Both Rawle and Story rejected the limitation on the ground that it would "render the power of impeachment a nullity . . . until Congress pass laws, declaring what shall constitute the other 'high crimes and misdemeanors'."<sup>126</sup> Theoretically it was open to Congress immediately to enact a complete Code of impeachable offenses, and given room for leisurely analysis it might have perceived that the English precedents were reducible to manageable categories.<sup>127</sup> But the Congress was engaged in weightier tasks, in erecting a novel structure of government, in fleshing out the bare bones of the Constitution. The meager role that criminal legislation played in this endeavor may be gathered from the negligible handful of criminal statutes that were enacted by a succession of early Congresses. Whatever the merits of the no-federal-common-law-crimes doctrine, the Senate, itself the tribunal for impeachments, has not embraced it, as its Delphic verdicts of guilty in the absence of statutory offenses indicate.<sup>128</sup> Nor has the Congress, the alter ego of the Senate as impeachment tribunal and the House as Grand Inquest, ever felt called upon to supply a Code of impeachable offenses, a tacit judgment that it does not deem such a Code necessary. These verdicts and that judgment seem to me to rest upon a sound historical basis.

Finally, a significant contrast exhibited by the terms of the impeachment provisions needs to be taken into account. Article I, § 3(7), provides Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification . . . but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment according to law.

The phrase "according to law" was omitted from article II, § 4,

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers . . . shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of Treason, Bribery, or other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

That omission, when contrasted with the association of "indictments" and "according to law" in § 3, can be read to indicate an intention to demarcate criminal trials under traditional criminal law from impeachments which had been triable under the "course of Parliament," in order to insure that the measure of impeachable conduct would not be the criterion of punishment following conviction upon indictment. Conversely, indictment "according to law" was not to furnish the test of the curative removal from office by impeachment. Indictability, it is safe to say, was not made the measure of impeachment.

1. Is Impeachment a Criminal Proceeding?

A more arresting question, and one that has not received the attention it deserves, is whether the Constitutional impeachment provisions, <sup>126</sup> Rawle, supra note 15, at 273; Story, supra note 12, at § 795. For an earlier critique of the view that there was a federal common law of crime, see 1 Tucker's Blackstone, App. (part I), 378 (1803) (hereinafter cited as Tucker).

<sup>127</sup> See text accompanying notes 82-92 supra. I would therefore differ with Story's statement that "political offenses are of so various and complex a character, so utterly incapable of being defined or classified, that the task of positive legislation would be impracticable, if it were not almost absurd to attempt it." Story, supra note 12, § 797. Nevertheless, Congress has never undertaken the task. So long, although authorized by article I, § 8(10) "To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas," Congress left the task to the courts. The Act of March 3, 1819, c. 77, § 5, 3 Stat. 519-14 (1819), provides a death penalty for one who is found "on the high seas [to] commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations." Thus it was left to the courts to select from the "law of nations." Again, "From 1799 to the present, Congress has made no definitive statement concerning grand jury powers." United States v. Cox, 342 F.2d 197, 186 (5th Cir. 1965) (Wisdom, J., concurring).

particularly when viewed in the context of the fifth and sixth amendments, set up a criminal proceeding at all. Undoubtedly English impeachments were criminal, though by the lex parlamentaria, because conviction could be followed by death, imprisonment or heavy fine. Our impeachment provisions may seem to point in the direction of criminality because they employ criminal terminology. For example, article II, § 4, provides for removal from office on "conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Article III, § 2(3) provides that, "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." And article II, § 2(1), empowers the President to "grant pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment"; and the function of a pardon is to exempt from punishment for a crime.<sup>129</sup> Then there are the references by the Founders to impeachment in terms of punishment.<sup>130</sup> But article I, § 3(7), earlier quoted, sharply separates "removal from office" from subsequent punishment after indictment, in contrast to the English practice which wedded criminal punishment and removal in one proceeding. From the text of the Constitution there emerges a leading purpose: partisan passions should no longer give rise to political executions.<sup>131</sup> Removal would enable the government to replace an unfit officer with a proper person, a measure essential to maintenance of efficient government,<sup>132</sup> leaving "punishment" to a later and separate criminal proceeding. Anomalies remain and will be discussed: why the pardon, why the exemption from "trial" of all crimes by jury; but the starting point, to borrow from Story, is that impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.<sup>133</sup> that is, it disqualifies him to hold office.

In a statement which anticipated Story, James Wilson came close to saying that the problem posed by double jeopardy is met by reading impeachment in non-criminal terms:

Impeachments . . . come not . . . within the sphere of ordinary jurisprudence. They are founded on different principles; are governed by different maxims, and are directed to different objects; for this reason, the trial and punishment of an offense on impeachment, is no bar to a trial [and punishment] of the same offense at common law.<sup>134</sup>

In a word, the separation of removal from criminal prosecution poses the problem of double jeopardy unless the removal proceedings is read in non-criminal terms. If impeachment is not criminal, it may be asked, why was it deemed necessary to have a saving clause for subsequent indictment and punishment? Possibly the saving clause was designed to preclude an inference from the unmistakable criminal nature of the English impeachment that an impeachment could be pleaded in bar to a subsequent criminal prosecution, an excess of caution.<sup>155</sup> To read impeachment in criminal terms is to raise a constitutional doubt whether a subsequent indictment and trial offends against the fifth amendment ban of double jeopardy, a doubt which the courts are under a duty to avoid.<sup>156</sup>

Although Wilson tacitly assumed that but for the non-criminal nature of impeachment double jeopardy would apply, at common law autre fois acquit and autre fois convict were confined to jeopardy of life.<sup>157</sup> The fifth amendment also provides, "nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb"; and early district courts therefore excluded "mere misdemeanors," and even an "infamous and severely punishable offense," from its protective scope.<sup>158</sup> But the Supreme Court, in 1873, noting inter alia that Chitty had dropped "life and limb" and substituted "placed in peril of legal penalties upon the same accusation," concluded that the "constitutional provision must be applied in all cases . . ."<sup>159</sup> To the extent that impeachment retains a residual punitive aura, it may be compared to deportation, which is attended by very painful consequences, but which, the Supreme Court held, "is not a punishment for a crime . . . It is but a method of enforcing the return to his own country of an alien who has not complied with the conditions" laid down for his residence,<sup>160</sup> precisely as impeachment is designed to remove an unfit officer for the good of the government.

But the House of Lords had long decided both issues in one trial, and I see no impropriety in dividing the issues for two trials before the same tribunal. Courts frequently hear civil cases which may be damaging to the defendant's reputation and then turn to the criminal side to try charges arising from the same facts.

Is there inconsistency in principle in declining to read back into the impeachment provisions the later formulated "no federal common law crimes" doctrine while reading "life and limb" in the later and broader judicial fashion? First, James Wilson understood the removal provisions to be non-criminal and consequently considered the double jeopardy principle to be inapplicable. Second, the impeachment provisions conferred upon Congress an essential executive removal power which is subsequently self-limiting judicial doctrine. The federal common law crimes cannot curtail this. Over the years Congress has tacitly considered the doctrine inapplicable to its impeachment function. The guarantee against double jeopardy, on the other hand, is for the benefit of the individual; it does not purport to cut down an essential power conferred upon one of the branches, and like other constitutional guarantees, e.g., due process, has been broadened over the years.

If impeachment be deemed a "criminal prosecution," it is difficult to escape the requirement of trial by jury. Earlier, article III, § 2(3) had expressly exempted impeachment from the jury "Trial of all Crimes"; and with that exemption before them, the draftsmen of the sixth amendment extended trial by jury to "all criminal prosecutions," without exception, thereby exhibiting an intention to withdraw the former exception.<sup>141</sup> Either we must conclude that the Founders felt no need to exempt impeachment from the sixth amendment because they did not consider it a "criminal prosecution," or that jury trial is required if impeachment be in fact a "criminal prosecution." One who would make "all" mean less than "all" has the burden of proving why the ordinary meaning should not prevail.<sup>142</sup> Speaking in another context of the article III and sixth amendment jury trial provisions, the Supreme Court said, "If there be any conflict between these two provisions, the one found in the amendment must control, under the well-understood rule that the last expression of the will of the law-maker prevails over the earlier one."<sup>143</sup> If impeachment be deemed criminal in nature, the problem is not to be solved by reading an exception from "criminal prosecution" into the sixth amendment. The companion fifth amendment clause, "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces," shows that the draftsmen knew well enough how to carve out exceptions. It is not for us to interpolate exceptions that they withheld. No need exists to read "exceptions" into the sixth amendment if impeachment is regarded merely as a removal procedure rather than a criminal trial, as the structure of the article I, § 3(7) impeachment provision itself indicates. And if, contrary to my view, impeachment is indeed a criminal proceeding, the task of reading an exception into the amendment is not for the Senate but for the Supreme Court.

Simpson tells us that the point "that criminal impeachments should be tried by a jury" was "made and overruled in the Blount impeachment,"<sup>144</sup> but he does less than justice to the facts. True, Jefferson, then Vice President, noted that a motion would be made to incorporate in a proposed bill for regulating impeachments in the Senate, "a clause for the introduction of juries into these trials." (Compare the paragraph in the Constitution which says, that all crimes,

<sup>143</sup> Simpson, supra note 15, at 66, dismisses the impact of the sixth amendment on the ground that it was adopted to secure jury trials "in the ordinary civil and criminal suits." He is plainly mistaken as to "criminal suits," for express provision had already been made by Article III, § 2(3) for the "trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment . . . by jury," and it was that provision that triggered the drive for the seventh amendment provision for jury trial in civil cases. For citations, see Berger, Impeachment of Judges and "Good Behavior" Tenure, 79 Yale L.J. 1475, 1489-90 (1970). Although that concern was preponderant, it was not necessarily exclusive. Provision for "ordinary" civil suits did not require a departure from the exception made for "cases of impeachment" in article III in favor of the all-inclusive "In all criminal Prosecutions" of the sixth amendment. Moreover, as the debate in North Carolina revealed in the very context of impeachment, there was distrust of Congress "dangerous latitude of construction": See text accompanying note 301 infra. On the eve of the first impeachment, Jefferson thought the sixth amendment relevant to impeachment trials, see text accompanying note 145 infra. All this, of course, on the debatable assumption that impeachment envisaged a "criminal prosecution."

except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, with the eighth amendment [the sixth], which says, that in all criminal prosecutions, the trial shall be by jury.) There is no expectation of carrying this, because the division in the Senate is of two to one . . . ." <sup>135</sup> Apparently the motion failed, <sup>136</sup> but this by no means disposes of the issue. Many months after failure of the motion <sup>137</sup> Blount filed what was in effect a plea to the jurisdiction, based on three points: 1) a right to trial by jury under the sixth amendment; 2) a Senator is not a "civil officer" within the meaning of the impeachment provision; and 3) he was not charged with malconduct in office, <sup>138</sup> but with actions in his private capacity. Opening for the Managers of the prosecution, Congressman Bayard halfheartedly argued that from the jury-trial claim "it must necessarily follow that the whole of their [the Senate] judicial authority is abolished . . ." But he himself recognized that it was not at all a "necessary" deduction when he made his final observation on the point, impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender, as to secure the State. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity [office]. <sup>139</sup>

In short, lacking punishment or impact on life or property, the proceeding was not the trial of a "crime," and hence the judicial authority of the Senate could be maintained and exercised. For whatever reason, Dallas, counsel for Blount, did not argue the jury-trial point but confined himself to the other two. <sup>140</sup> The Senate was persuaded by the plea "that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction," <sup>141</sup> a statement that, as regards the jury-trial point, is to say the least equivocal. Virtual abandonment of that point on argument removed the necessity of ruling on it; and the Senate ruling is compatible with Bayard's argument that impeachment is unaffected by the sixth amendment because it is a non-criminal proceeding. <sup>142</sup>

Yet another difficulty arises, from article II, § 2 provision that exempts impeachments from the Presidential power to "grant pardons for offenses." Blackstone treats "offenses" as virtually synonymous with "crimes" <sup>143</sup> and a pardon comes into play to exempt from punishment for a crime. <sup>144</sup> Let me attempt an explanation for this confusing cross-

<sup>144</sup> See note 129 supra. Simpson, supra note 15, at 34, stated, "The only inference that can be fairly drawn from the use of the word 'offenses' in Article II, Section 2, instead of the word 'crimes,' is that it was recognized that there were 'offenses against the United States' which were not crimes, and all those, including fines, penalties, and forfeitures, could be pardoned by the President; but for 'offenses' resulting in a conviction upon impeachment, the President was not to be permitted to pardon." Apparently Simpson considers that impeachment is grounded upon an "offense" that is not a crime, see also id. at 33-37, 40-41.

Like Simpson, I consider that the American impeachment process is not criminal, but I can not as easily deprive "offenses" of its normal "criminal" connotations. See current. The Framers had the English practice constantly before their eyes; doubtless they were aware that the Act of Settlement (1700) foreclosed the plea of pardon to an impeachment, though it remained open to the King to issue a pardon after conviction.<sup>152</sup> Here was a flaw to be avoided, and it is quite possible that the Framers did not pause to think though the impact of this exception upon the division they had instituted between impeachment and subsequent indictment. Since the Framers were following the English pattern in important respects, it was the counsel of prudence to bar a pardon after impeachment and conviction, notwithstanding that the separation of removal from subsequent indictment had rendered it unnecessary.<sup>153</sup> In the crowded effort to erect an unprecedented structure of government, the Framers might well have overlooked some lack of harmony in detail. Marks of haste are apparent on the face of the instrument, e.g. the provision which enables Congress to punish treason is not found in article I, the legislative article, but in the judicial article III; the provision for impeachment of judges is inferentially included in the article II, executive article, phrase "all civil officers." Words like "offense," "convict," "high crimes" had been employed in the English impeachment process; and a thorough-going attempt to clarify the non-penal aspect of removal would have required the Framers to coin a fresh and different vocabulary, perhaps an insuperable task in all the circumstances. They were content to furnish practical answers to manifest problems, to prevent, for example, a Presidential pardon from undoing the impeachment of a Presidential favorite. One need not be completely persuaded by such explanations and yet prefer them to the difficulties presented by the double jeopardy and trial by jury amendments. It is not given to the historian retrospectively to impose a tidy scheme upon the unruly facts; he must be content to take account of anomalies and to resolve ambiguity by making what appears to be the best available choice.

2. The Limits of "High Crimes and Misdemeanors"

Pressing for the impeachment of Justice Douglas, Congressman Ford, it will be recalled, asserted that an "impeachable offense" is whatever House and Senate jointly "consider [it] to be."<sup>154</sup> The Records make quite plain that the Framers, far from meaning to confer illimitable power to impeach and convict, intended to confer a limited power.

Before Mason moved to add "maladministration" to "Treason, bribery," he explained that,

Treason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of Treason note 129 supra; text accompanying note 153 infra. Simpson furnished no evidence for the assignment of a double meaning to "offenses," no explanation why penalties such as "fines and forfeitures" should be excluded from the norms of criminal sanctions. Where they were clearly "civil" in nature, the likelihood that a "pardon" would come into question was remote. The exemption of impeachment, in a word, is not explicable on the Simpson analysis.

<sup>152</sup> Act of Settlement, 12 & 13 Will. III, c. 2, § 3 (1700); 1 Chitty, supra note 7, at 783; see also note 7 supra.

Thus Mason proposed to "extend the power of impeachment" to reach "great and dangerous offenses," "attempts to subvert the Constitution," by adding "maladministration." But Madison demurred because "so vague a term [as maladministration] will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate," and "high crimes and misdemeanors" was accepted in its place. Manifestly, this substitution was made for the purpose of limiting, not expanding the initial Mason proposal.<sup>190</sup> Earlier the Convention had rejected "high misdemeanors" in another context because it "had a technical meaning too limited,"<sup>191</sup> so that adoption of "high crimes and misdemeanors" exhibits an intent to embrace the "limited," "technical meaning" of the words for purposes of impeachment. That consequence would attach in any event, for use of a technical term, "fully ascertained by the common or civil law" would require reference to that law "for its precise meaning."<sup>192</sup> If "high crimes and misdemeanors" had an ascertainable content at the time the Constitution was adopted—as was the fact—that content furnishes the boundaries of the power. It is no more open to Congress to stray beyond those boundaries than it is to include in the companion word "bribery" an offense such as "robbery" which had a quite different common law connotation.<sup>193</sup> The design of the Framers to confer

<sup>192</sup> United States v. Jones, 26 F. Cas. 633, 635 (No. 15, 494) (C. Ct. Pa. 1813) (per Justice Bushrod Washington). Chief Justice Marshall said of the word "robbery" in a statute that "it must be understood in the sense in which it is recognized and defined at common law." United States v. Palmer, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 610, 636 (1818). So too, "the word 'jury' and the words 'trial by jury' were placed in the Constitution . . . with reference to the meaning attached to them in the law as it was in this country and in England at the adoption of the Constitution." Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 344 (1898).

This was the common view, as is illustrated by Jefferson's transmittal of a draft of a Virginia criminal code to George Wythe, in which he explained that he sought to preserve "the very words of the established law, wherever their meaning had been succeeded by judicial decisions or rendered technical by usage," in order, as he added in a subsequent "Note," to give no occasion for new questions by new expressions." Quote in Bursi, Treason in the United States, 53 Harv. L. Rev. 233-54 (1941).

It is reasonable to infer that the Framers were familiar with English impeachment trials. As early as 1731, William Smith, in an opinion rendered to the New York Assembly, quoted Article 3 of the Clarendon Impeachment. Quoted J. Smith, Cases & Materials on Development of Legal Institutions 439, 442 (1967). Several colonial libraries in New York had various collections of the State Trials. P. For his Manual of Parliamentary Practice (1801), reprinted to the Senate Manual (53rd Cong. 1893): 61-125 Vice President Jefferson embedded the debates in Parliament and the State Trials. For impeachment materials, see id. at 149-153. In a letter to the Boston Gazette, January 4, 1793, Josiah Quincy, Jr. directed attention to the scope of impeachment in England and to the impeachment of leading English statesmen across the centuries, drawing on Selden's Par. Parl. (Rushworth's Collections), the Lords' Journal, Quincy, Massachusetts Reports, 1761-1772 580-84 (1866).

Since, he said, "high crimes and misdemeanors" are not defined by any statute of the United States (nor, it may be added, by any English statute), "Resort, then, must be had either to parliamentary practice and the common law, in order to ascertain what are high crimes and misdemeanors, or the whole subject must be left to the arbitrary discretion of the Senate. . . ." Id. at § 796, 798. Cf. Marshall, C.J. in United States v. Wilson, 32 U.S. (7 Pet. 159, 159 (1833).

a limited power is confirmed by their rejection of removal by Address which knew no limits.<sup>163</sup>

Even so, some uneasiness apparently was excited by the breadth of the power, for there were repeated assurances that impeachment was meant only for "great offenses," "great misdemeanors." James Iredell, later to be a Supreme Court Justice, told the North Carolina Convention that the "occasion for its exercise [impeachment] will arise from acts of great injury to the community. . . ."<sup>164</sup> Impeachment, said Governor Johnston in that Convention, "is a mode of trial pointed out for great misdemeanors against the public."<sup>165</sup> From James Wilson's expression of hope in the Pennsylvania Convention that impeachments "will seldom happen,"<sup>166</sup> it is inferable that he too was concerned only with serious misconduct. In this the Founders were but reflecting English sentiment, as was well put by Solicitor General, later Lord Chancellor, Somers, who stated in Parliament in 1691, "The power of Impeachment ought to be, like Goliath's sword, kept in the temple, and not used but on great occasions."<sup>167</sup>

The peaks of the English practice were evidently familiar to the Founders. In the Federal Convention George Mason said "corruption" would be impeachable; Gouverneur Morris agreed that "corruption and some few other offenses" ought to be impeachable. Madison added that protection against the "negligence or perfidy of the Chief Magistrate" were "indispensable." The President, said Madison, "might pervert his administration into a scheme of peculation or oppression. He might betray his trust to a foreign power." Morris added that he "may be bribed . . . to betray his trust," and recalled that "Charles II was bribed by Louis XIV."<sup>168</sup>

In the Virginia Ratification Convention Madison stated that "if the President be connected, in any suspicious manner with any person, and there be grounds to believe that he will shelter him" he may be impeached. He also stated that, "Were the President to commit anything so atrocious as to summon only a few States [i.e. Senators to consider a treaty]" he would be impeached for a "misdemeanor."<sup>169</sup> Corbin and Pendleton considered the giving of "bad advice" impeachable.<sup>170</sup> In North Carolina Iredell said, "I suppose the only instances, <sup>163</sup> 2 Farrand supra note 108, at 428. Speaking of the Act of Settlement (1700), Todd properly remarks that the removal by Address "is, in fact, a qualification or exception from the words creating a tenure during good behavior and not an incident or legal consequence thereof." The power "may be invoked upon occasions when the misbehavior complained of would not constitute a legal breach of the conditions on which the office is held," i.e. when they would not amount to "misbehavior" in law. A Todd, Parliamentary Government, 193 (Waspole ed. 1892). The terms of the Act confirm his construction: "Judges' Commissions (to) be made Regnum se bene deserviant . . . but upon the Address of both House of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them." 12 & 13 Will. <sup>167</sup> 5 New Parl'ys. Hist. 678 (1691). His view was immediately paraphrased by Attorney General Treby, later Chief Justice of Common Pleas: "Impeachments are seldom used, as not fit on common occasions. . . ."Id. So too, when the impeachment of the Earl of Grey was proposed, Sir Thomas Clifford said he "would not have the sword of this House of Impeachments be blunted upon offenses of this nature. . . . Would have impeachments of this nature upon great and considerable occasions." The Commons voted that the accusation "be left to be prosecuted at law." 4 Howell, supra note 7, at 913, 919, 920 (1690). In this country Story said that impeachments is "intended for occasional and extraordinary cases, where a superior power, acting for the whole people, is put into operation to protect their rights and to rescue their liberties from violation." 1 Story, supra note 12, at § 731.

in which the President would be liable to impeachment, would be where he had received a bribe, or had acted from some corrupt motive or other.<sup>173</sup> General C. C. Pinckney said in South Carolina that those are impeachable "who behave amiss, or betray their public trust." An abuse of trust by the President, there said Edward Rutledge, was impeachable.<sup>174</sup> The net effect of these remarks, it seems to me, is to preclude resort to impeachment for petty misconduct. Such is also the implication of Hamilton's reference to "[T]he awful discretion which a court of impeachment must necessarily have, to doom to honor or to infamy the most confidential and the most distinguished character of the community. . . ."<sup>175</sup> He was not thinking of a sledgehammer to crush a fly. Senate power, then, was not designed to be unlimited; rather as Story said, "what are and what are not high crimes and misdemeanors is to be ascertained by a recurrence to English law."<sup>176</sup>

One case of impeachable conduct in England mentioned by Story, the rendering of unconstitutional opinions,<sup>177</sup> merits special notice. The subservient judges of Charles I had held that the "Ship-Money Tax" was constitutional,<sup>178</sup> a judgment rejected by an outraged Commons, which later impeached the judges.<sup>179</sup> Under our Constitution, however, the determination whether a measure is constitutional was left to the final determination of the judiciary. James Wilson flatly rejected the suggestion, made in the Pennsylvania Ratification Convention in order to cast doubt on the security which he had stressed was provided by an independent judiciary, that judges are to be impeached because they decide an act null and void, that was made in defiance of the Constitution? What House of Representatives would dare to impeach, or Senate to commit, judges for the performance of their duty.<sup>178</sup>

A similar statement was made by Gerry;<sup>179</sup> and that conclusion is inherent in the very nature of judicial review. Once it is granted that noted that "in England . . . ministers that advised illegal measures were liable to impeachment, for advising the king" 4 id., at 208; see also statement of Iredell, note 91 supra.

<sup>176</sup> Apparently Story, supra note 12, at § 786, conceived of removal by impeachment "upon the mere ground of political usurpation or malversation in office, admitting of endless varieties, from the slightest guilt up to the most flagrant corruption." But he did not explain his "slightest guilt" nor take note of the assurances in the several conventions, including the history of the adoption of "high crimes and misdemeanors." Nor did he seek to reconcile it with his statement in § 751, quoted note 167 supra.

Mention only can be made of several associated problems: does out-of-court conduct which damages confidence in the administration of justice constitute a "great offense"? Are the examples of official misconduct, i.e. misconduct in office, cited by the Founders merely illustrative or preclusive and intended to repudiate the branch of English practice which dealt with out-of-court misconduct? Must we view rejection of removal "at the pleasure of Congress" as a bar to removal for just cause? For example, did Judge Ritter's acceptance of substantial gifts from wealthy residents of his district<sup>181</sup> constitute a "great offense"? Had litigation of the donors been pending before him, acceptance of the gifts would have amounted to bribery. Substantial gifts in the absence of pending cases are a step removed, but they raise the question: why did divers donors shower the judge with gifts. It was not sheer coincidence which caused them to break out in a rash of generosity and to select this precise individual as the object of their benefactions. Is it unreasonable to infer that they expected to influence his judgment in future cases in which men of property may expect to be involved? Judge Ritter received these gifts by reason of his office, and the Senate could fairly infer, in the words of a charge against Lord Treasurer Middlesex that this was "Corruption shadowed under pretext of a New Year's Gift. . . ."<sup>182</sup> If, unlike Middlesex, Ritter did not use "the power of his place . . . to wrest" these gifts from the donors, it is justly inferable that "the power of his place" was the sole inducement thereto.<sup>183</sup> And as in the case of Lord Halifax, his acceptance of those gifts "open[ed] a way to all manner of corrupt practices."<sup>184</sup>

Instead of engaging in such refinements the Senate convicted Ritter on the charge that his offense was "to bring his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice therein, and to the prejudice of public respect and confidence in the Federal judiciary. . . ."<sup>185</sup> For this there was a precedent in the charge that Chief Justice Scroggs, by his "notorious excess and debaucheries" brought "the highest scandal on the public justice of the kingdom."<sup>186</sup> Vast powers, greater than those entrusted to English judges, were granted to our courts. Unlike English judges, it is given to them to set aside legislation enacted by the representatives of the people. Their judgments, going from time to time to issues that divide the nation, depend on acceptance by the people, acceptance which in large part derives from the respect the judiciary, and in particular the Supreme Court, has enjoyed. misconduct which vitiates that respect saps an important foundation of our government.<sup>187</sup> Although Ritter's misconduct did not constitute the "high treason" with which Scroggs was charged, it may well be regarded as a "great offense" within the compass of "high crimes and misdemeanors."<sup>188</sup> But this is a matter that requires more extensive investigation than is possible within the scope of this article.

II. THE ROLE OF POLITICS—MOTIVATION OF THE FRAMERS

In a comment on the Resolution for the impeachment of Justice Douglas introduced in the House on April 16, 1970, by Representative Gerald R. Ford, Milton Viorst states,

110 sponsors of the anti-Douglas resolution are all conservative Republicans and Dixiecrats. This seems persuasive evidence in support of the hypothesis which virtually everyone in Washington accepts: that the undertaking seeks not simply to impeach William Orville Douglas but to discredit the liberalism inherent in the domestic programs of Democratic Administrations since the New Deal . . .<sup>189</sup>

Representative Ford all but conceded that his Resolution was in retaliation for the Senate's rejection of two of President Nixon's nominees to the Supreme Court.<sup>190</sup> 'Twas ever thus; impeachment was "essentially a political weapon" from its inception in 1388;<sup>191</sup> and so it continued to be when it was revived in the reign of James I in order to bring his corrupt and oppressive ministers to heel.<sup>192</sup> But where the object of Jacobean impeachments had been the "reformation of abuses and not the venting of private spleen or party hatreds,"<sup>193</sup> where the impeachment of the Earl of Strafford had been designed to break the back of Charles I's absolutist pretensions,<sup>194</sup> the moving force after the Restoration came to be party intrigue in a factional struggle for <sup>187</sup> Compare this with the words of Lord Chancellor Erskine in the proceedings respecting Justice Luke Fox (wherein articles of impeachment had been filed by the House of Commons with the House of Lords, and where the possibility of removal by Address to the King was under discussion): "The true question . . . had Mr. Justice Fox, by his misconduct, incurred to the degradation of our free government and constitution." 7 Parl'ys. Debates 768 (1806).

In one of the earliest American impeachments, that of Judge Francis Hopkinson in 1780, the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania stated "we conceive it to be indelicate for a Judge to accept presents from persons who frequently have business before him tho' no case be then depending. . . ." And it stated that it was of "highest importance . . . that the people should have a confidence in the integrity of the Judges." Hogan, Pennsylvania State Trials 58-59 (1795). Hopkinson was acquitted on factual grounds, and the tribunal resolved doubts in his favor, as is fitting in such case.

Chief Justice Taft, commenting on the impeachment of Judge Archbald, who had entered into advantageous deals with persons who had cases pending before him, stated in an address before the American Bar Association in 1917 that the conviction was most useful to demonstrating to all incumbents of the federal bench that they must be careful in their conduct outside of court as well as in the court itself, and that they must not use the prestige of their official position, directly or indirectly, to secure personal benefit.

<sup>190</sup> Facing up to the view of his Resolution as "retaliation for the rejection by the other body of two nominees for the Supreme Court, Judge Hagensworth and Judge Carswell," Ford said: "In a narrow sense, no. . . . But in a larger sense, I do not think there can be two standards for membership on the Supreme Court, one for Mr. Justice Fortas [who, Ford implies, resigned under pressure], another for Mr. Justice Douglas." 116 Cong. power.<sup>195</sup> From an "appeal to the nation against wicked ministers,"<sup>196</sup> impeachment was transformed into a clumsy means of striking at unpopular policies,<sup>197</sup> manifestly "political," and it was then supplanted by an Address of the Parliament to the King, which came to be regarded as a vote of censure and no confidence;<sup>198</sup> and thus by degrees ministerial accountability of the ministers to the Parliament was achieved.<sup>199</sup> While the Convention was sitting in Philadelphia the spectacular trial of Warren Hastings, spear-headed by Edmund Burke, the paladin of American liberty, was underway. Hear Macaulay on the Hastings impeachment:

Whatever confidence may be placed in the decision of the Peers on an appeal arising out of ordinary litigation, it is certain that no man has the least confidence in their impartiality, when a great public functionary, charged with a great state crime, is brought to their bar. They are all politicians. There is hardly one among them whose vote on an impeachment may not be confidently predicted before a witness has been examined.<sup>200</sup>

Impeachment did not change color in this country. When John Adams proposed in 1774 to impeach, and the Massachusetts Assembly filed charges against, the Justices because they had declined to renounce royal salaries in place of those theretofore paid by the Assembly's appropriation, what was this but political?<sup>201</sup> In the Convention Charles Pinckney warned that Congress, "under the influence of heat and faction," would "throw [the President] out of office."<sup>202</sup> A prophecy which barely fell short of realization 80 years later when the conviction of Andrew Johnson was narrowly defeated.<sup>203</sup> Explaining impeachment to the People who were being asked to adopt the Constitution, Hamilton stated that the prosecution of impeachments "will seldom fail to agitate the passions of the whole community, and to divide it into parties, more or less friendly or inimical, to the accused. In many cases, it will connect itself with the pre-existing factions . . . and in such cases there will always be the greatest danger, that the decision will be regulated more by the comparative strength of the parties, than by the real demonstrations of innocence or guilt."<sup>204</sup>

in the Judiciary which was practically an arm of the party;<sup>206</sup> judges, as in the case of Justice Samuel Chase, were making intemperate attacks on the Jefferson administration in harangues to the Grand Jury;<sup>207</sup> and it is little wonder that the infuriated Jeffersonians launched an impeachment of Chase. The Federalists "supported Chase completely in every test," and with the help of a group of Jeffersonians whom John Randolph, leader of the impeachment, had alienated by his opposition to a judicious compromise of the Yazoo claims,<sup>208</sup> saved Chase from richly deserved retribution. In a study of the role of partisan politics in the impeachment of judges since 1903, ten Broek found a correlation between votes and party affiliations; at times the voting split along party lines.<sup>209</sup> The impeachment of Judge Ritter in 1936 is thus described by Gerald Ford: "Judge Ritter was a transplanted conservative Colorado Republican appointed to the Federal bench in solidly Democratic Florida by President Coolidge. He was convicted by a coalition of liberal Republicans, New Deal Democrats, and Farmer-Labor and Progressive Party Senators in what might be called the northwestern strategy of that era."<sup>210</sup> Notwithstanding, it may be added, Representative Ford unhesitatingly borrowed the explanatory utterances of several Senators in that proceeding for his own proposal to impeach Justice Douglas.

In evaluating the uses of impeachment, therefore, we should not close our eyes to its political inception and continued political coloration, even in the cases of the English Justices who had offended the Parliament by assisting the king to carry out detested policies.<sup>211</sup> The drawing of political lines goes to the motivation behind the given impeachment; and here we need to recall that in the great English impeachments the charges were often the sheerest facade for a politically motivated proceeding. But be the motivation what it may, in this country impeachment must proceed within the confines of "high crimes and misdemeanors" as they had taken form in 1787. The fact that the Founders further emphasized that impeachment was framed for "great offenses," "great misdemeanors," may well be attributable to their desire to reduce the impact of factionalism. The critical focus should therefore be not on political animus, for that is the nature of the beast, but on whether Congress is proceeding within the limits of "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Congressman Ford, to be sure, maintains that the impeachment process was meant to enforce the tenure for "good behavior," a more elastic phrase which permits removal for misbehavior; and in addition to the several quotations from the Ritter case he could have quoted still other and earlier remarks to the same effect. But my own study has convinced me that "good behavior" was a doctrine entirely separate from "high crimes and misdemeanors"; that it had its own enforcement machinery, in no wise allied to impeachment; that in England impeachment proceeded solely for "high crimes and misdemeanors," not for a breach of "good behavior"; that almost all of the evidence in the Convention excludes an intention to wed the two. For this I have elsewhere set forth the extensive proof.<sup>212</sup> Here it must suffice to say only that a Convention which rejected Mason's "maladministration" as "so vague" and replaced it with the "limited," "technical" "high crimes and misdemeanors" hardly intended to pump into "high crimes and misdemeanors" all that is included in the equally "vague" "misbehavior."

Why, one asks, did the Framers take up this faction-ridden mechanism which, long before the Hastings trial, had seen its best days. For with the achievement of ministerial accountability to Parliament early in the 18th Century, the prime purpose of impeachment had been accomplished and thenceforth it found but infrequent use.<sup>213</sup> Then too, the successful struggle for ministerial accountability to Parliament was not really relevant to a system which set up three separate, independent departments, and made Cabinet members responsible to the President, not to Congress.<sup>214</sup> Professor Chafee considered that

The British situation is obvious to us, but it was not obvious to the men who framed our Constitution. . . . They thought of the King as the Chief Executive and replaced him by the President. . . . You cannot get rid of a King by a hostile vote in the legislature, and perhaps their minds stopped there. The importance of a majority vote in Parliament for getting rid of the King's main advisers was overlooked.<sup>215</sup>

There was no confusion on this score. Governor Morris reminded the Convention that the President "is not the King, but the prime Minister,"<sup>216</sup> and that in England the prime Minister was "the real King."<sup>217</sup> Iredell adverted to the maxim that the King can do no wrong and exulted in the "happier" American provision which made the President himself triable.<sup>218</sup> Thus they made sure to reach the topmost executive by impeachment. Nor did the Framers overlook "the importance of a majority vote in the Parliament for getting rid of the King's main advisers." In setting up an independent President who was to serve for a term, and in making cabinet officers a part of the Executive branch, the Framers surely were aware that a mere vote of no confidence could not, as in England, topple a Secretary.<sup>219</sup>

<sup>219</sup> Consider Butler's remark in the Convention on May 30th, when Randolph proposed three separate departments, that he had "opposed the grant of powers to Congress (under the Articles of Confederation), heretofore, because the whole power was vested in one body. The proposed distribution of the powers into different bodies changes the case. . . ." 1 Farrand, supra note 108, at 34. That Congress, Butler surely knew, appointed the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. And the suggestion, rejected by the Convention, that the national legislature appoint the President, 2 id. 66-68, again indicates some awareness that the Prime Minister owed his office to Parliament. The Framers knew the English practice and consciously diverged from it. Cf. Madison, 2 id. at 59.

Indeed they rejected legislative removal by Address of Judges, members of another independent branch.<sup>220</sup> It was because the separation of powers left no room for removal by a vote of no confidence that impeachment was adopted as a safety-valve, a security against an oppressive or corrupt President and his sheltered ministers.

Like the Colonists before them, the Founders were haunted by the threat to liberty of illimitable greed for power.<sup>221</sup> Before them marched the shade of despotic Kings;<sup>222</sup> they were familiar with absolutists Stuart claims; and many dreaded that a single Executive might tend to monarchy.<sup>223</sup> Franklin asked, "What was the practice before this where the Chief Magistrate rendered himself obnoxious? Why recourse was had to assassination. . . ."<sup>224</sup> Impeachment was preferable. Fear of Presidential abuses prevailed over frequent objections that impeachment threatened his independence.<sup>225</sup> "No point," said Mason, "is of more importance than that the right of impeachment should be continued."<sup>226</sup>

This may seem strange in light of Madison's warning that all power tended to be drawn into the "Legislative vortex."<sup>227</sup> It is true that the Framers had come to fear legislative excesses as a result of the State post-1776 experience;<sup>228</sup> and they forced the Congress about with a number of restraints, e.g. a Presidential veto and judicial review. But the Colonial Assemblies had been the darling of the Colonists, elected by themselves, not thrust upon them by a distant King as were judges and Governors.<sup>229</sup> At the end of the Colonial period

The records of the Federal and Ratification Conventions indicate that the adoption of impeachment was anything but "unthinking." The objective of the Founders, I suggest, was that outlined by an English barrister in 1791, who, writing a century after achievement of ministerial accountability, adverted to the "obvious" and "great" "advantage, which impeachments afford, as a check and terror to bad Ministers," and cited as "an additional reason why it ought to be cherished by Englishmen . . . that it furnishes the most effectual preservative against the corrupt administration of justice. . . . That Ministers are not now violating the principles of the Constitution, or that the administration of justice is now free from the slightest stain or suspicion of corruption, furnishes no reason for abolishing this mode of trial, for it is impossible to know, how much the security, with which we now enjoy our Constitution and Liberties, and how much of the satisfaction, with which we now confide in these unsuspected characters, that now grace the seats of justice, may be derived from the existence of this very institution. . . ." Quoted 4 Hatsell, supra note 24, at 69-70n, 253n. The Founders were very much aware of the lessons of the past. <sup>229</sup> Thus it was that James Wilson explained the predilection for the legislature, 1 Wilson, supra note 5, at 292-93. The persistence of this feeling may be gathered from his admission in 1791 that it was time to regard Executive and Judges equally with the legislature as representatives of the people. Id. at 293. Warning against the danger of legislative tyranny, Madison remarked that the "founders of our republics . . . seem never the prevalent belief, said Corwin, was that "the executive magistracy" was the natural enemy, the legislative assembly the natural friend of liberty. . . .<sup>230</sup> To the radical Whig mind, a potent influence on Colonial thinking, "the most insidious and powerful weapon of eighteenth century despotism" was the "power of appointment to offices." The Executive, it was feared, could fasten his grip on the community by placemen scattered strategically over the nation.<sup>231</sup> Such suspicions died hard, and when a choice had to be made the Framers preferred the Congress to the President, for as Madison explained in the Federalist, "In republican government, the legislative authority necessarily predominates."<sup>232</sup>

One thing is clear: in the impeachment debate the Convention was almost exclusively concerned with the President.<sup>233</sup> The extent to which the President occupied the center of the stage may be gathered from the fact that the addition to the impeachment clause of "the Vice President and all Civil officers" only took place on September 8th, shortly before the Convention adjourned.<sup>234</sup> But the Founders were also fearful of the ministers and favorites whom Kings had refused to remove,<sup>235</sup> and they dwelt repeatedly on the need of power to oust corrupt or oppressive ministers whom the President might seek to shelter. "Few ministers," said Nicholas in the Virginia Convention, "will ever run the risk of being impeached, when they know the King cannot protect them by a pardon."<sup>236</sup> and how much less against impeachment itself. No friend of the Constitution, Patrick Henry deplored the absence of "blocks and gibbets . . . those necessary instruments of justice." But he too looked to impeachment; Blackstone, he said, "tells you that the minister who will sacrifice the interest of the nation is subject to parliamentary impeachment. This has been ever found to be effectual."<sup>237</sup>

In our time impeachment of judges has become the predominant preoccupation, but we shall misconceive impeachment if we fail to grasp that to the Framers impeachment of judges was decidedly peripheral. It was only caught up in a last-minute interpolation in arti-

<sup>235</sup> The Founders' concern with removal of "favorites" emerges most clearly in the First Congress. Madison stated, "It is very possible that an officer who may not incur the displeasure of the President may be guilty of actions that ought to forfeit his place. The power of this House may reach him by means of an impeachment, and he may be removed even against the will of the President."

Similar remarks were made by Benson, id. at 382; Livermore, id. at 478; Lawrence, id. at 377, 482 and Goodhue, id. at 534. cle II, the executive article, when to the impeachment of the President was added without explanation "Vice President and all civil officers." That story, the effect of the judicial tenure for "good behavior," its relation, if any, to impeachment, the alleged exclusivity of the impeachment provisions for the removal of judges upon misconduct, is too lengthy for rehearsal here. One may doubt whether the considerations which fed apprehensiveness of the President and his favorites had any play with respect to judges who, because of their life-time tenure, conferred in order to insure judicial independence,<sup>238</sup> would now have no inducement to become tools of unpopular Presidential policy.<sup>239</sup> And one may wonder whether the persistence of partisan influence on judicial impeachments would have disappointed the hopes of the Founders who sought to set them apart from "every successive tide of party."<sup>240</sup>

III. JUDICIAL REVIEW

"The Constitution," said Charles Evans Hughes, "is what the judges say it is."<sup>241</sup> If "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors" likewise are what the Senate says they are, Congressman Gerald Ford did not err in asserting that "impeachable offenses" are what House and Senate jointly "consider [them] to be."<sup>242</sup> From Story onwards it has been thought that in the domain of impeachment the Senate has the last word;<sup>243</sup> that even the issue whether the charged misconduct constituted an impeachable offense is unreviewable because the trial of impeachments is confided to the Senate alone.<sup>244</sup> This view has the weighty approval of Professor Wechsler:

Who . . . would contend that civil courts may properly review a judgment of impeachment when article I, section 3 declares that the 'sole Power to try' is in the Senate? That any proper trial of an impeachment may present issues of the most important constitutional dimension . . . is simply immaterial in this connection.

<sup>239</sup> Madison said in the Virginia Convention, "Were I to select a power which might be given with confidence, it would be the judicial power." 3 Elliot, supra note 5, at 533; Congress v. Court, supra note 2, at 185-86.

<sup>240</sup> 1. Wilson, supra note 5, at 287. Writing in England in 1791, a barrister noted that impeachment "has been employed with less mixture of vindictive, or unwarrantable motives, when directed in this object [corrupt administration of justice] than when its terrors have been levelled against Favourites and Ministers." Quoted 4 Hatsell, supra note 24, at 10n. 253n.

<sup>243</sup> With respect to impeachment, said Story, "the true exposition of the Constitution" is a matter, "the final decision of which may reasonably be left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when the occasion shall arise." 1 Story, supra note 12, at 392, 395. See also Rawls, supra note 15, at 219; Ross, supra note 161, at 125, 26.

<sup>244</sup> In Ritter v. United States, 54 Ct. Cl. 293 (1936), cert. denied 300 U.S. 663 (1937), the court dismissed a suit wherein an impeached judge contended that the Senate had exceeded its jurisdiction in trying him on charges which did not constitute impeachable offenses under the Constitution, saying that the provision which conferred upon the Senate "the sole power to try all impeachments" (U.S. Const. art. I, § 3) meant that "no other tribunal should have any jurisdiction of the cases tried under the provisions with reference to impeachment." 54 Ct. Cl. at 296.

What is explicit in the trial of an impeachment or, to take another case, the seating or expulsion of a Senator or Representative, may well be found in others.<sup>245</sup>

On one branch of his assertion, the "seating" of a Representative, Professor Wechsler has since been repudiated by the Supreme Court in Powell v. McCormack,<sup>246</sup> which reviewed and set aside the exclusion of Congressman Adam Clayton Powell from the House for serious misconduct. That decision calls for reconsideration of the scope of the Senate's "sole power to try" impeachments.

At issue in Powell were article I, § 2(2) which describes three qualifications which a Representative must meet, and Article I, § 5(1) which provides that "Each House shall be the judge of the . . . qualifications of its own members." In a suit against the Speaker of the House, Powell maintained that the exclusion was unconstitutional because exclusion was limited to the requirements of age, citizenship and residence contained in article I, § 2.<sup>247</sup> The House invoked the article I, § 5 provision empowering it to "judge the . . . qualifications of its own members," and went on to "note that under Art. I, § 3, the Senate has the 'sole power' to try all impeachments." And it argued that "these delegations (to 'judge,' to 'punish' and to 'try') to the Legislative Branch are explicit grants of 'judicial power' to the Congress and constitute specific exceptions to the general mandate of Art. III that the 'judicial power' shall be vested in the federal courts." In consequence, the House maintained, the Court could do no "more than to declare its lack of jurisdiction, to proceed."<sup>248</sup> The Court rejected the contention<sup>249</sup> and found the "political question" turned on an inquiry whether the claimed power had been committed to the House by the Constitution.<sup>250</sup>

The Court began with the established proposition that "it is the province and duty of the judicial department to determine . . . whether the powers of any branch of the government . . . have been exercised in conformity to the Constitution; and if they have not to treat their acts as null and void."<sup>251</sup> And it concluded that "in judging the qualifications of its members Congress is limited to the standing qualifications prescribed in the Constitution." Consequently "the House was without power to exclude [Powell] from its membership" on grounds of misconduct.<sup>252</sup> In other words, the power to "judge" does not permit the Senate to add to the Constitutional "qualifications." The point was admirably made by Senator Murdock in the debate on the unsuccessful attempt to exclude Senator William Langer in 1941: "Whoever heard the word 'judge' used as meaning the power to add to what already is the law."<sup>253</sup> The Senate, he stated, has no right "to add to the qualifications" enumerated in the Constitution; and, said Justice Douglas, concurring in Powell v. McCormack, "Senator Murdock stated the correct constitutional principle governing the present case."<sup>254</sup> Like the three qualifications of article I, § 2 (age, resident and citizenship) to which exclusion is limited, impeachment, by article II, § 4, is confined to three grounds, "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," which circumscribe the Senate's "sole power to try impeachments." The "sole power to try impeachments" does not enlarge these three grounds. For the "power to try" is limited by the power to "convict," and by the express terms of article II, § 4, only "on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" may the President "be removed."

A threshold question is whether a misconstruction of "treason," for example, is the equivalent of adding a fourth category, as was "misconduct" in Powell. Let us test the analogy. The Senate may convict for "treason"; by article III, § 3, "treason" is defined as levying war against the United States or giving aid and comfort to its enemies. Suppose that the Senate convicts the President of treason on the ground that he attempted to subvert the Constitution, a favorite formula of Parliament.<sup>255</sup> Whether this be labelled as a "construction" or a "factual determination," it plainly amounts to an attempt to add an omitted category to the Constitutional definition.<sup>256</sup> When Mason suggested the addition to "Treason, bribery" of the word "maladministration," he explained to the Convention that "Treason . . . will not reach many great and dangerous offenses . . . Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined."<sup>257</sup> And James Wilson stated in the Pennsylvania Ratification Convention, "it has not been left to the legislature to extend the crime and punishment of treason so far as they thought proper."<sup>258</sup> To impeach for "treason" on grounds that are outside the Constitutional definition, therefore, lies beyond the powers conferred. Nor does a free-wheeling Senatorial power to expand the common-law definition of "bribery" stand any better.<sup>259</sup>

The phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is not as sharply defined as "treason" or "bribery," but it did have an ascertainable content in the English practice.<sup>260</sup> If the phrase leaves more latitude for judgment to the Senate, this is still not equivalent to unbridled discretion. For the last thing intended by the Framers was to leave the Senate free to declare any conduct whatsoever a "high crime and misdemeanor." Madison rejected "maladministration" because "so vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate";<sup>261</sup> and "high crimes and misdemeanors" was adopted in its place with knowledge that it had a "technical," "limited meaning," a meaning to be sought by recurrence to English practice.<sup>262</sup>

It may be objected that this analysis is too pat, that the three categories of Powell, "age, citizenship and residence," are quite clear, whereas "high crimes and misdemeanors" lack definite contours, that the Court would have no standards, no criteria whereby to settle the boundaries of the power thus conferred. The problem of "standards" was vastly greater in Baker v. Carr, the "reapportionment" case, where there were no precedents whatever to serve as guidelines, yet despite the "enormously difficult problem of working out standards for utilizing the equal protection provision in the apportionment cases" the Supreme Court entered the field.<sup>263</sup> The "standards" problem posed by "high crimes and misdemeanors" is very considerably less; the English practice if imprecise may yet be reduced to recognizable categories that serve as an outline such as was altogether lacking in "reapportionment."

When the constitutional boundaries of a power are in issue, the problem of "criteria," I suggest, is not really apposite. The "lack of criteria" test derives from Luther v. Borden, which arose out of the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island. In the aftermath "two groups laid competing claims to recognition as the lawful government," invoking the guarantee of a republican form of government.<sup>264</sup> The Court dwelt on the practical and evidentiary difficulties of determining whether the Rhode Island government sponsored by the Dorr faction was adopted by the "authorized" voters.<sup>265</sup> In substance, the Court refused to become involved in factual findings in a "political" struggle for power between competing State factions. Even so, it took care to differentiate and reserve the high power . . . of passing judgment upon the acts . . . of the legislative and executive branches of federal government, and of determining whether they are beyond the limits of power marked out for them respectively by the Constitution.<sup>266</sup>

In the performance of this function the Court has undertaken massive tasks of interpretation without any standards to guide it, as Baker v. Carr illustrates, and as the related path of case law pricking out the boundaries between State and federal powers under the "commerce clause," for example, again demonstrates.<sup>267</sup>

Another criterion of "political question," in the words of Justice Frankfurter, is the difficulty of "finding appropriate modes of relief."<sup>268</sup> A Court which did not boggle at the refractory remedial dif-facilities<sup>269</sup> posed by reapportionment<sup>270</sup> should not shy from entering a decree, in a suit to recover salary or in a quo warranto, ordering payment of the salary or restoration of the suitor to office.

The "political question" doctrine, in my judgment, has been seriously undermined by Baker v. Carr and Powell v. McCormack. That doctrine is a self-denying judicial construct without roots in constitutional history. No mention is made in the debates of the Framers and the Ratifiers that "political questions" should be excluded from the ambit of judicial review. Constitutional questions are inescapably "political."<sup>271</sup> In at least one pre-1787 case, Commonwealth v. Catton,<sup>272</sup> Judge George Wythe took for granted the justiciability of a dispute between the Virginia Senate and the House of Delegates. That dispute lay at the bottom of an appeal from a conviction for treason; and Wythe unhesitatingly assimilated the duty "to protect one branch of the legislature, and, consequently, the whole community, against the usurpations of the other;" to the judicial duty to protect "a solitary individual against the rapacity of the sovereign." It speaks volumes on whether a dispute between difference branches of government was deemed justiciable in 1782 that so eminent a scholar and jurist should not have experienced the slightest qualm on that score.

No case thus far has held that a legislative-executive conflict is non-justiciable. On the contrary, the Supreme Court has already acted "as umpire between Congress and the president"<sup>273</sup> in Myers v. United States,<sup>274</sup> and United States v. Lovett.<sup>275</sup> In Myers the Court permitted the Attorney General to attack a Congressionally enacted statute that limited the President's removal power; and as Justice Frankfurter remarked, "on the Court's special invitation Senator George Wharton Pepper, of Pennsylvania, presented the position of Congress [in opposition to the Attorney General] at the bar of this Court."<sup>276</sup> In United States v. Lovett, which involved a statute designed to force certain agencies to discharge respondents, the argument of counsel for Congress<sup>277</sup> was rejected that

In form, to be sure, both Myers and Lovett were private suits for recovery of salary, but in fact these were vigorous contests between Congress and the President. And in the teeth of a Congressional attempt to deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to review a provision curtailing the effect of a Presidential pardon, the Court held in United States v. Klein that the provision "impairs the executive authority,"<sup>279</sup> thus jumping into a political thicket with both feet. If the central "power" issue was "political," the curse was not removed because it was presented in a "private" litigation. "Some arbiter," said Justice Jackson, "is almost indispensable when power is . . . balanced between different branches, as the legislative and executive . . . Each unit cannot be left to judge the limits of its own power."<sup>280</sup> The courts, said Baker v. Carr, "cannot reject as 'no law suit' a bona fide controversy as to whether some action denominated 'political' exceeds constitutional authority."<sup>281</sup> For, said Chief Justice White in another "political question" case, it is the "ever present duty" of the courts "to enforce and uphold the applicable provisions of the Constitution as to each and every exercise of governmental power."<sup>282</sup>

Another argument against judicial review of impeachment is that the power to "try" and to issue a "judgment," article I, §3(7), is itself "judicial" and, in consequence the Court may not substitute its "judicial power" for that of the Senate. On this view, there is an exception from article III, §2, which provides that "The judicial power shall extend to all cases . . . arising under this Constitution." Rather than carve out an exception from this all-encompassing grant, I would suggest an accommodation, to read the "sole power to try all impeachments" as a grant of trial jurisdiction, for there is good reason to conclude that in 1787 the word "try" connoted a trial rather than an appeal.<sup>283</sup> Thereby effect would be given both to the Senate's <sup>285</sup> The related word "trial" was defined by Blackstone as "the examination of matters of fact to issue." 3 Blackstone, supra note 11, at 330. Probably this was too narrow, for it had earlier been deemed to include the trial of issues of law. J. Rastall, Trial in Les Termes de la Ley (London, ed 1742). But that it was thought of as the initial determination appears from Dr. Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language: "Trial is used in law for the examination of all causes. . . the trial is the issue, which is tried upon the indictment. . ." The affinity between "tried (try) and "trial" is worn through the old examples cited under "trial" and "try" in the Oxford English Dictionary.

True, Governor Morris stated that the Supreme Court "was to try the President after the trial of the impeachment." 2 Farrand, supra note 169, at 600, but this was an uninformed layman's loose use of legal terms, for the Court would not try the criminal charges but only bear an appeal therefrom. Hamilton, explaining the choice of the Senate as tribunal, also said "Would it be proper that the person who disposed of his fame . . . in one [impeachment] trial, should, in another trial, for the same offense, be also the disposers of power "to try" and to the Court's appellate jurisdiction under "all cases . . . arising under this Constitution," i.e. questions of law, of constitutionality, as distinguished from questions of fact settled by the trier of the facts.<sup>284</sup> Such an accommodation harmonizes with the Powell holding that the article I, § 5(1) provision "Each House shall be the Judge of the . . . Qualifications of its own Members" did not bar inquiry into action in excess of jurisdiction. Surely the power to "try" is not more comprehensive or final than the power to "judge";<sup>285</sup> nor is protection of the other branches from wrongful Congressional onslaughts more intrusive than review of the "qualifications of [the House's] own Members."

Perhaps the most formidable argument against judicial review may be based on the fact that the trial of impeachments was originally entrusted to the Supreme Court but was at length transferred to the Senate over the objections of Charles Pinckney and Madison.<sup>286</sup> Gouverneur Morris explained that the reason for the change was that the Supreme Court "was to try the President after the trial of the impeachment."<sup>287</sup> At a later point, he added, "no other tribunal than the Senate could be trusted. The Supreme Court were too few in number and might be warped or corrupted. . . ."<sup>288</sup> So too, Roger Sherman "regarded the Supreme Court as improper to try the President because the judges would be appointed by him."<sup>289</sup> These views were expanded by Hamilton in No. 65 of The Federalist. He emphasized that whereas the Senate would be "unawed" by the fact that the House lodged charges, it was doubtful whether the Supreme Court would be "endowed with so evident a portion of fortitude" to execute "so difficult a task."<sup>290</sup> But he himself later explained in Federalist No. 78 that judicial tenure was made secure in order that the courts would have the "fortitude" to set aside unconstitutional statutes enacted by both Houses and endorsed by the President.<sup>291</sup> Such decisions would engender no little political excitement. It was the part of wisdom to shield the Court from the heat of a trial crackling with political lightning; but the trial by the Senate would draw much of the lightning; and as the lawyers among the Founders knew from their own law practice, appellate tribunals generally do not operate in a super-heated atmosphere.

This is not to say that the prospect of reviewing an impeachment as passion-laden as that of President Andrew Johnson might not his life and his fortune." The Federalist, supra note 2, No. 65, at 426. Hamilton was too practiced a lawyer to confuse a trial and an appeal, and one may deduce that he was employing short-hand for the quick grasp by laymen, rather than attempting to alter the accepted meaning of the term "try."

<sup>284</sup> As Ellbridge Gerry said in the First Congress, "Why should we construe any part of the Constitution in such a manner as to destroy its essential principles when a more consonant construction can be obtained?" 1 Ann. Cong., supra note 130, at 473.

<sup>285</sup> In Powell v. McCormack, the House analogized its exclusion power to the power "to try all impeachments," and characterized both as "explicit grants of judicial power" to the Congress [which] constitute specific exceptions" to the article III grant of "judicial power" to the courts, 393 U.S. at 513.

give the Court pause. At that point the prestige of the Court, badly tarnished by the Dred Scott decision, was at its nadir,<sup>292</sup> and any attempt at judicial intervention might well have invited harsh reprisals by the inflamed Reconstruction Congress. But in the intervening century the Court has been restored to its high position in the regard and loyalty of the American people—witness the reaction to President Franklin Roosevelt's "Court-Packing Plan" notwithstanding popular discontent with the Court's anti-New Deal decisions<sup>293</sup>—and vindictive reprisals by the Congress would be almost unthinkable. If there be indeed power to review impeachments in excess of jurisdiction, we may expect of the Court the fortitude exhibited by the aged Chief Justice Taney when Lincoln's suspension of habeas corpus was brought before him at the outbreak of the Civil War.<sup>294</sup> Then too, the far more frequent impeachments of lesser figures, e.g. district judges, would be unlikely to whip up a storm of such dimensions as might a direct confrontation between President and Congress. If we are to test judicial review by practical considerations, let the focus be not on the solitary Johnson impeachment but on the humdrum impeachments of small-fry district judges, the usual fare. At best such considerations are prudential, a counsel of judicial self-restraint rather than a denial of jurisdiction to declare that Constitutional bounds have been transgressed.

Another Hamilton argument drawn from Morris was that it would be improper for one and the same tribunal to hear both the impeachment and the criminal prosecution.<sup>295</sup> Historically, however, the House of Lords tried both issues, i.e. removal and criminal punishment, in the same proceeding, whereas the Supreme Court would hear appeals on two different records of trials by two different triers of fact, the Senate and a jury, attended by all the limitations that surround such review. For me, the Hamilton arguments have an air of post hoc rationalization. A preference for the Senate based upon the Sherman-Morris fear of judicial corruptibility or Hamilton's fear that the Court would lack fortitude is hardly reconcilable with representations made to secure judicial tenure or the wide-spread confidence in the judiciary as contrasted with pervasive distrust of Congress.

Whatever the effect of the Morris-Sherman-Hamilton remarks, their force seems to me counteracted by relevant representations made in the Ratification Conventions; and as Jefferson and Madison emphasized, the meaning of the Constitution is to be sought in the explanations made to those who adopted it.<sup>296</sup> There the fear of <sup>292</sup> The "grave injury that the Court sustained through its decision has been universally recognized. Its action was a public calamity. . . ." <sup>294</sup> A military officer seized a citizen upon "vague charges" and conveyed his prisoner to Fort Mifflin. The commanding officer rejected service of a writ of habeas corpus and stated that the President had authorized him to suspend the writ at his discretion. Taney held that only Congress could suspend the writ, and stated, "my duty was too plain to be mistaken. I have exercised all the power which the constitution and laws confer upon me, but that power has been resisted by a force too strong for me to overcome." Ex parte Merryman, 17 F. Cas. 131, 153 (No. 9,487) (C. Ct. Md. 1861).

<sup>296</sup> For Madison, the meaning of the Constitution was to be looked for "in the State Conventions which accepted and ratified the Constitution," quoted in C. Warren, Congress, the Constitution and the Supreme Court 67 n. (1925). As President, Jefferson declared that he read the Constitution in accordance with the "meaning contemplated by the plain understanding of the people at the time of its adoption—a meaning to be found in the explanation of those who advocated it." Quoted in 4 Elliot, supra note 5.

Congressional excesses found its sharpest expression, and proponents of adoption repeatedly assured the Ratifiers that Congress was "fenced" about with "limits,"<sup>297</sup> that judicial review would confine Congress within bounds.<sup>297</sup> To be sure, no express mention of judicial review was made with respect to impeachment, but the same may be said of other equally important functions. "To what quarter," asked John Marshall in the Virginia Convention, "will you look for protection from infringement on the constitution, if . . . not . . . to the judiciary? There is no other body that can afford such protection."<sup>298</sup> Such remarks were made by others in the Virginia and other Conventions.<sup>299</sup> It was never intended that Congress should be the final judge of the boundaries of its own powers.<sup>300</sup> Not an inkling is to be found in the Records of the Ratification Conventions that the area of impeachment was to constitute an exception, that in this area Congress was left free to roam at will. To the contrary, when Archibald Maclaine sought in the North Carolina Convention, by construction of the impeachment power, to allay certain fears expressed by Timothy Bloodworth, Bloodworth commented, "I do not distrust him, but I distrust them [Congress]. I wish to leave no latitude of construction." And Joseph Taylor, speaking to Congress' power to impeach, stated that the Senators are "one of the branches of power [i.e., Congress] which we dread under this Constitution."<sup>301</sup> So intense was such distrust that North Carolina rejected the Constitution notwithstanding it had been ratified by ten States.<sup>302</sup> In no Convention was a claim of illimitable power made with respect to any function of Congress. Astonishment would have greeted a claim that the structure so carefully reared upon the separation of powers could be shaken to bits whenever Congress chose to resort to an unlimited power of impeachment. To the contrary, there was a constant drum-fire of warnings against Congressional oppression.<sup>303</sup> Bearing in mind that ratification was tough and go,<sup>304</sup> I daresay that had such claims been made ratification would have foundered.<sup>305</sup>

Although impeachment was chiefly designed to check Executive abuses and oppressions<sup>306</sup> there was no thought of delivering either the President or the judiciary to the unbounded discretion of Congress. This is attested by the Framers' rejection of the unfettered removal by Address,<sup>307</sup> by their rejection of "maladministration" because that was "so vague" as to leave tenure "at the pleasure" of the Senate,<sup>308</sup> and by substitution of "high crimes and misdemeanors: with knowledge that it had a "technical," "limited meaning." Nothing less than a limited power of impeachment would have satisfied the opposition who regarded impeachment as a threat to Presidential independence.<sup>309</sup> Impeachment, be it remembered, was a carefully limited exception to the separation of powers,<sup>310</sup> tolerable only if exercised strictly within bounds. "Limits" on Congress determined by Congress itself would be no limits at all.<sup>311</sup>

To this it may be answered that just as the ultimate guarantee that the judiciary will not step out of bounds is the self-restraint of the Court, so the Senate too must be trusted to exercise self-restraint. It is one thing, however, to expect self-restraint of judges schooled to disciplined, dispassionate judgment, and not subject to the gusts of faction, and something else again to expect self-restraint of a body predominantly political in character and which both in England and in the United States has been unable to shake off political considerations when sitting in judgment.<sup>312</sup> Self-restraint could be relied upon with respect to the judiciary because, in the words of Hamilton, they "have neither FORCE nor WILL, but merely judgment," and were "therefore the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution."<sup>313</sup> But the vast power to prescribe the rules under which we live, to initiate action, as is the case even in impeachment, cast Congress in a very different role, one of which there was pervasive distrust. The fact is that the Ratifiers feared Congress and trusted judges. Said Madison in the Virginia Convention, "Were I to select a power which might be given with confidence it would be the judicial power,"<sup>314</sup> a sentiment echoed by others in the several conventions.<sup>315</sup> The courts, said Hamilton in the Federalist, were "the bulwarks of a limited constitution against legislative encroachments,"<sup>316</sup> a statement anticipated by Jefferson.<sup>317</sup> In recommending adoption of the Bill of Rights, Madison stated in the First Congress that the courts would be "an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the Legislative and Executive."<sup>318</sup>

Constitutional limits, as Powell v. McCormack again reminds us, are subject to judicial enforcement; and I would urge that judicial review of impeachments is required to protect the other branches from Congress' arbitrary will. It is hardly likely that the Framers, so devoted to "checks and balances," who so painstakingly piled one check of Congress on another,<sup>319</sup> would reject a crucial check at the nerve center of the separation of powers. They scarcely contemplated that their wise precautions must crumble when Congress dons its "judicial" hat, that then Congress would be free to shake the other branches to their very foundations. Before we swallow such consequences, the intention of the Framers to insulate Congressional transgressions of the "limits" they imposed upon impeachment should be proved, not casually assumed. The Constitution, said the Supreme Court, condemns "all arbitrary exercise of power";<sup>320</sup> "there is no place in our constitutional system for the exercise of arbitrary power."<sup>321</sup> The "sole power to try" affords no more exemption from that doctrine than does the sole power to legislate which, it needs no citation, does not extend to arbitrary acts.

Finally, assume that the "sole power to try" conferred insulation from review, it must yield to the subsequent Fifth Amendment provision that "No person" shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. . . ." If the Constitution does in fact place limits upon the power of impeachment, action beyond those limits is without "due process of law" in its primal sense:

when the great barons of England wrung from King John . . . the concession that neither their lives nor their property should be disposed of by the crown, except as provided by the law of the land, they meant by "law of the land" the ancient and customary laws of the English people. . . .<sup>322</sup>

In our system the place of the "ancient and customary laws" was taken by the Constitution; and injurious action not authorized by the Constitution is therefore contrary to the "law of the land" and is forbidden by the due process clause. "Due process" has been epitomized by the Court as the "protection of the individual against arbitrary action."<sup>323</sup> One who enters government service does not cease to be a "person" within the fifth amendment; and an impeachment for offenses outside the Constitutional authorization would deny him the protection afforded by "due process." It would be passing strange to conclude that a citizen may invoke the judicial "bulwark" against a $20 fine,<sup>324</sup> but not against an unconstitutional impeachment, re-

<sup>317</sup> In 1787, when Jefferson welcomed the "check" which a Bill of Rights "puts in the hands of the judiciary," he added, "This is a body, which if rendered independent . . . merits confidence for their learning and integrity." 5 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 81 (P. removal from and perpetual disqualification to hold federal office. Here protection of the individual coincides with preservation of the separation of powers, and the interests of the assaulted branch, as Judge George Wythe perceived, are one with the interest of "the whole community." Those interests counsel us to give full scope to the "strong American bias in favor of a judicial determination of constitutional and legal issues,"<sup>325</sup> and to deny insulation from review of impeachments in defiance of Constitutional bounds.

IV. CONCLUSION

In England impeachment for "high crimes and misdemeanors" did not require proof of an indictable crime, although the penalties of death or imprisonment made impeachments "criminal," but this was under the "course of Parliament" as distinguished from the ordinary statutory or common law crimes. The Framers, however, completely separated the impeachment-removal proceedings from a subsequent indictment and criminal trial. Thereby they indicated that impeachment was not to be a criminal proceeding, a view that the double jeopardy amendment and the sixth amendment provision for trial by jury "in all criminal prosecutions" caution us to adopt. History, in short, does not require indictability as the basis for impeachment.

The Framers were almost exclusively concerned with fashioning "a bridle" upon the Executive; and fear of "encroachments of the executive"<sup>326</sup> led the Framers to swallow the possibility that factional strife would continue to color impeachment.<sup>327</sup> But the Framers had no intention of delivering the President to the untrammelled will of Congress; they confined impeachment within the technical, "limited" terms of the common law—"treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Although the removal of judges was decidedly peripheral to concern with executive encroachments, being governed by the same language it is subject to the same limits. Finally, Constitutional limits, as Powell v. McCormack reminds us, are subject to judicial enforcement, the more so in the case of impeachment, because the other branches can not be left to the arbitrary will of the Congress.

Whether or not judicial review is available for a conviction on impeachment, Congress should avoid possible Constitutional confrontations. And a decent regard for the design of the Founders should constrain the Senate to disclaim unlimited power,<sup>328</sup> and to act within the confines contemplated by the Founders. When Congress impeaches and convicts in disregard of those bounds, it is guilty of an abuse of its power which posterity, if not the Court, will condemn. No member of Congress should lightly invite a judgment such as branded the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson as "one of the most disgraceful episodes in our history."<sup>329</sup> Congress should have before it the admonition of Edmund Burke with respect to a mooted impeachment: "We stand in a position very honorable to ourselves

APPENDIX

INDICTABILITY OF JUDGES

In order to sustain his argument in the Chase impeachment proceedings that impeachment demanded an indictable crime, Luther Martin, leading counsel for Chase, maintained that judges were indictable for violation of their official duties. He dismissed Floyd v. Barker, text accompanying note 46 supra, out of hand because "the reasons there assigned, however correct they might be as to the judges in England, can have no possible application to the judges of the United States." 14 ANN. CONG. 434. Nevertheless, American law accepted Coke; in 1810, five years after Martin spoke, Chancellor Kent held that the Coke doctrine "has a deep root in the common law"; and took note of Coke's statement that no judge may be questioned for a judgment given, "either at the suit of a party, or of the king." Tates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282, 291, 293. In 1867, Lawrence, who sought to lay a predicate for the impending Andrew Johnson impeachment, wrote, "It is a rule of the common law that judges of record are freed from all presentations whatever except in Parliament, where they may be punished for anything done by them in such courts as judges." LAWRENCE, supra note 15, at 604. Bradley v. Fisher, 12 Wall. (80 U.S.) 335, 350 (1871). It became accepted doctrine that judges enjoyed immunity from private suits for actions in their judicial capacity.

But Martin leaned more heavily on Viner's statement that "A justice cannot raise a record, nor imbecille [embezzle?] it." 14 ANN. CONG. 435. Viner cited Brooke's Corona, which in turn cited 2 Rich. III, 9, 10. No such statute appears in the Statutes of the Realm or Statutes at Large; but a cognate statute is 8 Rich. II, cap. 4: if any judge is convicted "of the false entering of pleas, raising [erasure] of Rolls and changing of verdicts . . . before the King and his Council . . . he shall be punished by Fine and Ranson [a treble fine, Jenkins 162, 145 E.R. 104 (undated)]." This was a statute of 1385, at a time when great ministers and the Justices were tried before the "King and his Council," so that one may question whether the statute contemplated an indictment. See text accompanying notes 22-26 supra.

In Martin's quotation, Viner made two further points. First, a judge cannot "file an indictment which is not found." Apparently this refers to Rex v. March, 3 Mod. 66, 87 E. 79, Rep. 42 (1603), wherein a Mayor who was also coroner and seemingly acted in a quasi-judicial capacity, had inserted additional names in an indictment after it had been found, and was therefore himself held guilty upon a subsequent information. This was punishment of a lesser judge, who was treated differently from a Justice of the higher courts. See text accompanying notes 55-59 supra. Second, Martin quoted Viner's statement that a judge cannot "give judgment of death where the law does not give it." Jenkins relates that this happened in a manor court again a lesser court, and that the Star Chamber decided that the judge should "be fined and imprisoned and lose his office." Jenkins 162, 145 E.R. 104 (undated). Indictments were not employed by the Star Chamber, see E. JENKS, A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 147 (2d ed. 1920).

Martin (14 ANN. CONG. 435) also quoted 1 HAWKINS, ch. 69 [actually ch. 67] § 6, to the effect that bribery in a judge is "punishable, not only with forfeiture of the offender's office of justice, but also with fine and imprisonment." Hawkins' marginal citation to 1 RUSHWORTH'S COLLECTIONS at 131, deals with the impeachment of Lord Bacon. Indeed, Hawkins himself stated that the law "free the Judges of all Courts of Record from all Prosecutions whatsoever, except in the Parliament, for anything done by them openly in such Court as Judges." Id. ch. 72, § 6.

THE SCOPE OF THE IMPEACHMENT POWER*

INTRODUCTION

Article II, section 4 of the Federal Constitution provides that "[t]he President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Since the adoption of the Constitution, congressional investigation of possible impeachable misconduct has been ordered in sixty-five cases, of which fifty-three involved federal judges.<sup>1</sup> As a result of twelve of these investigations—nine concerning federal judges—articles of impeachment were voted by the House.<sup>2</sup> Seven of the twelve respondents in these proceedings were acquitted,<sup>3</sup> one resigned just before the commencement of his trial by the Senate,<sup>4</sup> and four—all of whom were federal judges—were convicted by the Senate.<sup>5</sup>

Borkin, The Corrupt Judge 219-58 (1962); 3 Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States 644-1034 (1907) [hereinafter cited as Hinds]; 6 Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States 684-795 [hereinafter cited as Cannon's]; sources cited in the Appendix. One case not mentioned in any of these sources is that of Associate Justice William O. Douglas, who was attacked in 1953 for issuing a stay of execution in connection with the Rosenberg espionage trial; the proceedings never developed beyond a day of hearings held by the House Judiciary Committee.

<sup>4</sup>Those cases not resulting in impeachment being voted by the House were disposed of in a variety of ways. In a substantial number of cases, the subject of the inquiry resigned, which invariably caused the proceedings to be discontinued. In the majority of the remaining cases the investigatory committee (which, with a single exception since it was established in 1813, has been the House Judiciary Committee or a subcommittee thereof in the case of charges against a federal judge) dropped the investigation without filing a report or filed a report recommending against impeachment. There have also been at least seven cases where the majority report stated that the facts did not warrant impeachment but censured the individual concerned or condemned his conduct; in three of these seven cases the minority report recommended impeachment. The investigatory committee recommended impeachment on twenty occasions. There was one occasion where the House voted not to impeach notwithstanding a recommendation to do so by the committee, and only one instance—that of Judge Londerback in 1953 (who was ultimately acquitted by the Senate)—where the House voted an impeachment in the face of a contrary recommendation by the majority report of the investigatory committee. See sources cited in note 1 supra.

Of central concern in each of these controversies has been the issue of what constitutes an impeachable offense. Since the high court of impeachment—the Senate—issues no written opinions to accompany its decisions,<sup>4</sup> the standard of impeachable conduct has never been definitively resolved. This article will focus on the standards of impeachable conduct as reflected in the phrase “high crimes and misdemeanors,” with attention to the historical background of the law of impeachment, in order to construe the sweep of this controversial clause in our Constitution.

THE HISTORICAL STANDARD

Analysis of the scope of the impeachment power has often begun with the theory that since the framers of the Constitution adopted the phrase “high crimes and misdemeanors” from the English practice, its definition was intended to be taken from the law of England at the time of adoption of the Constitution.<sup>5</sup> By this reasoning, no conduct would be impeachable under the Constitution unless it was impeachable in England in 1787.

Although the English practice is undoubtedly of substantial value in construing the impeachment clause, to accept this precedent as an inflexible and unchanging standard would be a grave error. Contemporary constitutional analysis correctly calls for a flexible approach to interpretation. A constitution “is necessarily adopted for the future, perhaps a remote future, . . . and those who adopt it cannot be presumed to have thought it was to be applied only to the then existing conditions, rather than to similar conditions certain to rise . . .”<sup>6</sup> Just as “the things for which people could be impeached in Great Britain shifted and changed with the shifting and changing judgment and legislation of the times,”<sup>6</sup> so the definition of an impeachable offense has not remained constant in this country. We turn, then, to the various factors that have dominated the discussion of impeachment standards.

UNDESIRABLE POLITICAL VIEWS

The impeachment by the House and subsequent acquittal by the Senate of Justice Samuel Chase in 1801-05 has been widely construed as a restraint on the use of the impeachment process to oust a judge or justice whose political views or judicial opinions are not to the liking of the political party in power.

The prosecution was based on the theory that “impeachment is nothing more than an inquiry by the two Houses of Congress whether the office of a public man might not be better filled by another” and that removal by impeachment was nothing more than a declaration by Congress to this effect: You hold dangerous opinions, and if you are suffered to carry them into effect you will work the destruction of the nation. We want your offices, for the purpose of giving them to men who will fill them better.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>4</sup> On occasion, individual senators will file opinions in the Congressional Record after a conviction, as was done by several senators in the Ritter case. These opinions are unofficial, however; there is never a formal opinion which speaks for the court of impeachment itself.

<sup>5</sup> “Whatever crimes and misdemeanors were the subjects of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are, therefore, subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States . . .” Brief filed by Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer on February 23, 1905, in the Swayne impeachment, 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at 340; accord, Brief for respondent in the Swayne impeachment, filed February 22, 1905, cited in id. at 323-25. But cf. id. at 344-45.

The defense, on the other hand, contended that "in order to sustain an impeachment, an offense must be proved upon the respondent which would support an indictment."<sup>11</sup>

The Senate's acquittal of Justice Chase in effect disavowed the prosecution's theory of impeachment, despite the ambiguous general verdict on both the facts and the law. The Republican partisans of Jefferson were forced to abandon their attempt at wholesale removal of Federalist judges through the impeachment process.

At the time of the Fortas crisis in 1969, Senator Sam Ervin, commenting on the Chase impeachment, noted that

[t]he precedent established was that judges could be impeached only for violations of law, and not for their political views or for decisions they handed down while on the bench. This precedent is a foundation stone of the independence of the Supreme Court. While the Court is not and never should be immune from criticism for its decisions, it should remain safe from retribution based upon partisan politics.<sup>12</sup>

MISBEHAVIOR

Since federal judges hold office "during good behavior,"<sup>13</sup> it has been suggested that "misbehavior" properly defines the bounds of "high crimes and misdemeanors," or even that lack of good behavior constitutes an independent standard for impeachment, apart from whatever standard may be dictated by the impeachment clause.<sup>14</sup> This position is bottomed, to some extent, on the much disputed premise that impeachment is the sole method of removing federal judges from office.<sup>15</sup> Were this the case, then the only way to give Ritter*, S. Doc. No. 200, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 644-47, 658 (1936) (hereinafter cited as Ritter Proceedings).

<sup>15</sup> Its report recommending the impeachment of Judge English in 1926, the House Committee on the Judiciary concluded that the good behavior clause was to be accorded considerable weight:

A civil officer may have behaved in public so as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon the country and he would continue to do this until his name became a public stench and yet might not be subject to indictment under any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. Otherwise the public would in this and kindred cases be beyond the protection intended by the Constitution. When the Constitution says a judge shall hold office during good behavior it means that he shall not hold it when his behavior ceases to be good behavior.

<sup>16</sup> The problems surrounding proposals for mandatory retirement of judges and justices, including the question of whether article III federal judges can constitutionally be involuntarily removed from office by means other than impeachment, will not be discussed here. There is, however, considerable literature on this subject. See e.g., Chandler v. Judicial Council of the Tenth Circuit of the United States, 398 U.S.

meaning to the good behavior clause would be either to incorporate it into the impeachment clause or to elevate it to the status of a second means of impeachment.<sup>16</sup> It is argued, however, that the "good behavior" clause is more aptly described by its other appellation—the "judicial tenure" cause—on the theory that it does not constitute a standard for impeachability, but merely states that federal judges hold office for life unless removed under some other provision of the Constitution.

For a number of reasons the impeachment clause, rather than the good behavior clause, should control.<sup>17</sup> If lack of good behavior were the standard for impeachability of federal judges, presumably a different standard would have to apply to civil officers other than judges, since the good behavior clause applies only to article III judges. Secondly, under the English practice at the time the Constitution was adopted, "good behavior" referred not to grounds for removal, but rather to the concept of lifetime tenure. Finally, it can be argued that if the word "misdemeanor" includes misbehavior, there is no reason for the drafters to have constructed the "good behavior" clause, unless it be for a purpose other than setting an impeachment standard.

It is interesting to note that the articles in each of the eight impeachments through 1905 were styled Articles of Impeachment for "high crimes and misdemeanors."<sup>18</sup> During this period, it was apparently the feeling of the House of Representatives that the impeachment power lay solely within the impeachment clause. Subsequent to 1905, however, the House departed from this strict construction. In all of the four later impeachments the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was removed from the introductory clause. Except for four articles in the Ritter case,<sup>19</sup> the word "misbehavior" was used in all of the individual articles of impeachment, sometimes with the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" or simply "misdemeanors." Presumably, the use of the term "misbehavior" indicates a reliance on the judicial tenure clause as an impeachment standard.

The phraseology of articles of impeachment, however, should be accorded little weight if the intent of the framers of the Constitution is clear. The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention do indicate an intention to limit the grounds for impeachment to those con-

<sup>16</sup> To say that the judicial tenure shall be limited to good behavior in one section of the Federal Constitution and then contend that the section of the Constitution immediately preceding that has destroyed its force and effect and has left the Federal Government without any machinery to . . . take jurisdiction of acts which constitute misbehavior but are not criminal, is to treat the words "during good behavior" as surplusage. Such an interpretation violates all rules of construction.

<sup>20</sup> Articles 3, 4, 5 & 6. See Appendix infra. Article 7, on which Judge Ritter was convicted, charged "misbehavior . . . and high crimes and misdemeanors in office." The articles on which Judge Archbald, the only other person impeached and convicted in the 20th century, was convicted—articles 1, 2, 4, 5 & 13—all charged "misbehavior in office" or "misbehavior as . . . judge" as well as either "high crimes and misdemeanors in office," or simply "misdemeanors in office." See Appendix infra.

tained in article II, section 4. On August 27, 1787, an amendment was offered to the "good behavior" clause<sup>20</sup> which sought to insert the proviso "that they [federal judges] may be removed by the Executive on the application [of] the Senate and House of Representatives."<sup>21</sup> Mr. Randolph opposed the motion "as weakening too much the independence of the Judges." Mr. Wilson commented that "[t]he Judges would be in a bad situation if made to depend on every gust of faction which might prevail in the two branches of our Government." By a vote of 7 to 1 (with 3 absent) the states voted to reject the amendment.<sup>22</sup> The delegates did, however, subsequently attach such a judicial removal provision to the impeachment clause, which had originally been drafted so as to apply only to the President. On September 8, 1787, the following was added to the impeachment clause: "The Vice-President and other Civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid."<sup>23</sup>

The likelihood that the words "as aforesaid" indicate an intent to adopt for federal judges the same standard of impeachable offense as applies to the President is underscored by the fact that immediately prior to the adoption of this provision the Convention had debated the appropriate standard to be used in the impeachment clause and expressly rejected the vaguer term "maladministration" in favor of "high crimes and misdemeanors."<sup>24</sup> The standards of article II, section 4 were thus carried over from the original presidential impeachment provision, which had been extended to apply to all "other civil officers,"—clearly including judges. The Constitutional Convention, therefore, quite clearly rejected the dual standard of "misbehavior" for judges and "high crimes and misdemeanors" for other federal officials.

In short, both logic and history indicate that the judicial tenure clause relates only to the tenure of federal judges, negating the proposition that their term of office is limited to a term of years. The power of removal, together with the appropriate standard, are therefore contained solely in the impeachment clause.<sup>25</sup>

INDICTABLE OFFENSES

In the almost 200-year history of impeachments under the Constitution, the most closely debated legal issue has consistently been whether impeachment is limited to offenses indictable under the criminal law—or at least to offenses which constitute crimes—or whether the word "misdemeanors" in the impeachment clause extends

<sup>25</sup> This is not to say that the proper standard is not lack of good behavior or misbehavior, or something on that order, but merely that if this is the standard it must be arrived at by construing the impeachment clause. If the result of such a construction turned out to be lack of good behavior, the similarity of such standard to the phraseology of the good behavior clause would be coincidental rather than causative. For a view directly to the contrary—that the relationship is causative rather than coincidental—see the statement of Mr. Manager George W. Norris in final argument on January 9, 1913, in the Archbald impeachment, 6 Cannon's, supra note 1, at 649-50.

to noncriminal misconduct as well. While the authorities are divided on this question, the majority clearly favors the broader definition.<sup>26</sup> That this conclusion is the better view follows from a logical analysis of the impeachment clause, the English precedents, the debates in the Constitutional Convention and the history of impeachments under the Constitution.

ANALYSIS OF THE IMPEACHMENT CLAUSE

If the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is considered by itself, dissociated from any historical background and from all other clauses of the Constitution, the word "misdemeanors" cannot logically be limited to its meaning in the criminal law—that is, all crimes which do not amount to felonies.

Following the doctrine that each word in the Constitution must be given meaning and none can be discarded as superfluous,<sup>27</sup> a separate and independent meaning must be found for the term "misdemeanors," as distinguished from the term "crimes." Since "crimes" encompasses misdemeanors in the sense of non-felony criminal offenses,<sup>28</sup> the term "misdemeanors" must be construed to include noncriminal misconduct

<sup>26</sup>That the Managers on the part of the House in the American impeachments have consistently urged the broad view and that counsel for respondents have argued that impeachable offenses be limited to crimes is not surprising. For example, the House Committee on the Judiciary, in its report recommending the impeachment of Judge English in 1926 concluded:

Although frequently debated, and the negative advocated by some high authorities, it is now, we believe, considered that impeachment is not confined alone to acts which are forbidden by the Constitution or Federal statutes. The better sustained and modern view is that the provision for impeachment in the Constitution applies not only to high crimes and misdemeanors as those words were understood at common law but also acts which are not defined as criminal and made subject to indictment, and also to those which affect the public welfare.

H. R. Rep. No. 653, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. 9-10 (1926).

With respect to more neutral observers, however, the list of authorities favoring the broad view is not unimpressive. One such authority states:

The cases . . . seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indelible crimes; that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruptions, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, by judges and high officers of state, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to indictment either at common law or under any statute.

15 American and English Encyclopedia of Law 1067-68 (2d ed. 1900).

It is interesting to note that this authority defines impeachment to extend to "maladministration," which was expressly rejected by the Constitutional Convention.

<sup>28</sup>In expounding the Constitution of the United States, every word must have its due force, and appropriate meaning; for it is evident from the whole instrument, that no word was unnecessarily used or needlessly added . . . No word in the instrument, therefore, can be rejected as superfluous and unmeaning.

Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540, 570-71 (1840).

<sup>29</sup>That the word "crimes" includes misdemeanors in the criminal law sense is clear. Black's Law Dictionary 444 (4th ed. 1951) defines "crime" as a "positive or negative act in violation of penal law . . . . 'Crime' and 'misdemeanor' properly speaking, are synonymous terms; though in common usage 'crime' is made to denote such offenses as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye."

To illustrate the intention of the Constitutional Convention with regard to the definition of "crime," one might examine article IV, § 2, of the Constitution, which provides: "A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime." The Supreme Court, construing this clause in Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 64, 99 (1860), held that "[t]he word 'crime' of itself includes every offense, from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses, and includes what are called 'misdemeanors,' as well as treason and felony." Accord, Ex parte Reggel, 114 U.S. 642, 649-50 (1885).

It is interesting to note that an earlier version in the Constitutional Convention of the phrase "treason, felony or other crime" in article IV, § 2, took the form of "treason, felony or high misdemeanor." Art. XV, Report of the Committee of Detail, Aug. 6, 1787, 2 Farrand, supra note 20, at 187-88. This supports the proposition that "crime" includes "misdemeanor." Yet it might also be cited to demonstrate, contrary to the argument made in the text, that since "high misdemeanor" in this early draft of article IV, § 2, refers to criminal conduct, it also denotes criminal conduct when it appears in the impeachment clause, article II, § 4.

if it is to have any independent meaning. As one commentator has put it, "the word 'crimes' was used to negative the thought that the only criminal offenses for which an impeachment would lie were 'treason' and 'bribery'; and the word 'misdemeanors' was used to negate the thought that only 'crimes' were impeachable."<sup>20</sup>

It is interesting to note that Congress did not make bribery a federal crime until three years after the Constitution was drafted in 1787.<sup>20</sup> If bribery was not a federal crime at the time of the drafting of the Constitution, then presumably "other high crimes and misdemeanors" would include offenses which are not federal crimes.

Bribery was, however, a crime in the various states, either by statute or common law. It might therefore be argued that "other high crimes and misdemeanors" refers to offenses against the criminal law of either the federal government or the states. On the other hand, it could be argued that it is not in keeping with the structure of our federal system, as embodied in the supremacy clause and in the Constitution generally, to allow the scope of the impeachment power to be delineated by the enactments of the various state legislatures.

ENGLISH PRECEDENTS

The phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was taken directly from the English parliamentary common law, where it had become surrounded by a substantial body of interpretive case law. Since this clause is a term of art, the normal canons of construction require that we look to its source in England for guidance as to its application under our Constitution.<sup>21</sup>

An examination of the history of impeachment in England reveals that a significant number of impeachments were based on non-criminal misconduct, and that in some cases the charges were essentially political in nature:

Thus, persons have been impeached for giving bad counsel to the king, advising a prejudicial peace, enticing the king to act against the advice of Parliament, purchasing offices, giving medicine to the king without the advice of physicians, preventing other persons from giving counsel to the king except in their presence . . . Thus, lord chancellors and judges and other magistrates have not only been impeached for bribery, and acting grossly contrary to the duties of their office, but for misleading their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, and for attempts to subvert the fundamental laws and introduce arbitrary power.<sup>22</sup>

One commentator cites ten impeachments in which "high crimes and misdemeanors" were charged but in which the offenses were not in-

<sup>23</sup> J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 585 (5th ed. 1891). For a discussion of the English impeachment cases see 4 J. dictable.<sup>33</sup> Another cites several cases in which English judges were impeached for giving "extrajudicial opinions and misinterpreting the law."<sup>34</sup> While there is some authority to the contrary,<sup>35</sup> the predominant view, therefore, is that under the English practice impeachment will lie for noncriminal, as well as criminal, misconduct.

DELIBERATION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

That the debates and actions of the Constitutional Convention surrounding the adoption of article II, section 4, should be considered in attempting to fathom the meaning of the impeachment clause is clear. What is less certain is how these deliberations should be interpreted.

Shortly after the Convention convened on May 29, 1787, the Committee of the Whole agreed that the President should be "removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty."<sup>36</sup> The Convention agreed on July 20 that the Executive should be impeachable<sup>37</sup> and approved the language of this provision on July 26.<sup>38</sup> The Committee of Detail<sup>39</sup> reported a draft constitution on August 6, which provided that the President might be "removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction in the Supreme Court, of treason, bribery or corruption."<sup>40</sup> On September 4, the Committee of Eleven<sup>41</sup> reported an impeachment provision limited to "treason or bribery."<sup>42</sup>

On September 8, Colonel Mason commented that "[t]reason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous

<sup>33</sup> Simpson, supra note 8, at 682. The author concludes that "there is nothing . . . in the English practice which otherwise limits that construction [of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors"] and hence it must be held to mean other than criminal misdemeanors." Id. at 686. It is interesting to note that this same commentator, in oral argument before the Senate as counsel for the respondent in the Archbald impeachment three years earlier, took a rather different view:

"[T]he question arises which of the English precedents are you going to accept, in view of the fact that some hold that an impeachable offense need not be an indictable one, and others hold a precisely antagonistic view. Are you going back to the days when a man was impeached simply because he happened to have been put in office by those who have themselves just been turned out? If that is the view you are going to accept then perhaps every four years in this country there will be a wholesale slaughter. But if you are going to accept the best precedents which appear upon the English reports, and especially those down near to the time when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, then those best precedents show that, except for an indictable offense, no impeachment would lie under the laws of England. 6 Cannon's, supra note 1, at 646."

"It is asserted, without fear of successful contradiction, both upon authority and principle, notwithstanding a few isolated instances apparently to the contrary, that no impeachment can be had where the King's Bench would not have held that a crime had been committed, had the case been properly before it.

"Dwight, Trial by Impeachment, 15 Am. L. Reg. 257, 264 (1867). This statement was intended by its author to be applicable to American, as well as English, impeachments. Dwight cites the case of Lord Melville, who was charged with wrongfully (but not corruptly) spending public funds without proper authority as Treasurer of the Navy, as an example of an acquittal due to the lack of an indictable crime. Id. at 267. See also Simpson, supra note 8, at 684-86. Of course, an acquittal cannot be determinative of any legal principle in any definitive sense since there is no separate ruling on the facts and the law."

offenses" and moved to add "or maladministration" after "bribery." Upon the objection of Madison that "[s]o vague a term would be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate," Mason withdrew "maladministration" and substituted "or other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State," and the Convention voted 8 to 3 to adopt this phrase.<sup>43</sup> The words "United States" were then substituted for "State."<sup>44</sup> The Convention also voted to extend the impeachment sanction to the Vice President and other civil officers.<sup>45</sup>

In its report of September 12, the Committee of Style and Arrangement deleted the words "against the United States,"<sup>46</sup> and the Convention accepted this change when it agreed to the Constitution as amended on September 15.<sup>47</sup> No further changes were made in the impeachment clause, which now covered "treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors," prior to the adoption of the Constitution in final form on September 17, 1787.

From this recounting it appears that, prior to the adoption of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," each time the Convention spoke as a whole it opted for a broad definition of impeachable offenses covering noncriminal as well as criminal misconduct. While the standard chosen by the Committee of Eleven—"treason or bribery"—and, most probably, that reported by the Committee of Detail—"treason, bribery or corruption"—are limited to criminal conduct, it should be emphasized that in these instances it was not the Convention as a whole which was speaking, but merely a committee thereof. From the post-Convention comments by its participants, as well as those by other authorities, it appears that these prior versions of the impeachment clause, together with the accompanying debates, indicate an intent on the part of the framers to include noncriminal misconduct within the catalog of impeachable offenses.<sup>48</sup> Even though "high crimes and misdemeanors" is construed to include some noncriminal misconduct, the fact that "maladministration" was deemed too vague and "high crimes and misdemeanors" was substituted in its place indicates, of course, that the latter clause must be construed more narrowly than the former.

<sup>48</sup> [I]n the many excellent and exhaustive briefs prepared by counsel for respondents in our impeachment proceedings, some of which were tried while members of the convention which framed the Constitution still lived, there is no assertion that any member of that convention had expressed the opinion that impeachment was only intended to cover indictable offenses. A somewhat careful independent examination fails to disclose any such statement.

Simpson, supra note 8, at 690-91. Simpson cites Luther Martin, who was a member of the Convention but later argued against its adoption, as the sole exception. As counsel for the respondent in the Chase impeachment, Martin contended that impeachment would be only for indictable offenses. 2 Hinds, supra note 1, at 762-63. There are several instances of post-Convention statements by the participants, however, which define the scope of an impeachable offense more broadly than that of an indictable crime. For example, Hamilton was of the view that impeachment will lie for "those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust." The Federalist No. 65, at 490 (J. Hamilton ed. 1866) (A. Hamilton). During a speech in Congress on June 16, 1789, on the bill to establish a Department of Foreign Affairs, Madison said that the President would be impeachable for "an act of maladministration" such as the "wanton removal of meritorious officers." 4 Elliot's Debates 380 (2d ed. 1937). Parenthetically, it should be noted that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was adopted after Madison had objected, successfully, to "maladministration" as being too vague.

HISTORY OF AMERICAN IMPEACHMENTS

An examination of the impeachment proceedings brought under the Federal Constitution indicates that impeachment may be invoked for serious noncriminal misconduct, as well as for criminal offenses.<sup>49</sup> Generalizations are difficult to draw, however, since few cases are available for analysis. The impeachments which failed of conviction are of relatively little value as precedent for purposes of this analysis. The close intermixture of fact and law makes it difficult to determine whether the Senate voted to acquit because the evidence was insufficient to support the allegations in the articles, or because the acts alleged in the articles, even if true, did not constitute impeachable offenses as a matter of law. Thus, if the articles of impeachment against a respondent who is acquitted contain elements of noncriminal misconduct, this would not establish that such activities do not fall within the impeachment power.

Even the four impeachments resulting in conviction<sup>50</sup> are less helpful than might appear at first glance. The impeachments of Judge Pickering and Judge Humphreys were not defended. Of the two contested cases, convictions were obtained on only five of thirteen articles in the case of Judge Archbald and on only one of seven articles in the case of Judge Ritter. Moreover, the value of the Ritter case as precedent is seriously diminished by the ambiguity created by his conviction on an article which essentially incorporated by reference the six articles on which he had been acquitted.

The result, then, is that the hard core of case law on federal impeachments consists of the five articles on which Archbald was convicted, surrounded by a penumbra consisting of the Pickering, Humphreys and Ritter cases. Accordingly, we must examine these four impeachments, placing emphasis on Judge Archbald's case.

The impeachment of Judge Pickering in 1803-04, was the first such proceeding to succeed and was quite clearly based, at least in part, on noncriminal misconduct. The first three articles involved a series of flagrant errors on the part of the judge in his conduct of a case. Articles 1 and 3 constituted violations of federal statutory law, but none of the first three articles constituted a criminal offense.<sup>51</sup>

It would be difficult to establish that any of the articles on which Judge Humphreys was impeached and convicted in 1862 are non-criminal, since all seven articles contain at least a flavor of treason, which the Constitution defines as follows: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."<sup>52</sup> Articles 3 and 4 alleged that the respondent aided the war effort of the Confederacy. Article 1, making a speech declaring the right of secession and inciting

<sup>51</sup> Article 4, however, charged open and notorious drunkenness and public blasphemy on the bench, which were probably punishable as misdemeanors at common law. Presumably, such conduct would violate the applicable state and local ordinances on disturbing the peace.

rebellion, and article 2, advocating secession, go well beyond the limits of protected free speech. Articles 5, 6 and 7 alleged in effect that Humphreys turned his court into a Confederate court which enforced the laws of the Confederacy and required allegiance to it. This allegation may or may not be sufficient to support a charge of treason, depending on whether it constitutes conduct "adhering to their [the United States'] enemies."

The question of treason aside, the conduct alleged in articles 2 through 4 appears also to constitute violations of a criminal statute dealing with various forms of seditious conspiracy.<sup>53</sup> Acts specifically proscribed by this statute are charged in article 3—levying war against the United States—and article 4—opposing by force the authority of the United States government. Article 2—advocating secession with intent to subvert the authority of the United States—appears to fall, though less directly, within the provisions of the statute applicable to articles 3 and 4. Article 2 also comes within the proscription against preventing the execution of the laws of the United States by force, which would, of course, inevitably result from secession.

At least some of the first six articles in the Ritter impeachment in 1933-36 alleged criminal offenses.<sup>54</sup> However, Judge Ritter was convicted only on article 7 which alleged that he had brought his court into disrepute and rendered himself unfit to serve as a federal judge by the conduct alleged in the first six articles.<sup>55</sup>

There are basically two theories by which this seemingly strange result can be rationalized. The first theory is that although none of the specific acts of misconduct, standing alone, warranted impeachment, all of the offenses taken in the aggregate were sufficient.<sup>56</sup> Under this theory, the substance of articles 1 through 6 is incorporated into article 7, which then includes criminal offenses. The weakness of this line of <sup>53</sup>Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if two or more persons within any State or Territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow, or to put down, or to destroy by force, the Government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the Government of the United States; or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States; or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States against the will or contrary to the authority of the United States; or by force, or intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office, or trust, or place of confidence, under the United States; each and every person so offending shall be guilty of a high crime.

Articles 2, 3 & 4 refer to the respondent's activities in 1861 & 1862; this statute was adopted July 31, 1861. Since one element of proof for a conviction is the presence of a conspiracy, it should be noted that each of the three articles alleges that the respondent acted in concert with others, and in fact article 4 specifically alleges a conspiracy. It also is of interest that a violation is labeled a "high crime," perhaps for the specific purpose of making clear that the crime involved was of a serious enough nature to be impeachable.

<sup>55</sup>After the vote was announced, a point of order was made that respondent was not guilty under article 7 because he had been acquitted of all the charges to which it referred by the action of the Senate with respect to articles 1-6. The point of order was overruled, the chair holding that article 7 contained the "separate charge" of "general misbehavior." 80 Cong. Rec. 5606 (1936).

The contention that his acquittal on articles 1-6 precluded his conviction on article 7 was advanced by Judge Ritter in a suit to recover his salary, but the Court of Claims rejected the suit for lack of jurisdiction in the courts to review the actions of the Senate in impeachment proceedings. Ritter v. United States, 84 Ct. Cl. 298, 300 (1936), cert. denied, 300 U.S. 688 (1937).

reasoning is that article 7 does not specifically allege again the charges contained in the first six articles, but alleges only that the respondent brought his court into disrepute. The conduct detailed in articles 1 through 6 is cited only as the cause of such disrepute, not as an allegation proper.

The second theory is based on the effect of the conduct, rather than on the acts themselves:

This ruling definitely lays down the principle that even though upon specific charges amounting to legal violations the impeaching body finds the accused not guilty, it may, nevertheless, find that his conduct in these very matters was such as to bring his office into disrepute and order his removal upon that ground.<sup>67</sup>

This result is analogous to the procedure generally followed with respect to the professions. Thus a lawyer may be disbarred, even after being acquitted of a criminal charge involving the conduct in question, on the theory that the purpose of the disbarment is to protect the public and the profession.<sup>68</sup> Presumably, a different result in the two proceedings can be reached because the burden of proof is higher for the criminal proceeding.<sup>69</sup>

In any event, under the second theory, which is probably the more plausible of the two,<sup>69</sup> article 7 would be construed not to contain any allegations of criminal misconduct.

In the Archbald impeachment of 1912-13, the thirteen articles essentially charged influence peddling—the use of the respondent's position as judge to influence litigants before his court to make deals favorable to friends. In return, the judge would typically be given a share of the profits without having to invest any money. Judge Archbald was convicted on articles 1, 3, 4, 5 and 13. In articles 1 and 3 the deals involved litigants before his court, while article 5 dealt only with a potential litigant. Article 4 alleged improper conduct by the respondent as a judge in having ex parte communications with one party in a suit without the knowledge of the other party or the other judges sitting on the case. This article did not, however, allege any personal gain for the respondent. Article 13 was an omnibus summary of Archbald's influence peddling, resulting in personal monetary gain from deals involving both actual and potential litigants before his court and from fees given for compromising litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission.<sup>71</sup>

<sup>69</sup> The effort to analogize impeachment with disbarment, however, runs afoul of the oft-expressed theory that impeachment is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. Thus, article II, § 2, of the Constitution gives the President power to grant pardons "for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." Article III, § 2, grants a right to a jury trial for "all crimes, except cases of impeachment" (emphasis added).

<sup>71</sup> Article 13 differs from article 7 in the Ritter impeachment in that the substance of the allegations in article 13 is specific misbehavior, rather than bringing of disgrace on the respondent's court. In the opinion of one commentator,

[I]t seems fair to conclude from the vote on the thirteenth article that judges are impeachable for a general course of misbehavior embracing a series of acts that are subversive of judicial probity or propriety chiefly because of the persistency with which they are committed. This is not to be understood as a holding that many legal naughts may,

The authorities consistently conclude that none of the five articles on which Archbald was convicted constitutes an indictable offense.<sup>62</sup> This assessment is probably correct with respect to article 4, which alleged misconduct in the course of judicial proceedings that is essentially in the same category with respect to criminality as the charges in the first three articles in the Pickering impeachment. As to articles 1, 3, 5 and 13, however, one must consider the relevant criminal statutes in force when the actions complained of took place.<sup>63</sup> For example, section 132 of the Criminal Code of 1909 makes it a crime for a federal judge to accept anything of value "with the intent to be influenced thereby" in any matter pending before him.<sup>64</sup> This section would appear to apply to articles 1, 3 and 13,<sup>65</sup> except that these articles nowhere allege an intent on Archbald's part to allow his judicial opinions to be influenced in return for the transactions he arranged. While the requisite intent might be inferred from the facts alleged, it can also be argued that Archbald merely held himself out as subject to being influenced but in fact never intended to be so influenced.

Perhaps the question of an intent to be influenced could be avoided under section 85 of the Criminal Code, an extortion statute extending to "[e]very officer . . . of the United States."<sup>66</sup> Even if the respondent never intended to be influenced, this statute might apply to articles 1, 3, 5 and 13 to the extent that he held himself out as being prepared to visit adverse consequences upon those who did not cooperate.

Finally, Judge Archbald's activities in compromising litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission, as alleged in article 13, collectively, become a legal unit, but rather that a continuation of transactions which are not seriously irregular when standing alone may become component elements of a system of misconduct sufficient to support an impeachment.

<sup>62</sup>W. Carpenter, Judicial Tenure in the United States 147 (1912); Stimson, supra note 8, at 637; Yankwich, supra note 32, at 856. One writer has commented that it was "doubted" that any of the five articles charged an indictable offense. Ten Broek, supra note 12, at 193.

<sup>63</sup>Following the usual practice, none of the articles in the Archbald impeachment specifically charged respondent with a crime. This is not determinative, however, of whether the facts alleged in the articles would be sufficient as a matter of law to constitute a criminal offense.

<sup>64</sup>Whoever, being a judge of the United States, shall in anyway accept or receive any sum of money, or other bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, contract, obligation, gift, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, with the intent to be influenced thereby in any opinion, judgment, or decree in any suit, controversy, matter, or cause pending before him, or because of any such opinion, ruling, decision, judgment, or decree, shall be fined not more than twenty thousand dollars, or imprisoned not more than fifteen years, or both; and shall be forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Act of March 4, 1909, ch. 321, § 132, 35 Stat. 1112.

It might be noted, parenthetically, that since a federal judge convicted under § 132 would be "forever disqualified to hold any office of honor . . . under the United States," Congress, on at least this one occasion, has taken the position that federal judges can be removed by means other than impeachment. This is, of course, softened somewhat by the fact that bribery is explicitly mentioned as a basis for impeachment in the impeachment clause.

<sup>65</sup>Article 5 would not be covered since it involved only potential litigants in the respondent's court, whereas § 132 requires intent by the judge to be influenced in a matter "pending before him." However, § 117 of the Criminal Code, Act of Mar. 4, 1909, ch. 321, 35 Stat. 1103-16, a bribery statute similar to § 132, extends to intent to be influenced as to matters "which may by law be brought before him" in the future. Section 117 applies to a "judge of the United States" and there is some authority that this includes federal judges. United States v. Germaine, 93 U.S. 508, 509-10 (1875).

<sup>66</sup>Every officer, clerk, agent, or employee of the United States, and every person representing himself to be or assuming to act as such officer, clerk, agent or employee, who, under color of his office, clerkship, agency, or employment, or under color of his pretended or assumed office, clerkship, agency, or employment, is guilty of extortion, and every person who shall attempt any act which if performed would make him guilty of extortion, shall be fined not more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

might constitute the practice of law by a federal judge, which was proscribed in 1812 and is arguably a crime.<sup>62</sup>

The foregoing discussion shows that at least some of the activities for which American federal judges have been impeached and convicted are not criminal offenses. This fact, in conjunction with the internal logic of the language of the impeachment clause, the English precedents and the debates in the Constitutional Convention, indicates that the impeachment remedy is not limited to criminal offenses.

OFFICIAL MISCONDUCT

It has often been suggested that the impeachment power does not extend to misconduct by a public official outside of his official position. The defense in the Swayne impeachment, for example, argued that, with respect to judges, impeachment should be limited to misconduct committed on the bench:

In English and American parliamentary and constitutional law the judicial misconduct which rises to the dignity of a high crime and misdemeanor must consist of judicial acts performed with an evil or wicked intent, by a judge while administering justice in a court, either between private persons or between a private person and the government of the State. All personal misconduct of a judge occurring during his tenure of office and not coming within that category must be classed among the offenses for which a judge may be removed by address, a method of removal which the framers of our Federal Constitution refused to embody therein.<sup>63</sup>

The strongest argument against this position is that criminal conduct, no matter how serious, would not be grounds for impeachment if

<sup>63</sup> Brief for the respondent, submitted February 22, 1905, 5 Hinds, supra note 1, at 366. One commentator, writing eight years later, took a contrary position, but only to the extent that respondent's conduct brought his office into disrepute:

To determine whether or not an act or a course of conduct is sufficient in law to support an impeachment, resort must be had to the eternal principles of right, applied to public propriety and civic morality. The offense must be prejudicial to the public interest and it must flow from a willful intent, or a reckless disregard of duty, to justify the invocation of the remedy. It must act directly or by reflected influence react upon the welfare of the state. It may constitute an intentional violation of positive law, or it may be an official dereliction of commission or omission, a serious breach of moral obligation, or other gross impropriety of personal conduct which, in its natural consequences, tends to bring an office into contempt and disrepute.

While the offense must be committed during incumbency in office, it need not necessarily be committed under color of office. An act or a course of misbehavior which renders scandalous the personal life of a public officer shakes the confidence of the people in his administration of the public affairs, and thus impairs his official usefulness, although it may not directly affect his official integrity or otherwise incapacitate him properly to perform his ascribed functions.

Brown, supra note 61, at 691-92.

Mr. Brown, as Special Investigator and Assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, prepared for the Attorney General a report on Judge Archbald's activities, which was later transmitted to the House, that in effect recommended impeachment.

The prosecution in the Archbald case made the flat statement that "if it is not essential that an offense should be committed in an official capacity in order that it may come within the purview of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachments" and went on to denote as impeachable "lainy conduct on the part of a judge which reflects on his integrity as a man or his fitness to perform the judicial functions." Brief submitted by Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton in the Archbald impeachment, 1 Proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Trial of Impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, S. Doc. No. 1140, 62d Cong., 2d Sess. 1961-62 (1913) [hereinafter cited as Archbald Proceedings]; see also, Simpson, supra note 5, at 305. (Mr. Simpson, as indicated previously, was later transmitted to the House, that in effect recommended impeachment.)

committed outside the scope of the respondent's official duties.<sup>69</sup> This argument is neutralized if one accepts Congressman McCloskey's recent assertion that acceptable judicial conduct is "conduct which complies with judicial ethics while on the bench and with the criminal and civil laws while off the bench."<sup>70</sup>

The idea is not a new one. Counsel for respondent in the Swayne impeachment proceedings argued that "personal misconduct of an English judge off the bench has never furnished the ground for impeachment."<sup>71</sup> An examination of the English impeachment cases lends support to this statement.<sup>72</sup>

The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention have some bearing on the question. On September 8, 1787, the Convention substituted for "maladministration" the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors against the State."<sup>73</sup> The words "United States" were then substituted for "State," "in order to remove ambiguity."<sup>74</sup> The Committee on Style and Arrangement deleted "against the United States" in its report of September 12, 1787,<sup>75</sup> and the Convention adopted this change without debate on September 15, 1787.<sup>76</sup>

Had the phrase "against the United States" not been deleted, the impeachment clause would clearly be limited to violations of federal criminal or civil laws and official misconduct. The change, however, was most probably a technical one, designed to remove surplusage. The framers having adopted the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" from the English practice, which appears to have limited impeachment to official misconduct, the addition of "against the State" or "against the United States" was unnecessary.<sup>77</sup> This explanation is further supported by the nature of the committee that made the change, and by the lack of debate with which the Convention accepted it.

Greater insight can be gained by an examination of the twelve American impeachments, with emphasis on the four convictions, to determine what part, if any, noncriminal, unofficial conduct has played.<sup>78</sup>

The first impeachment, that of Senator William Blount in 1797-99, involved the alleged incitement of two Indian tribes to mount a military expedition against neighboring Spanish territory and capture it for Great Britain. Four of the five articles, which dealt separately with the various means used by the respondent to further his scheme, alleged violations of the "laws" of the United States.<sup>79</sup> This is, at the very least, a reference to violations of civil law, such as the treaty between the United States and Spain referred to in article 2, and may involve criminal violations as well.

The charges on which Judge Pickering was impeached and convicted in 1803-04 all clearly involved official misconduct. The first three articles alleged grossly erroneous rulings on questions of law, while article 4 involved the respondent's personal decorum (drunkenness and profanity) while performing his official duties in court.<sup>80</sup>

Justice Chase (1804-05) was charged solely with misconduct while acting in his official capacity. The first six articles involved improper rulings in two criminal trials, while the last two articles dealt with abuses in connection with the respondent's statements to grand juries.<sup>81</sup>

The single article of impeachment exhibited against Judge Peck (1826-31), dealing with the respondent's abuse of the contempt power in connection with an attorney who had argued a case before him, similarly involved misconduct on the bench.<sup>82</sup>

Judge Humphreys was impeached and convicted in 1862 on charges each of which encompassed either criminal violations or official misconduct, or both. Articles 1 and 2 (urging secession from the Union) and articles 3 and 4 (assisting the Confederate war effort) appear to fall within the constitutional definition of treason.<sup>83</sup> Articles 2 through 4 most probably come within the conspiracy statute passed by Congress in 1861.<sup>84</sup> Article 1 alleged that the respondent violated his oath of office, apparently a form of official misconduct. Articles 5 through 7 alleged that the respondent used his official position and his court to support the Confederacy.<sup>85</sup>

In the impeachment of President Johnson (1866-68), the charges revolved around the respondent's attempts to remove his Secretary of War from office (articles 1 through 9, 11) and certain of the respondent's speeches in which he was highly critical of Congress (articles 10 and 11). Each of the articles dealing with the effort to oust the War Secretary cited at least one federal statute alleged to have been violated by the respondent. In addition, all of the actions in question were taken by the respondent in his official capacity as President. The charges involving the respondent's speeches alleged not only that such language was inflammatory and reflected badly on the Congress, but that the thrust of at least one speech was to attack the validity of congressional legislation and deny that it was binding on the respondent.<sup>86</sup> The latter accusation, tied in with the charges that the respondent ignored several congressional statutes in attempting to remove his Secretary of War, implied a flouting of the principle of separation of powers and a refusal to be bound by the Constitution. This would constitute a violation of civil law and misconduct in the official capacity with which the respondent, as President, deals with the executive and legislative branches.<sup>87</sup>

William Belknap was impeached in 1876 for abusing his position as Secretary of War by accepting money in return for an appointment to an Army post tradership.<sup>88</sup> This was official misconduct, as well as bribery.

Most of the charges against Judge Swayne (1903-05) rather clearly involved either official misconduct or violation of civil or criminal law. Articles 1 through 3 alleged that excessive government monies were paid out to reimburse the respondent while he was on official business. Articles 6 and 7 (failure to reside in the respondent's judicial district) are sufficient grounds for impeachment, since they alleged a "high misdemeanor."<sup>89</sup> This charge, in addition, involved official misconduct, since residence in the respondent's district was required by statute for a person occupying the respondent's official position. The conduct complained of in articles 8 through 12 (abuse of the contempt power against three attorneys) took place on the bench, and therefore constituted official misconduct.

Articles 4 and 5 also involved official misconduct, but for more subtle reasons. These articles alleged that the respondent appropriated for his personal use a railroad car held by a receiver appointed by him. While the respondent took this action in his private capacity, he was able to do so only because of the leverage inherent in his official position.

All thirteen of the articles in the case of Judge Archbald, who was impeached and convicted in 1912-13,<sup>90</sup> alleged official misconduct. Respondent committed the offense specified in article 4 (improper ex parte communications with one party to a suit before his court) while on the bench. The offense complained of in article 12 (appointing the attorney for a railroad as jury commissioner)<sup>91</sup> was committed in an equally official capacity. While the other articles<sup>92</sup> involved conduct committed by the respondent in his private capacity, all of

<sup>87</sup> Since there was no question of respondent's "guilt" of the offense charged—making specified speeches—it is realistic to conclude that his acquittal indicated that the offense charged was not an impeachable one. Thus construed, the Johnson case—as does the unsuccessful Chase impeachment over half a century before—stands for the proposition that impeachment should not be used as a tool to remove from office officials with whom those in power disagree politically.

<sup>89</sup> 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at 960-63. 2 Stat. 788 (1812) declared it "incumbent" upon federal judges to reside within the district for which they were appointed. The statute also stated that it shall "not be lawful" for a judge to practice law. Any person offending the injunctions or prohibitions of the act was guilty of a "high misdemeanor." This definition, arguably, may have included residency violations as a high misdemeanor.

<sup>91</sup> 48 Cong. Rec. 8707 (1912). The conduct alleged in article 12 (on which article respondent was acquitted) does not on its face appear improper. If it were, however (perhaps because the railroad in question was the subject of attempted influence peddling on respondent's part, alleged in article 6), it would be official misconduct since respondent made the appointment in question in his capacity as judge.

the allegations contained therein involve the abuse of his official position as judge for personal gain.<sup>93</sup> In some cases the respondent used his influence to persuade a litigant<sup>94</sup> or a potential litigant<sup>95</sup> to enter into a particular business transaction with a third party, in return for which the respondent would usually be given a financial interest. In other instances, the respondent used his position as judge to secure more direct economic benefits, either from litigants<sup>96</sup> or potential litigants<sup>97</sup> in his court.<sup>98</sup> Judge Archbald also was alleged to have used his influence as judge to settle a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission for a fee, where the opposing party was also a litigant in a case before his court.<sup>99</sup>

All of the charges against Judge English (1925-26) involved either misconduct in his official capacity on the bench or abuse of his position for personal gain, or both. Article 1 involved misconduct during disbarment proceedings, summoning state officials to appear for an imaginary case, and coercion of a jury and of the press. Articles 2 and 3 alleged that the judge operated his bankruptcy court for his personal profit and for that of a particular referee toward whom he showed undue favoritism. Article 4 outlined the respondent's use of his power to choose depository banks for bankruptcy funds to his personal financial benefit. Article 5 alleged denials of the right to counsel and to a jury trial and general mistreatment of litigants. This article also charged that the respondent attempted to use his power to appoint receivers and other officers of the court to secure the appointment of his son to like positions.<sup>100</sup>

One charge against Judge Louderback (1932-33) involved a violation of civil law, while all the remaining allegations were of official misconduct on the bench, designed, in some cases, to personally enrich the respondent. Article 1 outlined an elaborate scheme by which the judge established a fictitious legal residence, in violation of state law, in order to shift the venue of anticipated lawsuit and then rewarded his secret assistant in this endeavor by attempting to coerce a receiver, appointed by the respondent, to choose as his attorney a friend of said assistant. Articles 2 through 4 (appointing incompetents and personal friends as receivers and granting excessive fees) similarly involved misconduct by the respondent in his official capacity and an abuse of his position for personal benefit. Article 5 realleged the substance of the other articles and also charged unfair and arbitrary conduct by the respondent while on the bench.<sup>101</sup>

The first six articles in the Ritter impeachment (1933-36) similarly charged offenses that are either official misconduct or violations of criminal or civil law. Article 1 (receiving a kickback from the fee paid to a receiver appointed by the respondent) and article 2 (participating as a judge in a champertous proceeding designed in part to create the above mentioned fee) alleged, at the very least, misconduct in the respondent's official capacity for personal profit.<sup>102</sup> Articles 3 and 4 alleged the "high misdemeanor" of engaging in the practice of law while on the bench,<sup>103</sup> which is possibly criminal and in any event impeachable.<sup>104</sup> The tax evasion alleged in articles 5 and 6 is, of course, a criminal violation.

While Judge Ritter was acquitted on these six articles, he was convicted on the charge of bringing his court into disrepute, through the conduct alleged in these six articles, which is neither a violation of civil nor criminal law,<sup>105</sup> nor is it official misconduct per se. The underlying conduct by which this was accomplished was, however, either official misconduct or violation of criminal or civil law. Article 7 must be construed accordingly.<sup>106</sup>

As can be seen from this recital of the charges in the twelve American impeachments, every charge in each article in all twelve cases—acquittals and convictions alike—charges either official misconduct or violation of criminal or civil law. Such a well-established and long-standing precedent, though not determinative, provides at least a strong indication of the scope of impeachable offenses. Thus, the impeachment power should exclude misconduct by the respondent in his private capacity which involves neither the conduct of his official duties, an abuse of his official position, nor a violation of criminal or civil law.

CONCLUSION

It can therefore be concluded that impeachment is not a political tool for arbitrary removal of officials; that the standard for what constitutes an impeachable offense is not based on an inflexible historical precedent or on the judicial tenure clause; that impeachment is not limited to crimes, whether indictable or otherwise;<sup>107</sup> and that the sanction of impeachment does not extend to noncriminal misconduct unless it involves violation of statutory law, the conduct of the respondent's official duties or an abuse of his official position.

Within these limitations, it is extremely difficult to define the proper standard for an impeachable offense in affirmative terms since the Ritter case cites the conduct charged in the first six articles only as the basis for a charge of bringing respondent's court into disrepute. Article 5 in the Louderback case, on the other hand, realleges the substance of the first four articles.

<sup>106</sup> Thus, if the respondent brings his court into disrepute by conduct which itself could be the subject of an impeachment, this degradation of his court is an impeachable offense under the Ritter precedent. However, otherwise nonimpeachable conduct cannot be bootstrapped into an impeachable offense under the rubric of alleging that such conduct brought the respondent or his court into disrepute.

<sup>107</sup> One commentator is of the opinion that noncriminal misconduct is impeachable only to the extent that such conduct is of a nature that it could be made a criminal offense. Simpson, supra note 8, at 805, 811-12; accord, Brief for the Respondent in Archbald Impeachment, 1 Archbald Proceedings, supra note 68, at 1092-1101 (argued in the alternative to the proposition that only indictable crimes are impeachable).

number of impeachments, not to mention convictions, has been far too small to form the basis of a comprehensive catalog of specific impeachable offenses.

The only generalization which can safely be made is that an impeachable offense must be serious in nature. This requirement flows from the language of the impeachment clause itself—"high crimes and misdemeanors," and is mandated by common sense if nothing else. While there is perhaps some authority to the contrary, it is generally accepted that the adjective "high" modifies "misdemeanors" as well as "crimes".<sup>107</sup> The nature of those articles of impeachment which resulted in conviction also indicates quite clearly that misconduct by a public official, be it criminal or noncriminal, must be of a serious nature to be impeachable.

While there are no clear rules as to what constitutes a serious offense, there are a number of factors which are relevant. Thus, an offense is more serious if it is a criminal violation or if it involves moral turpitude. In the words of one court,

It may be safely asserted that where the act of official delinquency consists in the violation of some provision of the constitution or statute which is denounced as a crime or misdemeanor, or where it is a mere neglect of duty willfully done, with a corrupt intention, or where the negligence is so gross and the disregard of duty so flagrant as to warrant the inference that it was willful and corrupt, it is within the definition of a misdemeanor in office. But where it consists of a mere error of judgment or omission of duty without the element of fraud, and where the negligence is attributable to a misconception of duty rather than a willful disregard thereof, it is not impeachable, although it may be highly prejudicial to the interests of the State.<sup>108</sup>

Thus a minor or technical violation of the judicial canons of ethics, of the civil law or even of the criminal law would not be impeachable. The violation must be serious, as in the cases of the four American judges convicted. To conclude otherwise would be not only to fly in the face of the precedents set by the 200-year history of American impeachments, but also to undermine the efforts of the framers of the Constitution to create an independent judiciary.

APPENDIX: THE 12 AMERICAN IMPEACHMENTS

I. WILLIAM BRIGANT

Position: United States Senator from Tennessee

Date: 1797-99

Charges: Article 1, Conspiring to carry on a military expedition against Spanish territory "in the Floridas and Louisiana . . . for the purpose of . . . conquering the same for the King of Great Britain," in violation of the laws and the obligations of neutrality of the United States.

<sup>107</sup>In fact, the language of 28 U.S.C. § 454 (1964) making the practice of law by federal judges a "high misdemeanor"—a phrase otherwise foreign to the criminal law—would indicate that Congress as far back as 1812 assumed that "high" modifies "misdemeanors" and that this conduct should be denominated a "high misdemeanor" to make clear that it could form the basis of an impeachment. See note 67 supra.

<sup>108</sup>State v. Hastings, 37 Neb. 96, 116-17, 55 N.W. 774, 780 (1893), interpreting article V, § 5, of the Nebraska Constitution, which provides that all civil officers of the state shall be "liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office."

Article 2. Conspiring to incite the Creek and Cherokee Indians to warfare in furtherance of the above mentioned scheme and in violation of the laws of the United States and of a treaty between the United States and Spain.

Article 3. Attempting to diminish and destroy the influence with the Creek and Cherokee Indian tribes of the principal Federal temporary agent in the area in furtherance of respondent's above mentioned scheme and against the laws of the United States.

Article 4. Attempting to "seduce" a Federal agent stationed at a trading post in the Cherokee Indian territories into assisting respondent in his "criminal intentions and conspiracies" above mentioned, against the laws and treaties of the United States.

Article 5. Attempting to impair the confidence of the Cherokee Indians in the United States and to "create and foment discontents and disaffection among said Indians" toward the United States in relation to the process provided by treaty for determining the boundary line between the Cherokee Nation and the United States, in furtherance of respondent's above mentioned "criminal designs" to incite the Cherokees and "against the peace and interests" of the United States.

Disposition: Acquitted of all charges on the ground that a United States Senator is not a civil officer of the United States as that term is used in the impeachment clause.

Article 8. Attempting to obtain favors—specifically the discounting of a $500 note—from the principal owner of a company engaged in litigation before respondent.

Article 9. Improperly influencing a party defendant in whose favor respondent had ruled to discount a $500 note.

Article 10. Accepting "a large sum of money" from an official of several corporations, any of which in the course of business was liable to be interested in litigation coming before respondent, and thereby bringing respondent's office into disrepute.

Article 11. Receiving in excess of $500 from various attorneys practicing in respondent's court and two court officials appointed by respondent.

Article 12. Appointing as jury commissioner the general attorney for a railroad.

Article 13. Obtaining credit from and through persons interested in litigation pending before respondent, while respondent was sitting on the District Court and also while respondent was sitting on the Commerce Court. While sitting on the Commerce Court: Carrying on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase and sale of culm dumps and other coal property; compromising litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission for a valuable consideration; corruptly using his influence as a judge on the Commerce Court in furtherance of the above mentioned schemes and to induce various railroads engaged in interstate commerce to enter into contracts in which respondent was financially interested. Respondent did not invest any money in consideration of any interest given him, but instead used his influence as judge with the contracting parties, many of whom were litigants in his court, and received an interest in such contracts in consideration of the use of his influence.

Disposition: Convicted on articles 1, 3, 4, 5 and 13; acquitted on other articles.

respondent would jail the jurymen; summoning certain members of the press to appear in court and threatening them with abusive language, including one threat of imprisonment, in order to suppress publication of certain facts concerning a disbarment proceeding.

Articles 2-3. Showing favoritism to a particular referee in bankruptcy, resulting in a combination to control and manage the court to the personal interest and profit of respondent and said referee; amending the rules of bankruptcy in respondent's judicial district for the sole purpose of furthering said combination.

Article 2. Granting "exorbitant" allowances to a receiver and an attorney, who were respondent's "personal and political friends and associates," and then refusing to order all of the assets involved in the case turned over to the state insurance commissioner, as ordered by the Circuit Court of Appeals, until all parties agreed not to contest said allowances.

Article 3. Appointing one Guy H. Gilbert as receiver knowing he was unqualified and incompetent, and refusing a hearing on the question to the parties in interest.

Article 4. Granting "on insufficient and improper application" and without proper notice to the parties the appointment as equity receiver of Guy H. Gilbert (referred to in article 3 supra) in a case where no receiver should have been appointed; failing to give impartial consideration to the motion to discharge such receiver; unlawfully taking jurisdiction over and approving a petition in bankruptcy of the company concerned, which petition was based solely on the improper appointment of an equity receiver by respondent, notwithstanding the pendency of the motion to discharge said receiver; appointing as receiver in said bankruptcy proceeding the aforementioned Guy H. IMPEACHMENT OF CIVIL OFFICERS UNDER THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION*

LEON R. YANKWICH**

I

THE NATURE OF IMPEACHMENT

Impeachment is resorted to so little that when mention is made of courts, the court of impeachment is seldom adverted to. Yet in California law, the court of impeachment is given at the head of the list of courts.<sup>1</sup> Under the Federal Constitution, the judicial power of the United States is vested in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time “ordain and establish”.<sup>2</sup>

The power of impeachment is, not strictly speaking, judicial power retained by the Congress. Nevertheless, the power is a most important one and when the Senate, under the mandate of the Constitution, sits in impeachment, it exercises a function of judicial character, whether we call it a court or not.

The word “impeachment”, in its original sense—derived from the Latin impedire (pedire, fetter, and pes, pedem, foot)—meant “to hinder” or “to prevent”. In parliamentary usage, it acquired the meaning of accusation or charge. Late in the 16th century, the word began to acquire the meaning which it has now, to accuse a person of high crime and misdemeanor before a court of impeachment. The practice of impeachment developed with the rise of responsible government and parliamentary institutions. By some, its rise is attributed to the fact that it was thought that high officers of the Crown might avoid, through their influence, punishment unless Parliament itself was in a position to inflict punishment.

The practice, as we have it, comes from England. The earliest record of an impeachment trial in England dates back to 1376. During the reign of Edward III and some of his successors, Bills of Attainder and proceedings in the Court of the Star Chamber took the place of impeachment trials. In 1620, impeachment was revived and during the next sixty-eight years, there was an impeachment on the average of every twenty months. There has been no resort to impeachment in England since the trial of Henry Lord Viscount Melville, Treasurer of His Majesty's Navy, for misappropriation of funds in 1806, in the reign of George III.<sup>2</sup> Under English parliamentary practice, any person, whether a peer or a commoner, may be impeached by the House of Commons for any crime or misdemeanor.<sup>3</sup> By specific constitutional provision, the right of impeachment under the Federal Constitution is very limited.

II

IMPEACHMENT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Impeachment and the procedure under it are governed by a few apparently simple provisions in the Constitution of the United States. They are:

"The House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole power of impeachment."<sup>4</sup>

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the chief justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present."<sup>5</sup>

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."<sup>6</sup>

"The President . . . shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."<sup>7</sup>

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."<sup>8</sup>

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. . . ."<sup>9</sup>

One of the most significant differences between impeachment in England and in the United States appears in the designation of persons who may be impeached. First to be noted is the fact that the President is subject to impeachment. No such right existed in England as to the English sovereign. The fact has been adverted to repeatedly by our courts in discussing the nature of the presidential office. In Langford v. United States, Mr. Justice Miller wrote:

"The President, in the exercise of the executive functions, bears a nearer resemblance to the limited monarch of the English Government than any other branch of our Government, and is the only individual

to whom it could possibly have any relation. It cannot apply to him, because the Constitution admits that he may do wrong, and has provided a means for his trial for wrong-doing, and his removal from office if found guilty by the proceeding of impeachment. None of the eminent counsel who defended President Johnson on his impeachment trial asserted that by law he was incapable of doing wrong, or that, if done, it could not, as in the case of the King, be imputed to him, but must be laid to the charge of the ministers who advised him.<sup>11</sup>

Another difference is noticeable in the fact that under English procedure, any person may be impeached. Under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, only "civil officers" may be impeached. The provision is broad enough to include all officers of the United States, who hold their appointment from the national government, whether their duties be executive, administrative or judicial, or whether their position be high or low. Military or naval officers are not subject to impeachment. No attempt has ever been made to impeach one. The reason, of course, is obvious: Army and Navy officers are subject to trial and punishment according to the Military Codes. As Story once put it,

"The very nature and efficiency of military duties and discipline require this summary and exclusive jurisdiction."<sup>12</sup>

Judges of the courts of the United States may be impeached. Four such judges have actually been convicted after impeachment: John Pickering in 1803; W. H. Humphreys in 1862; R. W. Archbald in 1912, and Halsted L. Ritter in 1936. In 1917, articles of impeachment were voted against Judge George W. English of Illinois, but he resigned before trial. There are other instances of judges against whom impeachment proceedings were recommended by the House Committee, but were dropped when they resigned: P. K. Lawrence in 1839; J. C. Watrous in 1860; M. H. Delahy in 1872; E. Durrell in 1874, and R. Busted in 1874. In 1933, a Federal District Judge from California stood trial for impeachment. The two-thirds vote necessary to obtain conviction not having been secured on any of the five charges of misconduct directed against him and arising out of the manner of handling receiverships, he stood acquitted and retained office. On April 16, 1936, the Senate of the United States convicted Judge Halsted L. Ritter, District Judge of the Southern District of Florida, after impeachment under seven articles charging him with misbehavior in office.

So far as is known, impeachment proceedings have been begun but once in the United States against a member of the President's Cabinet. That happened in 1876 when impeachment charges for bribery were filed against William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, after he had resigned. Although his contention that he was not a "civil officer" and, therefore, not subject to impeachment, was overruled, he was later acquitted, presumably upon the same ground. All authorities agree that members of the Congress of the United States, not being commissioned by the President, are not "civil officers" of the United States. Only one attempt has ever been made to impeach a Senator of the United States. That was in 1797, when articles of impeachment were filed against Senator William Blount. The Senate sustained Senator Blount's objection to the jurisdiction upon the ground that he was not a "civil officer", subject to impeachment.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Of the many points of difference which exist between the first magistrate in England and the first magistrate of the United States in respect to the personal dignity conferred on them by the constitutions of their respective nations, the court will only select and mention two. It is a principle of the English constitution that the king can do no wrong, that no blame can be imputed to him, that he cannot be named in debate. By the constitution of the United States, the president, as well as any other officer of the government, may be impeached. . . .

Under the broad interpretation which has been placed upon the words "civil officer", it is quite evident that many of the civil officers who are subject to impeachment may also be removed by the President with or without the consent of the Senate.<sup>14</sup> Others, such as the President and Vice-President, cannot be removed otherwise. This is also true as to Judges. For, while the Constitution provides that they shall hold office during "their good behavior"<sup>15</sup> there is no provision in the Constitution for their removal for lack of "good behavior", except through impeachment.

III

GROUNDS FOR IMPEACHMENT

The grounds for impeachment are treason, bribery and "other high crimes and misdemeanors".<sup>16</sup> The words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are general. They are borrowed from English parliamentary practice. The phrases there used have been, at various times "treason, felonies and mischiefs done to our Lord, The King", "divers deceits", and, finally, in their latest form, "high crimes and misdemeanors". No definition of them has been attempted. The meaning of the two specific crimes, bribery and treason, is well established. Treason is defined in the Constitution itself as consisting "only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort".<sup>17</sup> For a definition of bribery, resort is had to the common law definition which is usually given as "the voluntary giving or receiving of anything of value in corrupt payment for an official act done or to be done".<sup>18</sup> The Constitution gives us no clue as to what crime or misdemeanors are. However, a study of English and American precedents in impeachment cases leads to the conclusion that they cover general official misconduct. The variety of charges which have served as a basis for impeachment may be illustrated by reference to some well-known cases.

On May 20, 1620, in the reign of James I, Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, was impeached before the House of Lords for bribery and corruption in office. The charges against him, contained in a large number of articles consisted of receiving money and valuable objects as bribes from litigants in cases pending before him. In many instances, the charge was made that he received bribes from both sides of the controversy. A final charge was also made that "he had given way to great extractions by servants in respect of private seals, and sealing injunctions". On April 30, 1620, Bacon admitted his guilt. He was fined 40,000 pounds. He was stripped of his peerage and his honors and sentenced to imprisonment in the Tower, at the King's pleasure. The fine was later remitted. He actually served only a few days in the Tower and was pardoned in November, 1621. That English judges, at the time, were not above corruption is evidenced by the fact that Bacon, himself, in his address to Serjeant Hutton upon becoming a Judge of the Common Pleas, saw fit to warn him against corruption with these words:

"That your hands and the hands of your hands (I mean those about you) be clean and uncorrupt from gifts, from meddling in titles, and from serving of turns, be they great ones, or small ones." Bacon, in his famous essay on judicature, set the loftiest ideals for a judge. In it he speaks of "integrity" as the portion of judges and their proper virtue and warns against improper acts by subalterns.

"The place of justice," he says, "is a hallowed place; and therefore not only the bench, but the foot pace and precincts, and purprise (close) thereof, ought to be preserved without scandal and corruption." More is the pity that a man of this type—the man who through his most important work, Novum Organum, or The Advancement of Learning, laid the foundation for the inductive method of discerning truth, and who is considered by modern historians of science as "one of the great builders who constructed the mind of the modern world"<sup>19</sup>—should have brought corruption to the high office of Chancellor, thus demonstrating that to study truth may not always mean to live it.

On May 13, 1624, during the reign of the same King, Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer, was found guilty upon impeachment which charged him with bribery and extortion under color of office. He was sentenced to the loss of his offices, disqualified from holding any office, place or employment "in the state and commonwealth" and was ordered imprisoned in the Tower of London during the King's pleasure; to pay a fine of 50,000 pounds and "that he shall never sit in Parliament any more and that he shall never come within the verge of the court."

On May 8, 1626, in the reign of Charles I, articles of impeachment were voted against George, Duke, Marquis and Earl of Buckingham, Great Admiral of the Kingdom of England and Ireland, charging him with holding a plurality of offices, buying his office as an admiral, buying a wardenship, failure to guard the seas and other acts of abuse of power and extortion, including the selling of places of judicature, procuring honors for his poor kindred and his "transcendent presumption in giving physic to the King".

Parliamentary upheavals resulting in the dissolution of Parliament, and the killing of the Duke on August 23, prevented the completion of his trial upon these charges.

On November 25, 1640, during the reign of the same King, Thomas, Earl of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was charged in articles or impeachment with various acts committed in Ireland aiming to subvert Parliamentary authority and to substitute his own arbitrary power. An old historian of the Long Parliament of England, Thomas May, has summed up the charges against him in the following quaint language:

The first and second being much alike, concerning his ruling of Ireland, and those parts of England, where his Authority lay, in an Arbitrary way, against the fundamental Lawes of the Kingdoms, which Lawes he had endeavoured to subvert. Thirdly, his retaining part of the King's Revenue, without giving a legal account. Fourthly, The abusing of his Power, to the increase and encouragement of Papists. Fifthly, That he maliciously had endeavoured to stir-up Hostility betweene England and Scotland. Sixthly, That, being Lieutenant-General of the Northerne Army, he had wilfully suffered the Scots to defeat the English at Newburne, and take Newcastle: that by such a losse and dishonour, England might be engaged in a National and irreconcilable quarrel with the Scots. Seventhly, That to preserve himselfe from questioning, he had laboured to subvert Parliaments and incense the King against them. Eighthly, and lastly, That these things were done during the time of his Authority as Deputy of Ireland, and Lieutenant-General of the Northerne Armies in England.

The King in person attended the trial and took notes. The higher aristocracy were on the side of the accused. May complains:

"The Courtiers cryed him up, and the Ladies (whose voices will carry much with some parts of the State) were exceedingly on his side."

Although the trial lasted from the twenty-second of March until the middle of April, during which time the Earl was on the stand for fifteen days, the Managers of the House of Commons finally decided on April 21, 1641, to proceed against him by Bill of Attainder. He was found guilty and executed on May 12, 1641.

Edward, Earl of Clarendon, Lord Chancellor of England, was impeached on July 10, 1633, in the reign of Charles II, on various charges. Among them were that he had tried to alienate the hearts of His Majesty's subjects from him by artificial insinuations and circulating approbrious scandals against the King, inciting jealousy; that he had "wickedly" advised the King to withdraw the English garrisons out of Scotland, and to demolish the forts; that he had endeavored to alienate the affection of the King from Parliament, and that he had advised the King and secured the sale of Dunkirk to the French King. The last Article read:

"That having arrogated to himself a supreme direction of all his majesty's affairs, he hath, with a malicious and corrupt intention, prevailed to have his majesty's customs farmed at a far lower rate than others do offer, and that by persons, with some of whom he goes a share, in that and other parts of money resulting from his majesty's revenue."

Clarendon fled, so the trial could not be held. Parliament, therefore, on December 12, passed a statute banishing him.

The last impeachment of which there is a record in England, is that of Henry, Lord Viscount Melville, Treasurer of His Majesty's Navy, who was impeached for various actions of misappropriation of public funds, on April 29, 1806, in the reign of George III. He was acquitted, after a long trial, on June 12, 1806. Other instances are a judge, (Tresilian) being impeached for misleading a sovereign by rendering unconstitutional opinions; an ambassador, (Wolsey) for betraying his trust: an advisor of the King, (Halifax) for seeking to obtain exorbitant emoluments to himself.<sup>20</sup>

The American precedents indicate, as do these English precedents, that the misconduct may, but need not, amount to a violation of law.

None of the eleven articles of impeachment against President Andrew Johnson, the only American President ever to face impeachment, charged a direct offense against either the Constitution or the statutes of the United States, except, perhaps, the violation of the Tenure of Office Act. Nine of the articles concerned the attempted removal of his Secretary of War and the others charged that the President, by his intemperate and inflammatory speeches, had attempted to bring into contempt the Congress of the United States. Judge John Pickering was convicted on impeachment in 1803, although no direct violation of law was charged against him. The charges were that he had released a vessel without bond, refused to hear witnesses in the case, refused to allow an appeal from his judgment; that he was intoxicated and used profanity while on the Bench. The articles of impeachment against Judge Samuel Chase charged unjudicial conduct, such as refusal to allow counsel to argue on the law to a jury, and addressing a grand jury in intemperate political language, in order to bring about an indictment under the Espionage Act. He was acquitted. Judge W. H. Humphreys was charged with treason, neglect of duty, of acting as a judge in a Confederate state and causing the wrongful arrest of citizens while so doing. Judge J. H. Peck was charged with punishing an attorney wrongfully for contempt. He was acquitted. The charges against Judge Swayne related to making wrongful claims for travelling expenses, receiving benefits from a receiver of his appointment, and punishing two attorneys wrongfully for contempt. He was acquitted. Judge R. W. Archbald was tried under five articles, none of which charged a crime. Among the most serious charges against him was the charge that he conducted a secret correspondence with a litigant concerning the merits of a case pending before him.

The impeachment proceedings against other judges, in more recent times, were grounded on misconduct which fell short of being a crime.

In the most recent impeachment—that of Judge Halsted L. Ritter of the Southern District of Florida<sup>21</sup>—the articles of impeachment were in substance:

I Misbehavior and high crime and misdemeanor in office by corruptly and unlawfully accepting from his former law partner $4,500 out of the avails of a decree made by the respondent.

II Misbehavior and high crime and misdemeanor in office by conspiring with his former law partner and others to continue property in litigation, promoting the conspiracy by keeping jurisdiction of a foreclosure proceeding contrary to the motion of the plaintiff in person, on the basis of interventions filed in the case, appointing as receiver a person alleged to be involved in the con-

VII Misbehavior and high crimes and misdemeanor in office by accepting large fees and gratuities, to-wit, $7,500 from J. R. Francis on or about April 19, 1929, said J. R. Francis having large property within his territorial jurisdiction as a judge, and on, to-wit, the 4th day of April, 1929, accepting $2,000 from Mullford Realty Corporation and a large amount of the securities of Olympia Improvement Corporation, organized to develop holdings within his territorial jurisdiction. Also, "by his conduct as detailed in articles I, II, III, and IV hereof, and by his income-tax evasions, as set forth in articles V and VI hereof."<sup>22</sup>

Judge Ritter was acquitted on Articles I to VI, but was adjudged guilty on Article VII by a vote of 56 to 28. After the vote was announced, a point of order was made that the respondent was not guilty because Article VII is an omnibus article, the ingredients of which are contained in the others upon which he had been acquitted. The president pro tempore of the Senate, however, overruled the point of order stating:

"A point of order is made as to Article VII, in which the respondent is charged with general misbehavior. It is a separate charge from any other charge, and the point of order is overruled."<sup>23</sup>

He then ordered judgment entered removing Judge Ritter from office.

It is very significant that by this ruling the Senate gave sanction to the proposition that to justify removal of a judge it is not necessary that he be guilty of violation of law. So ruling, they made their own the part of Article VII which reads:

<sup>23</sup> Ibid. The contention that his acquittal on the charges contained in Articles I to VI inclusive prevented his conviction on Article VII was advanced by Judge Ritter himself in the suit to recover his salary for the month of April, 1936, before the Court of Claims.

The claim was rejected upon the ground that no authority exists in any court of the United States to review or revise the action of the United States Senate in an impeachment proceeding.

The Court said:

"Our conclusion is that we have no authority to review the impeachment proceedings held in the Senate and decide whether the accusations made against the plaintiff were such that he could properly be impeached thereon, nor can we pass upon the question of whether his acquittal on the first six articles was a bar to prosecution under the seventh. In our opinion, the Senate was the sole tribunal that could take jurisdiction of the articles of impeachment presented to that body against the plaintiff and its decision is final." Ritter v. United States, 84 Ct. Cl. 298, 300 (1935). See State ex. rel. Trapp v. Chambers, 96 Okla. 78, 220 Pac. 890 (1924).

The Supreme Court by denying certiorari has approved the ruling Ritter v. United States, 300 U.S. 668 (1933).

The reasonable and probable consequence of the actions or conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, hereunder specified or indicated in this article, since he became judge of said court, as an individual or as such judge, is to bring his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice therein, and to the prejudice of public respect for and confidence in the Federal judiciary, and to render him unfit to continue to serve as such judge.<sup>24</sup>

This ruling definitely lays down the principle that even though upon specific charges amounting to legal violations, the impeaching body finds the accused not guilty, it may, nevertheless, find that his conduct in these very matters was such as to bring his office into disrepute and order his removal upon that ground.

The conclusion thus reached met with vigorous opposition on the part of some of the Senators as the debates show. Nevertheless, it is consistent with the general attitude of courts in cases dealing with the professions. Courts have repeatedly held that an attorney, after acquittal of a charge of law violation, may, nevertheless, be disbarred for his conduct in the very matter of which he stood acquitted. Similar rulings have been made with regard to physicians. The basis of these rulings is that the object of the criminal prosecution is entirely distinct from the proceedings for disbarment or revocation of license—the one aiming to punish, the other to the protection of the public and the profession. These principles are applied with such uniformity in all cases that it is unnecessary to give any citations. They apply with greater force to a judicial office in which the highest rectitude is required. So that instead of seeing danger in the precedent set in the Ritter case, we should welcome the ruling of the Senate as notice to the judiciary that they will require compliance with the highest standards of ethical behavior upon their part. And so I agree with the summary of the case made by the Honorable William Gibbs McAdoo, Senator from California, in a memorandum which he filed in the matter:

Good behavior, as it is used in the Constitution, exacts of a judge the highest standards of public and private rectitude. No judge can besmirch the robes he wears by relaxing these standards, by compromising them through conduct which brings reproach upon himself personally, or upon the great office he holds. No more sacred trust is committed to the bench of the United States than to keep shining with undimmed effulgence the brightest jewel in the crown of democracy—justice.

However disagreeable the duty may be to those of us who constitute this great body in determining the guilt of those who are entrusted under the Constitution with the high responsibilities of judicial office, we must be as exacting in our conception of the obligations of a judicial officer as Mr. Justice Cardozo defined them when he said, in connection with fiduciaries, that they should be held "to something stricter than the morals of the market place. Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior."<sup>25</sup>

In the only impeachments under the California Constitution involving judges, the charges did not involve violations of law. Judge James

H. Hardy was impeached and found guilty in 1862, for using profane language out of court and expressing sympathy with the Confederate cause. In 1929, Judge Carlos S. Hardy, of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, was impeached and acquitted. The accusations against him were:

(1) that he gave legal advice as attorney and counsellor of law to a well-known evangelist and her mother;

(2) that he aided her in fostering the belief that she had been kidnapped, while the grand jury was investigating the kidnapping;

(3) that, while a judge, he had received a sum of money in compensation for legal services;

(4) that he had sought to intimidate a witness who might be called in a criminal case arising out of the kidnapping;

(5) that in the trial of a criminal case he had caused to be numbered the seats in the courtroom and had distributed tickets for the seats to his friends.

The only other impeachments of California State officers, under the State law, were those of Henry Bates, State Treasurer, in 1857, for defrauding the State, which resulted in his conviction, and, in the same year, of G. W. Whitman, State Comptroller, upon a similar accusation, which resulted in his acquittal. Whitman, however, was suspended from his office pending trial and was never reinstated after his acquittal.

From these precedents, it is evident that the interpretation which is placed upon the words "crimes and misdemeanors" is a broad one; that persons have been impeached and found guilty for acts of misconduct, some of a personal, others of an official character—which do not amount to a crime. So much so that the Committee on Impeachment of the House of Representatives in the case of United States District Judge George W. English, stated in their report that impeachment may be based upon acts not forbidden by either the Constitution or the Federal Statutes. The Report read:

It is now, we believe, considered that impeachment is not confined to acts which are forbidden by the Constitution or Federal statutes. The better sustained and modern view is that the provision for impeachment in the Constitution applies not only to high crimes and misdemeanors as those words were understood at common law but also acts which are not defined as criminal and made subject to indictment, and also to those which affect the public welfare. Thus an official may be impeached for offenses of a political character and for gross betrayal of public interests. Also for abuses or betrayal of trusts, for inexcusable negligence of duty, for the tyrannical abuse of power, or, as one writer puts it, for 'a breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness, when habitual, or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official duty imposed by statute or common law'. No judge may be impeached for a wrong decision.<sup>26</sup>

This broad statement of the grounds for removal by impeachment, supported by precedents in our history, justifies the statement made in 1913 by Former President William H. Taft, who, in commenting upon the conviction after impeachment of United States Circuit Judge Robert W. Archbald, stated that judges "must be careful in their conduct outside of court as well as in the court itself, and that they must not use the prestige of their official position, directly or indirectly, to secure personal benefits."

Elsewhere in the same address, Mr. Taft stated:

Under the authoritative construction by the highest court of impeachment, the Senate of the United States, a high misdemeanor for which a judge may be removed in misconduct involving bad faith or wantonness or recklessness in his judicial action or the use of his official influence for ulterior purposes. . . . By the liberal interpretation of the term "high misdemeanor" which the Senate has given, there is now no difficulty in securing the removal of a judge for any reason that shows him unfit.<sup>27</sup>

Under the English practice, the House of Lords may impose any punishment it sees fit. So, in addition to removal from office, imprisonment, fines, banishment have been imposed. In one case—that of Archbishop Laud—death was imposed. It is evident from this that impeachment under English law aims to punish the individual. The Federal provision, not only by the grounds of impeachment, but also by the punishment it provides, justifies the statement that the proceeding is not intended to punish the individual for wrongdoing, but merely to remove him from office for political offenses. The punishment provided in the Constitution is removal from office and disqualification from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States.<sup>28</sup> Conviction is not a bar to prosecution for the same acts under the criminal law.

PROCEDURE ON IMPEACHMENT

By analogy to English practice a procedure has grown up which is substantially as follows:

The impeachment is instituted by the House of Representatives by the adoption of a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to investigate charges brought against the officer. This committee may, after investigation, recommend the dismissal of the charges, or recommend the impeachment. If the resolution recommending impeachment is adopted, articles of impeachment are drawn setting forth the grounds for impeachment. Following the adoption of a resolution to impeach, the House appoints Managers to conduct the impeachment. The Senate is then informed of these facts by resolution. Upon this resolution reaching the Senate, the Senate adopts a resolution informing the House that the Senate is ready to receive the Managers appointed by the House. The latter then present themselves to the Senate, and present the articles of impeachment, reserving the right to file additional articles later. The Managers then retire. After the Senate has fixed the time for the trial, the House is informed of the fact. On the date of the trial, the Senate resolves itself into a body for trial of the impeachment. The President of the Senate presides over the court, except in case of the impeachment of the President of the United States, when the Chief Justice presides. Upon the organization of the court, the Managers appear and the trial of the case proceeds. In England, the Commons attend the trial in a body. The accused is brought before the court, and may present his demurrer or answer to the charges contained in the articles. The presentation of the evidence takes the usual order of proceedings in a court. The evidence against the accused is first presented, then evidence in defense and concluding evidence by the Managers. In the examination of witnesses and the presentation of testimony, the general rules of evidence obtainable in criminal courts apply, including the constitutional presumptions and guarantees applicable to criminal trials. After the conclusion of the evidence, there is argument, followed by deliberation by the Senate in executive session and the vote in open session.<sup>29</sup> A two-thirds vote is necessary for impeachment. The proceeding may be dismissed in the Senate by the House Managers. The Senate may either acquit or convict the defendant. In England, a person convicted on impeachment may be pardoned or reprieved by the Crown.<sup>30</sup> No pardon is permitted under the Federal Constitution.<sup>31</sup>

THE INEFFECTIVENESS OF THE REMEDY

Impeachment has fallen into disuse in England. Dicey explains this disuse by stating that the rule of law—to the observance on which the English people are so definitely committed—makes it unnecessary to resort to extraordinary remedies to enforce its obedience.<sup>32</sup> In the United States, it is significant that it has been used more often against judges than against other civil officers. It has been estimated that fifty percent of the impeachment proceedings were against judges.<sup>33</sup> It is the view of students that the acquittal of President Johnson saved the United States from what might otherwise have been a tragedy—a tragedy that might have branded as unworthy a man whom later generations have come to consider as a great patriot trying to carry on under trying circumstances. A great historical wrong was thus avoided by one vote. The background of Johnson's impeachment is now known to all. The presence of Johnson, of plebeian origin, in the Presidency was objectionable to many people. His intemperate speeches and attacks offended others. Upon the death of Lincoln, it was thought that in Johnson the re-united states had a President who would sanction extreme measures against the defeated South. Johnson, however, after becoming President, withstood the attempts of the radicals and extremists to crush the South. He sought, in his own "undiplomatic" way, to uphold the cause of those who would heal the wounds of the War, as Lincoln had desired. His reward was a trial of impeachment. The trial was presided over by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase. It began on March 5,

1868, and ended on May 26, 1868. The vote was 35 for conviction and 19 for acquittal.<sup>34</sup>

Several State Governors have been convicted after impeachment, in recent years, Governor William Sulzer of New York in 1913, Governor James Ferguson of Texas in 1917, and Governor J. C. Walton of Oklahoma in 1923. Recurring election and the recall statutes make the removal of judges of state courts easy and resort to impeachment unnecessary. This is not the case with Federal judges. The remedy of impeachment is cumbersome and unavailable, except in extreme cases. The convictions secured were in cases which showed grave violations of those standards of probity and ethical conduct which we associate with the high office. There are other faults, however, such as arbitrariness, which as effectively destroy a judge's usefulness, as the more serious lapses which have been made the basis of impeachment.

In the case of the lower Federal courts, at least, which are the creatures of the Congress,<sup>35</sup> an easier method is needed to determine the fitness of an occupant to continue in office. The Constitution provides that such judges shall hold office during "good behavior". But it contains no provision defining "good behavior", or giving anyone the right to do so. It has been suggested recently that such power exists in the Congress. The suggestion is that the Congress give the Supreme Court the right to establish a test of "behavior" with power to remove Federal Judges, other than constitutional judges, when their "behavior" is no longer "good".<sup>36</sup>

<sup>36</sup> The proposal is that of Senator William Gibbs McAdoo of California, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Bankruptcies, Receiverships and The Administration of Justice. His statement given to the press at Los Angeles, November 12, 1935 (see Herald-Express) read in part:

"Judges of the Supreme Court and all other courts of the United States, by a provision of the Constitution, hold their offices during their 'good behavior', which ordinarily means for life. Thus a higher standard of conduct is required of the judiciary than that of other government officers, for they must not only avoid the grounds of removal as specified for all others, but must also so demean themselves that their official behavior is good.

"The Supreme Court is created by the Constitution and it is clear that none of its members could be attacked in any other way than by the impeachment process provided for in the Constitution itself.

"The circuit court of appeals, the district courts and all other courts of the United States are created by Congress under the authority delegated to it by the Constitution. It naturally follows that whatever Congress may do it may undo, and it would seem to be within its power to establish a method independent of the impeachment process, of inquiring into the judicial conduct of the judges for those courts it has created.

"I believe it a practical application of the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to pass a law which would give to the Supreme Court, for instance, the right to take evidence upon the conduct of any judge of an inferior court, and to decide the question of his fitness to continue to act as a member of the court."

The junior Senator from California has since embodied the idea in a Bill known as Senate Bill 4527, introduced on April 23, 1936, which would establish a "high court for the trial of judicial officers" to be composed of ten judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, ranking in point of seniority and service, one to be drawn from each circuit, together with the Chief Justice of the United States, District Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, who shall be the presiding judge or justice of the court. The jurisdiction of the court would be confined to the trial and determination of charges to be brought against judges of the inferior courts of the United States with power to remove them for misconduct or misbehavior upon quo warranto proceedings instituted before it by the Attorney General.

Defending the proposal, the Senator said, when offering the Bill:

"The procedure I have outlined would be in all respects fair to an accused judge. It would give to him the benefit of a trial in a regular court of law, sitting exclusively to determine the question of his guilt or innocence, and unaccompanied and uninterrupted by other duties during the period of the trial. The procedure would be fair to the courts, because it would place in their own hands the determination of the judicial question of the guilt or innocence of a member of the judiciary. It would not impose upon them the performance of any unjudicial task and would invoke their cooperation in a matter in which they should be supremely interested, namely, the preservation of the honor and integrity of the judicial office.

The writer of what is by many considered one of the leading essays on the subject of Federal impeachments (and to whom all subsequent writers must acknowledge their indebtedness), Mr. Alexander Simpson, Jr.,<sup>27</sup> argues that under the power granted the Congress, by Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution, to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in the government of the United States "or of any department or office thereof", it has the power to define what constitutes "good behavior" and to declare the office vacant after a judicial procedure designed to determine that the incumbent's behavior is no longer good. The writer states:

It would seem that under the latter clause Congress would have power to define what constitutes "good behavior", and to provide a method for ascertaining whether or not the judges are complying with the tenure under which they hold, and to cause them to forfeit their offices if they are not, subject, of course, to a review by the courts of the question as to whether or not the definition wholly or partially is within the meaning of those words as used in the Constitution. By this method the question becomes a judicial one, as it should be, and the accused judge will be safeguarded in his right to hold his office exactly as he is safeguarded in all the other rights vested in him by the Constitution. That Congress has the power claimed was expressly asserted by Senator Catron in the Archbald Impeachment.<sup>28</sup>

In my opinion, such power could not be given without a constitutional amendment. The Constitution provides one method only for removing judicial officers, i. e., by impeachment. It is true that the Congress is given power "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court".<sup>29</sup> But they are not given power either to determine tenure or to provide for another method of selection, except the general one, by the President, with "the advice and consent of the Senate".<sup>30</sup> The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is fixed by the Constitution.<sup>31</sup> Mr. Justice Story, in a famous case decided in 1816,<sup>32</sup> expressed the view that the article creating and defining the judicial power of the United <sup>27</sup>At this point I wish to add that it is my firm conviction, after such studies as I have made of this subject, that the term "good behavior" as used in the Constitution, is a justiciable question, and that the Congress, under the authority conferred upon it, has the power to create a tribunal to try that issue whenever it shall be raised in a proper manner.

<sup>28</sup>The procedure I am suggesting would in no way diminish or cut down the privileges or prerogatives of the Congress. The Congress would be free, whenever it so desired, to resort to the existing process of impeachment. At the same time the Congress could set in motion the alternative procedure by a majority vote of both Houses directing the Attorney-General to institute a suit under the new removal method, as I have already stated, and I merely repeat it to emphasize the point. The freedom of action of the Congress would thus in all respects be preserved." Sen. Rep. No. 83, 74th Cong., 2nd Sess. (1936) 6217.

Such is the language of the article creating and defining the judicial power of the United States. It is the voice of the whole American people solemnly declared, in establishing one great department of that government which was, in many respects, national, and in all, supreme. It is a part of the very same instrument which was to act not merely upon individuals, but upon states; and to deprive them altogether of the exercise of some powers of sovereignty, and to restrain and regulate them in the exercise of others.

Let this article be carefully weighed and considered. The language of the article throughout is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the legislature. Its obligatory force is so imperative that Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into operation. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested (not may be vested) in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. Could Congress have lawfully refused to create a supreme court, or to rest in it the constitutional jurisdiction?<sup>42</sup> The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive, for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.<sup>43</sup> Could Congress create or limit any other tenure of the judicial office? Could they refuse to pay, at stated times, the stipulated salary, or diminish it during the continuance in office? But one answer can be given to these questions: it must be in the negative. The object of the constitution was to establish three great departments of government; the legislative, the executive and the judicial departments. The first was to pass laws, the second to approve and execute them, and the third to expound and enforce them. Without the latter it would be impossible to carry into effect some of the express provisions of the Constitution. How, otherwise, could crimes against the United States be tried and punished? How could causes between two states be heard and determined? The judicial power must, therefore, be vested in some court, by Congress; and to suppose that it was not an obligation binding on them, but might, at their pleasure, be omitted or declined, is to suppose that, under the sanction of the Constitution they might defeat the Constitution itself; a construction which would lead to such a result cannot be sound.<sup>43</sup>

The only method of removal being by conviction upon impeachment, the procedure suggested would be another method of removal, not sanctioned by the Constitution. It would also add to the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Desirable though a quicker method of removal might be—especially in the case of judges of lower courts—the power to establish such a method does not, in my opinion, reside in the Congress. The Congress, in establishing inferior courts—under the constitutional mandate—is also under mandate to confer upon the judges appointed to administer them the constitutional tenure—that of holding “during good behavior.”<sup>44</sup>

The tenure “during good behavior” can be terminated only upon conviction after impeachment for “high crimes and misdemeanors”. The former is referable to the latter. “Good behavior” ceases to exist in an incumbent when he has committed “high crimes and misdemeanors”. The fact can only be established by proof in a court of impeachment. Any other method of establishing it is clearly outside of the intentment of the constitutional provisions relating to removal of civil officers.

All students of the problem agree, however, that a change is not only desirable, but needed. Those who, moved by false conceptions of the dignity of the Federal judicial office, would oppose any change in the present method, should remember that courts are social institutions belonging to society as a whole, and that the law itself is merely a form of social control aiming to satisfy the changing needs of a changing society. Because of this, a judge may be unfit who, without being guilty of any moral obliquity, does yet, through arbitrariness or by overlooking the fact that the office he occupies is not a private, personal, life-long sinecure, but an institution established to achieve the needs of society for justice through law, fail to attain that high standard of “good behavior” which should be the ideal of the judge of an enlightened society. A great judge has written:

The time is past in the history of the world when any living man or body of men can be set on a pedestal and decorated with a halo. True, many criticisms may be, like their authors, devoid of good taste, but better all sorts of criticism than no criticism at all. The moving waters are full of life and health; only in the still waters is stagnation and death.<sup>45</sup>

There is wisdom and security for a free society in such an attitude, even towards the judiciary.

“Power of Impeachment,” Congressional Quarterly Guide to the U.S. Congress

POWER OF IMPEACHMENT*

Impeachment is perhaps the most awesome though the least used power of Congress. In essence, it is a political action, couched in legal terminology, directed against a ranking official of the Federal Government. The House of Representatives is the prosecutor. The Senate chamber is the courtroom; and the Senate is the judge and jury. The final penalty is removal from office and disqualification from further office. There is no appeal.

Impeachment proceedings have been initiated in the House some 50 times since 1789, but only 12 cases have reached the Senate. Of these 12, two were dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, six resulted in acquittal and four ended in conviction. All of the convictions involved Federal judges: John Pickering of the district court for New Hampshire, in 1804; West H. Humphreys of the eastern, middle and western districts of Tennessee, in 1862; Robert W. Archbald of the Commerce Court, in 1913; and Halsted L. Ritter of the southern district of Florida, in 1936.

Two of the impeachments traditionally have stood out from all the rest. They involved Justice Samuel Chase of the Supreme Court in 1805 and President Andrew Johnson in 1868, the two most powerful and important Federal officials ever subjected to the process. Both were impeached by the House—Chase for partisan conduct on the bench; Johnson for violating the Tenure of Office Act—and both were acquitted by the Senate after sensational trials. Behind both impeachments lay intensely partisan politics. Chase, a Federalist, was a victim of attacks on the Supreme Court by Jeffersonian Democrats, who had planned to impeach Chief Justice John Marshall if Chase was convicted. President Johnson was a victim of Radical Republicans opposed to his reconstruction policies after the Civil War.

PURPOSE OF IMPEACHMENT PROCESS

Based on specific constitutional authority, the impeachment process was designed “as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men,” according to Alexander Hamilton in Federalist No. 65. The Constitution declares that impeachment proceedings may be brought against “the President, Vice President and all civil officers of the United States,” without explaining who is, or is not, a “civil officer.” In practice, however, the overwhelming majority of impeachment proceedings have been directed against Federal judges, who hold lifetime appointments "during good behavior," and cannot be removed by any other method. Nine of the 12 impeachment cases that have reached the Senate have involved Federal judges. Federal judges have figured in 33 of the approximately fifty impeachment cases that have failed to reach the Senate.

Others whose impeachment has been sought include Cabinet members, diplomats, customs collectors, a Senator and a U.S. district attorney. These officials are subject to removal by dismissal or expulsion as well as by impeachment, and it seldom has been necessary to resort to full-scale impeachment proceedings to bring about their removal. Proceedings against the only Senator to be impeached, William Blount of Tennessee, were dismissed in 1799 after Blount had been expelled from the Senate in 1797. War Secretary William W. Belknap, the only Cabinet member to be tried by the Senate, was acquitted in 1876 largely because Senators questioned their authority to try Belknap, who had resigned as Secretary several months before the trial.

The House Judiciary Committee twice has ruled that certain Federal officials were not subject to impeachment. In 1833, the Committee determined that a territorial judge was not a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution because he held office for only four years and could be removed at any time by the President. In 1926, the Committee said that a Commissioner of the District of Columbia was immune from impeachment because he was an officer of the District and not a civil officer of the United States.

DEBATE IN CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

The origin of the Congressional impeachment process dates from 14th century England. Under the parliamentary system, an impeachment (indictment) was preferred by the House of Commons and decided by the House of Lords. In America, colonial governments and early state constitutions followed the British pattern of trial before the upper legislative body on charges brought by the lower house.

THE CONSTITUTION ON IMPEACHMENT

Following are provisions of the Constitution that deal with the Congressional power of impeachment:

The House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article I, section 2.)

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article I, section 3.)

The President . . . shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Article II, section 2.)

The President, Vice President and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article II, section 4.)

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury . . . (Article III, section 2.)

Despite these precedents, a major controversy arose over the impeachment process in the Constitutional Convention. The issue was whether the Senate should try impeachments. Opposing that role for the Senate, Madison and Pinckney asserted that it would make the President too dependent on the Legislative Branch. Suggested alternative trial bodies included the "national judiciary," the Supreme Court or the assembled chief justices of state supreme courts. It was argued, however, that such bodies would be too small and perhaps even susceptible to corruption. In the end, the Senate was agreed to. Hamilton (a Senate opponent during the Convention) asked later in the Federalist: "Where else than in the Senate could have been found a tribunal sufficiently dignified, or sufficiently independent?"

A lesser issue was the definition of impeachable crimes. In the original proposals, the President was to be removed on impeachment and conviction "for mal or corrupt conduct," or for "malpractice or neglect of duty." Later, the wording was changed to "treason, bribery or corruption," and then to "treason and bribery" alone. Contending that "treason and bribery" were too narrow, George Mason proposed adding "mal-administration," but switched to "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the state" when Madison said that "mal-administration" was too broad. A final revision made impeachable crimes "treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The provisions of the Constitution on impeachment were scattered through the first three articles. To the House was given the "sole power of impeachment." The Senate was given "the sole power to try all impeachments." Impeachments could be brought against "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States" for "treason, bribery or other high crimes or misdemeanors." Conviction meant "removal from office and disqualification to hold" further public office.

The first attempt to use the impeachment power was made in 1796. A petition from residents of the Northwest Territory, submitted to the House on April 25, accused Judge George Turner of the territorial supreme court of arbitrary conduct. The petition was referred briefly to a special House committee and then was referred to Atty. Gen. Charles Lee. Impeachment proceedings were dropped after Lee said, May 9, that the territorial government would prosecute Turner in the territorial courts.

PROCEDURES IN IMPEACHMENT CASES

The first impeachment proceedings, against Turner, failed to provide precedents for later impeachments. In fact, the process has been used so infrequently and under such widely varying circumstances that no uniform practice has emerged.

At various times impeachment proceedings have been initiated by the introduction of a resolution by a Member, by a letter or message from the President, by a grand jury action forwarded to the House from a territorial legislative, by a memorial setting forth charges, by a resolution authorizing a general investigation, or by a resolution reported by the House Judiciary Committee. The five cases to reach the Senate since 1900 were based on Judiciary Committee resolutions.

After submission of the charges, a Committee investigation has been undertaken. If the charges have been supported by the investigation, the Committee has reported an impeachment resolution, which in four of the five post-1900 cases has included articles of impeachment. The impeachment resolution has been subject to adoption by majority vote. In earlier cases, the impeachment articles were drafted by a select committee named by the House Speaker or by simple resolution. Like the impeachment resolution, the articles too have been subject to adoption by majority vote.

The next step, after the House has adopted an impeachment resolution and articles of impeachment, has been selection of House managers to direct the proceedings in the Senate. House managers have been chosen by a resolution fixing the number of managers and authorizing the Speaker to appoint them, by a resolution fixing the number and making the appointments, and by ballot, with a majority vote for each candidate. Once selected, the House managers have appeared at the bar of the Senate to inform the upper house of the impending impeachment trial and to present the articles of impeachment. The Senate, in turn, has informed the House when it is ready to proceed.

The full House may attend the trial, but the House managers have been its representatives at the proceedings. Following Senate rules adopted March 2, 1868, the trial has been conducted in a fashion similar to a court trial for a criminal offense. Both sides may present witnesses and evidence, and the defendant has been allowed counsel and the right of cross-examination. If the President is on trial, the Constitution requires the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to preside. The Constitution is silent on a presiding officer for lesser defendants, but Senate practice has been for the Vice President or the President pro tempore to preside. Procedural questions during trial have been decided by majority vote, but conviction has required, according to the Constitution, approval of two-thirds of the Senators present. A separate vote on each article is required by Senate rules, and a two-thirds vote on a single article is sufficient for conviction. Removal upon conviction is required by the Constitution, although the Senate at times has voted removal after conviction. Disqualification is not mandatory; only two of the four convictions have been accompanied by disqualification, which has been subject to a majority vote.

CONTROVERSIAL QUESTION

Three major issues have dominated the history of the impeachment power: the definition of impeachable offenses, possible Senatorial conflicts of interest and alternative removal methods for Federal judges.

Impeachable Offenses. "Treason" and "bribery," as constitutionally designated impeachable crimes, have raised little debate, for treason is defined elsewhere in the Constitution and bribery is a well-defined act. "High crimes and misdemeanors," however, have been anything that the prosecution has wanted to make them. An endless debate has surrounded the phrase, pitting broad constructionists, who have viewed impeachment as a political weapon, against narrow constructionists, who have regarded impeachment as being limited to offenses indictable at common law.

The constitutional debates seemed to indicate that impeachment was to be regarded as a political weapon. Narrow constructionists quickly won a major victory, though, when Chase was acquitted, using as a defense the argument that he had committed no indictable offense. The narrow constructionists continued to prevail when President Johnson also was acquitted on a similar defense. His lawyers argued that conviction could result only from commission of high criminal offenses against the United States.

The only two convictions to date in the 20th century suggest that the broad constructionists still have powerful arguments. The 20th century convictions removed Robert W. Archbald, associate judge of the U.S. Commerce Court, in 1913, and Halsted L. Ritter, U.S. judge for the southern district of Florida, in 1936. Archbald was convicted of soliciting for himself and for friends valuable favors from railroad companies, some of which were litigants in his court. It was conceded, however, that he had committed no indictable offense. Ritter was convicted for conduct in a receivership case which raised serious doubts about his integrity.

Ritter's was the last impeachment to reach the Senate. But the debate over impeachable offenses is certain to be revived in future Senate cases.

Conflicts of Interest. An equally controversial issue, particularly in earlier impeachment trials, concerned the partisan political interests of Senators, which raised serious doubt about their impartiality as jurors.

President Johnson's potential successor, for example, was the president pro tempore of the Senate, since there was a vacancy in the Vice Presidency. Sen. Benjamin F. Wade (R Ohio), president pro tempore, took part in the trial and voted—for conviction. On the other hand, Andrew Johnson's son-in-law, Sen. David T. Patterson (D Tenn.), also took part in the trial and voted—for acquittal.

In the Johnson trial and in others, Senators have been outspoken critics or supporters of the defendant, yet have participated in the trial and have voted on the articles. Some Senators who had held seats in the House when the articles of impeachment first came up, and had voted on them there, have failed to disqualify themselves during the trial. On occasion, intense outside lobbying for, and against, the defendant has been aimed at Senators. Senators have testified as witnesses at some trials and then voted on the articles.

Senators may request to be excused from the trial, and in recent cases Senators have disqualified themselves when possible conflicts of interest arose.

Removal of Judges. Two forces have combined in the continuing search for an alternative method of removal for Federal judges. One force has been led by Members of Congress anxious to free the Senate, faced by an enormous legislative workload, from the time-consuming process of sitting as a court of impeachment. The other force has been led by Members anxious to restrict judicial power by providing a simpler and swifter means of removal than the cumbersome and unwieldy impeachment process.

The search to date has been unsuccessful. Efforts to revise and accelerate the impeachment process have failed. So, too, have attempts to amend the Constitution to limit the tenure of Federal judges to a definite term of years. A more recent approach has been to seek legislation providing for a judicial trial and judgment of removal for Federal judges violating "good-behavior" standards. The House passed such a bill on Oct. 22, 1941, by a 124-122 vote, but it died in the Senate.

A 1947 report by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress concluded:

"1. There is no power in the Executive or Legislative Branches of the Government to remove or limit the tenure of Supreme Court justices, or, indeed, any judges of constitutional courts, except as Congress is expressly authorized to act by impeachment for lack of good behavior. . . .

"2. Means of removal other than impeachment and limitations on tenure could be provided for by constitutional amendment. Among such methods of removal could be that of legislative address.

"3. Congress perhaps can constitutionally provide for judicial removal of Federal judges for lack of good behavior. . . . While the good behavior tenure clause never has been construed by the Supreme Court, it has been contended that the clause must be read with a view to changing needs, and that Congress, therefore, might define the term so as to allow judicial removal for any form of conduct or neglect which according to modern notions tends to corruption or inefficiency."

ATTEMPTED IMPEACHMENTS

Many proposed impeachments have failed to come to a vote in the House because the defendant died or because he resigned or received another appointment, removing him from the disputed office. Among the unsuccessful impeachment attempts have been moves against two Presidents, a Vice President, two Cabinet officers, and a Supreme Court justice.

The House on Jan. 10, 1843, rejected by an 84-127 vote a resolution by Rep. John M. Botts (Henry Clay Whig Va.) to investigate the possibility of initiating impeachment proceedings against President Tyler. Tyler had become a political outcast, ostracized by both Democrats and Whigs, but impeachment apparently was too strong a measure to take against him.

A move developed in 1873 to impeach Vice President Schuyler Colfax because of his involvement in the Credit Mobilier scandal. The matter was dropped when the Judiciary Committee recommended against impeachment on the ground that Colfax had purchased his Credit Mobilier stock before becoming Vice President.

A similar move to impeach Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty in 1922 on account of his action, or lack of action, in the Teapot Dome affair was dropped in 1923 when a Congressional investigation of the scandal got under way. As the Teapot Dome investigation and a separate Justice Department study progressed, Daugherty was forced by President Coolidge to tender his resignation, March 28, 1924.

A running fight between Rep. Wright Patman (D Texas) and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon over Federal economic policy in the depression came to a head in 1932, Patman on Jan. 6 demanded Mellon's impeachment on the ground of conflicting financial interests. To put an end to that move, President Hoover on Feb. 5 nominated Mellon to be ambassador to Great Britain and the Senate confirmed the nomination the same day. Mellon resigned his Treasury post a week later to take on his new duties.

SENATE RULES OF PROCEDURE AND PRACTICE . . . WHEN SITTING FOR IMPEACHMENT TRIALS

Following are the major provisions of rules used by the Senate during impeachment trials. With the exception of Rule XI, which was adopted May 28, 1955, the rules have remained unchanged since their adoption March 2, 1868, for the trial of President Johnson.

I. Whenever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives that managers are appointed on their part to conduct an impeachment against any person and are directed to carry articles of impeachment to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to such notice.

II. When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced at the bar of the Senate and shall signify that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant at Arms to make proclamation . . . after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

III. Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation, or sooner if ordered by the Senate, proceed to the consideration of such articles and shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) until final judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as may, in its judgment, be needful. Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the members of the Senate then present and to the other members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

IV. When the President of the United States or the Vice President of the United States, upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the consideration of the articles of impeachment, as aforesaid, with a request to attend; and the said Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate during the consideration of said articles and upon the trial of the person impeached therein.

V. The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

VI. The Senate shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of, and disobedience to, its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the Sergeant at Arms, under the direction of the Senate, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of the Senate.

VII. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the Presiding Officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the Presiding Officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the members present, when the same shall be taken.

VIII. Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as herein before provided, a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles, and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate and named in such writ, and file his answer to said articles of impeachment, and to stand to and abide the orders and judgments of the Senate thereon; which writ shall be served by such officer or person as shall be named in the precept thereof, such number of days prior to the day fixed for such appearance as shall be named in such precept, either by the delivery of an attested copy thereof to the person accused, or if that can not conveniently be done, by leaving such copy at the last known place of abode of such person, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place therein; or if such service shall be, in the judgment of the Senate, impracticable, notice to the accused to appear shall be given in such other manner, by publication or otherwise, as shall be deemed just; and if the writ aforesaid shall fail of service in the manner aforesaid, the proceedings shall not thereby abate, but further service may be made in such manner as the Senate shall direct. If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty. If a plea of guilty shall be entered, judgment may be entered thereon without further proceedings.

IX. At 12:30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer. . . . Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

X. The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he do not appear, either personally or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded.

XI. That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of twelve Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.

XII. At 12:30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary shall give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of —, in the Senate Chamber, which chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

XIII. The hour of the day at which the Senate shall sit upon the trial of an impeachment shall be (unless otherwise ordered) 12 o'clock m.; and when the hour for such thing shall arrive, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall so announce; and thereupon the Presiding Officer upon such trial shall cause proclamation to be made, and the business of the trial shall proceed. The adjournment of the Senate sitting in said trial shall not operate as an adjournment of the Senate; but on such adjournment the Senate shall resume the consideration of its legislative and executive business.

XIV. The Secretary of the Senate shall record the proceedings in cases of impeachment as in the case of legislative proceedings, and the same shall be reported in the same manner as the legislative proceedings of the Senate.

XV. Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon an impeachment.

XVI. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the Presiding Officer, and if he, or any Senator, shall require it, they shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table.

XVII. Witnesses shall be examined by one person on behalf of the party producing them, and then cross-examined by one person on the other side.

XVIII. If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony standing in his place.

XIX. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer.

XX. At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions.

XXI. All preliminary or interlocutory questions, and all motions, shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time.

XXII. The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

XXIII. On the final question whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately; and if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted upon any of said articles by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, the Senate shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

XXIV. All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate; but a motion to adjourn may be decided without the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded by one-fifth of the members present. The fifteen minutes herein allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not on the final question on each article of impeachment.

XXV. Witnesses shall be sworn. . . . Which oath shall be administered by the Secretary, or any other duly authorized person.

All process shall be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, unless otherwise ordered by the court.

XXVI. If the Senate shall at any time fail to sit for the consideration of articles of impeachment on the day or hour fixed therefor, the Senate may, by an order to be adopted without debate, fix a day and hour for resuming such consideration.

Two depression-era attempts by Rep. Louis T. McFadden (R Pa.) to impeach President Hoover on general charges of usurping legislative powers and violating constitutional and statutory law were rejected by the House. The first attempt was tabled Dec. 13, 1932, by a 361-8 vote; the second attempt was tabled Jan. 17, 1933, by a 344-11 vote.

Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court has been subjected to repeated impeachment attempts. The day after Douglas granted a stay of execution to Soviet spies Julius and Ethel Rosenberg on June 16, 1953, Rep. W. M. Wheeler (D Ga.) introduced a resolution to impeach the justice. The resolution was unanimously tabled by the Judiciary Committee on July 7, after a one-day hearing at which Wheeler had been the sole witness. In 1970, two resolutions for Douglas's impeachment were introduced in the midst of a bitter conflict between President Nixon and the Senate over Senate rejection of two Supreme Court nominations. One impeachment resolution was introduced April 15 by Rep. Andrew Jacobs Jr. (D Ind.); the other on the same day by a large bipartisan group of sponsors. Among the charges cited were possible financial conflicts similar to those that had led to Senate rejection of the Nixon nominees for the Court. A special House Judiciary Subcommittee on Dec. 3 voted 3-1 that no grounds existed for impeachment.

IMPEACHMENT TRIALS

Sen. William Blount. On July 3, 1797, President John Adams sent to the House and Senate a letter from Sen. William Blount (Tenn.) to James Carey, a U.S. interpreter to the Cherokee Nation of Indians. The letter told of Blount's plans to launch an attack by Indians and frontiersmen, aided by a British fleet, against Louisiana and Spanish Florida to achieve their transfer to British control. Adams' action initiated the first proceedings to result in impeachment by the House and consideration by the Senate.

In the Senate, Blount's letter was referred to a select committee, which recommended his expulsion for "a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator." The Senate expelled Blount on July 8 by a 25-1 vote.

In the House, meanwhile, a special committee had recommended that Blount be impeached. The House on July 7 adopted a committee resolution impeaching Blount, and on the same day it appointed a committee to prepare articles of impeachment. On Jan. 29, 1798, the House adopted five articles accusing Blount of attempting to influence the Indians for the benefit of the British.

Senate proceedings did not begin until Dec. 17, 1798. Blount challenged the proceedings, contending that they violated his right to a trial by jury, that he was not a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution, that he was not charged with a crime committed while a civil officer, and that courts of common law were competent to try him on the charges. On Jan. 11, 1799, the Senate by a 14-11 vote dismissed the charges for lack of jurisdiction. Citing the Senate vote, Vice President Thomas Jefferson ruled Jan. 14, that the Senate was without jurisdiction in the case, thus ending the proceedings.

Judge John Pickering. In a partisan move to oust a Federalist judge, President Jefferson on Feb. 4, 1803, sent a complaint to the House citing John Pickering, U.S. judge for the district of New Hampshire. The complaint was referred to a special committee, and on March 2 the House adopted a committee resolution impeaching the judge. A committee was appointed Oct. 20 to prepare articles of impeachment, and the House on Dec. 30 by voice vote agreed to four articles charging Pickering with irregular judicial procedures, loose morals and drunkenness. At the time of the trial by the Senate, the judge, born about 1738, was known to be insane. He did not attend the trial, which began March 8, 1804, and ended March 12, with votes of 19-7 for conviction on each of the four articles. The Senate then voted, 20-6, to remove Pickering from office, but it declined to consider disqualifying him from further office.

Justice Samuel Chase. In an equally partisan attack on another Federalist judge, the House on Jan. 7, 1804, by an 81-40 vote adopted a resolution by John Randolph (States Rights Democrat Va.) for an investigation of Samuel Chase, associate justice of the Supreme Court, and of Richard Peters, a U.S. district court judge in Pennsylvania. Ostensibly, the investigation was to study their conduct during a recent treason trial. The House dropped further action against Peters by voice vote on March 12. On the same day, by a 73-32 vote, it adopted a committee resolution to impeach Chase. A committee was appointed to draw up articles, and the House in a series of votes on Dec. 4, 1804, agreed to the articles, charging Chase with harsh and partisan conduct on the bench and with unfairness to litigants.

The trial began Feb. 9, 1805. House managers directing proceedings in the Senate included, in addition to Randolph, Caesar A. Rodney (D Del.), Joseph H. Nicholson (D Md.), Peter Early (Ga.), John Boyle (D Ky.), George W. Campbell (D Tenn.), and Christopher Clark (Jeffersonian Democrat Va.). Chase appeared in person. In addition, he was represented by four lawyers, Robert G. Harper, Luther Martin, Philip B. Key and Joseph Hopkinson. The Senate voting on March 1 failed to produce the two-thirds majority required for conviction on any of the eight articles of impeachment; "not guilty" votes outnumbered the "guilty" votes on five of the articles.

Judge James H. Peck. On Dec. 8, 1826, a memorial from a Missouri man was presented to the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee citing James H. Peck, a U.S. judge for the district of Missouri. The memorial lay dormant until Jan. 7, 1830, when the House adopted a resolution authorizing an investigation of Peck's conduct. On April 24, the House by a 123-49 vote adopted a committee resolution impeaching Peck, and later the same day it appointed a committee to prepare articles of impeachment. A single article was adopted May 1 by voice vote, charging Peck with setting an unreasonable and oppressive penalty for contempt of court. The trial stretched from Dec. 20, 1830, to Jan. 31, 1831, when 21 Senators voted for conviction and 22 for acquittal.

Judge West H. Humphreys. During the Civil War, West H. Humphreys, a U.S. judge for the east, middle and west districts of Tennessee, accepted an appointment as a Confederate judge, without resigning from his Union judicial assignment. Aware of the situation, the House on Jan. 8, 1862, by voice vote adopted a resolution by Horace Maynard (American Tenn.) to authorize a Judiciary Committee investigation of Humphreys. On May 6 the House, also by voice vote, adopted a committee resolution impeaching Humphreys. Articles of impeachment, drafted by a committee appointed May 14, were adopted by voice vote on May 19. The articles charged Humphreys with advocating secession and accepting office as a Confederate judge. In a one-day trial on June 26, the Senate convicted Humphreys on all except one charge, removed him from office by a 38-0 vote and disqualified him from further office on a 36-0 vote.

JOHNSON'S IMPEACHMENT AND TRIAL

First Attempt—Radical Republicans in Congress and President Andrew Johnson carried on a running battle over postwar policy toward the Confederate states. Johnson favored a lenient attitude; the Radicals favored repressive tactics. Finally on Jan. 7, 1867, two Radicals, Reps. James M. Ashley (R Ohio) and Benjamin F. Loan (Radical Mo.) introduced a pair of resolutions calling for Judiciary Committee investigations and impeachment of the President. The Committee gathered a mass of general testimony highly critical of Johnson and recommended impeachment. However, the House by a 57-108 vote Dec. 7, rejected a Committee resolution impeaching the President. The resolution was defeated primarily because no specific crime was alleged to have been committed.

Second Attempt—Radical opposition to Johnson continued to run high, and on Jan. 22, 1868, the House by a 99-31 vote adopted a resolution by Rufus P. Spalding (R Ohio) authorizing the Committee on Reconstruction to "inquire what combinations have been made or attempted to be made to obstruct the due execution of the laws. . . ." To help the Committee, the House on Feb. 10 referred to it the impeachment evidence gathered in 1867. Then on Feb. 21, 1868, Johnson formally dismissed Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton, a leading Radical sympathizer. The dismissal violated the Tenure of Office Act of March 2, 1867, which required Senate concurrence in the removal, as well as the appointment, of certain officers, and which made violation of the Act a "high misdemeanor."

The day after Johnson moved against Stanton, the Committee on Reconstruction recommended impeachment of the President. And on Feb. 24 the House by a 128-47 vote adopted a Committee resolution impeaching Johnson, and by a 124-42 vote appointed a committee to draw up articles of impeachment. In a series of votes March 2 and 3, the House adopted the articles, charging the President with violation of the Tenure of Office Act and with attacking Congress in a series of political speeches. (See Appendix for complete text of the articles.)

The impeachment trial opened March 30, 1868. The managers for the House were John A. Bingham (R Ohio), George S. Boutwell (R Mass.), James F. Wilson (R Iowa), Benjamin F. Butler (R Mass.), Thomas Williams (R Pa.), John A. Logan (R Ill.) and Thaddeus Stevens (R Pa.). The President did not appear at the trial. He was represented by a team of lawyers headed by Henry Stanbery, who had resigned as Attorney General to lead the defense. Associated with Stanbery were Benjamin R. Curtis, Jeremiah S. Black, William M. Evarts, Thomas A. R. Nelson and William S. Groesbeck.

After weeks of argument and testimony, the Senate on May 16 took a test vote on Article XI, a general, catch-all charge, thought by the House managers most likely to produce a vote for conviction. The drama of the vote has become legendary. With 36 "guiltys" needed for conviction, the final count was guilty, 35, not guilty, 19. Stunned by the setback, Senate opponents of the President postponed further voting until May 26. Votes were taken then on Article II and Article III. By identical 35-19 votes Johnson was acquitted also on these articles. To head off further defeats for Johnson opponents, Sen. George H. Williams (Union Republican Oreg.) moved to adjourn sine die, and the motion was adopted 34-16, abruptly ending the trial.

JOHNSON IMPEACHMENT VOTES

The Senate voted on only three of the 11 articles of impeachment against President Andrew Johnson. The President was acquitted on each article by identical votes of 35-19, with 36 "guiltys" necessary for conviction. The roll call on the three votes follows:

OTHER IMPEACHMENTS AND TRIALS

War Secretary William W. Belknap. Faced with widespread corruption and incompetence among high officers of the Grant Administration, the House on Jan. 14, 1876, adopted by voice vote a resolution authorizing various committees to conduct general investigations of Government departments. On March 2 the House by voice vote adopted a resolution from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department impeaching Secretary of War William W. Belknap. Only hours earlier, Belknap had resigned, and President Grant had accepted the resignation. Despite Belknap's resignation, work by the Judiciary Committee on articles of impeachment was continued, and the House agreed to the articles on April 3. They charged Belknap with graft in connection with the appointment and retention of an Indian post trader at Fort Sill in Oklahoma.

As pre-trial maneuvering proceeded, the Senate on May 29 declared by a vote of 37-29 that it had jurisdiction over Belknap regardless of his resignation. The trial, which ran from July 6 to Aug. 1, 1876, ended in acquittal. The majority of "guilty" votes on each article (35, 36 or 37 as against a constant 25 "not guilty" votes) fell short of the two-thirds necessary for conviction. A number of Senators, explaining their positions, said they had voted against conviction on the ground that the Senate lacked jurisdiction.

Judge Charles Swayne. Rep. William B. Lamar (D Fla.) on Dec. 10, 1903, introduced a resolution, adopted by voice vote, for a Judiciary Committee investigation of Charles Swayne, U.S. judge for the northern district of Florida. Months later, the Committee recommended impeachment, and the House on Dec. 13, 1904, adopted by voice vote a Committee resolution impeaching Swayne and authorized a special committee to prepare articles of impeachment. The articles were adopted in a series of votes on Jan. 18, 1905. They charged Swayne with living outside of his district, improperly fining a lawyer for contempt, and using a private railroad car in the hands of a receiver appointed by the judge. Opening arguments in the trial began Feb. 10. The trial ended Feb. 27, when the Senate voted acquittal on all articles; none was given even a simple majority for conviction.

Judge Robert W. Archbald. On May 4, 1912, the House adopted a Judiciary Committee resolution authorizing an investigation of Robert W. Archbald, associate judge of the U.S. Commerce Court. A Committee resolution impeaching Archbald and setting forth articles of impeachment was adopted by the House July 11 by a 223-1 vote. The judge was charged with using improper influence and accepting favors from litigants. The trial, which began Dec. 3, ended Jan. 13, 1913, with Archbald convicted on five of the 13 articles. The Senate on the same day removed him from office by voice vote and, by a 39-35 vote, disqualified him from further office.

Judge George W. English. A resolution asking for an investigation of George W. English, U.S. judge for the eastern district of Illinois, was introduced Jan. 13, 1925, by Rep. Harry B. Hawes (D Mo.). The House on April 1, 1926, adopted by a 306-62 vote a Judiciary Committee resolution to impeach English. The resolution also set forth the articles of impeachment, charging English with partiality, tyranny and oppression. The trial was set to begin Nov. 16, but on Nov. 4 English resigned. Instead of proceeding with the trial, as was done after Belknap's resignation, the Senate on Dec. 13 by a 70-9 vote dismissed the charges at the request of the House managers.

Judge Harold Louderback. A resolution by Rep. Fiorello H. LaGuardia (Republican Progressive N.Y.) for an investigation of Harold Louderback, U.S. judge for the northern district of California, was adopted by a voice vote of the House on June 9, 1932. The Judiciary Committee's study produced mixed results. The majority recommended censuring, but not impeaching Louderback. However, the House on Feb. 24, 1933, by a 183-142 vote adopted a minority resolution by LaGuardia impeaching the judge and specifying the articles. They accused Louderback of favoritism and conspiracy in the appointment of bankruptcy receivers. A trial that lasted from May 15 to May 21 ended in acquittal. The "not guilty" votes outnumbered the "guilty" votes on all except one of the five articles.

Judge Halsted L. Ritter. Rep. J. Mark Wilcox (D Fla.) on May 29, 1933, introduced a resolution for an investigation of Halsted L. Ritter, U.S. judge for the southern district of Florida. The resolution was adopted by a voice vote on June 1. A long delay followed. Then on March 2, 1936, the House by a 181-146 vote adopted a Judiciary Committee impeachment resolution. The articles of impeachment, contained in the resolution, charged Ritter with a variety of judicial improprieties. The trial lasted from April 6 to April 17. Although there were more "guilty" than "not guilty" votes on all except one of the first six articles, the majorities fell short of the two-thirds required for conviction. However, on the seventh article, with 56 votes necessary for conviction, the vote was 56 guilty and 28 not guilty. Thus, Ritter was convicted. He was ordered removed from office, without a vote. An order to disqualify him from further office was defeated, 0-76.

Foreword

BY HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR., CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

In October 1973, the Committee on the Judiciary issued as a Committee Print, Impeachment: Selected Materials, a 718-page volume of materials regarding the constitutional bases for the impeachment of officers of the United States.

It was my hope at that time that those materials, some of them previously scattered in select libraries and in some cases out of print for more than a century would be more readily accessible to Members of Congress and to a larger segment of the American community.

The demand for those volumes has been enormous, and the Committee continues to receive daily innumerable requests for additional information regarding the procedures and mechanics of the impeachment process in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate. For that reason, I am pleased to transmit a second volume of materials, these gleaned exclusively from Hinds' and Cannon's Congressional Precedents. Together in one volume for the first time, they offer an extended historical and parliamentary manual of how the impeachment process works in the United States.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Jury. In the case of Alice Pierce (1 R., 2) a jury was impaneled for her trial before a committee. (Seld. Jud., 123.) But this was on a complaint, not on impeachment by the Commons. (Seld. Jud., 163.) It must also have been for a misdemeanor only, as the Lords spiritual sat in the case, which they do on misdemeanors, but not in capital cases. (Id., 148.) The judgment was a forfeiture of all her lands and goods. (Id., 188). This, Selden says, is the only jury he finds recorded in Parliament for misdemeanors; but he makes no doubt if the delinquent doth put himself on the trial of his country, a jury ought to be impaneled, and he adds that it is not so on impeachment by the Commons; for they are in loco proprio, and there no jury ought to be impaneled. (Id., 124.) The Ld. Berkeley (6 E., 3) was arraigned for the murder of L. 2 on an information on the part of the King and not on impeachment of the Commons; for then they had been patria sua. He waived his peerage, and was tried by a jury of Gloucestershire and Warwickshire. (Id., 126.) In 1 H., 7, the Commons protest that they are not to be considered as parties to any judgment given, or thereafter to be given, in Parliament. (Id., 133.) They have been generally and more justly considered, as is before stated, as the grand jury, for the conceit of Selden is certainly not accurate that they are patria sua of the accused, and that the Lords do only judge but not try. It is undeniable that they do try, for they examine witnesses as to the facts, and acquit or condemn according to their own belief of them. And Lord Hale says "the peers are judges of law as well as of fact" (2 Hale P.C., 275), consequently of fact as well as of law.

2205. Under the parliamentary law an impeachment is not discontinued by the dissolution of Parliament.—In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Continuance. An impeachment is not discontinued by the dissolution of Parliament, but may be resumed by the new Parliament. (T. Ray., 353; 4 Com. Journ., 23 Dec., 1970; Lord's Journ., May 15, 1791; 2 Wood., 618).

2206. It was decided in 1876 that an impeachment trial could only proceed when Congress was in session.

Instance during an impeachment trial wherein a Member of the Senate called on the managers for an opinion.

On June 19, 1876,* in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Balknap, late Secretary of War, the counsel for the respondent asked for a postponement of the trial until some time in the next November.

Thereupon a question arose as to whether or not the trial might proceed when the House of Representatives was not in session, and Mr. John J. Ingalls, a Senator from Kansas, asked for an opinion from the managers for the House of Representatives.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

Perhaps, Mr. President, it will be sufficient for the managers to say in that regard that the managers are not agreed on that question. Some of us have a very fixed opinion one way, and other managers seem to have as fixed an opinion the other way; and not being agreed among ourselves we perhaps ought not to discuss the question until we can come to some agreement.

I will say further, Mr. President and Senators, that the question which is presented by the Senator has not been fully considered by the managers; it has not been very much discussed by them, but it has been sufficiently discussed to enable us to see that there is this difference of opinion. I think myself that when the question is fully discussed by the managers they will come to a conclusion on the subject unanimously; but perhaps one differing with me might think we should come unanimously to a different conclusion from that which I entertain.

I will say for myself that I have no doubt of the power of this court to sit as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of the Congress.

I ought to say in regard to the opinion which I have expressed that I predicate that opinion upon the action of both the Houses. I think that in order to authorize the sitting of this court beyond all question either the House or the Congress should vote to empower the managers to appear before this court in the recess or absence of the House.

I ought to say in furtherance of the view which I have presented, that the question has been settled in the State of New York, the State in which I reside and I, of course, would naturally be influenced somewhat by the decision. In the case of Judge Barnard the trial was had at Saratoga after the adjournment of the legislature, and in the recent impeachment trial in Virginia the same course was taken—the impeachment was not tried until after the adjournment of the legislature. I am also reminded that as far back as 1853 when Mr. Mather, a canal commissioner, was impeached in New York, he was tried after the legislature adjourned. In regard to the English authorities they seem on the whole to warrant the proposition that the House of Lords may proceed as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of the Parliament.

Soon after,<sup>7</sup> while an order was pending providing that the trial should proceed on July 6. Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, proposed to add thereto as an amendment the following:

Provided, That impeachment can only proceed in the presence of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, and without division, the words "in the presence of the House of Representatives" were stricken out and the words "while Congress is in session" were inserted.

Thereupon Mr. Morton asked and obtained leave to withdraw his amendment.

Thereupon Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, offered the proviso again:

Provided, That impeachment can only proceed while Congress is in session.

This proviso was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 19.

Thereupon Mr. Oliver P. Morton proposed to amend by adding the words, "and in the presence of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, proposed to amend Mr. Morton's amendment by adding the words, "or its managers."

Mr. Saulsbury's amendment was disagreed to without division; and Mr. Morton's amendment was disagreed to by a vote of yeas 9, nays 28. So it was Provided, That the impeachment can only proceed while the Congress is in session.

The reasons actuating the Senate in coming to this decision do not appear from Senate proceedings, as the debates were in secret; but in a verbal report made to the House of Representatives by the Chairman of the Managers, Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, this statement appears:<sup>8</sup>

The plan of the managers on the part of the House has been this: To induce the Senate, as a court of impeachment, to allow Congress to adjourn and then sit as a court to carry on the case. But there are two reasons against that which render it conclusive that the Senate will not do so. The first is that many Senators doubt the power of the Senate to sit as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of Congress. The second, and the really practicable reason, is that it will be found impossible to keep a quorum of the court together after the adjournment of Congress.

2007. The Senate decided, in 1876, that William W. Belknap was amenable to trial notwithstanding his resignation of the office before his impeachment for acts therein.

In the Belknap trial the managers and counsel for respondent agreed that a private citizen, apart from offense in an office, might not be impeached.

Discussion as to effect of an officer's resignation after the House has investigated his conduct, but before it has impeached.

On May 4, 1876,<sup>9</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore announced that the Senate had adopted the following:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

On the first question, whether or not the respondent was amenable to trial for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation, the argument naturally divided itself into three branches.

1. May a private citizen be impeached, irrespective of whether he has held office or not?

2. May a private citizen who formerly held an office be impeached for acts done as an incumbent of that office?

3. Assuming that a person may not be impeached after he is out of office for acts done in office, does a resignation, after proceedings for impeachment begin, confer immunity?

As to the first question, may a private citizen be impeached, Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:<sup>10</sup>

Upon the first question I do not know how the managers are to maintain the jurisdiction of this court upon any other principle than that which was asserted in the Blount case, which was that "all persons are liable to impeachment" (Annals of Congress of 1797, vol. 2, p. 2251), because, as was alleged there all persons are liable in England, the country from which we borrow the proceeding, and to whose laws and usages we must therefore look for the extent of its application. But as the court on that occasion overruled this doctrine, and the decision has been acquiesced in for seventy-eight years, the managers ought not now to expect this court to overrule it.

And Mr. Manager Scott Lord, speaking for the House of Representatives, said:<sup>11</sup>

The learned counsel, Mr. Blair, suggested that we should be driven to the position of asserting that a citizen who had never held office was impeachable. We claim no such thing. We claim first, and admit, that the authorities have settled that a mere citizen can be impeached; and if the authorities had not settled it, the Constitution, not by express words, but by its intent, does exclude the idea of impeachment as against a mere private citizen.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, after an exhaustive discussion of authorities, said: <sup>12</sup>

In Blount's case, where the question I am discussing was first presented to this court, Messrs. Bayard and Harper, managers, understanding the task before them, grappled with the subject, and maintained the broad ground that the power of impeachment under our Constitution reached to every inhabitant of the United States, Blount, not as a Senator, but while a Senator, had committed the acts charged in the articles of impeachment. He pleaded to the jurisdiction, first, that he was not an officer of the United States when he committed the acts complained of, and, secondly, that he was not even a Senator at the time of the impeachment. It appeared from the record that he was a Senator at the time the acts were committed. The managers argued that a Senator was a civil officer. But they also contended that whether a Senator was a civil officer or not was immaterial; because impeachment was not confined to civil officers. And there was no fault in their reasoning, upon their premises. If impeachment lies against any private citizen of the United States, then Blount should have been convicted; because surely he could not interpose his senatorial character as a shield against an impeachment maintainable against any private citizen. And so the question was distinctly presented, whether or not impeachment lies against a private citizen.

The court, as is well known, decided that there was no jurisdiction. And this decision is an authoritative declaration that impeachment can not be maintained against a private citizen.

We have been unable to find any case in which a private citizen has been held subject to impeachment for misconduct in an office formerly held by him. In the Barnard case, it is true, the court held that the accused might be convicted and removed from office on account of offenses committed in a former term of the same elective office which he was holding at the time of impeachment.

In the State of Ohio, Messrs. Pease, Huntington, and Tod held a certain act of the legislature unconstitutional and void. At the session of the legislature 1807-8 steps were taken to impeach them therefor, but the resolution was not acted upon at that session; but at the next session steps were taken toward the impeachment of the offending judges, and articles of impeachment were reported against Pease and Tod, but not against Huntington, who in the meantime had been elected governor of the State, and of course had ceased to be a judge of the court. This discrimination is an authority in favor of the proposition that no man can be impeached after he is out of office. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 160, note 3.)

(2) The main force of the argument was expended on the second question, whether or not a private citizen who has formerly held an office may be impeached for acts done as an incumbent of that office. The question of the right to impeach a private citizen was argued only for its relation to this second question.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, began the argument with a review of the nature of impeachment in America and England, and continued: <sup>13</sup>

This settles the principle upon which impeachment must be exercised. It is strictly confined to the cases expressly enumerated in the Constitution, as much so as any other court established by the Federal Constitution.

And this brings me to the consideration of what are the cases enumerated by this Constitution as within the power of impeachment. There is no other enumeration except what is contained in the fourth section of the second article, as follows:

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The enumerated cases of persons, therefore, against whom this court can entertain articles of impeachment are "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States;" not persons who have been President, Vice-President, or civil officers, but only persons who can be at the time truly described as President, Vice-President, or as civil officers, and who can "be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason," etc. "If there must be a judgment of removal," says Story, "it would seem to follow that the party was still in office;" but it is not necessary to rely upon this inference, plain and necessary as it is, because the only persons specified as subject to impeachment are officers, and it would be equally plain that only officers were amenable to impeachment if nothing was said in the section about removal, and it were simply "that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers shall be subject to impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery," etc., because it is only by these descriptions as officers that they are made subject to impeachment. Hence the only question before the court is whether the term "officer" can be applied to a person not at the time in the holding of an office.

And this has been the accepted construction. From the day when Blount was tried until now no attempt has been made to impeach a private citizen, and that not because there have not been plenty of proper subjects for impeachment if the law had authorized the proceeding against ex-officers. Within a few years past it is notorious that a number of officers who were under investigation and who were threatened with impeachment resigned to avoid it, and the proceedings against them were abandoned. Several Judges were among the number, all whose names I do not now recall, and it is not necessary to do so, because the Senate knows to whom I refer, who resigned their places and thereby arrested the proceedings. So in New York, where the high court of impeachment is composed of the judges of the court of appeals and the senate, and the provisions of whose constitution, if not in identical words with those of the national Constitution, are substantially the same, an impeachment was dismissed against Judge Cardozo, within a few years, on the presentation of his resignation. The judiciary committee of the house of representatives of that State, composed of persons who will, I understand, be recognized by some of the managers as among the ablest lawyers of that State, reported against the power of impeachment of any person not actually in office. The language of the resolution in Fuller's case (the case referred to) is:

"That no person can be impeached who was not at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and at the time of the impeachment holding some office under the laws of the State."

This resolution and the accompanying report form part of the report of the trial of George G. Barnard, page 158.

I have examined all the constitutions of all the States with reference to the provisions therein contained on the subject of impeachment. With two exceptions, they correspond in substance with the national Constitution; and I have not learned that any impeachments against ex-officers have taken place under those constitutions.

Mr. Blair next cited opinions of the framers of the Constitution, and the comments of Judge Story, saying:<sup>14</sup>

All of the reasons upon which the proceeding was supposed to be necessary were applicable only to a man who wielded at the moment the power of the Government, when only it was necessary to put in motion the great power of the people, as organized in the House of Representatives, to bring him to justice. It is a shocking abuse of power to direct so overwhelming a force against a private man. It may be deemed by some of small moment, because it can only effect his disfranchisement; but the effect is to dishonor him, and it is simply tyranny to put this man's honor in peril by the application of that overwhelming force. The great authors of England, as well as the great commentator on our Constitution mentioned, hold that impeachment ought only to be brought into action to arrest the wrongdoing of another power in the Government. The arena of impeachment is in fact a place in which a controversy takes place between the high powers of the Government. The only theory upon which it can be justified is to enable the people, massed and organized in their representative houses, to assail their oppressors, armed with the power of the Executive and the patronage and prestige which that gives them. Do you seek to prostitute that power to the oppression of a private individual, wasting his means by an action that, as this author says, has invariably ruined every private man who has been the subject of it in Great Britain?

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter held that there were two theories in regard to impeachment—one that the proceeding was so broad that private persons might fall within its reach, as in England, and the other that impeachment “was only a proceeding to remove an unworthy public officer.” And he declared that one of these theories must be accepted, and that there was no middle ground. He then proceeded at length to cite authorities<sup>15</sup> to show that a private citizen might not be impeached, and then said:<sup>16</sup>

Bearing in mind this method, when we read that the “House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and the Senate the sole power to try impeachment;” and learn from the debates in the convention that impeachment was intended as a method of removal from office, we naturally look elsewhere in the Constitution for the extent of this power; in other words, for the officers who may be removed by this method, which we find in section 4 of article 2, as follows:

There is a strong implication arising from the provision that punishment in cases of impeachment shall extend no further than removal from office, or removal and disqualification, that impeachment only lies against those in office. But section 4 of article 2 is perfectly conclusive.

Consider the language of this fourth section of the second article. The President shall be removed, etc. Suppose General Jackson still alive, and to be impeached to-day for removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States? Who would preside over the trial?

Section 3 of article 1 provides:

“When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside.”

Suppose General Jackson living and impeached for removing the deposits. Would the Chief Justice preside? Manifestly not, because General Grant is President, and the case supposed would be an impeachment of a private citizen, and not of the President. And yet, upon the theory now maintained, that once a President is always a President for the purposes of impeachment, the Chief Justice would have to preside. This is as absurd as it would be to construe a statute giving Members of Congress the franking privilege, as giving that privilege to every one who had been a Member of Congress.

The Constitution does not authorize the impeachment of certain crimes—that is, crimes committed in offices—but it authorizes an impeachment of certain persons, described by the class to which they belong; that is, civil officers of the United States.

I may assume therefore that the purpose for which the power of impeachment was incorporated in the Constitution will be observed by this court, in exercising the jurisdiction which the Constitution confers. And upon this subject the debates in the convention are not only satisfactory, but absolutely conclusive.

Before passing from the subject of these debates let me say that considerable opposition was developed against embodying this power in the Constitution. Those who opposed it did so upon the ground that conferring the power would make the President a subservient tool of Congress and destroy the proper equilibrium of the three departments. On the other hand, it was urged that without the impeachment clause it would be in the power of the President, especially in time of war, when he would have large military and naval forces at command, and public moneys at his disposal, to overthrow the liberties of the people. Near the close of the debate Mr. Morris said his views had been changed by the discussion, and he expressed his opinion to the effect that—

"The Executive ought to be impeached. He should be punished, not as a man, but as an officer, and punished only by degradation from his office."

This was the only debate upon the general subject of impeachment. Thus it will be seen that those who favored and those who opposed incorporating the power in the Constitution, contemplated the impeachment of officers while holding office.

Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, also of counsel for the respondent, said: <sup>17</sup>

We must then fall back on the one question whether an officer who has resigned is subject to the power of impeachment, or whether he is to be regarded as a private citizen after he goes out, and therefore amenable only to the courts.

The words are "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers." Who is the President? If that means an ex-President, a person who has once held the office of President, but whose term has expired or who has resigned, then the same interpretation must be given to the other words, and the words "the Vice-President and all civil officers" may include all persons who have held office at any period of their lives. When we speak about the President, do we ever refer to anybody except the incumbent of that office? A half-grown boy reads in a newspaper that the President occupies the White House; if he would understand from that that all ex-Presidents are in it together he would be considered a very unpromising lad.

The managers would not assign that absurd meaning to any other part of the Constitution. Where it is provided that the Vice-President shall preside in the Senate, they know very well that nobody is included but the actual incumbent. Statutes have been passed declaring that the Members of Congress shall have certain privileges, such as franking letters and receiving an annual compensation out of the Treasury. Did anybody ever claim that this extended to old Members retired from public life? Any law which declares that public officers as a class shall be entitled to pay as privileges would be confined to those persons in office, and no sensible man would think of a Constitution extending it to former officers. When, therefore, the Constitution says that all civil officers may be impeached, it is a violation of common sense to hold that the power may be applied to a late Secretary of War or other person who does not at the time actually hold any office at all.

The Constitution declares that when the President is impeached the Chief Justice shall preside. The question has been propounded repeatedly, and by several Senators, who would preside if an ex-President was impeached? I admit that that is a puzzle. The puzzle arises out of the absurdity of impeaching an ex-President. Our friends on the other side are so hampered by their own theory that they are obliged simply to decline answering. There is one answer and only one consistent with their logic, and that is this: That when an ex-President is impeached an ex-Chief Justice ought to preside at the trial.

But then the reductio ad absurdum is furnished to their argument when they read on that the President, the Vice-President, and all other civil officers of the United States shall be removed upon conviction. The single sentence uttered by Governor Johnstone in the North Carolina convention puts this in a light so perfectly clear that it would be throwing words away to talk about it. How can a man be removed from office who holds no office? How turn him out if he is not in? The object and purpose of impeachment was removal—removal, mind you, not for a day, not for an hour, not a removal which might be rendered nugatory the next moment by his reappointment or reelection, but a permanent removal. You find an officer misbehaving himself, and you get hold of him while he is still in the possession of power. When you get your grasp upon him, you hurl him down, and give him such a pernicious fall that he can never rise again.

Removal is not only the object of impeachment, but it is the sole object. Removal and disqualification are so associated together that they can not be separated. You can not pronounce a judgment of removal without disqualifying; and you can not pronounce a judgment of disqualification without removal, because the judgment which the Constitution requires you to pronounce is a judgment of removal and disqualification—not removal or disqualification; and this is made perfectly manifest to my mind from the experience we have had in Pennsylvania. It was thought by the convention that framed our Constitution desirable that the Senate, upon conviction of an offender of this kind, should have the discretion to say that he might be removed without being disqualified; and accordingly they changed the provision which had previously been copied from the Constitution of the United States, and instead of saying what is said here, that judgment shall extend to removal and disqualification, it says it shall extend to removal, or to removal and disqualification. The effect of that was to allow of a judgment of removal alone, but not of disqualification alone—removal alone, or removal and disqualification.

On the other hand, the managers for the House of Representatives maintained, with careful citation of authorities, that impeachment was intended to reach a public officer while in office or after he had left office. Mr. Manager Scott Lord said :<sup>18</sup>

Therefore we claim that the limitation of the Constitution is not as to time; it simply relates to a class of persons, and the word "officer" is used as descriptive precisely as it is used in the very statute to which the counsel referred. If it be true because the word "office" or "officer" is used in the Constitution, without saying anything about a person after he is out of office, that the defendant is not impeachable, then he can not be indicted, because the statute relating to his indictment simply speaks of him as an officer.

What is the real intent and meaning of the word "officer" in the Constitution? It is but a general description. An officer in one sense never loses his office. He gets his title and he wears it forever, and an officer is under this liability for life; if he once takes office under the United States, if while in office and as an officer he commits acts which demand impeachment, he may be impeached even down to the time to which the learned counsel, Mr. Carpenter, so eloquently referred the other day—down to the time that he takes his departure from this life.

It is supposed by many that because an officer must be removed no judgment can be pronounced without pronouncing the judgment of removal. This, it seems to me, is a very great error. If he is in office, of course under the Constitution he must be removed; but if out of office, the sentence of disqualification or some inferior sentence may be passed upon him, for the obvious reason that the sentence is divisible. This was distinctly held in the Barnard case, to which reference has been made. In that case the court proceeded unanimously to vote that he should be removed from office; but when the question came up on the other point, shall he be disqualified? several members of the court voted in the negative.

I do not see, then, any possible view in which there is difficulty; and the learned counsel on the other side will not be able to create any difficulty excepting under the claim that a person in office, having so conducted himself as to be worthy of impeachment, finding that it is impossible to escape the facts or pervert them, may, I repeat, defeat the Constitution for the purpose of preventing his punishment.

Messrs. Managers George A. Jenks and George F. Hoar examined the English precedents and the history of the Constitution at length, the latter summarizing his conclusions<sup>19</sup> thus :

The history of the steps by which these constitutional provisions found their place, the few authorities which can be found on the subject, the narrower argument drawn from the language of the Constitution and the broader argument drawn from a consideration of the great public object to be accomplished all point the same way and bring us irresistibly to the conclusion that the power of the Senate of the United States over all grades of public official national wrongdoers, a power conferred for the highest reasons of state and on fullest deliberation, to interpose by its judgment a perpetual barrier against the return to power of great political offenders, does not depend upon the consent of the culprit, does not depend upon the accidental circumstance that the evidence of the crime is not discovered until after the official term has expired or toward the close of that term, but is a perpetual power, hanging over the guilty officer during his whole subsequent life, restricted in its exercise only by the discretion of the Senate itself and the necessity of the concurrence of both branches, the requirement of a two-thirds' vote for conviction, and the constitutional limitation of the punishment

But I think I can show to the Senate of the United States, from the history of the formation of this Constitution, that the jurisdiction conferred was complete, and that the unanimous purpose of the convention to confer the power of impeachment over everybody committing crime in office is to be found and proved by its debates, and that the clause saying that civil officers can be removed on conviction is put there as an exception to the clauses which previously had determined the tenure of those offices. In other words, the framers of the Constitution had given power of impeachment to the House, given the power of trial to the Senate, extended the power to all cases of national official wrongdoers, prescribed the mode of proceeding, the numbers necessary to convict, limited the judgment, and passed from that question.

Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, a Senator from California, asked if Members of the Senate who had in times past been civil officers of the United States were, in Mr. Hoar's view, liable to impeachment. Mr. Hoar replied: <sup>20</sup>

They are, undoubtedly. The logic of my argument brings us to that result, and undoubtedly they are as safe from the operation of that process practically as the newly-born infant in his mother's arms. Does anybody suppose that there is to be a two-thirds vote of the American Senate which will rake up and try and punish for political offenses, when the public judgment of this people has demanded an amnesty? The whole power to punish, the whole judgment after the offender has left office is disqualification to hold office, and that judgment is a judgment in the discretion of the Senate. Hunt in Massachusetts, a justice of the peace—the language being exactly the same as this—was sentenced simply to suspension from his office and disqualification to hold any other for twelve months. That was the case of a Justice of the peace in the town of Watertown, I think, early in this century.

Let me sum up the argument, drawn from the language of the Constitution. The power of impeachment is not defined in the grant in the Constitution. It is conferred as a general common-law power. The judgment is then limited to removal and disqualification, and two-thirds required for conviction. No limit of its application to persons is inserted in the grant. But a subsequent limitation on the tenure of office is inserted, namely, the case of a removal by impeachment, to guard against the argument that officers, whose term is fixed in the Constitution, can not be removed under the power of impeachment, just as impeachment is excepted in the clause securing the right of trial by jury and in the clause conferring the power to pardon.

But suppose we grant the phrase, all civil officers, to be inserted as a definition of the persons who may be reached by this process. Is the definition to be taken to apply to them at the time of the commission of the offense or at the time of the punishment? Suppose a statute enact that all wrongdoers may be punished. Is it not clear that if they be wrongdoers when they commit the act the liability to punishment attaches? The very statute which punishes bribery would fail by this construction to reach anybody, because it is in this respect, as has already been said, almost identical with the provision of the Constitution in its description.

The provision that the judgment shall extend no further than removal from office and perpetual disqualification authorizes any lesser penalty included within those limits to be imposed at the discretion of the Senate. In Hunt's case, in Massachusetts, the sentence was disqualification for a year under a like constitutional provision.

The whole constitutional provision, so far as affects our present purpose, can be summed up in two sentences which are scarcely a paraphrase or change of the existing text of the existing law, and these two sentences I think state precisely the contentions on the one side and on the other. We say that the Constitution in substance is this: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try impeachments, and civil officers shall be removed on conviction." The counsel for the defendant would state it to be: "Judgment in case of conviction shall be removal from office and disqualification. If the defendant is willing." That is the summing up of the two propositions.

But the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution must be ascertained after all by a broad consideration of the great public objects they were intended to accomplish. "Never forget," says Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland—and that sentence is the keynote to his whole judicial power—"Never forget that it is a constitution you are interpreting."

(3) As to the third branch of the inquiry, assuming that an ex-officer may not be impeached, whether or not a resignation after proceedings begin confers immunity, there was not very extended debate. Mr. Manager Scott Lord said,<sup>21</sup>

I now propose to call the attention of the court to the other questions of this case referred to in the order of the Senate. The first question of the second replication is: "Can the defendant escape by dividing the day into fractions?" This question is also presented by the articles and plea. The allegation on page 5 is not denied. Therefore, as I propose to show this court by an unbroken series of decisions that the law does not permit a day to be divided into fractions in such a case as this, and if it be true that the defendant was Secretary of War on the 2d of March, on any part of that day, and therefore impeachable, then that question, perhaps, can be argued independent of this replication. I propose, now, to argue the question under the second replication. The authorities will bear upon both the plea and replication. First, I say a judicial act dates from the earliest minute of the day in which it is done.

The next question presented by their replication is, Did the impeachment relate back to the inception of the proceedings by an authorized committee of the House? Whether the committee was authorized or not is a question of fact. Therefore the comments of the learned counsel relating thereto were not in order, because it is affirmed on the part of the House of Representatives that this committee had authority. If it should appear that the committee had no authority, then another principle would be invoked, and that is the principle of adoption. But it is not necessary to discuss that now, because for the purposes of this argument the authority is conceded. In regard to the principle of relation it is this: That the House of Representatives before this resignation having instituted proceedings against Mr. Belknap for the purpose of investigating these crimes and for the purpose of impeaching the defendant, when the impeachment was made it related back to the original proceeding which was instituted, as is confessed, before this resignation. When divers acts concur to a result, the original act is to be preferred, and to this the other acts have relation.

In this case we claim that the House of Representatives, having obtained jurisdiction of the subject-matter by instituting these proceedings against the defendant, he could no more defeat them by resigning midway than he could defeat the Constitution itself. When the House of Representatives by its solemn act impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanors, that was a judicial act, the highest judicial act that can be performed in this nation save one, and that is the act to be performed by this tribunal when it pronounces "guilty" or "not guilty" upon the proofs before it.

Therefore, we say the defendant in this case should not be allowed his dilatory plea, because these proceedings had been instituted against him long before he had resigned his office, long before he had attempted to escape the penalty due to his crime by this resignation. This impeachment is in furtherance of justice, not in furtherance of injustice. It is due to the defendant; it is due to the dead whom he claims to represent; it is due to all the associations that surround him, if he is an innocent man, that he establish his innocence in this tribunal. Therefore to hold jurisdiction in this case, to give him the opportunity to establish his innocence, or the House of Representatives to establish his guilt, is in furtherance of justice. To deny jurisdiction under these circumstances would be in furtherance of injustice.

In this case before the court the doctrine of relation prevents injustice, for it changes no rule of evidence, and does not affect the merits.

Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, argued,<sup>23</sup> on the other hand:

If I am right in saying that the only purpose of impeachment is to remove a man from office, when the man is out of office the object of impeachment ceases, and the proceedings must abate. There would be no further object to attain by the proceeding. Suppose the man committed suicide while his trial was progressing, would not that be good matter of abatement? Suppose he commits official suicide by resigning, why should this not have the same effect? I have attempted to show that the sole object for which the power of impeachment was given is removal from office.

There is another proposition which I intended to argue in that connection. The disqualification clause of punishment was evidently put in for the purpose of making the power of removal by impeachment effectual. After providing that the officers of the United States might be removed on impeachment, although the President could not pardon the offender convicted and removed, yet if he could reinstate him the next morning he would have substantially the power of pardon. To prevent this was the object of the disqualifying clause: which Story says is not a necessary part of the judgment. You might impose it where you had removed an officer appointed by the President whom the President could reinstate. You could stop that by fixing disability upon the officer; and that I take to have been the sole purpose of this clause.

If I am right in this position, if the man died in the middle of the trial, or if he died after finding against him, but before judgment had been pronounced, the suit would abate. Must this court go on and sentence a man after he is dead—either physically or officially dead? It is equally absurd to talk of removing a man from an office which he no longer fills, as to talk of removing a man from office after he is dead. So far as its effect upon the suit is concerned I see no difference between the case of his natural death and his official death. The suit abates because there is no further object to be attained by its prosecution.

Let me remind the Senate that there is not a writer on this subject who does not maintain that the power of impeachment was never intended for punishment.

This is conclusively shown by the fact that the party, after he is impeached, is to be indicted and punished for his crime. And it should be remarked that, if impeachment lies against one not in office, he must either not be punished at all, which would show the absurdity of the proceeding; or you must inflict the disqualification, which, Story says, you need not inflict on one removed from office.

Returning from this digression to the line of my argument, let me say that Rawle's Commentaries and the report of the Blount case were considered by Judge Story in writing his Commentaries; and he quotes from them both, but evidently disagrees with Rawle's parenthetic suggestion, and the concessions made by the counsel of Blount.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked Mr. Carpenter this question:

Is there no distinction on the point of jurisdiction to try an impeachment, between the case of a resignation before articles are found and the case of resignation not till after articles, have been found?

Mr. Carpenter replied:<sup>24</sup>

The question put to me by the Senator from New York is very specific, and, in reply, I would say that a distinction exists between the case where a resignation precedes the exhibition of the articles and the case where a resignation comes between the exhibition of the articles and final judgment. And this court might hold that after jurisdiction had attached by exhibition of the articles, or even by the formal impeachment which precedes exhibition of articles, the jurisdiction had attached, and resignation would not prevent final judgment. Speaking, however, for myself, I still incline to the opinion that if the officer, who alone can be impeached, is out of the office before judgment of removal passes, this would abate a proceeding, which, I have endeavored to show, can only be had for the purpose of removal. It is said the law will not require a vain thing; from which I infer that the highest court in the Republic will not render a vain judgment.

Mr. Carpenter also said,<sup>25</sup> after citing authorities :

But against this array of authorities, showing that a private citizen can not be impeached, the managers say that Belknap was in office at the time of the impeachment. It is not denied that Belknap resigned, and his resignation was accepted by the President, at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m., March 2, 1876; nor is it denied that the first proceedings in the House in relation to him took place after 3 p. m. of that day. But the managers say that, in legal contemplation, he was in office at the time of impeachment, because the law will not notice fractions of a day; and, second, that he resigned to evade impeachment, and therefore was in office for the purpose of impeachment after his resignation was accepted.

Fractions of a day! I did not suppose this case would be determined on a question of special pleading, or a fiction of law, until I heard the argument of the learned manager [Mr. Lord] yesterday. I supposed we could strike through the fog and place our feet upon the solid rock of jurisdiction. But the managers propose to hold us by a fiction. They maintain that, although the respondent had resigned, and his resignation had been accepted, nevertheless, this court must decide that he was in office all day, and until after his impeachment on the afternoon of that day, because this court can not distinguish between the forenoon and afternoon of a day.

Suppose a man is sentenced by a criminal court to be hanged at 2 p. m. of a certain day; and suppose the President pardons him at 10 a. m. of that day. Must he be hanged at 2 p. m. because the law knows no fraction of a day? We have heard of men being hanged on the gallows; hanged at the yard-arm; but we never heard of a man being hanged on the fraction of a day.

Suppose in time of war the colonel of a regiment is relieved from duty, or his resignation accepted at 9 o'clock in the morning, and at 4 p. m. of the same day the regiment is engaged in battle. Could the colonel be court-martialed because he was not at the head of his regiment at 4 o'clock?

But having answered the managers on the substance of their claim of jurisdiction, we shall not yield to their fictions.

Mr. Manager Jenks replied<sup>26</sup> to Mr. Carpenter :

Of the second portion of this proposition, which is concerning the collateral facts, I shall say but little, if anything, more than this: It has been considered by the chairman of the managers; he has advanced three or four propositions in support of the view that it is material to consider all the surrounding facts. One of those propositions is, that in law there is no fraction of a day. He has cited authorities to establish that; that was the general rule, that in law there is no fraction of a day. This being the general rule, an exception was introduced by the honorable counsel for the defendant, that is, that if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, a court will consider the fractions of a day. Then the matter stands thus: As a rule, courts will not recognize the fractions of a day; but as an exception, if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, they will recognize the fractions of a day. Hence, when the counsel cited those authorities to show that they would consider it as an exception, it was essential to show that it was necessary to subserve the purposes of justice to bring his case within the exception. He left off just where the real contest began: Is it necessary to subserve the purposes of justice that this court should recognize the fractions of a day? It seems to me that there is no necessity in subserving the purposes of justice that this court should recognize any fraction of a day. Put the question in this form: How can it subserve the interests of justice, when a defendant is charged with having surreptitiously filched from the pockets of from eight hundred to a thousand men from 10 to 25 cents every day for five years, that that defendant shall plead this as an excuse, that the ends of justice are subserved by recognizing the fractions of a day? If he had discussed this, and shown that this defendant would have been wronged did you not consider it, he would then have brought his case within the exception; but, having failed to do that, he leaves it as my colleague, the chairman, left it; that is, that the general rule, if the defendant have not brought himself within the exception, still exists, and the court will not recognize the fractions of a day.

With reference to the question of relation, that was not considered at all by the counsel for the defendant, and we shall leave it, as our chairman has left it, with you.

The Senate debated the question from the 15th to the 29th of May.<sup>27</sup> The debates were behind closed doors and were not reported.

On May 16<sup>28</sup> the following questions were submitted by Senators for consideration:

By Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana :

Is there power in Congress to impeach a person for crime committed while in office if such person had resigned the office and such resignation had been accepted before the finding of articles of impeachment by the House?

By Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont :

Has the Senate power to entertain jurisdiction in the pending case of the impeachment by the House of Representatives of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, notwithstanding the facts alleged in relation to his resignation?

By Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, on May 25 :<sup>29</sup>

Resolved, That notwithstanding the resignation of William W. Belknap prior to his impeachment by the House of Representatives he is still liable to such impeachment for the misdemeanors charged in the articles presented by the House of Representatives, and his plea of such resignation is not sufficient in law to bar the trial upon such articles.

On May 29<sup>30</sup> the Presiding Officer announced that the proposition pending was that offered by Mr. Morton on the 16th instant. Thereupon Mr. Morton modified his proposition to read as follows:

Resolved, That the power of impeachment created by the Constitution does not extend to a person who is charged with the commission of a high crime while he was a civil officer of the United States and acting in his official character, but who had ceased to be such officer before the finding of articles of impeachment by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," in the first line, and in lieu thereof inserting:

That the demurrer of the respondent to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the respondent be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the plea of the respondent to the jurisdiction of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the articles of impeachment are sufficient to show that the Senate has jurisdiction of the case, and that the respondent answer to the merits of the accusation contained in the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Isaac P. Christiancy, of Michigan, moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, by striking out all after the word "that" in the first line thereof, and inserting:

W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is not amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, he having resigned said office before impeachment.

Mr. George G. Wright, of Iowa, moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Morton on the table, and this motion was agreed to, yeas 36, nays 30.

Thereupon Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, proposed a resolution, which was in this form, after the words "before he was impeached" had been added on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York :

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

Mr. Algernon S. Paddock, of Nebraska, moved to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, having ceased to be a civil officer of the United States by reason of his resignation before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives, the Senate can not take jurisdiction in this case.

This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 29, nays 37.

Then the resolution was agreed to, yeas 37, nays 29.

Mr. Thurman also presented a further resolution, which, after amendment at the suggestion of Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, was agreed to by a vote of 35 yeas, 22 nays:

Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution [June 1 was fixed by a separate resolution] the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught;" which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

In the final arguments Messrs. Montgomery Blair<sup>31</sup> and Matthew H. Carpenter<sup>32</sup> also argued this question.

2008. Reference to discussions as to what are impeachable offenses.—In the course of the arguments during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the question, "What are impeachable offenses?" was discussed at length and learnedly. Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, argued<sup>33</sup> learnedly in favor of this definition:

We define therefore an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor to be one in its nature or consequences subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or, without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers from improper motives or for any improper purpose.

Mr. Butler also appended to his argument<sup>34</sup> an exhaustive brief on the "law of impeachable crimes and misdemeanors," prepared by Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio.<sup>35</sup> This view was also supported by Mr. Manager John A. Logan, of Illinois.<sup>36</sup> Of the Senators who filed written opinions, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, argued at length that political offenses were impeachable offenses.<sup>37</sup> So also argued Mr. Richard Yates, of Illinois.<sup>38</sup>

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, of counsel for the President, argued, on the other hand, that impeachable offenses could only

2009. Argument that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is a "term of art," of fixed meaning in English parliamentary law, and transplanted to the Constitution in unchangeable significance.—On February 22, 1905,<sup>43</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachment, the following being among them:

I. WHAT ARE IMPEACHABLE "HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS," AS DEFINED IN ARTICLE II, SECTION 4, OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES?

By a strange coincidence, the death of parliamentary impeachment, as a living and working organ of the English constitution, synchronizes with its birth in American constitutions, State and Federal. Leaving out of view the comparatively unimportant impeachment of Lord Melville (1805), really the last of that long series of accusations by the Commons and trials by the Lords, which began in the fiftieth year of the reign of Edward III (1376), was the case of Warren Hastings, who was impeached in the very year in which the Federal Convention of 1787 met at Philadelphia. Before that famous prosecution, with its failure and disappointment, drew to a close, the English people resolved that the ancient and cumbrous machinery of parliamentary impeachment was no longer adapted to the wants of a modern and progressive society. But before this ancient method of trial thus passed into desuetude in the land of its birth it was embodied, in a modified form, first in the several State constitutions and finally in the Constitution of the United States.

Article II, section 4, of the Federal Constitution, provides that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Article I, section 2, provides that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment." Article I, section 3, provides that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." Article III, section 2, provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."

II. PROVISIONS BORROWED FROM THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bayard said in his argument in Blount's trial (Wharton's St. Tr., 264): "On this subject, the Convention proceeded in the same manner it is manifest they did in many other cases. They considered the object of their legislation as a known thing, having a previous definite existence. Thus existing, their work was solely to mold it into a suitable shape. They have given it to us, not as a thing of their creation, but merely of their modification. And therefore I shall insist that it remains as at common law, with the variance only of the positive provisions of the Constitution. * * * That law was familiar to all those who framed the Constitution. Its institutions furnished the principles of jurisprudence in most of the States. It was the only common language intelligible to the members of the Convention."

A recent writer of note, speaking on the same subject, has said: "If we examine the clauses of the Constitution, we perceive at once that the phraseology is applied to a method of procedure already existing. 'Impeachment' is not defined, but is used precisely as 'felony,' 'larceny,' 'burglary,' 'grand jury,' 'real actions,' or any other legal term used so long as to have acquired an accepted meaning, might be. The Constitution takes impeachment as an established procedure, and lodges the jurisdiction in a particular court, declaring how and by whom the process shall be put in motion, and how far it shall be carried. They have given to us a thing not of their creation, but of their modification. To ascertain, then, what this established procedure was, what were, at the time of the Constitutional Convention, impeachable offenses, we must look to England, where the legal notions contained in the clauses quoted had their origin." (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 800. Article by G. Willett Van Nest.) Madison, in No. 85 of the Federalist, said: "The model from which the idea of this institution has been borrowed pointed out the course to the Convention. In Great Britain it is the province of the House of Commons to prefer the impeachment and of the House of Lords to decide upon it. Several of the State constitutions have followed the example."

III. HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS AS DEFINED IN ENGLISH PARLIAMENTARY LAW

The English Parliament as a whole has always been considered and styled "The high court of Parliament," which is governed by a single body of law peculiarly its own. As Sir Thomas Erskine May (Parl. Prac., pp. 71 and 72) has well expressed it: "Each house, as a constituent part of Parliament, exercises its own privileges independently of the other. They are enjoyed, however, not by a separate right peculiar to each, but solely by virtue of the law and custom of Parliament." In the words of Lord Coke (4 Inst., 15), "As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction—some the civil and canon, some the common law, others their own peculiar laws and customs—so the high court of Parliament hath also its own peculiar law, called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti." Blackstone (Bk. I., 163) in commenting upon the statement of Coke, that the law of Parliament, unknown to many and known by few, should be sought by all, observes that, "It is much better to be learned out of the rolls of Parliament and other records and by precedents and continual experience than can be expressed by any one man." Chitty, in commenting upon the statement of Blackstone, has said:

"The law of Parliament is part of the general law of the land, and must be discovered and construed like all other laws. The members of the respective houses of Parliament are in most instances the judges of that law; and, like the judges of the realm, when they are deciding upon past laws, they are under the most sacred obligation to inquire and decide what the law actually is, and not what, in their will and pleasure, or even in their reason and wisdom, it ought to be. When they are declaring what is the law of Parliament, their character is totally different from that with which, as legislators, they are invested when they are framing new laws; and they ought never to forget the admonition of that great and patriotic chief justice, Lord Holt, viz, 'that the authority of the Parliament is from the law, and as it is circumscribed by law, so it may be exceeded; and if they do exceed those legal bounds and authority their acts are wrongful, and can not be justified any more than the acts of private men.' (1 Salk. 505.)" (Chitty's Blackstone, vol. 1, p. 119, note 21.) It has always been conceded that the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors," embodied in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, must be construed in the light of the definitions fixing its meaning in the parliamentary law of England as that law existed in 1787. The construction then given to the phrase in question was incorporated into our Federal Constitution as a part of the phrase itself, which is unintelligible and meaningless without such construction. The following elementary principles (as stated by Hon. William Lawrence, in the brief prepared by him for use in the trial of Andrew Johnson, Vol. I, pp. 125, 136), seem upon that occasion, to have passed unchallenged:

"As these words are copied by our Constitution from the British constitutional and parliamentary law, they are, so far as applicable to our institutions and condition, to be interpreted not by English municipal law but by the lex parliamentaria. * * * Whatever 'crime and misdemeanors' were the subject of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are therefore subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution. * * * "Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors" are, of course, impeachable. Treason and bribery are specifically named, but 'other high crimes and misdemeanors' are just as fully comprehended as though each was specified. The Senate is made the sole judge of what they are. There is no revising court. The Senate determines in the light of parliamentary law. Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge. * * * Now, when the Constitution says that all civil officers shall be removable on impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and the Senate shall have the sole power of trial, the jurisdiction is conferred and its scope is defined by common parliamentary law."

While the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment is the sole and final judge of what impeachable "high crimes and misdemeanors" are, no arbitrary discretion so to determine is vested. The power of the court simply extends to the construction of the phrase in question as defined in English constitutional and parliamentary law as it existed in 1787. That is made plain by Story in his Commentary on the Constitution, section 797, when he says: "Resort then must be had either to parliamentary practice, and the common law, in order to ascertain what high crimes and misdemeanors; or the whole subject must be left to the arbitrary discretion of the Senate for the time being. The latter is so incompatible with the genius of our institutions that no lawyer or statesman would be inclined to countenance so absolute a despotism of opinion and practice, which might make that a crime at one time or in one person which would be deemed innocent at another time or in another person. The only safe guide in such cases must be the common law."

IV. A RULE OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCTION AS DEFINED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

The fundamental principles of English constitutional law were first reproduced in the constitutions of the several States. In the light of the construction put upon them there, they were embodied, so far as applicable and desirable, in the Constitution of the United States. Thus the Federal Supreme Court was called upon at an early day to interpret the immemorial formulas or "terms of art" through which the cardinal principles of English constitutional law were incorporated in our governmental systems, State and Federal. The uniform rule for construing such formulas or "terms of art" adopted at the outset has been continued in force until the present time. When, in the trial of Aaron Burr, Chief Justice Marshall was called upon to construe Article III, section 3, of the Constitution, which provides that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," he said, "What is the natural import of the words 'levying war?' and who may be said to levy it? * * * The term is not for the first time applied to treason by the Constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our Constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it. So far as the meaning of any terms, particularly terms of art, is completely ascertained, those by whom they are employed must be considered as employing them in that ascertained meaning, unless the contrary be proved by the context. It is therefore reasonable to suppose, unless it be incompatible with other expressions of the Constitution, that the term 'levying war' is used in that instrument in the same sense in which it was understood in England and in this country to have been used in the statute of twenty-fifth of Edward III, from which it was borrowed." (Burr's Trial, vol. 2, pp. 401, 402.)

When in the case of Murray v. The Hoboken Land Co. (18 How., 272) it became necessary for the Supreme Court to construe the formula "due process of law," as embodied in the fifth amendment, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the court, said: "The words 'due process of law' were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words 'by the law of the land' in Magna Carta. Lord Coke, in his commentary on those words (2 Inst., 50), says they mean due process of law. The constitutions which had been adopted by the several States before the formation of the Federal Constitution, following the language of the Great Charter more closely, generally contained the words 'but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.' The ordinance of Congress of July 13, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, used the words."

When in the case of Davidson v. New Orleans (96 U.S. 97) it became necessary to again construe the same formula—"due process of law," as embodied in the fourteenth amendment—Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said: "The prohibition against depriving the citizen or subject of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law is not new in the constitutional history of the English race. It is not new in the constitutional history of this country, and it was not new in the Constitution of the United States when it became a part of the fourteenth amendment, in the year 1868. The equivalent of the phrase 'due process of law,' according to Lord Coke, is found in the words 'law of the land,' in the Great Charter, in connection with the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury, and other guarantees of the rights of the subject against the oppression of the Crown." In Smith v. Alabama (124 U.S. 465) it was held that "the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history," a statement affirmed by the adoption in United States v. Wong Kim Ark (169 U.S. 649).

V. IMMEMORIAL FORMULAS TRANSPLANTED FROM THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION, UNCHANGABLE BY SUBSEQUENT CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION

The foregoing authorities put the fact beyond all question that the immemorial formulas or "terms of art" transferred from the English constitution to our own were adopted, not as isolated or abstract phrases, but as epitomes or digests of the great principles which they embodied. That is to say, the term "levying war" carried with it the identical meaning given it as a part of the statute of Edward III; the term "due process of law," the identical meaning given to it as a part of Magna Charta; the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," the identical meaning given it as a part of the law of the High Court of Parliament. Or, in other words, when such formulas were embedded in the Constitution of 1787, their historical meaning and construction went along with them as completely as if such meaning and construction had been written out at length upon the face of the instrument itself. If that be true, the conclusion is self-evident that no subsequent Congressional legislation can change in any way, by addition or subtraction, the definitions embodied in such formulas at the time of their adoption. If the contrary were true, Congress could any day give to the term "levying war" or "due process of law" a definition, conveying ideas of which the fathers never dreamed. Or if the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" could be subjected to a new Congressional definition, acts which were such in 1787 could be relieved of all criminality, and new acts not then criminal could be added to the list of impeachable offenses. So obvious is the fact that Congress can not legislate at all on the subject that Mr. Lawrence, whose brief has been heretofore quoted, frankly admitted, while striving to give to the powers of Congress the widest possible construction, that "Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration, and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge."

The last phrase is specially suggestive of the fact that if Congress could, by subsequent legislation, "define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines," the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment could be entirely deprived by such legislation of the power to determine what were impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors as defined by the fathers in 1787. In other words, if Congress can add to or subtract from the constitutional definition in any particular, it can destroy it altogether. In the great case of Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch, 137) the first in which an act of Congress was ever declared unconstitutional, the question of questions was this: Does the fact that the Constitution itself has defined the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court prohibit Congress from enlarging such original jurisdiction by subsequent legislation? The solemn answer was that the attempt of Congress to do so was void. Why? Because the dividing line between the original and appellate jurisdiction having been drawn by the Constitution itself, it is immovable by legislator. In the words of the great Chief Justice: "If Congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction where the Constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original, and original jurisdiction where the Constitution has declared it shall be appellate, the distribution of jurisdiction made in the Constitution is form without substance." Thus it follows that any act of Congress which attempts to change the constitutional definition of impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors, by adding to the list some offense unknown to the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787, is simply void and of no effect.

2010. Argument of Mr. John M. Thurston, counsel, that judges may be impeached only for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in connection with the court.

Argument that an impeachment trial is a criminal proceeding.

On February 25, 1905,<sup>44</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in final argument, said :

In the printed brief originally filed in behalf of the respondent a demonstration, based upon the authorities, was made, to the effect that no clear light is to be derived as to the meaning of the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors," so far as that phrase relates to the impeachment of English and American judges, except from the English and American judicial impeachment cases in which it has been applied to that subject. Instead of attempting to meet that reasonable and obvious contention upon its merits, the managers have evaded it by propounding a series of generalities, based upon principles drawn, in the main, from political impeachments which throw no real light upon the subject. In the course of that evasion the following remarkable statement has been made :

Said the managers in their brief :

"For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim is made that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity."

The fact that that statement does not fully relate the history of impeachment cases will appear by consideration of those cases. After the impeachments for bribery, pure and simple, of English judges are put aside, but two judicial impeachments remain in the entire history of the English people—that is, the impeachment of judges.

Judges, like all others, can be impeached for treason not committed upon the bench or in judicial affairs. They can be impeached for bribery by the strict terms of the Constitution, bribery committed anywhere, without regard to whether they were sitting upon the bench at the time. But as to other causes of impeachment I challenge the honorable managers to show me any case in history, English or American, where a judge has been impeached for any other crime or high misdemeanor except one alleged to have been committed in connection with his exercise of judicial authority. In saying that, I do not refer to some impeachment cases that have happened in States and under State constitutions, for many of the constitutions of the several States have provisions largely at variance with those of the Constitution of the United States upon this subject.

But four judicial impeachments have taken place under the Constitution of the United States. It was admitted by the House of Commons in England and by the House of Representatives in the United States by the form of the articles they presented in these judicial impeachment cases that, excepting treason or bribery, neither an English nor a Federal judge could be impeached except for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in connection with his court, either between private individuals or between the Government and the citizen.

The statement of the honorable managers in their brief—

"For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity"—is contradicted by the judicial history of every case of impeachment of a judge in Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. Manager Olmsted was greatly mistaken when he said in his argument : "One year later, the Senate having convicted John Pickering, Federal Judge in a New Hampshire district, upon a charge of drunkenness"—

The article exhibited against John Pickering charged him with drunkenness upon the bench, and was limited to that charge, for framers of that impeachment well knew that the drunkenness of the judge was no ground for impeachment under the Constitution of the United States unless he carried that drunkenness upon the bench.

The articles against Pickering read:

"Being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear on the bench of the said court for the purpose of administering justice in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors, and did then and there frequently in a most profane and indecent manner"—

That is, on the bench, while administering justice—"invoke the name of the Supreme Being, etc."

It was perfectly understood by every constitutional lawyer then, as it should be understood now, that the personal misconduct of an English judge off the bench has never furnished the ground for impeachment, and for the well-understood reason that under the English constitution, as it has been called, they provided for two methods of removing judges from the bench—one by impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors and the other upon address to the sovereign by both houses of Parliament.

When we came to frame our Constitution we adopted from the English constitution the term "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." The question was mooted in that convention as to whether or not we should also embody in our Constitution the English provision for the removal of Federal judges by address of the two Houses of Congress to the President. Understanding perfectly well, as the debates will show, that impeachment would only lie for a crime or offense committed in connection with the judicial office and the administration of justice, they rejected the proposed clause providing for removal by address. The framers of our Constitution did this because they were tenacious of the stability of the tenure of office of our Federal judges, and were fearful that if they enlarged the impeachment provision some of the States, by reason of local prejudice, might proceed criminally against them, and upon conviction of crime base articles of impeachment thereon.

Mr. President, I state here and now that the contention made by one of the honorable managers that a judge can be impeached under the Constitution of the United States for a crime committed as an individual against a State law has no foundation in any case that has ever been known of on the earth, was not thought of as possible by the framers of our Constitution, and is not the law to-day. It would leave a Federal judge at the mercy of a local condition, inimical as it might be to the Federal Constitution.

The case of Humphreys has been cited as a case where a Federal judge was impeached for other than judicial misconduct. Yes, Humphreys was impeached for treason. Any judge can be impeached for treason or for bribery, no matter where or how committed; but the only charge in his impeachment other than treason was the charge of judicial misconduct as the judge of the court, in the court, and acting in the administration of justice.

Mr. President, that the framers of our Constitution well knew the limitations they were imposing upon the right of impeachment is further attested by the fact that in the original draft of that great document the language was "for treason, bribery, or maladministration," and the word "maladministration" has crept into some of the constitutions of our several States. Upon the consideration of that question on the floor of the convention it was moved to strike out "maladministration" and insert "other high crimes and misdemeanors," and for the very reason that the term "maladministration" was a loose term that might mean, under the decisions of the Senate in the future, much or little; that it might cover impeachments at one period of time by one party in power that it would not cover at another period of time with another party in power. They struck it out because it was too large a term, too loose a term, and they inserted in its place those definite words, "high crimes and misdemeanors," taken from the English constitution with parliamentary construction already attached.

We took that provision from the English constitution and with it we took the interpretation that was placed upon it by the lex parliamenti, the law of Parliament, established by the adjudications in the great tribunal. That provision meant then what it meant in England at the time. Mr. President, that provision meant then what it has meant ever since. It meant then what it always must mean. From the debates in that convention it does appear that those words were adopted with that construction upon them because it was claimed that it would be unwise to permit even the Congress of the United States, by ever making something a crime that was not then a crime, to enlarge the operation of that impeachment provision of the Constitution, or to repeal some of those things which then constituted crimes and thereby prevent the impeachment of those who committed them.

· Sir, that provision of the Constitution was embodied in that great instrument with a meaning that can never be changed by the Congress of the United States. It was embodied there with a meaning which will remain the same to the end of time. It furnishes the limitation with which the power of Congress can be exercised in impeachment cases.

· I insist that for the first time in this case is it even suggested by constitutional lawyers that that term permits the impeachment of a judge simply because he has been tried and convicted in a court of a State for a crime against the statutes of a State, or because in his private life he has been impure or improvident, or because of any other shortcomings or failures exhibited in his career except those which relate to the administration of justice in the court over which he presides.

Mr. President, before proceeding to discuss the articles and the evidence, I call your attention to the fact that this is a criminal proceeding, and the respondent is charged with a crime. That question was settled by the Senate some days since upon the vote taken on the question of the admissibility of evidence. It is certain that this proposition is true, because the last portion of section 2 of article 3 of the Constitution of the United States provides that "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," and thereby the framers of that great instrument declared that an offense to be impeachable must be a crime, or, what is equivalent to it, a high misdemeanor.

Mr. President, this respondent, being on trial charged with crime, is entitled to every reasonable doubt that may arise upon the evidence in the case. I do not come here to claim that he needs the application of this rule, for I insist that the evidence in this case shows that he is guiltless beyond a reasonable doubt; but I invoke the attention of the Senate to that beneficent rule of law, now because it is the outgrowth of the spirit of liberty and justice so strong in the Anglo-Saxon race. It is the common safeguard and heritage of every American citizen. It is the shield of the accused and is a bulwark for the protection of the liberty and life of every man, woman, and child in the land.

2011. Argument of Mr. Manager Perkins that a judge may be impeached for personal misconduct.—On February 24, 1905,<sup>45</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, in concluding argument, said in relation to the articles charging nonresidents in the district:

The argument made in behalf of the respondent is this: That a judge, under the precedents of the English courts, can not be impeached for any act except one done in the course of his duty as a judge, and that the sixth and seventh articles do not charge an omission of duty as a judge, but an omission of duty as an individual.

Mr. President, this can best be answered by an illustration of what is the logical and necessary result of the argument on the other side, that a judge of the United States court can not be impeached by the Senate of the United States unless for some strictly judicial act. Let us suppose that a judge commits a crime; that he forges a note; that he embezzles money. He is indicted and tried and convicted in the State courts of these crimes and sentenced to bear the punishment. Then it is sought to remove him from office by impeachment. The judge having committed these crimes is impeached. He employs my learned friends on the other side, and they claim before the Senate then, as they claim now, that the Senate has no power to impeach a judge except for acts done as a judge. They say, and say justly, that when this judge forged a note, or embezzled money, he was not acting as a judge, but as an individual. And if the argument be just, we have this extraordinary conclusion: A judge can not be removed except by impeachment. The judge, for the crime committed in his private capacity, is serving his term in State's prison. As he marches to perform hard labor, he will once a month receive the consolation of opening the envelope containing the check which will be monthly sent to him to pay him his salary as a judge of the United States court. Such a result shows the absurdity of the position.

The English cases are cited, but in England, apart from the remedy by impeachment, a judge can be removed for any cause deemed sufficient by a bill of attainder. That is unknown in this country. Bills of attainder were not put in our Constitution, and the remedy by impeachment by the Senate is the sole remedy by which a judge can be removed.

But a word more. What offense is Judge Swayne charged with? It is that he did not reside within his district. The law could not say that Judge Swayne as an individual should reside in the northern district of Florida or anywhere else, but the law says that when he is a judge he, because he is a judge, shall reside within his district; and when he failed so to do he omitted a judicial requirement made of him just as much as if he had sold justice or made unrighteous decisions.

I shall say no more on that point, but come at once to what is the important, the great question in this case—not whether the offense is impeachable, but whether the offense was committed. It has already been suggested that a judge of the United States court is the one officer in the land who holds his office by a life tenure. He can not be removed by the people. He can not be removed by the President. Nothing but the act of God or the vote of the Senate can remove a man who holds the office of United States judge. His dignity is great; his responsibility is correspondingly great. The people who complain, the people who lack confidence in their judges, can look to the Senate and can look here alone for relief. If they can not get it here they can not get it anywhere.

2012. Argument of Mr. Anthony Higgins, counsel, that impeachable offenses by a judge are confined to acts done on the bench in discharge of his duties.—On February 24, 1905,<sup>46</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said in final argument:

Mr. President, I conceive it is of no slight interest or importance to the Senate that of the four learned managers who have now taken part in the presentation of the prosecution of this case three of them have devoted as much time as they have to the question whether the offenses charged in the first seven articles constitute impeachable offenses—the alleged offense or crime of the respondent of making a false claim, or obtaining money by false pretenses; of using a car belonging to a railroad company, contrary to good morals, and, third, in not obeying the statute to reside in his district. All three have united in presenting the argument of ab inconvenienti—one which seldom weighs much with courts, and one which, it seems to us, after the conclusive discussion of the subject in the argument which it has been our privilege to present to the Senate on the constitutional question, is not left in the case really for discussion. That argument shows beyond peradventure that the framers of the Constitution in leaving out of the Constitution any provision for the removal of an official subject to impeachment by address did it purposely and with a view of giving stability to those who hold the offices, and especially the judges.

"Mr. Dickinson," says Elliott in his Debates on the Constitution, "moved, as an amendment to Article XI, section 2, after the words 'good behavior,' the words 'Provided, That they may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives.'"

This was in respect of the judges.

Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction in terms to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

* * * * *

"Mr. Randolph opposed the motion as weakening too much the independence of the judges.

* * * * *

"Delaware alone voted for Mr. Dickinson's motion."

Says Judge Lawrence in a paper on this subject, which he filed in the Johnson impeachment case:

"Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper case for removal.

* * * * *

"The first proposition was to use the words 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out."

* * * * *

Mr. Mason said:

"Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined."

He moved to insert after "bribery" the words "or maladministration."

Mr. Madison replied:

"So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate."

Mr. Mason withdrew "maladministration" and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State."

Mr. President, there are in the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, South Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, and Texas provisions substantially the same as those contained in the constitutions of Pennsylvania and of Delaware. The constitution of the State of Pennsylvania of 1790 provides:

"ARTICLE V.

"SEC. 2. The judges of the supreme court and of the several courts of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature."

The clause of the constitution of Delaware is similar. The Pennsylvania constitution as amended in 1838 provides:

"SEC. 3. The governor and all other civil officers under this Commonwealth shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office, but judgment in such cases shall not extend farther than a removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Commonwealth. The party, whether convicted or acquitted, shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." (Page 1561.)

So that there are in those constitutions the direct provision that power of removal by address is given as punishment for cases which by the very words of the constitution are said not to be the subject of impeachment.

An examination of the constitutions of the several States will show that there are not more than two or three State constitutions which do not contain the power of removal by address. That power was placed in the English constitution by a great and famous historic statute—the Act of Settlement—passed early in the reign of William and Mary, or of Anne, at the time when the present dynasty of the British throne was placed upon the authority of an act of Parliament. Then it was that the provision was placed in the statute that judges should be removable by address for causes that were not the subject of impeachment. Therefore, in the face of this state of the constitutional law and of the terms and provisions of the Constitution, where is there room for an argument that that construction shall not hold because there is no other way of getting rid of judges but by impeachment?

Now, but one word more on this, and that is in respect to the case that was cited by the learned manager, Mr. Olmsted, of an impeachment in Massachusetts. I call attention to the fact that the constitution of Massachusetts of 1790 makes provision for the impeachment of judges broader than the other States, or at least most of them.

"ART. VIII. The Senate shall be a court with full authority to hear and determine all impeachments made by the house of representatives against any officer or officers of the Commonwealth for misconduct and maladministration in their offices."

So in Massachusetts the judge who took illegal fees upon the ministerial side of his probate court was clearly impeachable under the provision of the Massachusetts constitution, which extended to ministerial functions.

2013. Argument from review of English impeachments that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to judicial conduct, just mean only acts of the judge while sitting on the bench.

History of removal by address in England and the state as bearing on the nature of impeachable offenses on the part of a judge.

On February 22, 1905,<sup>47</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

The only pertinent definitions of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as contained in Article II, section 4, of the Federal Constitution, must be drawn (1) from the law of Parliament as it existed in 1787; (2) from the contemporaneous expositions of that law embodied in the constitutions of the several States. In order to present anything like an adequate statement of the English law of impeachment as it existed at the time in question, some account must be given of the process of growth through which it had passed prior to that time.

The history of that growth is divided into two epochs, easily distinguishable from each other. The first begins with the proceedings against the Lords Latimer and Neville, which took place in the Good Parliament in the fiftieth of Edward III (1376). These proceedings are regarded by the constitutional historians as the earliest instances of a trial by lords upon a definite accusation made by the Commons. (Hallam, M. A., Vol. III, p. 56; Stubbs, Const. Hist., Vol. II, p. 431.) Not until early in the reign of Edward III was Parliament definitely and finally divided into two houses that deliberated apart; not until near the close of that reign did the Commons, as the grand jury of the whole realm, attempt to present persons accused of grave offenses against the State to the Lords for trial. At the outset, the new method of accusation was rivaled by what were known as "appeals," which have been thus defined: "It was the regular course for private persons, even persons who were not members of Parliament, to bring accusations of a criminal nature in Parliament, upon which proceedings were had." (Stephen, Hist. of the Criminal Law of England, Vol. I, 151.)

The results of the private warfare thus instituted were so inconvenient that "appeals" were finally abolished by the statute of I Hen. 4, c. 14. Thus left without rival, proceedings by impeachment were occasionally employed during the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI. In the reign last named Lord Stanley was impeached in 1459 for not sending his troops to the battle of Bloreheath. That trial terminates the first epoch in the history of the law of impeachment in England. It was not again employed during the period that divides 1459 from 1621, an interval of one hundred and sixty-two years. The primary cause for the suspension is to be found in the fact that during that interval it was that the decline in the prestige and influence of Parliament was such that the directing power in the state passed to the King in council, the judicial aspect of which was known as "the star chamber." There it was that the great state trials took place during the reign of Edward IV and during the following reigns of the princes of the house of Tudor. Such impeachment trials as did take place during the first or formative epoch are not as distinctly defined as those that occurred during the later period, and have now only an antiquarian interest.

VII. IMPEACHMENTS IN ENGLAND: SECOND EPOCH

With the revival of the powers of Parliament in the reign of James I, impeachment was resumed as a weapon of constitutional warfare. From that time its modern history, with which this discussion is concerned, really begins. The first impeachment case to occur during the second epoch was that of Sir Giles Mompesson in 1621, the last that of Lord Melville in 1805. Including the first and last the total is 54. [Here follows the list.]

An examination of the foregoing list reveals the fact that many of the impeachments in question were directed against private individuals, it having always been the law of England that all subjects, as well out of office as in office, might be thus accused and tried. A good illustration may be found in the notable case of Doctor Sacheverell, rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, who was impeached by the Commons and convicted by the Lords for having preached two sermons inculcating the doctrine of unlimited passive obedience. (State Trials, XV. p. 1.) As that branch of the law of impeachment which authorized the accusation of private individuals out of office was never reproduced in this country, cases of that class may be dismissed from consideration. By far the greater number of the remaining cases are what are known as "political impeachments," whereby one party in the State would attempt to crush its adversaries in office by impeaching them for high treason, which generally involved commitment to the Tower.

As illustrations, reference may be made to the case of Portland, Halifax, and Somers, three Whig peers impeached of high treason by a Tory House of Commons for their share in promoting the Spanish partition treaties in 1700; and to that of Oxford, Bolingbroke, and Ormond, Tory ministers impeached by the triumphant Whigs in the Commons for their share in negotiating the peace of Utrecht in 1718. (State Trials, Vol. XIV, p. 233. Parl. Hist., Vol. VII. p. 105.) A well-known English writer has described the latter as "the instance of purely political impeachment." (Taswell-Langmead, English Const. Hist., p. 549, note.) Cases of that class shed but a dim light upon the definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" as applied to those offenses for which English judges have been punished for misbehavior in office. No clear or authoritative definitions of the term in question can be found, as applied to that subject, outside of what are known as judicial impeachments as contradistinguished from political. As the purely judicial impeachment cases which have occurred in England are very few in number, their results may be stated within narrow limits.

The earliest of the accusations which have been made against English judges have been for the crime of bribery, the crime for which Lord Bacon was impeached by the Commons in 1621. The charges against Bacon particularly set forth instances of judicial corruption by the acceptance of bribes, and in his "confession and submission" he said: "I do plainly and ingeniously confess that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defense." (State Trials, Vol. II, 1106). Such cases, though rare, had occurred before Bacon's time. In the words of Sir J. F. Stephen, Coke "gives two instances in which judges were punished for taking bribes, namely, Sir William Thorpe, in 1351, who took sums amounting in all to £90 for not awarding an exigent against five persons at Lincoln assizes, and certain commissioners (probably special commissioners) of oyer and terminer, who were fined 1,000 marks each for taking a bribe of £4. I have elsewhere referred to the impeachment of the Chancellor Michael de la Pole, by Cavendish, the fishmonger for taking a bribe of £40, 3 yards of scarlet cloth, and a quantity of fish, in the time of Richard II. * * *

"Lord Macclesfield was also impeached and removed from his office for bribery in 1725." (Hist. of the Crim. Law of Eng., Vol. III, pp. 251-52, citing as to the case of Lord Macclesfield Sixteen State Trials, p. 767.) That case was the last judicial impeachment in England. It is not, therefore, strange that bribery, as an distinct and substance offense, should have been named, side by side with treason, as an impeachable crime, in the Constitution of the United States. After the bribery cases of Lord Chancellor Bacon and Lord Chancellor Macclesfield have been subtracted from the foregoing list, but two judicial impeachments remain in the entire history of the English people. Only in those two cases have the Commons impeached and the Lords tried English judges upon charges of judicial misconduct other than bribery.

IX. IMPEACHMENT OF SIR ROBERT BERKLEY AND OTHER JUDGES

In 1635 Charles I announced his intention to extend the exaction of ship money to the inland counties. When the writs of that year were resisted, the judges gave answers in favor of the prerogative. When in 1636 another set of ship writs were issued, Hampden made a test case by refusing to pay the assessment on his lands at Great Missenden, and the issue thus raised was argued in November and December, 1637, before a full bench. The contention made in favor of the Crown was sustained by seven of the judges—Finch, chief justice of the common pleas; Bramston, chief justice of the king's bench; Berkley, one of the justices of that court; Crawley, one of the judges of the common pleas; Davenport, lord chief baron of the exchequer; Weston and Trevor, barons of that court. When the day of reckoning came, Finch fled to Holland, and the remaining six were impeached by the Commons for their judgments rendered in favor of the royal contention, the charges being delivered to the Lords July 6, 1641. As Berkley's opinion in favor of the legality of ship money was the most emphatic, he was made the special object of attack in articles which charged him not only with the ship-money opinion, but with other acts of judicial misconduct on the bench. The nature of the accusations against him can be best explained by extracts from the articles themselves, which open with the general statement "that the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the said court of king's bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of the realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, which he hath declared, by traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions appearing in the several articles ensuing."

The following are a fair sample of the special charges: "4. That he, the said Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the king's bench, and having taken an oath for the due administration of justice, according to the laws and statutes of the realm, to His Majesty's liege people, on or about the last of December subscribed an opinion, in hæc verba: 'I am of opinion, that where the benefit doth more particularly redound to the good of the ports,' etc. * * * 6. That he, the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, did on——deliver his opinion in the exchequer chamber against John Hampden, esq., in the case of ship money. * * * 7. That he, the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, and one of the justices of the assize for the county of York, did, at the assizes held at York in Lent, 1636, deliver his charge to the grand jury, that it was a lawful and inseparable flower of the Crown for the King to command, not only the maritime counties, but also those that were inland, to find ships for the defense of the kingdom.' * * * 8. The said Sir R. Berkley then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, in Trinity term last, then sitting on the bench in said court, upon debate of the said case between the said chambers and Sir E. Bromfield, said openly in the court, 'that there was a rule of law, and a rule of government;' and that 'many things which might not be done by the rule of law might be done by the rule of government;' and would not suffer the point of legality of ship money to be argued by chambers' counsel. * * * 9. The said Sir R. Berkley, then and there sitting on the bench, did revile and threaten the grand jury returned to serve at the said session, for presenting the removal of the communion table in All Saints Church in Hertford aforesaid. * * * 11. He, the said Sir R. Berkley, being one of the justices of the said court of king's bench, and sitting in said court, deferred to grant a prohibition to the said Court-Christian in said cause, although the counsel did move in the said court many several times and several for a prohibition." (State Trials, vol. 3, pp. 1283-1291.) The impeachment against Berkley ended in his paying a fine of £10,000.

X. IMPEACHMENT OF SIR WILLIAM SCROGGS, CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE KING'S BENCH

In the reign of Charles II, Sir William Scroggs, chief justice of the king's bench, was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, the nature of which may be best explained by the following extracts from the articles themselves. The general accusation is "that the said William Scroggs, then being chief justice of the court of king's bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws, and the established religion and government of this Kingdom of England; and instead thereof to introduce popery and arbitrary and tyrannical government against law; which he has declared by divers traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions." Chief among the special charges are the following: II. "That he, the said Sir William Scroggs, in Trinity term last, being then chief justice of the said court, and having taken an oath duly to administer justice according to the laws and statutes of this realm, in pursuance of his said traitorous purposes, did, together with the rest of the justices of the said court, several days before the end of said term, in an arbitrary manner, discharge the grand jury which then served for the hundred of Oswaldston, in the county of Middlesex, before they had made their presentments, etc. * * * III. That, whereas one Henry Carr had, for some time before, published every week a certain book, entitled 'The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or The History of Popery,' wherein the superstitions and cheats of the Church of Rome were from time to time exposed, he, the said Sir William Scroggs, then chief justice of the court of king's bench, together with the other judges of the said court, before any legal conviction of the said Carr, of any crime did in the said Trinky term, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, make and cause to be entered a certain rule of that court against the printing of said book, in hæc verba. * * * IV. That the said Sir William Scroggs, since he was made chief justice of the king's bench, hath, together with the other judges of the said court, most notoriously departed from all rules of justice and equality in the imposition of fines upon persons convicted of misdemeanors in said court." The result was that the chief justice was removed from office and given a pension for life. (State Trials, Vol. VIII, pp. 195, 216.)

XI. PROCEEDING AGAINST LORD CHIEF JUSTICE KEELING.

Intervening between the case of Berkley and other judges (1640) and that of Sjr William Scroggs (1680) are proceedings by the Commons against Lord Chief Justice Keeling, which occurred in 1667, notable for the reason that they clearly illustrate what kind of judicial acts were considered as impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors at that time. "A copy of Judge Keeling's case, taken out of the Parliament Journal, December 11, 1667: 'The House resumed the hearing of the rest of the report touching the matter of restraint upon juries; and that upon the examination of divers witnesses, in several causes of restraints put upon juries, by the Lord Chief Justice Keeling; whereupon the committee made their resolutions, which are as follows: 1. That the proceedings of the Lord Chief Justice, in the cases now reported, are innovations in the trial of men for their lives and liberties; and that he hath used an arbitrary and illegal power, which is of dangerous consequence to the lives and liberties of thhe people of England, and tends to the introducing of an arbitrary government. 2. That in the place of judicature, the Lord Chief Justice hath undervalued, vilified, and condemned Magna Charta, the great preserver of our lives, freedom, and property. 3. That he be brought to trial, in order to condign punishment in such manner as the House shall judge most fit and requisite.'" (State Trials, vol. 6, p. 991, seq.)

"On the 16th of October, 1667, the House being informed 'that there have been some innovations of late in trials of men for their lives and deaths, and in some particular cases restraints have been put upon juries in the inquiries,' this matter is referred to a committee. On the 18th of November this committee are empowered to receive information against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling for any other misdemeanors besides those concerning juries. And on the 11th of December, 1667, the committee report several resolutions against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling of illegal and arbitrary proceedings in his office. The chief justice desiring to be heard, he is admitted on the 13th of December and heard in his defense to the matters charged against him, and being withdrawn, the House resolve 'that they will proceed no further in the matter against him.'" (4 Hatsel Prec., pp. 123-4, cited in Chase's Trial, Vol. II, p. 461.)

XII. REMOVAL BY ADDRESS PROVIDED BY THE ACT OF SETTLEMENT

By the foregoing analysis of the only English precedents to which we can look for expositions of the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to the conduct of English judges, the fact is put beyond all question that the only judicial acts which the House of Commons ever regarded as falling within that category are such acts as a judge performs while sitting upon the bench, administering the laws of the realm, either between private persons or between the Crown and the subject. In the case of Mr. Justice Berkley the gravamen of the charge was that he rendered a judgment in the matter of ship money in conflict with what his triers considered the law of the realm to be. In the case of Chief Justice Scroggs the gravamen of the charge was that he arbitrarily discharged grand juries; that in a libel case he rendered an illegal judgment, and that he imposed unjust fines upon those convicted of misdemeanors. In the proceedings against Chief Justice Keeling the gravamen of the charge was that he had put "restraint" upon juries by fining them for their verdicts. "Wagstaff and others of a jury were fined an hundred marks a piece by Lord Chief Justice Keeling." (4 Hatsell Prec., p. 124, note.) Excepting bribery there is no case in the parliamentary law of England which gives color to the idea that the personal misconduct of a judge, in matters outside of his administration of the law in a court of justice, was ever considered or charged to constitute a high crime and misdemeanor. When the question is asked, By what means is the personal misconduct of an English judge, not amounting to a high crime and misdemeanor, punished? the answer is easy.

Prior to the passage in 1701 of the famous Act of Settlement (12 and 13 Will. III, C. 2) neither the tenure nor the compensation of English judges rested upon a firm or definite foundation. Hallam (Const. Hist., Vol. III, p. 194) tells us that "it had been the practice of the Stuarts, especially in the last years of their dynasty, to dismiss judges, without seeking any other pretense, who showed any disposition to thwart government in political prosecutions." As the hasty and imperfect Bill of Rights had failed to provide a remedy for that condition of things, it became necessary for the authors of the Act of Settlement, "the complement of the Revolution itself and the Bill of Rights," to provide that English judges should hold office during good behavior (quandiu se bene gesserint), and that they should receive ascertained and established salaries. But, while the judges were being thus entrenched in their offices, the fact was not forgotten that the remedy by impeachment extended only to high crimes and misdemeanors which did not embrace personal misconduct. Therefore a method of removal was provided by address, which was intended to embrace all misconduct not included in the term "high crimes and misdemeanors."

In the light of that statement it will be easier to understand the full purport of that section of the Act of Settlement which provides "that after the said limitations shall take effect as aforesaid, judges' commissions be made quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them." Thus, for seventy-five years prior to the severance of the political tie which bound the English colonies in America to the parent State, the twofold method for the removal of English judges was clearly defined and perfectly understood on both sides of the Atlantic. The twofold method embraced (1) the removal by impeachment for all acts constituting "high crimes and misdemeanors," a term then clearly defined in English parliamentary law; (2) the removal by address for all lesser acts of personal misconduct not embraced within that term. That such was the general and accepted view on this side of the Atlantic in 1776 of the English parliamentary law on impeachment and address will be put beyond all question by the following references to the several State constitutions in which that law reappeared.

XIII. IMPEACHMENT AND ADDRESS AS DEFINED IN THE CONSTITUTIONS OF THE SEVERAL STATES

On May 10, 1776, the Continental Congress recommended to the several conventions and assemblies of the colonies the establishment of independent governments "for the maintenance of internal peace and the defense of their lives, liberties, and properties." (Charters and Constitutions, vol. 1, p. 3.) Before the end of the year in which that recommendation was made the greater part of the colonies had adopted written constitutions, in which were restated, in a dogmatic form, all of the vital principles of the English constitutional system. Illustrations of the adoption of the English plan for the removal of judges by impeachment and address may be drawn from the following State constitutions: The constitution of Pennsylvania of 1776, Article V, section 2, provides that "the judges of the supreme court and of the several courts of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may remove any of them, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature."

The constitution of Delaware of 1792, Article VI, section 2, provides that "the chancellor and the judges of the supreme court of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may in his discretion, remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature." The constitution of South Carolina of 1868, Article VII, section 4, provides that "for any willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any executive or judicial officer on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly." Here are explicit and dogmatic statements of the settled rule of English parliamentary law that judges may be removed by impeachment for grave offenses of judicial misconduct, and by address for lesser offenses of personal misconduct. As this distinction was so well known, many of the State constitutions simply presuppose it without stating it in express terms. The constitution of Massachusetts of 1780, Chapter III, article 1, after providing for removal by impeachment, declares that "all judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting such concerning whom there is different provision made in this constitution: Provided, nevertheless, the governor, with consent of the council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature."

The constitution of Georgia of 1798, Article III, section 1, provides that "the judges of the superior court shall be elected for the term of three years, removable by the governor on the address of two-thirds of both houses for that purpose, or by impeachment and conviction thereon." The constitution of New Hampshire of 1784, Article I, part 2, provides that "all judicial officers, duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting those concerning whom there is a different provision made in this constitution: Provided, nevertheless, the president, with the consent of council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature." The constitution of Connecticut of 1818, Article V, section 3, provides that "the judges of the supreme court and of the superior court shall hold their offices during good behavior; but may be removed by impeachment, and the governor shall also remove them on the address of two-thirds of the members of each house of the general assembly." It is said that the Constitution of New York of 1777 was the model from which the impeachment clauses of the Constitution of the United States were copied. (6 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 277.)

The New York constitution of that date expressly limited impeachment to persons in office, and omitted removal by address. Such an omission was, however, exceptional. The rule was to introduce into the State constitutions both processes of removal by impeachment and address. And if it were not for fear of wearying the court by reiteration, the list of instances could be greatly lengthened in which both methods were introduced into later State constitutions not here mentioned, together with the recognized distinction between impeachable offenses and the lesser acts of misconduct justifying only removal by address, expressed in the words "not sufficient ground of impeachment." (See Appendix.)

2014. Arguments that Congress might not by law make non-residence a high misdemeanor in a judge.

Discussion of the intent of a judge as a primary condition needed to justify impeachment.

On February 22, 1905,<sup>48</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

First. That the definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as employed in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution, must be drawn from the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787, construed in the light of the contemporaneous expositions of that law embodied in the provisions of the constitutions of the several States as to impeachment and address.

Second. That the definition of that term, as fixed at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, is organic and unchangeable by subsequent Congressional legislation; that no act not an impeachable offense when the Constitution was adopted can be made so by a subsequent act of Congress.

Third. That the "high crimes and misdemeanors" for which English judges were impeachable in 1787 can only be clearly ascertained from an examination of what are known as the English judicial impeachment cases, as contradistinguished from the political.

Fourth. That English judges have never been impeached except for bribery, or for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in court, either between private individuals or between the Crown and the subject.

Fifth. That since the act of settlement (1701), when the tenure and compensation of English judges was first fixed on a definite basis, such judges have been removable for judicial misconduct not amounting to an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor, by address.

Sixth. That the plain distinction between the acts for which a judge may be impeached and the acts for which he may be removed by address was clearly recognized and defined in the constitutions of many of the States.

Seventh. That after careful consideration and debate the Federal Convention of 1787, with only one dissenting vote, rejected the proposition to embody the removal of Federal judges by address in the Constitution of the United States "as weakening too much the independence of the judges." After rejecting the more ample provisions upon the subject of impeachment embodied in some of the State constitutions, it was resolved that Federal judges should only be removed by impeachment for and conviction of "high crimes and misdemeanors" in the limited sense in which that phrase was defined in the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787.

Eighth. That in no one of the four judicial impeachments which have taken place since the adoption of our Federal Constitution has the House of Representatives ever attempted to impeach a Federal judge for "high crimes and misdemeanors," except in those cases in which he would have been impeachable under the English parliamentary precedents. That is to say, the proceedings against Justice Berkley and other judges (1640), the proceedings against Chief Justice Keeling (1667), the proceedings against Chief Justice Scroggs (1680), the proceedings against Judge Pickering (1803), the proceedings against Judge Chase (1804), the proceedings against Judge Peck (1830), the proceedings against Judge Humphreys (1862), so far as they relate to judicial misconduct, rest upon a single proposition, which is this: In English and American parliamentary and constitutional law the judicial misconduct which rises to the dignity of a high crime and misdemeanor must consist of judicial acts, performed with an evil or wicked intent, by a judge while administering justice in a court, either between private persons or between a private person and the government of the State. All personal misconduct of a judge occurring during his tenure of office and not coming within that category must be classed among the offenses for which a judge may be removed by address, a method of removal which the framers of our Federal Constitution refused to embody therein.

When the allegations contained in articles 1, 2, and 3, presented against this respondent, are examined, it appears that they set forth in three forms an identical charge, which is in substance that the respondent, in settling his accounts with certain United States marshals under a certain act of Congress providing for the reasonable expenses for travel and attendance of a district judge, when lawfully directed to hold court outside of his district, exacted and received in payment for such expenses from the said marshals sums in excess of the amounts contemplated in said act. It is charged that such acts constitute "a high crime, to wit, the crime of obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense, and of a high misdemeanor in office." The short answer to such a charge is that no such offense was ever thought of or defined in the parliamentary law of England as a high crime and misdemeanor in 1787, or at any other time: that it bears no relation whatever to the acts known in English parliamentary law as an impeachable offense. If it be true, as alleged, that the respondent was guilty in making such settlements of "obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense," then the remedy is by indictment by a grand jury and a trial by a petit jury, as in the case of any other citizen of the country. The Constitution expressly provides, Article I, section 3, that persons subject to impeachment "shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." While it is quite possible to understand how such personal misconduct upon the part of a judge, entirely disconnected with the conduct of judicial business on the bench, might subject him to removal by address in a State which had adopted that plan of removal for nonimpeachable offenses, it is hard to conceive how many effort of the imagination could reach the conclusion that such an act constitutes an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in English parliamentary law.

The same comments are applicable to the charges made in articles 4 and 5 as to the use by the respondent of a certain car belonging to a certain railroad, "the said railroad company being at the time in the possession of a receiver appointed by said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, on the petition of creditors." Even if it could be established that the circumstances attending such a transaction would warrant removal by address, no advance would be made toward the conclusion that such acts constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in English parliamentary law, because the further allegation that "the said Charles Swayne, acting as judge, allowed the credit claimed by the said receiver for and on account of the said expenditure as part of the necessary expenses of operating said road" falls far short of the English and American rule as to the evil or wicked intent which must accompany a judgment or opinion delivered on the bench in order to render it impeachable. Nothing is better settled than the fact that a judge is not impeachable even for a judgment, order, or opinion rendered contrary to law unless it is alleged and proved that it was rendered with an evil, wicked, or malicious intent. Justice Berkley was impeached not simply because he decided in favor of ship money, but because he "traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws" of the realm thereby. Chief Justice Scroggs was impeached not simply for imposing "fines upon persons convicted of misdemeanors in said court," but because he imposed them "for the further accomplishing of his said traitorous and wicked purposes."

Justice Chase was impeached because he, "with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Bassett, one of the jury;" "that, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in." Judge Peck was impeached not because he punished Lawless for contempt, but because he did so "with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke Edward Lawless under color of law, * * * under the color and pretense aforesaid and with the intent aforesaid, in the said court then and there did unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily order and adjudge," etc. If further illustrations of the necessity for averments as to the wicked and malicious intent with which a judicial act must be performed need be given, they may be drawn from articles 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, presented against this respondent, in which impeachable offenses are properly charged under the rule which the Constitution prescribes—that is to say, the rule of English parliamentary law. It is charged in one article that the said Charles Swayne "did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days E. T. Davis, an attorney at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States;" and in another that he "did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of a contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days Simeon Belden, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States."

With the plain and settled rule thus recognized clearly in view, the draftsmen of articles 4 and 5 have not only failed to charge that the respondent "allowed the credit claimed by said receiver for and on account of the said expenditure," etc., "maliciously and unlawfully," but, what is more to the point, they have failed to charge that he did so "knowingly." There is no reason to suppose, in the absence of such an allegation, that a judge, approving the mass of accounts presented to the court by a receiver of a railroad, would have personal knowledge of every trivial item which such accounts contain. The presumption is clearly to the contrary. In articles 4 and 5 there is no charge either that the respondent ever "knowingly" passed upon the items of expense in question or that he approved them "maliciously and unlawfully." In the absence of such allegations articles 4 and 5 fall to the ground.

The charge of nonresidence contained in article 6 presupposes the validity of section 551, Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that "a district judge shall be appointed for each district, except in cases hereinafter provided. Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor." If the foregoing argument proves anything, it is the fact that when the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was embodied in the Federal Constitution in 1787 it drew along with it, as an integral part of it, the definitions which fixed its meaning in English parliamentary law at that time. The phrase, coupled with the definitions of it, thus became organic and unchangeable by subsequent Congressional legislation, just as the definition of the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court became organic and unchangeable. The convention pointedly refused to make impeachable offenses an uncertain or changeable quantity. "The first proposition was to use the words 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out. * * * Colonel Mason said: 'Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined.' He moved to insert after 'bribery' the words 'or maladministration.' Madison: 'So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate.' Mason withdrew 'maladministration' and substituted 'other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State.'" (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 804.)

The fathers knew exactly the limitations of the phrase adopted, and they repelled the idea that it was ever to be enlarged or diminished. If nonresidence of a judge in his district could be added by Congress to the list of impeachable offenses, that list could be thus indefinitely extended; or, by the same authority, every impeachable offense as understood in 1787 could be abolished. If it is admitted that Congress can change the organic definition, either by addition or subtraction, it follows as clearly as a mathematical demonstration that the scheme of impeachment provided in the Constitution can be entirely remodeled by legislation. The validity of the section in question, making nonresidence a high misdemeanor, can not be supported by serious argument. Even if it could be, the fact can not be lost sight of that its plain provision is that "every such judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed." It will not be disputed that Judge Swayne was so residing in the district for which he was appointed at the time that subsequent legislation excluded the place of his residence from such district. Certainly nothing more can be put forward by those who assert the validity of section 551 than the contention that it was respondent's duty to remove, within a reasonable time, from the district for which he was appointed into the new one for which he was not appointed. It follows, therefore, that the accusation now made amounts to nothing more than the charge that respondent did not act with sufficient alacrity; that he did not remove his residence into the new district with sufficient promptness. How could such laches possibly constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor?

On February 23, 1905,<sup>40</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, filed, by permission the following brief:

A BRIEF OF AUTHORITIES ON THE LAWS OF IMPEACHMENT

The purpose of this brief is to show—

First. That the framers of the Constitution intended that the House of Representatives should have the right to impeach and the Senate the power to try a judicial officer for any misbehavior that showed disqualification to hold and exercise the office, whether moral, intellectual, or physical.

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject of impeachment are as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Art. I, sec. 2.)

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law. (Art. II, sec. 1.)

"The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Art. II, sec. 2.)

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Art. 3, sec. 2.)

The convention that framed the Constitution did not define words, but used them in the sense in which they were understood at that time.

The convention did not invent the remedy by impeachment, but adopted a well-known and frequently used method of getting rid of objectionable public officers, modifying it to suit the conditions of a new country.

In England all the King's subjects were liable to impeachment for any offense against the sovereign or the law. Floyd was impeached for speaking lightly of the Elector Palatine and sentenced to ride on horseback for two successive days through certain public streets with his face to the horse's tail, with the tail in his hands; to stand each day two hours in pillory; to be pelted by the mob, then to be branded with the letter "K" and be imprisoned for life in the Tower. The character and extent of the punishment was in the discretion of the House of Lords.

The Constitution modified the remedy by confining it to the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers, and the punishment to removal from office and disqualification to hold office in future.

That it was not intended as a punishment of crime clearly appears when we read that a party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

Said Mr. Bayard, in Blount's trial:

"Impeachment is a proceeding of a purely political nature. It is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the State. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity." (Wharton's State Trials, 263.)

Subject to these modifications and adopting the recognized rule, the Constitution should be construed so as to be equal to every occasion which might call for its exercise and adequate to accomplish the purposes of its framers. Impeachment remains here as it was recognized in England at and prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

These limitations were imposed in view of the abuses of the power of impeachment in English history.

These abuses were not guarded against in our Constitution by limiting, defining, or reducing impeachable crimes, since the same necessity existed here as in England for the remedy of impeachment, but by other safeguards thrown around it in that instrument. It will be observed that the sole power of impeachment is conferred on the House and the sole power of trial on the Senate by Article I, sections 2 and 3. These are the only jurisdictional clauses, and they do not limit impeachment to crimes and misdemeanors. Nor is it elsewhere so limited. Section 4 of Article II makes it imperative when the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers are convicted of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors that they shall be removed from office. There may be cases appropriate for the exercise of the power of impeachment where no crime or misdemeanor has been committed.

Whatever crimes and misdemeanors were the subjects of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are, therefore, subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution.

"The framers of our Constitution, looking to the impeachment trials in England, and to the writers on parliamentary and common law, and to the constitutions and usages of our own State, saw that no act of Parliament or of any State legislature ever undertook to define an impeachable crime. They saw that the whole system of crimes, as defined in acts of Parliament and as recognized at common law, was prescribed for and adapted to the ordinary courts." (2 Hale, Pl. Crown, ch. 20, p. 150; 6 Howell State Trials, 313, note.)

They saw that the high court of impeachment took jurisdiction of cases where no indictable crime had been committed, in many instances, and there was then, as there yet are, two parallel modes of reaching some, but not all offenders—one by impeachment, the other by indictment.

With these landmarks to guide them, our fathers adopted a Constitution under which official malfeasance and nonfeasance, and, in some cases, misfeasance, may be the subject of impeachment, although not made criminal by act of Congress, or so recognized by the common law of England, or of any State of the Union. They adopted impeachment as a means of removing men from office whose misconduct imperils the public safety and renders them unfit to occupy official position. All American text writers support this view.

"Congress have unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct; and the rules of proceeding and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law and parliamentary usage. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors. It seems, then, to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment that, though the common law can not be a foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or laws, that jurisdiction, when given, attaches, and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law, and that what are and what are not high crimes and misdemeanors is to be ascertained by a recurrence to that great basis of American jurisprudence. The reasoning by which the power of the House of Representatives to punish for contempts (which are breaches of privileges and offenses not defined by any positive laws) has been upheld by the Supreme Court stands upon similar grounds; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish for contempts until the acts had been previously defined and ascertained by positive law it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal.

"In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law, and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy. Thus lord chancellors, and judges, and other magistrates have not only been impeached for bribery and acting grossly contrary to the duties of their offices, but for misleading their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, and for attempts to subvert the fundamental laws and introduce arbitrary power. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the great seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to have neglected the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to have betrayed his trust, a privy councillor to have propounded or supported pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to have obtained exorbitant grants or incompatible employments—these have been all deemed impeachable offenses. Some of these offenses, indeed, for which persons were impeached in the early ages of British jurisprudence would now seem harsh and severe; but perhaps they were rendered necessary by existing corruptions, and the importance of suppressing a spirit of favoritism and court intrigue.

"Thus persons have been impeached for giving bad counsel to the King, advising a prejudicial peace, enticing the King to act against the advice of Parliament, purchasing offices, giving medicine to the King without advice of physicians, preventing other persons from giving counsel to the King except in their presence, and procuring exorbitant personal grants from the King. But others, again, were founded in the most salutary public justice, such as impeachments for malversations and neglects in office, for encouraging pirates, for official oppression, extortions, and deceits, and especially for putting good magistrates out of office and advancing bad. One can not but be struck, in this slight enumeration, with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses, and with the entire propriety of confiding the jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the policy of the state, and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers.

"The other point is one of more difficulty. In the argument upon Blount's impeachment it was pressed with great earnestness, while there is not a syllable in the Constitution which confines impeachments to official acts, and it is against the plainest dictates of common sense that such restraint should be imposed upon it. Suppose a judge should countenance or aid insurgents in a meditated conspiracy or insurrection against the Government. This is not a judicial act, and yet it ought certainly to be impeachable. He may be called upon to try the very persons whom he has aided. Suppose a judge or other officer to receive a bribe not connected with his judicial office, could he be entitled to any public confidence? Would not these reasons for his removal be just as strong as if it were a case of an official bribe? The argument on the other side was that the power of impeachment was strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, and this necessarily implied that it must be limited to malconduct in office."

[American and English Encyclopedia of Law, Vol. XV, p. 1066]

"In the United States.—The Constitution of the United States provides that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. If impeachment in England be regarded merely as a mode of trial for the punishment of common-law or statutory crimes, and if the Constitution has adopted it only as a mode of procedure, leaving the crimes to which it is to be applied to be settled by the general rules of criminal law, then, as it is well settled that in regard to the National Government there are no common-law crimes, it would seem necessarily to follow that impeachment can be instituted only for crimes specifically named in the Constitution or for offenses declared to be crimes by Federal statute. This view has been maintained by very eminent authority. But the cases of impeachment that have been brought under the Constitution would seem to give to the remedy a much wider scope than the above rule would indicate.

"In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute, and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offenses charged in the articles was, in most of the cases, not denied. In one case, however, counsel for the defendant insisted that impeachment would not lie for any but an indictable offense, but after exhaustive argument on both sides this defense was practically abandoned. The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be taken, not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruptions, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, my Judges and high officers of state, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute. Additional weight is added to this interpretation of the Constitution by the opinions of eminent writers on constitutional and parliamentary law and by the fact that some of the most distinguished members of the convention that framed it have thus interpreted it."

"Impeachments are thus introduced as a known definite term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for the definition of them."

In England the practice of impeachments by the House of Commons before the House of Lords has existed from very ancient times. Its foundation is that a subject intrusted with the administration of public affairs may sometimes infringe the rights of the people and be guilty of such crimes as the ordinary magistrates either dare not or can not punish. Of these, the representatives of the people, or House of Commons, can not judge, because they and their constituents are the persons injured, and can therefore only accuse. But the ordinary tribunals would naturally be swayed by the authority of so powerful an accuser. That branch of the legislature which represents the people, therefore, brings the charge before the other branch, which consists of the nobility, who are said not to have the same interests or the same passions as the popular assembly.

"The delegation of important trusts, affecting the higher interests of society, is always from various causes liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign states, or the basest appetite for illegitimate emoluments are sometimes productive of what are not inaptly termed political offenses, which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings."

[Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, p. 980, par. 2539.]

"The purpose of impeachment, in modern times, is the prosecution and punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors, chiefly of an official or political character, which are either beyond the reach of the law, or which no other authority in the State but the supreme legislative power is competent to prosecute, and, by the law of Parliament, all persons, whether peers or commoners, may be impeached for any crimes or offenses whatever."

[Trial of Judge Peck, p. 427. Mr. Buchanan's argument.]

"What is an impeachable offense? This is a preliminary question which demands attention. It must be decided before the court can rightly understand what it is they have to try. The Constitution of the United States declares the tenure of the judicial office to be 'during good behavior.' Official misbehavior, therefore, in a judge is a forfeiture of his office. But when we say this we have advanced only a small distance. Another question meets us. What is misbehavior in office? In answer to this question and without pretending to furnish a definition, I freely admit we are bound to prove that the respondent has violated the Constitution or some known law of the land. This, I think, was the principle fairly to be deduced from all the arguments on the trial of Judge Chase, and from the votes of the Senate in the articles of impeachment against him, in opposition to the principle for which his counsel in the first instance strenuously contended, that in order to render an offense impeachable it must be indictable. But this violation of law may consist in the abuse as well as in the usurpation of authority.

"The abuse of a power which has been given may be as criminal as the usurpation of a power which has not been granted. Can there be any doubt of this? Suppose a man to be indicted for an assault and battery. He is tried and found guilty, and the judge, without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation having been shown, fines him a thousand dollars and commits him to prison for one year. Now, although the judge may possess the power to fine and imprison for this offense, at his discretion, would not this punishment be such an abuse of judicial discretion and afford such evidence of the tyrannical and arbitrary exercises of power as would justify the House of Representatives in voting an impeachment? But why need I fancy cases? Can fancy imagine a stronger case than is now, in point of fact, before us? A member of the bar is brought before a court of the United States guilty, if you please, of having published a libel on the judge—a libel, however perfectly decorous in its terms and imputing no criminal intention, and so difficult of construction that though the counsel of the respondent have labored for hours to prove it to be a libel still that question remains doubtful. If in this case the judge has degraded the author by imprisonment and deprived him of the means of earning bread for himself and his family by suspending him from the practice of his profession for eighteen months, would not this be a cruel and oppressive abuse of authority, even admitting the power to punish in such a case to be possessed by the judge?

"A gross abuse of granted power and an usurpation of power not granted are offenses equally worthy of and liable to impeachment. If, therefore, the gentleman could establish, on the firmest foundation, that the power to punish libels as contempts may be legally exercised by all the courts of the United States, still he would not have proceeded far toward the acquittal of his client.

"It has been contended that even supposing the judge to have transcended his power and violated the law, yet he can not be convicted unless the Senate should believe he did the act with a criminal intention. It has been said that crime consists in two things, a fact and an intention; and in support of this proposition the legal maxim has been quoted that 'actus non fit reum, nisi mens rea.' This may be true as a general proposition, and yet it may have but a slight bearing upon the present case.

"I admit that if the charge against a judge be merely an illegal decision on a question of property in a civil cause, his error ought to be gross and palpable, indeed, to justify the interference of a criminal intention and to convict him upon an impeachment. And yet one case of this character has occurred in our history. Judge Pickering was tried and condemned upon all the four articles exhibited against him, although the three first contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law in a cause involving a mere question of property, and then refusing to grant the party injured an appeal from his decision, to which he was entitled.

"And yet am I to be told that if a judge shall do an act which is in itself criminal; if he shall, in an arbitrary and oppressive manner and without the authority of law, imprison a citizen of this country and thus consign him to infamy, you are not to infer his intention from the act?"

[Judge Spencer's argument, p. 290.]

"It is necessary to a right understanding of the impeachment to ascertain and define what offenses constitute judicial misdemeanors. A judicial misdemeanor consists, in my opinion, in doing an illegal act colore officii with bad motives, or in doing an act within the competency of the court or judge in some cases, but unwarranted in a particular case from the facts existing in that case, with bad motives. To illustrate the last proposition: The eighth article of the amendments of the Constitution forbids the requirement of excessive bail, the imposition of excessive fines, or the infliction of cruel or unusual punishment. If a judge should disregard these provisions, and from bad motives violate them, his offense would consist, not in the want of power, but in the manner of his executing an authority intrusted to him and for exceeding a just and lawful discretion."

[Mr. Wickliffe's argument, p. 308.]

"By the third article of the Constitution of the United States it is declared that the judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behavior.

"I maintain the proposition that any official act committed or omitted by the judge, which is a violation of the condition upon which he holds his office, is an impeachable offense under the Constitution.

"The word misdemeanor, used in its parliamentary sense as applied to offenses, means maladministration, misconduct not necessarily indictable, not only in England, but in the United States.

"In the Senate, July 8, 1797, it was resolved that William Blount, esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States." (Wharton's State Trials, 202.)

"He was not guilty of an indictable crime. (Story on the Constitution, sec. 799, note.)

"The offense charged. Judge Story remarks, was not defined by any statute of the United States. It was an attempt to seduce a United States Indian interpreter from his duty, and to alienate the affections and conduct of the Indians from the public officers' residing among them."

Blackstone says: "The fourth species of offense more immediately against the King and Government are entitled 'misprisions and contempts.' Misprisions are, in the acceptance of our law, generally understood to be all such high offenses as are under the degree of capital, but nearly bordering thereon. * * * Misprisions which are merely positive are generally denominated contempts or high misdemeanors, of which the first and principal is maladministration of such high offices as are in public trust and employment. This is usually punished by the method of parliamentary impeachment." (Vol. 4, p. 121. See Prescott's trial, Mass., 1821, pp. 79-80, 109, 117-120, 172-180, 191.)

On Chase's trial the defense conceded that to misbehave or to misdeemean is precisely the same. (2 Chase's Trial, 145.)

The Constitution declares that judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their commissions during good behavior. This tenure of office was introduced into the English law to enable a removal to be made for misbehavior. (Chase's Trial, 357.)

At common laws, an ordinary violation of a public statute, even by one not an officer, though the statute in terms provides no punishment, is an indictable misdemeanor. (Bishop, Constitutional Law, 3d ed., 187, 535.)

The term "misdemeanor" covers every act of misbehavior in a popular sense. Misdemeanor in office and misbehavior in office mean the same things. (7 Dane Abgt., 3 5.) Misbehavior, therefore, which is a mere negative of good behavior, is an express limitation of the office of a judge.

We may therefore conclude that the House has the right to impeach and the Senate the power to try a judicial officer for any misbehavior or misconduct which evidences his unfitness for the bench, without reference to its indictable quality. All history, all precedent, and all text writers agree upon this proposition. The direful consequences attendant upon any other theory are manifest.

For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim is made that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity.

If that position is well taken, a judge might be a common drunkard, an open frequenter of disreputable resorts; he might be a common thief, an embezzler of trust funds, a gambler, even a murderer. If he could manage to keep out of jail and attend to his judicial duties, the remedy by impeachment would not reach him. To state the proposition, is to argue it.

Removal of a judge for misbehavior or lack of good behavior is impossible unless it can be done through the impeaching power. Otherwise the people are powerless to rid themselves of the most unworthy, disgraceful, and unfit official.

But the exigencies of this case do not demand even a discussion of the proposition that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity.

The claim is in the nature of a demurrer to the first seven articles. It admits the truth of the averments contained in them. It admits that the respondent, as judge of the district court he held at Waco, Tex., that as judge he knowingly made a false certificate; that as judge he receipted for and received money to which he was not entitled as reimbursement for expenses incurred as judge which he never did incur. All these acts were done in his official capacity. If he had not been a judge, he could not have held the court, incurred any expense, or receipted for or received any money. The stamp of his official character is on every act. His official position enabled him to do what he did do; without it he could not have violated the law.

In the case of the use of the property of the bankrupt corporation, which was in his hands for preservation, it was because he was judge that he had the opportunity to use the property. It was to bring him to hold court that the car was sent. An officer of his court sent it. He had the right and it was his duty to approve the account covering the expenses of the trip. If he had not been a judge, he could not have used the property of the railroad company. The article charges that Charles Swayne, judge, appropriated the property to his own use without making compensation under a claim of right, viz, that what he did was done in his official capacity.

The articles that charge him with violating the residence law assert that he did it while exercising his office of judge. The act is directed against judges; a private person can not violate it. The act commands a judge to reside in his district—that is, the official must live there; it is to be his official residence, so that he will be where he is wanted to perform his official duty. The violation of the law is the violation of an official duty, which the law imposes on him in his official duty, which the law imposes on him in his official character. All this the demurrer confesses, and yet the argument is made that for a violation of the act a judge is not impeachable, because it is not an official act.

But the proposition is seriously advanced that no act of Congress can create an impeachable offense or make a crime or misdemeanor the subject of impeachment for which impeachment would not lie in England before the adoption of the Constitution.

Impeachable offenses were not defined in the English law by act of Parliament or otherwise: any offense was impeachable that Parliament chose to so consider. Therefore when Congress makes that a crime or misdemeanor which was not so denominated at the time of the adoption of the Constitution it does not follow that the acts made crimes were not the subject of impeachment before the adoption of the Constitution.

For example, suppose no English law condemned the making of false certificates by a judge for the purpose of obtaining money from the Treasury. Can it be said that if an English judge had been guilty of such an offense that he would not have been subject to impeachment? If so, then neither can it be said that Congress created new impeachable offenses when the act was passed pertaining to false certificates.

The power to impeach for misbehavior of civil officials is vested in the House and the power to try in the Senate as fully as it was exercised by the English Parliament before 1787. That power covered every offense from high treason to slander against a ruler. Subject only to the limitation that the remedy by impeachment is confined to civil officers—for high crimes and misdemeanors—the power was conferred and may be exercised as fully now as then.

We have seen that according to the law of Parliament misdemeanor and misbehavior of public officers are synonymous terms. Another proposition advanced by counsel for respondent is that no judge was ever impeached in England for a misbehavior not committed in the discharge of his judicial functions. This is believed to be an error; judges were impeached for giving extrajudicial opinions. But suppose the fact to be as stated, the conclusion would not follow that because no English judge ever so misbehaved himself outside of his official duties as to make him a subject of impeachment that therefore he could not have been impeached if he had so misbehaved.

But however interesting discussion of such question may be it is quite unimportant in this case. All the charges against this respondent grow out of his official acts. Nothing that he did of which complaint is made could have been done by a private person, or by anyone who did not hold a judicial office. Because the respondent was a judge he had the right to make a certificate upon which to draw money from the Treasury; because he was a judge a private car was sent to bring him from Guyencourt to hold court at Jacksonville; because he was a judge the law imposed upon him the duty of living in a certain district; because he violated the law in all these cases in his official capacity he is charged.

The conclusion is therefore not to be resisted that even if the contention of the respondent's counsel is correct a judge can be impeached for nothing but official misconduct, these offenses are within the rule, and of them this court has jurisdiction.

2016. Argument of Mr. Manager Clayton that a judge may be impeached for misbehavior not necessarily connected with his judicial functions.—On February 24, 1905,<sup>50</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne. Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, said in final argument:

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that repeatedly in impeachment trials before the Senate it has been asserted that civil officers can not be impeached except for the commission of indictable offenses, but it was never before this time seriously contended that a judge can not be impeached except for wrongful conduct committed strictly in the performance of an act purely judicial.

Therefore in this case we are brought to a consideration of what is an impeachable offense. The Constitution denounces impeachable offenses under the terms of "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors" are general terms, and for their import and meaning reference may be had to English jurisprudence and parliamentary law, to the provisions of the constitutions of the several States relating to impeachments in existence prior to and at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and to the interpretation put upon the words in the debates in and by the action of the United States Senate in impeachment cases which have heretofore been tried.

In the present case the House of Representatives has charged this judge with crimes and misdemeanors, and also contends that he has forfeited his tenure of office because he has not conformed to the good behavior required by Article III, section 1, upon which his right to hold office is predicated. The judge is entitled to hold his office during good behavior, but not otherwise. The provision of the Constitution conversely stated would be that he shall not hold office after having been guilty of misbehavior. If I understand the contention of the counsel for the respondent here, they insist that high crimes and crimes and misdemeanors and the words "the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior" are limited or restricted to such acts as may be committed by a judge in his purely judicial capacity. In other words, however serious the crime, the misdemeanor, or misbehavior of the judge may be, if it can be said to be extrajudicial he can not be impeached. To illustrate this contention, the judge may have committed murder or burglary and be confined under a sentence in a penitentiary for any period of time, however long, but because he has not committed the murder or burglary in his capacity as judge he can not be impeached. That contention, carried out logically, might lead to the very defeat of the performance of the function confided to the judicial branch of the Government.

In the History of the Constitution of the United States, by George Ticknor Curtis, in volume 2, page 260, is found this language:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that, either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions, he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist when no offense against positive law has been committed, as when the individual has from immorality or imbecility or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

In the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, by Roger Foster, volume 1, page 569, this statement is made :

"The object of the grant of the power of impeachment was to free the Commonwealth from the danger caused by the retention of an unworthy public servant."

Again, on page 586, this statement :

"The Constitution provides that 'the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior.'

"This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means, except impeachment, is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law."

Again, on page 591, this statement :

"An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as * * * an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power."

In Rawle on The Constitution, page 201, in speaking of the court of impeachment, it is said :

"The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust."

In Story on The Constitution (5th edition), section 796, it is said :

"Is the silence of the statute book to be deemed conclusive in favor of the party until Congress have made a legislative declaration and enumeration of the offenses which shall be deemed high crimes and misdemeanors? If so, then, as has been truly remarked (citing Rawle on The Constitution), the power of impeachment, except as to the two expressed cases, is a complete nullity and the party is wholly dispensable, however enormous may be his corruption or criminality. It will not be sufficient to say that, in the cases where any offense is punished by any statute of the United States, it may and ought to be deemed an impeachable offense. It is not every offense that by the Constitution is so impeachable. It must not only be an offense, but a high crime and misdemeanor."

The further answer to this contention may be that it is repugnant to the Constitution, which especially provides for the impeachment of a civil officer for high crimes and misdemeanors, and especially provides that the judge shall hold his office during good behavior.

Again, it is repugnant to the spirit and genius of our institutions; and, if it were correct, it would be to throw around the judge, as a civil officer, a protection not afforded any other officer under the Government. It is also repugnant to the precedents in impeachment trials before the Senate, to the precedents in impeachment trials in the different States that had similar provisions in their constitutions and had impeachment trials before the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Any civil officer can be impeached. The President of the United States can be impeached. The removal from office can be had in respect to any officer under the Government, and it would be anomaly to say that in a free representative government the people are deprived of the power and the right to remove from office an unworthy officer. If it be true that a judge can not be impeached except for what he may have done strictly in his capacity as judge, then this extraordinary protection is afforded to him: He is put upon a pedestal by himself; he is raised above the military, because they can be tried and gotten rid of; he is raised above the Executive, for he can be tried by impeachment and removed from office; he is raised above the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House of Representatives, for they may be expelled upon a two-third vote of the members of their respective bodies. I say it would be anomaly. So far as the power of getting rid of an unworthy official is concerned, if that contention be correct it would be a hiatus in the power of government.

Did the fathers intend that it should ever come to pass that an unworthy officer, although a judge, guilty of murder or burglary or any other disgraceful crime which brings his high position into disrepute, can wrap a mantle of protection around him and say, "Although I am guilty of an infamous crime, I did not commit it in my judicial capacity, and therefore, convicted felon though I am, I can continue to be judge and to draw the emoluments of that high office?" I do not believe that this contention has even been made in any of the cases heretofore presented to the Senate.

In Judge Pickering's case it will be remembered that he was accused of drunkenness. He was also accused of releasing a ship which had been libeled without requiring bond. It might be argued that he did not get drunk in his official capacity; and yet the Senate in that case did impeach him and remove him from office, and that was one of the charges.

In the case of Judge Humphreys, the other judge who was convicted and removed from office, the charge was that he had made secession speeches and that he had acted as a judge of a Confederate court. Certainly he did not make secession speeches in his capacity as a judge of the United States court; it was not done in the trial of any cause before him. He did that in his individual capacity, and yet the Senate did vote to convict him, and did remove him from office, because, among other things, he had made these speeches and had held and exercised the office of a Confederate judge during the civil war.

I have here Foster on the Constitution. I will not tax the patience of the Senate by reading it; but, availing myself of the privilege heretofore referred to, I shall ask to have inserted in the Record that portion of the text which I have marked.

The extract referred to is as follows:

"The only difficulty arises in the construction of the term, 'other high crimes and misdemeanors.' As to this, four theories have been proposed: That, except treason or bribery, no offense is impeachable which is not declared by a statute of the United States to be a crime subject to indictment. That no offense is impeachable which is not subject to indictment by such a statute or by the common law. That all offenses are impeachable which were so by that branch of the common law known as the 'law of Parliament.' And that the House and Senate have the discretionary power to remove and stigmatize by perpetual disqualification an officer subject to impeachment for any cause that to them seems fit. The position that, except treason or bribery, no offense is impeachable which is not indictable by law was maintained by the counsel for the respondents on the trials of Chase and Jackson. * * *

"The first two theories are impracticable in their operation, inconsistent with other language of the Constitution, and overruled by precedents. If no crime, save treason and bribery, not forbidden by a statute of the United States, will support an impeachment, then almost every kind of official corruption or oppression must go unpunished. Suppose the Chief Justice of the United States were convicted in a State court of a felony or misdemeanor, must he remain in office unimpeached and hold court in a State prison?

"The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can be found only in the law of Parliament, and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States.

"The Constitution provides that—

"The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.'

"This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law.

"In 1803 Pickering, a district judge of the United States, was convicted on impeachment for his official action in surrendering to the claimant, without requiring the statutory bond, a vessel libeled by the United States, for refusing to allow an appeal from this order, and for drunkenness and profane language on the bench.

"None of these offenses was indictable by the common law or by statute.

"Humphreys, a district judge of the United States, was convicted on impeachment, not only for treason, but also for refusing to hold court, for holding office under the Confederate States, and for imprisoning citizens for expressing their sympathy with the Union. The managers of the House of Representatives who opened the case admitted that none of these offenses except the treason was indictable.

"Some advocates have gone so far as to maintain by a misapplication of a term of the common law that the proceedings on an impeachment are not a trial, but a so-called 'inquest of office,' and that the House and Senate may thus remove an officer for any reason that they approve. That Congress has the power to do so may be admitted. For it is not likely that any court would hold void collaterally a judgment on an impeachment where the Senate had jurisdiction over the person of the condemned. And undoubtedly a court of impeachment has the jurisdiction to determine what constitutes an impeachable offense. But the judgments of the Senate of the United States in the cases of Chase and Peck, as well as those of the State senates in the different cases which have been before them, have established the rule that no officer should be impeached for any act that does not have at least the characteristics of a crime. And public opinion must be irremediably debauched by party spirit before it will sanction any other course.

"Impeachable offenses are those which were the subject of impeachment by the practice in Parliament before the Declaration of Independence, except in so far as that practice is repugnant to the language of the Constitution and the spirit of American institutions. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large.

"In this class of cases, which rests so much in the discretion of the Senate, the writer would be rash who were to attempt to prescribe the limits of its jurisdiction in this respect.

"An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance, or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness, when habitual or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, and profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official function which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power, as well as a breach or omission of an official duty imposed by statute or common law; or a public speech when off duty which encourages insurrection. It does not consist in an error in judgment made in good faith in the decision of a doubtful question of law, except, perhaps, in the violation of the Constitution."

2017. Review of impeachments in Congress to show that judges have been impeached only for acts of judgment performed on the bench, as contradistinguished from personal acts performed while in office.—On February 22, 1905,<sup>51</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

Seven impeachment trials have taken place under the machinery provided for that purpose by the Constitution of the United States: That of William Blount (1793), that of John Pickering (1803), that of Samuel Chase (1804), that of James H. Peck (1830), that of West H. Humphreys (1862), that of Andrew Johnson (1868), and that of William W. Belknap (1876). Three of the foregoing were political impeachments and four judicial, as those terms are understood in English parliamentary law. The articles presented by the House of Representatives against the four judges—Pickering, Chase, Peck, and Humphreys—illustrate in the most emphatic manner possible that the popular branch of Congress has heretofore always perfectly understood the meaning of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to the misconduct for which a judge may be impeached. When placed side by side with the English precedents on that subject heretofore examined they agree in every particular. The House of Representatives, in the only four cases of the kind ever tried, limited its accusations, with the greatest strictness, to the acts of judgment performed by the judge on the bench, as contradistinguished from personal acts performed by the judge while in office, which might have been the ground of removal by address.

Turning first to the case against John Pickering, judge of the district court of New Hampshire, for practical illustrations, we find that judge charged with misconduct while adjudicating a certain admiralty case pending in said district court: "Yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States, did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States in the trial of said cause did order and decree the ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalett Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States and to the manifest injury of their revenue." (Art. II.) Again (Art. III), when an appeal was prayed in open court in behalf of the United States, the charge is that "the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws, and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States, and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal as prayed for."

And again (Art. IV), after the statement was made that said Pickering was "a man of loose morals and intemperate habits," he was thus accused: "On the eleventh and twelfth days of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear upon the bench of said court, for the purpose of administering justice, in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors, and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all good citizens of the United States, and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge and degrading to the honor and dignity of the United States." It should be specially noted here that no pretense was made that "loose morals and intemperate habits" or profanity constituted a high crime and misdemeanor. Upon the contrary, the accusation was strictly limited to acts done "upon the bench of the said court" while "administering justice in a state of total intoxication." There was no attempt in Pickering's case to claim that personal misconduct, which might have been the ground of removal by address, was an impeachable offense.

The articles of impeachment presented against Judge Samuel Chase contain equally pointed illustrations. In Article I he is charged with delivering an opinion in writing on the question of law, on the construction of which the defense of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the said John Fries, the prisoner, before the counsel had been heard in his defense; in Article II the charge is that "the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Bassett, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on said trial;" in Article III the charge is that on the trial the judge refused to permit a witness to testify; in Article IV the charge is of various acts of judicial misconduct during a trial; and in the remaining articles the charges are of various acts of judicial misconduct on the bench in charging and refusing to discharge grand juries.

The accusation against Judge James H. Peck was contained in a single article, based upon the judicial conduct of the judge while sitting upon the bench in a case of contempt against Luke E. Lawless, who had published a newspaper article criticising a judgment rendered by Judge Peck in a case in which Lawless was plaintiff's counsel. The gravamen of the charge was this: "The said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, did afterwards, on the same day, under the color and pretenses aforesaid, and with intent aforesaid, in the said court, then and there unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily order and adjudge that the said Luke Edward Lawless, for the cause aforesaid, should be committed to prison for the period of twenty-four hours, and that he should be suspended from practicing as an attorney or counsellor at law in the said district court for the period of eighteen calendar months from that day; and did then and there further cause the said unjust and oppressive sentence to be carried into execution."

The impeachment of Judge West H. Humphreys was begun and concluded during the civil war. He was tried and condemned in his absence and without a hearing. While such an anomalous proceeding can have but little weight as a precedent, what it does contain of matter relevant to a judicial impeachment supports the contention made herein. The first charge contained in the articles presented against Judge Humphreys was that he was guilty of treason, in that he "then being district judge of the United States, as aforesaid, did then and there, to wit, within said State, unlawfully and in conjunction with other persons, organize armed rebellion against the United States and levy war against them." When the allegations incident to the accusation of treason are subtracted from the articles, all that remains is a charge of judicial misconduct upon the part of Judge Humphreys while sitting in a court of the Confederate States.

The words of the accusation are that the said Humphreys "did unlawfully act as judge of an illegally constituted tribunal within said State, called the district court of the Confederate States of America, and as judge of said tribunal last named, said West H. Humphreys, with the intent aforesaid, then and there assumed and exercised powers unlawful and unjust, to wit, in causing one Perez Dickinson, a citizen of said State, to be unlawfully arrested and brought before him, as judge of said alleged court of said Confederate States of America, and required him to swear allegiance to the pretended government of said Confederate States of America; * * * In decreeing within said State, and as judge of said illegal tribunal, the confiscation to the use of said Confederate States of America of property of citizens of the United States, and especially of property of one Andrew Johnson and one John Catron." Thus in this anomalous proceeding, carried on amid the passions of a great civil war, the idea was not for one moment lost sight of that the misconduct upon the part of a judge, which constitutes an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor, must occur while he is actually presiding in a judicial tribunal and abusing its powers.

2018. Review of the deliberation of the Constitutional Convention as bearing on the use of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors."—On February 22, 1905,<sup>23</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief which was signed by them as counsel but which as they said had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them.

After reviewing the accepted meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," as used in England and the colonies, the argument proceeds:

Before the Federal Convention of 1787 met the original State constitutions had been in operation for at least ten years. As a general rule the framers looked to that source of light when the adoption of a principle of English constitutional law was concerned.

The questions that constantly arose were: In what form has such a principle reappeared in the several States? Is its operation an effect satisfactory therein? Such examples were sometimes taken, however, not as guides but as warnings. It did not always follow that a principle adapted to the wants of a single State was to be ingrafted without modification upon the constitution of a Federal State. The debates touching the adoption of impeachment and address pointedly illustrate that fact, as the Convention resolved to adopt the one without the other. The record is specially clear and direct upon that point. In the Madison papers (pp. 481-482) the following appears:

"Article XI being taken up, Doctor Johnson suggested that the judicial power ought to extend to equity as well as law, and moved to insert the words 'both in law and equity' after the words 'United States' in the first line of the first section."

Mr. Read objected to vesting these powers in the same court.

On the question, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, aye—6; Delaware, Maryland, no—2; Massachusetts, New Jersey, North Carolina, absent.

On the question to agree to Article XI, section 1, as amended, the States were the same as on the preceding question.

Mr. Dickinson moved, as an amendment to Article XI, section 2, after the words "good behavior," the words "Provided that they may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives." (The words of the act of settlement are, "but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them.") Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction, in terms, to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior, and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

Mr. Sherman saw no contradiction or impropriety if this were made a part of the constitutional legislation of the judiciary establishment. He observed that a like provision was contained in the British statutes.

Mr. RUTLEDGE. If the Supreme Court is to judge between the United States and particular States, this alone is an insuperable objection to the motion.

Mr. Wilson considers such a provision in the British Government as less dangerous than here; the House of Lords and House of Commons being less likely to concur on the same occasions. Chief Justice Holt, he remarked, had successively offended, by his independent conduct, both House of Parliament. Had this happened at the same time, he would have been ousted. The judges would be in a bad situation if made to depend on any gust of faction which might prevail in the two branches of our Government. Mr. Randolph opposed the motion as weakening too much the independence of the judges.

Mr. Dickinson was not apprehensive that the legislature, composed of different branches, constructed on such different principles, would improperly unite for the purpose of displacing a judge.

On the question for agreeing to Mr. Dickinson's motion, it was negatived.

Connecticut, aye; all the other States present, no.

Thus the proposition to ingraft upon our Federal Constitution that provision of the act of settlement, specially referred to in the debate by Mr. Sherman, was rejected with only one dissenting voice. When, at another time, Mr. Dickinson attempted to provide that the President should be removed by address, his proposal was rejected by the same majority. As Mr. William Lawrence (Impeachment of Andrew Johnson, Vol. I, p. 135) has stated it: "Removal on the address of both Houses of Parliament is provided for in the act of settlement (3 Hallam, 262). In the convention which framed our Constitution, June 2, 1787, Mr. John Dickinson, of Delaware, moved 'that the Executive be made removable by the National Legislature on the request of a majority of the legislatures of individual States.' Delaware alone voted for this and it was rejected. Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper case for removal." The last sentence states the essence of the whole matter. The Convention resolved that neither the executive nor judicial officers of the United States should be removed from office except "on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

As a well-known authority has expressed it: "The first proposition was to use the words, 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out. It was voted that the clause should be simply 'removable on impeachment.' The debate shows that the Members did not wish the Senate to be able to remove a civil officer whenever he acted in a way detrimental to the public service, for such a power was expressly refused. (Citing Madison Papers, p. 481, heretofore quoted.) A general debate took place on a clause in one draft which made the President triable only for treason and bribery. It was urged that the jurisdiction was too limited. The following are extracts from the debate which ensued: Colonel Mason said: 'Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined.' He moved to insert after 'bribery' the words 'or maladministration.' Madison: 'So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate.' Mason withdrew 'maladministration' and substituted 'other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State.' In the final draft the words 'against the State' were omitted, doubtless as surplusage, and the expressions finally adopted, 'crimes' and 'misdemeanors,' were words which had a well-defined signification in the courts of England and in her colonies as meaning criminal offenses at common (parliamentary) law." (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 804, article on "Impeachable offenses under the Constitution of the United States.") The term "common" instead of "parliamentary" law is carelessly used in that excellent statement, as it often is elsewhere. After quoting Rawle on Constitution (200, Lawrence (Johnson's Imp., Vol. I, p. 125)) remarks: "This author says in reference to impeachments, 'we must have recourse to the common law of England for the definition of them;' that is, to the common parliamentary law. (3 Wheaton, 610; 1 Wood and Minot, 448.)"

2019. Abandonment of the theory that impeachment may be only for indictable offenses.

Discussion of the theory that an impeachable offense is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest.

On February 22, 1905,<sup>53</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support to their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven of the articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them :

When sitting as a high court of impeachment the Senate is the sole and final judge of the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors." It has been well said that "'Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors' are of course impeachable. Treason and bribery are specifically named. But 'other high crimes and misdemeanors' are just as fully comprehended as though each was specified. The Senate is made the sole judge of what they are. There is no revising court. The Senate determines in the light of parliamentary law. Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge." (Lawrence, Johnson's Imp., Vol. I, p. 136.) And yet the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has in no one of the seven cases tried before it ever attempted to define the momentous phrase in question, and probably never will. When a new case arises nothing can be learned except what may be gleaned from the individual utterances of Senators, and from the arguments of counsel made in preceding cases, too often under the temptation to bend the precedents to the necessities of the particular occasion. One good result has, however, been the outcome of such discussions, and that is the elimination of two propositions which have perished through their own inherent weakness. One the one hand, a grotesque attempt has been made to narrow unreasonably the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by the claim that the power of impeachment is limited to offenses positively defined by the statutes of the United States as impeachable crimes and misdemeanors.

Apart from its other infirmities, this contention loses sight of the fact that Congress has no power whatever to define a high crime and misdemeanor. On the other hand, an equally untenable attempt has been made to widen unreasonably the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by the claim that, under the general principles of right, it can declare that an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or, without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers for improper motives or for an improper purpose. This expansive and nebulous definition embodies an attempt to clothe the Senate sitting as a court with such a jurisdiction as it would have possessed had the Federal Convention seen fit to extend impeachment "to malpractice and neglect of duty," or to "maladministration," a proposition rejected with a single dissent because, as Madison expressed it, "So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate."

Even that school which gives the widest possible interpretation to the Federal Constitution will hardly be willing to go so far, even under the general-welfare clause, as to write into the Constitution phrases and meanings which the framers expressly rejected, in order to accomplish what may be considered by some a convenient end. Certainly that school which still respects the canons of strict construction can not listen to such an argument. Between the two extremes, those who have made a careful study of the subject find no difficulty in reaching the obvious conclusion that the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" embraces simply those offenses impeachable under the parliamentary law of England in 1787, subject to such modifications as that law suffered in the process of reproduction. When the objection is made that the phrase thus construed covers too narrow an area, the answer is that it was the expressly declared purpose of the framers so to restrict it within narrow limits perfectly understood at the time. In the first place, the proposition to adopt removal by address was rejected with only one dissent; in the second, the proposal to adopt such a comprehensive term as "maladministration" was rejected and the limited phrase in question substituted. The declaration was clearly made at the time that there must be no undue weakening of the independence of the Federal judiciary. The necessity for such a precaution was soon justified by events.

A leading authority upon the subject tells us that upon the destruction of the Federalist party on the election of Jefferson "An assault upon the judiciary, State and Federal, was made all along the lines. In some States, as New Hampshire, old courts were abolished and new ones, with similar jurisdiction, created for the sole purpose of obtaining new judges. In Pennsylvania an obnoxious Federal judge was removed from the common pleas by impeachment; and an impeachment of all the Federal judges of the highest court was made, but failed through the uprising of the entire bar, irrespective of party lines, in defense of their official chiefs. A similar attack was made upon the Federal judiciary." (Foster on the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 531.) With the possibility of such an assault impending it is not strange that the makers of our Federal Constitution should have confined the power of removing judges by impeachment within the well-known limits which the English constitution had defined.

2020. Mr. Manager Olmsted's argument that impeachment is not restricted to offenses indictable under Federal law and that judges may be impeached for breaches of "good behavior."

Discussion of English and American precedents as bearing on the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors."

On February 23, 1905,<sup>54</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, in final argument, said:

Although it would seem that the question must now be considered settled, nevertheless in nearly every impeachment trial the question is raised as to the character of and offenses for which impeachment will lie. In times past men of great learning and authority have contended that no officer can be impeached except for indictable offenses, and that as there are no common-law offenses against the United States, it follows that there can be no impeachment except for an offense expressly declared and made indictable by act of Congress. This view of the matter fades away in the bright light of reason and of precedent.

Such a construction would render the constitutional provision practically a nullity. Congress has defined and made indictable by statute comparatively few offenses. It would be impossible in any statute to define or describe all the various ways in which a judge or other civil officer might so notably and conspicuously misbehave himself as to justify and require his removal. Even murder is not defined in any act of Congress. When it so appears, reference to some other source must be had to ascertain the meaning of the term. Murder is not made indictable by any act of Congress, nor has any Federal court jurisdiction of that crime unless committed upon the high seas.

Suppose a judge to commit murder upon the dry land within the confines of a State. That would not be a high crime or misdemeanor within the provision of any act of Congress. Could it successfully be maintained that it was not a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning of Article II, section 4, of the Constitution, or that it was not such a breach of good behavior as would justify removal from office? If that be the proper construction, then it is possible to imagine that as the respondent transacted official business at and dated his communications from "United States district court, northern district of Florida, judge's chambers, Guyencourt, Del.," so a more violent and vicious man might conduct business at "Judge's chambers, State penitentiary," and still be free from all danger of impeachment or removal from the judicial office.

I have shown, Mr. President, that men have formerly argued that only indictable offenses are subjects for impeachment; that as there were no common-law offenses against the United States there can be no impeachment except for crimes declared and defined by act of Congress. But now, in the 48-page brief served upon us last evening, bearing the names of the honorable counsel for respondent, but the authorship of which they distinctly disavowed—and I now know the reason why—we find the astounding doctrine that no can can be impeached for any offense declared by Congress. Therefore no officer can be impeached. no matter what he does, unless we can find that in England some judge had been impeached for the same specific offense prior to the adoption of our Constitution, which borrowed something from the other country in this matter.

Now, we admit, Mr. President, that the term "impeachment" is imported from the English law, and so is the constitutional phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" used in relation thereto. They are both without definition, either in the Constitution or in any act of Congress. Where, then, shall their definition and construction be found? Our Supreme Court has declared that—

"Where English statutes—such, for instance, as the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations—have been adopted into our legislation, the known and settled construction of those statutes by courts of law has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts or has been received with all the weight of authority." (Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Peters, 2-18.)

That was an unanimous decision in which Chief Justice John Marshall participated and concurred, and the opinion was written by Mr. Justice Story.

To the same effect is the case of United States v. Jones (3 Wash. C. C. R., 209), and many other authorities that might be cited.

We may therefore look to the law of England for the meaning of the term "impeachment" and of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as used in connection therewith—not so much to the statute law, nor to the common law, as generally understood, but to the common parliamentary law of England, as found in the precedents and reports of impeachment cases.

The Senate has always been governed in impeachment cases by the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. It requires but a brief investigation to show that according to the English parliamentary practice in vogue at and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the greatest possible variety of offenses, not indictable, were nevertheless held proper causes for impeachment.

In II Wooddean's Law Lectures, an acknowledged authority, the learned author, in his lecture upon "Parliamentary Impeachment," says (p. 596) :

"It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice, and they can not consistently, either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue elsewhere but to those who share with them in the legislature.

"On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the constitution assumed its present form."

And again (p. 601) :

"Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust, are most proper, and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery, or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office; if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions; if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to betray his trust, a privy counselor to propound or support pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments, these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments, because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses or to investigate and reform the general polity of the state."

In several cases English judges were impeached for giving extrajudicial opinions and misinterpreting the law. (4 Hatsell, 76.)

Such is the undoubted parliamentary law of England, from which our process and practice of impeachment and the very term itself are derived. That it has been adopted and followed here is equally certain.

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution (pp. 260-261), says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. * * * Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime, but a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law is committed, as where the individual has from immorality, imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

And Judge Story says, in section 799 of his work on the Constitution:

"Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct. * * * In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanor." (1 Story on Con., sec. 799).

Such writers as Cooley and Wharton and Rawle maintain the same position and support is not only by reason, but by authority and precedent. For a very able discussion of this subject I refer to the brief of Mr. Lawrence, adopted by the managers and published among the proceedings in the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and also in 6 American Law Register, new series, page 641.

Every impeachment case ever presented to the United States Senate has been founded upon articles, some or all of which charged offenses not indictable; and Judge West, of Tennessee, as well as Judge Pickering, was convicted and removed for offense not subject to indictment under either State or Federal laws.

We agree with respondent's brief, the authorship of which his counsel disavow, that the general character of offenses impeachable may be studied to advantage by a consideration of the English precedent, but I can never agree that in order to convict an American judge we must first show that some English judge has been convicted of the same specific offense.

No English judge has been impeached for murder, or perjury, or forgery, or larceny; and yet they were undoubtedly impeachable offenses in English as they are here to-day. They, or any of them, would certainly constitute a breach of that "good behavior" during which Federal judges hold their commissions. Surely an offense which would have been impeachable without a statute is none the less so because Congress has declared it a misdemeanor. Taking money out of the Treasury on a false certificate would have been impeachable in England before our Constitution. It is none the less so here, statute or no statute.

JURISDICTION OF FIRST SEVEN ARTICLES

Respondent denies that the offenses charged in the first seven articles are proper subjects of impeachment on the ground, as we understand it, that they were committed by him in his private and not in his official capacity; or, in other words, that the articles do not charge misbehaviors or misdemeanors in office. We labor under the impression that the respondent is "in office," and that any misdemeanor committed by him, either in his private or official capacity, since he accepted the President's commission was a misdemeanor "in office." He may have been out of his court room and out of his district, but he has never been out of office.

The Constitution and his commission each defines his terms as "during good behavior," and provides for his removal from office for "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," meaning thereby misbehavior, for misbehavior is misdemeanor, and misdemeanor is misbehavior. There is no limitation to offenses actually committed upon the bench, nor to those committed while in the performance of any judicial or official function, or in any way under color of office.

The Century Dictionary gives this definition:

"During good behavior: As long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties or the conduct of one's life; as, an office held during good behavior."

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution (pp. 260-261), says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. * * * Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime, but a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law is committed, as where the individual has from immorality, imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

Such is manifestly the intention of the Constitution. That instrument says "during good behavior." It does not, as some of the State constitutions do, add the words "in office." It says "high crimes and misdemeanors," but it does not add "in office." In the brief of respondent's honorable counsel the authorship of which they disavow, they tell us, and it is entirely true, that at one stage of its formation the provision read "misdemeanors against the State." But as the words "against the State" were stricken out they argue that it must be construed as if they had been left in.

JUDGE HUMPHREY'S CASE

Mr. President, there are plenty of authorities, both English and American, that in order to be the subject of impeachment it is not necessary that an offense shall be committed even under color of office, and just here I take issue in the most emphatic manner with the statements of that 48-page brief as to the causes for which convictions have been had in impeachment. It is full of historical inaccuracies. It declares, for instance, that Judge West H. Humphreys, of Tennessee, was convicted only for offenses committed in his judicial capacity.

I say that he was convicted upon each one of the seven articles, only one of which—the fifth—had any relation at all to his duties as a Federal judge. The very first article charged him with advocating secession. Where? Upon the bench? No. In the court room? No. In a written opinion? No; but in a public speech in the city of Nashville. Five other of those counts were of the same character. How could a judge commit that offense upon the bench? He did not speak as a judge, but as a citizen at a public meeting.

Mr. President, Andrew Johnson came within one vote of being impeached upon the eleventh article in his case, a portion of which I will read:

"That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office, and of his oath of office, and in disregard of the Constitution and laws of the United States, did, heretofore, to wit, on the 18th day of August, A.D. 1866, at the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, by public speech, declare and affirm, in substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States."

Upon that article the vote against him was 35 to 19. A change of one vote would have expelled him from the Presidency.

Treason, removal for which is made compulsory, is specifically defined by the Constitution in these words:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only of levying war against them or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

It would hardly be possible for a judge, sitting upon the bench, or in any other way except entirely aside from any function of his office, to be guilty of this offense. But suppose that, disassociating himself as far as possible from his judicial position, he should in his individual capacity participate in "levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

That would surely be treason, as constitutionally defined, and yet, upon the argument of the honorable counsel for respondent, he could not be impeached and removed from office for that offense. Think of that. A traitor to his country, sitting securely upon the bench, secure from removal by any power on earth, for in no way can he be removed except by the Senate, upon impeachment by the House of Representatives. A Federal judge, upon that reasoning might commit murder upon the public highway, or be convicted of housebreaking, or forgery, or perjury, or in any other way bring into contempt his high office, and yet we are told that if the offense be not committed upon the bench, nor in the court room, nor in any way relating to his judicial duties, he can not be impeached and removed.

It is hardly necessary to prolong this branch of the discussion, in view of the fact that the question has already been determined by the Senate itself.

BLOUNT'S CASE

In 1797 William Blount was expelled from the Senate for attempting to seduce a United States Indian Interpreter from his duty and to alienate the affections and conduct of the Indians from the public officers residing among them. That was not a statutory offense, nor committed in the Senate Chamber, nor in the exercise or omission of any Senatorial function, nor under color of office; but the Senate, nevertheless, resolved that he "having been guilty of a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he is hereby, expelled from the United States Senate."

That was not upon an impeachment proceeding, but the principle involved was precisely the same, and later it was sustained in the impeachment case of Judge Humphreys, as I have shown.

THE ARTICLES DO CHARGE OFFENSES HAVING STRICT RELATION TO HIS OFFICIAL OFFICE.

It is difficult in any event to see any force in respondent's plea to the jurisdiction. The offenses charged in the first seven as well as in all other articles do relate entirely to his judicial office and not to his private conduct.

2021. Argument of Mr. Manager De Armond that Congress may make nonresidence of a judge a high misdemeanor.

Argument that a judge may be impeached for misbehavior generally.

On February 25, 1905,<sup>55</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, in final argument, said:

Thirty years before Judge Swayne was born the Congress of the United States enacted a law, now embodied in section 551, Revised Statutes, requiring a district judge to reside in his district. The question of the enactment of such a law arose years earlier. The discussion was participated in by makers of the Constitution as well as by contemporaries of those illustrious men. In the body which passed the law were those who had gathered in the spirit of the Constitution, not merely from the lips of those who had made it, but through participation in the making of it. The law was passed in the full belief, unchallenged by anybody, that the power rested in the Congress to pass such a law, and it was declared that a violation or disregard of that law should constitute a high misdemeanor, employing the very language of the Constitution itself.

And yet we find, thanks to the facile pen of some modern essayist whose product is embodied in the record in this case, some unknown great man, that it is impossible for Congress to add to or take from the category of "high crimes and misdemeanors" as embodied in the Constitution in the clause relating to impeachments.

Those who lived in that early day, those who participated in the discussions that led up to that early legislation, and those who enacted that law did not think just as this modern writer and essayist does think. This graceful writer, but, as he has demonstrated, evidently poor lawyer, confess that he can not define, and he says nobody can define, just what was meant by "high crimes and misdemeanors;" but he insists that there was such a fixed, settled, immovable, unchangeable, ever-enduring meaning and limitation attached to and embodied in it that nothing can be added to it or taken from it; and yet he does not know what it is; he does not tell us, and he says nobody else can tell, what it is.

The doctrine, aside from this authority which the respondent's counsel quoted with so much approval and indorsed so fully, the doctrine of other essayists and other commentators upon the Constitution, the doctrine of men whose names have gone into our history as illustrating in its best phases and as demonstrating the greatest capacity and the highest achievements of the human mind, was and is that Congress could add to what might be embraced in the term, and that the Senate of the United States, on the trial of an impeachment, was made by the Constitution itself, and ever must be, the final authorized judge of the meaning.

Suppose that this Republic were to endure, as all of us most sincerely hope it will, for centuries and multiplied centuries, and suppose that a thousand years hence, or five thousand years hence, after agencies and forces undreamed of to-day, as those playing important parts in the drama of to-day were undreamed of a short time ago, were brought into requisition, and out of their use and development new and strange conditions, unthought of and unthinkable to-day, should arise, and that the Congress, in its enlightened wisdom, should conclude to declare this, that, or the other thing arising out of the development of these new conditions high crimes and misdemeanors. These wise commentators of the school of this essayist and their successors, if they are to have succession in a more enlightened age of the world and of the country, would say: "You can not impeach for that. You must go back into the English parliamentary law for the chart of your powers. At the adoption of the Constitution you were confined within the Englishman's definition of high crimes and misdemeanors, and confined to his category of them; but what his definition was or is and what was or is embraced within his catalogue we do not know, and nobody knows.

Those who framed the Constitution meant to deny and did deny to the Congress all power whatsoever to declare anything a high crime or misdemeanor which was not such when the Constitution was made."

Then if you or your successors should modestly say to these gentlemen, "Pray tell us, then, what are the things for which an impeachment will lie? What is comprehended within the term 'high crimes and misdemeanors?' What, within the meaning of the Constitution, made by those short-sighted men, so long, long ago in their graves, is embodied in these words?" They would answer then, I suppose, as this wise commentator of to-day answers, "I do not know; nobody ever has said, and nobody will ever be able to say."

Drifting back to English history, counsel claim to have discovered—and it is a discovery of something which does not exist, I think; but I pass that by—that no judge in English history ever was impeached or tried on impeachment except for an offense committed in the actual discharge of the duties of a judge, sitting on the bench itself. Well now, if that were true, what does it prove? It proves nothing—absolutely nothing.

Reflect upon it for a moment. Suppose all these trials had been with reference to some particular offense. It would be just as logical to contend that for no other offense committed upon the bench in the discharge of judicial duty would impeachment lie. How many cases must there be before this is settled? They say there have been but few, and that is true. How many are necessary to fix it that there can not be a trial by impeachment for any other offense? There again they can not answer.

The truth of the matter is that this question of impeachment and the right and power to impeach, and the things for which people could be impeached in Great Britain, shifted and changed with the shifting and changing judgment and legislation of the times. At one time it was supposed to be legitimate and proper, and the supposed power was exercised, to impeach and convict and remove from office and imprison for the advocacy of religious views and the propagation of religious doctrines which, at another time, were held to be the correct views and the sound doctrines relating to the subject of religion in that great realm. So it has been and so it is and so it will be.

These gentlemen ignore entirely the question as to good conduct—"during good behavior." They say that the provision for removing judges by address is not embodied in the Constitution. What do they say then? They say there is no way of removing them except in a few cases to which, they say, the constitutional provision respecting impeachment implies.

As was said by Mr. Morris, when that matter was under discussion in the Constitutional Convention, the judges ought not to be removed on the ground of lacking in good behavior except upon a trial. What trial is provided? The kind of trial you have here now. The trial before the Senate of the United States, on impeachment by the House of Representatives. There has been embodied in that one method all the power that resides in the Government in all its branches—all the power of the people of this vast country, this great and mighty Republic—to remove from office an offending civil officer. And precisely the same provision that applies to the judges applies to all other civil officers.

The gentlemen discriminate respecting the judges. Where do they get the ground for the discrimination? It is not in the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution suggesting that a judge can be removed from office only for offending on the bench, and that as to other civil officers they may be removed for offenses off duty, or not so narrowly official.

The learned counsel for the respondents who closed the case on the other side seemed to take lightly the suggestion of Mr. Manager Palmer in the brief which he filed, and of my other colleagues who argued this case, that according to the commentators upon the Constitution, according to the spirit of the Constitution, according to the just principles of law governing impeachment, it is within the power of the House of Representatives to vote impeachment, and it is within the just and constitutional powers of the Senate to convict, for conduct in a judge off the bench and away even from his judicial transactions. The logical conclusion from the contention of respondents' counsel is that no matter how vile any civil officer of the Government may be, no matter how great the sum total of the individual items of his offending, so long as the offending is not on the bench or in the active technical conduct of his office the whole power of the Government is too weak, the arm of the House of Representatives too short, and the judgment of the Senate too puny to reach the offender and protect the public from the vile contamination of his continued presence in office. We do not take that view of the matter.

2022. Opinion of Attorney-General Felix Grundy that Territorial judges are not civil officers of the United States within the meaning of the impeachment clause of the Constitution.—On February 4, 1839,<sup>60</sup> as pertinent to the consideration of a pending bill to amend the law establishing the Territorial government of Wisconsin, Mr. Isaac H. Bronson, of New York, chairman of the Committee on Territories, presented to the House a letter of the Attorney-General of the United States, Hon. Felix Grundy, giving an opinion on the subject of the removal of Territorial judges by impeachment:

The provision of the Constitution which relates most directly to this subject is contained in the first section of the third article, which declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

The construction of this part of the Constitution has been settled, it seems to me, by the opinion of Congress, expressed by various acts, and also by the Supreme Court of the United States.

By the article of the Constitution referred to the judges are to hold their offices during good behavior. Congress can not consistently with this provision provide any other or different tenure of office within the States.

Congress has in most cases limited the tenure of office of Territorial judges to four years. This could not be done were they judges under or provided for by the Constitution, because by that instrument the tenure is during good behavior. It should be noticed that Congress has imposed this limitation of four years, not in a single instance only, but in many. It has been imposed in the Territories embraced within the limits of the original States, where the Territory has been ceded to the General Government, and Territorial governments have been created therein. It has also been done in the Territories purchased by the United States from foreign nations. I think these acts clearly prove the sense of Congress to be that Territorial judges are not judges under the Constitution, but are mere creatures of legislation.

I have said that the Supreme Court of the United States have also decided upon this point. In the case of the American Insurance Company and others v. Canter, reported in first Peters, the court very distinctly recognized the opinion above expressed, and convey their views in the following strong language: "These courts (meaning Territorial courts), then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be deposited; they are incapable of receiving it; they are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general rights of sovereignty."

The only remaining inquiry is as to the liability of Territorial judges to impeachment under the Constitution. The fourth section of the second article of the Constitution is in these words: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

If the construction of the Constitution be correct, as I suppose it is, that these judges are not constitutional but legislative judges, I can see nothing in the Constitution which would warrant their being embraced by the expression, "and all civil officers of the United States." They are not civil officers of the United States in the constitutional meaning of the phrase. They are merely Territorial officers, and therefore, in my opinion, not subject to impeachment and trial before the Senate of the United States.

2023. Reference to a summary of provisions of State constitutions relating to impeachment and removal by address.—On February 22, 1905,<sup>57</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. John M. Thurston and Anthony Higgins, of counsel for respondent, filed as part of an argument on a plea as to jurisdiction a summary of provisions in the constitutions of the various States at various periods of their existence. It appears in full in the Congressional Record of that date.

2024. The question of reimbursement of respondent for his expenses in an impeachment trial.—On February 23, 1905,<sup>58</sup> in the Senate, the President pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the counsel of Judge Charles Swayne; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the President pro tempore of the United States Senate:

The undersigned have the honor to request that, inasmuch as Judge Charles Swayne has been declared not guilty by the Senate of the impeachment charges preferred against him by the House of Representatives, an allowance may be made as a part of the expenses of the Senate in connection with the impeachment which shall enable him to defray the expenses of his counsel and the other expenses incurred by him in making his defense.

The undersigned will submit a statement of such expenses whenever requested to do so by the Senate.

2025. The sole power of impeachment is conferred on the House of Representatives by the Constitution.—The Constitution, in Article I, section 2, provides:

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

2026. Under the parliamentary law of impeachment the Commons, as grand inquest of the nation and as accusers, become suitors for penal justice at the bar of the Lords.

The Commons, in impeaching, usually pass a resolution containing a criminal charge against the accused and direct a Member to impeach him by oral accusation before the Lords.

The person impeaching on behalf of the Commons signifies that articles will be exhibited.

In impeaching, the spokesman of the Commons asks that the delinquent be sequestered from his seat, or committed, or that the Peers take order for his appearance.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachment:

<sup>3</sup> House did not attend in Blount's case (sec. 2318) and in the Peck trial only in the preliminary proceedings (sec. 2373). Attended in Committee of Whole in Chase trial (sec. 2350, 2354) and also in Johnson trial (sec. 2420, 2427, 2435). Also see section 2392 for Humphrey's trial, sections 2449, 2467 for Belknap's, and section 2483 for Swayne's.

<sup>4</sup> See also other sections relating to the managers: Choice on appointment of. Sections 2300, 2306, 2323, 2345, 2350, 2368, 2388, 2417, 2448, 2475. Held not to be a committee. Section 2420. Sometimes endowed with power to compel testimony and even make investigations. Sections 1685, 2419, 2423. Conduct and privileges of, during a trial. Sections 2144-2154. Announced on entering Senate Chamber to attend trial. Section 2427. Required to rise and address the Chair before speaking. Section 2146. As to making of motions by. Sections 2136, 2144, 2147, 2189. Rule as to questions and colloquia. Section 2154. May object to witnesses answering questions asked by Senators. Sections 2182-2186. May argue on questions put on propositions offered by Senators. Sections 2148, 2188. May not move to amend a proposition offered by a Senator. Section 2147. The claim that they should have the closing of all arguments. Section 2136. They protest against delays during the trial of the President. Section 2150. Are admonished not to delay. Section 2151. Decline in the Pickering case to discuss a matter from a third party. Section 2334. As to reports in relation to trial. Sections 2338, 2423, 2468.

Accusation. The Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice. (2 Wood., 597; 6 Grey, 356.) The general course is to pass a resolution containing a criminal charge against the supposed delinquent, and then to direct some member to impeach him by oral accusation at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of the Commons. The person signifies that the articles will be exhibited, and desires that the delinquent may be sequestered from his seat, or be committed, or that the Peers will take order for his appearance. (Sachev. Trial, 325; 2 Wood., 602, 605; Lords' Journ., 3 June, 1701; 1 Wms., 616; 6 Grey, 324.)

2027. The Commons attend generally in impeachment trials, but not when the Lords consider the answer on proofs or determine judgment.

The Commons attend impeachment trials in committee of the whole, or otherwise, at discretion, and appoint managers to conduct proof.

The presence of the Commons is considered necessary at the answer and the judgment in impeachment cases.

Method of taking the vote in judgment in English impeachment trials.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual, the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Presence of Commons. The Commons are to be present at the examination of witnesses. (Seld. Jud., 124.) Indeed, they are to attend throughout, either as a committee of the whole House, or otherwise, at discretion, appoint managers to conduct the proofs. (Rushw. Tr. of Straff., 37; Com. Journ., 4 Feb., 1709-10; 2 Wood., 614.) And judgment is not to be given till they demand it. (Seld. Jud., 124.) But they are not to be present on impeachment when the Lords consider of the answer or proofs and determine of their judgment. Their presence, however, is necessary at the answer and judgment in cases capital (id., 58, 158) as well as not capital. (Id., 162.) The Lords debate the judgment among themselves. Then the vote is first taken on the question of guilty or not guilty; and if they convict, the question or particular sentence is out of that which seemeth to be most generally agreed on. (Seld. Jud., 167; 2 Wood., 612.)

2028. In 1830, during the impeachment trial of Judge Peck, the House reconsidered its decision to attend the trial daily.

Instance of the reconsideration of an order which had been partly executed.

On December 23, 1830,<sup>5</sup> this resolution was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That, during the trial of the impeachment now pending before the Senate, this House will meet daily at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that from day to day it will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and attend said trial during the continuance thereof and until the conclusion of the same.

On the same day the House attended the trial in accordance with the order, and continued to do so as long as it remained in effect.

On December 24,<sup>6</sup> Mr. Kensey Johns, jr., of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to, and the consideration of this motion was postponed to December 27.

On December 27,<sup>7</sup> after consideration, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

On January 3, 1831,<sup>9</sup> Mr. Johns moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider,<sup>9</sup> and Mr. Johns's motion was agreed to, yeas 117, nays 58.

A motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was disagreed to, yeas 55, nays 111.

And the question being put, "Will the House reconsider the same vote?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurring on agreeing to the original resolution of December 23, after debate, on January 4<sup>10</sup> the question was put "that the House do, on reconsideration, agree to pass the same," and it was decided in the negative, yeas 69, nays 118.

The House up to this time had daily attended the impeachment trial. Thereafter it ceased to do so until a new order was adopted.

2029. The House sometimes continues an investigation begun in a preceding Congress with view to an impeachment, making use of the former report and the testimony already taken.

The House may empower a subcommittee to send for persons and papers and conduct an investigation.

On January 30, 1892,<sup>11</sup> Mr. William C. Oate, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to :

Whereas, Aleck Boorman, judge of the United States district court for the western district of the State of Louisiana, was charged in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress with high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by him as a judge; and

Whereas, the Committee on the Judiciary, under the authority of said House, investigated the alleged official misconduct in office of the said judge and took a considerable volume of testimony thereon both against said judge and for him, he being present in person or by his counsel whenever and wherever the said testimony was taken; and

Whereas, upon due consideration thereof the said committee reported a resolution to the said House of Representatives declaring that Judge Boorman should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and accompanying the said resolution was the evidence upon which the same was based, which was duly printed under the direction of said committee and by order of the House; and

Whereas, the said resolution never came to a vote, and hence never was adopted by said House for the lack of time to duly consider the same; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said report, charges, and evidence be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to thoroughly investigate the same and to report to the House the findings and recommendations in regard thereto at any time.

And for the purpose of making the investigation hereby ordered the said Committee on the Judiciary may adopt and use as legal evidence the testimony taken as aforesaid during the Fifty-first Congress in the case of Judge Boorman, and may take and consider any additional and explanatory evidence of a legal character which may be offered either for or against the said judge; and in respect to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary; to send a subcommittee whenever and wherever deemed necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee, and the said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect

<sup>10</sup> Under the present practice of the House a motion to lay on the table a motion to reconsider disposes of it finally. But in 1831 that practice was not established. About 1842 it was recognized that the tabling of a motion to reconsider was a final disposition of it.

to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary: that the Sergeant-at-Arms by himself or deputy shall serve the process of said committee and subcommittee and execute its orders and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby, and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

On June 1<sup>12</sup> the committee reported in favor of the impeachment of Judge Boardman.

2030. Instance wherein the Speaker presented a petition in which were preferred charges against a Federal judge.

A petitioner who preferred charges against a Federal judge, furnished the certificate of a notary to his signature. (Footnote.)

On June 25, 1906,<sup>13</sup> the Speaker under the rule presented a petition, as follows, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Petition of Francis C. Mahon, of New Orleans, La., preferring charges against Charles Parlance, district judge of the eastern district of the United States court of Louisiana.<sup>14</sup>

2031. When managers of an impeachment are elected by ballot, a majority is required for the choice of each.—On December 5, 1804,<sup>15</sup> the House having decided that seven managers should be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment of Judge Samuel Chase, the ballot was taken, and the following Members appeared to be duly elected by a majority of the votes of the whole House, as six of the said managers, to wit: Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Rodney, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Early, Mr. Boyle, and Mr. Nelson.

The House proceeded to a second ballot for another manager, when the ballots being examined it appeared that no Member had a majority of the votes of the whole House, but that the highest number of votes was given in favor of Mr. George Washington Campbell.

The Speaker<sup>16</sup> decided that it being provided by a standing rule and order of the House that in case of any second ballot of the House in which the number required to compose a committee should not be elected by a majority of the votes given on the second ballot, a plurality of votes shall prevail, and therefore that in his opinion the said George Washington Campbell was duly elected the seventh manager.

On an appeal this decision was reversed, and a further ballot being taken Mr. Campbell received a majority of votes and was elected.

The Annals show that the Speaker based his decision on the supposition that the rules of the House for choice of committees by ballot was applicable to the choice of managers.

But debate arising the concensus of opinion was that on former occasions a majority of votes had been given for each manager, although in the case of Judge Pickering this appeared rather from the recollection of gentlemen than from the Journals. The Speaker invited the appeal, which was taken by Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, with expressions of respect.

<sup>14</sup> This petition was signed by the petitioner, and as the signature was not certified in any way it was returned with the statement that it should be certified. It was then returned with the certificate and seal of a notary, and thereupon was presented by the Speaker.

2032. A Member appointed one of the managers of an impeachment may be excused by the House.—On January 25, 1805,<sup>17</sup> the House excused Mr. Roger Nelson, of Maryland, from serving as one of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Judge Samuel Chase.

2033. The House gives leave to its managers to examine Members as witnesses in an impeachment trial, and leave to its Members to attend for that purpose.—On April 28, 1876,<sup>18</sup> Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the managers have leave to examine any member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and any Member of the House whom they deem necessary as a witness on the trial of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, and that leave is hereby given to Members to attend the trial for that purpose if they see fit to do so.

2034. A resolution empowering managers of an impeachment to take the testimony of Members was presented as a question of privilege.—On April 28, 1876,<sup>19</sup> Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, presented as a question of privilege, and as required by the rule of parliamentary law, the following resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved, That the managers have leave to examine any member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and any Member of the House whom they deem necessary as a witness on the trial of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, and that leave is hereby given to Members to attend the trial for that purpose if they see fit to do so.

2035. The inability of a manager to attend a session of an impeachment trial is announced by his associates.

No question was made on an occasion during the Swayne trial when less than a quorum of the managers were in attendance.

On February 17, 1905,<sup>20</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Swayne, the managers attended, with the exception of Mr. Manager David H. Smith, of Kentucky.

Before proceedings began, Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, announced:

Mr. President, Mr. Manager Smith, of Kentucky, has requested me to say to the court that he is unable to attend to-day's session on account of sickness.

2036. On February 20, 1905,<sup>21</sup> the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence to-day of Managers Palmer, Powers, of Massachusetts; Perkins and Smith, of Kentucky. We shall proceed as best we may in their absence.

No question was made as to the fact that only three of the seven managers—less than a quorum—were in attendance.

2037. The House thanked its managers for their services in the Swayne impeachment trial.—On March 3, 1905,<sup>22</sup> Mr. Swager

Sherley, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, offered this resolution, which was agreed to by the House :

Resolved, That the thanks of the House be, and are hereby, extended to the managers on behalf of the House in the impeachment proceedings of Judge Charles Swaine before the Senate of the United States, to wit, Henry W. Palmer, Samuel L. Powers, Marlin E. Olmsted, James B. Perkins, David A. De Armond, Henry D. Clayton, and David H. Smith, for the able and efficient manner in which they discharged the onerous and responsible duties imposed upon them.

2038. Forms of subpoena and compulsory process issued by House committee to produce persons and papers for Blount impeachment.—In the proceedings for the impeachment of William Blount in 1797–8, the managers of the House of Representatives issued a subpoena in the following form: <sup>23</sup>

To John Rogers, resident in the Cherokee Nation:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States did, on the 8th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, resolve as follows, to wit :

The chairman of the managers also, in connection with the first process; issued instructions as follows:

To Capt. William Eaton.

SIR: You will proceed with the utmost expedition to New York, and, immediately on your arrival, see Mr. Harrison, or such other person as, in case of his absence, you are addressed to. Having advised with such person as to the proper mode of executing your commission, you will proceed, with such assistance as may be deemed necessary, to arrest the person expressed in your warrant, in the most secret manner, and to secure all his papers. Him and his papers you will then convey safely and expeditiously to this place.

When you see the person to be arrested, it will be proper to inform him that the committee is desirous of avoiding all unnecessary publicity, and that, by attending quietly with his papers, it may be prevented. You may let him understand at the same time that hesitation or resistance can have no other effect than to render the affair more disagreeable to him by making it public. On the road he will be treated by you as a fellow-passenger, but carefully attended to, and above all, the papers are to be most carefully guarded and kept in your own possession.

The same treatment may be observed toward any other person whom, with his papers, it may be resolved to arrest.

Whatever papers are seized you will immediately seal up in the presence of the person to whom they belong, if on the spot, or, if not, the presence of some other person, and will deliver them sealed to the committee.

It is scarcely necessary to add that the papers most likely to be important will be letters from William Blount, and copies of letters sent to him. Such must be diligently sought and carefully secured.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant.

2040. Form of discharge issued to a witness before the House committee which investigated the impeachment charges against William Blount.—In the proceedings for the impeachment of William Blount, in 1797–8, the managers of the House of Representatives issued a discharge to a witness in form as follows:<sup>25</sup>

These are to certify whom it may concern, that Dr. Nicholas Romaine, of the city of New York, having attended the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, charged with the impeachment of William Blount, in pursuance of the process by them issued for that purpose, and having undergone such examination, and answered such interrogatories as were required and exhibited by the said committee; and having further entered into bonds for his appearance before the Senate of the United States as a witness on a trial of the said impeachment, has been, and hereby is, discharged by the said committee from any further attendance upon them.

Form of subscription of witness to testimony and attestation thereof in examination preliminary to the Peck trial.—The Journal<sup>26</sup> of the Judiciary Committee, which in 1830 examined the charges against James H. Peck, judge of the United States court for the district of Missouri, shows that each witness subscribed to his testimony, which bore this further indorsement:

Sworn and subscribed before the Judiciary Committee on the — March, 1830.

The same form is found in later investigations.

The House may take official cognizance of a paper listened to by the Committee of the Whole in attendance on an impeachment trial.

On March 23, 1868,<sup>27</sup> the House was considering the proposed replication to the answer of President Johnson to the articles of impeachment presented against him in the Senate by the House. This answer had been transmitted to the House from the Senate by message.

Mr. John W. Chanler, of New York, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the answer of the President might be read.

The Speaker<sup>28</sup> said:

The Chair rules that the message from the Senate can be read, but the answer of the President can not be read upon the demand of any Member. * * * When the answer was read in the Senate, the House, in accordance with its own resolution, was in attendance there for the specific purpose of hearing the proceedings. It is therefore to be presumed that every Member of the House was present and heard the answer read.

Mr. Chanler having called attention to the fact that the House attended in Committee of the Whole, the Speaker said:

The Chair overrules the point made by the gentleman on the grounds that the House takes official cognizance of all proceedings in the Committee of the Whole as well as in the House; whether the Speaker or the chairman of the Committee of the Whole presides does not affect the question.

2043. During the Johnson trial the House considered matters pertinent thereto under suspension of the rules.—On March 16, 1868,<sup>29</sup> while proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson were going on, the House, by suspension of the rules, considered and agreed to the following:

Resolved, That except during the morning hour on Monday the rules may be suspended during the pendency of the impeachment of the President to proceed to the consideration of any matter which may be reported by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

2044. Instance wherein the managers consulted the House as to a proposition that an impeachment trial be postponed.

The House having taken no action when consulted as to postponement of an impeachment trial, the managers left the decision to the court.

Instance wherein the managers of an impeachment made a verbal report to the House on a matter arising during the trial.

On June 17, 1876,<sup>30</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, moved "that this cause be now continued until some convenient day in the month of November."

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

Mr. President and Senators, under circumstances which I need not now here detail, surrounding this case, the managers have concluded to ask leave on this motion to consult with the House. I will say now that whatever the conference with the House may result in and whatever the determination of the Senate may be we desire that the question of filing this paper shall be disposed of when there is a quorum; but on the question of postponement under all the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed and the case placed we desire leave to confer with the House.

The Senate evidently in order to permit this consultation at once adjourned.

On the same day <sup>21</sup> Mr. Manager Lord made a verbal report to the House of Representatives, and then, on behalf of the managers, proposed this resolution:

Whereas in the impeachment of William W. Belknap the defendant has moved for a continuance now on account of the lateness of the session, with the difficulty which will probably attend the retaining of a full organization of the court and the urgency of other business.

Resolved, That the managers be authorized to consent to a continuance until the — day of November next.

Considerable debate arose over this proposition, there being a manifest feeling that the Senate should assume the responsibility of the decision. Mr. Manager Lord, in response to an inquiry by Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, said that undoubtedly the Senate, like any other court, had the absolute right to postpone the trial without the assent of the managers for the House, and Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, thereupon urged that as they had that power they should exercise it.

Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, proposed the following substitute for the proposition of the managers:

Resolved, That upon the information communicated by the managers with reference to the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, the House of Representatives, with renewed assurances of confidence in the managers to whom the conduct of the trial has been committed, authorize them to act upon the subject of their communication as to them shall under all the circumstances of the case seem proper.

A motion for the previous question showed an equal division of the House, the Speaker pro tempore casting the deciding vote on a vote by tellers. A disposition to resort to dilatory proceedings being manifested the House dropped the matter and proceeded to other business.

On the next day, in the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Manager Lord said:

Mr. President, in regard to the application of the defendant to adjourn the trial to November next, the managers have reported to the House the proceedings in the court of impeachment on Saturday last; the House has taken no action in the premises, and the managers therefore leave the question of such postponement with the court.

The Senate denied the application for a postponement.

2045. A proposition to impeach a civil officer of the United States is presented as a question of constitutional privilege.—On January 10, 1843,<sup>22</sup> Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, as a privileged subject, submitted the following:

I do impeach John Tyler, Vice-President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

First. I charge him with gross usurpation of power and violation of law in attempting to exercise a controlling influence over the accounting officers of the Treasury Department by ordering the payment of accounts of long standing that had been rejected for want of legal authority to pay, etc.

[The arraignment continues at considerable length, there being nine charges in all.]

Mr. Horace Everett, of Vermont, submitted that the proposition of Mr. Botts did not take precedence on the ground of privilege, and therefore was not in order according to the routine of business as established by the rule.

The Speaker<sup>33</sup> decided that as by the Constitution it was a privilege of the House of Representatives to institute proceedings against the President, he considered that the present was a privileged proceeding and should take precedence of all other proceedings.

The record of debates gives the Speaker's explanation for his ruling. He said that since the present Speaker had been in the chair there had been no case of this kind before the House, and only two cases since the beginning of the Government. The first was that of Chief Justice Chase,<sup>34</sup> in which no question like the one now raised was presented. That case was then considered and acted upon by the House as a privileged question. Mr. Randolph rose in his seat, and, without any resolution or specific charges, after some remarks on the conduct of Judge Chase, moved for a committee to take into consideration the propriety of impeaching him. The matter went on day after day, and by the universal acquiescence of the House took preference of all other business as a privileged question. In addition to this the Chair considered this a high constitutional question, paramount to all others, without reference to the rules of the House.<sup>35</sup>

2046. On January 7, 1867,<sup>36</sup> Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and Acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law—

In that he has corruptly used the appointing power ;

In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power ;

In that he has corruptly used the veto power ;

In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States ;

In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any Department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oaths to witnesses.

Mr. William E. Finck, of Ohio, made a point of order, questioning whether the matter was privileged.

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Art. II, section 4.)

The Speaker<sup>37</sup> ruled that it was privileged, saying that in the Twenty-seventh Congress, by the then Speaker, it was decided, on the point raised by Horace Everett, of Vermont, that it was a question of privilege.<sup>38</sup>

2047. On December 2, 1884,<sup>39</sup> Mr. John F. Follett, of Ohio, submitted as a matter of privilege the following:

I do impeach Lot Wright, United States marshal of the southern district of Ohio, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with usurpation of power and violation of law—

In that he appointed a large number of general and special deputy marshals to serve at the several voting precincts in the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, at an election of Members of Congress held in said city on the 14th day of October, A.D. 1884, and armed said deputy marshals with pistols and other deadly weapons, said to have been furnished by the War Department of the United States Government, etc., * * * Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be required and directed, as soon as the same can reasonably be done, to investigate such charges and report to this House—

First. How many deputy marshals, general and special, were appointed and authorized by said United States marshal for the southern district of Ohio, etc. * * *

Resolved, That in making such investigation the said committee be empowered to appoint a subcommittee of three, consisting of the chairman of said committee and such other two members thereof as he may select, which subcommittee shall have full power to meet and hold its sessions at such times and places as may seem proper, to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of witnesses and to require them to testify, to employ a stenographer, and to incur any and all such necessary and reasonable expenditures as may be deemed requisite for the purposes of such investigation, such expenditures to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, made the point of order that the resolutions were not in order.

After debate the Speaker<sup>40</sup> said:

The present occupant of the chair decided during the last session of Congress that a mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a public officer, without proposing to impeach him, was not a matter of privilege under the rules of the House or under the Constitution of the United States; and the Chair has seen no reason to change that opinion. But the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Keifer) is mistaken in his statement that the resolution now offered does not contain a proposition for impeachment. The resolution begins with an impeachment of this officer: and all that follows is a mere specification under the general charge made, together with a direction to a committee to make the investigation usual in such cases. The proceeding corresponds precisely with that adopted in the Twenty-seventh Congress, when an attempt was made to impeach the then President, John Tyler, and adopted afterwards in the Thirty-ninth Congress, when Mr. Ashley, then a Member from Ohio, rose in his place on the floor, made charges against the then President, Andrew Johnson, and asked for an investigation. * * * It is admitted that the resolution now offered does contain a proposition to impeach a public officer who is impeachable under the Constitution; but it is insisted that it does not present a matter of privilege under the Constitution or rules of the House, because, in the first place, it contains other matter; that is to say, it directs the committee to take certain evidence in the case which it is claimed is not pertinent to the charges made.

It may be, or it may not be, that the resolution does direct the committee to take what the House might afterwards decide to be incompetent evidence upon a charge of this character. But that, of course, is not a question for the Chair to determine. It is the province of the House to decide, when the resolution comes before it, how far it shall direct the committee to proceed in the investigation or as to what charges it shall investigate.

Again, it is objected that this inquiry should be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, and not by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Of course, if a proposition to impeach a public officer should be submitted to the Chair for reference, the Chair, under the rules of the House, would send it to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it is always in the power of the House itself to determine what committee shall conduct an investigation or consider and report upon any matter. So it seems to the Chair that under all of the rulings heretofore made this presents a matter of privilege, and the House can determine for itself how far the committee shall proceed in the investigation, what committee shall have charge of it, and what matters shall be investigated.

2048. On December 10, 1895,<sup>41</sup> Mr. William E. Barrett, of Massachusetts, presented as a question of privilege the following:

I do impeach Thomas F. Bayard, United States ambassador to Great Britain, of high crimes and misdemeanors on the following grounds:

Whereas the following report of a speech, delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution, by Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States of America at the Court of Great Britain, is published in the London News under date of November 8, 1895:

"The opening address of the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution was delivered last night by Mr. Bayard, the ambassador of the United States of America, who selected for the subject 'Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence.' In his own country, he said, he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of State socialism styled 'protection' which he believed had done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon State aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause." etc. [The extract is quoted at length.]

And whereas such reflections on the Government's policy and people of the United States by an ambassador of the United States to a foreign country and before a foreign audience is manifestly in serious disregard of the proprieties and obligations which should be observed by an official representative of the United States abroad, and calculated to injure our national reputation.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to ascertain whether such statements have been publicly made; and, if so, to report to the House such action, by impeachment or otherwise, as shall be proper in the premises. For the purpose of this inquiry the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, made the point of order that this did not constitute a question of privilege.

During the debate the precedents of February 4 and December 2, 1884,<sup>42</sup> were cited. The Speaker,<sup>43</sup> in ruling, said:

It seems to the Chair that there is a great distinction between the two cases. The Chair has examined the decision of the Speaker of the House made on the 2d day of December, 1884, and sees no reason why he should not adopt that opinion. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.<sup>44</sup>

2049. Although a report as to an impeachment be laid on the table, the right to move again an impeachment in the same case is not precluded.—On December 6, 1867,<sup>45</sup> the House was considering the report of the Judiciary Committee recommending the impeachment of Andrew Johnson.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked whether, if the subject be laid on the table, it would prevent any gentleman from calling it up as a question of privilege and moving the impeachment of the President.

The Speaker <sup>46</sup> said :

If this subject be laid on the table, no gentleman can call up this report. He can propose to impeach the President or any other officer of the Government on any day during the session, and that could be done even though the President should have been impeached and acquitted by the Senate.

2050. A mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a civil officer is not presented as a matter of constitutional privilege, even though impeachment may be contemplated as a possibility.—On February 4, 1884,<sup>47</sup> Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, presented the following resolution, claiming it to be a question of privilege :

Resolved, That the petition of Richard W. Webb, and accompanying statement of charges against Samuel B. Axtell, chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico and judge of the first judicial district thereof, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and ascertain whether the allegations * * * be true, * * * and report thereon to the House such action, to be taken by impeachment or otherwise, as they may advise; and in making such examination and investigation the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, made the point that this was not such a question as enabled the memorial to have present consideration. If it were entitled to consideration, one person who might or might not be responsible might spread before the country charges which had not been examined by any committee.

In sustaining the point of order the Speaker <sup>48</sup> said :

The Chair will state that, having looked at the memorial, he finds that it does contain charges against a judge of the United States court in the Territory of New Mexico. Upon that the gentleman from Illinois offers a resolution that the memorial and charges be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation. The question is made that this is not a matter of privilege. * * * If a Member on the floor should prefer articles of impeachment against a public officer the Chair has no doubt that it would be a privileged matter under the Constitution, because the House possesses the power of impeachment. But this is not a resolution proposing to impeach anyone. It simply instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the truth or falsity of certain charges made against a public officer in a memorial which has been presented. The inquiry may result in an impeachment or it may not.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the conduct of William B. West, American consul at Dublin, in Ireland, regarding American prisoners in that city and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that if he has been guilty of conduct which would be liable to impeachment this House may take measures to have articles of impeachment presented to the Senate.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that this did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker <sup>50</sup> said :

The gentleman from Illinois rises to a question of order, that as the resolution does not positively propose impeachment of this consul it is not a question of privilege. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Robinson modified his resolution to read as follows :

Resolved, That William B. West, consul of the United States at Dublin, Ireland, be impeached before the Senate.

The Speaker said :

That is a question of privilege, and can be introduced for reference or action.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. 2052. On November 21, 1867,<sup>51</sup> Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, as a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution :

Whereas Charles Francis Adams, United States minister to Great Britain, has been charged with neglect of duty toward American citizens in England and Ireland by failing to secure their rights as such citizens : Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that, if the charge be true, articles of impeachment against said Charles Francis Adams may be presented by this House to the Senate of the United States : that the President of the United States be requested to telegraph to the said Charles Francis Adams immediately to demand his passports and to return home ; that the Secretary of State be instructed to communicate to this House all correspondence to and from the Department for the two years last past on the arrest, imprisonment, trial, or conviction of any American citizen, or any person claiming to be such, in Great Britain and Ireland, without reference to its public effect to be considered, if need be, in secret session of this House.

The resolution having been read, the Speaker <sup>52</sup> said :

The Chair rules that this resolution is a question of privilege, as it proposes an impeachment of an officer of the Government.

2053. Impeachment is a question of constitutional privilege which may be presented at any time irrespective of previous action of the House.—On March 3, 1879,<sup>53</sup> the regular order of business was the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department proposing articles of impeachment against George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, and now minister plenipotentiary to China.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the House having referred the subject-matter of the investigation of charges against Mr. Seward to the Committee on the Judiciary it was not in order for the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department to take further action on the case.

The Speaker <sup>54</sup> overruled the point of order on the ground that the subject referred to the Committee on the Judiciary was the answer of the said Seward in response to the order of the House requiring him to show cause why he should not be declared in contempt of the House, and also on the further ground that the question of impeachment was one of constitutional privilege which could be raised or presented at any time by any Member of the House.

2054. A resolution for discontinuing impeachment proceedings, but not respectful to the House, was ruled not to be privileged.— On May 18, 1868,<sup>55</sup> Mr. Alexander H. Jones, of North Carolina, offered as involving a question of privilege, the following :

Whereas this House did in bad judgment and hot haste pass a resolution and articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and appointed managers to conduct the suit before the high court of the Senate; and whereas it has been abundantly proven that there was no cause or plausible pretext for the same; and whereas the Senate and the country labor under great excitement and embarrassment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said managers be instructed forthwith to withdraw said suit, that the House may be redeemed, the Senate relieved, and the country given repose.

Mr. Elihu Washburne, of Illinois, having objected, the Speaker<sup>56</sup> held:

The Chair will rule on the question. He thinks this is not a question of privilege. The preamble contains a reflection on the House. It is unparliamentary on the part of any Member to reflect upon the action of the House in the language used in the preamble. * * * It is not a parliamentary preamble and resolution for the consideration of the House, not being respectful in its terms to the House.

"Two-thirds of the Members present" are required by the Constitution for conviction on impeachment.

The Constitution limits judgment in impeachment cases to removal from office and disqualification to hold office.

A person convicted in an impeachment trial is still liable, under the Constitution, to the punishment of the courts of law.

The Constitution, in Article I, section 3, provides :

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. But the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

impeachment against a Commoner, except on complaint of the Commons.

Provisions of parliamentary law as to trial by impeachment of a Commoner for a capital offense.

In Chapter LIII, of Jefferson's Manual, the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Jurisdiction. The Lords can not impeach any to themselves, nor join in the accusation, because they are the judges. (Seid. Judic. in Parl., 12, 63.) Nor can they proceed against a Commoner but on complaint of the Commons. (Ib., 84.) The Lords may not, by the law, try a Commoner for a capital offense, on the information of the King or a private person, because the accused is entitled to a trial by his peers generally; but on accusation by the House of Commons they may proceed against the delinquent, of whatsoever degree and whatsoever be the nature of the offense; for there they do not assume to themselves trial at common law. The Commons are then instead of a jury, and the judgment is given on their demand, which is instead of a verdict. So the Lords do only judge, but not try the delinquent. (Ib., 8, 7.) But Wooddeson denies that a Commoner can now be charged capitally before the Lords, even by the Commons, and cites Fitzharris's case, 1681, impeached for high treason, where the lords remitted the prosecution to the inferior court. (8 Grey's Deb., 325-327; 2 Wooddeson, 576, 601; 3 Seid., 1604, 1610, 1618, 1619, 1641; 4 Blackst., 25; 9 Seid., 1656; 73 Seid., 1604-1618.)

2057. In 1868, after mature consideration, the Senate decided that it sat for impeachment trials as the Senate and not as a court.

An anxiety lest the Chief Justice might have a vote seems to have led the Senate to drop the words "high court of impeachment" from its rules.

The Senate, as a Senate and not as a court, adopted rules for the Johnson trial; but on the insistence of the Chief Justice adopted them when organized for the trial.

In the Johnson trial the articles of impeachment were presented before the Chief Justice had taken his seat, although he had filed his written dissent from such procedure.

Written dissent of the Chief Justice from views taken by the Senate as to its constitutional functions in an impeachment trial.

Enunciation of Mr. Senator Summer's theory that the Senate was not a court and the Senators were not constrained by the obligations of judges in an impeachment trial.

On February 29, 1868,<sup>5</sup> the Senate, in its legislative capacity and before its organization for impeachment proceedings, began the consideration of a series of rules reported<sup>6</sup> by a select committee composed of Messrs. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan; Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois; Roscoe Conkling, of New York; George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana; Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland. The caption of this report was "Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when Sitting as a High Court of Impeachment." At the outset of the discussion<sup>7</sup> Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, made the objection that the rules not only proposed the method for organizing the Senate into a court, but also proposed regulations for the court itself. He conceived that it was not proper for the Senate as such to adopt rules to control the action of the court upon any question whatever that might become material during the trial.

During the discussion of the rules themselves, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, acting upon suggestions received since he had concurred in the report, called attention<sup>8</sup> to the use of the words "high court of impeachment" in Rules III and IV as submitted :

They both used language which may, perhaps, lead to trouble, and give rise to a different theory in regard to the character of the body that is to try this impeachment. It is provided that the Senate shall resolve itself into a high court of impeachment. Is there any authority in the Constitution for that, or is there any propriety in it? Is not this impeachment to be tried simply by the Senate of the United States? While the Senate is engaged in the trial, does it lose the character of the Senate and become a court? If we shall allow ourselves to contemplate that idea, may it not lead to consequences that we do not desire, and to difficulties? The Constitution seems to contemplate that this impeachment shall be tried by the Senate. It says: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," and "when sitting"—that is, the Senate, when sitting—"for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation." That is all that is required, that the Senate, when sitting for that purpose, shall be on oath or affirmation. But we are here proposing to resolve ourselves into another character, we are to cease to be a Senate and become a court. If we follow out that theory, there may be many little consequences attaching to it before we get done with it that we do not anticipate. Why not preserve the simple idea that this impeachment is to be tried by the Senate of the United States as the Senate and nothing else? What use have we got for the phraseology "resolving itself into a high court of impeachment?" I object to the use of the word "high," in that connection, anyhow. But the argument made by my colleague suggests that the theory which we thus seem to recognize may involve other consequences that we do not now contemplate; and although I assented to these rules, and would regret now to find fault, yet it occurs to me, from the suggestion made and from looking at the Constitution itself, that this impeachment, after all, is to be tried simply by the Senate of the United States.

Debate at once arose<sup>9</sup> and there was a citation of precedents to show that in former impeachment trials the words "high court of impeachment" had been used, although Mr. Conkling argued that these words had been used rather by the Secretary in recording the proceedings than by the Senate itself.

Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, moved to strike out the word "high," and announced that if that should be agreed to, he would propose further amendments with the object of removing the idea that the Senate was in such proceedings a distinct court.

Mr. Ferry's motion was disagreed to,<sup>10</sup> yeas 16, nays 21.

The question was not settled by this vote, however, but recurred again and again. On March 2,<sup>11</sup> Mr. Hendricks proposed an additional rule, as follows:

When the Senate sits as a high court of impeachment in a case in which the Chief Justice must preside, such of the foregoing rules as apply to the trial shall be considered and adopted by the court before they shall have force.

In support of his motion Mr. Hendricks argued :

I am not able to see that there ought to be a doubt on this question. If the Chief Justice must preside when the Senate shall try the case, he sought to preside when the Senate decides how it will try the case, what forms of proceeding shall be observed, what rights shall be secured to counsel, what rights shall be reserved to Senators. Many of these rules are exceedingly important.

* * * If the Constitution provides that the Chief Justice must preside here, and that this must be a court with the Chief Justice as the presiding officer when the trial takes place, ought we not to decide how the case shall be tried when he is in his seat? In a case where the Chief Justice must preside, is it proper that the Senate, in his absence, when the Vice-President or President pro tempore is occupying the chair, who may succeed in case the impeachment is successful—is it right with that organization of the Senate to prescribe the rules which shall govern the court which the Constitution itself provides for?

* * * These rules, among other things, confer upon the Chief Justice presiding the power to decide certain questions, questions of the admissibility of evidence. These may be very important. It is conferring upon him a power which he would not possess in the absence of the rule. Now, that is a power which he is to exercise in the court, which we confer upon him when not organized into the court and not under oath.

In reply Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, suggested that the Chief Justice would have no vote in adopting the rules, and as to his decisions on the admissibility of evidence, he said :

We confer that power upon him in pursuance of the authority of the Senate to make rules for its government in any particular in which the Senate may be called upon to act, as the Constitution says we may. Now, in any possible contingency, if we have the authority at any time to confer the power mentioned in the seventh rule upon the presiding officer, does it make any possible difference whether we do it to-day or to-morrow, whether we do it when the Chief Justice is here or when he is absent. If I could see that it did, I might hesitate upon the point ; but as the same identical individuals are to do the thing whenever it is done, I can not for my life see what difference it can make whether it is done on one day or another.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Hendricks was disagreed to without division.

Immediately thereafter <sup>12</sup> Rule XXIV was read, prescribing forms for subpoenas of witnesses and of the summons to the person impeached. In these forms occurred the words "Senate of the United States, sitting as a high court of impeachment." Mr. Conkling moved to strike out the words "sitting as a high court of impeachment" wherever they occurred.

This motion was agreed to without very extended debate, Mr. Cronkling stating that if his amendment should be adopted it would restore the forms to what they were in the trials of 1804, 1830, and 1862. Mr. Edmunds explained that the words objected to had been introduced to get a form applicable to all conditions, whether the Chief Justice, a Vice-President, or a President pro tempore should preside.

Mr. Conkling's motion was agreed to yeas 23, nays 12. This was not, however, regarded as very significant on the question as to the nature of the court. Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, who voted for the motion, but championed the idea that the words high court should be retained as descriptive of the body, said that he did not consider it necessary, in summoning a witness, to inform him that the Senate was sitting as a high court of impeachment.

But on Rule XXV Mr. Conkling brought the question to issue <sup>13</sup> by moving an amendment which struck out the word "court."

Mr. Sherman said :

That this Senate is a court when it proceeds to try a case I think it does not need any very long speech to prove. We examine witnesses ; we convict or acquit ; we try a case; we are sworn; and if there is any element of a trial or any idea of a court that does not enter into our organization I do not know what it can be.

<sup>13</sup> Senate Journal, p. 246 ; Globe, pp. 1593-1594. There is a discrepancy between the Journal and Globe, but the debate shows that the Globe must be correct.

Mr. Conkling said:

The Constitution says that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. It does not say that the Senate shall become a court ex officio; it does not say that there shall be a high court for the trial of impeachment, to be composed of the Senate and of the Chief Justice sitting ex officio. It says nothing of that kind, but simply that the Senate shall try all impeachments. Why not leave it there? If it is a court we do not destroy that character by omitting these superfluities from our rules. If it is not a court we do not clothe it with the ermine and the attributes of a court by putting in the rules that it is so.

Then why not take the thing precisely as we find it?

Mr. Edmunds said:

It is a matter of some regret to me and to those of us who differed from my friend from New York in committee, where we thought we had settled the matter, that he is not willing to take the decision of the Senate on Saturday, when we were pretty full, upon this very question, instead of bringing it up again now, after we have gone through with this whole thing. Of course he is perfectly justified in doing so if he thinks the importance of it demands that course on his part; but I am a little afraid that his fear of the canal board in his State being turned into a court has led him to be a little touchy on this subject.

On Saturday, it will be remembered, this very question was debated at great length, not an unnecessary length, but every gentleman expressed his views who chose to do so, and gave his reasons for them, and the precedents were referred to; and then upon the yeas and nays on the question of striking out the word "high" (in connection with which it was expressly stated by the Senator from Connecticut that if he succeeded in that he should follow it by the other motions which would leave the description of the body to be simply "the Senate," because it would be easier to get an affirmative vote upon striking out a word, which was, of course, a mere matter of form, than it would upon the whole) the proposition was voted down, and voted down upon a reference to the precedents.

I hold in my hand the Globe, showing those proceedings; and the first was the trial of Blount, in 1798, in which—I ask the attention of the Senator from New York to it—the formal resolution—not the entry of the Secretary, but the resolution of the Senate as offered and adopted—was "resolved, that at the next opening of the court of impeachment the president" shall do so and so. Then, when we come to the trial of Chase, which was referred to also in some parts of the proceedings, the expression "court of impeachment" appears only to be the entry of the Secretary, but in other parts of the proceedings it appears to be the judgment of the Senate itself. Then, when we come to the trial of Peck, on the question of the Senate's taking upon itself a judicial capacity, the formal resolution offered on the part of the committee appointed by the Senate to report rules in that case was:

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock to-morrow the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment."

So that we find ourselves from the beginning, in 1798, down to this time—and the case of Humphreys in 1862 is just the same—having adopted this phraseology as describing the Senate, when it was exercising this function, as sitting as a court, saying nothing now about the word "high." Then where is the use, after all the discussion we have had on this point and one decision of it in the face of these uniform precedents from the beginning to this time, of turning our faces back and oversetting the whole theory upon which these rules go?

Mr. Ferry said:

Whether the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachments, be a court or not in ordinary language, whether that term as ordinarily used may properly enough be applied to it is one thing. Whether the Constitution calls it a court and designates it as a court is another thing. If that tribunal be a court according to the Constitution, I would like to have Senators who desire to retain this phraseology point out to me a statute on the face of the earth designating the presiding officer of the court in which a presiding officer has not somewhat more functions than Senators seems to be willing to attribute to the presiding officer of this court of impeachment. And I feel thus because I wish to preserve simply to the Senate—not in relation to this particular case; I care nothing about it in this particular case one way or the other—but to preserve to the Senate, and the Members of the Senate only, their constitutional functions without interference from outside. As I suggested before, it is not worth while for me to go over the argument again, because, using this language in the rules which we are prescribing, we ourselves prejudge the question and estop ourselves. As it seems to me, by declaring that the Constitution makes this tribunal a court in the legal, constitutional signification of the term, we estop ourselves from claiming that none other than a Senator is a member of that court.<sup>14</sup>

To this Mr. Edmunds retorted:

I ask him if he does not know that the House of Lords in England from time immemorial has always been called the high court of Parliament; and if he does not know that in proceedings in impeachment in that court the lord chancellor or lord high steward, the president of the court, has no vote unless he be a member of that court by being a peer, by the constant practice and frequent decision of that body?

Mr. Conkling's motion was then agreed to—yeas 16, nays 13.

Then the rules were generally amended, on motion of Mr. Ferry, in such a way as to remove the word "court" or "high court of impeachment" wherever occurring,<sup>15</sup> and were agreed to.

On March 4<sup>16</sup> the Senate met, and the President pro tempore laid before them the following communication:

To the Senate of the United States:

Inasmuch as the sole power to try impeachments is vested by the Constitution in the Senate, and it is made the duty of the Chief Justice to preside when the President is on trial, I take the liberty of submitting, very respectfully, some observations in respect to the proper mode of proceeding from the impeachment which has been preferred by the House of Representatives against the President now in office.

That when the Senate sits for the trial of an impeachment it sits as a court seems unquestionable.

That for the trial of an impeachment of the President, this court must be constituted of the Members of the Senate, with the Chief Justice presiding, seems equally unquestionable.

The Federalist is regarded as the highest contemporary authority on the construction of the Constitution; and in the sixty-fourth number the functions of the Senate "sitting in their judicial capacity as a court for the trial of impeachments" are examined.

In a paragraph explaining the reasons for not uniting "the Supreme Court with the Senate in the formation of the court of impeachments" it is observed that "to a certain extent the benefits of that union will be obtained from making the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the president of the court of impeachments, as is proposed in the plan of the convention, while the inconveniences of an entire incorporation of the former into the latter will be substantially avoided. This was, perhaps, the prudent mean."

This authority seems to leave no doubt upon either of the propositions just stated. And the statement of them will serve to introduce the question upon which I think it my duty to state the result of my reflections to the Senate, namely, at what period, in the case of an impeachment of the President, should the court of impeachment be organized under oath as directed by the Constitution?

It will readily suggest itself to anyone who reflects upon the abilities and the learning in the law which distinguish so many Senators that besides the reason assigned in the Federalist there must have been still another for the provision requiring the Chief Justice to preside in the court of impeachment. Under the Constitution, in case of a vacancy in the office of President, the Vice President succeeds; and it was doubtless thought prudent and befitting that the next in succession should not preside in a proceeding through which a vacancy might be created.

It is not doubted that the Senate, while sitting in its ordinary capacity, must necessarily receive from the House of Representatives some notice of its intention to impeach the President at its bar; but it does not seem to me an unwarranted opinion, in view of this constitutional provision, that the organization of the Senate as a court of impeachment, under the Constitution, should precede the actual announcement of the impeachment on the part of the House.

And it may perhaps be thought a still less unwarranted opinion that articles of impeachment should only be presented to a court of impeachment; that no summons or other process should issue except from the organized court, and that rules for the government of the proceedings of such a court should be framed only by the court itself.

I have found myself unable to come to any other conclusions than these. I can assign no reason for requiring the Senate to organize as a court under any other than its ordinary presiding officer for the later proceedings upon an impeachment of the President which does not seem to me to apply equally to the earlier.

I am informed that the Senate has proceeded upon other views; and it is not my purpose to contest what its superior wisdom may have directed.

All good citizens will fervently pray that no occasion may ever arise when the grave proceedings now in progress will be cited as a precedent; but it is not impossible that such an occasion may come.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Constitution has charged the Chief Justice with an important function in the trial of an impeachment of the President, it has seemed to me fitting and obligatory, where he is unable to concur in the views of the Senate concerning matters essential to the trial, that his respectful dissent should appear.

S. P. CHASE.

Chief Justice of the United States.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1868.

This letter was referred to the select committee of which Mr. Howard was chairman.

Soon thereafter the managers presented themselves with the articles of impeachment, and delivered them to the Senate, the President pro tempore presiding.<sup>17</sup>

Then,<sup>18</sup> after the intervention of legislative business, the Senate agreed to the necessary resolutions for notifying the House of Representatives and the Chief Justice that on the following day "the Senate will proceed to consider the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States." etc.

A resolution providing that a printed copy of the rules be furnished to the House of Representatives was agreed to, although Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, objected that this should not be done until the court had been organized and had determined on rules.

On March 6,<sup>19</sup> after the organization for the trial of the articles of impeachment, the Chief Justice said, before putting the question on a resolution notifying the House of Representatives of the organization:

The Chair feels it his duty to submit a question to the Senate relative to the rules of proceeding. In the judgment of the Chief Justice the Senate is now organized as a distinct body from the Senate sitting in its legislative capacity. It performs a distinct function; the members are under a different oath; and the presiding officer is not the President pro tempore of the Senate, but the Chief Justice of the United States. Under these circumstances, the Chair conceives that rules adopted by the Senate in its legislative capacity are not rules for the government of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment unless they be also adopted by that body. In this judgment of the Chair, if it be an erroneous one, he desires to be corrected by the judgment of the court, or of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of the President, which in his judgment are synonymous terms, and therefore, if he may be permitted to do so, he will take the sense of the Senate upon this question, whether the rules adopted on the 2d of March, a copy of which is now lying before him, shall be considered the rules of proceeding in this body. ["Question!"] Senators, you who think that the rules of proceeding adopted on the 2d of March should be considered as the rules of proceeding of this body will say "ay;" contrary opinion, "no." [The Senators having answered.] The ayes have it by the sound. The rules will be considered as the rules of proceeding in this body.

The journal of the Senate, in referring to proceedings in the trial, also refrains from the use of the words "high court of impeachment."<sup>20</sup>

The Chief Justice, however, in opening the daily sittings, directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to "open the court by proclamation."<sup>21</sup>

The answer of the President was also addressed to the "Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment."<sup>22</sup>

On June 3, 1868,<sup>23</sup> after the trial of the President had been concluded, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, presented to the Senate the following resolutions declaring the constitutional responsibility of Senators for their votes on impeachment:

Whereas a pretension has been put forth to the effect that the vote of a Senator on an impeachment is so far different in character from his vote on any other question that the people have no right to criticise or consider it; and whereas such pretension, if not discountenanced, is calculated to impair that freedom of judgment which belongs to the people on all that is done by their Representatives: Therefore, in order to remove all doubts on this question and to declare the constitutional right of the people in cases of impeachment—

1. Resolved, That, even assuming that the Senate is a court in the exercise of judicial power, Senators can not claim that their votes are exempt from the judgment of the people; that the Supreme Court, when it has undertaken to act on questions essentially political in character, has not escaped this judgment; that the decisions of this high tribunal in support of slavery have been openly condemned; that the memorable utterance known as the Dred Scott decision was indignantly denounced and repudiated, while the Chief Justice who pronounced it became a mark for censure and rebuke; and that plainly the votes of Senators on an impeachment can not enjoy an immunity from popular judgment which has been denied to the Supreme Court, with Taney as Chief Justice.

2. Resolved, That the Senate is not at any time a court invested with judicial power, but that it is always a Senate with specific functions, declared by the Constitution; that according to express words, "the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," while it is further provided that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," thus positively making a distinction between the judicial power and the power to try impeachments; that the Senate on an impeachment does not exercise any portion of the judicial power, but another and different power, exclusively delegated to the Senate, having for its sole object removal from office and disqualification therefor; that, by the terms of the Constitution, there may be, after conviction on impeachment, a further trial and punishment "according to law," thus making a discrimination between a proceeding by impeachment and a proceeding "according to law;" that the proceeding by impeachment is not "according to law," and is not attended by legal punishment, but is of an opposite character, and from beginning to end political, being instituted by a political body, an account of political offenses, being conducted before another political body having political power only, and ending in a judgment which is political only; and therefore the vote of a Senator on impeachment, though different in form, is not different in responsibility from his vote on any other political question; nor can any Senator on such an occasion claim immunity from that just accountability which the Representative at all times owes to his constituents.

3. Resolved. That Senators in all that they do are under the constant obligation of an oath, binding them to the strictest rectitude; that on an impeachment they take a further oath, according to the requirement of the Constitution, which says, "Senators, when sitting to try impeachment, shall be on oath or affirmation;" that this simple requirement was never intended to change the character of the Senate as a political body and can not have any such operation; and therefore, Senators, whether before or after the supplementary oath, are equally responsible to the people for their votes, it being the constitutional right of the people at all times to sit in judgment on their Representatives.

It does not appear that this resolution was ever acted on.

2058. During the Johnson trial the functions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial were discussed by managers and counsel for respondent.—In the course of the arguments during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the question as to whether or not the Senate sitting for the trial had the attributes of a court was discussed at length. Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, argued<sup>24</sup> that it did not. Of the Senators who filed written opinions, Mr. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, sustained at length the view that impeachment was a political and not a judicial proceeding.<sup>25</sup>

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, of counsel for the President, argued that the Senate was a court,<sup>26</sup> and Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, also of counsel for the President, took the same view, arguing at length,<sup>27</sup> as did Mr. William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio, also of counsel for the President.<sup>28</sup> Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, argued from both English and American precedents, that the Senate sat as a court.<sup>29</sup> Of the Senators who filed written opinions in the case, this view was sustained by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky.<sup>30</sup>

2059. The Senate, by majority vote, assumed jurisdiction to try the Belknap impeachment, although protest was made that a two-thirds vote was required.—On June 6, 1876,<sup>31</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, presented the following:

Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP

Here in court comes the said William W. Belknap and moves the court now here to vacate the order entered of record in this cause setting aside and holding as naught the plea of him, said Belknap, by him first above in this cause pleaded, for the reason that said order was not passed with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting upon the question of adopting and passing said order, as appears by the record in this cause.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR,
MATT H. CARPENTER,

Of Counsel.

The plea referred to was that the Senate had no jurisdiction to try the case, since Mr. Belknap had resigned before the impeachment was made.

At the previous sitting, on June 1, Mr. Carpenter had said : <sup>22</sup>

Speaking for myself only (not having consulted with my colleagues), I maintain that upon the whole record the order is void, for the reason that it was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Suppose a case in the Supreme Court, where only a majority of the judges need concur in the judgment; and suppose the record to show that only four judges concurred in the judgment while five dissented, but the minority directed the clerk to enter the judgment or order as the act of the court, and he should do so and certify it as such under the seal of the court. It is manifest, I think, that such judgment, if the dissent of the majority appeared of record, would be absolutely void, and would be so declared by any court where the judgment should come in question collaterally. I think this judgment is in the same category.

That we can raise these questions on a final hearing, is clear, because it can not be maintained that any question upon which conviction depends can be eliminated from such final determination by the action of less than the constitutional majority of two-thirds. Otherwise a mere majority of the Senate might defeat the constitutional provision.

In these cases of impeachment, if a mere majority can settle the question of jurisdiction, so a mere majority, by overruling a demurrer to the articles, can determine that the acts alleged to have been done or omitted by the respondent constitute in law a high crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution; leaving the final judgment to rest only upon questions of fact or at the final hearing, none of these questions having been disposed of, some master tactician might first move a resolution declaring that the respondent had done or omitted the acts charged, and if sustained by a mere majority, might claim that the facts were settled, and that judgment must rest upon the question of law whether such facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor.

In briefer and plainer terms, no conviction can take place under this provision of the Constitution, unless two-thirds of the Senators concur in regard to every element necessary to conviction, and first and conspicuous among these, must be the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord had said. <sup>22a</sup>

On the point which the counsel has suggested, practically that a two-thirds vote is necessary on the question of jurisdiction, that Senators who voted that this court had not jurisdiction must therefore on the final vote, when the question is put, "Did this defendant take $1,500 on a given occasion and for such a purpose?" say "Not guilty," because of their views in regard to jurisdiction—on this point I say we shall be prepared to show that there is nothing whatever in the suggestion; in fact, that the whole practice of courts of impeachment has been in contravention of it; that the Constitution itself prevents any such possibility. Therefore when this question is raised in some proper form we shall desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, said : <sup>23</sup>

That question can be argued on the motion submitted by the counsel for the respondent. I suppose it can be argued at almost any time or in any way. In my judgment it never can be decided until we come to the final decision, but it can be argued on the motion submitted; although I think it is pretty clear, for reasons that I am not at liberty to state now, that it can not be decided on any such motion as that submitted by the counsel.

And Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, concurred :

I will say now that, so far as I can see, the statement of the law upon this point as made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] is what meets with my view. I have not had time to consult with the other counsel in the case and do not know how they feel about it; but I think, whatever may be done with this motion or whenever it may be argued, it can not really be directly decided until the final determination of the case, and what we ought to have, therefore, the privilege of arguing the point at any time. It is a question that arises and will arise at every step of this case as we go on.

Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, a Senator from Maryland, proposed this order :

Ordered, That the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at one o'clock p. m., when argument shall be heard upon the motion offered by the counsel for the respondent.

The order was disagreed to, yeas 18, nays 23.

On June 16th Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, presented the following paper :

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP

And now, to wit, this 16th day of June, 1876, the said William W. Belknap comes into court, and being called upon to plead further to the said articles of impeachment, doth most humbly and with profoundest respect represent and show to this honorable court that on the 17th day of April last past he did plead to the said articles of impeachment, and in his said plea did allege that at the time when the House of Representatives of the United States ordered the said impeachment, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited at the bar of the Senate against him, the said Belknap, he, the said Belknap, was and ever thereafter had been not a public officer of the United States, but a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and that the plea aforesaid and all the matters and things therein contained were by him, said Belknap, fully verified by proofs, namely, by admissions of the said House of Representatives before said court; and the said Belknap further represents and shows to the court here that the truth and sufficiency of the plea pleaded by him as aforesaid were thereupon debated by the managers of the said House of Representatives and the counsel of this respondent, and thereupon submitted to this court for its determination and judgment thereon; and that such proceedings were thereupon had in this court on that behalf in this cause; that afterwards, to wit, on the 29th day of May last past, the members of this court, to wit, the Senators of the United States sitting as a court of impeachmen as aforesaid, did severally deliver their several judgments, opinions, and votes on the truth and sufficiency in law of the said plea, when and whereby it was made duly to appear that only thirty-seven Senators concurred in pronouncing said plea insufficient or untrue; whereas twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court, by their opinions and votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be that said plea was sufficient in law and true in point of law; so that the said Belknap in fact saith that, on the day and year last aforesaid, twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court declared therein that the said Belknap having ceased to be a public officer of the United States by reason of his resignation of the office of Secretary of War of the United States before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate cannot take jurisdiction of this cause; and that seven Senators did not vote upon said question, and only thirty-seven Senators, by their votes, declared their opinion to be that the Senate could take jurisdiction of said cause. And afterwards thirty-seven Senators sitting in said court, and no more, concurred in a resolution declaring that "in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap is amenable to trial on impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office," and that twenty-nine of said Senators sitting in said court, by their votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be to the contrary thereof. And afterwards, on the day and year last aforesaid, it was proposed in said court that the President pro tempore of the said Senate should declare the judgment of the said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, to be that said plea of said respondent should be held for naught, and a vote was taken upon said proposition; and, as said vote showed, two-thirds of the said Senators present did not concur therein; but, on the contrary thereof, only thirty-six Senators did concur therein, and twenty-seven Senators then and there present, and voting on said proposition, did by their votes dissent from and vote against said proposition. All of which appears more fully and at large upon the record of this court in this cause, to which record he, said Belknap, prays leave to refer.

Therefore the said Belknap, referring to the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 3, clause 6, which provides that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present," (meaning on trial on impeachment,) avers that his said plea has not been overruled or held for naught by the Senate sitting as aforesaid, no such judgment having been concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators sitting in said court and voting thereon: but, on the contrary thereof, as the vote aforesaid fully shows, the said plea of the said respondent was sustained, and its truth in fact and sufficiency in law duly affirmed by the said Senate sitting as aforesaid, more than one-third of the Senators of said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, having by their votes so declared, to wit, twenty-seven Senators as aforesaid, and said twenty-seven Senators having by their votes declared and affirmed their opinion to be that said plea of said respondent was true in fact and was sufficient in law to prevent the Senate sitting as aforesaid from taking further cognizance of said articles of impeachment.

Wherefore the respondent avers that he has already been substantially acquitted by the Senate sitting as aforesaid: and that he, the said respondent, is not bound further to answer said articles of impeachment; the said order requiring this respondent to answer over not having been made with the concurrence of two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting upon the question of the passage of said order; and said order having been passed with the concurrence only of less than two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid, and voting on the question of making and passing said order, the said order ought not to have been entered of record as an order of said court of impeachment in this cause; and said order appearing upon the whole record of said cause to be null and void as an order of said court.

And the said respondent prays the court now here, as he has before formally moved said court, to vacate said order, and the said respondent hereby prays said court that he may be hence dismissed.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
MATT H. CARPENTER,
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR.

Of Counsel for said Respondent.

The Senate thereupon adopted the following order, the first clause being agreed to by a vote of yeas 26, nays 24, and the second by a vote of yeas 21, and nays 16.

Ordered. That the paper presented by the defendant on the 16th instant be filed in this cause; and the defendant having failed to answer to the merits within ten days allowed by the order of the Senate of the 6th instant, the trial shall proceed on the 6th of July next as upon a plea of not guilty.

This question was discussed somewhat at length during the final arguments in this case, Messrs. Montgomery Blair,<sup>35</sup> J. S. Black,<sup>36</sup> and Matt. H. Carpenter,<sup>37</sup> sustaining the contention already made by them, and Messrs. Managers William P. Lynde<sup>38</sup> and Scott Lord<sup>39</sup> taking the opposing view.

The question had also been discussed briefly on July 6,<sup>40</sup> when the managers began to introduce testimony, Mr. Black having proposed the following:

The counsel for the accused object to the evidence now offered and to all evidence to support the opening of the managers, on the ground that there can be no legal conviction, the Senate having already determined the material and necessary fact that the defendant is not, and was not when impeached, a civil officer of the United States.

The question being submitted:

Shall the objection of counsel for the respondent be sustained?

it was decided in the negative without division.

2060. The Senate, in 1868, when certain States were without representation, declined to question its competency to try an impeachment case.—On February 29, 1868,<sup>41</sup> the Senate was proceeding to the consideration of rules of procedure for impeachments, the occasion being the proposed impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, when Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, moved to recommit the rules with instructions as follows:

That the committee report as a substitute for the rules just read the following: "That the Constitution of the United States having appointed the Senate to be the court to try all impeachments, and having provided that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, and the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, and Florida having each chosen two Senators, and those Senators not having been admitted to their seats in the Senate, while they continue to be excluded the Senate can not be formed into a constitutional and valid court of impeachment for the trial of articles of impeachment preferred against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States."

Mr. Davis argued elaborately in favor of his motion, saying in the course of his remarks:

The motion that I make is based upon the idea that while the present Members of the Senate exclude ten States from representation in the body the Senators representing the remaining States, which are not excluded, have no right to form a court of impeachment, and can not do so until the ten States whose Senators have been excluded are admitted as Senators. I think myself that the motion is properly made at this time to the Senate, not to the court of impeachment. Whether the Senate will form itself into a court of impeachment or not is a Senatorial question. It is not a question for the court of impeachment to decide. It does not come before the court of impeachment at all, according to my judgment of the matter. The Senate must be in such condition as to numbers and representation from all the States that it has the constitutional power to resolve itself into a court of impeachment. Whether it be in that condition or not is a question not for the court to decide, but for the Senate, before it resolves itself into a court of impeachment to decide. It seems to me that that is the correct position in relation to that point. Being of that opinion, I will proceed at on great length with my remarks.

If the ten excluded States had never been in the rebellion, if they were now represented upon the floor of the Senate, could the Senate or could the two Houses of Congress exclude from representation in both Houses ten other States; and having excluded ten other States, could the remaining Senators from twenty-seven instead of thirty-seven States resolve themselves into a court of impeachment for the trial of the President? I presume that no Senator will answer that question in the affirmative. If that is conceded, to my mind it concedes the whole principle and the whole proposition, and I will proceed to assign one or two reasons why I believe so.

Any State that was in rebellion, after the rebellion was suppressed and after the State submitted itself to the Constitution and laws and authorities of the United States, which fact was admitted by her representation in the Senate or in the House, was as much in the Union as though that State had never been in the rebellion. I will take the State of Virginia. The State of Virginia has had a representative in the Senate since the suppression of the rebellion and since the time when there was a single arm raised against the authority of the United States; that Senator has served two sessions here since the rebellion was entirely suppressed; he was recognized by the Senate as a representative of the State of Virginia, and the Senate in taking that course toward him admitted that State to be in the Union as a State with all the rights and privileges which she would be entitled to under the Constitution as if she had never been in the rebellion at all. In the case of Luther v. Borden that principle is decided, and I will read a passage from it. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] and the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] and all the Senators who support the Congressional policy of reconstruction seem to rely upon that case as their principal authority, at least the principal experiment of their authority. I will read one paragraph from that decision:

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority."

There is the plain principle. It is in conformity to the principle of the law of post limine, too; it is in conformity to our Constitution. It is a declaration of the principle of the Constitution in these few and simple words, that when Congress has admitted Senators and Representatives from a State both the existence and authority of the government under which they were appointed and its republican form have been recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

Sir, it seems to me that this decision settles the question as to Virginia and as to Tennessee. The Senators, or at least a Senator from Tennessee and Senators from Virginia, and Representatives from both States, have been admitted by Congress to their seats in both Houses. That, this decision says, is a recognition by the proper constitutional authority of the governments under which those Senators and Representatives were appointed and of the republican form of the governments under which they were appointed.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, replied, saying, in the course of his remarks:

The Constitution requires no other Senate for the trial of an impeachment than what is required for any other purpose. The same Senate that can pass a bill can sit in the trial of an impeachment. The Senator can find no difference in the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution that says there shall be two Senators here from every State; it says that to convict on impeachment shall require the votes of two-thirds of the Members present—that is what it says.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky ignores one fact in his argument, which I think is of some importance in the consideration of this question: that is to say, he ignores the fact that there has been a rebellion. He treats the ten States which now have no representatives on this floor as being illegally and improperly excluded without cause. He omits any recognition of the fact that there has been a rebellion, that the people of those States have been in arms against the Government of the United States. He omits to mention the fact that they withdrew their Senators from this Chamber for a treasonable purpose, and that they engaged in hostility against the Government of the United States. These facts are material in the consideration of this question.

He says that every State in this Union is entitled to two Senators upon this floor. I controvert that proposition entirely. If the people of a State have destroyed their State government, if they have no legal State government that is authorized to elect Senators, I ask how they can have Senators upon this floor? If we regard these ten States as States in this Union, still the fact remains that they destroyed their loyal State governments, and they have no State governments that are legal and are recognized by the Government of the United States, and therefore they have no means under the Constitution of putting Senators upon this floor.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it worth while to undertake to follow the Senator in his argument. As I remarked before, I regard his presence here as a protest against his whole argument.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, opposed the motion of Mr. Davis, but solely on the ground that the subject was not one for the decision of the Senate, but was for the court of impeachment to decide.

The motion to recommit was decided in the negative, yeas 2, nays 39.

On March 23, 1868,<sup>42</sup> after the Senate had organized for the trial of the President, after the articles of impeachment had been presented but before the reply had been made, Mr. Davis presented the following:

Mr. Davis, a Member of the Senate and of the Court of Impeachment, from the State of Kentucky, moves the court to make this order:

The Constitution having vested the Senate with the sole power to try the articles of impeachment of the President of the United States preferred by the House of Representatives, and having also declared that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the legislatures thereof," and the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas having, each by its legislature, chosen two Senators who have been and continue to be excluded by the Senate from their seats, respectively, without any judgment by the Senate against them personally and individually on the points of their elections, returns, and qualifications, it is Ordered, That a court of impeachment for the trial of the President can not be legally and constitutionally formed while the Senators from the States aforesaid are thus excluded from the Senate; and this case is continued until the Senators from these States are permitted to take their seats in the Senate, subject to all constitutional exceptions to their elections, returns, and qualifications severally.

The question on agreeing to the order was taken without debate, and there appeared, yeas 2, nays 29. So the order was not agreed to.

2061. The doctrine of disqualifying personal interest as applied to a Senator sitting in an impeachment trial.

In 1868 the President pro tempore of the Senate voted on the final question at the Johnson trial, although a conviction would have made him the successor.

A Senator related to President Johnson by family ties voted on the final question of the impeachment without challenge.

A question as to the time when the competency of a Senator to sit in an impeachment trial should be challenged for disqualifying personal interest.

On March 5, 1868,<sup>43</sup> while the Senate was organizing for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and after the Chief Justice had taken the chair, the administration of the oath to Senators proceeded until the name of Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, was called. As Mr. Wade arose from his seat and advanced to take the oath Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, a Senator, entered an objection:

The Senator just called is the Presiding Officer of this body, and under the Constitution and laws will become the President of the United States should the proceeding of impeachment, now to be tried, be sustained. The Constitution providing that in such a case the possible successor cannot even preside in the body during the trial, I submit for the consideration of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate the question whether, being a Senator, representing a State, it is competent for him, notwithstanding that, to take the oath and become thereby a part of the court? I submit that upon two grounds, first, the ground that the Constitution does not allow him to preside during these deliberations because of his possible succession, and, second, the parliamentary or legal ground that he is interested, in view of his possible connection with the office, in the result of the proceedings, he is not competent to sit as a member of the court.

An extended debate at once arose. Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, urged that this tribunal was not to be tested by the ordinary rules of civil law. The State of Ohio had a right to send two Senators, and the Constitution gave them each a vote. Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, made the point that Mr. Wade might not necessarily be President pro tempore at the end of the trial, and hence was not necessarily personally interested. Messrs. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, and George H. Williams, of Oregon, urged that the question was premature, since the party interested to make the objection was not present, and no Senator should make it, and that the Senate should be organized before the question should be raised.

In the course of the debate Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said :

Mr. President, if it should now be determined that the Senator from Ohio shall not be sworn it would be an error, a blunder of which the accused would have just right to complain when he should come here. If a judge is interested in a case before him, or if a juror is interested in the result of the issue which he is called upon to try, it is an objection that the parties to the case have the right to waive; and they have always had that right under any system of practice that I have known anything about.

As was suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. Morrill] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams], it is not an objection to be made by a fellow juror, by another member of the court, or by anybody except the parties to that case; and if we now, in the absence of the accused, say that the Senator from Ohio shall not be sworn, the President when he comes here to stand his trial will have a right to say "A Senator has been excluded that I would willingly accept; I have confidence in his integrity; I have confidence in his character and in his judgment, and I am willing to waive the question of interest; who had the right to make it in my absence?" The Senator from Indiana, my colleague, and the Senator from Kentucky have no right to make the question unless they should do it in the character of counsel for the accused, a character they do not maintain.

Mr. President, I desire to say one thing further, that this objection made here, in my judgment, proceeds upon a wrong theory. It is that we are now about putting off the character of the Senate of the United States and taking upon ourselves a new character; that we are about ceasing to be a Senate to become a court. Sir, I reject that idea entirely. This is the Senate when sworn, this will be the Senate when sitting upon the trial, and can have no other character. The idea that we are to become a court, invested with a new character, and possibly having new constituents, I reject as being in violation of the Constitution itself. What does that say? It says that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." The Senate shall have the sole power to try; it is the Senate that is to try; not a high court of impeachment—a phrase that is sometimes used—that is to be organized, to be created by the process through which we are now going; but, sir, it is simply the Senate of the United States. The Senate "when sitting for that purpose shall be on oath or affirmation." That does not change our character. We do not on account of this oath or affirmation cease to be a Senate, undergo a transformation, and become a high court of impeachment; but the Constitution simply provides that the Senate, while as a Senate, trying this case shall be under oath or affirmation. It is an exceptional obligation. The duty of trying an impeachment is an exceptional duty, just as is the ratification of a treaty; but it is still simply the Senate performing that duty. "When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside." Preside where? In some high court of impeachment, to be created by the transformation of an oath? No, sir. He is to preside in the Senate of the United States, and over the Senate; and that is all there is of it. "And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present." Two-thirds of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, if I am right in this view, it settles the whole question. The Senator from Ohio is a Member of the Senate. My colleague has argued this question as if we were about now to organize a new body, a court, and that the Senator from Ohio is not competent to become a member of that court. That is his theory. The theory is false. This impeachment is to be tried by the Senate, and he is already a Member of the Senate, and he has a constitutional right to sit here, and we have no power to take it from him. As to how far he shall participate, as to what part he shall take in our proceedings, as has been correctly said, that is a question for him to decide in his own mind. But, sir, he is already a Member of this body; he is here; he has his rights already conferred upon him as a Member of this body, and he has a constitutional right to take part in the performance of this business, as of any other business, whether the ratification of a treaty or the confirmation of an appointment or the passage of a bill, which may be devolved on this body by the Constitution of the United States. Because he has been elected President pro tempore of the Senate does that take from him any of his rights as a Senator? Those rights existed before, and he can not be robbed of them by any act of this Senate.

But, sir, aside from this question, which goes to the main argument, this entire action is premature. There is nobody here to make this challenge, even if it could be made legitimately. The Senators making it do not represent anybody but themselves. The accused might not want it made. He might, perhaps, prefer the Senator from Ohio to any other Member of this body to try his case. It is always the right of the defendant in a criminal proceeding and of the parties in a civil action to waive the interest that a juror or a member of the court may have in the case.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said :

While I am up, permit me to say a few words in reply to the honorable Member from Indiana [Mr. Morton]. He tells us it is for the President of the United States—applying his remarks to the case which is to be and is before us—himself to make the objection, and that he may waive it. With all due deference to the honorable Member, that is an entire misapprehension of the question. The question involved in the inquiry is, what is the court to try the President? It is not to be such a tribunal as he chooses to try him. It is a question in which the people of the United States are interested, in which the country is interested; and by no conduct of the President, by no waiver of his, can he constitute this court in any other way than the way which the Constitution contemplates; that is to say, a court having all the qualities which the Constitution intends.

The honorable Member tells us that we are still a Senate and not a court, and that we can not be anything but a Senate and can not at any time become a court. Why, sir the honorable Member is not treading in the footsteps of his fathers. The Constitution was adopted in 1789. There have been four or five cases of impeachment, and in every case the Senate has decided to resolve itself into a court, and the proceedings have been conducted before it as a court and not as a Senate. To be sure, these component elements of which the court is composed are Senators, but that is a mere descriptio personarum. They are members of the court because they are Senators, but not the less members of a court. The Constitution contemplated their assuming both capacities. As a Senate of the United States they have no judicial authority whatever; their powers are altogether legislative; they are to constitute and do constitute only a portion of the legislative department of the Government; but the Constitution for wise purposes says that in the contingency of an impeachment of a President of the United States or any other officer falling within the clause authorizing an impeachment they are to become, as I understand, a court. So have all our predecessors ruled in every case; and who were they? In the celebrated case of the impeachment against Mr. Chase, who was one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, there were men in the Senate at that time whose superiors have not been found since, nor at any time before, and they adopted the idea and acted upon the idea that the Senate in the trial of that impeachment acted as a court and not as a Senate.

I submit, therefore, that the honorable Member from Indiana [Mr. Morton] is altogether mistaken in supposing that we are not a court. But look at the power which we are to have. We are to pronounce judgment of guilty or not guilty; we are to answer upon our oaths whether the party impeached is guilty or not guilty of the articles of impeachment laid to his charge, and having pronounced him guilty or not guilty, we are then to award judgment. Who ever heard of the Senate of the United States in its legislative capacity awarding a judgment.

But besides that, why is it, Mr. Chief Justice, that you are called to preside over the court, or the Senate when acting as a court to try an impeachment? It is because it is a court. You have no legislative capacity; your functions are to construe the laws in cases coming before you; and the very fact that upon the trial of an impeachment of the President of the United States the Vice-President is to be laid aside, and the ordinary Presiding Officer, if the Vice-President himself does not exist, and you are to preside, shows that it is a court of the highest character, demanding the wisdom and the learning of the Chief Justice of the United States.

The honorable Member says, and other Members have said, that a question of interest or no interest is not involved in an inquiry of this description. Does the honorable Member mean to say that if the honorable Member from Ohio had a bill before the Senate awarding to him a sum of money upon the ground that it was due to him by the United States he could vote upon the question of the passage of the bill? Why not if the honorable Member from Indiana is right? He is a Senator. If he is right that the Constitution intends that each State shall have two votes upon every question coming before the body, then in the case supposed the honorable Member from Ohio would have a right to vote himself, and by his own vote to place money in his own possession. Who ever heard that that was a right that could be accorded anywhere?

Mr. President, courts have gone so far as to say that a judgment pronounced by a judge in a court of which he was the constitutional officer in a case in which he had a direct interest, was absolutely void upon general principles; and void because of any statutory regulation on this subject, but void upon the general ground that no man shall be a judge in his own case. Does it make any difference what may be the character of the interest? If the honorable Member from Ohio was the sole party under the Constitution to try this impeachment, could he try it? Would not everybody say it is a casus omissus? There can be no trial as long as he continues to be the sole Member of the court, because he has a direct and immediate interest in the result; because the judgment would be absolutely void as against the general principle founded in the nature of man, that no man should be permitted to adjudge a question in which he has a direct interest.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, said:

Mr. President, I certainly do not appear here to represent my colleague on this question, but I represent the State of Ohio, which is entitled to two Senators on this floor. The Constitution declares that each Senator shall have a vote, and the Constitution further declares that each Senator shall take an oath in cases of impeachment. The right of my colleague to take the oath, his duty to take it, is as clear in my mind as any question that ever was presented to me as a Senator of the United States. The Constitution makes it plainly his duty to take the oath. He is a Senator, bound to take the oath, according to my reading of the Constitution; and every precedent that has been cited, and every precedent that has been referred to, bears out this construction. If after he has taken the oath as a Member of the Senate of the United States, for the purposes of this trial, anybody objects to his right to vote on any question that may be presented to this court or to the Senate hereafter, the objection can then be made and discussed; but his right in the preliminary stages to take the oath, and his duty to take it, is made plain by the Constitution itself. If hereafter, when the impeachment progresses, his right to vote on any question is challenged the question may be discussed and decided.

The case cited by my honorable friend from Maryland is directly in point. Mr. Stockton came here with a certificate from the State of New Jersey in due form; he presented it, and was sworn into office. Did anybody object to his being sworn? At the same time other papers were presented to the Senate challenging his right to be sworn, saying that the legislature of New Jersey had never elected Mr. Stockton; but because of that did anybody object to the oath being administered to Mr. Stockton? No one; although his right to take the oath was challenged, and a protest signed by a very large number of the members of the New Jersey legislature against his right to the seat, was presented. He was sworn in and took his seat here by our side, and voted and exercised the rights of a Senator. When the question of the legality of his own election came up, the Senate decided that he was not legally elected, and the question referred to arose upon his right to vote in that particular case. The question was whether he could vote, being interested in the subject-matter. The Senator from Massachusetts made the objection, and offered a resolution that he had not a right to vote in the particular case; and after debate that was decided in the affirmative, although by a very close vote. My own conviction then was and is yet that Mr. Stockton, as a Senator from the State of New Jersey, had a right to vote in his own case, although it might not be a proper exercise of the right.

So, sir, this question has been decided two or three times in the House of Representatives. In the celebrated New Jersey case, where a certificate of election was presented by certain Members from the State of New Jersey and they were excluded, public history has pronounced their exclusion to have been an unjustifiable wrong upon the great seal of the State of New Jersey. I believe that action is now generally admitted and conceded to have been wrong. Those men presented their credentials in the regular form, and they had the right to be sworn. So in many other cases where the right of persons to hold office is in dispute, those who have the prima facie right are sworn into office, and then the right is examined and finally settled. I had a matter presented to me once in which I was personally interested, and where I was sworn into office. I was directly and personally interested: but I took the oath of office, and I discharged my duties as a Member of the House of Representatives; and when the question came up whether I should vote on the election of a particular officer, I being a candidate for the office, I refused to vote. But it was my refusal which prevented my vote from being received. If I had chosen to vote, I had the right as a Member from the State of Ohio, even for myself. I have no doubt whatever of that. It is the right of the State; it is the right of the people; it is the right of representation. The power of the State and the power of the people must be exercised through their Senators and through their Representatives.

In the particular case here I do not suppose, I do not know at least, whether the question will ever arise. My colleague is required to take this oath as a Member of the Senate of the United States. You have no right to assume, nor have Senators the right to assume, that he will vote on questions which may affect his interest. That is a matter for him to decide; but the right of the State to be represented here on this trial of an impeachment is clear enough. Whether he will exercise the right, or whether he will waive it, is for him to determine. You have no right to assume that he will exercise the right or power to vote for himself where he is directly interested in the result.

It seems to me, therefore, that no Senator here has a right to challenge the voice of the State of Ohio, and the right of the State of Ohio to have two votes here is unquestionable unless when the question is raised in due form it shall be decided against my colleague. In the preliminary stages, when we are organizing this court, he ought to be sworn, and then if he is to be excluded by interest, unfitness, or any other reason, the question may be determined when raised hereafter; but no Senator has the right now to challenge his authority to appear here and be sworn as a Senator of the State of Ohio. His exclusion must come either by his own voluntary act, proceeding on what he deems to be just and right according to general principles, or it must be by the act of the Senate upon an objection made by the person accused in the trial of the impeachment. It seems to me that is clear and therefore I object to any waiver of the matter. I think my colleague has a right to present himself and be sworn precisely as I and other Senators have been sworn. Then let him decide for himself whether, in a case in which his interest is so deeply affected, he will vote on any question involved in the impeachment. If he decides to vote, when his vote is presented, then, not the Senator from Indiana, but the accused may make the objection, and we shall decide the question as a Senate or as a court, for I consider the terms convertible; we shall then decide the question of his right to vote.

Sir, several things have been introduced into this debate that I think ought not to have been introduced. The precise character of this tribunal, whether it is a court or a Senate, has nothing to do at present with this question. The only question before us is whether Benjamin F. Wade, acknowledged to be a Senator from the State of Ohio, has a right to present himself and take the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws in cases of impeachment. He is not the Vice-President: he is not excluded by the terms of the Constitution. He is the presiding officer of the Senate, holding that office at our will. You have no right to take away from him the power to take the oath of office and that to decide for himself as to whether, under all the circumstances, he ought to participate in this trial.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, said:

Mr. President, I incline to the opinion that the objection made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. Morrill] to the motion of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks], and also that made by the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams], is correct. I can not see how a Senator is to object to another Senator being sworn in, although I think there may be some doubt raised on the question for this reason: The Constitution provides that in a case where the President of the United States is tried under an impeachment the Chief Justice of the United States, not the Vice-President, shall preside; and though that was intended originally to look to the Vice-President alone, yet if another person, from the death of the Vice-President, or from his absence or his acting as President, stands in precisely the same relation to the office of President under the law and the Constitution, whether he be a Senator or not, ought not the principle equally to apply?

It certainly excludes the Vice-President from being a member of the court. Does it not equally exclude the presiding officer of the Senate? It does not make him, being a Senator, less a Senator of the United States in his legislative capacity; but the clause of the Constitution prevents and is intended to prevent the influence of the man who would profit as the necessary result of the judgment of guilty in the case. It supposes that he can not be or may not be sufficiently impartial to sit as a judge in that case or to preside in the court trying it. That is the object, as I suppose.

But, sir, there is great force in the objection that that point must come by plea or motion, if you please, from the party accused; and I should not have thought for a moment of embarking in this discussion had it not been for the renewal by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] of the endeavor to disprove the idea that the Senate must be organized into a court for the purpose of a judicial trial. Now, sir, whether it is to be a high court of impeachment or a court of impeachment, or to be called by the technical name court, is, in my judgment, immaterial; but the honorable Senator's argument did not touch the Constitution. The Senate is to constitute the court; the Senate is to try. Is there nothing in the provisions of that article which gives the judicial authority—for it is not legislative, it is judicial authority conferred, a judicial authority in special cases—is there nothing in that article which, of necessity, makes the body a judicial tribunal whenever it assumes these functions, and not a legislative body? Otherwise, how comes the presiding officer who now fills the chair to be in the seat which he occupies? When the Constitution says that the Senate shall have the sole authority to try impeachments is it necessary that it should say that the Senate shall be a court for the purpose of trying impeachments if every clause of the Constitution shows that it must be a judicial tribunal and must be a court, or else the language is meaningless which is applied to its organization? The members of the body are to be sworn specially in the particular case as between the accused and the impeachers. Is not that the action of a court? They are to try an individual in a criminal prosecution. Is not that judicial action? Is not the entire judicial power of the United States vested in the Supreme Court and the inferior courts, with that exception, by the very terms of the Constitution?

But, further, the body is to give judgment, to pronounce judgment, a judgment of removal from office always as the result of conviction; and if they please to carry it still further, they may pronounce judgment of disqualification from hereafter holding any office. Do not these terms of necessity constitute a court?

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, dissented from the view that the Chief Justice was made the presiding officer because the Vice-President would be an interested party, and argued from the literature contemporaneous with the Constitution that the Vice-President was expected to perform the duties of the President while the trial was going on. As to the question of personal interest, Mr. Sumner said:

There were other remarks made by Senators over the way to which I might reply. There was one that fell from my learned friend, the Senator from Maryland, in which he alluded to myself. He represented me as having cited many authorities from the House of Lords tending to show in the case of Mr. Stockton that this person at the time was not entitled to vote on the question of his seat. The Senator does not remember that debate, I think, as well as I do. The point which I tried to present to the Senate, and which, I believe, was affirmed by a vote of the body, was simply this: That a man can not sit as a judge in his own case. That was all, at least so far as I recollect, and I submitted that Mr. Stockton at that time was a judge undertaking to sit in his own case. Pray, sir, what is the pertinency of this citation? Is it applicable at all to the Senator from Ohio?

Is his case under consideration? Is he impeached at the bar of the Senate? Is he in any way called in question? Is he to answer for himself? Not at all. How, then, does the principle of law, that no man shall sit as a judge in his own case, apply to him? How does the action of the Senate in the case of Mr. Stockton apply to him? Not at all. The two cases are as wide as the poles assunder. One has nothing to do with the other.

Something has been said of the "interest of the Senator from Ohio on the present occasion." "Interest." This is the word used. We are reminded that in a certain event the Senator may become President, and that on this account he is under peculiar temptations which may swerve him from justice. The Senator from Maryland went so far as to remind us of the large salary to which he might succeed, not less than $25,000 a year, and thus added a pecuniary temptation to the other disturbing forces. Is not all this very technical? Does it not forget the character of this great proceeding Sir, we are a Senate and, not a court of nisi prius. This is not a case of assault and battery, but a trial involving the destinies of this Republic. I doubt if the question of "interest" is properly raised. I speak with all respect for others; but I submit that it is inapplicable. It does not belong here. Every Senator has his vote to be given on his conscience. If there be any "interest" to sway him, it must be that of justice and the safety of the country.

On March 6,<sup>44</sup> Mr. Hendricks, after discussing the various questions raised, withdrew his objection, saying :

But, Mr. President, I find that some Senators, among them the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Bayard,] who agree with me upon this question on the merits, are of the opinion that the question ought more properly to be raised when the court shall be fully organized, when the party accused is here to answer. I do not believe that he can waive a question that goes to the organization of the body; I believe it is a question for the body itself. But upon that I find some difference of opinion; and when I find that difference of opinion among those who agree with me upon the merits, upon the main point, whether he shall participate in the proceedings and judgment who may be benefited by it—while I find some Senators, who agree with me upon that question, disagreeing with me upon the question whether it ought to be raised now or when the Senator from Ohio proposes to cast a material vote in the proceedings, I choose to yield my judgment—my judgment, not at all upon the merits; my judgment not at all upon the propriety and the duty of the Senate to decide upon its own organization; but I yield as to the time when the question shall be made in deference to the opinion of others; and for myself, sir, I withdraw the question which I presented for the consideration of the President of this body and of the Senate yesterday.

The oath was then administered to Mr. Wade.

It appears from the Journal of the proceedings of the trial that Mr. Wade did not vote on any record vote until at the close of the trial, on May 16,<sup>45</sup> when his name is recorded on a question relative to the order of passing judgment on the several articles of impeachment. Thereafter he voted both on incidental questions and on the question of guilty or not guilty.

It appeared from the debate on the question as to Mr. Wade that another Senator was related to President Johnson<sup>46</sup> but no objection was made to him on the ground of affinity, nor did any Senator urge that this should be considered an objection.<sup>47</sup> This Senator was Mr. David T. Patterson, of Tennessee, and he was son-in-law of the respondent. Mr. Patterson participated in the trial throughout, and on May 16<sup>48</sup> voted "not guilty" on the main question.

right to challenge a Member of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment case was discussed <sup>49</sup> at length by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler during the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson.

2063. A quorum of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial is a quorum of the Senate itself and not merely a quorum of the Senators sworn for the trial.—On February 23, 1905,<sup>50</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, asked for a call of the Senate and there appeared forty-two Senators, and, the Presiding Officer,<sup>51</sup> said :

Upon the call of the Senate, forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate sitting in the impeachment trial is not present.

Then, on motion of Mr. Knute Nelson, of Minnesota, the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to send for absentees.

Later the Presiding Officer said :

A quorum of Senators who have been sworn in the impeachment trial is present—forty-three Senators.

The proceedings under the call were then dispensed with, and the Presiding Officer put the pending question on the admissibility of certain testimony.

There appeared yeas 10, nays 34—a total of 44 Senators responding, and the Presiding Officer announced that the evidence was not admitted.

Mr. Henry M. Teller, a Senator from Colorado, raised a question as to whether or not forty-four Senators constituted a quorum.

The Presiding Officer said :

Forty-three Senators make a quorum of the Senators who have been sworn in the impeachment trial.

Later Mr. Teller again raised the question :

Mr. President, I have been under the impression for a good many years that a majority of this body—in this instance forty-six Senators—made a quorum. I was somewhat surprised to find that a majority of the Senators sworn are held to be a quorum. I am not aware myself of any provision of the Constitution that allows this body to do business with less than a majority. You could not pass here a ten-dollar pension bill without a majority. Is it possible that less than a quorum can exercise the most important function that has been placed on the Senate by the Constitution? In my judgment, there is no court here present tonight. I raise that question.

The Presiding Officer said :

The Presiding Officer is of opinion that the point of order is well taken. He will state in this connection, however, that it has not been observed in proceedings of the Senate hitherto.

Thereupon further proceedings were taken to secure a quorum, and the Presiding Officer announced :

On the call of the Senate forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Presiding Officer thinks it becomes the duty of the Presiding Officer again to submit to the Senate the question with regard to the admission of evidence offered by counsel for respondent, which was submitted when a quorum of the Senate was not present, but when a quorum of the Senators sworn in the impeachment trial was present.

A little later the Presiding Officer said :

A short time ago the Presiding Officer stated that he thought in this trial there had been a call of the Senate and that business had been conducted when there was less than a quorum of the Senate. He finds upon examination that he was mistaken, and that on the two occasions when the roll call was had to determine the existence of a quorum there was on each occasion a quorum of the Senate present.

2064. An attempt of the House to investigate alleged corruption in connection with the votes of Senators during the Johnson trial was the subject of discussion and investigation in the Senate.—On May 21, 1868,<sup>52</sup> in the Senate sitting in legislative session, but at the time when the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, was pending, Mr. John B. Henderson, a Senator from Missouri, rising to a question of privilege, said :

On Saturday last after a vote had been taken in the court of impeachment on the eleventh article, and the Members of the House had retired to their own Chamber, one of the managers offered and the House adopted the following resolution :

"Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint subcommittees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House."

It was advocated by its mover, one of the managers, on the ground that base and corrupt motives had determined the judgment of the Senate; and another one of the managers being asked during a debate on Monday last in the House if he would have Senators perjure themselves, replied that "perjury would not hurt them much."

On Tuesday, the 19th instant, I received the following notice from the managers :

FORTIETH CONGRESS, UNITED STATES,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
"Washington, D.C., May 19, 1868.

"Sir: A question has arisen in the course of our investigation wherein your testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry.

"Will you do the committee of managers the courtesy to attend at the earliest possible moment at the Judiciary Committee room of the House, where they are in waiting to receive you?

"By direction of the managers.

"Your obedient servant,

"B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

"Hon. J. B. HENDERSON."

To which I replied as follows—the reply not being delivered, however, till the next morning :

"WASHINGTON CITY, May, 1868.

"GENTLEMEN: Yours of this date is received. You say 'a question has arisen in the course of our investigations wherein your (my) testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry,' and thereupon you request my early attendance before the managers as a witness.

"This request, I take it, is intended to answer the purposes of a subpoena, and is issued under authority of a resolution adopted by the House on Saturday last in the following words, to wit :

"I have already read the resolution.

"A prosecution by impeachment against the President is set on foot, and now, when the evidence and arguments have been fully submitted and the Senate as a court is deliberating on its judgment, a second prosecution is instituted against the Senate itself. Whatever may be the purpose of this inquisition—and I use the word in no offensive sense—it is, in my judgment, not only a direct insult to the body of which I am a member, but a proceeding of most dangerous tendency in the future. A large part of our proceedings has been conducted in secret, the managers, counsel, and reporters being excluded. If a member of the court can now, before the rendition of judgment, be withdrawn from consultation and subjected to the inquisition of the prosecutors, that inquisition may reach to all proceedings, and thus subvert the dignity and independence of the Senate. If it be to purge corruption from the Senate, the Senate is the proper body to guard and protect its own honor.

"Personally, I have no objection to appearing and testifying before you to all matters within my knowledge on the subject of impeachment. And were I to refuse, I know a new shower of calumny, base and grievous enough already, would certainly be poured upon me. But in my judgment this proceeding rises above personal considerations. It concerns public justice and effects the character, honor, and dignity of the Senate.

"I am engaged to appear before another committee of your body to-day, and on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow I shall submit this question for its consideration and be governed accordingly.

"Yours, respectfully,

"J. B. HENDERSON.

"To the managers of impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Henderson urged that the resolution under which the summons had issued contained a direct insult to the Senate, and that the summons was an invasion of the privileges of the Senate.

Mr. Henderson also presented another letter received later from the managers:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1868.

SIR: The managers have the honor to acknowledge your communication of 19th instant in answer to their request, which was not intended to serve the purpose of a subpoena, but as a courteous intimation to you that you could aid them in the investigation with which they have been charged.

If it had occurred to them to speculate upon the topic, they would have supposed you might do them the justice to believe that they would have asked no question indecorous or improper, certainly not as to anything which occurred in the secret sessions of the Senate. They were not aware of the time they sent their note to you that the Senate was not in session for "deliberation on the judgment" or otherwise, and they also believed that if they so far transgressed the limits of propriety as to make any inquiry which you deemed improper you would certainly have the efficient remedy of declining to answer.

Accepting the theory of your note, that you are a judge, they do not perceive on that account any objection to your answering as to matters pertinent in a further prosecution of the respondent on trial before the Senate for other and different offenses, because it is well known among lawyers that in both civil and criminal trials the presiding judge may be, and when occasion requires is, sworn as a witness in the very case then pending.

Jurors, in like manner, are called from their seats and sworn during the trial; and either, during the adjournment of the court, might legally and properly be called before a grand jury to give evidence on which to find an indictment against the prisoner at the bar for other and different offenses.

They bring these considerations to your notice in order that, seeing the theory upon which they have acted, you will acquit them of any discourtesy, either personal to yourself or to the honorable Senate. Without indicating any opinion upon the question whether a Senator is liable to examination as a witness before a committee of the House, they desire to add that they did not intend to assert such claim in their communication to you of 19th instant. They had no purpose other than to avail themselves of your knowledge of facts, if agreeable to you, to give them the benefit, of your knowledge, to aid them in pursuit of justice and right.

By direction of the managers.

Your obedient servant,

Hon. J. B. HANSENSON.

B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

In the course of the debate arising over the presentation made by Mr. Henderson, Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, asked for the consideration of a resolution presented on a previous day by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky:

Whereas it is represented that some persons have been and are engaged in violating the rights and privileges of the Senate by the use of threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means toward its Members to constrain them in their consideration, action, and judgment in the matter of the article of impeachment against the President of the United States now pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment; therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of three, to be appointed by the Chair, do proceed to inquire into the facts of such imputed threats, intimidation, and other unlawful means aforesaid, and the names of the persons, if any, using, or that have used, them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, employ a stenographer, and report the facts to the Senate.

To this Mr. Edmund G. Ross, of Kansas, proposed an amendment adding:

And that said committee be authorized to request the managers on the part of the House to furnish said committee a transcript of all the testimony that has been or may be taken by them in the case of the impeachment of the President.

After debate the further consideration of the subject was postponed.

On May 27<sup>53</sup> the consideration of the resolution was resumed, when Mr. Davis was permitted to withdraw the resolution and submit it in the following modified form:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to inquire into and report the facts in relation to any threats, intimidation, or other improper influences that were used or offered to be used, directly or indirectly, to control or influence the consideration or decision of the Senate or any Senator in the manner of the impeachment of the President of the United States lately pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment. Also, to inquire into and report the facts in relation to any overture or offer of an improper character to any person by or in the name of any Senator or other person in connection with said impeachment trial, and the names of any persons connected with said transactions or any of them. Said committee to have power to send for persons and papers, to summon witnesses, to take their evidence, and employ a stenographer, and to report as early as practicable.

Mr. Ross thereupon proposed an amendment in the nature of a substitute:

That a committee be appointed by the President of the Senate, to be composed of five Senators, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether improper or corrupt means have been used, or attempted to be used, to influence the votes of the Members of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment of the President; and that the said committee be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and to do all things that in their judgment may be necessary for the furtherance of the object of the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to, after debate, and then the resolution, as amended was agreed to.

R. Curtis, of counsel for the President, in his opening used the latter title. Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, one of the managers, in his closing argument, addressed the Presiding Officer as "Mr. Chief Justice." This was the title used by Mr. William M. Evarts and other counsel for the President. In general the managers preferred the title "Mr. President," Messrs. Managers Benjamin F. Butler and John A. Bingham using it almost if not quite invariably. The Chief Justice in ruling usually said, "The Chief Justice thinks," etc., but sometimes said, "The Chair thinks." In the Journal and Record of Debates<sup>54</sup> the words "Chief Justice" are invariably used. The Senators used some one and some the other designation in addressing the Chair.

In the impeachment of William Blount, the Vice-President (Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia) presided, and we find this form of address, "Mr. President."<sup>57</sup>

2067. During the Johnson trial Chief Justice Chase gave a casting vote on incidental questions, and the Senate declined to declare his incapacity to vote.—On March 31, 1868,<sup>58</sup> during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, a motion was made that the Senate retire for consultation, and there appeared on the vote, yeas 25, nays 25.

The Chief Justice thereupon said :

The Chief Justice votes in the affirmative. The Senate will retire for conference.

The Senate having retired, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, offered the following proposition as an amendment to the pending question :

That the Chief Justice of the United States, presiding in the Senate on the trial of the President of the United States, is not a member of the Senate, and has no authority under the Constitution to vote on any question during the trial, and he can pronounce decision only as the organ of the Senate, with its assent.

This was disagreed to, yeas 22, nays 26.

Later Mr. Sumner proposed the following :

Resolved, That the Chief Justice of the United States, presiding in the Senate on the trial of the President of the United States, is not a member of the Senate, and has no authority under the Constitution to vote on any question during the trial.

This was objected to as not relating to the subject for consideration of which the Senate had retired, and was not considered.

On April 1 Mr. Sumner offered the following :

It appearing from the reading of the Journal of yesterday that on a question where the Senate were equally divided the Chief Justice, presiding on the trial of the President. gave a casting vote, it is hereby declared that in the judgment of the Senate such vote was without authority under the Constitution of the United States.

This was rejected without debate, yeas 21, nays 27.

On April 2, 1868,<sup>59</sup> the question was taken as a motion that the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial adjourn, and there appeared yeas 22, nays 22. Thereupon the Chief Justice said "The Chief Justice votes in the affirmative," and so adjournment was voted.

2068. Discussion of the propriety of arbitrary abridgment by the Senate of the time of an impeachment trial.—On February 21, 1905,<sup>60</sup> in the Senate sitting in legislative session, Mr. Eugene Hale, a Senator from Maine, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That all proceedings in the impeachment trial now before the Senate sitting as a court shall be terminated on Saturday, February 25 next, and a final vote shall be taken on the afternoon of that day at 4 o'clock.

Later, on the same day, in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial, Mr. Hale introduced the same resolution, for action at a future time.

On February 22,<sup>61</sup> in the Senate in legislative session, Mr. Hale withdrew the resolution and submitted the following:

Ordered, That all proceedings before the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment against Charles Swaine, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, shall terminate on Saturday, February 25 next, and, in pursuance of this order, all testimony upon either side shall be closed on Friday, the 24th day of February next, and the Senate shall commence its session sitting for the trial of said impeachment proceedings at 12 o'clock meridian on said Saturday, the 25th day of February next; and, without any other motion or proceeding intervening, the counsel for the defense shall have until 2 o'clock of said day to present the case of the defendant, said time to be apportioned or divided as said counsel may determine; the managers on the part of the House of Representatives shall have, to present the case against said Charles Swaine, the time from 2 o'clock until 4 o'clock of said day, said time to be apportioned or divided as the managers may determine; at 4 o'clock, without further motion or proceeding intervening, the final vote shall be taken upon said impeachment proceedings.

In support of this resolution, Mr. Hale cited the backward condition of the legislative business.

Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, said in reply:

Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Maine that the legislative business before this Senate is of extreme importance, but I do not think that anything is of more importance than that the Senate shall give such direction to any measures which it may deem necessary for expedition of the impeachment trial as will not bring into discredit and disrepute the very high and important function which we are now performing. In trying the impeachment presented by the House we are complying with the requirements of the Constitution, through which alone the purity and integrity of the public service can be guarded and secured.

The suggestion which I desire to make in this connection, in order that a wrong impression may not go abroad, is that everything which looks to expedition of the impeachment trial should, so far as necessary and practicable, be in the nature of additional time given by the Senate to this work in the interval which now remains at our command, and that it should not be directed to the arbitrary abridgment of the necessary presentation of this case by the House of Representatives, performing, as it does, a high constitutional function in bringing and presenting to the Senate its case. If we desire that the impeachment trial shall close by Saturday, then the proper course is to give more time to it each day, so that the managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent may have before them full time in which to fully present their respective cases to the Senate. We all know that this session must end at noon on the 4th of March, and that we are limited in time by law; and the objection which I make to the suggestion of the Senator is not to his effort that we may by proper expedition in the disposition of the impeachment matter have sufficient time for the proper discharge of the important duties of another kind which devolve upon us. My objection is to the method proposed. I prefer that instead of that the direction should be given to this matter which will impose upon us, if it need be, additional labor by providing for additional time to be devoted to the trial each day, and that it be not disposed of by the suggestion of an arbitrary abridgment in the opportunity of the House of Representatives to present its case here, and of the time for the proper consideration by ourselves as to how this important matter shall be determined, and what final disposition shall be given to it.

Mr. William M. Stewart, of Nevada, said:

Mr. President, I should like to make one suggestion in regard to this matter. It is suggested that the Constitution restrains the Senate, and that to comply with the provisions of the Constitution no limitation should be put upon time. We have a constitutional right to trial by jury, we have a constitutional right to have cases heard by the courts, and the courts exercise in pursuance of that a reasonable discretion as to the time to be used. The Supreme Court of the United States have rules in regard to the time to be used in cases to be argued there, and in criminal proceedings the courts put a reasonable limit to the time to be allowed for argument. They have to facilitate a trial in order to comply with the Constitution at all.

This brought from Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, this question:

Has the Senator ever known a court before which there was a criminal case to fix a limit of time within which limit testimony for the defense should be presented?

The matter went over.

Present form and history of Rule XI of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XI of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

At 12:30 o'clock afternoon the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary shall give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of ————, in the Senate Chamber, which chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

This is the form reported and agreed to in the revision of 1868.<sup>8</sup> It was formed by uniting portions of rules 11 and 12, which had been framed in 1805<sup>9</sup> at the time of the trial of Judge Chase.

2071. The hour of meeting of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial being fixed, a motion to adjourn to a different hour is not in order.—On March 30, 1868,<sup>10</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. John Sherman moved an adjournment.

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, suggested that the adjournment be to 10 o'clock on the morrow.

The Chief Justice<sup>11</sup> said:

The hour of meeting is fixed by the rule, and the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order.

2072. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice held that the motion to adjourn took precedence of a motion to fix the day to which the Senate should adjourn.—On April 3, 1868,<sup>12</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, moved that when the court should adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. Edmunds made the point of order that the motion to adjourn took precedence.

The Chief Justice <sup>11</sup> said :

The Chair is of opinion that the motion to adjourn takes precedence of every other motion if it is not withdrawn.

Debate having arisen, the Chief Justice <sup>11</sup> said :

The Chief Justice is of opinion that, pending the question of adjournment, no debate is in order from any quarter. It is a question exclusively for the Senate. Senators, you who are in favor of the adjournment of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment until Thursday next will, as your names are called, answer "yea;" those of the contrary opinion, "nay."

And there appeared yeas 37, nays 10. So the motion was agreed to.

2074. The motion to adjourn to a certain time has been admitted in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.—On June 1, 1876,<sup>14</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, proposed this inquiry :

Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether it would be in order now to move to adjourn to a day certain, or whether the order should be properly that when the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourns, it be to a definite time?

The President pro tempore <sup>15</sup> said :

It would be in order to move to adjourn to a certain time.

2075. The Senate sits for an impeachment trial with open doors, but may deliberate on its decisions in secret.

Present form and history of Rule XIX of the Senate sitting in impeachment trials.

Rule XIX of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials," is as follows :

At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions.

The first clause of this rule is in the form adopted in 1805,<sup>16</sup> for the trial of Judge Chase. The second clause, setting forth a contingency in which the doors may be closed, was added in the revision of 1868,<sup>17</sup> preparatory to the trial of President Johnson.

On July 31, 1876,<sup>18</sup> when the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, was about to proceed to judgment, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, a Senator from Maine, proposed to amend the rule by striking off the qualifying clause, so that the proceedings should be held in open session. But the Senate by a vote of yeas 23, nays 32, declined to consider the proposition.

2076. If the Senate fail to sit in an impeachment trial on the day or hour fixed, it may fix a time for resuming the trial.

Present form and history of Rule XXV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXV of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials," is as follows:

If the Senate shall at any time fail to sit for the consideration of articles of impeachment on the day or hour fixed therefor, the Senate may, by an order to be adopted without debate, fix a day and hour for resuming such consideration.

This rule was adopted in 1868,<sup>19</sup> preparatory to the proceedings for the trial of President Johnson.

Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, a Senator, objected that the proposition was not in order.

The Chief Justice<sup>21</sup> said:

The motion comes before the Senate in the shape of an order submitted by a Member of the Senate and of the court of impeachment. The twenty-third rule requires that "all the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of rule seven." The seventh rule requires the Presiding Officer of the Senate to "submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions; but the same shall on the demand of one-fifth of the Members present, be decided by yeas and nays." By amendment this rule has been applied to orders and decisions proposed by a Member of the Senate under the twenty-third rule. The Chair rules therefore that the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is in order.

Thereupon the proposition was entertained.

2078. When informed that managers are to present articles of impeachment, the Senate, by rule, requires its Secretary to inform the House of its readiness to receive the managers.

Present form and history of Senate Rule I as to impeachments.

Rule I, of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials,"<sup>22</sup> is as follows:

Whensoever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives that managers are appointed on their part to conduct an impeachment against any person and are directed to carry articles of impeachment to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to such notice.

This rule, with two immaterial verbal changes, is in the form adopted for the trial of Judge Chase in 1804.<sup>23</sup> It merely put in form of a permanent rule the practice followed in the trials of Senator Blount and Judge Pickering. In 1868,<sup>24</sup> for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the rule received slight verbal changes, and was adopted in the form above, except the last two words, which read "said notice," instead of "such notice."

2079. Articles of impeachment being presented, the Senate is required by its rule to proceed to prompt consideration thereof.

Before consideration of articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer is required by rule to administer the oath to the Senators present, and later to others as they may appear.

The Senate, in its rules, has refrained from prescribing an oath for the Chief Justice when he presides at an impeachment trial.

The Senate is required by rule to continue in session from day to day, Sundays excepted, during impeachment trials, unless otherwise ordered.

In 1868 the Senate eliminated from its rules all mention of itself as a "high court of impeachment."

Present form and history of Rule III of the Senate for impeachment cases.

Rule III, of the "Rules of procedure and practice of the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," is as follows:

Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation or, sooner, if ordered by the Senate, proceed to the consideration of such articles, and shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) until judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as may, in its judgment, be needed. Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the Members of the Senate then present and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

This rule, which formulated the practice of previous trials, dates from 1868,<sup>25</sup> when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a series of rules for the proceedings incident to the impeachment of President Johnson. This rule was reported in form as follows:

III. Upon such articles being presented to the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation, or sooner if so ordered by the Senate, resolve itself into a high court of impeachment for proceeding thereon. A quorum of the Senate shall constitute a quorum of the court, and it shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the court) until final judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as it may, in its judgment, be needful. Immediately upon the Senate resolving itself into such high court of impeachment the Secretary of the Senate shall administer to the Presiding Officer (unless he shall be the Chief Justice) the oath required by the Constitution of the United States in such cases, and in the form hereinafter prescribed, and thereupon the Presiding Officer shall administer such oath to the Members of the Senate then present, and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear whose duty it shall be to take the same.

The wording of this language, with its references to the "high court of impeachment" and the quorum thereof, gave rise to a discussion<sup>26</sup> as to the constitutional status of the Senate in such procedure; and resulted in amendment<sup>27</sup> striking out those words, and bringing the rule in this respect to its present form. Another question arose over a proposition to strike out the words providing for administering the oath to the Presiding Officer. Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, said:

I think the Presiding Officer of the court of impeachment should be under oath, but it should be an oath different from that taken by the Members who try the case. In the rule, as reported to us, it was contemplated that the same oath should be administered to him that was administered to the Members of the Senate. I believe in former impeachment trials the Presiding Officer was sworn. There may be some difficulty about our prescribing an oath for the Presiding Officer. I think it very clear that by an act of Congress the form of an oath to be taken by the Presiding Officer might be provided, and that it would be binding. It seems an anomaly that we should have a Presiding Officer sitting here and not under any legal obligation or any moral obligation such as an oath would impose. I agree that the amendment already made excepting him from the operation of the general form of oath provided for Members of the Senate is eminently just and proper; and his exception becomes indispensable after the decision which has been made by the Senate on several occasions, withdrawing him altogether from any interference with our proceedings except on questions of order. I suppose, Mr. President, we have the same power to prescribe an oath for the Presiding Officer of the Senate that we have to prescribe an oath for the Members of the Senate, if indeed, there be any authority to bind him by such an obligation.

Mr. Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, said:

The Chief Justice of the United States is under oath. When he entered upon the discharge of his functions as Chief Justice, he took an oath to discharge all the duties that were incumbent upon him as such officer; and this duty is placed upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and was embraced in his oath to discharge his duties as Chief Justice of the United States; and any further oath than that I think would be unnecessary.

* * * I beg leave to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the reason why Senators have to be sworn, in addition to their usual oath as Senators, is that it is provided for by the Constitution, which says that "When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation;" and goes on, "When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside," but it does not say that the Chief Justice shall be sworn. In the same sentence in which the Constitution provides that the Senate shall be sworn when sitting to try an impeachment, it says that the Chief Justice shall preside, and, of course, in the absence of any requirement of a special oath, we are to understand that he is sworn to the discharge of his duties, and this duty among the rest, when he took his oath of office. I believe that is all the oath required of him.

The amendment was agreed to, bringing the latter portion of the rule into the form now existing.

Rule XXIV of the "Rules of procedure and practice of the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

FORM OF OATH TO BE ADMINISTERED TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SENATE SITTING IN THE TRIAL OF IMPEACHMENTS

"I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of _____, now pending, I will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws; So help me God."

This is the form agreed to in 1868.<sup>29</sup>

As originally reported the form of oath for Members of the Senate has this heading:

Form of oath to be administered to the Presiding Officer and Members of the Senate.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, raised the point<sup>30</sup> that the Constitution did not require the Presiding Officer to be sworn, but only the Senators. Some discussion arose over this question. Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, thought the Presiding Officer should be sworn.

Mr. Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, said that the Chief Justice was already sworn to perform his duties, and this was part of his duties as Chief Justice.

The Senate, without division, agreed to an amendment striking out the words "Presiding Officer and" from the heading.

2081. In 1876 the Senate doubted its authority to empower its Presiding Officer to administer to Senators the oath required for an impeachment trial.

In the Belknap trial the oath to Senators was administered by the Chief Justice until by law authority was conferred on the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

On April 5, 1876,<sup>31</sup> in the Senate pending proceedings for the impeachment of William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, said:

I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to a matter which I, after consultation with as many Senators as I could find, think it necessary to bring to the notice of the Senate respecting the matter of the impeachment to-day. The third rule of the Senate in regard to impeachments provides that on this day at one o'clock—

"The Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the Members of the Senate then present, and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same."

But on examination we are unable to find any statute of the United States which authorizes the President of the Senate or the Presiding Officer to administer this oath. It stands upon the rule alone. The language of the statute about the authority of the Presiding Officer is that, when Senators appear to take their seats upon an election to this body, the Presiding Officer shall swear them in, and any Senator may administer a similar oath to the Vice-President, the President of the Senate, when he appears; and there the statute stops except in respect of witnesses who are by law to be sworn by the President of the Senate.

In this state of difficulty and in the very grave doubt, at least, that in the minds of all the gentlemen whom I have been able to consult there is about this being a constitutional compliance with that requirement which obliges us to be under oath (which, of course, implies a legal and binding oath), we have thought it best for this occasion, until provision can be made by law, to submit to the Senate a proposition that the Chief Justice of the United States be invited to attend at one o'clock to-day to administer these oaths, there being no question about his authority to do so. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of Rule 3 which I have read, respecting the administration of the oath by the Presiding Officer, shall be suspended for this day; and if that be unanimously agreed to, as of course it requires unanimous consent to suspend this rule, I shall then offer an order which will accomplish the next step in the matter.

In accordance with this suggestion the rule was suspended, and the order referred to by Mr. Edmunds was submitted and agreed to.

To remedy this difficulty a bill was prepared, passed both Houses, and was approved by the President on April 18, 1876.<sup>32</sup> This empowers the Presiding Officer of the Senate for the time being to administer all oaths or affirmations that are or may be required by the Constitution or by law to be taken by any Senator, officer of the Senate, witness, or other person, in respect to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate. Also the Secretary and Chief Clerk of the Senate are respectively empowered to administer any oath or affirmation required by law, or by the rules or orders of the Senate to be taken by any officer of the Senate, or by any witness produced before it.

In accordance with this law the President pro tempore, on April 27,<sup>33</sup> administered the oath required of Senators sitting for impeachment trials, to Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh, of New Hampshire.

When the Chief Justice is to preside at an impeachment trial the Presiding Officer of the Senate is required by rule to give him notice of time and place and request his attendance.

Present form and history of Rule IV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule IV of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," provides:

When the President of the United States or the Vice-President of the United States, upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the consideration of the articles of impeachment, as aforesaid, with a request to attend; and the said Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate during the consideration of said articles and upon the trial of the person impeached therein.

The discussion of the constitutional status of the Senate in impeachment proceedings, incident to the adoption of rules in 1868, resulted in the present form of the rule. The committee having the subject of rules under consideration at that time, reported<sup>34</sup> it as a new rule in form as follows:

IV. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall be presiding officer of the high court of impeachment, except when the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, in which case the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside, notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the organization of the high court of impeachment as aforesaid, with a request to attend, and he shall preside over said court until its final adjournment.

of impeachment," amendments were offered by Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, and agreed to, which brought the rule to its present form. The debate on this rule showed the understanding to be that the Chief Justice should not be notified to attend and preside until after the articles of impeachment had been presented.

Rule V of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," provides:

The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

This rule dates from 1868, when it was reported<sup>36</sup> in nearly its present form by the committee having in charge the rules to be adopted in view of the impeachment of President Johnson. It was changed to its present form by substituting the word "Senate" for "Court" in two places, in accordance with conclusions arrived at after discussion as to the constitutional status of the Senate.<sup>37</sup>

2084. The preparations in the Senate Chamber for an impeachment trial are directed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

During an impeachment trial the Presiding Officer on the trial directs all forms not otherwise specially provided for.

The Presiding Officer on an impeachment trial may make preliminary rulings on questions of evidence and incidental questions or may submit such questions to the Senate at once.

The preliminary rulings of the Presiding Officer on an impeachment trial stand as the judgments of the Senate, unless some Senator requires a vote.

On questions of evidence and incidental questions arising during an impeachment trial the voting is without division unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth.

Discussion of the propriety of the Presiding Officer on an impeachment making a preliminary decision on questions of evidence.

Discussions of the functions of the Chief Justice in decisions as to evidence in an impeachment trial.

Present form and history of Rule VII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," is as follows:

The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the Presiding Officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the Presiding Officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present, when the same shall be taken.

The first sentence of the rule is the substance of Rule VII, adopted in 1805<sup>38</sup> at the time of the trial of Judge Chase. In 1868, at the time of the proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson, the committee of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported<sup>39</sup> it in substantially its present form, in the first draft the word "court" was generally used instead of "Senate;" but in accordance with a general principle established at that time that phraseology was changed.<sup>40</sup> Also the draft reported from the committee did not contain the last sentence of the present form.

On March 2,<sup>41</sup> while the report was under debate, Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, moved to strike out these words:

And the Presiding Officer of the court may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which rulings shall stand as the judgment of the court, unless some member of the court shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the court for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the members of the court, and insert in lieu thereof:

The Presiding Officer may, in the first instance, submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions, but the same shall, on the demand of one-fifth of the Members present, be decided by yeas and nays.

The words to be inserted were suggested by Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan.

A long debate resulted on this motion.

Mr. Drake explained his reasons:

The Constitution simply says that when the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside. In that position he has just exactly the same powers and functions that the Vice-President would have in any other case of impeachment, and no more. Now, sir, any man in the country, whether a lawyer or not, may, in the course of events, come to fill the position of Vice-President of the United States. Suppose that a man who had never been a lawyer, never made law his study, and did not know anything at all about the complex rules of evidence in the courts of justice were to be elevated to the Vice-Presidency, and the Senate should consist, as it does now, of a large majority of those who have made the law their study during a large portion of their lives, and he should be set up in the chair as the Presiding Officer of that body to decide questions of law. I will venture to say that the Senate would regard it as quite preposterous.

Now, sir, why should we set the Chief Justice there to decide these questions? We can not do it, in my opinion, without a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, which does not entitle him to any more prerogatives as the Presiding Officer of the court than the Vice-President would have in other cases.

But, sir, there is a very grave objection to this. Even taking the distinguished Chief Justice of the United States, so justly distinguished for his great mind and his great knowledge of the law, it is not proper, it is not judicious, it is not for the purposes of justice expedient that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, should ever be brought to the point of overruling a decision made by the Chief Justice of the United States sitting in the chair as the Presiding Officer of the court. It is not proper that the judgment of the Senate upon questions of law, which it must ultimately decide, if a single Senator demands its decision, should be warped, or if not warped, in any degree affected by the previous announcement of an opinion upon that question by so high a judicial officer as the Chief Justice.

Sir, it might be that, on some future occasion, when a President of the United States should be impeached again, the Chief Justice might be a very strong opponent of his, or a very strong advocate of his, and that his decisions might be influenced one way or the other by the personal considerations or the political considerations which bound him to the President or made him the President's opponent. Under these circumstances, it is not wise or judicious, in my opinion, that we should lay down a rule, not only for this trial but for all other trials, which might bring the Chief Justice, sitting as our Presiding Officer, in continual conflict with the Senate. Let the Senate decide its own questions of law. Let it not, by simple acquiescence, put the Chief Justice there to decide these questions of law. Let them come up to the work themselves and pronounce their own decision, without the necessity of appealing from his decision, and being brought into antagonism with him.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, opposed this view on the ground that the trial would be unnecessarily prolonged were the preliminary decision taken from the Presiding Officer. That was the function of every presiding officer, and he considered that "a departure from the ordinary customs and courtesies extended to presiding officers, especially in a case where the Presiding Officer was made so by the Constitution of the United States." would be a very remarkable circumstance.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, argued elaborately in the same line:

I say that the Senators alone do not constitute a perfect Senate, but the Vice-President of the United States is a part of the Senate, and has certain functions to perform as a part of the Senate, and his right to vote as an officer of the Senate is recognized under certain circumstances. When the Senators are equally divided, he has a right to vote, for the language is:

"The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided."

That is, unless the Senators be equally divided he shall have no vote; but, if they are equally divided, then he is to have a vote. Certainly he could have no vote under any circumstances unless he did, for certain purposes at any rate, constitute a part of the Senate. Then the Constitution provides that—

"The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

Then it says:

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

Does that mean solely and exclusively; that the Senators shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; or does it mean that the Senate as an organized body, constituted under the provisions of the Constitution, shall try an impeachment? I say that it means that the Senate, with the Vice-President of the United States presiding, and the Constitution contemplates that he is to participate in the trial of every impeachment, except where the President of the United States is upon trial.

"When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation."

Does that mean that the Senators alone shall be upon oath or affirmation, or does it mean that the Senate, that all the constituent Members of the Senate who participate in the trial, shall be upon oath or affirmation?

"When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside."

Now, sir, I understand the Constitution to make the Chief Justice of the United States a part of the Senate when it is engaged in trying an impeachment against the President of the United States. I do not undertake to say that he possesses the power to vote like a Senator; I will not make that declaration at this time; but he is a part of the Senate, and I maintain that the Senate, by its rules, may confer upon him such powers as it sees proper in the proceedings of the trial. He is not to be treated, when the Constitution requires him to come here and preside over this body, as a stranger and an interloper, because, under the Constitution, he has as much right to be here as any Member of this body. It is as much his duty to be here as it is the duty of any Member of this body to be here; and if he is here under the Constitution, he is here for certain purposes and must necessarily possess the powers of a presiding officer. Why should there be evinced a kind of jealousy, as it seems to me, on the part of the Senate, lest if the Chief Justice comes in here he may assume to exercise powers which do not belong to him? Are we to assume that position, and hence refuse to give to him those rights and powers and privileges which the Constitution contemplates he should have?

It seems to me that there is a perfect propriety, when the Constitution compels him to come here and preside upon the trial of the President, in allowing him, in the first instance, to decide in that court as he would in the other court where he presides as Chief Justice.

Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, while not holding that the Chief Justice might vote, considered it eminently proper that he should exercise a preliminary decision:

In the first place, he is an eminent judge, because of his position. Is he not competent, in all probability, to correctly and safely decide the questions that are likely to rise during the progress of the trial? In his office as Chief Justice he participates in the greatest decisions that are made in any court in the world, and as a judge of one of the circuits he presides over the controversies incident to life and property. Shall he not be heard to express in the first place for the Senate a judgment, and if not agreeable, the Senate shall say it is not agreeable? What harm can come of it? It brings the question directly before the body, promptly, conveniently, safely, prudently, in my opinion.

But if he is not to participate that far, to say the least of it, in the business of the body, why has the Constitution been so careful to have him here? Certainly for the purpose merely of presiding and seeing that good order is preserved in the body the Constitution would not be so careful that he should preside. Some power, it is presumed, is to be exercised by him. The Constitution presumes that and what power? To decide questions as they arise in the progress of the case, as questions ordinarily are decided, though subject, of course, to the superior will of the Senate.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, who took the view advanced by Mr. Drake, cited precedents:

We may gain information at this point from the practice and precedents under the British constitution. "The House of Lords," called at times "the court of the King in Parliament," was, like the Senate, an entirety; an ascertained, defined body. There was a presiding officer at all times, and his existence and administration was derived from the constitution as much as from our Constitution proceeds the existence of a presiding officer here. This presiding officer was sometimes a member of the House of Lords—taken from the body to preside in it, as our Presiding Officer for several sessions has been taken from the Members of the Senate. Sometimes the presiding officer in the Lords was made a member of the body contemporaneously with his installment as presiding officer—not having been a peer before, he was ennobled at the time and thus became a member. Sometimes not being a peer, and therefore not a member of the Lords, he presided without a peerage being conferred, and thus he was presiding officer, with all the prerogatives appurtenant to the presiding chair, but still was not a member of the body. By turning to the powers accorded to the Lord Chancellor as presiding officer, and to the duties and prerogatives of the lord high steward of England in the trial of impeachments, we may be able to measure the force of the expression, "When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside." A distinction has been made between the right to vote and to decide of the lord high steward between a trial before the Lords in Parliament—that is to say before the House of Lords at large and a trial before a commission of the peers. It has been insisted that the lord steward never participated in the decision if the trial was before a chosen number of the peers, but that he did take part in judgment and decision when the trial was before the House of Lords in full.

Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Chancellors, refers to this distinction; so does May in his Law of Parliament. But the journal of the House of Lords affords no reason to believe that such a difference of practice in the two tribunals was observed. On the contrary, the question whether the lord steward had or had not a vote or a contrary in giving judgment seems to have hinged entirely upon his being merely a presiding officer or being also a member of the House of Lords itself. In virtue of his place as presiding officer he seems in no case to have participated in voting or determining the cause. His right and power and designation to preside seems never to have been supposed to carry with it any permission or obligation to join in deciding questions submitted to the tribunal. In many instances the lord high steward did vote, however, in trials of impeachment, but always in virtue of his being a member of the House, independent of the fact that he was also its presiding officer.

To substantiate this I refer, first, to the case of the Earl of Ferrers, brought to the bar in 1760. The case is reported at length by Sir Michael Foster, one of the judges of the court of king's bench. The earl having been convicted, the House propounded to the judges two questions, one of which went to the power of the presiding officer and of the House without the presiding officer. The judges answered the questions after deliberation, in writing, and the reasoning appears in Foster's Crown Law at page 138 and onward. I read from page 143. Having discussed some matters incident to a trial of a peer before a commission of peers he proceeds:

"But in a trial of a peer in full Parliament, or, to speak with legal precision, before the King in Parliament, of a capital offense, whether upon impeachment or indictment, the case is quite otherwise. Every peer present at the trial (and every temporal peer hath a right to be present in every part of the proceeding) voteth upon every question of law and fact, and the question is carried by the major vote, the high steward himself voting merely as a peer and member of that court in common with the rest of the peers, and in no other right.

"It hath indeed been usual, and very expedient it is in point of order and regularity, and for the solemnity of the proceeding, to appoint an officer for presiding during the time of the trial and until judgment, and to give him the style and title of steward of England. But this maketh no sort of alteration in the constitution of the court. It is the same court founded in immemorial usage. In the law and custom of Parliament, whether such appointment be made or not.

"It acteth in its judicial capacity in every order made touching the time and place of the trial, the postponing the trial from time to time upon petition according to the nature and circumstance of the case, the allowance or nonallowance of counsel to the prisoner, and other matters relative to the trial, and all this before an high steward hath been appointed; and so little was it apprehended in some cases which I shall mention presently, that the existence of the court depended on the appointment of an high steward, that the court itself directed in what manner and by what form of words he should be appointed. It hath likewise received and recorded the prisoner's confession, which amounteth to a conviction, before the appointment of an high steward, and hath allowed to prisoners the benefit of acts of general pardon, where they appeared entitled to it, as well without the appointment of an high steward as after his commission dissolved."

On the next page, referring to the case of the Earl of Danby, he states certain proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament, and remarks—

"That the Lords' committees said 'The High Steward is but Speaker pro tempore, and giveth his vote as well as the other Lords.'"

And upon this appears the following entry:

"In the Commons' Journal of the 15th of May it standeth thus: Their lordships farther declared to the committee that a Lord High Steward was made hac vice only, that notwithstanding the making of a Lord High Steward the court remained the same and was not thereby altered, but still remained the court of peers in Parliament; that the Lord High Steward was but as a speaker or chairman for the more orderly proceeding at the trials."

This the Commons wished entered on the Lords' Journal.

On page 147, speaking of the law as laid down by the Lords, Sir Michael says:

"The letter of the resolution, it is admitted, goeth no farther, but this is easily accounted for. A proceeding by impeachment was the subject matter of the conference, and the Commons had no pretense to interpose any other. But what say the Lords? The High Steward is but as a speaker or chairman pro tempore for the more orderly proceeding at the trials; the appointment of him doth not alter the nature of the court, which still remaineth the court of the peers in Parliament. From these premises they draw the conclusion I have mentioned. Are not these premises equally true in the case of a proceeding upon indictment? They undoubtedly are."

This case and the authorities referred to in stating it seem to make it clear that the immemorial understanding in England has been that the officer whose duty it is to preside at trials of impeachment has definite functions, convenient and conducive to order, and the dispatch of business, and that the duty to vote or to decide is not among his duties or his powers. The fact of his presiding or of his being authorized or commissioned to preside, according to these cases, carries with it no right to act as a trier or a member. The same doctrine will be found in Sharswood's Blackstone, at pages 261 and 262 of the second volume. Lord Campbell, in the third volume of his Lives of the Chancellors, page 557, refers to the case of Lord Dellamere, tried in 1886 for complicity with Monmouth. Jeffries was Lord High Steward and seems to have conducted himself with all the brutality to have been expected of him. He began by a harangue to the culprit, urging him, in the presence of the king, to confess. Dellamere interposed to inquire if he was to be one of his judges, to which the Lord High Steward replied, "No, my Lord; I am judge of the court, but I am none of your triers." This trial was not before the House of Lords, but before a commission of peers, and in so far it is not a literal precedent. Here are other cases of antiquity and of note, more or less instructive, cases in which the presiding officer voted, not apparently sui juris, but by reason of his peerage.

In the trial of Lord Lovat, impeached by the Commons for high treason in 1746:

"The Lord High Steward, by a list, called every peer by his name, beginning with the lowest baron, and asked them, 'If Simon, Lord Lovat, was guilty of the high treason whereof he stands impeached or not guilty?'"

"And thereupon every Lord, standing up uncovered, answered: 'Guilty, upon my honor,' laying his right hand upon his breast.

"Which done, the Lord High Steward, standing uncovered at the chair, as he did when he put the question to the other Lords, declared his opinion to the same effect and in the same manner." (27 Lords' Journals, p. 76.)

In the trial of the Earl of Oxford and of Earl Mortimer, impeached in 1717:

"The Lord High Steward stated the question before agreed on, and asked every Lord present severally, 'Whether content or not content?'"

"And they all answering in the affirmative, as did the Lord High Steward declared his opinion also:

"The Lord High Steward declared that Robert, Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, was, by the unanimous vote of all the Lords present, acquitted of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Commons for high treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and of all things therein contained." * * * "And then the Lord High Steward stood up uncovered: and, declaring 'that there was nothing more to be done by virtue of the present commission,' broke the staff and pronounced the commission of Lord High Steward dissolved." (26 Lords' Journals, p. 525.)

The same form was observed in the case of Earls Derwentwater et al., impeached for high treason, in 1715.

In Viscount Melville's trial on an impeachment, in 1806, according to the Journal of the House of Lords—

"The Lord Chancellor having asked every Lord present, beginning with the junior baron, 'What says your lordship on this first article?' and the Lords having severally answered thereto, and the Lord Chancellor having declared his opinion also, the said several other questions were in like manner stated, and each Lord was severally asked in manner aforesaid touching the same. And the Lords having severally answered to the same, and the Lord Chancellor having declared his opinion also on each of the said questions, the Lord Chancellor declared that the answer of a majority of the Lords to each of the said questions, respectively, was 'not guilty.'"

Here are cases decided by the Lords without the vote or voice of the presiding officer—cases in which there was a presiding officer with every right as such, but without any participation in the decisions made.

In the case of Lord Chancellor Bacon, in 1621—

"The House (of Lords) being resumed, and the Lord Chief Justice returned to his place, it was put to the question whether the Lord Viscount St. Albans (Lord Chancellor) shall be suspended from all his titles of nobility during his life or no? and it was agreed per plures that he should not be suspended thereof." (40 Lords' Journals, p. 302.)

In Sacheverell's case, impeached in 1700—

"Then his lordship put the question, beginning at the junior baron first, as follows: 'Is Doctor Henry Sacheverell guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, charged upon him by the impeachment of the House of Commons?'

"And having asked every Lord present, and they having declared guilty or not guilty,

"His lordship having cast up the votes, declared him guilty." (Ibid.)

In the case of the Earl of Macclesfield, in 1725—

"It was agreed that the question to be put to each Lord, severally, shall be, 'Is Thomas, Earl of Macclesfield, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors charged on him by the impeachment of the House of Commons, or not guilty?'

"And every Lord present shall declare his opinion, 'guilty or not guilty, upon his honor', laying his right hand upon his breast.

"When the Lord Chief Justice, Speaker of this House, directed the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to bring thither the Earl of Macclesfield, who, after low obeisances made, kneeled until the said Lord Chief Justice acquainted him he might rise. (Judgment pronounced, Record of mode of obtaining the votes of the Lords on each resolution is, 'The question was put thereupon; and it was resolved in the affirmative.')

 (Ibid.)

Mr. President, there may be arguments on this point which these precedents do not answer, but, it seems to me, they confront the view presented by the Senator from Oregon. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord High Steward of England, by the British constitution, were invested with the prerogatives and powers of presiding officers. Their attributes were more potential, their sway was greater, the examples of their supremacy were more copious, than the genius of our Constitution would tolerate. And if we ascertain the full measure in the less liberal days of British monarchy of what a presiding officer might do, surrounded by peers and commissioned by the King, we shall not fall short at least of the intention of those who adopted the language to which the Senator referred. The framers of our Constitution were profoundly learned in the practice and the meaning of British law, and the word "preside," when used by them, may well be supposed not to have been selected to convey a greater meaning than had been attached to it in the great struggle of privilege and power from which they had derived the philosophy of government.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Drake was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 7.

On March 31, 1868,<sup>42</sup> at the outset of the trial, on the objection of Mr. Henry Stanbery, counsel for the President, to certain testimony, the Chief Justice ruled that the testimony was competent.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, a Senator, at once objected that the question of the competency of evidence should be determined by the Senate and not by the Presiding Officer.

The Chief Justice<sup>43</sup> thereupon said:

The Chief Justice states to the Senate that in his judgment it is his duty to decide upon questions of evidence in the first instance, and if any Senator desires that the question shall then be submitted to the Senate it is his duty to submit it. So far as he is aware that has been the usual course of practice in trials of persons impeached in the House of Lords and in the Senate of the United States.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, seconded by Messrs. John A. Bingham and George S. Boutwell, urged on behalf of the House of Representatives, (a) that the Chief Justice might not make such preliminary decision, and (b) that such decision having been made by the Chief Justice the managers as well as any Senator might call for a decision of the Senate. In presenting their views the managers quoted at length from English precedents.

The Chief Justice, stating his position more fully, said :

The Chief Justice will state the rule which he conceives to be applicable once more. In this body he is the Presiding Officer; he is so in virtue of his high office under the Constitution. He is Chief Justice of the United States, and therefore, when the President of the United States is tried by the Senate, it is his duty to preside in that body, and, as he understands, he is therefore the President of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment. The rule of the Senate which applies to this question is the seventh rule, which declares that "the Presiding Officer may, in the first instance, submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions." He is not required by that rule so to submit those questions in the first instance; but for the dispatch of business, as is usual in the Supreme Court, he expresses his opinion in the first instance: If the Senate, who constitute the court, or any Member of it, desires the opinion of the Senate to be taken, it is his duty then to ask for the opinion of the court.

Mr. Manager Butler having asked whether the right to ask the opinion of the Senate would extend to a manager, the Chief Justice replied :

The Chief Justice thinks not. It must be by the action of the court or a member of it.

The Senate having retired for consultation, Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, proposed an amendment to Rule VII which in effect struck out all after the first sentence of the present draft of the rule and inserted what is now the second sentence. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 31, nays 19, after the Senate had by a vote of yeas 20, nays 30, disagreed to the following declaration proposed by Mr. Drake :

It is the Judgment of the Senate that under the Constitution the Chief Justice presiding over the Senate in the pending trial has no privilege of ruling questions of law arising thereon, but that all such questions should be submitted to a decision by the Senate alone.

The last sentence of the rule relating to method of voting was not included by the above proceedings, and on April 1, 1868,<sup>44</sup> when a vote was about to be taken on a question of evidence, Mr. Drake insisted that, under Rule XXIII, and in the absence of a provision in Rule VII, the vote should be taken by yeas and nays.

But the Chief Justice decided :

Upon the question of order raised by the Senator from Missouri, the Chair is of opinion that he may submit this question to the Senate without having the yeas and nays taken, unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth of the Members present.

On April 2, 1868,<sup>45</sup> Mr. Drake proposed the following addition to the rule :

Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present or requested by the Presiding Officer, when the same shall be taken.

When the proposition came up for action on the next day, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, the words "or requested by the Presiding Officer" were stricken out, and then the amendment as amended was agreed to without division.

Thus the rule attained its present form.

2085. The Presiding Officer during an impeachment trial sometimes rules preliminarily on evidence and cautions or interrogates witnesses.—In the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore<sup>46</sup> of the Senate presided. On questions arising over the admissibility of testimony he usually submitted the questions directly to the Senate for decision, without expressing a preliminary judgment.<sup>47</sup> In five instances, on questions wherein the principles had already been passed on by the Senate, he ruled.<sup>48</sup> In two cases he ruled on questions not already determined by the Senate, but announced that if counsel requested he would submit the matter.<sup>49</sup>

2086. On February 13, 1805,<sup>50</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the case of the United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, John Basset, was testifying, when the following occurred:

The Witness. The court considered me a good juror, and I was sworn accordingly. After the trial had been gone through, the jury retired to their room. I informed the jury that I thought we should have the book read through.

The President<sup>51</sup> here stopped the witness, and informed him that it was useless waste of time to relate what took place in the room of the jury.

The witness, however, continuing the statement he had previously begun, the President desired him to go on, if it were necessary for the purpose of connecting the testimony he had to give; but to pass over what occurred among the jury as briefly as possible.

Also again, on April 2,<sup>54</sup> the Chief Justice interrogated William E. Chandler, a witness.

Rigid enforcement of the rule that decisions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial shall be without debate.

On June 26, 1862,<sup>55</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of the United States v. West H. Humphreys, a question arose as to the form in which the court should pronounce judgment, and debate was going on, when Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, was called to order by Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, who insisted that the rule that "all decisions shall be had by ayes and noes and without debate," should be enforced.

The President pro tempore<sup>56</sup> said:

The rule is very explicit, leaves no room for doubt that these questions are to be decided without debate.<sup>57</sup>

Mr. Davis then proposed an appeal from the decision.

The President pro tempore declined to entertain the appeal.

The President pro tempore did not explain this decision, but when Mr. John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, questioned it, Mr. O. H. Browning, of Illinois, said :

I think an appeal can not be taken from the judgment of the presiding officer of a court.

2089. The Senate elected a presiding officer for the Swayne trial, and gave him the powers of the President of the Senate for signing orders, writs, etc.—On January 24, 1905,<sup>58</sup> the President pro tempore (William P. Frye, of Maine) in the Senate sitting in legislative session, requested that he be relieved of the duty of presiding at the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne. Thereupon the Senate chose Mr. Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, as presiding officer for the trial.

On the same day Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Rules, made a statement as follows :

Mr. President, the rules of the Senate governing the sessions of the Senate when it is sitting in the trial of impeachments seems to draw a distinction between the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the presiding officer on the trial. Rule V provides :

"The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules, or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide."

The forms of summonses and subpoenas are all signed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. In order to remove all possible question as to who shall sign the mandates of the Senate, including subpoenas, I offer the regulation which I send to the desk. * * *

The Constitution invests each House with the power, without limit, to make its own rules of procedure. Under the Constitution the function of trying impeachment cases devolves upon the Senate, and the provision of the Constitution must be construed as authorizing the Senate to make the rules which it may deem necessary for the proper discharge of all of the duties and functions developed upon it by the Constitution. The Senate has, I think, within its power and with perfect propriety under the circumstances, appointed a Senator to preside, using the language of the rule to be, "the presiding officer on the trial." That clearly vests in him the functions, as I think, of passing upon the admissibility of evidence and upon the various questions which may arise in the course of the trial.

This question is one which must be determined at once, for a summons is to be issued to Judge Swayne to appear, and it is important, of course, that there shall be no doubt that the officer signing the summons has the power to do so.

Mr. Spooner offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the Senate :

Resolved, That the presiding officer on the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be, and is hereby, authorized to sign all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials and by the Senate.

The proceedings of an impeachment trial are reported like the legislative proceedings.

Present form and history of Rule XIII of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

The Secretary of the Senate shall record the proceedings in cases of impeachment as in the case of legislative proceedings, and the same shall be reported in the same manner as the legislative proceedings of the Senate.

This rule was framed in 1868,<sup>60</sup> preparatory to the impeachment of President Johnson.

2091. In an impeachment trial all preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions are argued not over an hour on a side.

The Senate, by order, may extend the time for the argument of motions and interlocutory questions in impeachment trials.

In arguing interlocutory questions in impeachment trials the opening and closing belong to the side making the motion or objection.

The Senate declined to sanction unlimited argument on interlocutory questions in impeachment trials.

The rule limiting the time of arguments on interlocutory questions in impeachment trials does not limit the number of persons speaking.

Present form and history of Rule XX of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment.

Rule XX of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time.

This rule dates from 1868, when the rules were revised preparatory to the trial of President Johnson. The committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported<sup>60</sup> the rule in this form:

XX. All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued by one person only on each side, and for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the court shall, by order, extend the time.

This rule was debated at great length and amended to its present form on March 2.<sup>61</sup> It was first objected by Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, that there should be a provision giving the opening and closing to the one making the motion or objection, and also dividing the time. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, however, answered this satisfactorily by saying that the committee had considered the question, and concluded that the provisions would be unnecessary, since it was habitual for the counsel making the motion or raising the objection to yield after taking a portion of his time, and then conclude after his opponent. The committee conceived that this would be the practice under this rule.

Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, moved an amendment striking out the provision limiting the argument to one person on each side, which was agreed to without division. A motion by Mr. Frelinghuysen to change the time limit from one to two hours was disagreed to, yeas 20, nays 24, and a third amendment proposed by him, to add at the end the words "before the argument commences," was disagreed to—yeas 10, nays 33.

Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, proposed to strike out the rule altogether, as contrary to the Senate's practice of unlimited debate, and as an innovation on the practice of all preceding impeachment trials. It was argued that interlocutory questions might be of the greatest importance, and that the argument thus limited might be one on which the result hinged. On the other hand, it was urged that impeachment trials, notably in England, were often prolonged, and that the Senate should provide against this at the outset. The motion to strike out was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 23.

So the rule was left in its present form.

2092. On April 1, 1868,<sup>62</sup> during the trial of President Johnson, a question arose, and the Chief Justice<sup>63</sup> said :

Senators, the Chair will state the question to the Senate. The twentieth rule provides that—

"All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time."

The twenty-first rule provides :

"The case on each side shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the the House of Representative."

On looking at these two rules together, the Chief Justice was under the impression that it was intended by the twentieth rule to limit the time, and not limit the persons; whereas, by the twenty-first rule, it was intended to limit the number of persons and leave the time unlimited; and he has acted upon that construction. He will now, with the leave of the Senate, submit to them the question : Does the twentieth rule limit the time without respect to the number of persons? Upon that question the Chair will take sense of the Senate.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative nem. con.

The Chief Justice then said :

The Senate decides that the limitation of one hour has reference to the whole number of persons to speak on each side, and not to each person, severally; and will apply the rule as thus construed.

2093. On April 27, 1876,<sup>64</sup> during the proceedings in the trial of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the counsel for the respondent moved a postponement of the further hearing of the case until the first Monday of the next December, and for the discussion of this motion Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked that the Senate make an order temporarily modifying the rule, so as to admit of two hours on a side. This request was granted by the Senate by a vote of yeas 48, nays 13, an order to that effect being offered and acted on at the same sitting.

2094. In impeachment trials all orders and decisions of the Senate, with certain specified exceptions, are by the yeas and nays.

During impeachment trials in the Senate the yeas and nays on adjournment are procured by one-fifth and not by rule.

The orders and decisions of the Senate in impeachment cases are without debate, unless in secret session.

Debate in secret session of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials is limited by rule.

On the decision of the final question in an impeachment case, debate in secret session of the Senate is limited to fifteen minutes to each Senator.

Present form and history of Rule XXIII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXIII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate; but a motion to adjourn may be decided without the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded by one-fifth of the members present. The fifteen minutes herein allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not to the final question on each article of impeachment.

This rule dates from 1868,<sup>65</sup> when a committee reported a revision in preparation for the trial of President Johnson. The rule was debated on March 2<sup>66</sup> and was amended in matters of detail, so it stood practically in its present form as far as the last sentence, which had not at that time been added.

On March 13,<sup>67</sup> in the Senate as organized for the trial, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, arose and said:

To correct a clerical error in the rules or a mistake of the types which has introduced a repugnance into the rules, I offer the following resolution by direction of the committee which reported the rules:

"Ordered, That the twenty-third rule, respecting proceedings on trial of impeachments, be amended by inserting after the word 'debate' the words 'subject, however, to the operation of rule seven.'"

If thus amended the rule will read:

"All orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of rule seven, except when the doors shall be closed, etc."

The whole object is to commit to the Presiding Officer the option to submit a question without the call of the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded. That was the intention originally, but the qualifying words were dropped out in the print.

The order was agreed to without division.

The last sentence of the rule, "the fifteen minutes herein allowed," etc., was added on March 7, 1868, on motion of Mr. Charles Drake, of Missouri, immediately before the Senate proceeded to pronounce judgment in the case of President Johnson.<sup>68</sup>

On July 31, 1876,<sup>69</sup> when the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, was about to proceed to judgment, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, a Senator from Maine, proposed an amendment which would have stricken out the words "except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation." This amendment was proposed in connection with one to Rule XIX, which would have abolished secret sessions in impeachment trials. The Senate, by a vote of yeas 23, nays 32, declined to consider either amendment.

2095. In the Senate, sitting for impeachment trials, the doors may be closed for consultation on motion put and carried.—On February 16, 1905,<sup>70</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a question arose as to the admissibility of certain evidence, and Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, moved that the doors be closed for deliberation, or, in case the motion should be otherwise, that the Senate retire to its conference chamber.

A question arose as to the interpretation of the rule, and the Presiding Officer said:

The rule is as follows:

"All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate."

The Presiding Officer is of the opinion that the consent of the Senate applies to the time during which a Senator may speak upon a question, and not to the question whether the Senate may proceed in the Senate Chamber as a court without closing the doors.

Mr. Bailey thereupon asked unanimous consent that the doors be closed. There being objection, he made a motion.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer will submit the motion to the Senate. Will the Senate order the doors to be closed for the purpose of deliberating upon the question?

There appeared yeas 53, nays 18. So the doors were closed.

2096. Secret sessions of the Senate to discuss incidental questions arising during an impeachment trial.—On May 14, 1876,<sup>71</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the doors were closed and the galleries cleared, while deliberation was going on as to the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try a civil officer who had resigned and whose resignation had been accepted. And the Senate continued to deliberate with closed doors until the decision of the question, on May 29.

2098. On the final question whether an impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays are taken on each article separately.

If an impeachment is not sustained by a two-thirds vote on any article a judgment of acquittal shall be entered.

If the respondent be convicted by a two-thirds vote on any article of impeachment the Senate shall pronounce judgment.

A certified copy of the judgment in an impeachment case is deposited with the Secretary of State.

Discussion as to whether or not the Chief Justice, presiding at an impeachment trial, is entitled to vote.

The reasons for eliminating from the Senate rules for impeachment trials the words "high court."

Present form and history of Rule XXII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

On the final question whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately; and if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted upon any of said articles by the votes of two-thirds of the Members present, the Senate shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

This rule was framed in 1868,<sup>73</sup> when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a revision of the rules in view of the approaching trial of President Johnson. As reported the rule was as follows:

XXII. If the impeachment shall not be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Members of said high court of impeachment present and voting a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted by the votes of two-thirds of the Members of such court present the court, by its Presiding Officer, shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

On motion of Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, and without division, an amendment was inserted<sup>74</sup> at the beginning, in the following words:

On the final question, whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately and;

Then Mr. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, proposed an amendment<sup>75</sup> so changing the first clause of the rule that it would read:

On the final question, whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately, and if the impeachment shall not be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present a judgment of acquittal shall be entered.

This proposition, by substituting the words "Senators" for "high court of impeachment," brought up the question as to whether or not the Chief Justice would have a vote. Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio said:

Now, if a Presiding Officer is elected by the Senate, either on account of the sickness or absence or inability of the Vice-President to preside, he would undoubtedly have a right to vote. The Presiding Officer would undoubtedly have a right to vote, because he is not only a Senator having a personal right to his seat as a Senator, but he is a representative of a State, and that State would have a right to vote; and his mere election as Presiding Officer would not disfranchise him from voting.

Under these circumstances, when the President is to be tried, the Constitution declares, the Senate still having the sole power to try all impeachments, that the

Chief Justice shall preside over that tribunal. What does that mean? That he shall be here simply as a figurehead? No, sir. In every case where a man is made the presiding officer of any tribunal, of any convention, of any political body, it necessarily implies the right to vote, unless that implication is excluded by the instrument itself. There is no doubt whatever but that the Vice-President of the United States could vote every day in our proceedings but for one thing; and that is, that the Constitution carefully excludes him from the right to vote except in case of a tie. But who doubts that but for that single clause of the Constitution which declares that the Vice-President of the United States shall not vote except in case of a tie he could do it? Suppose the clause read "the Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate;" suppose it stopped there; would not the Vice-President have a right to vote? The very implication drawn from the fact that he is the Presiding Officer of the Senate would give him a vote; but it goes and says, "but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided." The very fact that this language was used to exclude him from the right to vote shows that in the absence of that language he would have the right to vote.

And, sir, when the Chief Justice is substituted in the place of the Presiding Officer of this body, without any exclusion from the right to vote, without any exception made as against him, he is made a member of this court, to participate in the proceedings of this court; and it does seem to me, in the absence of all other precedents of exclusion or constitutional provision, he would have a right to vote. I do not know that the Chief Justice would take the same view of it or desire to vote, but it does seem to me that the Constitution, by substituting his high officer here as the Presiding Officer of this body, did not intend to make him a mere instrument or medium to put a question to the body, but intended to make him a part of the tribunal or court to try the case.

Mr. Howard, of Michigan, said:

The amendment of the Senator from Maine adopts, in effect, the language of the Constitution itself, as I understand it; and so far I think it entirely proper to be adopted. I must, however, now and at all times, so far as I can see my way, repel the idea that the Chief Justice is a member of the so-called court of impeachment, or has any right to vote during the deliberations of that court, or upon any question arising during the trial. I do not propose to go into it further now, although I see the gravity of the question, and have for some time been entirely sensible of it.

I will say, however, before I take my seat, that if we regard the analogies presented to us in the constitutional history of England, the same result which I claim to be the truth here will be arrived at. The House of Lords sit as a high court of impeachment. They are presided over when thus sitting either by the Lord Chancellor or the Lord High Steward; and the precedents are numerous and clear that the Lord Chancellor, although thus presiding, or the Lord Steward thus presiding, has no vote in the House of Lords in virtue of his presidency of the body; but if he be a peer he has, in right of his peerage, the right to vote; but it is put upon that ground, and that ground only. As president of the body he has no right even to decide questions where the body is equally divided.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, referred to the important question raised and suggested that, to avoid that question, the amendment be modified so as to read "members present" instead of "Senators present." That would be the very language of the Constitution.

Mr. Morrill finally yielded to that request and the modified amendment was agreed to without division.

A little later the Senate recurred to Rule VII again, and after discussion of the powers of the Chief Justice in presiding, determined upon such amendment of that and other rules as to eliminate the words "high court of impeachment" wherever they occurred, the object evidently being to remove all idea that the Chief Justice had any other function than to preside.<sup>76</sup> In fact, the Chief Justice did vote on an occasion when the vote of the Senate was a tie,<sup>77</sup> on March 31, but did not vote in the final judgment.<sup>78</sup>

Mr. Peter G. VanWinkle, of West Virginia, then proposed<sup>79</sup> an amendment to the second clause so it should read as follows:

But if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted by the votes of two-thirds of the members of such court present, the court shall proceed to ascertain what judgment shall be rendered in the case, which judgment, being rendered, shall be pronounced by the Presiding Officer, etc.

This was in view of the fact that the Constitution does not say that the punishment shall necessarily extend to disqualification to hold office. Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, suggested that the same result could be attained by striking out the words "of such court" and "by its Presiding Officer." Mr. VanWinkle accepted the amendment, which was agreed to without division.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, next proposed to insert after the words "impeachment shall not" the words "upon any of the articles be presented," and after the word "convicted" the words "upon any of said articles."<sup>80</sup>

The object of this amendment was to make it certain that a conviction on one article, as on one count of an indictment, should be sufficient for judgment, after the analogy of the criminal law. The amendment was agreed to without division.

So the rule received its present form.

2099. In 1804 the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, considered and adopted rules for the trial.—On December 10, 1804,<sup>81</sup> the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, took into consideration the report of the committee appointed on November 30 to prepare and report proper rules of proceedings, to be observed by the Senate in cases of impeachments.

This report consisted of a series of rules, prescribing forms and methods of procedure. On this day the high court agreed to a portion of the rules, and then postponed the consideration of the remainder.

On December 24 the high court resumed consideration of the report, and agreed to the remaining portion.

In the meanwhile, on December 14, action had been taken in accordance with the rules agreed to on December 10.

2100. Where the special rules for impeachment trials are silent, the general rules of the Senate are regarded as applicable.

At the Johnson trial the Chief Justice felt constrained to submit to the Senate for decision a question of order affecting the organization.

At the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that one point of order might not be made while another was pending.

The Chief Justice ruled in the Johnson trial that debate must be confined to the pending question.

Instance of an appeal from the decision of the Chief Justice on a question of order arising during the Johnson trial.

In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that a proposed rule or order should lie over for one day.

On March 6, 1868,<sup>82</sup> while the Senate was organizing for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the Chief Justice had taken the chair as presiding officer, and while the oath was being administered to the Senators, an objection was made to the competency of Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, to take the oath.

Discussion having arisen, Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan submitted a question of order.

The Chief Justice<sup>83</sup> said :

The Senator from Connecticut is called to order. The Senator from Michigan has submitted a point of order for the consideration of the body. During the proceedings for the organization of the Senate for the trial of an impeachment of the President the Chair regards the general rules of the Senate as applicable and that the Senate must determine for itself every question which arises, unless the Chair is permitted to determine it. In a case of this sort affecting so nearly the organization of this body the Chair feels himself constrained to submit the question of order to the Senate. Will the Senator from Michigan state his point of order in writing?

While the point of order raised by Mr. Howard was being reduced to writing at the desk, Mr. James Dixon, of Connecticut, submitted as a point of order whether a question of order such as was pending could be raised.

The Chief Justice said :<sup>84</sup>

A point of order is already pending, and a second point of order can not be made until that is disposed of.

Mr. Howard's question was then submitted in writing, as follows :

That the objection raised to administering the oath to Mr. Wade is out of order, and that the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to postpone the administering of the oath to Mr. Wade until other Senators are sworn, is also out of order under the rules adopted by the Senate on the 2d of March, instant, and under the Constitution of the United States.

The Chief Justice announced that this question was open to debate.

Mr. Dixon having proceeded in debate, was discussing the competency of Mr. Wade to participate in the trial, when Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, called him to order for not confining himself to the question under consideration.

Thereupon the Chief Justice held :

The Senator from Ohio makes the point of order that the Senator from Connecticut, in discussing the pending question of order, must confine himself strictly to that question, and not discuss the main question before the Senate. In that point of order the Chair conceives that the Senator from Ohio is correct, and that the Senator from Connecticut must confine himself strictly to the discussion of the point of order before the House.

Mr. Dixon having proceeded, was again called to order by Mr. Howard, who objected that no debate was in order under Rule XXIII of "the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials." This rule he quoted as follows :

All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, except when the doors be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak, etc.

The Chief Justice overruled the point of order, saying :

The twenty-third rule is a rule for the proceedings of the Senate when organized for the trial of an impeachment. It is not yet organized; and in the opinion of the Chair the twenty-third rule does not apply at present.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having appealed, the Chief Justice put the question :

As many Senators as are of opinion that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" as many as are of the contrary opinion will answer "nay."

And there were yeas 24, nays 20; so the decision of the Chief Justice was sustained.

The Chief Justice in conducting the business of the court adopts for his general guidance the rules of the Senate sitting in legislative session as far as they are applicable. That is the ground of his decision.

Ordered, In answer to the motion of the managers, that under the rule limiting the argument to two on a side unless otherwise ordered, such other managers and counsel as choose may print and file arguments at any time before the argument of the closing manager.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the order, and Mr. Sumner having demanded its consideration, the Chief Justice<sup>85</sup> said :

The Chief Justice stated on Saturday that in conducting the business of the court he applied, as far as they were applicable, the general rules of the Senate. This has been done upon several occasions, and when objection has been made orders have been laid over to the next day for consideration.

2103. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice admitted a motion to lay a pending proposition on the table.—On April 13, 1868,<sup>87</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, an order relating to the final arguments in the trial, was under consideration.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, said :

I raise a question of order, Mr. President, that in this Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment there is no authority for moving to lay any proposition on the table. We must come to a direct vote, I think, one way or the other.

The Chief Justice<sup>85</sup> said :

The Chief Justice can not undertake to limit the Senate in respect to its mode of disposing of a question; and as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] announced his purpose to test the sense of the Senate in regard to whether they will alter the rule at all the Chief Justice conceives his motion to be in order.

2104. Instance wherein a Senator sitting in an impeachment trial was excused from voting on an incidental question.—On May 15, 1876,<sup>88</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question arose as to the sufficiency of the pleadings. After the arguments had been concluded, but before the Senate had rendered a decision, Mr. James L. Alcorn, a Senator from Mississippi, attended and took the oath prescribed for Senators sitting in impeachment trials.

Having taken the oath, Mr. Alcorn rose and stated that he had been unavoidably absent from the sessions of the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment heretofore held, and for that reason he asked to be excused from voting upon the question now under consideration presented by the pleadings.

Thereupon Mr. John Sherman moved that Mr. Alcorn, for the reasons stated, be excused from voting on the question as presented by the pleadings and now before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

2105. Instances of a call for a quorum in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.

The Presiding Officer of the Senate sitting in an impeachment trial directed the counting of the Senate to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

On April 22, 1868,<sup>89</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, during the argument of Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell, the attendance after a recess was so scanty that Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, moved a call of the Senate under the then existing Rule 16 of the Senate. The motion was carried and the roll was called.

2106. On May 4, 1876,<sup>90</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, commented on the fact that less than a quorum were present, and moved a call of the Senate.

And thereupon the roll was called.

2107. On June 16, 1876,<sup>91</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, suggested that there was no quorum present, and asked the President pro tempore to ascertain.

The President pro tempore<sup>92</sup> said :

The Secretary will count the Senate.

The Chief Clerk having counted the Senators present, the President pro tempore announced that the Senators present did not constitute a quorum.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Edmunds, the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to request the attendance of absentees.

This having failed to secure sufficient attendance, the Senate thereupon adjourned.

The Chair is informed that there is a message to be submitted from the House of Representatives. If there is no objection the proceedings of the trial will be temporarily suspended for that purpose.

A message was received from the House of Representatives.

After which the President pro tempore said :

The Senate resumes its session sitting for the trial of the impeachment.

Later another message was received in the same way.<sup>56</sup>

2109. On July 19, 1876,<sup>56</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. William Windom, a Senator from Minnesota, asked that the proceedings might be suspended in order that he might make a report from the committee of conference on the sundry civil bill.

The President pro tempore<sup>57</sup> said :

If there be no objection proceedings will be suspended for that purpose.

After some time spent in legislative session, the Senate resumed the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

2110. Admission to the Senate galleries during the Johnson trial was regulated by tickets.

On March 4, 1868,<sup>58</sup> Mr. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, during the proceedings preliminary to the trial of President Andrew Johnson, proposed the following :

Ordered. That during the trial of the impeachment now pending no person besides those who now have the privilege of the floor shall be admitted to the galleries, or to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the Senate and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Such tickets shall be numbered, and shall be good only for the day on which they are dated. The number of tickets issued shall not exceed the number of persons who can be comfortably seated in the galleries, leaving the steps and passages entirely free. The portion of the gallery set apart for the diplomatic corps shall be exclusively appropriated to it, and tickets of admission thereto shall be issued to the foreign legations. Four tickets shall be issued to each Senator, 2 tickets to each Member of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets to the Chief Justice and to each justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 tickets to the chief justice and to each justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and 2 tickets to the chief justice and to each judge of the Court of Claims. Sixty tickets shall be issued by the Presiding Officer to the reporters for the press, and the remaining tickets shall be distributed under his direction.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, shall carry out these regulations, and, with the approbation of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, shall be authorized to employ such additional force as may be necessary for the preservation of order.

On March 6<sup>59</sup> this proposition was referred to the select committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, and which had in charge the forms of procedure and arrangements for the trial.

On March 10<sup>1</sup> Mr. Howard reported the order with amendment. There was considerable debate as to the propriety of making any rule, the argument being that the public should not be excluded. On the other hand it was urged that order and decorum during the trial were of great importance, and that there should be arrangements which would secure an audience disposed to preserve order.

Another question that was discussed at length was the provision for seating Senators. At the Humphries trial the Senators had occupied benches placed at the right and left of the presiding officer. Senators who had sat during those proceedings objected to such arrangement as uncomfortable and also as inconvenient because of difficulty in hearing. It was pointed out that the attendance of Members of the House was not likely to be large, as already in the preliminary proceedings not over fifty had attended at any one time. Finally, on motion of Mr. Anthony, an amendment was agreed to providing that the Senators should occupy their usual seats during the trial. The order as amended was agreed to as follows:

That during the trial of the impeachment now pending no persons besides those who have the privilege of the floor and clerks of the standing committees of the Senate shall be admitted to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the Senate and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The number of tickets shall not exceed 1,000.

Tickets shall be numbered and dated, and be good only for the day on which they are dated.

The portion of the gallery set apart for the diplomatic corps shall be exclusively appropriated to it, and 40 tickets of admission thereto shall be issued to the Baron Gerolt for the foreign legations.

Four tickets shall be issued to each Senator, 4 tickets each to the Chief Justice of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets to each Member of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets each to the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 tickets each to the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, 2 tickets to the chief justice and each judge of the Court of Claims, 2 tickets to each Cabinet officer, 2 tickets to the General commanding the Army, 20 tickets to the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, for the use of the President, and 60 tickets shall be issued by the President pro tempore of the Senate to the reporters of the press. The residue of the tickets to be issued shall be distributed among the Members of the Senate in proportion to the representation of their respective States in the House of Representatives, and the seats now occupied by the Senators shall be reserved for them.

Ordered, That after to-morrow the order of the 15th of March ultimo, relative to admission to the gallery, be suspended until further order, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate shall take special care that order shall be observed in the galleries during the trial of the impeachment now pending, and he is hereby authorized to arrest and bring before the Senate any person who violates the orders of the Senate, and he shall take effective measures to secure admission to the diplomatic gallery, the ladies' gallery, and the reporters' gallery to those only who are entitled to admission thereto under the rules.

On April 2<sup>3</sup> the resolution was debated briefly. Mr. Sherman intimated that the audiences had not been very orderly, and that the people who would attend with open galleries would do as well.

On April 4<sup>4</sup> the proposition was debated, principally as to the conduct of the audiences, but was not acted on and apparently did not come before the Senate again.

On May 5<sup>5</sup> a proposition to give seats in the gallery to the members of the United States Medical Association was discouraged in debate, and did not come to a vote, it being urged that they could seek admission by tickets in the usual way.

2111. According to the best considered practice, the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial does not obtain the use of Senate archives without an order made in legislative session.—On April 4, 1868,<sup>6</sup> in the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of the production of testimony on behalf of the House of Representatives, asked that the Executive Journal of the Senate for a certain date might be produced, and he asked that the Senate direct its production.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, a Senator, moved that the Journal be furnished.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Justice<sup>8</sup> said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that that is an application which can only be addressed to the Senate in legislative session. If the court desire it, he will vacate the chair in order that the President pro tempore may take it.

Very soon thereafter, on motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, "the Senate sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment adjourned to 12 o'clock m. to-morrow."

Thereupon the President pro tempore resumed the Chair, and in the course of legislative business, on motion of Mr. Johnson, it was:

Order. That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish to the counsel for the President a statement of the beginning and end of each executive and legislative session from 1789 to 1868.

2113. During the trial of President Johnson the Senate voted to receive resolutions of a State constitutional convention on the subject of the impeachment.—On March 25, 1868,<sup>9</sup> while proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson were going on before the Senate, the President pro tempore<sup>10</sup> laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention of North Carolina, returning thanks for the vigilance with which the House and Senate had proceeded in the matter of impeachment.

Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, said:

I object, Mr. President, to the reception of that paper, and for this reason: It purports to be addressed to the Senate of the United States, and the Members of the Senate of the United States compose the court of impeachment, and any communication addressed to the Members of that court upon the pending subject is improper to be entertained by the Senate, the Senate composing that court, as being an attempt to exercise an influence upon the minds of the judges.

The President pro tempore put the question on the reception of the resolutions, and the Senate voted to receive them.

The resolutions were then laid on the table.

2114. In the Swayne trial a Senator who had not heard the evidence was excused from voting on the question of guilt.—On February 27, 1905,<sup>11</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, as the vote was about to be taken on the first article, Mr. P. C. Knox, of Pennsylvania, said :

Mr. President, having been prevented by illness from attending the sessions of the Senate sitting in this impeachment trial at which the testimony was produced, and also having been prevented by the effects of the illness from reading the testimony, I ask that the Senate may excuse me from voting upon this and all subsequent roll calls taken to ascertain the judgment of the Senate upon the charges against the respondent.

The Presiding Officer said :

Senators, you have heard the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox]. Those who would excuse him from voting will say "aye;" opposed, "no." [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it. The Senator from Pennsylvania is excused.

2115. The expenses of the Senate in the Swayne trial was defrayed from the Treasury.—On January 24, 1905,<sup>12</sup> the Senate, in legislative session, agreed to this resolution :

Resolved, etc., That there be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Charles Swayne.

On July 7, 1797,<sup>e</sup> when articles of impeachment from the House of Representatives were exhibited in the Senate against William Blount, a Senator, it was ordered that he be sequestered from his seat and enter into recognizance for his appearance to answer said impeachment.

Mr. Blount thereupon named his sureties, who were satisfactory to the Senate, and the recognizance was approved by the Senate and executed in its presence as follows:

Be it remembered, That on the 7th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1797, personally appeared before the President pro tempore and Senate of the United States William Blount, esq., Senator of the State of Tennessee; Thomas Blount, esq., Member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of North Carolina, and Pierce Butler, esq., of South Carolina, who severally acknowledged themselves to owe to the United States of America the following sums, that is to say: The said William Blount the sum of $20,000, and the said Thomas Blount and Pierce Butler each the sum of $15,000, to be levied on their respective goods and chattels, lands, and tenements, on the condition following, that is to say:

The condition of the foregoing recognizance is such that if the said William Blount shall appear before the Senate of the United States to answer to certain charges of impeachment to be exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, and not depart therefrom without leave, that then the above recognizance shall cease to exist, otherwise be and remain in full force and virtue.

2120. Under the parliamentary law the respondent answers the summons in custody if the case be capital and the accusation by special, but not if it be general.

The accusation being of misdemeanor only, the respondent, under the English usage, does not answer the summons in custody, but the Lords may commit him until he finds sureties for his future appearance.

Under the parliamentary law the respondent, if a Lord, answers the summons in his place; if a Commoner, at the bar.

Under the English practice a copy of the articles is furnished to the respondent and a day is fixed for his answer.

According to the parliamentary law the respondent, on accusation for misdemeanor, may answer the articles by person or by writing or by attorney.

A respondent in a case of impeachment for misdemeanor answers the articles before the Lords in such a state of liberty or restraint as he was in when the Commons complained of him.

In English impeachments the respondent has counsel in accusation for misdemeanor, but not in capital cases.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Appearance. If he appear, and the case be capital, he answers in custody; though not if the accusation be general. He is not to be committed but on special accusations. If it be for a misdemeanor only, he answers, a Lord in his place, a Commoner at the bar, and not in custody, unless on the answer the Lords find cause to commit him till he finds sureties to attend and lest he should fly. (Seid. Jud., 98, 99.) A copy of the articles is given him and a day fixed for his answer. (T. Ray.; 1 Rushw. 268; Fost., 232; 1 Clar. Hist. of the Reb., 379.) On a misdemeanor his appearance may be in person or he may answer in writing or by attorney. (Seid. Jud., 100.) The general rule on accusation for a misdemeanor is that in such a state of liberty or restraint as the party is when the Commons complain of him, in such he is to answer. (Ib., 101.) If previously committed by the Commons, he answers as a prisoner. But this may be called in some sort judicium parlium suorum. (Ib.) In misdemeanors the party has a right to counsel by the common law, but not in capital cases. (Seid. Jud., 102, 105.)

2121. Under the parliamentary law the answer of the respondent to impeachment need not observe the great strictness of form.

The respondent in an impeachment case may not, under the English law, plead in his answer a pardon as bar to the impeachment.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Answer. The answer need not observe great strictness of form. He may plead guilty as to part and defend as to the residue; or, saving all exceptions, deny the whole, or give a particular answer to each article separately. (1 Rush., 274; 2 Rush., 1374; 12 Parl. Hist., 442; 3 Lords' Journ., 13 Nov., 1643; 2 Wood., 607.) But he can not plead a pardon in bar to the impeachment. (2 Wood., 615; 2 St. Tr., 735.)

2122. Under the parliamentary law of impeachments the pleadings may include a replication, rejoinder, etc.—In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Replication, rejoinder, etc. There may be a replication, rejoinder, etc. (Seid. Jud., 114; 8 Grey's Deb., 233; Sach. Tr., 15; Journ. House of Commons, 6 March, 1640-41.)

2123. The pleadings were the subject of full discussion during the Belknap trial.

The extent of dilatory pleadings in the Belknap trial was commented on as an innovation on American and English precedents.

In the Belknap trial the House was sustained in averring in pleadings as to jurisdiction matters not averred in the articles.

The articles of impeachment in the Belknap case were held sufficient although attacked for not describing the respondent as one subject to impeachment.

The Senate having assumed jurisdiction in the Belknap impeachment, declined to permit the respondent to plead further, but gave leave to answer the articles.

On May 4, 1876,<sup>9</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore announced that the Senate had adopted the following :

That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amendable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such arguments discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material, and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

As to the second question referred to, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, summarized thus :<sup>9</sup>

Briefly, the attitude of the case is this :

The articles of impeachment charge that the respondent, Belknap, was at one time Secretary of War, and while holding that office did certain things which are declared by said articles to be high crimes and misdemeanors.

The respondent pleads to the jurisdiction of the court that when this proceeding was commenced he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen.

The first replication avers that he was Secretary of War when he committed the acts complained of, and the respondent has demurred.

A second replication by the House charges that after the acts were committed the House had commenced an investigation, with a view to impeachment, and that the respondent with full knowledge of the fact resigned his office, with intent to evade impeachment. This replication has closed in issues of fact which are pending for trial.

The court has ordered an argument in regard to the sufficiency of the plea in abatement, the materiality of the issues of fact, and also whether the House can support the jurisdiction by matters alleged in subsequent pleadings, but not alleged in the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord summarized<sup>10</sup> more at length :

For the proper consideration of these questions it is expedient that at this stage of the case I call your attention precisely to what the issues are. I do not intend to read the pleadings in full, but only such parts of them as may be necessary for the understanding of this point. Article 1 presents as follows :

"That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post.

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500 in consideration of the appointment of said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time."

Then in article 3:

"Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

"Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office."

The defendant in this case answered to these articles:

"And the said William W. Belknap, etc., says, that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States."

The House of Representatives duly adopted and filed a general and special replication. A part of the latter is as follows:

"The House of Representatives of the United States say that the said William W. Belknap, after the commission of each one of the acts alleged in the said articles, was and continued to be such officer, as alleged in said articles, until and including the 2d day of March, A.D. 1876, and until the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation of his official conduct as such officer in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles, and the said committee was considering the report it should make to the House of Representatives upon the same, the said Belknap being at the time aware of such investigation and of the evidence taken and of such proposed report.

"And the House of Representatives further say that while its said committee was considering and preparing its said report to the House of Representatives recommending the impeachment of the said William W. Belknap for the matters and things set forth in the said articles, the said William W. Belknap, with full knowledge thereof, resigned his position as such officer on the said 2d day of March, A.D. 1876, with intent to evade the proceedings of impeachment against him. And the House of Representatives resolved to impeach the said William W. Belknap for said matters as in said articles set forth on said 2d day of March, A.D. 1876."

To this replication the defendant rejoins, among other things, that the—

"Chairman of said committee then declared to said Belknap that he, said Clymer, should move in the said House of Representatives, upon the statement of said Marsh, for the impeachment of him, said Belknap, unless the said Belknap should resign his position as Secretary of War before noon of the next day, to wit, March the 2d, A.D. 1876: and said Belknap regarding this statement of said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid, as an intimation that he, said Belknap, could, by thus resigning, avoid the affliction inseparable from a protracted trial in a forum which would attract the greatest degree of public attention and the humiliation of availing himself of the defense disclosed in said statement itself which would cast blame upon said other persons, he yielded to the suggestion made by said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid."

There is a joinder in demurrer and a surrejoinder by the House of Representatives, a portion of which surrejoinder I will read:

"And the said House of Representatives, as to the first and second subdivisions of the rejoinder to the second replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the defendant to the said articles of impeachment, wherein the said defendant demands trial according to law, the said House of Representatives, in behalf of themselves and all the people of the United States, do the like."

Now, I call the attention of this court to the fact that in regard to two of the allegations made in the second replication by the House the defendant tendered issues and the House of Representatives joined in such issues, and I shall argue to this court and produce authorities presently to show that the defendant, having thus tendered issues joined in by the House, he can not go behind them, and can not question the right of this tribunal to hear and determine the matters thus brought before it.

Then there are four special rejoinders which the defendant made. One of them I have read to this court. In regard to each of the other three not read, the House of Representatives tendered an issue to be tried by this court; and what does the defendant do? Does he say that these matters are improperly before this court? Does he say that any injury will result to him in having these facts fully and fairly and truthfully investigated by this tribunal? Not at all. So far from it, with great formality he tenders a similiter in the following words:

"And the said Belknap, as surrejoinders of said House of Representatives to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth rejoinders of the said Belknap to the second replication of said House of Representatives above pleaded, whereof said House of Representatives have demanded trial, the said Belknap doth the like."

We say that they are estopped upon every principle known to legal proceedings, known to the trial of cases in court, from attempting now to evade these issues. It was very proper on the part of this tribunal to raise this question, if it saw fit, but I apprehend, when the authorities are reviewed upon this point it will be seen that it was too late for anybody to raise this question. Of course any question involving the jurisdiction of this court may be raised at any time; but on questions which do not involve its jurisdiction, but only facts pertaining thereto, no matter in what form of pleading these facts get before it, it is too late, when both parties have so tendered issues to be tried by this tribunal, for the defendant or for any member of this court to prevent such trial; and this I shall show abundantly by the authorities. If otherwise this tribunal, the most august in the land, supposed above all others capable of reaching to the direct truth regardless of forms and ceremonies, has not the power of a court of a justice of the peace; for I affirm that on the other side not one authority can be found, in the whole range of authorities, showing that when issues are joined on questions of fact before the most inferior court it has not the power to try and determine them; and therefore the question amounts to this: Has this tribunal less authority than the most inferior court in the United States or in any other land?

The first authority I introduce upon this point affirms this doctrine, that the plaintiff in his replication may introduce new matter to fortify his declaration. Now what is the question before this court? The very resolution gives us the victory in this regard; it assumes that such facts are in aid of a pertinent question before this court in support of its jurisdiction. I admit we could allege no new offense in this way; we could tender no new or distinct issue upon the merits as to the crime or misdemeanor which this defendant committed; but the question which he raises is a dilatory one, it is not one relating at all to his guilt or his innocence. It is a question of jurisdiction. He raises that question and affirms certain facts relating thereto; and we, in aid of that jurisdiction, bring in certain other facts relating thereto. This is the true statement of the case; we did what we have done in aid of the jurisdiction, and this the pleader may always do.

After the citation of various authorities, Mr. Manager Lord con- tinued: <sup>11</sup>

I call the attention of the court now to the report of a committee of the British House of Commons, a learned and intelligent committee, a committee which has made a report that will go down with the ages, and I apprehend be received as the law on this subject so long as civilization exists. I call attention to Burke's Works, seventh volume, page 490, where the committee consider the "rules of pleading in courts of impeachment." I never have heard yet of any rule as to pleadings in a criminal court besides the indictment and the plea. Sometimes a defendant puts in what we call a special plea. If a question of jurisdiction is raised it is usually raised ore tenus. But what are the rules of pleading in this court? Such committee say:

"Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading, as observed in the inferior courts, have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament, in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception as of false or erroneous pleading hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament as not coming within the form of the pleading."

The members of this court know the distinguished character of Mr. Walpole not only as a lawyer but as a statesman.

Mr. Walpole said—

"Those learned gentlemen (Lord Wintoun's counsel) seem to forget in what court they are. They have taken up so much of your lordship's time in quoting of authorities and using arguments to show your lordships what would quash an indictment in the court below that they seem to forget they are now in a court of Parliament and on an impeachment of the Commons of Great Britain."

"A great writer on the criminal law, Justice Foster, in one of his discourses, fully recognizes those principles for which your managers have contended, and which have to this time been uniformly observed in Parliament. In a very elaborate reasoning on the case of a trial in Parliament (the trial of those who had murdered Edward the II) he observes this: 'It is well known that in parliamentary proceedings of this kind it is, and ever was, sufficient that matters appear with proper light and certainly to a common understanding, without that minute exactness which is required in criminal proceedings in Westminster Hall. In these cases the rule has always been loquendum et vulgus.'"

We say, therefore, if the articles are defective and the second replication not of strict right, all is cured by rejoinder, surrejoinder, and similiter. And in regard to the main question presented by the second replication—not the most conclusive question perhaps, but it may be called the main question of the second replication—namely, whether this defendant has the right to evade the Constitution and defeat its operations by his own will, he confesses and avoids. He admits on the record that he resigned for the purpose of evading this impeachment. It is true he says he was not guilty, and resigned for other purposes; but that is utterly immaterial to this question, because he does admit, I repeat, that he resigned for the purpose of defeating this impeachment.

I will not stop, Senators, to answer the suggestion of counsel that the chairman of that committee had the right, in behalf of this nation, and in behalf of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, to make a contract with the defendant that if he would get out of the office of Secretary of War before a certain hour he should not be impeached for these high crimes and misdemeanors, which, if these articles are true, had polluted him for years, and made him of all men that have ever appeared in a court of impeachment the most unfit to hold civil office. I deny such a right. I am astonished that counsel of respectability and of high standing should stand in this court and assume for a moment that the chairman of a committee had a right to make any such infamous contract; but that is one of the issues. I was surprised the more to hear it stated here, because it is one of the issues. The allegation of such agreement we absolutely deny; we deny that any such contract was made. By our surrejoinder we tender an issue upon that question, and it is accepted by the other side by filing their similiter.

Reference has been made also to the fact that the Constitution leaves the defendant subject to an indictment, and that an indictment may be found against him. The two proceedings, Senators, are entirely and absolutely distinct. One has nothing to do with the other, for the statute to which the counsel referred (sec. 1781 of the Revised Statutes) does not pretend to change the law or rules of impeachment.

Now I wish to call the attention of this tribunal to another consideration, and that is that on this question you are not to give the defendant the benefit of any of those rules which are provided for criminal cases. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that he is accused as a criminal, and that this proceeding is a criminal proceeding, so that when we get to the merits he may say that he is entitled to the presumption of innocence, that he is entitled to be defended by counsel—and certainly he has illustrious counsel—that he would be entitled to the right of challenge before a jury, and is entitled to confront the witnesses; assuming that this was an indictment and he was before one of the courts of the land and should stand up and claim all these privileges, they of course would be given to him, and we do not care about challenging them here. For the sake of the argument, we admit that here upon the merits he has all these privileges, so far as applicable in this court. What I say is that on this question of jurisdic-

This is not one of the questions over which the law watches with such jealousy to guard the rights of a defendant. So long as it is true that no case of fact can be made, no evidence can be offered under which speculation may not peer: so long as it is true that sometimes innocent men suffer; so long as that maxim exists in our law that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men go free than that one innocent man suffer, the common law will allow a person accused of crime the presumption and privileges we have referred to. But what these questions to do with a mere abstract question of law? The question now presented to you has nothing to do with his guilt or innocence; it has nothing to do with his imprisonment; it has nothing to do with any question personal to himself. It is purely a legal one, and must be considered precisely as though it arose in a civil action, excepting, as before suggested, that he has not all the privileges in this regard that he would have in a civil action. When a defendant in a criminal action raises a dilatory plea it does not receive the consideration which it does in a civil action.

What is the object in pleading in criminal actions? Allow me to call the attention of the court to 2 Archbold's Criminal Practice and Pleadings, sixth edition, volume 2, page 206:

"The object of pleading, whether in civil or criminal actions, is to inform the parties of the facts alleged by each against the other with such clearness and distinctness as to enable them to prepare for the trial of disputed facts or for the application of the law to those which are admitted. In its application to criminal cases it is a statement of crime imputed to the prisoner with such a particularly of circumstances only as will enable him to understand the charge and prepare for his defense, and as will authorize the court to give appropriate judgment upon conviction."

At common law a defendant in a criminal action was not allowed to plead in abatement as in civil action (1 Archbold, p. 110; Barber's Criminal Law, p. 343), and can not tender a bill of exception. (Garbett's Criminal Law, vol. 2, p. 521.) Therefore you see, Senators, that while the law has always been watchful to protect life and liberty, intending that no innocent man should be falsely accused of crime, yet in regard to the surroundings of the case, in regard to the mere question of pleadings, he has certainly had no more privilege, and certainly has now no more privilege, than in a civil action.

I pass now to the second branch of the question presented by the order of the Senate, and that is on the materiality of the allegations of the second replication and of our rejoinder. We did not regard the replication as tendering a material issue, and for that reason we might, and perhaps ought to have, demurred; but having, as we believed, a conclusive answer to it in the rejoinder which we made, we chose that course, preferring that in this maneuvering for position—that is all it amounts to—our friends on the other side should not have the advantage of us.

It needs no argument to show that if only persons holding office are amenable to impeachment it must be charged in the articles that they hold office; and describing the defendant as "late Secretary of War" does not bring him within the description of persons given in the Constitution as amenable to impeachment. It would not be sufficient for them to have alleged that "the defendant does not now hold office, but was an officer at one time, and resigned in order to avoid impeachment." That would not have been sufficient certainly, for, if so, an ordinary court of justice might entertain jurisdiction of a person who had not been served with process upon an allegation that the defendant, hearing that it was intended to serve process upon him, had incontinently taken himself out of the jurisdiction of the court. There is no imaginable difference between the cases. We heard that they intended to impeach us, and, as the Constitution limited the prosecution to persons in office, we stepped over the line, just as a citizen of the United States who happens to be in New York, and learns that somebody there wants to serve him with a writ, betakes himself to New Jersey.

A man has a right to avoid lawsuits. The defendant here had a right, however innocent he might have been, to avoid the ruin which the law-books tell him attend invariably the prosecution of a private person by this overwhelming power. No sensible man, unless he had ample means, would undertake a conflict of that sort if he could avoid it and character enough to stand before the country to justify his action. But the Supreme Court of the United States have settled again and again an analogous question that a man residing in one State may convey his property to persons outside of it to give a court jurisdiction, provided he does it in good faith. That principle was decided in the case of McDonald v. Smalley (1 Peters, 120); also Smith v. Kernochen (7 Howard, 198); Jones v. Lee (18 Howard, 76); Briggs v. French (2 Sumner, 252).

The court also holds in those cases that a man may change his residence from a State in order to assert his title to property within that State in the Federal courts against persons holding it adversely provided he changes his residence in good faith. Does anybody doubt that we resigned in good faith? Does anybody suppose or suspect that the defendant's was a colorable resignation: that he is to be restored to office when this prosecution ceases? Certainly not. And therefore the case corresponds entirely in principle to the decision I have cited. If jurisdiction may be obtained by the voluntary act of a party done in good faith, no reason can be suggested why a jurisdiction may not be avoided by a voluntary act done also in good faith. We were inclined to demur to the original pleading, and the original pleading is defective in the point that I have already brought to the attention of the court in not describing this defendant as one subject to impeachment, and in describing him in fact as a person who is not subject to impeachment, because it says that he was "late Secretary of War."

On the third question which is presented for consideration by the order of the Senate I think little need be said. They can not amend their articles by a new assignment in a replication. Nobody ever heard of an amendment of an indictment; and I may add that the court in the case of Barnard held that articles of impeachment were not amendable. I could, by looking over the books, perhaps find some accidental decision of a refusal of a court to allow an indictment to be amended. Indictments are quashed for defects which could be amended at any stage of a civil action as of course, and a new indictment must be found before further proceedings can be had. This, with the decision in the case of Barnard, at page 192, volume 1, that there could be no amendment of articles of impeachment, will dispose of the question suggested by the order of the Senate as to whether a necessary allegation not made in the articles could be supplied in the subsequent pleadings.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, also of counsel for respondent, said:<sup>13</sup>

This court can only acquire jurisdiction, in a proceeding of impeachment, by articles presented by the House, showing a case of impeachable criminality; that is, a case where the act complained of is impeachable, and the actor subject to impeachment. In other words, the articles must be such as to require no aid from subsequent pleadings. In this case the articles describe the respondent as "late Secretary of War." Within the strictness of allegation required by common law criminal courts such descriptive persons would not be equivalent to an allegation that he was no longer in that office. Therefore, and to meet the view sometimes entertained that a citizen holding one office may be impeached for misconduct in another, we interposed the plea to the jurisdiction, stating affirmatively that at the time of impeachment the respondent was not any officer of the United States. He was impeached at the bar of the Senate—if formal announcement that articles would be presented against him is an impeachment—on the 2d day of March, A.D. 1876. Some of the articles charge that he continued to be Secretary of War to or until (I forget which) the 2d day of March. This excludes the 2d day of March from his holding office; therefore, if we are right in contending that only a person holding office can be impeached, the articles fail to show a case within jurisdiction.

And I think it would have been safe for us to demur to the articles. But not wishing to take risks upon a technical construction, we thought it safer to plead affirmatively the fact that the respondent was not holding any office at the time of impeachment. Undoubtedly, to any plea of the respondent in confession and avoidance of the articles, the prosecution might have relied in confession and avoidance; but not so to a plea which, in substance, is denial of any fact which should have been stated in the articles, to show jurisdiction. If the articles themselves are deficient in not stating any fact necessary to entire jurisdiction—jurisdiction of the offense and the offender—then this court never acquired jurisdiction.

It results from the fact that this court has only a special jurisdiction, that the first pleading must show a case within the jurisdiction. This was held with regard to jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States in Brown v. Keene (8 Peters, 112); Jackson v. Ashton (8 Peters, 148); Hodgson v. Bowerbank (5 Cranch, 303); Mossman v. Higginson (4 Dallas, 12), and Jackson v. Twentyman (2 Peters 136).

The honorable manager [Mr. Lord] yesterday referred us to two cases—2 Chitty's Reports, 367, and 2 Maule & Selwyn, 75. These were actions of quo warranto—that is, civil suits to try the title to an office, to be followed by a judgment for damages and costs. The court held, what everybody would concede, that resignation did not preclude final judgment.

One Senator at least—Senator Howe—will remember a somewhat remarkable case of this kind in our own State, where he happened to be on the winning and myself on the losing side. I refer to the case State on the relation of Bashford v. Barstow. In this case, after the court had declared its jurisdiction, the attorney-general came into court and filed a discontinuance.

But the court held that the case was really a civil cause, in favor of the relator, against Barstow, who was in possession of the office; that the State had no interest in the question, and was only a formal party.

The learned manager also asserted that in a criminal cause there could be no such thing as a replication and rejoinder. If he will take the trouble to examine Wentworth's Pleadings he will find that he is in error; and if he will examine Archbold's Criminal Pleadings he will find the very forms from which we have drawn our pleadings subsequent to the plea in abatement.

On May 20<sup>14</sup> the Senate, after several days of deliberation, agreed to these resolutions, the first by a vote of yeas 37, nays 29, and the second by a vote of yeas 35, nays 22.

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

2. Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution [fixing the time for delivering this judgment] the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law, and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught, which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid."

On June 1,<sup>15</sup> after the announcement of the decision, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, commented on the effect of the findings:

The defendant first pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court. The managers filed a replication, to which the respondent demurred; and the managers joined in the demurrer.

The rule is that each pleading must answer the preceding one. The replication, if sufficient in law, was a valid answer to the plea. The validity of the replication in matter of law was put in issue by our demurrer. And had the court upon the demurrer held the replication bad, then the court would have looked back to the plea itself to see whether or not it was sufficient in law; and if it had found the plea to be bad, then the court would have held in favor of the prosecution; upon the principle that a bad replication is as good as the bad plea to which it is a response. But in this case the court overruled our demurrer to the replication, thus holding the replication a sufficient answer to the plea. Was there therefore any necessity for the court to go back through the record and pass upon the sufficiency of prior pleadings? The plea to the jurisdiction having been answered by a replication which the court held good by overruling our demurrer to it, what was the necessity for the court to go back through the record? The only question raised by the plea was the jurisdiction of this court over the respondent; and whether or not the prosecution was entitled to a final judgment, or whether the judgment should be respondeat ouster, is a question to be examined.

But I submit with great confidence that the question of sufficiency in law of the articles of impeachment was not before the court; and that after judgment upon the question of jurisdiction, of respondeat ouster, the respondent was at liberty to begin his defense, as he might have done without questioning the jurisdiction.

In case on indictment, when the defendant challenges the jurisdiction of the court, and fails to make good his objection, he is remitted to every privilege he would have possessed if he had commenced his defense with questioning the jurisdiction; that is, he may move to quash, or he may plead in bar, or plead the general issue.

If I were compelled alone to take the responsibility in this case I should plead no further, but leave the managers to their own course; and in that case would not the managers be entitled to move for final judgment? This would be so, I think, had the issue been one of fact only. But here there was an issue of law and several issues of fact, all of which the court has disposed of by the order just entered.

We have appeared and pleaded, and if the court have held our defense insufficient, may we not stand upon it, without filing further pleadings? My impression is that the next step to be taken is for the managers to move for judgment, after which we could move for leave to plead further, which I have no doubt the court would grant.

All this, of course, is upon the supposition that the court has overruled the plea to the jurisdiction. The order declaring the jurisdiction was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present. That is, less than two-thirds of the Senate think there is jurisdiction to convict the respondent.

Manifestly a court which has not jurisdiction to convict has no jurisdiction to try the respondent; and such pretended trial would be wholly extrajudicial. No witness could be indicted for false swearing at such trial, nor punished for contempt for not obeying a subpoena.

It therefore becomes a very important question to be settled by the respondent's counsel, whether any, and if any what, further steps should be taken on the part of the respondent. An order has been entered in the record, as an order of the court, overruling the plea to the jurisdiction. But the journal of the proceedings shows that thirty-five Senators concurred in the order, and twenty-two dissented.

Speaking for myself only (not having consulted with my colleagues), I maintain that upon the whole record the order is void, for the reason that it was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

One question which the learned counsel has discussed before you the managers do not feel authorized to discuss while the order of this Senate remains. By its order the demurrer to the replication of the House of Representatives is overruled, the plea of the defendant is overruled and held for naught, and the article of impeachment are held sufficient. Now, apprehending that this order has been made upon due consideration, that the Senators understood all these pleadings and made this order in that view, we do not feel called upon, I repeat, to discuss the questions pertaining thereto until some motion is made to change the order; and if such a motion should be made, if the Senate, after this deliberation and after this carefully prepared order, takes into consideration the question whether it will change its order, then the managers will desire to be heard.

And on June 6,<sup>16</sup> when the Senate was determining the length of time to be allowed to the respondent to answer on the merits, Mr. Manager William P. Lynde said:

We have already been occupied for several weeks with dilatory pleadings. We have had a plea to the jurisdiction of the Senate. It has been suggested by the counsel for the respondent that they would yet demur, or ask leave of the Senate to demur, to the articles of impeachment. The managers believe that these dilatory pleadings have been indulged in by this Senate quite too long and without a precedent. I find no precedent either in England or in this country for dilatory pleadings on impeachment. In the first case tried under our Constitution against Senator Blount, it is true, the respondent filed a plea to the jurisdiction which is regarded as a dilatory pleading; but that was without authority and without precedent. There never had been a case in England where a plea of that kind had been allowed to be put into articles of impeachment, and it stands alone in this country.

The time which has already been occupied in this case must satisfy the Senate that it is not right that these dilatory pleadings should be introduced or allowed. In the case of Judge Barnard in New York, where the counsel for the respondent applied to the court for leave to file a demurrer or leave to move to quash certain articles of impeachment, the court refused the request and required the defendant to plead to the merits, stating that in the course of the trial of the case all those questions of law could be availed of by the parties and would be decided by the court.

Now, we think that if a precedent of this kind is established, if this Senate will go on and hear dilatory plea after dilatory plea, first a plea to the jurisdiction, a plea in abatement, then a demurrer to the form, there is no end; and when shall we arrive at a trial of this case upon the merits? If there was an officer of this Government now in office who endangered the liberties of the people, who was engaged in a conspiracy against the Government, and he stood impeached before the Senate, if these dilatory pleas were allowed, the evil to be apprehended from his action might be carried into effect and realized. And yet it is claimed that it is a matter of right by the respondent, on the other side, and the courts of impeachment of this country have, by precedent at least if not by direct vote, decided that when an officer of the Government is impeached he can not be suspended from the functions of his office while the trial is progressing. No; it has been the aim and intention of the courts in all cases of impeachment that a speedy trial should be had, that the respondent should be required to answer to the merits, and then the court would consider the question, and the whole question, and protect and save the country.

Mr. Carpenter also raised another question: <sup>17</sup>

The question of the sufficiency in law of the articles themselves has not been raised by a demurrer thereto, has not been argued by either side, nor submitted to the court. The only question raised, argued, or submitted was the question of jurisdiction of the defendant; that is, whether the court had power to pass upon the sufficiency of the articles, or take any other step whatever in the cause. Had the court affirmed jurisdiction (as I claim it has not), then we could have moved to quash the articles, or demurred to them, or joined issue for trial. I do not hesitate to affirm that none of these articles, with possibly one exception, state the necessary facts to constitute a good indictment. Mere rhetoric and denunciation will not do. It is not enough to say that the defendant has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors; but the articles must state every fact which is an element of crime. And although the same strictness of pleading has not been required in cases of impeachment as in ordinary criminal causes, yet every fact relied upon to constitute the crime must be stated; and on the trial the proof can not go beyond the averments of the articles. In the several impeachment trials in this country defendants have not resorted to formal pleadings. In Blount's case his response was more like an answer to a bill in chancery than a pleading in a criminal cause. It was a plea to the jurisdiction, a demurrer, and answer, all in one.

But I assume that where the respondent chooses to avail himself of formal and particular pleading, which the experience of a thousand years has shown to be essential to the protection of innocence, this court will not deny the right, at least without a hearing.

I therefore assume that the court, on its attention being called to the very sweeping terms of this order, will, of its own motion, vacate so much of it as holds that the articles of impeachment are sufficient in law.

The sufficiency in law of the articles is as material to the conviction of the respondent as is the truth in point of fact of the matters therein charged. Before there can be a conviction several things must be established:

First. That the defendant, in fact, has done, or omitted to do, certain things;

Second. That the things he has done or omitted constitute a crime;

Third. And not merely a crime, but a high crime or misdemeanor, meriting impeachment; and Fourth. That the respondent is subject to impeachment, and this court has jurisdiction over him for the hearing and determination of this cause.

If any one of these elements be wanting, there can be no conviction. And of course, as soon as any one of these propositions is established in favor of the respondent he is entitled to an acquittal. I think the point as to jurisdiction has been determined in his favor, inasmuch as more than one-third of the Senate has declared against jurisdiction. But what course we ought to take as a matter of expediency—whether we should move to vacate the order altogether and that the respondent be dismissed; or demur to the articles; and if the demurrer is overruled, answer to the merits and go to trial—should only be determined after consultation of the respondent's counsel.

To this Mr. Manager Scott Lord replied: <sup>18</sup>

One other suggestion. We apprehend that the true object of all trials, civil or criminal, is to reach the merits at the earliest moment. The defendant here stands accused by impeachment, having been a high officer of the Government, of certain crimes and misdemeanors. He has put in one dilatory plea, and that has occupied all his time. He now proposes, after this Senate has so deliberately entered this order; after it, having examined all the pleadings, has found these articles of impeachment sufficient, to try again in that direction. He proposes to demur to the articles of impeachment; and while I can not, perhaps, strictly call a demurrer a plea, yet, in a broader sense, it is. The defendant proposes another dilatory proceeding; I may call it properly another dilatory plea. And how many shall he have? It is absolutely in the discretion of the Senate whether to give him this privilege or not. It is in the discretion of any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, unless controlled by statutory law.

This defendant accused of these high crimes, after having by his dilatory plea occupied weeks of time, seeks further delay. After this court, under rules which are broader and more liberal than in other courts in regard to pleadings, has deliberately overruled his demurrer, deliberately held his plea for naught, and that the only pleading before this tribunal is the pleading called the "articles of impeachment," and after this court has solemnly adjudged that these articles are sufficient, the defendant by his learned counsel asks you to go back into the courts of law, for rules not binding even there. He wants you to adopt the rules which he says are held in criminal courts, and give him the right, under all the circumstances of this case, to put in this further dilatory plea, because he says what? That he could go into a criminal court and take up these articles of impeachment, and one by one satisfy the tribunal that the pleading would not be good as an indictment. What if he could, and what if the technical rule availed here? It nevertheless is in the discretion of this court whether it will allow him again to stand on a technical point instead of proceeding to the merits. I apprehend it is an application which will not be favored by the Senate. I apprehend this Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will hardly take the position, after this deliberate order, that it will open the whole case again, and for what? Not from a sense of justice to the defendant; not for the purpose of ascertaining the truth; but simply that learned counsel skilled in the criminal courts may stand in this august tribunal and urge that these articles of impeachment have not all the words and phraseology which he thinks would be necessary in a court of criminal jurisdiction to maintain an indictment.

I will not now discuss the question whether the articles of impeachment are sufficient. The counsel himself has confessed the rule that pleadings in this court are entirely distinct and separate as to mere technical rules from pleadings in ordinary criminal proceedings. This court has a broader range; it has an easier path in its high jurisdiction to reach the merits, and therefore I may say, with all respect to this tribunal, that it would be a most extraordinary proceeding, in the judgment of the managers, for this court, without claim of any possible injustice to the defendant, to open this case for another dilatory plea instead of requiring him to go to trial upon the merits.

The Senate finally <sup>19</sup> discarded an order providing that the respondent "have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days," and agreed to the following:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days, by respondent, to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

This question of pleadings was touched upon also in the final arguments, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, speaking<sup>20</sup> at length on the view already advanced by him, and Mr. Manager Scott Lord opposing.<sup>21</sup>

2124. The answer of respondent is part of the pleadings of an impeachment trial, and exhibits in the nature of evidence may not properly be attached thereto.—On February 3, 1905,<sup>22</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, at the end of the portion of respondent's answer relating to the first article of impeachment, certain exhibits were attached to show the practice of other Federal judges in certifying their expense accounts to the Department at Washington. Judge Swayne was accused in the first article of rendering false accounts.

At the conclusion of the reading of this portion of the answer, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said :

Mr. President, we have attached as exhibits to this answer to the first article three certificates, one from the fifth, one from the seventh, and one from the ninth judicial circuits of the United States, which show that, almost without exception, the amount of $10 per diem was drawn by each and all of the judges, both of the circuit and district courts of those circuits, in their attendance outside of their districts, under the provisions of the law. We have been unable up to the present time to secure from the Secretary of the Treasury the additional certificates for the other districts.

After concluding the reading of the entire answer of the respondent, Mr. Thurston said :

Now, Mr. President, referring to the fact that certain exhibits which we desired to attach to our answer to article No. 1 had not been attached because of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury in the short space of time has been unable to furnish it to us we move as follows :

Counsel for respondent move on order giving them leave to hereafter attach to the answer herein to article 1, as exhibits, additional copies of certificates of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amounts certified to and received from the United States by the judges of the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, and eighth judicial circuits, as their reasonable expenses for travel and attendance while holding court away from the place of their residences, and outside of their respective districts, in the year 1903 it having been impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and furnish the same to respondent up to the present time.

Mr. Manager Palmer said that the managers did not admit that these exhibits were material,<sup>23</sup> but that they would not object except on the question of delay that might be caused.

Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, offered this order :

Ordered, That the respondent, Charles Swayne, have leave to hereafter, not later than the 10th instant, attach as further exhibits to his answer to article 1 of impeachment copies of the certificates of the Secretary of the Treasury, referred to in said answer, showing the amounts certified to and received from the United States by the judges of the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, and eighth judicial circuit as their reasonable expenses for travel and attendance while holding court away from the place of their residence, and outside of their respective districts, in the year 1903.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, said :

Mr. President, as a matter of good practice—and I presume we are to conduct this trial according to good practice—it seems to me that this is a request for time in which to exhibit evidence as a part of the pleadings. If this matter is admissible before this court at all, it is admissible as evidence. It does not occur to me as an appropriate proceeding to be giving time in which counsel for the respondent may file evidence with their pleadings. That is as I look at it. If it were desirable to give the counsel time to prepare new allegations I should not object to an order for that ; but I do object to having this court put into the attitude of expressly and by order providing for delay, in producing as a part of the pleadings, what properly, as it seems to me, belongs only to the production of evidence.

Mr. Manager Palmer also said :

If, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Bailey], it is true that these exhibits are to be considered as evidence, then certainly they ought to be attached before the managers are asked to reply. We had expected to ask until next Monday to reply or to demur or to except to this answer, and the answer ought to be complete before we are asked to reply to it. If this time is postponed until the 10th of February our answer will have been in, and if these matters are matters of evidence it might be quite a serious consideration. Therefore we object to the extension of the time until the 10th of February.

Mr. Thurston then said :

The President, the respondent and his counsel are so anxious to interpose no obstruction to the speedy trial of this case that if, as suggested, our motion would be taken as a ground for asking delay we here and now withdraw it.

The Presiding Officer announced :

The motion is withdrawn, and the Chair supposes the order proposed by the Senator from Indiana is also withdrawn.

So the subject was dropped.

2125. Counsel for respondent in the Swayne trial interposed a plea as to jurisdiction of offenses charged in certain articles, but declined to admit that it was a demurrer with the admissions pertinent thereto.

During time of presentation of testimony in the Swayne trial counsel of respondent were permitted to file a brief on their pleas to jurisdiction.

Form of brief on plea to jurisdiction filed by counsel for respondent in Swayne trial.

On February 22, 1905,* in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, after the counsel for the respondent had begun to present testimony, but before they had concluded, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said :

Mr. President, the respondent has at all times insisted, and still does insist, upon the pleas to the jurisdiction as to the first seven counts. It had been the purpose of my associate, Mr. Higgins, to present our statement and arguments with respect to those as a part of his opening statement. In deference to the evident wish of the Senate and to the imperative demand for the completion of the legislative duties of the Senate, he decided to waive that privilege.

We have prepared a statement and argument as to those pleas to the jurisdiction which we could, of course, use on the final arguments in the case. But we feel it would be fairer to the Senate and to the manager to present those now, and as our position upon the pleas to the jurisdiction and as a part of our presentation of the case we now ask to present our statement and argument and have it printed in the Record, so that the Senate and the managers may have an opportunity before the close of the case to consider it. [To the managers on the part of the House.] Is there any objection?

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, replied that the managers did not object.

The Presiding Officer<sup>25</sup> said:

The brief prepared by counsel on the question of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles will be inserted in the Record unless there be objection on the part of the managers or of Senators.

Mr. Thurston then said:

Mr. President, I feel it is our duty to state that this presentation of the historical, constitutional and parliamentary procedure in impeachment proceedings has been prepared not by counsel for respondent, whose names are attached to it, but by a gentleman who is renowned as a scholar along constitutional lines and a lawyer of great ability, and without naming him we wish to disclaim any credit that may attach to the preparation of this document.

Mr. Manager Palmer then stated a question, and the following occurred:

Mr. Manager PALMER. Are you demurring to the first seven articles of impeachment upon the ground that they do not charge an impeachable offense? Is that the idea?

Mr. THURSTON. Our pleas are in to that effect, if the manager has read them.

Mr. Manager PALMER. Exactly. I understand you are filing a demurrer to the first seven articles on the ground that they do not charge impeachable offenses.

Mr. THURSTON. We did interpose special pleas to those articles.

Mr. Manager PALMER. And this argument is intended to support those pleas?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. Manager PALMER. Of course your demurrer admits the truth of all that is stated in those articles.

Mr. THURSTON. I beg pardon.

Mr. Manager PALMER. It could not be a demurrer if it did not.

Mr. THURSTON. I beg pardon, Mr. President. We have not demurred. Our pleas stand, and the manager can take any legal view of them that he chooses to present.

The heading and signatures of the document were as follows:

2126. The managers being introduced in the Senate and having signified their readiness to exhibit articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer directs proclamation to be made.

Form of proclamation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms when managers bring articles of impeachment to the Senate.

Articles of impeachment being exhibited by the managers, the Presiding Officer says that the Senate will take proper order and inform the House thereof.

In 1868 the Senate ceased in its rules to describe the House of Representatives while acting in impeachment cases as the grand inquest of the nation.

Present form and history of Rule II of the Senate rules for impeachments.

Rule II of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced at the bar of the Senate and shall signify that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the [Presiding Officer] of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words, viz: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against _____;" after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The origin of this rule is found in the trial of William Blount in 1797.<sup>26</sup> In 1804<sup>27</sup> at the impeachment of Judge Pickering, the committee having charge of the rules—Messrs. Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont, Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia, Robert Wright, of Maryland, and William Cocke, of Tennessee—made a new draft of the words to be repeated after proclamation. At the trial of Blount they had been:

All persons are commanded to keep silence while the Senate of the United States are receiving articles of impeachment against _____, on pain of imprisonment.

Mr. Tracy's committee modified this to this form:

All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachments, articles of impeachment against _____

For the trial of Judge Chase, in 1805, the rule was adopted in practically the identical form agreed to by Mr. Tracy's committee, except that the words "sitting as a court of impeachments" were omitted.<sup>28</sup> There does not seem to have been significance in the omission of these words, since the articles of impeachment against Judge Chase were received by the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment. In 1868, during the proceedings against President Johnson, the rules were revised, but the committee reported<sup>29</sup> this rule in the form as used since 1805. While the rules were under debate on February 29, Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, said as to the language of the announcement:

In the Constitution which the fathers adopted, after grave consideration, they said that the House of Representatives should impeach an officer. We say that "the grand inquest of the nation" shall impeach. Where is the advantage of this new language? Why not make proclamation in the Senate here that "the House of Representatives impeaches the President of the United States?" It is not sufficiently high sounding is all the trouble about it. It expresses exactly the thought that the Constitution does, truly and correctly, and does not refer us to some body of men not known to our system of government.

The matter was not further discussed, and on March 2,<sup>30</sup> on motion of Mr. Hendricks, without further debate or diversion, the words "grand inquest of the nation" were stricken out and "House of Representatives" inserted. So the rule came to its present form.

2127. Upon presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate for the trial, a writ of summons is issued to the accused.

The writ of summons to one accused in articles of impeachment recites the articles and notifies him to appear at a fixed time and place and file his answer.

The rule specifying the method of serving writs of summons to one accused in articles of impeachment.

The person accused in articles of impeachment failing to appear or to answer, the trial proceeds as on a plea of not guilty.

The person accused in articles of impeachment may appear in person or by attorney.

If a plea of guilty be entered in answer to articles of impeachment, judgment may be entered without further proceedings.

Present form and history of Rule VIII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as hereinbefore provided, a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles, and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate and named in such writ, and file his answer to said articles of impeachment, and to stand to and abide the orders and judgments of the Senate thereon; which writ shall be served by such officer or person as shall be named in the precept thereof, such number of days prior to the day fixed for such appearance as shall be named in such precept either by the delivery of an attested copy thereof to the person accused, or if that can not conveniently be done, by leaving such copy at the last known place of abode of such person, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place therein; or if such service shall be, in the judgment of the Senate, impracticable, notice to the accused to appear shall be given in such other manner, by publication or otherwise, as shall be deemed just; and if the writ aforesaid shall fail of service in the manner aforesaid, the proceedings shall not thereby abate, but further service may be made in such manner as the Senate shall direct. If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty. If a plea of guilty shall be entered, judgment may be entered thereon without further proceedings.

This rule dates from 1868,<sup>31</sup> when it was adopted preliminary to the trial of President Johnson. It was reported from a committee of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, in its present general form; but during consideration in the Senate the word "court" was stricken out wherever it occurred, and the word "Senate" substituted, to conform to a general decision of the Senate.

Form of oath administered to the returning officer in an impeachment case.

The oath taken by the returning officer in an impeachment case is spread on the records.

Present form and history on Rule IX of the Senate in impeachment cases.

Rule IX of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

At 12:30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following, viz: "I, _____, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the _____ day of _____, by the Senate of the United States, against _____, is truly made, and that I have performed such service as therein described: So help me God." Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

This rule, with slight changes, date from the Chase trial in 1805.<sup>32</sup> In 1868<sup>33</sup> in preparation for the trial of President Johnson, it was adopted in exactly its present form.

2129. In an impeachment case the writ of summons being returned, the accused is called to appear and answer the articles.

The person impeached being called to appear and answer, a record is made as to appearance or nonappearance.

The person impeached may appear to answer the articles in person or by attorney, and a record is made as to the mode of appearance.

When the person accused in articles of impeachment appears by agent or attorney, a record is made naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears.

Present form and history of Rule X of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule X of the "Rule of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" provides:

The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he do not appear, either personally or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded.

This rule was first adopted in 1805,<sup>34</sup> for the Chase trial. In 1868,<sup>35</sup> during proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson, the rules were generally reviewed, but this rule was changed only by dropping out the word "exhibited" after "articles of impeachment." It was then agreed to in the present form.

Present form and history of Rule XIV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XIV of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon an impeachment.

This rule in identically its present form dates from the Chase trial in 1805.<sup>36</sup> It then embodied what had been the practice in preceding trials.

2131. In impeachment trials all motions made by the parties or counsel are addressed to the Presiding Officer, and must be in writing, if required.

Present form and history of Rule XV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XV of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the President Officer, and if he, or any Senator, shall require it, they shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table.

This rule was first drafted in 1805,<sup>36</sup> for the trial of Judge Chase. It had then an additional clause providing how the vote should be taken on such motions. In 1868,<sup>37</sup> when the rules were revised, it was given its present form, the words "presiding officer" being substituted for "President of the Senate," and the clause relating to voting being stricken out. The words "or any Senator" were also inserted at this time.

2132. In an impeachment trial the case is opened by one person on each side.

The final arguments on the merits in an impeachment trial are made by two persons on each side, unless ordered otherwise upon application.

The final argument on the merits in an impeachment trial is opened and closed by the House of Representatives.

Present form and history of Rule XXI of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXI of the "Rules of proceeding and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

This rule dates from 1868,<sup>38</sup> when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a revision of the rules, in view of the approaching trial of President Andrew Johnson. The rule as reported was in this form:

XXI. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side, and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

On March 2,<sup>39</sup> this rule was debated fully, and amended so as to stand in its present form. Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, proposed an amendment which, after discussion, was adopted in form as follows:

The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person.

During the debate Mr. Roscoe Conkling explained this amendment on behalf of Mr. Sumner, who has been called away:

The Senator from Massachusetts thought that when the managers came here and rose to open their case and had proceeded an hour perhaps the Senator from Indiana or some other Senator would say, "This now is a proceeding, a question falling within the first of these two rules; it is a preliminary or interlocutory matter, and therefore to be restricted to an hour." That there might be no question about it, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes that the two rules shall stand precisely as they are now, the latter of which rules gives to counsel the right to sum up the evidence at any length they please, be it a day or four days or ten days each; but that before the evidence has been delivered, before the witnesses are called, that explanatory statement which is called "an opening" shall be made by one person on each side, one manager on the part of the House of Representatives in the beginning, and one counsel on the part of the respondent after the evidence for the prosecution is closed and the respondent comes to make his case. To cover that, the Senator from Massachusetts interposes this rule between the two (leaving the previous rule to operate upon interlocutory matters, as it does), to provide for the opening of the case on each side respectively before the evidence is delivered, and then to leave to counsel to sum up, or close the case, or, in the language of the rule, to make the "final argument on the merits" at any length they please. That is the meaning of it, as I understand it.

A question having been raised by Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, Mr. Conkling said further:

The idea is that the practice is to be precisely as it is in Indiana—not the practice in Westminster Hall, but the practice as we know it in this country. The plaintiff, for illustration, opens his case and gives his evidence and finishes it; then the defendant opens his case and gives his evidence and finishes it; and then the summing up occurs. That is the design here—that the prosecutors for the House of Representatives open their case and prove it as far as they can; then the respondent opens his case and proves it as far as he can. That is precisely what the amendment means, I submit. I know that is the design of the mover.

The amendment was agreed to without division.

A more serious question arose as to the number of persons who should be permitted to sum up on each side. Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, objected that the number should not be restricted, saying:

If I remember rightly the history of impeachment trials in England, the members of the managers and the counsel on the part of the defense have addressed their arguments to a particular issue that was involved in a particular specification; and I think that was the case in this country in the celebrated Chase trial, and in the Peck trial. There were divers and sundry specifications, to each of which the defendant pleaded not guilty. One manager argued each particular specification; and one of the counsel on the part of the defense replied to him. Each article was one of the points upon which the court had to pronounce that the defendant was either guilty or not guilty, and each was argued separately.

Now, had we not better leave this whole matter to be settled by a conference between the attorneys of the respective sides when they shall reach the argument than to say now peremptorily that ten or twenty articles shall all be combined in the speech of the counsel instead of being severed, as they have been in previous trials, and limiting them to two speeches on each side? My own opinion is that a question of practice of that kind belongs purely to the court; and if we are to resolve ourselves from a Senate into a court, it ought to be settled by the court itself, when the Chief Justice, who is to preside over us, is present to give us the aid of his counsel.

Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, speaking in the same line, said :

I can state to the honorable Senator from Vermont and to the Senate that in every case of crime of any great interest, and especially a capital crime, I have never known the argument of the case on the part of the defense by a less number of counsel than three, and it is often by five. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that in the management of the case, if you introduce more than two counsel, if they are competent counsel, you embarrass the case and you weaken the prosecution or the defense. But it is not so always in the argument of cases of importance. It is a universal practice in the criminal courts of Kentucky that where a case of interest involving capital punishment is under trial, and the accused desires it, he is heard by at least three counsel in his defense.

Mr. President, I have learned this fact in relation to impeachments—that they are to be treated with more liberality on both sides than the stringent practice and forms and rules of proceeding in criminal cases, and that those rules which are introduced into criminal cases to economize time have never been resorted to as a general rule in the trial of impeachments. It seems to me that all the modes of proceeding and all the practice in cases of impeachment ought to be more liberal, ought to be more free from restrictions, and especially technical restrictions, and restrictions simply to save time, than criminal prosecutions. And yet the honorable committee that have reported these rules of proceeding and practice are restricting the proceedings in this and all future cases of impeachment much more rigorously than is known in the criminal practice in the courts of Kentucky.

Mr. James Dixon, of Connecticut, said :

I most deeply regret to see what I think I see, what I can not help seeing, in the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and some other Senators. That Senator speaks as if the consumption of a day or two days or three days or even four days, taken up in the defense of this great trial, was to be regretted, a thing to be deprecated and avoided; and he points out as something to be shunned that Mr. Burke spoke four days in the great trial of Warren Hastings. I confess I have not that feeling. I regret that the Senator has it; I regret that any Senator has it. I do not think it is to the credit of this body when entering upon this great trial, impartial as undoubtedly we all are, wishing to do justice in a solemn case of this kind, bringing before us the President of the United States, the gentlemen are disposed to deny him on the final argument upon ten charges the privilege of being heard by as many counsel as he wishes.

In behalf of the restriction, Mr. Sumner said :

The Senator forgets that on the trial of Judge Peck Mr. Wirt, in a speech which I have sometimes thought was the most masterly forensic effort in the history of our country, occupied the attention of the Senate two full days. The Senator will also remember that on the trial of Warren Hastings, Mr. Burke occupied the attention of the court of impeachment for four successive days, and there were other gentlemen on both sides, managers, and also counselors for the defense, who occupied the attention of the court each for several days.

I merely refer to these historical precedents that we may be reminded in advance of the possibilities of a trial like this: and a Senator near me says, the probabilities. Perhaps that is a better word; but I refer to express myself in the most moderate manner, and I therefore said simply "the possibilities." It seems to me that it is our duty to provide against probabilities or possibilities even.

And Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, said :

Now, as to the propriety of this rule as a general rule. Is there a Senator on this floor who would stand up and say of his own personal knowledge of criminal practice in his own State that this rule does not exist in all their courts? I do not mean as a written rule necessarily; but is it not a general rule in every court in the United States of America, either State or national, that only two counsel are heard on a side in the summing up of a cause? A man is tried for his life, and, as a general rule—there may be exceptions, but I never heard of them in that case—only two counsel are heard in his defense, and only two for the prosecution. So all civil rights and questions involving the operations of law over vast sections of country are determined in the same way. This very day, in another Chamber of this building, before the Supreme Court of the United States, a cause is argued which may involve the peace and safety of the inhabitants of ten States, and of millions of persons, and it is confined, by the rules of that court, to two counsel on a side, and nobody complains that any injustice is being done to any one.

After the debate had continued for some time, Mr. Edmunds proposed the following amendment, which was agreed to without division:

Insert, after the words "on each side," the words "unless otherwise ordered by the court upon application for that purpose."

The word "court" was afterwards changed to "Senate" in accordance with a general conclusion to which the Senate had arrived.

Mr. Dixon, referring to the law of Connecticut as a precedent, then proposed the addition of the following clause:

And the counsel of the party accused in all trials to which these rules are to apply shall be allowed the closing turn in the final argument.

Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, said it had been the law of Connecticut since 1848, but had worked badly. The amendment was rejected without division.

2133. In the opening address in an impeachment trial it is proper to outline what it is expected to prove; but it is not proper to quote evidence which may or may not be admissible later.—On February 10, 1905,<sup>40</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Charles Swayne, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, was making the opening address on behalf of the managers, and had outlined what they expected to prove in support of the article charging the improper use of a private railway car. Mr. Palmer went on to say:

The respondent acknowledged the facts, as above stated, but defended his action upon the ground that the property of the railroad company being in the hands of the court, he, the judge of the court, had a right to use it without making compensation to the railroad company.

When questioned on the subject, we shall prove that he said, in answer to this question:

"Q. You said this car was one of the cars in possession of the court, because the road was in the hands of a receiver?—A. Yes."

"Q. You said that it was the privilege of the court to use that car, because the road was in the hands of a receiver?—A. Yes."

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected:

Mr. President, the statement that is now being read, as the record shows, is a part of the testimony of Judge Swayne taken before the committee of the House of Representatives, which, under the acts of Congress, can not be used against him in any criminal prosecution; and therefore it is improper to make the statement that the chairman of the managers is now proceeding to make. We object to the presentation here, by statement or otherwise, of any testimony that was given by Judge Swayne, the respondent, before the House committee, claiming his right, under the law of the Congress of the United States, that it can not be used against him in any criminal prosecution, of which this certainly is one.

After brief argument the Presiding Officer<sup>41</sup> said:

Of course, the managers on the part of the House and the counsel on the part of the respondent have somewhat wide latitude in their opening statements, but the Presiding Officer is of opinion that testimony which has been given by Judge Swayne on the occasion referred to ought not to be cited at length. He has a right to plead his privilege. He can not be obliged to criminate himself. * * * It seems to the Presiding Officer to be an indirect way of getting before the

Senate the fact that Judge Swayne had testified to this. The Presiding Officer suggests to the manager that he may properly omit the reading of testimony which had been given on another occasion by Judge Swayne.

Very soon after, in outlining the case as to the charge of nonresidence, Mr. Palmer said:

The facts, as they will appear in the testimony, are that after his confirmation as judge in 1800 he established his residence at St. Augustine, in a house rented from Mr. Flagler, and lived there with his family until the boundaries of his district were changed by the act of Congress in the year 1894. Judge Swayne states that he was urged by his friends not to move his family or furniture, that the next Congress would probably restore his district, and therefore his furniture was allowed to remain in St. Augustine until the year 1900, when he rented the Simmons cottage in Pensacola and lived there at intervals until 1903, when his wife bought a home. During the six years—

Mr. Higgins objected.

Mr. President, I wish to say that that statement is again contrary to the rule we have invoked as to the statute.

The Presiding Officer<sup>42</sup> held—

The Presiding Officer thinks that the manager has a right to state what he expects to prove, but that he ought not to go further by citing any testimony which has been given by Judge Swayne on another occasion as the means by which he expects to prove it.

2134. The opening address in an impeachment trial should be confined to what is to be proven, and how it is to be proven, and should not include extended argument on the whole case.—On February 21, 1905,<sup>43</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, was making the opening address preliminary to the introduction of testimony for the respondent, and in the course of his remarks made various citations which he asked the Secretary to read. Thus he had read extracts from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Bradley v. Fisher; In re Cuddy, petitioner; In re Savin, and an extract from the answer of one O'Neal in a lawsuit out of which arose one of the causes of Judge Swayne's impeachment.

After the reading of this extract the Presiding Officer interrupted saying:

The Secretary will suspend for a moment. Why does the counsel claim that this is proper in an opening? The Presiding Officer supposed that the opening of a case on the part of the managers or on the part of counsel should be limited to a statement of the issues raised in the case, and what the parties propose to prove either for the prosecution or the defense. How do these extracts which the Secretary has been asked to read fall within what the Presiding Officer supposes to be the proper line of an opening on behalf of the respondent?

Mr. Higgins replied:

I will state, Mr. President, in the first sentence, that a perusal of the statement of counsel in the Peck case shows that the managers went very fully into the merits of the case on the argument. Mr. Meredith, in opening for the respondent, did not. I thought, therefore, that I was entirely within the rules of this anomalous proceeding, which is not by common law, is not in equity, but is according to the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. The articles and answers are drawn from the civil law. They are not known to our own practice, and therefore I have supposed that it was a proceeding where the largest latitude was given to counsel in the first instance.

In the second place I desire to say, Mr. President, on this interesting point that the Greenhut testimony has not been read, and it is impossible to get a statement of the issues without it. I could have had read the affidavit of Greenhut. I could have read Greenhut's testimony, so as to get them before the court as to what they would show, but I have elected to leave them out, and was stating what O'Neal's was. Moreover, I thought it was the shortest way in which I could proceed.

The Presiding Officer then said :

The Presiding Officer, of course, does not wish to limit counsel for respondent as to any of their just rights, but as was suggested a moment ago the Presiding Officer supposed that an opening on behalf of the person accused was to be confined strictly to the issues raised and what the counsel expected to prove, and how they expected to be able to prove it. This opening seems to have taken the form of an extended argument on the whole case, which the Presiding Officer had supposed would be more proper, to say the least, when the case came to be finally argued. Perhaps the Presiding Officer is only expressing a little the impatience of the Senate, and without attempting to fix limits, he wants to suggest that the opening should be concluded as quickly and as rapidly as counsel feel that it can be in presenting their case to the Senate.

2135. At the trial of President Johnson both managers and counsel for respondent objected successfully to the rule limiting the number speaking in final argument.

In the final argument in the Johnson trial the conclusion was required to be by one manager.

The privilege of submitting a written instead of an oral argument in the final summing up was allowed in the Johnson trial.

In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to limit the time of the final arguments.

The Chief Justice ruled during the Johnson trial that a proposed order should, under the Senate practice, lie over one day before consideration.

On April 11, 1868,<sup>44</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Senator from New Jersey, proposed the following :

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the respondent be permitted to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so.

The Chief Justice <sup>45</sup> held that under the rules of the Senate the order would not be considered until the next day.

On April 13,<sup>46</sup> the order came up in the Senate sitting for the trial, and Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, at once proposed the following to come in at the end :

Provided, That the trial shall proceed without any further delay or postponement on this account.

Mr. Manager Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania, referred to the rule of the Senate (Rule XXI), which provided that the final arguments "may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives," and said that the rule as it stood was calculated to embarrass the managers, whose number had been fixed by the House at seven. In the preceding impeachment cases wherein a defense had been made, the cases of Judges Chase and Peck, the numbers of managers were, respectively, seven and five, and in the one case six of the seven managers were heard in concluding argument, and in the other all five were heard. In neither of those cases did there seem to have been any question as to the right of the House to be heard through all its managers. And going to the English precedents, in the famous case of Warren Hastings all the managers were heard in argument.

After further debate Mr. Frelinghuysen modified his order as follows:

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President be permitted to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so: Provided, That the trial shall proceed without any further delay or postponement on this account: And provided further, That only one manager shall be heard in the close.

Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell objected to the proposition to limit the close to one manager. He recited that in the trial of Judge Peck the case was first summed up by two managers on the part of the House, then the case of the respondent was argued by two of his counsel, and then the case was closed by the arguments of two managers. And in the case of Judge Peck, after the counsel for the respondent had concluded, the case was closed by three managers. He also cited the ably conducted trial of Judge Prescott, in Massachusetts, wherein two arguments were made by the managers after the close of the argument for the respondent.

Mr. Sumner then proposed to amend by striking out the last proviso and inserting:

And provided, That according to the practice in cases of impeachment the several managers who speak shall close.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, in order to test the sense of the Senate as to the desirability of changing the existing rule, moved that the order and pending amendment be laid on the table. This motion was agreed to, yeas 38, nays 10.

On April 14,<sup>47</sup> Mr. Sumner offered this order:

Ordered, In answer to the motion of the managers, that under the rule limiting the argument to two on a side unless otherwise ordered, such other managers and counsel as choose may print and file arguments at any time before the argument of the closing manager.

This order going over for consideration until the next day a discussion arose as to the time of submitting the written arguments, and Mr. John Conness, of California, proposed this amendment:

Strike out all after the word "ordered" and insert:

"That the twenty-first rule be so amended as to allow as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so: Provided, That not more than four days on each side shall be allowed; but the managers shall make the opening and the closing argument."

The question being taken, the substitute was disagreed to, yeas 19, nays 27.

Thereupon Mr. Jonathan Doolittle, of Wisconsin, proposed an amendment:

Strike out all after the word "ordered" and insert:

"That upon the final argument two managers of the House open, two counsel for the respondent reply; that two other managers rejoin, to be followed by two other counsel for the respondent; and they, in turn, to be followed by two other managers of the House, who shall conclude the argument."

Thereupon Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, moved that the proposed order and pending amendment be postponed indefinitely. This motion was agreed to, yeas 34, nays 15.

On April 20,<sup>48</sup> after the introduction of evidence had been concluded, Mr. Manager John A. Logan asked of the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial, that he be permitted to file a printed argument instead of arguing orally. After some discussion Mr. William M. Stewart, a Senator from Nevada, offered this order:

Ordered, That the honorable Manager Logan have leave to file his written argument to-day and furnish a copy to each of the counsel for the respondent.

To this Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, offered the following as a substitute:

That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent have leave to file written or printed arguments before the oral argument commences.

Mr. Stewart accepted the substitute as an amendment, and it was considered by the Senate in lieu of the original resolution offered by Mr. Stewart.

On April 22 the amendment of Mr. Stewart, in its modified form, was considered, and Mr. George Vickers, a Senator from Maryland, proposed as a substitute:

As the counsel for the President have signified to the Senate sitting as a court for the trial of the impeachment, that they did not desire to file written or printed arguments, but preferred to argue orally, if allowed to do so: Therefore,

Resolved, That any two of the managers other than those who under the present rule are to open and close the discussion, and who have not already addressed the Senate, be permitted to file written arguments at or before the adjournment of to-day, or to make oral addresses after the opening by one of the managers and the first reply of the President's counsel, and that other two of the counsel for the President who have not spoken may have the privilege of reply, but alternating with the said two managers, leaving the closing argument for the President and the managers' final reply to be made under the original rule.

This proposed substitute was agreed to, yeas 26, nays 20; but immediately thereafter the order as amended by the substitute was disagreed to, yeas 20, nays 26.

Thereupon Mr. Vickers offered the following:

Ordered, That one of the managers on the part of the House be permitted to file his printed argument before the adjournment of to-day, and that after an oral opening by a manager, and the reply of one of the President's counsel, another of the President's counsel shall have the privilege of filing a written or of making an oral address, to be followed by the closing speech of one of the President's counsel, and the final reply of a manager under the existing rule.

Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, thereupon moved to amend by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

That such of the managers and counsel for the President as may choose to do so have leave to file arguments on or before Friday, April 24.

The amendment of Mr. Conness was disagreed to, yeas 24, nays 25.

The original order as proposed by Mr. Vickers being under consideration, it was, on motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, amended by striking out the word "one" in the first line and inserting "two." Then, on motion of Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, the words "or written" were inserted between the words "printed" and "arguments." And on motion of Mr. John Conness, of California, the time was lengthened from "adjournment of to-day" to "before to-morrow noon."

Thereupon Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, offered an amendment subsequently modified to read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

"That subject to the twenty-first rule all the managers not delivering oral arguments may be permitted to file written arguments at any time before the 24th instant, and the counsel for the President not making oral arguments may file written arguments at any time before 11 o'clock of Monday, the 27th instant."

A motion to lay the whole subject on the table was disagreed to, yeas 13, nays 37.

At this stage of the proceedings Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, of counsel for the President, addressed the Senate, asking that all the counsel for the President who should be able to participate—Mr. Stanbery being ill—should have leave to address the Senate either orally or in writing, as they should elect. He concluded:

I may say, although I am not expressly authorized to do so, that I am satisfied the President desires that his cause shall be argued by the two additional counsel whom he has provided in the case, besides the three counsel who were heretofore selected for that purpose; and I trust you will not deny us this right. I trust that you will feel at liberty to extend it to all the counsel in the case. If we choose to avail ourselves of it we will do so. I have no sort of objection, so far as I am concerned that the same right shall be extended to all or to more than an equal number of managers on the other side. I trust that the resolution be so shaped as to embrace all the counsel who are engaged in the cause in behalf of the President.

Mr. Nelson also cited the precedent of Judge Chase's trial, when six of the managers and five of counsel for the respondent were permitted to address the Senate.

After consideration of suggested amendments, Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, proposed to amend Mr. Henderson's amendment by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

As many of the managers and of the counsel for the President as desire to do so be permitted to file arguments or to address the Senate orally.

And this amendment was agreed to, yeas 29, nays 20.

Then, on motion of Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, these words were added:

But the conclusion of the oral argument shall be by one manager, as provided in the twenty-first rule.

Mr. Richard Yates moved to amend by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

Four of the managers and four of the counsel for the respondent be permitted to make printed or written or oral arguments, the managers to have the opening and closing, subject to the limitation of the twenty-first rule.

This amendment to the amendment was disagreed to, yeas 18, nays 31.

Then by a vote of yeas 28, nays 22 the substitute of Mr. Henderson, as amended by the propositions of Messrs. Trumbull and Buckalew, was agreed to, and then the order as amended was agreed to. So it was—

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President as desire to do so be permitted to file arguments or to address the Senate orally, but the conclusion of the oral argument shall be by one manager as provided in the twenty-first rule.

2136. After elaborate investigation it was held that the opening and closing arguments on incidental questions in impeachment trials belong to the side making the motion or objection.

The claim of the managers to the closing of all arguments arising in course of an impeachment trial has been denied after examination of American and English precedents.

Discussion of the technical forms of pleading in an impeachment trial, as related to right of opening and closing arguments on an incidental question.

Instance wherein the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial fixed the number of managers and counsel to argue on an incidental question.

One of the managers in an impeachment trial may not move to rescind an order of the Senate as to the conduct of the trial.

On March 23, 1868,<sup>49</sup> in the Senate while sitting for the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson, the counsel of the President offered an application that thirty days be allowed the President and his counsel for the preparation of his case.

The managers for the House of Representatives were first heard, Mr. Manager John A. Logan opposing the request. Then Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, was heard in favor. Mr. Manager James F. Wilson next opposed, and was followed by Mr. Henry Stanbery, counsel for the President, who favored the application.

Then Mr. Manager John A. Bingham proposed to reply on behalf of the House of Representatives.

The Chief Justice,<sup>50</sup> who was the Presiding Officer under the Constitution, said:

The Chair announced at the last sitting that he would not undertake to restrict counsel as to number without the further order of the Senate, the rule not being very intelligible to him. He will state further that when counsel make a motion to the court the counsel who makes the motion has invariably the right to close the argument upon it.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Bingham asked the decision of the Senate, saying:

Mr. President, with all respect touching the suggestion just made by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I beg leave to remind the Senate, and I am instructed to do so by my associate managers, that from time immemorial in proceedings of this kind the right of the Commons in England and of the Representatives of the people in the United States to close the debate has not been, by any rule, settled against them. On the contrary, in Lord Melville's case, if I may be allowed and pardoned for making reference to it, the last case, I believe, reported in England, Lord Erskine presiding, when the very question was made which has now been submitted by the Presiding Officer to the Senate, one of the managers of the House of Commons arose in his place and said that he owed it to the Commons to protest against the immemorial usage being denied to the Commons of England to be heard in reply to whatever might be said on behalf of the accused at the bar of the Peers. In that case the language of the manager, Mr. Giles, was:

"My Lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their knowledge and undoubted privilege—the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted when required.”—(State Trials, vol. 29, p. 782; 44 to 46 George III.)

Lord Erskine “responded the right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed.”

Following the suggestion of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat, I believe that when that utterance was made it had been the continued rule in England for nearly five hundred years.

In this tribunal, in the first case of impeachment that ever was tried before the Senate of the United States under the Constitution (I refer to the case of Blount), the Senate will see by a reference to it that although the accused had the affirmative of the issue, although he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, the argument was closed in the case by the manager of the House, Mr. Harper. (Wharton's State Trials of the United States, pp. 314-315.)

When I rose, however, at the time the honorable Senator spoke, I rose for the purpose of making some response to the remarks last made for the accused; but as the Presiding Officer has interposed the suggestion to the Senate whether the managers can further reply I do not deem it proper for me to proceed further until the Senate shall pass upon this question.

Some discussion arising, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, called for the reading of this rule:

20. All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate by order, extend the time.

Mr. Manager Bingham thereupon stated that the managers had used but thirty-five minutes of their time.

Thereupon Mr. Bingham was allowed to proceed.

At the close of his remarks there was no claim for recognition from the counsel for the President, and a vote was taken.

2137. On April 1, 1868,<sup>51</sup> in the Senate during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, a witness called by the managers, was being examined, when counsel for the President objected to the competency of a certain question. After arguments had proceeded for some time, the following colloquy occurred between Messrs. Managers John A. Bingham and Benjamin F. Butler on the one side and Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, on the other:

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. I rise to a question here. I understand that we speak here under a rule of the Senate, as yet at least, that requires us to be restricted to an hour on each side.

Mr. STANBERY. And one counsel, if you go according to the rule.

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. No; I do not understand that. I understand, on the contrary, that the practice heretofore thus far in the progress of this trial has been to allow the counsel to divide their time as they pleased, within but one hour on each side. The point to which I rise now, however, is this: That we understand that in a proceeding of this sort the managers have always claimed and asserted, where the point was raised at all, the right to conclude upon all questions that were raised in the progress of the trial. The hour has been well nigh expended in this instance on each side, as I am told, though I have not taken any special note of the time. But we raise the question; and I state that the fact that our time has been exhausted, as I am advised, is the only reason why I raise it now; and thus we are cut off from any further reply. Our only objective in raising the question is that we shall not be deemed to have waived it, because we are advised that it was settled years ago in Melville's case by the

Lord Chancellor presiding and by the Peers that the managers might waive their privilege by their silence.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. We have the affirmative.

Mr. STANBURY. On this question? Oh, no.

2138. On April 28, 1876,<sup>52</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the following order was made in a secret session of the Senate, which had retired for consultation, and was reported:

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th of May, 1876, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and three managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed on between themselves, and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

The argument here referred to was on a question in the nature of a demurrer raised by the plea of the respondent that he was not amenable to impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War because of his resignation of said office.

The order having been read in the Senate sitting publicly for the impeachment, Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, announced that the managers requested to be heard on the question of the opening and closing arguments, and also in regard to the number of managers who should be allowed to speak.

Then Mr. Manager Lord proposed a motion<sup>53</sup> to rescind the order. The President pro tempore<sup>54</sup> said:

The Chair would state to the manager that a motion by him to rescind the order of the Senate would not be in order; but the manager is permitted to address the Senate.

The question being thrown open to argument, three main points were involved:

1. The rule suggested by the state of the question.
2. The American precedents.
3. The effect of English usage.

(1) As to the rule suggested by the state of the question, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, stated, in support of their claim to the opening and closing, the conditions under which the question presented itself:

Now let me briefly state the condition of the pleadings in this case.

To the articles of impeachment the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, averring that, when the House ordered the impeachment, and when the articles were exhibited, he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen, etc.

It is contended by some that a citizen holding one office may be removed by impeachment for prior misdemeanors in another office. If this be sound, then the plea to the jurisdiction set up new matter; that is, that he was not in any office. Some of the articles of impeachment did not show that he was out of office as Secretary of War, and none of them averred that he was a private citizen. To this plea the House of Representatives replied double; first, that he was Secretary of War when the acts complained of were done, and continued in such office "down to the 2d day of March, 1876;" second, that he was in such office "until and including the 2d day of March, 1876," and until the House, by its committee, had completed an investigation, etc.

At this point Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, interposed to say that this reply of the House was a replication.

Mr. Carpenter (continuing) said :

Certainly, and so they call it.

To the first replication the respondent interposed a demurrer; found on page 8 of printed proceedings. And the managers filed a joinder in demurrer; found on page 9.

The honorable manager [Mr. Hoar] now claims that the first replication was a demurrer. An inspection will show that it was not. It does not object to the plea as insufficient in matter of law, but because of certain facts therein set forth. We demurred to this replication, and they joined in demurrer.

If all the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment are regarded as immaterial, then the substance of the matter is, we have demurred to the articles. And a demurrer to the articles is an affirmative assertion that, conceding the truth of the matters therein contained, they are insufficient in law; and upon this proposition we hold the affirmative.

Mr. Carpenter also said :

There is no question as to what is the rule in the courts of law. There it is well settled that the party demurring has the right to open and close the argument. The rules of pleading and proceeding in the ordinary courts of justice, no less than the great canons of the common law, have resulted from centuries of practical experience in the administration of justice, and have been approved by the sages of the law as the best methods to elicit truth and administer justice. If these rules are wisely devised to insure these ends, why should they be departed from in this trial? Is there other motive here than to ascertain the truth and do justice? One of two things is clear; those rules should be observed here or abolished there. It is impossible to maintain that one system of procedure will secure justice in one tribunal and produce injustice in another. And the question is whether the methods which have been established, and from time to time improved, in the courts of law, which are in almost continuous session and dealing with endless variety of causes, are less reliable than rules which might be adopted in a court like this which sits only occasionally after long intervals, and where the personnel of the court is likely to be wholly changed between one trial and another.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, also of counsel for the respondent, said :

The first to which I will call the attention of the Senate is the case of Barnard, with which the managers have shown their familiarity, having referred to it in connection with this plea in abatement. Throughout that case the rule which obtains in courts of justice was adhered to, that counsel who maintained the affirmative of the issue had the opening and reply upon such issue. I would also say—and I am making my remarks very brief—in regard to the affirmative of the issue that this is substantially a demurrer to the articles, because every lawyer knows that in a proceeding like this the articles themselves must allege all the facts necessary to give the jurisdiction in the case alleged and proved. This court of impeachment is a court of limited jurisdiction under the Constitution, and in every court of that character the facts upon which the jurisdiction rests must appear on the complaint by which the case is initiated and inviting the action of the court.

Now, every party demurring has the opening and closing, and the argument which is addressed to the court on the other side, that, as they have the affirmative of the general issue, therefore they ought to be heard in opening and replying upon all the questions arising in the progress of the case, would with equal propriety give the plaintiff in every other court the reply on all such questions, whether applied to a question of law or a question of fact. But that is not the rule. In this case we demur, and thus say that, assuming all the facts alleged to be true, the House of Representatives has no case. That is an affirmative proposition that no impeachment can be maintained on the facts charged, and therefore we are entitled to the opening and conclusion of the argument.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar, on the other hand, contended :

I desire for one moment to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the managers undertake here the affirmative of this issue. It is true that the respondent has interposed what he calls a plea to the jurisdiction, and that the jurisdictional question has been raised by making an issue upon that plea; but that is a matter of form and not of substance. If the counsel for the respondent had seen fit to enter a general plea of "not guilty," the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try and convict would have been involved in the final vote upon that question. To show the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the inquiry is a part of the affirmative issue involved in the presentment of articles. So that by the logic of ordinary practice we are brought to the same result as we should be if it were not a question of the prerogative of the House, and the accustomed and well-settled methods of proceeding in impeachment.

* * * * *

The substance of this issue is this: The House of Representatives say the defendant did certain acts as Secretary of War, and remained Secretary of War until the 2d day of March. The defendant replies, "I was not Secretary of War when you presented your articles, or before," leaving it ambiguous whether he means never before, or that there was a time before when he did not hold the office. In order not to be entangled by that ambiguity, the House of Representatives say, "We mean to assert, as we said before, that you were Secretary of War down to the 2d day of March; and the fact that you have gone out since (which is the only fact, as we understand the pleadings, now newly set up by you) is not a sufficient answer to our original article."

* * * * *

I understand that the question which the Senate ought to determine is this—this is the substance of the whole thing: Is the fact newly affirmed, and first affirmed by this respondent, to wit, the fact that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to the charge? You can not escape that simple proposition. That is what you have got to try: Is the fact newly set up by the defendant, that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to this charge? He sets that up and the House of Representatives say that is no sufficient answer; and that is a demurrer in substance and in fact; and on the question whether a fact so set up by my antagonist newly, for the first time in the case, is a sufficient answer to what I have said, I am always entitled to the opening and close.

The House of Representatives, in the first instance, allege in the original articles:

"Art. 3. That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876."

Now, if the Senate will be good enough to observe the plea, which was put in by the honorable counsel, it is this:

"That this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment exhibited and presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, because he says that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States."

In that replication there is an ambiguity. If the respondent had said that at the time of the presentment of the articles of impeachment he was not a civil officer, it would have presented the naked question of jurisdiction without ambiguity or difficulty, and the House would have demurred; but he inserts the word "before." That may have one of two meanings. It may amount to an allegation that he was never, before the original articles of impeachment were presented, a civil officer of the United States. I do not say that that astute purpose was in the mind of the counsel who drew the pleading. If we had demurred simply, if we had made a simple demurrer, the respondent might then have come before the Senate and argued that he had responded to the articles that he never was a civil officer of the United States at any time before they were presented, and we should have been left to a discussion upon the verbiage of the article and to the danger of being excluded from court by a blunder in not giving the proper construction to the defendant's language. Accordingly, we set up no new matter, but we simply reassign, in regard to the fact which is left doubtful on the expression of the defendant's plea, what we said in our original articles: in other words, we say, "We mean to say that you were a civil officer of the United States until the 2d of March; and therefore, that being the meaning of our original article, your plea presents no legal or proper response." It is a case, therefore, of a reassignment or a reaffirmation of a fact originally set forth in a mode in which the meaning of the original allegation can not be questioned, and saying that, therefore, that fact being considered, the plea of the respondent shows no answer in law. Thus we have presented to the Senate in substance an issue made here in this way—a statement of the original articles that the defendant was a civil officer of the United States down to the 2d day of March, reaffirmed in the replication; a statement by the defendant that before these articles were presented he had ceased to be such civil officer; and a statement on the part of the House of Representatives that that last allegation is no defense to the charge; in other words, a simple demurrer to what is pleaded and well pleaded in the original article: and on such demurrer by the invariable rule of courts both of law and equity the party sustaining the demurrer has the affirmative.

Upon the larger question (setting aside now the pleadings and taking the substance of the issue upon the question of jurisdiction) the plaintiff always has the affirmative. If the respondent had contented himself with introducing a naked plea of "not guilty," he could have availed himself of his objection to the jurisdiction upon that plea, and it would have required the judgment of the court to be given against him or in his favor, without setting up the fact at all, because the original articles do not allege that at the time of the presenting of the articles he was a civil officer of the United States.

And it may be proper to say one further word in conclusion. I understand, in accordance, as was suggested in the very significant question put I think by the honorable Senator from New York, that the true rule of pleading in impeachment cases is this: The House of Representatives present articles setting up the substance of the transaction on which they rely, not in the form of an indictment or of a bill in equity or of a civil declaration certain to a certain intent in general, but setting forth the substance of a transaction. It is not necessary to give dates. You may say "on or about the time." It is not necessary to give legal results or intendments. Then the defendant comes in and in his answer either denies the whole matter if there was no such transaction as is set up, or if there was a transaction of the kind, but an innocent and not a guilty one, with certain different and other circumstances, he tells the story as he alleges it to be, setting up at the same time all special suggestions of law or of defense of fact on which he relies; and the pleadings are made up in that way by a joinder of issue. I do not think it is in the power of parties by pleadings of fact such as take place in ordinary courts of law to compel the Senate to determine, except in its discretion, several issues of fact in succession. Suppose an issue of fact were made up on this question of jurisdiction, is the Senate to be compelled to lay aside its legislative business and determine that, and then the defendant answer over, perhaps setting up some other matter strictly in bar, and have that determined, and so the Senate put to a trial of half a dozen successive issues of fact? I respectfully submit that that is not the rule, but that the proper method of pleading is the one which I have first stated.

Undoubtedly it would have been very proper that the matter set up in this second replication should have been set up in the original articles; but it is also well settled in matters of impeachment that the House of Representatives has in its discretion the right at any time to file additional articles if it see fit. It is also true that this new matter set up in the second replication has been pleaded to without objection on the part of the defendant; that it is before the Senate as an allegation in the cause presented by the authority of the House: and whether it should or should not have been originally inserted in the articles becomes now of no consequence.

(2) As to the American precedents, Mr. Manager Hoar said:

This question arose in the trial of President Johnson, and with the leave of the Senate I will cite that authority and the English authority on which the Senate then based its action. After a discussion of a question of practice which came up, as to the course of proceeding in the trial, the Chief Justice, then presiding in the Senate, after the managers for the House had closed what they had to say, inquired of the counsel for the President respondent whether they desired to reply to what had been said by the managers, and the managers representing the House interposed with this suggestion:

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. Mr. President, with all respect touching the suggestion just made by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I beg leave to remind the Senate, and I am instructed to do so by my associate managers, that from time immemorial in proceedings of this kind the right of the Commons in England, and of the Representatives of the people in the United States, to close the debate has not been by any rule settled against them. On the contrary, in Lord Melville's case—"

And this, I believe, is the last case of impeachment which has taken place in England—"if I may be allowed and pardoned for making reference to it, the last case, I believe, reported in England, Lord Erskine presiding, when the very question was made which has now been submitted by the Presiding Officer to the Senate, one of the managers of the House of Commons arose in his place and said that he owed it to the Commons to protest against the immemorial usage being denied to the Commons of England to be heard in reply to whatever might be said on behalf of the accused at the bar of the Peers. In that case the language of the manager, Mr. Giles, was :

"My lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so, it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their acknowledged and undoubted privilege, the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted when required.' (29 State Trials, p. 762, 44-46 George III.)

"Lord Erskine responded the right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed."

"Following the suggestion of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat, I believe that when that utterance was made it had been the continued rule in England for nearly five hundred years.

"In this tribunal, in the first case of impeachment that ever was tried before the Senate of the United States under the Constitution (I refer to the case of Blount), the Senate will see by a reference to it that although the accused had the affirmative of the issue, although he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, the argument was closed in the case by the manager of the House, Mr. Harper."

In response to that claim, the distinguished and able counsel for the President, who, I need not remind many of the most distinguished Members of this body, fought every inch of ground, yielded to the demand; and throughout the President's trial, from that time, the House of Representatives was heard in reply upon every question that arose, whether a question of the admission of evidence, of the proceedings, or the final question, following therein the English precedents for five hundred years and the precedent adopted in the first case of impeachment in the Senate, and acting therein also in accordance with what, so far as I have been able to examine, has been the proceeding in every case of impeachment in a State tribunal in this country.

* * * * *

In the Blount trial, I believe I have stated with sufficient distinctness, the plea being that William Blount was a Senator of the United States, and therefore not an impeachable civil officer, and also that he had laid down his office before the proceedings were instituted—upon that issue, which presented simply the question of jurisdiction, the opening and close were with the House.

* * * * *

Blount's case was the case to which I referred. In the haste of replying to the learned counsel I used the phrase, "the rule settled by itself for the Senate in the first case which came before them." In point of fact, it appears upon the report that the order of proceeding was settled by the four distinguished counselors who took part in it by an agreement, and there is no vote or other express action of the Senate to be found; and it was my purpose, on the suggestion of one of my honored associates, to have made that explanation to the Senate at this time, but it passed from my mind. But Blount's case seems to me to be a very significant and important authority, for it is not credible that those four lawyers, four as able lawyers as the bar of the United States afforded at that time, Mr. Jared Ingersoll, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Harper, and Mr. Dallas, would have conceded so important an advantage to the managers on the part of the House of Representatives without any equivalent, unless they had understood the practice to be so.

* * * * *

I speak at this moment only from memory, but I do not understand that the learned counsel correctly states the only American precedent to which he has referred—the case of Barnard. In Barnard's case a plea was interposed to the jurisdiction, in substance the same plea which is interposed here, applying to several of the articles. That plea was argued by itself, and upon that argument the counsel for the State had the opening and the close.

On the other hand, Mr. Carpenter said :

In Blount's trial the House of Representatives had interposed the first demurrer, and therefore the managers were entitled to open and close the argument. In the report of that case (2 Annals of Congress, p. 2248), it is said :

"Mr. Bayard, the chairman, having communicated with Mr. Ingersoll, the leading counsel for the defendant, it was agreed between them that the managers should proceed in the argument first on the part of the prosecution, and that the right to reply should belong to the managers."

That is, the managers and the counsel for the defendant, being good lawyers, were agreed that the managers were entitled to open and close the argument upon the demurrer interposed by them. Such is the rule in all courts of justice. And yet the honorable manager [Mr. Hoar] refers to this understanding between counsel as to the rights of the managers, in that case, to show that the managers, in all cases, are entitled to open and close the argument upon a demurrer interposed by the defendant ; which would be exactly the reverse of the rule in courts of law.

Indeed, the broad proposition is maintained by the honorable manager that in the argument of every question to arise in this case, upon every motion made by either side, and upon every demurrer, no matter by which side interposed, the managers are entitled to the opening and close. And I understood him to contend at your last sitting that this was conceded by the eminent counsel who defended the impeachment against President Johnson, when the question was first raised by Mr. Manager Bingham ; and that the court and counsel on both sides thereafter proceeded on that hypothesis.

But an examination of the report of that trial shows that the honorable manager was under a total misapprehension. I read from page 77 of the first volume of the Congressional edition of that trial :

"Mr. Howard and Mr. Manager Bingham rose at the same time.

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Senator from Michigan.

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. On the part of the managers I beg to respond to what has just been said.

"Mr. HOWARD. I beg to call the attention of the President to the rules that govern the body.

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. I will only say that we have used but thirty-five of the minutes of the time allowed us under the rule.

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chair announced at the last sitting that he would not undertake to restrict counsel as to number—

They had been restricted as to time—

"without the further order of the Senate, the rule not being very intelligible to him. He will state further that when counsel make a motion to the court, the counsel who makes the motion has invariably the right to close the argument upon it.

"Several SENATORS. Certainly."

Mr. Bingham, however, wished to be heard, and by unanimous consent was heard, just as this body, unquestionably, by unanimous consent would hear any manager on this honorable board who might ask such indulgence. So Mr. Bingham was heard. It is true that in his remarks he set up this unwarrantable claim, which has been repeated by his successor, that the House of Representatives had the right to close every argument whether they had the affirmative of the particular issue or not ; but the silence with which the Senate listened leads me to infer that they were perfectly satisfied with the ruling of the Chief Justice, made before Mr. Bingham took the floor, and never recalled, and which was supported by "several Senators" answering from their places "certainly." No vote was taken on the question. It was an interlocutory question ; I believe a motion by the defendant for additional time to answer.

The Chief Justice ruled emphatically that whichever party made a motion, the counsel who made it had invariably the right to close the argument upon it, and several Senators responded "certainly." And nothing occurred to show that the remarks of Mr. Bingham affected the opinion of the Chief Justice or of the Senators who responded in approval. Certainly the ruling was not changed.

(3) As to the English precedents, Mr. Manager Hoar said :

I understand that the rules of proceedings upon impeachment are not governed by the principles or precedents of ordinary criminal courts. The House of Lords or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment undoubtedly derives great light in the application of the principles of common justice and of law from the sages of the law ; but nevertheless impeachment is a proceeding which stands on its own constitutional ground. It is an investigation into the guilt of great public offenders abusing official trusts by the legislative bodies of the country where that practice prevails. In that investigation, as everywhere else, those legislative bodies are equals. Neither branch of the American Congress stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; neither branch of the British Parliament stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; but the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an impeachment, just as the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an act of legislation. In the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the Lords every bill which it passes, and requests the assent of the Lords thereto, just as in the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the House of Lords the fact that it has ascertained the guilt of a great public offender in the course of its official duty, and asks the judgment of the House of Lords as to his guilt and his punishment.

It is an absolutely settled principle of right that upon all questions which arise in the trial of an impeachment the House of Commons has the right to reply. It is a principle which has existed in England for four hundred years, which, when the term "impeachment" is used in our Constitution in clothing this body with one of its highest functions, was imported, as all the other constitutional attendants of an impeachment were imported, except where they are expressly varied by the Constitution itself.

But the burden and the duty is on us of providing that charge according to the precedents of this Senate and of all senates, according to the precedents of the House of Lords in England sitting as a court of impeachment, and not according to the precedents of police courts or inferior courts of any other kind sitting anywhere. And the precedents of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment have adopted the rule practiced upon in the English House of Lords, from which impeachments come, for five hundred years, that on all questions the party instituting the proceeding and having the burden of proof throughout the whole issue has the right to reply. That is the proposition, and to that proposition no answer whatever has been vouchsafed or suggested by the honorable counsel for the defendant.

The further proposition, to which no reply has been suggested, was that in this particular on this special issue now made up, the precedent of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment precisely corresponds and agrees with the precedents of all courts whatever, that where a plea to the jurisdiction is interposed and to that plea a demurrer is filed, which—leaving out now this second matter of fact—is the question here, the party demurring has the affirmative and the reply in support of his demurrer.

* * * * *

In regard to the English precedent, I beg leave respectfully to refer honorable Senators to a report of which Mr. Burke is the author from a committee appointed by the House of Commons to inspect the journals of the Lords with a view of ascertaining the occasion of the great delay which had happened in the trial of Warren Hastings. This inspection and report were made in the seventh year of that trial. Mr. Burke makes in this report a most ample and thorough discussion of the entire procedure in cases of impeachment in Parliament. He begins by considering the matter of pleadings and the matter of evidence and other matters of procedure, and states in the fullest manner the principle upon which the claim of the managers rested. I do not mean to say that he states anything in regard to this particular question of the opening and close. The report is silent upon that particular subject, but he states the doctrine. He begins by saying:

"Your committee finds that the Lords, in matter of appeal or impeachment in Parliament, are not of right obliged to proceed according to the course or rules of the Roman civil law, or by those of the law or usage of any of the inferior courts in Westminster Hall, but by the law and usage of Parliament."

Then he cites various precedents from the earliest times, and finds that always the court proceed according to the law and usage of Parliament. Then he cites Lord Coke:

"As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some by the common law, some by the civil and canon law, some by peculiar laws and customs, etc., so the high court of Parliament, suis propriis legibus et consuetudinibus subsistit. It is by the lex et consuetudo parliamenti that all weighty matters in any parliament moved, concerning the peers of the realm, or Commons in Parliament assembled, ought to be determined, adjudged, and discussed by the course of the Parliament and not by the civil law, nor yet by the common laws of this realm used in more inferior courts.

"This is the reason that judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, because it is not to be decided by the common laws, but secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti; and so the judges in divers Parliaments have confessed."

Then he goes on under the "rule of pleading:"

"Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading as observed in the inferior courts have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception, as of false or erroneous pleadings, hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament, as not coming within the form of the pleading; and, although a reservation or protest is made by the defendant—matter of form, as we conceive—to the generality, uncertainty, and insufficiency of the articles of impeachment,' yet no objections have in fact been ever made in any part of the record."

I do not think it is worth while to detain the Senate with reading very full and copious extracts from this report. I will take the liberty of placing the book where it will be reached by Senators when they discuss this question.

Taking the other view, Mr. Carpenter said :

In the next place, whatever may be the precedents in the House of Lords in trying an impeachment, we have the authority of the honorable manager himself who has just taken his seat that they are not binding at all in a trial of impeachment under our Constitution. In the debate which took place in the House (if it can be called a debate where nobody was allowed to speak) as to the ordering of the impeachment, the honorable manager himself stated that the British rules were not applicable, and consequently no aid could be drawn from the trial of Warren Hastings. Now I submit that whatever may have been the rule in the trial of impeachments in England this court should make its own rule, and that should be the rule of right and justice.

I deny, as respectfully as a man may deny anything that comes from a coordinate branch of this Congress, that the House appears here in any other attitude than we appear here, a suitor in this cause. Is it possible, where the Constitution says we are to have a trial, and the House of Representatives presents itself here as the accuser, that it is a part of the court; that it is entitled to any favor here that we are not entitled to? The rule uniformly adopted by the courts of law is a rule which the experience of hundreds of years has determined to be wise and proper, and that is the rule which I understand this Senate has ordered for this trial.

And Mr. Montgomery Blair argued :

It is altogether a mistake, also, that this proceeding was ever otherwise considered here or in England as standing upon any different footing in its general principles than any other proceedings at law Woodson, in his lecture on the subject of impeachment (volume 2, page 596), treats it as a suit. His language is that "the House of Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice." Wilson in his Parliamentary Law speaks of the articles as analogous to an indictment, and hence the rules of practice ought to conform to those of the courts in analogous circumstances, and if they vary from them in England, it does not follow a practice there which does not conform to the general principles recognized here. We have greatly restricted the impeachment proceeding; it is not the proceeding here as there in many of its essential features.

In conclusion, Mr. Carpenter quoted from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies.

Mr. Joseph E. McDonald, of Indiana, moved to rescind the order giving the opening and closing to the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. A. S. Merrimon, of North Carolina, asked this question :

Do the managers claim to reply in the discussion of all questions, as a matter of right, or only on the ground of practice, which the court may in its sound discretion rightfully change?

Mr. Manager Hoar replied :

I respectfully reply to that question that we do not concede that whatever be the constitutional and lawful prerogatives of the House of Representatives in this regard can be rightfully changed without the assent of the House itself.

The Senate, by a vote of 40 yeas, 18 nays, voted to retire for consultation.

Having retired, the question recurred on the motion of Mr. McDonald, which was decided in the negative; yeas 20, nays 34.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, it was—

Ordered, That four managers on the part of the House of Representatives may be allowed to submit arguments upon the question whether the respondent is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and whether the issues of the fact presented in the pleadings are material, and also whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

And then, the Senate having returned to its chamber, the President pro tempore said :

The presiding officer is directed to state that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the order of argument was made is overruled, and also to state that an order is made granting the request of the managers on the part of the House that four of the managers be permitted to argue the case.

2139. On July 7, 1876,<sup>55</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question arose as to the admissibility of certain testimony.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, who had objected to the testimony, claimed the right as the objector to the opening and closing of the argument, but offered to waive the opening.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, admitted the right claimed, and insisted that the managers should exercise it.

Thereupon Mr. McMahon argued, and was followed by Mr. Carpenter. Then Mr. Manager George A. Jenks closed.

2140. Instance of action by the Senate as to improper language used by counsel for respondent in an impeachment trial.

The presiding officer at an impeachment trial exercises authority to call to order counsel using improper language.

On April 29, 1868,<sup>56</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and during the final arguments in the case, Mr. Charles Sumner, a Senator from Massachusetts, offered the following :

Whereas Mr. Nelson, one of the counsel for the President, in addressing the Senate, has used disorderly words, as follows, namely : Beginning with personalities directed to one of the managers he proceeded to say, "So far as any question that the gentleman desires to make of a personal character with me is concerned, this is not the place to make it. Let him make it elsewhere if he desires to do it:" and whereas such language, besides to fight a duel, contrary to law and good morals : Therefore,

The Chief Justice<sup>87</sup> said that the proposition of Mr. Sumner was not before the Senate if objected to.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, thereupon objected.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, who was the manager referred to, asked that no further action be taken in regard to the language referred to.

On April 30,<sup>87</sup> the proposition came before the Senate sitting for the trial.

Pending consideration, Mr. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, asked Mr. Nelson if he intended by the language to challenge the manager to a duel.

Mr. Nelson said that he did not particularly have a duel in mind. He simply resented a charge by the manager, and he had no idea of insulting the Senate.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, moved that the proposition lie on the table, and the motion was agreed to; yeas 35, nays 10.

2141. On June 16, 1876,<sup>88</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, offered a paper in the nature of a plea that the proceeding be dismissed because the Senate had affirmed its jurisdiction of the case by less than a two-thirds vote.

Objection arose to placing the paper on file, whereupon Mr. Black said:

Mr. President, we offer a paper asserting our legal and constitutional rights, as we understand them. A Senator rises and says he objects; a manager rises and says he objects. Is that a reason for simply throwing it under the table? Is there not to be some reason given for such a thing as that? What is to be done with this? Walk over us I admit you can, if a majority see proper to do so. They can do as they please; they can order it to be thrown under the table; but some little respect ought to be shown a man who is struggling for his liberty and his reputation—

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, interrupting, said:

I call the counsel to order. I do not think that the language he is addressing to the Chair is fit to be addressed to this court.

The President pro tempore<sup>89</sup> said:

Counsel will use language which is proper and decorous. * * * The counsel will proceed, using proper language. The Chair will call him to order if he does not use proper language.

2142. It was held that a motion relating to the sitting of the Senate in an impeachment trial might be argued by counsel.—Only July 7, 1876,<sup>90</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, moved that the Senate take a recess until 7:30 p.m. for the purpose of an evening session.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, was making an appeal against an evening session, when Mr. Edmunds raised the question of order that on a question of this kind of counsel were not entitled to be heard.

The President pro tempore<sup>59</sup> overruled the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter made his protest, and the Senate decided the motion of Mr. Edmunds in the negative.

2143. In arguing in an impeachment trial counsel take position under direction of the Senate.—On July 25, 1876,<sup>61</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, was about to address the Senate in the final summing up, when Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, said:

Before the counsel proceeds, I will state that I have heard some complaints made about the position that the counsel and managers have to occupy in the presence of the Senate. I therefore suggest that the counsel be allowed to occupy any position he desires from which to address the Senate.

Thereupon, by unanimous consent, Mr. Carpenter was permitted to stand in the outer tier of seats.

2144. Instance wherein a manager was permitted to move a change of the rules governing the Senate in impeachment trials.—On April 11, 1868,<sup>62</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, on behalf of the managers, moved in the Senate for a change in one of the rules governing the trial.

This motion was entertained.

2145. Instance wherein the managers of an impeachment declined to answer a question propounded by a Senator during the trial.—On April 1, 1868,<sup>63</sup> in the Senate during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, was under examination. Counsel for the President objected to a question tending to elicit from witness the substance of a conversation with General Thomas, and statements of the latter as to the means by which the President proposed to obtain possession of the war office.

In the course of the discussion as to the admissibility of the question, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, Senator from Maryland, propounded the following:

The honorable managers are requested to say whether evidence hereafter will be produced to show—

First. That the President, before the time when the declarations of Thomas, which they propose to prove, were made, authorized him to obtain possession of the office by force or threats, or intimidation, if necessary; or,

Secondly. If not, that the President had knowledge that such declarations had been made and approved of them.

To which Mr. Manager John A. Bingham replied:

I am instructed by my associates to say—and I am in accord in judgment with them, Mr. President—that we do not deem it our duty to make answer to so general a question as that; and it will certainly occur to the Senate why we should not make answer to it.

impeachment of trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, and Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, were engaged in a colloquy, when the President pro tempore<sup>65</sup> said:

The Chair will remind the gentlemen that they must rise to speak, and address the Chair. The Chair will insist upon it. * * * The Chair will again remind gentlemen, and hopes he does it for the last time, that the counsel as well as the managers should address the Presiding Officer, that he may maintain the rights of the parties. It is due to the Senate that it should be done; and the duty of the Chair demands it to protect the respect due to the Senate. The Chair will state, also, that he will not recognize a gentleman on either side unless he does rise and address the Presiding Officer.

2147. During an impeachment trial a proposition by managers or counsel is not amendable by Senators, but yields precedence to one made by a Senator.

A proposition offered by a Senator during an impeachment trial is amendable by Senators, but not by managers or counsel.

On June 6, 1876,<sup>66</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a proposition fixing the time for the hearing of evidence on the merits was under discussion, and motions were offered by the managers for the House of Representatives, by the counsel for the respondent, and by Senators. A question arising as to amendment and precedence the President pro tempore<sup>67</sup> said:

The Chair has ruled that a proposition made by managers or counsel is not amendable by Senators; but any proposition made by a Senator is amendable by a Senator, nor can the proposition made by Senators be amended by the counsel or managers. A motion made by a Senator has priority of one offered by the managers or the counsel.

2148. During an impeachment trial an order proposed by a Senator is debatable by managers and counsel, but not by Senators.—

On June 1, 1876,<sup>68</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. William Pinckney Whyte, a Senator from Maryland, offered an order fixing the time for further pleadings on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, discussed the proposed order at some length.

Thereupon Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, proposed to address the Senate.

The President pro tempore<sup>1</sup> reminded him that debate was not in order:

Mr. Thurman said:

I do not wish to debate, but I want to know the rule of the Senate on this subject. I want to know whether there is to be an unlimited discussion of counsel and managers on every order that is offered by a Senator. In my judgment it is all irregular.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair will state in reply to the Senator from Ohio that the Chair was holding under the rule that each of the parties is entitled to one hour's debate on any motion or order submitted.

2149. During the Peck impeachment trial the respondent assisted his counsel in examining witnesses, in argument on incidental questions, etc.—On January 11, 1831,<sup>69</sup> in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the case of the United States v. James H. Peck, the respondent, who was United States district judge of Missouri, assisted his counsel, personally addressing the court to offer documentary evidence, to explain testimony which he proposed to offer, to propound questions to the witness, to make a statement supplementary to the testimony of a witness, and to argue as to the admissibility of certain testimony.

2150. Delays in the Johnson trial caused by illness of counsel for respondent were the occasion of protest on the part of the managers and of action by the Senate.—On April 16, 1868,<sup>70</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, announced that the defense had reached a point where it would not be convenient to produce any more testimony on this day. On April 14 the Senate had adjourned because of the illness of Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the respondent, and on April 15 the proceedings had been modified somewhat because of his continued illness. He was still absent on the 16th, when Mr. Evarts, after introducing considerable testimony made announcement as above stated.

This caused a protest from Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of which he said:

We adjourned early on Monday, as you remember, and on the next day there was an adjournment almost immediately after the Senate met because of the learned Attorney-General. Now, all we ask is that this case may go on.

If it be said that we are hard in our demands that this trial go on, let me contrast for a moment this case with a great State trial in England, at which were present Lord Chief Justice Eyre, Lord Chief Baron McDonald, Baron Hotham, Mr. Justice Buller, Sir Nash Grose, Mr. Justice Lawrence, and others of Her Majesty's judges in the trial of Thomas Hardy for treason. There the court sat from 9 o'clock in the morning until 1 o'clock at night, and they thus sat there from Tuesday until Friday night at 1 o'clock, and then, when Mr. Erskine, afterwards Lord Chancellor Erskine, asked of that court that they would not come in so early by an hour the next day because he was unwell and wanted time, the court after argument refused it, and would not give him even that hour in which to reflect upon his opening which he was to make, and which occupied nine hours in its delivery, until the jury asked it, and then they gave him but a single hour, although he said upon his honor to the court that every night he had not got to his house until between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, and he was regularly in court at 9 o'clock on the following morning.

That is the way cases of great consequence are tried in England. That is the way other courts sit. I am not complaining here, Senators, understand me. I am only contrasting the delays given, the kindnesses shown, the courtesies extended in this greatest of all cases, and where the greatest interests are at stake, compared with every other case ever tried elsewhere. The managers are ready. We have been ready; at all hazards and sacrifices we would be ready. We only ask that now the counsel for the President shall be likewise ready, and go on without these interminable delays with which when the House began this impeachment the friends of the President there rose up and threatened.

At the conclusion of Mr. Butler's remarks, Mr. John Conness, Senator from California, offered this order:

Ordered, That on each day hereafter the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m.

Mr. Charles Sumner proposed the following as a substitute therefor :

That, considering the public interests which suffer from the delay of this trial, and in pursuance of the order already adopted to proceed with all convenient dispatch, the Senate will sit from 10 o'clock in the forenoon to 6 o'clock in the afternoon, with such brief recess as may be ordered.

Under the ruling the proposed order went over to April 17 for consideration, when Mr. Sumner's proposed substitute was disagreed to, yeas 13, nays 30. The original order offered by Mr. Conness was then agreed to, yeas 29, nays 14.

The Senate had heretofore met at 12 m. under the rule.

2151. Instance during an impeachment trial wherein the Presiding Officer admonished managers and counsel not to waste time.—On February 15, 1905,<sup>70a</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, in the course of the introduction of testimony, the Presiding Officer<sup>70b</sup> said :

While the Presiding Officer makes no criticism on the course of the examination and cross-examination, he desires to say that the time of the Senate is very precious, and he hopes that there will be as little time taken by immaterial questions, either by the managers or by counsel, as possible, and that we may get along with this case.

2152. The Senate, and not the Presiding Officer, decides on a motion for attachment of a witness.

Instance wherein, during the Swayne trial, testimony was introduced to show the propriety of an attachment against an absent witness.

On February 10, 1905<sup>71</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, after the pleadings had been concluded and when the witnesses were called, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, manager on behalf of the House of Representatives, said :

Mr. President, in the case of Joseph H. Durkee, of Jacksonville, Fla., we have a certificate of a physician stating that he is not able to attend. The certificate was sent to the Presiding Officer and by him handed to me, and it has been exhibited to counsel on the other side.

Mr. Durkee is a witness who has been subpoenaed by both sides, and is a material and important witness. I have a witness present who will testify with respect to Mr. Durkee's present condition, and I ask that Mr. B. S. Liddon be summoned to testify what Mr. Durkee's present condition is, for the purpose of moving for an attachment.

Mr. Liddon was then sworn and examined, giving testimony indicating that Mr. Durkee was able to attend.

The testimony being concluded, Mr. Palmer announced that on that showing the managers would ask for an attachment. He suggested, however, that if the counsel for respondent would consent, it could be arranged to take the deposition of the witness at his home. The counsel declined to agree to this.

Then the Presiding Officer<sup>72</sup> said :

The Senate will take into consideration the motion for an attachment, and decide it later on. The Presiding Officer will merely say at the present time that it seems to be understood that the witness is suffering from a serious disease, which makes it very difficult for him to travel, certainly without an attendant, and that for that reason his son, who is a physician, has been summoned. It would seem as if it were hardly required to issue an attachment until information is communicated to the Senate as to whether there is a real refusal on the part of the witness to come or whether the witness will come with his son as an attendant.

For the reason the Presiding Officer suggests that a decision of the motion be postponed, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will be instructed to ascertain whether the witness will come under the circumstances.

Later on this day, however, on a question relating to another witness, the Presiding Officer said <sup>73</sup>:

The rules require that a motion for an attachment shall be decided by the Senate rather than by the Presiding Officer. The Presiding Officer, however, will suggest that the motion being now made, a decision upon it can be delayed for a little time. There may be some further information. So it is not necessary to submit the question at this time to the Senate, unless it be desired.

2153. On February 13, 1905,<sup>74</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, in respect to the application made by counsel for the respondent for an attachment against Louis P. Paquet, we desire to have the matter properly investigated as to whether the witness is really able to attend or not, and to that end we ask that the attachment may issue, and that the officer or the Sergeant-at-Arms serving the same may be charged with the discretion of determining whether the witness is able to attend or not. That is the course which has been pursued in practice with which I am familiar. In other words, where there is doubt in the mind of the court or of counsel as to whether a witness is able to attend or not, the court awaits the return of the sheriff or the marshal in the premises.

The Presiding Officer <sup>75</sup> said:

The sixth rule of the Senate for impeachment trials provides that motions for attachment must be decided by the Senate rather than the Presiding Officer. Whether it be necessary for the Senate to retire to consult upon this matter the Presiding Officer does not know, but he will state the motion to the Senate.

Mr. Paquet, a witness summoned for the respondent, has furnished the certificate of a physician that he has been ill since January 31, and is still ill, confined to his bed, and probably will not be able to travel for two or three weeks. Counsel for respondent now moves that an attachment may issue, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms in serving the same be authorized to use his discretion to determine whether the witness is or is not able to travel. Unless there be some motion made to retire for the consideration of this question, the Presiding Officer will submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. John C. Spooner, a Senator from Wisconsin, said:

Mr. President, whether a witness shall be brought by an attachment or not is for the judgment of the Senate as a court. I should think, and I should like to hear it somewhat discussed, if there are authorities sustaining the proposition, that a court issues an attachment for a witness leaving it to the sheriff to determine whether the judgment of the court or the writ shall be executed or not. I should like to have the authorities produced.

2154. Rule in the Swayne trial governing Senators as to colloquies and questions addressed by them to managers, counsel, or other Senators.

In the Swayne trial Senators were permitted a freedom of debate greater than usual.

On January 27, 1905,<sup>76</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, a debate arose between Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of the managers for the House of Representatives, and Mr. J. C. S. Blackburn, a Senator from Kentucky.

The Presiding Officer said :

The Chair wishes to observe at this point that he doubts the propriety of debate between Senators and the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House. He does not speak positively upon that question, not having had an opportunity to examine the precedents.

On February 3,<sup>77</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, offered and the Senate agreed to an order containing the following rule :

It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy, or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other, but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer.

The effect of this rule seems to have been to permit debate and suggestions by Senators. Thus on February 10<sup>78</sup> Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, suggested as to testimony and debated. On February 13<sup>79</sup> there was extended debate of Senators on the subject of issuing processes for witnesses. On February 14<sup>80</sup> Mr. Porter J. McCumber, of North Dakota, and others, discussed evidence. Also on February 23,<sup>81</sup> on an order relating to the printing of arguments of managers, there was free debate by the Senators. Yet on an important question relating to the admissibility of testimony, arising on February 14<sup>82</sup> and 16, the Senate, after some debate, decided to enforce the rule providing for secret sessions. In other cases, also, the doors were closed. But during this trial Senators were permitted a greater freedom of debate than in other trials.

2155. The judgment of the Lords in impeachments is given in accordance with the law of the land.

The trial of impeachments before the Lords is governed by the legal rules of evidence.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England," on the subject of impeachments.

Judgment. Judgments in Parliament, for death, have been strictly guided per legem terrae, which they can not alter; and not at all according to their discretion. They can neither omit any part of the legal judgment, nor add to it. Their sentence must be secundum, no ultra legem. (Seld. Jud., 168, 171.) This trial, though it varies in external ceremony, yet differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments, prevailed; for impeachments are not framed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution against too powerful delinquents. The judgment therefore is to be such as is warranted by legal principles or precedents. (6 Sta. Tr., 14; 2 Wood., 611.) The chancellor gives judgment in misdemeanors; the lord high steward formerly in cases of life and death. (Seld. Jud., 180.) But now the steward is deemed not necessary. (Fost., 144; 2 Wood., 613.) In misdemeanors the greatest corporal punishment hath been imprisonment. (Seld. Jud., 184.) The King's assent is necessary in capital judgments (but 2 Wood., 614, contra), but not in misdemeanors. (Seld. Jud., 136.)

2156. In the Belknap trial the Senate directed the managers and counsel for respondent to furnish to one another lists of the witnesses they proposed to call.

The Senate denied in the Belknap trial the application of respondent's counsel for a statement of the facts which the managers expected to prove by each witness.

Form of a motion submitted by counsel for respondent in an impeachment trial.

On June 6, 1876,<sup>7</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, an order was made providing that on July 6, 1876, the Senate would proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

Thereupon Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, submitted this motion:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES

v.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP

William W. Belknap, by his counsel, moves the court that an order be made upon the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to furnish within twenty-four hours to the accused or his counsel a list of the witnesses whom they intend to call, together with the particulars of the facts which they expect to prove by them.

It being stated on behalf of the managers that a large portion of the testimony, and especially the material testimony, had been printed, Mr. Blair said:

Of course in respect to that part of the testimony which has been printed, it is very easy to furnish it to us; but I beg leave to say that there is a large portion of the testimony taken before the Judiciary Committee of which we are not at all informed, which we have applied to the managers for copies of, but they repelled us and refused to give them to us. We do not know what part of it they may rely on at all. We have rumors of its character from the press; but we do not know what part of it they mean to rely upon, or what facts they mean to rely upon; and as we are ordered to prepare, we want to make that preparation to meet such case as they may make.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, asked this question:

Is there any precedent for the order asked for, either in impeachment trials or in ordinary courts of criminal jurisdiction?

To this Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, replied:

No; but certainly there ought to be one made. * * * We do not go upon precedent here; that is, this application is not founded upon anything that has ever happened before. There never was a case like this before. I have never heard whether the managers object to this order or not. If they do, I can not conceive for what reason. Certainly they do not intend to keep us in ignorance of the kind of case they are going to produce against us and take us by surprise and then proceed and run over us and get a conviction against us on grounds that we have no notice of. They do not think it is unfair, I suppose, to tell us beforehand what sort of facts they intend to produce.

They have their witnesses here, or at least within easy reach. Ours are scattered all over the continent; some of them in California, others in the Indian Territory. It becomes absolutely necessary for us, as soon as we can, to get out our subpoenas for witnesses and use all diligence in bringing them here. If the trial is to go on upon the 6th of July or at any other time, even a month later than that, we will be hard pressed for time. We can not know what particular witness we need or how many of them unless we are informed of theirs and understand that facts they mean to prove or try to prove.

I maintain, as to every public accuser, a manager of the House of Representatives, an attorney-general, or district attorney, if he has a criminal case which he intends to prosecute against a citizen, that he is bound by his duty and as a lover of justice to disclose the whole case to the defendant as fully as possible and at the earliest moment.

The gentlemen say, when we ask them for this list, that it is a secret which they have the right to keep and they will keep it until the moment of the trial and then spring it upon us, so that we shall be unable to meet it by contradiction or explanation. They wish to take us by surprise as much as possible, and convict the defendant, if they can, without giving him a chance to show his innocence. They say there is no precedent for such a call as we make upon them now. Nothing like this is found in the common-law cases. I do not know how far back they want us to go for a precedent old enough to suit them. In modern times it has never been refused. I admit that by the common law, whose authority they invoke, a man on trial in any criminal court had no chance at all for life or liberty. He was not allowed counsel. He was not allowed to call witnesses. He was not confronted with the witnesses against him. None of those privileges which are secured in our Constitution were given to a party charged with a criminal offense by the ancient common law. That common law was a bloody old beast.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, said :

What is the proposition which the counsel makes? It is no more and no less than this, that he has the right to invade the room of the managers, that he has the right to ascertain their course of trial, that he has the right to know every possible witness to prove a certain fact.

Sufficient it is to say that the wisdom of all the ages is against it. The learned counsel had better devote himself to answering the question of the Senator, and find whether in all the past ages a single precedent of this kind has been had in any criminal proceeding. It is not enough for him to rise here and say he did not hear the managers object. He may possibly have been out of the room. It is not enough for him to stand here and say, "We need to make a precedent in this case." It is enough for us to answer that he asks for an extraordinary precedent, extraordinary proceeding, against the wisdom of all the past, and in regard to which he can not find the first authority in rummaging through all the books of the common law and all the books relating to criminal jurisprudence. I am surprised that any such proposition should be seriously made here, that we should be compelled, in advance, to disclose to him the names of witnesses and what each witness is expected to testify to, when we have laid before him in the broadest manner every charge that we make, and one article of these articles of impeachment contains seventeen specifications.

The order proposed by counsel for respondent was disagreed to by the Senate, without division.

The Senate then agreed to this order :

Ordered, That the managers furnish to the defendant, or his counsel, within four days, a list of witnesses, as far as at present known to them, that they intend to call this case; and that, within four days thereafter, the respondent furnish to the managers a list of witnesses, as far as known, that he intends to summon.

2157. In the Belknap trial the Senate adjourned to await the attendance of a witness declared by the respondent, on oath, to be "material and necessary for his defense."

The Senate declined to postpone formally the Belknap trial to await the attendance of a witness for the respondent.

Respondent's application in the Belknap trial for delay to await a witness's arrival was not required to be accompanied by a statement as to what he would prove.

Form of respondent's application for delay to await a witness in an impeachment trial.

On January 12, 1876,<sup>3</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, after the testimony for the respondent had proceeded some time, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, announced that one witness whom they had asked to have summoned—John S. Evans—had not appeared. He said that his presence was necessary at this stage, and asked the Senate sitting for the trial to adjourn some reasonable time for Mr. Evans to arrive.

To this the managers on the part of the House of Representatives objected.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar said :

I understand the rule and practice to be perfectly well settled and enforced in all courts where justice is administered according to the forms and practice of the common law that a party in a civil or criminal case applying either for a continuance or a postponement on account of the absence of a witness must show—

First. That the witness has been duly summoned ;

Second. That the evidence which the witness would give if present is material and important to his cause ; and,

Third. That the evidence must be so set forth that the opposite party may, if he choose, elect to admit that the witness, if present, would so testify ; not to admit the fact, but that the witness, if present, would so testify ; and that election is always tendered to the opposite party.

There is but one exception to the universality of that rule, which is, that where the evidence is of itself of a character which the witness only could state, that is not required of the party, as, for instance, if the question were of the construction of a dam which had been taken away, the scientific expert under whose direction that structure was built would be the only person who could describe it, and it would be impossible for the party ordinarily to say what his witness would testify to on that subject if he were present ; but with that exception, of the evidence of experts where it is of such a character that the evidence could not be understood by the party who undertakes to set it forth, the rule is universal.

In the present case I fully concede that the defendant's counsel ought to stand before the Senate as if they had summoned the witness. They applied to the Senate for a subpoena. The Senate granted the order. The Sergeant-at-Arms did not execute it because, as he understood, there had been a subpoena issued already and served at the instance of the other party. So we agree that the defense stands here in all respects having used all diligence to obtain the presence of this witness ; but the defendant shows no reason whatever why he should not state the evidence which Mr. Evans would give if he were present and give us an opportunity to elect to consent to that evidence. In fact, Mr. Evans, it appears, has been twice examined very fully in regard to this whole transaction before two different committees of the House. It is true that there was nobody present at that examination representing the defendant, and therefore certainly it is true that the defendant can not be sure that the facts favorable to him within Evan's knowledge were brought out in that examination. I do not overlook that. I make the concession also as fully as the learned counsel could desire. Still, either he can state what Mr. Evans would testify if he were present, and his reasons for believing that he would so testify, or he has no reason to believe that Evan's testimony would be valuable to him if he were here. He can not escape, as it seems to me, that dilemma. Either he has no reason to suppose that Mr. Evans would be more important to him than any other citizen of the United States who is at a distance of a thousand miles from this place or he can state what it is that this witness knows and would prove, and give us the opportunity to make our election.

I conceive that any distinction in practice which has grown up in State courts between a first continuance from term to term and a second continuance from term to term has nothing whatever to do with this matter. This is not a court having terms. It is a court which expires with its first and only term. This is not the case of an application for a continuance of a trial made before trial. It is a case where the trial has begun and has proceeded with the full consent in this particular of both parties. The evidence is fresh in the minds of all the members of the court. This, therefore, is a simple application for the postponement of a trial which is already far advanced toward its termination.

My associate [Mr. Manager Jenks] desires me to state the case of the trial of Smith and Ogden in the circuit court of the United States, where Judge Paterson establishes the rule that I have stated.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

It is proposed, I suppose, from this initiatory proceeding, to treat this as an application for a continuance. Everything that has been said proceeds upon the assumption that we have applied for a continuance of this case, whereas we only ask that a witness who has been duly summoned, who ought to be here now, for whose absence we are not responsible, should be allowed a reasonable time to make his appearance, being detained by freshets or some other cause for which the party defendant is not in any way responsible. We have no disposition to abuse the patience of this body. We do not expect a delay beyond the time when the Senate will be in session in the transaction of its other business. We do not expect to detain this body with any long speeches. We have evinced no disposition whatever at any time, as I may appeal to the experience of every gentleman who hears me, to abuse the patience of this body in any respect, and above all not to try any sharp practice upon this body, but to have a fair trial.

I utterly protest against the application of rules derived from other proceedings altogether to the occasion which has arisen now, which is not an application for a continuance. We only ask that this body will wait until a man who has been summoned by its order makes his appearance here so that we may proceed with our examination.

While I am up I will say, however, that my learned friend on the other side and the very learned gentleman who makes this proposition are altogether mistaken or I am in regard to the rules of practice about what terms a party is to have who makes his application for a continuance. The gentleman who is associated with me has said that on application for a second continuance under the rules of the State in which I have practiced the party is required to state what the witness is expected to prove. The practice which prevails in the circuit court of this District and in Maryland, as my learned friend who represents that State on this floor [Mr. Whyte] will bear me out, is that where a party makes an application for a continuance, and states what he expects to prove by the witness, that proof is assumed to be a fact, not that the witness has proved it, but it is assumed to be a fact, an indisputable fact, according to the practice prevailing in this District, and in Maryland, from which State we derive the practice that prevails in the District. So that if the rule is to be enforced here, and the analogy is to be taken from the practice prevailing in this District, if we state what we expect to prove by this witness, and they proceed to trial, what we expect to prove is assumed to be an undisputed fact. That is the law of this District and the practice of the courts of the United States in the District of Columbia. That is a peculiar law. It does not prevail in the other courts with which I am familiar. It does not prevail in Missouri, where I practiced a great many years; but it is a law of this District and of Maryland. So then there are differences in respect to the laws of the different States. There is no uniform law on this subject. There is no common law upon this subject. There is none here recognized by this body. This court will have to make a rule for itself, and especially will it have to make a rule for itself in a proceeding which is not a motion for a continuance, but a motion for the delay of this trial until a witness can reach here who has been duly summoned. * * *

And, in response to a question by Mr. Manager Hoar, Mr. Blair said:

The gentleman knows perfectly well that when cases are called for trial in the ordinary courts of judicature the parties are asked whether they are ready for trial, that then and there the parties announce whether they are ready or not, and that motions for continuance are made and settled before they proceed to trial. Here there has been no occasion of that kind. We have been required to go to trial on this occasion without any "ifs" or "ands" about it, whether we were ready or not. We have been appointed a given day to be here. We have been notified that our witnesses would be summoned, and we have had the allowance of a committee of this body to summon them. We put their names in the hands of the officer to summon them. He has summoned them; and it is not our fault that this witness is not here. The analogies of the gentleman break down. One of the most unjust things in this world is to apply false analogies. It is the most misleading of all modes of reasoning.

Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, also of counsel for the respondent, argued:

I deny utterly the rule which they lay down with so much emphasis as being the true and only rule applicable to such a case—that is, that when a party is caught with an absent witness whom he had used all diligence to get here, and who he had good reason to believe would be here—it is either fair or just or law to push him forward or make him show the specific testimony which the witness would give if he were here, unless there be some reason to doubt the good faith of the application or the materiality of the witness, supposing him to be here.

The managers have produced a book, The Trials of Smith and Ogden. There the counsel for the accused asked for the continuance of the cause until they should be able to get certain witnesses from Washington, to which it was objected that they had not stated what specific facts the witnesses would prove if they were present in court. Mr. Colden, of counsel for the defense, answered:

"That is not the law as we have hitherto understood it. If we are obliged to offer an affidavit, we conceive it to be sufficient, in the first instance, to declare generally that the witnesses are material without specifying the particular points to which they are to testify, and that without them our client can not safely proceed to trial."

To which the answer of the judge was this:

"You must offer an affidavit, and must show in what respect the witnesses are material."

Now mark the reason upon which that ruling was founded:

"The facts charged in the indictment took place, and are laid, in New York; the witnesses are admitted to have been during that period at Washington. The presumption is therefore that they can not be material, and this presumption must be removed by affidavit."

That is the rule. If we were asking for a postponement on account of a witness who manifestly was a thousand miles off at the time the fact which we wished to examine him upon occurred, that would raise such a presumption against us that the court would very properly call upon us to show how that witness could be a material witness. They have cited this book as a precedent, and, so far as I have read it, it is a sound precedent. Let them follow it up.

At the conclusion of the arguments, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, proposed this order, which was agreed to without division:

Ordered, That the Senate will receive any evidence otherwise competent which the counsel for the respondent assure the Senate will be connected with the case by the testimony of the witness Evans, now absent, but whom the respondent duly asked to have summoned and who is expected to appear.

Later, during the same day,<sup>9</sup> Mr. Carpenter announced:

Now, Mr. President, we have completed all the testimony that in our opinion as counsel we can properly and safely introduce until Mr. Evans is sworn. We now repeat the request that the court adjourn for a reasonable time to enable Mr. Evans to be present.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We certainly renew our objections, Mr. President, to a continuance without a compliance with the rule, or, if not the rule, a rule that ought to be established by the Senate, that the materiality or pertinency of the testimony expected be submitted to the Senate. The question has been argued.

Soon after Mr. Carpenter asked leave to file this affidavit in support of their motion:

In United States Senate sitting as a court of impeachment

v.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

W. W. Belknap, being first duly sworn, on oath says that he has stated to his counsel, Hon. J. S. Black, Montgomery Blair, and Matt. H. Carpenter, what he expects to prove by John S. Evans, and after such statement is advised by his said counsel, and verily believes, that the testimony of said Evans is material and necessary for his defense in this cause, the said Evans being the same person upon whose appointment the articles of impeachment are based; that said affiant is informed and believes that said Evans is en route for Washington and detained by high water obstructing the roads, but that he will be in as soon as he can get here, and this application for postponement of the trial is made in good faith, and not for delay.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of July, A. D. 1876.

W. J. McDONALD,
Chief Clerk Senate.

Mr. Manager McMahan said :

The objection has been fully stated, and we only rise now to enter it formally here.

In support of the objection Mr. Manager Elbridge G. Lapham said :

The respondent entered upon the trial without objection, upon the assumption that he was ready for trial. We are now in the midst of the trial; and a different rule, I submit, applies to this case from what would have been applicable if this application to postpone had been made before the trial commenced, upon the ground that Evans was not here in attendance. We have waited until the evidence on our side is completed, with the right to call this witness in case he comes, for we want him, I apprehend, much more than the defense. We have waited until the defense have exhausted in the main their evidence, according to the suggestion of the counsel. Now they propose to stop this trial midway, and postpone the further hearing by reason of the absence of this witness, without any suggestion as to what they propose to prove in respect to this case by him. I submit that an application now, pending the trial, is upon an entirely different footing from an application made before the trial is entered upon on the supposition and statement that the party is not ready for trial and can not properly commence it. The defendant did not ask to postpone this case on the ground that his witnesses were not here. He entered upon the trial on the 6th of the present month, the day assigned by the Senate for the trial, without objection that he was not prepared to go through with it. It was then the proper time, if his witnesses were not here, for him to have asked a postponement until their arrival. Having entered upon the trial, and having proceeded to the point we now have reached, I submit that the application to postpone is upon a different footing from what it would have been if made then.

Mr. Carpenter replied :

Mr. President, the reason for strictness against an application made to adjourn a cause after the trial of it has commenced in a court of law is that a jury is not a continuing institution. It is summoned for a term, and it never comes again. That particular body never comes a second time. That is the reason, and it is always stated so, why greater strictness is observed in regard to the postponement of a trial commenced before a jury. Everything that has been done must be lost. The testimony at the next term must be retaken, and the whole case proceed de novo. Here is a trial in the court of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, a body that can not die as long as the Government lives, a continuous institution, that is not to lose the benefit of what has been done. The strict attention which has been paid by every Senator here to this testimony shows that it will never fade from his recollection. There is not the slightest fear that when the Senate shall postpone this hearing for a week or ten days to have this witness arrive any of the testimony will be even faintly fading away at all in the minds of the Senate. The argument, therefore, made by the managers as to a nisi prius trial before a jury has no application.

Again, he says we ought to have applied for a continuance before we commenced the trial. I have already stated to the Senate, and now repeat, that when we made our application to have this witness subpoenaed he was not subpoenaed in our behalf, because the Government had subpoenaed him themselves. The Government were here with their case, and Mr. Evans was one of their witnesses, and we have heard from first to last that he was one of their main and principal witnesses, the thought of whose absence makes their grief overflow. We had no doubt that the managers were acting in good faith. We had no doubt that they would not proceed to the trial until they knew their chief witnesses were at command.

Mr. Carpenter then presented this request:

The respondent's counsel ask for an order that the further trial of this cause be postponed until notice be given by the Senate to the House of Representatives of the United States and to the respondent.

Pending consideration of this application, the Senate sitting for the trial adjourned.

On July 13 the President pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate describing the efforts made to secure the attendance of the witness, and stating that the latter had started for Washington, but had been detained by bad roads.

Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, a Senator from Delaware, having propounded to counsel for the respondent a question which had not been answered, proposed the following:

That as a condition precedent to the order for postponement of this trial asked for on the 12th instant by the respondent it is Ordered, That the respondent inform the Senate what in substance he proposes to prove by John S. Evans, the witness on the ground of whose absence postponement is asked.

Mr. Carpenter then said:

Mr. President and Senators, I desire in the first place to enter a respectful protest against being compelled in a criminal case to state what we expect to prove by a witness. I do that, not for its importance in this case so much as I hold that every lawyer defending a person accused in any court owes it to his profession to stand by the regular practice, and I understand that to be the regular practice almost without exception, that where a defendant in a criminal case is not in fault to the subpoenaing of a witness he is not compellable to state what he expects to prove by that witness.

In this case, however, one or two things I may state. In the first place, we expect to prove by Mr. Evans one reason why he was not appointed when he first applied for this position, and that was that he intended to form a partnership with Durfee * * * and that that was one important reason why he was not appointed at first.

In the next place, let me say that Mr. Evans is the man upon whose appointment these articles rest. We have never examined him nor had an opportunity to do so. He has sworn twice before a committee of the House, and the testimony presented by the managers is quite voluminous in manuscript. We have never read it; at least I have never read it; and I never supposed we should be called upon to read it, because we had the assurance of the Government that Mr. Evans was to be here. It seems now, from the statement of the Sergeant-at-Arms, that Mr. Evans was here and was released temporarily by the managers themselves without consultation with us. Our witness had been subpoenaed by the order of the Senate, has been here, has been discharged or released temporarily by the opposite party without consultation with us, and we desire to call and examine him.

Now we are asked, "Will you state what you expect to prove by him?" We can not, because we do not know what he will swear to in regard to certain points.

And, sir, in a trial like this where every word we utter goes upon the record to be called back in the summing up of this case to show that we were mistaken about what the witness would swear, we should be guarded and prudent. We know this man Evans has had intimate knowledge of the management of that tradership from first to last, for he has been the trader. We know from glancing through certain other testimony and from certain other facts within our knowledge that he must have knowledge of certain subjects which we think if he would swear one way will be important to us; if he would swear the other way it might not be so beneficial to us. We think he will swear in our favor; and yet we do not know what he will swear; and therefore we do not know what we expect to prove by him.

The Senate, without further action on the application, adjourned.

On July 14 the Senate sitting for the trial adjourned to Monday, the 17th, the following order being made:

Ordered, That when the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourns it be till Monday next and that the trial then proceed.

On Monday, the witness not having arrived, Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, proposed this order:

Ordered, That the respondent have leave to examine John S. Evans at any stage of the proceedings prior to the termination of the argument-in-chief to any matter material to his defense.

But on motion of Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the Senate sitting in this trial adjourn until Wednesday, the 19th instant.

On Wednesday Mr. Evans was present, and was sworn.

2158. The Senate sitting on impeachment trials is empowered by rule to compel the attendance of witnesses.

The Senate sitting on impeachment trials has authority to enforce obedience to its orders, writs, judgments, etc., punish contempts, and make lawful orders and rules.

The Sergeant-at-Arms is authorized by rule to employ necessary aid to enforce the lawful orders, writs, etc., of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials.

Discussion as to the power of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials to command assistance of the military, naval, or civil service of the United States.

Discussion as to the power of the Senate sitting on impeachments to enforce its final judgment.

Present form and history of Rule VI of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VI of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

VI. The Senate shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of, and disobedience to, its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the Senate, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of the Senate.

This rule dates from the revision made in 1868, at the time of the impeachment proceedings against President Johnson. The committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported<sup>10</sup> the rule in this form:

VI. The court shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of and disobedience to its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the presiding officer may, by the direction of the court, require the aid and assistance of any officer or person in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments of said court.

The Senate having come to a conclusion which caused the word "court" to be discarded, the word "Senate" was substituted.<sup>11</sup> Before that was done, however, another question had been presented by the motion of Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, who moved to strike out the lines—

And the Presiding Officer may, by the direction of the court, require the aid and assistance of any officer or person in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments of said court.

Debate arose on this motion,<sup>12</sup> involving two points—one as to the power of the Senate to command such assistance for its incidental or interlocutory judgments, and the other as to the power to enforce by such means, or by any means, its final judgment.

In support of his motion Mr. Saulsbury said:

My reason for making this motion is that, in my judgment, it is not in the constitutional power of the Senate of the United States, when acting in the discharge of its ordinary duties or as a court, to command the services of the Army and Navy or of any officer of the Army and Navy; that if it is proper to clothe the court with such a power it is necessary to pass an act of Congress giving them the authority, if such an act itself could be constitutionally passed. Suppose that this provision of this article remained, and the court called upon the officers of the Army and Navy to assist the court in the discharge of its duties, and they should assist them either as officers or in company with men under their command, what power would the court have to compel their attendance and their assistance? They are already under the command, in the first instance, of the General of the Army, and, secondly and chiefly, under that of the President of the United States.

How, therefore, can the Senate, acting as a Senate, command the services of the Army and Navy or the officers of the Army and Navy? Suppose they refuse to obey the order of the court made upon them for any attendance or to assist the court, how can you enforce that order? I submit, Mr. President, if their services can be invoked by any agency whatever, it can only be done after the passage of an act by the two Houses of Congress; that the court then would be acting in pursuance of law; but that the orders of this body, this Senate, are not law, and that the words, if they remain, will be a nullity and inoperative.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, said:

Assuming that the Senate, when it proceeds to try an impeachment, is a court, I suppose it possesses those powers as to the execution of its judgments that other courts possess—no other or greater powers. I do not suppose that it can be contended that the Senate can make a rule which will have the force of law. True, the Senate may provide for its own government in the transaction of any particular kind of business; but I do not understand that the Senate can make a rule that will operate upon persons outside of the Senate, or that will operate like a legislative act.

Assuming, then, that the Senate, in making these rules, is confined to the creation of orders that regulate its own actions, it seems to me to follow necessarily that the court has no power by the use of military force to execute its judgment. Take any court; if you please, the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Suppose a judgment is rendered by that court; it becomes the duty of the ministerial officer, the marshal or the sheriff, to execute that judgment. If resistance is made to the process in his hands, then he may summon the posse comitatus for the purpose of executing that process; and if the resistance is so strong as to defeat his proceedings, under such circumstances, if there be any law of the land which authorizes it, he may call upon the military to assist him in the execution of the process. But I submit that when judgment is rendered by the court the jurisdiction of the court is at an end, so far as enforcing its execution is concerned. Can the supreme court of the District of Columbia make an order and enter it upon its records that if any process of that court is resisted a military or naval force shall be employed in the execution of that process? * * * as to whether the court in session may make an order commanding the military or naval forces of the United States to do any act whatever, unless it may be to protect the court, to protect its dignity, to preserve decorum. That is an inherent power in the court. But can the court issue an order as a court and say to General Grant, "You marshal your army in such a place for such a purpose? Or can it issue an order to any admiral in the Navy to put his armed vessels in any particular position for any purpose? It seems to me that, if there is no law on the subject, there ought to be a law providing for the enforcement of judgments that are rendered in cases of this kind. If there be no law, then such a law ought to be enacted; but because there is no law the Senate has no power to assume to create such a law and exercise legislative power. I do not desire to have the Senate in making these rules go beyond its jurisdiction, though I am in favor, of course, of all rules that are necessary to enable the Senate to transact its business. But it does seem to me that if in a case of impeachment that may be tried before the Senate a judgment of guilty should be pronounced by the court it can make no subsequent order for the execution of that judgment. If the person who is to be removed from office by that judgment refuses to obey that judgment, then legislation will be necessary or some other power must be interposed.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, concurred with Mr. Williams if the rule was intended to enforce the final decree of the court. But he conceived that the rule was intended to apply only to what might be called the interlocutory orders of the court, to compel the attendance of witnesses, or judgments finding recalcitrant witnesses in contempt.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said :

I concur with the honorable Member from Delaware and the honorable Member from Oregon that we have no power to adopt the rule which we are asked to adopt. The rule which we are asked to adopt is one which, when proposed in the committee, of which I had the honor to be a member, I resisted, and I have seen no reason to change the opinion which led me to that course.

The authority conferred upon the Senate is to try all cases of impeachment, and the Constitution provides that when the President is the party impeached the Chief Justice is to preside; and the judgment which the Senate, acting as a court of impeachment, may pronounce can not extend beyond a declaration that the party impeached shall be removed from office and be thereafter ineligible to any other office of trust or profit under the United States. The "judgment shall not," in the language of the Constitution, "extend further than" that; and upon that judgment being rendered in the case of a President—we are to look at that as a case which is really now before us with reference to this question—the Vice-President, if we have one, is to become President; and if the Vice-President is himself the President and is himself the party impeached, the President pro tempore of the Senate is to become President. No process, therefore, is necessary to enforce that judgment to that extent. The moment it has been pronounced the incumbent who has been impeached ceases to be President, and the party next in succession becomes at once the President. When he is the President he has precisely the same authority that he who is elected President and who takes his office at the termination of the term of his predecessor has.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, argued :

I should be sorry to see us strip ourselves, by refusing to adopt a rule of this kind, of the power which that rule confers. It is a power which inheres in a body like this, as it does to the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England, from whence we derive our theory of trying impeachments. This rule only regulates and puts in force in the way of execution this existing power. We have to act as an organized body, whether sitting as a Senate or sitting as a court, because, as I said before, it is the same body exercising different functions, sitting for different purposes. Therefore, when the Constitution permits us to make rules and regulations for the government of the Senate, I think under the Constitution we can make a regulation for the government of the Senate when it is exercising any of the functions that the Constitution imposes upon it. Being of the opinion that this power to protect ourselves, and to enforce any order or mandate that the Constitution authorizes us to make, exists, while I agree that it ought to have the assistance of law in a great many respects, it being in my judgment an inherent power, we have a right to regulate and to name the cases in which it shall be put in exercise. As I have said before, if any question arises after we are sworn, and the Chief Justice takes the chair, as to the fact that the functions of the court are cramped by these general rules, it will be time enough then for the court to say that it will or will not (because it is the same body) change or execute them. Now, I should be sorry to see the Senate exercising the constitutional power of making rules and regulations in general, refuse to provide for putting in exercise a power of this kind, while I hope and believe it will not be necessary to make use of it; especially in view of the fact that it has been published to the world in another place (using parliamentary language), by a distinguished leader, that our orders, processes, and mandates will be resisted. * * *

The Constitution says that we are to try and adjudge, and there the Constitution stops; and hence, upon the logic of that proposition, inasmuch as the Constitution does not provide how we are to get the Chief Justice in here in a certain case, or how we are to be sworn in a certain other case, the law providing no oath, the Constitution providing no oath, merely stating that we are to be sworn, we are perfectly helpless. In short, the argument is that the Constitution is not a code of procedure; that it does not contain a set of rules and regulations. Mr. President, that is a mistake. It is a mistaken idea of the nature of the Constitution, of the idea of conferring constitutional power. Wherever there is a grant of power by a law or by a constitution to a tribunal or a body or a person, there is granted in that power, as a part of it, there is conferred as in it and of it and a part of it all the power that is necessary, justly and properly necessary, to the due exercise of the power conferred. So the Supreme Court frequently decided in the days of Marshall; and I challenge contradiction upon the proposition. * * *

The Senate gives itself the power, without having an endless debate on the subject, to direct its Presiding Officer, when we have a justice of the Supreme Court on trial or any other man accused, to apply to the President of the United States and ask of him the assistance that is necessary to protect us in the exercise of our functions. It does not assume the legislative power of imposing any penalty if that President should refuse. There is the distinction. If we were desiring to get a witness into court who refused to come, and force were needed to bring him upon attachment, it would be necessary, if he should bring action against one of the assistants of the Sergeant-at-Arms, for that assistant to defend on the authority of the Senate, and to prove that it was by our authority that he assisted the Sergeant-at-Arms in bringing in the witness. Now, what does this rule provide? It provides for all such cases in advance, without having a squabble over them at the time. By it our authority is given in advance, by a mere order to that effect on a single point, to call upon everybody to assist in the enforcement of our process.

Now, as to the final process, if you speak of it as process—it is not so spoken of in the report: it is spoken of as a judgment—it is said that the word "judgment" may include the final judgment. The term "judgment," of course, does in its natural meaning include final judgments as well as interlocutory ones; but we must always construe language in reference to the subject to which it is to be applied. As applied to interlocutory judgments, we all seem to agree that it is proper. When you come to final judgment, although there is no express exception made, the nature of the final judgment has been well stated by the Senator from Ohio; it is a judgment the very force and operation of the pronouncing of which is to change the office, speaking in the case of a President, from one person to another; so that the judgment in a certain sense may be said to execute itself. Therefore, if you say the word includes final judgment, and you may in that literal sense, it does no harm, because all that then you would call upon anybody to do would be to call upon the new and lawful President of the United States to assist the Senate in putting himself into possession of his own office.

The motion of Mr. Saulsbury, to strike out, was agreed to, yeas 25, nays 15.

Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, said during the debate:

I will state that in the committee, as I was a member of it, I thought it better not to have this clause in, and I was in favor of the old rules as far as they could be made applicable to the present case. I thought the fewest changes made the best. Now, I submit to the Senate whether we shall not accomplish all we want by adopting the old rule on this point. I think the Senator from Indiana will be satisfied with that, and I think we ought all to be satisfied with it. The old rule provided that the Presiding Officer "shall also be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons during the trial, to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him." The marshal has authority under the general laws to call a posse, if necessary, to call on the military if necessary. We have a marshal in the District of Columbia not acceptable I believe to everybody, but I think a marshal who will do his duty, whatever his duty is, as faithfully as anybody else. Why not strike out all of the words of this rule? After the word "court" strike out and insert what I have read, so as to read:

"The Presiding Officer may by the direction of the court direct the employment of the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons, during the trial to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him."

I think that would get us out of this difficulty.

Objection was made to this old rule—which dated from the trial of Judge Chase, in 1805—on the ground that the marshal of the District of Columbia had duties of his own prescribed by law, and might not be at the service of the Senate. There was discussion also as to his power, and the power of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to summon a posse comitatus to assist. Finally Mr. Trumbull's proposition was put in form as follows, and agreed to without division:

And the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the discretion of the court, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of said court.

Subsequently, in accordance with the general principle agreed on, the final words "said court" were stricken out, and the "Senate" inserted.

So the rule was finally agreed to in the form in which it now exists.

2159. The Senate, sitting for the Belknap trial, declined to order process to compel the attendance of a witness who had been subpoenaed by telegraph merely.—On July 10, 1876,<sup>13</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked for an attachment to compel the attendance as a witness of John S. Evans. Mr. Carpenter stated that Evans had been subpoenaed, but had not appeared. The following return was read:

WASHINGTON, D.C., July 1, 1876.

I made service of the within subpoena, telegraphing the same to the within-named John S. Evans, at Fort Sill, Ind. T., on the evening of the 22d day of June, 1876.

JOHN R. FRENCH,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon also said:

I will state in addition that I have seen a dispatch in the Sergeant-at-Arm's room from John S. Evans acknowledging the receipt of this subpoena.

It was then

Ordered, That an attachment issue for the said John S. Evans.

Presently Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, asked if there was proof that Evans had been served with the subpoena. It having been stated in reply that the proof being by telegraph, Mr. Edmunds moved to reconsider the vote on the order, and the motion was agreed to.

Then a discussion arose, in the course of which it was developed that the subpoena for this witness, as well as for other witnesses living at a distance, had been served by telegraph.

Mr. John W. Stevenson, a Senator from Kentucky, said he was not aware of any law permitting a witness to be subpoenaed by telegraph, and expressed a doubt as to the legality of an attachment based on a subpoena thus served. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, expressed the same doubt, and Mr. Edmunds said:

That is no service in point of law.

On motion of Mr. Edmunds the subject was laid on the table.

Then, on motion of Mr. Edmunds,

Ordered, That a subpoena issue commanding the said John S. Evans to appear forthwith before the Senate.

2160. The Senate, sitting for an impeachment trial, has commanded a reluctant witness to produce certain papers in its presence.—On July 8, 1876,<sup>14</sup> in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Leonard Whitney was sworn and examined as a witness on behalf of the United States. The witness was manager for the Western Union Telegraph Company and had been subpoenaed to produce telegrams passing between Caleb P. Marsh and the respondent.

Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers for the House of Representatives, said to the witness:

Now open your package and see what dispatches you have from Washington to New York, passing between Mr. Marsh or R. G. Carey & Co. and W. W. Belknap.

The witness replied:

Before I do so I wish to state that I can not produce these telegrams unless I am required to do so by the court; and I respectfully submit to the court that they are privileged communications, and I ought not to be required to produce them.

The President pro tempore<sup>15</sup> thereupon submitted the question to the Senate, Shall the witness produce the telegrams? and it was decided in the affirmative without division.

2161. In impeachment trials before the House of Lords it is the practice to swear and examine the witnesses in open house.

Under the parliamentary law witnesses in an impeachment trial may be examined by a committee.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England," on the subject of impeachments:

Rule XXIV of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "You, _____, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence you shall give in the case now pending between the United States and _____ shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God." which oath shall be administered by the Secretary or any other duly authorized person.

To _____, greeting:

You and each of you are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate of the United States, on the _____ day of _____, at the Senate Chamber in the city of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before the Senate, in which the House of Representatives have impeached _____

FORM OF DIRECTION FOR THE SERVICE OF SAID SUBPOENA.

The Senate of the United States to _____, greeting:

Secretary of the Senate.

These forms were agreed to in 1868<sup>17</sup> on report from a committee of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman. They were adopted, with slight variations of phraseology from the forms used in the impeachments of Blount and Chase, in 1797 and 1805. The words "high court of impeachment," which had been introduced in the forms as reported, were stricken out in accordance with a general conclusion of the Senate as to its functions.

As reported, the rule provided simply that the oath to witnesses should be administered by the Secretary. The words "or any other person duly authorized" were added on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York. A difference of opinion had arisen as to the power of the Senate to confer on anyone the authority to administer an oath.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, argued<sup>18</sup> that it could only be done by law, because if perjury should arise, the oath must be shown to be administered by an officer authorized by law to administer an oath. The Secretary had power to do so. Mr. Howard held that the Senate had the power, as belonging to its judicial function in trying the case, to provide for the administration of the oath.

2163. In impeachments a Senator called as a witness is sworn and testifies standing in his place.

Present form and history of Rule XVII of the Senate in impeachment trials.

Rule XVII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony standing in his place.

This rule dates from 1797,<sup>19</sup> when it was adopted for the trial of William Blount. In 1805,<sup>20</sup> at the time of the trial of Judge Chase, it received verbal changes merely.

2164. During the Belknap trial Senators were called as witnesses and were sworn, and testified standing in their places.— On July 12, 1876,<sup>21</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, I desire to call Senator Allison, of Iowa.

The President pro tempore<sup>22</sup> said:

The Senator will stand in his place and be sworn.

Hon. William B. Allison was sworn and examined, standing in his place.

Similarly, George G. Wright, a Senator, was called, sworn, and examined.

2165. In an impeachment trial testimony is presented generally and is not classified according to the article to which it applies.—

On February 11, 1805,<sup>23</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of the United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness was called, in behalf of the managers, when Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, stated that this witness was called on an article subsequent to that on which the witnesses already examined had testified. He would submit a proposition to the honorable managers to go through at one time the whole of the testimony on each article. It might not be the regular course, but if gentlemen assent to it, said Mr. Harper, we shall prefer it; it will be convenient to the witnesses, many of whom may be discharged before the whole of the testimony is gone through.

Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, said:

Though this mode may have its advantages, it is attended with its difficulties. A witness may be found to support more than one article. With regard to the first article, I have no objection to this course; but with regard to the subsequent articles I have.

The President <sup>24</sup> said:

If the gentlemen are agreed, I will take the sense of the Senate on the course to be pursued.

Mr. Randolph said:

It is the wish of the managers not to depart from the usual course.

Mr. Harper said:

We do not claim it as a right.

2166. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice held that evidence might be introduced during final arguments only by order of the Senate.—On April 20, 1868,<sup>25</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the testimony had been nearly closed on both sides, Mr. Manager John A. Bingham suggested that it might be the desire of the managers later to examine one or more witnesses. This caused a discussion as to the admission of testimony after the beginning of the final arguments. Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, express the opinion that such a course would not be in accordance with the American practice. Mr. Manager Bingham suggested that it had been done in the trial of Judge Chase, although he could not speak positively.

The Chief Justice <sup>26</sup> said:

In case the honorable managers desire to put in further evidence after the argument it will be necessary to obtain an order of the Senate; at least it would be proper to obtain such order before the argument proceeds.

2167. The proposition that evidence in an impeachment trial may be admitted or excluded by a majority vote has not been questioned seriously.—On July 21, 1876,<sup>27</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, was making his argument in the final summing up, and was holding that, as two-thirds of the Senate were required to convict, so also two-thirds were required on a vote determining jurisdiction.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, propounded this question:

If it requires two-thirds of the Senators present to overrule the respondent's plea to the jurisdiction, does it not follow that two-thirds are necessary to overrule any objections to testimony made by the respondent or to sustain an objection to testimony made by the managers?

Mr. Black replied :

No; clearly not. I admit that is a very fair attempt at the reductio ad absurdum of our proposition, but it does not succeed. What I say is that two-thirds are required to establish any fact which is an essential element in the conviction. Every other fact may be established and every other order may be made by a bare majority. I do not say that, because this is a court of impeachment and two-thirds of the Senate are required to concur in a final conviction, therefore every time an adjournment is moved it can not succeed with a majority of two-thirds.<sup>29</sup>

2168. Witnesses in an impeachment trial are examined by one person on either side.

Present form and history of Rule XVI of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XVI of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

Witnesses shall be examined by one person on behalf of the party producing them, and then cross-examined by one person on the other side.

This rule was first drafted in 1805<sup>30</sup> for the trial of Judge Chase. In the revision of 1868,<sup>30</sup> preparatory to the trial of President Johnson, it was amended by striking out the words "cross-examined in the usual form," and inserting "cross-examined by one person on the other side."

2169. The managers in the Swayne trial having offered to prove a statement made by respondent before the House committee, counsel successfully resisted the reading of the statement as part of the offer.

An argument by counsel for respondent against the "offer of proof" method of presenting evidence in an impeachment trial.

Instance wherein counsel for respondent in the Swayne trial was called to order for language reflecting on the conduct of the managers.

On February 14, 1905,<sup>31</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, offered to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, at the city of Washington, D.C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement.

At this point Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the reading of the statement, saying:

Mr. President, standing here as objecting to this offer, I repeat what I said a few days since about this attempt to present to this court the statements made by Judge Swayne while he was a witness before a committee of the House of Representatives. The offer to prove what he said before that committee is all that, under any rule of practice that has ever prevailed in any court, can be made. It has never been held that in offering to prove what a witness had said somewhere else a statement could be made in the offer of what he had said somewhere else, because that would, by indirection and by pettifog-

<sup>29</sup> During the trial of President Johnson a suggestion was made by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, that the two-thirds rule should prevail as to ruling questions of evidence or law against the respondent, and he introduced an order to that effect; but it was not acted on. ging, Mr. President, present to the court, the judge, or the jury the statement of what the evidence would show when it was really admitted, if at all, and evidently in the expectation—

At this point Mr. Edmund W. Pettus, of Alabama, intervened and said:

Mr. President, I object to the word "pettifogging" being used in this court. The Presiding Officer<sup>32</sup> said:

The Presiding Officer thinks that the word ought not to have been used.

Mr. Thurston then continued:

I apologize for the use of that word. I was not using it with reference to this offer. I was saying that it was a common custom in some courts to attempt to show by a statement of this kind what a witness had said somewhere else, when the attorneys making the offer knew and understood perfectly well that the statement itself would not be proper evidence to be introduced in the case, and that an offer of this kind was and is an attempt to present to a court evidence known to be improper, prohibited by the statutes of the United States, and its reading to the court in an offer must necessarily be, and can only be, an attempt by indirection to place in the record and before the judges testimony that they know is not legal testimony and ought not to be considered.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to reflect—and if I have made any reflections upon these honorable managers I withdraw them—I do not wish to reflect upon them in this case, but I do say that in other cases and in other courts where offers of this kind have been made they have been necessarily made with the express desire to place in the record and before the court and the jury a line of evidence that is prohibited by the law of the land from being presented. We object both to the offer to introduce the testimony and to the offer to read the proposed testimony to this court. Mr. President, we also protest against this manner of presenting evidence by an offer to prove something.

The only proper way, in our judgment, if the managers wish to produce this testimony and have this court pass upon its competency, is to put a witness on the stand or to offer to the record, to ask the question, or let the record be objected to, and pass upon that. I do not think it is proper for us, Mr. President—and the occasion may arise in this case where it would be most desirable for us, if it were proper—to offer to prove a certain statement of fact that we do not believe can be introduced in evidence if objected to upon the other side. But, sir, feeling our responsibility here, we will not attempt to offer before this court a statement of anything, nor will we attempt to offer in this court to prove facts setting it forth. What facts we have to prove we will prove by records, or we will prove them by questions directed to the witnesses presented in the court, and let the objections, if any there be, be taken in the regular way and upon legal lines.

Mr. Manager Palmer announced that he would hand the statement to the court and let the court pass upon it:

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, said:

Mr. President, while the Presiding Officer passes on such questions in the first instance, Senators must pass upon it finally, and they know what is offered before they can vote intelligently upon the question. It is unprecedented to say that the court shall not be permitted to hear what is offered before passing upon the admissibility of it. * * * for my own guidance, I would like to know exactly the question before the court.

The Presiding Officer said:

It is in writing. The managers offer to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, in the city of Washington, D.C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement. Then the statement is recited.

No further demand was made for the reading of the statement, and it was not read.

2170. Managers and counsel disagreeing as to method of direct and cross examination of a delayed witness the Senate ordered examination in accordance with the regular practice.—On July 12, 1876,<sup>23</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the managers announced:

We desire to state to the Senate that we are through with our case in chief for the United States with this exception, that if Mr. Evans arrives in the usual course of the trial of this case, we desire to put him on the stand, or if he is put upon the stand by the defense we desire permission to put to him such questions as would be competent and proper if he were examined by us in chief; but we do not ask the delay of this case one hour for the arrival of Mr. Evans. On the contrary, we ask that it proceed.

The President pro tempore said:

Is there objection to this privilege of examination being reserved?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected.

On July 19<sup>24</sup> John S. Evans appeared, and was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent.

Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, I desire to say to the managers that Mr. Evans is now upon the stand. If they wish to examine him as a witness on the part of the prosecution, we make no objection to their doing so. If they do not, we give them notice that we shall insist on their being held to a proper cross-examination.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

Mr. President, we desire to state to the Senate that we shall claim the right to call on cross-examination whatever is legitimate and proper in this case. I think, after having waited for nearly a whole week for the witness to come to accommodate the defense, that the Senate will endeavor to expedite matters by enabling us to put our questions to the witness upon cross-examination with the full privilege of the gentlemen in rebutting to ask him to explain all those matters about which we may inquire, which will make one examination answer all the purposes of this case, whereas if we now examine him the gentlemen on their side will have a right only to cross-examine him as to what we examined into, and then they must put him on the stand, we cross-examine him, and so on, making really a double examination, and upon the good sense of the Senate on that question we rely now. The gentlemen may examine Mr. Evans.

Mr. Carpenter rejoined:

It will be recollected that the manager stated to the Senate that Mr. Evans was one of his most important witnesses. When he closed his case, he closed it reserving the right to call Mr. Evans if he should appear at any time during the trial. Mr. Evans is now present. We waive all objection to his being examined in chief on the part of the Government if they wish to examine him. If they do not, we shall insist, as far as we can insist, that when they come to the cross-examination they shall be restricted to the proper rules of cross-examination.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, it was—

Ordered, That the managers proceed to examine the witness Evans in chief; or, should they decline to do so, the respondent may proceed to examine the witness in chief, with the right of the managers to cross-examine him like any other witness.

2171. The Senate prefers that managers and counsel, in examining witnesses in an impeachment trial, shall stand in the center aisle.—On February 15, 1905,<sup>35</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, it was directed that the managers in examining witnesses should stand in the center aisle of the Senate Chamber, near the rear row of seats, so that the answers of witnesses might be heard readily by the Senators.

Later, however, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, urged that he must stand by the table in examining witnesses, as he needed to consult certain documents.

But generally managers and counsel stood in the central aisle when conducting the examinations.

2172. Witnesses in an impeachment trial give their testimony standing unless specially permitted to sit.—On February 14, 1905,<sup>36</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Joseph H. Durkee, had been sworn, when the Presiding Officer<sup>37</sup> said :

The witness asks that he may be allowed to be seated. He may sit if there is no objection. The witness will please raise his voice and answer all questions so as to be heard all over the Chamber.

2173. The Senate assigns the place to be occupied by witnesses testifying in an impeachment trial.—On July 6, 1876,<sup>38</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the testimony was about to begin, when the President pro tempore<sup>39</sup> suggested that witnesses take a place at the right of the Chair, on a level with the Secretary's desk; but at the suggestion of the managers and several Senators a place on the floor in front of the Secretary's desk was assigned to the witnesses.

Later<sup>40</sup> Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, said :

Mr. President, is there any objection on the part of the Senate and counsel to have the witness stand at your right or left? So far as I am concerned, it is utterly impossible for me to hear one word out of three that is spoken. It has been so during the whole time. If I take the seat of another Senator, it is at his inconvenience. This is my seat. I have no right to another, but I have a right to hear what is said.

The President pro tempore said :

The Chair will state to the Senator that he designated a little higher place for the witnesses, but the managers and counsel thought it would be preferable to have the witness in front of the desk, and the Chair submitted that to the Senate, and, as there was no objection, the witnesses were placed there.

Then the President pro tempore put the request to the Senate, and it was ordered that the witnesses stand on the right of the Chair on a level with the Secretary's desk.

justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, Luther Martin, one of the counsel for the respondent, was sworn and examined as a witness in behalf of the respondent.

2175. The order of taking testimony in an impeachment trial is sometimes waived by consent of both parties.—On February 16, 1905,<sup>42</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said:

Mr. President, the witness Belden, of New Orleans, has not yet arrived, and with the exception of that one witness, so far as we know now, our case is complete, and we are willing that the respondent may go on with his testimony, with the privilege to us of calling General Beiden when he arrives.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, this suggestion was made to me this morning by the managers, and we have no objection to their proposed arrangement, it being, as I understand, that they have closed their case in chief, except as to the testimony of Judge Belden, who is to be produced by them and examined upon his arrival. We make no objection to that request. We should like, however, that they place Judge Belden upon the stand as soon as he does arrive, in order that as far as possible we may have their entire case in before we present our own witnesses.

2176. A question put by a Senator to a witness in an impeachment trial is reduced to writing and put by the Presiding Officer.

All orders and motions, except to adjourn, are reduced to writing when offered by Senators in impeachment trials.

The Presiding Officer in an impeachment trial is the medium for putting questions to witnesses and motions and orders to the Senate.

Present form and history of Rule XVIII of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XVIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer.

This rule dates from the Chase trial in 1805.<sup>43</sup> In the revision of 1868,<sup>44</sup> preparatory to the trial of President Johnson, the form was modified by the insertion of the parenthetical clause and the use of the words "Presiding Officer" for "President."

2177. In defiance of Rule XVIII for impeachment trials, the Senate has established the practice that Senators may interrogate managers or counsel for respondent.

Instance of an appeal from a ruling of the President pro tempore in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.

While the Senate was sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, arguments, continuing from May 4 to May 8, 1876, were offered by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent on the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try a citizen not in civil office at the time of the presentation of articles of impeachment. In the course of these arguments, members of the Senate frequently interrupted the managers and counsel for respondent with questions<sup>45</sup> relating to various points touched in the argument. These questions were generally presented in writing.

Mr. President, is it proper that I should ask the manager a question ?

The President pro tempore<sup>47</sup> said :

It has been so ruled by the Senate.

And thereafter, during the trial, both the managers and counsel for respondent were interrupted by questions.<sup>48</sup>

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, raised a question of order as to the right of a Senator to interrogate counsel.

The President pro tempore<sup>50</sup> said :

The Senator from New York calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rule does not authorize the questioning of counsel, but of witnesses. * * * The rule will be read.

"XVIII. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing and put by the Presiding Officer."

* * * The Chair will state that in administering the rule he would not feel authorized to permit a question to be put to the counsel or the managers, for the rule provides only for Senators to question witnesses, and not counsel or managers to be questioned by them. * * * The Senator from New York has stated the point of order, and the Chair simply holds that under the rule No. 18, and which is the only one bearing upon the subject and upon which he rules, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. Edmunds appealed, and on the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?" There appeared yeas 18, nays 21. So the Chair was overruled, and the question proposed by Mr. Edmunds was put to counsel.

2180. Questions asked by Senators in an impeachment trial, whether of managers, counsel, or witnesses, must be in writing.—

On July 11, 1876,<sup>51</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, several Senators had addressed verbal questions to the managers and to counsel for the respondent. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, having called attention to the rule, which he condemned as absurd, the President pro tempore<sup>51a</sup> said :

As the Senator from New York has alluded to the fact that the question was not put in writing, the Chair will say that it has not been done in order to facilitate business, and a moment ago one of the Senators was about to reduce a question to writing and the Senator from New York stated that the practice had been otherwise. * * *

The Chair to facilitate business has allowed questions to be put without being reduced to writing by their propounders.

Later, colloquies and objection having arisen, the President pro tempore ruled :

The Chair will enforce the rule. Colloquies must cease. Objection has been made, and the Chair must enforce the rule. He will state that on the part of Senators, to guard against any breach of the rules and unpleasantness, he will require all questions to be reduced to writing ; and then certainly there can be no debate. The counsel will proceed.

Mr. Richard J. Oglesby, a Senator from Illinois, asked :

Does the decision of the Chair, that no questions can be put hereafter without being reduced to writing, cover questions put by the court to one of the counsel ?

The President pro tempore said :

It covers all questions put by members of the Senate. The rule does not require the questions on the part of the parties to be reduced to writing unless so required by the Chair or a Senator ; but all questions put by members of the Senate the rule requires shall be put in writing.

2181. On July 19, 1876,<sup>52</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, John S. Evans, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was on the stand, when Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, proposed to ask orally a question. The suggestion being made that the question should be reduced to writing, Mr. Randolph urged that such had not been the practice.

The President pro tempore <sup>53</sup> said :

The Chair will observe at this time that so far as questions have been put to witnesses by Senators the rule in the recollection of the Chair has been observed until this time, and the Chair called the attention of the Senator from California, who put a question just now without reducing it to writing, to the fact that the rule required it to be done. The question having been put and it having been reduced to writing, by calling the attention of the Senator to the rule the Chair did his duty. Heretofore no questions have been put to witnesses, as the Chair recollects, without having been first reduced to writing.

To this question Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, in behalf of the House of Representatives, objected.

Mr. Garrett Davis, a Senator from Kentucky, thereupon raised the question that one of the managers had no right to object to a question propounded by a member of the court.

The Chief Justice <sup>55</sup> said :

When a member of the court propounds a question, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly within the competency of the managers to object to the question being put and state the grounds for that objection, as a legal question. It is not competent for the managers to object to a member of the court asking a question; but after the question is asked, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly competent for the managers to state their objections to the questions being answered.

Did you at any time, and when, before the President gave the order for the removal of Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War, advise the President to appoint some other person in the place of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, one of the managers for the House of Representatives, at once objected to the question as leading in form, and also as being incompetent according to the decisions of the Senate as to this line of inquiry.

Mr. Garrett Davis, a Senator from Kentucky, raised a question as to whether or not the managers or the counsel for the defense could interpose any objection to a question by a member of the court.

The Chief Justice<sup>57</sup> said:

The Chief Justice thinks that any objection to the putting of a question by a member of the court must come from the court itself.

Thereupon Mr. Charles D. Drake, a Senator from Missouri, objected to the question.

The Chief Justice said:

The only mode in which an objection to the question can be decided properly is to rule the question admissible or inadmissible; and that is for the Senate. The question of the Senator from Maryland has been proposed unquestionably in good faith, and it addresses itself to the witness in the first instance, and it is for the Senate to determine whether it shall be answered by the witness or not. Senators, the question is whether the question propounded by the Senator from Maryland is admissible.

And the question being taken, there appeared yeas 18, nays 32. So the question was excluded.

2184. Either managers or counsel in an impeachment trial may object to an answer to a question propounded to a witness by a Senator.—On February 11, 1905,<sup>58</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness A. H. D'Alemberte, was sworn and examined. In the course of the examination a Senator, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, proposed this question:

Q. Does the law of Florida require the payment of a poll tax from each male citizen of the State who is over 21 and under 55 years of age, without reference to the question whether or not he votes?

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

In the opinion of the managers, that is a question of law, not of fact. I suppose we have a right to object to a question by a Senator, under the rule and we object to that question. It is a matter of law, and I do not suppose the witness is a lawyer.

The Presiding Officer <sup>80</sup> said :

If the objection is insisted upon, the Presiding Officer thinks that the question is improper, for the reason that it relates to a matter of law; but the Presiding Officer would suggest that this examination has so far proceeded upon questions of law very largely.

Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, a Senator from Massachusetts, raised a question as to whether or not the managers might object to a question propounded by a Senator.

The Presiding Officer said :

Perhaps not in the technical way in which objections are made in court, but the Presiding Officer thinks that either the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent have a right to raise the question, to be decided by the Presiding Officer, as to whether evidence is admissible. * * * The Presiding Officer does not at this time desire to make any binding or irreversible rule, but if such a case can be supposed as that a Senator should put an improper or inadmissible question to a witness the Presiding Officer thinks that that question being raised he would have a right to rule upon it.

Later Mr. Manager Palmer said :

While the witness is coming I wish to submit to the President the authority on which I objected to the question asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Hopkins]. It is a ruling made by Chief Justice Chase in the trial of Andrew Johnson, and is to be found in the second volume of the Congressional Globe, at pages 166, 169, and 170, where it was decided that the managers had a right to object to a question asked by a Senator.

I merely call attention to the authority to show that I was not objecting without some reason.

A little later Mr. Joseph B. Foraker, a Senator from Ohio, said :

I deem it my duty to call attention to the fact that on page 310 of Extracts from Journals of the Senate of the United States of America in Cases of Impeachment I find the following ruling by the Chief Justice.

Mr. Johnson, Senator, having asked a question, objection was made by the managers.

"Mr. Manager Bingham having commenced an argument in support of the objection,

"Mr. Davis raised the question of order that it was not in order for the managers to object to a question propounded by a Member of the Senate.

"The Chief Justice ruled that neither the managers nor the counsel had a right to object to a question being put by a Member of the Senate, but might discuss the admissibility of the evidence to be given in answer to such question."

The ruling by the Chief Justice was submitted to the Senate and was sustained by the Senate, the rule on that subject being Rule XVIII, Governing Impeachment Trials, which reads as follows :

"XVIII. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer."

In other words, the rule is without qualification; and this is the first time I ever heard it suggested that a court conducting a trial did not have a right to put any question the court might see fit to ask. If there be any ruling such as managers have stated there is, made by the Chief Justice in the course of that trial, I have overlooked it.

Later Mr. Manager Palmer said :

Mr. President, the managers have been asked for the particular authority for making objection to a question asked by a Senator. I refer the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] to the Congressional Globe, volume 40, trial of Andrew Johnson, page 169, in which the Chief Justice made this ruling. * * * The 13th of April, 1868, page 169. The ruling was as follows :

"The Chief Justice. The honorable manager will wait one moment. When a member of the court propounds a question, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly within the competency of the managers to object to the question being put and state the grounds for that objection as a legal question. It is not competent for the managers to object to a member of the court asking a question; but after the question is asked it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly competent for the managers to state their objections to the questions being answered.

The Presiding Officer said :

The manager will allow the Presiding Officer to refer to the ruling which was cited by Senator Foraker. It is in these words :

"The Chief Justice ruled that neither the managers nor the counsel had a right to object to a question being put by a Member of the Senate, but might discuss the admissibility of the evidence to be given in answer to such question."

The ruling seems to be that an objection can not be made to a Senator putting a question, but that the admissibility of the evidence to be given might be objected to and discussed.

Mr. Manager Palmer said :

That is right. That is what we understood. We objected to the admissibility of the answer to such a question, because we did not think it was a legal question.

The Presiding Officer continued :

That is what the Chair understood; not that the managers objected to a question being put by a Senator, but objected to the question being answered.

Mr. Manager Palmer added :

Yes; we objected to its being answered, not to its being asked.

2185. The Senate decided that it might, in an impeachment trial, permit a Senator to interrogate a witness, although both managers and counsel for the respondent objected.—On July 11, 1876,<sup>60</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, had been examined by the managers, cross-examined by counsel for the respondent, and had responded to questions put by Members of the Senate. Thereupon Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, proposed another question.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, and Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, on the part of the House of Representatives seconded the objection.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, asked what business the court had to ask a question to which both parties objected.

Mr. Logan said :

I presume that members of the court here stand upon an equality, and that one has as good a right to ask a question as another, provided it is a proper question, couched in proper language. I asked a question a while ago of the witness what the understanding was between him and Mrs. Bower. I did not use the name, but that was it, and he gave the understanding, and in that answer he incidentally remarked that he had an understanding with the former Mrs. Belknap. The question was argued by the managers and counsel for the respondent; the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and the Senate voted that the question should be answered; and the witness did answer the question. In furtherance of that question, I have asked what the understanding was with the former Mrs. Belknap.

Mr. Thurman said :

The House of Representatives here is represented by its managers; the defendant is represented by his counsel; and when both sides agree as to what are the issues upon which they will put in evidence, I really do not see, with entire respect to the Senator from Illinois and every other Senator, that it is any part of the duty of the Senate which is to sit here as impartial judges to introduce a new line either of prosecution or of defense. I see no reason for it; and if the Senate has erred once, it is no reason why it should err again. If neither the managers on the part of the House nor the counsel for the defendant have seen fit to go into the arrangements, if there were any, between the witness and this deceased lady or this living lady, it is no business of ours to go into them. If it is necessary for the purposes of public justice that they should be gone into and the testimony would be legitimate, it is to be presumed that the House of Representatives, through its managers, would have asked us to hear the testimony. If it were necessary for the defense that the matter should be gone into, it is to be presumed that the counsel for the defense would have introduced it as a defense. It is not for us to supply any deficiency of the prosecution or to supply any deficiency of the defense.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said:

I simply want to state that I regard it as the absolute right of this court or any member of it, with the consent of his brother judges or a majority of them, to ask any question; and the idea that the court can be overruled by the counsel on either side agreeing that the question shall not be asked is something entirely new.

The Senate decided, by a vote of yeas 23, nays 17, that the question should be admitted.

2186. Instance wherein both managers and counsel for respondent were permitted to object to questions proposed by Senators.— On April 18, 1868,<sup>61</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent. In the course of the examination, Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, proposed in writing this question:

State if, after the 2d of March, 1867, the date of the passage of the tenure-of-office act, the question whether the Secretaries appointed by President Lincoln were included within the provisions of that act came before the Cabinet for discussion; and if so, what opinion was given on this question by members of the Cabinet to the President.

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham objected that the evidence sought to be obtained was incompetent under the decisions of the Senate already made.

The question being taken, there appeared in favor of admitting the testimony 20 yeas, and against 26 nays. So the testimony was not admitted.

Q. Why did you send to W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, the one-half of the various sums of money received by you from Evans at Fort Sill?

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

Mr. President, the celebrated Jeremiah Mason in the trial of a very important case once said, when a judge put a question to a witness, he being counsel for the defense, that if the question was put on the part of the plaintiff, he objected to it; if it was put on behalf of the defendant, he withdrew it. * * * The Government have gone through the examination of this witness; we have cross-examined him; the court has allowed them to go partially into a redirect examination, and they have concluded it. This question put by the managers now would certainly be objectionable, and I presume that we have the same right to object to a question put by the court that we would have if it were put by the managers. * * * They have had one redirect examination, the court overruling our objection to it, to give it to them. Now after this will this court permit the managers to return to that subject and open the examination of this witness? And if they will not permit the managers to do it, will the court do it themselves? If a question can not be objected to when put by one of the court which would be ruled out if put by the counsel, then this is a strange proceeding and we are in a singular situation. I say this of course with entire respect to the Senator who asks the question; but we must have a right to object to the question, and for the purpose of testing whether it is proper or improper, it must be considered as a question put by the managers, and put by the managers at this time, is there the slightest doubt that the Senate would rule it out?

The Senate, without division, determined that the question should be admitted.

The witness replied to it:

Simply because I felt like doing it. It gave me pleasure to do it. I sent him the money as a present always, gratuitously. That is the only reason I had.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, asked:

I should like to ask the witness, in connection with his last answer, whether General Belknap knew, in advance of these remittances from time to time, how large the present was going to be that was to be sent?

Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, I object to that question upon the ground that one man can not swear what another man knows. It is physically and intellectually impossible. If he could say that he told Mr. Belknap a thing, if he could prove any fact, that fact may be proved; but could I be put on the stand to swear what the Senator from Vermont knows upon any subject? I should say he knows all about it, but any particular knowledge on a particular subject I could not be called to swear to. Nobody can.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, also of counsel for respondent, said:

Mr. President and Senators, there is another objection to this question that I hope the Senate will consider before voting that this question shall be admitted, and that is that this witness is a Government witness, and that the interrogatory of the Senator is to impeach the witness on the part of the prosecution. It implies that he has not stated the truth.

The question being submitted, the Senate, without division, decided that the interrogatory should be admitted.

2188. While managers or counsel may argue in objection to a question put to a witness by a Senator in an impeachment trial, the Senator may not reply.—On July 19, 1876,<sup>63</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. It was alleged that Evans had been appointed by respondent through improper influence by one Marsh, who had shared by the terms of a contract in Evans's profits and divided them with respondent.

Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, proposed this question to witness:

The question is this: What amount of goods did Mr. Evans sell at Fort Sill during any one year pending this contract?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, objected:

The object of that question seems to be to show that he made an improvident contract with Marsh and paid him too much. I submit that that can have no materiality to this case. If the managers trace $500 home to Belknap in the form of a bribe, it is just as complete a case as $50,000. If he paid him an unreasonable bribe, it is no worse than to pay ten cents.

Mr. Randolph said:

I am unfortunately placed to argue the question with the counsel—

The President pro tempore <sup>64</sup> said:

Debate is not in order. The question will be put.

Thereupon, without division, the Senate decided that the question should be admitted.

2189. Rule of the Senate in the Swayne trial permitting managers or counsel to offer motions or raise questions as to evidence and prescribing the manner thereof.—On January 27, 1905,<sup>65</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, of the managers for the House of Representatives, offered the following:

Ordered. That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant-at-Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpoenaed by him to appear on the 10th day of February, at 1 o'clock p.m.

Later Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, said:

We understand that the order which the managers of the House have asked for can not properly be put by them, and I suppose it is the proper practice to regard the order offered as a request. I offer, upon the request of the managers of the House, for present consideration, the order which I send to the desk.

Later, after the Senate had resumed its legislative sessions, Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, said:

Mr. President, a moment ago, when the Senate was sitting as a court, it was doubted if the managers on the part of the House are permitted under the rules to make a motion. My own opinion is that nobody but a Senator can make a motion to be voted on by the Senate, but it would be a most anomalous situation if an attorney in any kind of a court could not make motions before that court to be acted on by that court. And for my own guidance—I am sure that other Senators are in much the same frame of mind—I should like to have that question settled. If it would be proper, I should like to have the Judiciary Committee report, or if the Senate prefers, a special committee, what have been the practice and the precedents in that respect.

It was pointed out that the Senate already had appointed a select committee to examine such questions, and that they would consider this question.

On February 3<sup>66</sup> Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, offered, and the Senate sitting for the trial agreed to, an order as follows:

Ordered. That in all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, whether as to form or otherwise the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the

Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers or counsel for the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be directly addressed to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

2190. During final argument in the Chase trial the managers claimed and obtained the right to introduce testimony to justify evidence of an impeached witness.—On February 23, 1805,<sup>97</sup> in the high court of impeachments, during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the testimony had been closed, the beginning on behalf of the managers in the final argument had been made, and two of the counsel for the respondent had submitted arguments, when Mr. John Randolph, Jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, moved the examination of Hugh Holmes, who would testify in corroboration of the testimony of John Heath, a witness for the managers, whose evidence had been attacked. Mr. Randolph explained that Mr. Holmes did not attend until the evidence for the managers had been concluded. Mr. Randolph further said :

I only state this circumstance in tenderness to the character of the witness, and that Mr. Holmes is ready to prove that, pending the trial of Callender, Mr. Heath did declare to him as having passed in his presence such a conversation as the witness has stated. It is not our wish to press his evidence, because we know that the evidence of a witness thus rebutted can establish nothing material to the prosecution. But we are ready, if the court and counsel for the respondent agree, to receive his testimony.

Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, said :

It is not for us to say how the honorable managers shall proceed in conducting this prosecution. We have no objection to Mr. Holmes being examined, and we feel perfectly indifferent whether Mr. Heath be abandoned or not. Should Mr. Holmes not be examined, I presume it will be understood that he was offered to support the declaration of Mr. Heath.

Mr. Randolph said it was not intended to abandon Mr. Heath.

Mr. Harper inquired how long Mr. Holmes had been in the city. If correctly informed he had been here three days, and if so, his testimony might have been adduced before the defense on the part of the respondent was made.

Mr. Randolph said the delay in offering Mr. Holmes to the court arose solely from an indisposition to interrupt the counsel for the defendant. The character of Mr. Holmes stood too high to be impeached. It was only when they heard the correctness of Mr. Heath's testimony questioned that the managers deemed it necessary to do that, for the not doing of which they had received the censure of the counsel for the respondent. Mr. Randolph then moved that Hugh Holmes should be sworn.

The President<sup>98</sup> said the reasons assigned for the admission of Mr. Holmes's testimony, so far as they arose from tenderness to the character of Mr. Heath, could have no weight with the court. The only question for them to decide was whether his testimony was or was not material.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, said he held it to be the right of either party, at any stage of the trial, when the evidence of a witness was impeached, to justify it by the testimony of another witness. He asked the receiving, therefore, of Mr. Holmes's testimony as a matter of right, not of favor.

The yeas and nays were taken on examining Mr. Holmes, and were yeas 21, nays 11.

2191. Instance of a suggestion by the Presiding Officer in the Swayne trial as to the form of a question.—On February 20, 1905,<sup>69</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness on behalf of the managers was questioned by Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri:

Q. Now, then, as to the matter of that newspaper article. I understood you to say that you knew nothing whatever about it and that you so stated during the hearing of these contempt proceedings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that Mr. Davis made a similar statement concerning himself?—A. I heard it; yes, sir.

Q. In the court, during the contempt proceedings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I will ask you whether there was anything else offered in testimony by those supporting the complaint against you than these two matters?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. Then I will ask you whether there was anything upon which testimony could have borne in the matter brought out against you?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected to this question.

The Presiding Officer <sup>70</sup> said:

In that form the question is hardly admissible. * * * The witness might be asked if he supposed there was anything which was important which was overlooked.

2192. Decision as to the limits within which counsel in an impeachment trial may criticise a witness.—On February 18, 1805,<sup>71</sup> in the high court of impeachments, during the trial of the case of The United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, John Montgomery, was called and in the course of cross-examination Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, said:

I will now proceed to show that Mr. Montgomery, in his strong anxiety to get Judge Chase impeached, has remembered things which nobody else remembers, and has heard things which nobody else heard.

Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, said:

I will ask of this court whether the witnesses we have called are not under their protection?

The President said:

If the counsel, in the testimony they adduce, come up to what they state they can prove, they will not be subject to reproach; if they do not, they merit it.

Mr. Randolph said:

I have no objection to the counsel impugning the veracity of one witness by the evidence of another and descanting upon it, but I think they take an improper liberty when they undertake to say, before it is proved, that what is deposed by a witness never passed.

The President <sup>72</sup> said :

I understand the gentleman to say that he will prove by another witness that what has been deposed never did pass.

Mr. Harper said :

Precisely so, sir.

2193. In the Swayne trial the Presiding Officer generally ruled on questions of evidence instead of submitting them directly to the Senate.—On February 21, 1905,<sup>73</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, the Presiding Officer submitted a question relating to the admissibility of evidence, to the Senate directly, without ruling himself. Generally, in the course of this trial the Presiding Officer ruled, and very rarely indeed was the judgment of the Senate asked. The cases wherein the Presiding Officer submitted the question at once to the Senate without ruling himself were rare and exceptional. On February 23 <sup>74</sup> occur several instances when the Presiding Officer submitted the decision at once to the Senate, and thereafter on the few succeeding days he submitted questions with more frequency.

2194. When the judgment of the Senate is asked after the Presiding Officer has ruled on a question of evidence, the form of question is, "Is the evidence admissible?"—On February 14, 1905,<sup>75</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne a question arose as to an offer of evidence, and the judgment of the Senate was asked by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas. The Presiding Officer said :

Objection was made to the introduction of certain evidence. The offer on the part of the managers of the House to prove what Judge Swayne stated before a committee of the House when he appeared voluntarily before that committee was objected to by counsel for the respondent. The Presiding Officer ruled that without inquiring technically whether it was testimony which Judge Swayne gave, or technically whether this was a criminal court, that the intention of the statute referred to was such as made it proper to exclude the testimony; and from that the Senator from Texas took an appeal.

Mr. Joseph B. Foraker, a Senator from Ohio, raised a question :

Mr. President, I submit it is not technically correct to call it an appeal. The rule provides when the Chair has ruled, it may, if any Senator so requests, submit the question to the Senate. I understand this is simply a request that the question be submitted to the Senate. * * * The question submitted to the Senate should be whether or not the objection of counsel for the respondent shall be sustained. So an affirmative vote would sustain the objection.

Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, a Senator from Illinois, said :

Would not the form under the rule then be as to whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the court?

Mr. Shelby M. Cullom, a Senator from Illinois, said :

I desire to read a paragraph from the trial of the President of the United States years ago :

"The Chief Justice. Senators, the Chief Justice is unable to determine the precise extent to which the Senate regards its own decisions as applicable. He has understood the decision to be that, for the purpose of showing intent, evidence may be given of conversation, with the President at or near the time of the transaction. It is said that this evidence is distinguishable from that which has been already introduced. The Chief Justice is not able to distinguish it, but he will submit directly to the Senate the question whether it is admissible or not."

The Presiding Officer <sup>76</sup> said :

This is the rule :

"And the presiding officer on the trial may rule [on] all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision ; or he may, at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate."

The presiding officer was of opinion that the question was whether the evidence was admissible. * * * The presiding officer then submits to the Senate the question whether the evidence offered by the managers on the part of the House is admissible.

2195. The right to ask a decision of the Senate after the Presiding Officer has ruled preliminarily on evidence belongs to a Senator, but not to counsel.—On July 7, 1876,<sup>77</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question by counsel for the respondent to a witness was objected to by Mr. Manager John A. McMahon.

The President pro tempore <sup>78</sup> said :

The Chair sustains the objection.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, asked if he might appeal to the Senate.

The President pro tempore <sup>79</sup> held that he might not, but said that a Senator might have the point submitted to the Senate.

2196. The Senate finally decided in the Swayne trial that under the rule debate on the admission of evidence might not take place in open Senate.—On February 14, 1905,<sup>79</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, the decision of the Senate was asked on a question relating to the admissibility of evidence. Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, proposed to debate the question, when a question as to debate arose, and the Presiding Officer <sup>80</sup> said :

In the opinion of the Presiding Officer, the matter can be discussed in the Senate upon the appeal and the vote be taken here, or the Senate can, if it so desires, retire to its conference chamber for discussion. Either course may be pursued, according to the wish of the Senate.

After Mr. Bailey had proceeded in debate for some time, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, cited Rules VII and XXIII, saying :

The rule is peremptory that except when the doors are closed there must be no debate, short or long. * * * I read Rule VII to show that Rule XXIII does not in any manner modify the provision of Rule VII as to debate except when the Senate is in secret session ; "when the doors shall have been closed," in the language of the rule. I do not think that debate upon any question which may arise is in order. Senators will perceive necessarily that a contrary rule would in its operations protract the session of a court of impeachment beyond the possibility of any practical termination.

The Presiding Officer said :

The Presiding Officer is of opinion that the point of order taken by the Senator from Georgia is well taken, and that the only exception is that contained in Rule VII. Rule XXIII provides :

"All orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation."

The exception in Rule VII is that upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division. But Rule XXIII provides that all orders and decisions shall be by yeas and nays. The exception referred to in Rule VII is upon questions relating to the introduction of evidence and incidental questions; if the vote of the Senate is asked, it may be decided without a division, unless the yeas and nays are demanded.

The Presiding Officer thinks the point is well taken.

2197. In an argument as to the admissibility of evidence, it is not proper to read the very evidence objected to.—On February 23, 1905,<sup>81</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, proposed to submit as evidence certain extracts from the official record of Congressional debates.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, having objected, Mr. Thurston said :

I am offering the proceedings. They directly bear upon the construction of this act, and I have a right to refer to the Congressional Record in the debates, at least; for instance, Mr. Allen, in the Senate, when this provision was under consideration, offered the following—

Mr. Manager Olmsted said :

I object to the gentleman putting in an argument the evidence to which we object. I understand he was about to read from the debates.

The Presiding Officer<sup>82</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer thinks that counsel can make the argument that he desires to make without reading the Congressional debates. He desires to show the nature of the evidence which he proposes to introduce by introducing these debates. They are something more than debates. They are action upon amendments and various motions that were made. The Presiding Officer thinks that that can be done without any actual reading of the debates. There can be statements by counsel as to the particular matter to which he wishes to call the attention of the Senate without reading the debates.

2198. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that the offering of evidence might not be interrupted by a question relating to business incident to the trial or to legislative sessions.—On April 3, 1868,<sup>83</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives were engaged in offering certain documentary evidence, when Mr. Henry B. Anthony, a Senator from Rhode Island, proposed to call up for consideration a matter of business pending in a legislative session of the Senate.

The Chief Justice<sup>84</sup> said :

It is not in order to call up any business transacted in legislative session.

subject to objection as to its relevancy.—On July 10, 1876,<sup>55</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked for the reading of two telegrams, one from Gen. W. T. Sherman and the other from Gen. P. H. Sheridan, setting forth that urgent military necessity rendered it desirable that the latter should not leave his post to testify before the Senate in this case. The telegrams having been read, Mr. Carpenter said :

In consequence of those telegrams, and not wishing to interrupt the public service unnecessarily, we have agreed, if the court will permit us, to let it go upon the record, as follows :

I. It is admitted that Lieut. Gen. Phil Sheridan would, if present, testify to the good official character of the respondent while Secretary of War.

II. That in regard to all the applications made for leave to sell liquors at the military posts the matter was referred by the Secretary of War to him, and by him investigated and reported on, and his report in all cases was adopted by the Secretary of War.

III. And that a part of a letter from him, Sheridan, to the Secretary of War, dated March 29, 1872, may be read in evidence and that the same, and said admission, shall be taken and regarded as testimony in this cause with the same effect as though General Sheridan had appeared and testified to the same effect.

It is understood, of course, that all these different points are subject to the objection that they are irrelevant or incompetent if the counsel on the other side chooses to raise that objection.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said :

We admit that he would be asked these questions and would answer in that way, provided they were competent or material.

2200. The presentation and reading of a document during introduction of evidence in an impeachment trial was held not to preclude an objection as to its admissibility.—On April 2, 1868,<sup>56</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, of Iowa, offered in evidence a certain letter from President Johnson to Gen. U. S. Grant.

The letter having been read, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked that certain documents referred to by the letter as accompanying it be read. The managers having announced that they did not propose to offer the accompanying documents, Mr. Stanbery entered an objection to the admission of the letter without the accompanying documents.

Mr. Manager Wilson raised the point that the objection came too late, since the letter had been submitted and read and was in evidence.

The Chief Justice<sup>57</sup> said :

The Chief Justice is of the opinion that objection may now be taken.

2201. In the Belknap trial the Presiding Officer, on request of respondent's counsel, required the reading in full of letters presented in evidence.—On July 8, 1876,<sup>58</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, in the course of the introduction of testimony, offered a series of letters, the reading of which began.

Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, while admitting that the counsel had the right to have the letters read at length, asked if, in order to save time, they might not be regarded as read.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected and demanded that the letters be read in full.

The President pro tempore<sup>89</sup> directed the reading to proceed.

2202. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that offer of documentary proof should state its nature only, but that the Senate might order it to be read in full before acting on the objection.—On April 18, 1868,<sup>90</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and testified that Foster Blodgett, postmaster at Augusta, Ga., had been suspended from office on complaints both written and verbal. Certified copies of the official papers relating to the removal were then offered in evidence by Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, having intimated that there might be objection, the Chief Justice<sup>91</sup> said :

The counsel for the President will state what they propose to prove in writing. * * * It will be necessary to state what the order and letters are ; otherwise the court will be unable to judge of their admissibility.

Thereupon Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, said :

I think we have a right to ask for the reading of the letters to know what we are called upon to vote.

The Chief Justice said :

The Senate undoubtedly have a right to order the letters to be read. * * * The usual mode of proposing to prove is by stating the nature of the proof proposed to be offered, and then, upon an objection, the Senate decides whether proof of that description can be introduced. It is not usual to read the proof itself. Undoubtedly it is competent for the Senate to order it to be read.

Mr. Evarts thereupon made this offer in writing :

We offer in evidence the official action of the Post-Office Department in the removal of Mr. Blodgett, which removal was put in evidence by oral testimony by the managers.

Mr. Butler having withdrawn all objection, the papers were then offered and read.

2203. Decisions as to the extent to which a witness in an impeachment trial may use memoranda to refresh his memory.—On February 11, 1805,<sup>92</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, George Hay was sworn as a witness, and made this statement :

The greater part of the evidence I am to deliver relates to what was said by me as counsel for J. T. Callender, who was indicted for a libel on the President of the United States, and what was said by one of the judges ; for I do not recollect to have heard the voice of Judge Griffin at any time during the trial. In order to make this statement as accurate as possible, as my memory is not strong, it is necessary to resort to a statement made by myself and the counsel associated with me in the defense of J. T. Callender, which I now hold in my hand, and every part of which, according to my best recollection, is correct.

Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, here interrupted Mr. Hay and said :

The witness may refer to anything done by himself at the time the occurrences happened which he relates. But I submit it to the court how correct it is to refer to what was not done by him, or done at the time.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether the notes were taken by him. Mr. Hay said :

The statements were made by different persons. Some parts were made by myself, perhaps the greater part ; the rest by Mr. Nicholas and Mr. Wirt. I believe I shall be able to state from it every material occurrence which took place at the time. With regard to those parts of the statement not made by me, a reference to them will call to my recollection the facts mentioned in such parts. If I state anything which I do not distinctly recollect, upon adverting to the statement, I will explain the actual situation of my mind on that point.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, said :

If I understand the witness, it is not his intention to give the paper in his hand as evidence, but merely to refer to it for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

Mr. Harper said :

I do not understand the way in which it is meant to use the paper. I apprehend that it is a rule of evidence that nothing but notes made at the time of the transactions related can be received as evidence. I therefore am of opinion that a reference to this statement is inadmissible, because a part of it is made by others, and none of it made at the time.

Mr. Caesar A. Rodney, of Delaware, one of the managers, said :

When we advert to what has been stated by the witness, who says he does not mean to state in evidence anything in the paper of which he has not, independently of it, a distinct recollection, I think it is within the law to admit him to avail himself of it. I apprehend that had I attended the trial of Callender and taken minutes, and others had attended and not taken notes, if by recurring to my notes there should be recalled to their recollection facts so distinctly that they could swear to them before the court, it would be competent to admit their reference to such notes.

Mr. George W. Campbell, of Tennessee, one of the managers, inquired whether the objection was not confined to that part of the statement not made by the witness ?

Mr. Harper said the objection related to the whole of it.

Mr. Campbell believed that a witness might use any memorandum to refresh his memory ; and that it was not necessary that it should be made at the point of time when the events happened. It is sufficient if made at a time when his remembrance of the facts was correct. With regard to that part not taken by himself, if he perused it at a time so shortly after the events related, as to be able to determine it accurate, and now recognize the memorandum to be the same, it was sufficient.

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said he had been many years in the practice of the law. The rules of evidence were probably different in different States. But he had always supposed that a witness could not be permitted to use any memorandum not made by himself, or at the time of the events related, or near it. He may, before he comes into court, consult any memorandum for the purpose of refreshing his memory, but not in court.

The President <sup>83</sup> said :

The witness proposes to make use of a memorandum under the circumstances which he has stated. The question is, shall the witness be permitted to make use of it ?

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, a Senator, said:

I am not prepared to answer that question at present, not knowing the nature of the minutes the witness proposes to use. I therefore move that the Senate retire before the question is taken.

The question on retiring was taken, and on division lost.

Mr. Adams said he wished to see the papers before he voted.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether it was in his own handwriting.

Mr. Hay replied that it was not; but that it was written by a clerk from a printed statement.

The President asked:

Have you the parts made by yourself separate?

Mr. Hay said he had not.

The President then put the question:

Shall the witness be permitted to make use of, as a memorandum, a paper containing a statement of facts, composed by himself and other gentlemen, in relation to the trial of James T. Callender, sometime after the trial, the paper proposed to be made use of being a copy made by his clerk from a printed paper which contained the said statement.

And there appeared yeas 16, nays 18.

2204. On April 3, 1868,<sup>94</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, William N. Hudson was sworn and examined by the managers for the House of Representatives as to a certain speech of the President which he assisted in reporting at Cleveland, Ohio. Being questioned as to certain interruptions which the President experienced while speaking, the witness was told by Mr. Manager Butler that he might refresh his memory from any memorandum or copy of a memorandum. Witness then proceeded to use a copy of the newspaper in which the report was printed.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected that the witness should speak by his recollection if he could. If he could not, he might refresh it by the presence of a memorandum which he made at the time.

The Chief Justice<sup>95</sup> having drawn from the witness that the memorandum made by him at the time was lost, and that the newspaper contained a copy of that memorandum, ruled as follows:

It is inquired on the part of the managers what interruptions there were, and the witness is requested to look at a memorandum made at the time in order to refresh his memory. Of that memorandum he has no copy, but he made one at the time, and it is lost. The Chief Justice rules that he is entitled to look at a paper which he knows to be a true copy of that memorandum. If there is any objection to that ruling, the question will be put to the Senate.

2205. It was held in the Peck trial that a witness might correct orally testimony already given by himself.

In correcting testimony previously given in an impeachment trial a witness was not permitted to put in a paper made up in part from the recollections of other persons.

On January 17, 1931,<sup>96</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, William C.

Carr presented himself before the court and stated that since the evidence had been closed a written statement of the testimony had been shown to him, from which he perceived that the evidence which he had given was in one point defective, from want of remembrance of certain circumstances. He now therefore prayed leave of the court to present a condensed statement of the facts which had been omitted. He had reduced them to writing under the solemnity of an oath. In doing so he had not chosen to rely altogether upon his own recollection, but had referred to that of two other witnesses in this cause, and also had consulted two other gentlemen concerned in the matter. He hoped that the court would deem this paper admissible. If not, he wished to be subjected to oral examination.

Objection being made by the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, the paper was withdrawn and the witness was examined orally.

On January 11,<sup>97</sup> B. C. Lucas had presented himself and addressed the court as follows:

I find it incumbent upon me to suggest to the court that since I gave my testimony some facts have occurred to my recollection which then escaped my memory.

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, said:

The witness appears with a view of explaining or supplying a defect in his testimony as before delivered.

The President of the court <sup>98</sup> said:

The witness has a right to make an explanation of his testimony.

2206. Instance wherein depositions offered in an impeachment trial were purged of matters in conflict with the rule laid down as to evidence.—On January 10, 1831,<sup>99</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence and read certain depositions. He stated that in consequence of decisions just made by the court of impeachment, relative to the admissibility of evidence, he had stricken from the depositions, which had been taken in Missouri, all those portions which were covered by the principles of the decision. The depositions, he said, had been examined jointly by the managers for the House of Representatives and himself, and the portions to be expunged had been mutually agreed upon.

2207. The Senate struck from the record of an impeachment trial certain statements of fact introduced by a manager in argument, without support of evidence.

On an order presented by a Senator in the course of an impeachment trial it was held that Senators might debate only in secret session.

On April 16, 1868,<sup>100</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of a speech of protest against the delays of the proceedings, introduced certain tabular statements of the sales of gold by the Government, with the object of supporting his claim that the delay in the trial of the President was reacting unfavorably on the country. These statements were printed in the Globe for that day.

On April 17, the Senate having convened for the trial, Mr. Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from Connecticut, offered the following:

Whereas there appear in the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday as published in the Globe of this morning certain tabular statements incorporated in the remarks of Mr. Manager Butler upon the question of adjournment, which tabular statements were neither spoken of in the discussion nor offered or received in evidence: Therefore,

Ordered, That such tabular statements be omitted from the proceedings of the trial as published by rule of the Senate.

Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, asked if it would be in order for a Senator to defend the Secretary of the Treasury against the attacks of the manager.

The Chief Justice<sup>1</sup> said that the rules positively prohibited debate. He said, however:

The question of order is made by the resolution proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. Upon that question of order, if the Senate desire to debate, it will be proper that it should retire for consultation. If no Senator moves that order, the Chair conceives that it is proper that the honorable manager should be heard in explanation.

Mr. Manager Butler thereupon made a brief explanation.

The order proposed by Mr. Ferry was then agreed to without division or debate.

2208. Having ascertained that certain testimony was within the scope of the articles of impeachment, the Senate reversed a decision that the testimony was immaterial.

Discussion as to whether or not the cross-examination in an impeachment trial may go beyond the scope of the direct examination.

Instance wherein a President pro tempore presiding at an impeachment trial made a decision as to evidence.

On July 7, 1876,<sup>2</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, General Irvin McDowell, a witness for the Managers, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. It had been charged against the respondent that he had appointed one Marsh to be post trader at Fort Sill, but that the name of one Evans had been substituted, said Evans having contracted with Marsh to share with him the profits, while Marsh remained away from Fort Sill and at his home in New York, and, it was charged, shared the money sent by Evans with the respondent. The witness, by direction of the Secretary of War, had drawn an order relating to absentee post traders. The examination proceeded thus:

Q. (By Mr. Carpenter). In regard to the post trader residing at the post, was there any object in that except to keep him at all times subject to military regulation and bring him more nearly within the control of the men who ought to control—the military officers?—A. My own view in drawing up that order was aimed at the question in hand of there being what I supposed to be a post trader at Fort Sill residing in New York.

Q. Would it make any difference whether he resided in New York or any other place, provided the rates at which he must sell were fixed?—A. I do not know whether it would or not.

Q. Can you conceive any difference?—A. I will only say what was in my mind at the time I drew the order up, that it was with reference to correcting an admitted abuse.

Q. The abuse, as you understood it, was sales at extravagant prices, was it not?—A. No; it was a man holding a place and exacting or receiving a large sum of money for it, having no capital, and doing no service for the money he received.

Q. Is there any way that that could injure the soldier or the country, unless he charged higher prices in consequence of that arrangement?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected to this question, saying:

The objection we make to the question is that it is an endeavor to exculpate the accused by simply proving that he did not hurt the soldiers, although he may have hurt Evans. It seems to me that in the trial of a person for official malfeasance in an impeachment case, if we prove that the Secretary of War is in a corrupt combination with a person who has procured an appointment, by which the person who gets the appointment, for example—and I will give the example, Evans—is to divide the money that Evans may be able to force out of this person, to say that that is innocent simply because it does not raise the price of provisions at the garrison or the price of thread or cotton or whatever else may be wanted there, is certainly to the managers something new in the development of this case and of the theory of the defense. We do not care whether he raised the price of provisions a copper, from our standpoint.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of council for the respondent, argued:

Mr. President and Senators, I beg to call the attention of the court to the fact that the gentleman in the close of his speech, and his colleague in the opening of his, assumed here as proved and established before this court the very thing that they have yet to prove, of which there is not a scintilla of proof before the court. He says, of course, if they prove that this defendant received this money it is an impeachable offense, and it does not make any difference what this order was drawn for. He goes back constantly harping on that and repeating it as the substance of the thing proved, when it remains yet to be proved, and when the question before this court bears directly upon that question, to show that by the course of conduct adopted by this defendant he could not have known that there was any such contract in existence between these parties.

The effort which we are here now making and the effect of this proof is as positive as it can be made to negative the assumption upon which these gentlemen are asking these questions. Is it not legitimate for us to ask this witness—an experienced officer of the Army, who himself did call upon the Secretary to inform him of this evil in existence and to suggest remedies for it—whether or not the remedy which he himself suggested was not adequate to the evil which he undertook to meet? The question whether the trader lived at the post or anywhere else is, as we expect to show, utterly immaterial; and yet we see that that circumstance was made to figure in the opening of this argument, and is continued to this moment, as the only way of escape from the conclusion and weight of this testimony that the defendant misrepresented to the officer who drew this order the fact that the trader resided not at the post but in New York.

The witness has not said any such thing; he has not said at all that this defendant represented to him any such thing. He has not said that, to begin with. Those are words put into his mouth by these gentlemen. He has not asserted at any time that the defendant told him that the trader lived in New York and that this was carried on for that purpose. He says, to be sure, that, as he now recollects it, he understood the fact to be that he did reside somewhere else; but we will show him and show this court before we get through that in that his recollection is mistaken. We will show him that he knew then, at the time, that the trader did not live in New York, but lived at the post. Hence this totally immaterial circumstance in its bearing upon this order is utterly swept out of the way, and the testimony will be left to bear with its whole force upon the fact that this defendant did not know and could not know of the existence of this contract which is the basis of the proceedings.

I therefore insist that this is a principal material question to be answered by the witness, and the fact of the resistance to it makes it manifest to the court that it is a pretty material question.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the question was excluded; yeas 20, nays 31. So the Senate sustained the objection.

Before the above vote had been taken Mr. Samuel J. R. McMillan, a Senator from Minnesota, had briefly called attention to the fact that in one of the articles of impeachment it was charged that Evans was retained in office by the Secretary of War not only corruptly, but that his retention there was "to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States," etc., and suggested that although that issue might not be the only issue in the case, it was an issue that might be a material one, and upon which the Senate would have to pass in their finding.

Soon after the vote,<sup>3</sup> the same witness being under cross-examination, Mr. Carpenter asked:

It is charged in the third article of impeachment that the things alleged to have been done there—that is, the making of this agreement between Evans and Marsh—had been to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at that post. In what way could such contract injure the officers of the United States?

Mr. Manager McMahon having objected, the President pro tempore<sup>4</sup> sustained the objection on the ground that a similar question had already been ruled out.

Mr. Carpenter having protested and asked for a hearing, Mr. A. S. Merrimon, a Senator from North Carolina, asked for a vote on the ruling of the Chair, and the President pro tempore submitted the question:

Shall this interrogatory be admitted?

In arguing, Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We have yet offered no proof in this case to show that this has been detrimental to the service of the United States in the view in which the ethics of the gentleman seem to indicate to him may be important. It is a matter really for him in the defense if there is anything in it; and he has no right when we put a witness upon the stand to go into his substantive defense on that point.

The second objection we have in this case is the one which the Senate has already decided. Suppose that we should, taking an indictment, find in that indictment that the offense charged was alleged to be against the peace and dignity of the State of Ohio, or the State of New York, or against the commonwealth; and you were to put a witness on the stand and attempt to prove that it was not against the peace and dignity of the State of Ohio or the State of New York, because it was done in a corner where the State did not see it or had nothing to do with it, and would not know it unless one of the parties told it. It seems to me that it is entirely irrelevant, and it certainly strikes me as a new argument in morals that it is not improper, not an impeachable offense, for a Secretary of War or a Secretary of the Navy to dole out his offices to the men that will make the best bargain with him, without reference to the question whether it may be injurious to the public service or not.

Mr. Carpenter argued—

there is, as every lawyer knows, a conflict in the decisions in England and in some of the States of this country in regard to the extent which a cross-examination may go. The rule in England, I understand to be, and in many of the States, that when a witness is called upon the stand, the other party may cross-examine him as to anything pertinent to the issue. The rule in other States is the reverse, and the rule I am bound to say in the Supreme Court of the United States is that you can only cross-examine as to matters referred to by the direct examination. But I submit to the Senate that in this trial, circumstanced as we are, with many army officers in attendance here whose public duties, as important as the duties of any officer, require their immediate return, and who are staying here every day to the prejudice of the public service, that rule, which after all is one in the discretion of the court, should in this case be, as I understand the English rule to be, that we may ask any witness called to the stand any question pertinent to the issue. There are many advantages in this. In the first place, it will place before the Senate in a compact form most of the testimony upon a particular subject.

In the next place, it will be a great convenience to all these witnesses. I do not understand, however, that I am now going at all beyond the scope of the direct examination. I make this remark because the question will undoubtedly arise hereafter as to other witnesses.

Now the managers say they have not as yet introduced any proof to show that this arrangement was detrimental to anybody. If they admit that it was not, then I do not wish to take a moment of your time in proving that it was not. If they concede that not a soldier paid one cent more for any article that was sold at that post in consequence of this arrangement between Marsh and Evans, that is the end of it. That is all I want to show by this testimony; but we are able to show, and shall if permitted, that notwithstanding this arrangement between Evans and Marsh, Evans never increased his prices on a single article. He has, as he has sworn elsewhere, upon the general average of his prices, charged less than he did before the arrangement made with Marsh.

The question being put on admitting the interrogatory, it was decided in the negative without division.

A little later,<sup>5</sup> the same witness having testified to his official relations with the respondent Mr. Carpenter asked, on cross-examination:

What has been his character as Secretary of War?

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We object to this question, and will state our objection to the Senate. I think this is clearly substantive matter of defense, and must come into the trial of this case when the defendant opens his side of the case; but I will say to the gentleman here, though it may not waive the proof upon his part, that the managers upon their part, as I understand, are perfectly willing to concede that up to the time of the development of these matters his character was as good as could be desired or wished.

Mr. Carpenter said:

This question, Mr. President and Senators, falls within the class of questions to which I before referred. Of course it is not a cross-examination, but if not answered now, it may make it necessary to keep General McDowell here for several days before it can be put in. I therefore offer it now and let the Senate rule upon it, and then, of course, we shall know exactly what course to take in regard to other evidence from other witnesses.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be admitted.

On July 19<sup>6</sup> John S. Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill, was a witness and was asked this question by Mr. Carpenter:

After you returned to Fort Sill and after that contract made between you and Mr. Marsh, by which you bound yourself to pay him sums of money on dates fixed in the contract, did you put up the prices of your goods at the fort?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected that the Senate had already decided that this line of inquiry was not permissible.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

The fourth article, if I remember the number rightly, charges that in consequence of this arrangement between Marsh and Evans the soldiers and officers of the Union Army were defrauded and compelled to pay extravagant and exorbitant prices. Now we offer to show that that is not true. Let the managers strike it out of the articles and we do not care for the proof. If it remains in the articles, we offer to disprove it and will prove by this witness that he not only did not increase his prices, but that they were absolutely lower from that time out until he was removed than they had ever been before, and not, as he expresses it, the one-tenth part of 1 cent was added to the price of goods sold to the soldiers in consequence of that arrangement.

The Senate, by a vote of yeas 26, nays 13, decided that the question should be admitted.

2209. In the Belknap trial the Senate permitted a redirect examination which was not responsive to the facts elicited in cross-examination.—On July 11, 1876,<sup>7</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was, after the direct examination, cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent.

At the conclusion of this cross-examination, Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, resumed examination, which proceeded:

Do you remember upon any occasion when Evans & Co. made payment in a check of Northrop & Chick to you for $500?

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, for reasons stated by Mr. Carpenter:

We have simply cross-examined this witness. We have shown nothing whatever, nor have we attempted to show anything whatever, except what is legitimate matter of cross-examination. They may reexamine in regard to the new matters we have called out in cross-examination, but nothing else. They can not go on now and by this witness attempt to show any consideration or anything of that kind, because that is a part of their case; they have examined the witness upon that subject and called out from him such evidence as they could and passed him over for cross-examination, and they can not return to it now.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, suggested:

I wish to suggest that even if the question is not strictly responsive to the cross-examination it is in the discretion of the court to permit it to be answered.

The question being put to the Senate, "Shall said interrogatory be allowed," it was decided in the affirmative without division.

2210. In the Swaine trial it was held that cross-examination should be responsive to the examination in chief.—On February 20, 1905,<sup>8</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge

Charles Swayne, a witness. Simeon Belden, was under cross-examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, and the following occurred:

Q. As your associate, did he have authority to sign your name, together with his own, as counsel in the matter of these proceedings?—A. He had not—not that I recollect.

Mr. THURSTON (handing paper to Mr. Manager Olmsted). As a part of our cross-examination we offer this paper in evidence.

The paper, which was afterwards read, was as follows:

LAW NO. 72, IN THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA, MRS. FLORIDA M'GUIRE V. PENSACOLA CITY COMPANY ET AL.

Hon. F. W. MARSH,

Clerk United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Florida.

DEAR SIR: Please enter the above cause on the trial or call docket for trial at the coming term of court.

LOUIS P. PAQUET,
SIMEON BELDEN,
Attorneys for Plaintiff

PENSACOLA, FLA., October 28, 1901.

The Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, suggested an objection.

Mr. Thurston said:

If I understand evidence, a paper which is a legitimate part of the res gesta, of the transaction upon which the witness was examined in chief, may be offered when identified as a part of the cross-examination. We may never desire to present any case on our side, but we can not tell until we have the evidence on the other side in.

Mr. Manager De Armond said:

Mr. President, we do not want to be understood as conceding the proposition which the counsel for the respondent has just stated. The question of the admissibility of a paper is a question that will have to be determined when it is offered; and, of course, if a paper could be introduced as a matter of cross-examination, the question of its competency could not be considered, or there would have to be delay to consider the admissibility of something offered by the opposite side when we are offering our testimony. But as to this paper, and only as to this paper, we do not care.

The Presiding Officer<sup>9</sup> said:

The Presiding Officer understands it is offered merely as a part of the cross-examination. * * * Whether it becomes admissible or pertinent in any other view of the case is a matter to be determined afterwards.

Later, on the same day,<sup>10</sup> and during the cross-examination of the same witness, the following occurred:

Q. You afterwards tried that same case, after it was rebrought, in that same court?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And there you had every opportunity to secure your witnesses, did you not?—A. We had all facilities on that trial.

Q. You got all the witnesses you wanted?—A. I think we did.

Q. I will ask you to examine this paper [handing paper to witness] and see if it is the precipe for witnesses filed by you as the witnesses you desire subpoenaed for that trial of the case when it did come on?—A. I suppose this is the list. I did not make it out; neither did I sign it.

Q. Signed by your associate, Mr. Davis, for himself and yourself?—A. I think so.

Mr. Thurston said :

Mr. President, it is not necessary to introduce this original paper in evidence, as it already constitutes a part of the record that the other side has put in. Possibly I may be mistaken; the whole record may not have gone in. I ask to have read the names of these witnesses and their residences as showing that all their witnesses, very few in number, resided immediately in and about the court-house at Pensacola.

The Presiding Officer said :

The Presiding Officer has some trouble about having these documents read by the Secretary. Counsel undoubtedly have a right to ask the witness on cross-examination, the witness having testified that there were forty or fifty witnesses, how many witnesses were used when the case came to trial. But the Presiding Officer can not see how it is proper at this time to have this part of the record read. The cross-examination can proceed without the introduction of the paper.

Mr. Thurston said :

Mr. President, we submit to the ruling. We will offer the paper in our own time, when that comes.

2211. On February 20, 1905,<sup>11</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Simeon Belden, was under cross-examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when the following occurred :

Q. This contempt proceeding was brought jointly against you, Davis, and Paquet, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time you have spoken of it was only tried as to Davis and yourself?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Further proceedings were thereafter had in that case against your associate, Mr. Paquet, were they not?—A. Other proceedings were had later on.

Q. And those resulted in his making and filing a written apology, did they not?

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said :

Mr. President, we are about to object to that. There is a better way of proving that, if it is true, and then it has nothing to do with the case, anyhow. There is no proceeding against Judge Swayne here regarding what he did or did not do with respect to Judge Paquet, and even if it is important to ask what he did or did not, or why he did or did not do it, there is a better way of showing it.

Mr. Thurston said :

I offered it as a part of the res gestæ.

The Presiding Officer<sup>12</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer does not see how that is a part of the cross-examination of this witness upon anything he said. * * * It may become admissible when counsel for the respondent take up the case. The Presiding Officer does not see how it is cross-examination.

2212. Rulings in the Swayne trial as to right of counsel of respondent to introduce documents in evidence during their cross-examination of witnesses for the managers.—On February 15, 1905,<sup>13</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness for the managers, Elza T. Davis, was under cross-examination by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, when these questions were asked and answered :

Q. (Producing paper.) Mr. Davis, will you kindly look at the paper I hand you and say whether or not that is your signature?

A. (After examining paper.) Yes, sir; that is my signature.

Q. Is that a paper presented for you in the United States circuit court for the fifth judicial circuit, relating to the habeas corpus?

A. I do not think it was presented in my case. I think that is an affidavit which was prepared in New Orleans, which Judge Paquet had prepared, and which I signed.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the court please, this is an original paper, and I offer in evidence.

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, objected that the paper might not thus be introduced in evidence.

The Presiding Officer<sup>12</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer thinks that it is hardly proper to offer this document in evidence on the part of counsel at this time. If they desire to cross-examine the witness upon anything contained in this document, they can do so without offering it formally as evidence now. * * * The Presiding Officer understands that the witness under cross-examination has been asked if a certain document bears his signature, and he says that it does. The Presiding Officer supposes that it is entirely proper for counsel upon cross-examination to ask him any proper question relating to what is in the document, but that this is not the time to offer it in evidence.

2213. Instance wherein during cross-examination in an impeachment trial the Senate sustained objection to evidence on a point not touched in direct examination and of doubtful pertinency.— On July 10, 1876,<sup>14</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Gen. William B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. A question arose as to whether or not respondent had ordered witness to a Dakota station as a punishment for testimony given before a committee of the House of Representatives in relation to the post tradership at Fort Sill, and Mr. Carpenter offered, in this connection, as follows:

The offer is to show that the President ordered Mr. Belknap as Secretary of War to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Belknap ordered General Sherman to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Sherman ordered General Sheridan to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Sheridan ordered General Pope to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota, and Pope designated the Sixth Infantry, of which Colonel Hazen happened to be colonel. That is all the connection Belknap had with that transaction, and there is the proof of it. [Holding up a bundle of papers.] We offer these papers.

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

We object, and I will state the ground of our objection. We have given no evidence on this point. We concluded the examination of General Hazen without asking him when or where he was ordered after he had given the testimony before the House committee. We did so because we did not desire to encumber this record or this case with any other question except the one legitimately before the Senate. We did it because we were aware of General Hazen's own letter from which we might have drawn our own conclusions, but we care to draw none now and have made nothing upon it; and, as I repeat to the gentleman, he is endeavoring in this case to try a side issue, that side issue being in the first instance whether General Hazen had told the truth about a particular matter; and in the second instance (which has no connection with this case) whether General Belknap sent him to the frozen country because General Hazen testified before the Military Committee.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the evidence was excluded without division.

2214. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that a witness recalled to answer a question by a Senator might be re-examined by counsel for respondent.

The Chief Justice declined to rule finally that cross-examination of a witness in an impeachment trial should be concluded before his dismissal.

On April 13, 1868,<sup>15</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was recalled as witness at the request of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, and was asked a certain question submitted in writing by Mr. Johnson, and admitted, after objection, by vote of the Senate.

The witness having answered the question, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the respondent (in whose behalf General Sherman had been called originally as a witness), proposed another question.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected that, as counsel for respondent had dismissed the witness, he might not be examined again by counsel for respondent when brought back by a question of the court.

The Chief Justice<sup>16</sup> said:

The Chief Justice thinks it is entirely competent for the Senate to recall any witness. The Senate has decided that the question shall be put to the witness. That amounts to a recalling of him, and the Chief Justice is of opinion that the witness is bound to answer the questions. Does any Senator object?

A little later Mr. Stanbery proposed another question to the witness, and Mr. Manager Butler objected again to the renewal of the examination by the counsel for the President.

The Chief Justice said:

Nothing is more usual in courts of justice than to recall witnesses for further examination, especially at the instance of one of the members of the court. It is very often done at the instance of counsel. It is, however, a matter wholly within the discretion of the court, and if any Senator desires it the Chief Justice will be happy to put it to the court, whether the witness shall be further examined.

Argument arising, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said:

The question, Senators, whether a witness may be recalled is a question of the practice of courts. It is a practice almost universal, unless there is a suspicion of bad faith, to permit it to be done, and it is always in the discretion of the court. In special circumstances, where collusion is suspected between the witness and counsel for wrong purposes adverse to the administration of justice, a strict rule may be laid down. Whatever rule this court in the future shall lay down as peremptory, if it be that neither party shall recall a witness that has been once dismissed from the stand, of course, will be obligatory upon us, but we are not aware that anything has occurred in the progress of this trial to intimate to counsel that any such rule had been adopted, or would be applied by this court.

Mr. Manager Butler said:

Mr. President, on Saturday this took place. This question was asked:

"In that interview"—

That is, when the offer was made—

"what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?"

That question was offered to be put, and after argument, and upon a solemn ruling, twenty-eight gentlemen of the Senate decided that it could not be put. That was exactly the same question as this, asking for the same conversation at the same time. Then certain other proceedings were had, and after those were had the counsel waited some considerable time at the table in consultation, and then got up and asked leave to recall this witness this morning for the purpose of putting questions. The Senate gave that leave and adjourned. This morning they recalled the witness and put such questions as they pleased, and we spent as many hours, as you remember, in doing that. On Saturday they had got through with him, except that they wanted a little time to consider whether they would recall him; they did recall him this morning, and after getting through with him the witness was sent away. Then he was again recalled to enable one of the judges to put a question to satisfy his mind. Having put his question and satisfied his mind of something that he wanted satisfied, something that he wanted to know, how can it be that that opens the case to allow the President's counsel to go into a new examination of the witness? How do they know, if he is not acting as counsel for the President, and there is not some understanding between them, which I do not charge—how can the President's counsel know that his mind is not satisfied? He recalled the witness for the purpose of satisfying his own mind, and only for that reason. I agree it is common to recall witnesses for something that has been overlooked or forgotten, but I appeal to the Presiding Officer that while—and I never have said otherwise—a member of the court who wants to satisfy himself by putting some question may recall a witness for that purpose, it never is understood that that having been done the case was opened to the counsel on either side to go on and put other questions. The court is allowed to put the question, because it is supposed that the judge wants to satisfy his mind on a particular point. After the judge has satisfied his mind on that particular point then there is to be an end, and if it is not to open the case anew. I trust I have answered the honorable Senator from Maryland that I meant no imputation. I was putting it right the other way.

After further argument, the Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice will explain the position of the matter to the Senate. The Senator from Maryland desired that the following question should be put to the witness (General Sherman): "When the President tendered to you the office of Secretary of War ad interim on the 27th of January, 1868, and on the 31st of the same month and year, did he, at the very time of making such tender, state to you what his purpose in so doing was?" To that question the witness replied, "he did" or "res." That answer having been given, the Senator from Maryland propounded the further question, "The witness having answered yes, will he state what he said his purpose was?" The witness having made an answer to that question, either partial or full, the Chief Justice is unable to decide which, the counsel for the President propose this question: "Have you answered as to both occasions?" That is the same question which the Senator from Kentucky now proposes to the Chief Justice, and which he is unable to answer. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] objects to the question proposed by the counsel for the President upon the ground that General Sherman, having been recalled at the instance of a Senator, and having been examined by him, he can not be examined by counsel for the President. The Chief Justice thinks that that is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Senate, but that it is usual, under such circumstances, to allow counsel to proceed with their inquiries relating to the same subject-matter.

The question was then put to the witness.

Later, as the witness had concluded, Mr. Manager Bingham stated that the managers might desire to recall him on the morrow.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, then said:

We must insist, Mr. Chief Justice, that the cross-examination must be finished before the witness is allowed to leave the stand.

After brief discussion the Chief Justice said:

Undoubtedly the general rule is that if the managers desire to cross-examine they must cross-examine before dismissing the witness, but that will be a question for the Senate when General Sherman is recalled.

2215. The Senate decided in the Belknap trial that a witness recalled, after direct and cross examination, to answer a question by a Senator might not be again subjected to direct examination.

On July 11, 1876,<sup>17</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, had been examined by the managers, cross-examined by counsel for the respondent, and had responded to questions put by Members of the Senate. Then Mr. Manager John A. McMahon proposed a question.

To this Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

Both parties have made this case to the Senate as they have chosen to make it; and the court has gone through in its own way, searching for facts, and, I understand, has rested also. Now, is it possible that the parties are to take this case up again and have any rights they would not have, arising from the examination as it took place on their part respectively? They can not go back with such a question certainly, unless it be on account of some questions that the court has put; and that certainly can not renew their right. They put this witness on the stand and exhausted him as far as they thought it was safe to do so; then we cross-examined him; both parties rested; and now the court has rested. Now we protest that the managers can not ask any more questions of this witness.

Mr. McMahon argued:

I understand even the order in which a witness is examined in a court of justice to be always a matter within the discretion of a court. A witness who has been fully discharged and gone may be called back and asked a question because something new has been developed in the case; and often—it is so laid down in the elementary books—you may recall a witness who has been absolutely discharged to ask him whether upon a certain occasion at a certain place he did not say so and so to A B, for the purpose of calling A B right there to contradict him. That is a very common practice.

Now, after the Senate has in the exercise of its discretion put further questions to this witness and eliminated a part of the truth from his bosom, what we want now is directly in the same line to put a question throwing light upon the very questions that have been put.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, replied:

I know what the gentleman says to be true that a witness may be recalled at any time at the discretion of the court; but the court presides over the trial and looks after the interests of justice, and therefore it is within the competency of the court, as every lawyer knows, to allow a witness to be recalled. But I appeal to this court and to its discretion and ask this court to consider whether it is just to allow this witness to be recalled and reexamined in the manner that it is now sought to do when the gentlemen have made their case, exhausted the witness, turned him over to us and we make a very brief cross-examination, and now when the manager seeks to have the last word of this witness and to reiterate and ding-dong in the ears of the Senate every time he makes a speech denunciations of our client as if he was appealing on the last argument of the case? I appeal to the Senate and to the justice of the Senate to know whether such a course of examination ought to be tolerated.

The point having been raised that the question had been already asked in practically the same form, Mr. McMahon withdrew it.

But soon thereafter, the witness in the meanwhile having answered questions put by Senators, Mr. Manager McMahon proposed another question.

Mr. Carpenter said:

That we object to. Unless the court mean to say that the whole case may now be opened by the managers, that is an improper question. It is their direct proof, and they have gone over that.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection and excluded the question.

2216. In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to admit as rebutting evidence a document not responsive to any evidence offered on the other side.—On April 20, 1868,<sup>18</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the defense had concluded their testimony, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler proposed to put in evidence the nomination sent by the President to the Senate on the 13th of February, 1868, of Lieutenant-General Sherman to be general by brevet, and the nomination of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, sent to the Senate on the 21st of February, 1868, to be lieutenant-general by brevet and general by brevet.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, objected :

It does not seem to us, Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, to be relevant, and it certainly is not rebutting. We have offered no evidence bearing upon the only evidence you offered under the eleventh article, which was the telegrams between Governor Parsons and the President on the subject of reconstruction. We have offered no evidence on that subject. * * * It is very apparent that this does not rebut any evidence we have offered. It is then offered as evidence in chief that the conferring of brevets on these two officers is in some way within the evil intents that are alleged in these articles. We submit that on that question there is nothing in this evidence that imports any such evil intent.

To this Mr. Manager Butler replied :

I only wish to say upon this that we do not understand that this case is to be tried upon the question of whether evidence is rebutting evidence or otherwise, because we understand that to-day the House of Representatives may bring in a new article of impeachment if they choose, and go on with it; but we have a right to put in any evidence which would be competent at any stage of the cause anywhere. * * * In many of the States—I can instance the State of New Hampshire—I am sure the rule of rebutting evidence does not obtain in their courts at all. Each party calls such pertinent and competent evidence as he has up to the hour when he says he has got through from time to time; and in some other of the States it is so applicable, and no injustice is done to anybody.

The Chief Justice having submitted the case to the Senate, there appeared in favor of receiving the evidence, yeas 14, nays 35. So the evidence was not received.

2217. The question as to whether or not testimony in an impeachment trial might be taken by a committee of the Senate.—On March 25, 1904,<sup>19</sup> in the Senate, Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to :

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to consider and report whether any amendment be desirable in the Senate rules relating to impeachments, and especially whether the rules may properly and lawfully provide for taking testimony in such cases by a committee in accordance with the practice of the English House of Lords in such cases, questions of the admission of material testimony and the final argument being reserved for the full Senate.

2218. After discussion of English precedents, the Senate ruled decisively in the Peck trial that the strict rules of evidence in force in the courts should be applied.

Witnesses in an impeachment trial are required to state facts and not opinions.

Decision as to the limits within which expert testimony may be admitted in an impeachment trial.

On January 7, 1831,<sup>2</sup> in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the case of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Robert Walsh, was examined on behalf of the respondent, and Mr. William Wirt, counsel for the respondent, asked this question:

When you read the strictures signed "A Citizen," did they strike you as misrepresenting the opinion of the court in a manner calculated to awaken the contempt and indignation of the people of Missouri, and to impair the confidence of the suitors in that court in the intelligence and integrity of the tribunal?

Judge Peck was impeached for punishing for contempt the author of a letter signed "A Citizen" and published in a St. Louis paper, criticising an opinion delivered by Judge Peck in the case of Goulard's heirs.

Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, one of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to this question, on the ground that the witness was asked for an opinion instead of a fact. The question for the court to settle in this trial was this: Did the strictures misrepresent the opinion? That was a question which must be decided on facts. The witness was now asked his conclusion, but was that an evidence of fact?

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, argued that the question at issue involved a knowledge of the obscure and intricate subject of Spanish titles and the application of Spanish laws in Louisiana Territory. The witness, from his familiarity with those subjects, was able to assist the court in forming its opinion. The managers had denied that professional knowledge was needed to show whether or not one paper misrepresented another; but Mr. Meredith held that in this case the court of impeachment could not be presumed to possess the requisite knowledge to enable it to form a correct judgment, unassisted by the opinions and conclusions of others. Therefore the proposed testimony was competent. Furthermore, the intention of the respondent in punishing the author of the strictures was a question of importance, and the proposed testimony would be pertinent to that branch of the discussion.

Mr. William Wirt, also counsel for respondent, elaborated the points outlined by his associate, but before doing so made remarks on the law of evidence as applied to impeachments:

In the well-known case of Warren Hastings, which occupied England so long, a most able and masterly protest was entered by Mr. Burke and the managers on the part of the House of Commons against the application of the rigid rules of evidence which governed the practice of the courts of law. It was contended before that tribunal that instead of the strict and iron rules of a law court, the field was broad and liberal, and to be controlled by no rule but the Lex et consuetudo Parliamenti. The protest is extended, very learned, and rests on numerous authorities; and if this court could have an opportunity to review it, they would not feel the least hesitation as to the fact that they are not to be trammelled and hemmed in by the rigid rules of evidence. I find that in the remarks of the Federalist respecting the high court of impeachment erected by the Constitution of this country, the writer lays it down as a conceded point that the strictness which prevails in the ordinary criminal courts does not apply here, nor is it required that the article of impeachment should be drawn up with all the rigid precision of an indictment. The proceedings in this highest court are to be more liberal and free, and nearer substantially to the course pursued by courts conversant with the civil than the criminal law. Mr. Rawle has the same idea. And the question would be, if the original view could now be before this court, whether this tribunal, which is not an appellate court on all questions of law, and is not, therefore, conversant with the strict rules of law, but whose whole jurisdiction has respect to impeachments alone, should or should not open itself to all lights which can be brought to bear on this decision, and whether more injustice would not accrue from narrowing the apertures through which light is to be received, than from opening them in all directions from whence a single ray can touch them.

In reply, Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers, argued at length in support of the objection, saying in the course of his remarks:

This question in four lines embraces the very essence of the respondent's defence—the very question to be decided by the court, and asks the witness to substitute his opinion for the judgment of the tribunal. I ask, Is there a court in the United States, however inferior its grade, which, on the trial of an indictment for a libel, would not, without an argument, overrule the opinion of a witness as to whether the matter charged to be libellous was or was not a libel, and what would be its effect on the public mind? Does it not strike everyone at the first blush that no such court could be found in any portion of this country?

The gentleman who last addressed the court has argued the question with very great ingenuity, and has presented a variety of topics introductory to the new doctrine which he has advanced concerning the law of evidence. He at first contended (though he afterwards waived the point) that the rules of evidence, by which all other courts of the United States are bound, ought not to be applied in their strictness to this high court of impeachment; and to sustain this proposition, he cited the celebrated protest of Mr. Burke upon the trial of Warren Hastings. But the gentleman seems to have forgotten that in that far-famed trial this very question was fairly made and decided; and it was held that the House of Lords, when sitting as a high court of impeachment, was bound by the same rules of evidence which regulated the proceedings of the most inferior courts of the kingdom. The whole trial of Judge Chase proceeded upon the same principle.

But even without such a precedent, could there be a reasonable doubt upon this question? What, sir? Against whom is it that this tremendous power of impeachment is invoked? Is it not against high state criminals? Men of standing and influence and character? And when the House of Representatives bring a culprit of this description to trial, are they to be told that in crimes affecting the whole nation, and which, in their consequences, may bring ruin upon the people, that the accused shall enjoy rights and privileges and immunities which are denied to any ordinary citizen, when arraigned before the most inferior court in the land? We deny the existence of any power, even in this high court, to dispense with the rules of evidence. When the House of Representatives become accusers, it is their right to have these rules administered here as they are administered by the Supreme Court and the other tribunals of the country.

There is another point of view in which the doctrine for which we contend will appear peculiarly proper and necessary. Will not the proceedings upon this trial be regarded as a precedent? And if this court shall decide questions of evidence against the law of the land will not such decisions bring the law of evidence into doubt and confusion throughout the United States?

The gentleman has also invoked the Federalist to his aid; and what does it say? Does it declare that on the trial of impeachments there is to be a departure from the established rules of proceeding, and that testimony is to be admitted here which ought to be rejected in a court of law? By no means. It merely recognizes the principle of the English law, that "in the delineation of the offense" in the form of the article of impeachment the same rigid exactness is not required which is necessary in framing an indictment. There is not the least intimation that this court, in the progress of the trial, ought to depart from the ordinary rules of evidence.

In further argument Mr. Storrs said:

I confess I feel alarmed to hear it gravely urged here that an impeachment is to be governed by other rules than the well-known and long-established rules of evidence. Rules of evidence are as much a part of the law of the land as any other part of it, and they constitute the security of every man. A more dangerous principle could not be broached, or a more alarming principle established than that, in the trial of an impeachment, the ordinary rules of evidence are to be relaxed; and I was, I confess, surprised that the respondent should seek to unsettle a principle the overturning of which might easily lead to the most unjust and oppressive proceedings. If this is to be done in favor of the respondent, will it be done in favor of him alone, or may not State favorites be shielded or State victims be destroyed by the same process?

On the question, "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared yeas 7, nays 35.

Again, on January 10,<sup>3</sup> the same witness being under examination, Mr. Meredith asked this question, which on objection was excluded by a vote of yeas 1, nays 39:

Do you think that the publication signed "A Citizen" was calculated to incense the claimants against the court, and to impair, in their minds, their confidence and respect for the court?

2219. In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to agree to a declaration modifying the strictness of the ordinary rules of evidence.—On April 16, 1868,<sup>4</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, proposed the following as a declaration of opinion to be adopted as an answer to the constantly recurring questions on the admissibility of testimony:

Considering the character of this proceeding, that it is a trial of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, and not a proceeding by indictment in an inferior court:

Considering that Senators are, from beginning to end, judges of law as well as fact, and that they are judges from whom there is no appeal;

Considering that the reasons for the exclusion of evidence on an ordinary trial where the judge responds to the law and the jury to the fact are not applicable to such a proceeding;

Considering that, according to parliamentary usage, which is the guide in all such cases, there is on trials of impeachment a certain latitude of inquiry and a freedom from technicality;

And considering, finally, that already in the course of this trial there have been differences of opinion as to the admissibility of evidence;

Therefore, in order to remove all such differences and to hasten the dispatch of business, it is deemed advisable that all evidence offered on either side not trivial or obviously irrelevant in nature shall be received without objection, it being understood that the same when admitted shall be open to question and comparison at the bar in order to determine its competency and value, and shall be carefully sifted and weighted by Senators in the final judgment.

Mr. John Conness, of California, moved that the paper lie on the table, and the question being taken, there appeared yeas 33, nays 11. So the paper was laid on the table.

2220. In an impeachment trial testimony that can be construed as fairly within the purport of the articles is admitted.—On April 2, 1868,<sup>5</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Charles A. Tinker was called and sworn as a witness on behalf of the managers, to prove the following dispatches:

MONTGOMERY, ALA.,
January 17, 1867.

Legislature in session. Efforts making to reconsider vote on constitutional amendment. Report from Washington says it is probable an enabling act will pass. We do not know what to believe. I find nothing here.

LEWIS E. PARSONS,
Exchange Hotel.

His Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON, President.

UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D.C.,
January 17, 1867.

What possible good can be obtained by reconsidering the constitutional amendment? I know of none in the present posture of affairs; and I do not believe the people of the whole country will sustain any set of individuals in attempts to change the whole character of our Government by enabling acts or otherwise. I believe, on the contrary, that they will eventually uphold all who have patriotism and courage to stand by the Constitution and who place their confidence in the people. There should be no faltering on the part of those who are honest in their determination to sustain the several coordinate departments of the Government in accordance with its original design.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

HON. LEWIS E. PARSONS, Montgomery, Ala.

Mr. Butler stated that he introduced this evidence under the tenth and eleventh articles of impeachment to show how President Johnson had endeavored to oppose the reconstruction legislation of Congress, of which the defeated amendment referred to in the dispatches was a part. Lewis E. Parsons was provisional governor of Alabama, and a man of influence.

The counsel for the President objected to the evidence because it did not refer to acts charged in the articles of impeachment. The tenth article referred to the President's speeches, and not to telegrams; and the eleventh charged him with trying to remove Secretary of War

Stanton and with trying to prevent the execution of the reconstruction laws. Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said :

"Designing and intending to set aside the rightful authority and powers of Congress, did attempt to bring into disgrace, ridicule, hatred, contempt, and reproach the Congress of the United States and the several branches thereof, to impair and destroy the regard and respect of all the good people of the United States for the Congress and legislative power thereof (which all officers of the Government ought inviolably to preserve and maintain), and to excite the odium and resentment of all the good people of the United States against Congress and the laws by it duly and constitutionally enacted."

That is the entire purview of the intent. Now, the only acts charged as done with this intent are the delivery of a speech at the Executive Mansion in August, 1866, and two speeches, one at St. Louis and the other at Cleveland, in September, 1866. The article concludes that by means of these utterances—

"Said Andrew Johnson has brought the high office of the President of the United States into contempt, ridicule, and disgrace, to the great scandal of all good citizens, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did commit and was then and there guilty of a high misdemeanor in office."

That is the gravamen of the crime; that he brought the presidential office into scandal by these speeches made with this intent. Senators will judge from the reading of this telegram, dated in January, 1867, whether that supports the principal charge or intent of his derogating from the credit of Congress or bringing the presidential office into discredit.

The eleventh article has for its substantive charge nothing but the making of speech of the 18th of August, 1866, saying that by that speech he declared and affirmed—

"In substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States authorized by the Constitution to exercise legislative power under the same, but, on the contrary, was a Congress of only part of the States, thereby denying, and intending to deny, that the legislation of said Congress was valid or obligatory upon him, the said Andrew Johnson, except in so far as he saw fit to approve the same, and, also, thereby denying, and intending to deny, the power of the said Thirty-ninth Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and in pursuance of said declaration"—

That is, in pursuance of the speech made at the Executive Mansion on the 18th of August, 1866—

"The said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1868, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, did, unlawfully, and in disregard of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, attempt to prevent the execution of an act entitled, 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1867"—

Which was after the date of this dispatch—

"By unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from forthwith resuming the functions of the office of Secretary for the Department of War."

The court will consider whether this dispatch touches that subject.

"And also by further unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means, then and there, to prevent the execution of an act entitled, 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1867; and also to prevent the execution of an act entitled, 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867."

Also, after the date of this dispatch. It is under one or the other of these two articles that this dispatch is, in its date and in its substance, supposed to be relevant.

Mr. Evarts concluded by contending that there was nothing in the telegram that showed the President guilty of crime or misdemeanor in opposing legislation of Congress or in doing anything mentioned in the articles.

Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell specifically cited the concluding words of the eleventh article, wherein the President was charged with "attempting to devise and contrive, means then and there * * * prevent the execution of an act" known as the reconstruction act. The adoption of the constitutional amendment was part of the reconstruction system, and the telegram to Governor Parsons was an act hostile to reconstruction.

The question being taken, the Senate decided, yeas 27, nays 17, that the evidence should be admitted.

2221. In the Johnson trial the Senate held inadmissible as evidence of an intent specified in the articles an act not specified in the articles.—On April 2, 1868,<sup>6</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, William E. Chandler, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, was called by the managers and sworn. The question "Do you know Edmund Cooper?", asked by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, caused Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, to ask what was the object of eliciting testimony concerning Mr. Cooper. After discussion, Mr. Butler offered the following in writing:

We offer to prove that after the President had determined on the removal of Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, in spite of the action of the Senate, there being no vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, the President unlawfully appointed his friend and theretofore private secretary, Edmund Cooper, to that position as one of the means by which he intended to defeat the tenure-of-civil-office act and other laws of Congress.

Mr. Manager Butler further stated that the proof was offered under the eighth and eleventh articles of impeachment.

Objecting to the testimony offered, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, quoted the eighth article's charge against the President:

"With intent unlawfully to control the disbursement of the moneys appropriated for the military service and for the Department of War, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, did unlawfully and contrary to the provisions of an act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1868, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, there being no vacancy in the office of Secretary for the Department of War, and with intent to violate and disregard the act aforesaid, then and there issue and deliver to one Lorenzo Thomas a letter of authority in writing, in substance as follows; that is to say:"

Now, you propose to prove under that, that there being no vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, he proposed to appoint his private secretary, Edmund Cooper, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. That is the idea, is it, under the eighth article? We object to this as not admissible under the eighth article. As by reference it will be perceived it charges nothing but an intent to violate the civil-tenure act, and no mode of violating that except, in the want of a vacancy in the War Department, the appointment of General Thomas contrary to that act.

As for the eleventh article, the honorable court will remember that in our answer we stated that there was in that article no such description, designation of ways or means, or attempt at ways and means, whereby we could answer definitely; and the only allegations there are, that in pursuance of a speech that the President made on the 18th of August, 1866, he—

"Afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February, A.D., 1868, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully, and in disregard of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, attempt to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1867, by unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from forthwith resuming the functions of the office of Secretary for the Department of War, notwithstanding the refusal of the Senate to concur in the suspension therefore made by said Andrew Johnson of said Edwin M. Stanton from said office of Secretary for the Department of War; and also by further unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means, then and there, to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867; and also to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, whereby," etc.

The only allegation here as to time and principal action, in reference to which all these unnamed and undescribed ways and means were used, is that on the 21st of February, 1868, at the city of Washington, he did unlawfully and in disregard of the Constitution attempt to prevent the execution of the civil tenure-of-office act by unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from resuming his place in the War Department. And now proof is offered here, substantively, of efforts in November, 1867, to appoint, in the want of a vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Edmund Cooper. We object to that evidence.

Mr. Butler urged that the appointment of Cooper was one of the means whereby the President sought to so arrange in the Treasury Department that General Thomas's requisitions from the War Department should be honored.

Mr. John A. Bingham, of the managers, also urged that the appointment of Cooper was intended as a means of illegally drawing money from the Treasury on requisitions of an illegal acting Secretary of War. Mr. Bingham further said on the question of evidence:

We consider the law to be well settled and accepted everywhere in this country and England to-day that where an intent is the subject-matter of injury in a criminal prosecution, other and independent acts on the part of the accused, looking to the same result, are admissible in evidence for the purpose of establishing that fact. And we go further than that. We undertake to say, upon very high and commanding authority, not to be challenged here or elsewhere, that it is settled that such other and independent acts showing the purpose to bring about the same general result, although at the time of the inquiry the subject-matter of a separate indictment, are nevertheless admissible. I doubt not that it will occur to the recollection of honorable Senators that among other cases illustrative of the rule which I have just cited it has been stated in the books—the cases have been ruled first and then incorporated into books of standard authorities—that where a party, for example, was charged with shooting with intent to kill a person named, it was competent, in order to show the malice, the malicious intent of the act, to show that at another time and place he laid poison. A party is charged with passing a counterfeit note: it is competent, in order to prove the scienter, to show that he was in possession of other counterfeit notes of a different denomination; and the rule, as stated in the books, is that what is competent to prove the scienter, as a general principle, is competent to prove the intent.

Before deciding the question several Senators propounded questions tending to show whether or not an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury could, in defiance of his chief, the Secretary of the Treasury, or without a special designation from him, or after his removal, honor requisitions for money from the Treasury. The response of witnesses and the reading of the law did not make plain that the Assistant Secretary would have the power, and rather suggested that he would not have it.

The question being taken as to the admissibility of the evidence, the yeas were 22, the nays 27. So the evidence was not admitted.

2222. In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to admit evidence of a fact bearing on the question of intent, no issue having been accepted in the pleadings on this point.

The Senate refused, in the Johnson trial, to admit as evidence in mitigation testimony held otherwise inadmissible.

Instances in the Johnson trial wherein the decisions of the Chief Justice on questions of evidence were overruled.

Instances wherein Senators propounded questions to counsel during arguments as to admissibility of evidence.

On April 17, 1968,<sup>7</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, was sworn and examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Welles testified that he was present at a Cabinet meeting on Friday, February 26, 1867, and thereupon Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, submitted the following offer of proof:

We offer to prove that the President, at a meeting of the Cabinet while the bill was before the President for his approval, laid before the Cabinet the tenure-of-office bill for their consideration and advice to the President respecting his approval of the bill; and thereupon the members of the Cabinet then present gave their advice to the President that the bill was unconstitutional and should be returned to Congress with his objections, and that the duty of preparing a message, setting forth the objection to the constitutionality of the bill, was devolved on Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton; to be followed by proof as to what was done by the President and Cabinet up to the time of sending in the message.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once objected to the admission of the proposed testimony.

The arguments on this question of evidence were made principally on April 18.

Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, in arguing against the admissibility of the testimony, pointed out that the House of Representatives had, in their replication, made no issue on the question whether or not the President had been advised by his Cabinet that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional. Whether the President was so advised or not they held to be immaterial to this case, and hence objected to the testimony on that point as irrelevant.

Mr. Manager Wilson continued:

The respondent is arraigned for a violation of and a refusal to execute the law. He offers to prove that his Cabinet advised him that a certain bill presented for his approval was in violation of the Constitution; that he accepted their advice and vetoed the bill; and upon that, and such additional advice as they may have given him, claims the right to resist and defy the provisions of the bill, notwithstanding its enactment into a law by two-thirds of both Houses over his objections. In other words, he claims, substantially, that he may determine for himself what laws he will obey and execute, and what laws he will disregard and refuse to enforce. In support of this claim he offers the testimony which, for the time being, is excluded by the objection now under discussion. If I am correct in this, then I was not mistaken when I asserted that this objection confronts one of the most important questions involved in this case. It may be said that this testimony is offered merely to disprove the intent alleged and charged in the articles; but it goes beyond this and reaches the main question, as will clearly appear to the mind of anyone who will read with care the answer to the first article. The testimony is improper for any purpose and in every view of the case.

Mr. Manager Wilson next preceded to examine the constitutional provisions relating to the executive power, and the punishment of impeachment, and then said :

The executive power was created to enforce the will of the nation ; the will of the nation appears in its laws ; the two Houses of Congress are intrusted with the power to enact laws, the objections of the Executive to the contrary notwithstanding ; laws thus enacted, as well as those which receive the executive sanction, are the voice of the people. If the person clothed for the time being with the executive power—the only power which can give effect to the people's will—refuses or neglects to enforce the legislative decrees of the nation, or willfully violates the same, what constituent elements of governmental power could be more properly charged with the right to present and the means to try and remove the contumacious Executive than those intrusted with the power to enact the laws of the people, guided by the checks and balances to which I have directed the attention of the Senate? What other constituent parts of the Government could so well understand and adjudge of a perverse and criminal refusal to obey, or a willful declination to execute, the national will, than those joining in its expression? There can be but one answer to these questions. The provisions of the Constitution are wise and just beyond the power of disputation in leaving the entire subject of the responsibility of the Executive to faithfully execute his office and enforce the laws to the charge, trial, and judgment of the two several branches of the legislative department, regardless of the opinions of Cabinet officers or of the decisions of the judicial department. The respondent has placed himself within this power of impeachment by trampling on the constitutional duty of the Executive and violating the penal laws of the land.

After contrasting the constitutions of the United States and England, the manager quoted an opinion given by Attorney-General Black, dated November 20, 1860, wherein it was stated that "to the Chief Executive Magistrate of the Union is confided the solemn duty of seeing the laws faithfully executed," and proceeded :

A departure from this view of the character of the executive power, and from the nature of the duty and obligation resting upon the officer charged therewith, would surround this nation with perils of the most fearful proportions. Such a departure would not only justify the respondent in his refusal to obey and execute the law, but also approve his usurpation of the judicial power when he resolved that he would not observe the legislative will, because in his judgment, it did not conform to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States touching the subjects embraced in the articles of impeachment on which he is now being tried at your bar. Concede this to him, and when and where may we look for the end? To what result shall we arrive? Will it not naturally and inevitably lead to a consolidation of the several powers of the Government in the executive department? And would this be the end? Would it not rather be but the beginning? If the President may defy and usurp the powers of the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, as his caprices or the advice of his cabinet may incline him, why may not his subordinates, each for himself, and touching his own sphere of action, determine how far the directions of his superior accord with the Constitution of the United States, and reject and refuse to obey all that come short of the standard erected by his judgment?

In conclusion, Mr. Manager Wilson said :

Concede to the President immunity through the advice of his Cabinet officers and you reverse, by your decision, the theory of our Constitution.

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, in arguing said that he should not consume time to reply to those matters which seemed to touch the merits of the case. This was simply a question as to the admissibility of proofs. Continuing, Mr. Curtis said :

The honorable manager has read a portion of the answer of the President, and has stated that the House of Representatives has taken no issue upon that part of the answer. As to that, and as to the effect of that admission by the honorable manager, I shall have a word or two to say presently. But the honorable manager has told you that the House of Representatives, when the honorable manager brought to your bar these articles, did not intend to assert and prove the allegations in them which are matters of fact. One of these allegations, Mr. Chief Justice, as you will find by reference to the first article and to the second article and to the third article, is that the President of the United States in removing Mr. Stanton and in appointing General Thomas intentionally violated the Constitution of the United States; that he did these acts with the intention of violating the Constitution of the United States. Instead of saying, "it is wholly immaterial what intention the President had; it is wholly immaterial whether he honestly believed that this act of Congress was unconstitutional; it is wholly immaterial whether he believed that he was acting in accordance with his oath of office, to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution when he did this act"—instead of averring that, they aver that he acted with an intention to violate the Constitution of the United States.

Now, when we introduce evidence here, or offer to introduce evidence here, bearing on this intent, evidence that before forming any opinion upon this subject he resorted to proper advice to enable him to form a correct one, and that when he did form and fix opinions on this subject it was under the influence of this proper advice, and that consequently when he did this act, whether it was lawful or unlawful, it was not done with the intention to violate the Constitution—when we offer evidence of that character, the honorable manager gets up here and argues an hour by the clock that it is wholly immaterial what his intention was, what his opinion was, what advice he had received and in conformity with which he acted in this matter.

* * * * *

I therefore say when the question of his intention comes to be considered by the Senate, when the question arises in their minds whether the President honestly believed that this was an unconstitutional law, when the particular emergency arose, when if he carried out or obeyed that law he must quit one of the powers which he believed were conferred upon him by the Constitution, and not be able to carry on one of the departments of the Government in the manner the public interests required—when that question arises for the consideration of the Senate, then they ought to have before them the fact that he acted by the advice of the usual and proper advisers; that he resorted to the best means within his reach to form a safe opinion upon this subject, and that, therefore, it is a fair conclusion that when he did form that opinion it was an honest and fixed opinion which he felt he must carry out in practice if the proper occasion should arise. It is in this point of view, and this point of view only, that we offer this evidence.

In the course of the discussion Mr. Jacob M. Howard, a Senator from Michigan, had proposed this inquiry:

Do the counsel for the accused not consider that the validity of the tenure of office bill was purely a question of law, to be determined on this trial by the Senate; and, if so, do they claim that the opinion of Cabinet officers touching that question is competent evidence by which the judgment of the Senate ought to be influenced?

To this Mr. Curtis answered:

The constitutional validity of any bill is, of course, a question of law which depends upon a comparison of the provisions of the bill with the law enacted by the people for the government of their agents. It depends upon whether those agents have transcended the authority which the people gave them, and that comparison of the Constitution with the law is, in the sense that was intended undoubtedly by the honorable Senator, a question of law.

The next branch of the question is "whether that question is to be determined on this trial by the Senate."

That is a question I can not answer. That is a question that can be determined only by the Senate themselves. If the Senate should find that Mr. Stanton's case was not within this law, then no such question arises, then there is no question in this particular case of a conflict between the law and the Constitution. If the Senate should find that these articles have so charged the President that it is necessary for the Senate to believe that there was some act of turpitude on his part connected with this matter, some mala fides, some bad intent, and that he did honestly believe, as he states in his answer, that this was an unconstitutional law, that an occasion had arisen when he must act accordingly under his oath of office, then it is immaterial whether this was a constitutional or unconstitutional law; be it the one or be it the other, be it true or false that the President has committed a legal offense by an infraction of the law, he has not committed the impeachable offense with which he is charged by the House of Representatives. And, therefore, we must advance beyond these two questions before we reach the third branch of the question which the honorable Senator from Michigan propounds, whether the question of the constitutionality of this law must be determined on this trial by the Senate. In the view of the President's counsel there is no necessity for the Senate to determine that question. The residue of the inquiry is:

"Do the counsel claim that the opinion of the Cabinet officers touching that question"—

That is, the constitutionality of the law—
"Is competent evidence by which the judgment of the Senate might be influenced?"

Certainly not. We do not put them on the stand as experts on questions of constitutional law. The judges will determine that out of their own breasts. We put them on the stand as advisers of the President to state what advice, in point of fact, they gave him, with a view to show that he was guilty of no improper intent to violate the Constitution.

Mr. Curtis next read a question propounded by Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland:

"Do the counsel for the President understand that the managers deny the statement made by the President in his message of December 12, 1867, to the Senate, as given in evidence by the managers at page 45 of the official report of the trial that the members of the Cabinet gave him"—

That is, the President—
"the opinion there stated as to the tenure of office act; and is the evidence offered to corroborate that statement, or for what other object is it offered?"

To this Mr. Curtis replied:

We now understand, from what the honorable manager has said this morning, that the House of Representatives has taken no issue on that part of our answer; that the honorable managers do not understand that they have traversed or denied that part of our answer. We did also understand before this question was proposed to us that the honorable managers had themselves put in evidence the message of the President of the 12th of December, 1867, to the Senate, in which he states that he was advised by the members of the Cabinet unanimously, including Mr. Stanton, that this law would be unconstitutional if enacted. They have put that in evidence themselves.

Nevertheless, Senators, this is an affair, as you perceive, of the utmost gravity in any possible aspect of it; and we did not feel at liberty to avoid or abstain from the offering of the members of the President's Cabinet that they might state to you, under the sanction of their oaths, what advice was given. I suppose all that the managers would be prepared to admit might be—certainly they have made no broader admission—that the President said these things in a message to the Senate; but from the experience we have had thus far in this trial we thought it not impossible that the managers, or some one of them speaking in behalf of himself and the others, might say that the President had told a falsehood, and we wish, therefore, to place ourselves right before the Senate on this subject. We desire to examine these gentlemen to show what passed on this subject, and we wish to do it for the purposes I have stated.

Mr. George H. Williams, a Senator from Oregon, proposed this question:

Is the advice given to the President by his Cabinet with a view of preparing a veto message pertinent to prove the right of the President to disregard the law after it was passed over his veto?

To this Mr. Curtis replied:

It is not of itself sufficient; it is not enough that the President received such advice; he must show that an occasion arose for him to act upon it which in the judgment of the Senate was such an occasion that you could not impute to him wrong intention in acting. But the first step is to show that he honestly believed that this was an unconstitutional law. Whether he should treat it as such in a particular instance is a matter depending upon his own personal responsibility without advice. That is the answer which I suppose is consistent with the views we have of this case.

The arguments being closed, the Chief Justice<sup>9</sup> said :

Senators, the question now before the Senate, as the Chief Justice conceives, respects not the weight but the admissibility of the evidence offered. To determine that question it is necessary to see what is charged in the articles of impeachment. The first article charges that on the 21st day of February, 1868, the President issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War; that this order was made unlawfully, and that it was made with intent to violate the tenure of office act and in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The same charge in substance is repeated in the articles which relate to the appointment of Mr. Thomas, which was necessarily connected with the transaction. The intent, then, is the subject to which much of the evidence on both sides has been directed; and the Chief Justice conceives that this testimony is admissible for the purpose of showing the intent with which the President has acted in this transaction. He will submit the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

The question being taken, there appeared yeas 20, nays 29. So the evidence was decided to be inadmissible.

Immediately thereafter<sup>9</sup> a question asked of the same witness by Mr. Evarts was challenged, thereby bringing from the counsel for the respondent this offer :

We offer to prove that at the meetings of the Cabinet at which Mr. Stanton was present, held while the tenure of office bill was before the President for approval, the advice of the Cabinet in regard to the same was asked by the President and given by the Cabinet; and thereupon the question whether Mr. Stanton and the other Secretaries who had received their appointment from Mr. Lincoln were within the restrictions upon the President's power of removal from office created by said act was considered, and the opinion expressed that the Secretaries appointed by Mr. Lincoln were not within such restrictions.

Mr. Manager Butler objected that this question related to the construction of a law, while the other related to its constitutionality; and that both questions fell under the same principle.

After argument, the Chief Justice said :

The Chief Justice is of opinion that this testimony is proper to be taken into consideration by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment; but he is unable to determine what extent the Senate is disposed to give to its previous ruling, or how far they consider that ruling applicable to the present question.

The question being submitted to the Senate, it was decided, yeas 22, nays 26, that the evidence was inadmissible.

Very soon thereafter<sup>10</sup> another question asked of the same witness was objected to, whereat the counsel for the respondent presented this offer :

We offer to prove that at the Cabinet meetings between the passage of the tenure of civil office bill and the order of the 21st of February, 1868, for the removal of Mr. Stanton upon occasions when the condition of the public service was affected by the operation of that bill came up for the consideration and advice of the Cabinet, it was considered by the President and Cabinet that a proper regard to the public service made it desirable that upon some proper case a judicial determination on the constitutionality of the law should be obtained.

To this Mr. Manager Butler objected :

Mr. President and Senators, we, of the managers, object, and we should like to have this question determined in the minds of the Senators upon this principle. We understand here that the determination of the Senate is, that Cabinet discussions, of whatever nature, shall not be put in as a shield to the President.

That I understand, for one, to be the broad principle upon which this class of questions stand and upon which the Senate has voted; and, therefore, these attempts to get around it, to get in by detail and at retail—if I may use that expression—evidence which in its wholesale character can not be admitted, are simply tiring out and wearing out the patience of the Senate. I should like to have it settled, once for all, if it can be, whether the Cabinet consultations upon any subject are to be a shield.

In reply, Mr. Evarts argued :

By decisive determinations upon certain questions of evidence arising in this cause you have decided that, at least, what in point of time is so near to this action of the President as may fairly import to show that in his action he was governed by a desire to raise a question for judicial determination shall be admitted. About that there can be no question that the record will confirm my statement. Now, my present inquiry is to show that within this period, thus extensively and comprehensively named for the present, in his official duty and in his consultations concerning his official duty with the heads of Departments, it became apparent that the operation of this law raised embarrassments in the public service and rendered it important as a practical matter that there should be a determination concerning the constitutionality of the law, and that it was desirable that upon a proper case such a determination should be had.

Mr. John B. Henderson, a Senator from Missouri, proposed this question to the managers :

If the President shall be convicted, he must be removed from office.

If his guilt should be so great as to demand such punishment, he may be disqualified to hold and enjoy any office under the United States.

Is not the evidence now offered competent to go before the court in mitigation?

To this Mr. Manager Butler replied that usually evidence in mitigation should be submitted after verdict and before judgment. Therefore, he said :

There is an appreciable time in this tribunal, as in all others, between a verdict of guilty and the act of judgment; and if any such evidence can be given at all, it must, in my judgment, be given at that time. It certainly can not be given for any other purpose.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question of admissibility to the Senate there appeared yeas 19, nays 30. So the evidence was not admitted.

Immediately thereupon <sup>11</sup> Mr. Evarts asked of the same witness this question :

Was there, within the period embraced in the inquiry in the last question, and at any discussions or deliberations of the Cabinet concerning the operation of the tenure of civil office act and the requirements of the public service in regard to the same, any suggestion or intimation whatever touching or looking to the vacation of any office by force or getting possession of the same by force?

To this Mr. Manager Butler objected as wholly immaterial and excluded under the principles of the last ruling. He said, in response to a question by the Chief Justice, that it was not worth while to object to the question as leading.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question of admissibility to the Senate, there appeared yeas 18, nays 26. So the question was excluded.

2223. Evidence that from the nature of the charge was immaterial was ruled out during the Swayne trial, although respondent's answer had seemed to lay a foundation for it.—On February 14, 1905,<sup>12</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles

Swayne, a witness, Elza T. Davis, was under examination, when Mr. Porter J. McCumber, a Senator from North Dakota, said :

Mr. President, I want to direct the attention of the Presiding Officer to a matter in the way of an inquiry for information. I understand that the pleadings of this case do make an issuable fact possibly of the question of inconvenience ; but what I wish to ask the Chair is this : When the law itself provides that it shall be unlawful for a judge to reside outside of his district, with no question whatever of convenience or inconvenience, whether the time of the Senate could properly be taken up upon an issue which, to my mind, is in no wise involved in the case. I call the Chair's attention to the law, which is very specific.

"Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

If the question, it seems to me, Mr. President, of convenience or inconvenience is a question at all, it is precluded by the state itself, which presumes that it will be convenient, or more convenient, if the judge resides there, or less convenient if he does not.

I do not know how many witnesses the managers on the part of the House may have on this subject, but it seems to me that the Chair, sitting as a judge, would necessarily have to rule that all this matter was wholly immaterial. The simple question is, Was he or was he not a resident? And I submit to the Chair whether it should be gone into, and, if so, the limit that should be allowed, taking the position myself that under the statute it can not be an issuable fact.

I may say to the Chair that we might take up a week on this subject, and then every Senator and attorney might concur in the opinion that the question of convenience or inconvenience would not affect it in the least.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, said :

Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Presiding Officer in reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota. I will say that the suggestion just made entirely corresponds with what I suggested yesterday, when I asked a somewhat similar question of one of the witnesses. It is the view of the managers, as it is of the Senator, that this evidence is immaterial. The statute says, as the Senator has properly stated, that if the judge does not reside within his district it shall be a high misdemeanor, and whether convenience or inconvenience resulted is, in our judgment, wholly immaterial.

However, in the answer of the respondent, it is alleged that in his belief his absence from his district caused no inconvenience to suitors. To meet that, not knowing what the views of the Senate might be ; not knowing but that some one might say, "Ah, well, this judge was absent, but it did no harm, and there was no inconvenience and no suitors suffered," we thought it might be well to offer some evidence on this subject.

But we are entirely content to take the ruling of the Chair that the evidence is immaterial and to offer no more of it, although we have other witnesses whom we could call. As the Senator has suggested, this is a branch on which indefinite evidence might be given if we saw fit to subpoena a sufficient number of lawyers.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for respondent, said :

Mr. President, counsel for the respondent fully agree with the position stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] and also the position as acquiesced in by the managers. We do not believe this testimony is material or relevant. We did, however, in framing our answer have in mind the fact before the committee of the House great stress had apparently been laid in the examination of witnesses upon testimony which they claimed tended to show that Judge Swayne's temporary absences from Florida had caused inconvenience to suitors and attorneys. Therefore we thought we were compelled to meet what had appeared in a previous investigation to be, in the theory of the managers, material. We do not believe it is.

We believe that the question of fact before the court is this, and only this : Did Judge Swayne have a residence in the district for which he was appointed? And that question of fact is in no wise changed or modified by reason of any further situation which may involve the convenience or the inconvenience of suitors or of attorneys.

After further argument the Presiding Officer <sup>13</sup> said :

Unless some Senator desires to have the matter submitted to the Senate, the Presiding Officer thinks that this testimony has some bearing upon the question of residence : that so far as the question of inconvenience is concerned, that is not material to the issue.

And later, during cross-examination of the witness, the Presiding Officer said :

The Presiding Officer does not think that the evidence in relation to the inconvenience of this witness by reason of the absence of Judge Swayne from Florida or Pensacola is material or even admissible, but that so much of his testimony as proves the fact that the judge was absent from Florida at Guyencourt, Del., at certain times is admissible for what it is worth.

2224. A question being raised in the Swayne trial that certain evidence was immaterial, the pleadings were examined to determine whether or not the issue involved was raised.—On February 10, 1905,<sup>14</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, one of the managers, called Payne W. Chase, a witness, to prove the charge that the respondent had made false certificates of expenses.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, said :

Mr. President, I may be mistaken as to the pleadings, but my understanding is that there is no issue as to the receipt and expenditure as alleged by the House, and that at most all that remains for the Senate to do is to determine the effect of the respondent having drawn the maximum allowance, and to determine, upon the state of the pleadings—it being alleged that he drew the money and did not expend it—what the law in that case is.

If I am right about that, I suggest that the calling of witnesses upon this charge, which involves the question of expense and receipt, would be a useless consumption of the time of the Senate.

Mr. Olmsted replied that an examination of the pleadings would show that the proposed testimony was necessary.

The Presiding Officer <sup>15</sup> said :

A cursory examination of the pleadings leads the Presiding Officer to the conclusion that there is no direct admission in the answer of the respondent that the expenses were actually less than the sum charged, and it seems that evidence may be introduced to show that they were less.

2225. A certified paper, bearing only indirectly on a question at issue, was ruled out in the Swayne trial.—On February 22, 1905,<sup>15</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, offered testimony in the following words :

Mr. President, on behalf of the respondent, I make the offer of a certified copy of the proceedings of the meeting of the board of county commissioners of Leon County, Fla., December 10, 1904. It is the board which was spoken of by a witness yesterday—Milton Jackson. I have presented the paper to the learned chairman of the managers, and would ask if there is any objection to it. * * * It is that the county commissioners of Leon County, Fla., in which is situated the city of Tallahassee, adopted a resolution at that time extending to Judge Swayne as the judge of the northern district of Florida, having to make a residence within his district, an invitation to reside in the city of Tallahassee. That evidence is before the court. The matter was brought to the attention of a witness (who has been examined here) by the Judge, who told him, the witness testified, that he would not live in Tallahassee because he had taken his residence in Pensacola. It is a fact and a circumstance connected with the act of residence.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said :

We object to it as irrelevant, incompetent, and tending to throw no light on the subject-matter under discussion.

The Presiding Officer<sup>16</sup> said :

This paper is a certified copy of the action of the board of county commissioners, held in Tallahassee, being an invitation sent to Judge Swayne to make his permanent home in Tallahassee. The Presiding Officer does not see how it is evidence in this case. If any Senator desires, he will submit the question to the Senate. [A pause.] It is not admitted.

2226. In impeachment trials the rule that the best evidence procurable should be presented has been followed.

It was decided in the Belknap trial that a witness might not be examined as to the contents of an existing letter without the letter itself being submitted.

Instance wherein the President pro tempore ruled on evidence during an impeachment trial.

On April 4, 1868,<sup>17</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Robert S. Chew, chief clerk of the State Department, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the House of Representatives, and examined by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler as to the practice of making temporary appointments of assistant secretaries of Departments to perform the duties of their chiefs in the absence of the latter. The witness testified that the appointments in such cases were made by the President, or by his order. Mr. Butler then asked :

Did the letter of authority in most of these cases * * * proceed from the head of the Department or from the President?

Mr. William M. Evarts of counsel for the President, objected that the letter of authority showed from whom it came, and was the best evidence on that point.

In the discussion which followed, the counsel for the President intimated that they did not object if the question was intended to elicit a reply as to whose manual possession the paper came from. But if it was intended to ascertain who signed the paper, then the paper itself would be the best evidence.

Mr. Butler reduced the question to writing as follows :

Question. State whether any of the letters of authority which you have mentioned came from the Secretary of State or from what other officer?

The Chief Justice<sup>18</sup> thereupon made an inquiry which led to this colloquy :

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. "Came from the Secretary of State." Do I understand you to mean signed by him?

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I am not anxious upon that part of it, sir. I am content with the question as it stands.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice conceives that the question in the form in which it is put is not objectionable, but—

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I will put it, then, with the leave of the Chief Justice.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice was about to proceed to say that if it is intended to ask the question whether these documents of which a list is furnished were signed by the Secretary, then he thinks it is clearly incompetent without producing them.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. Under favor, Mr. President, I have no list of these documents; none has been furnished.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Does not the question relate to the list which has been furnished?

Mr. Manager BUTLER. It relates to the people whose names have been put upon the list; but I have no list of the documents at all. I have only a list of the facts that such appointments were made, but I have no list of the letters, whether they came from the President or from the Secretary or from anybody else.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. In the form in which the question is put the Chief Justice thinks it is not objectionable. If any Senator desires to have the question taken by the Senate, he will put it to the Senate. [To the managers, no Senator speaking.] You can put the question in the form proposed.

Mr. Manager BUTLER (to the witness). State whether any of the letters of authority which you have mentioned came from the Secretary of State, or from what other officer.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the witness is not to answer by whom they were sent.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I believe I have this witness.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice will instruct the witness. [To the witness.] You are not to answer at present by whom these documents were signed. You may say from whom they came.

2227. On July 10, 1876,<sup>10</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Gen. William B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, counsel for the respondent. The witness testified that he had proposed in a letter to Mr. James A. Garfield, a Member of the House of Representatives, to give information as to post traders, and as a result had been subpoenaed before the Military Committee in 1872. He also testified as to writing letters to the Secretary of War, General Belknap. Then Mr. Carpenter asked:

Q. Do you recollect a long letter to General Belknap dated September 12, 1875?

Witness replied that he did.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter proposed to ask:

Do you recollect using these words, or substantially these words, in that letter to General Belknap, namely: "I was summoned to Washington to give evidence upon staff organization of the French and German armies. After finishing upon these subjects I was questioned upon the subject of post traders. I at first remonstrated, on the ground that I had not reported the matter to you" (that is, the Secretary), "because I believed the Commissary Department would defeat any action in that direction?"

Mr. Manager John A. McMahan objected, saying:

You have no right to cross-examine him in regard to the contents of a letter without submitting it to him. * * * If you say it is a memorandum of a letter that was destroyed, no matter; but if you claim to have the letter you can not cross-examine him on it without putting it in his hand.

We make objection, Mr. President and Senators, to the witness being asked any question as to the contents of a letter which the counsel apparently holds in his hand. If he does not have it, the objection at any rate goes to the point that it having been addressed to the defendant, the counsel must first show it to have been destroyed.

The question being submitted, the Senate, without division, excluded the question.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, if the Senate will pardon me just a moment, I did not state the ground of the question, because I thought it was apparent. The witness has just sworn to a totally different state of facts; that he came here on subpoena and was examined on this matter in obedience to the subpoena. On cross-examination we got from him the fact that he wrote a letter to General Garfield from his post. Now, here is a letter, or at least I am inquiring of him now if he did not write to General Beiknap, on the 12th of September, 1875, a totally different account of that transaction. * * * Senators will recollect that this witness testified here that he gave testimony before the House Military Committee, because he thought if he conferred directly with the Secretary of War he would not pay any attention to it. He then swears he did write a letter and sent it through the regular military channels, communicating everything to General Belknap that he swore to before the committee. In this letter, of which I now question him, he writes, as we claim and offer to prove by him, that he did not report the matter to the Secretary for the reason that he knew the Commissary Department would not permit it to be done.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, said: "The letter will show," to which Mr. Carpenter replied: "The letter I do not propose to give in evidence."

Objection being made to this debate, Mr. John H. Mitchell, a Senator from Oregon, moved to reconsider the vote whereby the evidence had been excluded.

Thereupon Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, argued:

It seems to me that the ruling of the Senate is made upon a rare misconception of the question submitted by my colleague in this case. Here is a witness upon the stand who testifies that he wrote a certain letter to the Secretary of War, semiofficial or official, he does not know which, communicating facts in relation to abuses prevailing at these trading posts in the Indian country, and that the reason why he did not go to the Secretary of War rather than go before the Military Committee to testify about these abuses was that he had written such a letter and that it had received no attention. Now, we want to ask him—and it is perfectly competent; no lawyer I think will deny the competency of it—whether he had not stated to another person on another occasion directly the contrary of that, stating the person and the time, leaving us the liberty of calling in that person, of calling for that letter, and showing that he is here stultifying himself and falsifying himself. * * * I said that I believed every lawyer in this body would recognize the principle that it was perfectly competent to ask a witness whether or not he had on a different occasion given a different account of the same subject than that he now offers. * * * I have not investigated the subject fully; but it seems to me perfectly plain that a party may be called upon to say whether he had not at a different time to a different person made a different statement; and this letter falls entirely within the common practice of showing that a witness had made on a different occasion a different statement in regard to the same subject matter.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

I think the Senate will discover that a while ago when I interrupted the witness when the contents of a letter were stated to him, I was right in regard to the law. I read now from an elementary book, Greenleaf on Evidence:

"§ 463. A similar principle prevails in cross-examining a witness as to the contents of a letter or other paper written by him. The counsel will not be permitted to represent, in the statement of a question, the contents of a letter, and to ask the witness whether he wrote a letter to any person with such contents, or contents to the like effect, without having first shown to the witness the letter, and having asked him whether he wrote that letter, and his admitting that he wrote it. For the contents of every written paper, according to the ordinary and well-established rules of evidence, are to be proved by the paper itself, and by that alone, if it is in existence."

That is very simple; and I was right a while ago, notwithstanding the overpowering weight of the gentlemen on the other side.

The Senate, without division, disagreed to the motion to reconsider.

2228. On July 12, 1876,<sup>20</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Nelson H. Davis, Inspector-General of the Army, was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and was asked this question by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent :

Q. Were you instructed by General Belknap as Secretary of War at any time to investigate into the standing and character of Durfee & Peck?

Durfee had been partner of one Evans, who was alleged to have been corruptly appointed post trader at Fort Sill by the respondent, and Mr. Carpenter explained the purpose of the question :

Mr. Durfee was Evans's partner, and Mr. Evans informed the Secretary of War of that fact. The Secretary of War had his suspicion that Durfee & Peck or Durfee himself was not the proper man to be appointed, and we propose to show that he ordered this witness to proceed there and inquire into the matter; that he did inquire into it, not at that particular post, but as to these men, and it was in consequence of that that Mr. Evans, who, it was understood, would go into company with Durfee if he was appointed, was not at that time appointed. Afterwards he did not form that partnership, and he was appointed without objection.

Mr. Manager McMahan objected to the question, saying that it was first desirable to know whether the instructions were written or verbal.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter waived the question, and asked of witness :

Did you investigate?

Mr. Manager McMahan objected on the ground that the matter was all of record, and hence that the record would be the best evidence.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the journal and record of trial show that the objection was overruled without division, but no record of an answer by the witness appears, and Mr. Carpenter at once proceeded to another matter, as if the question had been excluded.

2229. On July 12, 1876,<sup>21</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Maj. Gen. John Pope was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and testified as to applications on the part of the post trader at Fort Sill for permits to sell liquor. The witness described the usual way in which such permits were forwarded to the War Department, and then Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked :

Do you know any instance while General Belknap was Secretary of War, in which he overruled recommendations of the officers through whose hands the application had come?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahan objected, saying :

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the record ought to settle that question. Everything goes officially through the departments and the action of the Secretary of War upon it, favorable or unfavorable, ought to be proved by the record and not by the mere recollection of a witness who has had so many other transactions.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the objection was sustained without objection.

Very soon after Mr. Carpenter asked, and the witness began to answer, as follows :

Q. Do you recollect any applications in regard to licenses for selling liquor at Fort Sill while General Belknap was Secretary of War?—A. I remember an application, simply because I had occasion to look it up recently, that the officers at Fort Sill—

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

We object to this. The witness himself discloses the fact that he remembers it because he has recently seen the official documents. Now, I say that the official documents must be produced.

The President pro tempore <sup>22</sup> said :

The manager took exception that the record should be produced, and on the prior ruling of the Senate the Chair ruled that the objection was well taken. If the counsel prefers, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

No request was made that the question be submitted, and the examination proceeded : <sup>23</sup>

Q. (By Mr. Carpenter.) Do you know anything of the extension of the reservation about Fort Sill, and when it took place?—A. Fort Sill was a post established at the time I took command of the department. My predecessor in command, General Schofield, was written to from the War Department, I think, directing him to take some steps to have the reservation extended and properly surveyed—

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, saying :

I am obliged again to say that all these are matters of record. The gentleman has a client who understands all about getting copies of them, who is thoroughly informed, and we must certainly object to having oral testimony as to what is matter of record.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection.

In relation to these decisions, Mr. Carpenter said :

General Pope is very anxious to get away from here and get back to his post, and we are willing to accommodate in every way to reach that result ; but if the managers are to pursue the present captious course of objection and require these documents to be produced, they have got to be looked up in the Department, and General Pope will have to stay and swear in view of them ; and after Mr. Evans arrives we shall then want him also in regard to two or three points that we can not inquire of now. * * * What I have spoken of now are these very matters that were covered by the questions that you objected we must get the records here to show. General Pope knows just as much about the matter without looking through forty pages as he will after he does that ; but still the Senate has sustained the objection ; and if you insist on it General Pope must remain. That is all.

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

We certainly must try the case according to the rules of evidence. We want to see the records themselves.

2230. In the Swayne trial hearsay testimony introduced to show inconvenience to litigants from respondent's conduct was ruled out.

Instance during the Swayne trial, wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 13, 1905,<sup>24</sup> in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, John S. Beard was sworn and examined.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, asked :

Have you ever heard complaints made by counsel of inconvenience in their practice by reason of the absence of Judge Swayne from Florida?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for respondent, objected, saying :

We object to asking for hearsay testimony. If there are any such cases, the attorneys themselves are within call, and the honorable manager is asking this witness to state nothing more than what some other attorney may have said.

Mr. Manager Perkins said :

Well, Mr. President, how else can the matter of common reputation be proven? The answer of Judge Swayne it seems to us is immaterial. The law requires that he shall live in the district, and if he was not a resident it was a high misdemeanor. But in his answer it is alleged by way of palliation that he does not think inconvenience resulted to the bar. That we can only meet by evidence of this character.

The Presiding Officer <sup>25</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer will submit this question to the Senate. The manager asks the witness, having first inquired who were the lawyers who did most of the business before the district court, if this witness had heard them complain of inconvenience growing out of the absence of Judge Swayne. Objection is made. The Presiding Officer will submit that question to the Senate. Senators who think the question is a proper one will say "aye" [putting the question]; contrary, "no." In the opinion of the Chair the "noes" have it. The objection is sustained.

2231. Testimony as to what was said by the agent or coconspirator of respondent in regard to carrying out respondent's order, the said order being a ground of the impeachment, was admitted. Instance wherein the Chief Justice ruled on the admissibility of evidence during the Johnson trial.

On March 31, 1868,<sup>26</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate in Congress from Dakota Territory, was sworn, and the examination was begun by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler. Mr. Burleigh testified that he had known Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, for several years, and that he had called on General Thomas at his house on the evening of February 21 last, and had a conversation with him.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Butler asked a question which, on the succeeding day, was reduced to writing as follows :

You said yesterday, in answer to my question, that you had a conversation with Gen. Lorenzo Thomas on the evening of the 21st of February last. State if he said anything as to the means by which he intended to obtain, or was directed by the President to obtain, possession of the War Department? If so, state all he said as nearly as you can.

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, objected to the question. In making his objection, Mr. Stanbery first reviewed the orders issued by the President to Mr. Secretary Stanton and to General Thomas, and continues :

Now, what proof has yet been made under the first eight articles? The proof is simply, so far as this question is concerned, the production in evidence of the orders themselves. There they are to speak for themselves. As yet we have not had one particle of proof of what was said by the President, either before or after he gave those orders or at the time that he gave those orders—not one word. The only foundation now laid for the introduction of this testimony is the production of the orders themselves. The attempt made here is, by the declarations of General Thomas, to show with what intent the President issued those orders; not by producing him here to testify what the President told him, but without having him, sworn at all, to bind the President by his declarations not made under oath; made without the possibility of cross-examination or contradiction by the President himself; made as though they are made by the authority of the President.

Now, Senators, what foundation is laid to show such authority, given by the President to General Thomas, to speak for him as to his intent, or even as to General Thomas's intent, which is quite another question. You must find the foundation in the orders themselves, for as yet you have no other place to look for it. Now, what are these orders? That issued to General Thomas is the most material one; but, that I may take the whole, I will read also that issued and directed to Mr. Stanton himself. He says to Mr. Stanton, by his order of February 21, 1868:

"SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication.

"You will transfer to Brevet Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge."

So much for that. Then the order to General Thomas of the same day is:

"SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

"Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Brevet Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,
"Adjutant-General U.S. Army, Washington, D.C."

There they are; they speak for themselves; orders made by the President to two of his subordinates; an order directing one of them to vacate his office and to transfer the books and public property in his possession to another party, and the order to that other party to take possession of the office, receive a transfer of the books, and act as Secretary of War ad interim. Gentlemen, does that make them conspirators? Is that proof of a conspiracy or tending to have a conspiracy? Does that make General Thomas an agent of the President in such a sense as that the President is to be bound by everything he says and everything he does even within the scope of his agency?

Mr. Stanbery argued at length to show that General Thomas was an officer of the Government performing his duty under order of a superior officer, and in no sense an agent. Furthermore, he argued that no foundation had been laid for the introduction of such testimony.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, replying, gave a brief résumé of the actions of the President in relation to Secretary of War Stanton:

He had come to the conclusion to violate the law and take possession of the War Office; he had come to the conclusion to do that against the law and in violation of the law; he had sent for Thomas, and Thomas had agreed with him to do that by some means if the President would give him the order, and thus we have the agreement between two minds to do an unlawful act; and that, I believe, is the definition of a conspiracy all over the world.

Let me restate this. You have the determination on the part of the President to do what had been declared to be, and is, an unlawful act; you have Thomas consenting; and you have therefore an agreement of two minds to do an unlawful act; and that makes a conspiracy, so far as I understand the law of conspiracy. So that upon that conspiracy we should rest this evidence under article seven, which alleges that—

"Andrew Johnson * * * did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, with intent unlawfully to seize, take, and possess the property of the United States in the Department of War in the custody and charge of Edwin M. Stanton."

And also under article five, which alleges a like unlawful conspiracy not alleging that intent.

Then there is another ground upon which this evidence is admissible, and that is upon the ground of principal and agent. Let us, if you please, examine that ground for a few moments. The President claims by his answer here that every Secretary, every Attorney-General, every executive officer of this Government exists by his will, upon his breath only; that they are all his servants only, and are responsible to him alone, not to the Senate or Congress or either branch of Congress; and he may remove them for such cause as he chooses; he appoints them for such cause as he chooses; and he claims this right to be illimitable and uncontrollable, and he says in his message to you of December 12, 1867, that if any one of his Secretaries had said to him that he would not agree with him upon the unconstitutionality of the act of March 2, 1867, he would have turned him out at once.

Mr. Butler cited as authorities Roscoe's Criminal Evidence (2 Carington and Payne, p. 232), United States v. Goding (12 Wheaton, pp. 469, 470), and Greenleaf on Evidence.

These arguments as outlined were further amplified by Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the President, and by Mr. Manager John A. Bingham.

And the question being put to the Senate, it was decided, yeas 39, nays 11, that the question proposed by Mr. Manager Butler should be put to the witness.

2232. On March 31, 1868,<sup>27</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, was sworn and examined as to a certain visit which he made to the house of Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, of the Army.

The witness having testified that he saw General Thomas at the time of that visit, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler asked:

Had you a conversation with him?

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked the object of the question, to which Mr. Butler replied:

The object is to show the intent and purpose with which General Thomas went to the War Department on the morning of the 22d of February; that he went with the intent and purpose of taking possession by force; that he alleged that intent and purpose; that in consequence of that allegation Mr. Burleigh invited General Moorhead and went up to the War Office. The conversation which I expect to prove is this: After the President of the United States had appointed General Thomas and given him directions to take the War Office, and after he had made a quiet visit there on the 21st, on the evening of the 21st he told Mr. Burleigh that the next day he was going to take possession by force.

Mr. Stanbery<sup>28</sup> thereupon entered an objection.

The Chief Justice<sup>29</sup> said:

The Chief Justice thinks the testimony is competent.

Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, after the said Thomas had been ordered by President Johnson to supersede Secretary of War Stanton and take possession of the office.

Then Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler offered this question :

Question. Shortly before this conversation about which you have testified, and after the President restored Major-General Thomas to the office of Adjutant-General, if you know the fact that he was so restored, were you present in the War Department, and did you hear Thomas make any statements to the officers and clerks, or either of them, belonging to the War Office, as to the rules and orders of Mr. Stanton or of the office which he, Thomas, would revoke, relax, or rescind in favor of such officers and employees when he had control of the affairs therein? If so, state as near as you can when it was such conversation occurred, and state all he said as nearly as you can.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected to the question as irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in the cause, and as not to be brought in evidence against the President by any support given by the testimony already in.

Mr. Manager Butler argued that the question was justified, because General Thomas was a coconspirator with the President :

You will observe the question carries with it this state of facts: Thomas had been removed from the office of Adjutant-General, for many years under President Lincoln, under the administration of Mr. Stanton, of the War Office. That is a fact known to all men who know the history of the war. Just before he made him Secretary of War ad interim the President restored Thomas to the War Office as the Adjutant-General of the Army. That was the first step to get him in condition to make a Secretary of War of him. That was the first performance of the President, the first act in the drama. He had to take a disgraced officer, and take away his disgrace, and put him into the Adjutant-General's office, from which he had been by the action of President Lincoln and Mr. Stanton suspended for years, in order to get a fit instrument on which to operate; get him in condition. That was part of the training for the next stage. Having got him in that condition, he being sufficiently virulent toward Mr. Stanton for having suspended him from the office of Adjutant-General, the President then is ready to appoint him Secretary ad interim, which he does within two or three days thereafter. We charge that the whole procedure shows the conspiracy.

To this Mr. Evarts replied :

The question which led to the introduction of this witness's statements of General Thomas's statements to him, of his intentions, and of the President's instructions to him, General Thomas, was based upon the claim that the order of the President of the 21st of February, upon Mr. Stanton for removal, and upon General Thomas to take possession of the office, created and proved a conspiracy; and that thereafter, upon that proof, declarations and intentions were to be given in evidence. That step has been gained, and, in the judgment of this honorable court, in conformity with the rules of law and of evidence. That being gained, it is similarly argued that if, on a conspiracy proved, you can introduce declarations made thereafter, by the same rule you can introduce declarations made theretofore; and that is the only argument which is presented to the court for the admission of this evidence.

So far as the statements of the learned manager relate to the office, the position, the character, and the conduct of General Thomas, it is sufficient for me to say that not one particle of evidence has been given in this cause bearing upon any one of these topics. If General Thomas has been a disgraced officer; if these aspersions, these revilings are just, they are not justified by any evidence before this court. And if, as a matter of fact, applicable to the situation upon which this proof is sought to be introduced, the former employments of General Thomas and the recent restoration of him to the active duties of Adjutant-General are pertinent, let them be proved; and then we shall have at least the basis of fact of General Thomas's previous relations to the War Department, to Mr. Stanton, and to the office of Adjutant-General.

And, now, having pointed out to this honorable court that the declarations sought to be given in evidence of General Thomas to affect the President with his intentions are confessedly of a period antecedent to the date to which any evidence whatever before this court brings the President and General Thomas in connection, I might leave it safely there. But what is there in the nature of the general proof sought to be introduced that should affect the President of the United States with any responsibility for these general and vague statements of an officer of what he might or could or would do, if thereafter he should come into the possession of power over the Department?

At the end of the debate the Chief Justice<sup>31</sup> said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that no sufficient foundation has been laid for the introduction of this testimony. He will submit the question to the Senate with great pleasure, if any Senator desires it. The question is ruled to be inadmissible.

Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, a Senator, asked that the question be taken by the Senate; and being put, Shall the question proposed by Mr. Manager Butler be put to the witness? the yeas were 28 and the nays 22.

So the question was put.

2234. An alleged coconspirator was permitted to testify as to declarations of the respondent at a time after the act, the testimony being responsive to similar evidence on the other side.— On April 10, 1868,<sup>32</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, was called as a witness on behalf of the President, and related the circumstances which occurred on February 21, 1868, when, in obedience to the direction of the President, he attempted to supersede Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War.

General Thomas having described his interview with Secretary Stanton, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, proceeded with the examination:

Q. Did you see the President after that interview?—A. I did.

Q. What took place?

At this point Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler interposed an objection, as follows:

I object now, Mr. President and Senators, to the conversation between the President and General Thomas. Up to this time I did not object, as you observe, upon reflection, to any orders or directions which the President gave, or any conversation had between the President and General Thomas at the time of issuing the commission. But now the commission has been issued; the demand has been made; it has been refused; and a peremptory order given to General Thomas to mind his own business and keep out of the War Office has been put in evidence. Now, I suppose that the President, by talking with General Thomas, or General Thomas, by talking with the President, can not put in his own declarations for the purpose of making evidence in favor of himself. The Senate has already ruled by solemn vote, and in consonance, I believe, with the opinion of the Presiding Officer, that there were such evidence of common intent between these two parties as to allow us to put in the acts of each to bear upon the other; but I challenge any authority that can be shown anywhere that, in trying a man for an act before any tribunal, whether a judicial court or any other body of triers, testimony can be given of what the respondent said in his own behalf, and especially to his servant, and a fortiori to his coconspirator. A conspiracy being alleged, can it be that the President of the United States can call up any officer of the Army, and, by talking to him after the act has been done, justify the act which has been done?

Replying to this objection, Mr. Stanbery said:

But, says the learned manager, the transaction ended in giving the order and receiving the order, and you are to have no testimony of what was said by the

President or General Thomas, except what was said just then, because that was the transaction; that was the res gestae. Does the learned gentleman forget his testimony? Does he forget how he attempted to make a case? Does he forget, not what took place in the afternoon between the President and General Thomas that we are now going into, but what took place that night? Does he forget what sort of a case he attempts to make against the President, not at the time when that order was given, nor before it was given, nor in the afternoon of the 21st, but under his conspiracy counts, the managers have undertaken to give in evidence that on the night of the 21st General Thomas declared that he was going to enter the War Office by force?

That is the matter charged as illegal; and the articles say that the conspiracy between General Thomas and the President was that the order should be executed by the exhibition of force, intimidation, and threats, and to prove that what has he got here? The declarations of General Thomas, not made under oath, as we propose to have them made, but his mere declarations, when the President was absent and could not contradict him—not, as now, under oath, and all the conversation when the President was present and could contradict or might admit. The honorable manager has gone into all that to make a case against the President of conspiracy; and not merely that, but proves the acts and declarations of General Thomas on the 22d; and not only that, but as late at the 9th of March, at the presidential level, brings a witness, with the eyes of all Delaware upon him [laughter], and proves by that witness, or thinks he has proved, that on that night General Thomas also made a declaration involving the President in this conspiracy, as a party to a conspiracy still existing to keep Mr. Stanton out of office.

Now, how are we to defend against these declarations made on the night of the 21st or the 22d, and again as late as the 9th of March? Does not the transaction run through all that time? How is the President to defend himself if he is allowed to introduce no proof of what he said to General Thomas after the date of the order? May he not call General Thomas? Is General Thomas impeached here as a coconspirator? Is his mouth shut by a prosecution? Not at all. He is free as a witness—brought here and sworn. Now, what better testimony can we have to contradict this alleged conspiracy than the testimony of one of the alleged conspirators; for if General Thomas did not conspire certainly the President did not conspire. A man can not conspire by himself.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared 42 yeas, 10 nays. So the question was admitted.

Later, in the examination of the same witness,<sup>33</sup> Mr. Stanbery asked this question:

Did the President at any time prior to or including the 9th of March authorize or direct you to use force, intimidation, or threats to get possession of the War Office?

Mr. Manager Butler objected to the introduction of such testimony. He said that the President had been impeached on February 22, and what directions he had given after that event were not to be a subject of testimony.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, contended that, as the managers had introduced witnesses to prove what General Thomas said on March 9, it was competent to introduce evidence as to what the President had actually done.

The Senate, without division, admitted the question.

2235. In general during impeachment trials questions as to conversations with third parties, not in presence of respondent, have been excluded from evidence.—On March 8, 1803,<sup>34</sup> in the high court of impeachment during the trial of John Pickering, judge of the United States district court of New Hampshire, Mr. Jonathan

Steele was testifying, when Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, addressed the court. He said he wished in case it should be deemed proper by the court, to ask one of the witnesses whether he had conversed with the family physician of Judge Pickering, and what his opinion was as to the origination of his insanity. Mr. Nicholson observed that he had doubts of the propriety of this question, and therefore, in the first instance, stated it to the court.

The court decided the question inadmissible.

Later, on the same day, this witness, in the course of his testimony, was going on to state some conversation he had with Judge Pickering's physician at this time which he was induced to ask in consequence of solicitude to gain true information as to the reported intemperance of the Judge, when he was interrupted by the Court,<sup>55</sup> and informed that this species of testimony had been already decided to be inadmissible.

2236. On July 10, 1876,<sup>56</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh was called as a witness for the United States. It was alleged in the articles of impeachment that Marsh, in collusion with the respondent, had effected the appointment of one Evans as post trader at Fort Sill, and that in consideration thereof Marsh had received from Evans certain sums of money which had been shared with the respondent. The witness being examined as to a contract between himself and Evans as to the payment of the above-mentioned sums of money, identified a paper presented to him as that contract. Then these questions were put and answered:

Q. Did Mr. Evans sign that paper with you?—A. He did.

Q. This agreement was reduced to writing in New York City. State whether it was agreed to before it was reduced to writing, and, if so, where. In other words, whether you came to any understanding in Washington before you went to New York City.—A. We came to an understanding as to the amount he was willing to pay, if I would allow him to hold the post and continue the business at Fort Sill.

Q. In that connection, without further questions, give us all that passed between you and Mr. Evans prior to the execution of this contract.

To the last question Mr. Matt. S. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

The Senate, of course, will observe that this calls for a conversation between the witness and a third person, not in our presence, with no pretense that we know anything about it.

The President pro tempore said:

The question is on the admission of the interrogatory.

The question was decided in the negative.

Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill. Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, proposed this question :

Prior to the sending of the first money, had you said anything to any person or had any person ever said anything to you on the subject of sending money to General Belknap ; if so, who was it ?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, but the Senate without division decided that it might be asked.

The witness replied that he had had a conversation with the present Mrs. Belknap. It was before he had sent any money to respondent, but he had sent money to her.

Thereupon Mr. Logan asked :

State what the conversation was.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected to the interrogatory, saying :

Even if General Belknap was present, while we might have called it as against him, he can not produce it as in his favor. It is the conversation of a third party. * * * Before the vote is taken, Senators, I desire that all shall understand the precise conversation now called for. It is a conversation between the witness and the present Mrs. Belknap, occurring on the night of the funeral of the second Mrs. Belknap, between the witness and her, not in the presence of General Belknap ; a conversation between the two persons on that occasion. Clearly it seems to me the defendant is not at liberty to produce that conversation in his behalf.

The question being taken on the admissibility of the question, there appeared yeas 18, nays 23. So the objection was sustained.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, a Senator from Massachusetts, then proposed this question :

State all the knowledge or information that General Belknap had, which it is in your power to state, as to the amount of any money sent him or the source whence it came, other than what you have already stated.

Mr. Carpenter having objected, the Senate without division admitted the question.

Mr. John A. Logan proposed this question :

Did you have any agreement with any person other than General Belknap in reference to sending the money you have testified to or any part of it? If so, with whom was such agreement and what was such agreement?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, and Mr. Manager Elbridge G. Lapham said :

Our objection is that this calls for a conversation with a third person, and is the precise question upon which the Senate has already passed. The witness having stated expressly that he had no conversation with the defendant, the question calls for some express conversation, some expression, agreement, or understanding, and not for an implied or inferential understanding from the acts of the parties.

After argument by managers and counsel, Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, a Senator from New Jersey, said :

As I understand it, the court, exercising its privilege and against the objection of the respondent, permitted it to be proven that there was a conversation which had relation in some manner to these payments. I think it is the right of the respondent that that conversation should now be given. It was the court, not the respondent, who introduced the fact that there was such conversation that had relation to these payments. I do not think we can fairly exclude the conversation.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, dissented from the law of the proposition made by Mr. Frelinghuysen.

The Senate, by a vote of 25 yeas, 21 nays, admitted the question. The witness answered :

I had a conversation with Mrs. Bower, the present Mrs. Belknap, on the night of the funeral. She asked me to go upstairs with her to look at the baby in the nursery. I said to her, as near as I can remember, "This child will have money coming to it after a while." She said, "Yes; my sister gave the child to me, and told me the money coming from you I must take and keep for it." I am not certain about the rest of the conversation. I have an indistinct impression of what was said afterwards. I said, very likely, "All right; but perhaps the father ought to be consulted," and her reply was that if I sent the money to him she would get it any way for the child, or something of that kind. That is as far as I remember it; but I had some understanding; I have sometimes thought that I said something to General Belknap that night. My entire recollection is indistinct about the matter, except her relation of her sister's dying request made an impression on me more than any other part of the conversation.

2238. In the Johnson trial declarations of respondent, made anterior to the act, and even concomitant with it, were held inadmissible as evidence.

Instance wherein a decision of the Chief Justice as to the admissibility of evidence was overruled by the Senate.

The Senate, in the Johnson trial, declined to exclude evidence as to fact on the ground that it might lead to evidence as to declaration.

Leading questions were ruled out during the Johnson trial.

Citation of English precedents as to evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 11, 1868,<sup>38</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was called as a witness on behalf of the President. The witness had testified that between December 4, 1867, and February 4, 1868, he had several interviews with the President relating to Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War. Thereupon Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asking as to a certain specified interview, propounded this question :

In that interview, what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the question.

The Chief Justice<sup>39</sup> said at once, before argument :

The Chief Justice thinks the question admissible within the principle of the decision made by the Senate relating to a conversation between General Thomas and the President;<sup>40</sup> but he will put the question to the Senate, if any Senator desires it.

The managers, having persisted in objection, an argument arose, Mr. Stanbery saying :

When a prosecution is allowed to raise the presumption of guilt from the intent of the accused by proving circumstances which raised that presumption against him, may he not rebut it by proof of other circumstances which show that he could not have had such a criminal intent? Was anything ever plainer than that?

Why, consider what a latitude one charged with crime is allowed under such circumstances. Take the case of a man charged with passing counterfeit money. You must prove his intent; you must prove his scienter; you must prove circumstances from which a presumption arises; did he know the bill was counterfeit? You may prove that he had been told so; prove that he had seen other money of the same kind, and raise the intent in that way. Even when you make such proof against him arising from presumptions, how may he rebut that presumption of intent from circumstances proved against him? In the first place, by the most general of all presumptions—proof of good character generally. That he is allowed to do to rebut a presumption—the most general of all presumptions—not that he did what was right in that transaction, not that he did certain things or made certain declarations about the same time which explained that the intent was honest, but going beyond that through the whole field of presumptions, for it is all open to him, he may rebut the presumption arising from proof of express facts by the proof of general good character, raising the presumption that he is not a man who would have such an intent. * * * Now, what evidence is a defendant entitled to whom is charged with crime where it is necessary to make out an intent against him where the intent is not positively proved by his own declarations, but where the intent to be gathered by proof of other facts, which may be guilty or indifferent, according to the intent? What proof is allowed against him to raise this presumption of intent? Proof of those facts from which the mind itself infers a guilty intention. But while the prosecution may make such a case against him by such testimony, may he not rebut the case by exactly the same sort of testimony? It is a declaration that they rely upon as made by him at one time, may he not meet it by declarations made about the same time with regard to the same transaction? Undoubtedly. They cannot be too remote. I admit that; but if they are about the time, if they are connected with the transaction, if they do not appear to have been manufactured, then the declarations of the defendants, from which the inference of innocence would be presumed, are, under reasonable limitations, just as admissible as the declarations of the defendant from which the prosecution has attempted to deduce the inference of criminal purpose.

Mr. Stanbery proceeded to cite from the State trials, p. 1065, the trial of Hardy.

Replying, Mr. Manager Butler said:

The learned gentleman from Ohio says what? He says "in a counterfeiter's case we have to prove the scienter." Yes, true; and how? By showing the passage of other counterfeit bills? Yes; but, gentleman, did you ever hear, in a case of counterfeiting, the counterfeiter prove that he did not know the bill was bad by proving that at some other time he passed a good bill? Is not that the proposition? Why try the counterfeit bill, which we have nailed to the counter, of the 21st of February; and, in order to prove that he did not issue it, he wants to show that he passed a good bill on the 14th of January. It does take a lawyer to understand that. That is the proposition.

We prove that a counterfeiter passed a bad bill—I am following the illustration of my learned opponent. Having proved that he passed a bad bill, what is the evidence he proposes? That at some other time he told somebody else, a good man, that he would not pass bad money, to give it the strongest form; and you are asked to vote it on that reason. I take the illustration. Is there any authority brought for that? No.

What is the next ground? The next is that it is in order to show Andrew Johnson's good character. If they will put that in testimony I will open the door widely. We shall have no objection whenever they offer that. I will take all that is said of him by all good and loyal men, whether for probity, patriotism, or any other matter that they choose to put in issue. But how do they propose to prove good character? By showing what he said to a gentleman. Did you ever hear of good character, lawyers of the Senate? Laymen of the Senate, did you ever a good character proved in that way? A man's character is in issue. Does he call up one of his neighbors and ask what the man told him about his character? No; the general speech of people in the community, what was publicly known and said of him, is the point, and upon that went Hardy's case.

* * * * *
But, then, look at the vehicle of proof. What is the vehicle of proof? They do not propose to prove it by his acts. When they are offered, I shall be willing to let them go in. Let them offer any act of the President about that time, either prior or since, and I shall not object, although the Senate ruled out an act in Cooper's case. But how do they propose to prove it? "What conversations took place between the President and you?" I agree, gentlemen of the Senate—I repeat it even after the criticisms that have been made—that you are a law unto yourselves. You have a right to receive or reject any testimony. All the common law can do for you is, that being the accumulation of the experience of thousands of years of trial, it may afford some guide to you; but you can override it. You have no right, however, to override the principles of justice and equity, and to allow the case of the people of the United States to be prejudiced by the conversations of the criminal they present at your bar, made in his own defense before the acts done, which the people complain of. That I may, I trust, without offense say, because there is a law that must govern us at any and all times, and the single question is—I did not mean to trouble the Senate with it before, and never will again on this question of conversation—what limit is there? If this is allowable, you may put in his conversations with everybody; you may put in his conversations with newspaper reporters—and he is very free with those, if we are to believe the newspapers. If he has a right to converse with General Sherman about this case and put that in, I do not see why he has not a right to converse with Mack, and John, and Joe, and J.B., and J.B.S., and T.R.S., and X.L.W., or whoever he may talk with, and put all that in.

I take it that is no law which makes a conversation with General Sherman any more competent than a conversation with any other man.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of the President's counsel, said :

And now I should like to look first to the question of the point of time as bearing upon the admissibility of this evidence. Under the eleventh article, the speech of the 18th of August, 1866, is alleged as laying the foundation of the illegal purposes that culminated in 1868, to point the criminality, that is what made the subject of accusation in that article. Proof, then, of the speeches of 1866 is made evidence under this article eleven, that imputes not criminality in making the speech, but in the action afterwards pointed by the purpose of the speech. So, too, a telegram to Governor Parsons, in January, 1867, is supposed to be evidence as bearing upon the guilt completed in the year 1868.

So, too, the interview between Wood, the office seeker, and the President of the United States, in September, 1866, is supposed to bear in evidence upon the question of intent in the consummation of the crime alleged to have been completed in 1868. I apprehend therefore that on the question of time this interview between General Sherman and the President of the United States, in the very matter of the public transaction of the President of the United States changing the head of the War Department, which was actually completed in February, 1868, is near enough to point intent and to show honest purpose, if these transactions, thus in evidence, are near enough to bear upon the same attributed crimes.

There remains, then, only this consideration, whether it is open to the imputation that it is a mere proof of declarations of the President concerning what his motives and objects were in reference to his subsequent act in the removal of Stanton. It certainly is not limited to that force or effect. Whenever evidence of that mere character is offered that question will arise to be disposed of; but as a part of the public action and conduct of the President of the United States in reference to this very office, and his duty and purpose in dealing with it, and on the very point, too, as to whether that object was to fill it by unwarrantable characters tending to a perversion or betrayal of the public trust, we propose to show his consultations with the Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States to induce him to take the place.

On the other question of whether his efforts are to create by violence a civil war or bloodshed, or even a breach of the peace, in the removal of the Secretary of War, we show that in this same consultation it was his desire that the Lieutenant-General should take the place in order that by that means the opportunity might be given to decide the differences between the Executive and Congress as to the constitutional powers of the former by the courts of law. If the conduct of the President in relation to matters that are made the subject of inculcation, and of inculcation through motives attributed through designs supposed to be proved, can not be made the subject of evidence, if his public action, if his public conduct, if the efforts and the means that he used in the selection of agents are not to be received to rebut the intentions or presumptions that are sought to be raised against him, well, indeed, was my learned associate justified in saying that this is a vital question. Vital in the interests of justice, I mean, rather than vital to any important considerations of the cause.

Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, quoted the Hardy case, over which a dispute had arisen :

My principal purpose is to get before the minds of Senators the truth in the Hardy case as it fell from the lips of the Chief Justice, when he passed upon the question which had been propounded by Mr. Erskine and objected to by the attorney-general. The ruling is in these words :

"LORD CHIEF JUSTICE EYRE. Mr. Erskine, I do not know whether you can be content to acquiesce in the opinion that we are inclined to form upon the subject, in which we go a certain way with you. Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is, that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself. Those declarations, if offered as evidence, would be offered therefore upon no ground which entitled them to credit. That is the general rule. But if the question be—as I really think it is in this case, which is my reason now for interposing—if the question be, what was the political speculative opinion which this man entertained touching a reform of Parliament, I believe we all think that opinion may very well be learned and discovered by the conversations which he has held at any time or in any place.

"MR. ERSKINE Just so, that is my question; only that I may not get into another debate, I beg your lordship will hear me a few words.

"LORD CHIEF JUSTICE EYRE. I think I have already anticipated a misapprehension of what I am now stating, by saying that if the declaration was meant to apply to a disavowal of the particular charge made against this man that declaration could not be received; as for instance, if he had said to some friend of his: When I planned this convention, I did not mean to use this convention to destroy the king and his Government, but I did mean to get, by means of this convention, the Duke of Richmond's plan of reform, that would fall within the rule I first laid down; that would be a declaration, which being for him, he could not be admitted to make, though the law will allow a contrary declaration to have been given in evidence. Now, if you take it so, I believe there is no difficulty."

And upon that ruling the question was changed as read by my associate manager, and correctly read by him, and all that followed this ruling of the chief justice and the subsequent discussion was read by my associate manager. The lord chief justice further said :

"You may put the question exactly as you propose."

That is, after discussion had occurred subsequent to the ruling of the chief justice to which I have referred, and in which a change in the character of the original question was disclosed.

"I confess I wished by interposing to avoid all discussion, because I consider what we are doing, and whom we have at that bar, and in that box, who are suffering by every moment's unnecessary delay in such a cause as this.

"MR. ERSKINE. I am sure the jury will excuse it; I meant to set myself right at this bar: this is a very public place."

Then follows the question—

"MR. DANIEL STUART examined by Mr. Erskine :

"Did you before the time of this convention being held, which is imputed to Mr. Hardy, ever hear from him what his objects were, whether he has at all mixed himself in that business?

"I have very often conversed with him, as I mentioned before, about his plan of reform: he always adhered to the Duke of Richmond's plan."

And which declaration came within the exception to the rule laid down by the chief justice. The final question was then put :

"From all that you have seen of him, what is his character for sincerity and truth?

"I have every reason to believe him to be a very sincere, simple, honest man."

To which the attorney-general said :

"If this had been stated at first to the question meant to be asked, I do not see what possible objection I could have to it."

* * * * *

That remark applies to the last question. The remark was made after the last question was put; but, as I understand it the two questions are substantially the same and are connected, and the remark of the attorney-general applied to both, as the first was but the basis the inducement to the last.

* * * * *

Now, what is the question which has been propounded by the counsel on the part of the President to General Sherman? It is this:

"In that interview what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?"

Now, I contend that that calls for just declarations on the part of the President as fall within the rule laid down by the chief justice in the Hardy case, and therefore must be excluded. If this conversation can be admitted, where are we to stop? Who may not be put upon the witness stand and asked for conversations had between him and the President, and at any time since the President entered upon the duties of the presidential office, to show the general intent and drift of his mind and conduct during the whole period of his official existence?

* * * * *

We certainly must insist upon the well known and long established rule of evidence being applied to this particular objection, for the purpose of ending now and forever, so far as this case is concerned, these attempts to put in evidence the declarations of the President, made, it may be, for the purpose of meeting an impeachment by such weapons of defense.

It is offered to be proved now, as the counsel inform us, that the President told General Sherman that he desired him to accept an appointment of Secretary for the Department of War to the end that Mr. Stanton might be driven to the courts of law for the purpose of testing his title to that office.

At the conclusion of the arguments the Chief Justice said:

Senators, the Chief Justice has expressed the opinion that the question now proposed is admissible within the vote of the Senate of yesterday. He will state briefly the grounds of that opinion. The question yesterday had reference to a conversation between the President and General Thomas after the note addressed to Mr. Stanton was written and delivered, and the Senate held it admissible. The question to-day has reference to a conversation relating to the same subject-matter, between the President and General Sherman, which occurred before the note of removal was written and delivered. Both questions were asked for the purpose of proving the intent of the President in the attempt to remove Mr. Stanton. The Chief Justice thinks that proof of a conversation shortly before a transaction is better evidence of the intent of an actor in it than proof of a conversation shortly after the transaction. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being put, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 23, nays 28. So the question was ruled out.

Mr. Stanbery next asked:

General Sherman, in any of the conversations of the President while you were here, what was said about the department of the Atlantic?

Mr. Manager Butler objected that this question fell within the ruling just made.

Thereupon Mr. Stanbery proposed the question in this form:

What do you know about the creation of the department of the Atlantic?

Mr. Manager Butler said:

We have no objection to what General Sherman knows about the creation of the department of the Atlantic, provided he speaks of knowledge and not from the declarations of the President. All orders, papers, his own knowledge, if he has any, if it does not come from declarations, we do not object to.

The Chief Justice said:

The counsel for the President will be good enough to state whether in this question they include statements made by the President.

To this Mr. Stanbery replied:

Not merely that; what we expect to prove is in what manner the department of the Atlantic was created; who defined the bounds of the department of the Atlantic; what was the purpose for which the department was arranged.

It was also developed by a question from the Chief Justice that the conversation referred to was prior to the attempted removal of Mr. Stanton.

The question being put, the Senate decided<sup>41</sup> without division that the question was not admissible.

Mr. Stanbery then asked this question:

Did the President make any application to you respecting the acceptance of the duties of Secretary of War ad interim.

Mr. Manager Butler said:

I am instructed, Mr. President, to object to this, because an application can not be made without being either in writing or in conversation, and then either would be the written or oral declaration of the President, and it is entirely immaterial to this issue.

Mr. William M. Evarts said:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, the ground, as we understand it, upon which the offer, in the form and to the extent in which our question which was overruled sought to put it, was overruled, was because it proposed to put in evidence declarations of the President as if statements of what he was to do or what he had done. We offer this present evidence as executive action of the President at the time and in the direct form of a proposed devolution of office then presently upon General Sherman.

Mr. Butler objected that under the guise of proving an act it was proposed to get in a conversation.

The question being put, the Senate decided without division that the question was admissible.<sup>42</sup>

The question having been put, and General Sherman having testified that the President had tendered him the office of Secretary of War ad interim on two occasions, Mr. Stanbery then asked:

At the first interview at which the tender of the duties of the Secretary of War ad interim was made to you by the President did anything further pass between you and the President in reference to the tender or your acceptance of it?

In response to a question by Mr. Manager Butler as to the scope of the question, Mr. Stanbery stated that the question was intended to draw out the declarations concomitant with the act.

Mr. Butler thereupon entered an objection to the question on the ground that it contemplated an evasion of the principles of the ruling heretofore made. He said:

My proposition is, objecting to this evidence, that the evidence is incompetent and is based upon first getting in an act which proved nothing and looked to be immaterial, so that it was quite liberal for Senators to vote it in, but that liberality is taken advantage of to endeavor to get by the ruling of the Senate and put in declarations which the Senate has ruled out.

Mr. Evarts argued :

The tender of the War Office by the Chief Executive of the United States to a general in the position of General Sherman is an Executive act, and as such has been admitted in evidence by this court. Like every other act thus admitted in evidence as an act, it is competent to attend it by whatever was expressed from one to the other in the course of that act to the termination of it. And on that proposition the learned manager shakes his finger of warning at the Senators of the United States against the malpractices of the counsel for the President. Now, Senators, if there be anything clear, anything plain in the law of evidence, without which truth is shut out, the form and features of the fact permitted to be proved excluded, it is this rule that the spoken act is a part of the attending qualifying trait and character of the act itself.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 23, nays 29. So the question was ruled out.<sup>43</sup>

Mr. Stanbery then asked :

In either of these conversations did the President say to you that his object in appointing you was that he might thus get the question of Mr. Stanton's right to the office before the Supreme Court?

Mr. Manager Butler objected to this question as leading in form, and as inadmissible within the decisions already made.

The Senate, by a vote of yeas 7, nays 44, decided that the question was not admissible.<sup>44</sup>

Mr. Stanbery then asked :

Was anything said at either of those interviews by the President as to any purpose of getting the question of Mr. Stanton's right to the office before the courts?

Mr. Stanbery explained that the preceding question seemed to have been overruled because of its form, and he now changed the form as he did not want it thrown out on a technicality.

Mr. Manager Butler objected to the question on the ground that it was incompetent under the rules of evidence to offer in another form a question ruled out as leading, saying :

I had the honor to say to the Senate a little ago that all the rules of evidence are founded upon good sense, and this rule is founded on good sense. It would do no harm in the case of this witness ; but the rule is founded on this proposition : that counsel shall not put a leading question to a witness, and thus instruct him what they want him to say, and then have it overruled and withdraw it, and put the same question in substance, because you could always instruct a witness in that way. Of course, that was not meant here, because I assume it would do no harm in any form, and the counsel would not do it ; but I think the Senate should hold itself not to be played with in this way.

The Senate without division decided that the question should not be admitted.<sup>45</sup>

Thereupon Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, a Senator, proposed this question in writing :

Did the President, in tendering you the appointment of Secretary of War ad interim, express the object or purpose of so doing?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, on behalf of the House of Representatives, objected to the question as both leading and incompetent.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 25, nays 27. So the question was ruled out.<sup>46</sup>

Mr. Stanbery then proposed this question :

At either of these interviews was anything said in reference to the use of threats, intimidation, or force to get possession of the War Office, or the contrary?

Mr. Manager Butler objected to the question, as falling within the rule already established.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection.<sup>47</sup>

2239. Evidence as to statements of Judge Swayne to prove intention as to residence and made before impeachment proceedings were suggested was the subject of diverse rulings during the trial.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 22, 1905,<sup>48</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Milton Jackson, a witness for the respondent, was examined by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, as to a conversation which he had with Judge Swayne several years previous to the impeachment in reference to the latter's place of residence, and this question was asked :

Q. (By Mr. Higgins.) What did the Judge state at that time about the subject of his residence?

To that I object, Mr. President, The statement of Judge Swayne, which we offered to prove, were excluded, of course, for a different reason, but certainly there is no rule of law which allows the statements of the respondent to be put in evidence in his own behalf. That, of course, is fundamental. No man can prove what he has done or what he has not done by his own statements as to what he did or purposed to do. There is no more fundamental rule of evidence than the respondent's statements can not be proved in his favor. If that were so, all Judge Swayne would have to do would be to state that he resided in Florida, and that would make him a resident of Florida, or be evidence of his residence there.

Mr. Higgins replied :

I submit to the Senate that this question is eminently proper as a verbal fact, an act of the judge, ante litem motam, before this matter was mooted, years before, in the announcement to his nearest of kin as to his residence at that time. In order to make clear to the Senate the question upon which it is asked to pass, I will say that the authorities of Leon County, Fla., in which is the city of Tallahassee, gave an invitation to Judge Swayne, written and engrossed, to make his residence and home there, and that this was shown to this witness, and that the Judge gave them reasons why he could not accept that offer, because of where he had elected to live. If that is not fair testimony and within the rule, I do not know what is. It was long before this question was ever raised, not with any view of the possibility of any such proceeding as this. The statement is admissible for a double reason—that he was not going to accept that offer; that the offer was made very shortly after the act of Congress was passed, and therefore the question arose at that time; and in rejecting that invitation he did it because he had elected to reside, as the witness will state, elsewhere in his district and with reference to the requirements of that act.

Now, we have made that statement in answer as a substantive part of the defense, that he announced at that time his intention as to where he expected to live as a proper thing for him to do, and it is an act which I submit it is eminently proper for us to be able to prove.

In reply Mr. Manager Perkins argued :

In other words, Mr. President, the offer of the counsel is this when we analyze it: The question being whether Judge Swayne as a matter of fact became a resident of the northern district of Florida, they can prove that by showing by another witness that Judge Swayne said he intended to become a resident. You can prove a fact. You can prove what a man did; what he was bound to do; that he became a resident. How—by showing what he did? No; but by proving that he said to some one else he intended to become a resident.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said :

I find that in the trial of Andrew Johnson, page 207 of the proceedings as reported in the Globe, it was offered for the counsel by the respondent to prove in these words :

"We offer to prove that the President then stated that he had issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton and the employment of Mr. Thomas to perform the duties ad interim; that thereupon Mr. Perrin said: 'Supposing Mr. Stanton should oppose the order?' The President replied: 'There is no danger of that, for General Thomas is already in the office,' etc."

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, Mr. Manager Wilson said :

Mr. President, as this objection is outside of any former ruling of the Senate and is perfectly within the rule laid down in Hardy's case—the celebrated English impeachment case—and cited this ruling from that case, which may be found in 24 State Trials, page 1096 :

"Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself."

The Chief Justice submitted the question to the Senate whether it should be admitted, and the vote was, yeas 9 and nays 37. So the question was rejected. There you have precedent both English and American.

The Presiding Officer <sup>49</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer will state the question. Counsel for the respondent offered to prove, as affecting the question of his residence, statements made by the respondent to the witness in the year 1894 or 1895 as to where it was his intention to reside. This is the question which is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS. I wish further to say that I intend also to put to the witness the question as to where the Judge stated at the time he did reside.

Mr. Manager OLMSTED. That would be equally objectionable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And, further the statements made by Judge Swayne at that time as to where his residence was. Senators in favor of the admission of such testimony will say "aye," opposed "no." [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the "ayes" have it. The "ayes" have it. The counsel will ask the question.

On February 23 <sup>50</sup> a witness, Charles F. Warwick, was examined by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, who asked :

Q. Do you know Judge Charles Swayne?—A. Very well.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. Ever since I came to the bar. I think I knew him before that intimately.

Q. Intimately, you say?—A. Intimately.

Q. Do you remember the fact of the act of Congress curtailing his district?—A. I do.

Q. Will you please state whether on or about or after that time, and fix the time yourself, you had any conversation with him, and he with you, concerning where he would make his residence in Florida?

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said :

We object to that testimony as being irrelevant and incompetent. The declaration of the respondent as to where he intended to reside is, in our judgment, not evidence in this case.

Mr. Porter J. McCumber, a Senator from North Dakota, said :

Mr. President, before submitting the matter to the Senate, I wish counsel would inform the Senate on what principle of law he justifies a proposition to introduce in evidence a self-serving declaration of a party defendant in a criminal proceeding.

Mr. Higgins said :

Mr. President, I had the honor to submit some remarks upon that question yesterday. We contend that such an assertion made before the present impeachment proceedings were mooted or expected, or as the maxim of the law has it ante litem motam, is itself essentially a verbal fact. Residence is made up of two elements—intention and action. Intent without action is futile to make a residence, but intention becomes a most important part of the proposition in the end as to what constitutes residence. As I have said and admitted, alone it will not make it, but it is a part of a whole in which it takes its own due proportion.

Now, if this were a self-serving assertion, made after the fact, if it came into the case in such a way it would be so clearly objectionable that it never would be presented by counsel for the respondent. But we submit it is a most important thing. When the good faith of the conduct of the respondent is in dispute, we bring here a witness of the highest character and standing to prove what at that time was the expressed intention of the respondent in respect to establishing his residence. I think therefore that, while admitting the principle upon which the distinguished Senator raises his question, we have brought this within an exception thereto. If we had expected that this question would be raised again to-day, after it had been disposed of yesterday, we would have come prepared with authorities to submit.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins of New York, said :

Mr. President, just a word. I did not again object to-day because the Senate yesterday, I must confess somewhat to my surprise, allowed a similar question to be answered. Doubtless it was that the legal question involved was not presented by me with the clearness with which it has now been stated by the Senator from North Dakota. The gentleman on the other side misstates the question and avoids the inquiry made by the Senator. It is not can Judge Swayne's intention be proved? His intention is a question that perhaps can be proved, but Judge Swayne's intention, no more than any other thing in Judge Swayne's behalf, can be proved by Judge Swayne's own statement.

It is offered to prove here, what? Judge Swayne's intention, by the fact that Judge Swayne said it was his intention. As the Senator from North Dakota properly says, it is an endeavor to prove something in behalf of the defendant by his own statement. There is the inherent vice of the question, and I think the failure perhaps to catch that point yesterday was the reason the ruling was made by the Senate.

Mr. Higgins replied :

Only a word in reply. The learned manager who would confine the evidence of intention to acts, when from the very great case in 3 Washington Report down it is the established law as to citizenship, as to residence, as to domicile, that they are each and every one of them made up of two articles—of intent and of action—that if you can not prove anything by words you are confined merely in your evidence to acts. That is not the law, with all due respect to my learned friend.

Mr. Manager Olmsted said :

I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this precise question was before the Senate of the United States in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, where his counsel offered to prove, for the purpose of showing the intent of the President of the United States, his statements to other parties.

There was then cited the celebrated English case of Hardy, reported in 24 State Trials, page 1096, where it was held by the House of Lords:

"Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent"—

Mark the words—

"though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, etc."

Upon the citation of that authority and the argument of the case the United States Senate decided, by a vote of nearly 4 to 1, that such a statement made by the respondent could not be proved by the party to whom he made it.

Mr. Higgins said:

I have not had a chance to reply to that. I agree to that law, for that was not a case of residence, nor of domicile nor of citizenship. It was a case of ordinary criminal conduct, where the intent is inferred from the act. But the difference is laid down in the law, that residence is a mixed question of law and fact; that it is made up of action plus intent, and intent plus action, and therefore it is to be differentiated entirely from Hardy's case, and goes back to another class of authorities entirely.

The Presiding Officer said:

Shall the witness be permitted to answer the question. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the "noes" have it. The "noes" have it, and the answer is excluded.

Later, on the same day,<sup>51</sup> Henry G. Swayne was sworn and examined by Mr. Higgins:

Q. Do you recall the time of the passage of the act of Congress curtailing the northern district of Florida?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. July 1864. Where were your father and family residing at that time?—A. St. Augustine, Fla.

Q. You were not there last year?—A. I was there at that time; that summer.

Q. State what you know as to any facts or acts of Judge Swayne with reference to making his residence at Pensacola.—A. Immediately after the passage of the act, or within a few days thereafter, he left the home in St. Augustine and went to Pensacola, declaring that he was—

Mr. Manager Perkins having interposed, Mr. Higgins said:

I offer to prove by this witness what the judge declared at the time; and I should like to know if the manager objects.

Mr. Manager PERKINS. We object. That is easily answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer understands that counsel propose to prove the declaration of Judge Swayne made at the time when he left his home in St. Augustine as to where he was going to make his home. * * * The Presiding Officer thinks that may be done. If any Senator desires, he will submit the question to the Senate. * * * This is a declaration made at the time he left his home in St. Augustine as to where he intended to take up his home on leaving the St. Augustine home. * * * If any Senator desires, the Presiding Officer will submit the question to the Senate. [A pause.] The Presiding Officer thinks it part of the res gestae. The Presiding Officer understands that the witness is about to testify to a statement made by Judge Swayne at the time he was giving up his home in St. Augustine; and that the Presiding Officer thinks the witness may state.

Mr. HIGGINS. Please proceed.

A. The statement in full which was made by Judge Swayne at the time, as I recollect it, was that the bill dividing the district or redistricting the State, whichever it was, had just passed Congress and been signed by the President, and that he would be compelled to make his residence within the boundaries of his district, and that he was going to go to Pensacola; and with that declaration he left St. Augustine that summer in the month of July. I was there, having gone down after my collegiate year was over, from Philadelphia, and I, with the other members of the family—

2240. By a majority of one the Senate, in the Johnson trial, sustained the Chief Justice's ruling that evidence as to respondent's declaration of intent, made at the time of the act, was admissible.—On April 13, 1868,<sup>52</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, asked for the recall as a witness of Gen. William T. Sherman, and General Sherman having taken the stand, Mr. Johnson proposed in writing this question :

When the President tendered to you the office of Secretary of War ad interim on the 27th of January, 1868, and on the 31st of the same month and year, did he, at the very time of making such tender, state to you what his purpose in so doing was?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham objected to the question as incompetent, in accordance with the rulings of the Senate heretofore made.

The question being taken without argument, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 26, nays 22. So the question was admitted.

And the witness replied, "Yes."

Thereupon Mr. Reverdy Johnson proposed this question :

If he did, state what he said his purpose was.

Mr. Manager Bingham objected to the question, since it was incompetent for the accused to make his own declarations evidence for himself.

The Chief Justice<sup>53</sup> said :

The Chief Justice has already said upon a former occasion that he thinks that, for the purpose of proving the intent, this question is admissible; and he thinks also, that it comes within the rule which has been adopted by the Senate as a guide for its own action. This is not an ordinary court, but it is a court composed largely of lawyers and gentlemen of great experience in the business transactions of life, and they are quite competent to determine upon the effect of any evidence which may be submitted to them; and the Chief Justice thought that the rule which the Senate adopted for itself was founded on this fact; and in accordance with that rule, by which he determined the question submitted on Saturday, he now determines this question in the same way.

Messrs. Managers Bingham and Butler asked if this was not the same question ruled on Saturday, April 11.

The Chief Justice said :

The Chief Justice does not say that. What he does say is, that it is a question of the same general import, to show the intent of the President during these transactions. The Secretary will read the question again.

* * * * *
Senators, you who are of opinion that the question just read, "If he did, state what he said his purpose was," is admissible, and should be put to the witness, will, as your names are called, answer yea; those of a contrary opinion, nay. The Secretary will call the roll.

And the vote being taken, there appeared yeas 26, nays 25. So the question was admitted.

2241. Declarations of the respondent made during the act were admitted to rebut evidence of other declarations, made also during the act, but on a different day.

Instance wherein, during the introduction of evidence, an objection withdrawn by a manager was renewed by a Senator.

On February 15, 1805,<sup>54</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, William Marshall was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent. During the examination of this witness Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, asked a question to which objection was made by Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers.

After consultation Mr. Nicholson withdrew the objection, whereupon it was renewed by a member of the court.

Thereupon Mr. Harper, in behalf of the respondent, made the following motion :

Testimony on the part of the prosecution, tending to show from the declarations of the respondent that he had a corrupt intention to pack a jury for the trial of Callender, having been given, he offers in evidence other declarations of his, made during the proceedings, but on a different day, for the purpose of rebutting the former testimony, and of showing that his intentions, in that respect, were pure and even favorable to Mr. Callender.

Thereupon the President <sup>55</sup> said :

This evidence is consented to by the managers. The question is, "Shall it be, on such consent, examined by the court?"

And the question was determined in the affirmative, yeas 32, nays 2.

2242. In the Johnson trial the Senate sustained the Chief Justice in admitting as showing intent, on the principle of res gestae, evidence of respondent's verbal statement of the act to his Cabinet.—On April 17, 1868,<sup>56</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, was sworn and examined as a witness by counsel for the respondent, and testified that he attended a meeting of the Cabinet on the afternoon of February 21 last. At this meeting, after the departmental business had been concluded, and as they were about to separate, the President made a statement.

Objection as to testimony of what the President said being intimated by the managers for the House of Representatives, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, made this offer of proof :

We offer to prove that on this occasion the President communicated to Mr. Welles and the other members of his Cabinet, before the meeting broke up, that he had removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim, and that upon the inquiry by Mr. Welles whether General Thomas was in possession of the office the President replied that he was; and upon further question of Mr. Welles whether Mr. Stanton acquiesced the President replied that he did; all that he required was time to remove his papers.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once objected.

Mr. President and Senators, as it seems to us, this does not come within any possible proposition of law to render it admissible. It is now made certain that this act was done without any consultation of his Cabinet by the President, whether that consultation was to be held verbally, as I think is against the constitutional provision, or whether the theory is to be adopted that the President has a right to consult with his Cabinet upon questions of his conduct.

Mr. Manager Butler proceeded to discuss the constitution and functions of the President's Cabinet, holding that strictly the President might only require written opinions of the heads of Departments.

Continuing as to the competency of the evidence, Mr. Butler said:

Now, the question is, after he has done the act, after he has thought it was successful, after he thought Mr. Stanton had yielded the office, can he, by his narration of what he had done and what he intended to do, shield himself before a tribunal from the consequences of that act? It is not exactly the same question which you decided yesterday by almost unexampled unanimity in the case of Mr. Perrin and Mr. Selye, the Member of Congress, on that same day, a few minutes earlier or a few minutes later? They offered in evidence here what he told Mr. Perrin and what he told Mr. Selye; they complicated it by the fact that Mr. Selye was a Member of Congress; and the Senate decided by a vote which indicated a very great strength of opinion that that sort of narration could not be put in.

Now, is this any more than narration? It was not to take the advice of Mr. Welles as to what he should do in the future, or upon any question; it was mere information given to Mr. Welles or to the other members of the Cabinet after they had separated in their Cabinet consultation, and while they were meeting together as any other citizens might meet. It would be as if, after you adjourned here, some question should be attempted to be put in as to the action of the Senate because the Senators had not left the room. Again, I say it was simply a narration, and that narration of his intent and purposes, his thoughts, expectations, and feelings.

I do not propose to argue it further until I hear something showing why we are to distinguish this case from the case of Mr. Perrin, on which you voted yesterday. Mr. Perrin tells you that on the 22d he waited for the Cabinet meeting to break up, and as soon as it broke up he went in with Mr. Selye, and then the President undertook to tell him. You said that was no evidence. Now, when he undertook to tell Mr. Welles is that any more evidence? I can not distinguish the cases, and I desire to hear them distinguished before I attempt an answer to any such distinction.

* * * * *

It is said that it is an official act. I had supposed up to this moment—aye, and I suppose now—that there is no act that can be called an official act of an officer which is not an act required by some law or some duty imposed upon that officer. Am I right in my ideas of what is an official act? It is not every volunteer act by an officer that is official. Frequently such acts are officious, not official. An official act, allow me to say, is an act which the law requires, or a duty which is enjoined upon the officer by some law, or some regulation, or in some manner as a duty. Will the learned counsel tell the Senate what constitutional provision, what statute provision, what practice of the Government requires the President at any time to inform his Cabinet or any member of them whatever that he has removed one man and put in another, and that that other man is in office? If there is any such law, it has escaped my attention. I am not aware of it.

* * * * *

Now, then, what is offered? Stanton has been removed by the act of the President; and thereupon, without asking advice—because that is expressly waived by the learned counsel last addressing us—not as a matter of advice, the President gives information. Now, how can that information be evidence? How can he make it evidence? The information is required by no law, was given for no purpose to carry out any official duty, was the mere narration of what the President chose to narrate at that time.

Mr. Evarts, in behalf of the respondent argued:

Now, then, it stands thus: That at a Cabinet meeting held on Friday, the 21st of February, when the routine business of the different Departments was over, and when it was in order for the President to communicate to his Cabinet whatever he desired to lay before them, the President did communicate this fact of the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas ad Interim, and that thereupon his Cabinet officers inquired as to the posture in which the matter stood, and as to the situation of the office and of the conduct of the retiring officer. Here we get rid of the suggestion that it is a mere communication to a casual visitor which made the staple of the argument yesterday against the introduction of the evidence as to the conversation with Mr. Perrin and Mr. Selye. We now present you the communication made by the President of the United States while this act was in the very process of execution, while it was yet, as we say in law, in fieri, being done.

It being in fieri, the President communicates the fact how this public transaction has been performed and is going on, and we are entitled to that as a part of the res gestæ in its sense of a governmental act, with all the benefit that can come from it in any future consideration you are to give to the matter as bearing upon the merits and the guilt or innocence of the President in the premises. It bears, as we say, directly upon the question whether there had been any other purpose than the placing of the office in a proper condition for the public service according to the announcement of the President as his intention when he conversed with General Sherman in the January preceding; and it negatives all idea that at the time that General Thomas to Mr. Wilkeson or to the Dakota Delegate; Mr. Burleigh, was saying or suggesting anything of force, the President was the author of, or was responsible for, his statements. The truth is, it presents the transaction as wholly and completely an orderly and peaceful movement of the President of the United States, as, in fact, it was, and no evidence has been given to the contrary, of any occurrence disturbing that peaceful order and as the situation in which its completion left the matter in the mind of the President up to that point of time.

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, also of counsel for the respondent, added:

We are anxious that this testimony now offered should be distinguished in the apprehension of the Senate, as it is in our own, from an offer of advice, or from the giving of advice by the Cabinet to the President. We do not place our application for the admission of this evidence upon the ground that it is an act of giving advice by his counsellors to the President. We place it upon the ground that this was an official act done by the President himself when he made a communication to his counsellors concerning this change which he had made in one of their number; that that was strictly and purely an official act of the President, done in a proper manner, the subject-matter of which each of those counsellors was interested in in his public capacity, and which it was proper for the President to make known to them at the earliest moment when he could make such a communication.

Mr. Curtis further reviewed the constitutional history of the Cabinet to show that the practice was for the President to rely on the Cabinet, both for consultation and decision, finally saying as to his remarks in making this review:

They are pertinent to the question now under consideration, for they go to show that under the Constitution and laws of the United States as practiced on by every President, including General Washington and Mr. Adams, Cabinet ministers were assembled by them as a council for the purposes of consultation and decision, and of course, when thus assembled, a communication made to them by the President of the United States concerning an important official act which was then in fieri, in process of being executed and not yet completed is itself an official act of the President, and we submit to the Senate that we have a right to prove it in that character.

The Chief Justice <sup>57a</sup> said at the conclusion of the arguments:

Senators, the Chief Justice thinks that this evidence is admissible. It has, as he thinks, important relation to the res gestæ, the very transaction which forms the basis of several of the articles of impeachment, and he thinks it also entirely proper to take into consideration in forming an enlightened judgment upon the intent of the President. He will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

Mr. Aaron H. Cragin, a Senator from New Hampshire, asked that the evidence excluded in the case of Witness Perrin <sup>57b</sup> be read. This having been done, Mr. Jacob M. Howard, a Senator from Michigan, proposed this question:

In what way does the evidence the counsel for the accused now offer meet any of the allegations contained in the impeachment?

How does it affect the gravamen of any one of the charges?

To this Mr. Evarts responded :

The Senators will perceive that this question anticipates a very extensive field of inquiry—first as to what the gravamen of all these articles is, and, secondly, as to what shall finally be determined to be the limits of law and fact that properly press upon the issues here ; but it is enough to say, probably, as we have every desire to meet the question with all the intelligence that we can command, at the present stage of the matter, without going into these anticipations, that it bears upon the question of the intent with which this act was done, as being a qualification of the act in the President's mind at the time he announces it as complete. It bears on the conspiracy articles and it bears upon the eleventh article, even if it should be held that the earlier articles, upon the mere removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas, are to cease in the point of their inquiry, intent, and all with the consummation of the acts.

The Chief Justice thereupon said :

The Chief Justice will restate to the Senate the question as it presents itself to his mind. The question yesterday had reference to the intention of the President, not in relation to the removal of Mr. Stanton, as the Chief Justice understood it, but in relation to the immediate appointment of a successor by sending in the nomination of Mr. Ewing. The question to-day relates to the intention of the President in the removal of Mr. Stanton ; and it relates to a communication made to his Cabinet after the departmental business had closed, but before the Cabinet had separated. The Chief Justice is clearly of opinion that this is a part of the transaction and that it is entirely proper to take this evidence into consideration as showing the intent of the President in his acts. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken, there appeared, yeas 26, nays 23. So the evidence was admitted.

2243. It was decided in the Chase trial that declarations of the respondent after the act might not be admitted to show the intent.—On February 15, 1805,<sup>55</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, counsel for the respondent, asked of Edward J. Coale, the witness under examination, the following question :

At the time Judge Chase desired you to make the copy in your hand, did he, or did he not, explain to you his reasons or motives for drawing up the paper from which this copy was made? If yes, what were they?

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, objected to the question.

At the suggestion of the President<sup>56</sup> the question was reduced to writing.

Mr. Hopkinson said he thought such questions perfectly legal when they went to show the intention of the accused. "We have heard," said he, "much of the quo animo, and it is perfectly clear that the intention constitutes the guilt of the offense."

Mr. Nicholson said :

The quo animo is to be collected from the acts of the party. The evidence of his declaration may be shown to prove the quo animo. But I do not consider it to be correct that Judge Chase shall be permitted to give in evidence declarations made at any other time than that when we have stated he made them ; otherwise it will always lay in the discretion of the party accused to state declarations made at another time by him for the purpose of justifying any acts he may have committed.

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said he had ever considered the declaration of the party at the time he was charged with committing a criminal act as competent evidence to show his innocence.

Mr. Nicholson said there was no doubt of it, but that he was not charged with drawing out the paper as a criminal act. Any declaration made by Judge Chase at the time he delivered the opinion of the court may be given in evidence, but any other declarations have nothing to do with the case.

The President said :

Where was the conversation between the judge and yourself?

Mr. COALE. At the judge's lodgings.

The question was then taken—

Is it competent for the counsel for the respondent to put said question to the witness?

And it was determined in the negative, yeas 9, nays 25.

2244. In the Johnson trial the Senate ruled out evidence as to respondent's declarations of intent made after the act.

Comment of the Chief Justice on the Senate's decisions on evidence as to respondent's declarations at or near the time of the act.

On April 16, 1868,* in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Edwin O. Perrin was sworn and examined by counsel on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Perrin testified to an interview which he had with the President in company with Mr. Selye, a Congressman, on the evening of February 21, 1868.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, asked :

Did you then hear from the President of the removal of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once entered an objection, which caused the counsel for respondent to submit in writing the following :

We offer to prove that the President then stated that he had issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton and the employment of General Thomas to perform the duties ad interim; that thereupon Mr. Perrin said : "Supposing Mr. Stanton should oppose the order." The President replied : "There is no danger of that, for General Thomas is already in the office." He then added : "It is only a temporary arrangement; I shall send in to the Senate at once a good name for the office."

Mr. Manager Butler said :

I find it, Mr. President and Senators, my duty to object to this. There is no end to declarations of this sort. The admission of those to Sherman and to Thomas was advocated on the ground that the office was tendered to them and that it was a part of the res gestæ. This is mere narration, mere statement of what he had done and what he intended to do. It never was evidence and never will be evidence in any organized court, so far as any experience in court has taught me. I do not see why you limit it. If Mr. Perrin, who says he has heretofore been on the stump, can go there and ask him questions, and the answers can be received, why not anybody else? If Mr. Selye could go there, why not everybody else? Why could he not make declarations to every man, aye, and woman, too, and bring them in here, as to what he intended to do and what he had done to instruct the Senate of the United States in their duties sitting as a high court of impeachment?

And Mr. Manager James F. Wilson added:

Mr. President, as this objection is outside of any former ruling of the Senate, and is perfectly within the rule laid down in Hardy's case, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that rule again, not for the purpose of entering upon any considerable discussion, but to leave this objection under that rule to the decision of the Senate:

"Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself." (24 State Trials, p. 1096.)

If this offer of proof does not come perfectly within that rule, then I never met a case within my experience that would come within its provisions. I leave this objection to the decision of the Senate upon that rule.

In behalf of the admission of the evidence Mr. Evarts said:

It will be observed that this was an interview between the President of the United States and a Member of Congress, one of "the grand inquest of the nation," holding, therefore, an official duty and having access, by reason of his official privilege, to the person of the President; that at this hour of the day the President was in the attitude of supposing, upon the report of General Thomas, that Mr. Stanton was ready to yield the office, desiring only the time necessary to accommodate his private convenience, and that he then stated to these gentlemen: "I have removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas ad interim," which was their first intelligence of the occurrence; that upon the suggestion, "Will there not be trouble or difficulty?" the President answered (showing thus the bearing on any question of threats or purpose of force as to be imputed to him from the declarations that General Thomas was making at about the same hour to Mr. Wilkeson) that there was no occasion for or "no danger of that, as General Thomas was already in." Then, as to the motive or purpose entertained by the President at the time of this act of providing anybody that should control the War Department or the military appropriations, or by combination with the Treasury Department suck the public funds, or to have, though I regret to repeat the words as used by the honorable manager, a tool or a slave to carry on the office to the detriment of the public service, we propose to show that at the very moment he asserts, "This is but a temporary arrangement; I shall at once send in a good name for the office to the Senate."

Now, you will perceive that this bears upon the President's condition of purpose in this matter, both in respect to any force as threatened or suggested by anybody else being imputable to him at this time, and upon the question of whether this appointment of General Thomas had any other purpose than what appeared upon its face, a nominal appointment, to raise the question of whether Mr. Stanton would retire or not, and determined, as it seemed to be for the moment, by the acquiescence of Mr. Stanton, was then only to be maintained until a name was sent in to the Senate, as by proof hitherto given we have shown was done on the following day before 1 o'clock.

At the conclusion of argument the Chief Justice<sup>61</sup> said:

Senators, the Chief Justice is unable to determine the precise extent to which the Senate regards its own decision as applicable. He has understood the decision to be that, for the purpose of showing intent, evidence may be given of conversations with the President at or near the time of the transaction. It is said that this evidence is distinguishable from that which has been already introduced. The Chief Justice is not able to distinguish it; but he will submit directly to the Senate the question whether it is admissible or not.

The question being taken on the admission of the testimony, there appeared, yeas 9, nays 37. So the evidence was excluded.

2245. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that an official message transmitted after the act was not admissible as evidence to show intent.—On April 15, 1868,<sup>62</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, during the presentation of evidence on behalf of the respondent, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel, offered a message of the President to the Senate of the United States, bearing date February 24, 1868.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the admission of the message as evidence, since it was virtually a declaration of the President after he was impeached, and that could not be evidence. Mr. Butler stated that the record as to the impeachment was:

That on the 21st of February a resolution was proposed for impeachment and referred to a committee; on the 23d the committee reported, and that was debated through the 22d and into Monday, the 24th, and the actual vote was taken on Monday, the 24th.

Arguing in support of the objection, Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, one of the managers, said as to the message:

Is it any more than a volunteer declaration of the criminal, after the fact, in his own behalf? Does it alter the case in law? Does it alter the case in the reason or judgment of any man living, either within the Senate or out of the Senate, that he chose to put his declaration in his own defense in writing? The law makes no such distinctions. I undertake to assert it here, regardless of any attempt to contradict my statement, that there is no law that enables any accused criminal, after the fact, to make declarations, either orally or in writing, either by message to the Senate or a speech to a mob, to acquit himself or to affect in any manner his criminality before the tribunals of justice, or to make evidence which shall be admitted under any form of law upon his own motion to justify his own criminal conduct.

I do not hesitate to say that every authority which the gentlemen can bring into court regulating the rule of evidence in procedures of this sort is directly against the proposition, and for the simple reason that it is a written declaration made by the accused voluntarily, after the fact, in his own behalf.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, argued that as the managers had been permitted to put in evidence a resolution of the Senate passed on February 21, and declaring that the President had exceeded his powers, the counsel for the respondent should be permitted to put in the message, which was an answer to that resolution. Mr. Evarts said:

Now, if the crime [the removal of Secretary Stanton] was completed on the 21st of February, which is not only the whole basis of this argument of the learned managers, but of every other argument upon the evidence that I have had the honor of hearing from them, I should like to know what application or relevancy the resolution passed by the Senate on the 21st of February, after the act of the President had been completed, and after that act had been communicated to the Senate, has on the issue of whether that act was right or wrong? And if the fact that it is an expression of opinion relieves the testimony from the possibility of admission, what was this but an expression of the opinion of the Senate of the United States in the form of a resolution regarding a past act of the President? There could be, then, no single principle of the law of evidence upon which this fact put in proof in behalf of the managers could be admitted, except as a communication from this branch of the Government to the President of the United States of its own opinion concerning the legality of his action; and in the same line and in immediate reply the President communicates to the Senate of the United States, openly and in a proper message, his opinions concerning the legality of the act. What would be thought of the Government that, in a criminal prosecution, by way of inculpating a prisoner, should give in evidence what a magistrate or a sheriff had said to him concerning the crime imputed, and then shut the mouth of the prisoner as to what he had said then and there in reply? Why, the only possibility, the only argument for affecting the prisoner with criminality for what had been said to him, was that, unreplied to, it might be construed into admission or submission; and to say that the prisoner when told, "You stole that watch," could not give in evidence his reply, "it was my own watch, and I took it because it was mine," is precisely the same proposition that is being applied here by the learned managers to this communication back and forth between the Senate and the President.

The arguments being concluded, the Chief Justice <sup>63</sup> said:

There is, perhaps, Senators, no branch of the law in which it is more difficult to lay down precise rules than that which relates to evidence of the intent with which an act is done. In the present case it appears that the Senate, on the 21st of February, passed a resolution, which I will take the liberty of reading:

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President stating that he has removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant-General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and to designate any other officer to perform the duties of the office ad interim."

That resolution was adopted on the 21st of February, and was served, as the evidence before you shows, on the evening of the same day. The message which is now proposed to be introduced was sent to the Senate on the 24th day of February. It does not appear to the Chief Justice that the resolution of the Senate called for an answer, or that there was any call upon the President to answer from the Senate itself; and therefore he must regard the message which was sent to the Senate on the 24th of February as a vindication of the President's act addressed by him to the Senate; and it does not appear to the Chief Justice to come within any of the rules which have been applied to the introduction of evidence upon this trial. He will, however, take pleasure in submitting the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] If no Senator desires that the question be submitted to the Senate, the Chief Justice rules the evidence to be inadmissible.

2246. The Chief Justice was sustained in admitting during the Johnson trial evidence of an act after the fact as showing intent.

Evidence of declarations of respondent after the fact was excluded in the Johnson trial, although related to an act admitted in proof to show intent.

On April 16, 1868,<sup>64</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Walter S. Cox, an attorney at law residing in the District of Columbia, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. The witness having stated that he was connected professionally with the case of Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, who had been arrested on a warrant based on an affidavit of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, asked:

When and under what circumstances did your connection with that matter begin?

To this question Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected on the ground of irrelevancy.

The Chief Justice <sup>65</sup> said:

The Chief Justice sees no objection to the question as an introductory question, but will submit it to the Senate if it is desired. [After a pause, to the witness.] You can answer the question.

The witness stated that he was sent for on February 22, and went to the President's House, where he saw the President about 5 p.m. Witness was about to relate what the President said, when Mr. Manager Butler interposed an objection.

This produced from the counsel for the respondent the following written offer:

We offer to prove that Mr. Cox was employed professionally by the President, in the presence of General Thomas, to take such legal proceedings in the case that had been commenced against General Thomas as would be effectual to raise judicially the question of Mr. Stanton's legal right to continue to hold the office of Secretary for the Department of War against the authority of the President, and also in reference to obtaining a writ of quo warranto for the same purpose; and we shall expect to follow up this proof by evidence of what was done by the witness in pursuance of the above employment.

Mr. Manager Butler at once objected.

In the course of the arguments Mr. Manager James F. Wilson thus stated the substance of the objection:

Now, I submit to this honorable body that no act, no declaration of the President made after the fact, can be introduced for the purpose of explaining the intent with which he acted. And upon this question of intent let me direct your minds to this consideration—the issuing of the orders referred to constitute the body of the crime with which the President stands charged. Did he purposely and willfully issue an order to remove the Secretary of War? Did he purposely and willfully issue an order appointing Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim? If he did thus issue the orders, the law raises the presumption of guilty intent, and no act done by the President after these orders were issued can be introduced for the purpose of rebutting that intent. The orders themselves were in violation of the terms of the tenure of office act. Being in violation of that act, they constitute an offense under and by virtue its provisions, and the offense thus being established must stand upon the intent which controlled the action of the President at the time that he issued the orders. If, after this subject was introduced into the House of Representatives, the President became alarmed at the state of affairs, and concluded that it was best to attempt by some means to secure a decision of the court upon the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the tenure of office act, it can not avail him in this case. We are inquiring as to the intent which controlled and directed the action of the President at the time the act was done; and if we succeed in establishing that intent, either by proof or by presumption of law, no subsequent act can interfere with it or remove from him the responsibility which the law places upon him because of the act done.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, argued:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, we have here the oft-repeated argument that the crime against the act of Congress was complete by the papers drawn and delivered by the President; that the law presumes that those papers were made with the intent that appears on their face, which, it is alleged, is a violation of that act; and as that would be enough in an indictment against the President of the United States to affect him with a punishment, in the discretion of the judge, of six cents fine, so by peremptory necessity it becomes in this court a complete and perfect crime under the Constitution, which must require his removal from office, and that anything beyond the intent that the papers should accomplish what they tend to accomplish is not the subject of inquiry here. Well, it is the subject of imputation in the articles; it is the subject of the imputation in the arguments; it is the subject, and the only subject, that gives gravity to this trial, that there was a purpose of injury to the public interest and to the public safety in this proceeding.

Now, we seek to put this prosecution in its proper place on this point, and to show that our intent was no violence, no interruption of the public service, no seizure of the military appropriations, nothing but the purpose by this movement either to procure Mr. Stanton's retirement, as was desired, or to have the necessary footing for judicial proceedings. If this evidence is excluded, then, when you come to the summing up of this cause, you must take the crime of the dimensions and of the completeness that is here avowed, and I shall be entitled before this court and before this country to treat this accusation as if the article had read that he issued that order for Mr. Stanton's retirement, and that direction to General Thomas to take charge ad interim, with the intent and purpose of raising a case for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States between the Constitution and the act of Congress; and if such an article had been produced by the House of Representatives and submitted to the Senate it would have been a laughingstock of the whole country.

The gentlemen shall not make their arguments and escape from them at the same breath. I offer this evidence to prove that the whole purpose and intent of the President of the United States in his action in reference to the occupancy of the office of Secretary of War had this extent and no more—to obtain a peaceable delivery of that trust from one holding it at pleasure to the Chief Executive, or, in the absence of that peaceable retirement, to have a case for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and if the evidence is excluded you must treat every one of these articles as if the intent were limited to an open avowal in the articles themselves that the intent of the President was such as I propose to prove it.

At the conclusion of the arguments, the Chief Justice <sup>66</sup> said:

Senators, the counsel for the President offer to prove that the witness, Mr. Cox, was employed professionally by the President in the presence of General Thomas to take such legal proceedings in the case that had been commenced against General Thomas as would be effectual to raise judicially the question of Mr. Stanton's legal right to continue to hold the office of Secretary for the Department of War against the authority of the President, and also in reference to obtaining a writ of quo warranto for the same purpose, and they state that they expect to follow up this proof by evidence of what was done by the witness in pursuance of the above employment. The first article of impeachment, which may, perhaps, for this purpose, be taken as a sample of the rest relating to the same subject, after charging that "Andrew Johnson, President of the United States," in violation of the Constitution and laws, issued the order which has been so frequently read for the removal of Mr. Stanton, proceeds:

"Which order was unlawfully issued with intent then and there to violate the act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,'" etc.

The article charges, first, that the act was done unlawfully, and then it charges that it was done with intent to accomplish a certain result. That intent the President denies, and it is to establish that denial by proof that the Chief Justice understands this evidence now to be offered. It is evidence of an attempt to employ counsel by the President in the presence of General Thomas. It is the evidence so far of a fact; and it may be evidence also of declarations connected with that fact. This fact and these declarations, which the Chief Justice understands to be in the nature of facts, he thinks are admissible in evidence. The Senate has already, upon a former occasion, decided by a solemn vote that evidence of the declarations by the President to General Thomas and by General Thomas to the President, after this order was sent to Mr. Stanton, were admissible in evidence. It has also admitted evidence of the same effect, on the 22d, offered by the honorable managers. It seems to me that the evidence now offered comes within the principle of those decisions; and, as the Chief Justice has already had occasion to say, he thinks that the principle of those decisions is right, and that they are decisions which are proper to be made by the Senate sitting in its high capacity as a court of impeachment, and composed, as it is, of lawyers and gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the business transactions of life and entirely competent to judge of the weight of any evidence which may be submitted. He therefore holds the evidence to be admissible, but will submit the question to the Senate, if desired.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having asked for a vote, on the question "shall the proof offered be admitted," there appeared yeas 29, nays 21. So the proof was admitted.

The witness then testified as to directions which he received from the President to institute legal proceedings to test General Thomas's right to the office of Secretary of War.

Mr. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, then asked:

What did you do toward getting out a writ of habeas corpus under the employment of the President?

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, the question was referred to the Senate and decided to be admissible; yeas 27, nays 23.<sup>67</sup>

The witness proceeded to describe his efforts in court, saying finally:

But the counsel who represented the Government, Messrs. Carpenter and Riddle, applied to the judge then for a postponement of the examination—

Mr. Manager Butler having questioned this statement, the Chief Justice said:<sup>68</sup>

It is an account of the general transaction, as the Chief Justice conceives, and comes within the rule. The witness will proceed.

The witness, having related how General Thomas was discharged from court, proceeded:

Immediately after that I went, in company with the counsel he had employed, Mr. Merrick, to the President's House, and reported our proceedings and the results to the President. He then urged us to proceed—

Here Mr. Manager Butler interposed an objection, and Mr. Manager John A. Bingham called attention to the fact that this was asking for the President's declaration on February 26, two days after his impeachment.

Mr. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, explained:

If it is to turn on that point, which has not been discussed in immediate reference to this question, we desire to be heard. The offer which the Chief Justice and Senators will remember was read, and upon which the vote of the Senate was taken for admission, included the efforts to have a habeas corpus proceeding taken, and also the efforts to have a quo warranto. The reasons why, and the time at which, and the circumstances under which, the habeas corpus effort was made, and its termination, have been given. Thereupon the efforts were attempted at the quo warranto. It is in reference to that that the President gave these instructions. We suppose it is covered by the ruling already made.

The Chief Justice said:<sup>69</sup>

The Chief Justice may have misapprehended the intention of the Senate; but he understands their ruling to be in substance this: That acts in respect to the attempt and intention of the President to obtain a legal decision, commencing on the 22d of February, may be pursued to the legitimate termination of that particular transaction; and, therefore, the Senate has ruled that Mr. Cox, the witness, may go on and testify until that particular transaction came to a close. Now, the offer is to prove conversations with the President after the termination of that effort in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The Chief Justice does not think that is within the intent of the previous ruling; but he will submit the question to the Senate, Senators, you who are of the opinion that this testimony should be received will please say "aye;" those of the contrary opinion, "no." [Putting the question.] The question is determined in the negative. The evidence is not received.

Thereupon Mr. Curtis propounded this question:

After you had reported to the President the result of your efforts to obtain a writ of habeas corpus, did you do any act in pursuance of the original instructions you had received from the President on Saturday, to test the right of Mr. Stanton to continue in the office? And if so, state what the acts were.

The Chief Justice at once intimated that under the last vote of the Senate this question was inadmissible; but Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, asked that the fifth article of impeachment be read:

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, and on divers other days and times in said year, before the 2d day of March, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, and with other persons to the House of Representatives unknown, to prevent and hinder the execution of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and in pursuance of said conspiracy did unlawfully attempt to prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then and there being Secretary for the Department of War, duly appointed and commissioned under the laws of the United States from holding said office, whereby the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

Counsel for the respondent stated that the question had reference to this article.

The Chief Justice, having had the original offer of proof on the part of counsel for respondent read, said:

The discussion and the ruling of the Chief Justice in respect to that question was in reference to the first article of the impeachment. Nothing had been said about the fifth article in the discussion, so far as the Chief Justice recollects. The question is now asked with reference to the fifth article and the intent alleged in that article to conspire. The Chief Justice thinks it is admissible with that view under the ruling upon the first offer. He will, however, put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, having asked for a vote, there appeared in favor of admitting the question 27 yeas, and against it 23 nays.<sup>70</sup> So the question was admitted.

2247. The Chief Justice admitted during the Johnson trial as showing intent a question as to action by the respondent, although taken after impeachment.—On April 16, 1868,<sup>71</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Richard T. Merrick, attorney at law, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. Witness testified that he had been counsel for Gen. Lorenzo Thomas when the latter was arrested on complaint of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, at the time of the President's attempt to remove Mr. Stanton and place General Thomas in the office; and that after the action of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District in discharging General Thomas, he saw the President and communicated to him what had transpired.

Then Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, proposed a question which, after objection, was presented in an offer of proof:

We offer to prove that about the hour of 12 noon, on the 22d of February, upon the first communication to the President of the situation of General Thomas's case, the President or the Attorney-General in his presence gave the attorneys certain directions as to obtaining a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of testing judicially the right of Mr. Stanton to continue to hold the office of Secretary of War against the authority of the President.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected that the witness had been General Thomas's counsel and had not been employed by the

President. Therefore this witness's testimony could not be considered evidence of the President's acts or declarations after impeachment.

The Chief Justice <sup>72</sup> said :

The Chief Justice thinks this evidence admissible within the rule already determined by the Senate. He will submit the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The witness may answer the question.

Mr. Curtis then proposed this question :

What, if anything, did you and Mr. Cox do in reference to accomplishing the result you have spoken of?

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, the Chief Justice said :

The Chief Justice thinks it is competent, but he will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause, to the witness.] Answer the question.

2248. In impeachment trials witnesses are ordinarily required to state facts, not opinions.

In the Johnson trial a witness was not permitted, as a matter of proof of intent, to state that he had formed and communicated an opinion to respondent.

On February 11, 1805,<sup>73</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, and while one Henry Tilghman was under examination, Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, one of the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, proposed this question :

You say that when the written opinion of the court was thrown on the table, it produced considerable agitation among the gentlemen of the bar. What did you conceive to be the cause of that agitation?

Mr. Philip B. Key, counsel for the respondent, objected.

The President <sup>74</sup> having required the question to be reduced to writing it was read by the Secretary.

Thereupon Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, a Senator, moved that the Senate should withdraw. This motion was then disagreed to.

The question was then put : "Is it competent for the managers to put the said question to the witness?"

It was determined in the negative, yeas 0, nays 34.

2249. On February 12, 1805,<sup>75</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, George Hay, being under examination, the following occurred :

The WITNESS. Finding that the judge had made up his mind on that subject, and that the law of Virginia was not considered as obligatory, I had no idea of making any motion to the court founded on the doctrine which he had thus denounced. My opinion before, at that time, and at the present time, the opinion which I expressed officially on a late occasion, is, that where the laws of the United States do not otherwise require or provide—

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said that he apprehended this testimony was of no kind of consequence.

The WITNESS. I was only about to state the reasons why nothing more was said on that subject, on a motion founded on it.

The PRESIDENT.<sup>76</sup> The Senate object to that sort of testimony. You will please to confine yourself as much as possible to facts.

2250. On April 13, 1868,<sup>77</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was called as a witness on behalf of the President, and Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked this question:

After the restoration of Mr. Stanton to office, did you form an opinion whether the good of the service required a Secretary of War other than Mr. Stanton; and if so, did you communicate that opinion to the President?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham at once objected to the question:

Mr. President and Senators, we desire to state very briefly to the Senate the ground upon which we object to this question. It is that matters of opinion are never admissible in judicial proceedings, but in certain exceptional cases, cases involving professional skill, etc.; it is not necessary that I should enumerate them. It is not to be supposed for a moment that there is a Member of the Senate who can entertain the opinion that a question of the kind now presented is competent under any possible circumstances in any tribunal of justice. It must occur to Senators that the ordinary tests of truth can not be applied to it at all; and in saying that, my remark has no relation at all to the truthfulness or veracity of the witness. There is nothing upon which the Senate could pronounce any judgment whatever. Are they to decide a question upon the opinions of forty or forty thousand men what might be for the good of the service? The question involved here is a violation of the laws of the land. It is a question of fact that is to be dealt with by witnesses; and it is a question of law and fact that is to be dealt with by the Senate.

Now, this matter of opinion may just as well be extended one step further, if it is to be allowed at all. After giving his opinion of what might be requisite to the public service, the next thing in order would be the witness's opinion as to the obligations of the law, the restrictions of the law, the prohibitions of the law. We can not suppose that the Senate will entertain such a question for a moment. It must occur to the Senate that by adopting such a rule as this it is impossible to see the limit of the inquiry or the end of the investigation. If it be competent for the witness to deliver this opinion, it is equally competent for forty thousand other men in this country to deliver their opinions to the Senate; and then, when is the inquiry to end? We object to it as utterly incompetent.

Mr. Stanbery explained the object of the question:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, if ever there was a case involving a question of intention, a question of conduct, a question as to acts which might be criminal or might be indifferent according to the intent of the party who committed them, this is one of that class. It is upon that question of intent (which the gentlemen know is vital to their case, which they know as well as we know they must make out by some proof or other) that a great deal of their testimony has been offered, whether successfully or not I leave the Senate to determine; but with that view much of their testimony has been offered and has been insisted upon. That is, it has been to show with what intent did the President remove Mr. Stanton. They say the intent was against the public good, in the way of usurpation, to get possession of that War Office and drive out a meritorious officer, and put a tool, or as they say in one of their statements a slave, in his place.

Upon that question of conduct, Senators, what now do we propose to offer to you? That the second officer of the Army—and we do not propose to stop with him—that this high officer of the Army, seeing the complication and difficulty in which that office was, by the restoration of Mr. Stanton to it, formed the opinion himself that for the good of the service, Mr. Stanton ought to go out and some one else take the place. Who could be a better judge of the good of the service than the distinguished officer who is now about to speak?

But the gentlemen say what are his opinions more than another man's opinions, if they are merely given as abstract opinions? We do not intend to use them as abstract opinions. The gentlemen did not read the whole question. It is not merely what opinion had you, General Sherman; but having formed that opinion, did you communicate it to the President, that the good of the service required Mr. Stanton to leave that Department; and that in your judgment, acting for the good of the service, some other man ought to be there.

This is no declaration of the President we are upon now. This is a communication made to him to regulate his conduct, to justify him, indeed to call upon him to look to the good of the service, and to be rid, if possible, in some way of that unpleasant complication. Anyone can see there was a complication there that must in some way or other be got rid of; for look at what the managers have put in evidence!

During the arguments Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, submitted in writing this question:

Question. Do the counsel for the respondent offer at this point to show by the witness that he advised the President to remove Mr. Stanton in the manner adopted by the President, or merely that he advised the President to nominate for the action of the Senate some person other than Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Stanbery replied that counsel for the President did not propose either, but proposed to show that General Sherman gave his opinion for the good of the service, and for that good thought that somebody else ought to be in the office.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 15, nays 35. So the question was excluded.

There has been a criticism made upon your communicating this matter to the Military Committee instead of communicating it through the regular channels to the Secretary of War. State your views of that question.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, on the ground that it might swear away an argument of the defense; but when the managers stated that a similar question had been put to another witness by Mr. Carpenter and admitted by the court the objection was withdrawn.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, said:

I object to that question myself, if counsel do not. I do not think the time of the court ought to be wasted with that sort of evidence.

Thereupon Mr. Manager McMahon withdrew the question.

2252. It was decided in the Belknap trial that a question to a witness might not be so framed that the answer might imply an opinion.

On July 11, 1876,<sup>79</sup> in the Senate for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, who asked this question:

Was there any corrupt agreement or any agreement between you and Mr. Belknap in regard to being appointed post trader at Fort Sill?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

We object to the word "corrupt." Say "any agreement." I think by using the word "corrupt" you are asking an opinion of the witness. The objection we make is that the question calls for an opinion as to the character of the agreement instead of calling for the agreement itself.

The President pro tempore <sup>80</sup> said :

The Chair sustains the objection.

2253. In the Swayne trial the opinions of witnesses, including answers to questions of mixed law and facts, were excluded.— On February 11, 1905, in <sup>81</sup> the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, A. H. D'Alemberte, was under examination, when Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, asked this question :

I ask the witness if Judge Swayne, to his knowledge, was in 1900 a resident of the county of which he was collector and in which Pensacola is situated?

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for respondent, objected, saying :

It is a question of law. We have no objection to the witness stating, but desire to have him state, every fact he knows about the movement or the residence of Judge Swayne, or where he actually or bodily was, but to ask a more conclusion of law is, we think, improper.

The Presiding Officer <sup>82</sup> said :

The question is, Was the respondent, to the witness's knowledge, a resident of Pensacola? The witness may answer the question.

The Witness. To my knowledge, he was not.

Q. (By Mr. Manager PERKINS). Was Judge Swayne a resident of Pensacola during that time?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying :

Mr. President, we are not objecting to their asking this witness whether or not in any particular year, month, week, or day Judge Swayne was in Pensacola. That would be a proper question. It would ask for a fact. But they are asking for a conclusion which can only result from the consideration of many facts related to the law.

The Presiding Officer said :

The witness is asked really for his opinion whether Judge Swayne was a resident at a certain place. If this witness can be so asked, any number of witnesses can be asked the question, and the decision of it would then depend upon the opinion of witnesses.

The question of residence is one of mixed law and fact, and must be determined, as the Presiding Officer thinks, by the Senate upon the proved circumstances and facts of the case and not upon the opinion of witnesses resident in that part of the country. So the question is excluded.

2254. On February 21, 1905, <sup>83</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, William A. Blount, was under examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when this question was propounded by Mr. Charles A. Culberson, a Senator from Texas :

Q. What was the manner of Judge Swayne as to anger or resentment in imposing sentence in the contempt proceedings?—A. That depends entirely upon the viewpoint of the man who was listening to him. I believed that he was right. It seemed to me—

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said :

Mr. President, I object to that. It is not an answer to the question. The witness is giving an opinion.

The Presiding Officer <sup>83a</sup> said :

The witness may state how he regarded the appearance of the judge in imposing this sentence. * * *

The Presiding Officer was about to say that he did not think the witness should make any comment in answering any question as to whether he thought the judge was right or not.

2255. On February 22, 1905,<sup>84</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness for the respondent, Thomas F. McGowin, was examined by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent :

Q. You heard all that was said?—A. I did ; all that the judge said.

Q. Yes ; all that the judge said. What was the general appearance of Judge Swayne in the delivery of these remarks?—A. As I recall it, I thought the judge spoke with a little more than ordinary deliberation and calmness and firmness, and the impression that was created on my mind was that——

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said :

Mr. President, I object to the impression created on the witness's mind. What he is entitled to testify to are facts that occurred there at that time.

The Presiding Officer <sup>85</sup> said :

Let the last phrase be stricken out. The witness can not testify in the impression made on his mind.

2256. In the Belknap trial objection was successfully made to an opinion of a subordinate officer as to evidence of the character of respondent's administration.—On July 12, 1876, in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Nelson H. Davis, Inspector-General of the Army, was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, having ascertained that witness had been in the Army during respondent's entire administration and had been holding constant official relations with him, asked :

From all you know of the subject, and from all you know of General Belknap, I ask you what has been the general character of his administration of the War Department?

Mr. Manager George A. Jenks at once objected :

The objection I make to that is that a witness must testify to character instead of to the specific acts of this man, or general acts. He must know what has been said by those who are familiar with his administration in that office, instead of how has he done the business.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar said :

We understand also that it should be the opposite of the particular offense charged. If a man is charged with adultery, his reputation for chastity ; if he is charged with perjury, his reputation for veracity. We suppose the question should be, "What is the reputation of the Secretary for official integrity?" * * * We do not understand that it is competent to prove by a subordinate officer in the Army, as an expert, the general character of the administration of a great officer of state. There is no such thing as an expert in such an administration. We object to the question unless it is limited to the reputation of the Secretary for official integrity.

Mr. Carpenter said :

We shall claim when we come to sum up this case that the general management of the War Department by General Belknap is a proper subject of consideration; that if they could establish this particular charge we could still prove the general management and official conduct of the Department, and then appeal to the Senate upon the whole record of the administration of that office whether this man shall be driven out into a little corner of his life or whether his whole conduct in the office is to be considered.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be admitted.

2257. A witness was permitted in the Belknap trial to give in answer a conclusion derived from a series of facts.—On July 10, 1876,<sup>86</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was examined by the managers and testified as to payments of money to the respondent from remittances received from one Evans, who had been appointed post trader at Fort Sill through witness's efforts in collusion with respondent. The witness had testified to sending remittances to respondent by express, when Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

Did General Belknap know where these moneys came from that you were sending to him?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

I object to that question. That calls for a conclusion, not for a fact. * * * A conclusion may be drawn from a correspondence running through years, and a dozen conversations; but it is a conclusion always. If you ask him what he told General Belknap, or what Belknap ever said to him, that calls for a fact; but to ask him whether he must have known such a thing calls for conclusion.

The question being submitted to the Senate, it was held, without division, to be admissible.

2258. In the Johnson trial the Senate sustained the Chief Justice in admitting as evidence of a general practice tabular statements of documents relating to particular instances.—On April 15, 1868,<sup>87</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence certain certified documents from the Navy Department, being in the nature of tabular statements of the results shown by the records as to appointments and removals of officers. Mr. Curtis described what was offered as follows:

The documents I offer are not full copies of any record. They are, therefore, not strictly and technically legal evidence for any purpose. They are extracts of facts from those records. Allow me, by way of illustration, to read one, so that the Senate may see the nature of the document:

"NAVY AGENCY AT NEW YORK.

"1864, June 20. Isaac Henderson was, by direction of the President, removed from the office of navy agent at New York, and instructed to transfer to Paymaster John D. Gibson, of United States Navy, all the public funds and other property in his charge."

We do not offer that as technically legal evidence of the fact that is there stated; but having in view simply to prove, not the case of Mr. Henderson, with its merits and the causes of his removal, etc., all of which would appear on the records, but the practice of the Government under the laws of the United States; instead of taking from the records the entire documents necessary to exhibit his whole case, we have taken the only fact which is of any importance in reference to this inquiry. If the Senate consider that they must apply the technical rule of evidence, we must get the records and have the records copied, and of course, for the same reason, readmitted.

There was objection on the part of the managers, but after argument the Chief Justice<sup>88</sup> said :

The counsel for the President propose to offer in evidence two documents from the Navy Department, exhibiting the practice which has existed in that Department in respect to removals from office. To the introduction of this evidence the honorable managers object. The Chief Justice thinks that the evidence is competent in substance, but that the question of form is entirely subject to the discretion of the Senate and of the Senate alone. The whole question, therefore, is submitted to the Senate. Senators, you who are of opinion that this evidence should be received will, as your names are called, answer "yea;" those of the contrary opinion, "nay."

And there appeared yeas 36, nays 15. So the document was admitted.

2259. A summary by counsel of the contents of documents was held to be in the nature of argument and not admissible as evidence.—On February 23, 1905,<sup>89</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the presentation of evidence, offered certificates from certain clerks of United States circuit courts, showing the dates at which the respondent had held court.

Then Mr. Thurston said :

For the convenience of the court and notification to the managers as to what we claim these certificates show, I will ask to have printed in the Record a list compiled by us from the certificates showing the various dates in a brief and concise form in the nature of a calendar, and also showing our computations of the number of days covered by them.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying :

Mr. President I submit that the certificates when printed will show what they contain, and their computation is what we object to.

The Presiding Officer<sup>90</sup> said :

That is a part of the argument, and the Presiding Officer thinks should be withheld until the argument is commenced.

2260. In impeachment trials public documents are admitted in evidence for what they may be worth.

Ruling by the Vice-President as to evidence in an impeachment trial.

On February 15, 1805<sup>91</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence a certificate of the clerk of the circuit court of Pennsylvania, to show that at the trial of Fries, in 1799, there were eighty-six civil suits depending.

Also a copy of the indictment on the first trial of Fries.

Also a part of a charge delivered by Judge Iredell at the term when Fries was tried, taken from Carpenter's report of that trial, page 14.

The President<sup>92</sup> said it might be read as a report of the case; but what credit it would deserve it would be for the court to determine.

2261. On January 11, 1831,<sup>93</sup> in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, the counsel for the respondent introduced as a witness Samuel D. King, a clerk in the General Land Office, to prove certain official records of that office relating to land grants in the Province of Louisiana.

The respondent was on trial for unlawfully oppressing Luke E. Lawless, whom he had imprisoned for contempt in criticising in the public prints the action of respondent as judge in a case relating to a land grant.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the introduction of the documents, alleging that they referred to land grants in a portion of the territory different from that in which the case in question had arisen, and that they did not show the practice in upper Louisiana, which was the region to which the pending trial related.

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, said:

We produce it as a public document from the proper repository. It purports to be a genuine document, and it shows, as we shall contend, that the same regulations applied to the whole province.

On the question, "Shall these documents be given in evidence?" there appeared yeas 40, nays 0.

2262. In the Johnson trial a message of President Buchanan, published as a Senate document, was admitted in evidence.—

On April 15, 1868,<sup>94</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, offered, with a view of showing the practice of the Government with reference to appointments to and removals from office, a message of President Buchanan, from the published Executive documents of the Senate.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected:

The difficulty that I find with this message, Senators, is, that it is the message of Mr. Buchanan and can not be put in evidence any more than the declaration of anybody else. We should like to have Mr. Buchanan brought here under oath, and to cross-examine him as to this.

The question being taken, the Senate decided, without division, that the evidence should be admitted.

2263. In the Johnson trial the managers were not required, in submitting a letter of respondent, to also submit accompanying but not necessarily pertinent documents.—On April 2, 1868,<sup>95</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, of Iowa, offered in evidence a certain letter of President Johnson to Gen. U.S. Grant, wherein were two portions referring to accompanying documents:

GENERAL: The extraordinary character of your letter of the 3d instant would seem to preclude any reply on my part; but the manner in which publicity has been given to the correspondence of which that letter forms a part and the grave questions which are involved induce me to take this mode of giving, as a proper sequel to the communications which have passed between us, the statements of the five members of the Cabinet who were present on the occasion of our conversation on the 14th ultimo. Copies of the letters which they have addressed to me upon the subject are accordingly herewith inclosed.

* * * * *

There were five Cabinet officers present at the conversation, the detail of which, in my letter of the 28th ultimo, you allow yourself to say, contains "many and gross misrepresentations." These gentlemen heard that conversation and have read my statement. They speak for themselves, and I leave the proof without a word of comment.

Mr. Wilson stated in introducing the letter that the special object of the managers in introducing it was to show the President's own declaration of an intent to prevent the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, from resuming the duties of the office, notwithstanding the action of the Senate and the requirements of the tenure of office bill.

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, entered an objection which was, by direction of the Chief Justice, reduced to writing, as follows:

The counsel for the President object that the letter is not in evidence in the case unless the honorable managers shall also read the inclosures therein referred to and by the letter made part of the same.

In support of the objection, Mr. Stanbery argued:

The managers read a letter from the President to use against him certain statements that are made in it, and perhaps the whole; we do not know the object. They say the object is to prove a certain intent with regard to the exclusion of Mr. Stanton from office. In the letter the President refers to certain documents which are inclosed in it as throwing light upon the question and explaining his own views. Now, I put it to honorable Senators: Suppose he had copied these letters in the body of his letter, and had said just as he says here, "I refer you to these; these are part of my communication," could any one doubt that these copies, although they come from other persons, would be admissible? He makes them his own. He chooses to use them as explanatory of his letter. He is not willing to let that letter go alone; he sends along with it certain explanatory matter. Now, you must admit, if he had taken the trouble to copy them himself in the body of his letter, they must be read. Suppose he attaches them, makes them a part, calls them "exhibits," affixes them, attaches them to the letter itself by tape or seal or otherwise, must they not be read as part of the communication, as the very matter which he has introduced as explanatory, without which he is not willing to send that letter? Undoubtedly. Does the form of the thing alter it? Is he not careful to send the documents not in a separate package, not in another communications, but inclosed in the letter itself, so that when the letter is read the documents must be read? It seems to me there can not be a question but that they must read the whole and not merely the letter; for it was the whole that the President sent to be read to give his views, and not merely the letter unconnected with these documents.

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham argued against the objection:

We claim that we are under no obligation by any rule of evidence whatever, in introducing a written statement of the accused, to give in evidence the statements of third persons referred to generally by him in that written statement. In the first place, their statements, we say, would not be evidence against the President at all. They would be hearsay. They would not be the best evidence of what the parties affirmed. The matter contain in the letter of the President shows that the papers, without producing them here, have relation to a question of fact between himself and General Grant, which question of fact, so far as the President is concerned, is affirmed in this letter by himself and for himself, and concludes him; and we insist that if forty members of his Cabinet were to write otherwise if could not affect this question. It concludes him; it is his own declaration; and the matter of dispute between himself and General Grant, although it is referred to in this letter, is no part of the matter upon which we rely in this accusation against the President.

Mr. Bingham admitted that if the letters referred to contained a statement relating to the matter with which they charged the President, and if the letter now sought to be introduced showed a statement from them adopted by the President himself in regard to the matter, the objection of respondent's counsel would be well taken.

The question was taken, "Shall the objection of the counsel by the President to the evidence proposed to be offered be sustained?" and there appeared yeas 20, nays 29.

So the objection was overruled and the letter was admitted as presented.

2264. Instance in the Swayne case wherein a witness was permitted to testify as to the nature of a document which was on record in the trial.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 23, 1905,<sup>96</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Charles A. Culberson, a Senator from Texas, submitted a series of questions to a witness for the respondent, W. A. Blount:

Q. Were you counsel for O'Neal in the contempt proceedings against him before Judge Swayne?—A. I was.

Q. Did you raise a question of jurisdiction of the court in those proceedings? If so, please state such question fully and how it was raised.—A. I raised the question by a demurrer.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, while ordinarily we would have no objection to the answer which we anticipate, yet the O'Neal case is all here of record, and objection was made yesterday to our asking the witness Greenbut as to the injury he received and which was exhibited in court at the time of that trial. The objection was based upon the fact that the complete record being here we could not go outside of it. Therefore in return I make the same objection that the record of the O'Neal case shows every proceeding that was had therein, including any objection that may have been taken to the jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

Before that is done, may I make a suggestion? This is a very different matter from the testimony which was sought to be brought out by Greenbut. There the attempt was to prove by him the extent of his injuries in a street combat, with no evidence that the facts as to which he was to testify had been before the court. Our objection was not because of the fact that it was in the record, but that it was proposed to prove something as an excuse for the Judge which had not been before him at the trial of the case, while here this witness is asked to testify to what occurred at the trial of the contempt case.

The Presiding Officer<sup>97</sup> said:

Shall the witness answer the question? [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the ayes have it. [A pause.] The ayes have it, and the witness will answer.

2265. Instance in the Swayne trial wherein, with the concurrence of counsel, the managers introduced without oral testimony a certified copy of a court record.

In the Swayne trial, evidently by written stipulation between managers and counsel, certified copies of records were used in the same way as the original might have been used.

On February 14, 1905,<sup>88</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Samuel L. Powers, of Massachusetts, said :

I offer in evidence, Mr. President, a certified copy of the court record in what is known as the "O'Neal case." This record is made up of what is known as the complaint upon which the order of attachment in this contempt case was issued, and also a demurrer to the original complaint, which appears to have been disposed of, and also the affidavit of the respondent, which is an answer to the complaint, together with other documents, showing the disposition of that case.

It has been agreed between counsel for the respondent and the managers that this record may go into evidence without being read before the court. It is very long and would occupy possibly an entire session if it were read. But I assume, Mr. President, in order to have it go into evidence without being read, it is necessary that we should have the permission of the court to do so. So I tender this record with the request that it become a part of the evidence in this case and be printed as such without first being read to the court.

After the presentation of the affidavits, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, said :

Mr. President, before the manager proceeds, as he says he will call only one witness, I desire to know whether the affidavits and such other matters as were included in these answers are offered and accepted as evidence without testimony being given from the stand? I simply wish the information.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said :

Mr. President, there is no objection on the part of the respondent.

I will state, Mr. President, in respect to that matter, that this is the first trial in this court that I am aware of where a stenographic record of what occurred in another court has been presented here.

In the Peck case, seventy-five years ago, the testimony of what occurred in Judge Peck's court was entirely dependent upon the oral testimony of the witnesses who were present at that trial. It has seemed to counsel for the respondent that they were fortunate in the O'Neal case that a stenographic record had been made and preserved, and that it could be presented here, so that this court would know precisely what had occurred there.

I think therefore it is better that it should go in in that form, even though without the sanction of an oath in this tribunal.

2266. On February 21, 1905,<sup>89</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was under examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when these questions were asked :

Q. Of the original contempt charge. I ask you now directly as to the other defendant in it, Mr. Paquet.—A. Judge Paquet first appear in answer to the citation with counsel, and objected to the proceeding upon the ground that Judge Swayne did not have jurisdiction, as the transaction in which counsel were engaged was not an official transaction of an officer of the court Judge Swayne overruled that contention, and Judge Paquet asked for time in which to make an answer. Thereupon he sued out a writ of prohibition from the circuit court of appeals, which was heard before that court and denied, and then he appeared in the circuit court before Judge Swayne and filed a paper, which was an apology and a purging of the contempt, as I understood, though the paper speaks for itself.

Q. (By Mr. Thurston.) What followed that?—A. Thereupon he was discharged without punishment.

Mr. Thurston then said :

We offer in evidence a certified transcript of that portion of the record in the case, merely asking to have read the paper in which Judge Paquet confessed and purged himself of contempt.

This certified transcript was as follows :

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA, AT PENSACOLA—IN THE MATTER OF CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS AGAINST LOUIS P. PAQUET

Now comes Louis P. Paquet, respondent in the above-entitled matter, and says :

That upon full and mature consideration of his actions and conduct in the matter referred to in the motion, made as the basis of the above-entitled proceedings, through excessive zeal in behalf of his clients, he did so act that this honorable court was justified in believing that the said actions were committed in contempt thereof and as showing disrespect therefor. That respondent regrets exceedingly the course taken by him in this matter, and now appears in court and requests that he be permitted to apologize for his behavior and file with the records in the above-entitled cause this paper.

This cause coming on to be heard, on the application of Louis P. Paquet to withdraw his answer in the above-entitled cause, and the submission of his explanation and apology by the said defendant—

It is now ordered that the said defendant do have leave to withdraw his answer heretofore filed and to subtract the same from the files of this court, and that this court do accept the said apology and statement filed on March 31, 1902, and the said defendant is hereby discharged from the rule to show cause, heretofore granted against him.

F. W. MARSH, Clerk.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said :

We object to that paper. It has never appeared in evidence in this case. The original has never been seen, and whether any such paper exists we do not know. We object to this extract from the minority report, because it was never in the case. * * * The first place where that paper ever appeared is in the minority report. It has never been seen by anybody except perhaps the people who made the minority report. I say it was never offered in evidence in any place. I should like to see the original, if you have it.

Mr. Thurston replied :

This is certified to by the clerk of the court as being a part of the record, and I think, if you will permit me, I have in my pocket the stipulation with the managers that certified copies of records may be produced and used in evidence in the same manner that the original documents could be.

The Presiding Officer<sup>100</sup> said :

The Presiding Officer thinks an official copy of the proceedings in court is proper evidence; and as to the other question, whether this is evidence or not, three parties were proceeded against for contempt. It was one proceeding. The action of the court with regard to two of them has been introduced in evidence, and the Presiding Officer thinks that the action of the court in regard to the third of the persons complained of for contempt can properly be admitted.

2267. By a close vote, after elaborate argument, the record of Congressional debates was admitted during the Swayne trial as having a bearing on the construction of a law.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 23, 1905,<sup>201</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the introduction of evidence, presented and asked to have incorporated in the Record certain extracts from the official debates of Congress. He explained:

These are the debates on three separate occasions when the provisions of law relating to the payment of expenses for travel and attendance of judges holding court outside of their districts were under consideration. We offer it as a part of the parliamentary history of the enactment of these laws and as having some bearing upon their construction.

Mr. Manager Martin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

Mr. President, the honorable counsel for the respondent offers certain extracts from the Congressional Record purporting to contain some portions of the debates at various times upon provisions of pending bills, which subsequently became statutes, relating to the payment of expenses of district judges for the purpose as he states, of construing those acts of Congress. To that we object, first, that it is not competent nor proper in the construction of a statute to consider the debates in Congress, and, second, that if admitted, it would require us in rebuttal to produce all the other portions of the debates, and then to call all those Members of Congress who are not present to ascertain their views upon the construction of the statute for which they then voted. Upon that I will take a very few minutes to refer the Presiding Officer and the Senate to what seems to me to be an entirely conclusive authority upon the subject.

It was decided in The United States v. Freight Association (166 U.S., p. 260) as stated in the syllabus:

"Debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body."

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court. On page 318 he said:

"Looking simply at the history of the bill from the time it was introduced in the Senate until it was finally passed, it would be impossible to say what were the views of a majority of the Members of each House in relation to the meaning of the act. It can not be said that a majority of both Houses did not agree with Senator Hoar in his views as to the construction to be given to the act as it passed the Senate. All that can be determined from the debates and reports is that various Members had various views, and we are left to determine the meaning of this act, as we determine the meaning of other acts, from the language used therein.

"There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. (United States v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 91 U.S. 72; Aldridge v. Williams, 3 How., 9. Taney, Chief Justice; Mitchell v. Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Co., 2 Story, 648; Queen v. Hertford College, 3 Q. B. D., 603.)

"The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other, the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it passed."

Now, Mr. President, you will readily see from the few disjointed remarks in the body at the other end of the building, the bill coming before it for the first time, one Member taking an offhand view of a paragraph and saying so and so, and another saying something else, and the great body who vote for it saying nothing, it is improper—and the Supreme Court has so held, and so have the courts of England—that it is absolutely improper to look into the debates for the purpose of construing an act of assembly. You will see at once that in order to do full justice to the subject it would be necessary to call all those Members who did not vote and ascertain their views; which would amount to taking a new vote in the House of Representatives to determine upon the construction of an act of assembly, the construction of which is proper matter for the courts, and in this instance for the Senate sitting as a court.

Mr. Thurston argued:

We offer to prove that on April 24, 1896, when this provision was before the Senate of the United States, the meaning of the clause was discussed on the floor of the Senate, and growing out of that discussion, and for the avowed purpose of making its meaning explicit, an amendment was attached to the clause in the Senate declaring, in substance, that nothing but actual expenses or moneys actually expended should be allowed the judges. That amendment was put on in the Senate. It went to conference and was rejected by the conference report, thereby, as we claim, determining that it was not the sense of the Congress of the United States that this allowance should be of moneys actually expended by the judges.

We further claim that in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, while a similar provision was under consideration on January 27, 1903, an amendment was offered, the purport of which was to prohibit the allowance to these judges of any traveling expenses where they had not actually made the expenditure of money; in other words, to prohibit them from certifying under the law to their traveling expenses when they had been riding free; and that amendment, made for that specific purpose, was rejected by the House, thereby showing, as we contend, the clear intention of Congress to allow the judges to certify and receive necessary or reasonable traveling expenses whether they paid the money out or not.

We further propose to show that in the House of Representatives on January 27, 1903, while a similar provision was under consideration * * * that the House of Representatives on the date I have last named, in further consideration of this appropriation, took proceedings whereby an amendment was offered to prevent the judges of the courts of the United States from receiving free railroad transportation, which amendment by the House of Representatives was rejected, thereby attesting, as we believe, the opinion or construction of the House of Representatives that the provision of the law permitted judges to receive from the Treasury of the United States reasonable traveling expenses whether they paid their fare or rode free.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, also of counsel for respondent, argued:

Mr. President, in the first place, there are two classes of legislative proceedings incorporated in this offer, as I understand. The one referred to by my colleague in the beginning of his remarks on this offer is where we offered to show the parliamentary history of the clause in the act of June 11, 1896, which is an offer to show an amendment proposed by a Senator, and the adoption thereof in the Senate, and afterwards a conference report, in which the amendment adopted by the Senate was stricken out and a substitute for the same enacted; and in that shape the act of 1896 became a law.

Now, quite apart from the question of the admissibility of debates as to the construction of a statute is the principle that applies on this offer, for I find it laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of The United States v. Johnson (124 U.S. 237-253), which supports this proposition:

"In like manner cogent and persuasive is the construction placed by either or both of the two Houses of Congress by legislation and in debate upon the statute."

The syllabus of that case is as follows:

"The joint resolution of Congress of March 31, 1868 (5 Stat., 251) affords evidence that the practice of the Secretary of the Treasury prior to that date not to cover into the Treasury the sums received from the sale of captured and abandoned property, but to retain them in the hands of the Treasurer in order to pay them out from time to time on the order of the Secretary, was known to Congress and was acquiesced in by it, as to what had been previously done; and all this brings the practice within the well-settled rule that the contemporaneous construction of a statute by those charged with its execution, especially when it has long prevailed, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, and unless it be clear that such construction is erroneous."

In other words, Mr. President, those legislative proceedings will make plain that the construction by a Senator upon the act of Congress under which district and circuit judges are paid when absent from their homes in the one case or their districts in the other holding court—that the construction which the learned managers place upon that act was the one which was sought by a Senator in that debate to place upon that statute in express words, and the Senate passed the amendment, and the conference committee struck it out. The Senate amendment, which was virtually a proviso that no expenses should be certified other than those that were actually incurred, was stricken out, and in place of it the last section of the act 1891, creating the circuit court of appeals, was substituted for it, which said that when these sums were paid to the Judge by the marshal they should be allowed to the marshal in his accounts. That clearly comes within the case of The United States v. Johnson and of the acquiescence by Congress. It is a much stronger case; it is more than an acquiescence by Congress in the construction, for it is by legislation making the statute in terms to be what excludes the construction that was sought to be put on it by a specific amendment to that effect.

That is a different thing from the mere opinions that are expressed by Members of either House of Congress at the time when a bill is in consideration before it; it is a part of the legislative history of the act, the amendment adopted by the Senate and its being stricken out in conference, and another feature added to the law in substitution for it being a part of our offer in what we seek to prove.

Now, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that the principle which has been adduced in the case of The United States v. Freight Association (166 U.S.) is not applicable to the case that is now before the Senate. It is not simply and merely a question as to what is the construction that would be put upon the act in question by a court; it is not a question as to the construction that will be put upon it by any member of this tribunal. The question, we respectfully submit, is whether or no this statute admits of a doubtful construction and is open to more than one opinion. If a statute is ambiguous, if it has been loosely drawn, if it is not clearly and without any uncertainty of one construction, and therefore not open to construction, then we have authority as old as Judge Story, and coming from authority as high as his, that in a case involving the accounts of an officer under such a statute any doubts are to be resolved in favor of the officer; and by a line of authority in the Supreme Court of the United States, followed frequently and numerous in the circuit courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States, we have a long line of authority that where a statute is in the least degree open to construction, and in many cases, Mr. President, where it has not been open to construction a long-continued construction of it by the executive officers of the Government has been held to be cogent, to be persuasive, to be decisive.

I had not expected to go into the presentation of that line of authority on this particular question—the question as to whether or no you would admit debates in Congress. Those debates, Mr. President, under the principle which I have now ventured to enunciate—and I do not suppose it will be disputed—go to the point that if the Congress itself in the debates placed a different construction upon this act from what the learned managers place upon it, there could be no crime in this respondent in placing a like construction upon it; that what here was said, and in another body in debate, as to what was the understanding of Congress as to the meaning of this act when Congress was in the process of enacting it, and again and again in repeated years on appropriation bills in identical terms this same statute has been brought up again and again in debate, that what was said there and then by Members of Congress as to the received construction of this act, totally different from that of the honorable managers, goes to show that this could not have been a statute that was not open to a difference of construction and opinion.

Mr. Manager Olmsted replied :

The long line of authorities which the counsel has cited seems to resolve itself down to the case of Johnson * * * in which the recitals in a joint resolution were accepted as evidence, in accordance with the well-known principle of law that the recital in the preamble of a public act of Parliament of a fact is evidence to prove the existence of the fact, not the debates in the House or in the Senate when the joint resolution was passed, but the joint resolution itself. That is the English and American doctrine.

I will simply add one more authority and rest. In the case of The United States against The Union Pacific Railroad (91 U.S., 72), Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, said, on page 79 :

"In construing an act of Congress we are not at liberty to recur to the views of individual Members in debate nor to consider the motives which influenced them to vote for or against its passage. The act itself speaks the will of Congress, and this is to be ascertained from the language used."

The Presiding Officer said :

The Presiding Officer will submit this question to the Senate: Counsel for the respondent propose to offer certain extracts from the Congressional Record, including debates in the House and Senate, votes in the House and Senate, for the purpose, as stated, of showing the history of the enactment by which the United States judges holding court out of their districts are entitled to expenses and as throwing light upon the true construction of the act. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the noes have it.

Mr. John C. Spooner, a Senator from Wisconsin, demanded the yeas and nays, and the same being taken, there appeared, yeas 34, nays 33. So the evidence was admitted.

2268. The Senate declined to admit in the Belknap trial testimony taken before a House committee and published as a public document.

Instance wherein a Senator objected to evidence which was not objected to by managers or counsel.

On July 1, 1876,<sup>102</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, H. T. Crosby was sworn and examined by the managers and was asked if he had any recollection that General Hazen had testified before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in regard to the post tradership at Fort Sill. The witness responded in the affirmative. Then Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked :

Did General Belknap, to your knowledge, know that the testimony had been given by General Hazen before the Military Committee in regard to Fort Sill?

To this witness replied that he thought General Belknap (the respondent) did know, but this was only an impression which rested on no facts that he could recall.

Mr. Manager McMahon then said :

We propose to show, and we now offer to test the question, the testimony of General Hazen before the Military Committee of the House on the 22d day of March, 1872, and we propose to supplement that with the orders issued from the War Department on the 25th day of March, 1872, which was a very good order but did not quite reach the Fort Sill case. We offer it now, and desire that the testimony of General Hazen, as published in an official document, shall be read :

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, did not object, but said :

It is testimony taken not only not in this Chamber, but taken in pais. * * * The point I want to suggest to the consideration of the manager only is this, that

I never heard one man tried on testimony given in some other tribunal. Without proof that the witness was dead or could not be called, and that the party was present and cross-examined him, it can not be done in a civil case. I suggest to the managers that it would be remarkable if you could read a deposition taken somewhere else.

After discussion, Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, said :

I should like to ask the witness a question through the Chair. Did General Belknap read or hear the testimony of General Hazen?

The witness said :

I do not know, sir.

Mr. Sherman also asked :

I will ask whether that testimony of General Hazen was published in the public journals and brought to the knowledge of General Belknap.

The witness replied :

I do not know.

Mr. Sherman objected to the introduction of the testimony at this stage of the proceedings.

Later, during the examination of Gen. Irvin McDowell by Mr. Manager McMahan, the following occurred :

Q. In the conversation between you and General Belknap, besides referring to this article in the New York Tribune, did you refer to the fact that General Hazen had testified before the Military Committee?—A. I think that I mentioned the fact that I learned from General Garfield that General Hazen had done so. I think General Belknap told me that General Hazen had done so and had said substantially the same thing. I think General Belknap was indignant at General Hazen having done so instead of having come to him. I think he thought he owed it to him to have made this statement to him personally instead of going elsewhere.

The managers then offered as evidence this order :

[Circular.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,

I. The council of administration at a post where there is a post trader will from time to time examine the post trader's goods and invoices or bills of sale; and will, subject to the approval of the post commander, establish the rates and prices (which should be fair and reasonable) at which the goods shall be sold. A copy of the list thus established will be kept posted in the trader's store. Should the post trader feel himself aggrieved by the action of the council of administration, he may appeal therefrom through the post commander to the War Department.

II. In determining the rate of profit to be allowed, the council will consider not only the prime cost, freight, and other charges, but also the fact that while the trader pays no tax or contribution of any kind to the post fund for his exclusive privileges, he has no lien on the soldiers' pay, and is without the security in this respect once enjoyed by the sutlers of the Army.

III. Post traders will actually carry on the business themselves and will habitually reside at the station to which they are appointed. They will not farm out, sublet, transfer, or sell or assign the business to others.

IV. In case there shall be at this time any post trader who is a nonresident of the post to which he has been appointed, he will be allowed ninety days from the receipt hereof at his station to comply with this circular or vacate his appointment.

V. Post commanders are hereby directed to report to the War Department any failure on the part of traders to fulfill the requirements of this circular.

VI. The provisions of the circular from the Adjutant-General's Office of June 7, 1871, will continue in force except as herein modified.

By order of the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND.

Then Mr. Manager McMahon said :

Now, if the Senate please, we propose to offer the testimony of General Hazen, as taken before the committee, for this reason and this purpose: We find from two different sources that General Belknap is advised of the fact and becomes indignant with the knowledge that General Hazen has testified to the existence of certain abuses at Fort Sill which lay directly within his province to correct.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, while not objecting formally, said :

You do not prove by anybody that General Belknap ever read that testimony to know what it was. The indignation arose from the fact that he had been talking before a committee when he ought to have gone through directer channels, through the Army.

Mr. Sherman having persisted in his objection, the question was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked :

Is that the testimony upon which the Senate is asked to vote that the respondent here was charged with a knowledge of this testimony so as to admit it as a declaration made to him?

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar replied :

I understand that General McDowell's testimony is that General Belknap said to him that General Hazen had testified in substance to the same matters which were contained in the New York Tribune article. * * * Therefore stating to him a knowledge of the substance of General Hazen's testimony. Now, if he had that knowledge of the substance of General Hazen's testimony, it tends to show that he knew that these periodical payments of money which came to him from Marsh were payments of money that had come to Marsh from the post trader. If I am in error as to the extent to which General McDowell's statement went, I can be corrected by referring to it. In other words, if General Belknap was receiving once every three months a sum of money from Marsh in New York, it is important for the Senate to know whether Belknap was informed that those moneys were moneys which were being improperly paid in consequence of this bargain of the post trader at Fort Sill to Marsh; in other words, that he knew where the money he was receiving came from. The article in the New York Tribune contains a distinct assertion of those payments by Evans to Marsh, and, as I understand it, the testimony of General Hazen contains in substance the same thing. It is therefore important not as proving the truth of anything that General Hazen said, but as proving that the Secretary of War was notified that such thing was said at that time.

The question being taken, the Senate declined to admit the testimony, yeas 20, nays 31.

2269. Testimony taken before a House committee and seen by respondent was admitted in the Belknap trial, not as evidence of the fact but as a partial foundation for an inference.—On July 11, 1876,<sup>103</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Hon. Hiester Clymer, chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives which had reported the evidence against the respondent, was examined as a witness on behalf of the United States. The witness was shown the manuscript copy of the testimony given by one Caleb P. Marsh before his committee, and, after he had identified it, was asked by Mr. Manager John A. McMahon:

After the testimony of Mr. Marsh was taken, state what action your committee took in regard to it so far as the Secretary of War was concerned.

To this question Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected.

Mr. McMahan explained the objects of the introduction of the testimony:

We propose to put in evidence the fact that the witness Marsh was examined; that his testimony was reduced to writing; that the Secretary of War was officially notified of the fact; that he appeared; that the testimony was read over to him; that he took time to consult; that he finally came in and presented his resignation to the committee, from which we shall draw our inferences as far as the situation permits. That is all. * * *

Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, asked of the manager:

Do I understand that the managers propose to introduce this testimony and follow it by the single proposition that thereupon the Secretary of War resigned, and thereby ask the Senate to draw a conclusion, or that there was anything said by him or done by him other than the mere resignation?

To this Mr. McMahan replied:

I have already stated that we expect to show that the investigation was continued from one hour in the day until another and then continued until the next day, and that while they were waiting for the matter the resignation was brought in and handed to the committee; and I accept the statement of the distinguished counsel, if he desires it in, for the express purpose of preventing his being impeached. If he desires to prove that fact, I have not any objection certainly.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked of the manager:

Shall I understand the managers to propose either to read at large the testimony of Marsh or to have that testimony received here and go upon the record, all for the purpose of proving that after it was delivered the respondent resigned his office? Is that the scope of this proposal, or is it intended to put into the case what Marsh testified in another form on another occasion, that that testimony may speak in this trial?

Mr. Manager McMahan replied:

Mr. President, I will answer the honorable Senator. It is offered in part only for the purpose which the honorable Senator from New York has eliminated from my remarks. The entire purpose is to show that substantially the same testimony as has been given here, not a different statement, but substantially the same statement as has been made here, was read over to the Secretary of War as a charge by one of the coordinate branches of the Government, to which he made no statement under oath or otherwise, and that the substantial facts therein stated having been brought to his knowledge and read without dispute, we are entitled to draw two inferences, the one from his resignation and the other from his failure to deny the facts therein stated, whatever they may have been.

Thereupon Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, said:

That is, you want to use it as a confession.

To this Mr. McMahan replied:

If you put it in that severe light, probably yes.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

I ask the attention of the Senate to the scope of the question which is now to be acted upon, and I put it to this body to say whether any legitimate conclusion such as the counsel for the Government seeks to draw from the conduct which he seeks to prove here would be authorized by the proof. The whole object of the gentleman is to show that in consequence of similar proof being offered before the Committee on War Expenditures and being made known to the defendant in this case he thereupon resigned his commission as Secretary of War, and he admits that at the time this resignation was put in it was done in consequence of an understanding which then was had that thereby impeachment or an action of this kind which is now here pending would be avoided.

Mr. Manager McMahan here interposed :

You misunderstand me. I say if you can prove that, I have no objection.

Mr. Blair continued :

Well, I understand that that is the proof which is to be offered, and is the nature of the case to which the managers now invite this court. Now, I ask the court to consider the state of proof to which the managers invite your attention, and to say whether or not any such conclusion as they seek to have you draw from it could be legitimately drawn. They ask you to draw a conclusion from the fact that the Secretary of War on seeing the proof resigned his office. I ask this court if that is a confession of guilt, or whether anybody in his senses could draw such a conclusion from it, even if it were not accompanied with the facts which we intend to prove if the matter is gone into. We intend to show that the reason of the resignation was that we wanted to avoid this trial, and had reason to believe that the committee before whom this testimony was taken concurred with us in the belief that that would be an avoidance of this trial. Now, take the whole scope of the case, because here is voluminous testimony to be offered and to be considered, and I ask the Senate to consider now before we go into it whether or not any such conclusion as the managers seek to draw from that can be legitimately drawn.

The question being taken, the Senate without division decided to admit the question.

The witness then answered the question, stating that the respondent was shown the testimony of Marsh, that he did not reply to it, and that he sent to the committee information of his resignation as Secretary of War.

Then Mr. Manager McMahan said :

Now we offer in evidence the testimony, the original paper, that was taken before the committee. * * * I offer it in evidence because, of course, it is impossible for this court to know to what extent the defendant was implicated by this testimony unless we know just exactly what the testimony was; and the strength of the inference, or its weakness, must of course be determined by the strength or weakness of the charges and the directness of the testimony.

Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, having intimated but not formally made an objection, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, said :

Shall I understand that it is now proposed to offer here for any purpose the testimony delivered by Marsh before the committee of the House? If it is, if nobody else does, I raise an objection to that, on the ground that it is incompetent; and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. Francis Kernan, a Senator from New York, asked :

Is the object to have it read as evidence in this case, or read as a communication made to Mr. Belknap?

Mr. Manager McMahan replied :

To have it read precisely upon the principle that the article in the New York Times of February 15, 1872, was read, as a charge of certain matters therein stated, but not as evidence of the truth of anything therein stated. Every lawyer, I think, can see the difference.

Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, a Senator from Delaware, asked :

What is the object and intent of the offer?

Mr. Manager McMahan replied :

I think the honorable Senator from Delaware will remember that in my answer to the remark of the Senator from New York who sits farthest from me [Mr. Kernan] I stated distinctly the object and purpose of this offer not as evidence to this court of the truth of any fact therein stated, but simply for the purpose of showing that at a particular time certain charges from an authorized source were made against the defendant, which were read to him for the purpose of ascertaining what action he took after this was communicated to him.

Mr. Bayard asked further:

Is it the object of the present inquiry to corroborate or discredit the testimony of Marsh, the witness, or to establish any fact therein referred to, or solely to prove what was the action or conduct of Mr. Belknap when the fact that such charges had been made against him was so made known to him?

Mr. Manager McMahon replied:

Mr. President, the question put to the managers is as follows: "Is it the object of the present inquiry to corroborate or discredit the testimony of Marsh?" In the first place, I will answer in detail that it is to corroborate Mr. Marsh in just this far, not as evidence of any facts stated therein, but when the charge was made by Marsh the Secretary of War by his conduct admitted the truthfulness of it.

Secondly, "Or to establish any fact therein referred to." Not as evidence of any fact therein referred to except in this way, when the fact is charged against the defendant, to draw a conclusion as to its truthfulness or untruthfulness by the action of the Secretary of War in regard to it.

"Or solely to prove what was the action or conduct of Mr. Belknap when the fact that such charges had been made against him was so made known to him." It is solely for that purpose; but from that we draw our conclusion as to the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the charge there stated, but do not seek to establish any minor details on that point.

Mr. Carpenter, arguing against the admission of the evidence, said:

If it is competent to introduce this testimony given by Marsh before the House committee simply because Belknap did not say anything in reply to it, is it not competent to introduce here every newspaper article that has charged him, from Maine to California, with being guilty of this offense, and with being a thief and all that sort of thing, to which he has, under direction of counsel, never opened his mouth, to which he has never written a reply, of which he has never taken the slightest notice? Upon what principle could you introduce the deposition of this witness simply because it was read to the defendant and he said nothing, and exclude a newspaper article which you could show he had seen and to which he had said nothing? We did not care when the article from the New York Tribune was offered to object for certain reasons. It was very doubtful in our mind whether that was legal testimony; but we did not care to object to it. But here is an offer made now the result of which, if sustained, is that if they can show that a newspaper has published an article charging him with being a thief in this particular, calling him all the hard names they can think of in consequence of these charges made here, and that he read it and threw it down, making no remark, that would be as competent as this testimony. It must be borne in mind that that committee had no jurisdiction over Mr. Belknap. Mr. Belknap could have no trial before that committee. A few things may be mentioned in a political trial that would not be proper in a court of law. It was well known that that committee was of an opposite political faith, and it was not expected that much justice would be done to Mr. Belknap or any other Republican; and any lawyer, I think, who had been consulted by Mr. Belknap would have given him the advice which he did receive, and that was to let the committee alone till they got through, and then see what their charges amounted to. But if the managers can introduce this evidence upon the ground that it was read to him and he said nothing, I submit that every newspaper article which can be shown to have been seen by him is evidence if they can also show that he read it and made no reply.

The question on the admission of the testimony being taken, the Senate decided, yeas 24, nays 14, that it should be admitted.

On July 19 <sup>104</sup> John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was examined as a witness, and was asked this question by Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent :

Mr. Evans, after you went back to Fort Sill with your appointment would you have reduced your prices but for the contract made with Marsh ?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, and the Senate, without division, excluded the question.

Mr. Carpenter then said :

Now, Mr. President, following the example of the managers, I offer here in partial corroboration of this witness his examination before the committee of the House, in which he swore distinctly that he would not have made the change of a shilling and that he never would have put prices down until he was compelled by the commission of officers that had jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

This matter is considered to be ruled out under the decision already made, I take it. If the Senate will not let him swear to it here in open court, they certainly will not allow you to corroborate him in that way.

After argument, during which Mr. Carpenter quoted the words of Mr. Manager McMahon as to the Marsh testimony, wherein he stated that the object was to corroborate Marsh's oral testimony to a qualified extent, the question was taken, and the Senate, without division, excluded the testimony.

On February 14, 1905,<sup>105</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, made the following offer of testimony in support of the articles relating to respondent's alleged improper use of a railway car :

The managers offered to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, at the city of Washington, D.C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of Nebraska, objected to the introduction of this evidence, claiming that it was prohibited by section 859 of the Revised Statutes :

No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony.

Mr. Thurston said :

Judge Swayne did appear ; he was examined and cross-examined, and, speaking a little outside of the record, I know that these questions the managers propose to ask him relate mostly, if not wholly, to his answers made on his cross-examination. But, Mr. President, the law of Congress does not distinguish between a man who comes before Congress or a committee of his own volition and a man who is haled there by process. The prohibition of the statute is as broad as human language can make it. It was designed for a wise and beneficent purpose, and no thought, in our judgment, ought to be had here by the managers in this case against our objection of attempting to override that statute of the Congress of the United States. * * * Mr. President, just a word or two in reference to this last suggestion, which is one which I had not expected to hear—that this trial is not a criminal proceeding. What is it, Mr. President? It has been held through all the history of impeachment trials to be in accordance with trials of persons charged with crimes. The verdict to be rendered in the case is one of "Guilty" or "Not guilty"—a verdict which is only appropriate in a criminal proceeding. Punishment is not of life, or limb, or liberty, but, sir, it is a far graver one, in my judgment, than any of those would be. It is a punishment of so grave a character that it can only be inflicted, under the Constitution of the United States, on being found guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors, and yet the gentleman says, with apparent sincerity, that this is not a criminal proceeding. You are trying this man here on a charge that he is guilty of a high crime or a high misdemeanor, and yet you say it is not a criminal proceeding.

Now, Mr. President, Charles Swayne, as the record shows, appeared before the House subcommittee and was sworn as a witness, and testified there. Afterwards, at another session of the committee, he again appeared, and was again examined and cross-examined before the same tribunal on another day. Did you ever hear in any court of justice the theory, when a man has been sworn as a witness on one day, that you needed to swear him again on the next day in the same case?

Mr. Manager Palmer said :

The offer is to prove that Judge Swayne voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee and made a voluntary statement in his own defense. He was not a witness; he was not summoned; and his statement was entirely voluntary. * * * On this occasion he read a typewritten statement, which occupies thirteen pages of the record. After his statement was read certain questions were asked him based on allegations that were made in his statement; and the questions that were asked him, that we now offer to prove, were based on suggestions made in his statement. The questions were asked by members of the committee to clear up some things that Judge Swayne had stated in his written statement. Now, we offer this testimony in entire good faith. * * * I say we offer this testimony in entire good faith. We are not pettifoggng; we are not endeavoring to get before the Senate testimony which is not testimony; but we offer it because we believe it is testimony, because it is competent testimony, and because it is the admission of the respondent here, a judge of a Federal court, who, in his own defense, made a voluntary statement, and he ought not to be objecting to it now here, as we believe. * * * No, sir; it was not under oath. To state the fact exactly as it is, Judge Swayne appeared before the committee, and this conversation occurred. On a previous occasion this testimony was given, or at least this statement was made on the last hearing that was had. On a previous hearing, several months before, Judge Swayne appeared and raised some question about some testimony that was given as to his residence. It was said to him by a member of the committee, "There is one man in the United States who knows all about this subject," and Judge Swayne said: "Do you mean me?" The committeeman said: "Yes; I mean you." Judge Swayne said: "Do you wish to have me sworn?" It was said to him: "That is entirely voluntarily with you; you can be sworn if you desire to be sworn." Then he held up his hand, and was sworn. That was at the hearing some months before. At the last hearing he appeared and read this typewritten statement, which, I say, occupies thirteen pages of the record, and that statement led to the inquiry made by a committeeman, which elicited the information which we now ask to give here. He was not sworn at that time. He had been sworn some months before on a different proposition at his own request or on his own volition.

Now, the reason for this statute is plain. It protects a witness who is compelled to testify to matters which might criminate him. In this case the offer is to show that Judge Swayne appeared voluntarily before the committee—and that is admitted—that he was not a witness summoned to appear, but that he appeared voluntarily, and made a statement and argument in his own defense. Something he said in that argument attracted the attention of a member of the committee who interrogated him and elicited the matter contained in the offer.

The statement is evidence here, first, because this is not a criminal proceeding against the respondent. If he has committed any crime, he can be punished for it in another proceeding. This is a proceeding in which, if Judge Swayne were convicted, he would not be punished as for a crime, but the extent of the punishment would be removal from office. It is a proceeding calculated to keep the judiciary unswayed and pure. It is the only method by which a judge who violates the tenure on which his office is held can be removed. His commission runs that he is to hold this office "during good behavior," and the only tribunal on earth in which that question can be settled is this august tribunal.

We are here to ascertain whether Judge Swayne has behaved himself well, and whether he is fit to hold this office. This is not a criminal trial; it is not a criminal prosecution; it is not followed by a sentence of any court. All that you can do under the Constitution is to deprive him of his office. If he has committed any offense the Constitution provides that he can be tried for that in another proceeding, and punished if he is found guilty.

The second reason why this is evidence is because he was not summoned to testify before the House committee, but appeared voluntarily to make a statement in his own defense. * * * Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the section of the Constitution of the United States under which this proceeding is had. I said that this was not a criminal prosecution. Did anybody ever hear that a man could be twice tried and convicted for the same offense? If the first trial is a criminal prosecution, then, of course, he could not be tried and convicted again. The provision of the Constitution is this:

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

Now, I say that is an amazing proposition that this judge who appeared and made a voluntary statement in his own defense should be objecting here now on the ground that it might incriminate him.

The Presiding Officer<sup>106</sup> ruled:

The general proposition that the admissions of a defendant may be proved does not seem to the Presiding Officer to apply to this case. The statute is that—

"No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony."

Now, without deciding technically whether this is testimony which was given by a witness before a committee, or whether it is proposed to use it in a criminal proceeding, or in a court, the Presiding Officer thinks that the intention of the statute is such as to make this evidence inadmissible.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, asked that the question be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. Bailey said:

If the court please, section 103 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

"No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous." (See sec. 859.)

Plainly the purpose of that statute was to enable the committees of either House, or either House itself, to compel the attendance and the testimony of any witness, and it provides, contrary to the rule of law not obtaining in the courts, that the witness shall not be permitted to decline to testify upon the ground that it might disgrace him or tend to render infamous. Having deprived him of the privilege which he would enjoy before the courts of this country, and having compelled him to testify before its committees, even to his own infamy or disgrace, Congress very wisely then provided that such testimony should not be adduced against him in any criminal proceeding in any court.

But, Mr. President, this is not a criminal proceeding within that statute, and this, in my opinion, is not a court within the meaning of that statute. The Constitution may seem to contemplate that we shall sit as a court when we try the President, because it provides that the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside at such a trial. Whether that was intended, as has been suggested by some, to protect the President against the ruling of the Vice-President, who might succeed to the Presidency in the event of the President's conviction and removal, or whether it was intended, as has been suggested by others, to secure a more certain and a more correct interpretation of the law, I do not undertake at this time to decide.

My own opinion is that the reason which prevailed upon the framers of the Constitution to provide that the Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate when it tries the President on impeachment charges was that the Vice-President might be suspected of having a deep and peculiar personal interest in the result of such a trial. But whether one or the other was the reason, it can not be successfully contended that this is a court within the meaning of section 859, or if it shall be held that this is a court, then it can not be contended that this is a criminal proceeding within that section.

The very provision of the Constitution under which we are proceeding negatives the idea that this is a criminal action, because it expressly provides that no matter what our judgment may be, it only excludes the incumbent against whom it may be pronounced from the honorable office which he holds and it leaves to the ordinary administration of the criminal jurisprudence of the country the punishment for his criminal acts. * * * Mr. President, a judge, in my opinion, may be impeached without being guilty of a crime. He holds his office by a different tenure from that under which other civil officers of the Government enjoy. He holds his office during good behavior, and more than one of the charges in this very case are not a crime. No penalty is denounced against the violation of that provision of the statute which provides that a judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and that his failure to do so shall be a high misdemeanor.

That term is new in legal vernacular. I know of no law books which furnish a distinction between a misdemeanor and a high misdemeanor. Certainly the Constitution does not. Congress has not seen fit to affix a penalty of any criminal nature to this very provision itself, and obviously the whole purpose that Congress had in mind when it declared that a failure to reside in the district for which the judge had been appointed was a high misdemeanor, was that his failure to do so should be an impeachable offense.

I put this case to the court and all the honorable members of it. Suppose there should be nothing before this body but the naked question, Does the honorable judge reside in his district? The law says that if he does not, he is guilty of a high misdemeanor. Does any member of the court doubt that if counsel for the respondent or the respondent himself were to rise in this court and say, "I do not reside in my district," there would be the slightest hesitancy in finding him guilty on that charge? Yet, sir, that charge is not a crime, and no Senator will contend that he could be prosecuted in the courts and punished for his failure to reside in his district. It is declared by law, it is true, to be a high misdemeanor, but it is not a crime, because there is no penalty attached to it by the law. Again, sir, suppose a judge should arbitrarily and maliciously disbar an attorney, does any Senator doubt that he could be, and ought to be impeached? And yet, sir, there is no criminal statute in that behalf provided.

The respondent was not a witness, within the statute, when examined before the committee of the House. As has well been suggested by my learned brother near me, whenever a party to a proceeding voluntarily takes the stand, he must be presumed to know the nature of it, and when he volunteers his testimony everything he says can be used. There are States under whose system of criminal jurisprudence the defendant himself may testify. He can not be called by the State; he can not be compelled to take the witness stand in his own behalf, and if he fails or refuses to do so it is error, and reversible error, for the prosecuting attorney to refer to that fact. But when the accused does take the witness stand in his own behalf, then he is not simply permitted to testify to what he thinks may be to his own benefit. He can be cross-examined, and all he says must be received and considered by the jury as testimony in the case.

When the respondent in this case voluntarily appeared before a committee of the House, with a full knowledge of the nature of its inquiry, and proceeded to take any of the facts, it was within the power and duty of that committee to interrogate him as to all the facts, and when he had made his statement there it does not lie with him to claim immunity under this statute.

I believe that the protection afforded by section 859 was made necessary and proper by section 103.

Having deprived the witness of a privilege as ancient almost as courts of justice, it was just and proper that he should not be exposed to prosecution and conviction upon his own testimony, which he had been compelled to give.

I do believe, further, that this is a court within the meaning of that statute. I am sure that this is not a criminal proceeding within the meaning of the statute, because the respondent might be found guilty of a charge that would terminate his office, although he were guilty of no crime.

I am further sure that the respondent in delivering his testimony before the committee of the House was not a witness within the reason or the protection of the statute, and I am still more certain that if he shall be deemed a witness he must be treated as a witness who came voluntarily to testify and whose testimony may be used against him.

Further discussion having been prevented by reference to the rules, the Presiding Officer put the question: "Is the evidence admissible?" and there appeared yeas 28, nays 45. So the evidence was not admitted.

On February 16, 1905,<sup>107</sup> as the managers were about to conclude the presentation of testimony, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, referred again to the subject of the respondent's statements before the House committee, and suggested a reconsideration of the former decision of the Senate:

Mr. President, if it can be shown, and it appears of record, so that the showing is not difficult if it exists, that Judge Swayne made any statement before the House committee before the oath was administered to him by that committee as a witness, we shall interpose no objection to such statement. But we do object to any statement that he made before that committee after he was sworn as a witness. * * * I do not desire to add anything to the argument I made the other day on this same question, except to call the attention of the Senate to one provision of the Constitution of the United States. It was urged here the other day that this is not a criminal proceeding, and that Judge Swayne is not charged with or being tried for a crime. I wish simply to call attention to a section of the Constitution, it being the last portion of section 2 of Article III. I read:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."

On motion of Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, and by a vote of yeas 53, nays 18, the doors were closed for consideration of the admissibility of the evidence heretofore ruled out.

On February 20,<sup>108</sup> the Presiding Officer announced in the Senate sitting for the trial:

Before the reading of the Journal the Presiding Officer will announce that at the last session of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment the question of evidence was decided, namely, the proposal of the managers to introduce statements by Judge Swayne made before the committee of the House of Representatives, and it was decided that such statements were inadmissible. The vote by which it was decided will appear upon the reading of the Journal.

The Journal being read, it appeared that on the question—

Are the statements made by Judge Swayne before the committee of the House of Representatives admissible as evidence?

it was determined in the negative—yeas 29, nays 47.

2271. In proving the contents of lost letters the Senate, in the Belknap trial, permitted the witness to be interrogated generally as to the import of a series of letters.

Instance of a ruling by the President pro tempore on a question of evidence during an impeachment trial.

On July 10, 1876,<sup>109</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh was called as a witness for the United States, and was questioned as to sums of money which he had sent to the respondent, and as to letters that had passed between them. He testified that he had destroyed all letters and telegrams, although he had received such from the respondent, directing how the money should be forwarded. After this testimony Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said to the counsel for the respondent:

Gentlemen, we have served a notice upon you to produce the letters which have passed between these parties, and, of course, we are ready now to receive them, or to offer evidence of their contents.

The notice was read as follows:

All letters, telegrams, and communications from said Caleb P. Marsh to you in regard to the appointment of post trader at Fort Sill or elsewhere.

All letters from said Marsh to you concerning the management, conduct, or removal of the post trader at Fort Sill.

All letters or telegrams from said Marsh to you in any way connected with the forwarding to you of money, certificates of deposits, drafts, etc.

All letter from said Marsh to you informing you of the state of accounts between him and yourself, particularly the letter informing him of a change in the amount of the annual payment to be made to you by him some time in the spring of 1872.

The time covered by this notice is from June 1, 1870, to March 2, 1876. The dates more particularly referred to are those specified in the seventeenth specification set forth in the fourth article of the impeachment articles filed against you.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said:

This notice, as far as it calls for letters touching the management of affairs at Fort Sill, calls for what were official letters, and may be found at the War Department. We have no other letters called for by the notice.

Thereupon Mr. Manager McMahon proceeded to ask questions to elicit proof as to the contents of the letters from witness to respondent, finally asking:

Now, give us the contents, as near as you can remember, or the substance, of one of these letters, without the date?

To this Mr. Carpenter objected, saying:

The rule is perfectly well settled that if an instrument is called for and not produced they may prove the contents of it. There is no doubt about that; but to ask the witness what was the general substance of letters without regard to date is not proving any instrument whatever. I deny that you can take a witness up here and pull a drag-net over the correspondence of business men for years and ask "what was the general purport of your correspondence?" That will not do. That is too indefinite. They will have to introduce the particular letter, and if they do not have it they must account for its loss, either by them or by us, and they may then prove the contents of that particular paper; but having shown that a particular paper is lost they can not ask the witness upon the general tenor of all these letters without regard to their date. When the question was put distinctly to this witness as to what were the contents of the letter which accompanied the first remittance, he said he did not remember. Now, if there is any other particular letter which they can locate in the mind of the witness and prove by him its contents, that of course is not objected to; but the question, "what is the general substance of letters," without regard to their dates, is not proving a particular paper; it is proving at large what was the substance of a general correspondence. That can not be done. You must prove it by introducing every letter by itself. If you have not got the letter, then you must account for its loss and prove its contents, not by proving what was the general tenor of 40 papers. It is for the court to say what the general tenor of them is, after they know each letter, and we are to have the substance of each letter as near as the witness can give it.

Mr. Manager McMahan's argument was:

What we desire to prove is this: We may call his attention to the particular date, but we go further and ask, Was there a general form in which you sent them, or was there any particular letter of which you may remember the substance? The idea is that we have got to go through these 14 different occasions when money was sent, and if he does not remember the contents of a particular letter, therefore, it is not competent to testify to the contents of all of them as to his best impression! I understand that the rules of evidence are based upon a knowledge of human nature, upon a knowledge of the infirmities of human nature, and that a witness who has transacted business of this kind, when the documents are in the possession of the defendant, when he undertakes to state here the substance of their contents, is entitled to state it without saying that it was the contents of the letter of the 1st of November or the 6th of October or the 9th of October, 1874. I think I have said all upon this question that the occasion demands.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question to the Senate, it was decided without division that the interrogatory should be admitted.

The witness having, in response to the question, stated the general tenor of one of these letters, this question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahan.) After you had dispatched a letter like that, what letter would you get in return? Give us the contents of one of his letters that you can remember.

Mr. Carpenter said:

I want formally to make the same objection. I suppose, of course, it will be overruled, but I want to make the same point here as upon the former question.

The President pro tempore <sup>110</sup> said:

The Chair will take it as the sense of the Senate that the objection is overruled.

The question having been answered, another question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahan.) State whether, after shipping the money to him by express, you informed him of that fact; and if so, how.

Mr. Carpenter having objected, the President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate.

Mr. Simon Cameron, a Senator from Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays, which were refused.

Thereupon, without division, the Senate decided the evidence admissible.

Witness having stated that he sent the express receipt by mail when he sent the remittance, Mr. Manager McMahan asked:

State whether you received any reply; and if so, in what shape.

Mr. Carpenter, having ascertained that the question did not relate to a specific transaction, objected.

The Senate admitted the question.

Later Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

When you inclosed one of these certificates of deposit to him, state what was the substance of the letter which you did send to him accompanying the certificate.

Mr. Carpenter having objected unless a particular certificate was specified, the President pro tempore said:

The Chair overrules the objection. The witness will answer the question.

Soon after Mr. Manager McMahon asked:<sup>121</sup>

When you delivered the money to him [the respondent] you stated that you at first delivered him $1,500 quarterly, and after the lapse of one and a half or two years $1,500 semiannually. State now whether you failed to deliver to him exactly at the time the amount that you were to deliver to him; and if so, why.

Mr. Carpenter said:

I want to object to that question, Mr. President. It is as disagreeable to me to seem to be captious about objections as it is disagreeable to the Senate to have me captious, but the insidious manner in which the facts of this case are sought to be kept out of view, while some deductions and conclusions are forced in as their substitute, is, although very ingenious and very artful and very gradual, yet perfectly apparent. We ought to have the questions so put to the witness that he will understand and that we shall understand precisely what transaction is being referred to. Now, you call his attention to no particular transaction at all; you do not name a place and do not fix a date; you do not determine any particular transaction; and yet you are trying in that way to float him over all of them, when in the only instance in which you put the question direct you did not get what you wanted to get, and I suppose that is the reason why the manager is now seeking to generalize. But it is an improper way, as I believe, to lead this witness. The manager knows perfectly well how to put the proper questions in a direct examination, not fix him between this boulder and that rock, and lead him from step to step and over gulch and gulf, as he is doing by this method of examination. This is too big a thing to be played on a small mere game. Let us have it out: let us have the facts. This is too big a court to be trifled with by that method of examination. Here is a man put on the stand to swear to we all know what. Why do not they let him swear to it? Why do not they put him right straight forward and let us have these facts in their natural order, and not dragged out one after the other in this indirect and, as I think, improper way?

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

Mr. President, it is a matter of great deprivation to the House of Representatives, no doubt, that the able gentleman (and I say it in all seriousness and earnestness) does not sit here to conduct the case of the Government for it, but that is one of those accidents which we can not prevent, for the simple reason that he fails to be a Member of the House. The House has selected us to try this case, and while we concede to the gentleman (and we concede it honestly, not in any other except the fairest meaning) great ability in his profession and a full understanding of all the points of law and a full knowledge of all the details of practice and a full aptitude in all the details of nisprius trials, yet we most respectfully submit to the Senate that we, however humble, appear here trying this case on our side, and if the gentleman will but possess his soul in patience for a little while the time will come when he can double this witness up all over four or five times with his unusual skill, and he can bring out all this truth that we are now so insidiously suppressing. He then make it appear that his client is innocent, and that all this that we are introducing as testimony has nothing whatever to do with this case. A little patience now, a little of that which we have exercised, and the time will come when all these material facts in this case, all this hidden truth, can be brought out in the full sunlight that we have had in the last three or four days. Now, we propose, and we must be allowed that privilege, to put the questions to the witness. I never knew that right interfered with before.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be put to the witness.

2272. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice was sustained in admitting as evidence the warrant and papers in a legal proceeding to which respondent was related, but not a party directly.—On April 13, 1868,<sup>112</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. R. J. Meigs, clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, was called on behalf of the respondent and testified that on February 22 he affixed the seal of the court to a warrant for the arrest of Lorenzo Thomas. The said Thomas was Adjutant-General of the Army and had been arrested on complaint of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, who made affidavit that Thomas had been appointed by respondent to take illegal possession of the office of Secretary of War.

The testimony as to the issuance of the warrant having been read, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, proposed to introduce as evidence the warrant and affidavit on which the warrant was issued.

To this Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected.

I have the honor to object, Mr. President, to the warrant and affidavit of Mr. Stanton being received as evidence in this cause. I do not think Mr. Stanton can make testimony against the President by any affidavit that he can put in, or for him by any proceedings between him and Lorenzo Thomas. I do not think the warrant is relevant to this case in any form. The fact that Thomas was arrested has gone in, and that is all. To put in the affidavit upon which he was arrested certainly is putting in res inter alios. It is not a proceeding between Thomas and the President; but this is between Thomas and Stanton, and in no view is it either pertinent or relevant to this case or competent in any form, so far as I am instructed.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, the arrest of General Thomas was brought into testimony by the managers and they argued, I believe in their opening, before they had proved it, that that was what prevented General Thomas using force to take possession of the War Office. We now propose to show what that arrest was in form and substance by the authentic documents of it, which are the warrant and the affidavit on which it was based. The affidavit, of course, does not prove the facts stated in it; but the proof of the affidavit shows the fact upon which, as a judicial foundation, the warrant proceeded. We then propose to follow the opening thus laid of this proceeding, by showing how it took place and how efforts were made on behalf of General Thomas by habeas corpus to raise the question for the determination of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to this act.

* * * * *

It has already been put in proof by General Thomas that before he went to the court upon this arrest he saw the President and told him of his arrest, and the President immediately replied "that is as it should be," or "that is as we wish it to be, the question in court." Now, I propose to show that this is the question that was in the courts, to wit, the question of the criminality of a person accused and his civil-tenure bill. And I then propose to sustain the answer of the President, and also the sincerity and substance of this his statement already in evidence, by showing that this proceeding, having been commenced as it was by Mr. Stanton against General Thomas, was immediately taken hold of as the speediest and most rapid mode, through a habeas corpus, in which the President or the Attorney-General, or General Thomas acting in that behalf, would be the actor, in order to bring at once before this court, the supreme court of the District, the question of the validity of his arrest and confinement under an act claimed to be unconstitutional, with an immediate opportunity of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States then in session, from which at once there could have been obtained a determination of the point.

At the conclusion of the argument the Chief Justice <sup>113</sup> said :

The Chief Justice thinks the affidavit upon which the arrest was made is competent testimony, as it relates to a transaction upon which Mr. Thomas has already been examined, and as it may be material to show the purpose of the President to resort to a court of law. He will be happy to put the question to the Senate if any Member desires it. [No Senator being heard to speak.] Read the affidavit.

But before the reading began, Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, demanded that the question be put to the Senate. This being done, there appeared, yeas 34, nays 17. So the reading of the warrant and affidavit in evidence was permitted.

2273. On April 13, 1868,<sup>114</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, R. J. Meigs, clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, had testified as to the issuance of the warrant for the arrest of Lorenzo Thomas on the affidavit of Edwin M. Stanton, and the warrant and affidavit had been admitted as evidence.

Then Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked :

Have you got the docket entries as to the disposition of the case of The United States v. Lorenzo Thomas, and if so will you produce and read them ?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the evidence as incompetent.

The Chief Justice <sup>115</sup> said :

The Chief Justice thinks that this is a part of the same transaction, and is competent evidence ; but he will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The witness will answer the question.

2274. Instance in the Belknap trial wherein a document not pertinent on its face was admitted to prove the negative of a pertinent proposition.—On July 8, 1876, in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, proposed the introduction as evidence of this letter, as bearing on the charge that the respondent had a corrupt arrangement with Marsh and Evans, who were interested in the past tradership at Fort Sill :

General Orders, No. 89.] WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

"Washington, October 12, 1872.

The opinion of the Acting Attorney-General upon the following questions is published for the information and guidance of all concerned :

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,

"Washington, October 3, 1872.

"SIR: I have duly considered the questions which you ask the Attorney-General in your letter of the 11th instant, and which are as follows :

"Where persons such as post traders, contractors, and others have been allowed by proper authority to erect buildings to facilitate their business upon a military reserve, with no restriction as to the term during which they shall be allowed to remain—

"1. Are such buildings, after the removal of the trader, contractor, or other person from the reserve, still his personal estate, and as such has he the right to dispose of them by rent, lease, or sale to other persons?"

"2. Does not such property become part of the realty after the appointment of a trader is revoked or a contractor has fulfilled his contract, or any event happens which dissolves their business connection with the reserve?"

"By the order of the Secretary of War of June 17, 1871 (a copy of which you inclose to me), it is provided that 'post traders appointed under the authority given by the act of July 15, 1870, will be furnished with a letter of appointment from the Secretary of War, indicating the post to which they are appointed.'

"They will be permitted to erect buildings for the purpose of carrying on their business upon such part of the military reservation or post to which they may be assigned as the commanding officer may direct, such buildings to be within convenient reach of the garrison.

"They will be allowed the exclusive privilege of trade upon the military reserve to which they are appointed, and no other person will be allowed to trade, peddle, or sell goods, by sample or otherwise, within the limits of the reserve.

"They are under military protection and control as camp followers.

"Buildings erected by post traders on a military reserve, in conformity to this order, are erected for the mutual benefit of the Government and the trader, and are not to be regarded as buildings would be erected by trespassers, or even by tenants under leases, in which no provision is made therefor; but they are erected under a license from the Government and for the mutual benefit of both parties. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that by the proper construction of the license these buildings were not intended to become a part of the realty after their erection; but were to continue the property of the traders, and, lest therefore when a trader is removed from his post, I have no doubt that he has a right to remove the building from the place where it was erected; and that when removed he can dispose of the materials as his own property. But it is very clear that the license to erect such buildings is a purely personal one, and is granted for one purpose only. Therefore, under such licenses, the person so erecting the building would have no right to rent or lease the same or even to sell it to another post trader without permission of the military authorities, but his rights are confined solely to that of removing the building from the reserve. Undoubtedly the property in such a building might, with the approval of the commanding officer, be transferred to another post trader, and such permission would have the same force as a license to a new post trader to erect such a building at that spot.

"I return you the papers inclosed.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

"CLEMENT HUGH HILL,
"Acting Attorney-General.

"Hon WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
"Secretary of War."

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the letter as without relevancy and having no possible bearing on the case.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We have asked the Adjutant-General for a copy of every order that has been issued since the Grierson complaint in regard to post traders for the purpose of proving a negative, but a very important negative in this case, and that is for the purpose of proving that every order that the Secretary of War issued, by a coincidence of good luck, failed to hit the case of Marsh and Evans.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question to the Senate, the evidence was admitted without division.

2275. In the Belknap trial testimony cumulative as to the fact but not as to the intent of respondent was admitted.—On July 8, 1876,<sup>116</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W.

Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon proposed the introduction as evidence of certain letters wherein a complaint had been made through the Solicitor of the Treasury that Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill, was clandestinely selling spirituous liquors, and the following letters in reply thereto :

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, November 2, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 28th ultimo on the subject of the illegal introduction of spirituous liquors, etc., into the Indian country by Evans & Co., and other parties, that previous to the 28th ultimo, on which date Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was authorized to take to that post monthly ten gallons of brandy and ten gallons of whisky for the use of the officers there, no permit had been given him or the other parties referred to to introduce any liquors into that country.

Very respectfully, etc.,

W. W. B.,
Secretary of War.

The SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 8, 1871.

SIR: In further response to your letter of the 28th ultimo on the subject of the alleged illegal introduction of liquors, etc., into the Indian country by certain persons, among others Evans & Co., of Fort Sill. I have the honor to inform you that Mr. John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, through his friends, denies having taken liquor into the Indian country without authority. Mr. Evans was appointed to the post tradership on October 10, 1870, and holds it in his own name and not in that of Evans & Co., and no complaint has ever been made against him by the military authorities at Fort Sill, he having been regarded a good and law-abiding business man.

I therefore request that no proceedings be commenced against him without a thorough investigation of the charges that he has been engaged in such practices shows they were well founded.

Very respectfully, etc.,

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

To the SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

The respondent was charged in the articles of impeachment with having appointed Evans corruptly and with sharing in connection with one Marsh in a tribute paid by Evans in consideration of the appointment.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said :

I object to all that proof. It does not go, so far as I can ascertain, to sustain any charge made in these articles at all, nor is it evidence of anything necessary for them to prove so far as I can see. They certainly do not state any reason why this should be received. One of the managers says he wants to prove by it that Evans was there acting as post trader and that Belknap knew it. As they have shown the fact that Belknap appointed him, it is pretty good evidence that he knew that Evans was appointed. There is no question made here that Belknap did not know that he was the post trader there; not the slightest. * * * You have proved by the only testimony which can prove it—to wit, the record of his appointment—that he was appointed. After you have proved the record of a judgment in a court of record, you cannot call witnesses to prove that the judgment was rendered, because that is cumulative. You have introduced conclusive evidence, and I have said to you that we do not deny it; we make no point upon it. Of course the Secretary knew that Evans was post trader.

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

The letters which we now offer by way of introduction to subsequent letters are letters which make certain specific charges against the post trader, John S. Evans. The theory of this prosecution is, and up to this point tolerably well sustained, that John S. Evans was appointed through the influence of Caleb P. Marsh and in pursuance of a corrupt bargain between them, the profits of which were equally divided between Marsh and the Secretary of War; that the Secretary of War did actually and personally receive his share of the fruits of this arrangement no man who has any regard for testimony can doubt. The great question for this tribunal is whether he received it knowingly, under such circumstances that any officer of honesty and integrity ought to have known where this money was coming from.

The particular point, therefore, to be investigated is the conduct of the Secretary of War. Whenever this particular post trader is affected, from whom he is receiving his gains, the particular point is to discover how the Secretary of War acts. What he may say is very direct and positive testimony, but it is not any more direct and positive than what he may do. * * * We have introduced conclusive evidence that John S. Evans was, in fact, the post trader, but whether the Secretary of War had forgotten the fact in the multitude of his different appointments is another important fact in this case which we propose to show had not occurred; that he had not forgotten that John S. Evans was the post trader, but, on the contrary, that he was receiving testimony as to John S. Evans's good character, supporting and sustaining John S. Evans all along.

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate, who decided without division that the evidence should be admitted.

2276. The Senate in the Belknap trial declined to admit evidence of a fact occurring after respondent had ceased to hold the civil office.

Instance of a ruling by the President pro tempore on a question of evidence in an impeachment trial.

On July 8, 1876,<sup>117</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, E. D. Townshend, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, when the latter proposed to offer in evidence a certain circular general order, issued March 7, 1876, from the War Department, and sent to every post in the United States directing the officers to examine whether the post traders were satisfactory; and, if not, to state that fact or to have them removed; and that in pursuance of the order, at Fort Sill on the 11th of April, 1876, there was a meeting of the officers and every one of them recommended the reappointment of Mr. Evans.

Mr. Manager William P. Lynde said:

We object to the introduction of that circular in evidence. It bears date, I think, 7th of March, after the resignation of Mr. Belknap, and has nothing whatever to do with the case now before the court so far as we can see. * * * It seems that this investigation was not had until Mr. Belknap had sent in his resignation and vacated the office of Secretary of War. He had made the appointment previously, it is true, on the recommendation of the officers at Fort Sill, when he was Secretary of War; but he refused to make it until Mr. Marsh threw in his interest and influence with the Secretary of War, who had informed Mr. Evans that he had already promised this appointment to Mr. Marsh. That the officers at Fort Sill found no fault with Mr. Evans and excused him of the high charges which he made for the goods which he sold to the officers and soldiers on the ground that he was paying $12,000 a year bonus we are informed by the letters of the commanding officers at the post and by the other evidence we have introduced in the trial. Therefore that these same officers should, subsequent to the resignation of the Secretary of War, when this matter was under investigation and when Mr. Evans was no longer called upon to pay this bonus of $12,000, have sufficient confidence in his integrity to recommend his continuance in that position, makes nothing in favor of the accused in this case. We therefore claim that it has no pertinency to the issue before the Senate, and ask that it may be excluded.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President and Senators, the court will observe that there are two theories here; one by the prosecution and one by the defense, and they recur at every stage of this case. Yesterday we had this battle with the managers, they assuming that we knew of these arrangements, of the existence of this contract, and were receiving knowingly this money. Of course they think that theory is true, and of course they think there is no other theory in the case. But there is another which we mean to make good to this court, and it is that we knew nothing of the consideration whatever; that this appointment was made in perfect good faith; that so far as we knew the law was being executed, and when failure of its execution was called to our attention we got the advice of our officers, those who were most familiar with this case, and got their remedies and applied them. They would think the argument to be on their side that we ought to have immediately removed this man, broken up his establishment, and turned him out, as the President did when the fact was finally brought to his attention and it was published that this contract existed. Let the Senate assume, as we infer they will assume, that the Secretary of War knew nothing of this transaction between these other parties; and that this man executed his duties faithfully. That he did execute them faithfully and that he was a good officer, we think is proved by the unanimous recommendation of the officers and soldiers at this post. We want now to show to the court that this officer, notwithstanding all the charges which were made, was recognized as a good and proper officer, and did his duty so satisfactorily that every officer at the post recommended his reappointment. We think this competent proof. We think this proper to go before the Senate as a circumstance to weigh in their judgment upon this case.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question, "Shall the circular be admitted?" the question was determined in the negative without division.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter offered the recommendation made by the council of administration, which convened at Fort Sill on March 7, 1876.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected.

The President pro tempore <sup>128</sup> said: <sup>129</sup>

On the same principle decided by the Senate, the Chair sustains the objection, the paper being subsequent to the resignation of the Secretary of War. * * * The Chair * * * decided it on the principle that it was subsequent to the date of resignation, and on that the Chair ruled. The Chair will, however, submit the question to the Senate, if desired, Shall this paper be admitted?

The question was determined in the negative without division.

2277. Judge Swayne being charged with submitting false certificates of expenses, evidence tending to show that other judges had submitted similar certificates was excluded.

Letters from other judges stating their construction of the law as to expenses were not admitted in behalf of Judge Swayne, charged with submitting false certificates.

A statement signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not under seal, summarizing the contents of official documents, was objected to as evidence in the Swayne trial.

Objection that new matter in respondent's answer, not responsive to any charge in the articles, should not lay a foundation for the introduction of evidence.

On February 23, 1905,<sup>130</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the introduction of testimony, made the following offer:

I now offer in evidence certified statements from the Treasury of the United States showing in detail the number of days in each year from April 1, 1895, down to March 31, 1903, during which the several circuit and district judges of the United States were attending court away from home or out of their districts, and showing the amount of expenses for travel and attendance to which each and all of them certified and received.

I make this offer as tending to show from an analysis of the certificates and accounts the contemporaneous judgment which has been placed upon the statute in question by the action of many of the judges of the courts of the United States, and also by the administrative officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying :

I desire that it be noted on the record that what this paper purports to be, as stated in the caption, is this :

"Statement showing amounts paid to United States circuit judges as expenses claimed while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences, and amounts paid to United States district judges as expenses claimed while holding court out of their own said courts, being in the first circuit."

And then there is one for each of the other eight circuits. * * * To that I offer the objection, which I will ask the Secretary to read :

The Secretary read as follows :

First, It is not responsive to any allegation contained in any of the articles of impeachment.

Second. If the subject-matter of the offer in any way relates to averments contained in the answers of respondent to the first, second, and third articles of impeachment, nevertheless, the said averments are not responsive to any charge contained in the articles of impeachment and present no issue for determination in this cause.

Third. The offer of respondent is only to show that the judges named did receive for their expenses an amount equal to $10 a day in the aggregate, but does not include an offer to prove that they did not actually expend as much as, or more than, the amount charged by the honorable judges to the Government as their said expenses of travel and attendance in holding court, and the evidence is therefore immaterial and irrelevant.

Fourth. That it is not averred in the answer nor offered to prove that the respondent, either at the time of or prior to the alleged false certification of his expenses in 1897, had consulted or conferred with or taken the opinion or had knowledge of the action of any of the judges referred to in the offer.

Fifth. It is not competent for respondent, in his own defense, to prove the usage or practices of other judges in other courts, particularly as it is not offered to show that he had knowledge thereof.

Sixth. If respondent has been guilty, as charged, of falsely certifying his expenses and collecting upon his own certificate an excessive amount from the Government, it is no justification for him to show that he subsequently ascertained that others had been guilty of the same offense.

Seventh. The certificates offered from the Treasury Department are not under its seal as required by the statute to make them admissible in evidence.

Eighth. The statements offered are not copies of any official papers or records remaining in the Treasury Department, but consist of some figures and data purported to have been made up after the consideration of such papers and records. They do not purport to show the amounts of expenses certified by the judges named therein, nor whether they were more or less than $10 a day. They show merely the amounts alleged to have been paid in each instance, without stating whether the said amount was more or less than the amount certified by the judge to have been expended. They do not include the certificate of the judge nor the account of the marshal who paid him. They are partial and incomplete, and not authorized by any statute to be used as evidence.

Ninth. The offer contains an unwarranted insinuation that other judges have collected from the Government for expenses sums greater than they actually expended, but without showing or offering to show what amounts they actually did expend, or certified as having been expended, and if received, will necessitate the calling of all of the said judges, as a matter of justice to them and to all the people of the United States, for the purpose of rebutting the said insinuation contained in the offer.

Mr. Manager Olmsted then said:

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to speak upon this point, there is nothing in any article of impeachment making any reference whatever to any Federal judge save only this respondent, who is himself charged in the first article with having in 1897 falsely certified to the amount of his expenses and received the money upon his said certificate. In his answer, after admitting that he did make that certificate, but denying in rather a vague way its falsity, he says, on page 27 of this record—it is the last paragraph on the page—“respondent says that he is fortified and confirmed in his honest belief that the construction so placed by him, etc., was and is right * * * by the fact that he is informed”—

Now, in 1905, nine years after he made that certificate, he is informed—“and verily believes, and as the records of the Treasury Department will show, that many of the circuit judges of the United States and district judges did the same thing.”

That, I submit, Mr. President, is new matter, not responsive to anything in the charge and having no proper place in the respondent's answer, and evidence under it is inadmissible upon the ruling of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate made upon the 14th instant upon our offer to prove the inconvenience to suitors and counsel of the absence of the respondent from his district. It was ruled inadmissible. That evidence was responsive to new matter inserted in the answer of the respondent, but the answer itself in that particular was not responsive to any averment in the articles of impeachment.

I want, just at this point, Mr. President, to state that the honorable counsel for the respondent took us to task for making a written offer embracing an admission made by the respondent, to which they objected. He took us to task in terms of great indignation for trying to get before the Senate matter in an improper way. I call your attention to these three exhibits attached to their answer, and ask what words of condemnation are strong enough to apply to the introduction in that matter of what is intended to be evidence in advance of the hearing of the case for the purpose of influencing the court in its decision? Upon the ruling I have already cited, and upon every authority, this evidence would have to be rejected for that reason.

But next, Mr. President, the offer is only to show that the judges named in those papers did, in certain instances, receive for their expenses as much, or a sum equal to $10 for each day if divided by the number of days. But it is not offered to show—the statement offered does not even refer to the subject, and respondent makes no offer to show—that those judges, nor any of them, did not actually expend that sum, and this is, I say, a cowardly insinuation against honorable judges—the dragging of their names in the mire without any attempt to prove that they have been guilty of any offense whatever.

Of course, Mr. President, if a judge is holding court in New Orleans, where, as I know from very recent experience, people may reasonably expend a good deal more than $10, or in New York, or in Chicago, or in San Francisco, and if his expenses amounted to $12.50 to $15 a day, he could get not to exceed $10; and so, of course, this statement would show that what he got amounted to $10. That is the maximum fixed by the law, but it is not the slightest evidence that he did not expend the money. They do not offer to introduce the certificates showing what his actual expenses were. So I say, that, lacking that essential element, it is not evidence at all in this case.

It is not pretended that this respondent at the time of making his certificate in 1897 knew the opinion of or consulted any other judge in the United States.

In regard to the fifth objection, Mr. President, it is not competent for the respondent in his own defense to prove the usage or practice of other courts or other counties. I propose to submit a very high authority. In the celebrated trial of Prescott in Massachusetts, made notable by the eminent array of counsel and managers involved, Judge Prescott, the probate judge, entitled upon one side of the court to take fees, was charged with taking more than the law permitted him.

In one case the excess was $1.98, and in another article some $39 of excessive fees were involved. He was convicted upon both charges. He offered to prove the usage of other courts and other counties throughout the State for the purpose of showing his intent to have been an honest one and in accordance with the practice throughout the State. That offer was made by Mr. Samuel Hoar and supported by himself and Daniel Webster, but they were completely overthrown in their argument by Mr. Manager Shaw—the same Mr. Shaw who afterwards became chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and, in the opinion of many men, secured a place in the history of the jurisprudence of this country second only to that of Chief Justice Marshall. I ask that the court will hear the offer which was made by Mr. Hoar in that case:

The Secretary read as follows:

The counsel for the respondent read the motions when put into writing, as follows, viz:

"1. And now the counsel for the respondent move that, in order to rebut the charge of willful and corrupt misconduct, they may be permitted to prove that at the time of the respondent's appointment to office there did exist, and continually since has existed, in the probate offices of the several counties in this Commonwealth a practice according to which, in cases of application for administration, certain official papers are prepared and executed and certain official acts done and performed which are not particularly enumerated in the statute called the 'fee bill,' and fees paid therefor, and to show the usual amount of such fees.

"2. And now the counsel for the respondent move that, in order to rebut the charge of willful and corrupt misconduct, they may be permitted to prove that at the time of the respondent's appointment to office there did exist, and continually since has existed, in the probate offices of the several counties of this Commonwealth a practice according to which, in cases of application for administration, certain official papers are prepared and executed and certain official acts done and performed which are not particularly enumerated in the statute of the Commonwealth, commonly called the 'fee bill.'"

Mr. President, to make this as brief as possible, that offer having been elaborately argued by those eminent gentlemen, was rejected by a vote of more than 2 to 1. Judge Prescott was convicted and removed from office upon those two articles. If this respondent has been guilty of any offense it is no excuse for him to say that somebody else did the same thing in later years, and in some other court; and in any event his offer does not include anything tending to show improper conduct by any other judge.

But again, that paper is not offered under the seal of any Department. It is not so authenticated as to be admissible in evidence. It does not purport to be a copy of any record in any Department. It is simply a lot of figures made up by somebody purporting to have been abstracted or extracted from certain documents, we know not what. It certainly does not show that any other judge ever certified to $10 of expenses when his actual expenses were less.

Now, when we offered the three certificates showing Judge Swayne's certificates and the action thereon we were required by the honorable counsel for the respondent to put in the whole record, the marshal's account, the action of the Treasury Department—every paper on file. These papers which they offer are not evidence in any proceeding on earth and would not be received in any court in Christendom.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, I must confess to my surprise at the last objection raised by the learned manager. It is true, I find, that the certificate to these statements is not attested by the seal of the Treasury Department, but it is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the only effect of that objection would be to require us to have the seal put to this paper between this time and the next meeting of this body. I hardly suppose that the learned managers will stand on that. An objection which merely goes to the authentication and which does not dispute its genuineness, it seems to me, is hardly worthy of either this tribunal or this grave proceeding. Nor have I supposed that either side in the prosecution of this case would undertake to put unnecessary tasks upon the other or lengthen the proceedings.

The learned manager said that the counsel for the respondent had compelled the managers to put in evidence certain certificates of the judge when they put in their Treasury statements in support of the articles against Judge Swayne—the first, second, and third. We put no compulsion upon them that I remember. They took their own course, and a very proper course. They rely upon their allegation of the untruthfulness of the certificate, and of course they put in the certificate. It would have been open to us to have loaded up this record with all of these papers from the Treasury Department and to have brought the originals here to the extreme disturbance of the public business. But, as we supposed, contributing to the need of dispatch of the Senate under its present conditions, we have got a succinct statement which gives all the material facts; for, Mr. President, behind the certificate here, as to every item, it is presumable, and there certainly is in the Treasury Department, certain other evidence. The course of proceeding in this case, as shown by the very certificate put in by the managers, is that at the end of a session of court held by a judge away from his home, at the circuit court of appeals, or away from his district in the district court, he presents his certificate to the marshal, stating the number of days and the amount of expenses, which he certifies to, and on that the marshal pays to him the amount and takes his receipt, which, under the form prescribed by the Department of Justice, is at the bottom of the certificate. A form of that was presented by my colleague only a few moments ago and admitted without objection.

That certificate is by the statute made the voucher upon which the marshal is reimbursed for his payment to the judge; and, as I shall call attention to, the statute requires that he shall be repaid—that he shall be allowed his account. The marshal then presents such item with the other items going to make up his account, his entire account, under the act of 1875, which we put in evidence here this afternoon, to the United States Judge for that court. In the particular cases, we have an object lesson here in the certificate introduced by the managers in condemnation of Judge Swayne, that there the marshal of Texas in two instances presented that account before the local judge, Judge Bryant, who did not sit in two certain trials growing out of the failure of a bank because he was interested in the matter in some way, and Judge Swayne held two long trials, one in one year and the other in another year, and made these certificates.

Now, the marshal presented his account to Judge Bryant, and, under the statute, the United States attorney for that district was at that time required to be present and his presence to be noted upon the record. The marshal's account had to be sworn to. The judge's certificate is prescribed, and the statute prescribes that he shall approve or disapprove of that account, as shall be according to law and as may be just.

So you have now the act of the marshal in paying the judge, and the act of the local judge in approving the account in the presence of the district attorney, who is there when he approves it in order to protect the United States. All that happens in the very district where the expenditures are made and where the judge knows and the district attorney knows and the marshal knows, each of their own knowledge, as to what is the amount of expenses that would be involved in a residence there. The account then goes with the marshal's to the Department of Justice, under the terms of the act which will be printed in the Record to-morrow, and is there audited, in the first instance, by the Auditor of the Department of Justice. From there, after the lapse of sixty days, it goes to the Treasury Department and is audited by the Auditor for the State and other Departments. It is then subject to the disallowance of the Comptroller, either of his own motion or upon its being brought before him.

You have, therefore, Mr. President, in this case the act in succession of six executive officers in confirmation or disallowance of such accounts. These certificates show that there has not been a single account disallowed by all of these officers: that from the beginning to the end there has been no objection made under the terms of this statute to the construction placed upon it by Judge Swayne, namely, that the certificate under which the payments were made were those that allowed a certificate of $10 a day irrespective of the facts as to whether that amount was actually expended or not. * * * I ask the learned manager if this fraud, which is a fraud before this Senate, was not such a fraud when it was brought before Judge Bryant? If it is a fraud now, it was a fraud then; and was there anything that has been proved by these witnesses that Judge Bryant did not know of his own knowledge? Did he reside in Tyler? I do not care. If he did, he knew it because he lived there. Did he reside elsewhere? Then he had to go away from his home, though in his district, to be sure, when he held court in Tyler, and he knew what it cost him just as much as Judge Swayne knew. Did not the district attorney know it? Did not the marshal know it? And does the learned counsel pretend to say that because of the terms of this certificate, as prescribed by the acts of 1891 and 1896, if that was a crime, it was not the duty of that district attorney to present Judge Swayne to his grand jury and have him indicted: that it was not the duty of Judge Bryant to bring it to the attention of the district attorney: that it was not the duty of the marshal to protest? Is it possible that there is any fraud that can exist within the jurisdiction of the Auditor of the Department of Justice, of the Auditor of the Treasury Department, of the Comptroller of the Treasury that they can not unkenel and uncover, and that it is not their duty to do it?

No, Mr. President, it can not be held in the face of that that any such construction could be put by them upon the act of 1891 and the act of 1896 as to these fees. They did not abandon their duty; they do not stand here as convicted of any such absence or lack of it. What they did do was to say, "We are concluded by the certificate because we can not go behind it; we are concluded by the certificate because the statute intended to make it an allowance when the judge certified it, irrespective of what the actual expenses were."

The Senate will perceive, Mr. President, therefore, that the admissibility of these certificates rest upon something else than the mere act of the circuit and district judges of the United States in their several and respective actions in the amounts they certified under this statute. It brings up as a ground of admissibility of these certificates the contemporary construction placed by the executive officers upon the certificates of the judges as made from time to time. The form in which we have presented it is compendious. It is stripped of every unnecessary matter of evidence, which would merely load it up with lumber. It is brought down to the naked skeleton of facts of what is vital; but it puts before the Senate all of the evidence, coupled with the acts of Congress, that is necessary, and is in no sense unfair to the managers, because it apprises them of everything that they might desire to know.

Mr. President, I had hoped that this discussion would be left to the final argument; and for my colleague and myself we are willing that that course should be pursued now. I would stop at once any further discussion of this subject and leave it until the final argument to complete then what I have already said, so as not to take up the time of the Senate; but that offer does not seem to meet with the views of the learned managers, and I am compelled, therefore, to go into the discussion of the case—I say of the case—as made now by this objection to our certificates.

What we contend, Mr. President, is that the proper construction of these acts of Congress of 1891 and 1896 as to judges holding court away from their homes or out of their districts, is the one placed upon it by Judge Swayne; and that is they were authorized to certify their expenses at $10 a day as an allowance or compensation for such services. I shall endeavor to be very brief. The act is:

"That any justice or judge who, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall attend the circuit court of appeals held at any place other than where he resides"—

And, mutatis mutandis, it is the same in the case of a district judge when he holds court out of his district—
"shall, upon his written certificate, be paid by the marshal of the district in which the court shall be held his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $10 per day, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States."

The prior state of the law was that the Judge for such service was paid his actual expenses upon vouchers filed with his accounts. This will not be disputed, I presume, and I have assumed that there is no doubt as to the state of the law.

The true construction of these statutes is that Congress intended that a judge rendering such service should be paid $10 a day as an allowance for compensation for the service. That such is the true construction of the act will appear from its provisions, as shown by its language, and from the changes wrought thereby.

What is meant by "reasonable expenses" as used in the act? It was changed, Mr. President, from "actual expenses" and, therefore, presumably on its face does not mean "actual expenses." * * * Understand, Mr. President, I am arguing that this evidence is admissible because of the contemporary construction placed upon the statute by the officers, and that the statute is one which will bear construction, that it is open to construction. If it is not open to construction, if it is so clear, as the managers contend, that there is no doubt about it, in such case as that the authorities would not apply.

I must therefore make a case where it is apparent upon the face of the statute that it is doubtful and is uncertain, and hence I am compelled to go to the task if this question is to be determined on its merits. I regret it very much.

All the expenses must not merely be reasonable. The term "expenses incurred in travel" is easily defined, but it is difficult to place limits upon the term "attendance." Certainly it can reasonably be held to include (1) many expenses which might not be included under the word "actual" as construed by the accounting officers of the Government; (2) many expenses not incurred in attendance, but caused by attendance, and (3) the expenses are "not to exceed $10 a day."

What light does this provision taken in connection with the words "for travel and attendance," throw upon the true construction of the words "reasonable expenses"? If a judge spends $13 one day and $7 another, shall he certify $20 for the two days, or only $10 for the one day and $7 for the other, and $17 in all? * * * I had very nearly completed, Mr. President, the argument I was submitting about the fact that contemporary construction applies because the statute itself is one that is loosely drawn. If the words "not to exceed $10 a day" are given a hard and fast interpretation, then it must be held to mean in the case to which I have already referred that it is not to exceed $10 for any one day, and so in this instance supposed the judge would certify $17 and loss $3. That is, if he expended $7 one day and $13 another, he could only certify to the $7 that he spent that day, and only $10 for the day he spent $13; but even the learned managers will not contend that that is the construction. Why? Because it is "for travel and attendance." Oh, they say, going about large districts, you have got to have traveling expenses, and a man will spend $20 or $30 a day sometimes in traveling and all that; but what becomes, then, of your construction that it is $10 from day to day?

But, again, Mr. President, did the word "reasonable" mean an amount not as fixed by the judge's certificate, but as determined by the personal habits of the judge, and, indeed, the state of his health, or the individual limitations of his physical needs?

But light is shed upon the meaning of the words "reasonable expenses," as used in the act, by its provisions fixing who shall determine what expenses are reasonable.

That takes me to what I have already submitted, namely, a contemporary construction, in which it is said that the amounts shall be allowed to the marshal in his accounts, and the sum on the certificate shall be paid by the marshal.

I assume, again, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Daniel], that it is by no means clear. On the contrary, I think it is clearly the other way; that under this act the certificate of the judge is conclusive; that is, that it is irrefutable and irreversible, because the statute makes it so. I submit to the Senate, as a most serious matter, that it is not irreversible where there is knowledge that a fraud has been committed; I can add nothing to what I have already said as to the case where the district attorney, the marshal, and the judge all have knowledge of it.

Mr. President, not detaining the Senate longer on that, I appeal to a case that is higher authority. I submit, than the one cited by the learned manager from an impeachment trial in Massachusetts; and that is the case of The United States v. Hill, where the doctrine of contemporary construction was applied to a statute nothing like as ambiguous and loosely drawn and uncertain as the one now under consideration here. That case was where a clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts had not returned in his emoluments his fees for naturalization papers.

Mr. Manager Olmsted concluded the argument—

In the first place, the act itself does not vest any power or discretion in Judge Bryant, or the marshal, or anybody else except the judge who certifies, for it provides:

"For reasonable expenses for travel and attendance of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts, not to exceed $10 per day each, to be paid on written certificates of the judges, and such payment shall be allowed the marshal in settlement of his account with the United States."

Provided the judge certified to a sum not to exceed $10 a day, what marshal had the right to sit on the account? I would not like to be that marshal. He would have been in jail for contempt inside of thirty minutes. What judge had a right to pass upon it? What Treasury official had a right to pass upon it? No one. The judge makes a certificate as to his expenses; and if it does not exceed $10 a day it is paid without question, and must be.

Now, in this offer of evidence that is not a word about the amount expended by any other judge. It is not pretended in there that any judge did not expend every dollar for which he was reimbursed by the Government. There is not anything in there about the construction of any official. We do not know whether their expenses exceeded $10 or not. We only know they did not get more than $10 for any one day.

Now, one word more about the absence of the seal from that paper. Of course there is no seal on it, and it is not a question of waiting until to-morrow for them to get a seal on it. There can not be a seal on it. The Department can only put the seal on certified copies of papers or documents in the Department, which that is not. The act of Congress provides:

"Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the Executive Departments authenticated under the seals of such Departments, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof."

That is not a copy of any record or any document or any book. It is some figures taken off by somebody, and we do not know who, and it simply shows the amounts paid to the judges therein named. There is no insinuation, except by counsel, that any one of these honorable judges charged or certified to any amount in excess of his actual expenses. There is nothing upon which to base the insinuation that a judge, having expended two or three or five dollars a day, certified that the expenses were $10 and collected the money from the Government.

On the same day, at the evening session, the question of the admissibility of the evidence was put by the Presiding Officer:<sup>121</sup>

The Presiding Officer thinks it becomes the duty of the Presiding Officer again to submit to the Senate the question with regard to the admission of evidence offered by counsel for respondent, which was submitted when a quorum of the Senate was not present, but when a quorum of the Senators sworn in the impeachment trial was present.

Counsel for the respondent offer in evidence certain statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, not under seal, purporting to show amounts paid to United States circuit judges as expenses claimed while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences and amounts paid to United States district judges as expenses claimed while holding court out of their own districts or while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences.

The question is, Shall the statement referred to be admitted in evidence? [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it. The "yeas" have it, and the statement is not admissible.<sup>122</sup>

Mr. Thurston then said:

Mr. President, I should like to have the Reporter read my two previous offers, which I desire to remake in the same terms I did before, and let the ruling be had upon them.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, we offer and ask to have incorporated in the record the opinion of the three circuit judges of one circuit, construing the law under which articles 1, 2, and 3 are framed. To be perfectly fair, I will state that this is in the shape of a letter, and has been written recently. On the question of offering it, I do not care to state to whom it is addressed or what judges sign it, but I offer it as an opinion of those judges on this question. The date of it is February 6, 1905.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will exclude that paper.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask to have my second offer read.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. THURSTON. We offer in addition thereto similar opinions contained in letters of about the same date, signed by fifteen members of the Federal judiciary. They are all the same.

Mr. Manager PALMER. If they are similar——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose?

Mr. THURSTON. For the same purpose that I offered the single letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose?

Mr. THURSTON. For the purpose of showing the construction placed by these judges on the statute under which articles 1, 2, and 3 are framed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will exclude those papers.

<sup>122</sup> A short time previously the yeas and nays had been taken on this question, showing 10 yeas for admission and 34 for exclusion. This vote showed the absence of a quorum, and therefore was of no effect, except as indicating the division of opinion.

2278. The Senate in the Belknap trial admitted evidence of an act which, in substance, amounted only to a refusal of respondent to confess culpability.—On July 8, 1876,<sup>123</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William L. Belknap, late Secretary of War, E. D. Townshend, Adjutant-General of the Army, a witness for the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and asked what the finding of the court-martial was in the case of Capt. George T. Robinson, of the Tenth Cavalry, and especially for a letter addressed by the said Robinson to W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, and dated St. Louis Barracks, Mo., April 2, 1875. Mr. Carpenter explained the purpose of this evidence:

This man Robinson was, as I understand, court-martialed and sentenced by the court to be dismissed the service. He was at the St. Louis Barracks at the time; and after the finding by the court was sent on to Washington to be approved by the Secretary of War he wrote a letter to the Secretary substantially stating the allegations which are now made in these articles and by the testimony offered by the managers, and containing what we regard as a blackmailing appeal to the Secretary of War, that he must disapprove of the findings of that court or the writer would take steps to disclose what he says existed in regard to the tradership at Fort Sill. (It was for transactions in connection with this tradership that the respondent was impeached.) Thereupon General Belknap examined the papers in the case, found that the proceedings were regular, that the court was justified in its finding, and he approved the finding and cashiered the captain, and filed this of record.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar objected to the evidence;

Mr. President, it seems to me that that act of the Secretary of War affords no evidence or presumption of his innocence. A blackmailing officer, himself convicted by court-martial, sent to the Secretary a certain threat and demanded certain action. If the Secretary of War had acceded to his demand, he would have put himself in the power of that officer forever; and the acceding to that demand or concealing the letter from the persons about him in the War Department would have been a confession of guilt. On the contrary, the exhibition of the letter and the going on with the court-martial was denial. All, therefore, that it is offered to show from the conduct of the Secretary of War is that in April, 1875, being charged with this offense, he denied it and did not confess it; in other words, he seeks to make evidence for himself by proving a denial, which is the substance of his own conduct.

The question on the admission of the paper being submitted to the Senate, they decided, yeas 21, nays 18, that it should be received. So the objection was overruled.

2279. In the Belknap trial the Senate, by a bare majority, admitted, to show intent, evidence that respondent had not inquired into newspaper charges reflecting on his subordinates.—On July 10, 1876,<sup>124</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, editor of the New York Tribune, was called as a witness for the United States, and examined as to a certain article which appeared in the Tribune as to the relations of the respondent with the post tradership at Fort Sill. In the course of the examination Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

You can state now whether at any time, personally or by letter, the Secretary of War addressed you any communication to find out your authority for the statements in that article.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected that the testimony sought was wholly immaterial and irrelevant to the case.

Mr. Manager McMahon argued:

We do not know at this stage of the objection whether the witness will say "yes" or will say "no," and therefore the argument must be directed on the hypothesis that he may answer either way, and at this stage of the inquiry, if it is admissible in case he should answer either way, it is, of course, competent, and I think it is competent no matter how it may be answered. Why? Here is an article charging the existence of a grievance at Fort Sill, the payment of a tribute by one man to another for being kept in the place. We have already called Mr. Smalley, who wrote the article, and proved by him that no inquiry was made of him as to the authorship of that article, and that there was no general conversation had in regard to it. We now propose to go to the headquarters, to the fountain, and inquire whether anything was said to the editor of the paper in regard to this matter; and for this purpose I do not care what the answer may be. If the answer is "yes," we desire the communication, whatever it may have been; if the answer is "no," our argument will be, in my judgment, equally strong, if not stronger, than it would be if we had the direct communication.

Now, I will put it on the hypothesis that the witness will answer "yes." Are we not entitled to know what the Secretary of War said when such a thing as this was published? I need not argue that question. Suppose now that he will answer "no;" are we not entitled to a knowledge of the fact as we propose to prove it here that, although these charges were publicly made in regard to the management of affairs at Fort Sill, the names having been given, the parties being specified, and one of the parties specified being, as we shall show, at that time an intimate personal friend of the Secretary of War, at no stage of the proceedings was any inquiry made by the Secretary of War from any person who would have any right to speak in regard to the source of the information of the facts stated in that communication? We draw our argument from that, and I have no objection to stating it. Our argument is this, that his conduct in that matter is the conduct of a guilty man; it is the conduct of a man who knows that the facts exist; of a man who knows all about the statements in the New York Tribune article, and he does not care to go to anybody to find out the authority.

Mr. Carpenter said:

The rule, of course, must be the same here as it would be in the trial of any criminal case in a court of law, and is this Senate to establish the rule that, as often as a newspaper contains a libel upon an individual that individual must go and shoot the editor, or must sue him for libel, or demand his authority for the article, or stand convicted of the charge? That is the question. They propose to convict this man of everything said in that article because he did not go and make a row about it, because he did not go and demand the authority upon which it was published, bring a libel suit, or shoot the editor. The man who is perfectly conscious of integrity in the matter never runs after such articles—at least there is no law that compels him to do so, and there is no law of presumption against him if he refuses to do it. I should be surprised to see any judicial court establish such a rule, and I should be anxious and curious to see how many of the Senators now sitting in the view of the Chair would be on their way for about five hundred editors within the next twenty-four hours. If it is a good rule against the Secretary of War, it is a good rule against any public man or any private citizen, and as often as any one of you Senators see a libel upon you in regard to any subject you must "jump for" the editor or you confess your guilt.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question, "Shall the managers be permitted to propound said interrogatory to the witness?" it was decided in the negative without division.

Then this question was asked :

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) Did you receive any communication from General McDowell in regard to this article in the New York Tribune?

Mr. Carpenter objected to the question.

Mr. Manager McMahon said :

Mr. President, I simply propose to show that at the time this thing occurred a communication was addressed, and to call for that and have it handed to me. Then I propose to have General McDowell recalled and to refresh his recollection by the contents of that letter. I do not propose to offer it now. * * * Am I not entitled to prove a certain letter which I desire to use in the progress of his case, and to identify it as the letter which the witness has received from a certain person in due course of mail?

The question being submitted to the Senate, they decided without division that the interrogatory might be propounded.

Later, during the same day,<sup>125</sup> Gen. William B. Hazen was called as a witness on behalf of the United States, and Mr. Manager McMahon asked :

State, if you know, who furnished the information upon which the New York Tribune article was published.

This question was later modified to this form :

After the publication of this article in the New York Tribune, state whether the Secretary of War, officially or otherwise, made any inquiry to you in regard to the truth of the statements contained in that article.

Mr. Carpenter objected.

Mr. McMahon explained :

From our standpoint, assuming the testimony which we have already given to be correct, which we have a right to do, we have heretofore proven that the article in the New York Tribune was brought to the knowledge of General Belknap. We have to-day proven that General Belknap had ascertained that the authority for those charges was General Hazen, who had Fort Sill within his lines and who had troops stationed there. We have had from another source that General Belknap was exceedingly indignant * * * because General Hazen had represented it to a committee instead of to him. Now, that is the inference we want to draw from it: There is no libel in the New York Tribune article upon Secretary Belknap; on the contrary, if you will read that article you will find that it expressly excludes the Secretary from participating in this matter, and says that he knows nothing about it. It is no libel upon him in a newspaper, which is a subject upon which my friend is so sensitive, and upon which the counsel made the point, and very properly, that a man should not every time run and see the author of a newspaper article; but here are charges put in this article, coming from an officer whose name is not given; but then at the bottom of it is stated that these charges are made on the authority of a high officer under the Government in the Army. Here is the Secretary of War not charged, not implicated, no libel put upon his character, no stain upon him, but a grievance, a monstrous grievance, is called to his attention, one that demanded the immediate arm of the Government to remedy if it were true. While I submit to the decision that was made a while ago in regard to the testimony of Mr. Whitelaw Reid, and did not propose to argue it at that time, I say that it is the very highest kind of testimony upon a question like this, that when these charges are made in a public newspaper, not against this gentleman who is upon trial, but against certain other individuals, and public attention is called to them, an extract from a letter quoted with quotation marks to indicate that it is an extract from an officer at that point, and then that is fathered by a leading officer in the Army—I say we have a right to show as we propose now to show, that instead of hunting up whether these things are true or not, instead of endeavoring as an officer of the Army to correct these evils, he cloaks them, does not inquire even when he knows the officer who is the authority for this statement, or the officer commanding this particular post. He shuts his eye to the transaction and goes nowhere for information. He goes neither to Mr. Smalley, who wrote the article, nor to Mr. Reid, who published it, nor to General Hazen, who was the authority for it, and as we shall show hereafter, he neither goes to Evans nor to Caleb F. Marsh to learn anything about it.

Are there no inferences to be drawn from these facts? Is it not the best kind of testimony when we have got the peculiar case that we have here? Then what are your relations, Mr. Secretary, or what were your relations to this man? Was Mr. Marsh privately milking him and dividing with you and you knew it? The inference is almost irresistible that he was aware of all these facts. He knew that General Hazen was the man who was responsible for this statement, and yet he neither corrects the abuses nor calls upon General Hazen in any shape or form.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

The testimony has already shown that Belknap was indignant at Hazen because he had violated the regulations of the Army and had not communicated what he pretended to know as a fact through the military channels, as it was his duty to do, but poured it out into the bosom of a congressional committee. The testimony also shows that Belknap did go to work investigating this matter through the proper channels. He wrote a letter to Grierson, who was in command of the post, and to Evans, and to others there, in regard to the matter. The letter of Mr. Grierson making his report is on the 18th of February. It was received about ten days after that, and the order correcting the whole thing was made on the 25th of March.

Is it possible that Mr. Belknap is to be condemned here because he did not select that particular method of investigation which the managers wish he had selected? He went to work regularly and efficiently. He did not wish to imitate the irregular conduct of General Hazen. Because Hazen had violated his duty and the regulations of the Army, it was not necessary that Belknap should also violate his duty, nor was it necessary that he should chase the newspaper or chase any correspondent of a newspaper; but he set immediately to work investigating through the regular military channels, where officers made their reports upon their character as officers and where if they were untrue they could be court-martialed for their untruth; not anonymous correspondence in newspapers, but regular official investigation, and on the 25th of March the whole matter was cured by the order of that date.

That is the state of facts. The question put to the witness is, Did General Belknap go to you about this matter? They might as well call any other man in Washington and ask, "Did he go to you about it." Belknap was under no obligation to go to General Hazen. He went through the regular channel to the commander of the post. General Hazen was not the commander of that post, and if General Hazen had known anything of irregularities there while he was in command of the post the regulations of war made it his duty to communicate it through the military authorities, not through political and congressional channels, but to make it directly through the official military channels. Then it could be corrected according to the discipline of the Army.

The question being put, "Shall the managers be permitted to propound the said interrogatory?" there appeared ayes 19, noes 18. So the interrogatory was propounded.

2280. In the Peck trial a witness was not permitted to testify to general public opinion on a subject not closely related to respondent's act.

Instance wherein, during an impeachment trial, the respondent personally examined a witness.

On January 11, 1831,<sup>228</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Robert Walsh, was under examination, when this question was asked by the respondent himself:

Do you or not know that at and before the time of the publication there was a general belief in the State of Missouri that many claims to lands in that State, under Spanish grants, were fraudulent?

The publication referred to was an opinion by Judge Peck in a case relating to Spanish grants, the case of Soulard's heirs, published in a newspaper in St. Louis. The impeachment arose from the fact that Judge Peck had punished for contempt one Lawless, who had published a criticism of the opinion.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the question. It was argued in behalf of the objection that in the trial of a district judge for the imprisonment of a citizen without law and unjustly, the high court of impeachment might not be led off to the trial of fraudulent land claims in Missouri, and to the trial of them by common rumor. There would be no end to such an inquiry.

In opposition to the objection it was argued by Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, and by the respondent himself, that they were prepared to prove fraud in particular cases, and especially fraud by Soulard. It was proper to show what facts the court had in mind when the proceedings against Lawless was had. If the judge believed that the publication by Lawless contained a misrepresentation of the opinion as to the grants, and tended to show them of a fair character, might he not have rightly considered it his duty to repress such an attempt.

Arguing for the managers Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, asked if rumor was evidence in any cause. Suppose, moreover, that it could be proved that there were ten thousand fraudulent land claims in Missouri. What bearing had that on the question of the impeachment. The question was whether Mr. Lawless fairly represented the opinion delivered by the judge, or whether the judge might commit him for a contempt in publishing such an article. Admit even that the claim of Soulard was fraudulent, that claim was not in issue now and the high court was not trying its merits.

The question being put: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared yeas 14, nays 27.

2281. In the Peck trial the person alleged to have been oppressed by respondent was required to testify as to acts of his own implying malice against the respondent after the said alleged oppression.—On January 11, 1831,<sup>127</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness on behalf of the managers, Luke E. Lawless, was under cross-examination by counsel for the respondent. The respondent was on trial for unlawfully oppressing Lawless by imprisoning him for contempt for criticising in the public prints a decision by respondent as judge in a case relating to a claim of Soulard's heirs.

Lawless had been imprisoned for an article signed "A Citizen" and published in a St. Louis paper in 1826. Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, now produced several newspaper articles published after the publication of 1826, and some published as late as 1830, and proposed this question:

Are you the author of all or either of the articles contained in the newspapers now handed to you relating to the respondent?

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, objected to the question, on the ground that a witness on cross-examination might not be compelled, if the publications were reprehensible, to accuse himself. It was also urged by Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, one of the managers, that the letters were wholly external to the case, for it could not be supposed that Judge Peck, in imprisoning Lawless, could have had foresight of these publications. They had nothing to do with the question as to whether or not Judge Peck was guilty of illegally imprisoning a citizen.

Mr. Meredith contended that in a case of libel or slander subsequent words or libels might be given in evidence to show quo animo the words were spoken or the libel written. He referred in support of this to Second Saunders on Pleading and Evidence, page 382.

On behalf of the managers it was urged that the authority cited might be applicable if Mr. Lawless were on trial for a libel, but could any authority be produced to prove that a witness under examination might be called on to establish his own guilt, if there be any, by his own testimony? Was not this directly in face of the constitutional provision that no person should be compelled to be a witness against himself? Should a judge be permitted to drive a man by oppression into the public newspapers for redress and then be allowed to use those very publications for the purpose of proving the existence of malice in the author previous to the date of his punishment.

Mr. Meredith said:

I am perfectly aware that we are not now trying Mr. Lawless for a libel. The argument and the authority were merely analogical—they both apply to this case. The principle is the same as in a case of libel. One of the great questions in this cause is the question of misrepresentation. After we have shown the misrepresentation it may be necessary, perhaps, to go a step further and show that it was intentional. We take that step when we show subsequent attacks upon the respondent, of which Mr. Lawless was the author. Is not this the object of such evidence in the case of a libel? and why should it not be as competent in a case of this kind, where intention is the question? It matters not at what subsequent period these publications were made. * * * They relate back to the original publication, and show the design and intention of the author. Again, does the lapse of time at all affect the second view with which this testimony is offered? Mr. Lawless is a witness in this cause. He has testified before this court, and one inquiry, and a main inquiry, is with what temper is he here as a witness? And do not these publications, if he be the author of them, go to evince that temper and feeling?

On the question, "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared, yeas 28, nays 13.

2282. The witness having testified that a report of a speech was made partially by others as well as by himself, the report was not admitted in evidence.

Instance of a ruling by the Chief Justice on a question of evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 3, 1868,<sup>128</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler offered in evidence a report of a speech of the President printed in a newspaper.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected to the admission of the report as evidence on the ground that the reporter

Hudson, who had been examined, had testified that a portion of the speech had been printed from notes taken by another reporter.

After discussion the Chief Justice<sup>129</sup> said :

The managers offer a report made in the Leader newspaper of Cleveland as evidence in the cause. It appears from the statement of the witness Hudson that the report was not made by him wholly from his own notes, but from his own notes and the notes of another person whose notes are not produced, nor is that person himself produced for examination. Under these circumstances the Chief Justice thinks that that paper is inadmissible. Does any Senator desire a vote of the Senate on the question?

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having asked for a vote of the Senate, the question was taken on admitting the paper as evidence, and there appeared, yeas 35, nays 11. So the report was admitted.

2283. Judge Swayne being charged with wrongfully committing persons for contempt, testimony as to the condition of the jail was ruled out as immaterial.—On February 16, 1905,<sup>130</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Charles M. Coston, a witness on behalf of the managers, was questioned by Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, as to the acts of the respondent in committing certain persons for contempt, and this question was asked :

Q. Well, where were they in the county jail?—A. They were in a room next to what they call "the prisoner department of the jail." This jail is a brick building, two stories in height. There is an entrance—

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, here intervened, objecting :

Mr. President, is Judge Swayne, this respondent, to be answerable for the manner in which the imprisonment was conducted in the absence of any testimony tending to show that he gave any directions with respect to it? If not, we object to this feature of the testimony.

Mr. Manager De Armond said :

Mr. President, the object of the inquiry was to ascertain where they were confined and how they were confined—something about the jail and the accommodations, or the lack of accommodations, that they had in the jail, in a general way, and the punishment that they endured under this sentence of the court. * * * We think it is material to the issue to show what the punishment inflicted upon them was, and to leave the court, in passing upon the matter with all the testimony upon the subject before the court, to determine how far the judge knew that such accommodations or lack of accommodations would be their lot in sentencing them—whether it was a proper sentence as to the amount of punishment or whether it was excessive. We are getting at the animus of the judge. * * * I think upon the question whether the sentences were excessive or not—as to that branch of it—it would be competent for the respondent to show, if he could show, that the imprisonment was not for an unusually long time; that the punishment was not excessive, if, as a matter of fact, the persons sentenced to the jail were taken to quarters which were commodious and clean and if there were no especially contaminating influences from the low class of criminals confined in the same jail at the same time; if they were the only occupants, for instance, and were in the rooms or apartments of the sheriff or keeper of the jail, instead of being in with the common criminals—I believe that would be competent for the respondent to offer in the case. It seems to me it is competent for those prosecuting the case to show the kind of confinement, the kind of place to which he sentenced them, bearing upon the question whether he had the right to send them there at all, and whether the punishment was excessive in sending them there for that length of time. That is all I wish to say about that.

For information, I ask the President whether I am to understand the ruling to be that all questions in regard to the jail are to be excluded? I do not wish to ask questions simply for the sake of asking them, of course.

The Presiding Officer <sup>131</sup> said:

The Presiding Officer does not see that the question as to the character of the jail or the way in which the persons sentenced for contempt were confined there is proper. It can not be said that Judge Swayne is responsible for that without some evidence is adduced showing that the judge directed something to be done which was improper. * * * The Presiding Officer thinks that it is not material to this issue to prove the condition of the jail. If any Senator so desires, the Presiding Officer will submit the question to the Senate.

On February 20,<sup>132</sup> during examination of a witness, Simeon Belden, by Mr. Manager De Armond, the following occurred:

Q. What was done with you?—A. I was locked up in the jail.

Q. What part of the jail—in a cell or not?

Mr. THURSTON. Wait a moment. We interpose the same objection that we made the other day. Nothing that possibly happened in and about that jail or the manner or method of the confinement of the witness could be chargeable to Judge Swayne.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Mr. President, when the matter was up before, what we were trying to show was the general condition of the jail and the general way in which the prisoners were handled or cared for there. Now, I am asking simply a narrative. There was a sentence pronounced against this gentleman and Mr. Davis, and I am asking what was done in the carrying out of that sentence. I suppose, if the sentence had not been carried out at all, it would be competent for the respondent to show it, and I think it is certainly competent for us to show whether it was carried out and how it was carried out. I do not mean in the way of going into the details or description about the jail, but what was done with these men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Anything more than that they were imprisoned for a certain length of time?

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Well, I desire to show where they were put, where they were changed to—without going into the matter of details—and how long they were kept there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (to the witness). Answer the question.

A little later,<sup>133</sup> while Mr. Manager De Armond was examining a witness, Michael Murphy, the following occurred:

Q. State whether or not you were in charge of the jail when General Belden and Mr. Davis were brought there by the United States marshal or deputy marshal.—A. Yes, sir; I was in charge of the jail.

Q. Was there a commitment brought with them?—A. To the best of my knowledge; yes, sir.

Q. State what you did with them.—A. I—

Mr. THURSTON. One moment. We object to this. We did not insist very hard on our right to this objection while Mr. Belden was testifying, but it is certain that what took place in that jail, its condition, the way the prisoners slept, the way they were fed, the way they were treated, could not be used to prejudice the court against Judge Swayne unless they first laid the foundation for it by showing that he was responsible for it or directed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the opinion of the Presiding Officer on a former day, but the questions which were asked Mr. Belden were allowed on the ground that they were a narrative of what occurred. The Presiding Officer does not think that evidence showing that the condition of the jail was an improper one is admissible unless it be shown that it was known to Judge Swayne and that that was part of his motive in committing them there.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. I was not going to ask the witness about the general condition of the jail. I was going to ask questions practically the same as those asked General Belden; about what was done with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the purpose of the questions?

Mr. Manager DE ARMOYD. To show the punishment they endured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is something unusual in the character of the jail which was known to Judge Swayne, the Presiding Officer thinks the evidence is inadmissible.

2284. Decisions as to relevancy of testimony during the Peck trial.—On December 23, 1830,<sup>124</sup> in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Luke Edward Lawless, was under cross-examination by Mr. William Wirt, counsel for the respondent. The witness, in a communication signed "A Citizen," and published in a St. Louis paper, had criticised an opinion delivered by Judge Peck in the case of Soulard's heirs. The judge was now on trial for punishing Lawless for contempt.

Mr. Wirt asked a question, reduced to writing, as follows: The witness is asked to refer to such parts of the opinion of the respondent in Soulard's case as support the first specification in the article signed "A Citizen."

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, objected that the question was irrelevant. The court had before them, he said, the publication of the witness, in which he had placed his assumptions in one column, and the passages in the opinion from which they were deduced in another column.

Mr. Wirt responded that the managers in opening the case had argued that there had been no misrepresentation of the opinion in the letter; and the question which he had asked was useful in determining the truth or lack of truth in the claim of the managers.

The question having been read to the court, the Vice-President put the question: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" and it was determined in the affirmative, yeas 32, nays 10.

2285. On December 22, 1830,<sup>125</sup> in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, while a witness, Luke Edward Lawless, was under cross-examination, Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, put the following interrogatory:

What was your contract for professional compensation in the case of Soulard's heirs?

It was for criticism of Judge Peck's decision in the case of Soulard's heirs that the witness had been punished by Judge Peck, and it was because of this punishment that the impeachment proceedings had been instigated.

The question being objected to by the witness and also by the managers for the House of Representatives, the question was put: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" and decided in the negative, yeas 19, nays 23.

2286. On January 10, 1831,<sup>126</sup> in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Josiah Spalding, was asked the following question by Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent:

What are the terms in which Mr. Lawless, according to general reputation, is in the habit of speaking of courts, both in their presence and out of court?

Judge Peck was on trial for the punishment of Mr. Lawless for contempt of court in criticising in a newspaper an opinion by the judge.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers, objected to the portion of the question contained in the words "and out of court."

Mr. Meredith admitted that he should not have asked the question had he not thought he had the assent of the managers.

The court, by a vote of yeas 3, nays 39, sustained the objection.

2287. General decisions during the Johnson and Belknap trials as to relevancy of testimony.

Instances of decisions by the Chief Justice on questions of evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 15, 1868,<sup>127</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence a letter of McClintock Young, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, removing Richard Coe from the office of appraiser at Philadelphia.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the proposed evidence as irrelevant. The letter, it was true, showed the direction of the President that the act be done; but if it were admitted it would be necessary to investigate whether or not the Acting Secretary or even the President might make the removal without consent of the Senate.

Mr. Curtis argued as to the act of Mr. Young:

He says that he proceeds by the order of the President, and I take it to be well settled judicially and practically that wherever the head of a Department says he acts by the order of the President he is presumed to tell the truth, and it requires no evidence to show that he acts by the order of the President. No such evidence is ever preserved, no record is ever made of the direction which the President gives to one of the heads of Departments, as I understand, to proceed in a transaction of this kind. But when a head of a Department says "by order of the President I say so and so" all courts and all bodies presume that he tells the truth.

The Chief Justice<sup>128</sup> ruled:

The Chief Justice thinks that this evidence is admissible. The act of a Secretary of the Treasury is the act of the President unless the contrary be shown. He will put the question to the Senate, however, if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The evidence is admitted.

2288. On April 20, 1868,<sup>129</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of the examination of Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, proposed certain questions which were objected to. As a result of this the Chief Justice said:

The honorable manager appears to the Chief Justice to be making a statement of matters which are not in proof, and of which the Senate has as yet heard nothing. He states that he intends to put them in proof. The Chief Justice therefore requires that the nature of the evidence that he proposes to put before the Senate shall be reduced to writing as has been done heretofore. He will make the ordinary offer to prove, and then the Senate will judge whether they will receive the evidence or not.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Butler submitted this offer:

We offer to show that Foster Blodgett, the mayor of Augusta, Ga., appointed by General Pope, and a member of the constitutional convention of Georgia, being, because of his loyalty, obnoxious to some portion of the citizens lately in rebellion against the United States, by the testimony of such citizens an indictment was procured to be found against him; that said indictment being sent to the Postmaster-General, he thereupon, without authority of law, suspended said Foster Blodgett from office indefinitely, without any other complaint against him and without any hearing and did not send to the Senate the report of such suspension, the office being one within the appointment of the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; this to be proved in part by the answer of Blodgett to the Postmaster-General's notice of such suspension, being a portion of the papers on file in the Post-Office Department upon which the action of the Postmaster-General was taken, a portion of which have been put in evidence by the counsel of the President, and that Mr. Blodgett is shown by the evidence in the record to have always been friendly to the United States and loyal to the Government.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, objected to this evidence as wholly irrelevant to this case. The evidence concerning Foster Blodgett was produced on the part of the managers, and on their part was confined to his oral testimony that he had received certain commissions under which he held the office of postmaster at Augusta; that he had been suspended in that office by the Executive of the United States in some form of its action, and there was a superadded negative conclusion of his that his case had not been sent to the Senate. In taking up that case the defense offered nothing but the official action of the Post-Office Department, coupled with the evidence of the head of that Department that it was his own act, without previous knowledge or subsequent direction of the President of the United States. In that official order, thus a part of the action of the Department, it appears that the ground of it was an indictment against Mr. Blodgett. A complaint was made that that indictment was not produced. The managers having procured it, having put it in evidence, they now propose to put in evidence his answer to that indictment or to the accusation made before the Postmaster-General.

After argument Mr. Manager Butler modified the question so as to stand as follows:

The defendant's counsel having produced from the files of the Post Office Department a part of the record showing the alleged cause for the suspension of Foster Blodgett as deputy postmaster at Augusta, Ga., we now propose to give in evidence the residue of said record, including the papers on file in the said case, for the purpose of showing the whole of the case as the same was presented to the Postmaster-General before and at the time of the suspension of the said Blodgett.

Mr. Evarts said:

Our objection to that offer, as we have already stated, is that it does not present correctly the relation of the papers.

The Chief Justice said:

The defendant's counsel having produced from the files of the Post Office to prove has been withdrawn. The offer which has just been read has been substituted. Senators, you who are of opinion that the evidence now proposed to be offered should be received will say aye; contrary opinion, no. [Putting the question.] The noes have it. The evidence is not received.

B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was recalled, and in the course of cross-examination, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, asked:

Is it according to discipline in the Army for an officer to publish scandal of the President which he knows nothing about except from hearsay?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

I must at this point enter an objection. It seems that my friend here is pursuing the old line, having the old misapprehension that every now and then crops out in this case. The misapprehension is that he is trying General Hazen and not General Belknap.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

Mr. President, this witness has been laboring for months to get up this impeachment for his own vindication. He came back here to-day for explanation, and I am doing everything in my power to assist his purpose. I want to show what his motives have been; I want to show that they are utterly groundless; I want to show that he has violated all the proprieties and all the duties of his official station by the hand he has taken in this matter and his anxiety to fan public sentiment against General Belknap, who has never done him an injury in his lifetime, and who had shown him so many favors that General Sherman objected to his giving him another; and that is the man who repeats gossip against the President and against the then Secretary of War, and publishes it in letters over his own name.

The Senate, without division, decided the question inadmissible.

2290. On January 12, 1876,<sup>141</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Hon. Hiester Clymer, chairman of the committee of the House of Representatives which had taken the testimony on which the impeachment was based, was examined as a witness for the United States, and then was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. Mr. Carpenter asked:

How long has the committee been engaged in investigating the affairs of the War Department?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected, saying:

I only want to understand how far this is to go. If any inference is to be drawn from any investigation held there that there is nothing else in this matter but what has been charged, we shall claim to put in the testimony which has been taken, which we shall certainly claim throws a good deal of light on other transactions and on this. We have carefully excluded them up to this point.

The question being put to the Senate, the interrogatory was admitted without division.

Very soon thereafter, the witness was reexamined by the managers, and Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

Had your committee taken any other testimony except Mr. Marsh's at the time that the House ordered the impeachment of Mr. Belknap and notified the Senate to that effect?

Mr. Carpenter having challenged the question, Mr. McMahon stated that it was put to rebut the presumption raised by the former question. If that was pertinent, this was.

After discussion the question was put: "Shall this interrogatory be admitted." and there appeared, ayes 11, noes 16, no quorum.

Thereupon, to save time, Mr. McMahon withdrew the question.

2291. On July 11, 1876,<sup>127</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, was under examination, when the following questions were asked, and the following colloquy took place between Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and Messrs. Managers John A. McMahon and Elbridge G. Lapham:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) Your wife has been subpoenaed as a witness to attend this tribunal?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I desire you to state now whether she is able to attend.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is the object of that?

Mr. Manager McMAHON. We want to know from the witness whether she is able to attend.

Mr. CARPENTER. We object. What has that to do with this case whether she is well or sick?

Mr. Manager McMAHON. We have a right to send for her if she is able to come. Let the objection be passed upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The counsel object to the question propounded by the managers. Shall the question be admitted?

The question was determined in the affirmative.

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) State whether your wife is able to be present in the court to be examined as a witness.—A. She is not, she is very ill.

Q. Have you the certificate of a surgeon to that effect?—A. I have.

Q. Whose certificate is it?—A. Dr. Alfred L. Loomis.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the managers state now what the object of that testimony is?

Mr. Manager LAPHAM. It is to inform the Senate the reason why we do not call Mr. Marsh.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is it proposed to raise any presumption against the defendant?

Mr. Manager LAPHAM. We shall argue that hereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. We will take her testimony that was given before the committee if the managers want that, or consent to have her deposition taken. We want to completely repel the presumption that Mrs. Marsh being ill is any evidence of our guilt.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. The managers here decline to do that. I do not agree with them in that matter. The counsel will make his application to the Senate personally.

2292. Testimony admitted in the Swayne trial as material, although objected to as not bearing directly on the issues.—On February 21, 1905,<sup>128</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness called on behalf of the respondent, was examined by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, and was questioned as to a suit known as the Florida McGuire case, the following being one of the questions:

During the first week of the court what steps did you take, if anything, to inform yourself as to the probability of the case being tried and as to when it might be reached upon the docket?

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, objected:

We think it is an immaterial matter what steps he took to ascertain when the case would be for trial and what he did about it. He is not a party to the record nor a party to the proceeding that we are trying.

Mr. Thurston said:

Mr. President, we propose to show that the defendants in that case prepared themselves for trial, got out their list of witnesses, were ready for trial when the case was reached, and that they had a right to demand from the judge that he should not grant any postponement of that trial unless upon legal cause shown.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. I suggest in regard to that matter that the persons upon the other side are the persons whose conduct should be inquired about.

What the defendants in that Florida McGuire case did or what they thought certainly are not matters for which the attorneys upon the other side could be held responsible. It is not inquiring anything about the attorneys of Florida McGuire—the parties who are proceeded against for contempt—but it is inquiring about what the attorneys upon the other side did, and what the attorneys upon the other side thought, and why the attorneys upon the other side did or thought certain things.

The Presiding Officer said: <sup>144</sup>

Does the Presiding Officer understand that that was stated in the trial of that case?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, Mr. President. I also propose to show it for another purpose. It is part of the res getae of this proceeding that has been gone into in detail and in such a manner that we might have objected at every step, but which, in deference to the desire of this court to proceed as rapidly as possible, we did not take advantage of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer thinks the question may be asked.

2293. On February 21, 1905,<sup>145</sup> in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was examined as to a suit known as the Florida McGuire case by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent:

Q. On that trial were there any witnesses called by Florida McGuire or her counsel or examined on her side who did not live in Pensacola, either upon or in the immediate vicinity to the Rivas tract?—A. So far as I know, not. I have to answer that this way: That a good many of these witnesses are known to me only in a general way, and I know generally where they reside. I do not know them personally, but I think that they all reside within a mile of the court-house in Pensacola.

Q. How long, in your judgment, would it have taken the United States marshal to have subpoenaed them all as witnesses?—A. If they had all been at home at the time they could have been subpoenaed in an hour or a half or two hours.

Mr. THURSTON. We offer this original praecipe for witnesses in that case. It is the original document which was identified the other day, and we ask, for the purpose of making up the record, that the certified copy may go in instead.

Mr. Manager David A. Armond, of Missouri, said:

We ask what is the object of offering this paper? What is it for? What do counsel expect to prove by it?

Mr. THURSTON. The object is to disprove the testimony of Judge Belden, who was very clearly brought to state that the only reason they decided to discontinue the Florida McGuire case was that they needed forty or fifty witnesses, many of them living at a distance, and that they could not possibly secure them from the time of Saturday afternoon, when court adjourned, to Monday morning, when the case was to be called. * * * I have now shown that upon the re-incarnation of the Florida McGuire case between the same parties was tried out in full in the same court, and that on that trial they only asked on behalf of Florida McGuire for twelve witnesses by subpoena, and that they all lived, and that all the witnesses they produced lived, right there. It is in line with our insistence that here was a conspiracy against the dignity and the honor of the court by its officers; and that it is a mere subterfuge in their testimony to claim that they discontinued that case because they had a multitude of witnesses who could not be obtained, when the fact was, as we propose to show and insist, that their discontinuance of that case resulted solely and alone because they were held and taken to task for their conspiracy and for their contempt.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Mr. President, the statement of the witness, Belden, was that they had forty or fifty witnesses for the trial, which was expected to take place in November, and that it would be impossible to get them for Monday, with notification upon the Saturday preceding.

This, now, is a paper which purports to be a list of some of the witnesses called for and used upon a trial which took place some time the next year in the suit brought over again—in another suit. It does not at all follow from the fact that this paper contains a list of twelve names that they did not have forty or fifty witnesses for the trial before, nor does it follow that the names of all the witnesses are contained upon the paper, or that they did not need or did not use any other witnesses upon the second trial. So it is an immaterial sort of paper, we think.

The Presiding Officer <sup>148</sup> said:

The Presiding Officer thinks the paper bears on the question, although it is not conclusive.

2294. The impeachment of William Blount, a United States Senator, in 1797.

The proceedings of the Blount impeachment were set in motion by a confidential message from the President of the United States.

In the Blount case the House voted to impeach on the strength of the matter contained in a letter proved to be in respondent's handwriting.

In the Blount impeachment case it was ruled that evidence should be taken before the House, and not before the Committee of the Whole.

In the Blount impeachment case the House seems to have distrusted its power to authorize the Speaker to administer oaths.

The House excused one of its Members from voting on any question connected with the impeachment to the bar of the Senate.

Forms of the resolutions impeaching William Blount and directing the carrying of the impeachment to the bar of the Senate.

The Blount impeachment was carried to the bar of the Senate by a single Member of the House.

On July 3, 1797,<sup>1</sup> a confidential message was received in the House from the President of the United States, who transmitted a letter purporting to have been written by William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee, to one James Carey, interpreter for the United States to the Cherokee Nation of Indians, for the purpose of seducing him from his duty and trust, in furtherance of certain unlawful designs. The message and papers were referred to a committee composed of Messrs. Samuel Sitgreaves, of Pennsylvania; Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Samuel W. Dana, of Connecticut; John Dawson, of Virginia, and William Hindman, of Maryland.

On July 6<sup>2</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves reported from the committee the following resolution:

Resolved, That William Blount, a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

This report was on the same day considered in a Committee of the Whole House. Mr. Sitgreaves stated that the President had been advised by the law officers of the Government that the letter was evidence of crime; that the crime was of the denomination of a misdemeanor; and that William Blount, being a Senator, was liable to impeachment. In conformity with this opinion, the letter had been transmitted to the House. There was debate as to whether or not a legislator was an officer liable to impeachment, after which Mr. Sitgreaves made a statement<sup>3</sup> as to the forms of procedure:

As to the form of proceeding necessary to be taken on this occasion, he would state what the opinion of the committee was as to this matter. They supposed it would be first proper for that House to determine that the gentleman in question should be impeached. This being done, that a Member of that House should go to the bar of the Senate and impeach the person, in the name of the House and of the people of the United States, and state that the House of Representatives will proceed to draw out specific articles of charge against him. According to the case, they require that he shall be sequestered from his seat, be committed, or be held to bail. When this is done, a committee will be appointed to draw articles of impeachment.

The reason, Mr. S. said, why some steps should be taken at present was that means should be taken to secure the person of the offender, either by confinement or by bail, since it was the opinion of the law officers of Government that he could not be arrested by ordinary process. He could not be arrested by the Senate; they could send for him (as he understood they had done) by the Sergeant-at-Arms, to take his seat in the House; but when the House adjourned, they had no further power over him until an impeachment was made against him.

Gentlemen said there was no danger of escape. If it were not improper to state what had taken place out of doors, it might be said that there had already been an attempt at an escape. Besides, if no investigation were now to take place, how were they to come to a knowledge of the plot which gentlemen seemed so desirous to come to a knowledge of? When they had determined to make the impeachment, and an oral declaration was made of it to the Senate, when they were ready to go home, they might go, and exhibit the charges at the next session, when they should have leisure fully to consider the subject.

Mr. John Rutledge, Jr., of South Carolina, who had attended the trial of Warren Hastings, approved the form of procedure, but suggested that the handwriting of Mr. Blount should be proven, and submitted a motion to that effect.

The chairman<sup>4</sup> suggested that the proof should be taken in the House, and this opinion prevailed, it being urged that the Committee of the Whole did not have the power of taking evidence. The committee accordingly arose.

In the House the Speaker<sup>5</sup> suggested the propriety of calling in a magistrate, as the Speaker had no power to administer an oath except in the case of qualifying the Members of the House. A motion to authorize the Speaker to administer the oath was disagreed to, 29 yeas, 53 nays.<sup>6</sup>

Then it was<sup>7</sup>

Ordered, That William Barry Grove, Abraham Baldwin, Joseph McDowell, and Nathaniel Macon, Members of this House, be examined upon oath, at the bar of this House, touching their knowledge of the handwriting of William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee; and that Reynold Keene, esq., one of the judges of the court of common pleas for the county of Philadelphia, and also one of the aldermen of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, administer the said oath.

The said Members were then sworn, and, being interrogated by the Speaker, severally answered that they believed the letter to be in the handwriting of William Blount.

It was then

Ordered, That the testimony of the said Members be reduced to writing by the Clerk, and that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed the report of the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 3d instant.

On July 7<sup>s</sup> the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Thomas Blount, a Member from North Carolina, and brother of William Blount, praying that he might be excused from voting on any question arising in the course of the impeachment proceedings. Thereupon it was Ordered, That the said Thomas Blount be excused from voting on any question relating to the impeachment, now pending in this House, of William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee.

On July 7,<sup>s</sup> also, the Committee of the Whole reported and the House agreed to the resolution that William Blount be impeached.

Then Mr. Sitgreaves moved an order which, with modification, was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. Sitgreaves do go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, impeach William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that this House will in due time exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same.

2295. Blount's impeachment continued.

In the Blount impeachment, following the precedent of the Hastings trial, the House did not send the articles to the Senate with the impeachment.

In the first impeachment the House followed English precedents to the extent of requiring the sequestration of the respondent from his seat in the Senate.

It was suggested by Mr. Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, that the articles of impeachment should be prepared and presented with the impeachment. To this the reply was made:<sup>10</sup>

Mr. Sitgreaves said that the mode which he proposed was the same which was practiced in the case of Mr. Hastings. Mr. Burke went up to the House of Lords and impeached him in words similar to those now proposed to be used. Some time afterwards, the articles of impeachment having been drawn, Mr. Burke again went up to the House of Lords and exhibited them. Mr. S. spoke also of a work lately published, in continuation of Judge Blackstone's Commentaries, which had a chapter on parliamentary impeachment, and pointed out this as the proper mode of procedure. He had also looked into the proceedings on the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield, and found the same course was taken. It was true that in the case of a public officer of the State of Pennsylvania, which perhaps his colleague might have in his eye, the articles of impeachment were exhibited at the same time that the impeachment was made.

On motion of Mr. Sitgreaves it was:

Ordered, further, That Mr. Sitgreaves do demand that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for the appearance of the said William Blount to answer to the said impeachment.

It was objected that it was not necessary to follow so closely the English precedents, since capital punishment could not follow a conviction on impeachment in this country. Therefore it would be unnecessary to confine the one impeached. But the House agreed to the order, ayes 41, noes 30.<sup>11</sup>

Form used in delivering the Blount impeachment at the bar of the Senate.

Upon the impeachment of William Blount the Senate took him into custody and required bonds for his appearance, and informed the House thereof.

Form of report to the House of an impeachment carried to the bar of the Senate.

On July 7,<sup>12</sup> while the Senate was engaged in proceedings for the expulsion of the said William Blount for the offense set forth in the message of the President, Mr. Sitgreaves appeared with the following message from the House:

Mr. President, I am commanded, in the name of the the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

I am further commanded to demand that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for his appearance to answer the said impeachment.

Thereupon the Senate agreed to the following:

Pursuant to a message from the House of Representatives of the United States by Samuel Sitgreaves, esq., a Member of that House, that they, in their own name, and in the name of all the people of the United States, have impeached William Blount, a Member of the Senate, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that, in due time, they will exhibit articles against him and make good the same; and they having demanded that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in this House, and that the Senate take order for his appearance to answer to the said impeachment:

Resolved, That the said William Blount be taken into custody of the messenger of this House until he shall enter into recognizance, himself in the sum of $20,000, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of $15,000 each, to appear and answer such articles of impeachment as may be exhibited against him.

Whereupon Mr. Blount named his sureties, and they were satisfactory to the Senate.

The President then named Mr. Blount and his sureties, who arose while the recognizance was read, and, being approved by the Senate, it was executed in their presence.

On the same day Mr. Sitgreaves returned to the House and reported:<sup>13</sup>

That, in obedience to the order of this House, he had been to the Senate, and in the name of this House and of all the people of the United States, had impeached William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and had acquainted the Senate that this House will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And, further, that he had demanded that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for his appearance to answer to the said impeachment.

On July 8<sup>14</sup> it was ordered by the Senate :

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives that, in consequence of their message of yesterday, by the Hon. Mr. Sitgreaves, one of their Members, they have caused William Blount to recognize, in the sum of $20,000 principal, with two sureties in the sum of $15,000 each, to appear and answer to the impeachment mentioned in their message.

In the Blount impeachment the drawing up of the articles was confided to a select committee, with power to procure testimony.

In the Blount impeachment the House, after discussion, empowered the committee drawing the articles to sit during the recess of Congress.

On the same day and succeeding day, in the House, the following resolutions appear to have been agreed to :<sup>15</sup>

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Resolved, That the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire, and by all lawful means to discover, the whole nature and extent of the offense whereof the said William Blount stands impeached, and who are the parties and associates therein.

The privilege of sitting during the recess was the subject of considerable debate, but precedents from English practice and from trials in South Carolina and Pennsylvania were cited.

Messrs. Sitgreaves, Baldwin, Dana, Dawson, and Robert Goodloe Harper, of South Carolina, were appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment.

After his expulsion from the Senate William Blount was surrendered by his bondsmen, and gave bonds anew to answer to the impeachment.

On July 8<sup>16</sup> in the Senate, the trial of William Blount terminated with his expulsion.

On this, Mr. Butler, in behalf of himself and Mr. Thomas Blount, the other surety, surrendered the person of William Blount, the principal, to the Senate, and requested to be discharged from their recognizance. Whereupon, it was Ordered, That they be discharged from their recognizance, and that the Secretary enter an indorsement on the back of the bond as follows :

"And now, to wit, on this 8th day of July, 1797, the Hon. Thomas Blount and Pierce Butler, esqs., came into the Senate and surrendered William Blount, esq., for whom they became bound yesterday.

On motion,

Resolved, That William Blount be taken into the custody of the Messenger of this House until he shall enter into recognizance, himself in the sum of $1,000, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of $500 each, to appear and answer such articles of impeachment as may be exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on Monday next.

A message was sent informing the House of Representatives of this action.<sup>17</sup>

On July 10 the Senate Journal records:<sup>18</sup>

Agreeably to the order of the Senate the within-mentioned William Blount having entered into recognizance, I have returned the same into the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

Ordered, That it be entered on the Journal of the Senate that William Blount failed making his appearance this day, agreeably to the recognizance entered into on the 8th instant.

A recess of Congress intervened between the impeachment of Blount and the framing of the articles of impeachment.

On July 10<sup>19</sup> in the House, it was:

Ordered, That Mr. Dana be excused from serving on the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, and that Mr. Bayard be appointed of the said committee in his stead.

On July 10 the Congress adjourned until the second Monday in November next.

The committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment in the Blount case reported the evidence, and later the articles.

The articles of impeachment in Blount's case were considered by the House and not by the Committee of the Whole.

After considering English precedents the House chose the managers of the Blount impeachment by ballot.

In choosing managers by ballot the House guarded against complications in case more than the required number should have a majority.

A manager in impeachment proceedings is excused from service by authority of the House.

The managers carry the articles of impeachment to the Senate in accordance with a resolution agreed to by the House.

On December 4, 1797,<sup>20</sup> at the second session of Congress. Mr. Sitgreaves from the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, submitted a report from which the injunction of secrecy was removed, and which was read in House on December 5 and ordered to lie on the table. This report did not embody the articles of impeachment, but simply set forth the facts, documents, subpoenas, etc., resulting from the investigation.<sup>21</sup>

On January 18 and 22, 1798,<sup>22</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves submitted supplementary reports, one representing an additional deposition and the other two letters received by the committee. They were read to the House and ordered to lie on the table.

On January 25, 1798,<sup>23</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves, from the committee, reported the articles of impeachment, which were considered in Committee of the Whole, and on January 29 were agreed to by the House.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Sitgreaves:

Resolved, That eleven managers be appointed, by ballot, to conduct the said impeachment on the part of this House.

As to the method of appointment there was some debate.<sup>24</sup>

Mr. Sitgreaves said, with respect to the manner of appointing managers, he left it to the discretion of the House. The British House of Commons appointed their managers of impeachment by ballot, as they did all their large committees. In this House a different course was taken with respect to committees: they were always appointed by the Speaker, except specially ordered otherwise. The former committee on this business was appointed by the Speaker. He was not disposed to deviate from the usual practice. If, however, any gentleman wished to move that they be appointed by ballot, such a motion, he supposed, would be in order.

Mr. Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, thought the rule directing the appointment of committees did not apply in the present case. It was true that managers of conferences of the Senate were thus chosen, but he thought there was an essential difference between the two cases. Managers of conferences reported to the House similarly with committees, and in fact they were a committee, though called by a different name. But managers of an impeachment on the part of this House appeared to him to be quite a different thing. They were not to make a report to the House which might be affirmed or negatived; they were the representatives of the House, and what they did would be final. Under this impression, in order to take the sense of the House upon the business, he moved that the managers be elected by ballot.

The motion that the managers be appointed by ballot was agreed to by the House.

On January 30<sup>25</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves, in view of the fact that the House should determine whether the choice should be determined by majority or plurality, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in the ballot for managers to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, on the part of this House, a majority of the whole number of votes shall be necessary to a choice; and if it should happen that more than eleven members shall have a majority, that, in that case, the eleven highest in votes shall be considered as chosen; and if any two or more having a majority of votes should be equal in number, so as that the plurality can not be determined among them, the same shall be decided by a new ballot, subject to the preceding rules.

Proceeding to ballot, the House, on this and the succeeding day, chose the following managers:

Messrs. Sitgreaves; James A. Bayard, of Delaware; Harper; William Gordon, of New Hampshire; Thomas Pinckney, of South Carolina; Dana; Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts; Hezekiah L. Hosmer, of New York; John Dennis, of Maryland; Thomas Evans, of Virginia; and James H. Inlay, of New Jersey.

Mr. Baldwin, who had been elected a manager, was excused by the House.

On motion,

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 12 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against William Blount, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, to be presented by the managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

This was the same day communicated to the House by a message borne from the Senate by its Secretary.<sup>29</sup>

Mr. Sitgreaves having stated that it was usual on all solemn occasions like this for the House to give sanction to its managers by an attendance at the time, the managers of the impeachment, accompanied by some of the Members of the House, accordingly went up to the Senate for the purpose of exhibiting the articles of impeachment against William Blount.<sup>30</sup>

Later, in the Senate,<sup>31</sup> a message was announced from the House of Representatives by the above-mentioned managers, who, being introduced, and all but the chairman being seated,<sup>30</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves, their chairman, addressed the Senate as follows :

Mr. Vice-President: The House of Representatives having agreed upon articles in maintenance of their impeachment against William Blount for high crimes and misdemeanors, and having appointed on their part managers of the said impeachment, the managers have now the honor to attend the Senate for the purpose of exhibiting the said articles.

The Vice-President then ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to proclaim silence, after which he notified the managers that the Senate was ready to hear the articles of impeachment; whereupon,

The chairman of the managers read the articles of impeachment, and they were received from him at the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms and laid on the table.

The Vice-President<sup>32</sup> then said: <sup>30</sup>

Gentlemen, managers on the part of the House of Representatives: The Senate will take such order on the articles of impeachment which you have exhibited before them as shall seem to them proper, of which due notice will be given to the House of Representatives.

William Blount, report, in part, that a writ of summons issue, directed to the said William Blount, in the form following :

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, 88 :

"The Senate of the United States of America to William Blount, late a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee, greeting : Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States of America did, on the 7th day of July last past, in their own name, and in the name of all the people of the United States, impeach you, the said William Blount, of high crimes and misdemeanor before the Senate of the United States : And whereas the said House of Representatives did, on the 7th day of February, of the present year, exhibit to the Senate their articles of impeachment against you, the said William Blount, charging you with high crimes and misdemeanors, therein specially set forth (a true copy of which articles of impeachment is annexed to this writ), and did demand that you, the said William Blount, should be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors : and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments might be thereupon had as are agreeable to law and justice—you, the said William Blount, are therefore summoned to be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber, in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the third Monday of December next, at the hour of 11 of that day, then and there to answer the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform such orders and judgments as the Senate of the United States shall make in the premises, according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States. And hereof you are in nowise to fail. Witness, the honorable Thomas Jefferson, esq., Vice-President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Philadelphia, the 1st day of March, in the year of our Lord 1798, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-second.

"Which summons shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate.

"That the said summons shall be served on the said William Blount by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, or a special messenger, who shall leave a true copy of the writ and the articles annexed with the said William Blount, if he can be found, showing him the original : or at the usual place of residence of the said William Blount, if he can not be found. Which messenger shall make return of the writ of summons, and of his proceedings in virtue thereof, to the Senate, on the appearance day therein mentioned.

"And that a message be sent to the House of Representatives, giving information that the Senate have directed the said writ to be issued, and of the day mentioned therein for the appearance of the said William Blount."

It was then

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do issue the summons hereinbefore directed, and that service thereof be made sixty days at the least before the return day mentioned in the said writ of summons.

This report was communicated to the House by message and appears in full on the Journal of that body.<sup>39</sup> The following order was then agreed to :

Ordered, That the said proceedings of the Senate be referred to the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the said impeachment against William Blount, with instructions to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what provisions are necessary to be made by law for regulating proceedings in cases of impeachment.

On April 6<sup>40</sup> Mr. Sitgreaves, from the managers, reported the following resolutions, which were agreed to :

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject of their resolution of the 1st of March last, relative to the impeachment of William Blount, and that the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment be the managers for this House at the proposed conference.

Resolved, That the managers of this House do request, at the said conference, that the Senate will appoint a day, during the present session of Congress, for the return of the summons directed by their resolution of the 1st of March aforesaid, to be issued to the said William Blount.

On April 9,<sup>41</sup> in the Senate,

Resolved, That they do agree to the proposed conference, and that Messrs. Ross and Livermore be managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

On April 13,<sup>42</sup> Mr. Bayard, from the managers appointed on the part of the House, submitted the following report, which was laid on the table:

That they laid before the conferees appointed by the Senate the resolution of the 6th instant, requesting the appointment of a day during the present session of Congress for the return of the summons against the said William Blount, the reasons upon which the said resolution was founded; and were assured by the conferees that the said request and the reasons for making it, suggested by the managers, should be reported and submitted to the Senate.

This report was ordered to lie on the table.

In the Senate, on April 16,<sup>43</sup> Mr. Ross, from the conferees, made a report; whereupon, it was

Resolved. That it is not, at this time, expedient to alter the return day of the summons directed to be issued to William Blount, so as to make it returnable in the present session of Congress as requested by the managers of the House of Representatives, there being no certainty that it will continue long enough to afford reasonable time for a proper service and return of this process.

On April 16<sup>44</sup> this resolution was communicated to the House by message, and was read and ordered to lie on the table.

In Blount's impeachment the return of service of the summons was filed in the Senate before the day set for the appearance.

In the Blount impeachment a letter from respondent's attorneys announcing their readiness to attend was filed in the Senate before the day set for appearance.

In the Senate on December 6, 1798,<sup>45</sup> in the next and third session of the Congress, "the return of service on the summons to William Blount, made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of the 1st of March last, was read." This is the entry of the Senate Journal, which does not give the return in full.

Then the President communicated a letter from Jared Ingersoll, esq., stating that he, together with A. J. Dallas, esq., were employed as counsel for William Blount, and that they were ready to attend the trial when ordered by the Senate. This letter does not appear in full in the Senate Journal.

Mr. Bayard, "the present chairman" of the managers,<sup>47</sup> offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That another Member be appointed, by ballot, as one of the managers to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, in the room of Mr. Sitgreaves, appointed a commissioner of the United States, under the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, with Great Britain.

The House accordingly chose Mr. John Wikes Kittera, of Pennsylvania.

The Senate, by message, informed the House that the summons had been served on William Blount and a return made thereon to the Secretary's office.

Rules adopted by the Senate for reading the return, calling the impeachment.

In the first impeachment the Senate by rule described itself as a court of impeachment.

Impeachment trials in the Senate have from the first been recorded in a separate journal.

Form used by the Sergeant-at-Arms in calling William Blount to appear and answer articles of impeachment.

Form of return of writ of summons in Blount impeachment.

William Blount appeared neither in person nor by attorney to answer the articles of impeachment.

The House did not attend the return of summons to William Blount to appear and answer articles of impeachment.

In the Senate on December 13:<sup>48</sup>

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the summons issued by order of the Senate of the United States against William Blount, on the 1st day of March last, to appear at their bar on the third Monday of December instant and answer to the impeachment made by the House of Representatives, for high crimes and misdemeanors, has been duly served on the said William Blount by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and a return thereon is made to the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

This message was received in the House on the same day.

On December 17,<sup>49</sup> in the Senate, Messrs. James Ross, of Pennsylvania; Jacob Read, of South Carolina, and Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire, were appointed to report rules for conducting the trial of impeachment and reported—

That the legislative and executive business of the Senate be postponed, and that the Senate form itself into a court of impeachment by taking the oath prescribed by a resolution of this House on the 9th of February, last.

After the oath has been administered to the President and Senate, the process which, on the 1st of March last, was directed to be issued and served upon William Blount, and the return made thereupon, shall be read. The officer who served the process shall be sworn to the truth of the return thereof. The defendant, William Blount, shall be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, his appearance shall be recorded. If he does not appear, his default shall be recorded.

The House of Representatives shall be notified of the appearance or default of the defendant, William Blount, and that the Senate will be ready at 12 o'clock to-morrow to receive the managers appointed by that House, and to take further order in this trial.

<sup>47</sup> Mr. Bayard was second on the committee of managers and apparently succeeded to the position without election, although such usage was not incorporated in the rule until 1804.

The report was adopted, and the Senate "formed itself into a court of impeachment accordingly." The daily Journal of the Senate does not record the proceedings of the court of impeachment,<sup>50</sup> but they were as follows on this day:<sup>51</sup>

On this day the Senate formed itself into a high court of impeachment, in the manner directed by the Constitution, and the oath prescribed was administered to the Senators present. The process issued on the 1st of March last against William Blount, together with the return made thereon, was read, and the return was sworn to as follows:

"James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, maketh oath that, in obedience to the within summons, he did repair to the usual place of residence of the within-named William Blount, at Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, and on the 27th day of August, in the present year, did then leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, and of the articles of impeachment annexed, with the wife of the said William Blount, he not being to be found; and that, on the next day, meeting with the said William Blount at the Blue Springs, the deponent showed and read the said original writ to the said William Blount, and informed him that he had left a copy at the usual place of his residence.

"JAMES MATHERS."

The doors of the court were then opened by order of the President, and by his order the Sergeant-at-Arms called the said William Blount three several times, in the words following, to appear and answer:

"Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye!

"William Blount, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee, come forward and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives."

William Blount not appearing, the court adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The House being informed that William Blount had failed to appear and answer the articles, instructed the managers to ask of the Senate time to prepare proceedings.

After William Blount had failed to appear and answer, counsel were admitted on his behalf.

William Blount having failed to appear and answer, the House, after discussing English precedents, declined to ask that he be compelled to appear.

The House declined to instruct its managers as to further proceedings after William Blount had failed to appear and answer.

In the House on December 18,<sup>52</sup> a message was received from the Senate notifying the House that William Blount, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors before the Senate, by this House, though he had been duly summoned, had not appeared at the bar of the Senate at the time appointed; and that the Senate would be ready to receive the managers at 12 o'clock this day, to take further order in this trial.

On motion of Mr. Harper, this message was referred to the managers of the impeachment, who had leave to sit during the session of the House.

Later, on the same day, Mr. Harper reported, and in accordance therewith it was—

Resolved, That the said managers do attend before the Senate, at 12 o'clock this day, and request a further day for preparing their proceedings in the said impeachment.

In the Senate, on December 18,<sup>53</sup> Messrs. Ross, Livermore, and Stockton were appointed to a committee to take into consideration and report what rules were necessary to be adopted on the trial of the impeachment.

On the same day the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, wherein occurred the following proceedings:<sup>54</sup>

The President communicated a letter, signed "Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas," praying to be admitted to appear as counsel for the defendant. It was accordingly so ordered, and that the House of Representatives be informed thereof.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the defendant's counsel appeared at the bar.

On motion of Mr. Harper (in the absence of Mr. Bayard, the chairman), in behalf of the managers that further time be allowed them to prepare their proceedings in the case, it was,

Ordered, That they have time till Monday next, at 12 o'clock, for that purpose."

The court adjourned till that time.

In the House, on December 20,<sup>54</sup> Mr. Harper submitted the report of the managers, which was as follows:

That, pursuant to the resolution of this House, of the 18th instant, they did attend before the Senate of the United States, and request a further day for preparing their proceedings in the said impeachment; whereupon, a further day was granted till Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

That the managers, having carefully considered the subject, are of opinion that it is neither consistent with the solemnity which ought to attend this high constitutional proceeding, nor with the principles, which, as far as they have been able to discover, have invariably obtained in impeachments, and all other trials of a criminal nature, to proceed to trial against the defendant in this case in his absence; and that the said William Blount, having failed to make personal appearance, as has been notified to the House by the above-mentioned message from the Senate, the next step, on the part of this House, ought to be a motion before the Senate that further order be taken by them for compelling his personal appearance at their bar, to answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by this House.

The managers, however, do not think it proper for them to take a step involving so important a principle without the direction of the House, for the purpose of obtaining which, they beg leave to submit to its consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the managers appointed, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, late a Senator of the United States, be instructed to request, at their next attendance before the Senate, that further order be taken for compelling the personal appearance of the said William Blount, to answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him on the part of this House."

On the next day the House debated the report at length. It appeared that the managers were nearly unanimous in favor of their report, but it was vigorously assailed in the House. Mr. Harrison G. Otis, of Massachusetts, opposed:

Mr. Otis said he did not know what had been the rule observed in similar cases in England; he had not had leisure to examine; nor did he think we ought to be bound by British precedents in a case of this kind. It is, said he, a new case, and he saw no difficulty in determining to prosecute this man to conviction, and in obtaining for him the punishment which he deserves. There is some analogy between this process and a process (well known in common law) against a man's property, distinct from his person. Every one knows that such a prosecution is a prosecution of forfeiture. For instance, we libel a vessel, and notice is given to all the parties to defend. If they do not appear, judgment and execution are obtained.

The present process is against the office of William Blount; it has nothing to do with his person; he is afterwards liable to a prosecution at common law for any crime which he may have committed.

Mr. Samuel W. Dana, of Connecticut, also supported this view:

Let gentlemen who say that a person, in a case like the present, should be required to appear, answer, if a sentence can neither affect a man's person nor his property, why he should appear in person? If a man were liable to be punished with imprisonment, fine, or ransom, his person ought to be secured; and it is because courts will have security, that in such cases persons are either imprisoned or held by efficient bail is refused. It is where it does not afford a sufficient security. Is any such security required in this case? asked Mr. Dana. There is not. The process would be a rare one if the party were required to appear.

The Constitution, continued Mr. Dana, has proceeded on a different principle. The process in cases of impeachment in this country is distinct from either civil or criminal—it is a political process, having in view the preservation of the Government of the Union. Impeachments under the British Government are wholly different from impeachments carried on under this Government. The Constitution proceeds on the high authority of public opinion and of the high value of reputation to every man who is a candidate for public office, and that the declaration of public reprobation, expressed by the constitutional organ, is one of the severest punishments. It considers that the punishment of fine and imprisonment may be endured, but that public abhorrence is not to be borne.

The punishment in this case therefore is wholly a declaration of public opinion, not only that the person receiving it has proved himself unworthy of his present office, but that there is such a baseness attached to his character as to render him unfit for any office in future. Taking the matter up in this view, the propriety of not considering the offense as criminal will clearly appear. Were the offense to be considered as a crime merely, the judgment of the court should involve the whole punishment; whereas, it has no connection with punishment or crime, as, whether a person tried under an impeachment be found guilty or acquitted, he is still liable to a prosecution at common law. This process therefore is perfectly sul generis—equally unknown to the British Government or to this country.

Upon this view of the subject, Mr. Dana said his opinion was, that the House ought to instruct the managers, but in a way directly opposite to that proposed by the resolution under consideration.

Mr. Dana also cited the case of Robert Tresylliam and others, tried before the British House of Lords in 1388, in support of his opinion, but it was alleged in opposition that this precedent had been highly censured by English law writers.

Mr. Harper defended the report of the managers:

It had been the practice, from the earliest records of our jurisprudence to the present time, that a man shall never be tried in his absence for a criminal offense. Gentlemen say the reason for this is, that he may be ready to receive judgment. If so, it would be foolish, because the court might direct the person of a criminal to be brought before them to receive sentence as well as they could do it before his trial. What, then, said he, is the reason? Ask the great sages of the English law, and they will give an answer very different from his learned friends. They will say that it is because a man ought always to be face to face with his judges and accusers; that no witness ought to be heard against a man, or his life or property put in jeopardy, without his personal presence; and so sacred is the principle held that a man is not permitted to depart from it. This is not a solitary instance in which personal convenience is sacrificed to natural convenience; this is frequently the case, in order to make sure the barriers which protect individual security. It is in this respect that our jurisprudence is chiefly distinguished from the inquisitorial proceedings of former times, where a man might be found guilty of the highest crimes without knowing who were his accusers, witnesses, or judges. It is by this sacred maxim that no man can be put in jeopardy without being confronted by his accusers. And shall we, said he, depart from this principle? Why shall we do this? Because the judgment to be awarded in this case does not extend to person or property? Is the judgment less than if it affected person or property? Gentlemen will not say so. They will say that a man's reputation is the dearest possession which he can enjoy; and certain he was that gentlemen who are opposed in opinion to him on this subject would sooner be deprived of their property or personal liberty than lose their fame and reputation. It was, in his opinion, the highest punishment that could be inflicted upon a man of worth.

The House disagreed to the resolution proposed by the managers, yeas 11, nays 69.

Mr. Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts, one of the managers, in order that there might be positive instructions from the House, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the managers appointed on the part of this House for conducting the impeachment against William Blount proceed in the prosecution of the said impeachment, although William Blount shall not appear in person to answer to the same.

It was urged against this resolution that it was improper to give any instructions at all and that the Senate should be left to proceed as they should think proper.

The resolution was disagreed to, ayes 37, noes 46.

Rule adopted by the Senate for the trial of William Blount in 1797.

The rule providing for the putting in of the answer or plea in the Blount case.

The rules in the Blount case provided that respondent's answer should be communicated to the House of Representatives.

The Senate rules in the Blount case required that respondent's answer should be spread on the journal.

The Senate rules in the Blount case provided that all questions arising should be decided in secret session and by yeas and nays.

Form of oath and mode of examination of witnesses prescribed in the Blount impeachment.

It was provided in the Blount case that Senators called as witnesses should be sworn and testify standing in their places.

The Senate communicated to the House its rules for the trial of William Blount; and they appear in the House Journal.

The Senate decided that the counsel for William Blount need not file any warrant of attorney or other written authority.

During proceedings in impeachment before the Senate the President pro tempore presides during temporary absence of the Vice-President.

In the Senate, on December 20,<sup>58</sup> Mr. Ross, from the committee appointed to prepare rules, made a report which, after amendment, was on December 21 agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That at the next opening of the court of impeachment the President shall inquire whether the managers have any request to make before the counsel of the defendant are called on to put in his answer.

If no motion or request is made, the defendant's counsel shall be required to put in his answer or plea to the articles of impeachment.

The answer or plea shall be read by the Secretary and entered by him on the Journal.

A copy of the defendant's answer or plea shall be communicated to the House of Representatives by the Secretary.

The President shall then inform the managers that the Senate is ready to hear any reply or motion which they may think proper to make.

All questions, arising in the course of the trial, shall be decided with closed doors. The decisions shall be by ayes and noes, which shall be entered upon the Journal. When the question is decided, the doors shall be opened, the parties called in, and the result made known to them by the President.

Witnesses shall be sworn by the Secretary, and shall take the following oath:

"I, A, B, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence I will give to this court, touching the impeachment of William Blount, now here depending, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: So help me God."

Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form. If a Senator wishes any question to be asked, it shall be put by the President.

If Senators are called as witnesses, they shall be sworn, and give their testimony standing in their places.

It was also—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, taking into their care the ordering of the trial of William Blount, late a Senator of United States from the State of Tennessee, on Monday, the 24th of December instant, have prepared some rules to be observed at said trial, which they have thought fit to communicate to the House of Representatives.

The message was accordingly delivered in the House, and the rules appear in full in the House Journal of December 21.<sup>56</sup>

On December 24<sup>57</sup> the Senate resolved themselves into a court of impeachment whereupon the proceedings were as follows:

The manager and counsel attended as on the 18th instant.

On the motion of Mr. Harper, in behalf of the managers, that the counsel exhibit and file the power, or powers, by which they are authorized to appear in behalf of William Blount, and that the managers be furnished with a copy thereof.

Mr. Dallas, one of the counsel, exhibited sundry letters to the President, which, he alleged, contains the powers and also the confidential instructions of Mr. Blount to his counsel.

The court was cleared in order to take into consideration the motion made by the managers of the impeachment; and, on the motion that it be ruled.

"That the court having, on the 18th day of the present month, admitted Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, esqs., to appear and plead for William Blount, to the impeachment now pending against him, and the court having then been satisfied that the said counsel were duly authorized to appear for the said William Blount, are of opinion that it is not necessary that any warrant of attorney, or other written authority, be now filed in this court."

It was determined in the affirmative, 20 to 2.

The managers and counsel being again admitted, the President<sup>58</sup> stated to them the opinion of the court on the motion of the managers, and returned to Mr. Dallas the letters by him exhibited, unopened.

The President then asked the managers if they had further motion to make prior to permission to the counsel for the defendant to file a plea, on his behalf.

To which the managers replied in the negative.

2310. Blount's impeachment, continued.

The plea filed by counsel of William Blount in answer to the articles of impeachment.

William Blount, in his plea, demurred to the jurisdiction of the Senate to try him on impeachment charges.

William Blount pleaded that he was not, at the time of pleading, a Senator; and that a Senator was not impeachable as a civil officer.

The plea of William Blount being received by the House of Representatives, was referred to the managers.

<sup>58</sup> It is evident that in the absence of the Vice-President the President pro tempore presided. The Vice-President had not attended this session at this time. Senate Journal, p. 567.

Whereupon the President notified to the counsel that they were permitted to file their plea, which was done by Mr. Ingersoll and read by the Secretary as follows:

UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM BLOUNT

Upon impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, December 24, 1798.

The aforesaid William Blount, saving and reserving to himself all exceptions to the imperfections and uncertainty of the articles of impeachment, by Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, his attorneys, comes and defends the force and injury, and says, that he, to the said articles of impeachment preferred against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought not to be compelled to answer, because he says that the eighth article of certain amendments of the Constitution of the United States, having been ratified by nine States, after the same was, in a constitutional manner, proposed to the consideration of the several States of the Union, is of equal obligation with the original Constitution, and now forms a part thereof, and that by the same article it is declared and provided, that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

That proceedings by impeachment are provided and permitted by the Constitution of the United States, only on charges of bribery, treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to have been committed by the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States, in the execution of their offices held under the United States, as appears by the fourth section of the second article, and by the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, and other articles, and clauses contained in the Constitution of the United States.

That although true it is, that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States, from the State of Tennessee, at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to; yet, that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not, nor was at the several periods, so as aforesaid referred to, an officer of the United States; nor is he, the said William, in and by the said articles, charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor, in the execution of any civil office held under the United States, or with any misconduct in civil office, or abuse of any public trust, in the execution thereof.

That the courts of common law, of a criminal jurisdiction, of the State, wherein the offenses in the said articles recited are said to have been committed, as well as those of the United States, are competent to the cognizance, prosecution, and punishment, of the said crimes and misdemeanors, if the same have been perpetrated, as is suggested and charged by the said articles, which, however, he utterly denies. All which the said William is ready to verify, and prays judgment whether this high court will have further cognizance of this suit, and of the said impeachment, and whether he, the said William, to the said articles of impeachment, so as aforesaid preferred by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought to be compelled to answer.

JARED INGERSOLL.
A. J. DALLAS.

On request of Mr. Harper, in behalf of the managers, that they be allowed a further delay, to wit, until Thursday sennight, to file their replication, it was allowed and the court adjourned at that time.

On December 26th a message from the Senate, by their Secretary, announced:

Mr. Speaker, the counsel in behalf of William Blount, by permission of the Senate, having filed their plea, I am directed to communicate a copy thereof to the House of Representatives.

This plea, as above given, appears in full in the Journal of the House. It does not appear from the Senate Journal that the Senate itself ordered this message sent. If the court of impeachment ordered it sent, the fact is not noted in the proceedings. But under the rule the Secretary would send it without further order of the Senate or court.

The House:

Ordered, That the said message be referred to the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, with instructions to proceed thereon as they shall deem advisable.

2311. Blount's impeachment, continued.

The House sent to the Senate a replication to respondent's plea; and his counsel presented a rejoinder.

The replication of the House was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

In the Blount impeachment the rejoinder on behalf of respondent was signed by his attorneys.

In the Blount impeachment the replication was presented by the House managers, but was read by the Secretary of the Senate.

In the Blount impeachment the Senate dispensed with the requirement for yeas and nays on questions of adjournment and on allowing further time for the parties.

On December 31,<sup>69</sup> in the House, Mr. Bayard, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, a message from the Senate communicating a copy of the plea filed by the counsel in behalf of the said William Blount, with instructions to proceed thereon, as they shall deem advisable, made a report, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

That the replication annexed be put into the said plea on behalf of this House, and that the managers be instructed to proceed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, as such time as shall be appointed by the Senate:

"The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf, and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William Blount, to the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States, to try the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William Blount:

"The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against the said William Blount, reply to the plea of the said William Blount, and say, that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William Blount from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that, by the Constitution of the United States, the House of Representatives had power to prefer the said articles of impeachment, and that the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same: Wherefore, they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William Blount be not allowed, but that the said William Blount be compelled to answer the said articles of impeachment."

It does not appear from the Journals of either the Senate or House that this replication was transmitted to the Senate by message before it was presented in the court of impeachment by the managers.

In the Senate, on January 3, 1799<sup>61</sup> it was

Resolved, That in all questions of adjournment of the court of impeachment, as also in all questions on a motion that further time be allowed to the parties, the taking the question by yeas and nays be dispensed with.

Also on January 3 the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, the proceedings of which are recorded:<sup>62</sup>

The court being opened, and the managers and counsel being present.

Mr. Bayard, chairman of the managers, in behalf of the House of Representatives, offered a replication, which was read by the Secretary as follows:

"The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf. [Here follows the text of the replication as given above.]

"Signed by order, and in behalf of the House.

"JONATHAN DAYTON, Speaker.

"Attest:

"JON. W. CONDY, Clerk."

Mr. Ingersoll, counsel for the defendant, thereupon presented a rejoinder, which was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM BLOUNT.

In the Senate of the United States.

"And the aforesaid William Blount, by Jared Ingersoll and Alexander J. Dallas, his attorneys, says that the matter by him before alleged which he is ready to verify, is sufficient reason in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and the articles therein set forth: which said matter so as aforesaid by him alleged, the said House of Representatives not having denied or made answer thereto, he prays the judgment of this honorable court, whether they will hold further jurisdiction of the said impeachment or take cognizance thereof, and whether the said William Blount shall make further answer thereto.

"JARED INGERSOLL.

"A. J. DALLAS.

"JANUARY 3, 1799."

It does not appear that this rejoinder was transmitted by message to the House.

2312. Blount's impeachment, continued.

In the Blount impeachment it was arranged that the managers should open and close in arguing respondent's plea in demurrer.

Mr. Bayard, the chairman, having communicated with Mr. Ingersoll, the leading counsel for the defendant, it was agreed between them that the managers should proceed in the argument first on the part of the prosecution, and that the right to reply should belong to the managers, whereupon.

Mr. Bayard rose and proceeded.

At the conclusion of his address Mr. Ingersoll, on behalf of the defendant, moved<sup>63</sup> for further time to reply, and it was allowed until 11 o'clock the next day to which time the court adjourned.

On January 4,<sup>64</sup> the court having convened, Mr. Dallas, in behalf of the defendant, spoke during that day's sitting.

On January 5<sup>65</sup> the court convened again, Mr. Ingersoll speaking further in defense. Mr. Ingersoll having concluded, Mr. Harper,<sup>66</sup> of the managers, closed.

After Mr. Harper had closed his observations, the Vice-President inquired of the managers if they had any further observations to offer, on which Mr. Bayard, in their behalf requested permission to withdraw for a few moments; and, returning into the court, he replied in the negative.

The argument touched upon five points, although on two of these little stress was laid.

Discussion as to the right to demand a trial by jury in a case of impeachment.

(1) The plea of the respondent had set forth that the power of impeachment as established in the original Constitution had been limited by the eighth amendment. Mr. Bayard, of the managers, answering this, contended that it had no bearing on the question of jurisdiction in this case, whatever it might have should there be a trial. But he further urged that if the contention of the plea were well founded there would be an end of the judicial character of the Senate and it must part with the power expressly given it by the Constitution to try all impeachments. The same rule of construction would require jury trials in courts-martial.<sup>66</sup>

In reply on this point Mr. Dallas, speaking for the respondent, said:

The honorable manager had misunderstood the object of the plea when he supposed it asserted a right to a trial by jury in cases properly impeachable, since the clause to which he referred was merely inserted to show that, unless this was a case in which an impeachment would lie, the party was entitled to a trial by jury in the ordinary courts having cognizance of the matters charged.

Argument that impeachment should not fail simply because the offense may be within jurisdiction of the courts.

(2) The plea that the courts of law were competent to try the cause was answered by Mr. Bayard by calling attention to the fact that no court at common law could give judgment of disqualification; and that the just punishment for the offenses alleged.

He also said:

In the second place, if the suggestion were true it would not be effectual, because by the seventh clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution delinquents shall be liable both to the punishment upon impeachment and that inflicted in the courts of common law. It is no objection to say that the courts have cognizance of the offense, because it is expressly provided that the one punishment shall not be an exemption from the other.

2315. Blount's impeachment continued.

In the Blount impeachment the managers contended, although in vain, that all citizens of the United States were liable to impeachment.

The law of Parliament was referred to in 1797 in discussing the power of impeachment.

(3) The first point of essential importance in the contending arguments of managers and counsel related to the nature of the power of impeachment. Mr. Bayard showed that in no places had the Constitution defined the cases or described the persons who should be objects of impeachment.<sup>67</sup> This, like other portions of the Constitution, left one to seek in the common law the answer to the questions.

The question,<sup>69</sup> therefore, is, what persons, for what offenses, are liable to be impeached at common law? And I am confident, as to this point, the learning and liberality of the counsel will save me the trouble of argument, or the citation of authorities, to establish the position that the question of impeachability is a question of discretion only, with the Commons and Lords. Not that I mean to insist that the Lords have legal cognizance of a charge of a capital crime against a commoner, but simply that all the King's subjects are liable to be impeached by the Commons, and tried by the Lords, upon charges of high crimes and misdemeanors. And this, sir, goes to the extent of the articles exhibited against William Blount. And for my part I do not conceive it would have been sound policy to have laid any restriction as to person upon the power of impeaching.

It is not difficult to imagine a case in which the punishment it imposes would be the most suitable which could be inflicted. Let us suppose that a citizen not in office, but possessed of extensive influence, arising from popular arts, from wealth or connections, actuated by strong ambition, and aspiring to the first place in the Government, should conspire with the disaffected of our own country, or with foreign intriguers, by illegal artifice, corruption, or force, to place himself in the Presidential chair. I would ask, in such a case, what punishment would be more likely to quell a spirit of that description than absolute and perpetual disqualification for any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government; and what punishment could be better calculated to secure the peace and safety of the State from the repetition of the same offense?

Mr. Dallas, counsel for the respondent, combated this proposition at length. It was contrary to the "principles of the Federal compact:"<sup>69</sup>

For although it is in some of its features Federal, in others it is consolidated; in some of its operations it affects the people as individuals; in others it applies to them in the aggregate as States; yet, in every view, all the powers and attributes of the National Government are matters of express and positive grant and transfer; whatever is not expressly granted and transferred must be deemed to remain with the people, or with the respective States; and as the motive for establishing the Federal Constitution arose from the want of a competent national authority in cases in which it was essential for the people inhabiting the different States to act as a nation, so far the people gave power to the Federal Government; but the delegation of that power is evidently limited by the reason which produced it.

Mr. Dallas asserted that the United States, as a nation distinguished from the States, had no common law, and that it would be unwise to apply the theory of impeachments taken "from the dark and barbarous pages of the common law" to the existing situation, since it would render the Government dependent upon the laws and usages of a foreign country. The same doctrine would also give the Federal courts jurisdiction beyond the enumerated cases. The doctrine was also inconsistent with the general policy of the law of impeachments, which was to afford a means of reaching offenders who could not be reached by the ordinary tribunals. The doctrine was also inconsistent with a fair construction of the terms of the Constitution itself:

The operative words<sup>70</sup> are express: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."—Art. 2, sec. 4. The previous clauses are only descriptive of the power and distributive of its exercise; declaring that the sole power to institute and the sole power to try impeachments shall belong to the branches of the Legislature respectively. They contain no description of the persons liable to impeachment, nor of the offenses for which the impeachment may be brought. To suppose that they include a jurisdiction over all persons, for all offenses, is to annihilate the trial by jury where a punishment more severe than death to an honorable mind may be inflicted; it is to overthrow all the barriers of criminal jurisprudence; for every petty rogue may be tried by impeachment before this high court for every offense within the indefinite classification of a misdemeanor.

The reason of the thing, as well as the expression, shows, however, that the offender must be a civil officer to vest the jurisdiction of impeachment. For every other offender a competent punishment is provided in the ordinary tribunals; but, in the case of a public officer, no sentence strictly judicial, in any common law court, can affect the tenure of his office. In the business of offices, to appoint, to reappoint, or to abstain from reappointing are attributes and exercises of Executive authority; the ordinary judicial authority can not exercise them, nor restrain or regulate their exercise by the proper magistrate. Hence arose the necessity of the judgment in case of a conviction on impeachment, which, by declaring that the delinquent officer shall be removed, and that he shall never be reappointed, affixes, in effect, a check or limitation to the general power of the Executive.

But, if civil officers are not exclusively contemplated, why limit the judgment on impeachment simply to a removal and disqualification? The common law maxim says that no man shall be twice tried for the same offense; and if the Senate may, on any charge against any offender, try the whole merits of the accusation and defense, why restrain them from pronouncing the whole judgment? Why multiply trials, and parcel out jurisdictions, when one trial, one jurisdiction, would accomplish every purpose of justice? There is an appearance of absurdity in the doctrine that can not be overlooked. A private citizen who holds an office may be impeached on the speculation that, at some period of his life, it is possible he should be appointed a public officer. And if any sentence is pronounced it must, in his case, be a perpetual disqualification; whereas, in the case of a man actually in office, the sentence may only extend to a present removal.

Again, if the bare designation of the party who should impeach, and of the party who should try impeachments, creates a jurisdiction over all persons for all offenses, why should the subsequent clause specially name the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States? They would certainly be included in the general authority; and it can be no answer to say that it was with a view, imperatively, to command their removal on conviction, because the restricted judgment of the Senate points emphatically at their case—a removal from office and a perpetual disqualification. Would not those officers be removed or disqualified for any offense for which a private citizen might be disqualified on impeachment, though it is not one of the enumerated offenses? It is here, likewise, to be remarked that the persons subject to removal are to be "civil officers of the United States," excluding all idea of affecting the station of State officers; and yet State officers as well as private citizens are liable to impeachment before this Senate, according to the present claim of jurisdiction.

Mr. Ingersoll also argued on this point in support of the contention of his colleague.

In concluding for the managers, Mr. Harper replied: <sup>71</sup>

The learned counsel who first replied to my colleague took great pains and displayed much ability to show the pernicious and absurd consequences which would result from adopting the penal common law of England, or the penal code of any State, as a rule of conduct for the Federal Government. But this was merely fighting a phantom; for my colleague contended for no such thing, nor is it in the least necessary for our purpose. We do not wish the Federal Government to adopt the penal laws of England or of any particular State in the Union, but we contend that when a term, borrowed from the law of England, is introduced without comment or explanation into our Constitution or our statutes, every question respecting the meaning of that term must be decided by a reference to the code from whence it was drawn in the same manner as a term in chemistry, or any other science, being introduced into one of our statutes or constitutions, must be explained by a reference to the writers on that science. Surely this is a different thing from adopting the penal code of England or of any particular State as a rule of conduct for the Federal Government.

Mr. Harper further said: <sup>72</sup>

Nor can I conceive how the universal extent of the power of impeachment, contended for by my honorable colleague, is contrary to the spirit, the objects, or the policy either of the law of impeachment or of the Federal Constitution. The use of the law of impeachment is to punish, and thereby prevent, offenses which are of such a nature as to endanger the safety or injure the interests of the United States; and the object of the Federal Constitution was to provide that safety and to protect those interests. Such offenses may be committed as well by persons out of office as by persons in office; and although the punishment can go no further than removal and disqualification, which restriction was, perhaps, wisely introduced in order to prevent those abuses of the power of impeachment which had taken place in another country, yet it may often be extremely important to prevent such offenders from getting into office, as well as to remove them when they are in; and it is, therefore, as consistent with the policy of impeachments and the principles of the Federal compact to punish them in the one case as in the other. This doctrine, it is further said, would enable Congress to interfere with the State governments by impeaching their officers. But those impeachments must be founded on offenses against the United States; and if such offenses were committed by State officers, I can not see why they ought not to be punished as well as in any other case. Surely they would not be less dangerous. If the convictions in such impeachments could remove men from State offices, or disqualify them for holding such offices, there might be something in the objection; but that could not be the case, since the removal and disqualification apply to officers under the General Government alone. * * * But the learned counsel for the defendant have told us that the power of impeachment is limited in the Constitution itself by the restriction which it imposes on the power of punishment. The power of punishment on conviction by impeachment is restricted, say they, to "removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and it would be absurd to impeach, try, and convict a man who held no office from which he could be removed, and could, of consequence, be not otherwise affected than by a disqualification to hold in future offices which he, perhaps, never had a prospect of obtaining. Of this absurdity the Constitution cannot be supposed to be guilty; and therefore it could not have intended to subject to the power of impeachment any persons except those who actually hold offices and may be punished by removal.

But where, Mr. President, did the honorable counsel for the defendant learn that disqualification to hold any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government of our country is no punishment? Would either of those honorable gentlemen think it no punishment in his own case?

Elaborate argument of the question whether or not a Senator is a civil officer within the meaning of the impeachment clause of the Constitution.

(4) The fourth branch of the discussion involved an inquiry as to whether or not—it being assumed that only officers of the United States might be impeached—a Senator was an officer within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. Bayard, for the managers, contended that he acted as a legislator, an executive magistrate, and a judge. The ordinance of Congress for establishing a government for the Northwest Territory, passed in 1787, had contemplated members of the legislature as officers. This use of the word "office" was contemporaneous with the formation of the Constitution.

Furthermore, he contended that a Senator was not only an officer, but was an officer within the meaning of the Constitution itself. He then discussed the following portions as confirmatory of this view:

Article I, section 3, clause 7; Article I, section 6; Article I, section 9, clause 7; Article II, sections 3 and 4.

As to two of these provisions he said: <sup>73</sup>

The first of these is the third section of the second article, which declares that the President shall commission all officers of the United States; and as it is clearly not designed that he should commission a Senator, it will be inferred that a Senator is not to be considered as an officer.

I humbly trust I can show, that it was not the intention of the Constitution that these words should take effect in their full extent; and I shall submit that they ought to be understood according to the subject to which they apply.

A commission is simply an evidence of authority delegated to a particular person. And surely it is proper that that evidence should show from the same source from which the appointment is derived. By the Constitution the President is made the fountain of office. The officers, properly speaking under the United States are all appointed by him; and it was right, therefore, as the general power of appointing was given to him, that he should also have the general power of commissioning.

It is certain that it was intended that the power of commissioning should not exceed that of appointing, because the President does not commission anyone whom he does not appoint. The provision in question was not intended to define who should be considered as officers, but to introduce a plain and just rule of policy that the power of appointing and commissioning should reside in the same person. The practice under this constitutional regulation, explains its meaning and extent. It is clearly not true that he commissions all officers of the United States. He is an officer himself, and so expressly denominated throughout the second article, and yet he has no commission. It is equally clear that the Vice-President is an officer, and yet not commissioned. Again, the Speaker of the House of Representatives is an officer, as I shall have occasion to show hereafter, but has no commission. And there are also a variety of subordinate officers, appointed by heads of Departments and courts of justice, whom the President does not commission. I am therefore justified in concluding that it does not follow, because a person has no commission from the President, that therefore he is not to be considered as an officer.

There is another objection of a similar nature, arising from the provision in the sixth section of the first article, of which it is probable much use will be made. That section declares that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office. It will therefore be said, if the place of a Senator is an office, this clause is repugnant and absurd.

This provision, I humbly apprehend, has the same limits with the one which I have just adverted to. The intention of it was to erect a barrier between the Executive and legislative departments; to prevent Executive patronage from influencing legislative councils. It was designed therefore to apply solely to the officers of Executive appointment. I am not much disposed, sir, to place reliance in an argument upon so great a subject, upon nice distinctions or verbal criticism; but I think I shall be excused for paying some attention to the peculiar language of the clause in question. The regulation is that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office. The United States here means the Government of the United States, for the United States grants no office but through the Government. Now, it is clear that a Senator is not an officer under the Government. The Government consists of the President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, and they who constitute the Government can not be said to be under it. Besides, a Senator does not derive his authority from the Government. The Senatorial power is an emanation of the State sovereignties; it is coordinate with the supreme power of the United States; in its aggregate, it forms one of the highest branches of the Government. Giving every effect to this section, it would only prove that a Senator is not an officer under the Government of the United States, but still he may be an officer of the United States; and give me leave to say that the distinction which I have here taken is supported by the variance of language to be found in another part of the Constitution.

Mr. Bayard also cited the law of March 1, 1792, enacting that in case of vacancy in the office of President the Speaker of the House of Representatives should exercise the office, as showing that in legislative interpretation the Speaker is an officer.

Mr. Dallas, in replying, discussed the articles of the Constitution referred to by Mr. Bayard, especially to show that a distinction could not be drawn between "officers of" and "officers under" the United States. The two terms, in his view, were used indiscriminately.

There were no words in the Constitution extending the impeaching power to a Senator: "

The second section of the second article provides, that "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, or other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." The President having then power to appoint all the officers of the United States, including military as well as civil officers; the the third section of the same article, declaring that "he shall commission all the officers of the United States;" and the fourth section, providing for the removal of all civil officers excluding military officers, on impeachment and conviction; it would seem inevitably to result that no man is an officer of the United States unless he has been appointed and commissioned by the President; and that, therefore, unless he is so appointed and commissioned, he can not be an object of impeachment. Here Mr. Dallas requested that it might be remembered that the provision respecting impeachments was a part of the Executive article of the Constitution; and was immediately connected with the arrangements for making appointments, and issuing commissions, under the authority of the President.

Then Mr. Dallas proceeded to inquire, Does the President nominate or commission Senators or Representatives? No; nor does the Constitution, in any part of it, term them officers, or call their representative station an office. But the honorable manager has said that the latitude to which this position extends would render it necessary that the President should issue a commission to himself, to the Vice-President, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, since they are all expressly denominated officers. The Constitution, however, is not chargeable with this absurdity. The President and Vice-President have their commissions from the Constitution itself, and the speaker of the House of Representatives is emphatically an officer of the House, not of the United States. But the objection affords an opportunity to illustrate the meaning of the Constitution. It is provided that the President shall commission all officers, and that all civil officers shall be removed on impeachment and conviction; but the President does not commission himself and the Vice-President, and therefore as it was intended to affect them by the impeachment power, it became necessary expressly to name them. The President does not commission Senators and Representatives; but it was not intended to affect them by the impeachment, and therefore they are not named.

Mr. Dallas continued to analyze various parts of the Constitution, and argued from the operation of them that a legislator never was considered as an officer of the United States, in the ordinary or constitutional acceptance of the term. The sixth section of the first article contains the following passage: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." Nothing could more strongly mark the discrimination between a legislator and an officer than the language which is here used. It is declared that no member holding any office shall be a member of either House while he continues in office. If a member was deemed an officer, the phraseology would doubtless have been, "no member holding any other office." Again let it be supposed that previously to the amendment of the Constitution (which merely provides that no law varying the compensation for the services of Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives has intervened) the pay of Senator had been increased by an act of Congress, could not a Representative, who had assisted in passing the act, be chosen a Senator before the expiration of the two years for which he was originally elected? Again let it be supposed that a new State was erected and admitted into the Union; if a Senator is an officer, the office of Senator for the new State would be created during the time for which Congress, who created it, was elected; and yet might not a member of that Congress be chosen a Senator for the new State, before the expiration of the time for which he was elected a Representative? When, for instance, Kentucky was separated from Virginia, and erected into a State, was not a Representative elected for Virginia, residing within the boundaries of Kentucky, eligible immediately as a Senator of Kentucky, though he resigned his Representative seat before the term of his election had elapsed?

The first section of the second article likewise pointedly distinguishes between a legislator and a public officer, declaring "that no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." If Senators or Representatives were considered as persons holding offices of profit or trust under the United States, it was superfluous to specify them at all; or, if named, it would have been correct to say, "no Senator or Representative, or person holding any other office of trust or profit," etc. But it is important also to remark that here, where the Constitution intends to work a disqualification, as to Senators and Representatives, they are expressly named; and no sound reason can be offered why they should not have been equally named, if the Constitution had intended to subject them to impeachment. * * * But, Mr. D. contended, that, independent of all precedent and authority, the distinction was founded upon the very nature of a free Government. The legislature is, in theory, the people; they do not themselves assemble, but they depute a few to act for them; and the laws which are thus made are the expressions of the will of the people. Over their Representatives the people have a complete control, and if one set transgress they can appoint another set, who can rescind and annul all previous bad laws. But the power of the people is only to make the laws; they have nothing to do with executing them; they have nothing to do with expounding them; and hence arises the diversity in the modes of remedying any grievance which they may suffer from the conduct of their Representatives or agents. If a legislator acts wrong, he may be expelled before the term for which he was chosen has expired; he may be rejected at the next periodical election; and the laws which he has sanctioned may be repealed by a new representation. But if an executive, or a judicial magistrate, acts wrong, the people have no immediate power to correct; prosecution and impeachment are the only remedies for the evil. Then, it is manifest, that, by the power of impeachment, the people did not mean to guard against themselves, but against their agents; they did not mean to exclude themselves from the right of reappointing, or pardoning; but to restrain the Executive magistrate from doing either with respect to officers whose offices were held independent of popular choice.

The argument that every person who executes an authority is in fact an officer was, in Mr. Dallas's opinion, too broad. The Speaker of the House of Representatives was an officer of the House, but not of the United States. And it was only on being chosen to the chair that he acquired the denomination of officer, contradistinguished from the character of Member.

Mr. Dallas continued further: <sup>75</sup>

From a just consideration of the principles of our Government, it was thus manifest that the moment there was a departure from the immediate choice of the people, the law of impeachment became necessary to secure them from the favoritism, or perverseness of the Executive Magistrate. Impeachment, he observed, is, with respect to executive and judicial officers, what expulsion is with respect to the members of the legislature. As expulsion enables the people to decide whether they will restore the evicted Member to their service, a conviction on impeachment enables the Representatives of the people to decide whether the delinquent shall be partially or totally excluded from the honors and emoluments of public office. But the very circumstance of declaring that a pardon shall not avail in cases of impeachment, though a reelection shall avail in cases of expulsion, demonstrates (as was before intimated) that the people did not mean to guard against the exercise of their own sovereignty, but against an abuse of the power delegated to their agents.

Mr. Ingersoll, speaking also in behalf of the respondent, dissented the extent of the power of impeachment under the Constitution, which as he claimed,<sup>76</sup> was restricted to the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States, for misconduct in office. He stated that he should afterwards endeavor to make it appear that Senators were not the objects of this power, not being comprehended under the designation of civil officers of the United States.

After discussing the limited powers granted by the Constitution, he said: <sup>77</sup>

My position is that the clause in question was intended and operates for the purpose of designating the extent of the power of impeachment, both as to the offenses and the persons liable to be thus proceeded against. It will be of use here to recollect that the Constitution had previously provided for the purity of the legislature in the second clause of the fifth section of the first article by empowering each House to punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a Member. No clause similar to that which is introduced into some of the State constitutions (that a member expelled and then returned is not liable to be expelled again for the same offense) is to be met with in the Constitution of the United States; and therefore the Senate has an unlimited power to expel any Member they shall deem unworthy their society.

Here, then, I flatter myself, the dispute admits of a clear solution—is reduced within a narrow compass, and brought to a point.

It is a rule of construction that every part of an instrument be, if possible, made to take effect and every word operate in some shape or other.

There are but two constructions suggested as possible—the one for which the honorable managers contend, to wit: That the fourth section of the second article was intended as an imperative injunction upon the Senate that when judgment was rendered against a civil officer of the United States it should be for removal from office; the other, that for which we, as counsel for the defendant, insist—that is, that it was intended to designate the extent of the practice of proceeding by impeachment, specifying who are the persons to be proceeded against, and for what offenses. If, then, I am able to show that the words of the fourth section of the second article will not have any effect or operation at all, unless they receive the construction for which I contend; if I establish these premises, the inference will necessarily follow that the construction for which the honorable managers contend is not well founded, and that the construction for which we contend is the true meaning of the Constitution in this particular. To this fair, short, and decisive test be the appeal.

He then proceeded to give emphasis to the word “further” in the Constitution, and to show that disqualification of office necessarily implied removal: <sup>78</sup>

It is impossible to pronounce a judgment that a man shall be incapable of holding an office and not remove him. The incapacity takes effect immediately. It is coeval with the judgment. There is not any interval between the judgment pronounced and the disqualification and incapacity. It is of course ridiculous to say that the fourth section of the second article was introduced to make it imperative upon the Senate to remove from office on conviction, when it was previously made so imperative that it was impossible to avoid pronouncing a judgment that would operate a removal from office. As it is thus clear beyond the possibility of doubt that the fourth section of the second article was not introduced for the purpose suggested by the honorable managers, which I have considered, and as no third construction has been attempted on either side, I infer that the construction contended for by the counsel for the defendant is well founded, to wit: That the fourth section of the second article was intended for the purpose of designating the extent of the power of proceeding by impeachment, at least so far as respects the persons liable to be thus proceeded against.

Further, if anything further be necessary upon a matter so very plain, if, as the honorable managers insist, all persons are within the extent of this mode of proceeding, why make it imperative on the Senate to remove civil officers only? Why make it absolutely imperative to remove the marshal of a district, whose sphere of influence is comparatively inconsiderable, and leave a general at the head of an army or an admiral in the command of a navy? Would not the public security be much more endangered by leaving a man convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors in these situations than those of many civil offices? It may be said that these military characters are liable to be proceeded against by courts-martial. Be it so; that consideration is a good reason why they should not be considered as within the power of impeachment, as we assert to be the case; but none at all for not removing them on conviction, if they are within the provision of the Constitution in this particular. And if Senators were within the power of proceeding by impeachment, would it not also have been made imperative upon the Senate to remove them, or have a veto upon every bill proposed to be passed into a law and every nomination for appointment to office?

I add, that I conceive the proceedings by impeachment are restricted not only to civil officers, but that the only causes cognizable in this mode of proceeding are malconduct in office.

Proceeding to consider whether or not Senators are "civil officers of the United States," after quoting Blackstone's definition, "a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging," Mr. Ingersoll called attention to the fact that an officer excluded from his office might obtain admission by mandamus proceedings. Might a Senator avail himself of these remedies? This question he answered in the negative.

To be an officer of the Government one must receive a commission from the Executive. A Senator was not such an officer. Nor was there force in the argument that a Senator had a judicial as well as an executive character. All those qualities of his position emanated from the same source as his legislative qualities.

He said on another point: <sup>79</sup>

Senators and Members of the House of Representatives have one set of words appropriated to them in the Constitution—civil officers, other terms; as thus, "office," "appointment," "commission," "removal;" Senator, or one of the House of Representatives, "Member," "election," "expulsion," "seat vacated."

What interpretation shall we give to the sixth section of the fourth article? "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office;" and yet a Senator is, ipso facto, it is said, an officer of the United States. Identity is incompatibility. The exception of a Senator is implied, say the honorable managers; but how do they show it? Is not this section to be understood as importing that the character of a Member of either House and that of an officer of the United States are, by the Constitution, distinct and incompatible? The distinction is observed throughout. Can the Clerk of this House, or the Clerk of the other House, be proceeded against by impeachment? I conceive not; because they are not appointed nor commissioned by the United States Government, or by the Executive thereof, but by the respective Houses. I believe that not an instance can be found in the Constitution of the United States in which a Senator is classed under the denomination of an officer, or civil officer of the United States.

Some observation was made on the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, "that no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States should, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present from any king, prince, or foreign state." Might a Senator, one in so important a public situation, accept of a present from a foreign state? No. I answer. The power of expulsion is a sufficient check. The impropriety of the measure would be a sufficient guard. The laws, in consonance with the Constitution of the United States, distinguish between the Members of the legislature and the officers of the United States, and also of the several States.

In the first volume of the laws of the United States, page 18, section 3, it is provided "that all members of the State legislatures, and the executive and judicial officers of the several States, shall take an oath to support the Constitution:" and by section 2 it is provided "that the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives," and by section 4, "that all officers of the United States" shall take the same oath, distinguishing between the Members of either House and the officers of the United States. In the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, of New York, of Massachusetts, and of New Hampshire the same distinction of language is observed. The distinction is equally familiar in the English law. In the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, page 368, it is said "that the oath of allegiance must be taken by all persons in any office, trust, or employment;" yet members of either House are not considered as included. On page 374 of the same volume it is declared "that no denizen can be of the Privy Council, or either House of Parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military." Such, I believe, has been the universal understanding of the expressions until the present prosecution.

It is a rule of construction that when a law is only doubtful, arguments ab inconvenienti are most powerful. The rule will apply, with equal propriety, to the construction of a constitution. If the most numerous branch, already, I repeat it, sufficiently formidable, may proceed by impeachment against a Senator—at their will doom to temporary disgrace any Member—this would form an engine of immense additional weight in their hands. I know that it is not always an objection against intrusting power that it may be abused; but when it is unnecessary to make the trust, and the danger great, the risk ought not to be incurred.

In concluding for the managers, Mr. Harper joined issue<sup>80</sup> with Mr. Ingersoll as to the intent of the clause relating to impeachments:

But admitting, Mr. President, that the power of impeachment is restricted by the Constitution to officers of the Government of the United States, still I contend that a Senator of the United States, a Member of this honorable body, is an officer of the Government, in the constitutional meaning of the word, and consequently liable to impeachment on the doctrine of the learned counsel themselves.

The learned counsel have, indeed, contended by their plea and in their arguments that none but civil officers are liable to impeachment by the Constitution; but in this they are plainly contradicted by the Constitution itself. They found their argument on that clause which provides "that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." But this clause is, evidently, not restrictive, but imperative. It does not point out what persons or what officers shall be liable to impeachment, but expressly orders that such and such officers, when convicted on impeachment, shall be punished to the extent, at least, of removal from office. The former clause had declared that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States," leaving the Senate to apportion the punishment, according to its discretion, within those limits. They might censure the person convicted, suspend him for a limited time, or disqualify him perpetually for certain offices, or for all offices during a certain period. But beyond absolute removal and perpetual disqualification for all offices they could not go. This was fixed as the utmost limit of their power and of their discretion.

It was judged, however, that in case of the President, Vice-President, or any civil officer the punishment ought not to be less than removal, though it might be more, according to circumstances. This provision was, therefore, inserted. Its object, manifestly, is, not to designate the persons who shall be liable to impeachment, but to prevent the Senate, in the exercise of their discretion, from retaining in a civil office a person convicted of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." As to the distinction here made between civil officers and other officers, there is no need to examine or defend it. It may, however, be supposed to have arisen from an opinion, certainly well founded, that, under certain circumstances, there might be danger or great inconvenience in removing from his command a military officer, whom, nevertheless, it might be very proper to censure or suspend, or even to disqualify for some particular offices. As to military officers, therefore, a complete discretion was left to the Senate; but not in the case of civil officers, to whom the same reasons could not apply. They, on conviction, must be removed. Military officers may be removed or not, according to circumstances.

He further contended that a Senator was an officer in the sense of the Constitution, and after exhaustively considering the definitions of the term "office," he said:<sup>81</sup>

The manner in which the term "office" is used by legal writers, and their formal definitions of it, support the interpretation which I have drawn from its received and common acceptation. Without going into a detail on this point, which might be tedious, let it suffice, Mr. President, to refer to Blackstone, who has been justly relied on by the learned counsel for the defendant, as a standard authority on subjects of this kind. Speaking of "offices," in the second volume of his Commentaries, page 36, as cited by the learned counsel who preceded me, that great writer lays it down that "offices are a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging." Now, let me ask, is not a seat in this honorable body "a public employment?" Has not the Member "a right to exercise this employment, and to receive the emoluments thereunto belonging?" Surely to answer in the negative would be a strange abuse of language.

The learned counsel who immediately preceded me has contended that a Senator can not be considered as an "officer," because there could be no quo warranto to remove him from his place if he held it improperly, nor mandamus to place him in it if unjustly kept out. But surely this can not be a well-founded argument, for, if it be, it applies as well to the President, the Judges, the Secretaries, and the Commander in Chief of the Army as to a Senator. Not one of them could be removed by quo warranto or replaced by mandamus. Did anyone ever hear of a quo warranto to remove a colonel of a regiment? Was a quo warranto ever brought in England against the Chancellor of the Exchequer or a Secretary of State, or a Lord of the Admiralty? Certainly not, and yet that these are officers will not be denied. The truth is, Mr. President, that the doctrine of quo warranto and mandamus, as far as it relates to officers, is confined exclusively to certain local municipal officers of a subordinate nature, who are placed, by the common law of England, under the superintendence of the supreme court of justice; to which, from the nature of their offices, recourse could most conveniently and effectually be had for their punishment, their removal, or their reinstatement. But this reason did not extend to the great officers of the State, of the Army, or the Navy, or to any of their subordinates. They could best be punished, removed, and replaced in a different manner and by a different authority. To them, therefore, nobody ever dreamt of extending the power of the supreme courts by quo warranto and mandamus, and yet nobody ever, on this account, thought of denying that they were "officers," which, however, would be just as reasonable as to contend that a Senator of the United States is not an "officer," because he can not be removed by a quo warranto or admitted by mandamus. I admit that it would be absurd to talk of an office from which a man could not be removed, however flagitious his conduct; or into which, when entitled to it, and improperly kept out, he had no means of obtaining admission. But a Senator may be removed by a vote of expulsion, and if duly elected, but not returned, may obtain his seat by a petition to the Senate.

I conceive, therefore, that no argument can be more destitute of foundation than that which would divest a seat in this honorable body of the quality of an "office," because it is not within the scope of write of mandamus and quo warranto.

If from Blackstone, Mr. President, we turn to our own laws, our own writers, and even our own constitutions, we shall equally find that a seat in the legislature is considered as an "office."

After discussing the legislator as an officer, especially in the light of the State and national constitutions and laws, especially discussing one clause of the National Constitution—<sup>82</sup>

A clause from the sixth section of the first article, in the following words, has also been relied on:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

I am ready to admit, Mr. President, with my honorable colleague, who opened the case, that this clause wears an aspect more hostile to our construction of the term "office" than any other part of the Constitution, but I contend with him that the Constitution, like all other instruments, must be construed in each separate part of it, secundum subjectam materiem, according to the subject-matter of each part, and in such a manner as to effectuate every part and render the whole consistent. These rules of construction will not be denied. When this clause comes to be analyzed and tried by these rules, it will, I think, appear satisfactorily that our construction is not infringed by it.

What is the object of this clause? It is threefold: First, to prevent a blending of the different departments of Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial—by uniting their functions in the hands of the same individual, which would be contrary to the spirit of the Constitution; secondly, to prevent the executive from acquiring an undue influence in the legislature, by appointing its most active and able Members to offices which must be held at his pleasure, and, thirdly, to take away from aspiring or avaricious Members the temptation to create offices or increase their emoluments, which might arise from the expectation of speedily filling those offices themselves. What description of officers was it necessary to exclude from the legislature in order to effect these three objects? First, those whose duties might be incompatible with a strict and regular attendance in the legislature; secondly, those who derive their appointments from the Executive, and, thirdly, those whose offices are of a nature to be considered as lucrative—to be sought after on account of their pecuniary emoluments. It is evident that some one or other of these characteristics belongs to every description of officers, except "legislative"—to military, to executive, judicial, and diplomatic. It is to be presumed that the Constitution here used the word "office" in that sense, and that only, which was necessary in order to effectuate its intentions, and consequently that the clause extends to those officers only whom it was the intention of the Constitution to exclude from the legislature. The clause therefore is to be understood as if, instead of the general expressions, "any civil office," "any office," it had said, "any other civil office," "any other office." This will render the whole Constitution consistent with itself and with the well-established meaning of language. In the clause relative to commissions we have an instance where, in order to prevent the Constitution from pronouncing a palpable absurdity, it was necessary to explain the general term "all officers," so as to mean "all officers appointed by the President." If the general expression may be controlled by the subject-matter and intent in one case, it may in another, and certainly the subject-matter and intent could not speak more strongly against the general expression in the former, or in any other case, than in this.

If this reasoning be well founded, it follows that the clause in question proves nothing against our doctrine of a Senator being an officer in the sense of the Constitution. It only proves that the Constitution, being obliged to use the same word in application to different matters, and for different purposes, has used it generally and left it to be explained by a reference to the intent and subject-matter, instead of explaining it by express modifications. The object here was to exclude certain officers from the legislature, and the term is used generally; but it by no means follows, from thence, that Members of the legislature are not themselves officers.

Also another argument was answered:<sup>53</sup>

An objection has also been drawn from the supposed intention with which the power of impeachment was established by the Constitution. The sole object of this power, it is said, was to provide a remedy against the favoritism or obstinacy of the Supreme Executive Magistrate, by affording a means of removing from office improper persons, whom he might be inclined to retain in place to the detriment of the nation. This necessity does not exist, we are told, with respect to members of the legislature who are removable by the people themselves at stated periods, and to whom, consequently, the power of impeachment ought not to extend.

But this can not be the sole object of the power of impeachment, because the President himself is liable to be impeached, as well as the officers whom he appoints. So also is the Vice-President. And yet these two great officers are appointed by the people themselves, in a manner far more direct and immediate than Senators and removable at shorter periods. If the power of impeachment be, as the learned counsel insist, intended as an aid to the control which the people, by the right of election, have over their public servants, or to supply the place of that control where it does not exist, surely there is much stronger reason for its extending to Senators than to the President or Vice-President, for

Senators are much farther removed from the power of the people and the control of elections than those officers. They are elected for a much longer period; their election being made by legislative bodies, who are chosen by the people for other purposes and, for a considerable time, is far less influenced by popular opinion or popular feelings than that of the President, who is chosen by electors elected for that sole purpose, and selected, in almost every instance, according to their known attachment to the favored candidate. The election of the President and Vice-President therefore partakes far more of the nature of a popular election than that of Senators. Indeed, of all the component members of our Government the Senate, both in the mode of its appointment and the term of its duration, is intended to be, and actually is, the most permanent and independent—the furthest elevated above the region and the influence of those storms whereby a popular government must sometimes be agitated. God forbid, Mr. President, that I should find fault with these ingredients in the composition of the Senate or do anything which could tend in the least to diminish their efficiency. I consider them as among the most valuable principles of the Constitution.

And finally he urged: <sup>84</sup>

But the effect of an impeachment, it is said, may be produced in another manner, more conformable to the dignity of the Senate. The same majority of two-thirds which can convict on an impeachment may also expel, and thus an improper person may be driven from the Senate. But, in the first place, he can not be thus kept out in future; for, though the Senate may expel, it can not disqualify. And if we suppose the case (which may very well happen) of a great and wicked man, supported by a strong party in the legislature of his own State, he may return again, after being expelled and may go on in the commission of "high crimes and misdemeanors," in the very station which gives him the greatest means of committing them with effect.

In the second place, an offender has a much better chance to escape from an expulsion than from an impeachment. Where the offense is of a very dark and complicated nature, consists in transactions or plots carried on at a distance or in many places at once, and of consequence can not be brought to light and fully substantiated without a laborious, long-continued and systematic inquiry, it must be admitted that the aid of a prosecutor will be necessary, and that the Senate of itself and for the mere purpose of expulsion will be little disposed to undertake so tedious and disagreeable a task.

2317. Blount's impeachment, continued.

In the Blount case it was conceded that a person impeached might not avoid punishment by resignation.

(5) As to the status of Mr. Blount at the time of the argument, Mr. Bayard said: <sup>85</sup>

It is also alleged in the plea that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred. If the impeachment were regular and maintainable when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event, grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

Speaking for the respondent, Mr. Dallas said: <sup>86</sup>

It is among the less objections of the cause that the defendant is now out of office, not by resignation. I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense and afterwards avoid punishment by resigning his office; but the defendant has been expelled. Can he be removed at one trial and disqualified at another for the same offense? Is it not the form rather than the substance of a trial? Do the Senate come, as Lord Mansfield says a jury ought, like blank paper, without a previous impression upon their minds? Would not error in the first sentence naturally be productive of error in the second instance? Is there not reason to apprehend the strong bias of a former decision would be apt to prevent the influence of any new lights brought forward upon a second trial?

The Senate decided that it had no jurisdiction to try an impeachment against William Blount, a Senator.

The Senate notified the House that it had made a decision in the Blount case and set a time for receiving the managers and rendering judgment.

The House did not attend its managers during the Blount impeachment, even at the judgment.

Form of judgment pronounced by the Vice-President in the Blount impeachment.

Judgment being given in the Blount impeachment, the managers submitted to the House a report in writing.

The Senate delivered to the managers for transmission to the House an attested copy of its judgment in the Blount case.

On January 7<sup>87</sup> the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, and the following resolution was offered :

That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives ;

That as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.

This resolution was debated in the court of impeachment until January 10,<sup>88</sup> when it was disagreed to, yeas 11, nays 14.

On January 11,<sup>89</sup> it was determined by a vote of 14 yeas and 11 nays, the division of Members being exactly as on the preceding day :

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

It was further ordered by the court of impeachment :

Ordered. That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate will be ready to receive the managers of the House of Representatives and the counsel of the defendant on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, to render judgment on the impeachment against William Blount.

The Journal of the Senate has no record of this order ; but it was received in the House the same day as a message from the Senate.<sup>90</sup>

On January 14,<sup>91</sup> the managers alone attended, the House going on with the transaction of its business. The court being opened and silence being proclaimed, the parties attending, judgment was pronounced by the Vice-President as follows :

Gentlemen, managers of the House of Representatives, and gentlemen, counsel for William Blount : The court, after having given the most mature and serious consideration to the question, and to the full and able arguments urged on both sides, has come to the decision which I am now about to deliver.

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

Copies of the judgment were delivered to the managers and to the counsel for the defendant, respectively.

After which they withdrew ; and, on motion, the court adjourned without day.

That agreeably to the notification of the Senate they attended at their bar to hear their judgment upon the plea of the said William Blount, and that the President of the Senate pronounced judgment upon the said plea, a copy whereof was ordered to be delivered to the managers and is annexed to this report.

2319. The impeachment and trial of John Pickering, judge of the United States district court for New Hampshire, in 1803.

The impeachment proceedings against Judge Pickering were set in motion by a message from the President.

The committee recommended and the House voted the impeachment of Judge Pickering on the strength of certain ex parte affidavits.

The House decided to proceed in the Pickering impeachment, although the session and the Congress neared an end.

The Pickering impeachment was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

Forms of resolutions for impeachment of Judge Pickering and directing the carrying of the same to the Senate.

On February 4, 1803,<sup>1</sup> a message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a "letter and affidavits exhibiting matter of complaint against John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, which is not within executive cognizance."

The message was read, and with the accompanying papers, was referred to a committee composed of Messrs. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; James A. Bayard, of Delaware; John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Samuel Tenney, of New Hampshire; and Lucas Elmendorf, of New York.

Accompanying the message were the following documents: (1) A letter from Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, to the President, stating that it appeared that Judge Pickering, in a suit wherein the revenue was concerned, had "acted in a manner which showed a total unfitness for the office," and which showed "some legislative interference absolutely necessary;" (2) a letter from John S. Sherburne, United States district attorney for New Hampshire, to the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting affidavits and making a statement as to the conduct of the judge; (3) affidavits of Thomas

Chadbourne, Jonathan Steele, Daniel Humphrey, John Wentworth, Joseph Whipple, and R. C. Shannon setting forth specific acts of said judge. These affidavits were taken ex parte.<sup>2</sup>

On February 18<sup>3</sup> Mr. Nicholson submitted the report of the committee:

That from the face of the said depositions it appears that the said John Pickering has been guilty of high misdemeanor in the exercise of his judicial functions, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

On March 2<sup>4</sup> the report was considered by the Committee of the Whole, who recommended concurrence in the report, after a debate which is very briefly reported and during which the principal question seems to have been the advisability of proceeding in the case at so late a period in the session. A proposition to postpone the resolution to the next session was disagreed to, ayes 9, noes 43.

The House agreed to the resolution, yeas 45, nays 8.

Thereupon it was Ordered, That Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Randolph be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Judge Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors: and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

Verbal report made by the House committee on returning from presenting in the Senate the impeachment of Judge Pickering.

Proceedings and resolutions adopted by the Senate in taking order on the presentation of the Pickering impeachment.

The impeachment of Judge Pickering was presented in the Senate on the last day of the Seventh Congress.

On March 3,<sup>5</sup> in the Senate, a message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Randolph, as follows:

Mr. President, we are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same.

We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

Then they withdrew.

On the same day in the House,<sup>6</sup> Mr. Nicholson reported verbally:

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, had impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And, further, that the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

On the same day, in the Senate,<sup>7</sup>

Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of a district court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy [Uriah, of Connecticut], Clinton [De Witt, of New York], and Nicholas [Wilson C., of Virginia].

Later on this day Mr. Tracy reported from the committee the following resolution and preamble, which were agreed to by the Senate:

Whereas the House of Representatives have this day, by two of their Members, Messrs. Nicholson and Randolph, at the bar of the Senate, impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and have acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same,

And have likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

On the same day a message announcing this resolution was received in the House.<sup>8</sup>

And late on the same day, March 3, 1803, both House and Senate adjourned sine die, the term of the Seventh Congress having expired.

At the beginning of the Eighth Congress the House continued the Pickering impeachment by appointing a committee to prepare articles.

The Eighth Congress met in its first session on October 17, 1803, it being the day appointed by law. The proceedings against Judge Pickering were continued from the point where they had been interrupted by the expiration of the Seventh Congress.

On October 20,<sup>9</sup> in the House, Mr. Nicholson stated that during the last session the House had voted an impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors. But the impeachment had been voted at so late a period of the session as rendered it impossible to act then finally upon it. In order that it might be now acted upon, and the impeachment proceed, he moved the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, who was impeached by this House during the last session of high crimes and misdemeanors: and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

The committee were appointed as follows: Messrs. Nicholson, John Randolph, jr., Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Peter Early, of Georgia, and Samuel Thatcher, of Massachusetts.

The Senate declined to order compulsory process to compel the appearance of Judge Pickering, but authorized a committee to examine the subject.

On October 27,<sup>10</sup> in the Senate, the following resolution was proposed, but was laid on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare the process to compel the attendance of John Pickering to answer the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives at their last session.

On November 14<sup>11</sup> the Senate resumed consideration above given and, having amended it, agreed to it as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, further proceedings at present ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of this Senate by two Members of the House of Representatives on the last day of the last session of Congress.

The following committee were appointed: Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut; Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont; Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Robert Wright, of Maryland, and William Cocke, of Tennessee.

The House considered the articles of impeachment of Judge Pickering in Committee of the Whole House.

The articles of impeachment of Judge Pickering were enrolled after they were agreed to by the House.

In the Pickering impeachment the House decided that the managers should not be appointed by the Speaker or by viva voce vote, but by ballot.

The House having excused a Member elected manager in the Pickering case, another was chosen by ballot.

Form of resolution directing the carrying of the articles of impeachment of Judge Pickering to the Senate.

Form of resolution directing that the Senate be informed of the appointment of managers and that they will carry articles to the Senate.

It does not appear that the message announcing the appointment of managers of the Pickering impeachment included their names.

On December 27<sup>12</sup> Mr. Nicholson, from the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, presented them to the House; and having been read, the same were referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

On December 30<sup>13</sup> the articles were considered in Committee of the Whole and being reported therefrom without amendment, were agreed to by the House. They appear in full in the Journal. During the proceedings<sup>14</sup> on the articles Mr. Samuel Tenney, of New Hampshire, called for the reading of several depositions to show that Judge Pickering had sustained a respectable character and that his recent conduct had arisen from insanity. In reply Mr. Nicholson said that the House had determined that they would impeach, and it was therefore the present duty to furnish the Senate with the articles. Mr. Nicholson further said that he was informed from respectable sources that Judge Pickering was habitually intoxicated. The articles were agreed to without division.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson, according to the Annals<sup>15</sup> the articles were ordered to be enrolled, in correspondence with the practice of the House. The Journal does not mention this.

It was then ordered that eleven managers be appointed on the part of the House. A discussion arose as to the manner of selection. A motion that they be appointed by the Speaker was decided in the negative. Then it was decided that they be appointed by ballot, although several Members, notably Mr. Nicholson, urged that they should be elected by viva voce vote.

It does not appear that a special rule was made to govern the balloting, which was presumably conducted under the then existing rule of the House.

The following were chosen managers: Messrs. Nicholson, Early, Cæsar A. Rodney, of Delaware; William Eustis, of Massachusetts; John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Samuel L. Mitchell, of New York; George W. Campbell, of Tennessee; William Blackledge, of North Carolina; John Boyle, of Kentucky, and Joseph Clay, of Pennsylvania.

On motion,

Ordered, That Mr. Roger Griswold be excused from serving as one of the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment; and that the House do now proceed, by ballot, to the appointment of another manager to serve in his stead.

Thereupon Mr. Thomas Newton, jr., of Virginia, was chosen.

On January 3, 1804,<sup>16</sup> it was

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House have appointed managers, on their part, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said John Pickering; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

On the same day in the senate:<sup>17</sup>

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed managers, on their part, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, and have also directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House of Representatives to be exhibited against the said John Pickering.

It does not appear that the message announced the names of the managers.

The Senate decided, in the Pickering case, that it would take order for respondent's appearance only after articles had been exhibited.

The Senate committee concluded, in the Pickering case, that there was no impeachment before the Senate until articles were exhibited.

It was concluded by a Senate committee in Pickering impeachment that the Senate had no power to take into custody the body of the accused.

A notification to the accused with a copy of the articles was deemed, in the Pickering impeachment, all the process necessary.

A Senate committee concluded, in the Pickering impeachment, that respondent might answer in person, by attorney, or not at all.

In the Pickering case the Senate committee concluded that after service of notice of the articles, the Senate might proceed to trial whether respondent entered appearance or not.

The Senate committee advised, in Pickering's case, that the Senate had the sole power to regulate forms, substances, and proceedings when acting as a court of impeachment.

On the same day in the Senate, after the receipt of the above message a report submitted by Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed to inquire as to further proceedings, was submitted as follows: <sup>18</sup>

That they find the following facts, which have an immediate relation to the subject committed to them, viz: "On the last day of the last session of Congress two Members of the House of Representatives came to the Senate, and in the name of the House, and of all the people of the United States, verbally impeached John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, without any specification; and likewise, they verbally acquainted the Senate that the said House of Representatives would in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, the said Pickering, and make good the same. And they verbally demanded that the Senate should take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachments;" and that said verbal declaration of impeachment was committed by the Senate to a select committee, who reported thereon, in the following words, viz: "Resolved, That the Senate will take the proper order thereon (that is, of the verbal impeachment aforesaid), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives," of which resolution, the Secretary of the Senate gave information to the House of Representatives.

With these facts in view, your committee have attended to the constitutional powers vested in the Senate as a court of impeachment, and they find that "judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." Hence your committee suppose that no power is constitutionally vested in the Senate to take into custody, or hold the body of the person impeached for trial; but that a notification to the party of the impeachment, with a copy of the articles exhibited, is all the process requisite in the case; and that it is optional with the party to appear in propria persona, by attorney, or not at all; and that after the notice given as aforesaid, it is competent for the Senate to proceed to a trial and judgment on said impeachment, whether the party shall appear by himself, his attorney, or not at all. And although your committee would not in the smallest degree interfere with the House of Representatives, in the manner of instituting the process of impeachment, since the sole right of impeaching is vested in the Constitution in that House, yet they believe the

Senate, in common with other courts, have the sole power, while acting as a court of impeachment, to regulate all forms as well as substance of impeachments which shall be presented to them, and all proceedings to be had thereon. They therefore are of opinion that at present no further proceeding ought to be had by the Senate respecting the verbal impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of the Senate by two Members of the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress; and that in strict and proper construction there is no impeachment before the Senate, until exhibited to them by the House of Representatives, in written articles.

On a full view of the subject, the committee respectfully submit for the consideration and adoption of the Senate the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the Senate can not with propriety take any order upon the verbal notification to them by the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress, that they did impeach John Pickering of high crimes and misdemeanors. And that all proceedings thereon by the Senate must be deferred until written articles shall, in due form, be presented by said House of Representatives."

It does not appear that the above resolution was formally agreed to by the Senate.

2325. Pickering's impeachment, continued.

Rule of the Senate prescribing forms and ceremonies for receiving managers in presenting articles of impeachment against Judge Pickering.

The Senate organized as a court before receiving the articles in the Pickering case.

The oath administered by the Secretary to the President and by him to the Senators in the Pickering impeachment.

The Senate set a day and hour for receiving the managers to exhibit articles impeaching Judge Pickering, and informed the House thereof.

The Senate appointed a committee to search the Journals for precedents for the Pickering impeachment.

The same committee further reported the following resolution :

Resolved, That, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment, at which time the following oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and, by him, to each member of the Senate, viz : "I, —, solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be), that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, I will do impartial justice, according to law," which court of impeachments, being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives, that they had appointed managers for the purposes aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

It was further—

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to search the Journals and report precedents in cases of impeachments; and that Messrs. Tracy, Bradley, Baldwin, Wright, and Cocke, to whom it was referred on the 14th of November last, to consider and report, if any, what further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, by this committee.

On January 4,<sup>19</sup> in the House, the following message was received from the Senate :

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to inform this House that the Senate will, at 12 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of United States for the district of New Hampshire, to be presented by the managers appointed by this House.

The Senate prescribed by rule the ceremonies for receiving the House managers to present articles of impeachment against Judge Pickering.

Form of proclamation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under direction of the President, when the managers presented articles in the Pickering impeachment.

Articles of impeachment being exhibited against Judge Pickering, the President of the Senate was directed by rule to state that order would be taken and the House would be notified.

On January 4,<sup>20</sup> in the Senate, before it resolve itself into a court of impeachment, Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed to examine precedents, reported the following:

Resolved, That, after the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against John Pickering, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation; who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire."

After which the articles shall be exhibited; and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

In the Pickering trial a Senator, who as a Member of the House had voted for impeachment, was challenged, but voted.

Thereupon Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, offered the following:

Resolved, That any Senator of the United States, having previously acted and voted as a Member of the House of Representatives, on a question of impeachment, is thereby disqualified to sit and act, in the same case, as a member of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment.

It was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

An appendix to the records of the court of impeachment has the following:<sup>21</sup>

Early in the trial a question was raised as to the propriety of those gentlemen, viz. Samuel Smith, Israel Smith, and John Smith, of New York, who were during the last session Members of the House of Representatives, and voted here upon the question for impeaching Judge Pickering, sitting and voting as Judges upon the trial.

Mr. Smith, of New York, wished to be excused.

Mr. S. Smith declared that he would not be influenced from his duty by any false delicacy; that he, for his part, felt no delicacy upon the subject, the vote he had given in the other House to impeach Judge Pickering would have no influence upon him in the court; his constituent had a right to his vote, and he would not by any act of his deprive or consent to deprive them of that right, but would claim and exercise it upon this as upon every other question that might be submitted to the Senate whilst he had the honor of a seat.

All these men appear as voting during the trial.

2328. Pickering's impeachment continued.

In the Pickering impeachment the Senate organized itself as a court before receiving the articles.

The Journal of the Pickering trial was kept separate from the regular Senate Journal.

Ceremonies of presenting the articles against Judge Pickering before the high court of impeachment.

In the Pickering impeachment the chairman of the managers read the articles and then delivered them at the table of the Senate.

The articles impeaching Judge Pickering, with signature of the Speaker and attestation of the Clerk.

The chairman of the managers reported verbally to the House after having presented in the Senate the articles impeaching Judge Pickering.

On this day, January 4<sup>22</sup> the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment. The ordinary Senate Journal merely records this fact, but does not contain the record of the court's proceedings.<sup>23</sup>

On February 20, 1805,<sup>24</sup> the Senate resumed consideration of the motion for printing the Journals of their proceedings, while sitting for the purpose of trying impeachments, and agreed to it as follows:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Senate while sitting for the purpose of trying impeachments shall be published in the same manner in which the legislative proceedings are now published, and this resolution shall have relation to all proceedings in trials of impeachments which have heretofore taken place.

The Senate having resolved itself into a court of impeachment, proceeded agreeably to its resolution to organize the court.<sup>25</sup>

The Secretary administered the following oath to the President:

You solemnly swear that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, you will do impartial justice, according to law.

The President administered the oath, respectively, to Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Olcott, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, John Smith, Tracy, Venable, Wells, and Worthington; and the affirmation to Messrs. Logan, Maclay, and Plumer.

A message was received from the House of Representatives.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Nicholson, Early, Rodney, Eustis, John Randolph, jr., Samuel L. Mitchill, George W. Campbell, Blackledge, Boyle, Joseph Clay, and Newton, were admitted; and Mr. Nicholson, the chairman, announced that they were the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit certain articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire.

<sup>23</sup> The Senate, however, kept in Journal form a record of "The trial of John Pickering, etc., on a charge exhibited to the Senate of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors," which was published later. Senate Journal, Eighth Congress, pp. 493-507.

They were requested by the President to take seats assigned them within the bar.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation, in the words following:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachments, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire.

The managers then rose, and Mr. Nicholson, their chairman, read the articles, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, Judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 1. That whereas George Wentworth, surveyor of the district of New Hampshire, did, in the port of Portsmouth, in the said district, on waters that are navigable from the sea by vessels of more than 10 tons burden, on the 15th day of October, in the year 1802, seize the ship called the Eliza, of about 285 tons burden, whereof William Ladd was late master, together with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, alleging that there had been unladen from on board of said ship, contrary to law, sundry goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth and manufacture, of the value of $400 and upwards, and did likewise seize on land within the said district, on the 7th day of October, in the year 1802, two cables of the value of $250, part of the said goods which were alleged to have been unladen from on board the said ship as aforesaid, contrary to law; and whereas Thomas Chadbourn, a deputy marshal of the said district of New Hampshire, did, on the 16th day of October, in the year 1802, by virtue of an order of the said John Pickering, judge of the district court of the said district of New Hampshire, arrest and detain in custody for trial before the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, the said ship, called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and also the two cables aforesaid:

And whereas by an act of Congress, passed on the 2d day of March, in the year 1789, it is among other things provided that "upon the prayer of any claimant to the court that any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise so seized and prosecuted, or any part thereof, should be delivered to such claimant, it shall be lawful for the court to appoint three proper persons to appraise such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall be sworn in open court, for the faithful discharge of their duty; and such appraisement shall be made at the expense of the party on whose prayer it is granted; and on the turn of such appraisement, if the claimant shall, with one or more sureties to be approved of by the court, execute a bond in the usual form to the United States for the payment of a sum equal to the sum of which the ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise so prayed to be delivered and appraised and moreover produce a certificate from the collector of the district wherein such trial is had and of the naval officer thereof, if any there be, that the duties on the goods, wares, and merchandise, or tonnage duty on the ship or vessel so claimed have been paid or secured in like manner as if the goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, had been legally entered, the court shall, by rule, order such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, to be delivered to the said claimant;" yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court of the said district of New Hampshire, the said act of Congress not regarding, but with intent to evade the same, did order the said ship called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and the said two cables, to be delivered to a certain Eliphalet Ladd, who claimed the same, without his, the said Eliphalet Ladd, producing any certificate from the collector and naval officer of the said district that the tonnage duty on the said ship or the duties on the said cables had been paid or secured, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, against the law of the United States and to the manifest injury of their revenue.

ART. 2. That whereas, at a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth on the 11th day of November, in the year 1802, by John Pickering, judge of said court, the United States, by Joseph Whipple, the collector of said district, having filed, propounded, and given the said judge to understand and be informed that the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, had been seized as aforesaid, because there had been unladen therefrom, contrary to law, 2 cables and 100 pieces of check, of the value of $400, and having prayed in their said libel that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might by the said court be adjudged to be forfeited to the United States and be disposed of according to law; and a certain Eliphalet Ladd, by his proctor and attorney, having come into the said court, and having claimed the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, and having denied that the said 2 cables and the said 100 pieces of check had been unladen from the said ship contrary to the law, and having prayed the said court that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might be restored to him, the said Eliphalet Ladd, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, did proceed to the hearing and trial of the said cause thus pending between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited by law, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right; and whereas John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States in and for the said district of New Hampshire, did appear in the said district, as his special duty it was by law, to prosecute the said cause in behalf of the United States, and did produce sundry witnesses to prove the facts charged by the United States in the libel filed by the collector as aforesaid in the said court, and to show that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, was justly forfeited to the United States, and did pray the said court that the said witnesses might be sworn in behalf of the United States, yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States, did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid, produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States in the trial of the said cause did order and decree the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States and to the manifest injury of the revenue.

ART. 3. That whereas it is provided by an act of Congress, passed on the 24th day of September, in the year 1789, "that from all final decrees of the district court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $300 exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next circuit court to be held in such district;" and whereas on the 12th day of November, in the year 1802, at the trial of the aforesaid cause between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited for the cause aforesaid, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district of New Hampshire, did decree that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, should be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant; and whereas the said John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States in and for the said district of New Hampshire, and prosecuting the said cause for and on the part of the United States, on the said 12th day of November, in the year 1802, did, in the name and behalf of the United States, claim an appeal from said decree of the district court to the next circuit court to be held in the said district of New Hampshire, and did pray the said district court to allow the said appeal, in conformity to the provisions of the act of Congress last aforesaid, yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal, as prayed for and claimed by the said John S. Sherburne in behalf of the United States, contrary to his trust and duty of judge of the district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice.

ART. 4. That whereas for the due, faithful, and impartial administration of justice, temperance and sobriety are essential qualities in the character of a judge, yet the said John Pickering, being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits, on the 11th and 12th days of November, in the year 1802, being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear on the bench of the said court for the administration of justice in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of intoxicating liquors; and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all the good citizens of the United States; and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge and degrading to the honor of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or other accusation or impeachment against the said John Pickering; and also of replying to his or any answers which he shall make to the said articles, or any of them; and of offering proof to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said John Pickering may be put to answer the said high crimes and misdemeanors; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Signed by order and in behalf of the House.

NATHANIEL MACON, Speaker.
JOHN BECKLEY, Clerk.

He then delivered the articles at the table; whereupon,

The President notified the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives, and they withdrew.

The court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

In the House,<sup>26</sup> on the same day, Mr. Nicholson, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, reported that the managers did this day carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 30th ultimo, and the said managers were informed by the Senate that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.

On January 12<sup>30</sup> the report was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That a summons issue, directed to the said John Pickering, in the form following:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, sc:

"The Senate of the United States of America, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, to John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, greeting:

the same shall be allowed by the President of the Senate for the time being, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to advance out of said fund, to said James Mathers, for his traveling expenses, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be by said James Mathers accounted for in a final settlement for his services.

Fourth. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolutions, and deliver to them a copy of the same.

Mr. Tracy, from the committee last mentioned, further reported in part, and the report was amended, as follows:

Resolved, That whenever application shall be made to the Secretary of the Senate for a subpoena or subpoenas for witnesses by the House of Representatives, either by their managers of the impeachment or in any other proper way, or by the party impeached or his counsel, acknowledged as such by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachments, he shall issue to such applicant a subpoena or subpoenas in the following form, viz:

"To [here name the witnesses and residence] greeting: You and each of you are hereby commanded, laying aside all excuses, to appear before the Senate of the United States, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, on the—— day of ——, at the Senate Chamber, in the city of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before said court of impeachments for trial, in which the House of Representatives have impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors. Fail not."

Witness, Aaron Burr, Vice-President of the United States of America and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Washington, this —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

Which subpoenas shall be directed in every case to the marshal of the districts where such witnesses reside, to serve and return.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do issue twelve subpoenas for witnesses in the above form for the use of the said Pickering, with blanks therein for such witnesses as he, the said Pickering, may think proper to summon, which subpoenas shall be delivered by the Sergeant-at-Arms to him at the time he shall serve the summons aforesaid on the said Pickering.

As amended, the report was agreed to, yeas 23, nays 5.

It was then—

Ordered, That the Secretary lay these resolutions before the House of Representatives.

The above resolutions were communicated to the House by message on this day,<sup>31</sup> and on January 13 were read and laid on the table. The resolutions of the Senate are printed in full in the House Journal.

On January 13<sup>32</sup> the high court appears to have agreed on a "form of direction to the marshal for the service of the subpoena:—"

You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpoena according to law.

Dated at Washington this —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Rules adopted by the Senate as a court to govern the trial of Judge Pickering.

The Senate sitting as a court did not communicate to the House the rules for governing the trial.

By the rules for the Pickering trial the President of the Senate was given general authority to direct forms of proceeding not otherwise provided for.

Form of oath taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms and entered on the record, on the making of the return of service of summons on Judge Pickering.

Rule framed to govern ceremonies for appearance and answer of respondent in the Pickering impeachment.

The rules for the Pickering trial provided that a record should be made if respondent appeared in person or by counsel, or if he failed to appear.

Rule for offering motions during the Pickering trial.

In the Pickering trial a rule provided that the Senate might retire for consultation on demand of one-third.

The rule of the Pickering trial required all decisions to be in open court, by yeas and nays, and without debate.

Form of oath and method of examination for witnesses in the Pickering trial.

Rule of the Senate, in the Pickering trial, for examination of a Senator.

The rules of the Pickering trial provided that a question by a Senator should be in writing and be put by the Presiding Officer.

On March 1<sup>34</sup> Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed by the Senate to examine precedents and prepare forms, reported to the court (not to the Senate) the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the court :

Resolved, That the President of the Senate shall direct all the forms of proceeding, while the Senate are sitting as a court to impeachments, as to opening, adjourning, and all forms during the session not otherwise specially provided for by the Senate.

And that the President of the Senate be requested to direct the preparations in the Senate Chamber for the accommodation of the Senate while sitting as a court, and for the reception and accommodation of the parties to the impeachment, their counsel, witnesses, etc.

And that he be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal, or any officer of officers of the District of Columbia during the session of the court of impeachments whose services he may think requisite and which can be obtained for the purpose.

And all the expenses arising under this resolution, after being first allowed by the President of the Senate, shall be paid by the Secretary, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

Resolved, That on the 2d day of March instant, at 1 o'clock, the legislative and executive business of the Senate be postponed, and that the court of impeachments shall then be opened, after which the process, which, on the 12th day of January last, was directed to be issued and served on John Pickering, and the return thereof, shall be read, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the following form, to wit:

"I, James Mathers, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by me, upon the process issued on the 12th day of January last by the Senate of the United States against John Pickering, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as there described, so help me God."

Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

The Secretary shall then give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon said impeachment. And upon the attendance of the House of Representatives, their managers, or any person or persons admitted to appear for the impeachment, the said John Pickering shall be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself or if by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he does not appear either personally or by agent or attorney the same shall be recorded. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the President of the Senate, and, if he shall require it, shall be committed to writing and read at the Secretary's table, and after the parties shall be heard upon such motion the Senate shall retire to the adjoining committee room for consideration, if one-third of the members present shall require it; but all decisions shall be had in open court, by ayes and noes and without debate, which shall be entered on the records.

Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "I, A. B. do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence I shall give to this court in the case now depending shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God."

Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form.

If a Senator is called as a witness he shall be sworn and give his testimony standing in his place.

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness it shall be reduced to writing and put by the President.

These rules were not communicated to the House of Representatives.

2332. Pickering's impeachment continued.

Ceremonies at the calling of Judge Pickering to answer the articles of impeachment.

The House did not accept the invitation of the Senate to accompany its managers at the return of summons in Pickering's impeachment.

On the same day, in the high court, the summons to John Pickering was read, together with the return made thereon by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the oath prescribed was administered to the returning officer by the Secretary.

Subpoenas having been issued in the form prescribed and directed to Ebenezer Chadwick and others, the following return was made to them respectively:

NEW HAMPSHIRE DISTRICT, ss:

January 28, 1804.

Pursuant to this precept, I have served the same by reading it to the within-named Ebenezer Chadwick, etc.

MICHAEL MCCLARY,

Marshal for the New Hampshire District.

Then it was, by the high court of impeachments—

Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives, and that the Secretary communicate a copy of the regulations agreed on to that House.

On March 2nd the substance of this order was by message communicated to the House, whereupon it was—

Resolved, That the managers appointed on the 2d of January last do now attend in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of conducting the impeachment against John Pickering on the part of this House.

It does not appear that attendance by the House itself was proposed.

Thereupon the managers attended in the high court, whereupon John Pickering was three times called to answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, but came not.

No appearance was made on behalf of Judge Pickering and no answer was made to the articles of impeachment.

In the Pickering impeachment counsel for respondent's son presented a petition of the latter setting forth that his father was insane, and asking for time to show this.

In the Pickering case, against the objection of the managers, the court determined to hear the counsel of respondent's son and evidence to show the insanity of the accused.

On a question of permitting counsel for respondent's son to appear in the Pickering trial, the said counsel was not permitted to argue.

The Vice-President then submitted a petition of Jacob S. Pickering, son of John Pickering, and a letter from Robert G. Harper, inclosed to the Vice-President.

PETITION OF JACOB S. PICKERING.

At a court of impeachments holden before the honorable the Senate of the United States of America, sitting in their capacity of a high court of impeachment at the city of Washington, on the 2nd day of March, 1804:

The House of Representatives of the United States v. John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire.

Jacob S. Pickering, of Portsmouth, in the district of New Hampshire, and son of the said John Pickering, against whom articles of impeachment have been exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, conceives it his duty most respectfully to state to this high and honorable court the real situation of the said John Pickering, the facts and circumstances relative to said articles, wherein he stands charged of supposed high crimes and misdemeanors, and to request that this court would grant him such term of time as they shall think fit and reasonable to substantiate this statement.

Your petitioner will be able to show that at the time when the crimes where-with the said John stands charged are supposed to have been committed, the said John was, and for more than two years before, and ever since has been, and now is, insane, his mind wholly deranged, and altogether incapable of transacting any kind of business which requires the exercise of judgment, or the faculties of reason; and, therefore, that the said John Pickering is incapable of corruption of judgment, no subject of impeachment, or amenable to any tribunal for his actions.

That this derangement has been constant and permanent, every day of his life completely demonstrating his insanity; every attempt for his relief, which has been prescribed by the faculty who have been consulted on his case, has proved unavailing, and his disorder has baffled all medical aid.

Your petitioner is well aware that the most conclusive evidence of the foregoing fact would result from an actual view of the respondent, which unfortunately, by reason of his great infirmities can not now be, but at the hazard of his life—he is wholly unable at this inclement season to support the fatigue of so long a journey; yet if the respondent's life be spared, and his health in any degree restored, it will be the endeavor of your petitioner that the said John shall make his personal appearance before this honorable court at any future day they shall think proper to assign.

Your petitioner will be able to show, any pretense to the contrary notwithstanding, that the decisions made in the cause stated in the first article of impeachment, although not the result of reflection, or grounded on any deductions of reason, were, nevertheless, correct, perfectly consonant to the principles of justice, and conformable to the laws of the land; and the refusal of the said judge to grant the appeal claimed by the said John S. Sherburne, in behalf of the United States, was not against law, or to the injury of the public revenue, as the third article of the impeachment supposes; there being no law to warrant such appeal in such a case.

While, with deep humility, your petitioner admits and greatly laments the indecorous and improper expressions used by the said judge on the seat of justice, as mentioned in the last article of impeachment, he will clearly evince the injustice of that part thereof which respects his moral character, and show abundantly, that from his youth upward, through a long, laborious and useful life, and until he was visited by the most awful dispensation of Providence, and the most deplorable of all human calamities, the loss of reason, he was unexceptionable in his morals, remarkable for the purity of his language, and the correctness of his habits, and the deviations in these particulars now complained of, are irresistible evidence of the deranged state of his mind.

When this high and honorable court shall take into their consideration the situation of this respondent, oppressed with infirmity, incapable of making arrangements for his defense, the inclemency of the season, his great distance from the place of trial, and the shortness of notice—when your honors reflect on the high and atrocious crime with which he stands charged; in the decision of which is involved, not his life (indeed his remains of life would be but a slender sacrifice), but that which, to an honest mind, is more dear than life itself, his good name—when you advert to the consequences attached to a conviction; the indelible stigma which will befall a numerous family whose only patrimony was the unsullied reputation of their parent, which they have ever cherished, and of which they fondly, perhaps too fondly, hoped, no time, or circumstance, or adverse fortune could deprive them—when your honors shall think of these things, your petitioner has strong confidence that the wisdom and justice of this court will permit a respondent, whose integrity until now has been unquestioned: who has sustained offices high and honorable, through a long life, and the general tenor of whose character and conduct has hitherto furnished him with a coat of armor against the assaults of his enemies, but who is now incapable of defending himself, to be defended by his friends.

Audi alteram partem is a maxim held in reverence wherever liberty yet remains. The Senate of America will be the last tribunal on earth that will cease to respect it; they will never condemn unheard; they will never refuse time for a full and impartial trial.

That time, that impartial trial, your petitioner prays for: the charity of the law preumes the innocence of the respondent; and your petitioner, also, respectfully entreats that, in the meantime, and more especially as the evidence on which the impeachment is founded, was taken ex parte, no unfavorable impressions may be made on the minds of this honorable court, by any report or extrajudicial representations which may have been made on the subject before them.

JACOB S. PICKERING.

LETTER OF ROBERT G. HARPER

SIR: Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, the son of Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire, has forwarded to me, through one of his friends here, the inclosed petition, with a request that I will lay it before the court of impeachments, and will appear on his part, if permitted, and support the prayer of it. I am also furnished with several depositions, showing that Judge Pickering, from bodily infirmity and total derangement of mind, is wholly incapable of appearing before the court at this time, of making a defense, or of giving authority to any person to appear for him.

The process of subpoena heretofore issued by the court not being compulsory, and Judge Pickering's narrow circumstances not enabling his son to defray the expenses of the witnesses whose testimony it is important for him to produce, it was judged necessary to serve the subpoena. The object of the petition is to obtain a postponement of the trial, and either compulsory process, or an order to take depositions, which may be received in evidence. Be pleased, sir, to lay the petition before the court, and to inform me whether I shall be received to appear on the part of the petitioner, Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, in its support. In that case I will attend in the capacity of agent or counsel for the petitioner, and submit to the court the reasons and proofs with which I am furnished in support of his application.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient very humble servant,

ROBERT G. HARPER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The President inquired if Mr. Harper was in court, and invited him to a seat within the bar, which having taken, he made the following address:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to address this honorable court in the case now before it, I think it proper to repeat explicitly what is stated in the letter just now read, that I do not appear as the counsel, agent, or attorney of Judge Pickering, or by virtue of any authority derived from him, he being in a state of absolute and long-continued insanity, can neither appear himself nor authorize another to appear for him. I present myself to this honorable court, at the request of Jacob S. Pickering, son of Judge Pickering, stating his father's insanity, and praying that time may be allowed for collecting and producing complete proof of the melancholy fact. This application for postponement I am prepared to support by depositions now in my possession; and it is also my intention, if permitted, to make a further application on the part of Judge Pickering for compulsory process to compel the attendance of such witnesses as it may be necessary to produce in proof of the fact of insanity, or for an order to take their depositions in writing on interrogatories, and notice to the prosecutors. It rests with this honorable court whether it will receive such an application, and hear counsel so appearing in its support.

After a short pause, Mr. Harper again rose and inquired whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering by counsel.

The President<sup>36</sup> answered that he presumed that it would not be so construed.

Mr. Nicholas, on behalf of the House managers, objected to the hearing of Mr. Harper in any other capacity than as counsel of the accused, and remarked that as Mr. Harper disclaimed appearing in that capacity, he could not in his opinion be heard. Other managers spoke, especially Mr. Rodney, who said :

I understand the President as having declared that, agreeably to the rules of proceeding adopted by the Senate, no person can be heard in this case but the accused, or his agent or counsel.

The Vice-President nodded assent.

Mr. Rodney continued :

I also understand the gentleman who appeared on this occasion, as clearly and explicitly stating that he does not appear as the counsel of Mr. Pickering, nor does he wish it so to be understood. That gentleman has informed us in a very fair and candid manner of the only character in which he does appear, and has assumed very properly and correctly the only ground upon which he wishes to stand. He has in positive terms disavowed the idea of his being the agent or counsel of the accused, because he has protested against Mr. Pickering's being affected by any act done by him. On this single ground, then, I respectfully submit whether it would be proper to hear the gentleman under these circumstances, and whether it be not manifested that he does not come within the rules laid down by the Senate for the government of this high court of impeachments.

But if the gentleman is to be heard on this subject in the anomalous character in which he appears, with a view of postponing the proceedings of this court, it will first be necessary for the court to decide that the case is properly before them, agreeably to the rules which have been established. If no appearance in person or by attorney has been entered, unless proceedings have been had which they shall consider tantamount to an appearance, there is no cause regularly in court, and it would be idle for any person to talk of postponing the consideration of that which really was not before the court. A question of this kind must, from the nature of it, ever be incidental to the principal or main question. When a writ is in court according to the rules of the court, a motion for postponement may, with propriety, if the circumstances justify it, be made. This must always be a subsequent consideration, after the court are in full possession of the case. Agreeably to the correct course of proceeding in ordinary courts, until bail and appearance, there can be no case in court. The party has no day given him, because he is, until this takes place, considered to be out of court : nor would any counsel, though duly authorized, be heard in his behalf. There has, in this case, then, been no appearance in person or by agent or counsel. The accused has made default, and no agent or attorney has been recorded for him. Surely, then, his default should be first recorded, and if the court consider that after his having been duly served, and making default, they will proceed to a hearing and determination of the principal question, it will then be proper to listen to those which are necessarily incidental. It will be at this stage of the business competent for the court, if at all, to hear the gentleman. But I am decidedly of the opinion there is no period in which it will be proper so to do unless he claims this right as the agent or counsel of the accused. In that capacity he has a right to be heard ; and in that capacity alone. Our Constitution has wisely secured to every man this privilege, and I would not deprive the humblest object in the community of this inestimable benefit. I flatter myself, therefore, that this honorable court will adhere strictly to the rules which they have prescribed for themselves, and that they will for these reasons, and those which have been assigned by my colleague, refuse the present application.

Mr. Harper inquired whether it would be regular in him to reply to these remarks?

The President said it would not; and immediately after put the question to the Senate, whether Mr. Harper should be heard in support of the prayer of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

Whereupon the Senate retired to a private Chamber, from which they returned about 3 o'clock, when the President advised the managers that the Senate would take further time to consider the question before them, and would make them acquainted with their decision.

Finally, with open doors, the court took a vote on the question :

Will the court hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering, upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the letter of R. G. Harper?

It was decided in the affirmative, yeas 18, nays 12.

It was then—

Resolved, That, on the motion made and seconded, the court shall retire to the adjoining committee room, if one-third of the Senators present shall require it.

The court adjourned to 12 o'clock the next day.

2334. Pickering's impeachment continued.

The court having determined, in the Pickering impeachment, to hear counsel of a third person on a preliminary question, the managers withdrew to consult the House.

The Senate declined to await the consultation of the managers with the House before hearing evidence as to Judge Pickering's sanity.

The House, in the Pickering impeachment, deemed it unnecessary to approve the conduct of its managers in declining to discuss in the court a matter from a third party.

In the Pickering case the Presiding Officer ruled that in presenting affidavits to show the insanity of the accused only the pertinent parts should be read.

The Presiding Officer held that counsel of the son of Judge Pickering, admitted to show the insanity of the accused, might not offer a motion to the court.

On March 6,<sup>37</sup> the court was opened, and the managers of the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, against John Pickering, attended.

Mr. Harper also attended.

The President informed Mr. Harper that the court would hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering and the letter of R. G. Harper.

Mr. Nicholson, in behalf of the managers, said he was instructed to ask for the reading of the proceedings of the court on the last day of its sitting.

The clerk having read the record, by which it appeared that John Pickering had been called three times without appearing.

Mr. Nicholson inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. Harper should be heard, and whether this was to be a step preliminary to the trial.

The President said he could not undertake to give an explanation of the proceedings of the Senate, adding that their meaning must be gathered from the proceedings themselves.

Mr. Nicholson then said that he begged leave to state that the managers were ready to proceed with the trial of the articles preferred by the House of Representatives.

The President said that under the decision of the Senate it had been determined in the first instance to hear Mr. Harper in support of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

Mr. Nicholson said he was instructed by the managers again to state that they were ready to support the articles of impeachment. They, however, not being at present under the consideration of the Senate, they did not consider themselves under any obligation to discuss a preliminary question raised by a third person unauthorized by the person charged. He was therefore instructed to state to the Senate that the managers would, under these circumstances, retire, and take the opinion of the House of Representatives respecting their further procedure.

The managers thereupon retired.

Then a proposition that the Senate retire to its private chamber was disagreed to, only six voting aye.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, apparently to second a suggestion of Mr. James Jackson, of Georgia, that proceedings should be delayed until the Senate had heard from the managers of the House of Representatives, moved an adjournment, but the motion was disagreed to, only 10 voting aye.

A motion by Mr. Robert Wright, of Maryland, that the counsel in support of the petition of J. S. Pickering be not heard until the return of the managers, or until their intention should be signified, was disagreed to, the ayes being seven.

Then Mr. Harper rose and presented affidavits, evidently ex parte, to show the insanity of Judge Pickering. One affidavit expressing the opinion that Judge Pickering could not "from his bodily infirmities" proceed on a journey to Washington, was ruled out by the President, as the order of the Senate confined the proof to the single allegation of insanity. On the presentation of another affidavit the President ruled that only the parts relating to insanity should be read.

After the reading of the affidavits,<sup>38</sup> Mr. Harper said this was the testimony on which he founded the application—which was to postpone the trial until such time as the court might think fit, in order to take depositions.

The President said :

It does not seem to me proper to receive any motion from you. The Senate will attend to what you have said and take proper order upon it.

Mr. Harper thereupon addressed the court briefly, expressing the wish that opportunity should be allowed and the necessary facilities afforded to obtain testimony.

The court thereupon adjourned.

In the House of Representatives,<sup>39</sup> meanwhile, a short time after the managers returned from the court, Mr. Nicholson, in their behalf, made to the House of Representatives the following communication :

That on Friday, the 2d of March, the managers, agreeably to the directions of the House, appeared at the bar of the Senate, to support the said articles of impeachment, when John Pickering was three times solemnly called, but did not answer or appear, either in person or by counsel. The President of the Senate then stated that he had received a letter, signed R. G. Harper, accompanying a petition, signed Jacob S. Pickering, who called himself the son of the party charged. The petition being read, was found to contain a statement of a variety of matter, particularly the insanity of Judge Pickering, upon which the prayer of the petition was founded for a postponement of the trial to some future day. Mr. Harper was called to the bar of the Senate: he entered, and stated that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not appear at the bar of the

Senate as counsel for John Pickering, from whom he had received no authority for that purpose; but that his object was to support the facts contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. There was a short pause, when Mr. Harper rose again and inquired whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel. The President of the Senate answered, he presumed that Mr. Harper's appearance would not be considered as the appearance of John Pickering by counsel.

The managers, under these circumstances, felt themselves bound to object to Mr. Harper's being heard in any other capacity than as counsel for the party who was impeached; and briefly stated their reasons for the objection.

The Senate withdrew to a private chamber, where it is presumed the question was debated. The managers again appeared at the bar of the Senate this day, and were informed by the President that it had been resolved to hear Mr. Harper in support of the allegations contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. The managers inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. Harper should be heard, and whether this was to be a measure preliminary to the trial. The President of the Senate declared that he could not undertake to explain the resolutions of the Senate, but that their sense must be collected from the resolutions themselves. The managers then offered themselves ready for trial, declaring that they were prepared to open the prosecution on behalf of the House of Representatives, and that the witnesses were ready to prove the facts charged in the articles of impeachment. Upon this offer being made, the President of the Senate stated that he considered it to be the sense of the Senate that Mr. Harper was to be heard before the trial commenced.

The managers considered this as an irregular step, and not believing that they ought to discuss any petition presented to the Senate from a person who was not a party to the impeachment, and this, too, before the party charged, although duly notified, had appeared, either in person or by attorney, withdrew from the Senate Chamber. They will not feel themselves either bound or authorized to appear again until the Senate shall inform them that they are prepared to proceed in the trial, unless specially directed by this House.

Mr. John Smilie, of Pennsylvania, thereupon proposed the following:

Resolved, That this House doth approve of the conduct of the managers appointed to support the articles of impeachment in the case of John Pickering, as stated in their report of this day, and that the said managers do not appear at the bar of the Senate, until they shall be specially instructed by this House.

There was objection to the resolution on the ground that it was not necessary for the House to express its opinion of the conduct of the managers at every stage. There was so much objection that Mr. Smilie on the next day withdrew the resolution.

After hearing evidence as to the sanity of the accused, the court of impeachment notified the House of its readiness to hear the managers on the articles.

There being no appearance for Judge Pickering, witnesses presented by the managers were not cross-examined, except for a few questions by the Presiding officer.

On March 7,<sup>a</sup> in the high court of impeachments, it was ordered that the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the court was open and ready to receive and hear the managers in support of the articles of impeachment. This motion was agreed to by a vote of yeas 19, nays 8.

Accordingly, on March 8,<sup>b</sup> the court was opened, the managers attended, and one of them, Mr. Early, after opening remarks, proceeded to produce testimony in support of the first article of impeachment, and then, in order, evidence supporting the other articles. This evidence consisted of the reading of statutes of the United States, an attested copy of the record of the court, with the seal of said court annexed, and the examination of witnesses.

Judge Pickering not being represented by counsel, the witnesses were not cross-examined, except in certain instances<sup>42</sup> when the President addressed questions to a witness.

The testimony tended to substantiate the charge that the said judge was an inebriate.

Mr. Nicholson then informed the court that the managers here closed the testimony, and then the managers withdrew.

2336. Pickering's impeachment, continued.

No defense being made in the Pickering impeachment, the two Senators from the State of the accused were examined at suggestion of the court.

In the Pickering case one of the managers submitted the case finally without extended argument.

The Senate declined to postpone the Pickering trial after the evidence had been submitted.

On March 9,<sup>43</sup> on the suggestion of Mr. Tracy, the Senator who was chairman of the committee having in charge the preparation of forms of procedure of the trial, Simeon Olcott and William Plumer, the Senators from New Hampshire, were respectively sworn and affirmed. They testified that in their opinion the troubles of Judge Pickering were not due to intemperance. Mr. Plumer thought the intemperance the result of insanity.

Four witnesses were introduced, at whose suggestion does not appear, and testified in rebuttal.

Mr. Nicholson then observed that the managers would withdraw for a few minutes. Accordingly they withdrew, and shortly returned.

Mr. Nicholson then, in their behalf, addressed the court briefly, saying that he was directed by the managers to inform the court that they submitted the articles on the evidence offered, entertaining no doubt of full justice being done by the decisions of the Senate.

Thereupon the managers retired.

Mr. Tracy then offered the following motion:

Resolved, As the opinion of this court, that the proceedings on the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against John Pickering be postponed to the — day of — next.

This resolution was disagreed to, yeas 10, nays 20.

Thereupon the court adjourned to the next day.

In the absence of the Vice-President a President pro tempore was chosen to preside over the court trying Judge Pickering.

The Senate informed the House of the day and hour fixed for pronouncing judgment in the Pickering impeachment.

The court of impeachment declined to postpone judgment until Judge Pickering could be brought personally before it for inspection as to sanity.

On March 10<sup>41</sup> the record of the court of impeachment shows:

Mr. Franklin was chosen President pro tem.

The Journal of the Senate for this day shows that the Vice-President was absent and that the Senate chose Mr. Jesse Franklin, of North Carolina, President pro tempore.<sup>45</sup>

On this day, also the Senate, before sitting as high court of impeachments, ordered,<sup>46</sup> by a vote of yeas 20, nays 9—

That the Secretary do acquaint the House of Representatives that the court of impeachments will, on Mouday at 12 o'clock, proceed to pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited by them against John Pickering.

Afterwards, the high court of impeachments having convened, Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, submitted the following:<sup>47</sup>

Resolved, That this court is not at present prepared to give their final decision upon the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors, the said John Pickering not having appeared, or been heard, by himself or by counsel; and it having been suggested to the court by Jacob S. Pickering, son of the said John Pickering, that the said John Pickering, at the time of the conduct charged against him in the said articles of impeachment as high crimes and misdemeanors, was, and yet is, insane, which suggestion has been supported by the testimony of two members of the court and by the affidavits of sundry persons, whose integrity is unimpeached; and it being further suggested in the said petition that at such future day as the court may appoint the body of the said Pickering shall be produced in court, and further testimony in his behalf, which will enable the court to judge for themselves as to the insanity of the said John Pickering and to act more understandingly in the premises: but that the said John Pickering, owing to bodily infirmity, could not be brought to court at present, at so great a distance, and at this inclement season of the year, without imminent hazard of his life.

Mr. Wilson Carey Nicholas, of Virginia (not Mr. Nicholson, the House manager) and Mr. Robert Wright, of Maryland, and others, objected to the resolution as not being in order.

Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, asked if it would be in order to move an amendment to it.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, said he would object to any amendment to it, as, by the rule of the court, a gentleman had a right to a vote upon any specific proposition he might please to submit connected with the trial.

Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, called for the reading of the rule.

Mr. Anderson then moved that the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Virginia yesterday be taken up as being entitled to be acted upon first.

The President pro tempore declared that the resolution of the gentleman from Delaware was fairly before the court and must be disposed of in some way before anything else could be taken up.

A motion for postponing the further consideration of it was then made and withdrawn.

Mr. Nicholas hoped it would not be permitted to go upon the journals of the court.

Mr. Jackson moved the previous question, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?"

<sup>45</sup> It seems hardly necessary to support that the court of impeachments ratified this selection of the Senate. The records of the court are not made with technical care, and the entry probably refers to action of the Senate.

Mr. White hoped that whatever question should be taken on the subject should be by yeas and nays; that his resolution and the manner in which it might be got rid of should be seen and understood.

Mr. Anderson then moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "not having been heard by himself or counsel," and all after the words "was, and yet is, insane" to the end of the resolution.

On motion of Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed.

At 3 o'clock the doors were opened and the question was taken upon the resolution as at first submitted—yeas 9, nays 19.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

The House attended its managers to the Senate to hear the Senate pronounce judgment in the Pickering impeachment.

The House having heard judgment in the Pickering impeachment, the managers made no report, and no record appears on the House Journal.

On March 12,<sup>45</sup> in the House of Representatives, it was Ordered, That this House do now attend in the Senate Chamber to hear the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, agreeably to the notification contained in a message from the Senate, by their Secretary, on Saturday last.

The Speaker, attended by the Members, accordingly withdrew to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the foregoing order; and being returned, etc., proceeded to other business. The House Journal has no record of the decision of the court.

The court determined to confine the question in the judgment on Judge Pickering to the simple question of guilt on the charges.

The court, in the Pickering judgment, declined to permit an expression as to whether the offenses constituted high crimes and misdemeanors.

In conformity with English precedents the Senate pronounced judgment, article by article, in the Pickering case.

The final question in the Pickering judgment was on the removal of the accused from office.

Meanwhile, on the same day, the Court of Impeachment had convened, and Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, inquired whether the question was to be taken on each article separately, as practiced in the House of Lords, or on the whole together. He hoped upon each separately, as gentlemen might wish to vote affirmatively on some and negatively on others, from which privilege they must be precluded by giving but one general vote of guilty or not guilty. He would, therefore, beg leave to submit to the consideration of the court the following as the form of the question to be put to each member upon each article of impeachment, viz:

Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the—article of impeachment or not guilty?

For this form of question, Mr. White observed, he could adduce precedent. It was nearly the same as was used in the very celebrated case of Warren Hastings, and he presumed would collect the sense of the court with as much certainty as any that could be proposed, which was his only object.

After some conversation, Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, moved the following as the form and prayed that it might be taken up :

Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the—article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

The President pro tempore declared that it would not be in order to take it up till the motion of the gentleman from Delaware was acted upon, as it was first before the court and had not yet been disposed of in any way, and was about to put the question following upon it, when—

Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, mentioned that he had objections to the form of question proposed by the gentleman from Delaware and moved to strike out the words “of high crimes and misdemeanors.”

On motion, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed. After some debate, Mr. White’s form of question was lost—only 10 voting in favor of it and 18 against it.

Mr. Anderson’s form was then adopted—yeas 18, nays 9.

Mr. White stated that he believed Judge Pickering had practiced much of the indecent and improper conduct charged against him in the articles of impeachment; that he had been seen intoxicated and heard to use very profane language upon the bench; that he had acted illegally and very unbecoming a judge in the case of the ship Eliza, as charged against him in the articles, but that he was very far from believing that any part of his conduct amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors or that he was in any degree capable of such an offense, because, after the testimony the court had heard, scarcely a doubt could remain in the mind of any gentleman but that the judge was actually insane at the time; and Mr. White wished to know whether it was to be understood by the two last votes just taken that the court intended only to find the facts and to avoid pronouncing the law upon them; that they could have it in view to say merely that Judge Pickering had committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment and upon such a conviction, to remove him, without saying directly or indirectly whether those acts amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors or not; for in the several articles they are not so charged, though judgment is demanded upon them as such. Upon such a principle and by such a mode of proceeding good behavior, he observed, would be no longer the tenure of office: every officer of the Government must be at the mercy of a majority of Congress, and it would not hereafter be necessary that a man should be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in order to render him liable to removal from office by impeachment, but a conviction upon any facts stated in articles exhibited against him would be sufficient.

Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, observed that the honorable gentleman from Virginia seemed to be offended at the language of his honorable friend from Delaware, who, in speaking of the proceedings on the impeachment, had called them a mere mockery of trial. To such terms, however, the ears of that honorable gentleman must be accustomed and accommodated, for, whilst either he or his friend had the honor of a seat in that body, they should designate this trial by no other character. It deserved no better appellation and would be thus characterized in all parts of the United States where these proceedings could be seen and understood.

That the conclusion of this exhibition might perfectly correspond with its commencement and progress, that the catastrophe might comport with the other parts of the piece, the Senate were now to be compelled, by a determined majority, to take the question in a manner never before heard of on similar occasions. They were simply to be allowed to vote, whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the Senate was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime and misdemeanor. The latest reason of this course was, Mr. Dayton said, too obvious. There were numbers who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge, upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment. The Constitution gave no power to the Senate, as the High Court of Impeachments, to pass such a sentence of removal and disqualification, except upon charges and conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors. The House of Representatives had so charged the judge and had exhibited articles in maintenance and support, as they themselves declared, of those charges. The Senate had received and heard the evidence adduced by the managers and had gone through certain forms of a trial, and they now, by a majority, dictated the form of a final question the most extraordinary, unprecedented, and unwarrantable. For himself, Mr. Dayton said, he felt at a loss how to act. He was free to declare that he believed the respondent guilty of most of the facts stated in the articles, but, considering the deranged state of intellect of that unfortunate man, he could not declare him guilty of the words of the Constitution; he could not vote it a conviction under the impeachment. Let the question be stated, as had been proposed by his honorable friend from Delaware, agreeably to the form observed in the well recollected case of Warren Hastings:

Is John Pickering guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor upon the charge contained in the first, the second, the third, or the fourth article of the impeachment, or not guilty?

Or, if the court preferred it, he should have no objection against taking the preliminary question, whether guilty of the facts charged in each article, provided they would allow it to be followed by another most important question, viz: Whether those facts, thus proved and found, amounted to a conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors, as charged in the impeachment, and expressly required by the Constitution. Both these forms of stating the question were, it was now too evident, intended to be refused by the majority, and thus a precedent established for removing a judge in a manner unauthorized by that charter.

Mr. White asked whether, after the question now before the court—which goes merely to settle, as gentlemen themselves believe, the point whether Judge Pickering has committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment or not—should be decided, it would then be in his power to obtain a vote of the court upon another question which, without presenting at present, he would state in his place, viz: Is it the opinion of this court that John Pickering is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, upon the charges exhibited against him in the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives?

The President pro tempore replied that he thought such a motion could not be received after the vote had been taken.

Mr. Wright submitted the following as the final question, viz:

Is the court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire?

This form was agreed to.

In the Pickering impeachment certain Senators retired from the court because dissatisfied with form of the question on final judgment.

Messrs. John Armstrong, of New York; Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont; David Stone, of North Carolina; Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey; and Samuel White, of Delaware, retired from the court. The two last not because they believed Judge Pickering guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, but because they did not choose to be compelled to give so solemn a vote upon a form of question which they considered an unfair one, and calculated to preclude them from giving any distinct and explicit opinion upon the true and most important point in the case, viz, as to the insanity of Judge Pickering, and whether the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, if true, amounted in him to high crimes and misdemeanors or not.

In final judgment the court found Judge Pickering guilty in all the articles and decreed his removal from office.

Final judgment being pronounced, the court of impeachment in Pickering's case adjourned sine die.

The question was then taken in the presence of the managers and of the House of Representatives, and decided as follows:

On the question—

Is John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the first article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

It was determined in the affirmative, yeas 19, nays 7.

The same question was put, in the same way, on the three remaining articles, and decided by a like result.

On the question—

Is the court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire?

It was determined in the affirmative, yeas 20, nays 6.

The court then adjourned sine die.

The Senate Journal<sup>49</sup> records simply the fact of the sitting and adjournment of the court, as on other days, and makes no mention of the result of the trial.

2342. The impeachment and trial of Samuel Chase, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1804.

The investigation of the conduct of Richard Peters, United States district judge for Pennsylvania, in 1804.

The impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was set in motion on the responsibility of one Member of the House, sustained by the statement of another Member.

In the case of Mr. Justice Chase the House, after long debate and a review of precedents, decided to order investigation, although Members could give only hearsay evidence as to the facts.

English precedents reviewed in the Chase case on the question of ordering an investigation on the strength of common rumor.

The House declined to state by way of preamble its reason for investigating the conduct of Mr. Justice Chase and Judge Peters.

Form of resolution authorizing the Chase and Peters investigation in 1804.

Two of the seven Members of the committee for the Chase investigation were from the number opposing the investigation.

Mr. John Randolph, who had moved the Chase investigation, was made chairman of the committee.

On January 5, 1804,<sup>1</sup> Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, arising in his place in the House, spoke of the necessity of "preserving unpolluted the fountain of justice," and then said:

At the last session of Congress a gentleman from Pennsylvania did, in his place (on the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States, state certain facts in relation to the official conduct of an eminent judicial character, which I then thought, and still think, the House bound to notice. But the lateness of the session (for we had, if I mistake not, scarce a fortnight remaining) precluding all possibility of bringing the subject to any efficient result. I did not then think proper to take any steps in the business. Finding my attention, however, thus drawn to a consideration of the character of the officer in question, I made it my business, considering it my duty as well to myself as to those whom I represent, to investigate the charges then made, and the official character of the judge, in general. The result having convinced me that there exists ground of impeachment against this officer, I demand an inquiry into his conduct, and therefore submit to the House the following resolution :

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase hath so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House."

Objection being made that the House should have further information before taking a step, which would cast discredit on the character of a judge, Mr. John Smilie, of Pennsylvania, who had made the statement in the preceding Congress referred to by Mr. Randolph, arose and, in the course of his remarks, said :

A man of the name of Fries was prosecuted for treason in the State of Pennsylvania. Two of the first counsel at that bar, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, without fee or reward, undertook his defense. I mention their names to show that there could have been no party prejudices that influenced them. When the trial came on the judge behaved in such a manner that Mr. Lewis declared that he would not so far degrade his profession as to plead under the circumstances imposed upon him. Mr. Dallas declared that the rights of the bar were as well established as those of the bench ; that he considered the conduct of the judge as a violation of those rights and refused to plead. The facts were these : The judge told the jury and the counsel that the court had made up their minds on what constituted treason ; that they had committed their opinion to writing, and that the counsel must therefore confine themselves to the facts in the case before the court. The counsel replied that they did not dispute the facts, but that they were able to show that they did not constitute treason. The end of the affair was that the counsel retired from court, and the man was tried without counsel, convicted, and sentenced to death.

After this the Attorney-General wrote a letter to Messrs. Dallas and Lewis, requesting them to furnish their notes and opinions for the use of the President. They drew up an answer, in which they stated that the acts charged against Fries did not amount to treason, but were only sedition, and that they were so considered in the British courts. This letter was read to me by Mr. Dallas. After receiving the letter the President pardoned the man.

A lengthy debate ensued as to whether or not, upon the facts before it, the House would be justified in agreeing to the resolution. It was objected <sup>2</sup> that the statements of the Member from Pennsylvania, Mr. Smilie, were not entitled to much weight, since they were not what he knew himself, but only what he had received from others. Moreover, he had charged only what amounted at most to an error of judgment on the part of the judge. Some facts, it was argued,<sup>3</sup> ought to be adduced, and so important a step should not be taken hastily. It was stated <sup>4</sup> that the most parliamentary way would be for a gentleman to state in the form of a resolution the grounds of impeachment and then to refer such a resolution to a select committee for investigation. But it would be novel and unprecedented for the House to institute, without facts before it, an inquiry into the character of a high officer of the Government. The voting of an inquiry, so it was declared,<sup>5</sup> would be considered equivalent to the expression of an opinion that the House had evidence of the probable guilt of the judge. It had been urged that the House, in this case, had all the powers of a grand jury. But a grand jury had only the right to receive testimony. They might not send for it. If there was evidence in this case they might act on it, even though it be ex parte, although that would be going far. But so far there had been no statement satisfactorily showing probable cause. It was asserted,<sup>6</sup> that the opinion of any one Member, without presentation of facts, should not avail to set in motion this proceeding. The gentleman from Pennsylvania might have misconceived the information given to him. Objection was further made<sup>7</sup> that the proposed form of procedure was not warranted by the precedents. The case of Bolingbroke was not in point, since that impeachment was based on disclosures made during examination of the conduct of the ministry. In the Blount and Pickering cases the Executive had transmitted documents to the House. But in this case it was proposed to appoint a committee to search in the first instance for an accusation and then to look for proofs to justify it. The assertion was made<sup>8</sup> that there were no precedents to justify an assertion that common fame was sufficient ground for impeachment. The precedent of the Earl of Stratford was a gloomy and terrible precedent, unsusceptible of application under a Republican form of government. It was true that a member had risen in his place in the Commons and impeached Warren Hastings, but at the same time he exhibited specific charges of misconduct. The House was the grand inquest of the nation, and its practice ought to be in many respects analogous to that of a grand jury. It should not listen to murmurs and seek for guilt. The resolution before the House did not allege a single fact. It was urged<sup>9</sup> that never, so far as any precedents so far cited had shown, had an inquiry been commenced in Parliament without a statement of the facts to accompany the motion, and it was objected<sup>10</sup> that even if common rumor had once been ground for beginning proceedings in a period of rudeness and violence, the more improved system of modern jurisprudence should discard such a doctrine.

In favor of the resolution it was urged<sup>11</sup> that the purpose of the inquiry was to procure evidence. If the House already had the evidence there would be no need of the inquiry. The statement of a Member in his place, even though hearsay, was sufficient to cause inquiry. It was pointed out<sup>12</sup> that under the rules of the House—such was the respect due to a Member of the House—the statement of a Member that he possessed information proper to be communicated to the House was sufficient to cause the doors to be closed at once; and surely the request of a Member for a committee of inquiry ought to be of equal force. It was further urged<sup>13</sup> that the right to move an inquiry was one of the most important pertaining to the Representative. And it was pointed out<sup>14</sup> that the motion to inquire should not be confounded with the motion to impeach. There was, it was urged,<sup>15</sup> a great difference between the inquiry and the impeachment. The analogy between the function of the House in this matter and that of a grand jury was correct and forcible. Before a grand jury it was the right of any individual to apply for and demand an inquiry into the conduct of any person within their cognizance, and it was more especially the right of any member of the jury to make such a demand. In addition to Mr. Smilie, another Member, Mr. John W. Eppes, of Virginia, stated<sup>16</sup> his belief that in his State a general opinion prevailed that Judge Chase had acted indecently and tyrannically in a case tried there. Mr. Eppes said he was not personally present at the trial; but he related what he believed to be the facts as to the case. It was urged<sup>17</sup> that in England common report was considered sufficient authority for similar inquiries. In this case common report from Maine to Georgia condemned the conduct of the judge, not only in the case of Fries, but in the case of a grand jury in Delaware and in the case of Callender in Virginia. The general sentiment of the country condemned<sup>18</sup> the judge. Moreover, the Representatives of two States lately came forward and opposed his being assigned to circuits which embraced their States. This single fact ought to make an impression on the House. But in this case a Member in his place had impeached the judge, and it was not necessary to rely on common report. As to precedents for the proposed action, the impeachments of Strafford, Bolingbroke, Oxford, and Ormond, Eyres and Hastings were referred to in English history. From American history a case of proceedings against certain judges in North Carolina in 1796 was cited.<sup>19</sup>

In the course of the debate it was agreed by the House that Judge Richard Peters, who was associated in the case with Judge Chase, should be included in an inquiry, should one be made. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 79, nays 37.<sup>20</sup>

On January 7,<sup>21</sup> Mr. John Dennis, of Maryland, proposed an amendment to the resolution, by prefixing the following preamble:

Whereas information has been given to the House by one of its Members, that, in a certain prosecution for treason on the part of the United States against a certain John Fries, pending in the circuit court of the United States in the State of Pennsylvania, Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, by whom the said circuit court was then holden, did inform the counsel for the prisoner, that as the court had formed their opinion upon the point of law, and would direct the jury thereupon, the counsel for the prisoner must confine their argument before the jury to the question of fact only; and whereas it is represented that, in consequence of such determination of the court, the counsel did refuse to address the jury on the question of fact, and the said John Fries was found guilty of treason and sentenced by the court to the punishment in such case by the laws of the United States provided, and was pardoned by the President of the United States.

It was urged in behalf of this preamble that the Journal should show the grounds for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, moved to amend the proposed preamble by striking out all after the word "whereas," where it first occurred, and inserting:

Members of this House has stated in their places that they have heard certain acts of official misconduct alleged against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, judge of the district court of the district of Pennsylvania.

A division of the motion to strike out and insert was made,<sup>22</sup> and on striking out there appeared yeas 79, nays 41. Then the motion to insert was agreed to without division.

Mr. Randolph and others opposed the preamble, urging that it would tend to limit the general inquiry desired.

The question being taken on the preamble as amended, it was disagreed to without a division.

The original resolution, as it had previously been amended, was then agreed to<sup>23</sup> as follows, the yeas being 81, the nays 40:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted, in their judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House.

Thereupon the committee was appointed as follows: Messrs. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; Joseph Clay, of Pennsylvania; Peter Early, of Georgia; Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Benjamin Huger, of South Carolina, and John Boyle, of Kentucky.<sup>24</sup>

On January 10,<sup>25</sup> the House passed a resolution that the committee "be authorized to send for persons and papers."

On January 30<sup>26</sup> Mr. J. Randolph, in the name of the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, stated that documents had been received by them which occupied a considerable bulk, the printing of which would considerably assist their investigation, by rendering them more convenient for perusal. He added that it would probably be necessary to print these papers for the information of the House when the report of the committee was made. He therefore moved the vesting in them authority to cause to be printed such papers as they might conceive proper. It was objected that the printing of a part of the documents might prejudice the case in advance; but on the part of the committee it was replied that it was not necessary that the printed documents be made public until the report should be made. The motion of Mr. Randolph was then agreed to.

The report recommending the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was considered in Committee of the Whole House.

The investigation which resulted in the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was entirely ex parte.

The House found that Judge Richard Peters had not so acted as to require impeachment.

The impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

Form of the resolution directing the carrying of the Chase impeachment to the Senate.

The committee appointed to prepare articles in the Chase case were all of those who had favored the impeachment.

The article of impeachment in the Chase case were reported just before the close of the first session of the Congress.

On March 6<sup>27</sup> Mr. Randolph submitted the report of the committee; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House. On March 8<sup>28</sup> Mr. Randolph submitted to the House an additional affidavit, which was referred also to the Committee of the Whole House.

On March 12<sup>29</sup> the report of the committee was taken up in Committee of the Whole House for consideration. This report was as follows:

That in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereunto subjoined, they are of opinion—

1. That Samuel Chase, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

2. That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, has not so acted in his judiciary capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House.

Accompanying this report was a volume of printed testimony. Two members of the committee, Messrs. Huger and Griswold, did not concur in the report; but as it was not the practice in the House at that time to permit minority views, their dissent appears only from the debate. Mr. Huger declared<sup>30</sup> that the testimony on which it was proposed to proceed was "entirely ex parte." This was not denied. Mr. Huger based his opposition to the report on this ground.

The Committee of the Whole House, after considering the report, recommended the following:

Resolved, That Samuel Chase, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Resolved, That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, hath not so acted, in his judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House.

The House agreed to the first resolution, yeas 73, nays 32. The second resolution was then agreed to without divisions.

Thereupon it was Ordered, That Mr. John Randolph and Mr. Early be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Samuel Chase, one of the associated justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer to the said impeachment.

On March 13,<sup>31</sup> in the Senate, a message from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. J. Randolph and Early, two of their Members, was received, as follows:

Mr. President: We are ordered, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

We are also ordered to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer to the said impeachment.

On the same day,<sup>32</sup> in the Senate, it was ordered that the message be referred to Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, and William C. Nicholas, of Virginia, "to consider and report thereon."

On March 13,<sup>33</sup> in the House, Mr. John Randolph, from the committee appointed on the 12th instant, reported—

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives, and of the people of the United States, had impeached Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And further: That the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer the said impeachment.

On motion it was—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who has been impeached by this House, during the present session, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Joseph Clay, Mr. Early, and Mr. Boyle be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

All of this committee had favored the report in favor of impeachment.

On March 26<sup>34</sup> Mr. Randolph reported articles of impeachment, which were ordered printed. These articles do not appear in the Journal of the House.

Then, on March 27,<sup>35</sup> the Congress adjourned to the first Monday in November next.

2344. Chase's impeachment continued.

The proceedings in the Chase impeachment were continued after a recess of Congress; but in deference to the practice at that time the articles were recommitted for a new report.

The articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase were considered article by article in Committee of the Whole.

Practice in considering and amending articles of impeachment in Committee of the Whole.

The House decided to retain in the articles of the Chase impeachment the old reservation of liberty to exhibit further articles.

The articles of impeachment in the Chase case appear in the House Journal in full at the time of their adoption.

On the second day of the next session, November 6,<sup>36</sup> Mr. Randolph raised a question as to the status of the articles of impeachment, it being then the practice of the House that pending business should begin anew at the first of a session.<sup>37</sup> As a result of this inquiry the report made at the last session was referred to a select committee, composed of the same members as the select committee of the preceding session, except that Mr. John Rhea, of Tennessee, succeeded Mr. Nicholson.

On November 30,<sup>38</sup> Mr. Randolph, from the select committee, reported articles of impeachment, which were nearly the same as those reported at the last session, with the addition of two new articles. The articles were referred to a Committee of the Whole House. An objection was made that the committee reporting in this case had been given no power of investigation, and yet that they had reported new articles not reported by the former committee, which had expired. This objection was not considered by the House.

On December 3,<sup>39</sup> the report was considered in Committee of the Whole House. The articles having been read, a question arose as to procedure, especially as to amendment; and the Chairman<sup>40</sup> gave it as his opinion that the proper method would be to take up the report by articles. This was done accordingly.

The first article being read, a motion was made to strike it out, whereupon the Chairman, with the approval of the committee so far as expressed, decided that, while the motion to strike out the first section of a bill would be in order, yet it seemed to him that in considering independent articles it would be preferable to take the sense of the Committee of the Whole on each article on a motion to concur with the action of the select committee which had reported the articles. This method was thereupon adopted.

Thereupon the Committee of the Whole House went through the report article by article, amending, and where an article had several paragraphs, reading by paragraphs for amendment. And on each article, after an opportunity for amendment and after reading of testimony relating to it on demand of a Member, the question was put on concurring.<sup>41</sup> The committee decided, ayes 40, noes 50, that the testimony should not be read as a whole on each article, but only as called for by Members.

When the last article was read, Mr. James Mott, of New Jersey, moved<sup>42</sup> to strike out the words, declaring that the House "saved to itself the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase," and further, that part which saved to the House "the right of replying to any such articles of impeachment or accusation which shall be exhibited to them." It seemed to him unfair that the House should reserve such a right to themselves. If there was anything more with which he ought to be charged, it ought to be now brought forward, and the accused should be informed at once how far they meant to go, in order to enable him the better to make his defense.

Mr. Randolph argued that these reservations had been made in the articles of the Blount and Pickering impeachments, and he did not wish to see the liberties of the people or the rights of the House abridged. Mr. Mott admitted the practice, which had been followed in his own State.

Mr. Mott's motion was disagreed to.

The last article having been concurred in, the Committee of the Whole House rose and reported the articles with amendments.

On December 4,<sup>33</sup> the articles were considered in the House, the Journal containing them in full as reported originally by the select committee. Each article was considered by itself, and after opportunity to amend the question was taken "that the House do agree" to the article. On the last article a division was demanded, as it contained both a charge against Judge Chase and the protestation whereby the House reserved to themselves the "liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles." The first portion of the article was agreed to, and then the question being taken on the second portion, it was agreed to, yeas 78, nays 32. The other votes on agreeing to the several articles had ranged as follows: yeas 70 to 84, nays 34 to 45. All amendments made in Committee of the Whole had been disagreed to, and no new ones were agreed to by the House.

The question having been taken on each article, the House then voted affirmatively on the question—

That the House do concur with the select committee in their agreement to the said articles of impeachment, as originally proposed, and hereinbefore recited.

2345. Chase's impeachment continued.

The House appointed seven managers, by ballot, for the trial of Mr. Justice Chase.

The managers chosen for the trial of Mr. Justice Chase had each voted for a portion, at least, of the articles.

The House overruled the Speaker and decided that a manager of an impeachment should be elected by a majority and not by a plurality.

Forms of resolutions directing the managers to exhibit in the Senate the articles of impeachment against Mr. Justice Chase.

In the Chase impeachment the message notifying the Senate that articles would be exhibited does not appear to have included the names of the managers.

The Senate notified the House of the day and hour when it would receive the managers to exhibit the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase.

The Senate as a court adopted a rule prescribing the ceremonies at the presentation of articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase.

On December 5,<sup>44</sup> it was—

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot, to conduct the impeachment exhibited against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Thereupon the following were elected: Messrs. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Caesar A. Rodney, of Delaware; Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; Peter Early, of Georgia; John Boyle, of Kentucky; Roger Nelson, of Maryland, and George W. Campbell, of Tennessee.

Each of these managers had voted for a portion or all of the articles of impeachment.

On the first ballot the six first Members on the list had each a majority of the ballots; but Mr. Campbell had only a plurality.

A question arising, the Speaker,<sup>46</sup> after referring to the rule of the House, "In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election," held that Mr. Campbell was duly chosen.

A question arose, and after reference to precedents, which did not seem conclusive, Mr. Randolph appealed from the decision. And the question being taken, the decision of the Speaker was overruled, ayes 25, noes 50. Thereupon a second ballot was taken, at which Mr. Campbell received a majority.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Nicholson, it was—

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Samuel Chase; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

On December 6<sup>46</sup> in the Senate the Clerk of the House delivered the message as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Samuel Chase.

On December 7<sup>47</sup> Mr. William B. Giles, of Virginia, from a committee appointed on November 30 "to prepare and report proper rules of proceeding to be observed by the Senate in cases of impeachment," made a report, which was read. With Mr. Giles on this committee were Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia, John Breckenridge, of Kentucky, David Stone, of North Carolina, and Israel Smith, of Vermont.

Also on December 7<sup>48</sup> it was—

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 1 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be presented by the managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

Immediately thereafter, in the high court of impeachment,<sup>49</sup> it was—

Resolved, That when the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States." After which the articles shall be exhibited; and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.<sup>50</sup>

2346. Chase's impeachment continued.

The articles of impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase.

Ceremonies at the presentation of the articles before the high court of impeachment in the Chase case.

In presenting to the court the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase, the chairman of the managers read them and then delivered them at the table.

The managers having carried to the Senate the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase, reported verbally to the House.

On the same day the message from the Senate announcing its readiness to receive the articles of impeachment was received in the House<sup>51</sup> and the managers repaired at 1 o'clock to the Senate Chamber. They were admitted,<sup>52</sup> and Mr. Randolph, the chairman, announced that they were—the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit certain articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The managers were requested by the President to take seats assigned them within the bar, and the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation in the words following:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes!

All persons are commanded to keep silence, etc. [In words as prescribed by the resolution.]

After the proclamation the managers rose, and Mr. Randolph, their chairman, read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ART. 1. That unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them, "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defense of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defense;

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defense of their client;

3. In debarring the prisoner from his constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give.

In consequence of which irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right, secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard by counsel, in his defense, to the disgrace of the character of the American bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the right of juries, on which ultimately rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

ART. 2. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, 1800, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libelous in the indictment, were extracted: and the said Basset was accordingly sworn, and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted.

ART. 3. That with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretense that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

ART. 4. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance, viz:

1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above-named John Taylor, the witness.

2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term.

3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions toward the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did at the same time manifestly tend.

4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment.

5. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

ART. 5. And whereas it is provided by the act of Congress passed on the 24th day of September, 1786, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that for any crime or offense against the United States the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and whereas it is provided by the laws of Virginia that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offense not capital the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending to appear and answer such presentment at the next court; yet the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a caus against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offense not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 6. And whereas it is provided by the thirty-fourth section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply; and whereas by the laws of Virginia it is provided that in cases not capital the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made, yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 7. That at a circuit court of the United States for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle, in the month of June, 1800, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge and stoop to the level of an informer by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared through their foreman that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood "that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle County, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order, that the name of this printer was"—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter," or words to that effect; and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the district attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded (and which were understood to be those published under the title of "Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser"), and, by a strict examination of them, to find some passage which might furnish the groundwork of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper, thereby degrading his high judicial functions and tending to impair the public confidence in and respect for the tribunals of justice so essential to the general welfare.

ART. 8. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore in the month of May, 1803, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury and of the good people of Maryland against their State government and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase then and there, under pretense of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury and of the good people of Maryland against the Government of the United States by delivering opinions which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extrajudicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as are agreeable to law and justice.

After the reading of the articles<sup>52</sup> the President notified the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers delivered the articles of impeachment at the table and withdrew.

Thereupon the high court of impeachments adjourned.

The managers having returned to the House, Mr. Randolph, their chairman, reported<sup>53</sup> that they did this day carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 4th instant, and that the said managers were informed by the Senate that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.

2349. Chase's impeachment continued.

Form of return made and oath taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms in the Chase impeachment.

Mr. Justice Chase appeared to answer the articles of impeachment "in his own proper person."

On his appearance to answer articles of impeachment Mr. Justice Chase was furnished with a chair.

Mr. Justice Chase, in appearing, was permitted by the Vice-President, without objection of the Senate, to read a paper giving reasons for delaying his answer.

Mr. Justice Chase, in asking time to prepare his answer to the articles, was called to order by the Vice-President for expressions used.

It was decided that members of the court should be sworn before considering respondent's motion for time to answer in the Chase case.

Mr. Justice Chase's application for a time to answer was accompanied by a sworn statement of reasons.

The Senate having fixed the day for Mr. Justice Chase to file his answer, informed the House that the trial would proceed on that day.

Neither the managers nor the House attended on the appearance of Mr. Justice Chase in answer to the summons.

On January 2, 1805,<sup>59</sup> the high court of impeachment having been opened by proclamation, the return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms was read, as follows:

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons to me directed, did proceed to the residence of the within-named Samuel Chase, on the 12th day of December, 1804, and did then and there leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, together with a true copy of the articles of impeachment annexed, with him, the said Samuel Chase.

JAMES MATHERS.

<sup>58</sup> Senate impeachment, Journal, pp. 513, 514.

After which the Secretary administered to him the oath, as follows :

You, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by you upon the process issued on the 10th day of December last, by the Senate of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, is truly made, and that you have performed said services as therein described. So help you God.

Samuel Chase was then solemnly called,<sup>60</sup> who appeared "in his own proper person."

The President of the Senate<sup>61</sup> informed him that the Senate was ready to receive any answer that he had to make.<sup>62</sup>

Mr. Chase requested the indulgence of a chair, which was immediately furnished. The report of the trial intimates that in accordance with the parliamentary practice of England no chair was assigned to him previously to his appearance, but that an informal intimation was made to him that, on his request, it would be furnished.

After being seated for a short time Judge Chase rose and commenced reading from a paper which he held in his hand.

After reading far enough to show that the paper was proceeding in general denial of the charges, the President reminded him that this was the day appointed to receive any answer he might make to the articles of impeachment. Thereupon Judge Chase said it was his purpose to request the allowance of further time to put in his answer.

The reading was then proceeding, when the President interrupted and asked if the paper was intended as his answer. If so, it would be put on file. If it was a prelude to a motion he meant to make praying to be allowed further time for putting in his answer, he would confine himself strictly to what had relation to that object.

Judge Chase said it was not his answer that he was reading, but that he was assigning reasons why he could not now answer, in order to show that he was entitled to further time to prepare and put in his answer.

The President replied :

You, who are so conversant in the practice of courts of law, know very well that a motion for time must not be founded on mere suggestions, but must be founded on some facts to prove the propriety of the motion.

Judge Chase said he meant to show the impracticability of his answering at this time, from the articles themselves, and it was for that purpose that he made an allusion to them.

The President said that with the caution he had given he might proceed, provided no objection were made by any gentleman of the Senate.

Judge Chase proceeded in his address.

Later in the reading the following paragraph occurred :

And acrimonious as are the terms in which many of the accusations are conceived; harsh and opprobrious as are the epithets wherewith it has been thought proper to assail my name and character, by those who were "puling in their nurses' arms" whilst I was contributing my utmost aid to lay the groundwork of American liberty, I yet thank my accusers, whose functions as members of the Government of my country I highly respect, for having at length put their charges into a definitive form, susceptible of refutation; and for having thereby afforded me an opportunity of vindicating my innocence, in the face of this honorable court, of my country, and of the world.

On using the expressions marked in italics,

The President interrupted Judge Chase and said that observations of censure or recrimination were not admissible; it would be very improper for him to listen to observations on the statements of the House of Representatives before an answer was filed.

Judge Chase said he had very few words more to add, which would conclude what he had to say at the present time.

With the permission of the President he proceeded.

The address being concluded, the President requested him to reduce to writing any motion which he wished to make.

Thereupon Judge Chase submitted the following:

I solicit this honorable court to allow me until the first day of the next session to put in my answer and prepare for my trial.

The President informed Mr. Chase that the court would take time to consider the motion.

During these proceedings incident to the return on the summons and the appearance of Judge Chase, neither the House of Representatives nor its managers were present.

After Judge Chase had submitted his motion the Senate withdrew to a private apartment, where debate arose as to whether or not the Senators should take the oath required by the Constitution before they took into consideration the motion of Judge Chase; and at the conclusion of the debate it was

Resolved, That on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow, before they proceed to any business on the articles of impeachment before them, and before the decision of any question, the oath prescribed by the rules shall be administered to the President and Members of the Senate.

On January 3<sup>63</sup> the high court of impeachments was duly opened with proclamation, and the oath was administered to the President and Senators in the manner prescribed by the rule.

Thereupon the President stated that he had received a letter from the defendant, inclosing an affidavit that further time was necessary for him to prepare for trial; which affidavit<sup>64</sup> was read, as follows:

City of Washington, ss:

Samuel Chase made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that it is not in his power to obtain information respecting the facts alleged in the articles of impeachment to have taken place in the city of Philadelphia in the trial of John Fries; or of the facts alleged to have taken place in the city of Richmond in the trial of James T. Callender, in time to prepare and put in his answer, and to proceed to trial, with any probability that the same could be finished on or before the 5th day of March next. And, further, that it is not in his power to procure information of the names of the witnesses, whom he thinks it may be proper and necessary for him to summon, in time to obtain their attendance, if his answer could be prepared in time sufficient for the finishing of the said trial, before the said 5th day of March next; and the said Samuel Chase further made oath that he believes it will not be in his power to obtain the advice of counsel, to prepare his answer, and to give him their assistance on the trial, which he thinks necessary, if the said trial should take place during the present session of Congress; and that he verily believes, if he had at this time full information of facts, and of the witnesses proper for him to summon, and if he had also the assistance of counsel, that he could not prepare the answer he thinks he ought to put in, and be ready for his trial, within the space of four or five weeks from this time. And, further, this his application to the honorable the Senate, for time to obtain the information of facts, in order to prepare his answer, and for time to procure the attendance of necessary witnesses, and to prepare for his defense in the trial, and to obtain the advice and assistance of counsel, is not made for the purpose of delay, but only for the purpose of obtaining a full hearing of the articles of impeachment against him in their real merits.

SAMUEL HAMILTON.

Whereupon the following motion was made by Mr. Stephen B. Bradley, of Vermont:

Ordered, That Samuel Chase file his answer, with the Secretary of the Senate, to the several articles of impeachment exhibited against him, by the House of Representatives, on or before the — day —.

A motion was made by Mr. William B. Giles, of Virginia, to amend the motion and to strike out all that follows the word "Ordered," and insert "That — next shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase.

The motion to strike out was agreed to, yeas 20, nays 10. And then the motion to insert was also agreed to, yeas 22, nays 8.

The motion to fill the blank with the words "first Monday of December next" was disagreed to, yeas 12, nays 18. Then a motion to insert "the fourth day of February next" was agreed to, yeas 22, nays 8. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 9.

On January 28 <sup>67</sup> the House elected by ballot Mr. Christopher Clark, of Virginia, to succeed Mr. Nelson, and informed the Senate thereof by message, delivered as follows by the Clerk :

Mr. President, I am directed to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives have elected Mr. Clark a manager to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the place of Mr. Nelson, who hath been excused that service.

Mr. Clark had voted in favor of all the articles of impeachment save one, which he had voted against.

Attendance of the House in Committee of the Whole at the ceremonies of the beginning of Chase's trial.

Description of the arrangement of the Senate chamber for the Chase trial.

Mr. Justice Chase introduced his counsel at the time he gave in his answer.

The Senate granted the request of Mr. Justice Chase for permission to read his answer by himself and counsel.

The answer of Mr. Justice Chase to the articles of impeachment.

The answer of the respondent in the Chase trial does not appear in the journal of the court.

On request of the managers the Senate directed its Secretary to carry to the House an attested copy of Mr. Justice Chase's answer.

The answer of Mr. Justice Chase being received in the House was referred to the managers.

Form of proceedings when the House attends an impeachment trial as Committee of the Whole.

On the same day, <sup>69</sup> the high court of impeachments was duly opened with proclamation, and it was then—

Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are in their public Chamber and are ready to proceed on the trial of Samuel Chase; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

This message being received in the House, <sup>70</sup> that body resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. Joseph B. Varnum, of Massachusetts, as Chairman, and proceeded to the Senate Chamber with the managers. Soon after they entered the Chamber and took their seats.

The Senate Chamber was fitted up in a style of appropriate elegance. Benches covered with crimson, on each side, and in a line with the chair of the President, were assigned to the Members of the Senate. On the right and in front of the chair, a box was assigned to the managers, and on the left a similar box to Mr. Chase and his counsel, and chairs allotted to such friends as he might introduce. The residue of the floor was occupied with chairs for the accommodation of the Members of the House of Representatives, and with boxes for the reception of the foreign ministers, and civil and military officers of the United States. On the right and left of the Chair, at the termination of the benches of the members of the court, boxes were assigned to stenographers. The permanent gallery was allotted to the indiscriminate admission of spectators. Below this gallery and above the floor of the House a new gallery was raised and fitted up with peculiar elegance, intended primarily for the exclusive accommodation of ladies. But this feature of the arrangement, made by the Vice-President, was at an early period of the trial abandoned, it having been found impracticable. At the termination of this gallery, on each side, boxes were specially assigned to ladies attached to the families of public personages. The preservation of order was devolved on the marshal of the District of Columbia, who was assisted by a number of deputies.<sup>71</sup>

Samuel Chase being called to make answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, appeared and requested that Robert G. Harper, Luther Martin, Philip B. Key, and Joseph Hopkinson, esqs., might be admitted and considered as counsel for him, the said Samuel Chase, and thereupon submitted a motion, which was read at the table as follows:

Samuel Chase moves for permission to read his answer, by himself and his counsel, at the bar of the honorable court.
