40TH CONGRESS, 1st Session. } HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. { REP. COM. No. 7.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

NOVEMBER 25, 1867.—Ordered that the report, with the testimony, be printed, (the report of the majority and the views of the minorities be printed together,) and the further consideration postponed until Wednesday, the 4th day of December next.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, stated by him to have been prepared by Mr. Williams, of Pennsylvania, with the exception of the specifications at the conclusion thereof:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the 7th of March last, authorizing them "to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the present duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow or corrupt the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House," respectfully report:

That in the performance of the important task assigned to them, they have spared no pains to make their investigations as complete as possible, not only in the exploration of the public archives, but in following every indication that seemed to promise any additional light upon the great subjects of inquiry; and they submit herewith the result of that portion of their labors in the voluminous exhibit that accompanies this report.

In order, however, to direct the attention of the House to such portions of the somewhat heterogeneous mass of testimony which they have been compelled to present without the order or arrangement that might have facilitated its examination, as are regarded by them as most material to the issue, they will now proceed to state as briefly as possible the leading facts which they suppose the inquiry to have developed beyond dispute, along with their own conclusions therefrom, and the reasons by which they have been influenced in reaching them. In so doing they must be allowed the indulgence which a comprehensive scrutiny, running over a two years' administration of the affairs of a great government, through an unexampled crisis of the State, and involving the very highest matters that can engage the attention of a free people, would seem to necessitate, and must, at all events, excuse.

The charges made, and to which the investigations of the committee have been especially directed, are usurpation of power, and violation of law, in the corrupt abuse of the appointing, pardoning, and veto powers; in the corrupt interference in elections, and generally in the commission of acts amounting to high crimes and misdemeanors under the Constitution; and upon this recital they were charged with the more general duty of inquiring into the official conduct of the President of the United States, and of reporting "whether he had been guilty of any acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the government of the United States, or which, in contemplation of the Constitution, would constitute a high crime or misdemeanor, requiring the interposition of the constitutional power of the House."

It will be observed, then, that the great salient point of accusation, standing out in the foreground, and challenging the attention of the country, is usurpation of power, which involves, of course, a violation of law. And here it may be remarked that perhaps every great abuse, every flagrant departure from the well-settled principles of the government, which has been brought home to its present administration, whether discovering itself in special infractions of its statutes, or in the profligate use of the high powers conferred by the Constitution on the President, or revealing itself more manifestly in the systematic attempt to seize upon its sovereignty, and disparage and supersede the great council to which that sovereignty has been intrusted, is referrible to the one great overshadowing purpose of reconstructing the shattered governments of the rebel States in accordance with his own will, in the interests of the great criminals who carried them into the rebellion, and in such a way as to deprive the people of the loyal States of all chances of indemnity for the past or security for the future, by pardoning their offences, restoring their lands, and hurrying them back—their hearts unrepentant, and their hands yet red with the blood of our people—into a condition where they could once more embarrass and defy, if not absolutely rule the government which they had vainly endeavored to destroy. It is around this point, and as auxiliary to this great central idea, that all the special acts of mal-administration we have witnessed, will be found to gravitate and revolve, and it is to this point, therefore, as the great master-key which unlocks and interprets all of them, that the attention of the House will be first directed.

It is a fact of history that the obstinate and protracted struggle between the executive and legislative departments of this government, arising out of the claim of more than kingly powers on the one hand, and as stoutly maintained by the assertion of the just rights of sovereignty lodged with it by the people, on the other, which has convulsed this nation for the last two years, and presented a spectacle that has no example here, and none in England since the era of the Stuarts, began with the advent of the present Chief Magistrate. The catastrophe which lifted him to his place, while it smote the heart of the nation with grief and horror, was the last expiring armed effort of the insurrection. The capital of the rebel government had fallen. Its chiefs were fugitives. Its flag was in the dust. The strife of arms had ceased. The hosts that had been gathered for the overthrow of this nation had either melted away in defeat and disaster, or passed under the conquering sword of the republic. The extraordinary mission of the Executive was fulfilled. Although, as the commander-in-chief, he might possibly treat with a belligerent in arms, the cessation of the war in the overthrow of the rebellion, and the unconditional surrender of its armies, had determined that power. To hold the conquered territory within our military grasp until the sovereign power of the nation residing in its representatives—the same which had girt the sword upon the thigh of its Executive, and placed the resources of the country in men and money at his command—should be ready to declare its will in relation to the rebels it had conquered, was all that remained for him to do. But the duties of the true sovereign were not yet at an end. An extent of territory of almost continental dimensions, desolated by war, but still swarming with millions of people, was at our feet, awaiting the sentence which it had deserved. The local governments, swept away, as they had been, in the opinion of the President himself, by the whirlwind of the rebellion, were in ruins. Whole communities were in anarchy; the courts outlawed; the social tie dissolved; a system of pretended laws existing, in deadly conflict with the law of the conqueror; a people subdued but sullen and full of hate, and hostile as ever, to the power that had overthrown them; a loyal element asking for protection; a new and anomalous relation without a parallel in history, about which the wisest of statesmen might well hesitate and differ, superinduced by the fratricidal strife that had ruptured the original ties, and placed its objects in the condition of public enemies; a large army to be disbanded, and such indulgence extended, such punishments inflicted, and such securities demanded for the future, as the interests of peace and justice might require. Never in the history of this or any other state have questions more numerous and vital, more delicate or difficult, requiring graver deliberation, or involving the exercise o higher governmental powers, presented themselves for the consideration of a people; and never was a Congress convoked in a more serious crisis of a state. The duties and responsibilities of the men who formed and organized the Union of these States, and of those who assembled here in 1861 to consult upon and provide the means for suppressing this great rebellion, were as nothing in the comparison, and demanded certainly no higher sagacity, and no broader wisdom, than the task of bringing back the dismembered States, and re-fusing these jarring and discordant elements into one harmonious whole. For this great work, the supreme Executive of the nation, even though he had been endowed by nature and education with the very highest of organizing faculties, was obviously unfitted by the very nature of his office. If Mr. Lincoln had survived, it is not to be doubted, from his habitual deference to the public will, that, although a citizen of a loyal State and enjoying the public confidence in the highest possible degree, he would have felt it to be his duty to convoke the representatives of the people, to lay down his sword in their presence, and to refer it to their enlightened and patriotic judgment to decide what was to be done with the territories and people that had been again brought under the authority of the government by our arms. The bloody hand of treason unfortunately hurried him away in the very hour of the nation's triumph. But if there were reasons which would have made this duty an imperative one with him, how powerfully were they re-enforced by the double effect of the tragedy that not only deprived the nation of its trusted head, but cast the reins of government upon a successor. The new President was himself in the doubtful and delicate position of a citizen of one of the revolting States, which were to be summoned for judgment before the bar of the American people. It was, perhaps, but natural that he should sympathize with the communities from which he had mainly differed only on prudential reasons, or, in other words, as to the wisdom of the revolt at that particular juncture of affairs. If other arguments had not sufficed to convince him of the necessity of referring all these great questions to the only tribunal on earth that had the power to decide them, it ought to have been sufficient that he owed alike his honors and his accidental powers, to the generous confidence of the loyal States, whose representative it was. But this was not the idea of Mr. Johnson. He feared, apparently, the people of the loyal States. He expected, of course, that they would insist, as they had a right to do, upon such conditions as would secure to them, if not indemnity for the past, at least the amplest securities for the future. Instead, therefore, of convoking the Congress of the United States to deliberate upon the condition of the country, he seems to have made up his mind to undertake that mighty task himself, to forestall the judgment and the wishes of the loyal people, and to neutralize effectually their power to undo his work, by bringing in the rebel States themselves to participate in the deliberations upon any and all questions which might be left for settlement.

To effect this object he issues his imperial proclamations, beginning with that of the 29th of May, in virtue, as he says, of his double authority as President of the United States, and commander-in-chief of its armies, declaring the governments of those States to have perished; creating, under the denomination of provisional governors, civil offices unknown to the law; appointing to those offices men who were notoriously disqualified by reason of their participation in the rebellion from holding any office under this government, and yet allowed to hold the same, and exercise the duties thereof, at salaries fixed by himself, and paid out of the contingent fund of the War Department, in clear violation of the acts of July 2, 1862, and 9th February, 1863.

Declaring, moreover, at the same time, that the governments of these States had been destroyed, he assumes it to be his individual right, as being himself the state—or rather the "United States"—to execute the guarantee of the Constitution by providing them with new ones, and accordingly directs his pretended governors to order conventions of such of the people as it was his pleasure to indicate, to make constitutions for them, on such terms and with such provisions as were agreeable to himself.

Unprovided, however, of course, in the absence of Congress, with the necessary resources to meet the expenses of these organizations, he not only directs the payment of a portion of them out of the contingent fund of the War Department, but with a boldness unequalled even by Charles I, when he, too, undertook to reign without a Parliament, provides for a deficit, by authorizing the seizure of property and the appropriation of moneys belonging to the government, and directing his governors to levy taxes for the same purpose from the subject people.

He maintains these governors in authority until he has coerced the rebel States into absolute submission to the terms imposed by him, and exercises his pardoning power, under their direction, in aid of this great work, to qualify the rebel officers elect, whose title to popular favor was known to rest almost exclusively on the services rendered by them in the armies of the confederacy, and their known hostility to the government of the Union.

In all this he proceeds without interruption, in the interregnum of the law-making power, exerting the highest functions of sovereignty, and dealing with the affairs of this nation as though he were its absolute master, without even vouchsafing a thought, according to the testimony of his cabinet ministers, as to the rights or the existence of the paramount department of this government; without a voice to remonstrate or an arm to stay him; and with a press and people lulled into security by occasional outgivings, official as well as otherwise, that all this imperial work was merely provisional or temporary, and subject, of course, to the ultimate jurisdiction of Congress in the premises.

Having thus accomplished all that it was possible for him to do, by giving to these States a colorable claim to seats, and procuring the election of candidates who were expected to assert it, when he is at last compelled once more to meet the high council of the nation, to which he is made responsible under the Constitution, he rends away the veil which had so thinly disguised his purposes, and proclaims to the representatives of the people that these States are already fully organized, restored to all their antecedent rights, and now only waiting to be admitted, with no power in Congress, as a legislative body, to deliberate or refuse, and no jurisdiction but the right of each house for itself to determine upon the election returns and other formalities touching the individual case of the applicant, and nothing more. If there had been a doubt as to the animus of the President in seizing into his hands the whole sovereignty of the nation, proceeding without a Congress, and trampling remorselessly under foot every statutory enactment and every constitutional limitation that stood in his way, that doubt was now resolved. The Congress of the United States, true to its high mission, and with a courage and constancy that were worthy of the best traditions of the British Commons, at once refused to register the imperious edict of the Executive, and asserted its privilege of revising his whole action in the premises, and settling for itself, as the representative of the American people, the terms upon which the rebellious States should be allowed to re-enter the family circle of the Union. The result was an immediate and indecent outburst of the wrath of the Executive, in torrents of fierce and fiery denunciation, in which the two houses were impeached as traitors in actual rebellion against the men whom they had conquered; their commissions disputed; their rights, authority, and privileges denied; their members individually arraigned and singled out for public obloquy; nay, even charged with the bloodiest designs upon the life of their detractor; and the determination subsequently boldly avowed to traverse their counsels, and overrule their will, by the employment of the patronage of his office, and the exertion of the veto, and every other power placed by the Constitution in his hands; and all this for no other reason than because they had exercised their undoubted prerogative of resisting, in the name of the loyal States and people, a plan of reconstruction prearranged by himself, and intended to be imposed on the country against the will of the men who had just scattered in flight the battalions of the traitor confederacy, and in the interest of the very men who had so causelessly rebelled against the benign rule of this great nation.

Concurrent, however, with this kingly process of reorganization, pursued with so much earnestness and pertinacity during the long and unhappy interregnum of the legislative power, were other measures of state, of less publicity, perhaps, but equally arbitrary and lawless in themselves, which, as merely subordinate and auxiliary to the leading idea, were but a part of the same great conspiracy against the people of the loyal States, although of such a nature in themselves as not to challenge the public observation, because it was not essential that they should be disclosed before the admission of the southern members. Chief amongst these were the surrender and transfer to the rebels, only partially subdued, of untold millions of property captured or confiscated by the government, or belonging to it in its own right by purchase or in virtue of its own expenditures.

It is a fact well known to the House and country that the rebel States were permeated by a system of railroads embracing many thousand miles, and furnished with all the costly apparatus required for their successful operation. These roads were generally constructed and owned by private corporations, aided, in some cases, by the States in which they were located, either by direct loans of their public bonds, or by a guarantee of the securities of the companies. Some of them, however, were built by the States themselves, and one, at least—the Piedmont railroad, between Greenborough and Danville—by the rebel government. By that government, however, they were all employed and used, with the undoubted consent of their directors and stockholders; and it is not to be denied that they constituted one of its most powerful and effective agents in carrying on the war against the Union. As an instrument of aggression they became, of course, by the law of nations, a legitimate subject of capture; and this principle was not only expressly affirmed, but extended so as to embrace all property so used, by the act of Congress of August 6, 1861. Many of them were actually captured from the enemy by our armies during the progress of the war, repaired and reconstructed at great expense, placed under military control, and used to the extent for which they were required for the convenience of the government. One of them—the Nashville and Northwestern, in the State of Tennessee—which had been previously abandoned by the company in an unfinished condition, was completed by the War Department, on the urgent importunity of Andrew Johnson, then military governor of that State, and under his special supervision, at an expense to the government of nearly two millions of dollars. In all, or nearly all the cases of actual capture, the roads had been dismantled and broken up, as far as practicable, and their rolling-stock run off into remoter States. In the case of the Nashville and Chattanooga—of which more hereafter—an expenditure of upwards of four millions of dollars was incurred in the article of repairs, while its rolling-stock had been carried South, where it earned in rebel employment twelve hundred bales of cotton, which the company has been allowed by Mr. Johnson to bring to market, and ship beyond the seas, for its own interest, while it is still allowed to say that the parties who claimed, and realized the proceeds, were not consenting to the use. All these roads, which were required for military purposes, had of course to be supplied with the necessary running equipments, at an enormous outlay.

Here then was an immense property, amounting in value, perhaps, to hundreds of millions of dollars, within the ownership or control of the government, and upon the disposition of which, there was no tribunal except the Congress of the United States that was competent to pass. It had been already settled by high authority, that, under the Constitution, which gives to Congress "the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," there was no power in any of the executive departments of this government to dispose of a dollar's worth of the public property without the special authority of an act of Congress; (1 Paine's C. C. R., 646,) and the very principle that the whole question of the disposition of the captured railroads and their running stock, after the termination of the war, would belong exclusively to the legislation of the country, had been already distinctly recognized and affirmed in the report of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War, of the date of August 9, 1864, in answer to an application for an account, and settlement, and restoration of the Nashville and Northwestern, and Nashville and Chattanooga roads, made by a certain Michael Burns, the president of both companies—a known sympathizer with the rebellion, but an intimate and confidential friend of Andrew Johnson, the then military governor—re-enforced by a special letter of recommendation from the latter to Mr. Lincoln, indorsing him as "a gentleman of high standing, an esteemed friend, and a worthy gentleman," to whose active co-operation the government was largely indebted in the construction of one of these roads. If it was important, as claimed by the administration, either to reduce the expenses of the government, or to facilitate the commerce of the rebel States, that it should get rid of this burdensome property, it was an easy matter to have followed the obvious course, by convoking Congress in order to obtain their advice and authority in the premises; and the very fact that it was important to dispose of that property as early as practicable, is a confession of the necessity for such an assemblage. And yet, strange as it may seem, the idea of the necessity of resorting to the aid of the sovereign legislative power of the nation, where it was clear that scarcely a single step could be legally taken without it, does not seem to have been considered worthy even of a passing thought from the President. The captured railroads were surrendered to their lately rebel proprietors, along with all the rolling stock which they could identify as originally their own, and even the portion of the Nashville and Northwestern road which was built by the government itself, without any consideration whatever; while the cars and machinery, supplied by the government at its own expense, were turned over to the same parties without sale, on an appraisement made by officers of the government selected for that purpose, at a long credit, and without any security whatever. But this is not all. Where the States themselves were proprietors, the transfer and surrender were made to the provisional governments set up by the President, and claimed by him to be thoroughly reinstated by his acts.

To show, however, not only the process, but the apparent influences under which this usurpation was effected, the undersigned will refer to the history of these gigantic operations, which, although running into the next session of Congress, were not supposed by the President to be of sufficient importance for its consideration, as that history stands revealed upon the public records, and the testimony of witnesses.

On the 8th of May, 1865, and, of course, immediately upon the surrender of the rebel armies in Virginia, a letter was written to the Secretary of War by Governor Peirpoint, suggesting that the government should put the railroads in that

State in running order. This letter was referred to General Grant, who declined to advise repairs except where they might be necessary to keep up communications with the garrisons, but suggested at the same time that facilities should be allowed to the loyal stockholders for repairing and running their roads at the earliest day, with such restrictions, however, as would prevent disloyal stockholders from receiving any of the profits.

On the 19th of the same month the Quartermaster General, in answer to an application made for the surrender of the Orange and Alexandria railroad, and in apparent forgetfulness of the opinion expressed by himself during the administration of Mr. Lincoln, in affirmance of the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress in the premises, submits the outlines of a general plan for the disposition of the captured railroads. Its leading features were, that the roads should be turned over as fast as they could be dispensed with by the military authorities, to the parties applying, who might seem to have the best claim, and be able to operate them; that no charge should be made for expense of material or operation; that all material used in construction and repairs, and all damaged material left along the roads, should be considered a part of, and be surrendered with them; that no payment or credit should be allowed for occupation or use during the military necessity that compelled the United States to take possession of them, by capture from the public enemy, their recovery and repairs being regarded as a full equivalent for the use; that all moveable property, including rolling stock belonging to the government, should be sold at auction, after full public notice, to the highest bidder; that all rolling stock and material, the property before the war of railroads, and captured by the forces of the United States, should be placed at the disposal of the roads that originally owned it; that roads not operated by the quartermasters' department should be left in possession of the parties thus holding them, subject only to the removal of any agent who had not taken the oath of allegiance; that when the superintendents declined to take the oath, a receiver should be appointed to administer its affairs and account to the board that might be recognized as the legal and loyal one; and that where the States were bondholders, the roads should be surrendered to their boards of public works, and where no such board, and the States unwilling to take charge of them, a receiver should be appointed by the Treasury Department to take charge of them as abandoned property.

The noticeable features of this plan are, that it treats the subject as entirely in the control of the Executive; that it proposes to donate to the companies all material used and damaged, as a part of their roads, and to surrender without equivalent the rolling stock, an instrument of war captured from the enemy, and belonging unquestionably to the United States; that it supposes an equitable liability for the use of a road captured from the public enemy, which could be fairly met only by a claim for salvage and repairs; that it proposes a public sale by auction of the government stock proper; that it recognizes the rebel State governments as legitimate, and surrenders property to them; and that it concedes the importance of an oath of allegiance, and provides for the removal of every administrator who has not taken it. This plan, although approved by the Secretary of War, was not eventually adopted in all its features.

Just at this crisis, however, reappears upon the stage a personage already named, who plays a part so painfully conspicuous in the extraordinary drama that was just opening, as to entitle him to the special notice of the historian of these transactions. That personage is Michael Burns—the same already spoken of—a man shown to have been notoriously disloyal while the star of the confederacy was in the ascendant at Nashville, who had acquired considerable wealth by the prosecution of a gainful trade in that city, and whose admitted sympathies for the rebellion had earned for him the distinguished compliment of having his name attached to a battery fitted out there for the wholesale murder of the defenders of the Union. How far he had contributed to its equipment does not appear. Being personally, however, a non-combatant, on account either of his years, or perhaps of his greater discretion than others, who surrendered themselves to their impulses, and in the enjoyment of an unusual measure of the confidence of Andrew Johnson, he seems to have found his account in remaining at Nashville, and following the retreating armies of the rebellion only with his prayers. He was wise in this, if he may be believed when he says that, although his sentiments were well known to the military governor, he was never asked to take the oath of allegiance, and could get a pass at any time to go through either line. Certain it is, that he did obtain a special letter of introduction, as already stated, to the late President, indorsing him as a gentleman of high standing, to whom the War Department was largely indebted for his cooperation, and on the faith of which he proceeded to Washington, and claimed the restoration of the roads of which he was president, which was refused, not only for the reason that the subject belonged exclusively to Congress, as already remarked, but because the government had expended more money on them than the stockholders themselves. Discouraged probably by these results, he seems to have abandoned the pursuit, until the change in the fortunes of his friend, the military governor, seems to have suggested a renewal of the application, under the auspices of Mr. Patterson, the son-in-law of the President.

On the 27th of June, Mr. Burns, upon assurances no doubt previously received by him, as stated by himself, addresses a letter to Brigadier General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the department of the Cumberland, wherein he informs that officer of an interview with the President of the United States, in which he had been told that the government was willing to turn over to the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company, their road, along with the tools necessary for keeping it in repair, and such rolling stock as would be required to operate it, to be held subject to the military authority, and taken at a valuation when a general settlement could be had with the government; and indicates the amount of stock which will be required for that purpose. This letter was referred to the Quartermaster General, who, in a report to the Secretary of War, dated on the 7th of July, declares the proposition inadmissible, and besides reiterating the views embodied in his plan of the 19th of May, and protesting against any other disposition of the rolling stock or machinery belonging to the government except on the terms of a sale at public auction, or an alternative hiring, concludes by saying, that the department is not competent to make any such final settlement, as is suggested by Mr. Burns, in view of the supposed application of the act of January 31, 1862, to railroads seized or captured within the rebel States.

On the 20th of July, Lieutenant Colonel Bliss reports to General Donaldson the decision of the Quartermaster General, to the effect that this, and most other railroads in that department, should be relinquished to their owners at the earliest possible day, but no rolling stock along with them except on terms of public sale or hire; that these views are concurred in by the Secretary of War; and that directions have been given to the general military manager (General McCallum) to transfer these roads in accordance therewith.

The plan of the 19th May, which had been approved by the Secretary, did not, however, square with the views of the President, who substituted another of his own, in an order of the 8th of August, directing the military commander of that department to turn over, as early as practicable, all roads in Tennessee and their continuations in the adjoining States, to the respective owners thereof, upon the conditions therein contained.

The material points of difference between this order and the previous one were:

First. That each and every company should be required to reorganize, and elect a board of directors whose loyalty should be established to the satisfaction of General Thomas.

Second. That an inventory should be taken of the rolling stock and other property, distinguishing between that originally belonging to the roads, and such as was furnished by, and belonging to the government.

Third. That the rolling stock of the government should be turned over to the companies at a fair valuation by competent and disinterested parties, on giving bonds satisfactory to the government therefor, payable in twelve months, or at such other time as might be agreed on.

Fourth. That statements should be made in triplicate of all expenditures by the government for repairs, with a full statement of receipts and transportation on government account.

Fifth. That all railroads in Tennessee should be required to pay all arrearages of interest due on bonds issued by that State prior to its secession, to aid in the construction thereof, before declaring dividends to stockholders.

The noticeable facts appearing here are, first, that, to save appearances and cover the donation to rebel stockholders, a loyal board of managers is prescribed as an ostensible condition precedent; second, that the arrangement looks not only to the surrender of the captured stock without equivalent, but to the private sale, at an appraised value, of such as had been furnished by the government, upon a long credit, and without any security; third, that it looks as obviously to the obligation of the government to account and settle with these rebel companies for the military use of their roads in suppressing the insurrection; and, fourth, that it provides with great care for all arrearages of interest on bonds issued by the State of Tennessee. The reason of this last precaution will appear hereafter.

Accompanying the order was a form of bond, prepared by General Thomas, pledging the individual liability of the directors, on the ground that the companies were disabled by pre-existing incumbrances from furnishing the necessary security upon their corporate property. This they refused to sign, and as it seemed a pre-determined point that the arrangement should not be balked in any way, another order was issued on the 14th of October, extending the benefit of the previous order of August 8 to all railroads within General Thomas's command, and authorizing the transfer of the rolling stock, upon the condition, if preferred to the latter order, and the security thereunder demanded by General Thomas, that the property should be distributed according to the actual need of the several roads, and that the companies should give their corporate bonds alone, in the form thereto annexed, for the payment of the appraised value, in equal monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. within two years; thereby substituting the said monthly instalments with interest, along with the reservation of a lien on the property sold, and the right to re-enter and repossess in case of a default, with a restriction on the power to sell or convey without the consent of the United States. Whether the law could be so altered by Executive mandate as to make such a security effective, is a question which the Committee do not feel called upon to examine, in a case where the whole transaction was manifestly against law, and no title passed to the purchaser.

On terms analogous, if not altogether identical with these, an immense amount of rolling stock and machinery belonging to the government, and costing it a sum that cannot now be ascertained, was transferred, together with the railroads themselves and the stock captured along with them, to the rebel proprietors, at the appraised or nominal value of $7,370,196 16, of which, after deducting the sums allowed in the way of credit for government transportation, the merest trifle has yet been paid, while the perishable security itself, always subject to casualty and destruction, if it ever amounted to anything, is depreciating from day to day. The testimony shows that many of these favored rebels have been absolutely indifferent to their obligations, while, on the plea of poverty, the larger portion have been indulged from time to time, for the admitted reason that the government was powerless to compel payment, while Congress and the people have been as completely ignored in regard to all these matters, as if they had no interest in the government at all; and the amount still due and unpaid, at the date of the last return from the department, was over six and a half millions of dollars, ($6,508,076 30.)

To illustrate, however, the way in which these things have been managed, the undersigned will now recur to the two leading cases of the Nashville and Northwestern, and Nashville and Chattanooga roads; the former built mainly, as already stated, by the government, at the urgent instance and under the personal supervision of Andrew Johnson, at a cost of nearly two millions, and the latter captured from the enemy, and repaired at an expense of over four millions of dollars.

These roads both passed, under the orders of August 8 and October 14, into the hands of their president, Michael Burns, for the use of the stockholders, who were mainly rebels, along with the rolling stock and machinery employed by the government thereon, at a valuation in the former case of $529,201 45, and in the latter of $1,556,551 73, for which the bonds of these companies respectively, were taken on the 30th of November, 1865, payable in monthly instalments with interest, as aforesaid, in two years from their date.

Before proceeding, however, with the history of the debts thus made, it will not be amiss to show how, and in what spirit, the above named orders were observed in the delivery.

It will be supposed, of course, that the preliminary condition of a loyal board of directors, at the least, even though the suggestion of General Grant as to the loyalty of the stockholders themselves, was treated with the coolest indifference, would be enforced at all events, if only for the purpose of saving appearances. The testimony shows, however, so far as the committee is in possession of the facts, that this provision was substantially disregarded, and that while observing the forms, the requisition of loyalty was treated as of no consequence whatever. A few examples will serve to indicate how little difference it made whether even the directors were faithful to the government or not.

In the case of the Memphis and Charleston railroad, the reference is to the President himself. A list of directors is presented to him, of whom a part only are designated as "undoubtedly loyal," and the question is asked, not whether they are loyal, but whether they are satisfactory. Ignoring, however, the condition of loyalty which he had prescribed himself, he answers by certifying that "from his personal knowledge of several of the within named gentlemen, and from representations made to him as to the others, he has no hesitancy in regarding them as a proper and perfectly acceptable board of directors."

In the case of the Tennessee and Alabama railroad, on a reference to the Hon. J. A. Fletcher, secretary of state, for his opinion as to the loyalty of fifteen directors named for that company, he makes the following answer:

"I. S. Claybrook, Frank Boardman, Samuel Henderson, M. G. L. Claiborne, and William Parke, are good and loyal men. Thomas F. Perkins, R. H. Bradley, John M. Gavock, John B. McEwen, William P. Cannon, and B. B. Toon, have all been more or less in sympathy with the rebellion, but are regarded as honorable men, and will probably discharge their duties loyally. C. W. Hance, Absalom Thompson, James Andrews, and A. C. Mayberry, are all liable to the objection of disloyalty. Thompson is the only one of them whose fidelity has been indorsed to me by acquaintance. Mayberry fled south in 1862, and only returned after Johnston's surrender. This is a bad sign, but it is said he ran to save his negroes. On the whole, the board is about as good as it can be made out of the material to be had. It is said every prominent loyalist among the stockholders is on the board, and the least objectionable of the rebel stockholders were chosen."

In the case of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, one of those whose history it is proposed to narrate specially, on account of Mr. Johnson's personal connection therewith, the names are submitted to General Thomas, along with the following communication, showing that they were selected under the advice of the President himself:

"NASHVILLE, August 18, 1865.

"GENERAL: I have the honor to submit for your approbation a list of directors elected on the 16th instant, at a stockholders' meeting held in this city, to conduct the affairs of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company for the ensuing twelve months, in accordance with instructions received from Washington, dated August 8. I would respectfully state that these persons elected as directors were elected in most instances, and as far as practicable, at the suggestion of the President of the United States.

* * * * * * *

"M. BURNS,

"President Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company."

Upon a reference of their names to the Hon. A. J. Fletcher, he answers as follows:

"M. BURNS, a man whose main object under all circumstances is to make money; loyal to the 'powers that be,' whether rebel or Union.

"WILLIAM T. BERRY, always loyal to the government.

"J. R. KNOWLES, a loyal and good man.

"JAMES WOOD, once got wrong, but is a quiet man, and is now considered safe.

"ANSON BROWN, once a very decided rebel; remained so till lately. It is said he 'submits.'

"A. NELSON, sympathized with the rebellion, but is a good man, and will do his duty.

"N. E. ALLOWAY, was once disloyal, but is a shrewd and sensible man, and will probably do his duty. He will have much influence in the board.

"JOHN M. HILL, once a rebel, but considered reliable at this time.

"LEVI WADE, once a rebel; present status unknown.

"JAMES H. GRANT, not known at the capital as a Union man.

"EDWARD COOPER, congressman elect.

"W. S. HUGGINS, unknown.

"JOHN T. HENDERSON, unknown.

"WILLIAM E. ELEASER, once an obstinate rebel, and was sent north for his refusal to take the oath of allegiance; present status not known.

"Most of these men are of high standing, and will probably do no disloyal act, but the weight of their sympathies will be with the 'down-trodden South.'"

From this answer it appears that but two of the fourteen men selected under the advice of the President could be indorsed as loyal, while the most that could be said of the board was that "they would probably do no disloyal act, but that the weight of their sympathies would be with the down-trodden South."

It was to these men, however, appointed at the instance and in the interest of the President, that this road, with the four millions of money expended on it by the government, and all the rolling stock it could identify as having been its own, before and during the war, was handed over, along with more than a million and a half of other government property.

And this brings us back to the special history of the debts incurred by the two Tennessee roads, which rejoiced alike in the administration of Michael Burns, and the distinguished favor of the President.

On the 11th of April, 1866, Mr. Burns, the president of both, having then paid nothing to the government, addresses to Captain R. S. Hamill, chief quartermaster of the military railroads in the division of the Tennessee, a note requesting that the time for the payment of the first instalment due on the bond of the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company, be extended to one year from the date of the bond, from which period the instalments to commence and continue to be paid monthly thereafter—no apology being vouchsafed for the default, and the only inducement for further indulgence suggested, being a promise to pay the accruing interest on the last day of each month, if possible; and on the following day the terms are accepted without objection.

No regard is paid, however, to this promise until the 16th of January following, (1867,) when Mr. Burns addresses another note to the Hon. J. S. Fowler, senator from Tennessee, who had been previously employed by him in his effort to obtain the possession of these roads, informing him that Major Hamill had notified him that he would take possession of the Northwestern road on the 20th of the (then) current month, for the non-payment of the debt due to the United States, which would be, as he says, a dead loss to the State and the United States; and asking him to have the order suspended until the road was finished, which would be in the month of June following. As in the former instance, no excuse is offered for the further default, but on the 19th of the same month, Major Hamill is ordered to suspend any action until further instructions, and to report immediately the state of the account, along with his reasons for taking possession of the road.

On the 20th of January, Major Hamill reports the state of the accounts, showing the bond of $529,201 45, of the date of November 30, 1865; a notification by himself to pay in April, 1866, and the extension granted at that time; the fact of additional purchases by Mr. Burns to the amount of $5,079 55; the refusal, or at least the "studied neglect" of that gentleman, after repeated solicitations, to execute an additional bond, and his second notification that he would retake possession of the property if the bond was not immediately executed, "as the only means whereby the studied indifference manifested by him regarding all matters pertaining to the indebtedness of the company to the government could be overcome." He adds, moreover, that the total amount received from the company up to that time was only $26,404 74, none of which was paid in money, but all consisting in credits for transportation services.

On the 18th of February, in reply to a letter from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, inquiring the cost to the government of the Nashville and Northwestern road, General Rucker communicates to the Secretary of War the report of Colonel Crilley, acting quartermaster of the United States military railroads, of the date of February 15, showing the total cost to the government for construction of new road, up to September 1, 1864, to have been $1,469,732 20; and on the 21st of the same month he submits to the Secretary of War a supplementary report, of the 19th of February, from the same officer, inviting attention to the fact that there was nearly a million and a half of dollars overlooked that was properly chargeable to the company, on account of the construction of their road, which, with the debt owing by them for property purchased from the government, on which only $26,704 74 had been paid, and amounting, with interest till January 31, to $552,422 09, would make a total of $2,022,155 29 due the United States, which the company appeared to be making no effort to pay. General Rucker suggests, moreover, that in making this transfer without receiving or demanding reimbursement, the government "has to this extent, apparently through inadvertence, transferred its own property," and asks that the proper action may be had thereon. It does not appear, however, that any notice has been taken of this communication, and the company holds the $2,000,000 of government property, without payment and without security.

The case of the Nashville and Chattanooga road involves, however, some additional facts, which will go far to explain the indifference of the government.

The amount of rolling stock purchased in this case was, as already shown, over a million and a half of dollars; more, according to the confession of Burns to the witness James, than the road could ever pay. On the 5th of April, 1866, in consequence, no doubt, of the threat of Major Hamill, already referred to, he addresses a note to that officer, informing him that the company will pay within five days one instalment on its bond, together with the accrued interest on the amount of purchase, and that, so far as possible, the subsequent instalments would be paid thereafter as they fell due. On the 15th of April this proposition is communicated to General Whipple, who replies, by letter of the 17th, that "as the money which should have been applied to liquidate the debt due the United States, has been paid out and gone beyond the control of the company, we can do no better than accept the proposition of Mr. Burns, which you are authorized to do, and compel prompt compliance with the conditions thereof in future."

Mr. Burns, however, in the mean while, has carried his case to another and a higher court, where he is confident of making better terms. On the 20th of April, and within three days after the date of General Whipple's answer, a certain John McClellan, of Nashville, then at Washington, and acting for Mr. Burns, addresses a letter to the President, informing him that he has been requested by Mr. Burns to say that he is sorely pressed by the officers of the government to pay in part for the material he had purchased; that he was induced to believe that it would not urge the payment of these claims until time could be had to make a settlement for the use of the road, on a basis proposed by him (Burns) to Quartermaster General Meigs, in the presence of Mr. Lincoln; that, acting on this belief, he had advertised that he was ready to pay the interest on the bonds of the company in New York on a given day, and made all his preparations for it, but in the mean time the above demand was made, accompanied by threats that they would again seize the road. He concludes by saying: "Now what he (Mr. Burns) most urgently desires of you is that the payment of these claims be ordered to be suspended until the settlement can be made, or to give him time to make the road earn the money. The road is doing well, and all that the company want is time. The amount now on deposit to meet the interest of bonds would pay the amount now due the government.

"You see how ruinous it would be to him, to the credit of the company, and the credit of the State, if he is forced to comply with this demand."

This communication, signed by the writer "for Mr. Burns," is referred by the President to the Secretary of the Treasury, "with directions that the collection be suspended until further orders," and by that officer turned over to the Secretary of War, who sends it to the Quartermaster General for his action. The last named officer reports on the 22d of May, that he had caused the order to be carried out; suggesting at the same time, with some degree of emphasis, "that the indebtedness of this company is the largest incurred by any railroad, amounting to $1,564,836 29, on which the instalments and interest now (then) due amount to $325,398 99."

It thus appears that Mr. Burns, having paid nothing, and being largely in arrears to the government, which was substantially without security for all this immense debt—confessing at the same time that he has money enough to pay it—showing by his own testimony that besides the proceeds of a large amount of cotton, the earnings of his railroad stock in the service of the enemy, which he is allowed to bring to market, he had realized over half a million of dollars out of the use of this very property, and claiming a settlement with the government upon the basis of the act of January 31, 1862, and showing no disposition whatever to pay a dollar of this money—is allowed, and in effect authorized by the President, to postpone the claim of the government, and to apply it to the payment of the bonds of a practically insolvent company, composed mainly of rebel stockholders, to save the credit of himself, the company, and the State, for which he had so tenderly and patriotically provided in his order of the 8th of August.

The surprise of the House and nation will not be diminished when they are informed that this same cherished object of the presidential favor, who had been so specially accredited by him to Mr. Lincoln, on grounds substantially admitted by himself to be false, instead of recognizing any pecuniary obligation to the government, has the effrontery to deny that it has built any more than five miles of the road in question, and to insist that instead of owing it money, it is, on the contrary, very largely indebted to him, as well for the use of the road it built, as of the road it captured; while he has the candor to avow at the same time, that it has not been his intention to pay, except upon a settlement in which the government shall be charged for that use, and that "knowing himself to be right," he is ready "to go to the utmost end and resist, by all legal means," any effort on the part of the government to dislodge him. Nay, he is not even prepared to deny that he may have told Sloss, who was the president or manager of another of the indebted railroads, "that he was a fool to pay, and might escape by delay," and may have advised others in the like predicament, "that there was no use in making their payments when there was money due them." In his testimony before the committee, he admits that "he would have had no difficulty in paying for the stock purchased by him, if he had neglected to pay the accumulated interest on the bonds," but says that "he was not inclined to do it from the fact that he believed there was a debt owing to the roads." In his evidence before the special committee on southern railroads, he remarks that the company had an interest account of nearly $500,000, and also a large floating debt, the former on the bonds of the company, indorsed by the State, and the latter for labor, wood, &c., accruing during the war and before, and that he paid all his debts honestly as far as he was able, but knowing the government was in the company's debt, he thought they might reasonably wait a little until he settled with them. And in all his negotiations, including his last letter to the President, he maintains this attitude, which, it must be admitted, is in entire harmony with the order of the President to make out the account of the receipts of the government for the use of these companies. It is by no means clear that it was intended by him that these debts should ever be paid. Burns so understood him, and says he thinks the action of the government towards himself was influenced partly by the consideration that he owed nothing, and that it (the government) was well aware that it was in his debt.

How it was that a man like this could be so indulged, in a case where there was no security and no disposition to pay, as to allow him to take the very money of the government, and apply it to the payment of the bonds of a rebel company, and a floating debt incurred, as is admitted, to some extent, while the State was a part of the rebel dominions, is one of those mysteries which Congress and the people will have a desire to understand. It has a special solution, however, that will make it perfectly intelligible, not in the magnetic power of the individual over a man whose will seems to have been the law to all around him—not even in the magnificent offer to him by Burns, when governor of Tennessee, on grounds of charity only, as insisted by himself, of half of his salary if he could obtain possession of these roads—but in mere relations of business and interest, in which he was able to make himself useful to the President.

It will be recollected that after stating, in the letter last referred to, his desire and readiness to pay the interest on the railroad bonds, the culminating argument is put in the pithy utterance: "You see how ruinous it would be to him, (Burns,) to the credit of the company, and the credit of the State, if he is forced to comply with this demand." Under ordinary circumstances there could be no particular force in such an appeal as this. But there was no mystery here. Burns was a friend; a member of the President's family, who had been previously retained as counsel in the matter of the surrender and transfer, was a considerable stockholder; and the President himself a creditor of both the company and the State, as the holder of thirty thousand dollars of their bonds, nineteen thousand of the former under the guarantee of the State, and the residue of the State itself, upon neither of which had any interest been paid since the commencement of the war! It was of course his interest that the credit of both should be protected, and the result was that the arrears of interest on his railroad bonds were paid, and the credit of the State, which had aided all its railroad companies by liberal contributions of the same sort, and for which the President had evinced so much solicitude in his order of the 8th of August, to that extent maintained and re-enforced; while the higher claim of the government, whose great interests had been intrusted to his hands, was indefinitely postponed! How far the general policy adopted by him in the treatment of the captured railroads of the south, may have been influenced by his pecuniary relations with the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, and the seceding State of Tennessee, can only be conjectured. It looks, however, to the Committee, as though the key to much of his extraordinary conduct upon so great a question might be not inappropriately sought in the facts they have just detailed.

It was not, however, in this particular agency alone that the financial skill of this man, whose main object, according to Mr. Fletcher, was under all circumstances to make money, was called into requisition for the personal advantage of the President, and to the detriment of the government; although the transaction itself, originating while he was military governor of Tennessee, and only consummated during his administration here, may be possibly regarded by the House rather as the subject of a civil remedy, than one of so high a nature as impeachment.

It appears from the evidence, that in the latter part of the summer of 1862, a loan was effected by Mr. Johnson, then military governor of Tennessee, in connection with the Hon. J. S. Fowler, then comptroller of the State, from the Union and Planters' Banks of Nashville, of the sum of $40,000, in the paper of those banks, which was then at a discount of from twenty to twenty-five per cent. below the legal tender circulation of the country, on their two notes of $20,000 each, redeemable in the same funds, for the purpose of paying, and relieving the families of a regiment of loyal soldiers which had been raised in that city. The money was refunded by the government "from twelve to eighteen months afterwards, or perhaps more," to Mr. Fowler, who lodged it with the government depositary at Cincinnati, on the 8th of July, 1864, took interest-bearing certificates therefor, and handed the same over to Governor Johnson, whose duty it became, of course, to take up the notes at once. They were permitted to remain unpaid, for the reason apparently that the money could be more profitably employed. In the mean while, however, the banks had become insolvent and passed into the hands of a receiver. Mr. Fowler testifies that he was much pressed to pay the notes, and much annoyed in reference to them—that he called the attention of Mr. Johnson to the matter after he became President, and that his answer was "let them call on me and I will attend to it." Mr. Burns says that about that time the banks became clamorous for their money; that Mr. Johnson desired to compromise, and thought they ought to take ten thousand dollars each, for the reason that their paper was at a large discount when received; and offered them that amount accordingly. On their refusal, he had recourse to Mr. Burns, and proposed through him to pay in Tennessee State bonds. The claim of the Planters' Bank was compromised in November, 1866, and paid on the draft of that gentleman for $14,600. That of the Union Bank was satisfied in January, 1867, upon a like draft for $15,000, although it is stated by him that the amount actually paid was $16,250, the deficiency of $1,250 being paid out of his own pocket, and the fact never yet disclosed to the President. During all this time, however, the funds were placed at interest, either in certificates of deposit or in the seven-thirty bonds of the government, purchased at a discount and sold at a large premium in December, 1866; and the effect is that Mr. Johnson has realized out of the government moneys, which should have been at once applied to the payment of the debt, the very snug sum of $10,400, along with the interest and profits on the whole amount of $40,000 advanced to him, for the period of about two years and a half. That it was an act of more than questionable propriety on his part, as military governor of Tennessee, will not, they think, be doubted by anybody, although they are not prepared to say that, however censurable in itself, it had any such reference to his official duties as President as would make it the proper subject of impeachment. They refer to it now mainly for the purpose of showing the relations of obligation and confidence existing between Burns and the Executive.

But a word more of Mr. Burns, who has accompanied the undersigned so far, before they part with him.

It is proper to add that the kindness of the Executive towards this individual was not exhausted by the benefactions that have been so largely commented on. The undersigned have already referred, in an incidental way, to the permit given to him by the President, to bring in and convey to market a large amount of cotton claimed by him for one of his companies—the Nashville and Chattanooga—as the earnings of its rolling-stock, run off by the officers of the road upon the approach of our armies, and employed in illicit traffic within the lines of the confederacy. Mr. Burns states that he obtained it from Mr. Johnson as early as the month of May; that General Steedman, then commanding in Georgia, refused to allow the removal of the articles, and that he afterwards showed the order to General Thomas, who replied that he knew nothing about it, and did not wish to be bothered, but that he would give the requisite authority, if the witness would enter into bonds that it was the bona fide property of the company. The witness says that the order was the usual one issued at that time. There is no evidence, however, of any other transaction of the sort, as there was no law, in the judgment of the Committee, to warrant it. To determine whether there was, they will refer to the several acts of Congress on that subject.

By the 5th section of the act of 13th July, 1861, it is provided that when the inhabitants of any State are declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, all commercial intercourse between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful, so long as such condition of hostility shall continue, and all goods and chattels coming from said State into other parts of the United States shall be forfeited to the United States, with the proviso, however, that the President may, at his discretion, license and permit commercial intercourse with any part of such State or section so in insurrection, in such articles, for such times, and by such persons as he may think most conducive to the public interest, but such intercourse shall be carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The 5th section of the act of July 2, 1864, extends the prohibition to all commercial intercourse between all persons in those parts of the insurrectionary States which are comprehended within the military occupation of the national forces, whether with each other, or with persons residing or being within districts declared in insurrection, and not within those lines.

The fourth section of the act of March 3, 1863, enacts that all property coming into any of the United States not declared in insurrection, from within any of the insurrectionary States, through or by any other person than an agent duly appointed under the provisions of this act, or under a lawful clearance by the proper officer of the Treasury Department, shall be confiscated to the use of the government of the United States; and any person or persons by or through whom such property shall come within the lines of the United States unlawfully, as aforesaid, shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The act of July 2, 1864, makes it lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of the States declared in insurrection, and repeals so much of the fifth section of the act of 13th July, 1861, as authorizes the President to license or permit commercial relations in any State or section declared to be in insurrection, except so far as may be necessary to supply the necessities of loyal persons residing in insurrectionary States within the lines of actual occupation by the military forces of the United States, or so far as may be necessary to authorize persons residing within such lines to bring or send to market in the loyal States any products which they shall have produced with their own labor, or the labor of freedmen or others employed, and paid by them pursuant to rules relating thereto, which may be established under proper authority.

It seems clear, therefore, to the undersigned that, upon this state of the law, there was no authority whatever left in the President to license or permit either the purchase or importation of the large amount of cotton, which Mr. Burns was thus allowed to bring within our lines, and send to market in the loyal States. The power conferred on him was only intended to legalize such honest traffic as might be conducive to the public interests, and to be exercised not on grounds of favoritism to individuals, but under regulations to be established by the treasury; while in all other cases of property coming into any of the loyal States, except through the agents of that department, as captured or abandoned, it was not only to be confiscated to the use of the government, but the persons by or through whom it came were subjected to fine and imprisonment. Even that power, however, had been withdrawn to give place to a system which should confer a monopoly of that traffic on the government, except so far as might be necessary to enable parties residing within our lines to bring to market the produce of their own labor, or that of their employés. In the present case the property admitted was confessedly the earnings of the cars and locomotives that had been run off into the remoter rebel States, by the very officers of that company themselves, to prevent them from falling into the hands of our troops. The withdrawal of that stock itself was an act of flagrant disloyalty, if not absolute treason to the government, which, under the law of 6th August, 1861, made it the subject of prize and capture wherever found; and the money earned by it in the service of the rebel government or its people was, at all events, the product of an illicit trade, which no imaginable state of circumstances, and no private claims of Mr. Burns could have excused the President for countenancing by favors such as these. He knew all the facts, or was bound to know them. His residence at Nashville, and his relations with Burns, would make this evident, without even the statement of that individual that he had explained the whole matter to General Thomas when he presented the President's order to that officer. It was his duty, under the law, to order the seizure of both the cotton and rolling-stock, for the use of the government, as soon as they came within his reach. If the President could pardon the past offence, and restore the property, as he has, in conformity with his unnatural policy, so uniformly done, he could at least grant no indulgence for future sin, by permitting its introduction in violation of a statutory interdict that made the act a criminal one.

But colossal as all these operations were, they are quite equalled in enormity, and perhaps eclipsed in magnitude, by those which related to the surrender of individual property which had come into the possession of the government by capture, abandonment, or confiscation, within the meaning of the law. They will be better understood, however, by a reference to the statutes passed in relation thereto.

By the act of the 6th of August, 1861, it was provided that if any person or persons shall purchase or acquire, sell, or give any property of whatsoever kind or description, with intent to use or employ, or suffer the same to be used or employed in aiding or abetting the insurrection, or if any person or persons, being the owner or owners of any such property, shall knowingly use or employ, or consent to the use or employment thereof, as aforesaid, all such property is declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found, and it is made the duty of the President to cause the same to be seized, confiscated, and condemned; which is but a recognition, so far as the property is so employed, of the rule of the public law, which would extend even to a case where the property was forcibly taken from the owner, and used in invitum, subject only to a possible right to restitution by virtue of the jus postliminii in the event of a recapture, in case that rule applied to captures upon land.

By the act of 17th July, 1862, it was further provided that to insure the speedy termination of the rebellion, it should be the duty of the President to cause the seizure of all the estate and property of the persons therein named, and to use and apply the same, and the proceeds thereof, for the support of the army.

The parties designated are the officers and agents, military and civil, as well of the confederate government, as of the States which composed the same; persons owning property in any loyal State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, who should give aid and comfort to the rebellion; and all other persons engaged therein, who should not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation made by the President, lay down their arms and return to their allegiance; and to secure the condemnation and sale of any such property after seizure, so that it may be made available for the purpose aforesaid, it is further provided that proceedings in rem, as in admiralty and marine cases, shall be instituted in the name of the United States in any district court, and that if such property shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States.

By the act of March 3, 1863, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint agents to receive and collect all abandoned or captured property in any State declared to be in insurrection against the government, except such as had been used, or was intended to be used, for carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, &c., and provides that any part of the goods or property received or collected by such agents may be appropriated to the public use, on due appraisement and certificate thereof, or forwarded to any place of sale within the loyal States, as the public interests may require, and that all sales of such property shall be at auction, to the highest bidder, and the proceeds paid into the treasury of the United States; with the proviso that any person claiming to be the owner of such abandoned or captured property might, within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim in the Court of Claims, and on proof of ownership, and that he had never given any aid or comfort to the rebellion, receive the residue of the proceeds, after paying expenses.

By the act of July 2, 1864, it is further provided that the agents so appointed shall take charge of, and lease, for periods not exceeding twelve months, the abandoned lands, houses, tenements, and shall also provide, in such lease or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of military occupation formerly held as slaves, who are, or shall become, free; and that, moreover, property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned where the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding and encouraging the rebellion.

The same act provides that all moneys arising from the leasing of abandoned lands, houses, or tenements, or from sales of captured and abandoned property, shall be paid into the treasury, and extends the operation of the first section of the act of March 12, 1863, so as to include property mentioned in the acts of July 13, 1861, and July 17, 1862, or, in other words, to lands.

And lastly, the act of March 3, 1865, provides for the establishment of a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from the rebel States; and enacts that the commissioner appointed in pursuance thereof, under the direction of the President, shall have authority to set apart, for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen, such tracts of land within the insurrectionary States as shall have been abandoned, or to which the United States shall have acquired title by confiscation, or sale, or otherwise, and to assign to every male citizen, refugee, or freedman, not more than forty acres of land, for the term of three years, during which they are to be protected in the use and enjoyment at a certain annual rent, with privilege to the occupants at the end of the term, or at any time previous, to purchase and receive such title as the United States can convey, on paying the value thereof, as ascertained and fixed for the purpose of determining the rent.

Before the passage of this last-mentioned act, to wit, on the 14th of January, 1865, appeared, the famous Field Order (No. 15.) of General Sherman, issued with the approbation of the Secretary of War, reserving and setting apart the islands from Charleston south, the abandoned rice fields along the river for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. John's, for the settlement of the negroes made free by the war and the proclamation of the President, and providing that whenever three respectable negroes, heads of families, should desire to settle, and have selected a locality clearly defined, within the said limits, the inspector of plantations should give them a license to establish a peaceful agricultural settlement, when they might subdivide the land among themselves, and such others as might choose to settle near them, so that each family should have a plot of not more than forty acres of tillable ground, with the privilege to all those who had enlisted in the military service of the United States of locating their families in any of the settlements at pleasure, and acquiring homesteads and all other rights and privileges of settlers, as though present in person; and with a view to carry out this system, Brigadier General Saxton was detailed as inspector of settlements and plantations, with directions to furnish personally to each head of a family, subject to the approval of the President, a possessory title in writing, along with a description of the boundaries.

Under this order General Saxton testifies that he seized the Sea islands, upon which he colonized some forty thousand negroes, whereof each head of a family was to receive forty acres of land.

On the establishment of the bureau, the President ordered, as it became his duty to do, all officers of the government having property in their charge which was subjected to its management, to turn over the same thereto, and the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 27th of June, directed his subordinates, who had in their possession, or under their control, any abandoned or confiscable lands or tenements, to transfer the same accordingly: and under this order, and the act of Congress, General Saxton states that he seized, as assistant commissioner, about four hundred and fifty thousand acres of abandoned land, principally on the mainland, and including nearly the entire city of Charleston. This, however, was but a fractional part of the abandoned land which had been appropriated to the uses of the bureau, and passed to it by the act of Congress, while the abandoned lands themselves were but a part of the spoils which the fortunes of war had thrown into the power of the government, and had been solemnly dedicated to the highest and holiest of purposes. The personal property captured, and the lands either condemned or subject to confiscation for the treason of their owners, were an additional element whose account would baffle all calculation.

With all these immense interests, however, the President undertook to deal without the authority of Congress, in the interests of the traitors who were then but half subdued, and at the expense of the rightful beneficiaries, as if they had been his own, and with a prodigality that ignored the heavy burdens of the north, and all the services of its loyal soldiery, while it gave back with lavish hand to the rebel leaders, who had themselves so remorselessly confiscated every rood of ground that belonged to a loyal man, the baronial possessions which they had so justly forfeited by their crimes.

The undersigned have already dwelt at great length upon the surrender of the captured railroads, and the transfer of the rolling stock belonging to the government, without authority, and without security. They have also referred to the gratuitous return, or absolute donation to the rebel proprietors throughout the conquered States, of all the cars, locomotives and machinery that had been captured in war, at the expense of the lives of so many of our soldiers, who were in some cases brutally murdered for their attempt to seize them. Nothing is clearer than that this property was absolutely vested by the capture, and no more within the gift of the President than this Capitol. "The general law is, that on the completion of the capture the title vests in the captor, and is complete when the surrender has taken place and the spes recuperandi is gone. With respect to booty, which refers to personal property captured on land, it is universally conceded that twenty-four hours' possession completes the title." (Halleck, 727, 780, Wheat; 632.) Nor has this principle been at any time questioned by the authorities. Even as to railroads themselves, the Secretary of War is careful to explain in his testimony, that the act of the government imported no transfer, but only a relinquishment of the possession, while in the letter of Acting Quartermaster Bliss, of the date of 25th of July, to Colonel Chandler, quartermaster of the military division of the Gulf, in answer to the demand of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad Company, for a return of property, it is distinctly asserted that "the road, with its appurtenances, was taken possession of by right of capture, and its property became the property of the United States by the same right;" while it was, at the same time, stated that "so much as remained and is no longer required for military uses has been, in accordance with the general policy pursued, on grounds of public utility, toward railroad companies, ordered to be returned to the company." What was the value of the property thus surrendered, the Committee have had no means of ascertaining. It is sufficient, however, that it must have been immense. Nor is it any apology to say that some of the stockholders may have been loyal men, who could not be compromised by the acts of the directors, although that is the plea on which the present Attorney General has refused to allow proceedings under the acts either of 1861 or 1862, for the confiscation of the property of southern corporations. If the fact were even so, which is by no means probable, it was their misfortune to have been thus associated. In proceedings in rem the law does not pursue the owner. It is the chattel that offends, and it would be a poor defence for him, that he had intrusted t to an agent who had used it in battle against his country, or attempted to smuggle it across the lines, in violation of its laws. The least that could be expected, however, would be that those who plead their loyalty should come into court, as they are authorized by law, and show that they were not consenting to its use; in which case, if entitled on a recapture by virtue of the jus postliminii, which is not generally understood, however, as applying to captures on land, their interests could be adjusted and reimbursement made out of the proceeds, after sale. To suppose, however, that the interests of a handful of loyal men, who had perhaps been exiled therefor, will cover a host of traitors, and shelter them from punishment, is more than even a truly loyal sufferer could desire. A few righteous men might have saved Sodom, but human justice cannot afford to follow such examples of forbearance. The case involves an assumption of power that no argument can excuse.

In the kindred matter, however, of the confiscated and abandoned lands, the acts of the President were not less arbitrary and unwarrantable.

The latter of these were made subject, as already shown, by the act of July 2, 1864, to leases for periods not exceeding twelve months, and subsequently vested in the Freedmen's Bureau, with authority to set them apart for the use of the refugees and freedmen, and to assign to every male citizen forty acres, for three years, at a specified rent, with the privilege of purchasing at or before the end of the term.

On the 29th of May, the day of the issue of the North Carolina proclamation, and within a little more than a month after the accession of the new President, he sent forth his proclamation of amnesty, under the authority apparently of the 13th section of the act of July 17, 1862, granting to all persons who had directly or indirectly participated in the existing rebellion, with sundry enumerated exceptions, amnesty and pardon with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in cases where legal proceedings under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property had been instituted, on the condition of an oath to support the Constitution and the Union, and faithfully to abide by all laws and proclamations made during the rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves with a proviso that special applications might be made for pardon by any person belonging to the excepted classes; and under this invitation it was not long until the special exercise of the pardoning power in the excepted cases was brought into full play, as an auxiliary to the general policy of restoration indicated in his proclamation appointing provisional governors for the rebel States.

The plan of the President looked to the entire restoration of all rights of property, except where suits had been commenced, without which feature, doubtless, few of the excepted classes would have humbled themselves to the attitude of suppliants for the clemency of an individual so obnoxious to that class of men in the south as Mr. Johnson was at that time. By this it soon became apparent that he intended and understood, not only oblivion of the past, but the re-investiture of all rights that had not been divested either by legislation absolutely, or perished by the accidents of war. Instead, therefore, of taking any steps to execute the law, or to enforce the provisions of the confiscation act, as his duty under that act required him to do, he insisted that the mere exhibition of his act of grace was sufficient in itself to strip the bureau of all its possessions, and to rehabilitate the subject of it in his original estate. The Commissioner of the bureau, however, charged, as he was, with the interests of the exiled loyalists, as well as of the helpless wards of the republic, and faithful to his great office, took a different view of the matter, as will be found in his first annual report to Congress, in which he suggests that it was the evident intention of the law to give the bureau control over abandoned lands solely for the purpose of assigning, leasing, or selling them to refugees or freedmen; that for this end it had given to the bureau every right which an actual owner could have, except, perhaps, the right of sale; that, for all practical purposes, the tenure of the bureau had been considered almost identical with an estate, upon condition subsequent, the condition being the restoration of the property by competent authority to its former owners; and that accordingly the policy first adopted by the bureau was to return estates to those only who could show constant loyalty, past as well as present, for the very sufficient reasons that as it held property by authority of an act of Congress for certain definite purposes, it was supposed that this tenure must continue to exist until those purposes were accomplished, and that it could therefore be surrendered only when it was evident that the control over it was unauthorized and improper.

In accordance with these views, a circular was issued on the 28th of July, (No. 13,) providing: First. That all confiscated and abandoned lands, and other like property that now are or may hereafter come under the control of the bureau, are and shall be set apart for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen, and so much as may be necessary assigned to them, as provided in section four of the act establishing the bureau. Second. That all lands or other property within the insurrectionary States, to which the United States shall have acquired title by "confiscation or sale or otherwise" during the late rebellion, and all abandoned lands or other property in those States, become so by construction of law, and which remain unsold, or otherwise disposed of, are and shall be considered under the control of the bureau for the purposes herein set forth, and for the time authorized by the act establishing the same, and no part or parcel of said confiscated or abandoned property shall be surrendered or restored to the former owners or other claimants thereof, except such surrender be authorized by the Commissioner. Third. The pardon of the President will not be understood to extend to the surrender of abandoned or confiscated property, which by law has been set apart for refugees and freedmen, or is in use for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of military occupation formerly held as slaves.

This order, however, although in obvious accord with the law, did not prove palatable to the President, and accordingly on the 16th of August he indorsed the following on the papers of B. B. Leake, a rebel soldier, which seem to have been referred to him:

"Respectfully returned to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees and Abandoned Lands. The records of this office show that B. B. Leake was specially pardoned by the President on the 26th ultimo, and was thereby restored to all his rights of property except as to slaves. Notwithstanding this, it is understood that possession of his property is withheld from him. I have therefore to direct that General Fisk, the assistant commissioner at Nashville, be instructed by the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, &c., to relinquish possession of the property of Mr. Leake, held by him as commissioner, and that the same be immediately restored to said Leake. The same action will be had in all similar cases.

"ANDREW JOHNSON."

This peremptory order, which he had no authority whatever to make, was followed up by sending for the Commissioner to inform him that there was something in his circular (No. 13) which the President did not like, and it was accordingly superseded and annulled by another of the 12th of September, re-written by himself, and designated as No. 15. In this, after the declaration, in the language of the law, that the bureau has charge of "such tracts of land as shall have been abandoned, or to which the United States shall have acquired title by confiscation, or sale, or otherwise," it is ordered, "first, that land will not be regarded as confiscated until it has been condemned and sold by decree of the United States court for the district in which the property may be found, and the title thereto thus vested in the United States; and, second, that abandoned lands held by this bureau may be restored to owners pardoned by the President, by the assistant commissioners, to whom such applications should be forwarded, so far as practicable, through the superintendents of the districts in which the land is situated; each application to be accompanied, first, by evidence of special pardon, or a copy of the oath of amnesty, where the applicant is not included in any of the classes therein excepted from the benefits of said oath; and, second, by proof of title."

While it has been a subject of unavailing and unredressed complaint, that loyal men, who have been ousted of their possessions by decrees of confiscation on the part of the rebel government, have not been restored by the President, but have been put to their actions of ejectment, and subjected to the law's delay before disloyal judges, the effect of this order, which assumed the right to direct the operations of an independent bureau, was a summary adjudication of a question of law in which the rights of third persons were involved, and belonging to another tribunal, which must decide at last upon the efficacy and extent of an instrument that must always, according to well-settled rules, be pleaded before it, and which tribunal must inevitably have decided under the exception as to suits depending in the proclamation of amnesty, that they were not affected in any case where the subject of the President's favor was not included in any of the excepted classes. The President not only assumes to override and annul the acts of Congress, and to set aside the national will as expressed therein, in relation to abandoned lands, by ordering their delivery upon his fiat, to the objects of his grace, but, with a coolness that is absolutely astounding, undertakes to eliminate from this statute the words "confiscation" and "otherwise," although put there disjunctively, and as distinguishable from "sale," and to change the word "or" into "and" by declaring that land shall not be regarded as confiscated until it has been condemned and sold by decree of the district court. And, as a consequence of this arbitrary exercise of power, the bureau is stripped by his act of its whole munificent endowment, not only of the lands of traitors abandoned within the meaning of the law, but even of those vested in the government by a regular judgment of condemnation, which divests the title of the delinquents in all prize courts, and vests the property in the United States by the very terms of the act of Congress, leaving only the process of sale as a means of converting it into money, which the government may waive, of course, if it desires to use the property, where there are no other claimants upon the fund, and with which the delinquent, at all events, has nothing to do whatever. It is shown by the Commissioner in his testimony, that, as a result of these unauthorized orders, the whole plan of Congress, as well as the intent of the field order of General Sherman, has been not only traversed but substantially overthrown by the mere will of the President. In Virginia, particularly, as he remarks in his report, quite an amount of land—not less than one hundred and two pieces, according to the returns made to the committee—had been libel'ed and condemned, and were about to be sold just previous to the establishment of the bureau, when the sales were suspended by the Secretary of War in order that these lands might be turned over to the bureau for the benefit of the freedmen. He claimed, as he had a right to do, that these lands, though not actually sold, were already the property of the United States, and remonstrated with the President against the insertion of the word "sold" in the definition of confiscated property. He left the President with the understanding and assurance on his part, that the question would be referred to the Attorney General. When the circular came back to him from the President it was with the interpolation of the words "and sold." The then Attorney General (Mr. Speed) testifies that he has no recollection that any such question was ever submitted to him, and that it had always been his opinion that when sentence of condemnation was once pronounced, the whole affair passed into the courts, and was beyond the jurisdiction of the Executive. It seems clear, then, that under the pretence of a reference, the act was that of the President himself, without even the poor apology of an erroneous advice. It was enough that it was a part of his policy, and all this property was restored.

But all this was only a trifle in its comparative amount. As a result of this order, a very large amount of property was restored in all the rebel, and some of the loyal States. In the city of New Orleans alone the quantity held and surrendered was enormous. In South Carolina General Saxton says that besides the Sea islands, he had seized about 450,000 acres, when he was arrested by an order of the 2d of October, directing him to seize no more, and that upon his requisition on the Treasury Department for all the abandoned property in its possession, it had turned over to him nearly the entire city of Charleston—all of which was restored to its former owners. He stated in addition that he had received four hundred and fifty orders for the restoration of property in that city, each order covering from one to twenty-five dwellings, and eighty-five more for the restoration of plantations—one or more to each order—and that his successor had probably restored more than he had. He refused, however, to surrender the Sea islands without a special order in each case, because he did not consider the circular No. 15 as applying to them. On an application made by the Hon. William Aiken, as in other like cases, he accordingly indorsed the answer that "he had taken possession under the field order of General Sherman, which was issued under a great military necessity, with the approval of the War Department; that more than 40,000 destitute freedmen had been provided with homes under its provisions; that he should break faith with the freedmen now by recommending the restoration of these lands; and that in his view this order of General Sherman was as binding as a statute."

The South Carolina rebels, however—the same who had first fired upon our flag, and held high carnival upon the boulevards of Charleston, as they watched the walls of Sumter, with its feeble garrison, crumbling under the traitor missiles which they hurled against them—had now become by their defeat the masters of the government they had endeavored to destroy, while the helpless freedman, the only "faithful among the faithless," who was in the ranks of our armies, and had earned his settlement at the price of his blood, was no longer an object of consideration for this government. Nay, even as though we had unjustly offended these proud patricians, and were desirous to propitiate their good will by something in the way of sacrifice, the government itself at once directs not only the surrender of the lands, but even the abandonment of its own offices and quarters, and the hiring of others—though afterwards modified into a retention of possession, to that extent, at a moderate rent. On the refusal, moreover, of General Saxton to surrender these lands without a special order, he was duly notified by one or two leading rebels that "they were to be given up; that the President had so informed them; and that he had better give them up quietly, or it would be the worse for him." As a consequence of this refusal, a letter was written by William H. Trescott to the President, indorsed by Governor Orr, stating that it was impossible for him to do anything so long as General Saxton had control of affairs in that department, and urging his immediate removal, which was done; and thus a valuable officer of the Union armies seems to have been displaced at the instance of two notorious rebels, merely because he insisted on doing his duty, and stood in the way of the President's policy. It was his duty so to refuse. If wrong was done, it was not his province to restore. The islands in question were captured and appropriated under an order which had the approval of the government. If they were not acquired by "confiscation or sale," they were acquired "otherwise," and that was by abandonment or lawful capture. Nor is it any more an answer, to say that the seizure of the lands of individuals is not in accordance with the usages of modern times, than it would be to insist that any process of condemnation is required in the case of a capture on land. Whatever may be said on the score of wisdom or humanity, the usage of nations is one thing and the right is another. As a matter of strict right, the law of nations authorizes it, although the usage of modern times is undoubtedly the other way. But the application of the usage itself is held to depend upon the principle of reciprocity. If one of two belligerents chooses to capture or confiscate the private estates of citizens of the other—as was the known practice of the rebel government—the other may retaliate; and even without this provocation, there is no power, as there is no common arbiter, that can gainsay or question the right of a conqueror to deal with the property of the conquered as may seem good to him. The right of General Sherman, the commander in the field, to make this order and appropriation was not doubted then, and is not doubted now, by the Secretary of War. If he was correct in this, it required no more than the actual seizure, and the approval of the government to perfect it, and the land thus seized was a property acquired "otherwise" than by "confiscation or sale," and falling under the charge of the bureau within the very terms of the act of Congress. If the law-making power chose to disaffirm that title afterwards, or to surrender it back, as it has since substantially done, to the original owners, upon the terms of good behavior or otherwise, that was their affair, and theirs only. The Executive of the nation was without power in the premises.

It does not seem, however, to have been considered that even a pardon itself was in all cases absolutely necessary to the restoration of the lands. In the case of Trenholm & Co., notorious blockade-runners, all the property of the firm was surrendered on a special order of the President, issued without any pardon at all, one of the members of the firm admitting in his testimony that it issued in September, while his own pardon was of a later date. How many other cases there were of the same sort, the committee are not advised. In that of J. E. Davis, the brother of the president of the confederacy, and a large landholder in Mississippi, who for a long time refused to apply for a pardon, or even to concur in the mediation of his friends, who interceded for him, on the ground that he had done no wrong, the President indorsed on the application for a return of his property, on the 22d of May, 1866, the very curt and apparently impatient inquiries, "by what terms is this property held? Why has it not been restored upon the application of the owner?" To which it was answered by the Commissioner, on the following day, that the property was taken up by the Treasury Department as abandoned, and that Mr. Davis had never received it, because he had refused to make application for his pardon, although he admitted that he was worth $20,000. On the 12th of September, he exhibited a pardon, which, according to General Howard, was the first official information of the fact, although it is said to bear date on the 23d of March. It does not appear, however, in the list furnished by the President to the House on the 4th of May, (Ex. Doc. No. 99,) and if not antedated, it was very probably refused by the beneficiary. The firmness of the Commissioner alone seems to have prevented the surrender of the property on the terms on which it was demanded.

Nor was the munificence of the President in all cases even impeded by the fact of a judicial sale under a decree of condemnation. General Howard reports four cases of this sort in Louisiana, viz: those of Burth Leonce, Goodrich & Co., and A. W. Merriman, in one of which the property was valued at $75,000, and another at $13,000; and one, also, of F. W. Armistead, in Virginia. There is a fifth, however, in the former State, which is entitled to special notice for several reasons. It is that of the notorious Pierre Soulé, whose dwelling-house at New Orleans, which was then occupied as an asylum by the government itself, and was of great value, was condemned on the 10th of July, and actually sold and bid in for the government on the 26th of September, 1865, at $23,500. This bid was, however, withdrawn by the consent of the marshal, because the officer who made it was not provided with funds to pay for it. On the 23d of October, Soulé received a special pardon, and on motion of his attorney and exhibition of the pardon on the 20th of November, a rule was taken on the government to show cause why the proceedings should not be discontinued and the property restored, which was heard on the 29th, and a decree of dismissal entered. The case is proved by General Howard to have been referred to the Attorney General in January for an opinion as to the validity of this decree, and the steps necessary to be taken for retaining the property, but no answer was vouchsafed; and on the 8th of March the resident commissioner was ordered to give actual possession of the property to Mr. Soulé, and it was done. It is due, however, to Mr. Speed, the then Attorney General, to say that he has no recollection of ever having been consulted in this case.

But whether the pardoning power extends to the remission of mere forfeitures, not touching the person, but recoverable only by proceedings in rem, is not, in the judgment of the undersigned, by any means clear on principle. It is not to be denied that the practice heretofore has, perhaps, recognized its efficacy to that extent. That practice will be found, however, to depend mainly, if not entirely, on the opinions of Attorneys General, who have looked for their authority in giving a construction to the terms of the Constitution to the analogies of the royal prerogative in England, which is not always a safe guide in the interpretation of a specific grant of power here. Where the penalty is a consequence of the conviction of the person offending, and a part of the judgment, it must fall, of course, with the offence; but when it consists merely in a forfeiture of property it does not seem to have been always so considered. Under the revenue and other laws, the power of remitting forfeitures has been sometimes lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury, and sometimes with the courts. If it had been considered a part of the pardoning power, it must have remained with the Executive, as it belongs to him only under the Constitution. They do not propose, however, to go into an argument upon a point that is not essential to their case.

But it is not to the mere subject of the remission of forfeitures of lands and chattels that the executive government has confined its beneficent operations. With the same habitual contempt for the law that seems to have governed it in all its measures, it has gone so far as not only to restore lands which had been vested in the United States by judgment of law, but even to pay back the proceeds of sales of personal property made under the law, in the face of a direct command to pay them into the treasury, and a reference for remedy, of such parties as might feel themselves aggrieved, to the courts alone. Governors Parsons and Sharkey, whose supposed influence at court seems to have suggested their employment in cases of this description, both testify specially to the payment of large sums of money arising from sales of cotton seized and forwarded to market by the agents of the Treasury Department. But the proof does not stop here. The records of the department show over sixteen millions of dollars received by the Treasurer from this source, of which upwards of six millions ($6,174,379 38) are proved by him to have been ordered into his hands as a special agent, for no other reason known to himself, "except, perhaps, that there were claims against it, and constant repayments, and that if it once got into the treasury, there was no way of getting it out except by warrant under act of Congress."

Nor did the Secretary fail to avail himself of this ingenious expedient for evading the constitutional interdict, and dispensing with the action of the legislative authority. All of this money, with the exception of $870,367 83, has been checked out by him on requisitions signed by the Commissioner of Customs, and countersigned by himself; in some instances under the special direction of the President. The account shows, it is true, that $2,600,000 of this money was "covered into the treasury," on two of these requisitions. The residue, however, seems to have been applied at the mere discretion of the Secretary to the reimbursement of individual claimants, expenses, and other disbursements connected with this branch of the service. Among the former is a notable item of the date of November 22, 1866, "refunding to B. F. Flanders the sum of $800 11, alleged to have been improperly covered into the treasury," and by this process withdrawn from it without warrant of law.

The cases shown by the Secretary, wherein the payments were made under the personal direction of the President, are seven in number. Two of these only, to wit, those of Mansfield & Co. and Mrs. Emily Miller, appear in the account of the Treasurer. It is to be remembered, however, that this account does not comprise those of the many supervising agents, upon whom orders were drawn ab libitum by the Secretary, who admits that until the special appointment of General Spinner all the claims were paid in that way. The reason assigned by the Secretary on his examination, as to one of these cases, was that he "believed it unjust to the claimant and disreputable to the government to send him to the Court of Claims," or, in other words, that it did not become a great nation, and was not its true policy, to enforce the law in that particular case, just as the Attorney General decides that it was not the policy of the government to enforce the laws of the same kind in regard to lands. Indeed, the policy of Congress enacted into law has not been generally recognized as the policy of the executive government. Whether the moneys thus withdrawn from the agents of the treasury were in the treasury or not, it is scarcely worth while to argue, although it would seem, on general principles, to be a question scarce susceptible of a doubt, whether, having once reached the hands of their proper custodian, they were not there, by construction of law, in virtue of his title to hold them as Treasurer of the United States. It is sufficient for the present purpose that they ought to have been there under the law. How much has been paid away in violation thereof, by a process which allowed so large a field for rebel attorneys, and so wide a scope for executive favoritism, it is impossible to say—the cases now referred to being only those where the property had been actually sold, and the proceeds realized.

It is not denied by the Secretary that large amounts of property were surrendered in specie upon the application of individual claimants, nor insisted by the undersigned that this might not, perhaps, be properly done in cases of clear mistake as to ownership, or when the loyalty of the owners was above all exception. There is a class of cases, however, suggested just at this point by the production of another of the special orders of the President, that is equally deserving of the attention of the House.

It was remarked at the outset that it was a part of the programme of the Executive to meet the necessities of his policy, and dispense with the otherwise indispensable agency of Congress in the premises, not only by drawing unlawfully upon the contingent funds of the departments, whose heads were then subject to his will, but by absolutely donating to his new governments the spoils of the dead confederacy, and authorizing them to supply any deficiency by taxation.

The evidence of this charge is to be found in the following extract from a communication of the Secretary of State of July 8, 1865, to the provisional governor of North Carolina:

"Mr. Worth will make an estimate of the expenses which may attend the special trust conferred on you, namely, the organization of the State of North Carolina. The amount thus reasonably estimated will be paid at the War Department as an expense incident to the suppression of the rebellion. The estimate, however, will carefully exclude all expenses which may arise from the administration of the civil government of the State, including the charities thereof. It is understood here that besides cotton, which has been taken by the Secretary of the Treasury under act of Congress, there were quantities of resin and other articles, as well as funds, lying about in different places in the State and elsewhere, not reduced into possession by United States officers, as insurgent property The President is of the opinion that you can appropriate these for the inevitable and indispensable expenses of the civil government of the State during the continuance of the provisional government. He is also of the opinion that you can levy taxes or assessments for the inevitable and indispensable expenses prescribed as aforesaid, and enforce their collection. Should you adopt this course, and find yourself impeded or embarrassed in the execution of the measure, you will then report to this department, and orders will be given by the War Department to the military authorities to take charge of the matter."

The result of these instructions was a correspondence between the treasurer of North Carolina and the Treasury Department at Washington, wherein it was claimed by the former that all property of the confederacy and of the rebel State governments, not seized till after General Schofield's proclamation, on the 27th of April, of a cessation of hostilities, as well as moneys in England arising from sales of cotton that had run the blockade, were intended to be embraced in them. To a despatch of the 19th of October, addressed to the Secretary, complaining of the seizures of cotton belonging to that State, and referring to these instructions, the Secretary replies that he did not consider them as having been intended to include that article, although confessing that the word "besides," as used by Mr. Seward in that connection, was "a little unfortunate." In a previous letter, however, of the 30th of June, to David Heaton, esq., the supervising special agent for that State, after referring to representations made to him by a delegation of citizens thereof, that "in consequence of the extreme destitution of the people, and the want of means at the disposal of the new State government, it would be almost impossible to put it fairly in operation," he proceeds as follows:

"Of course none of the property already turned over to or collected by our agents, as such, can properly be appropriated for that purpose, but I incline to the opinion that the public good will be as well promoted, and the true spirit of the laws on the subject as fairly carried out, by allowing the new organization to have the benefit of some of the ungathered debris scattered through the State as to have it gathered by agents of this department, and the proceeds thereof go into the treasury, and I have accordingly indicated to the gentlemen composing the delegation that our agents should not be too inquisitorial in their researches, or too exhaustive in their labors in this direction, and that I have no objection to the present State government having the benefit of any property which belonged to its rebel predecessor that it may be able to collect. I will thank you to so shape your action, and direct your subordinates as to substantially carry out the policy above indicated."

And in a subsequent letter of July 3, 1866, in reply to an inquiry by the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, as to the detention by the government of one hundred and seventy-five bales of cotton claimed to belong to the same State, he reasserts the authority of the Executive to deal with these questions on the same footing as Congress or the law, in the following conclusion:

"The policy decided upon in relation thereto is that it should be taken to New York and sold, the proceeds to be held for such ultimate decision as might be made in the premises, either by the action of the Court of Claims, or Congress, or by order of the President."

The Secretary is under the impression that the like course was pursued in regard to others of the rebel States, and admits that no accounts have ever been rendered by or required from any of the provisional governments, of the property rightfully belonging to the United States, appropriated by them under this authority.

The special order of the President above referred to shows that even a larger measure of liberality was extended to the most criminal of all the revolting members, in the surrender to the provisional government of South Carolina of "the State works," located at Greenville, and consisting of buildings erected during the rebellion for the manufacture of arms, on lands donated for that purpose. On application made therefor, the case was referred by him not to the Attorney General for the law, but to the Secretary of State, as a sort of chancellor, for his opinion "whether (without waiving the right of the government, or admitting the legal claim to it asserted by the State authorities,) it would be equitable and advisable to allow them to retain the property in question on account of the expenses of the provisional government, in the same manner that the provisional government of North Carolina was allowed to take and retain possession of certain property for the same purpose." The Secretary responds, of course, that "the State of South Carolina, from the time when its provisional government was authorized, is to be considered not as an insurgent, or seditious, or hostile State, but as a State loyal to the Union;" that the State thus loyal "is impoverished, and needs and is entitled not only to forbearance, but to magnanimity and favor;" that it was obvious that much of the captured property would produce no considerable accessions to the treasury, and that if the net avails resulting from a sale would not exceed $60,000, it might be properly relinquished after appraisement, "with the reservation, however, that after peace shall have been proclaimed, and the State of South Carolina shall have been fully restored to her federal relations, the subject shall be referred to the consideration of Congress." The President thereupon directed an appraisement of the property, with instructions for its relinquishment to the State in case it did not exceed in value the amount suggested, but without providing for any future reference to the supreme authority. It was appraised accordingly at $33,928 79, and surrendered to the provisional government without any reservation whatever.

But the munificence of the President to his own governments did not stop with the debris, either of the dead confederacy or of the living Union. True to the paradoxical theory of his minister of state, "that from the time the provisional governments were authorized by him," and while holding and constraining them only by the power of the sword, "they were to be considered as States loyal to the Union, and entitled not only to forbearance, but to magnanimity and favor," he not only manifests his settled purpose of forcing these outlawed communities into their old relations, in defiance of Congress and the people, by the impotent device of reporting their votes on the constitutional amendment in regard to slavery, but presumes to endow them from the national domain by the issue to them, as members of the Union, of patents or certificates for their pretended shares of college scrip, covering a large amount of public land, under the provisions of an act of Congress, (July 5, 1862,) passed while they were in actual rebellion against the government, and authorizing the distribution thereof among the States for agricultural purposes. The testimony of the honorable James Harlan, then Secretary of the Interior, shows that upon the submission by him to the President, at a cabinet meeting, of a demand made by a gentleman representing himself to be the agent of the State of North Carolina, he was directed by that officer, with the assent of a majority of his cabinet, and in conformity, as he says, with "his settled policy, to permit each of the rebel States to receive and enjoy all the rights and privileges of any other State in the Union, on the ground that they had been fully restored," to cause the scrip to be issued accordingly. And the fact that it did issue, and that other scrip was in the course of preparation for the States of Georgia, Virginia, and Mississippi, is verified of record by the recitals of an act of the present Congress, approved by the President himself, in which the whole proceeding is solemnly declared to be unauthorized and illegal, and all further steps in that direction expressly prohibited. Enough, however, was done to show the utter contempt with which the opinion of Congress has been ever regarded, and the determined purpose of the Executive to bend the whole government to his own will.

The committee have not, in their remarks upon the restoration of rebel property, undertaken to inquire into the wisdom or humanity of either the principles of public law, or the enactments of Congress, which divested the titles of the owners, or appropriated it to the uses of the government. On that subject there are differences of opinion among the undersigned, while none of them would have favored a rigorous, universal, or undiscriminating enforcement, since the return of peace, of the penalties prescribed in order to the suppression of the revolt. That, however, is a question which has been already passed upon by the highest authority in this nation, and is not re-examinable here. If it were, it would be an easy task to show at least that the legislation of Congress has been distinguished by a spirit of moderation, forbearance, and magnanimity, that has no example in history. But even if it were otherwise, they are all agreed that it was no business of the Executive. His duty was only to execute the law as he found it, and carry out the policy recognized and established by it, so long as it was the law. The task of mitigating its severity, if it were even rigorous, belonged only to the Congress of the United States, and could be safely trusted with them only, to be exercised, if wisely exercised, with a judicious economy that would husband their resources of mercy, and dispense it at such times, and upon such conditions, as would enable them to conciliate the disaffected, and take security for the future good behavior of those who had offended unto death. That they would have so dealt is not to be questioned. But the assumption of the right of the mere executive officer of the nation to inaugurate a policy of his own, in contradiction of the will of the people, as already declared or hereafter to be declared by their representatives, and to force that policy upon the nation, by turning loose and reinstating all the offenders against its laws, in the possessions and power which they had legally forfeited, was a high crime against it, that deserves not only its censure and condemnation, but a measure of redress so large as not only to correct the evil, but to serve as an example and warning for all future time.

Akin to the subject just discussed is that of the abuse of the pardoning power, another of the articles of charge against the President, which the undersigned will now proceed to examine.

It is not disputed that this power is lodged with the Executive, under the Constitution, without any apparent limitation upon its exercise. It would be a false logic, and a poor statesmanship, however, to infer that it is without reasonable limitations altogether, and may be exercised without discrimination, to the great damage, and possibly to the entire destruction of the government. Every power granted by the Constitution is subject to such a qualification, and if susceptible of abuse, is only to be checked and controlled by the remedy of impeachment. It will scarcely be contended that in a state of war, such as that through which this nation has just passed, the Executive might turn loose the prisoners who were the captives of our spears, as fast as the fortunes of war delivered them into our hands, by according to them an absolute pardon of their crime, although it is clear that he might do it without violating the letter of the law—or that he would not be impeachable and removable for the abuse, either upon considerations connected with the public safety, or on the footing of the traitorous purpose—the animus, in more technical language—which it might disclose.

And yet the exercise of the pardoning power by the present incumbent, as will be shown, if not resulting in the discharge of prisoners, flagrante bello, has been such in its effects as to turn loose, nondum cessante bello, with all their rights and powers of mischief fully restored, and place beyond the reach of punishment, either in person or estate, the very excepted classes who had been justly singled out in the proclamation of amnesty as the ruling spirits of the rebellion, and the most formidable of its agents; and this with the undoubted purpose of enlisting their means and influence, using them as auxiliaries against the government which had just subdued them, in carrying out his policy of reorganizing the rebel communities, and forcing those communities into the Union in defiance of the will of Congress, and of the people of the loyal States. It was with this process that the system of special pardon was first inaugurated, and it was precisely to this class of men that it seemed intended that the work should be especially intrusted. They were the known favorites of the still unsubmissive South. Their merits and popularity rested upon their services in the rebellion, and their known hostility to the government. To make treason honorable, they were elected to the conventions, and although disqualified by the proclamation, were invited to take their seats and participate in the work that was to restore them to their original power in the nation, by the offer, without regard to the merits of the case, of a free pardon, which they had not, perhaps, even condescended to ask. For this purpose the provisional governors were made the almoners of the Executive bounty, and the keepers of the Executive conscience. "Send hither list of members elected to the convention, in order that pardons may be issued," is the language of the State Department to Provisional Governor Johnson, of Georgia, in a telegram of October 27, 1865. "All those who are aspirants to seats in the convention will be pardoned upon your recommendation, and a submission of their names by telegraph," is the language of the President himself in another, of the 21st of September, to Holden, of North Carolina. In this exercise of the high prerogative conferred on him by the Constitution, the committee think he delegated a trust that was purely personal, and abused the power that the Constitution had given him.

If other evidence were wanted, however, to show how far this power was abused as an instrument to subserve the purposes of the President in forcing his policy upon the nation, it may be found in the case of the one hundred and ninety-three deserters from a West Virginia regiment, who were released from all pains and penalties, and restored to their forfeited pay and allowances, to the amount of some $75,000, at the instance of a particular friend of the President, without knowledge of the facts, and upon no other argument, so far as the undersigned can ascertain, than the statement of a pardon-broker, and a letter purporting to have been written by a democratic candidate for Congress, to the effect that it would be doing him a great service by enabling them to vote at the approaching election, because he was well assured that their restoration would result in his election, provided it could be effected immediately. It was effected immediately. The letter of the pardon-broker, Mr. McEwen, of the 22d October, 1866, suggesting the fact that "these men were registered, and wanted to vote, but would be debarred, unless the disability was removed," was placed in the hand of the Hon. T. B. Florence, along with that purporting to be written by Mr. Andrews, the candidate referred to, on the following day, and a peremptory order was at once indorsed by the President, without so much as a reference for any other purpose than its execution. It is testified, however, by the Secretary of War, that no investigation was made by him, but that within a day or two after the order had been sent to the Adjutant General for execution, he was advised by that officer that "he thought the President had been deceived, for he found that one or more of the persons ordered to be relieved had deserted to the enemy;" that he immediately went to the President, and asked him whether he was aware of the fact, and whether he desired to have such persons released; that the President replied in the negative, and directed him to have an investigation made as to how many of them belonged to that class; and that only one was found who belonged to it; but what investigation was made as to the others, he was unable to say.

From this subject the transition is an easy one, to that not only of the failure of the President to execute the laws, but to his absolute obstruction of public justice, in sheltering the violators of the law from the just punishment which it awarded to ther crimes.

The Constitution makes it the duty of the President "to take care that the laws are faithfully executed," and there is no way in which he can evade this duty, except by the exercise of the pardoning power, in cases of offence against the United States. There is no intermediate course by which he can lawfully relieve the offender without incurring the responsibility that might attach to an act of pardon, but yet it is shown by the evidence that he has not only refused on system to enforce the laws enacted for the purpose of punishing treason against the state, but has interposed, through his subordinates, to prevent not only the exaction of forfeitures, but the prosecution of crimes connected with the rebellion. Mr. Chandler, the district attorney for the State of Virginia, testifies that on no less than nineteen indictments found and depending for treason, in that district, proceedings have been indefinitely stayed. In Kentucky, Alabama, and other States, according to the testimony of Attorney General Stanbery, prosecutions of this sort were numerous, and the same is stated by him more specifically as to Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland. And yet, so far as the undersigned are informed, they have been invariably arrested or dismissed, upon such reasons as will be found in the following passage from his testimony: "I considered that no one certainly was expecting that these trials should go on. If it was our duty to try parties indicted for treason, who had taken part in the rebellion, then it was not only our duty to try them, but to prosecute every one else who had been guilty of the same offence. We could not make fish of one and fowl of the other." And again, in answer to the question whether the duty to prosecute would not be determined by the fact of information made, he says: "That is a mode of proceeding. But if there was a public policy to prosecute persons for treason who were engaged in the rebellion; if it was thought necessary to vindicate the laws by such prosecution; and if it was our duty to go on and prosecute, we should be involved in more cases than we were involved in, and these were more than we could manage. I have distinct views on that subject as to the policy of going on with these trials for treason. They were general in Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland. My own opinion was that the war had settled all the issues of the war. I did not myself think it necessary that the question whether secession is treason should be left to any twelve men anywhere." In his opinion, then, it was only a speculative question of casuistry or metaphysics that was involved, and none of the vindication of the law. He had "distinct views as to the policy of punishment." Both he and the President had a policy, which was, unfortunately, not that of the law, and that was to punish nobody. They had "more cases already than they could manage," and therefore they managed none even of those they had, except in the way of dismissing all of them. They could not discriminate, although the President had already discriminated in his first proclamation of amnesty. There were no great criminals to be made examples of although, in a better hour, and in the same instrument, he had already singled them out, and reserved them to be dealt with by the law. The right to pardon even the excepted classes was still open to him, if he did not choose to prosecute, but he had no right to accomplish the same object by indirection, where he may have shrunk from the responsibility of the act, by striding into the courts and using the law officer of the government to strike down their process by the mailed hand of executive authority; and yet this is precisely what he has done in all these cases.

But it is not in the matter of proceedings strictly criminal alone, that the course of public justice has been thus obstructed. The same policy exactly has prevailed in relation to proceedings in rem under the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862. For a few months after the accession of Mr. Johnson, the district attorneys were advised, by circulars from the office here, that they would be expected diligently to enforce these laws; and they proceeded accordingly to file their informations in the courts against all such property as they considered to be obnoxious to this proceeding. This process was, of course, not palatable to the South. The zeal and fidelity of the officer were made the subject of complaint at Washington. The rigor of the rule was relaxed. Attorneys, as shown by the testimony of Mr. Starbuck, who made reports of property that was liable to seizure, even in cases where it had belonged to the dead confederacy, were discouraged by the refusal of the government to prosecute. When they seized the cotton or other property of rebel corporations, accumulated in the service of the confederate government, to which all their resources had been devoted, they were instructed that the directors could not bind the stockholders, on the hypothesis that some of them might possibly be loyal, and the very curious argument, that, if the law were otherwise, the individual property of every town or city whose officers might have appropriated any portion of the public funds in aid of the rebellion, would be liable to confiscation! If permitted to proceed, however, the prerogative stepped in under Order No. 15, in the shape of a pardon, with the royal sign manual attached, to wrest the confiscated property from the hands of the government. And the whole mockery was ended, after the briefest life, by the order of October 10, 1865, conforming to that issued to the Freedmen's Bureau, and instructing them to make no more seizures under the confiscation act of July 17, 1862, until further orders from the department. Nor from that time forward have the inducements to official fidelity been any more flattering. The fate of James Q Smith, the district attorney for Alabama, and apparently one of the most intelligent and faithful of these officers, who is admitted to have been driven from that State for his adherence to the Union, and his property sequestrated, is evidence of this. Offending in the same way as General Saxton, his head fell, like that of Saxton, upon the remonstrance of certain members of the bar of middle Alabama—most of them, no doubt, consenting to his expatriation and the seizure of his property—on charges of ignorance and incapacity, oppression in office, and the exaction of illegal fees. His correspondence with the department shows that the first was grossly libellous The second is just the complaint that was likely to be made against a faithful officer. And if dismissed on the third, for aught that appears, it was without a hearing and without evidence.

That this, however, has been, and is to the present day, the settled policy of the government, is a point not open to dispute. It is admitted by Attorney General Stanbery, in answer to a question put to him by the committee, that he has neither instituted nor directed any proceedings whatever in the courts, either criminal or civil, in personam or in rem, for the enforcement of the laws passed for the suppression of the rebellion. His reasons for arresting prosecutions for treason have been already detailed. In regard to the confiscation acts, he says that he found this policy prevailing when he came into office, and his own reasons for not enforcing them are that they were, in his judgment, only war measures, which had served their purpose, and run their course; and that it would, moreover, be an erroneous policy to confiscate property after the return of peace.

Mr. Speed agrees that this was the policy in his time, and that it had the approbation of the President. It is to be remarked, however, that it was the opinion of that gentleman, as communicated to the Senate by the President, so late as January 5, 1866, (Ex. Doc. No. 7,) that though active hostilities had ceased, a state of war still existed over the territory in rebellion; and we have the admissions of the President himself in his proclamations of April 2 and August 20, 1866, that until the last mentioned day, the peace of the Union was not re-established. It is to be remembered, moreover, that until the restoration of the judicial authority by the re-introduction of the courts into the conquered territory, it was impossible to execute these laws so far as they regarded lands. There was no apology, therefore, for refusing to enforce them, even supposing them to have been war measures only, at least until the return of universal peace was so solemnly proclaimed by the President. By the construction of these Attorneys General, they became absolutely inoperative with the first practicable opportunity of enforcing them. The main objection seems to have been, however, that the policy of the law was not in accord with that of the President. That any Attorney General holding his place by the tenure of the executive will, should agree with his principal, and think him wiser than the Congress of the United States, is perhaps entirely natural; but that he should allow himself to be betrayed into the opinion that the laws were not to be enforced because he or the President could possibly have made better ones, is a striking commentary on the effect of cabinet conclaves, in the long interregna of Congress, upon great affairs of state, on the part of men, who are, under the theory of our Constitution, but the ministers and not the supervisors of the legislative will. Nothing but the habit of making law, or dispensing with it, could have led to such a result.

The indisposition of the government, however, to bring to justice even the guiltiest of the rebel leaders is best exemplified in its treatment of two of their number—one the border agent, who was commissioned to organize invasions from the territory of a neutral state, and the other the head of the rebel confederacy.

It will be remembered that amongst the individuals charged by the President with the crime of complicity in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, was Clement C. Clay, who, in addition to this offence, was held for the crime of setting on foot piratical expeditions to plunder and burn our cities. Though not arrested at the time, the fact of his confederation with the murderers of Mr. Lincoln was found by the sentence of a military commission, which received the approval of the President. Upon his surrender, after a short imprisonment, though laboring under so grave an imputation, he was released on his parole on the 19th of April, 1866. On an information lodged against him, subsequently, by the district attorney for the State of Alabama—the same who was removed, as already shown, for his superserviceable zeal—he was indicted for treason and conspiracy, and his property duly seized for confiscation under the act of 1862. On application, however, to the President, the proceedings for confiscation were dismissed, and his property restored on the 14th of February, 1867. On the 21st of the same month an order was issued to the district attorney of that State, suspending proceedings on the indictment, and, on the 26th of March, the same attorney was directed again to suspend proceedings indefinitely, and instructed, specially, not even to make the arrest.

In regard to the case of the leader of the rebellion himself, the committee are not agreed upon the propriety or necessity of indulging at present in any special commentary.

Next to the obstruction of the course of public justice, and the flat disobedience of the mandates of the law therein, is the abuse of the appointing power, and with it the power of removal, which, although not conferred on the President by the Constitution, has been generally conceded to him in practice since the foundation of the government, as an incident to the power to appoint, and only conceded, perhaps, on the opinion expressed by Madison in the debate in the first Congress, in 1789, on the establishment of the department of foreign relations, that its abuse would be impeachable. And here it may be truly said that, among all the appliances used to coerce the national will, and force the policy of the President upon the country in opposition to the opinion of its Congress, there have been none more profligate and law-defying than those connected with the exercise of this tremendous power.

It is not to be denied that, for the last thirty years of our history, this great power has been again and again abused by the indiscriminate proscription of valuable public servants, for no other reason than to reward the hungry hordes who have followed upon the heels of a successful aspirant, or to punish those who have been independent enough, or perhaps unfortunate enough, to differ in their political opinions with the victorious candidate or party. To some extent, at least, it was to be expected that an incoming party should gather around it the men who most faithfully reflected its opinions, and it was perhaps not unreasonable that it should endeavor to strengthen itself by taking possession of the strong places of the government, so far as might be essential to the success of its administration. The power of appointment involves, like the pardoning power, the exercise of a discretion as large as it, with the advantage of a check against abuse in the association of the Senate. That of removal, however, like the same power of pardon, is without limits, except in the constitutional check against abuse by the remedy of impeachment. The measure of criminality would depend, however, in all such cases, not so much upon the act itself, as upon the animus with which it was done, and that is only to be reached by uncovering the hearts, and penetrating the hidden motives of those who may have discretion enough to disguise an unlawful purpose by an affectation of zeal for the public interests. And this has been precisely the difficulty heretofore. In the present case, however, we see, perhaps for the first time, the intent of the dispenser of the government patronage boldly and shamelessly avowed. The present incumbent, without a party to represent his opinions, except it may be in the rebel States, and in the very crisis of his mortal struggle with the Congress of the United States, has felt no hesitation in declaring in effect, in a public speech, and in the hearing of the whole nation, that the present is but a contest for power between the Congress and himself. The former, as he charges, is aiming to maintain its ascendancy in the government, and to perpetuate it by keeping its friends in office, and threatens accordingly to pass a law to prevent him from turning them out. "But," he remarks, "if you will stand by me in this action, God willing, I will kick them out just as fast as I can." And he is as good as his word. The axe is put in motion, and nearly two thousand heads fall on the scaffold in about four months, to the great detriment of the public service, while the argument in reply to the inquiry of Congress, as to the causes of their removal, is not official misbehavior, but "political reasons" only, which, as explained by the testimony of the Postmaster General, means that they favored the policy of the representatives of the people in preference to the scheme of the President. It is not, like those that have gone before it, even the case of a triumphant party coming into the possession of the government, upon a set of opinions that have received the indorsement of the nation, but that of a President almost without a follower, holding by the votes of those whose will he attempts to overrule, and employing the patronage they have so generously placed in his hands, for the public use, in the endeavor to make his own will supreme over this land.

But it is not only in the general fact of wholesale removal without cause, that Andrew Johnson has sinned against the nation's law. If there were even a precedent to excuse him thus far, there is more behind for which there is no example. Although the wisdom of the Constitution has associated with the President, the Senate of the United States, as an advisory body in the making of appointments, he has practically ousted that body of its jurisdiction, and absorbed the whole appointing power in himself, by refusing in many cases to make nominations for vacancies that had been filled by him during the recess of the Senate, and retaining and reappointing not only the incumbents of these offices, but men who had actually been rejected by that body. The Secretary of the Treasury reports twenty-six cases out of one hundred and ninety-nine removals, in the customs and internal revenue service, of the former character, which he is pleased to ascribe to clerical inadvertence, although they are all alleged by him to have been duly returned to the President, and he was obliged to admit that he was speaking only by conjecture in regard to a point of which he was confessedly ignorant. The same number of cases is reported by him of re-appointments of the same individuals after rejection by the Senate, and after the adjournment of that body. A single case of the latter description is also reported by the Attorney General, while the Postmaster General returns a list of about seventy postmasters whose nominations were not sent in, and ten where the persons rejected were re-appointed. The apology is, in the former case, that the omissions were accidental, which could not well be, so long as the President keeps a record of these matters, and is so liberally provided with clerks. In the latter, the act was one of commission, where the idea of inadvertence is inadmissible. That they involve a violation of duty—a manifest breach of the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution—and tend to overthrow the just balance of the government, and with it to endanger the liberties of the people, no man can seriously dispute. If the President may refuse to nominate for vacancies which have been filled by him during the recess, and continue the same officers, or can appoint others after the adjournment of the Senate—or if he may disregard their advice, by re-appointing the individuals whom they may have rejected, he may obviously keep up the succession, without advice, and perpetuate the power indefinitely in himself, while the Senate will cease to have any value, or any actual function as an advisory council in this government.

But this is not all. It is not the Constitution only that has been violated in the matter of appointments. It was necessary to get out of the way also the laws which Congress has enacted as a part of its policy in the suppression of the rebellion, and the restoration of the Union. By an act passed on the 9th of February, 1863, it was provided that no money should be paid from the treasury of the United States to any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval, as salary in any office not authorized by some previously existing law, unless where such office shall be subsequently sanctioned by law; and again by the act establishing a test oath, passed on the 2d of July, 1862, it was further provided that hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, shall, before entering on the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe a certain oath—being that generally known as the test oath—which oath so taken and signed shall be preserved among the files of the court, house of Congress, or department to which the said office may appertain.

The very first step in the process of executive reconstruction, the lawfulness of which its chief director and manager, the Secretary of State, to whose department it was assigned, does not hesitate to say he never doubted for a moment, involved a manifest violation of the Constitution of the United States, as well as both these laws. The project wanted southern managers. None were so fit, of course, for such a work as the traitor class, in whose interest it was apparently contrived. It was clear, moreover, that it could not be accomplished without money. In the place of provisional governor a new civil office was created by proclamation, that was unknown to our laws. To that office men were appointed and commissioned, without the advice of the Senate, who were notoriously disqualified from taking the test oath by reason of their active participation in the rebellion, and salaries assigned and paid to them out of the contingent fund of one of the departments of the government. Nay, as if the very annals of despotism had been ransacked for examples, the stinted resources of the executive departments were, as already shown, to be eked out by the stranded wrecks—the unadministered assets—of the dead confederacy, which these extraordinary functionaries were allowed to seize and appropriate; and failing in this resource, they were still further authorized to quarter themselves, like the lieutenants of the Cæsars, or rather like so many Turkish pashas, by the sovereign power of taxation, upon the conquered provinces, claimed at the same time by the Executive to be States of this Union, at peace with the nation, with all their original rights restored, and with their functions only temporarily impaired!

Governor Parsons, of Alabama, testifies that he took the oath with a qualification as to so much of it as denied the agency of the party in the rebellion. Governor Sharkey swears that he took an oath that was prepared for him in the State Department, which was not the test oath, and "had nothing of that sort in it," and that instead of filing it, as he should have done, he took it home with him. Their salaries were paid, however; and thus was this great law—a leading feature of the policy of Congress, enacted for the safety of the States, and to prevent the intrusion of traitors into the offices of the government, and the quartering of such men upon the resources of the loyal tax-payers—most flagrantly disregarded in every particular.

But it was not in these cases only that the law in question was trampled under foot. It was set aside intentionally in the appointment of officers in the customs and internal revenue service in the rebel States, who were known to be incapable of taking the oath required by law, and were accordingly allowed to amend and qualify it in such a way as suited their respective measures of patriotism. The fact was first brought to the notice of the House in the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to a resolution of inquiry addressed to the President, showing fifty-four appointments of this character, with the admission that there were undoubtedly others whose oaths had not yet been received. The effect was, that the payment of salaries to the men so appointed was, from that time forward, out of the question; but, instead of conforming to the law by removing them at once, a special message was thereupon transmitted to Congress by the President, on the 5th of April, 1866, (Ex. Doc. No. 81,) suggesting a modification of the law, and conveying letters addressed to him by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, urging the necessity of the change. The argument of the Secretary, resting on a strong feeling of sympathy for the rebel appointees, who, according to his statement, were suffering for the want of their salaries, recites the fact that, in view of the opinion of "the President and his cabinet," that "the revenue system ought to be established throughout the recently rebellious States with as little delay as practicable, and that the very unpleasant duty of collecting taxes from an exhausted and recently rebellious people should be performed by their own citizens, he had not hesitated to recommend, nor the President to appoint" men who might have been so connected with the insurgent State and confederate governments as to be unable to take the oath; and as the emergency seemed too pressing to admit of delay until the meeting of Congress, it was thought that the test oath might, in view of the great object to be attained, in some cases be dispensed with. "No one," he says, "could have regretted more than yourself and the members of your cabinet, the necessity which existed for this course; but there seemed to be no alternative, and it was confidently hoped that under the circumstances of the case, it would be approved by Congress." And he re-enforces the argument in favor of a change in the law by the suggestion, that as there were few persons of character or intelligence in those States who could qualify under the statute, he was "at a loss to know where the right men could be obtained," and "was well satisfied that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find them;" and that, moreover, "if the present incumbents should be dismissed, the public revenues would be seriously diminished."

It is clear, then, from this statement, that the law in question was knowingly violated, and that on calculation, with a view to a policy of restoration which was at variance with the will of Congress. And the former of these propositions is affirmed by the testimony of the then Attorney General, (Mr. Speed,) who states that he advised and voted against it as unlawful, and was supported in that view by one other member of the cabinet, (Mr. Stanton,) while Mr. Seward, who favored the proposition, admits that these appointments were made with a full knowledge of the disqualifications of the appointees under the law, and, upon full consultation, with the distinct and deliberate purpose of dispensing with it until Congress should be in a condition to modify it so as to meet the views of the Executive.

But the emergency was too pressing, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, to wait for the assembling of Congress. This, however, is the poorest of subterfuges. If the President had desired to confer with the Congress of the United States, or had hoped to secure their co-operation in his work, he would have called them together, as he could have done, long before the period of the pressing emergency which is supposed to have necessitated these violations of the law; and the very assertion of the necessity is a confession that he failed in his duty in not convoking them. He cannot plead his own default as an excuse for dispensing with the law. If it was necessary, as the Secretary and the Executive both suppose, that he should at once proceed to establish civil government in those States, and carry into effect the revenue laws, it was equally necessary that he should summon the law-making power to his aid, because it was clear that he could not get along lawfully without it. The Secretary's argument admits as much, but proposes that the President shall avoid this by doing the legislation himself, until Congress shall come here only to make the law conform to what their joint wisdom has determined that it ought to be. But the President had no real desire to see the representatives of the people of the loyal States. No spectacle could apparently have gratified him less. Nor had he any reason to believe that they would consent to repeal the test oath if here. If he had thought so, and it had been dispensed with merely because the urgency was such as to render it impossible to wait for them, they would have been scarcely allowed to assemble without having their attention invited to the infractions of that law, which had been necessitated by their absence, instead of being left to discover the fact themselves. But necessity has been called the tyrant's plea; and the apology made here is no more than a rehearsal of the argument of the crown lawyers in defence of the prerogative of making laws—which never was extended, however, to that of constructing governments—by proclamation. That prerogative perished in England with the Tudors. But others descended—a fatal inheritance—upon the unfortunate family of the Stuarts. It was the mistake of Charles I, to insist on governing without a parliament, as it was the error of the last of that dynasty to cling to the ancient but obsolete prerogative of dispensing with the laws, which tumbled him from his throne, and drove him and his family beyond the seas. It is a sort of apothegm that history repeats itself. It is but natural, of course, that tyranny should always follow the same road and employ the same devices; but it is something more than a common coincidence, to find that the very act which culminated in the ruin of the second James is precisely that which challenges our animadversion here. Both involved the dispensation with a law establishing a test oath as a qualification for office. In the former it was doubted by the ablest lawyers whether the prerogative did not extend thus far in special cases, and a judicial decision was obtained before a bench of pliable judges in affirm-ance of it. But it was too late for such experiments. The British nation revolted, and the revolution, with its bill of rights, has swept away forever this last remnant of ancient tyranny. The only difference between the cases is that this is one of a political test, while that was a religious one. No monarch will ever venture to assert that prerogative again in England. It remains to be seen whether it can be asserted with impunity here.

The main apology, however, for this usurpation of power is, that it was difficult, if not impossible to find competent men who could take the oath, and that as a consequence the revenue must have been the sufferer.

It would have been well, perhaps, if the latter of these considerations had occurred to the President or Secretary, on the occasion of the wholesale decapitation of valuable and faithful officers in the same department of service in the North, in advance of the elections of 1866, for no other reason than because they did not favor the policy of the President. But was it true that good and loyal men could not be found within the rebel States? Were they sought after? Were they wanted? Or was it the policy of the President to favor the traitor class in this particular, as in others?

The evidence establishes the fact conclusively that there were loyal men enough within these States, notwithstanding the discouraging exhibit of the Secretary, to perform these duties, if it had been his policy to employ them. The fact that these States, or some of them, contributed so largely to the Union armies, while as a general thing, the truest and bravest of our friends amongst them, were driven into exile, ought to be a sufficient answer to the unjust reflection that there were no men of character there who had not bowed the knee to Baal. But the statement is as untrue as it was ungenerous, as has been already shown by the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House, in the 39th Congress, (Rep. No. 51) made on the 23d of April, 1866, upon a reference of the message and communications now referred to. It is there stated, upon the authority of a letter from the Treasury Department itself, that one of the newly appointed officers who could not qualify—Montgomery Moses by name—who was appointed collector of the first district of South Carolina, was for four years collector of war tax for Jeff. Davis, while, in the language of the writer, "all his sons were rebels, and are now sucking government pap, and plenty of Union men here are idle." It was further stated, moreover, that a communication was furnished to a leading paper of this city, about that time, to the effect "that General Spenser, who commanded a part of the three thousand federal Alabama troops, and the Union men of that State then here, would be happy to furnish to the Treasury and Post Office Departments, the names of hundreds of respectable, reliable, and intelligent Unionists in that State, who were able to take the test oath of office without mutilation or mental reservation;" and that another of the same sort, protesting against the repeal of the law, in the name of the loyal men of Virginia, declared that "there were a sufficient number of competent and loyal men incarcerated at Richmond and Salisbury, for no cause but devotion to the Union government, to fill all the federal appointments in that State; and that the same was true as to all the others, if such men had the least encouragement to apply for them." Some of them did venture upon the experiment; among others, Mr. J. J. Giers, of Alabama, who, although backed by the special indorsements of Mr. Lincoln, Generals Grant and Thomas, and even Andrew Johnson himself, when military governor of Tennessee, was postponed to a Mr. F. W. Sykes, who was a member of the rebel legislature of the same State. The Secretary admits, on his examination before the committee, that the inquiries made for loyal men were of parties whom they met with from the South, but most generally of the provisional governors, the most of whom were disqualified under the test oath law themselves; and says that "he supposes most of the persons they consulted had in some manner participated in the rebellion." The despatch of Provisional Governor Holden to the President, of October 19, 1865,

"Sir, please direct that no more appointments of collectors and assessors of internal revenue be made for this State, until I can make nominations"—goes far to prove that the selection of these officers was committed entirely to those illegal functionaries. On evidence like this, the House refused to alter the law, reconstruction in this way being no part of its policy. The favorites were of course obliged to retire, because it was evident that they could not be paid, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself gives testimony to the untruthfulness of the reasons upon which the President felt himself compelled to dispense with the law, by the admission that he finds no difficulty in securing loyal and unexceptionable men to fill all the offices!

The next article of charge is that which relates to the abuse of the veto power.

It is not denied, of course, that the Constitution has lodged this power with the President in the same general terms as are employed in refererence to the pardoning power. It would be equally a mistake here, however, to suppose that it was intended to be free from all limitation, or was exercisable in all cases at his mere caprice, without any discrimination as to the object, and in such a way as to obstruct on system the action of the legislative power. The President is not, as he has been generally but too apt to suppose himself, a part of the legislature. It is not with him, as with the King of England, who, even under the still prevailing forms that mark the progress of the British constitution, is theoretically supposed to be the fountain of all law as well as honor, and may exercise the power of a Roman tribune, by absolutely arresting an act of legislation by his royal negative. The negative which the Constitution gives the President is but a suspensive one—a merely dilatory engine, or a sort of brake upon the movement of the legislative machine. The time was when its interposition was a very unusual one—as it is at this day in England, where it has slept for near two hundred years—and when it was considered by statesmen that the only proper occasion for its exercise was in cases where the objection arose out of the fundamental law, and the constitutional obligations of the President therefore necessitated dissent. The committee have not found it necessary, however, to resort to any extreme ground like this. It is sufficient, in their judgment, if it shall be found that this power has been systematically employed to defeat the will of the people, and accomplish the criminal designs of the Executive, and not for the purpose only of giving them time to reconsider the acts of their representatives. If the Declaration of Independence made it a special grievance that the King of England, in the exercise of his undoubted perogative, had "refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary to the public good," and that he had "obstructed the administration of justice by refusing it to laws establishing judiciary powers," it can scarcely be supposed that the men who put it forth intended that there should be no remedy short of revolution for its abuse.

On this point there seems to be no difficulty. Whatever may have been the motive in other cases, the present Executive has not hesitated to disclose the animus which has governed him. In his speech at St. Louis, he has unreservedly proclaimed in the hearing of the American people, that in this great struggle between the legislative power of the nation and himself, "he would veto its acts whenever they came to him." And he has been as good as his word here also. In every instance, perhaps without an exception, where those acts looked to the pacification and restoration of the rebel States, and the protection of the Union element therein, he has interposed his objections, and exerted his power to defeat the will of the people of the loyal States. That he has not succeeded in this object, and brought the legislation of the country to a dead stand in everything that concerned the restoration of tranquillity, is to be set down exclusively to the fact that the rebels themselves, whom he sought to introduce, have not been allowed to hold a place in its councils.

The undersigned do not propose an inquiry into the sufficiency or sincerity of the reasons upon which he has unsuccessfully attempted to thwart the will of the nation on so many important occasions, even though the recent change of posture, in regard to the meaning and effect of one of the last great acts of its legislation, might well invite a scrutiny into the motives upon which he refused to give it his assent. There is evidence, however, in regard to the veto of the bill for the admission of the Territory of Colorado, that does show an attempt to secure the support of the senators elect from that Territory, on the condition of the approval of the bill passed by the two houses of Congress. It may be contended, perhaps, that the fact is not made out by the conversations of the President himself, and that the agency of his private secretary (the Hon. Edward Cooper) might not possibly be considered, under his own disclaimer, as sufficient in law to criminate the supposed principal. If it had been the desire of the President, however, to secure the support of the new senators by such an offer, it is not to be supposed that he would have negotiated with them in any other way. "See Cooper," was the language used by the President to Mr. Scovill, of New Jersey, when the question became so delicate as to make it judicious to adjourn the conversation, and refer the question to an intermediary. Whether it was regarded as important that Cooper should "see" them, may be learned from the interview which followed the mysterious note inviting it, of which the handwriting was unknown to himself, and of which the detected writer, (Mr. Coyle, of the Intelligencer,) who could not deny it to be his own, was profoundly oblivious. The undersigned are of the opinion that no impartial man can read the testimony on this subject, in connection with the veto message itself, without seeing in it the evidence that the approval or disapproval of that bill, against which no constitutional objections were alleged, was made to depend entirely on the question whether the votes of the two senators could be secured in favor of the "policy" of the President.

The next in order of the charges on which your committee are required to pass, is that of a corrupt interference in elections.

This, however, is covered to a great extent by the abuse of the appointing power in the removal of public officers for reasons merely political, and the bestowal of their places on others, upon the terms of adherence to the policy of the President. A reference to the papers on file in the Post Office and Treasury Departments will show that this was the argument most relied on in nearly all the cases of appointments and removals. To descend into details on such a subject would be a task of infinite and by no means agreeable labor. The committee will content themselves with referring, in this connection, to the testimony of two only of the witnesses examined before them. One of these witnesses, a man named Geiger, of Ohio, who held the place of a travelling agent in the revenue service, at a salary of two thousand dollars a year and expenses, testifies that he was on actual duty some four or five months only of the time, and that he attended the Philadelphia convention, and made a long tour and multitudinous speeches in support of the President's policy. What important services he rendered to the government beyond this, does not very satisfactorily appear. Mr. Sloan, of the same State, who held another agency of the like description in the Post Office Department, states that, having understood the President wished to see him, he "called accordingly, and was informed by him that he was very anxious to head off the intense radicals, hoped that Ohio would not indorse them, and said it was very important that the schemes of those in Congress should not take possession of the hearts of the people;" that "he was anxious to have everything done to head them off," and that "in carrying out his views in Ohio, the offices should be given to his friends;" and that, in pursuance of this conversation, Colonel L. D. Campbell, Geiger, General Burnett, and himself, having united upon some changes, waited together on the President, and they were made.

The case of the general order business in New York, where heavy burdens improperly imposed on commerce were appropriated, not only for the benefit of favorites, but for "political purposes," is another case that has been already made familiar to the House through the investigation of another of its committees. To have pursued this line of inquiry further, by a minute scrutiny into the contributions levied upon office-holders, either to support newspapers, or in the way of brokerage to favorites, would have involved a task of weariness and supererogation both, in a case where the facts are generally notorious, and their importance is greatly dwarfed in the presence of so many more flagrant and undeniable enormities. The presence and active participation of two of the heads of departments in a political convention at Philadelphia, having for its object the organization of a party to sustain the policy of the President, and defeat the will of Congress and the people, and one of those functionaries the prime agent in the removals from and appointments to office for "political reasons," is a fact well known to the country. The like had not happened before in its history. In the view of right-minded men, it was something more than a public scandal. Mr. Locke regards the employment of "the force, treasure and offices of the society, to corrupt the representatives, or openly to pre-engage the electors, and prescribe what manner of persons shall be chosen," as among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate which amount to a dissolution of the government; for "what is it," he says, "but to cut up the government by the roots, and poison the very fountains of public security?" (Locke on Government, vol. 2, §222.) The like opinion has commended itself to the common sense of the people of England, and finds expression as well in the common law, as in their declaration of rights. Judge Blackstone says (1 Com., 178) that "as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal, and strongly prohibited." The jealousy of the Commons is, however, better illustrated by the fact, that they have not only proclaimed it by solemn resolution to be "highly criminal in any minister or servant under the Crown, directly or indirectly, to use the power of office to influence the election of representatives, and that any attempt at such influence will always be resented by that House as aimed at its own honor, dignity, and independence, as an infringement of the dearest rights of every subject throughout the empire, and tending to sap the basis of this their free and happy constitution;" but that at the commencement of every session of Parliament, it is their usage to declare it to be "a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the House of Commons, for any lord of Parliament or lord lieutenant of any county to concern himself in the election of any member of Parliament;" and in the same spirit it is provided by law that "if any officer of the excise, customs, stamps, or certain other branches of the revenue, presume to intermeddle in elections, by persuading any voter, or dissuading him, he shall forfeit £100, and be disabled from holding any office." Mr. Johnson has made of the revenue service of this nation, an engine to defeat its will, by confessedly removing unexceptionable officers for no other offence than because they would not use their places to advance his policy. Whether the appearance of his ministers, or "upper servants," on such occasions as have been described, and the exercise of their high trusts in aid of his great usurpation, and in slavish subordination to his will, are to be regarded as criminal here, and resented by this House, as a blow aimed at its independence, involving an infringement of the dearest rights of the people here, and tending to undermine our own free and happy Constitution, the House itself will decide. Standing alone and under ordinary circumstances, it might, perhaps, afford to pass it over. As one of the most potent agencies in the concerted, obstinate, and persistent attempt to overwhelm the legislature and the courts, and usurp all the powers of government, it cannot, we think, with due fidelity to the living generation and to posterity, permit it to go unrebuked or unavenged.

But the efforts of the President to break down the power of Congress and impose his own policy on the nation, have not been confined to the mere disregard of the law, or the abuse of the extraordinary powers conferred on him by the Constitution.

The history of the country shows that from the first moment at which it was ascertained that it was the determination of the law-making power to settle for itself the great question of the reconstruction of the government, all the power and influence of the administration were brought into play, not only to prevent the enactment of laws, but even the execution of those which it seemed good to Congress to enact in defiance of the will of the Executive, by denying their authority, and endeavoring to bring the representative body into public obloquy and contempt. The first unmistakable public exhibition of this determination on his part, is to be found, perhaps, as has been already remarked, in the memorable utterances of the 22d of February, 1866, provoked apparently by the exercise of the undoubted rights of Congress, in referring, for the consideration of a joint committee of the two houses, one of the most important questions in our history, instead of humbly and submissively accepting the instructions of the President in regard to its duties, along with the passage of a law for the protection of the loyal people of the South from the persecutions of the defeated but vindictive rebels, who were then rejoicing in the sunshine of Executive favor. It was not the first time that this great nation had been shocked and humbled by an exhibition so scandalous in itself, and so damaging to its reputation, in the person of its highest magistrate. It was the first time, certainly, when, in utter forgetfulness of the proprieties of the position, of the respect and decorum always to be observed by the co-ordinate departments of the government towards each other, and always so essential to the maintenance of their proper harmony and dignity, a chief magistrate of this republic had ever ventured to make of measures depending before the representative body the subject of public remark, or to call in question what was said by an individual member, by singling him out as an object of public animadversion. Although there was a time in British history when the King might send down for a refractory member, or perhaps even visit the House to administer to it a public reprimand, there has been no time since the revolution of 1688, when the Commons of England would not have resented this as a breach of privilege, as they would equally an attempt like that of the President in his first annual message, in December, 1865, to instruct them in regard to their duties; and there is no privilege enjoyed by that body which is not equally essential to the independence of this. Nor is the breach on the part of the Executive to be justified by anything that is said or done here. He has no right to know what occurs in either house of Congress. The Constitution provides expressly that no member shall be questioned for anything said by him in debate on either floor. It has, bestowed, moreover, no supervisory power on the President—nothing, indeed beyond the mere right to communicate officially, and in a decorous way, his objections to a bill, when it has duly reached him; while, on the other hand, it does make the President responsible to Congress, by lodging with it the power to inquire into his public conduct, and to impeach and remove him when necessary.

But the unseemly exhibition just referred to was not the mere ebullition of a transient displeasure with an individual, which died with the occasion. If it had been, it might, perhaps, have been excused as a mere infirmity of temper on the part of the distinguished censor. But it was an attack on the law-making power. It denied the lawfulness of the Congress itself, and disputed the validity of its acts as such. And it was followed up by others so gross and scandalous, as to disclose a systematic purpose on the part of the Executive to remove that obstacle out of his way, by denying its authority, and inculcating a spirit of disobedience to its enactments. To prove the truth of this, it is only necessary to refer to his public characterization of the national legislature as "a body calling itself a Congress, and hanging, as it were, on the verge of the government;" his repeated declarations that it was composed of "usurpers," "traitors at the other end of the line," who were themselves in rebellion against the government, and incompetent to legislate for the people whom they had wrongfully excluded from a share in their deliberations. The echo of his last speech, denouncing the result of the action of Congress, as the establishment of a military despotism in the south, is still lingering on our ears.

Such language as this, coming from the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and followed up, as it was, by correspondent acts, in the then unsettled condition of the country, just emerging from a long and bloody war, and with a hostile population scarce half subdued, overflowing with rancor and bitterness against the Union which they hated, and all loyal men who had aided in their defeat, and ready to join hands with the first ally that might offer, to accomplish their cherished wish for the destruction of the government, was full of danger to the republic. If not intended, it was at least well calculated to subvert the government. It was a direct invitation, while the wounds of the South were still green and festering, to new rebellion, in which they were to be aided by all the power of the administration, backed by the whole anti-war democracy of the North—and it was so understood. If not dealt with as treason against the state, it was only because the war was supposed to be over. Promulgated as publicly during the continuance of actual hostilities, by any officer of the government, it would have cost him his commission and his liberty. If it did not reopen the strife of arms, or result in a coup d'état which would have turned over the whole government into the hands of the defeated rebels, it was only the constancy and fidelity of the loyal people of the North, in sustaining their Congress, that prevented it. The South was ready to respond. The armies of the Union had been withdrawn. In some parts the broken squadrons of the rebellion were silently mustering and reorganizing, under the color of conservators of the local peace. It had already, under this encouragement, unsheathed the sword against the white loyalist, and prepared the fetters for the black one. Mr. Goodloe, the United States marshal for the State of North Carolina, testifies (in January) that "the disposition of the people in that State had undergone a most unfavorable change during the last twelve months, in consequence, mainly, of the encouragement administered by the speeches of the President, and their idea that he would be able to resist the policy of Congress, and that in April, 1866, the rumor was prevalent at Wilmington, and circulated on the authority of a very intelligent lawyer who had just returned from Washington, that 'the President was going to bring 70,000 or 75,000 men to Washington, and was going to displace Congress and do as he pleased.'" Mr. Starbuck, the district attorney of the same State, testifies also to an "unfavorable change of sentiment, an increasing spirit of disaffection, and an outspoken feeling of disloyalty, occasioned as well by the position of the President during the first session of the thirty-ninth Congress, as by the too liberal exercise of the pardoning power; that it began with the division between the President and Congress; that the disloyal element took sides with the President, and that they were encouraged to believe that it would create a division in the North, and that in case of difficulty they would have friends there." The like testimony in regard to the revival of disloyal sentiment throughout the whole South is to be found in the evidence taken before, and annexed to the report of the joint Reconstruction Committee of the thirty-ninth Congress. How much private suffering and bloodshed it has involved to the loyal people of the South no man will ever know. The tragedies of Memphis and New Orleans, those great carnivals of murder, where ex-confederate soldiers in their traitor uniforms, and wearing the insignia of the rebellion, were let loose like wolves to riot in the blood of loyal men, only standing out more obtrusively than others in the foreground of the dark picture that overspreads the canvas, may, we think, be fairly set down to the account of the President, who, in the latter of these cases, which he substantially justifies, while he throws the whole responsibility on Congress, ignoring the civil authorities of the State, commissioned known traitors to break up a legitimate assemblage of loyal men, and directed the military to sustain them in the act. All were but the consequences of the "instructions" issuing from the President. If they were not rehearsed in the streets of Baltimore, it is only to the well-timed expostulations of the leader of our armies that we are indebted for the fact. If the rebel States are not yet reconstructed, it is because he has unfitted their people for readmission into the old family circle of the Union; because he has taught them to disregard the authority of Congress; because he has encouraged them to believe that his will would prevail in this contest over that of the people's representatives; and because he has interfered with every forward step which they have taken in the pathway of peaceful and permanent restoration.

That, instead of acquiescing, as he was bound to do, he has endeavored to obstruct the plans of Congress by using his influence to prevent the adoption by the loyal, and the acceptance on the part of the rebel States, of the very liberal terms which it was pleased to offer, is a fact that might well rest on the evidence of two witnesses examined by the committee; one, Mr. Weatherby, of the pretended South Carolina legislature, and the other, Mr. Scovill, a senator from New Jersey, who severally called upon and conversed with him on that subject. To the former, who was sent up for this purpose in December, 1866, he remarked that "the Supreme Court had made a decision, perhaps the day before, which indicated the course they would take, and that he entertained a hope that he would be able to save the country by carrying out his policy on his plan." To the observation, however, that "the people of South Carolina were in such trouble that they were disposed to weaken on the subject of the constitutional amendment, if it would restore the country," he answered that "they had no assurance that it would restore the country; that it would give up everything; and he would regard it as the destruction of the Constitution and the country;" and Mr. Weatherby went home with his opposition strengthened. By the latter, who held, as he says, a casting vote in the senate of New Jersey, it was proved that he had an understanding with the President through his private secretary, (Mr. Cooper,) to whom he was referred by him, that he might control the offices in West Jersey, if not in the whole State, if he would sustain the policy of the administration, including the defeat of the constitutional amendment. But it is not necessary to rely on mere oral evidence. The fact is abundantly proved by the gratuitous message of June 22, 1866, (Ex. Doc. No. 57,) conveying the report of the Secretary of State on the resolution requesting the submission by him of the constitutional amendment recommended by Congress to the legislatures of the several States. The duty was a purely ministerial one, which required no more than a return of the fact that it had been performed. It pleased the President, however, to improve the occasion for the purpose of testifying his hostility to the amendment, with which he had nothing properly to do, and upon which his opinion had not been asked, by a public protest, in which, after referring to the peculiar importance of the proceeding, in view of the facts that the amendment was not submitted for his approval, and that, of the thirty-six States, eleven were excluded from representation, although, as he states, with the single exception of Texas, they had been entirely restored as States in conformity with the organic law, and of the doubt whether the action of Congress was in harmony with the sentiments of the people, and whether State legislatures, elected without reference to such an issue, should be called upon to decide upon the ratification, he concludes as follows:

"Waiving the question as to the constitutional validity of the proceedings of Congress upon the joint resolution proposing the amendment, or as to the merits of the article which it submits through the executive department to the legislatures of the States, I deem it proper to observe that the steps taken by the Secretary of State, as detailed in the accompanying report, could be construed as purely ministerial, and in no sense whatever committing the Executive to an approval or recommendation of the amendment to the State legislatures, or to the people. On the contrary, a proper appreciation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, as well as of the interests of sectional order, harmony and union, and a due deference for an enlightened public judgment, may at this time well suggest a doubt whether any amendment ought to be proposed by Congress, and pressed upon the legislatures of the several States for final decision, until after the admission of such loyal senators and representatives of the now unrepresented States as have been or as may hereafter be chosen in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

It is not to be denied, therefore, that so far as his influence as a public officer could go, and by means anything but proper and legitimate, he has endeavored not only to force his own policy upon the nation, but to prevent its concurrence in the plan suggested by the wisdom of its representatives for bringing about the restoration of the dismembered States, and securing the future peace and happiness of the republic. And that he still persists in maintaining this unprecedented and disastrous struggle against the popular will, and will make good his menaces by persevering in it, as he may do, as obstinately and bitterly to the end of his administration, although the nation may be racked and shattered to its foundations by the unnatural strife, seems to be too clear even to furnish a hope for those who would rather "bear the ills we have," and the greater that may ensue, than meet like men and statesmen the high and imperious requirements of public duty, by clearing the pathway to peace and rest.

Upon the foregoing state of facts, then, standing as they do almost entirely upon the public records, and not, of course, susceptible of successful contradiction, it becomes a question for the House to decide whether there are legal grounds for impeachment, and if so, whether the occasion is such as to make it their duty to exert their constitutional power for the public safety, and in the vindication of the violated law, by summoning the delinquent to answer before the highest tribunal of the country.

And here they would have been content to leave the case to the common sense of the House and country, as one whose very statement was sufficient in itself to compel from both the answer which they desired, if a doubt had not been suggested on this point so novel to themselves, that nothing but the respect which they owe to and feel for those who differ from them, would have induced them to trespass further upon the indulgence of the House by endeavoring to dispel.

In order, however, that the House may better understand the precise question at issue, they will here condense into a series of general propositions the several leading facts best entitled, as they think, to the consideration of the House, in the mass of evidence which they have taken.

These facts are—

1st. That the President of the United States, assuming it to be his duty to execute the constitutional guarantee, has undertaken to provide new governments for the rebellious States without the consent or co-operation of the legislative power, and upon such terms as were agreeable to his own pleasure, and then to force them into the Union against the will of Congress and the people of the loyal States, by the authority and patronage of his high office.

2d. That to effect this object, he has created offices unknown to the law, and appointed to them, without the advice or consent of the Senate, men who were notoriously disqualified to take the test oath, at salaries fixed by his own mere will, and paid those salaries, along with the expenses of his work, out of the funds of the War Department, in clear violation of law.

3d. That to pay the expenses of the said organizations, he has also authorized his pretended officers to appropriate the property of the government, and to levy taxes from the conquered people.

4th. That he has surrendered, without equivalent, to the rebel stockholders of southern railroads captured by our arms, not only the roads themselves, but the rolling-stock and machinery captured along with them, and even roads constructed or renovated at an enormous outlay by the government of the United States itself.

5th. That he has undertaken, without authority of law, to sell and transfer to the same parties, at a private valuation, and on a long credit, without any security whatever, an enormous amount of rolling-stock and machinery, purchased by and belonging to the United States, and after repeated defaults on the part of the purchasers, has postponed the debt due to the government in order to enable them to pay the claims of other creditors, along with arrears of interest on a large amount of bonds of the companies, guaranteed by the State of Tennessee, of which he was himself a large holder at the time.

6th. That he has not only restored to rebel owners large amounts of cotton and other abandoned property that had been seized by the agents of the treasury, but has presumed to pay back the proceeds of actual sales made thereof, at his own will and pleasure, in utter contempt of the law directing the same to be paid into the treasury, and the parties aggrieved to seek their remedy in the courts, and in manifest violation of the true spirit and meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no "money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

7th. That he has abused the pardoning power conferred on him by the Constitution, to the great detriment of the public, in releasing, pending the condition of war, the most active and formidable of the leaders of the rebellion, with a view to the restoration of their property and means of influence, and to secure their services in the furtherance of his policy; and, further, in substantially delegating that power for the same objects to his provisional governors.

8th. That he has further abused this power in the wholesale pardon, in a single instance, of 193 deserters, with restoration of their justly forfeited claims upon the government for arrears of pay, without proper inquiry or sufficient evidence.

9th. That he has not only refused to enforce the laws passed by Congress for the suppression of the rebellion, and the punishment of those who gave it comfort and support, by directing proceedings against the delinquents and their property, but has absolutely obstructed the course of public justice, by either prohibiting the initiation of legal proceedings for that purpose, or, where already commenced, by staying the same indefinitely, or ordering absolutely the discontinuance thereof.

10th. That he has further obstructed the course of public justice, by not only releasing from imprisonment an important state prisoner, in the person of Clement C. Clay, charged, among other things, as asserted by himself in answer to a resolution of the Senate, (Ex. Doc., 39th Congress, No. 7,) "with treason, with complicity in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, and with organizing bands of pirates, robbers, and murderers in Canada, to burn the cities and ravage the commercial coasts of the United States on the British frontier," but has even forbidden his arrest on proceedings instituted against him for treason and conspiracy, in the State of Alabama, and ordered his property, when seized for confiscation by the district attorney of the United States, to be restored.

11th. That he has abused the appointing power lodged with him by the Constitution:

1. In the removal, on system, and to the great prejudice of the public service, of large numbers of meritorious public officers, for no other reason than because they refused to indorse his claim of the right to reorganize and restore the rebel States, on conditions of his own; and because they favored the jurisdiction and authority of Congress in the premises.

2. In reappointing, in repeated instances, after the adjournment of the Senate, persons who had been nominated by him and rejected by that body as unfit for the place for which they had been so recommended.

12th. That he has exercised a dispensing power over the laws, by commissioning revenue officers and others unknown to the law, who were notoriously disqualified by their participation in the rebellion from taking the oath of office required by the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, allowing them to enter upon and exercise the duties appertaining to their respective offices, and paying to them salaries for their services therein.

13th. That he has exercised the veto power conferred on him by the Constitution, in its systematic application to all the important measures of Congress looking to the reorganization and restoration of the rebel States, in accordance with a public declaration that "he would veto all its measures whenever they came to him," and without other reasons than a determination to prevent the exercise of the undoubted power and jurisdiction of Congress over a question that was cognizable exclusively by them.

14th. That he has brought the patronage of his office into conflict with the freedom of elections, by allowing and encouraging his official retainers to travel over the country, attending political conventions and addressing the people, instead of attending to the duties which they were paid to perform, while they were receiving high salaries in consideration thereof.

15th. That he has exerted all the influence of his position to prevent the people of the rebellious States from accepting the terms offered to them by Congress, and neutralized, to a large extent, the effects of the national victory, by impressing them with the opinion that the Congress of the United States was blood-thirsty and implacable, and that their only hope was in adhering to him.

16th. That, in addition to the oppression and bloodshed that have everywhere resulted from his undue tenderness, and transparent partiality for traitors, he has encouraged the murder of loyal citizens in New Orleans, by a confederate mob pretending to act as a police, by holding correspondence with its leaders, denouncing the exercise of the constitutional right of a political convention to assemble peacefully in that city, as an act of treason proper to be suppressed by violence, and commanding the military to assist, instead of preventing the execution of the avowed purpose of dispersing them.

17th. That he has been guilty of acts calculated, if not intended, to subvert the government of the United States, by denying that the thirty-ninth Congress was a constitutional body, and fostering a spirit of disaffection and disobedience to the law and rebellion against its authority, by endeavoring, in public speeches, to bring it into odium and contempt.

And now, whether these grave facts, or any of them, involving undoubted usurpation of power, and repeated violations of law, and admitted to be worthy of the severest censure, are sufficient in themselves to authorize an impeachment within the meaning of the Constitution, is the question to be considered.

If they are not, then the exercise of powers as absolute as those of any monarch in Christendom is utterly remediless, and there are few cases in history where such a proceeding could have been rightfully instanced under our law, as there is none, in the opinion of the committee, that has been characterized by so many enormities.

To understand this question thoroughly, however, it is necessary to look into the history and uses of the proceeding, which has been derived by us from the constitution of the country whose laws and institutions have been so largely copied in the construction of our own government.

The practice of impeachment was borrowed originally from the Germans, who in their great councils sometimes tried capital accusations relating to the public, (4 Bl. Com. 260; Tacitus de Mor. Germ., 127,) and has been so reputed for its wisdom that it is to the want of this that the ruin of the republic of Florence is ascribed by its great historian. (Story's Com., sec. 744.)

The earliest instance of an impeachment by the Commons of England at the bar of the Lords, was in the year 1376, in the reign of Edward III. (Cushing's Law Practice of Parliament, sec. 253.) Before this time, it had been the practice of the Lords to try either peers or commoners, without any previous complaint, for great public offences. (May on Parliament, 49, 50.)

"The object of these prosecutions in America, as well as in England, is to reach high and potent offenders, such as might be presumed to escape punishment in the ordinary tribunals, either from their own extraordinary influence, or from the imperfect organization and power of these tribunals." (Story's Com., sec. 688) And it is said by Woodeson, in his lectures, (vol. 2, p. 601,) "such kinds of misdeeds as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust, are the most proper, and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery, or of acting grossly contrary to the duties of his office; if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions; if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental law, or introduce arbitrary power; these have been cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So, where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to betray his trust, a privy counsellor to propound or support dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of the government to obtain exorbitant grants, or incompatible employments; because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offences, or to investigate or reform the general polity of the state." And to the same effect it is remarked again by the same author, (p. 591,) "it is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community, and at the same time in a manner not cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents, and the nature of such offences may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court, and the wisdom of the largest assembly;" and again, (p. 611,) "impeachments are not framed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution, where it might be obstructed by the influence of too powerful delinquents, or not easily discovered in the ordinary course of jurisdiction by reason of the peculiar quality of the alleged crimes."

The same view is also taken by May in his Treatise on Parliaments, (page 473,) where he says: "Impeachment by the Commons for high crimes and misdemeanors beyond the reach of the laws, or which no other authority in the state will prosecute, is a safeguard of liberty well worthy of a free country, and of so noble an institution as a free Parliament. The times in which its exercise was needed were those in which the people were jealous of the Crown; when the Parliament had less control over the prerogative; when courts of justice were impure; when, instead of vindicating the law, the Crown and its officers resisted its execution and screened political offenders from justice." And he accounts for its unfrequency in modern times by the fact that "the limitations of prerogatives, and the immediate responsibility of the ministers of the Crown to Parliament, have prevented the consummation of those crimes which impeachments were designed to punish;" and remarks that "for these reasons impeachments are now reserved for extraordinary cases and extraordinary offences." And again, (page 474:) "The purpose of impeachment in modern times is the prosecution and punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors chiefly of an official or political character, which are either beyond the reach of the law, or which no other authority in the state but the supreme legislative power is competent to prosecute."

It is stated, moreover, in the papers of the Federalist, (No. 65,) referring, of course, to the provision of the Constitution on that point, that "the subjects of the jurisdiction of a court of impeachment are those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may, with peculiar propriety, be denominated political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself."

And in accordance with this is the language of Mr. Rawle, in his Treatise on the Constitution, page 19. "Its foundation," he remarks, "is that a subject intrusted with the administration of public affairs may sometimes infringe the rights of the people, and be guilty of such crimes as the ordinary magistrates either dare not or cannot punish." "The delegation of important trusts affecting the higher interests of society," he adds, "is always, from various causes, liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the individual extension of power; the influence of party and prejudice; the seductions of foreign states, or the baser appetite for illegitimate emolument, are sometimes productive of what are, not inaptly, termed political offences, which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings." Besides, "the involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law, and sometimes too subtle and mysterious to be fully detected in the limited period of ordinary investigation."

And again, (page 204:) "The legitimate causes of impeachment can only have reference to public character and official duty. In general, those offences, which may be committed equally by a private person as a public officer, are not the subjects of impeachment. Murder, burglary, robbery, and, indeed, all offences not immediately connected with office, except the two expressly mentioned, are left to the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, and neither house can regularly inquire into them except for the purpose of expelling the member."

In the view, then, of these concurring authorities, historical as well as legal, which seem to settle the scope of the impeaching power in such a way as, in England at all events, would clearly bring each and all of the charges enumerated in the foregoing propositions within its legitimate range, is there anything in the terms of our Constitution, enacted in full view of them, to change the law in such a way that the boldest of usurpations, the grossest violations of duty, and the highest contempt of law, on the part of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, may run riot over the land, and shake the very pillars of the state, by convulsing the whole country to its foundations, without a remedy?

The objectors insist that there is. To understand them fully, however, it is necessary to refer to the terms of the instrument itself.

The fourth section of its second article provides that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors." It, therefore, names but two offences specifically, and they are not charged here. Do the facts involved fall, then, within the general description of "other high crimes and misdemeanors," or are they excluded by the enumeration?

It is insisted, for the first time, we think, that they do not come within the meaning of the language used, because, although all confessedly in the popular sense the highest and gravest of misdemeanors, and many of them in the technical or common law signification of the terms, indictable as such in England, and, perhaps, in most of the older States, they are neither crimes nor misdemeanors here, because it has been held, with much diversity of opinion on the bench, and more at the bar, that there is no jurisdiction in the courts of the United States to punish criminally except where an act has been made indictable by statute, which, as the committee are constrained to think, is not a necessary logical result, even if the doctrine were incontrovertible, and to be considered as no longer open to discussion in the courts. It would not follow, as they suppose, that what was undoubtedly a crime or misdemeanor at the common law, in the view of the framers of the Constitution who sat under it, and used its language, and recurred so often to its principles, had become any the less a crime before the highest court for purposes of impeachment, because another tribunal, having no jurisdiction at all over the subject, may have decided that it is no longer cog-nizable before them, even if it were essential, as there is no authority to show, that it should be a true crime within the meaning of the common law. There is a law of Parliament, which is a part of the common law, and by which only this question must be determined.

The objection has the merit at least of being a novel as well as a subtle one; well enough, perhaps, for the range of a criminal court, but too subtle by far for those canons of interpretation that are supposed to rule in the construction of the fundamental law of a great state. If it be a sound one, then there is no remedy in the Constitution but for the specific offences of treason and bribery, as there was no such thing as what it describes "as high crimes or misdemeanors" then known to the laws of the United States, and the government must perish whenever it is attacked from a quarter that could not have been foreseen. But could the statesmen who framed the Constitution have perpetrated so grave a blunder as this? Did they intend, instead of anchoring that power to the rock by a precision that should fix it there, and leave nothing open to construction, to leave it all afloat for future congresses to say what offences should be from time to time impeachable? Did they, when dealing with a question so mighty as the safety of the state, use words without a meaning, except what might be thereafter given to them by an ephemeral legislature, or invented by an uncertain and not always consistent court? or did they stand in the august presence, and under the not uncertain light of the common law of England, which they had claimed as their birthright, speaking the language, with a thorough understanding of its import, of the sages and statesmen who had illustrated its principles? Are their oracles to be read, as they would have been in England, or would be now in any of its colonies past or present, or are their solemn utterances to be measured by a language that they did not know? They committed no such error, and the suggestion that they did is one that does not seem to antedate the case to which it is at present applied.

To ascertain the meaning of the terms in question, there are but three possible sources to which the explorer can recur, and they are the Constitution itself, the statutes, and the parliamentiary practice, or the common law of which it is a part. The Constitution, however, goes no further, as already shown, than to declare the two political offences of treason and bribery to be "high crimes and misdemeanors," and as such impeachable, while no statute has ever attempted it. Nor does it by any means follow that where an offence has been made so punishable as a crime, the right to impeach is a corollary. It is not every offence that by the Constitution is made impeachable. It must be not a crime or misdemeanor only, but a "high" one, within the meaning of the law of Parliament. There are, moreover, as suggested by Judge Story in his Commentaries, many offences of great enormity, which are made punishable by statute only when committed in a particular place. What is to be said of them? Are they impeachable if committed under one jurisdiction, and not so if perpetrated under another? There are, too, many others of a purely political character, which have been held again and again to be impeachable, that are not even named in our statute books, and many more may be imagined in the long future for which it would be impossible for human sagacity or perspicuity to provide. There is no alternative then left, unless the remedy is to fail altogether, except to resort to the parliamentary practice and the common law, or leave the whole subject in the discretion of the Senate, which would be inadmissible, of course, in a government of law.

The argument asserts that the offence must be an indictable one by statute, to authorize an impeachment. It is not even admitted, however, that this high and radical and only effective remedy for official delinquencies—and in this country, at least, it is no more than that—is to be confined to those offences which are known by these terms, within the technical meaning that has been assigned to them. In such a case as this no narrow interpretation can be allowed to defeat the object of the law. A constitution of government is always to be construed in a broad, catholic sense, in order to suppress the possible mischief and advance the remedy. Those who maintain this doctrine strangely forget that there is a parliamentary sense, which conforms to the popular one, and is as much a common law sense as the one on which they rely. The object of the law is not to punish crime. That duty is assigned to other tribunals. The purpose here is only to remove the officer whose public conduct has been such as to disqualify him for the proper discharge of his functions, or to show that the safety of the state—which is always the supreme law—requires that he should be deposed. It refers not so much to moral conduct as to official relations—not, indeed, to moral conduct at all, except so far as it may bear on the performance of official duty. The judgment is not fine or imprisonment, as it may be in England, but only removal from office and disqualification for the future. One of the very objects of this extraordinary tribunal, as has been shown already, and will be further enforced hereafter, is to reach those very cases of official delinquency, against which no human foresight could provide, and which the ordinary tribunals are inadequate to punish. No ingenuity of invention, no fertility of resource can hedge round a high public officer by boundaries which the greater ingenuity of fraud or wickedness, may not be able to pass by sap, or scale. If a President, it may be that he may prove impracticable. He may ignore the law, and even wage war on the power that is intrusted with the making of it. He may nullify its acts by misconstruing or disregarding them, or denying their authority. He may be guilty of offences which are in their very nature calculated to subvert the government—all which things Andrew Johnson is shown clearly to have done. And yet these things, although high misdemeanors against the state, and fraught with peril to its life, may not be indictable as crimes. But will anybody say that the Constitution affords no remedy—that the arch offender must be borne with, and the state must die—merely because Congress has failed to provide, not the same, but a different punishment for the same offence? The cases in England show that this is not law there, as it is not reason, which is said to be the life of the law. The cases here, though all of offences that were not statutory crimes or misdemeanors, have been so few as to leave this question open, to be decided hereafter upon those great reasons of state that lie at the foundation of the law of Parliament, which is the rule that must govern ultimately here.

And in entire harmony with what has been just said is the following passage from Story's Commentaries:

"The offices to which the power of impeachment has been, and is ordinarily applied as a remedy, are of a political character. Not but that crimes of a strictly legal character fall within the scope of the power, but that it has a more enlarged operation, and reaches what are aptly termed political offences, growing out of personal misconduct, or gross neglect, or usurpation, or habitual disregard of the public interests in the discharge of the duties of political office. These are so various in their character, and so indefinable in their actual involutions, that it is almost impossible to provide for them by positive law. They must be examined on very broad and comprehensive principles of policy and duty."—(Vol. 2, §764.)

And to the same effect is the following passage from Curtis: "Although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for crime. The purposes of impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office, or aside from its functions, he has violated a law, or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offence against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has, from immorality or imbecility, or maladministration, become unfit to exercise the office. The rules by which an impeachment is to be determined are therefore peculiar, and are not fully embraced by those principles or provisions of law which courts of ordinary jurisdiction are required to administer." (Curtis on the Constitution, 360.) And in accordance with this is the answer of Mr. Madison to the objection of a possible abuse of the appointing power. "The danger," he says, "consists merely in this, that the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeached by the House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust."

But this is not all. The undersigned have already suggested that the objection was a novel one. They now refer to the following quotation from Judge Story, to show that in this opinion they are by no means singular. In section 798 of his Commentaries, this eminent jurist says: "However much it may fall within the political theories of some statesmen and jurists to deny the existence of a common law, belonging and applicable to the nation in ordinary cases, no one has as yet been bold enough to assert that the power of impeachment is limited to offences positively defined in the statute book of the Union as impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors."

Fortunately, however, for the occasion, the whole question has been long foreclosed by practice and authority. "The Congress of the United States," (referring to Judge Story again) "has itself unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct, and the rules of proceeding, and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law, and parliamentary usage." And he further remarks, in this connection, that "in the few cases of impeachment which had theretofore been tried, no one of the charges had rested on any statutable misdemeanor." When he wrote the cases had been only three. In the first, which was that of Blount, in 1798, where the charge was of a conspiracy to invade the territories of a friendly power, although there was no decision on the merits, the impeachable character of the offence was affirmed by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate, expelling the delinquent from that body, as having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, in the very language of the Constitution. The second, (Pickering's,) in which a conviction took place, was against a judge of a district court, and purely for official misconduct. The third (Chase's) was against a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and was also a charge of official misconduct, but terminated in an acquittal. It is a noteworthy fact, however, that in the last-named case, (the only one in which the point was raised,) it was conceded by the answer, that a civil officer was impeachable for "corruption, or some high crime or misdemeanor, consisting in some act done or omitted in violation of a law commanding or forbidding it." Two other cases have occurred since that time. The first, that of Judge Peck, in December, 1830, was for punishing a refractory barrister for contempt, as for "an arbitrary, unjust, and oppressive arrest and sentence, with intent to injure and oppress under cover of law." The case was clearly not of an indictable offence under any statute of the United States, but, though defended by the very ablest counsel, (Messrs. Wirt and Meredith,) it did not seem to have occurred to them, that the offence charged was not impeachable within the meaning of the Constitution. The other, that of Judge Humphreys, at the commencement of the rebellion, was upon charges of disloyal acts and utterances, some of which clearly did not set forth offences indictable by statute of the United States, and yet upon all those charges, with one exception only, he was convicted and removed.

It is only necessary to add that the conclusion of Judge Story upon the whole case is, that "it seems to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment, that, though the common law cannot be the foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or laws, that jurisdiction, when given, attaches, and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law, and that what are, and what are not 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be ascertained by a recurrence to that great basis of American jurisprudence." And he adds to this, that "the power of the House to punish contempts, which are breaches of privilege not defined by positive law, has been upheld on the same ground; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish until the acts had been previously ascertained and defined by positive law, it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal."

And this, it is hoped, will dispose forever of the novel objection that is now interposed in the path of the nation's justice, in the defence of its greatest offender, and in a case that has no parallel in enormity in the parliamentary history of England. It is scarcely necessary to repeat that the charges, resting mainly upon record evidence, are not only of usurpation and abuse of admitted power, but of a contempt of law and of the legislative power that transcends anything in the annals of either the Tudors or the Stuarts.

It may be answered, however, as it has been, that all this was with the best intent, and that positive corruption must be shown to make the act impeachable. The President alleges a necessity in one case, of dispensing with the laws in consequence of the absence of Congress. The Attorney General insists that it was not the true policy of the country to enforce the laws against the rebels, and he accordingly refuses to do it. The Secretary of the Treasury holds the same opinion also as to the subject of captured and abandoned property, and he returns the proceeds, as the President returns the property itself.

An old but homely proverb says that the place most dreaded by the wicked is paved with good intentions. If such intentions, or even a supposed necessity could excuse the violation of the law, no transgressor would ever be punished, and no tyrant fail to show that what he had done was with the best designs, and for the purpose of saving the Constitution of the state. If Andrew Johnson can plead that he gave away, or sold the public property to rebels to promote their commerce, or that he dispensed with the test oath only to conciliate the disaffected, or collect the revenue, because of the absence of that Congress which he had refused to convene, the self-willed James II might even with a better grace have asserted that he had dispensed with the religious test in the interests of universal toleration. By way, however, of disposing of this apology, it may not be amiss to cite a few authorities:

"The rule is, that if a man intends to do what he is conscious the law—which every one is conclusively presumed to know—forbids, there need not be any other evil intention. (Bish. Crim. Law, §428, 11 S. and R. 325.) It is of no avail to him that he means at the same time an ultimate good."—Ibid.

"When the law imposes a prohibition it is not left to the discretion of the citizen to comply or not. He is bound to do everything in his power to avoid an infringement of it. The necessity which will excuse him for a breach must be instant and imminent. It must be such as to leave him without hope by ordinary means to comply with the requisitions of the law."—Fir. Story I, 1 Gall. 150 S. P., 3 Wheat., 39., 1 Bish., sec. 449.

"Whenever the law, statutory or common, casts on one a duty of a public nature, any neglect of the duty or act done in violation of it is indictable."—1 Bish., sec. 537–389.

"The same doctrine requires all those who have accepted, to discharge faithfully all public trusts. Any act or omission in disobedience of this duty, in a matter of public concern, is, as a general principle, punishable as a crime."—Ibid, sec. 913.

The only remaining question is whether, in view of all these facts, it will be the duty of this house to call the President to answer before the Senate, or whether any considerations of mere public or party expediency, on either side of the House, ought to be allowed to prevail on them to let the accused go free.

And here there is but a single question that can legitimately enter into the discussion, and that is, whether, in view of the time which he has yet to serve, any apprehended jar or possible disturbance to the country, would probably outweigh the favorable results that might be expected from such an inquiry.

The undersigned are loth to enter into any mere mercantile statement of profit and loss in a case where the life of a great nation is in the balance. The people did not stop, like cold-blooded economists, to count the cost when the flag of the nation was fired upon at Sumter. They took counsel only of their instincts when they saw their country's ensign floating in the thick smoke of treason, and they rushed incontinently to its defence. The shock of that conflict has rocked the government to its foundations, but it has only seated those foundations deeper and more solidly than ever, while it has developed its amazing powers, and falsified the auguries of its world-wide enemies. If it could survive the catastrophe that smote down its great Chief Magistrate, and lifted Andrew Johnson into his place, it will not even feel the jar, when the mighty machine, freighted with the destinies of so many generations, shall rush over the prostrate form of the discarded servitor who had so nearly wrecked it. But even the temporary shock, if any, that such an event might occasion, were nothing to the chronic disturbance, the universal derangement produced by a standing obstruction of so long continuance, which has kept the South in anarchy for the last two years, and threatens, under the determined hostility to the congressional plans of reconstruction, to perpetuate the existing disaffection and insecurity of life and property for the remainder of his constitutional term. Mr. Johnson is, by virtue of his office, the executive minister of the law. To expect or hope, after his own utterances, and the long experience of the nation, that he will administer and execute in good faith the will of a body which he denies to be a Congress so long as the disloyal States are excluded, and denounces as a usurper, is to be sanguine beyond the usual measure of credulity that is allowed to man. The first step in the direction of effective restoration would seem to be, not the empirical and questionable process of abridging the constitutional powers of the executive magistrate, but the committal of this great work to the hands of those who will recognize the jurisdiction of Congress, and bow respectfully to its authority.

But there is another consideration of an equally important character. There are some things which the people cannot afford to overlook. Where a great principle is violated, or a great wrong is done by a high public officer, which threatens the existence of the state, or endangers it in the example, the people interested cannot safely stop to inquire whether the vindication of the law will alarm the timid or disturb the mercenary, or even as to the actual mischief which the special violation may have produced. A great poet has remarked that "our fears are traitors." Free government was not designed for coward races. It was not the weight of the exaction that drove the patriot Hampden to his single-handed struggle with the whole power of the British crown. The penny of taxation on the pound of tea was nothing to the men who sounded the tocsin of the revolution in the streets of Boston. It was against the principle that made them slaves that they revolted. They knew their rights. They had studied the British constitution in its principles and elements. They had sounded all its depths and shoals, and they knew precisely where their liberties were vulnerable. It is the testimony of Mr. Burke that there were no men living, who better understood the value of a principle, and it was because they belonged to a race which, according to the same great statesman, had the happy faculty of scenting danger on the breeze, and was indebted mainly for its freedom to the great fact of its extreme sensibility to attacks upon its cardinal maxims of liberty. That race, with all its admixtures, still governs this land. It may possibly become familiarized to invasions of its cherished rights. It may come eventually, under false and unworthy teachers, to look upon the overthrow of its great landmarks of liberty as of so little importance as to be unworthy of notice. But when that time comes—when its blood shall be so diluted, and its susceptibilities so deadened, that the icy torpor of indifference shall steal over it, and the apologists of tyranny be allowed to impugn the motives of its assailants, and to say that it is better to bear with it, either because they want peace, or because the contemner of the laws is supposed to be powerless, or because his removal may result in a change of rulers—its history will be written. The first cunning usurper will seize upon its liberties, and a subservient Congress will ratify the act.

In view, then, of all that has been said, and upon the fullest consideration of the facts disclosed, your committee do solemnly pronounce and declare it as their deliberate judgment that Andrew Johnson, as President of the United States, is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors within the meaning of the Constitution, in the exercise of his great office, of so grave a nature as to demand his immediate arraignment and trial therefor; and they do accordingly, in behalf of the loyal people of the United States, whose rights and interests he has betrayed, and whose government he has endeavored to subvert; in vindication of the law that he has violated, and the justice that he has contemned; and in the name of the thousands who have died in order that the republic might live, recommend and respectfully insist that he be impeached, and held to answer therefor before the Senate of the United States.

In accordance with the testimony herewith submitted, and the view of the law herein presented, the committee are of opinion that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this house—

In that, upon the final surrender of the rebel armies, and the overthrow of the rebel government, the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, neglected to convene the Congress of the United States, that by its aid and authority legal and constitutional measures might have been adopted for the organization of loyal and constitutional governments in the States then recently in rebellion:

In that, in his proclamation to the people of North Carolina, of the 29th day of May, 1865, he assumed that he had authority to decide whether the government of North Carolina, and whether any other government that might be set up therein, was republican in form; and that, in his office of President, it was his duty and within his power to guarantee to said people a republican form of government, contrary to the Constitution, which provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and contrary, also, to a deliberate opinion of the Supreme Court, which declared that Congress is vested exclusively with the power to decide whether the government of a State is republican or not:

In that he did thereafter recognize and treat a plan of government, set up in North Carolina under and in conformity to his own advice and direction, as republican in form, and entirely restored to its functions as a State, notwithstanding Congress is the branch of the government in which, by the Constitution, such power is exclusively vested; and notwithstanding Congress did refuse to recognize such government as a legitimate government, or as a government republican in form:

In that, by public proclamation and otherwise, he did, in the year 1865, invite, solicit, and convene, in certain other States then recently in rebellion, conventions of persons, many of whom were known traitors who had been engaged in an attempt to overthrow the government of the United States, and urged and directed such conventions to frame constitutions for such States:

In that he thereupon assumed to accept, ratify, and confirm certain so-called constitutions framed by such illegal and treasonable assemblies of persons, which constitutions were never submitted to the people of the respective States, nor ratified and confirmed by the United States; thus usurping and exercising powers vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States exclusively:

In that he pardoned large numbers of public and notorious traitors, with the design of receiving their aid in such conventions, called by his advice and dictation, for the purpose of organizing and setting up such illegal governments in the States then recently in rebellion, prior to the annual meeting of Congress, with the intent thus to constrain Congress to accept, ratify, and confirm such illegal and unconstitutional proceedings:

In that he did within and for the States recently in rebellion create and establish, as a civil office, the office of provisional governor, so-called—an office unknown to the Constitution or laws of the land:

In that he appointed to such office, so created in said States respectively, men who were public and notorious traitors, he well knowing that they had been engaged in open, persistent, and formidable efforts for the overthrow of the government of the United States, and well knowing, also, that these men could not enter upon the duties of said office without committing the crime of perjury, or in manifest violation of the laws of the country:

In that he directed the Secretary of State to promise payment of money to said persons, so illegally appointed, as salary or compensation for services to be performed in said office, so illegally created contrary to the provisions of a law of the United States approved February 9, 1863, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and for a deficiency for the signal service for the year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-three":

In that he directed the Secretary of War to pay moneys to said persons for services performed in said office, so illegally created, which moneys were so paid under his direction, without authority of law, contrary to law, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States:

In that he deliberately dispensed with and suspended the operation of a provision of a law of the United States passed on the second day of July, A. D. 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes":

In that he appointed to offices created by the laws of the United States persons who, as was well known to him, had been engaged in the rebellion, who were guilty of the crime of treason, and who could not, without committing the crime of perjury or otherwise violating criminally the said act of July 2, A. D. 1862, enter upon the duties thereof:

In that, without authority of law and contrary to law, he used and applied property taken from the enemy in time of war for the payment of the expenses and the support of the said illegal and unconstitutional governments so set up in the said States recently in rebellion; and for a like purpose, and in violation of the Constitution and of his oath of office, he authorized and permitted a levy of taxes upon the people of said States, thus usurping and exercising a power which, by the Constitution, is vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States.

All of which acts were usurpations of power, contrary to the laws and Constitution of the United States, and in violation of his oath of office as President of the United States.

In that, the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, has, in message to Congress and otherwise, publicly denied, substantially, the right of Congress to provide for the pacification, government, and restoration of said States to the Union; and, in like manner, he has asserted his exclusive right to provide governments therefor, and to accept and proclaim the restoration of said

States to the Union; all of which is in derogation of the rightful authority of Congress, and calculated to subvert the government of the United States:

In that, in accordance with said declarations, he has vetoed various bills passed by Congress for the pacification and government of the States recently in rebellion, and their speedy restoration to the Union, and upon the ground and for the reason that the said States had been restored to their places in the Union by his aforesaid illegal and unconstitutional proceedings, thus so interposing and using a constitutional power of the office he held as to prevent the restoration of the Union upon a constitutional basis:

In that he has exercised the power of removal from, and appointment to, office for the purpose of maintaining effectually his aforesaid usurpations, and for the purpose of securing the recognition by Congress of the State governments so illegally and unconstitutionally set up in the States recently in rebellion; such removals and appointments having been attended and followed with great injury to the public service and with enormous losses to the public revenue:

In that, in the exercise of the pardoning power, he issued an order for the restoration of one hundred and ninety-three men belonging to West Virginia, who, upon the records of the War Department, were marked as deserters from the army in time of war; and this upon the representations of private and interested persons and without previous investigation by any officer of the War Department, and for the sole purpose of enabling such persons to vote in an election then pending in said State, and with the expectation that they would so vote as to support him in his aforesaid unconstitutional proceedings; he then well knowing that the men so restored, and by virtue of such restoration, would be entitled to a large sum of money from the treasury of the United States:

In that by his message to the House of Representatives of the 22d day of June, 1866, and by other public and private means, he has attempted to prevent the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed to the several States by the two Houses of Congress agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, although such proposed amendment provided among other things for the validity of the public debt of the United States, and rendered the payment of any claim for slaves emancipated, or of any debt incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States impossible, either by the government of the United States or by any of the States recently in rebellion, he well knowing that the provisions inserted under and by his dictation in the said illegal constitutions for said States were wholly inadequate to protect the loyal people thereof, or the people of the United States against the payment of claims on account of slaves emancipated, and of debts incurred by such States in aid of rebellion, thus rendering it practicable and easy for those in authority in the aforesaid illegal and unconstitutional governments, thus set up, to tax and oppress the loyal people of such States for the benefit of those who had been engaged in the attempt to overthrow the government of the United States:

In that he has made official and other public declarations and statements calculated and designed to injure and impair the credit of the United States; to encourage persons recently engaged in rebellion against its authority to obstruct and resist the reorganization of the rebel States, so called, upon a republican basis, and calculated and designed also to deprive the Congress of the United States of the confidence of the people, as well in its patriotism as in its Constitutional right to exist, and to act as the department of the government which, under the Constitution, possesses exclusive legislative power; and all this with the intent of rendering Congress incapable either of resisting his said usurpations of power, or of providing and enforcing measures necessary for the pacification and restoration of the Union:

And that in all this he has exercised the veto power, the power of removal and appointment, the pardoning power, and other constitutional powers of his office, for the purpose of delaying, hindering, obstructing, and preventing the restoration of the Union by constitutional means, and for the further purpose of alienating from the government and laws of the United States those persons who had been engaged in the rebellion, and who, without aid, comfort, and encouragement thus by him given to them, would have resumed in good faith their allegiance to the Constitution; and all with the expectation of conciliating them to himself personally, that he might thereby finally prevent the restoration of the Union upon the basis of the laws passed by Congress.

And, further, in that the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, transferred and surrendered, and authorized and directed the transfer and surrender of railways and railway property of the value of many millions of dollars, to persons who had been engaged in the rebellion, or to corporations owned wholly or in part by such persons, he well knowing that in some instances the railways had been constructed by the United States, that in others such railways and railway property had been captured from the enemy in war, and afterwards repaired at great cost by the United States, such transfer and surrender being made without authority of law, and in violation of law:

In that he directed and authorized the sale of large quantities of railway rolling stock, and other railway property, of the value of many millions of dollars, the property of the United States by purchase and construction, to corporations and parties then known to him to be unable to pay their debts then matured and due, and this without exacting from said corporations and parties any security whatsoever:

In that he directed and ordered subordinate officers of the government to postpone and delay the collection of moneys due and payable to the United States on account of such sales, in apparent conformity to an order previously made by him that the interest upon certain bonds issued or guaranteed by the State of Tennessee in aid of certain railways, then due and unpaid for a period of four years and more, should be first paid out of the earnings of the roads in whose behalf said bonds were so issued or guaranteed:

In that, in conformity to such order and direction, the collection of moneys payable and then due to the United States was delayed and postponed, and the interest on such bonds, of which he himself was a large holder, was paid according to the terms of his own order, thus corruptly using his office to defraud and wrong the people of the United States, and for his own personal advantage:

In that he has not only restored to claimants thereof large amounts of cotton and other abandoned property that had been seized and taken by the agents of the treasury in conformity to law, but has paid and directed the payment of the actual proceeds of sales made thereof, and this in violation of a law of the United States which orders and requires the payment into the treasury of the United States of all moneys received from such sales, and provides for loyal claimants as efficient and easy remedy in the Court of Claims, and in manifest violation also of the spirit and meaning of the constitution wherein it is declared that no "money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law";

And further, in that the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, authorized the use of the army of the United States for the dispersion of a peaceful and lawful assembly of citizens of Louisiana, and this by virtue of a despatch addressed to a person who was not an officer of the army, but who was a public and notorious traitor; and all with the intent to deprive the loyal people of Louisiana of every opportunity to frame a State government republican in form, and with the intent further to continue in places of trust and emolument persons who had been engaged in an attempt to overthrow the government of the United States, expecting thus to conciliate such persons to himself and secure aid in support of his aforesaid unconstitutional designs.

All of which omissions of duty, usurpations of power, violations of his oath of office, of the laws, and of the Constitution of the United States, by the said

Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have retarded the public prosperity, lessened the public revenues, disordered the business and finances of the country, encouraged insubordination in the people of the States recently in rebellion, fostered sentiments of hostility between different classes of citizens, revived and kept alive the spirit of the rebellion, humiliated the nation, dishonored republican institutions, obstructed the restoration of said States to the Union, and delayed and postponed the peaceful and fraternal reorganization of the government of the United States.

The committee therefore report the accompanying resolution, and recommend its passage.

RESOLUTION providing for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. Wilson submitted the following as the views of a minority:

We dissent from the conclusions arrived at by a majority of the committee, and ask leave to present a minority report.

On the third day of June, 1867, it was declared by a solemn vote in the committee, that, from the testimony then before them, it did not appear that the President of the United States was guilty of such high crimes and misdemeanors as called for an exercise of the impeaching power of this House. The vote stood yeas five, nays four. On the 20th instant this action of the committee was reversed, and a vote of five to four declared in favor of recommending to the House an impeachment of the President. Forty-eight hours have not yet elapsed since we were informed of the character of the report which represents this changed attitude of the committee. The recentness of this event compels a general treatment of some features of the case as it is presented by the majority, which otherwise would have been treated of more in detail.

The report of the majority resolves all presumptions against the President, closes the door against all doubts, affirms facts as established by the testimony in support of which there is not a particle of evidence before us which would be received by any court in the land. We dissent from all of this, and from the temper and spirit of the report. The cool and unbiased judgment of the future, when the excitement in the midst of which we live shall have passed away, will not fail to discover that the political bitterness of the present times has, in no inconsiderable degree, given tone to the document which we decline to approve.

Dissenting, as we do, from the report of the committee, both as to the law of the case and the conclusions drawn from the facts developed by the testimony, a due respect for the body which imposed on us the high and transcendently important duty involved in an investigation of the charges preferred against the President, impels us to present at length our views of the subject which has been committed to us by a most solemn vote of the House of Representatives. In approaching this duty we feel that the spirit of the partisan should be laid aside, and that the interests of the republic, as they are measured by its Constitution and laws, alone should guide us. And we most deeply regret that, in this regard, we cannot approve the report of our colleagues who constitute a majority of the committee. While we would not charge them with a design to act the part of partisans in this grave proceeding, we nevertheless feel pained by the tone, temper and spirit of their report. But regrets will not answer the demands of the present grave and commanding occasion; and we therefore respond to them by presenting to the House the results of a careful, deliberate, and, as we hope, a conscientious investigation of the case before us.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment." What is the nature and extent of this power? Is it as boundless as it is exclusive? Having the sole power to impeach, may the House of Representatives lawfully exercise it whenever and for whatever a majority of the body may determine? Is it a lawless power, controlled by no rules, guided by no reason, and made active only by the likes or dislikes of those to whom it is intrusted? Have civil officers of the United States nothing to insure them against an exercise of this power except an adjustment of their opinions and official conduct to the standard set up by the dominant party in the House of Representatives? Happily for the nation this power is not without its constitutional boundaries, and is not above the law. When we examine the Constitution to ascertain in what cases the power of impeachment may be exercised—for what acts civil officers may be impeached—we are informed that "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Art. II, sec. 2.)

In these cases only can the power of impeachment be lawfully used. It would seem to be difficult to mistake the import of this plain provision of the fundamental law of the land; and yet it is not free from conflicting interpretations. This conflict does not arise upon the terms "treason" and "bribery," for they are too well understood and too clearly defined in the Constitution and the laws of the land to admit of any disputation concerning them. They are both crimes of a high grade, and punishable upon indictment in the courts of the United States. They are offences against the public weal, with just and adequate penalties prescribed for them by the law of the nation. There is no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution, in so far as it relates to these crimes. Whatever conflict of opinion has arisen respecting the extent of the power of impeachment finds its origin in the terms "other high crimes and misdemeanors." These terms, it has been claimed, give a latitude to the power reaching far beyond the field of indictable offences. This doctrine is denied. Here arises the only doubt concerning the jurisdiction of the impeaching power of the House of Representatives.

The fact that the framers of the Constitution selected by name two indictable crimes as causes of impeachment would seem to go far towards establishing as the true construction of the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors," that all other offences for which impeachment will lie must also be indictable. Having fettered the House of Representatives by naming two well-defined crimes of the highest grade, it is not to be presumed that the same hands which did it clothed the House with the right to ramble through all grades of crimes and misdemeanors, all instances of improper official conduct and improprieties of official life, grave and unimportant, harmful and harmless, alike. It is unreasonable to say that the men who framed our Constitution, after undertaking to place a limitation on the power of impeachment, ended their effort by throwing away all restraints upon its exercise and placing it entirely within the keeping of those upon whom it was intended to confer only a limited power. There is something more stable than the whims, caprices, and passions of a majority established as a restraint upon this power by the Constitution. The House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer, but it must be done according to law. It must be for some offence known to the law, and not created by the fancy of the members of the House. As was very pertinently remarked by Hopkinson on the trial of Chase, "The power of impeachment is with the House of Representatives, but only for impeachable offences. They are to proceed against the offence, but not to create the offence, and make any act criminal and im-peachable at their will and pleasure. What is an offence, is a question to be decided by the Constitution and the law, not by the opinion of a single branch of the Legislature; and when the offence thus described by the Constitution or the law has been committed, then, and not till then, has the House of Representatives power to impeach the offender."

A civil officer may be impeached for a high crime. What is a crime? It is such a violation of some known law as will render the offender liable to be prosecuted and punished. "Though all wilful violations of rights come under the generic name of wrongs, only certain of those made penal are called crimes." (Encyc. Brit., vol. xiii. 275.) The offence must be a violation of the law of the sovereignty which seeks to punish the offender; for no act is a crime in any sovereignty except such as is made so by its own law. In England no act is a crime save such as is so declared either by the written or unwritten law of the kingdom, and therefore only crimes by the law of England are indictable in England. Crimes are defined and punished by law—by the law of the sovereignty against which the crime is committed—and nothing is a crime which is not thus defined and punished. "Municipal law" (which, among its multiplicity of offices, defines and punishes crimes) "is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong." (1 Blackstone, 44.) Nothing is a crime which is not such a breach of this command or prohibition as carries with it a prescribed penalty. Hence Blackstone said: "All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro." The citizen must be notified of what acts are crimes, and he cannot be lawfully punished for any others. The reasonableness of this rule was appreciated, and its enforcement provided for, by the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, when they placed in that instrument the declaration that "no * * * * * ex post facto law shall be passed." No act which was not a crime at the time of its commission can be made so by subsequent legislative or judicial action; and this doctrine is as binding on the House of Representatives when exercising its powers of impeachment as when employed in ordinary criminal legislation.

All that has been said herein concerning the term "crimes," may be applied with equal force to the term "misdemeanors," as used in the Constitution. The latter term in nowise extends the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives beyond the range of indictable offences. Indeed, the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor" are, in their general sense, synonymous, both being such violations of law as expose the persons committing them to some prescribed punishment; and, although it cannot be claimed that all crimes are misdemeanors, it may be properly said that all misdemeanors are crimes. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, states it thus: "In common usage, the word crimes is made use of to denote such offences as are of a more atrocious dye; while smaller faults, and omissions of less consequence, are comprised under the gentle name of misdemeanors only." Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, states the doctrine in this wise: "Temporal crimes, which are offences against the laws of this realm, whether the common law or acts of Parliament, are divided into two general ranks, or distributions, in respect to the punishments that are by law appointed for them, or in respect of their nature or degree; and thus they may be divided into capital offences, or offences only criminal, or rather, and more properly, into felonies and misdemeanors. And the same distribution is to be made touching misdemeanors, namely: They are such as are so by the common law, or such as are specially made punishable as misdemeanors by acts of Parliament."

Thus it appears that the terms crime and misdemeanor merely indicate the different degrees of offences against law—crime marking the felonious degree, misdemeanor denoting "all offences inferior to felony." Both indicate indictable offences. They are terms of well established legal signification. There is nothing uncertain about them. The framers of the Constitution used these terms as terms of art, and we have no authority for expounding them beyond their true technical limits.

An examination of the several provisions of the Constitution which have any bearing upon this subject will strengthen the position hereinbefore assumed. Section three, article one, reads thus: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." When the Senate is organized under this section of the Constitution as a high court of impeachment, it is simply a court of special criminal jurisdiction—nothing more, nothing less. It is bound by the rules which bind other courts. It is as much restrained by law as any other criminal court. It is not a tribunal above the law, and without rule to guide it; if it were, it might well be addressed in the language of Burke, in one of his speeches in the Hastings case, when he said: "This high court, * * * * this highest court of criminal jurisdiction, exercised upon the requisition of the House of Commons, if left without a rule, would be as lawless as the wild savage, and as unprincipled as the prisoner that stands at your bar." (Burke's Works, vol. 8, p. 8.) No man would be safe before such a court—a court that could make the crime, determine its mode of proof, pronounce and execute judgment, without restraint from the Constitution or laws of the land. No such irresponsible engine of wrong and oppression has been created by the Constitution. The British constitution allows no such unrestricted power to the House of Lords. "An impeachment before the Lords by the Commons in Great Britain, in Parliament, is a prosecution of the already known and established law, and has been frequently put in practice, being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom," (4 Blackstone, 259;) and when this most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction is assembled for the trial of a person impeached for a violation of the "already known and established law," it must proceed according to the known and established law, for although "the trial must vary in external ceremony, it differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments prevail." (Woodeson, vol. 2, 611.) A doctrine which would assert for the Senate of the United States greater and more despotic power in cases of impeachment than is possessed by the House of Lords will never be accepted by the American people.

If the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, is not to be bound by the laws which bind other courts, why require the senators to be put on oath or affirmation? If this court may declare anything a high crime or misdemeanor which may be presented as such by the House of Representatives, and pronounce judgment against a civil officer thereon, why swear the members of the court at all? The oath is not a solemn mockery. It is prescribed for some good purpose. What is it? The form of oath adopted by the Senate in Chase's case affords a very satisfactory answer, and it is, therefore, here quoted, as follows: "You solemnly swear or affirm, that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ———, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws of the United States." (Chase's Trial, vol. 1, p. 12.) This oath is very comprehensive. It covers the charge, the evidence, and all the rules thereof; the decisions upon all questions arising during the progress of the trial, and the final judgment. In all these several respects the members of the court are to be guided by the Constitution and laws of the United States. They can try upon no charges other than treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; and the offence charged must be known to the Constitution, or to the laws of the United States. The rules of evidence under and in pursuance of which crimes may be proved upon indictment in the courts of the United States are to be observed. The judgment "shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." The office of the oath is to insure a strict observance of these requirements of the Constitution and the laws. This seems clear without further reference to other provisions of the Constitution; but it is proper that we should look at all of its clauses bearing upon the question under discussion.

The Constitution having created a court for the trial of impeachments, prescribed its jurisdiction and placed a limitation on its power to pronounce judgment, then declares that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." It would seem difficult, indeed, to misunderstand this language. A civil officer convicted on impeachment is, notwithstanding such conviction, still liable to a prosecution for the same offence in the courts of ordinary criminal jurisdiction. How can this be if his offence be not an indictable crime? The court of impeachment cannot apply the usual statutory punishment. It cannot go beyond removal from, and disqualification to hold, office under the United States. The enforcement of other penalties for the same criminal conduct is left to the criminal courts of the country, after conviction upon indictment. Is not this substantially a constitutional direction to the court of impeachment not to convict a civil officer of any crime or misdemeanor for which an indictment will not lie? This view of the question was very forcibly stated by Mr. Martin, in his argument in Chase's case, in these words: "The very clause in the Constitution, of itself, shows that it was intended the persons impeached and removed from office might still be indicted and punished for the same offence, else the provision would have been not only nugatory, but a reflection on the enlightened body who framed the Constitution; since no person ever could have dreamed that a conviction on impeachment and a removal from office, in consequence, for one offence, could prevent the same person from being indicted and punished for another and different offence." (Chase's Trial, vol. 2, p. 137.) How can the force of this argument be avoided? Wherein does it lack the support of sound reason and good sense? But it does not rest merely upon the clauses of the Constitution above quoted; others, yet to be noticed, give it much additional strength, and these will now be examined.

The section of the Constitution securing the trial by jury reads as follows: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Section 2, article 3.) Can it be successfully claimed that the word "crimes," as here used, is less comprehensive than it is where it occurs in section 4 of article 2? If not, then the crimes for which a civil officer may be impeached are the subjects of indictment or presentment; for such only can be tried by a jury. Any act which is a crime within the meaning of the last-named section is also a crime within the intent of the former, although the converse of this proposition is not true, as it is not every crime which a jury may try that will render a civil officer committing it liable to impeachment. For the latter purpose the crime must "have reference to public character and official duty," (Rawle on the Constitution, 204.) The plain inference to be drawn from the section is, "that cases of impeachment are cases of trials for crimes."

Again, in that part of the Constitution which clothes the President with the power to grant pardons, it is said, "He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." (Article 2, section 2.) What is the meaning of the term "offences"? It cannot mean less than such acts as render offenders liable to punishment, else why is a pardon necessary, or even desirable? No one needs a pardon who has not committed a crime. A pardon shields from or relieves of punishment. Punishment follows trial and conviction. Trial and conviction for crime can be had only for a violation of an existing law declaring the act done a crime. The term offences, then, means crimes, in which, of course, is included misdemeanors.

High crimes and misdemeanors are subject to two jurisdictions—first, in the ordinary criminal courts of the country; second, in the high court of impeachment. The same party, for the same acts, may be on trial in both tribunals at the same time. If convicted in both cases the President may pardon the criminal and relieve him of the consequences resulting from a conviction by the first-named jurisdiction, but the Constitution forbids his interference with the last. The grant of power and the exception are both in the same clause of the same section, and the fact that they are thus intimately associated shows that they relate to the same subjects—indictable offences.

So intimately are these several sections and clauses of the Constitution connected with each other; so unerringly do they point in the same direction; so irresistibly do they suggest a consecutive train of thought; so perfectly does each part adjust itself to the whole, that it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that nothing less than an indictable crime or misdemeanor will support an impeachment of a civil officer of the United States. A fact recorded in the trial of Chase is very suggestive in this connection. Eight articles were preferred against him by the House of Representatives. It seems to have been admitted that all of the articles except the fifth charged him with criminal conduct. In regard to the fifth, his counsel made the point that it did not "charge in express terms some criminal intent on the respondent." The proof was as clear upon this article as it was upon the remaining seven. Thirty-four senators voted on the several articles, and while the votes on seven of them ranged from four to nineteen for conviction, every senator answered "not guilty" on the fifth. It is fair to conclude, in view of the proof submitted in support of the several articles, that the members of the court approved the position taken by the counsel of Chase on the trial.

It is claimed by those who oppose the doctrine herein advanced that it is contrary to the current of the English and American authorities. This is an error which a careful examination of the cases will not fail to expose. Comparatively little attention has been devoted to the power of impeachment, and to the laws and principles which govern it in this country. Popular opinion is more at fault with respect to this subject than perhaps any other within the entire range of the Constitution. It is generally considered a kind of unlimited, undefined, and undefinable power, whose proper office it is to supply all defects of law, and to provide all desired remedies respecting civil officers and their official conduct—a patent medicine for the speedy cure of all cases which baffle the skill of the regular practice. It seems strange that this idea should have become so prevalent, for it has not a fair, impartial, well-considered case in either the United States or Great Britain to support it.

The first case of impeachment by the House of Representatives was that of William Blount, a senator from the State of Tennessee, in 1797. The articles in this case were five in number. "The first charged the said William Blount with intending to carry into effect a hostile expedition in favor of the English against the Spanish possessions of Louisiana and Florida; the second, with attempts to engage the Creek and Cherokee Indians in the said expedition; the third, with having alienated the affections of the said Indians from Ben. Hawkins, an agent of the United States among the Indians, the better to answer his said purposes; the fourth, with having seduced James Cary, an interpreter of the United States among the Indians, for the purpose of assisting in his criminal intentions; and the fifth, with having attempted to diminish the confidence of the Cherokee Indians in relation to the boundary line, which had been run in consequence of the treaty which had been held between the United States and the said Indians." (Annals of Congress, 5th Congress, vol. 1, pages 499, 919) These charges were set out with great particularity, and were declared to be criminal breaches of Blount's "trust and station as a senator, in violation of the obligations of neutrality, and against the laws of the United States." They were undoubtedly regarded as indictable offences. Why they were so regarded will appear hereafter.

Blount appeared by his counsel, Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, who entered, in his behalf, a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. The plea set up four reasons why the court should not entertain jurisdiction of the case, though it appears that the matter was disposed of upon a single point. After argument, the following motion was voted on by the court: "That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives; that, as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled."

The vote of the senators upon this motion stood—yeas 11, nays 14; and thereupon the managers of the House of Representatives and the counsel for Blount were informed that—

"The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed." (Ibid., vol. 2, pages 2318–'19.) This is the only point decided in the Blount case.

The next case presented by the House of Representatives was that against John Pickering, judge of the United States district court of the district of New Hampshire. He was charged with gross misconduct in the trial of a revenue case which grew out of the seizure of a certain vessel for a breach of the revenue laws, contrary to his "trust and duty as a judge of the said district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice;" and that he did this "wickedly intending to injure the revenues of the United States, and thereby to impair their public credit." This was the substance of three of the articles presented in the case. The other one (there being four in all) charged him with "being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits;" and that he appeared on the bench for the purpose of administering justice "in a total state of intoxication," * * "and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being," &c. (Ibid., first session 8th Congress, 321.)

Judge Pickering did not appear in the case, but his son sent to the Vice President a petition, which was laid before the court, asking for a postponement of the trial, and that, as his father was incapable of defending himself, he might be defended by his friends. The petition alleged, among other things, that "at the time when the crimes wherewith the said John [Pickering] stands charged are supposed to have been committed, the said John was, and for more that two years before and ever since has been, and now is, insane, his mind wholly deranged, and altogether incapable of transacting any kind of business which requires the exercise of judgment, or the faculties of reason; and, therefore, that the said John Pickering is incapable of corruption of judgment, no subject of impeachment, or amenable to any tribunal for his actions." (Ibid., 328.)

A discussion arose on this petition, in which the managers of the House of Representatives opposed the reception of the petition and the introduction of evidence in support. But the court decided to "hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering," by a vote of—yeas 18, nays, 12. (Ibid., 332.) A number of depositions were read in support of the petition, and it will be difficult to find any fact in the case better supported, or more substantially proved, than that of the insanity of the respondent. This issue was a grave and pertinent one, and yet the court, after deciding to entertain it, and proceeding to its trial, finally disposed of the case as though no such issue had been raised. This conduct of the court is both remarkable and discreditable;

but not more so than its final action on the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. Pickering was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. If convicted at all, the Constitution required that it should be for high crimes and misdemeanors, as there were no charges of treason or bribery in the case. In order that the guilt or innocence of the respondent should be directly passed upon by the court, without any improper evasion of its real and legal merits, Senator White moved that the "following question be put to each member upon each article of impeachment, viz: Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the —— article of impeachment, or not guilty?" The mover stated that he had borrowed the form of the question from the one used in the case of Warren Hastings. The question was fair in form, and presented the identical issue which the court was about to decide; but it did not suit the purposes of those who were determined to convict, and it was rejected by a vote of—yeas 10, nays 18. Thereupon Senator Anderson moved the following form, viz: "Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the —— article of the impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?" This form was adopted by—yeas 18, nays 9. (Ibid., 364.) So the court, after entertaining the plea of insanity and neglecting to decide it, on the foregoing evasive and unmeaning question, convicted Pickering on each article, and removed him from office; but this end was reached by a strict party vote. Senator Dayton said of the form of the question, and the reason of its adoption: "They were simply to be allowed to vote whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was too obvious. There were members who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge, upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane, and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment." (Ibid., 365.) If this rule is to be followed, any civil officer may be impeached, convicted, and removed from office, for acts entirely proper and strictly lawful. Who can wonder that members of the court denounced the whole proceeding as "a mere mockery of trial?" Surely, the case reflects no credit on the Senate which tried it, and in one short year the members of the body seem to have arrived at the same conclusion; for, on the trial of Judge Chase, the form of the question adopted to be propounded to each member of the court was as follows, viz: "Mr. ———, how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the —— article of impeachment?" (Ibid., 2d session 8th Congress, 664.) It is to be hoped that no one will ever quote the Pickering case as an authority to guide the House in presenting, or the Senate in trying, a case of impeachment. It decided nothing except that party prejudice can secure the conviction of an officer impeached in spite of law and evidence.

The next case carried to the Senate by the House of Representatives has gone into history as one "without sufficient foundation in fact or law." (Hildreth's History of the United States, vol. V. 254.) The case of Samuel Chase, a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, is now referred to. Chase was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in eight articles. It is not necessary to set out the substance of these articles. One of them was founded on his conduct at the trial of John Fries for treason, before the circuit court of the United States at Philadelphia, in April and May, 1800—more than four years before his impeachment. Five of them were based on his conduct at the trial of James Thompson Callender "for printing and publishing, against the form of the act of Congress, a false, scandalous, and malicious libel," &c., "against John Adams, then President of the United States," &c. The remaining two rested on his charge to the grand jury in and for the district of Maryland, in May, 1803, and his refusal to discharge the grand jury in and for the district of Delaware, in June, 1800. The articles portrayed the conduct of Judge Chase in as offensive a manner as the committee could command. The bitterness of Randolph appeared in every article, and the enemies of the accused felt confident of his conviction.

Chase answered minutely and elaborately to the several articles, and filed against each the following plea, viz.: "And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said article of impeachment, saith that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by said first article is alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require." (Ibid., 117) This was the issue on which the case went to trial. The result was the acquittal of Chase on each article. This result was not owing to a failure of the evidence produced to support the facts alleged; for, so far as at least four of the articles are concerned, the allegations were supported in almost every particular; and had the same form of question been used on the conclusion of the trial as was adopted in the Pickering case, Chase, doubtless, would have been convicted. The questions propounded in both cases have already been quoted, and a mere glance at them will show how Pickering was convicted and Chase acquitted.

If this case establishes anything, it is that an impeachment cannot be supported by any act which falls short of an indictable crime or misdemeanor. This point was urged by the able counsel for Chase with great ability and pertinacity; and the force with which it was presented drove the managers of the House of Representatives to seek shelter under that clause of the Constitution which says: "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior." (Manager Nicholson's Speech, Ibid., 597.) This provision, respecting the tenure of the judicial office, it was claimed would authorize the impeachment of a judge for misbehavior which would not support an indictment. The court did not approve this position, and very properly; for, as the Constitution provides that civil officers may be impeached for high crimes or misdemeanors, and nothing is known to the law as a high crime or misdemeanor which is not indictable, of course an impeachment for anything else would be improper.

If the position assumed by the managers in the Chase case, that a judge may be impeached for mere misbehavior in office not amounting to an indictable offence, because such conduct is a breach of the tenure by which the judicial office is held, is correct, what would be its effect on the case which this committee now have in hand? If resort must be had to the clause of the Constitution which prescribes the tenure of the judicial office to justify an impeachment of a judge on account of conduct not known to the law as a crime, does it not reach too far to serve the purposes of those who would impeach the President of the United States because of acts for which he may not be indicted? The President holds his office by a different tenure. The Constitution says: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years." (Art. 2, sec. 1.) This provision of the Constitution stands firmly in the way of those persons who would tone down the term misdemeanor below the indictable standard by resorting to the clause fixing the judicial tenure. Judges hold their respective offices during good behavior; the President holds for a definite time—four years. If, therefore, the argument proves anything in the former case, it proves too much for the latter. If a judge may be impeached for non-indictable conduct, because he holds his office during good behavior, it follows logically that an officer who holds for a term of years cannot be so impeached. This exposes the fallacy of the entire argument.

In 1830, the House of Representatives carried another impeachment to the Senate for trial. This was the case against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri. The charge against Judge Peck was of high misdemeanor in office. But one article was presented, which set out with great particularity the facts on which the accusation was based, and charged that the "said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, unmindful of the solemn duties of his station, and that he held the same, by the Constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure Luke Edward Lawless, did, thereafter, at a term of the said district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, * * * * arbitrarily, oppressively, and unjustly, and under color and pretence that the said Luke Edward Lawless was answerable to said court, * * * as for a contempt thereof," &c.; that he caused Lawless to be unlawfully arrested; that he unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily imprisoned said Lawless in the common prison, and suspended him from practicing in said court, "to the great disparagement of public justice, the abuse of judicial authority, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States." (Trial of Judge Peck, 51.)

Peck filed a lengthy answer, in which he justified his conduct. He alleged that "in all the actions and doings of the respondent in the premises, he avers that he was supported and justified by the Constitution and laws of the land." This was the issue tendered by the respondent. He did not rest upon any real or supposed weakness of the case as presented by the House of Representatives, but boldly declared that his conduct was proper, lawful and right. He elected to present an affirmative defence, and to rely upon the strength of his own cause, and the court sustained him; the vote stood—"guilty," 21; "not guilty," 22. (Ibid., 474.)

The next and last case of impeachment by the House of Representatives was that of West H. Humphries, judge of the United States district court for the several districts of the State of Tennessee, in 1862. Seven articles were preferred against Humphries. Each of them charged him, in direct or indirect terms, with the crime of treason, for they all occurred after the secession of South Carolina, and the assembling of armed men to enforce and render successful the treasonable position assumed by that State. The South Carolina convention passed the ordinance of secession on the 17th day of December, 1860. The first criminal act laid to the charge of Humphries was alleged to have transpired on the 29th day of December, 1860, at which time he urged the people of Tennessee to secede, and thus made himself a party to the treason which had already levied war against the United States in South Carolina. The third article charged him with having, in conjunction with others, organized armed rebellion and levied war against the United States; and all of the other articles charged treasonable acts upon him. (Congressional Globe, volume 48, page 2277.) Humphries was convicted, as it was right he should be. He was charged with a crime against the known law of the land; he was a traitor against the government of the United States.

Five cases only of impeachment have been presented to the Senate by the House of Representatives. One of them, as has been shown, was disposed of on a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, two resulted in the acquittal of the accused, and two in conviction.

An examination of the English cases will not, it is believed, lead to a different conclusion. Cases can doubtless be found wherein Parliament has exercised this high power in a most extraordinary manner, and convicted persons upon charges not indictable. The power of Parliament over the subject is far greater than that which the two houses of Congress can exercise over the citizen. The power of Parliament embraces impeachments, bills of attainder, and bills of pains and penalties. In times of high party excitement this power has been in some cases most shamefully and oppressively exercised. Excitement arising from other causes has sometimes put this irresponsible engine of good and evil into motion. Hatsell gives an account of a most singular exercise of this power in these words: "On the 21st of May, 1368, the forty-second year of Edward III, the King, prelates, lords, and commons being in the white chamber, (after the business was over of reading the petitions and answers, with the aid granted by the commons, and the King's thanks,) there staid and dined with the King all the lords and many of the commons; and after dinner, returning into the white chamber, Sir John Lee was brought before them, and accused of divers misdemeanors, of imprisoning William Latimer, and, as steward of the King's household, for attacking divers persons, and making them answer to him out of councils, on which articles Sir John Lee, not being able sufficiently to excuse himself by law, was committed to the Tower of London until he should pay a fine according to the King's pleasure, and then the prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and commons departed."—(Vol. 4, p. 100.)

Now, although this singular after-dinner proceeding may have been very proper in the judgment of those who participated in it, and comes down to us white with age, it will hardly be contended that we should accept it as a precedent to be followed by the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States, notwithstanding it is embalmed in the history of the proceedings had in the Parliament of Great Britain. But even in this case, swimming as it did in the King's wine, the drunken lords and commons charged Sir John Lee with offences indictable at common law.

Some three hundred years later, the Earl of Strafford was impeached for treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors. The proceeding was likely to fail, or at all events was too slow for the excited populace. Parliament was forced to adopt the more speedy mode of a bill of attainder. Such a bill was passed, and Strafford was executed on the 12th of May, 1641. This attainder was afterwards reversed (but too late for Strafford) by the act 13 and 14 Charles II., chapter 29, in which Parliament records its own shame by stating the reasons for the passage of the act in these words: "That he [Strafford] was condemned upon accumulative treason, none of the pretended crimes being treason apart; that he was adjudged guilty of constructive treason; that the bill was forced through both houses by mobs of armed and tumultuous persons; that when the King signed the commission for giving the royal assent to the bill, he did it with exceeding great sorrow," &c. (4 Hatsell, 239.) The last fact recited is well supported by the King's letter to Strafford, given on the same page, and which reads as follows, viz:

"STRAFFORD: This misfortune that is fallen upon you by the strange mistaking and conjuncture of these times being such that I must lay by the thought of employing you hereafter in my affairs, yet I cannot satisfy myself, in honor or conscience, without assuring you now, in the midst of your troubles, that, upon the word of a King, you shall not suffer in life, honor, or fortune; this is but justice, and therefore a very mean reward from a master to so faithful and able a servant as you have showed yourself to be; yet it is as much as I conceive the present times will permit; though none shall hinder me from being your constant and faithful friend.

"CHARLES, R.

"WHITEHALL, April 23, 1641."

Within twelve days of the date of this letter the King signed the bill of attainder, and Strafford was executed. The wild, unbridled passions of the times were too much for King and Parliament. Strafford was really charged, tried, convicted, and executed by a mob. But whatever may be said against this case—and certainly enough may be said to deter the House of Representatives from adopting any part of it as a precedent to be followed—this much must be said in its favor—it charged Strafford with indictable crimes. The Commons, in no case worthy of notice, ever rested their action on any act which was not alleged to be criminal. In some cases mere pretexts were resorted to in support of crimes charged; in others, resort was had to strained constructions of the law; but the necessity of the presence of an allegation of a known crime was, almost without an exception, recognized. Some of the efforts of the Commons to bring their cases within the rules of law were not very happy, though made by men of great learning and ability. Thus, in the case of Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, (1680,) who was charged with high treason, when some difficulty was found in sustaining the allegation by any definition of treason to be found in the laws of the realm, Mr. Sergeant Maynard, during the very able debate which took place in the House of Commons, undertook to preserve the consistency of Parliament, and to keep up a show of respect for the law, by advancing the following doctrine: he said, "What treason is, no man can define nor describe. The statute of 25 Edward III. does not do it. If another offence be committed, the Parliament shall judge whether it deserves the punishment of treason. Whatever offence deserves the punishment of a traitor, the Parliament may impeach, and the lords may judge accordingly." (4 Hatsell, 158.)

This doctrine would certainly afford a sufficient latitude of jurisdiction to enable Parliament to punish any obnoxious person. It was cunningly devised to answer the purpose of those who felt that they had need of some excuse for punishing as treason a course of conduct which did not range within the limits of any defined treason. The unsoundness of the position assumed by Maynard is presented in a strong light by a speech made on the same side by Sir Francis Winnington, who said: "The two great pillars of the English government are Parliament and juries; it is this gives us the title of free-born Englishmen; for my notion of free Englishmen is this: that they are ruled by the laws of their own making, and tried by men of the same condition as themselves. These two great undoubted privileges of the people have lately been invaded by the judges that now sit in Westminster Hall." (Ibid., 170)

Now, if Winnington was right, Maynard was wrong; for if Scroggs, as a free Englishman, was to be ruled by laws relating to treason made by free Englishmen, how could he be impeached for that which was no treason by any law thus made? Parliament makes the laws of England, not the courts. The House of Lords, when engaged in the trial of an impeachment, is a court to administer the law. If a law be not first made, how can a court administer it? It was complained of Scroggs that he did not administer the law properly, and as free Englishmen had made it; and the complaint was well founded. But this would not justify Parliament in following his example. The attempt of the actors in this case to appear consistent was successful only in rendering their inconsistency most palpable on the page of history.

The doctrine contended for by Maynard has never been adopted in any English case fit to be quoted as an authority. It belongs to another parliamentary power, and is thus referred to by Hatsell: "Where the courts of criminal judicature are equal to the trial of any offence, and can, by existing laws, inflict a punishment adequate to the crime, the same observations are applicable to bills of pains and penalties, viz: that recourse should never be had to extraordinary modes of proceeding. But if the crime is of a nature and magnitude deserving a punishment, in the particular case, far beyond what has by the law been deemed sufficient in similar but less atrocious misdemeanors, or if the rules of admitting evidence, or other forms, to which the judges in a court of law are bound to adhere, would preclude the execution of justice upon offenders whose imprisonment or banishment from the country were become a necessary sacrifice to the order and well-being of the public at large, it has been held, ever since the Revolution, and in the best times of this government, that such circumstances would reasonably justify a departure from the common forms of proceeding, and would entitle the legislature itself to take cognizance of the case, and by a bill of pains and penalties to avenge the mischief offered to the state, thereby to hold out an example which might prevent similar offences in future." (Vol. 4, 103.)

Another writer states the matter thus: "All the modes of criminal prosecutions hitherto spoken of, whether by impeachment or otherwise, are vindications of the laws in being, on which they are wholly founded. But besides the regular enforcement of established laws, the annals of most countries record signal exertions of penal justice, adapted to exigencies unprovided for in the criminal code. Such acts of supreme power are with us called bills of attainder." (Woodeson 2, 621.)

That the principle supported by these authorities has been violated in many cases, in addition to those already referred to, is not doubted; but this does not at all detract from their force, and when we find that in all the cases an attempt was made to bring them within some known law, every violation of the principle but adds to its strength. Hatsell, in his Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons, gives fifty-nine cases of impeachment, ranging from the accession of James I. to 1780, and in every case wherein the facts on which the Commons based their action are given, a crime or misdemeanor, either at common law or by statute of Parliament, is disclosed. Of these cases, twenty-nine were for high treason; two for bribery and corruption in office; two for corruption in office; four for sedition; one for procuring illegal patents; one for extortion; one for unlawfully granting writs of privilege; one for arbitrary and illegal proceedings as a judge; one for the embezzlement of prize goods; one for smuggling; and twelve for high crimes and misdemeanors, in which the offences are not sufficiently described to justify a classification of them by name. Twenty-one of the fifty-five cases never went to trial before the Lords. Some of them were abandoned by the Commons before presentation to the House of Lords, some were dismissed by the Lords for want of prosecution, and several were disposed of by the more summary methods of bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties.

These cases disclose many curious facts, and some very bad law. Some of them were based on most frivolous pretexts; others rested solely on the resentments of men of influence at court and of power in Parliament. The case of Lord High Treasurer Middlesex is an example of the latter class. In 1624 he was impeached for taking bribes, and convicted on some of the articles. This case and its consequences are charged to the resentment of the Duke of Buckingham, who was in high favor with the King. (4 Hatsell, 132.) Two years afterwards the Duke of Buckingham was impeached for a variety of offences in his administration. The King interfered to save him, and dissolved the Parliament. The Commons revived the case in the next Parliament; but before its conclusion Buckingham was assassinated. (Ibid., 134.) Individual resentment, partisan prejudice and excitement, and desire for revenge, instigated very many of the English impeachment cases. This is very well illustrated in the speech of Lord Carnarvon on the trial of the Earl of Danby—a speech that forms one of the foot-prints in the history of parliamentary impeachments which should ever remind the people of this nation that great caution should be used in the selection of English precedents. Carnarvon said: "My lords, I understand but little of Latin, but a good deal of English, and not a little of English history, from which I have learned the mischiefs of such kind of prosecutions as these, and the ill fate of the prosecutors. I could bring many instances, and those ancient; but, my lords, I shall go no further than the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, at which time the Earl of Essex was run down by Sir Walter Raleigh. My Lord Bacon, he ran down Sir Walter Raleigh, and your lordships know what became of my Lord Bacon. The Duke of Buckingham, he ran down my Lord Bacon, and your lordships know what happened to the Duke of Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, ran down the Duke of Buckingham, and you all know what became of him. Sir Harry Vane, he ran down the Earl of Strafford, and your lordships know what became of Sir Harry Vane. Chancellor Hyde (Lord Clarendon) ran down Sir Harry Vane, and your lordships know what became of the chancellor. Sir Thomas Osborn, now Earl of Danby, ran down Chancellor Hyde; but what will come of the Earl of Danby your lordships best can tell. But let me see that man that dare run the Earl of Danby down, and we shall soon see what will become of him." (11 Howell, S. T., 632, 633.)

Did chance weld the chain which so closely holds these names together in the history of parliamentary impeachment? Was it not rather the natural product of misused power? The officer or party who misuses power may be considered fortunate indeed if the wheel of fortune returns no retribution. An advance beyond the law for the punishment of an obnoxious officer is always attended with danger, and English history is crowded with proof of the truth of this assertion. Almost every case which has stamped disgrace upon parliamentary impeachments is impressed with some departure from the known law of England, or with motives which should never enter the precincts of a court; still there is greater excuse for the appearance of such cases in the proceedings of Parliament than could be claimed for the Congress of the United States if it should choose to follow in the footsteps of these English precedents. Many of the most obnoxious parliamentary cases were the results of popular excitement. A great majority of the people of England were excluded from the exercise of the right of the elective franchise, and comparatively few officers were elective. "The King can do no wrong," and the Crown is hereditary, the wrongs, oppressions, and usurpations of the Crown carried no responsibilities beyond the ministers, who were selected by the irresponsible master whose work they were to do and whose crimes they were to assume; grievances, real or supposed, could not be corrected by the people at the ballot box. In times of great commotion, smarting under the effect of their grievances, they regarded an impeachment, a bill of attainder, or a bill of pains and penalties as the only remedy afforded them, and they insisted on its application, regardless of the consequences which might follow. The turbulent populace of London often gave swift motion to the wheels of parliamentary power. Kings, lords, and commons were overawed and forced to do great wrongs. Could this excitement have passed off through that great conservator of the public weal, the ballot-box, at times of oft-recurring elections, impeachments would have been far fewer and much more creditable. For want of this, some of the best men of England have been sent to the block, and Englishmen of to-day hang their heads in sorrow and shame when they look upon the recorded conduct of their ancestors.

When we take up the reports of the well considered cases of parliamentary impeachments, cases which were controlled by the judgments instead of the passions of men, we find but little difficulty in ascertaining the doctrines on which they rest. No unbiased mind can be misguided by them. They rest upon the known law of England, and were had for its enforcement. They exhibit the House of Lords sitting as a court and bound by the laws and rules which were observed by the other criminal courts of the realm, a court for the trial of offenders against laws which existed when the offences were committed, and which looked into those laws to see whether or no the persons arraigned at its bar had violated a "rule of conduct prescribed by the supreme power of the state."

In the year 1724 the Commons impeached the Earl of Macclesfield, lord chancellor of England, of high crimes and misdemeanors, in that he had unlawfully sold offices, masterships in chancery, for his own private gain. He had realized large sums of money from this source. This case is given at length in 16 How, State Trials, and the conviction hinged exclusively on the fact that he had committed an indictable offence. Of this case Lord Campbell remarks: "There has been a disposition in recent times to consider that Lord Macclesfield was wrongfully condemned. 'The unanimity of his judges,' says Lord Mahon, 'might seem decisive as to his guilt, yet it may perhaps be doubted whether they did not unjustly heap the fault of the system on one man; whether Parker had not rather, in fact, failed to check gradual abuses, than introduced them by his authority or encouraged them by his example.' I must say that although it is impossible not to pity a man of such high qualities when so disgraced, and it must be acknowledged that, with good luck, notwithstanding all that he did, he might have escaped exposure and preserved an untarnished fame; yet, in my opinion, his conviction was lawful, and his punishment was mild. There can be no doubt that the sale of all offices touching the administration of justice (with the strange exception in favor of common law judges) was forbidden by the statute of Edward VI, and every chancellor who afterwards sold a mastership in chancery must have been aware that he was thereby violating that statute." (Lives of the Lord Chancellors, vol. 4, p. 554.)

The report of this case perfectly sustains this position of Lord Campbell. It establishes beyond doubt that had not Macclesfield's conduct been made criminal by the statute of Edward VI, he would not have been convicted. The action of both houses of Parliament outside of the case confirms this understanding of the record. Hatsell, (vol. 4, 258,) in a note to the case of Macclesfield, furnishes the following facts respecting the action had for the indemnity of the masters who had purchased offices of the lord chancellor. On the charge being sent to the House of Lords, Hatsell says: "The Commons immediately ordered in a bill for indemnifying the masters in chancery from the penalties of the act of 5th and 6th of Edward VI, chapter 16, against buying and selling offices, upon discovering what consideration they paid for their respective offices." The bill was quickly passed by both houses.

But we need not go outside of the very complete report of the case as given in the State Trials to sustain the declaration that the proceeding would have resulted in an acquittal of Macclesfield had the charges made against him not involved indictable crimes. Not one of the several able managers for the Commons pretended to claim a conviction in the absence of proof of an indictable crime. The effort of the managers throughout the entire trial was to show that such crimes had been committed by the accused earl. They claimed that the acts with which he stood charged were crimes at common law, by the statute of 12 Richard II. and of Edward VI.; in the language of one of the managers, "criminal by the common law and criminal by act of Parliament."

No unbiased mind can examine this case and arrive at a conclusion respecting it different from that which has been stated above. The doctrine of the case is, beyond all question, that an act, to be impeachable, must also be indictable.

The case was free from all passion, resentment, revenge, or partisan bias. It was well considered, and the vote in favor of conviction was unanimous. The case reflects the law of England respecting impeachments as well as any one that was ever tried by the House of Lords. The rules of law concerning crimes and their proof were observed and adhered to throughout, and Macclesfield was convicted because he was proved guilty of crimes declared by the law, and indictable in the courts, of England.

The case of Warren Hastings is another full of instruction. No one can read the twenty-two articles preferred against Hastings and fail to discover a multitude of crimes prescribed by the law of England. Bribery, peculation, usurpation of powers, official corruption, official oppression and extortion, all appear in the long array of crimes laid to the charge of Hastings, and each of them was indictable in the criminal courts of the realm.

Of these crimes Burke, in his speech on the third day, said:

"As to the crime which we charge, we first considered well what it was in its nature, and under all the circumstances which attended it. We weighed it with all its extenuations and with all its aggravations. On that review we are warranted to assert that the crimes with which we charge the prisoner at the bar are substantial crimes; that they are no errors or mistakes, such as wise and good men might possibly fall into; which may even produce very pernicious effects, without being, in fact, great offences. The Commons are too liberal not to allow for the difficulties of a great and arduous public situation. They know, too well, the domineering necessities which frequently occur in all great affairs. They know the exigency of a pressing occasion which in its precipitate career bears everything down before it, which does not give time to the mind to recollect its faculties, to re-enforce its reason, and to have recourse to fixed principles, but, by compelling an instant and tumultuous decision, too often obliges men to decide in a manner that calm judgment would certainly have rejected. We know, as we are to be served by men, that the persons who serve us must be tried as men, and with a very large allowance indeed to human infirmity and human error. This, my Lords, we knew, and we weighed before we came before you. But the crimes which we charge in these articles are not lapses, defects, errors, of common human frailty, which as we know and feel we can allow for. We charge this offender with no crimes that have not arisen from passions which it is criminal to harbor; with no offences that have not their root in avarice, rapacity, pride, insolence, ferocity, treachery, cruelty, malignity of temper; in short, in nothing that does not argue a total extinction of all moral principle, that does not manifest an inveterate blackness, dyed ingrain with malice, vitiated, corrupted, gangrened to the very core. If we do not plant his crimes in those vices which the heart of man is made to abhor, and the spirit of all laws human and divine to interdict, we desire no longer to be heard on this occasion. Let everything that can be pleaded on the ground of surprise or error upon those grounds be pleaded with success; we give up the whole of those predicaments. We urge no crimes that are not crimes of forethought. We charge him with nothing that he did not commit upon deliberation; that he did not commit against advice, supplication, and remonstrance; that he did not commit against the direct command of lawful authority; that he did not commit after reproof and reprimand, the reproof and reprimand of those who are authorized by the laws to reprove and reprimand him. The crimes of Mr. Hastings are crimes not only in themselves, but aggravated by being crimes of contumacy. They were crimes not against forms, but against those eternal laws of justice which are our rule and our birthright. His offences are, not in formal, technical language, but in reality, in substance and effect, high crimes and high misdemeanors."—(Burke's Works, vol. 7, pp. 13, 14.)

This is Mr. Burke's own interpretation of his articles against Warren Hastings. Apply to this the doctrine that acts which are malum in se are crimes at common law, and what must become of every attempt to torture this case into a prop to uphold the dangerous doctrine that public officers may be impeached for acts not known to the law as crimes or misdemeanors? It is believed safe to aver that every offence for which a conviction was really claimed by the managers on behalf of the Commons was known to the law of England as an indictable crime.

For some seven years the trial of this ponderous case "dragged its slow length along" before a conclusion was reached. During the whole trial the rules of the criminal law of England were applied to the case. Questions relative to which the Lords had doubts were submitted to the judges. The managers complained of some of the opinions of the judges; but the Lords followed the judges. The end of the case was an acquittal of Hastings. But it would be difficult to understand how this result could have been arrived at, if the doctrine that an impeachment may be had for acts not indictable had been countenanced by the Lords; for no one can doubt that the evidence disclosed sufficient in the way of mistakes, errors, and misbehavior to justify a conviction under that doctrine.

The last English impeachment case was that of Viscount Melville, in 1806. A very complete report of this case may be found in 29 How. S. T., 550 to 1482, inclusive, and it will well repay a careful perusal, as it was a thoroughly and calmly considered case, and undoubtedly presents the settled doctrine of the English law of impeachment.

Melville was treasurer of the navy, and the Commons charged him in ten articles with having "fraudulently, corruptly, and illegally" used, and permitted others to use, the public money intrusted to him, for private gain. Sir Samuel Romilly, solicitor general, who was one of the managers for the Commons, in his argument stated the case thus: "My Lords, the crimes imputed to the noble lord are of two kinds; they are offences against the common law, and a direct breach of a positive act of Parliament. The first and the tenth articles of impeachment relate only to offences at the common law, and the other articles comprise in them offences at the common law, and likewise violations of the act of Parliament." (P. 1151.) He insisted that Melville's acts were indictable crimes, and in no part of his argument did he claim, nor did any other manager for the Commons claim, that a conviction could be justified on any other ground than that the evidence disclosed an indictable offence. No one during the entire course of the proceeding and trial questioned that such was the law of England.

At the close of the case the Lords sent three questions to the judges, substantially directing them to inform the House whether the facts recited constituted such unlawful proceedings on the part of Melville as "would have been a misdemeanor or punishable by information or indictment." The judges answered that they were not such unlawful acts as could be thus punished, (pp. 1469, '70, '71.) Melville was thereupon acquitted upon each of the ten articles preferred against him. And this closes the list of parliamentary impeachments in England.

Cases can be found in parliamentary history in conflict with the doctrine stated. But that it would be wise, safe, or lawful for the House of Representatives to follow such cases is utterly denied. If we are to be guided at all by English cases, let us resort to those which were the best considered, the latest, the most calmly tried, the most enlightened to be found on the records of Parliament, and not those that were moulded in the midst of revolution, directed by passion, and decided by unreasoning prejudice.

No precedent should be followed which is not founded in reason. The enlightenment of the present day should not be obscured, nor its progress obstructed, by the follies, mistakes, or passions of men who passed away centuries ago. Who would think of respecting the infamous ruling of Jeffreys in Sidney's case, because it was the act of a judge upon the bench? And yet who does not know that many of the parliamentary impeachments were as full of passion and as void of law as the court in which Sidney, and Russell, and Armstrong, and Baxter were tried?

The idea that the House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer of the United States for any and every act for which a parliamentary precedent can be found is too preposterous to be seriously considered. However well such precedents may answer present purposes, they may return to plague those who give them countenance. Those who hold to the doctrine that the "Senate is the sole judge" of what are high crimes and misdemeanors, and that "there is no revising court," (Am. Law Reg. Sept., 1867, p. 660,) forget how often appeals in this country are carried from senates, congresses, presidents, and courts to the high tribunal of the people at the ballot-box, and how inexorable are the mandates of reversal which proceed therefrom. The history of this country is crowded full of such appeals and of their results.

Another very important question may be here suggested. If only indictable crimes and misdemeanors are impeachable, by what law must they be ascertained? Must it be by the law of the United States, of the States, the common law, or by any or all of these?

In the case of the United States vs. Hudson and Goodwin, (7 Cranch, 32,) it was held that "the legislative authority must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offence," before the courts of the United States can exercise jurisdiction over it. This doctrine was affirmed by the case of the United States vs. Coolidge et al., (1 Wheaton, 415,) and Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in ex parte Ballman and Swartwout, (4 Cranch, 95,) said; "Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law, until some statute shall change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction." And it was in following these cases that Justice McLean held, in United States vs. Lancaster, (2 McLean's R., 433.) that "the federal government has no jurisdiction of offences at common law. Even in civil cases the federal government follows the rule of the common law as adopted by the States, respectively. It can exercise no criminal jurisdiction which is not given by statute, nor punish any act, criminally, except as the statute provides." The same doctrine is followed in 1 Wash. C. C. R., 84; 2 Brock, 96; 1 Wood. and Minot, 401; 3 Howard, 103; 12 Peters, 654; 4 Dallas, 10, and note; 1 Kent's Com., 354; Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, 17; and Wharton, in reviewing this question, says: "However this may be on the merits, the line of recent decisions puts it beyond doubt that the federal courts will not take jurisdiction over any crimes which have not been placed directly under their control by act of Congress." (Am. Criminal Law, 174)

Are these authorities founded in reason? If they are, why should they not be followed by the High Court of Impeachment, as well as other courts of the United States? The principle on which they proceed is that nothing is a crime against the United States which has not been declared so to be by the sovereignty of the republic; that only the laws of the United States can be enforced in the courts of the United States; that the United States do what other civilized and Christian governments do—enforce their own laws, for such only are rules of conduct prescribed for their own citizens. This seems to be reasonable; and if it is so, it would be difficult to find an excuse, or form a pretext, for not applying it to the tribunal intrusted with the jurisdiction to try cases of impeachment.

But it is claimed that the High Court of Impeachment is exempt from this jurisdictional limitation by the terms of the Constitution itself; that the Constitution establishes the court, confers its jurisdiction, and includes within it common law crimes, inasmuch as it says: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This, it is said, opens the broad field of the common law for the ascertainment of offences for the commission of which civil officers may be impeached; that the terms treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, are common law terms, and are to be understood in the sense given them by the common law; that, as used in the Constitution, their import is the same as at common law. Is this true, to the extent stated? Suppose the impeachment is to be for treason, and some common law treason is attempted to be set up, what would be the result? The Constitution says: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This puts an end to all attempts to impeach a civil officer of the United States for treason at common law. Then the term treason, as used in the Constitution, although it be a common law term, is shorn of its common law signification.

But it may be said that the term "bribery" is not defined in the Constitution, and, therefore, a civil officer may be impeached for bribery at common law. If this be true, why is it true? Bribery was, at the time the Constitution was formed, a crime known not only to the common law, but also to the laws of each of the thirteen States participating in the organization of the government of the United States. It was selected by name because it affected the administration of the affairs of the government in all of its departments—executive, legislative, and judicial—as treason touched the very life of the nation. Being thus selected by name, recourse may be had to the common law to ascertain the constituent elements of the crime thus named. "Courts may properly resort to the common law to aid in giving construction to words used in the Constitution," (3 Wheaton, 610; 1 Wood. and Minot, 448;) and as the Constitution used the word bribery, resort can be had to the common law to determine its meaning. Thus, the framers of the Constitution placed within the jurisdiction of the high court of impeachment the two crimes which peculiarly affect the life and well-being of the nation—both being specifically named.

How is it with other offences? The Constitution says: "or other high crimes and misdemeanors." What other high crimes and misdemeanors? To what extent can the common law aid us in answering this question? If we go to the common law to find what a crime is, we discover that it is some act or omission in violation of law which may be punished in the mode prescribed by law. This is the general signification of the term crime at common law. It is not a naming of a specific offence. If the Constitution had named murder, arson, burglary, larceny, or any other crime, by its title, the common law could have aided us in arriving at its meaning, for all these, and a multitude of others, are crimes at common law. After wandering over the entire field of common-law crimes, how are we to tell those which will support an impeachment? Learned writers assert that those offences which may be committed by any person, such as murder, burglary, robbery, &c., are not the subjects of impeachment. (Rawle on the Constitution, 204.) But these are all crimes, high crimes, and they meet us at every step in our gropings among the winding passages of the common law engaged in vain endeavors to determine what the Constitution means by the terms high crimes and misdemeanors. Can any mode of escape from this perplexity be devised except that which shall affirm that the phrase "or other high crimes and misdemeanors" means such other high crimes and misdemeanors as may be declared by the law-making power of the United States? Is it unreasonable to conclude that a civil officer can be impeached only for some crime or misdemeanor named by the Constitution or laws of the United States? This is the course pursued towards the citizen in private life. Why should greater uncertainty attend the public officer?

It will not do to answer these suggestions by stating hypothetical cases, and affirming that an officer who should do this, that, or another thing, ought to be impeached, and that it would be unsafe for the nation to permit such conduct to pass unchallenged and unpunished. The obvious answer to all this is, that everything which ought to be made a crime can be made so by legislation. The power is ample and the machinery perfect for all such work. If they are not used, the fault may not lie at the door of the delinquent officer. The statement of a supposed case of itself proves that a remedy may be provided. The remedy is to prohibit the doing of the thing supposed, and declaring its commission a crime. A case cannot be stated which will not suggest its own remedy. Every difficulty may be surmounted by appropriate legislation; and the question may very well be asked, What right has the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States to sleep on their undisputed legislative powers and then resort to the common law of England for the punishment of civil officers, when no civil court of the United States can punish a citizen or foreigner for any crime from the highest to the lowest degree, except it be first prescribed by an act of Congress? The decisions of the courts of the United States that they have jurisdiction of no crimes not found in the statutes of Congress, give great force to the statement of Mr. Rawle in his work on the Constitution, that "The doctrine that there is no law of crimes except that founded in statutes, renders impeachment a nullity in all cases except the two expressly mentioned in the Constitution—treason and bribery, until Congress shall pass laws declaring what shall constitute the other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Page 265.)

Rawle combatted the doctrine of the decisions referred to, and this it is which gives peculiar force to the language just quoted from him; for had he accepted the doctrine of the decision in the case of the United States vs. Hudson and Goodwin, it is perfectly evident that he would have declared the impeaching power inoperative, except so far as it relates to treason and bribery, until Congress, by legislation, should give it vitality.

Story also combatted this doctrine, and denied the correctness of the decisions upon which it is based. It was this which gave direction to those parts of his commentaries on the Constitution so freely quoted by those who claim that the power of impeachment is unlimited. He cites approvingly the remarks of Rawle above quoted. (Com. on the Constitution, section 796.) He affirmed that the courts of the United Stated have jurisdiction of common law crimes; but the decisions are against him. He states in his Commentaries on the Constitution that impeachments will lie for non-indictable offences; but the authorities which he cites are against him. He cites Rawle; but it has already appeared how that author surrenders the entire position. He quotes 2 Woodeson, lecture 40, but in this very lecture Woodeson says: "Impeachments, as we have seen, are founded and proceed upon the laws in being. A more extraordinary course is sometimes adopted. New and occasional laws have been passed for the punishment of offenders. Such ordinances are called bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties." (2 Woodeson, 620.)

Offences known to the laws in being are indictable; and the Congress of the United States may not resort to bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties; these are forbidden by the Constitution. But to what laws must the offences be known? To the law of the sovereignty against which they are alleged to have been committed.

Is there any foundation on which to rest a contrary doctrine? May not the case be stated as a syllogism thus: No officer is subject to the impeaching power for the commission of an act which is not indictable; common law crimes are not indictable in the courts of the United States; ergo, common law crimes will not sustain an impeachment by the House of Representatives of the United States?

The case of the United States vs. Hudson and Goodwin was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in February, 1812, and its doctrine has been adhered to from that day to the present time. It is of some importance to remember this date, as it is subsequent to the impeachment of Blount, Pickering, and Chase, which may account for the failure to raise the question in those cases: "Can a civil officer be impeached for an offence which is not indictable under the laws and in the courts of the United States?" It was not necessary to raise it in the Peck case, for his defence, as has already been stated, was a justification of his conduct; while the Humphries case was founded on statutory offences, and no defence was made.

The duty now remains of presenting the facts upon which this case rests as they are developed by the testimony. This will be done in accordance with the arrangement of the charges in the preamble and resolution of the House.

The first charge is: "Usurpation of power and violation of law."

This is understood to relate mainly to the acts of the President relative to the reconstruction of the rebel States, and perhaps no better way of presenting this branch of the case (and the same may be remarked of the several branches) can be devised than to quote the most important passages of testimony and such official acts as require no proof, as will serve to cast light upon it.

To the question, "Did any one of the cabinet express a doubt of the power of the executive branch of the government to reorganize State governments in States which had been in rebellion, without the aid of Congress?" honorable Edwin M. Stanton answered as follows, viz:

A. None whatever. I had myself entertained no doubt of the authority of the President to take measures for the organization of the rebel States on the plan proposed during the vacation of Congress, and agreed in the plan specified in the proclamation in the case of North Carolina. It may be proper to add, in regard to the history of this subject, that on the day succeeding the date of the telegram to General Weitzel, and on the last day of Mr. Lincoln's life, there was a cabinet meeting, at which General Grant and all the members of the cabinet, except Mr. Seward, were present. General Grant at that time made a report of the condition of the country as he conceived it to be, and as it would be on the surrender of Johnston's army, which was regarded as absolutely certain. The subject of reconstruction was talked of at considerable length. Shortly previous to that time I had myself, with a view of putting in a practicable form the means of overcoming what seemed to be a difficulty in the mind of Mr. Lincoln as to the mode of reconstruction, prepared a rough draught of a form or mode by which the authority and laws of the United States should be re-established and governments reorganized in the rebel States under the federal authority, without any necessity whatever for the intervention of rebel organizations or rebel aid. In the course of that consultation Mr. Lincoln alluded to the paper, went into his room, brought it out, and asked me to read it, which I did, and explained my ideas in regard to it. There was one point which I had left open; that was as to who should constitute the electors in the respective States. That I supposed to be the only important point upon which a difference of opinion could arise—whether the blacks should have suffrage in the States, or whether it should be confined for the purposes of reorganization to those who had exercised it under the former State laws. I left a blank upon that subject to be considered. There was at that time nothing adopted about it and no opinions expressed; it was only a project. I was requested by the other members of the cabinet, and by Mr. Lincoln, to have a copy printed for each member, for subsequent consideration. My object was simply to bring to the attention of the President and cabinet, in a practical form, what I thought might be a possible means of organization without rebel intervention. Mr. Lincoln seemed to be laboring under the impression that there must be some starting point in the reorganization, and that it could only be through the agency of the rebel organizations then existing, but which I did not deem to be at all necessary. That night Mr. Lincoln was murdered. Subsequently, at an early day the subject came under consideration, after the surrender of Johnston's army, in the cabinet of Mr. Johnson. The project I had prepared was printed, and a copy in the hands of each member of the cabinet and the President. It was somewhat altered in some particulars, and came under discussion in the cabinet, the principal point of discussion being as to who should exercise the elective franchise. I think there was a difference of opinion in the cabinet upon that subject. The President expressed his views very clearly and distinctly. I expressed my views, and other members of the cabinet expressed their views. The objections of the President to throwing the franchise open to the colored people appeared to be fixed, and I think every member of the cabinet assented to the arrangement as it was specified in the proclamation relative to North Carolina. After that I do not remember that the subject was ever again discussed in the cabinet. (Page 401.)

In the testimony of honorable William H. Seward, the following questions and answers occur, viz:

Q. Is the plan of reconstruction applied by the President to the rebel States a system of his own creation, or how was it agreed upon?

A. I think it grew during the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the administration of Mr. Johnson, and it was modified from time to time by the circumstances as they occurred. The first act of reorganization, as I have mentioned, was in the case of Tennessee. I think I am the author of that. I think, so far as I know, that plan of reconstruction was pursued, at least until the time I was taken sick and went to my bed, in the month of April, 1865. When I came out of the sick-room, the first day I went to the cabinet, I think the draught of the President's proclamation, or a plan of proclamation, was submitted to me. I found that it substantially accorded with what I had understood to be my own plan, and I accepted it as being the same.

Q. Do you refer to the proclamation now in the case of North Carolina?

A. I refer now to the general proclamation of amnesty and reconstruction of Mr. Johnson. How far it differed from other plans submitted, I do not remember. When this question came up before the President, and in cabinet, it was discussed and adopted during my sickness, and was understood and stated, I believe, as one which harmonized with what had previously been done, but modified by the circumstance of the close of the war, and other things.

Q. Was there not this difference, that Mr. Lincoln's plan was adopted during the war as a war measure, while Mr. Johnson's plan was adopted after the war had ceased?

A. There was a difference both of time and circumstance.

Q. I find the proclamation for the organization of a provisional government of North Carolina was dated May 29, 1865. Was that proclamation considered in cabinet before it was published?

A. That and the other proclamation referred to were all subjects of frequent discussion and very careful deliberation before any one was issued. I think that when the proclamation was reduced definitely to the form which it now has, it was submitted to the whole cabinet, but I cannot certainly say as to the fact that it was. My recollection is that all the provisions contained in it were carefully considered by the President in cabinet. I am not able to state, however, positively about that. I see, by looking at the date, that at that time I had only partially recovered, and I was unable to be in cabinet in all its meetings. I remember, when I arose from my sickness, that I took the papers then presented to me and made some suggestions to it in the way of amendment, which were accepted. (Pages 377, 378.)

The following will be found in the testimony of General U. S. Grant:

Q. Do you recollect the proclamation that is called the "North Carolina proclamation?"

A. Yes, sir; that was the first one published giving a State government.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the President as to the terms or purport of that proclamation?

A. I was, as I say, present when it was read. It was in the direction that I wanted. I was anxious to see something done to give some sort of temporary government there. I did not want to see anarchy.

Q. Did you give any opinion in favor of that proposition?

A. I did not give any opinion against it. I was in favor of that or anything else which looked to civil government until Congress could meet and establish governments there. I did not want all chaos left there and no form of civil government whatever. I was not in favor of anything or opposed to anything particularly. I was simply in favor of having a government there; that was all I wanted. I did not pretend to give my judgment as to what it should be. I was perfectly willing to leave that to the civil department. I asked no person what I should do in my duties; I was willing to take all the responsibilities; and I did not want to give my views as to what the civil branch of the government should do.

Q. I understand you to say that you were very anxious, at the close of the war, that civil governments should be established in some form as speedily as possible, and that you so advised the President?

A. I so stated frequently in his presence.

Q. But that you advised no particular form or mode of proceeding?

A. I did not.

Q. Were you present when this North Carolina proclamation was read in the cabinet?

A. I would not be certain, but my recollection is that the first time I heard it read was the presence only of the President, the Secretary of War, and myself.

Q. Did you give your assent to that plan?

A. I did not dissent from it. That is just in accordance with what I have stated. It was a civil matter, and, although I was anxious to have something done, I did not intend to dictate any plan. I do not think I said anything about it or expressed any opinion about it at that time. I looked upon it simply as a temporary measure, to establish a sort of government until Congress should meet and settle the whole question, and that it did not make much difference how it was done so there was a form of government there.

Q. I wish to know whether at or about the time of the war being ended you advised the President that it was, in your judgment, best to extend a liberal policy towards the people of the south, and to restore as speedily as possible the fraternal relations which existed prior to the war between the two sections?

A. I know that immediately after the close of the rebellion there was a very fine feeling manifested in the south, and I thought we ought to take advantage of it as soon as possible; but since that there has been an evident change there. I may have expressed my views to the President.

Q. What is your recollection in reference to that?

A. I may have done so, and it is possible I did; I do not recollect particularly. I know that I conversed with the President very frequently. I do not suppose that there were any persons engaged in that consultation who thought of what was being done at that time as being lasting—any longer than until Congress would meet and either ratify that or establish some other form of government. I know it never crossed my mind that what was being done was anything more than temporary. (Pages 832, 834, 835.)

This testimony presents the beginning of the reconstruction policy, so called, of President Johnson; and interweaves, to some extent, with the preceding administration.

It does not appear in any part of the testimony that the President or his advisers claimed exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of the reorganization of the rebel States. On the contrary, it does appear that no such claim was asserted. General Grant says that he was in "favor of anything which looked to civil government until Congress could meet and establish civil governments there."

On the same point the following question and answer disclose the opinion of Mr. Stanton:

Q. You have expressed an opinion as to the power to issue proclamations for reorganization. Do you mean by the opinion you have expressed to include any opinion as to the final legality of the organizations to be accomplished under such plan of reorganization; in other words, whether that reorganization would be final and conclusive, and that Congress would have no right to regulate and control it?

A. My opinion upon that point is only the opinion of an individual citizen. My opinion is that the whole subject of reconstruction, and the relation of a State to the federal government, is subject to the controlling power of Congress; and while I believe that the President and his cabinet were not violating any law, but were faithfully performing their duty in endeavoring to organize provisional governments in those States, I supposed then, and still suppose, that the final validity of such organizations would rest with the law-making power of the government. That, however, as I said, is but the opinion of an individual. (Page 406.)

And it will be remembered that the Secretary of State, acting for the President, on the 24th day of July, 1865, sent a telegram to the provisional governor of Mississippi in these words, viz:

W. L. SHARKEY, Provisional Governor of Mississippi, Jackson:

Your telegram of the 21st has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only, until the civil authorities shall be restored, with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

In still more emphatic terms the Secretary of State addressed a letter to the provisional governor of Florida, as follows, viz:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 12, 1865.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 29th ultimo, with the accompanying proclamation, has been received and submitted to the President. The steps to which it refers, towards reorganizing the government of Florida, seem to be in the main judicious, and good results from them may be hoped for. The presumption to which the proclamation refers, however, in favor of insurgents who may wish to vote, and who may have applied for, but not received, their pardons, is not entirely approved. All applications for pardons will be duly considered, and will be disposed of as soon as may be practicable. It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

His Excellency WILLIAM MARVIN,
Provisional Governor of the State of Florida.

These several proofs show pretty conclusively that General Grant was not mistaken when he testified: "I do not suppose that there were any persons engaged in that consultation [with reference to reconstruction] who thought of what was being done at that time as being lasting, any longer than until Congress would meet and either ratify that or establish some other form of government." The testimony before the committee unquestionably proves that it was the original purpose of the President to act in conjunction with Congress with reference to the reconstruction of the rebel States; and had this purpose continued, there would have been no serious conflict between the executive and legislative departments of the government over the restoration of those States to their proper positions in the Union. In that case the assumption by the President of a challenged power would not have been asserted a crime by those who now arraign him as a criminal. The executive department of the government was called upon to deal with a new question, under circumstances of great embarrassment, and in the midst of most troublous times. The nation was just emerging from a most terrible, and, on the part of the rebels, a most unjustifiable war, during which it had given but little attention to modes of reconstruction, and that little had been marked by a confusion of ideas and theories most discordant. No well-rounded issue had been made up between the two departments of the government, nor would such a result have been arrived at had not a seeming change of purpose on the part of the President crystallized an issue and brought on a conflict.

The first official notice which Congress received of the President's change of purpose was contained in his first annual message, delivered to the two houses December 4, 1865. In that document, after stating what he had done in the matter of reorganizing civil governments in the rebel States, he proceeded to say: "The amendment to the Constitution being adopted, it would remain for the States whose powers have been so long in abeyance to resume their places in the two branches of the national legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration. Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

This, with other official and unofficial indications of the President's purpose, led to the creation of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, which was effected by the concurrent resolution of December 13, 1865, by the terms of which the committee was directed to "inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and to report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress." Everything relative to those States coming before either house was turned over to this committee; and weeks and months were devoted to a most searching inquiry into their condition, and what had been done toward their reconstruction by the President. During this time the breach became wider, and the conflict waxed warmer between the executive and legislative departments of the government. On the 19th day of February, 1866, the President returned to the Senate with his objections the "bill to amend an act to establish a bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees, and for other purposes." In the message assigning his reasons for the return of the bill, the President said: "The bill under consideration refers to certain of the States as though they had not 'been fully restored in all their constitutional relations to the United States'. If they have not, let us at once act together to secure that desirable end at the earliest possible moment. It is hardly necessary for me to inform Congress that, in my own judgment, most of those States, so far, at least, as depends on their own action, have already been fully restored, and are to be deemed as entitled to enjoy their constitutional rights as members of the Union."

On the 20th day of February, the House of Representatives responded to this part of the message by passing, by a vote of yeas 109, nays 40, the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That, in order to close agitation upon a subject which seems likely to disturb the action of the government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no senator or representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation.

Following quickly upon this came the President's celebrated and notorious speech of the 22d of February, which rendered irreparable the breach between him and Congress—if such had not before been its character—and ten days thereafter (March 2) the Senate passed the foregoing resolution of the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 29, nays 18.

The next prominent act of the President which added fuel to the flames that divided the two departments of the government was his veto of the "bill to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication," popularly known as the "civil rights bill." This occurred on the 27th of March, 1866. If anything was needed to render complete the rupture between the two departments of the government, the message which announced this veto supplied it.

During the time covered by these several acts the Joint Committee on Reconstruction was diligently occupied in the discharge of its duties. It passed carefully over the entire field committed to its charge. The condition of every rebel State was examined. The devious ways of the "President's policy" were explored—nothing escaped its vigilance and scrutiny. On the 18th day of June, 1866, the committee presented its report to the two houses of Congress. The report was signed by W. P. Fessenden, James W. Grimes, Ira Harris, J.

M. Howard, George H. Williams, Thaddeus Stevens, Elihu B. Washburn, Justin S. Morrill, John A. Bingham, Roscoe Conkling, George S. Boutwell, Henry T. Blow, twelve able, careful, earnest men. This report summed up the whole case involved in the President's efforts at reconstruction, and the consequent conflict between him and Congress. It did not charge him with criminal conduct, nor fail to consider the "peculiar circumstances" under which he acted. On the contrary, in speaking of the authority of the people to "frame a form of government," the report said: "Ordinarily this authority emanates from Congress; but, under the peculiar circumstances, your committee is not disposed to criticise the President's action in assuming the power exercised by him in this regard." And near the close of the report this passage may be found: "While your committee do not for a moment impute to the President any such design," [to destroy the constitutional form of government, and absorb its powers in the Executive,] "but cheerfully concede to him the most patriotic motives, they cannot but look with alarm upon a precedent so fraught with danger to the republic."

The remedy proposed by that committee was not an impeachment of the President, but an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as follows, to wit:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, or representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial offices of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such males citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But the Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned; but neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

This amendment, as passed, was a modification of the one originally reported by the committee and embraced the provisions of the one first reported, and adjusted more satisfactorily to the views of its friends the disqualifications contained in "a bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the government of the United States," which was reported by the committee as a part of the plan of reconstruction.

The amendment passed the Senate on the 8th day of June, 1866, by yeas 33, nays 11; and was adopted by the House on the 13th of June, yeas 138, nays 36.

To make the plan complete, the committee also reported "a bill to provide for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights," in these words, namely:

Whereas it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights; and whereas the Congress did, by joint resolution, propose for ratification to the legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, an article in the following words, to wit:

[The article is above quoted.]

Now, therefore, Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the above recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the senators and representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act.

This bill was never finally acted on, but it is well known that a compliance, in good faith, on the part of the insurrectionary States with this plan of reconstruction would have assured their restoration to the Union. There would have been objections from some members in each house of Congress, but the general feeling was as stated.

In view of the grave character of the case with which the committee has been charged, it seems important that one feature of this plan should not be overlooked, namely, that it proposed to use the identical governments which were organized in the insurrectionary States, in pursuance of the President's "policy," as a means to insure its own success. Nor has Congress, down to the present time, destroyed or set aside such governments. The act of March 2, 1867, "to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," contains the following section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted. That, until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same; and in all elections to any office under such provisional governments all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none others, who are entitled to vote under the fifth section of this act; and no person shall be eligible to any office under any such provisional governments who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third section of said constitutional amendment" (Statutes 39th Congress, 429.)

The affairs of those States are now administered through the machinery of the provisional governments, under the supervision of the military authorities of the United States; and here it may be well to consider, however wrong or unlawful the acts of the President in the creation of those governments may be regarded, whether, without regard to the questions of law hereinbefore discussed, he can be held criminally responsible in the presence of their permissive existence by Congress, and the use to which it has put the results of his improper and illegal acts.

Looking over the entire field of presidential and congressional action affecting the reconstruction branch of this case, and in consideration of the peculiar circumstances which have surrounded it; the multitude of opinions which obstructed the formation of a definite legislative judgment; the necessities of the recent past which impelled public officers to some action, and the present condition of the country, it seems to us that the issues involved are more properly triable before the grand tribunal of the people at the ballot-box, where they have so long been pending, than in the presence of the high court of impeachment.

The reconstruction policy of the President cannot succeed except through an approval by Congress. Such an approval would destroy every element of crime involved in it, for it would then be the act of the government of the United States. If it do not receive the sanction of Congress it cannot present a perfected crime. The present Congress will continue until the close of the President's term of office. It will not approve his plan. Success in his alleged crime is thus rendered impossible.

We do not deem it necessary to enter upon an examination of the details involved in the President's action relative to the subject of reconstruction. These are but, severally, parts of a general system, and are as well understood by the House and the country as by us. Each part was necessary to constitute the whole. If the greater be not a crime, the less cannot rise to that importance.

The second charge is, that the President has "corruptly used the appointing power."

Relative to this charge, a large amount of testimony has been taken by your committee; and it discloses pretty conclusively that, for a time at least, the President and some members of his cabinet used this power with considerable vigor in behalf of those applicants for office who favored the policy of the administration; and it cannot be doubted, from the disclosures of the testimony, that this power was used for the purpose of strengthening the administration in its contest with Congress.

Executive Document No. 96, communicated to the House of Representatives February 20, 1867, discloses the fact that there were sixteen hundred and forty-four postmasters removed "between the 28th day of July, 1866, and the 6th day of December, 1866;" and that "of this number, one thousand two hundred and eighty-three were removed for political reasons." The Postmaster General (Hon. A. W. Randall) was examined with reference to these removals, and gave the following testimony, viz:

Q. In your answer to the House resolution calling for information in regard to the appointments to office, you designated as causes in a great many cases, thirteen or fourteen hundred in all, "political reasons." The term is a very vague one, and I will be obliged to you to state more distinctly what you mean by it?

A. There were above twelve or fourteen hundred in all, and part of them were for political reasons.

Q. Referring to your printed answer, I find that you state the whole number of removals to be 1,601, and that of these 1,283 were for "political reasons;" and you state afterwards that eight were for "political reasons and neglect of duty," thereby implying, I suppose, something more than mere neglect of duty?

A. In those cases there were charges against the individuals as well as political reasons: perhaps inattention to duty. I do not remember the particulars in these cases. I suppose the statement which you have read is a correct statement. I will answer that "political reasons" embrace a good many things. Removals for that cause have been frequent in almost every administration. When we began, we turned men out because they did not vote for Lincoln; that was a political reason, and it was so stated. If men voted the democratic ticket or were opposed to the policy of Mr. Lincoln, they were removed for that cause; it was designated "political reasons."

Q. I am speaking now of the removals made by the President in office, and the removals to which you refer in this answer.

A. I was proceeding to state that opposition to the policy of the present administration, which is understood to be the policy of Mr. Lincoln, was a cause for which many of these men were removed. It was opposition to Lincoln's policy, which Mr. Johnson was trying to carry out, and the general term "political reasons" was used; that is, the general term used to cover a great variety of circumstances. A man may have been very abusive of Mr. Johnson, denouncing him on the street as a traitor; he would be turned out of office, and it would be stated for "political reasons." If he was abusive of the Postmaster General, denouncing him in the same way, we would turn him out, and assign the reason for it as "political."

Q. I wish you would state, in the cases referred to in this answer, whether "political reasons" were not difference of opinion with the Executive in regard to his policy in the reconstruction of the southern States?

Not altogether; these questions entered into it. It went both ways: for instance, republican members of Congress would come into the department and complain of a man as having been opposed to the war, as denouncing Lincoln and Johnson, and wanted me to turn him out. I would turn him out, and assign as cause "political reasons." On the other hand, complaint would come that a man was abusing Mr. Johnson, calling him a traitor for carrying out his policy in opposition to Congress. He would be turned out and the cause assigned "political reasons." Without my attention being called to particular cases, I can only state the meaning of the term in this general way; and I have simply intended to give you a general idea.

Q. I wish you would state whether, in a majority of cases, these removals were not made simply from the fact that the persons harmonized in sentiment with Congress in the matter of reconstruction?

A. In a great many cases it was so, but I cannot say in a majority. I could not, from memory, undertake to say with accuracy what proportion. (Pages 333, 334.)

This is substantially an avowal that opposition to the policy of the administration was deemed a sufficient cause for the removal of a public officer. The testimony of James M. Scovel (pages 619 to 633) shows that this was the case, and that no person who refused to support such policy would be appointed to office, and that he received this information, at least in an inferential way, from both the President and his private secretary, Mr. Edward Cooper.

In view of all the testimony taken with reference to this branch of the case, we can but conclude that it was the purpose of the President to use the appointing power in such manner as to favor those who approved of the policy of the administration, and would accord to it their support, and that this purpose related to all of the executive departments, in which many removals and appointments were made in pursuance of it. Was this purpose and its consequent use of the appointing power a change from the practice and action of former administrations? An affirmative answer to this question would go far towards establishing the charge of corruption in the exercise of this power. What has been the practice of former administrations? Does any one doubt that whigs were formerly turned out of office by democratic presidents because they were whigs, and for no other reason? and that in the mutations of parties democrats shared the same fate for a like reason? Did not the republican party continue the practice? and is it now first discovered to be a crime? We will not affirm that this practice is not wrong, nor can we say that there is a member of either branch of Congress who has not, at some time, asked for its application. If "honest, faithful, and capable" officers could continue to discharge their public duties regardless of the successes and defeats of parties, the government and the people, doubtless, would profit thereby. But it is a well-established historical fact that for half a century each succeeding administration has practiced, to a greater or less extent, the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." The appointing power was left without regulation or restraint by law, until the 2d day of March, 1867, when Congress passed "an act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices." (Acts 39th Congress, 430.) We are not apprised of any infraction of this statute by any testimony before us.

Since 1836, in all cases where deputy postmasters have been appointed and confirmed by the Senate, a commission in the following form has been issued:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and punctuality of ———, I have nominated, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate do appoint, ——— deputy postmaster ———, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to law; and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said ———, for the term of ———, unless the President of the United States for the time being should be pleased sooner to revoke and determine this commission.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the [L. S.] United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ———, and of the independence of the United States of America the ———.

By the President:

This form reserves and asserts the right and power of the President to revoke and determine the commission at any time, and at his pleasure to create a vacancy by a removal.

In all cases since 1837, "when such officers have been appointed during a recess of the Senate," the following form of commission has been used, viz:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and punctuality of ———, I do appoint ——— deputy postmaster ———, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said ———, during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being, and until the end of the next session of the Senate of the United States, and no longer.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the [L. S.] United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ———, and of the independence of the United States of America the ———.

By the President:

These forms represent the practice of the executive department of the government for very many years. They disclose a usage of the government, and it is an established principle of law, affirmed by the Supreme Court, that "usages have been established in every department of the government which have become a kind of common law, and regulate the rights and duties of those who act within their respective limits, and no change of such usages can have a retrospective effect, but must be limited to the future. Usage cannot alter the law, but it is evidence of construction given to it, and must be considered binding on past transactions." (7 Peters, 14.)

The act of March 2, 1867, pronounced against this usage, and declared a rule by which the appointing power should be guided. The executive department of the government has conformed its action to that rule, and has changed the forms of its commissions accordingly. Since the passage of that act, in all cases of suspension from office, commissions in the following form have been issued, to wit:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of ———, I do designate him to perform the duties of the office of deputy postmaster at ———, in the State of ———; and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said ———, until the next meeting of the Senate of the United States, and until the case of ———, who has been suspended by the President from the performance of the duties of said office, shall be acted upon by the Senate, and no longer, unless the commission shall be sooner revoked, subject to the conditions prescribed by law.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the [L. S.] United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ———, and of the independence of the United States of America the ———.

By the President:

———— ————,
Secretary of State.

In all "cases of vacancies by death or resignation," the following forms of commissions have been used, namely:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

When officers have been confirmed by the Senate, upon the nomination of the President, commissions have been issued in form as follows, namely:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and punctuality of ———, I have nominated, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate do appoint ——— deputy postmaster ———, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of that office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said ———, for the term of ———, subject to the conditions prescribed by law.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the [L. S.] United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ———, and of the independence of the United States of America the ———.

By the President:

———— ————,
Secretary of State.

If any departure from this system has transpired, the testimony before us does not disclose it.

Complaint has been made that the President, for the purpose of more effectively using the appointing power to the advancement of his own ends, has corruptly endeavored to evade the provisions of the Constitution defining and regulating the appointing power, by neglecting or refusing to send to the Senate, in a number of cases, nominations to fill vacancies which happened "during the recess of the Senate." The evidence does not support this charge. The testimony of Hon. Hugh McCulloch, (71 to 78 inclusive,) of George Parnell, J. L. W. Huntington and C. E. Creecy, (79 to 84 inclusive,) of Hon. A. W. Randall, (333 to 345,) of W. E. Chandler, esq., (472 to 480,) Robert Johnson, (495,) and of W. G. Moore, (542, 543,) explains the circumstances involved in this complaint, and rebuts the presumption sought to be raised of a corrupt or criminal intent on the part of the President relative to the absence of nominations to fill said vacancies.

The appointment to office of persons who could not take the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, may be properly considered under this charge. Some sixty appointments of this character were made, and the state of facts disclosed by the testimony concerning them will be briefly stated. The following extracts are made from the testimony of Hon. Hugh McCulloch, viz:

Q. Have any persons been appointed to office in the southern States since the close of the rebellion, and been allowed to enter on the duties of their office without taking what is commonly called the test oath?

A. A number of persons have been appointed to office in the southern States who were unable to take the test oath of 1862.

Q. State to the committee, without further interrogation, the circumstances of their appointment, &c.

A. In reply to a resolution of the Senate, dated December 13, 1865, calling for information on the subject, I addressed to the Senate a reply, which is to be found in Executive Document No. 3, 39th Congress, 1st session. As I stated the facts as they occurred concisely at the time, I would like to make that reply a part of my testimony in this case. (Page 604.)

In the document referred to a statement is given explanatory of these appointments, and from it we quote as follows:

Upon the surrender of the confederate armies, it was regarded by the President and his cabinet as a matter of great importance that revenue offices should be established in the southern States, in order that commerce and trade might be resumed, and the authority of the government in one of its most important branches should be again recognized in all parts of the Union with as little delay as practicable. It was also regarded as a matter of scarcely less importance that citizens of the respective States in which offices were located, and not strangers, should be appointed revenue officers. In carrying into effect these views it became necessary to call into requisition the services of some southern men who had participated in the rebellion. None, however, have been appointed to office, or permitted to hold office under the law for the collection of the revenues, who are known to have instigated the rebellion, or who could properly be considered as justly responsible for it. It has been my purpose to recommend the appointment, and to sanction the appointment, of such only as could take the oath literally; and failing to be able to find such persons, to confine the appointment to those who gave no aid to the rebellion until the government of the United States had failed to give them the protection to which they were entitled, and there was no government but rebel government (State and confederate) to which they could look for safety or support in the perilous circumstances in which, without any previous action of their own, they had been forced. It is believed that very few persons not belonging to one or the other of these classes are holding positions under this department. (Page 605.)

Q. Were those appointments made by the President?

A. The principal appointments are presidential appointments. They were made by the President on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. I desire to state that this was considered a matter of so grave importance that, before any action was taken upon the subject of filling revenue offices at the south, it was a matter of cabinet consultation; and, after a full and careful deliberation, it was agreed—as I recollect, unanimously—that, as it was important for the government that we should establish our revenue offices without delay, the Secretary of the Treasury would be justifiable in doing the best he could in regard to appointments, under the peculiar circumstances of the country. (Page 607.)

* * * * * * *

Q. When was this cabinet meeting held to which you refer?

A. I cannot name the time. It was the subject of conference at one or two meetings. It was pretty soon after the collapse of the rebellion—early in 1865.

Q. What efforts were made by your department, previous to that decision to which you refer, to ascertain whether men who could take the test oath could be found at the south?

A. We made no other efforts than to inquire of the men whom we met from the south in reference to the best persons in their neighborhoods to hold the respective offices, and to request that in all cases they would name persons, if they could do so, who were competent and could take the oath. That was about the only means we had of ascertaining.

Q. Can you give any reason why Congress was not informed of that action until the Senate called for information by resolution?

A. I have no other reason to give than this, that the action of the Treasury Department and of the Post Office Department in reference to appointments to southern offices was, as we understood, known to Congress without any formal communication. I had myself frequent conversations with leading men on the subject. No communication was made to Congress, because I thought it was generally understood that such appointments had been made, and it was expected that Congress would take some action in the matter without a formal communication.

Q. State in this connection to what member of Congress you ever made any such communication.

A. I cannot recollect definitely with whom I conferred. I think I did speak once or twice to Mr. Fessenden on the subject; and without being able to give names, my impression is that I spoke to perhaps a dozen others, explaining fully the course which had been taken by the Secretary of the Treasury. I wish to say that, after Congress had failed to take any action on the report which I made in December, after waiting for some action, and none being had, in March I addressed a communication to the President on the subject, and that communication was referred to Congress. As soon as I understood that Congress was hardening, as I deemed it, toward the South, and that there would be no modification of the oath, I took the most prompt measures in my power to have all the occupants who had not taken the oath dismissed from or to resign office, and others appointed in their places.

Q. Have all those men who did not take the oath been paid their salaries?

A. Not a dollar to my knowledge, with the single exception referred to. Some have been applicants to Congress for relief.

Q. Did not collectors retain their salaries out of money which came into their hands?

A. Under present regulations, and I think under regulations which were then in existence, a collector of internal revenue does not retain his compensation, but is compelled to deposit the entire amount of his receipts, he receiving at the proper time a draft for his commissions, &c. (Pages 613, 614.)

The testimony of ex-Attorney General Speed casts some light upon the subject of these appointments, as the following extracts will show, viz:

Q. During your period of office, did you at any time consider the question of the power of the President or of the heads of departments to appoint men to office who could not take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by the statute of 1862, known as the test oath?

A. Yes, sir. I do not recollect having given any official opinion on the subject. I have had the records examined, and could find no trace of an official opinion there. I recollect, however, that the subject was discussed as early as and before the 30th of May, 1865. Immediately after the collapse of the rebellion the administration desired very earnestly to establish the various departments of the government in the seceded States. The judiciary department was under my control. I was very anxious to send judges, marshals, and the appropriate officers of that department to the south. I find that on the 30th of May, 1865, Mr. Mason was commissioned as district attorney, and Mr. Dick was commissioned as district judge of North Carolina. On or prior to the day that those commissions were made out, the subject of taking the test oath had been discussed in the cabinet. There was very little discussion of it. Some of us were of the opinion that probably persons could be inducted into office and made de facto officers without taking the test oath. Under that opinion, not well considered, those commissions were issued. After they were issued, I and other members of the cabinet (Mr. Stanton more particularly) examined carefully the question, and came to the conclusion that no persons could be inducted into office down there without taking the test oath. Mr. Dick and Mr. Mason had gone home. I wrote to them to that effect, and they returned their commissions, not being able to take the test oath. From that time no persons were commissioned in that department who could not take the test oath.

Q. Have you any specific recollection whether the fact of that decision was made known to the President?

A. I have no specific recollection of the occasion. My recollection is very distinct to this effect—that when the matter was first brought before the cabinet Mr. Stanton, who is a bright lawyer, aided me in looking into the matter, and we concurred in the notion that possibly persons might be inducted into office without taking the test oath. The matter was laid over, and we afterwards considered it more carefully, and both of us came to the conclusion most decidedly that it could not be done. Whether Mr. Stanton was at the second meeting of the cabinet when the decided opinion was given I cannot say; but at that second meeting of the cabinet, a very decided opinion was given by me. My impression is that I did not write out any opinion, but that I talked from minutes which I held in my hand in relation to the matter. (Pages 791, 792.)

This second discussion of the question occurred some time in August, 1865, the precise day Mr. Speed could not state.

A number of persons were appointed after this date to revenue offices who could not take the "test oath," but the testimony does not show that the President in any case knew that the appointees could not qualify in manner and form required by law.

Appointments of this character were confined almost exclusively to the Treasury Department, as it appears from the testimony that a distinction was made between officers deemed peculiarly advantageous to the government, and those regarded as more intimately connected with the interests and convenience of the people of the insurgent States; hence, while revenue officers who did not qualify in accordance with the act of July 2, 1862, were appointed, no such cases seem to have occurred in the appointment of postmasters. These appointments were regarded as relating more to the advantage and convenience of the people of the insurgent States than to the government. They were not made unless the appointees could qualify under the said act. Why was this exception made if the design was merely to subserve the purposes of the administration? Why was not the same system carried out in all of the executive departments, if its designed end was predetermined to work out the success of the plan of the President regardless of the law of the land or the will of Congress?

The third charge is: that the President has "corruptly used the pardoning power."

This power is vested in the President by section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution, in these words: "He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." The exercise or non-exercise of the power rests in the discretion of the President. If he does not use it corruptly, he commits no crime. He must be guided by his judgment in the use of this as in all other instances of discretionary power, and "when an officer is called to exercise a judgment of his own, he is not punishable for a mere error therein, or for a mistake of the law. Here the act, to be cognizable criminally, or even civilly, must be wilful and corrupt." (Bishop on Criminal Law, 913.)

That the President has used the pardoning power in a vast number of cases, is a fact of public notoriety, and is abundantly established by the testimony. But this fact proves but one thing, namely, that a great many persons in the United States had committed crimes. It raises no presumption of corruption. The legal presumption is that the President used this power properly in each and every instance. This presumption may be overcome by proof; but this result has not been arrived at in any case examined by the committee. It is not contended that the power may not have been unwisely used, nor that many mistakes may not have been made in its exercise. It is simply affirmed that in such cases as have been examined in detail, the element of corruption in granting the pardon does not appear.

The pardon of Solomon Kohnstam created considerable excitement in the country when it was announced. The statements concerning it, made in the press, seemed to establish conclusively that a wanton, reckless, and corrupt use of the pardoning power had been discovered. Kohnstam had deliberately, and by most wicked and criminal practices, defrauded the government out of a large sum of money when it was straining every resource to the utmost tension to destroy a rebellion which threatened its life. The President pardoned him, and the committee examined the supports underlying the action of the Executive. The result may be found on pages 417, 418, and if they are turned to, few will assert that that case presents evidence of a corrupt use of the pardoning power.

Other cases were examined in detail, such as that of George W. Gayle, who proposed for $1,000,000 to "cause the lives of Abraham Lincoln, William H. Seward, and Andrew Johnson, to be taken," (564 to 570,) and the case of Joseph R. Anderson, one of the proprietors of the Tredegar iron works, of Richmond, Virginia, (417,) with no graver results.

It has been asserted that the case of the "West Virginia soldiers" establishes an instance of a corrupt use of this power, because two hundred and ninety-one persons were included in one order, without an examination into the merits of each individual's case. What are the facts? The following letter was presented to the President:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., October 22, 1866.

SIR: The soldiers whose names will be found in the accompanying list were nearly all marked absent without leave in the year 1864, during that terrible campaign to Lynchburg, under command of Major General Hunter. In the cavalry those so marked had their horses killed, and were obliged, like the disabled infantry, to make their way back within our lines, or hide in the mountains until the command returned. If a soldier is absent at three roll-calls, and the officers do not know where he is, he is marked a deserter; when that record is made, a trial by court-martial is necessary to remove the charge; this opportunity these men never had. They rejoined their respective commands and served nobly to the end of the war, when, mustered out of service, they were unable to draw the pay due them.

You will perceive there has been a selection made of the deserving men from each regiment; the small number taken from each is proof of that fact. I do not consider these men deserters; they certainly never intended or thought of deserting, and justice requires that the charge should be removed, and thus restore them to all the rights and privileges of soldiers and citizens. These men are registered and want to vote, but will be debarred unless the disability is removed.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, yours,

M. McEWEN, M. D.,
Late Surgeon-in-Chief 2d Cav. Div., and Brevet Col. U. S. A.

His Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States. (Page 283.)

On this appeared the following indorsements:

Referred to the honorable the Secretary of War. All pains and penalties attaching to these men on account of the charge of desertion are remitted, and the charge will be removed from the rolls.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

OCTOBER 23, 1866

Referred to the Adjutant General to issue order in conformity with above by the President.

E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Concerning these papers the Hon. E. M. Stanton testified as follows:

Q. As far as the files of the department show, was there any paper transmitted to your department from the President, at the same time the one last referred to was received?

A. There was none at that time that I have any knowledge of. The letter of Surgeon McEwen, with the indorsement of the President, was brought to me by some one; I cannot now recollect whether by Mr. McEwen, or whether it was transmitted in the ordinary course by the President. I read the order of the President and immediately indorsed my order below, and sent it down to the Adjutant General. The letter of Surgeon McEwen I did not then read, and have never read it since.

Q. Was there any investigation made into the nature of the offences committed, or said to have been committed, by these men, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were real deserters or nominal deserters?

A. No investigation was made by me. Shortly after the order was sent to the Adjutant General, probably the same day, he reported to me that he thought the President had been deceived in reference to that application, for he found that one or more of the persons ordered to be relieved had deserted to the enemy. I immediately went to the President and asked him whether he was aware of that fact, and whether he desired to have such persons released. He said he was not aware of the fact and certainly did not mean to order their release, and directed me to have an investigation made as to how many of them belonged to that class. I returned instantly to the War Department and gave directions to the Adjutant General to examine how many of them belonged to that class, and not to embrace them in the order. I understood that on examination it was found that only one belonged to that class, and he was not embraced in the order. What investigation was made in reference to the others I am unable to say. I acted upon the order that was indorsed upon the letter. (Pages 276, 277.)

The result is evidenced by the following order:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 21, 1866.

All pains and penalties attaching to the following named men, on account of the charge of desertion against them, are hereby removed, and the charges will be removed from the rolls: [Here were inserted the names of the soldiers.]

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

(Page 278.)

But it is said that the President acted upon the promptings of a corrupt motive—that the real reason which governed him was a desire to control the election in the Martinsburg district, West Virginia, and that this is proved by a letter alleged to have been written by Edward W. Andrews, who was at the time the democratic candidate for Congress in that district. The letter referred to is in words as follows:

His Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON, President of the United States:

SIR: The accompanying list embraces the names of nearly two hundred soldiers, who are disfranchised by the charge of desertion. The great majority of these men reside in my congressional district. It would be doing me a great service to have the charge removed, and thus enable them to vote at the approaching election. The contest will, without doubt, be a very close one, and I feel well assured the restoration of these men will result in my election, provided it can be done immediately. (Page 317.)

Matthew McEwen testifies (page 57) that he received this letter from Mr. Andrews. Andrews testifies (page 317) that he never wrote the letter—that it is a forgery. His son, Samuel J. Andrews, swears (page 361) that he wrote the letter without his father's knowledge, and says that "Dr. McEwen sat down and wrote off in pencil a letter which I copied and then signed my father's name to it and gave it to him," (McEwen.) An effort is made to trace this letter to the hands of the President, but taking the testimony of McEwen, (page 56,) of Thomas B. Florence, (page 273,) of Robert Johnson, (page 493,) and of William G. Moore, (page 540,) together, it does not appear that the letter reached the President or that he had any knowledge of it.

Supplemental testimony has been taken tending to show that the Andrews letter did reach the President, and that an answer to it was written by Colonel W. G. Moore, one of the President's private secretaries. We affirm that under no rule of law does the testimony carry a knowledge of that letter, or of its contents, to the President. But suppose it did reach him, and that he acted on its improper appeal; what then? The act of pardon was right. The soldiers affected by it ought to have been restored to the rolls, and have received an honorable discharge. They had served their country well, and their alleged desertion was the result of the technicality of military law, and not of their own intention. There is no reasonable doubt of this. A technicality disfranchised them; nothing more did the deed. Suppose the motive of the President was bad; the deed itself was right. For what, then, is he to be impeached—the bad motive or the good deed? If the President is to be impeached for this, let those who choose stand and demand from these soldiers of the republic a surrender of the elective franchise; we will not do it.

The policy pursued relative to the pardon of persons applying therefor under the amnesty proclamation, and the reasons on which it was based, are thus disclosed in the testimony of ex-Attorney General Speed:

Q. What principle governed you in recommending men to pardon?

A. The general principle of clemency. If I saw the party, or if a gentleman in whom I had great confidence gave me a description of the party, which I relied upon, I recommended a pardon. I regarded it as best to relieve those persons of apprehension, and let them go to work. We operated on these exceptions in the office in this way: The persons coming under the $20,000 clause and the more minor officers were all thrown together, and there was very little question asked about them. Our object was to fling pardons broadcast. And so that there would be no question in the future about slavery, we put a condition in the pardon that the person pardoned should accept the situation of the country in reference to the abolition of slavery. There was a condition in the pardon that he should never thereafter hold a slave, or make use of slave labor; and if we only gave pardons to a few it would be ridiculous to make that condition, whereas giving pardons to a great many persons of the influential classes would give force and effect to that idea. That induced us to be very liberal with pardons.

Q. Is that the principle on which you account for the pardoning of such a large number of leading men in the south who came under the exception?

A. I do not know whether that is the principle. The principle on which we acted in the office was, not to investigate closely the cases coming under the $20,000 clause, and the clause in relation to minor officers. Unless there was something against the party the pardon went as a matter of course. In the cases of higher officers the applications had to come direct to the Attorney General or the President; and we made exceptions in particular cases. (Pages 303–304.)

If the general policy of granting pardons, or its individual application, has been corrupt or criminal, the testimony before us does not disclose it. We do not assert that the use made by the President of the pardoning power has not been unwise, impolitic, dangerous; but we do affirm that the testimony does not disclose a crime or misdemeanor known to the law, in its exercise.

The fourth charge is: "That the President has corruptly used the veto power."

The testimony taken by the committee under this charge relates mainly to the veto of the bill for the admission of the proposed State of Colorado. The following extract from the testimony of Hon. John Evans, one of the senators elect of the proposed State, will serve as a condensation of this branch of the committee's inquiry, viz.:

Q. State as much as possible in detail the conversation that occurred between you and Mr. Cooper, and between you and the President.

A. Previous to our interview with the President, we were invited into a private room by Mr. Cooper, who said he desired to talk with us in regard to the Colorado question. After a resumé of the present political situation, he said it was of vital importance for us to be friends of the President and his plan of restoration; said there would be no trouble about our bill if we would give our adherence to the President's policy; that believing, as the President did, that the future welfare and harmony of the country depended upon sustaining him as against Congress, it would not be expedient in him (the President) to admit us to fix a ruling power over him in the Senate; that there was no constitutional reason or precedent upon which to veto—it was merely a question of expediency, and added: "It is for you, gentlemen, to decide." He said a great deal else of this import, to all of which we answered, and stated that we had no personal hostility to the President; would be glad to see harmony, and hoped a more perfect understanding between the President and Congress would yet harmonize them, and that some plan would yet be agreed upon that would restore the union of all the States, so that loyalty could be encouraged and protected in the late rebel States; that one of us (Mr. Chaffee) had voted for him (the President) in the Baltimore convention, and that we should sustain him so far as we could, in justice to our views upon the great national question of reconstruction. He then asked us to go in and see the President, which we did. The President met us very cordially; went over his whole plan in detail, since his inauguration; said that our bill placed him in a rather awkward position; that he felt the necessity of carrying out his policy as the only one to restore the Union; that the radicals in Congress, if allowed to succeed, would disrupt and destroy the government. He characterized the leading men as actuated only by a desire to prolong themselves in power, and said he did not deem it expedient, or in consonance with the future welfare of the Union, to admit two more into the Senate to carry out their schemes; that he felt friendly to the West, and desired to do right, &c., &c.; to all of which we answered that we thought him mistaken about the animus and object of the majority in Congress; that we believed they, as well as himself, were actuated by patriotic motives; that we felt it to be our duty to be free to act as we thought best in our judgment, after taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; that we could have no object in this exigency but to act in a way that would restore the country upon a just basis, so that the rights of all would be guaranteed; that we should have sustained the civil rights bill if we could have voted upon it; that we very much desired the admission of Colorado, and hoped he would approve the measure, &c. I further stated to him that I had been a republican since the organization of that party. After we left him Mr. Cooper held another private interview with us, in which he requested us to put our views in writing for him, not to be used, as nearly and as favorably as we could, consistently, with the President's policy; to think of it over night, and to see him again at nine o'clock in the morning. During this interview he left us and went in to see the President, and after returning he made this request for us to put our views in writing. We called in the morning, separately, and without consultation with each other, and declined, stating that we had said and done all that we could, and would have to submit to what the President saw fit to do in the premises. (Pages 19–20.)

Hon. Jerome B. Chaffee, the other senator elect, confirmed this statement of his colleague, and, in addition thereto and in answer to the following question, gave this reply:

Have you any doubt, from what transpired between you and Mr. Cooper and the President, that if you had agreed to their proposition the President would have signed the Colorado bill?

I have not a doubt, in the world. I judge so from the conversation of the President—from his remark to us that it put him in an awkward position—that he had always been the friend of the west—that he hated to veto the bill; but he deemed the restoration of these States of paramount importance to everything else—and that he did not deem it expedient to admit two more senators to override him. (Page 22.)

Of course, this opinion of Mr. Chaffee cannot be received as evidence, but the facts he testified to go far towards supporting it.

Mr. Cooper was examined with reference to these interviews, and the following extracts are taken from his testimony:

I was extremely anxious that Colorado should be admitted as a State. That was my position. I was urging upon the President of the United States its admission, and for that purpose I desired to learn what were the views of Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee, in regard to the political questions then agitating the country.

Q. Please state what occurred at that interview.

A. I cannot pretend to detail the conversation. The substance of it was to ascertain, if I could from them, what position they assumed in regard to the questions then dividing Congress and the President as to declaring the States lately in insurrection and rebellion territories. I received from Mr. Chaffee a written statement of his views, and a verbal statement from Mr. Evans.

Q. Can you produce the written statement made by Mr. Chaffee?

A. It is on file in the Executive Mansion, and if it has not been destroyed, can be produced.

Q. Please state your recollection of the conversation that occurred on that occasion.

A. The substance of the conversation that I recollect was, that I inquired of them what their views were in regard to the restoration of the States lately in insurrection—whether they held with the majority in Congress, that they were dead States, incapable of representation, or whether they believed loyal representatives elected from the States should be received by Congress to their seats. I understood both of these gentlemen to say that while they were republicans, they were unhesitatingly in favor of the admission of loyal representatives elected from any of the States lately in rebellion who could take the test oath. When I ascertained that to be their view, I urged it as an argument to the Executive why the Colorado bill should be sent back approved.

Q. At whose instance did you have this interview?

A. At my own.

Q. Had the President any knowledge whatever of your intention to bring about this interview?

A. Not the slightest.

Q. It was, then, solely on your own responsibility?

A. It was.

Q. Did you inform the President of it?

A. Yes, sir. I took the gentlemen into the President's room myself.

Q. That conversation commenced before you took them in to see the President, and was on the same evening of their interview with the President?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you go in to see the President before they were introduced?

A. It is very probable I did, though I do not remember it. If I did, it was only to see if he was disengaged and was willing to give them a hearing.

Q. Were you present at the interview between them and the President?

A. I was not. As soon as they were admitted I retired.

Q. Did you see them after the interview between them and the President?

A. I think not. If I did, it was only casually. (Pages 24 and 25.)

* * * * * * * * *

Q. Did you suggest to Mr. Evans or Mr. Chaffee, or to either of them, that the approval of the Colorado bill by the President might depend upon their position relative to the questions you discussed with them?

A. No, sir; I only desired to know them for the purpose of using them as an argument. The President had at no time predicated his action upon the political position that the senators would assume or that they held. His objections were of an entirely different character.

Q. Do you know at what time the message was written?

A. It was not completed until the day it was sent in.

Q. Do you know whether it had been commenced the day before?

A. I do not. I am satisfied the views and positions assumed in the message had been determined upon by the President days before.

Q. Do you remember anything being said during the interview between Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee and yourself about it being in their power to determine what would be the fate of the bill?

A. I have no idea I told them that. I had no authority to say it was. If I did say it, it was upon my own responsibility. They certainly misunderstood me if they so stated, for I had no authority in the world to do so in the slightest. One of my reasons for favoring the Colorado bill was, that in its constitution it used the word "white" in regard to electors. It was changing its condition from a territorial state by the decree of its citizens, as I thought, and I believed that Governor Cummings was doing them injustice.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Q. Did you express your own opinion to either Mr. Chaffee or Mr. Evans, as to the probability of the President's signing the bill in case their statements were satisfactory?

A. No, sir. I had no authority to do so—not the slightest. I only stated that I desired to use it as an argument, and would be glad to have an opportunity of doing so to sustain my own views. My support of the Colorado bill was entirely independent of Mr. Chaffee's or Mr. Evans's views in regard to any question. (Page 26.)

The only paper signed by Messrs. Evans and Chaffee is here given:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1866.

DEAR SIR: We have seen and heard reports to the effect that "the Colorado senators have sold out to the radicals for the sake of getting the bill passed through Congress for the admission of Colorado into the Union." We desire to say to you, and all others, that this statement is entirely untrue; that we have not agreed or pledged ourselves to support any man or measures; that we are wholly free to vote and act as our judgment directs, and shall do so to the best of our knowledge and ability, and in accordance with the Constitution which we swear to support. We would not consider ourselves worthy of a seat in the United States Senate under any such imputation, if true.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

J. B. CHAFFEE.
JNO. EVANS.

Hon. EDWARD COOPER.

The Colorado bill was vetoed May 15, 1866. The veto message was not acted on in the Senate. This is substantially the entire case before the committee relating to a corrupt use of the veto power. If it discloses an impeachable crime we are unable to detect it. The testimony undoubtedly shows that the President had determined to veto the Colorado bill. Suppose he did offer to change his position, and to approve it in consideration of a promise by the senators elect to support his administration—to change his position and approve the bill—what then? He was required by the Constitution to approve or disapprove the bill. He had resolved upon the former. Did he change his resolution? No. An offer to change for a consideration, if he proposed it, was very improper; but was it a crime? Put it in its worst light, and we are still confronted by the fact that the offer was not accepted, and the act was not done. Has Congress, even, declared that this was wrong? Colorado is not yet a State. Why? Congress did not overrule the veto of the President. Is not this, under the Constitution, an approval of his official act? Let this form the basis of impeachment, who will assume the responsibility of giving it effect?

The fifth charge is, that the President has "corruptly disposed of the public property of the United States."

Under this charge considerable attention was devoted to the disposition of railway property in the rebel States. For a complete statement of this branch of the case reference is here made to the testimony of honorable E. M. Stanton, and its accompanying exhibits, commencing on page 186 and closing on page 264.

It does not appear from the testimony that the President gave his personal attention to this subject to any considerable extent, except so far as relates to the railroads in the State of Tennessee. The Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General seem to have been the principal actors in regard to the disposal of that class of property, so far as the inauguration of a system is concerned. The following statement may be found in Mr. Stanton's testimony, viz:

Shortly after the surrender of the rebel armies, the attention of the War Department was directed to the proper disposition to be made of the railroads and railroad stock throughout the rebel States which came into our possession, either by capture or construction. It was the subject of a good deal of consultation and conference between the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General. It was the opinion of the Secretary of War that it was wholly impracticable for the government to operate these railroads under any system, and that it would tend greatly to the advantage of the country to make such disposition as would allow them as speedily as possible to become what they were designed—channels of commerce and trade between the States; and that any terms on which that could be done, would be advantageous. This was especially the case in regard to the western and southwestern railroads, where it was said there were large amounts of cotton that would be available to remove north in exchange for supplies to go south, of which it was said they were greatly in want. The first case, I think, in which the matter came up for practical action, was in reference to the Orange and Alexandria railroad. In the case of this road an arrangement was made by which it was turned over to the company, the details of which I am not now able to state. An officer in the quartermasters' department is engaged in getting the papers together, and they will be furnished. The attention of the department, some time prior to the 27th of June, was called to the railroads in Tennessee by a correspondence between the Quartermaster General and General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the department of the Cumberland, copies of which I hereby present. I have the originals here, which the committee may examine if they desire. On the 7th of July the Quartermaster General submitted to the Secretary of War a report upon the subject, relating to a communication from M. Burns, president of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, which is annexed with the other papers. These views of the Quartermaster General were concurred in by the Secretary of War generally, and so indorsed on the report on the 11th of July, 1865. At the time of my approval of the report, I did not advert to the observations which had been made by the Quartermaster General in the close of his report in regard to the act of Congress of the 31st of January, 1865. My construction of the law differs from that which seemed to be entertained by the Quartermaster General in regard to that subject. I have not regarded that act as having anything to do with roads in Tennessee, or in any of the other States where they were captured by our armies or were enemy's property acquired by military occupation.

Q. In case of the construction of a railroad by the government, the government furnishing the material and the labor, what has been the custom of the department in surrendering such roads to companies claiming them?

A. In all instances, I think, such roads have been surrendered in the same manner as if they had been originally constructed by the companies. That subject was talked of, and was the subject of a good deal of conference between myself and the Quartermaster General. My own view was that the great object on the part of the government was to get these roads operated, and that to go into an inquiry as to the cost of construction would be impracticable, either as to the actual cost of construction or as to any certain rule of compensation, because many of them were constructed at a much larger expense than companies would construct them. They were constructed under the pressure of war, and for temporary purposes. The object of arriving at the actual cash or money value or equivalent for the roads was not only impracticable, but really of but very little practical interest in comparison with the great end of having the channels of commerce in the rebel States opened and carried on with a view of getting out their produce, furnishing supplies, and getting commerce into its regular channels. In my own view that appeared to be the most certain and most speedy system of reconstruction we could adopt, and that it would tend more to establish harmony than any other thing that could be done by the government. In view of all this, and after the most deliberate consideration we could give to it, it was the opinion of the Quartermaster General and myself—certainly my own—that it would be impracticable to make any distinction. And, so far as I know, no distinction was made in any part of the country in reference to roads built by the government and roads that had been constructed by companies before the war commenced.

Q. Suppose the government, at its own expense, had constructed seventy miles of railroad in one of the rebel States, and that at the close of the war a company should apply to the executive department of the government for a transfer of the road so constructed by it, by what authority or provision of law would the executive department be authorized to transfer the road so constructed to the company making the application?

A. I do not know of any act of Congress that directly or in terms would authorize any such transfer; but regarding the construction of the road in time of war simply as a means or instrument of carrying on war, when the war was over I would conceive it to be strictly proper and within the scope of the powers of the General commanding, or especially of the President of the United States, as the commander-in-chief of the army, to render that instrument as available for peace purposes as possible. And inasmuch as the road would be entirely useless unless it was operated, and it would be for the benefit and interest of the public to have it operated as speedily as possible, I should think it would be in the exercise of a wise discretion, and exercising proper authority, to turn over that road to any company or individual who would operate it, for in that way he would be applying the war material to the only available use to which it could be applied. (Page 183 to 186.)

These ideas were reduced to a system, and a plan was finally adopted involving the following propositions, viz:

1. Every railroad in charge of the quartermasters' department to be turned over as soon as no longer required to the applicants seeming to have the best claim to it, and being able to operate it the most efficiently for the transportation of stores and troops.
2. No charge to be made against the railroad for expense of material or operation.
3. All material for permanent way used in the repair and construction of the road, and all damaged material of this class left along its route, to be considered part of the railroad given up with it.

4. No payment or credit to be given the road for occupation or use during the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it; the return of the road with repairs being a full equivalent for its use.

5. All movable property and rolling stock belonging to the United States to be sold at auction, after simple notice, to the highest bidder.

6. All rolling stock and material which belonged to the road before the war or before possession by United States forces, to be given up to the proper agents of the road as soon as no longer required.

7. When there are State boards of public works able and willing to take roads, the roads to be given up to such boards, leaving to the State authorities and judicial tribunals the determination of rival claims.

8. Railroads not operated by the quartermasters' department not to be interfered with unless under military necessity, but to be left with present possessors, subject only to removal of every official and operative who had not taken the oath of allegiance.

9. The eighth condition not being enforced, a receiver, accountable for receipts to the board of directors, to be appointed.

10. In Virginia, no obstacle to be interposed to possession by the board of public works of all the roads not in use by the United States military forces, and those thus used to be turned over to the board when no longer required. In States holding bonds of the roads, but not having boards of public works, roads to be turned over to the State authorities, or to receiver appointed by the Treasury Department at the instance of the War Department, to take possession of them as abandoned property. (Pages 189, 190.)

This general plan was defaced by order of the President of August 8, 1865, which related to the "relinquishment of government control over roads in Tennessee," directing that the roads in said State be surrendered upon the following principles, to wit:

1. Every company to reorganize and elect a board of directors, whose loyalty should be established to General Thomas's satisfaction.

2. A complete inventory of rolling stock, tools, and other material and property on each road to be made out in triplicate.

3. Separate inventories of rolling stock and other property originally belonging to each road, and that furnished by and belonging to the government.

4. Bonds satisfactory to the government for payment, within twelve months from transfer or such other reasonable time as should be agreed upon, of a fair valuation of government property, turned over upon an adequate appraisement—the United States reserving government dues for carrying mails and other service by each company until payment of obligations by the companies, and the balance of unliquidated indebtedness remaining at the maturity of the debt to be paid by the companies in money.

5. Tabular statements to be made of all expenditures by the government for repairs to each road, with full statements of receipts from private freights, passage, and other sources, and of the number of persons and amount of freight transported, and the distance in each case. All of said reports or tabular statements to be made in triplicate, one each for the Secretary of War, the military headquarters of the department, and the railroad company.

6. All railroads in Tennessee to be required to pay arrearages of interest due on bonds issued by that State, prior to the date of its pretended secession, to aid in construction of the roads, before declaration or payment of dividends to stockholders.

7. Buildings erected for government purposes on the line of railroads, and not valuable or useful for business of the companies, not to be a charge against the companies, and charge not to be made for rebuilding houses, bridges, or other structures which were destroyed by the federal army.

8. Authority given General Thomas to give to quartermasters within his division any orders necessary for the carrying out of this plan. (Page 190.)

"After a conference between the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General, on the 14th of October, 1865," the benefits of the foregoing plan were extended to all roads within General Thomas's command; and subsequently, "upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General," the same privileges were extended to other roads.

Many million dollars' worth of property passed into the hands of railway corporations under these orders. Was it property the title to which was vested in the United States? So far as the road beds and other real estate belonging thereto are concerned, this question must be answered in the negative. None of these roads had become the property of the government, either by seizure, condemnation, and sale of the roads themselves, or of the shares held by the stockholders. The title was in the companies. The government was in possession for military purposes; when these purposes had been served, the government relinquished its possession, and surrendered the roads. Such is the case which the testimony discloses. Whether this action was wise, prudent, just, are not questions for us to determine. We are dealing with crimes and misdemeanors, and if these do not appear, the case fails, no matter what amount of folly and censurable conduct may be disclosed.

Here it may be well to call attention to the action of the Attorney General, (Mr. Speed,) relative to the property of corporations. A letter of instruction was directed by him to the United States district attorney for Alabama, in these words, to wit:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 18, 1865.

SIR: A corporation cannot be guilty of treason, or of any of the acts denounced in the confiscation law of July 17, 1862.

You will not, therefore, seize the property of corporations; and release any that may have been seized.

Very respectfully, &c.,

JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General.

JAMES Q. SMITH, Esq.,
United States Attorney, Montgomery, Alabama.

This was a terse and emphatic approval of the position assumed by the Assistant Attorney General, in a communication addressed to the same district attorney, on the 22d September, 1865, in which he said:

This office has heretofore been and is now of the opinion that a proceeding will not be and cannot be sustained in law under that statute to enforce the confiscation of the property of a corporation for any acts done by the directors or agents of the corporation in contravention of the statute. Such acts can only render the directors or agents personally responsible to the law. They cannot render the corporation liable to the penalties of the confiscation act. The directors, being but attorneys, could do no act, unless within the scope of their authority, to bind their principals. Were the rule different, the loyal stockholders and creditors of the corporation, including those who may never have been in the rebellious States, would lose their property without having been in any way in fault. If the law were otherwise, the property of every town and city whose officers may have applied any part of the corporation funds in aid of the rebellion, would be liable to confiscation; and thus loyal citizens as well as rebels might be punished for acts in which they had no personal share or sympathy. (Page 431.)

We are not prepared to challenge the correctness of the doctrine here advanced.

It may be claimed that, so far as regards movable property, a different rule applies. What then? In most instances a different one was applied. In many cases the rule was violated to the advantage of the government; for it was applied even in the cases of corporations. Property of this description was appraised and sold to the companies. Absolute property rights were asserted by the government, and sales were made. In such cases wherein payments were not made at the time of sale, bonds securing the amounts bid were required and executed. There was no law for this, and every such sale was illegal. But every unlawful act is not a crime. Were these things done with intent to violate law and injure the government? Even under the broad doctrine that a civil officer may be impeached for a common law crime, these things must appear. They do not appear in this case.

An effort is made to fix on the President a criminal intent and corrupt motive by proving the following state of facts. A communication in these words was addressed to the President in the interest of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, viz:

WASHINGTON, April 20, 1866.

SIR: M. Burns, President of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, at Nashville, Tennessee, requested me to say to your Excellency that he is sorely pressed by the officers of the government to pay in part for the material he purchased for the use of this road from the quartermasters' department. He says that he was induced to believe that the government would not urge the payment of those claims until time could be had to make a settlement for the use of the road, upon a basis proposed by him (Burns) to Quartermaster General Meigs, in the presence of Mr. Lincoln.

Acting upon this belief, he advertised that he was ready to pay the interest on the bonds of the company in New York on a certain day, and made all his preparations for it, but in the mean time the above demand was made, accompanied by threats that they would again seize the road.

Now, what he most urgently desires of you is, that the payment of these claims be ordered to be suspended until the settlement can be had, or to give him time to make the road earn the money. The road is doing well, and all that the company want is time. The amount now on deposit to meet interest on bonds would pay the amount now due the government.

You see how ruinous it would be to him, to the credit of the company and the credit of the State, if he is forced to comply with this demand.

Very respectfully,

JNO. McCLELLAN,
For M. BURNS.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.

This appeal was successful, and an extension was granted in pursuance of an order indorsed on the communication, and which is here copied:

Respectfully referred to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, with directions that collection be suspended until further orders.

EDMUND COOPER,
Acting Private Secretary.

The President held nineteen bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company of one thousand dollars each. These bonds were guaranteed by the State of Tennessee. In the testimony of Colonel Robert Morrow the history of these bonds, as well as some others, is given, and the following quotation is made therefrom, to wit:

I have seen these bonds again and can give about this description of them: There are nineteen mortgage bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company issued under a special act of the legislature, and the payment of which is guaranteed by the State of Tennessee. Six of these have the following indorsement on the back, written in ink: "From Bank of Tennessee to Governor Johnson. C. J." I know the handwriting of the initials to be that of Cave Johnson, who was President of the Bank of Tennessee from 1853 until about the beginning of the war. The bonds were issued in 1854, or at least bear that date. The other thirteen of the nineteen correspond with the six I have described in every particular, except the indorsement of Cave Johnson. They are made payable to bearer, and may be transferred without any formal assignment. There are also ten bonds of the State of Tennessee, issued for the general purposes of the revenue of the State, bearing date 1859, for $1,000 each, five of them bearing the same indorsement, signed "C. J." as the six Nashville and Chattanooga railroad bonds I have referred to. Four of the other Tennessee State six per cent. bonds, of $1,000 each, have the following indorsement:

"Maxwell, Saulpaw & Co. sold this bond to A. Johnson, September 24, 1860.

"A. L. MAXWELL & Co."

These bonds were also issued by the State of Tennessee for general State purposes. One of the ten Tennessee State bonds bears no indorsement. There is also one bond of the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad for $1,000, bearing the following indorsement:

"Sold by me to Andrew Johnson on 15th October, 1858.

"WM. M. LOWEY."

Making in all thirty bonds of $1,000 each. Then, in addition to these are four new bonds, into which the overdue interest on the Tennessee State bonds was funded. I cut the coupons from the thirty bonds for interest, which had accumulated since the first or middle of 1861; and, through the First National Bank of Washington, transmitted those cut from the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad bonds to New York, where they were paid in currency, and the ten Tennessee State bonds and one East Tennessee and Virginia railroad bond to Nashville to be funded, and for which the four new bonds were received, the difference, whatever it was, being paid." (Page 644.)

It is claimed by the committee that this state of facts shows that the President acted corruptly in granting an extension of time to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company for the payment of the amount due the government, because the State of Tennessee was not prepared to pay the interest due on these bonds, and that the only way to get his interest was for him to postpone the payment of the debt due to the United States, so that the company could use its funds in taking up the coupons due on the bonds—that in this the President prostituted the powers of his office to advance his private interests. If this extension stood alone amid all the pressing needs of southern railroad companies and their applications for relief, some force might be accorded to the argument based on it. But what are the facts? In Mr. Stanton's testimony it appears that—

The first extensions of time for the payment of indebtedness to the government were given by order of Major General Thomas on the 29th of March, 1866, when, upon representations of the inability of the East Tennessee and Virginia and the East Tennessee and Georgia Railroad Companies to commence regular monthly payments, and in consideration of the same inability and a disposition to meet its liabilities to the government on the part of the Mississippi and Tennessee, he directed extension to be granted to these three companies. By direction of General Thomas extensions were also allowed: on April 5 to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, upon representation that such extension would be the best arrangement for payment that the company could make; on April 10 to the New Orleans and Ohio, upon the application of the company; on April 12 to the Nashville and Northwestern, upon application of the company; on April 17 to the Nashville and Chattanooga, because the money which should have been applied to liquidation of indebtedness to the government had been paid out; on April 26 to the Mobile and Great Northern, and the Mississippi, Gainesville, and Tuscaloosa, on the application of the companies and the recommendation of the quartermaster charged with the management of the affairs of military railroads and the collection of indebtedness; on May 7 to the Mississippi Central and the Nashville and Decatur Line, upon the solicitation and representations of the companies.

Extensions were granted by order of the Secretary of War: on May 11 to the Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville railroad, upon the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General, based upon the representation of the embarrassment of the stockholders, and the outlay required for repairs to the road; on July 20 to the Alabama and Tennessee River railroad, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General, based on the inability of the company to pay, and the defeat of the purpose of the transfer which would result from attempt at enforcement of immediate payment; on August 3 to the Alabama and Florida, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General; on August 28 to the Atlantic and Western, on the application of the governor of Georgia, and to obtain further security by enactment of the Georgia legislature for the payment of the indebtedness; on November 21 to the Nashville and Decatur line, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas, based upon the disposition of the company to act in good faith, the greater security for payment, the advantage to the government in having the road resume operation, and the disadvantage of selling the property at public sale; on December 5 to the Selma and Meridian, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General; on December 6 to the Mobile and Ohio, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General. (Page 191.)

As to the restoration of property which had been seized and held by agents of the government under the act of July 17, 1862, commonly known as the confiscation act; the acts of July 2, 1864, and March 3, 1865, relating to the Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees, and the act of July 2, 1864, which provided "for the collection of captured and abandoned property," many pages of testimony have been taken. Pages 84 to 159, inclusive, embrace the testimony of General O. O. Howard, General J. S. Fullerton, General Rufus Saxton, Daniel R. Goodloe, and D. H. Starbuck; pages 364 to 368, that of General E. R. S. Canby; pages 512 to 525, additional by General Fullerton; pages 550 to 554, that of Attorney General Stanbery; pages 614 to 618, that of the Secretary of the Treasury; pages 761 to 766, additional by General Howard, with exhibits and statement of property restored, on pages 773 to 777; pages 806 to 813, that of ex-Attorney General Speed, with exhibits; pages 816 to 824, that of honorable Francis E. Spinner; pages 860 to 863, additional by the Secretary of the Treasury, with exhibits on pages 870 to 878. This testimony discloses the policy and practice of the Executive department in the administration of said several acts, and shows the kinds and amounts of property restored to claimants and former owners.

Section 5 of the act of July 17, 1862, provides:

That to insure the speedy termination of the rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereinafter named in this section, and to apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the army of the United States, &c.

Section 7 declares:

That to secure the condemnation and sale of any such property, after the same shall have been seized, so that it may be made available for the purpose aforesaid, proceedings in rem shall be instituted in the name of the United States in any district court thereof, or in any territorial court, or in the United States district court for the District of Columbia, within which the property above described or any part thereof may be found, or into which the same, if movable, may be brought, which proceedings shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases, and if said property, whether real or personal, shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemy's property, and become the property of the United States, and may be disposed of as the court shall decree, and the proceeds thereof paid into the treasury of the United States for the purposes aforesaid.

The testimony shows that a large amount of property had been seized under the fifth section of the aforesaid act, and proceedings were pending in a number of districts looking to the condemnation and sale of the same.

Section 13 of the act is in these words, to wit:

That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

Acting in harmony with the spirit of this section of the act referred to, President Lincoln issued his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863, portions of which are here quoted, as follows:

Whereas, in and by the Constitution of the United States it is provided that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States; and

Whereas a rebellion now exists whereby the loyal State governments of several States have for a long time been subverted, and many persons have committed, and are now guilty of treason against the United States; and

Whereas with reference to said rebellion and treason, laws have been enacted by Congress, declaring forfeitures and confiscation of property and liberation of slaves, all upon terms and conditions therein stated, and also declaring that the President was thereby authorized at any time thereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such times and such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare; and

Whereas the congressional declaration for limited and conditional pardon accords with well established judicial exposition of the pardoning power;

* * * * * *

Therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves and in property cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which said oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court: so help me God.

This proclamation specified the classes of persons excepted from its benefits, and also contained President Lincoln's one-tenth plan of reconstruction.

The act of July 17, 1862, and the proclamation referred to, established a policy relative to persons who engaged in the rebellion, their rights and property.

After the war ceased and Mr. Johnson had succeeded to the presidency, it became necessary to consider what should be done, in view of the policy thus established, with rebels and their property.

The act creating the office of Attorney General provides that one of his duties shall be "to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law when required by the President of the United States," &c. (Brightley's Digest, 92.) It is fair to presume that, when the President receives an opinion from the Attorney General, he is justifiable in following it. If this be not true, the statute is not only a meaningless contrivance, but a dangerous trap.

Mr. Speed testifies that, as Attorney General, he more than once gave to the President opinions that the act of July 17, 1862, was a war measure, and that, the war being over, it was not proper to continue to enforce it. (Page 807.) The present Attorney General (Mr. Stanbery) approved this position of his predecessor, and testified that "the recital of the act of 1862 is, 'that for the purpose of suppressing insurrection, confiscation is ordered to be carried on.' After the insurrection was put down, it did not seem proper to go on and order confiscation." (Page 552.) This view of the law has been acted on by the President. But this did not complete the policy which he has pursued upon this subject.

He next inquired of the Attorney General (Mr. Speed) whether a cessation of hostilities rendered it necessary or proper that another proclamation of amnesty and pardon should be issued. This inquiry was made on the 21st of April, 1865. On the 1st day of May following the Attorney General submitted to the President, at length, his opinion, and advised "that another and new offer of amnesty, adapted to the existing condition of things, should be proclaimed." (Pages 1083 to 1086.)

In pursuance of this opinion the President issued his amnesty proclamation of May 29, 1865, as follows, to wit:

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 8th day of December, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and on the 26th day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-four, did, with the object to suppress the existing rebellion, to induce all persons to return to their loyalty, and to restore the authority of the United States, issue proclamations offering amnesty and pardon to certain persons who had, directly or by implication, participated in the said rebellion; and whereas many persons who had so engaged in said rebellion have, since the issuance of said proclamations, failed or neglected to take the benefits offered thereby; and whereas many persons who have been justly deprived of all claim to amnesty and pardon thereunder by reason of their participation, directly or by implication, in said rebellion and continued hostility to the government of the United States since the date of said proclamations, now desire to apply for and obtain amnesty and pardon:

To the end, therefore, that the authority of the government of the United States may be restored, and that peace, order, and freedom may be established, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do proclaim and declare that I hereby grant to all persons who have, directly or indirectly, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, amnesty and pardon, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and except in cases where legal proceedings, under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property of persons engaged in rebellion, have been instituted; but upon the condition, nevertheless, that every such person shall take and subscribe the following oath, (or affirmation,) and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I ——— ———, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves; so help me God."

Provided, That special application may be made to the President for pardon by any person belonging to the excepted classes, and such clemency will be liberally extended as may be consistent with the facts of the case and the peace and dignity of the United States.

This proclamation did not differ materially from the one issued by President Lincoln, except in an enlargement of the excepted classes, and a modification of the oath so far as to exclude all conditions concerning a support of all laws and proclamations having "reference to the emancipation of slaves."

In all cases of seizure of the property of persons who come within the amnesty declared, and of those to whom special pardons have been granted, it has been restored, and in some instances restoration has been made after condemnation—in a few, after sale. The circumstances governing the latter class of cases do not appear in the testimony.

This was done upon the broad ground that "when the pardon is full it releases the punishment, and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offence;" and that "if granted before conviction it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching, as was subsequently held by the Supreme Court of the United States, in ex parte Garland, (4 Wallace, 380.)

Whether the policy thus established be right or wrong, wise or unwise, the principles involved in it seem to have guided the President in the surrenders of property made by him, in all cases of seizures under the several acts of Congress above mentioned, except such surrenders as may have been made in accordance with the principles of the acts themselves.

Let it here be noted that every act of Congress determining a penalty or forfeiture must be based upon some crime, and that every crime lies within the limits of the pardoning power. This principle extends to every seizure of property under the several acts of Congress above mentioned. This resolves this entire branch of the case, as well as that which affirms a corrupt use of the pardoning power, into a determination of the question whether, in each act of pardon, the element of corruption entered. We have not been able to discover the instance in which this element appears. However much we may question the wisdom, prudence, or sagacity which have marked the exercise of this power, we must still ask for the evidence of its corrupt use, under any view of the law governing the case. The testimony fails to present a satisfactory answer.

The sixth charge is, that the President has "corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts, and conspired with others to commit acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors."

Both branches of this charge relate mainly to subjects which have already been considered under other charges, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate what has gone before.

A great deal of the matter contained in the volume of testimony reported to the House is of no value whatever. Much of it is mere hearsay, opinions of witnesses, and no little amount of it utterly irrelevant to the case. Comparatively a small amount of it could be used on a trial of this case before the Senate. All of the testimony relating to the failure to try, and admission to bail of, Jefferson Davis, the assassination of President Lincoln, the diary of J. Wilkes Booth, his place of burial, the practice of pardon brokerage, the alleged correspondence of the President with Jefferson Davis, may be interesting to a reader, but is not of the slightest importance so far as a determination of this case is concerned. Still, much of this irrelevant matter has been interwoven into the report of the majority, and has served to heighten its color and to deepen its tone. Strike out the stage effect of this irrelevant matter and the prominence given to the Tudors, the Stuarts, and Michael Burns, and much of the play will disappear. Settle down upon the real evidence in the case, that which will establish, in view of the attending circumstances, a substantial crime, by making plain the elements which constitute it, and the case, in many respects, dwarfs into a political contest.

In approaching a conclusion, we do not fail to recognize two stand-points from which this case can be viewed—the legal and the political. Viewing it from the former, the case upon the law and the testimony fails. Viewing it from the latter, the case is a success. The President has disappointed the hopes and expectations of those who placed him in power. He has betrayed their confidence, and joined hands with their enemies. He has proved false to the express and implied conditions which underlie his elevation to power, and, as we view the case, deserves the censure and condemnation of every well-disposed citizen of the republic. While we acquit him of impeachable crimes, we pronounce him guilty of many wrongs. His contest with Congress has delayed reconstruction, and inflicted vast injury upon the people of the rebel States. He has been blind to the necessities of the times and to the demands of a progressive civilization. He remains enveloped in the darkness of the past, and seems not to have detected the dawning brightness of the future. Incapable of appreciating the grand changes which the past six years have wrought, he seeks to measure the great events which surround him by the narrow rules which adjusted public affairs before the rebellion and its legitimate consequences had destroyed them and established others. Judge him politically, we must condemn him. But the day of political impeachments would be a sad one for this country. Political unfitness and incapacity must be tried at the ballot-box, not in the high court of impeachment. A contrary rule might leave to Congress but little time for other business than the trial of impeachments. But we are not now dealing with political offences; crimes and misdemeanors are now demanding our attention. Do these, within the meaning of the Constitution, appear? Rest the case upon political offences, and we are prepared to pronounce against the President, for such offences are numerous and grave. If Mexican experience is desired, we need have no difficulty, for there almost every election is productive of a revolution. If the people of this republic desire such a result, we have not yet been able to discover it; nor would we favor it if its presence were manifest. While we condemn and censure the political conduct of the President, judge him unwise in the use of his discretionary powers, and appeal to the people of the republic to sustain us, we still affirm that the conclusion at which we have arrived is correct.

We therefore declare that the case before us, presented by the testimony and measured by the law, does not disclose such high crimes and misdemeanors, within the meaning of the Constitution, as require "the interposition of the constitutional power of this House," and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the proposed impeachment of the President of the United States, and that the subject be laid upon the table.

JAMES F. WILSON.
FREDERICK E. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. MARSHALL submitted the following as the views of a minority:

The undersigned, agreeing with our associates of the minority of the committee in their views of the law and in the conclusion that the evidence before the committee presents no case for the impeachment of the President, might, if they had stopped there, been content simply to have joined in the report which they have submitted.

But as they, as well as the majority, have felt it their duty to go further and express their censure and condemnation of the President, we feel that it is due to ourselves and to the position we occupy to present as briefly as possible a few additional remarks for the consideration of the House and of the country. Having determined that the evidence does not show that the President has been guilty of any act or crime for which under our Constitution and laws he can or ought to be impeached, this conclusion, as it seems to us, is the determination of the whole question submitted by the House to the committee. It is the commission by the President of an impeachable offence only that can subject him to our official jurisdiction, or justify us as a committee of the House of Representatives, or even the House itself, as such, in challenging his official acts. As the report of the majority does not charge the President with any act recognized by any statute or law of the land as a crime or misdemeanor, we can but regard the charges preferred as a political or partisan demonstration, tending and intended to bring him into odium and contempt among the people; as an unjustifiable attempt to excite their suspicions, "spargere voces in vulgum ambiguas." We utterly deny the right of the committee, or any member thereof as such, to do this.

As citizens, as politicians, we may criticize, find fault with, and condemn the policy, the political acts, or even the entire administration of the President, but as a committee of this house considering the charges referred to it, as members of Congress acting officially, we have no such right, power, or jurisdiction.

The executive is one of the co-ordinate departments of this government, invested with certain defined constitutional powers and prerogatives, over which the legislative has no control, and with the constitutional exercise of which the legislative department has no right to interfere. The original source of all executive and legislative power is the same, the people—the warrant and measure of those powers the same, the Constitution. In his constitutional and legitimate sphere, in the exercise and conduct of his department, the President is as free to act and as independent as the Congress, while acting within the bounds prescribed for it by the Constitution. He is no more accountable or responsible to Congress than Congress is to him. Congress has no more authority to censure and condemn him than he has to censure and condemn Congress. His discretion, exercised within the bounds of the Constitution, is no more subject to the animadversion or reproof of Congress than are the constitutional and discretionary acts of Congress to his. Neither Congress nor the President has any powers or authority not derived from and found in the Constitution.

The only question with reference to which the committee were authorized to inquire was whether the charges against the President were true and constituted an offence or offences subjecting him to impeachment. Certainly if this is not the only question referred to the committee, it is the only one which the committee as such has investigated. The political propriety of the acts of the President has not for one moment engaged the attention of the committee.

We most certainly, having no other motive or interest than to serve our country and do our duty in the matter referred to us, have never once in the taking of testimony or the examination of witnesses supposed that any question other than the impeachment was properly before us. The impeachment of the President, the chief officer of this great republic, the bare inquiry with a view to ascertain whether he had committed any offence for which he ought to or might be put upon trial before the most august tribunal of the world, impressed us from the beginning with most solemn awe. We endeavored in the investigation to exclude from our mind every question of mere politics, and as far as possible to be uninfluenced by party bias.

We were admonished that in some sense the nation, the people, in the person of their executive head, were on trial before the world, and that personal animosity and party politics should be inflexibly and scrupulously forgotten or ignored. For any cause to have shrunk from a full and careful investigation of the great question of impeachment was cowardice; to have pursued it in the spirit of party, to have degraded it into a mere investigation of political policy with reference to partisan success, would have been meanness, and disgraced the nation itself by scandalizing the nation's constitutional head. We repeat, therefore, that the investigation of the committee was, so far as we took part in it, with the sole view to ascertain whether the President, under the charge preferred against him, was guilty of any impeachable offence; not only so, but with the belief that it was the only question we were authorized or expected to inquire into. Not a witness was called or examined with any view to proving a case for merely censuring or condemning the political action of the President. No suggestion was made or intimation given by the majority of the committee, till the resolution of censure was offered, that there was any purpose of considering, as a committee, any but the question of impeachment. Nor was there then, as we understood it, any purpose of reporting such resolution to the House for its official action. We think, therefore, that we are warranted in saying that, although much testimony irrelevant, illegal, and experimental was taken—much that had no bearing upon the question of impeachment, and much more that was not testimony in any case or for any purpose, that none was taken with any view except the impeachment. Hence we insist that if the committee had the right and jurisdiction (which we deny) to inquire into the political and discretionary acts of the President with a view to his condemnation, it has not in any legitimate and proper manner investigated or attempted to consider that subject.

We do not impugn the personal motives of any member of the committee who differs with us. Our intercourse upon the committee has been pleasant, and the courtesy with which we have been treated uniform and uninterrupted. We entertain none but the most kindly personal feelings towards every member; but candor and a sense of duty compel us to declare that we can find no warrant or excuse for this travelling outside or beyond the subject with which the committee was charged, to censure and condemn the President, except in the prejudice and zeal of overheated partyism. The President needs and can ask no defence from us upon party grounds, or upon any other than those which spring from official obligations and duty. He was not the President of our choice, and was not elected by our votes; nor is it necessary that we should agree with him, or justify or approve all he has done. Neither do we feel called upon to review all the great mass of testimony taken by the committee to show that his censure and condemnation are not warranted by it, in fact, though taken as it has been and unchallenged as it was in that regard. We do not, however, believe the unbiased, the unprejudiced mind will be able in the testimony to discover any just or reasonable cause for condemning or impugning the motives by which he was actuated. Indeed, differing with him in opinion, as we have, as to the policy and propriety of many things he has done and many more that he has left undone, we feel compelled to declare that the proofs before us will not warrant a charge that he was in any instance controlled by motives other than those pure and patriotic.

His greatest offence, we apprehend, will be found to be that he has not been able or willing to follow those who elected him to his office in their mad assaults upon and departure from the constitutional government of the fathers of the republic; and that, standing where most of his party professed to stand when they elevated him to his present exalted position, he has dared to differ from a majority of Congress upon great and vital questions. He has believed in the continuing and binding obligations of the Constitution; that the suppression of the rebellion against the Union was the preservation of the Union and the States comprising it; and that when the rebellion was put down the States were all and equally entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States. Planting himself firmly and immovably upon this position, he has incurred the fierce and malignant hatred and opposition of all those who claim, by virtue of the alleged conquest of the territory and the subjugation of the people of the lately rebellious States, the power and right to dictate to them the constitution and laws they shall live under and the liberties they shall be permitted to enjoy. In this difference between Congress and the President, and the desire of each for the adoption by the country of their respective views, is, we suspect, to be found not only the cause for the movement to impeach the President, but of his censure and condemnation. Out of it have grown the embittered feelings and violent hatred of the President by his former friends. The majority of Congress and of the committee have entertained and been prepared to declare at all times, in Congress and out of it, even more strongly than is expressed in their report, the same censure and condemnation. This opinion was not formed upon any testimony taken before the committee or upon any facts elicited by its investigations. It was a political opinion growing out of difference of views upon political questions. It was the opinion with which the majority of the committee entered upon the investigation. It was that which inspired and stimulated all its inquiries and examinations. But, notwithstanding these pre-existing opinions and prejudices, the minority of the committee have been compelled to find, after the fullest consideration and the most protracted deliberation, that the President has committed no offence for which, under our laws, he can or ought to be impeached, and hence none, as we insist, subjecting him to the official jurisdiction of the committee or the House. The censure and condemnation of the President, either by the majority or minority, is without our jurisdiction, not justified by the facts, unbecoming one department of the government towards the other, and calculated to bring reproach upon the committee, the House, and the nation.

We cannot ignore the fact that time has been spent and testimony taken by the committee in endeavoring to ascertain if the President, in his official capacity, has spoken censoriously or condemnatory of Congress with a view to his impeachment therefor. Can it be more becoming in a committee of this house or in the House itself, to go beyond its jurisdiction and censure and condemn the President, than for him to censure and condemn Congress? Is not the impropriety of the one as apparent as the other? If one is impeachable, is not the other wrong? What would be thought of the Supreme Court if, after having been compelled in a case properly pending before it, to decide an act of Congress constitutional, it should, because it did not agree to the propriety or policy of the enactment, declare its severe censure and condemnation of the Congress for having passed it? Who would hesitate to pronounce this an unjustifiable and unwarrantable interference with the rights and duties of Congress by the Supreme Court, calculated to disturb the harmony of our governmental system, and to bring into unhappy, if not fatal collision, the co-ordinate departments? Like this attempt to reprove or censure the President for acts or wrongs not amounting to offences subjecting him to the legal jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, such an act would, it seems to us, be sheer impertinence on the part of the court, justly meriting, obloquy and reproach.

Such interference by one department of the government with the others, without authority of law, must and will most assuredly break off that comity which should at all times characterize their relations and intercourse.

The end cannot but be foreseen: the antagonism will ultimately produce enmity and open hostility and aggressions, which must result in the destruction of one or more of the departments, and, as a consequence, destroy our system of government altogether.

With all due respect to the majority of the committee, we cannot regard the charges made against the President as a serious attempt to procure his impeachment. Without dwelling upon their utter failure to point to the commission of a single act that is recognized by the laws of our country as a high crime or misdemeanor, the inconsistency of the majority cannot fail to challenge the attention of the country. Acts for which Mr. Lincoln was clamorously applauded, are deemed high crimes in Mr. Johnson. For every act so gravely condemned the President had the sanction and approval of his cabinet, and yet, while he is arraigned before the world as a criminal of the deepest dye, they are not only not impeached, but are recognized as special favorites of the party for impeachment. The latter have even gone so far as to unite in the passage of an extraordinary and unprecedented law to prevent the President from removing these officers from the places which they hold. Mr. Stanton, the late Secretary of War, gave his emphatic approval of the acts for which the President is arraigned, and yet the ex-Secretary is a favorite and popular martyr, and the whole country is vexed with clamors for his restoration to power and place. The President is held criminally responsible for the acts of subordinates, of which he did not even have the slightest notice or knowledge. And yet those bringing him to trial enact a statute depriving him of all control over these same subordinates, and they are deemed worthy of the especial protection of Congress. The President has used every means within his power to bring the great state prisoner, Jefferson Davis, to a speedy trial, and yet he has been denounced throughout the land for procrastinating and preventing the trial, while the judges and prosecuting officers having entire control of the matter have been deemed worthy of the most honeyed plaudits. Were ever inconsistencies more glaring and inexplicable than these? And can we possibly be mistaken when we assert that however honest may be the majority of the committee, the verdict of the country and of posterity will be that the crime of the President consists not in violations of, but in refusals to violate the law?—in being unable to keep pace with the "party of progress" in their rapidly advancing movements, or to step "outside of and above" the Constitution in the administration of the government?—in preferring the Constitution of his country to the dictation of an unscrupulous partisan cabal, in bravely daring to meet the maledictions of those who have aimed at the accomplishment of a most wicked and dangerous revolution, rather than to encounter the reproaches of his own conscience and the curses of posterity through all time?

If the subject were not too grave and serious a one for mirth, some of the grounds of impeachment presented by the majority would certainly be sufficiently amusing. The President is gravely arraigned for arraying himself against the loyal people of the country in vetoing the mis-called reconstruction acts of Congress, when (without dwelling upon the constitutional right and duty of the President in the premises) Congress itself has, for these same acts, just received the most withering and indignant condemnation and rebuke of the entire people from Maine to California. The impeachers, forgetting that they have been themselves impeached, and that the verdict of the tribunal of last resort has already been rendered against them, still persist in trifling with the peace, safety and prosperity of the country by precipitating upon it this dangerous question at a time so critical as this. It is wicked thus to trifle with the most vital interests of the nation, and to disregard the voice of a great people when spoken, as in this case, so emphatically in favor of the preservation of our constitutional form of government and the rights and liberties established by our revolutionary fathers.

We will not attempt to add anything to the able, and, as we believe, unanswerable argument just presented by the chairman of our committee upon the law of impeachment. Had not experience taught us the wonderful diversity in human judgments and conclusions, we should find it difficult to believe that there could, upon the questions submitted to us, possibly be two opinions among candid and intelligent men. Blind bigotry and unbridled partisan rage, it is true, can see crime in the most meritorious actions, and men governed by these unhallowed passions do not hesitate to drag to the stake or the tortures of the inquisition all who will not conform to their wretched creeds and miserable dogmas. They substitute their own crude and often crazy theories for truth and justice, and under pain of severest penalties demand of all men to bow down and worship the idol they have erected. That their own judgment may be fallible, or that other men differing from them may be equally wise and honest with themselves, never occurs to their minds, and they will, without hesitation, question the justice even of the Almighty if the ways of Providence do not conform to their own crude theories. This class of men has constituted a considerable portion of mankind in all ages, and in none have they been more numerous than in our own. They have furnished the bigots and persecutors of all times, and their pathway through the long line of history, from its earliest dawn to the present time, has been marked with carnage and desolation. With such men no argument based upon the Constitution and established laws can have any validity. They live and breathe in a purer and higher atmosphere "outside of the Constitution" and above the laws. They are too pure and immaculate to be fettered by the restraints of constitutions or written laws. They are a law unto themselves, and both men and gods must conform to their views and theories or receive their bitterest maledictions. But our people will never submit to have their Chief Magistrate arraigned for trial for offences unknown to the laws and which exists only in the excited brains of his political enemies. It would be a precedent disastrous in its consequences and subversive of our political institutions.

We cannot doubt that the evidence herewith this day submitted will be received with one universal burst of indignation by the American people. If they retain any just pride in their country and its institutions, they will blush to find that the chief officer of their government has for ten months been subjected to the scrutiny of a secret star chamber inquisition unparalleled in its character in the annals of civilization. A drag-net has been put out to catch every malicious whisper throughout the land, and all the vile vermin who had gossip or slander to retail, hearsay or otherwise, have been permitted to appear and place it upon record for the delectation of mankind. Spies have been sent all over the land to find something that might blacken the name and character of the Chief Magistrate of our country. Unwhipped knaves have given information of fabulous letters and documents that, like the ignis fatuus, eternally eluded the grasp of their pursuers, and the chase ever resulted only in aiding in the depletion of the public treasury That most notorious character, General L. C. Baker, chief of the detective police, even had the effrontery to insult the American people by placing his spies within the very walls of the executive mansion; the privacy of the President's home, his private life and habits and most secret thoughts, have not been deemed sacred or exempt from invasion; the members of his household have been examined; and the chief prosecutor has not hesitated to dive into loathsome dungeons and consort with convicted felons, for the purpose of accomplishing his object of arraigning the President on a charge of infamous crimes.

When we consider all these facts, and that the investigation has been a secret ex parte one; that it has been so persistent and untiring, and carried on at a time of most unparalleled party excitement; when the masses of the dominant party were lashed into a wild frenzy, and led to believe that the President was guilty of treason; when thousands all over the land really thought that it would be a righteous act to get him out of the way by any means, fair or foul; and when he has been hunted down by partisan malice as no man was ever hunted and hounded down before, it is really wonderful that so little has been elicited that tends in the slightest degree to tarnish the fair fame of the President. The American people ought to congratulate themselves, for the sake of the reputation of their country, that this failure has been so emphatic and so complete.

In what we have said of the character of evidence taken before us, and the means used to procure it, we must not be understood as reflecting upon the action of the committee or any member thereof. Such an interpretation of our remarks would do great injustice to us and to them. Whether such latitude should have been given in the examination of witnesses, we will not now inquire. In an investigation before a committee it would be difficult, and, perhaps impossible, to confine the evidence to such as would be deemed admissible before a court of justice. Indeed it may be questioned whether it would be proper so to restrict it, and it is perhaps better, even for the President, that those who were managing the prosecution from the outside were permitted to present anything that they might call or consider evidence, as the world can thus the better comprehend how utterly destitute of foundation is all this clamor that has been raised against him.

The first witness examined was General Lafayette C. Baker, late chief of the detective police, and although examined on oath, time and again, and on various occasions, it is doubtful whether he has in any one thing told the truth, even by accident. In every important statement he is contradicted by witnesses of unquestioned credibility. And there can be no doubt that to his many previous outrages, entitling him to an unenviable immortality, he has added that of wilful and deliberate perjury; and we are glad to know that no one member of the committee deems any statement made by him as worthy of the slightest credit. What a blush of shame will tinge the cheek of the American student in future ages, when he reads that this miserable wretch for years held, as it were, in the hollow of his hand, the liberties of the American people. That, clothed with power by a reckless administration, and with his hordes of unprincipled tools and spies permeating the land everywhere, with uncounted thousands of the people's money placed in his hands for his vile purposes, this creature not only had the power to arrest without crime or writ, and imprison without limit, any citizen of the republic, but that he actually did so arrest thousands all over the land, and filled the prisons of the country with the victims of his malice, or that of his masters.

This whole system—such an outrage upon the Constitution and every principle of free government; so anti-American and anti-republican—has, with its originators and supporters, already, thank God, been damned to eternal infamy; and it is pleasant to reflect that not only the system, but its unscrupulous agents, will go down to posterity loaded with infamy and followed by the curses of millions. It sometimes happens that the administration of the most dangerous usurpations is placed in the hands of men so respectable for character and talents as to disarm suspicion and conciliate even those whose liberties are endangered. We have reason to be thankful to an ever kind and merciful Providence that this worst feature of the worst of despotisms, when the attempt was made in an unhappy hour to transplant it to our free American soil, was placed for its administration in the hands of a class of men so destitute of manhood and character as to arouse the undying scorn and indignation of the entire people. And as these infamous outrages were not sanctioned by any precedent in our own country, it is hoped and believed that they will never, throughout all time, be deemed worthy of imitation.

It is not our purpose now to attempt an analysis or discussion of the evidence taken before us, or to point out the gross absurdities and inconsistencies of a very large portion of it. It will be read and considered by the American people, and we cannot doubt what their verdict will be. When those who have been attempting to load with disgrace and infamy the Chief Magistrate of our country shall stand pilloried in the undying scorn and indignation of a great people, he, after passing through this fiery ordeal, we have no hesitation in predicting, will have and retain all over the land, even to a greater extent than ever heretofore, the respect and confidence of his countrymen.

IMPEACHMENT INVESTIGATION.

FORTIETH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION—CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 7, 1867.

WHEREAS, The House of Representatives of the 39th Congress adopted on the 7th of January, A. D. 1867, a resolution authorizing an inquiry into certain charges preferred against the President of the United States; and, whereas, the Judiciary committee, to whom said resolution and charges were referred, with authority to investigate the same, were unable, for want of time, to complete said investigation before the expiration of the 39th Congress; and, whereas, in the report submitted by said Judiciary committee on the 2d of March, they declare that the evidence taken is of such character as to justify and demand a continuation of the investigation by this Congress. Therefore, be it

Resolved, By the House of Representatives, that the Judiciary committee, when appointed, be and they are hereby instructed to continue the investigation authorized in said resolution of January 7th, 1867, and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses, and that the committee have the authority to sit during the session of the House, and during any recess which Congress or this House may take.

Resolved, That the speaker of the House be requested to appoint the committee on the Judiciary forthwith, and that the committee so appointed be directed to take charge of the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress, and that said committee have power to appoint a clerk, at a compensation not to exceed six dollars per day, and to employ the necessary stenographers.

Resolved further, That the clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, on the order of the committee on the Judiciary, such sum or sums of money as may be required to enable the said committee to prosecute the investigation above directed, and such other investigations as it may be ordered to make.

Attest: EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION—CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 7, 1867.

Mr. JAMES M. ASHLEY, as a question of privilege, submitted the following, which was read, considered and agreed to:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law, in that he has corruptly used the appointing power; in that he has corruptly used the pardoning power; in that he has corruptly used the veto power; in that he has corruptly disposed of the public property of the United States; in that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts, and conspired with others to commit acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House, whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional power of this House, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses.

Attest: EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday, February 6, 1867.

LAFAYETTE C. BAKER, sworn and examined.

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio:

Q. I wish you to state to the committee the contents, as nearly as you can, of a letter which you have had in your possession, written by Andrew Johnson some time in the early part of 1864 to a Southern man, giving information as to the troops about the capital and elsewhere, and advice to Jefferson Davis. State where that letter is, if you know, and give its contents as nearly as you can, and the history of it.

A. I know there was a letter of that character, purporting to have been written by Andrew Johnson.

Q. Give its date, as nearly as you can.

A. I am not positive as to the date. It was during the time, however, that Andrew Johnson was acting governor of Tennessee. I had the letter twice in my possession, the first time about three days, and the last time about two weeks.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. State when that was.

A. That was, I think, in the last of October, or the first part of November, 1865. I doubted the genuineness of the letter at first, and so expressed myself to the party who gave it to me; and for that reason it was given to me the second time. Not being familiar with the signature of Andrew Johnson, I carried the letter to Colonel Browning, to the White House. Turning over the written part of the letter, so that he could only see the signature, I said to Colonel Browning that I believed there were parties engaged in forging the President's signature to letters of recommendation, and other papers, and that I had there what purported to be his signature. This was in Colonel Browning's private room at the White House. There were two persons present. I called him over to the marble fire-place and laid the letter down on the mantel-piece, with the written part turned under. I asked him if that was the signature of the President. He said it was. I asked him whether, in the event he should be called upon at any time, he would swear to it. He said he would swear it was the President's signature. I carried the letter back to the party who gave it to me. He had left the city, in the meantime, for three days. He afterwards came to me, and I returned to him the letter.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State the contents of the letter.

A. I cannot state the contents of that letter with any degree of certainty. The first time I had the letter in my possession, as I said before, I did not believe it was a genuine letter, and I paid very little attention to it. It was very difficult to read; that is, it was not written very legibly. The second time I had it in my possession I read it. It was dated at Nashville, and was addressed to Jefferson Davis, and was apparently in reply to a letter which he had received either from Davis or some one in authority. In fact, the letter starts out by acknowledging the receipt of another letter. It goes on to make suggestions as to some declared policy which had been adopted by the confederacy. In another place he refers to Parson Brownlow in very severe terms, the language I do not recollect. The party who handed me that letter I have not seen but once since. I saw him in Washington some three months after I returned to him the letter. He told me he was here as an applicant for a position. He wanted to know from me what use could be made of this letter to secure it. I asked him what he wanted. He mentioned to me one or two positions, although he was not particular. The first time I had this letter in my possession I mentioned to some parties or party here in Washington that there was such a letter. I was waited upon by a number of members of Congress, I think three times, to get the letter. It was too late, however; I had returned the letter. Mr. Hotchkiss, Mr. Scofield, and, I think, Mr. Van Aernam, called on me about it. This was in the beginning, or some time during the month, of November, 1865.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Are you not mistaken? Congress did not meet till December.

A. I think it was soon after the Cobb difficulty, in reference to pardons. I was arrested on the 11th of November, and the indictment was found on the 10th.

Q. That was after Congress met.

A. It may have been.

Q. Was not Mr. Shellabarger there once?

A. Yes, sir; it may have been in December, I am not positive as to dates. The only way I have of fixing the date is, that I know it was after the Cobb difficulty.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you stated all you can recollect of the contents of the letter?

A. I have stated all I can swear to in reference to it.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Did he not advise Davis in that same letter about the number of troops about the capital and in Kentucky?

A. There was reference made to troops in that letter.

Q. As to the disposition of the United States forces—where they were?

A. No. I do not think he designated any point and stated the number of troops at that point. I think he referred to troops being at such and such places, but that he stated the numbers I do not recollect. I do not think he did.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there anything in the letter about the shipment of arms?

A. Not in that letter, that I recollect.

Q. What account did the person who had possession of that letter give of the manner by which he had obtained the possession?

A. I asked him that question repeatedly, and never got any direct answer from him except that the letter was taken off Andrew Johnson's table.

Q. Where?

A. In Nashville.

Q. Did the body of the letter and the signature seem to have been written by the same person?

A. Yes, sir. It was very difficult to read the letter. I studied over it a long time before I could make it out.

By Mr. MORRIS:

Q. Do I understand that it was taken from Mr. Johnson's table before it was sent?

A. Yes, sir; that was the statement of this man.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Who was that man?

A. John W. Adamson.

Q. Of where?

A. 29 Myrtle street, Nashville, Tennessee.

Q. He was the man who inquired of you what use could be made of it in getting an appointment?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has he ever received any appointment?

A. I think not. I never heard of his receiving any.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What statement did he make relative to his obtaining possession of the letter? Did he himself take it from Johnson's table?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he state by whom it was taken from Johnson's table?

A. Yes.

Q. By whom did he say?

A. He said that Governor Brownlow's son employed a colored man to take it.

Q. Which one of Governor Brownlow's sons?

A. He did not say.

Q. Did he say anything about the then whereabouts of the colored man, or whether he knew anything about him?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. To whom did you return that letter?

A. I returned it to John W. Adamson. He did make a partial explanation to me in reference to it. He stated that he wanted to make some pecuniary use of the letter. He did not hesitate to state that to me in both, in fact in all, of the conversations that I had with him.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever disclose the fact of the existence of the letter to any officer of the government?

A. No, sir; to no officer of the government except to members of Congress. I may have talked with General Eckert about it.

Q. From whom did you receive the letter the second time?

A. From the same man.

Q. And returned it to the same man?

A. Yes; I asked him for it the second time. I sent for him, and he came to my office on Eighteenth street in the night, and handed it to me.

Q. Where is Adamson now?

A. He is in Nashville, I suppose.

Q. What business is he engaged in?

A. I do not know.

Q. State whether any other parties read this letter besides yourself and Adamson, and, if so, who they were.

A. Yes; a man by the name of Charles H. Cruther and another man named C. G. Watkins. I met Watkins and Adamson on the street together several times.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Did any other parties read the letter besides those persons and your wife?

A. I do not know that my wife read it. She heard me trying to read it several times.

Q. State whether the whole import of the letter written by Andrew Johnson was not to turn the whole power which he possessed in Tennessee, in a certain contingency, over to the rebel cause.

A. No; I did not have that opinion of the letter exactly. From what I recollect of it, the thing was that he was making a proposition—making suggestions as to what their policy should be.

Q. And if they accepted it?

A. If they accepted it, my impression from the letter was that he was going with them.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. With the rebels?

A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State whether you know where those persons are now who read this letter.

A. I do not.

Q. Where is Watkins's residence?

A. I do not know; somewhere in Maryland; not far from here, I think.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. State what knowledge you have of the existence of any other letters written by Johnson, either before or after he became President.

A. Mrs. Lucy L. Cobb, of Washington city, showed me two letters the evening she was brought to my headquarters, the 8th of April, 1866. I talked to her very severely about visiting the White House, saying that a woman of her character had not any business to go there. She claimed that she had a right to go there, and that it was with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the President. To satisfy me that her statement was correct, she showed me two letters, one written by the President to the Postmaster General, to give Mr. Cobb, her husband, a situation in the Post Office Department, and another one written to Mr. McCulloch, asking him to give Mrs. Cobb a situation in the Treasury Department.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. State what position you held then.

A. I was provost marshal of the War Department.

Q. What was the character of Mrs. Cobb?

A. She was a disreputable woman, or, in other words, a woman of the town.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. If there are any other letters that you have seen of Johnson's, written by him to any person connected with the confederate government, or proposing to change the administration of the government in their favor after he became President, or anything of a public nature affecting the public interests of the United States, please state it, and state all you know about such letters.

A. I do not know of any letters of that character – of any other letter. Mr. Adamson told me that there were other letters. I told him I wanted to see him. He brought a man to me to introduce to me, named Speck, who had letter in his possession purporting to be written by Andrew Johnson.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Before or after he became President?

A. After he became President.

Q. How long after?

A. The letter, I think, was dated in July or August after he became President.

Q. Did you read that letter?

A. Yes; I read what I could of it. I could not read it all. I only had it for a few moments in my hand.

Q. Please state its character.

A. I returned the letter and told the man I believed it was a forgery, and that I did not wish to have anything to do with it; and I believe so still. I believe so, because the signature did not look like the signature which Colonel Browning pronounced the genuine signature of Andrew Johnson.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. You stated that there were two persons present when you showed the letter to Colonel Browning; who were they?

A. One of them was Major Long. They did not see the letter, and did not hear the conversation.

Q. Are you not familiar enough with the handwriting of Johnson to determine for yourself whether the handwriting was genuine?

A. No, sir; I do not suppose I have seen half a dozen of his signatures.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what you know about telegrams, and the manner in which they were sent, and to whom, after he became President.

A. That is all hearsay; I do not know anything of it of my own knowledge.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. State what you heard, and from whom, with reference to those telegrams being sent in cipher from the President's house to Nashville.

A. I think the first intimation I had of telegrams was some time in August or September, 1865. I was at Nashville, where I had been sent by Mr. Johnson's order. I received a written order from the President to go to Macon, Mobile, Atlanta, and other places, for the purpose of looking up certain letters which were supposed to have belonged to C. C. Clay. While in Nashville, I was applied to by a man who claimed to have been in the government telegraph department.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Give his name.

A. His name is Wilbur. He applied to me, in the first place, for a situation.

Q. Can you give his full name?

A. I have got it on some papers, but I cannot recollect it now. He made an application to me for a position as a detective on my force, and in the conversation I had with him he said he had been in the government telegraph office. I asked him where. He said at Nashville. I told him that I did not want to employ any more detectives. He said he thought he had something very important. I told him that if he would come to my room at the hotel that night I would talk with him. He came around there and stated that he had seen copies of telegrams sent by Andrew Johnson, which the operators in the office thought were very singular—so much so that it had become a subject of conversation among them. I asked him what they were. He said that the telegrams in reference to Parson Brownlow were very scandalous. I asked him if he could get me copies of them. He said he could not get them himself, as he was not then in the office, but that he knew an operator in the office from whom he thought he could get copies. I told him I was going south, and should be back in Nashville in two or three weeks, and that if he could get any copies of those telegrams and would bring them to me, I would be able to judge whether they were genuine or not, or whether they were of any importance or not. I went away, and when I came back to Nashville I found him at the hotel the night I arrived. I asked him if he had got the telegrams. He said he had not, but that he had been at the office and had seen them. I asked him what the purport of them was. He said they were telegrams sent to Nashville, in cipher, from the office here in Washington.

Q. From the War Department office?

A. From the War Department office. There was no other office at that time for sending government messages. Parson Brownlow was very ill at that time, and Mr. Johnson hoped that the Lord would take him away as soon as possible; that it was the only salvation for the State of Tennessee—and a great many things that I do not recollect. When I found that I could not get the telegrams into my possession, I did not attach much more importance to it at that time.

Q. Did you or not get the impression from that conversation that those telegrams were sent to persons who would regard them as instructions to overturn the established government in Tennessee?

A. I got that impression for this reason—that he told me plainly that all the operators in the office regarded it as a conspiracy against the government.

Q. Against the loyal government of Tennessee?

A. Against the State government.

Q. Do you know about what time those despatches were sent from here?

A. They must have been sent in July or August, 1865. He told me a long story about a cipher; that he had seen some messages; that the President wanted a new cipher arranged; that he was not willing that even the Secretary of War should know his cipher; and that he applied to General Eckert, the chief telegraph operator, to arrange a cipher, and that General Eckert did arrange a cipher, and nobody had the key to it except the parties in his office here and one party in the office at Nashville. I spoke to General Eckert after I came home about the cipher, and if there was such a cipher.

Q. What did the General say?

A. Well, he did not give me any answer. It was not a proper question for me to ask him in the first place, but I asked without really expecting to get an answer.

Q. What was the name of the party at Nashville who understood that private cipher?

A. That I do not recollect. I was trying to find it last Sunday among my papers in Philadelphia; I have got it somewhere.

Q. Was he an operator in the office?

A. No, sir; he was a citizen, and my impression is that he is the present mayor of Nashville. I feel very certain he is. The name is a German name.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Who was the operator at that time, at this end of the line, at the War Department?

A. There were seven or eight of them. There was one particular operator, I believe, who had charge of those cipher messages.

Q. What was his name?

A. I do not know who he was. General Eckert would know more about that than I do; he was in charge of the military telegraph office at that time. In my conversation with Mrs. Cobb she went on to tell a long story about the President having facilities for communicating with his friends in the South which even Mr. Stanton did not know anything about.

Q. I wish you to state to the committee the number of persons who were arrested by you, and tried and convicted either by courts-martial, military commissions, or civil courts during the rebellion, who have been since pardoned by Johnson, and who are now holding office. Give the names of those whom you recollect, and if you have the list furnish it.

A. I have brought to Washington the proof sheets of the book which I am publishing, and which contains the names of the parties, the nature of their offences, &c.

Q. State the number as near as you can.

A. I think there have been one hundred and twenty-three of my prisoners who were convicted.

Q. Of penitentiary offences?

A. Yes. Out of that number ninety-two or ninety-three were pardoned and holding office at the time I made my report to General Fry. In my report the facts are all set forth, the names of the prisoners, the sentences, the amount of fines imposed, &c.

Q. Do I understand that those persons are now holding office?

A. About ninety-two or ninety-three of them are. Cahill was convicted of forging soldiers' enlistment papers, and was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. He was pardoned by Mr. Johnson, and was appointed to a situation in the Philadelphia post office as letter carrier, where he now is. Devlin was sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary and a fine of $10,000. He was pardoned before he left the Old Capitol prison, and was, I am told, appointed an inspector of customs in New York under Mr. Smyth. Those names are all contained in my report to the Provost Marshal General.

Q. State what you know about the pardon brokerage business.

A. Previous to the arrest of Mrs. Cobb, a despatch was received by the Secretary of War from General Sheridan, at New Orleans, stating that Isaac N. Surratt was on his way from Monterey in Mexico to Washington to assassinate President Johnson. The Secretary handed me the despatch. I said to the Secretary, "I do not know what I can do; I do not know this man, and have got no description of him." The next day General Sheridan sent a despatch, which General Steele had sent him, giving a full description of Surratt. The Secretary sent for me again, and handed me the second despatch. I said, "Now I can do something, because I have got a description of the man." This despatch was received the very day I was going to Canada. I handed the two despatches to my assistant, and told him he had better detail a man or two to go to the White House at night, and watch around outside; but they were under no circumstances to go inside the building, as I did not want even the President to know that there was any fear of his assassination. I left Washington that night on the six o'clock train to go to Canada to get those letters I have been talking about. I got as far as Baltimore when I met a man on the street, who told me that Isaac N. Surratt was in Baltimore; I went into General Heintzelman's office, and telegraphed in cipher to the Secretary of War: "Isaac N. Surratt in Baltimore; look out for him." I went to Canada, and was there three weeks. When I came back I asked my assistant in the office, "Did you detail men for the White House." He said, "I did." I said, "Whom did you detail." He said, "S. S. Jones and John Odell." I said to my assistant, "You send for Jones and Odell; I want to see them." They came up to my office, and I asked them if they had seen any suspicious characters about the White House; they said that they had not. They then volunteered a statement with reference to their duties at the White House. They said that the President heard that they were on duty there, and sent one of the messengers for them to come up. Jones went up and had an interview with the President; and after that he was with the President every night, and walked out with him in the grounds at night for exercise. He was a sort of body-guard for the President. In this conversation that I had with Jones and Odell, they told me that there were a great many improprieties going on at the White House; that certain women were going there at all times—night and day—and, among others, they mentioned the name of Mrs. Cobb. "Why," said I, "it is not possible that Mrs. Cobb goes to the White House?" Jones said, "She is there all the time. She came down stairs yesterday morning with a pardon in her hand, shook it in my face, and boasted that she could get anything done she wanted." I said they must be mistaken, and I put on my hat and went to the White House. In the reception room, I saw Mrs. Cobb sitting with a large batch of papers in her lap. I went up to her and said, "What are you doing here? You have got no business here; you are not a proper character to be here." She refused to go out, and I took her by the shawl, raised her off the seat, took her down stairs, and told her to go away. In a further conversation that I had with Jones and Odell, I learned something of the manner in which those pardons were being procured. I then became satisfied that Mrs. Cobb was procuring pardons, and I got one of my detectives to get up a fictitious application in the name of Captain Clarence J. Howell, of the rebel army. I told him to go to the Avenue House, where Mrs. Cobb was stopping, and to make a contract with her in writing to procure a pardon. I gave him two $50 notes to give her. He went there under a written contract, which I have got, paid Mrs. Cobb the hundred dollars, and was to have the pardon next night at 6 o'clock. Next night at 6 o'clock I went down with him to the Avenue House. He went up to Mrs. Cobb's room and got the pardon, paying $200 more for it. I had marked all the money. I went up to the room then and demanded the money from Mrs. Cobb. She would not give it to me. I asked her to go to my headquarters. She wanted to know if I had any objections to her husband going with her. I said, "No." We got into a carriage and went to my headquarters. I took her into my private office. She was very indignant at being treated in the way I treated her. She wanted to know why I made an example of her. She said there were other women making ten dollars for the one she made, and getting ten pardons for the one she got, and she could not understand why she should be selected from the others. I asked her who were getting pardons. She said that Mrs. Colonel Washington, of Harper's Ferry notoriety, was getting a great many pardons; also, Mrs. Stewart, and Mrs. Reed, of Charleston, South Carolina—the woman who got the cotton order there. She then boasted of her intimacy with the President, and pulled out of her bosom the two letters that I have before referred to, to the Postmaster General, and to Mr. McCulloch. She said she had procured a number of pardons, and gave me the names of the persons, which I wrote down on the blotting paper on my desk. She told me how much money she got for them, and how much she paid for them.

Q. Did she tell you that the President knew she was getting money for them?

A. She said the President knew all about it. I asked her the question to whom she paid money. She stated that, for two pardons which she procured for two men in Richmond, she had got $3,000; that she bought a pair of kid gloves for Colonel Robert Johnson, took two $500 bills, put a $500 bill in each glove, and presented the gloves to Robert Johnson. She went on to state that the President had, on one or two occasions, made advances to her, and asked her into his private room; that she had met him twice at the Kirkwood House before he was President, and staid in his room all night once, and one night until 2 o'clock. She then detailed to me a conversation which I afterwards corroborated partially, that the President was going to muster out certain radical officers, and was going to dispense with Mr. Stanton. After she told me that

Mrs. Washington was procuring pardons, I made out an application in the name of John Kelly, and gave it to the same man who had procured the pardon from Mrs. Cobb, and I gave him, with it, one hundred dollars. The application was made out, I think, after 7 o'clock in the evening.

I went to Georgetown, and made a written contract with Mrs. Ellen B. Washington, the wife of the rebel Colonel Lewis Washington, who lived near Harper's Ferry. She got into the carriage after she got the $100, and came down to the President's house, went up stairs, came down again in a few minutes, and said it was all right, that they were then filling up the pardon, and it would be ready that evening. That same evening there was to be a party at Georgetown, in the house of Mrs. English, to which some cabinet officers had been invited. She made an excuse that she must go back to Mrs. English's at once. In the meantime, next morning, the arrest of Mrs. Cobb became known, and the thing stopped at once. After I got the pardon in my possession, the contract of Mrs. Cobb, and the marked money, I went to see the President, leaving Mrs. Cobb sitting in my room. I found him alone and he asked me to be seated. I handed him the pardon, and began to tell him the story as to how I got possession of it. He stopped me at once, and wanted to know where I got the pardon. I said I got the pardon from Mrs. Cobb, and I began telling him the story again. He interrupted me, and became very much excited. He continued to ask me the question where I got the pardon. When I attempted to explain to him where I got it, he interrupted me. Finally, he wanted to know where Mrs. Cobb was. I said, "She is at my office." He then wanted to know the character of the woman. I gave him a little history of my knowledge of the woman, and of her character. He said to me, "I don't know these people. All sorts of people come here, and I am obliged to see them all. I want to treat them all kindly, and hear their complaints, as far as I can; and it is very likely there are people of that character coming." He said, "I recollect signing this pardon, but I did not sign it until after 4 o'clock to-day, and I don't know how you got it." He called his son Robert, and handed him the pardon. He asked him, "Robert, what do you know about this pardon?" Robert says, "Why, father, this is the pardon you signed for Mrs. Cobb this afternoon." Then I began telling him the story about the pardon, and he became very much excited, and charged me with having circulated a certain circular, which was got up by the radicals before Congress met, pledging certain members of Congress and Senators to a certain line of policy, after Congress should meet. He wanted to know if I carried round such a circular. I said I did not. He said I did, and told me I was telling an untruth. I told him I never saw such a circular in my life; that I had simply heard there was such a paper in existence, but that I had never seen it. He asked me to leave the papers with him, and to come to see him again. I left the papers, and the next afternoon I got a note from Major Long, saying the President wanted to see me immediately. I went to the White House, and the President wanted to know about this manner of procuring pardons. I gave him a little history of it. He pulled out of his drawer this pardon, which Mrs. Cobb had got, and said to me, "This pardon, it appears, has not been returned to the Attorney General for his signature; there is no oath attached to it, as required by law." And he wanted to know how I got it into my possession. I told him again how I got it, that I got it from Mrs. Cobb; that she gave it to me. He wanted to know if I suspected anybody in the Attorney General's office. I told him what Mrs. Cobb said in reference to Mr. J. M. Pleasants, the pardoning clerk in the Attorney General's office; that she had to divide with Pleasants upon every pardon she got. And then I told him the circumstance of Pleasants following Mrs. Cobb out of the room one day into the hall, taking hold of her, and telling her she should not carry away that pardon until he had his half of the money. He was apparently very indignant at Mr. Pleasants, and said he would send for him, and talk with him. I don't know whether he ever did so. At any rate he said he should take measures to stop this business, and to stop these characters from coming to the White House. I left him. In the course of four or five days I found that Mrs. Cobb was still going to the White House, and was procuring pardons; and I determined then to ascertain whether she was going with his approval or not. I directed one of my men to go to the door of the White House, and if Mrs. Cobb came there to tell her she could not go into the building. This was on Monday morning. My man went down there, and had been there about an hour, when she came and wanted to go into the White House. He said no, you cannot go into the building. She wanted to know by whose orders she was prohibited. The man told her it was by my orders. She went around the back way, entered the grounds, passed the conservatory, came into the kitchen, got up stairs, and went to the President's room. After a few minutes the President sent for the man whom I had stationed at the door, and wanted to know by whose orders he was guarding the doors of the White House. This man's name was S. S. Jones. Mr. Jones told the President he was there by my orders. The President said, "Do you tell General Baker I want to see him immediately." Before Jones got up to my office the President had sent another messenger for me, who came, very much excited, and said the President wanted to see me. I told him I would be down in a few moments; and on my way down to the White House I met Jones, who was on his way to my office, and he told me what the President said. He said the President was very furious, and that he was a little drunk, and that I had better not go down there then, but to wait until that afternoon. I said no; that I would go down to the President, as he had sent for me. I went to the White House, and found a good many people waiting in the ante-room. The messenger told the President I was there, and he opened the door himself. There was nobody in the room; and when I went in he locked the door—or catched the lock in some way—and in a very furious manner wanted to know by what authority I was detailing detectives to the White House. I said to him, "I supposed you did not want Mrs. Cobb to come here, and I found she was coming here, and I stationed the man at the door to prevent her coming; you told me you did not want any of these characters to be coming to the White House, and I thought it my duty to prevent her coming here." He said, "When I want you to detail detectives to the White House I will send for you and let you know." I was standing up near the door, and he came over to where I was and began to say I had made myself very conspicuous in reference to this particular matter of pardons; that when he wanted an investigation made in reference to matters that occurred at the White House, he would give a written order to make it. I excused my conduct as far as I could. He talked very loudly and abusively; and I said something to him that I do not recollect. Then he shook his fist in my face, and wanted to know how I dared talk to him in that way. I told him I dared talk to any man when I was right. He got very much beside himself, and walked around the table, and I started to go out of the room. He called me back and said, "You can tell your friend Stanton what I say." I said, "Very well, sir;" and I started to go out. He repeated, "I say you can go and tell your friend Stanton what I say" I said, "Very well, sir." I got by that time up to the door, and he came right up to me and shook his fist at me and said, "Now you go and tell your friend Stanton what I said." I said, "Very well, sir," and backed out of the room and came away. There had been a good many complaints made by people coming from the South for pardons that they were subjected here to all sorts of impositions by claim agents and pardon-brokers. Governor Parsons came up here in behalf of his constituents to do something to prevent it. He claimed that these applicants for pardon were all poor men and had no means—scarcely means enough to come here—and that when they did get here he claimed they should obtain their pardons; that the business should be expedited as fast as possible, and they allowed to go away without being subjected to extortion on the part of claim agents and pardon-brokers. To obviate that difficulty, it was suggested that an agent be appointed to remain permanently in Washington who should receive all the applications, place them on file, take them to the Attorney General's office, get the pardons, and send them to the persons free of charge. This agent to be paid either by the State of Alabama or by the government. Arrangements, I believe, were entered into, and Colonel Sayers opened an office on the Avenue, opposite Willard's Hotel.

Q. You mean Colonel Sayers late of the rebel army?

A. So I understood. That was immediately after the difficulty with Mrs. Cobb. Some three or four months after that I was told that Colonel Sayers was sending a good many pardons through Adams & Co.'s express, and sending the bills with them. I went down to Mr. Dunn, in Adams & Co.'s office, in this city, and told him I wanted to look at his books. He took me into his office and introduced me to his agent. He showed me a register of packages sent. I do not recollect the exact number, but the books will show there were a great number between the 4th and 14th of November. The pardons were sent away by express in the official envelope of the Attorney General, and outside on the envelope they had put "C. O. D. $100," (collect on delivery $100.) I went to work and copied from Adams & Co.'s books the names of the persons for whom pardons had been procured, the dates of the pardons, and where they were sent. Then I went to see the cash book of Adams & Co., showing when the money came back and to whom it was paid. Adams & Co.'s books will show how many pardons Colonel Sayers sent away between given dates, and how much money he received for them. It is a well known fact that he made out regular bills and collected $100 for each pardon. There were some 1,300 or 1,400 pardons which he got paid for—that is if he got paid for all that he sent, as I presume he did. My investigation only extended to a number of days in the month of November. I am told, however, that the business continued right on, and continues to this day.

Q. Do those books show that Sayers received the money?

A. The cash book shows that.

FEBRUARY 7, 1867.

Q. You spoke yesterday of the pardon clerk in the Attorney Generals office—do you know whether he knew of any improprieties in connection with the exercise of the pardoning power, regarding pardons, or anything connected therewith?

A. I know that in a conversation I had with the Attorney General, Mr. Speed, he said he had very strong suspicions against his clerk, Mr. Pleasants, but that he had declined to make any charge against him or to dismiss him until he could get the facts. I related to him the conversation I had with Mrs. Cobb, in which she said that she had paid Mr. Pleasants one-third of all the money that she had received for pardons. I related the circumstance which she told me of Mr. Pleasants sending a messenger after her when she went out of the office having a pardon in her possession; of his following her up some distance towards the White House, and saying that Mr. Pleasants wanted to see her, that she went back, and Mr. Pleasants said to her he must have that $50, referring to one-third of $150 which she had received for procuring a pardon for a man named Myers, in Richmond.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, February 7, 1867.

LAFAYETTE C. BAKER recalled and examination continued.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You stated yesterday that some 123 persons who had been arrested by you had been convicted by the civil and military courts of various crimes, and of that number some ninety had been pardoned by President Johnson, and a number of them appointed to office under the government Give the names of these persons.

A. Here are the proof-sheets of a book of mine which has been published in Philadelphia. They embrace the convictions and pardons up to the time the book was written, and I have the list of the balance of them. In my report to General Fry, reference is made to them, and I think the names are given of the persons convicted, who then held positions under the government. Cahill is in the post-office in Philadelphia, and Devlin was in the custom-house, in New York. There are but two or three in the list who had not been pardoned, and those have been pardoned since.

Q. All the persons embraced in this list have been pardoned?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you not furnish us with the names of those persons?

A. I can give you the full names and the positions which they now hold, but I cannot do so without getting the original manuscript from Mr. Headley. The President asked me to state officially what I knew concerning Mrs. Cobb and other women who were visiting the White House. He wanted it to put it on record. On the 12th of November I made this written confidential report to him in which I went over the whole ground of the pardoning business, the names of the persons engaged in it and the character of those women. I delivered that report to him myself in person, and sat in the chair and heard him read it. Mr. Headley has got a copy of that report to the President. The last interview I had with the President was two or three days after he had received my report. The report was made before I stationed the detective at the door. He charged me in that last interview, among other things, with stating in my report that which was not so.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. In the violent interview which you had with the President, did you discover that his provocation grew out of the fact that you had stationed a detective there?

A. Oh, yes; he complained of it directly. He commenced the conversation by asking me by what right I had stationed detectives at the White House.

Q. That was subsequent to your report?

A. Oh, yes. The very first interview I had with him on the subject, I gave him the history of this woman. That report was verbal. He then asked me to make him a written report. I then gave him the report which I have spoken of. The list of persons convicted and afterwards pardoned, will appear fully in the paper which Mr. Headley has got, from which the list in this book is compiled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you recollect any other particular subject treated of in your book bearing on the subject of the investigation, which is before the committee?

A. Yes, sir. I propose to publish in my book the whole history of the pardon business, as I understand it. I pu lish all the official documents which I have in my possession on the subject. I publish my report to the President, his letters and notes requesting me to see him, the particulars of the interviews between us, and Mrs. Cobb's statement to me. They are in type, but I have not got the proof-sheets. The book will contain about 900 pages, and I have only about 750 here.

Q. Was there any effort made on the part of any member of the Executive Department to suppress the publication of your book?

A. Yes, I think there was.

Q. Can you state of your own knowledge that there was any such effort made?

A. Not of my own knowledge directly.

Q. Have you reason to believe that such an effort was made?

A. Yes.

Q. What is the ground of that belief?

A. I made a written contract with a publishing house in New York—Derby & Miller, 5 Spruce street—to publish my work after first submitting to them the materials which I had, to make a book. I knew nothing then about the relations between Mr. Seward and the publisher, Mr. Derby. I had made a contract with Mr. Headley to write the work. He began writing it, and submitted his manuscript from time to time. I came to Washington, and Mr. Riddle, ex-member of Congress from Ohio, who lives next door to Mr. Baker, chief clerk in the State Department, told me that Mr. Baker, in a conversation with him the night before, told him he had seen proof-sheets of Baker's book in the State Department. Mr. Riddle wanted to know whether I was going to submit the proof-sheets of my book to Mr. Seward. I said no, that I wasn't aware that Mr. Seward ever had them. I made some further inquiries and satisfied myself that Mr. Seward had the proof-sheets and had read them. I had published some original orders from Mr. Seward for the arrest of persons which he had given me in 1861. I understood that was his objection to the work, that I had no right to publish his orders. The work was suspended on the book for some months in New York. I finally went to New York and made an arrangement to have the work continued.

Q. What was the cause of the suspension?

A. I understood it was Mr. Seward's interference.

Q. From whom did you get that understanding?

A. I got it from several persons.

Q. Did you get it from the publishers?

A. Not directly from the publishers.

Q. Have you had any interview with Mr. Seward since you came to this city this last time?

A. I have seen Mr. Seward.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him touching this investigation?

A. No, sir, not a word.

Q. Or with any other member of the executive branch of the government?

A. Not directly. I had some conversation with Mr. Stanton.

Q. Concerning this investigation?

A. Not particularly. He simply asked me how long I had been in the city, and what I was doing here, and I told him.

Q. Did he seek the interview?

A. No, sir. He wanted to see me with reference to a suit that was pending against him by Smithson, the banker. I had in my possession the original papers for the arrest of Smithson and the seizure of his property, and Mr. Stanton wanted to see me with reference to those papers.

Q. There was nothing in either of those interviews that led you to believe that Mr. Seward or Mr. Stanton had interfered in the publication of your book?

A. No, sir. It is generally understood and believed that the delay in the publication of the book has been in consequence of the interference by Mr. Seward. I never heard of Mr. Stanton interfering with it.

Q. Did Mr. Seward seek the interview you had with him?

A. I had not any interview with him directly. I met him accidentally.

Q. Where?

A. I met him at the door going into the department as I was coming out.

Q. That is the only interview you had with him?

A. That is the only interview I have had with him since I have been here this last time.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. State whether you can recollect the names of any other parties who had read this letter that was written by Mr. Johnson.

A. After giving my testimony yesterday I was thinking of the matter. I knew that somebody had seen and read that letter, and I happened to think of the man who read it. I was in correspondence with Mr. W. C. Matchett, and it was through him that those gentlemen whom I referred to yesterday as being anxious to see the letter came to my room. I had forgotten, when I gave my testimony yesterday, that Matchett had seen this letter. He has seen it, and he has got a memorandum in his pocket giving the purport of a number of letters which I had, not referring to this matter but to other matters, which memorandum he says he took at that time.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1867.

EDWARD R. PHELPS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you testify before the committee on public expenditures of the House of Representatives, concerning a subject called the general order business in New York?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state what is meant by that term "general order" business.

A. Warehouses are kept in New York, in which a large business is done by the storage of goods which are not passed directly through the custom-house. These are under the control of the collector, and are kept by men who receive appointments from him.

Q. Is the general order business regarded as profitable?

A. Yes, sir; very profitable, especially in New York. It has been estimated in New York to be worth over $100,000 a year to the parties who have it.

Q. The profits arise from the amounts received from storage?

A. From storage, cartage, and labor. A great many men are employed in getting goods in and out.

Q. Were you ever engaged in any negotiation with any person to secure any part of the general order business in the city of New York?

A. Yes, sir; I was engaged with Thomas J. Barr, of New York.

Q. Please state all the circumstances attending such negotiations.

A. We employed one Mrs. W. C. Perry, of Cincinnati, who was a confidential friend of the President, as we understood. She called upon the President at the White House to state to him what we wanted. He requested her to bring myself and Mr. Barr to him. I called, on the appointment made by the President, to state to him that we wished the general order business from pier No. 59, North river, to the battery. He questioned me, and also Mr. Barr, as to what party we belonged. I stated to him that I was a republican. He then asked me if I could bring him endorsements from members of Congress, on which he could fall back, or something of that kind, if any question was made in reference to it. He said if I could bring satisfactory recommendations I should have it; that he knew Mrs. Perry very well, and that I was recommended very highly by her; that he would give me this for the benefit of Mrs. Perry; that he wanted to have it made satisfactory to her. I then got a letter from Henry J. Raymond, recommending myself to the President, which was endorsed by ten or twelve members of Congress from New York State.

Q. They knew nothing about the arrangement, of course?

A. No, sir. Mr. Raymond knew me very well, and would indorse me for anything within the gift of the government. We then called upon the President, upon an appointment, between six and seven o'clock in the evening, about the middle of June, I think, 1866. He said that I should have the appointment. I told him there would be considerable of a time about it among the politicians in New York, because it was patronage very much looked after, and there were parties there who would think I ought not to have it, and that I wanted him to stand by me. Says he, "Young man, I will stand by you; this is all right. As soon as I appoint a collector, I will give you the necessary papers to him."

Q. Did he give you any papers to the collector?

A. He did; a week or ten days before Mr. Smythe was confirmed.

Q. Was the paper he gave you in the nature of a letter to Mr. Smythe?

A. Yes, sir; it was addressed to the collector of the port of New York, and placed in an envelope from the executive department.

Q. Where is that letter?

A. It is in the hands of Mr. Smythe.

Q. When did you deliver it to Mr. Smythe?

A. On the Tuesday or Wednesday after he was confirmed. He was confirmed on Friday, and came from Washington on Saturday.

Q. Can you state the contents of the letter?

A. I do not recollect exactly how it was worded. The substance was about this: "You will please give the general order business from pier No. 59, North river, to the battery, to Edward R. Phelps and Thomas J. Barr, of New York."

Q. How many interviews had you with the President prior to receiving that letter?

A. I should think about four. Mr. Barr had two.

Q Who was present at those several interviews?

A. At the interviews with myself there were Mrs. Perry and the President, and sometimes Colonel Moore and Mr. Browning, private secretaries.

Q. Had you any acquaintance with the President prior to your application for the general order business?

A. No, sir.

Q. By whom were you introduced to the President?

A. By Mrs. Perry.

Q. How did you become acquainted with Mrs. Perry?

A. I became acquainted with her some six or seven years ago, when she was living at Syracuse. She was then Mrs. Haskins, and, as I understand, known here as Mrs. Jennie Norwood.

Q. When did you learn that she had influence with the President?

A. I learned it in the winter of 1863, while he was military governor of Tennessee.

Q. When did you first speak to Mrs. Perry in relation to the general order business in New York?

A. In June, I think it was, 1866.

A. What proposition, if any, did you make to Mrs. Perry in relation to that business?

A. She told me that she had influence with the President; that she could obtain almost anything for me; that she had a great many offers from parties to become a partner with them, but that she had never done that. I told her that we wanted the general order business; that if she would obtain an order on the collector we would give her, I think, one-fourth of the net profits. She called upon the President, as I stated, and, in pursuance of an appointment, I subsequently called, and the President asked me, at the interview, about the general order business—as to what it was. He appeared to be ignorant of it. I explained it to him. He asked me how lucrative it was, and what it would amount to in a year. I told him there had been different estimates put upon it—from forty to fifty thousand dollars. He asked me who held it, and their politics. I told him that several gentlemen held it who were all, except one, opposed to him in politics. He then said, as I have said, that if I could get recommended it would be satisfactory, and we should have the appointment.

Q. Did he make these promises prior to any statement on your part as to the interest Mrs. Perry was to have in the business?

A. He made them all at one time. He said if these recommendations were brought as to my standing as loyal to my party, and character, &c., that there would not be any trouble about our having the business, saying that he gave it to us for the benefit of Mrs. Perry, as he had known her for a long time and wished to benefit her.

Q. How did the President know Mrs. Perry was to be benefited by this arrangement?

A. I suppose she had told him what we had promised. Nothing occurred in my presence at that time indicating that he knew of the arrangement. That was about all that occurred in that interview. The next interview was some ten days afterwards. At that time nobody was present but myself, Mrs. Perry, and Colonel Browning. I then brought him the letter I mentioned from Mr. Raymond, and letters from prominent men in regard to Mr. Barr. He asked me how I wanted the letter written, and directed Colonel Browning to write a letter to the collector of the port of New York giving to Mr. Barr and myself the general order business. Colonel Browning wrote the first paper, which was signed by the President, and I left. I ascertained in the course of a week or ten days that this paper was not satisfactory, and Mrs. Perry and myself called upon the President again. In the meantime, Mrs. Perry had said to us that she wanted an agreement drawn up between ourselves and her. I drew up a paper and gave it to her, pledging her, I think, one-fourth of the net profits of the business. I then called upon the President to get another paper from him, which I did, directed to the collector of the port of New York, directing him to give the general order business to Barr and Phelps. At that time she took out the paper we had signed and exhibited it to him They walked off to one side, while Colonel Moore, who was then present, drew up this order on the collector of New York. The President read the paper, and said to me that he wanted us to act right with Mrs. Perry, or something of that kind. He stated, "I see that it is all right between Mrs. Perry and yourself, and I want you to act honorably with her."

Q. Have you a copy of that paper?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is that all that occurred in that interview in which she exhibited that paper to the President?

A. I think it was.

Q. Was any arrangement made by which you was to give any share of the profits to any other person?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you secure that business?

A. No, sir; this last paper, drawn up by Colonel Moore and signed by the President, was held by us until Mr. Smythe was appointed collector and confirmed. We then called upon him within two or three days and presented the paper. He appeared to be very much surprised at receiving it, and remarked that the business was all disposed of, saying: "The President must know about this, for I saw him on Saturday (the day after he was confirmed) and he said nothing about it. He must know I had disposed of it or a certain part of it," and then remarked that he had to give a certain portion of it to Senator Doolittle's son, and a portion of it to the son of another Senator whom I do not recollect, and some to Senator Patterson, the President's son-in-law; that he had given it to those parties before he could be confirmed, and that he had only reserved $15,000 of it for himself, for poli ical purposes, he afterwards added.

Q. Did he tell how that $15,000 was to be used?

A. He did not.

Q. Did you inform the President of the result of the interview with Mr. Smythe?

A. Mrs. Perry did. Mrs. Perry was at Washington. We immediately wrote to her; she wrote back that she had called to see the President but could not get an interview with him, and she came on to New York the next day and called and saw Mr. Smythe and had an interview with him, and she had to my knowledge several interviews with Mr. Smythe.

Q. You did not see the President afterwards?

A. No, sir; I never went near him.

Q. Does that close your connection with the general order business?

A. After Mr. Smythe stated that the business had been disposed of, he then offered to compromise the thing. He wanted to know if he could not satisfy this party, who was so intimate with the President, by giving her $5,000 interest in the business, and said he would then try and do something for myself and Mr. Barr. We told him we could not accept any such proposition; that we thought we were entitled to the position. He then asked us to call in two or three days, I think on Thursday, and he would then let us know what he could do. Mr. Barr and myself then called, and he stated that the whole matter was disposed of, and he could not do anything about it; that he had information from the President that he could do just as he pleased about the matter.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1867.

JOHN EVANS, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q State your residence?

A. Denver City, Colorado territory.

Q. To what position were you elected under the proposed State organization of Colorado?

A. United States Senator.

Q. Were you in this city about the time of the passage of the bill, during the first session of the 39th Congress, providing for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union?

A. I was.

Q. State whether you had any interviews with the President of the United States, after the passage of that bill, in reference to the same?

A. I had.

Q. Were you invited to any such interview?

A. I was, by an anonymous note.

Q. Have you the note, and if so, produce it?

A. Supposing it would be called for I brought it along, and present the original note.

Q. Please read it.

A. It reads as follows: "Mr. Evans will please call at the President's house and see Mr. Edward Cooper—Monday."

Q. Do you know in whose handwriting this note is?

A. I do not.

Q. By whom was it delivered to you?

A. It was left in my box at the hotel post office, National Hotel.

Q. State whether in response to that note you called upon Mr. Edward Cooper.

A. I did.

Q. What position was Mr. Cooper occupying at that time?

A. I understood him to be the private secretary of the President.

Q. Please state what transpired at that interview between you and Mr. Cooper.

A. We had a long interview in regard to the political situation, and in regard to the probability of the President signing the Colorado bill.

Q. State substantially, in detail, what transpired during that interview.

A. It would be difficult at this late period to detail all the conversation that passed between us. The substance of it was that it was Mr. Cooper's impression that, if Mr. Chaffee and I would sustain the President's policy, he would not veto the Colorado bill.

Q. Did he pretend to speak by authority?

A. I think that, although his general conversation would indicate that he did, he in terms disclaimed speaking by authority. He said the matter was in our hands, and that it was for us to say.

Q. Meaning thereby that the approval or disapproval of that bill was in your hands?

A. That is what I understood him to mean.

Q. After that interview with Mr. Cooper, did you have an interview with the President the same day?

A. We did, immediately following, on the same night.

Q. Did Mr. Cooper go in with you?

A. No, sir; he proposed that we should go in and see the President.

Q. State, as much as possible in detail, the conversation that occurred between you and Mr. Cooper and between you and the President.

A. Previous to our interview with the President, we were invited into a private room by Mr. Cooper, who said he desired to talk with us in regard to the Colorado question. After a resume of the present political situation, he said it was of vital importance for us to be friends of the President and his plan of restoration; said there would be no trouble about our bill, if we would give our adherence to the President's policy; that believing as the President did, that the future welfare and harmony of the country depended upon sustaining him as against Congress, it would not be expedient in him (the President) to admit us to fix a ruling power over him in the Senate; that there was no constitutional reason or precedent upon which to veto—it was merely a question of expediency—and added, "It is for you, gentlemen, to decide." He said a great deal else of this import, to all of which we answered and stated that we had no personal hostility to the President, would be glad to see harmony, and hoped a more perfect understanding between the President and Congress would yet harmonize them, and that some plan would yet be agreed upon that would restore the Union of all the States, so that loyalty could be encouraged and protected in the late rebel States; that one of us (Mr. Chaffee) had voted for him (the President) in the Baltimore convention; and that we should sustain him so far as we could, in justice to our views, upon the great national question of reconstruction. He then asked us to go in and see the President, which we did. The President met us very cordially; went over his whole plan in detail since his inauguration; said that our bill placed him in a rather awkward position; that he felt the necessity of carrying out his policy as the only one to restore the Union; that the radicals in Congress, if allowed to succeed, would disrupt and destroy the government. He characterized the leading men as actuated only by a desire to prolong themselves in power, and said he did not deem it expedient or in consonance with the future welfare of the Union to admit two more into the Senate to carry out their schemes; that he felt friendly to the West, and desired to do right, &c., &c.; to all of which we answered that we thought him mistaken about the animus and object of the majority in Congress; that we believed they, as well as himself, were actuated by patriotic motives; that we felt it to be our duty to be free to act as we thought best in our judgment, after taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; that we could have no object in this exigency but to act in a way that would restore the country upon a just basis, so that the rights of all would be guarantied; that we should have sustained the civil rights' bill if we could have voted upon it; that we very much desired the admission of Colorado, and hoped he would approve the measure, &c. I further stated to him that I had been a republican since the organization of that party. After we left him Mr. Cooper held another private interview with us, in which he requested us to put our views in writing for him, not to be used, as near and as favorably as we could, consistently, with the President's policy, to think of it over night, and to see him again at nine o'clock in the morning. During this interview he left us and went in to see the President, and after returning he made this request for us to put our views in writing. We called in the morning, separately and without consultation with each other, and declined, stating that we had said and done all that we could, and would have to submit to what the President saw fit to do in the premises.

Q. Did you have any interviews with the President or with Mr. Cooper other than those you have mentioned in your testimony?

A. Prior to this we did. This last interview with Mr. Cooper occurred in the morning, and the veto was sent in in the afternoon of the same day. We saw the President once before, soon after the Colorado bill was presented to him.

Q. Did anything transpire, at any of your prior interviews, in relation to the course he would take in regard to the Colorado bill?

A. In our first interview with the President there was nothing said that related to the course that we should pursue in Congress. We simply laid before him the evidence of our population, wealth, and resources—evidence of what, as we supposed, was calculated to demonstrate the propriety of his signing the bill. There had been a great deal of disparagement of Colorado in the discussion that had taken place in the Senate.

Q. You say the veto was sent in the afternoon of the day on which you were requested to call and present your views in writing; have you read the veto message?

A. I have.

Q. Did the President in that message state any reason for disapproving the bill which he had assigned to you in your conferences with him and with Mr. Cooper?

A. I do not recollect that the President discussed with us the grounds which were assigned in his veto message.

Q. Did he state anything in conflict with the statement of Mr. Cooper that there was no constitutional objection and no precedents on which to found a veto, but that it was a mere matter of expediency, and that it was a matter in your hands to determine?

A. He did not. He did not, however, make any constitutional objection in his message.

Q. Did either he or Mr. Cooper intimate that a veto message had been prepared?

A. Not to my recollection.

Q. State the date of your first interview with Mr. Cooper which occurred in pursuance of the note you have testified to.

A. That interview was the evening before the veto was sent in. I think it was on the 17th of May last.

JNO. EVANS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1867.

JEROME B. CHAFFEE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. I reside at Central City, Colorado.

Q. Were you elected to any public position by the legislature of the proposed State of Colorado? If so, state what position.

A. Yes, sir. I was elected as one of the Senators of the United States from that State.

Q. Have you heard the statement of Mr. Evans concerning the interviews held by him and yourself with Mr. Cooper, and with the President?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether you concur in the statements made by him.

A. Yes, sir; I concur in them fully.

Q. Is there anything you can add thereto?

A. I do not know that there is anything particularly, except to say that our interviews lasted about four hours with the President and with Mr. Cooper. I may also state that I received a note inviting me to call, the same as Mr. Evans did.

Q. Can you furnish that note?

A. I will do so, if I can find it. I think it is in my trunk, in New York.

Q. Was there an intimation in these conversations with the President or with Mr. Cooper that a veto message had been prepared?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he state any reasons to you during the conversations with him which were stated in the message that was sent to the Senate?

A. In that interview he did not discuss any reasons for vetoing the bill, except such as stated by Mr. Evans.

Q. Did he intimate to you that he had or had not made up his mind upon the question of vetoing the bill?

A. From his conversation, my judgment would be that he had not made up his mind, but that it depended upon the result of that interview. I may state that Mr. Cooper said he knew there would be no trouble about the bill, provided certain statements in writing were made by us.

Q. What were they?

A. The proposition was that the rebel States were States in the Union, and as such were entitled to representation. And upon that proposition we had our discussion. He wanted the proposition in writing. He showed me some letters from prominent politicians, one of which I read, from a man in Albany by the name of Delavan. The substance of it was, not to trust the Senators from Colorado; that they would agree to support his policy, and when they got into the Senate they would "throw" him. I judged that was the reason why he wanted to have our opinion in writing; thinking we were a little shaky, he wanted to have us on record.

Q. To whom was the letter addressed?

A. To the President.

Q. You say there were other letters; did you see them.

A. There were two or three other letters. I did not read them. I felt some indignation at what they contained.

Q. Did you see to whom they were addressed?

A. I could not say. I am pretty sure they were addressed to the President.

Q. Did Mr. Cooper state the contents of any other letter?

A. I understood from his conversation that they were urging the President to veto the bill.

Q. Have you any doubt, from what transpired between you and Mr. Cooper and the President, that if you had agreed to their proposition the President would have signed the Colorado bill?

A. I have not a doubt in the world. I judge so from the conversation of the President—from his remark to us that it put him in an awkward position—that he had always been the friend of the West—that he hated to veto the bill—but he deemed the restoration of these States of paramount importance to everything else—and that he did not deem it expedient to admit two more Senators to override him.

Q. He did not, then, turn his objection to the Colorado bill upon any other ground than simply that? He did not give any of the reasons contained in his veto message?

A. He made no reference to any of those grounds, to my recollection.

Q. State whether Mr. Cooper, on the occasion of your interview with him on the day you had your interview with the President, left you; and if so, how long he was absent, and what he said on his return.

A. After his first conversation with us that evening, he left us, and came back in a few minutes and invited us to go in and see the President. We went in and saw the President and talked with him perhaps an hour and a half. We then came back and had another interview with Mr. Cooper. He then wanted us to think the matter over, and let him know in the morning early, and reduce our conclusions to writing. I went back in the morning, and told him I could not say or do anything more than I had done. I said to him, as I had said to the President, that I would like to have the State admitted, but that I could never consent to take a seat in the Senate unless I went there free to do as I saw it my duty to do. I therefore declined to do anything more than I had already done.

Q. The decision of the case, you understood, was held in reserve until your answer that morning had been given?

A. Yes, sir; the morning of the day on which the veto message was communicated to the Senate.

Q. State any other conversation you may have had with the President upon the subject of the Colorado bill.

A. When we first came here with our bills and papers relating to Colorado, we called on the President and laid before him the papers we had brought, and which are embodied in Executive Document No. 10. We asked him to look them over, transmit them to the Senate, and recommend the passage of a bill for the admission of the State. He stated to us that we had better have our men ready to take charge of the bill when it came in. I told him we had already spoken to some men on the subject. He expressed himself as having no doubt as to the admission of our State, and in favor of her admission at that interview.

Q. If you have heard the President say anything relative to his opinion as to the propriety of admitting Colorado, other than you have already stated, please state what you have heard him say.

A. I went up to the President's with a friend of mine, General Ed. McCook. This was before the case was decided in Congress. He said he would have recommended her admission. He then smiled, and said that if he had recommended her admission, the radicals would have pitched in against the bill, or something to that effect, and he thought he had better not say anything about it. That was before there had been any discussion on the bill. I judged from that he was favorable to the admission of the State.

J. B. CHAFFEE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1867.

Hon. EDWARD COOPER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Please state your residence and position.

A. My residence is Shelbyville, Tennessee. I am a member of Congress, from the fourth district of that State.

Q. Were you private secretary to President Johnson?

A. I was acting private secretary to President Johnson from early in April until the 29th day of July, 1866.

Q. Look at that note (given in testimony of witness Evans) and state whether you recognize the handwriting.

A. I do not.

Q. Do you recognize the note?

A. I never saw it before that I can remember.

Q. Did you ever send a note to Mr. Evans, who was one of the senators elect under the proposed State government of Colorado, requesting an interview?

A. I never did that I have any recollection of.

Q. Did you have an interview with him during the time the Colorado bill was before the President, on the evening before the veto message was sent in?

A. Yes, sir. I had an interview with Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee together—no interview with Mr. Evans separately.

Q. State at whose instance that interview was held.

A. At my own.

Q. How was it brought about?

A. I do not recollect whether by invitation in person or through others. I think it was in person to Mr. Chaffee.

Q. Was your request for an interview made only to Mr. Chaffee?

A. That was all, and at my desk at the President's, at a time when Mr. Chaffee had called there.

Q. Where was that interview held?

A. It was held in the room now occupied in the White House as a reception room.

Q. State the reason which induced you to request an interview of that sort.

A. I was extremely anxious that Colorado should be admitted as a State. That was my position. I was urging upon the President of the United States its admission, and for that purpose I desired to learn what were the views of Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee in regard to the political questions then agitating the country.

Q. Please state what occurred at that interview.

A. I cannot pretend to detail the conversation. The substance of it was to ascertain, if I could, from them what position they assumed in regard to the questions then dividing Congress and the President as to declaring the States lately in insurrection and rebellion territories. I received from Mr. Chaffee a written statement of his views, and a verbal statement from Mr. Evans.

Q. Can you produce the written statement made by Mr. Chaffee?

A. It is on file in the Executive mansion, and if it has not been destroyed, can be produced.

Q. Please state your recollection of the conversation that occurred on that occasion.

A. The substance of the conversation that I recollect was, that I inquired of them what their views were in regard to the restoration of the States lately in insurrection—whether they held with the majority in Congress, that they were dead States, incapable of representation, or whether they believed loyal representatives elected from the States should be received by Congress to their seats. I understood both of these gentlemen to say that while they were republicans they were unhesitatingly in favor of the admission of loyal representatives elected from any of the States lately in rebellion who could take the test oath. When I ascertained that to be their view, I urged it as an argument to the Executive why the Colorado bill should be sent back approved.

Q. At whose instance did you have this interview?

A. At my own.

Q. Had the President any knowledge whatever of your intention to bring about this interview?

A. Not the slightest.

Q. It was, then, solely on your own responsibility?

A. It was.

Q. Did you inform the President of it?

A. Yes, sir. I took the gentlemen into the President's room myself.

Q. That conversation commenced before you took them in to see the President, and was on the same evening of their interview with the President?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you go in to see the President before they were introduced?

A. It is very probable I did, though I do not remember it. If I did, it was only to see if he was disengaged, and was willing to give them a hearing.

Q. Were you present at the interview between them and the President?

A. I was not. As soon as they were admitted I retired.

Q. Did you see them after the interview between them and the President?

A. I think not. If I did, it was only casually.

Q. State whether, at the interview of Mr. Evans, Mr. Chaffee, and the President, you requested them to put their views in writing?

A. I requested them to do so. I cannot state whether before or after their interview with the President. I was not present at the interview with the President.

Q. Do you remember anything said about their views being committed to writing, and calling on the President again the next morning?

A. My recollection is, that they were to submit to me their views in writing, (whether that request was before or after they saw the President, I cannot say,) and that they were to return the next morning to me with their views.

Q. Did they call the next morning?

A. I think I saw one of them. As I went from the Executive mansion, I think I saw Mr. Evans.

Q. Did you have any conversation upon that subject?

A. None that I remember. If I did, it was a very brief one.

Q. Do you know whether they had an interview on that morning with the President?

A. No, sir; I cannot say.

Q. You were so well satisfied with their position in regard to their views of admitting representatives from the recent rebellious States, as to use your influence with the President to secure his approval of the bill?

A. No; that does not do me justice. I was in favor of the admission of Colorado, as an independent proposition. I used my influence with the Executive to induce him to sign the bill as it originally came from Congress, before I had an interview with either of the Senators. I favored that proposition independent of their views. In the course of a conversation, while I was arguing with Mr. Chaffee, or stating to him that these were my views, of his own accord he proceeded to state his position in regard to the measures then before Congress. Believing that if those were his views and those of Mr. Evans, it might be an additional argument which I could present to the President to induce him to sign the bill in accordance with my wishes, I sought the interview with them; and after my interview with them, I procured an interview with the President for them, at which I was not present. I requested their views in writing. Mr. Chaffee reduced his to writing, and they were on file in the secretary's office when I left the desk.

Q. When did you receive this statement from Mr. Chaffee in writing?

A. My recollection does not serve me as to that.

Q. You do not remember whether it was that day or the next day?

A. I do not. I think it was the day before the interview.

Q. Was this interview on the day the veto message was sent to the Senate?

A. The evening before, I think.

Q. And they were to call in pursuance of the request you made the morning of the day the veto was sent in?

A. Yes, sir; I think so. I, however, only depend on my memory.

Q. Did you suggest to Mr. Evans or Mr. Chaffee, or to either of them, that the approval of the Colorado bill by the President might depend upon their position relative to the questions you discussed with them?

A. No, sir; I only desired to know them for the purpose of using them as an argument. The President had at no time predicated his action upon the political position that the Senators would assume or that they held. His objections were of an entirely different character.

Q. Do you know at what time the message was written?

A. It was not completed until the day it was sent in.

Q. Do you know whether it had been commenced the day before?

A. I do not. I am satisfied the views and positions assumed in the message had been determined upon by the President days before.

Q. Do you remember anything being said during the interview between Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee and yourself, about it being in their power to determine what would be the fate of the bill?

A. I have no idea I told them that. I had no authority to say it was. If I did say it, it was upon my own responsibility. They certainly misunderstood me if they so stated, for I had no authority in the world to do so in the slightest. One of my reasons for favoring the Colorado bill was, that in its constitution it used the word "white" in regard to electors. It was changing its condition from a territorial state by the decree of its citizens, as I thought, and I believed that Governor Cummings was doing them injustice.

Q. Do you remember anything being said in that conversation to the effect that the future welfare of the country depended upon sustaining the President as against Congress; that it would not be expedient in him to admit Colorado, and thus fix a ruling power over him in the Senate?

A. I may have said that the happiness and welfare of the country, in my opinion, depended upon sustaining the policy of the President. Those were my views. I have no idea that I said to them that it depended upon maintaining a majority in the Senate of the United States, or otherwise.

Q. Did you, in any manner, represent to them that their approval of the President's policy, and their agreement to support it in the Senate, would tend to produce a favorable action on the part of the President relative to the Colorado bill?

A. I have no idea I did. I said to them, I have no doubt that agreeing with the President in regard to his plan for the restoring of the States would afford me a strong argument in their favor. I have no doubt I said that, because I believed it would.

Q. Do you remember anything like this being said: that there was no constitutional reason for vetoing the bill; that it was merely a question of expediency?

A. I do not. I may have made use of the remark that there was no question of constitutional law involved in it, in my opinion. There were many persons who were at the office urging me to intercede with the President in favor of the bill, and there were many others who called upon me urging me to use whatever influence I might have, in inducing him to veto it. I cannot pretend to say who they were.

Q. After Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee had left the President, did you have an interview with the President that evening?

A. I did not, on that subject. I do not think I did at all; certainly not on that subject.

Q. Do you remember going in to see the President and returning again to Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee, and then requesting them to put their views in writing?

A. I do not remember that it occurred in that way. It may have done so. My impression is that the request to reduce their views to writing was made previous to their interview with the President, though in the midst of so much office business it is impossible for me to recollect now at this time when it occurred.

Q. Do you remember showing any letters to either Mr. Evans or Mr. Chaffee during that interview?

A. I do not.

Q. Have you any recollection of a letter written by a person by the name of Delavan, from Albany, relating to the admission of Colorado?

A. Yes; and I may have shown it to Mr. Chaffee in one of my interviews. The letter was written by a man whose name commenced with "D"—a gentleman purporting to have large mining interests. The letter was adverse to the admission of Colorado.

Q. Do you remember what that letter contained?

A. It simply contained an argument against it on the ground that the territory did not contain population sufficient to justify its admission.

Q. Did it intimate anything as to what the Senators elect might do if they were admitted?

A. Not at all.

Q. There was no expression of opinion as to what might or would be the course of Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee in case they were admitted?

A. Not the slightest.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. The idea you drew in regard to Mr. Chaffee was, that he was a decided supporter of the President's policy?

A. That is what I had heard. It came through some editorial in a Nebraska paper that was sent to the desk, I think.

Q. Did you express your own opinion to either Mr. Chaffee or Mr. Evans, as to the probability of the President's signing the bill in case their statements were satisfactory?

A. No, sir. I had no authority to do so—not the slightest. I only stated that I desired to use it as an argument, and would be glad to have an opportunity of doing so to sustain my own views. My support of the Colorado bill was entirely independent of Mr. Chaffee or Mr. Evans' views in regard to any question.

Q. Did you show them any letters at the time?

A. None that I recollect. It is more than probable that I showed Mr. Chaffee everything that was at the desk, legitimate for public observation, against their admission, so as to enable him, if possible, to counteract it.

Q. To whom was that letter addressed?

A. Simply to myself, as secretary.

Q. Do you remember whether that letter was written by Mr. Delavan?

A. It may have been. I do not remember certainly.

Q. Where is that letter?

A. It is on file if it has not been destroyed.

Q. Please obtain that, and the letter from Mr. Chaffee to which you have referred, and bring them before the committee.

A. I will do so, if possible.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 27, 1867.

Hon. EDWARD COOPER, M. C., having been recalled, made the following statement:

I have examined the files of the private secretary of the President's mansion. I find no letter received from Mr. Delavan. There was such a letter addressed to me, but I do not find it there. I find among the files the following original letters:

KIRKWOOD HOUSE, Washington, D. C., May 10, 1866.

DEAR SIR: In the brief time allowed to visitors at your office, I was unable this morning to give you such a statement of facts in reference to Colorado as I desired; and knowing that you could not give your valuable time to long conversations, I have presumed upon your good feeling (as expressed) towards Colorado, to enclose you a written statement as regards the population, mineral wealth, agricultural resources, and political status of this young territory, now asking to be admitted into the Union. I ask of you, out of consideration to the people of that territory, to submit these facts to the President of the United States, with the request to examine the same.

I am, with great respect, very respectfully,

GEO. T. CLARK.

Hon. EDWARD COOPER, Private Secretary of the President, Executive Mansion.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1866.

DEAR SIR: We have seen and heard reports to the effect that "the Colorado senators have sold out to the radicals for the sake of getting the bill passed through Congress for the admission of Colorado into the Union." We desire to say to you and all others, that this statement is entirely untrue; that we have not agreed or pledged ourselves to support any man or measures; that we are wholly free to vote and act as our judgment directs, and shall do so to the best of our knowledge and ability, and in accordance with the Constitution which we swear to support. We would not consider ourselves worthy of a seat in the United States Senate under any such imputation, if true.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

J. B. CHAFFEE,
JNO. EVANS.

Hon. EDWARD COOPER.

Accompanying this letter of George T. Clark, were several statements or exhibits relating to the condition of the territory, among which was the following:

"POLITICS.—Some of the people of Colorado formed a territorial government in 1861. There has been but one simple question with them, and that was, for the Union, or against it. This was the only issue. No parties were or have been formed. The calling of the constitutional convention was under the name of 'those supporting the Union and administration,' &c. The convention was composed of men of all parties. It was not a question of politics, but that of framing such a constitution as would be acceptable to the people, and in conformity with the laws and Constitution of the United States. The senators and representatives were elected upon the Union administration ticket without a pledge to any party, and were sent to Washington to urge our admission into the Union, and advocating such measures as would be beneficial to Colorado."

These are the only communications I can find on file. My recollection is distinct that I had a letter from Mr. Chaffee, which was filed, stating his position upon the questions at issue, but it is not there, or at least I have not found it to-day. Mr. Evans's letter was never handed to me. My recollection is that, on the morning after the interview referred to in my last examination, I passed him coming into the building as I was going out, and stated to him that it was unnecessary for me to act any further; that the President had decided to veto the measure, or that a veto message would go up.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Evans wrote such a letter?

A. I do not know whether he did or not. My impression is, that he said he had one prepared. I desire to state further that the writer, George T. Clark, of the letter and exhibit referred to, was introduced to me at my desk by Mr. Chaffee.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 7, 1867.

Hon. JOSEPH HOLT sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State whether you have in your possession the diary alleged to have been taken from the person of J. Wilkes Booth, after the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, and after the death of Booth?

A. I have, and now offer it for the consideration of the committee, as it was given to me.

Q. Is it now in the same condition it was when you received it?

A. It is. It has been in my possession since I received it.

Q. From whom did you receive it?

A. The precise person from whom I received it, I cannot now state. It was some one connected with the pursuit of Booth and his capture, or it may have been given to me from the War Department. It was reported and represented to me to have been taken from his person when he was killed. The diary itself indicates very clearly its character.

Q. Was an abstract of letters, said to have been written by Davis and other confederates to his or their agents in Canada, ever furnished to you?

A. Yes, sir. General Baker, who, I think, went to Canada with a view of recovering these papers, or seeing the agents said to have them, gave me a paper in which there were certain extracts. I think I showed it to the Secretary of War. One of the letters was represented to contain a sentence in Latin.

Q. Do you know where that is at this time?

A. I do not. I have been unable to find it. I do not mean to say the Latin was in the extract; but there was a passage which was ended, as General Baker showed me, by a sentence in Latin, which, I think, he stated he was unable to copy.

Q. Is that extract in the Bureau of Military Justice?

A. I have searched for the paper, but have not found it. Whether it passed into the hands of others in the course of the consultation upon the subject I do not know. I was anxious to have followed the subject further, but was unable to do so. The passage, as I remember, was in a letter to Thompson, and the substance—I cannot give the precise language—was, "Your explanation for not proceeding in the matter which, more than all others, concerned the confederacy, is not satisfactory." Then followed, as I understood, the Latin, which I was anxious to get hold of and which, as I supposed, might give me a clue to what was meant.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you remember the substance of the quotation?

A. No, sir; it was not there. I think General Baker said he had not been able to copy it, not understanding the language. I know there was nothing there which I could translate. I thought if I could get the original it would furnish a key to the whole matter.

Q. I understand that you searched for that paper and was not able to find it?

A. No, sir; I did not find it. I will look for it again. My attention was the more drawn to it because of the state of Thompson's mind as shown by the testimony on the trial of the assassins, which was that, while approving the assassination, he was unwilling to proceed with it without more specific instructions and authority from Richmond, for which he is represented to have been waiting a short time before the date of this letter. I supposed it probable that in that frame of mind he had offered this explanation of his delay, which Davis said was not satisfactory. He said the explanation was not satisfactory, whatever it was.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. Can you state the reason why the effort to get these letters was not followed up?

A. I had not the authority myself, and I think the Secretary of War, with whom I conferred upon the subject, had not sufficient faith in the value, or importance, or genuineness of the papers to make the large appropriation of funds necessary to obtain them. It was, I believe, in consequence of this distrust on his part that he did not then authorize me to meet the terms on which alone it was alleged the letters could be obtained; and I could not proceed without his approval or direction. Some time afterwards he placed funds at my disposal, and authorized me to make an effort to get possession of the letters.

Q. You think it possible that extract may be found in your office?

A. It is hardly possible. I will make another search for it. I have no knowledge of these papers except these meagre extracts. General Baker, who made the extracts, can of course speak of the entire papers, as they were in his possession.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1867.

Hon. JOSEPH HOLT having been recalled, made the following statement:

I desire to say to the Committee that since giving my deposition on the 7th instant, I have caused a very careful search to be made in the Bureau of Military Justice for the paper of which I spoke, and which purported to contain extracts from letters of Davis. It has not, however, been found, nor do I now entertain any expectation of being able to recover possession of it.

It is proper to add that during the last summer the Secretary of War placed the fund deemed necessary at my disposal, and authorized me to make an effort to obtain these letters from Davis, referred to by me in my former testimony. I accordingly sent an agent to Canada for this purpose. He was deemed specially well qualified for the undertaking, because of his intelligence and acquaintance with the parties and their associates who were believed to have the letters either in their possession or under their control. I have no reason to doubt but that the agent was faithful and thorough in the investigation which he made. He was, however, wholly unsuccessful, and returned, I think, with a decided impression that no such genuine letters existed.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday, February 6, 1867.

LAFAYETTE C. BAKER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How long after John W. Booth was shot by Corbett, was it before you saw his body?

A. He was shot in the morning about daylight, and I saw the body about half past eleven o'clock that night.

Q. Had anything been taken from his person that you know of before you saw his body?

A. Everything.

Q. By whom?

A. By Colonel Conger and Lieutenant Baker. I have a memorandum of everything he had on his person—the original memorandum made right at the time.

Q. Have you it with you?

A. I have got it among my papers in Washington, and will produce it to the committee.

Q. State whether you have ever seen any letters tending to show the complicity of Jefferson Davis with the plot to assassinate President Lincoln.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State when and where you saw them, and the contents of the letters, as near as you can.

A. By the direction of Mr. Stanton I went to Canada three or four times for the purpose of getting some letters which were supposed to be in the possession of rebels there, referring to the assassination of the President. I went there and had several interviews with parties. Finally I made an arrangement for nine letters which I had selected. I came back to Washington and stated to the Secretary of War, as nearly as I could recollect, the contents of those letters. He wanted me to bring those letters to Washington. I told him it was impossible for me to get the letters in Canada without paying for them. He did not know that he was at liberty to authorize the disbursement of any money for that purpose. I then tried to get the letters on the ground that they should be brought to Washington and examined, and if found to be genuine they were to be paid for.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Go on and state what the letters contained.

A. I will get at that in one moment. I went back the third or fourth time to get the letters, and found I could not get them. I then asked the privilege of making copies of them. I went back and was to have had copies of those letters. I began copying one letter when parties came into the room and declined letting me go on unless the letters were paid for. I did, however, make a brief of eight letters, and brought that brief to Washington. On a Sunday morning I went to Mr. Stanton, at the War Department, between nine and ten o'clock. He looked at the brief and said it was very important. He sent for Judge Holt. I remained there until Judge Holt came, and submitted the paper to the judge. The judge asked me to make a copy of it and bring it over to his office that day. I had it copied and carried it to Judge Holt. I went with Judge Holt to the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War told me to come to the office prepared to go to Canada that night on the six o'clock train. I went to the War Department as directed. I told Mr. Stanton I was ready to go, and he said, "You need not go." He had told me in the morning that he would see the President, and I presumed when I came back that he had seen the President, because he told me very promptly when I came inside the door that it was not necessary for me to go. There was a Latin quotation in one of those letters which I did not understand, but which Judge Holt seemed to understand. I copied the letters as correctly as I could. That letter was written on the 8th of March, 1865.

Q. By whom?

A. It was written by Jefferson Davis to Jacob Thompson. There was another letter written by Jefferson Davis to the Bishop at Halifax.

Q. That is the place where Mr. Davis's children are now.

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Do you know the handwriting of Jefferson Davis?

A. The Secretary of War pronounced it a genuine letter.

Q. Did you know it yourself to be genuine?

A. The Secretary examined the letters which I got in the South, and said he was satisfied that the signatures were genuine; so said Judge Holt. They never saw the originals of the Canada letters, but I was satisfied that they were genuine letters. I think the Attorney General, Mr. Speed, went to Canada, and had all those letters in his possession at one time, and was on the point of coming away with them, when something occurred. He went to Canada, and had a conference with those parties, while I was there. I was somewhat familiar with Davis's signature, because I was in Richmond a prisoner, in 1861, and had three interviews with him in his room. I received a pass from him in his own handwriting, which I have got yet. I got letters while I was in the South, which I ascertained to be in Davis's handwriting; and by comparing the handwriting with the Canada letters, I knew them to be written by the same person.

Q. State the contents of these letters, to the best of your recollection.

A. The letter written by Davis to the Bishop at Halifax was thanking the bishop very kindly for his attention to his children, who were at school there, and giving a very doleful, discouraging account of the prospects of the confederacy. In the letter of the 8th of March, from Davis to Thompson, he uses this language: "The consummation of the act that would have done more to have ended this terrible strife, being delayed, has probably ruined our cause." The last clause I am not very clear about, but I think that is the language. That is written distinctly in Davis's letter to Thompson of the 8th of March, 1865. I took pains particularly to get that part of the letter correct.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. What was the purport of the other letters?

A. I cannot recollect the contents of them. They were all of that character.

Q. And all from Davis?

A. No, sir. There were two or three of them from Lawson Clay, in the adjutant general's office, in Richmond, to C. C. Clay. There were two or three letters written by Thompson to Davis, and there was a copy of one letter written by Thompson to Dr. Blackburn.

Q. Did the Secretary of War tell you that the President did not want those letters?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was that the impression you got from the manner in which your contemplated visit to Canada was cut short?

A. I got the impression from the fact that the Secretary of War told me in the morning that I was to go to Canada that night in the 6 o'clock train to get those letters, and that he would see the President, and from the fact that when I went back in pursuance of orders, in the afternoon, he told me very promptly he did not want me to go to Canada, or to bother myself any more about it.

Q. What was the price agreed upon to be paid for those letters?

A. I think they wanted $20,000. I have been trying to find the brief which I furnished to Judge Holt, but I cannot find it. I copied one or two of the letters in pencil. When I submitted the brief to Judge Holt, he wanted it copied off with pen and ink. I carried it back to my office, and my clerk copied it. Then I carried the copy to Judge Holt, and that is the copy which I inquired for several times. I asked Judge Holt for it several times, and he said he supposed it was at the War Department. The brief covers eight or ten pages.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, February 7, 1867.

LAFAYETTE C. BAKER, recalled and examination continued.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you prepared to-day to furnish to the committee a list of the articles found on the person of J. Wilkes Booth, after he was shot by Corbett?

A. I find that I have not got that paper with me. I have it, but not with me.

Q. Can you furnish that paper?

A. Yes.

Q. When did you first see the diary of Booth?

A. I saw it the afternoon of the day that Booth was shot.

Q. Did you examine it particularly?

A. I read portions of it. I cannot say that I did examine it particularly, because I received it and started immediately to deliver the articles to the Secretary of War.

Q. Did you deliver that to the Secretary of War?

A. Yes, and he read a good deal of it in my presence—extracts from it.

Q. Did any person take a copy of the entries in that diary?

A. I cannot swear positively that any person did. I think Judge Holt or Judge Bingham has got a full copy of the diary.

Q. Did Mr. Bingham see it before it was delivered to the Secretary of War?

A. No, sir; he saw it afterwards. It was written in pencil.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 7, 1867.

LAFAYETTE C. BAKER recalled and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Examine this article. State whether you have ever seen it before; and if so, under what circumstances?

A. I recognize this as a book taken from the body of J. Wilkes Booth, but I do not think it is all here. There seems to have been some leaves torn out here in a number of places. There was a note written on one of these sheets. The one I have reference to was written to Dr. Stewart. I recognize the loose sheet here also. I had reference to a note written to Dr. Stewart, asking him to send a horse and wagon over to the Garret farm.

Q. State whether there were any other entries in that book then than those which appear there now.

A. I think there was a great deal more of the original diary than appears here now.

Q. Examine that part of the diary where leaves seem to have been torn out, and say whether you see any evidences on the remaining margins of the leaves which have disappeared, of their having been written on, and state what your recollection is as to there being other entries in the book at the time you first saw it.

A. All the pages torn out seem to have been written on with one exception. I do not find any marks on one or two of them.

Q. How many seem to have been torn out?

A. There seem to have been sixteen or eighteen leaves cut out. My recollection in reference to this book is quite indistinct, for the reason that I only had it in my possession a very short time.

Q. What is your recollection as to other entries in this book than those which now appear?

A. I cannot testify as to that. I can only say that, in my opinion, there have been leaves torn out of that book since I saw it.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. As far as you know, in whose hands was that diary placed by you?

A. I handed the diary to the Secretary of War.

Q. From whom did you receive it?

A. From Colonel Conger. There were some other papers in the book which I do not see now.

Q. What was the nature of them?

A. Nothing except memorandums of the names of persons in lower Maryland, written on cards and slips of paper. I do not see any of them here now. There is a map here, and some poetry. They were small pieces of paper, which might drop out of the book and not be noticed.

Q. Did you read all that was written in the diary?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you read any of it?

A. I looked through it—yes, sir. One reason why I think these leaves have been torn out since I had the book in my possession is this: When Colonel Conger handed me the book, I asked him if he took it from Booth, himself. He said he did. There was a sheet that should be in the book, with a drawing of a house on it; just a pencil sketch of a house. I know we talked about it afterwards, to see if we could determine where that house was; whether it was where Mrs. Surratt lived, or some other house he was in the habit of frequenting.

Q. You stated there were some sixteen or eighteen pages missing. You mean by that at one place?

A. At one place; yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 22, 1867.

Major General AMOS BECKWITH sworn and examined.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. What office do you hold in the army of the United States?

A. I have the rank of major general by brevet.

Q. Where were you stationed on the 30th of July last?

A. In the city of New Orleans.

Q. What duties were you discharging there at that time?

A. The duties of chief commissary for the south-western States.

Q. How far was your office from that of General Baird, who was in command of the troops there?

A. The two offices were adjoining, in different buildings.

Q. Were you in the office of General Baird on that day, and if so, about what time?

A. I went into the office of General Baird on that day sometime about 12 o'clock.

Q. State whether any communication was brought to General Baird from Lieutenant Governor Albert Voorhees, after you went into the office; and give, as near as you can, the time when such communication was brought.

A. Some time after I went into the office a communication was brought from Albert Voorhees, lieutenant governor, by a messenger, and handed to General Baird.

Q. What was the substance of that communication?

A. The substance of the communication was, informing General Baird that parties of negroes were collecting in the lower portions of the city, or something of that kind, and that there were symptoms of an outbreak or riot.

Q. Give your best judgment as to the time of day when that communication was brought to General Baird.

A. Some time between 12 and 1 o'clock; I cannot fix the precise minute.

Q. State what was done by General Baird to bring troops from the barracks to the city.

A. General Baird, at some time previous to the moment that I went to his office, had made an arrangement with the quartermaster to have a steamboat in readiness at the landing to send for troops, in case he should deem it necessary. A short time after I went into the office, he despatched a messenger to take the boat and proceed to the barracks for the troops. That messenger returning, he sent him back a second time, to increase the speed of the troops, if possible. A short time after, he mounted his horse and went out to meet the troops himself. I went with him.

Q. What was said by General Baird concerning his understanding as to the time at which the convention was to meet?

A. Soon after I went into the office he informed me that he had been mistaken as to the hour at which the convention was to meet; that he had supposed that it was to meet late in the day; whereas he had just been informed that it had assembled already, at 12 o'clock; had taken a recess, and was to meet again at 1 o'clock.

Q. Can there be any doubt that it was after 12 o'clock when you went to the office of General Baird, and when the message you speak of was received?

A. I am positive it was after 12 o'clock when I went to the office of General Baird at the time I have mentioned. I always left my office about 12 o'clock, to go down and get lunch—never before. General Baird took lunch with me that day, and that was not until after 12 o'clock.

Q. You say you are positive it was after 12 o'clock when the letter or message was received: may it not have been as late as 1 o'clock, according to your recollection?

A. It may have been; I would not be so positive about that.

A. BECKWITH,
Brevet Major General U. S. Army.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Friday, February 8, 1867.

LEWIS E. PARSONS, Senator elect from Alabama, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Were you provisional Governor of Alabama; if so, when were you appointed and how long did you hold the office?

A. I was appointed provisional Governor of Alabama on the 19th of June, I think, and was removed from that office on the 20th of December following.

Q. Did you take an oath of office when you entered upon the duties of provisional Governor; if so, did it contain what is usually known as the test oath?

A. There was an oath attached to the commission which was given to me at the State Department, and I was expected to cause the oath to be administered to myself, which I did, with one qualification. There are several clauses in the oath, in all of which the statement is to the effect that the party has not voluntarily done thus and so. I could not state as a fact that I had not done some things which would amount to aiding rebellion; but I could state conscientiously that I never did it from any choice because I desired the destruction of the government of the United States.

Q. Did you receive from the government of the United States any compensation for your services as provisional Governor?

A. I was informed in the commission that my compensation would be at the rate of $3,000 a year, which I could draw for at times specified; but I made no draft at all. When I was relieved from the position of provisional Governor, I came here and was directed to make out an account for services rendered to the government of the United States, which I did, and that account was paid—$1,500, being for six months' service; that is, I was paid $1,500, less the tax.

Q. Was that payment made by the Treasury Department?

A. I am unable to say. The account was rendered to the Secretary of War, and by him directed to be paid. Some gentleman in the office took charge of the matter after the account was allowed, and the money was paid to me on the next day, I think, on my calling at the War Department.

Q. Have you had any conversation with President Johnson in reference to the pending constitutional amendment?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In those conversations, has President Johnson expressed to you any opinion as to whether or not it should be ratified by the States?

A. The first conversation I had with him on the subject—I cannot state the time, but of course it was since the amendment was proposed—he asked me what I thought the people of Alabama would do in relation to it. I replied that I did not think they would accept it, and I went on to give him my reasons in brief.

Q. Did he express any opinion himself as to what he desired?

A. He did not; he made no expression whatever.

Q. At any time since then, has he expressed to you any opinion as to his desire in the matter?

A. Never in terms. I have understood, as every one has, that he was opposed to it, and I have always spoken to him myself as if that was the fact; but he has never said to me, "I am opposed to it," or given me any reason why it ought not to be ratified. On the contrary, the reasons, such as they were, had been often urged by me on him why the amendment should be strenuously opposed by all who desired to continue the distinct line between the federal and State authorities as it was marked out by our fathers.

Q. Did you understand President Johnson to dissent from those views, or assent to them?

A. President Johnson never signifies, so far as I am aware, whether he approves or disapproves of what you say. So far as my experience goes, he listens to what you have to say, and withholds whatever may be his own views.

Q. Has he ever, at any time, to you or in your presence, given any counsel or advice as to what should be done by yourself or anybody else on the subject of ratifying or rejecting the constitutional amendment?

A. I cannot recollect that he has.

Q. Do you know of anything done by President Johnson in reference to its ratification or rejection?

A. I cannot say that I do; I do not recollect anything that he has ever done on the subject.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State whether you have from other sources than the President himself received any information of any steps or measures taken or adopted by the President to affect the action of the State on the proposed constitutional amendment?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you been engaged, either for yourself or in behalf of others, in prosecuting claims against the government on account of property confiscated or abandoned, or property seized by the government in the southern country during the war or subsequently?

A. I have not been engaged in prosecuting claims, either for myself or others, in reference to property confiscated or abandoned that I recollect. I have been engaged in obtaining the release of property seized by the government of the United States, or rather by its agents, without due authority, as my clients contended; and I have obtained in one instance proceeds of cotton thus seized unlawfully by the government agents, which was sent to New York and sold, and the proceeds held in the hands of the agent until the claim put in by my client, who is a citizen of my State, could be heard before the Treasury Department.

Q. Speaking first of those cases where you obtained the release of the property, state the names of the clients and the character of the claims for the property seized.

A. It was cotton in each instance, I believe. The cotton was released in two instances. Some fifty bales were released in behalf of Mr. McCurdy, of Chambers county, Alabama. The cotton was seized by the subordinate agent in Alabama, and, on presentation of the facts in the case to the Treasury Department, the Secretary became satisfied that the seizure was improperly made, and directed the agent to release the property.

Q. Were there any other cases of that sort?

A. In the case of the estate of N. H. Harrison, of Pickens county, Alabama, represented by one of his administrators, Lewis M. Stone, of Pickens county, there were some 500 or 600 bales involved. The order in that case for the release was made first by the Secretary of the Tresury, and subsequently another application had to be made to the Attorney General to the same effect on evidence, which is there on file.

Q. Did you apply to the President in either of those cases?

A. No, sir; I never spoke to him on the subject of cotton in any case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. With whom did you have any interview respecting those claims?

A. With the Secretary of the Treasury and the assistant Secretary, Mr. Chandler. The application was made to them, and, the case being heard first by them, they referred it for a report to some of the officers.

Q. Do you recollect to whom it was referred?

A. My recollection is that in one instance a reference was made to the Solicitor of the Treasury, Mr. Jordan. In the other instance it was referred to Mr. Charles Eames, an attorney in this city. They were especially referred to him by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and also to Mr. Kaufmann, one of the assistants in the Treasury Department, who was in charge, as I understand, more particularly of that bureau in the department. These, I think, are the only names of officers that now occur to me to whom reference was made.

Q. Can you now refer to the statute, if there be any, under which this property was released?

A. The argument which I made to the Secretary, and to the assistant Secretary, and to Mr. Eames, and to Mr. Jordan, was based upon the ground that the Treasury of the United States was charged with the duty of seizing cotton which was liable to be seized under the laws of the United States, and that if the Secretary became satisfied that his subordinate agents had either corruptly or innocently made a mistake it was his duty, as a just and faithful public officer, to correct that mistake at the earliest possible moment.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Give the circumstances attending each case of seizure, and the alleged ground on which the seizure was made by the government.

A. I cannot do so with the degree of clearness which, perhaps, justice requires. I can only give my general recollection. The facts, however, are all on file in writing on which the order was made in every instance where I had anything to do with the claim. In the case of the Harrison estate, my recollection is that Mr. Harrison raised the cotton that was seized, that it remained on his estate until he died, and was subsequently, after the surrender, about to be removed to market by his lawful administrators, when it was seized by persons claiming to be Treasury agents of the government, and carried to Mobile. The evidence, pro and con, in reference to the title of the estate to the cotton was sent on to Washington, and the testimony made so clear a case that the Secretary of the Treasury, on the examination of the case, ordered the release of the cotton; and, thereupon, those same men who had attempted to make it liable under the Treasury agency turned round and attempted to make it liable by a new proceeding before the courts of the United States Thereupon I was telegraphed to for the first time by the representative of the State, or his attorney, in Mobile, I forget which. In a short time Mr. Stone, himself, one of the administrators, came on, and I went with him to the Attorney General, Mr. Speed. We laid before him the evidence which had been taken in the Treasury Department, pro and con, on which the Secretary of the Treasury had decided, and such other evidence as was adduced at the time. Mr. Speed promptly ordered the district attorney to stop proceedings against the cotton. In the case of McCurdy, a gentleman whom I have known personally for a number of years, his fifty bales of cotton were seized by a man named Lazare while I was provisional Governor of Alabama. McCurdy made application to me setting forth the facts; and, under the regulations issued by the Treasury Department, copies of which had been furnished to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, I informed Mr. Lazare, after examining the facts in the case, that I thought this cotton was not liable to be seized. The facts were, that Mr. McCurdy was a large planter and had several hundred bales of cotton. He had subscribed fifty bales to the confederate loan, but he had never set apart the number of bales, or put any mark upon them to indicate any particular fifty bales as being those which he subscribed to the confederate government. Before the subscription was called for in kind, the confederate authorities provided by an act that their cotton agents might receive confederate treasury notes in payment of the cotton. Mr. McCurdy satisfied their claim in that way. On that state of the case I advised Mr. Lazare that I thought the cotton was not liable, and he released it. That was not done by me as an attorney, but simply as an officer of the State for the time being. Subsequently I was relieved, and being elected to the United States Senate, I came to Washington, and while here I received a letter from Mr. McCurdy's son—the old gentleman himself being so feeble that he could not write—stating that somebody else had seized that fifty bales of cotton and was attempting to make it liable, and requesting me to apply to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the proper quarters, to obtain its release. I did obtain an order releasing it, but I do not recollect now whether that order was made by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Attorney General. It was made, however, by one or the other, as the seizure was made under the alleged authority of the one or other department.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Was the first release of this cotton which you made while you were provisional Governor referred to the department in Washington?

A. No, sir; I did not make any order officially in the case. I simply looked into the matter, and advised Mr. Lazare that I thought this man's cotton was not liable, and I gave him my reasons for thinking so, and he came to the conclusion himself that it was not liable. Mr. Lazare had a commission authorizing him to identify and seize a certain number of pounds of cotton—several thousand pounds—on the ground that a similar amount of cotton belonging to him, as an agent for a French house, had been destroyed by the government of the United States—he being a Frenchman himself. On examining the facts, as I have stated, Mr. Lazare came to the conclusion that the cotton was not liable to seizure, and he let it go of his own accord.

Q. You spoke of another case in which you obtained proceeds of sale?

A. Yes. But before I pass to that, I recollect that I endeavored to obtain the release of some other cotton, but not successfully, it being still involved in litigation in Montgomery or Mobile. It was at the instance of Josiah Morris, of Montgomery, he having been security on a replevin bond for the Bank of Louisiana, as I understood. I did not succeed, however, in obtaining that release; that is, the cotton is still in litigation, as I learned the other day. That, as far as I now remember, covers the cases in which I have made applications to have cotton released in Alabama, where anything has been done.

Q. State the facts in reference to the case in which you obtained an order for the money.

A. That is the case of Benjamin Jolly, of Madison county, Alabama. Mr. Jolly claimed to have bought 1,554 bales of cotton, and to be the owner of it. He was a man of large wealth prior to the war. That cotton was situated in what we call South Alabama, south of the Alleghany mountains. Mr. Jolly claimed that he had a permit, duly issued under the authority of the Treasury Department, to make this purchase, which was approved by President Lincoln; and he offered proof to show that he had that authority, and that he made this purchase in pursuance of it. Before he could remove the cotton the rebellion collapsed, and an order from General Canby prohibited individuals from moving cotton. This cotton was then taken by the government agents and carried to Mobile. Mr. Jolly and his agents followed it up and watched it as carefully as they could. He claimed that he had proved that 1,274 bales of it had reached the city of New York, being shipped on various vessels, and had come into the possession of Simeon Draper, who was cotton agent for the government at that place. Proof of all those facts in writing is on file in the Treasury Department. On that state of facts, the cotton itself having been sold along with other cotton that had been shipped at different times of shipment, the Treasury released the proceeds after deducting the government's fourth first, and then all the expenses on the whole transaction from the remainder, from the part which properly belonged to Mr. Jolly. Under the terms of the permit Mr. Jolly was to give one-fourth of the purchase to the government, clear of all expense at Mobile. The number of bales which Mr. Jolly claimed had reached New York, was disputed by the Treasury Department. It did not admit that his proof in that respect was satisfactory. It did not regard the proof as showing that more than 700 or 800 bales had reached the hands of Mr. Draper, and the decision, therefore, was that Mr. Jolly should have three-fourths, less all the expenses, of whatever number of bales the Treasury had got the proceeds of.

Q. Were those bales identified all the way to New York and in the sale?

A. Yes, sir. The records kept by Mr. Draper in New York and referred to Mr. McCulloch, and the records kept by the agent through whose hands the cotton was shipped from Mobile, show the number of bales. According to Mr.

Jolly's view, the evidence of Mr. Draper's books shows that 1,174 bales had come to New York, but Mr. McCulloch decided that only 700 or 800 bales had reached New York.

Q. When was this money paid to Mr. Jolly?

A. Last November or December.

Q. Was any other person than yourself concerned in prosecuting this claim before the department?

A. I think there were others as assistants.

Q. What are the names of those persons?

A. It is only a conjecture on my part.

Q. Give us the benefit of the conjecture.

A. I think Mr. Leftwich, a member of Congress from Tennessee, was interested as an attorney, and was employed in it before me while he was here claiming his right to a seat. This claim had all been made out before he was admitted to a seat.

Q. Were there any other persons connected with the prosecution of that claim?

A. None as attorneys, except General John A. Logan. I think there were some other persons interested in helping Mr. Jolly to identify the cotton as private individuals followed it up.

Q. Give us the names of those persons.

A. Mr. F. W. Brooks, of Memphis, Tennessee, a gentleman named Parkman, and another gentleman named Roddy.

Q. What amount of money was received on account of this cotton?

A. I think $71,000 was the amount awarded to Mr. Jolly after deducting the charges and the government fourth.

Q. With whom, in the Treasury Department, did you have interviews concerning the payment of this money?

A. The whole question was argued before Mr. McCulloch, and the case was referred to Mr. Eames for a report. It was discussed before him, and his report was made in writing on evidence which is on file.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was his report in favor of the payment of the money?

A. Yes, sir. He decided on the facts before him that we were entitled to much more than we were allowed.

Q. By whom was Mr. Eames paid for his services?

A. I think they deducted his pay out of the proceeds, making it part of the costs.

Q. Do you know the amount of his compensation?

A. I think it was $250 or $500; I have forgotten which. It came out of the charges that were made against Jolly.

Q. How long after his report was submitted to the department was it before the order was made for the payment of the money?

A. I do not recollect. It was some weeks.

Q. During that time did you have interviews with any other persons in the department following up the claim?

A. Yes, sir; to urge a final decision.

Q. With whom were those interviews?

A. Sometimes I applied to Mr. Chandler, and sometimes to Mr. McCulloch, urging him to take up and act upon the question.

Q. Where did Mr. Jolly reside at the time he purchased this cotton?

A. At Huntsville, Alabama, as I understood.

Q. Are those the only cases of claims in which you have been interested as an attorney?

A. They are the only cases that were disposed of, except one in favor of William Smith, of Selma, Alabama, for whom I obtained the release of about one hundred bales. I have some small claims pending now. This was the only case in which I ever succeeded in getting any money. I have got two or three claims for cotton now which I hope to get some action on some day or other.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you know anything of a claim belonging to a man named Shepherd, of Alabama?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that claim still pending?

A. I had nothing to do with that case as counsel. I saw a statement in the New York Tribune yesterday about that case, which is utterly unfounded. I never drew a dollar from the Treasury for Mr. Shepherd. My understanding of the claim is, that he bought a large amount of cotton and claimed it; but the Secretary of the Treasury would not allow his claim. He proved that he had gone to a good deal of expense and labor and time, watching and preserving the cotton from destruction during the period of commotion which attended the collapse of the rebellion. On this refusal to recognize his claim to the cotton, Mr. Shepherd, as I understood, made an application to have an allowance made for services. He got a small amount for those services—I suppose in the neighborhood of $12,000. My understanding is, that General Logan was the attorney for that claim.

LEWIS E. PARSONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Friday, February 8, 1867.

WILLIAM L. SHARKEY, Senator elect from the State of Mississippi, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Were you provisional Governor of Mississippi? If so, when were you appointed, and how long did you hold the office?

A. I was appointed some time in June, 1865, and I held the office till October, 1865.

Q. Did you take the oath of office when you entered on your duties?

A. Yes. I took the oath that was administered to me in this city. I do not recollect precisely the phraseology of it.

Q. Did it contain what is usually known as the test oath?

A. No, sir; I think not. There was nothing of that sort in it. I had a copy of it which I took home with me, and it is now in the archives of the State government.

Q. By whom was the oath administered?

A. I think it was by Judge Wylie, of this city. The form was made out, probably, by the Secretary of State, or some one in his office, and was handed to me.

Q. You received the form of oath from the State Department?

A. Yes, I think so.

Q. Do you recollect the name of the person from whom you received it?

A. I do not. I am pretty certain I received it from the State Department, but I cannot recollect the person who gave it to me. I took it to Judge Wylie, who administered the oath to me, and I signed it. I did not deposit the oath, as I suppose I should have done, but took it home with me. It was an oversight on my part.

Q. Did you receive any salary or compensation from the United States, or any officer of the government?

A. Not a cent. I received compensation, but I collected it myself in the way of taxes. There was not a cent expended by the government, so far as I know, in the administration of the government of Mississippi.

Q. Had you any conversation with President Johnson in reference to the pending constitutional amendment proposed by the 39th Congress?

A. I suppose I have had some conversation with him, the precise tenor of which I cannot recollect.

Q. Have you received from him any advice or opinion as to the manner in which you should act or exert your influence in reference to the ratification of the amendment?

A. No, I think not. I took my own course in that matter, and opposed the amendment, as an individual, for various reasons. All that I said or wrote on the subject was my individual objection. I suppose I have had conversation with the President about it. I can only state, in general terms, that I understood he was opposed to it, but for what particular reason I cannot now undertake to detail.

Q. Have you been at any time engaged in conducting claims against the government on account of citizens who claimed property or the proceeds of property abandoned or confiscated to the government of the United States?

A. I do not know in reference to any confiscated property.

Q. Or to property which had been seized by any officer of the government of the United States?

A. I never collected any claim unless it was determined by the Treasury Department that the cotton was improperly seized.

Q. Who were the claimants in those cases where you have collected the claims?

A. I got some cotton released in New Orleans which had been improperly taken from a man named George, I think. The cotton was taken by an officer and was ordered to be turned over.

Q. Have you in any case received, or have the persons for whom you acted received money that had been paid into the Treasury as the proceeds of the sale of property confiscated, abandoned or seized?

A. On one occasion I aided in obtaining money for a lady named Bonham. I did not get it myself, but it was paid to a friend, under a power of attorney from Mrs. Bonham, who received it in my absence. I supposed it came from the Treasury.

Q. What was the nature of her claim?

A. The cotton was improperly seized and sold, and they paid her for it—a small amount.

Q. What was the amount?

A. Some $12,000 or $14,000; the precise amount I do not recollect.

Q. In behalf of this woman did you present to the Secretary of the Treasury or to any officer of the Treasury, your views of the right of the Treasury Department under the law to pay the money?

A. Probably I did. I do not know whether I ever did in writing. I believe, with the exception of one other case, this was the only claim that I have ever collected. There was a steamboat seized by the government belonging to a man in the southern part of Mississippi, named Portwans, which boat the government delivered over at my request, by request of General Grant, and, I think, of the Judge Advocate General.

Q. Had the boat of which you speak been condemned?

A. No, sir; I think not. The man was a loyal citizen, and so proved himself. His boat had been taken improperly as was decided, and she was returned to him.

Q. So far as you understand, under what provision of law was the money paid out of the Treasury to the woman whom you represented?

A. I do not know.

Q. Do you recollect calling the attention of the Secretary to any provision of law which authorized it to be done?

A. I do not know that I did. The claim was not filed by me, but by a different gentleman, and the lady requested me to press it through. That was about the whole of it.

Q. Did you have any interview with the President in reference to that claim or in reference to any claim of which you have spoken?

A. No, sir; I had no interviews with the President about them. I did ask the President to refer a couple of little claims to the Attorney General, but whether he made the reference I do not yet know. He knew nothing about the merits of them, and I merely wanted the Attorney General's advice. The President has had nothing to do with claims for me. I recollect another case which I aided in getting through the Treasury department. It was the claim of John Duncan, for cotton. However, there were other parties engaged in it. I was merely assisting. The money never came into my hands. It was paid to him individually, I believe. I merely wanted to say that I assisted in getting his claim through.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Has the President of the United States, in any conversation that you have ever had with him, informed you of his desire to defeat the pending constitutional amendment?

A. I do not know that he ever has, except to express his objections to the measure.

Q. You never had any conversation with him on that subject?

A. I stated awhile ago that I probably had a conversation with him about the constitutional amendment, and my understanding was that he was opposed to it; but what particular means he employed, if any, I do not of course know.

Q. He never stated to you any of the means which he employed, if any, to secure its defeat?

A. I think not. I do not recollect that he ever mentioned any means to be employed to defeat it.

Q. Do you know of any means that have been employed to defeat the constitutional amendment?

A. I took means myself, so far as Mississippi was concerned, by writing a letter home. Perhaps the first public expression of opinion from anybody in opposition to the amendment was from me. I took various grounds. The letter was published. As to what anybody else has done, I do not know.

W. L. SHARKEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 16, 1867.

CHARLES G. HALPINE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you the editor of the New York Citizen?

A. I am.

Q. Look at the slip now shown you, and say whether it is a part of a number of that paper.

A. It is; this article is from my own pen.

Q. In the form of a letter from Washington, under date of March 6, 1867?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that article a true report of a conversation you had with the President?

A. I would not call it exactly a report. I may say that the closing paragraph states precisely what it is. The greater points it contains were touched upon by the President. I might call it a free translation into the ordinary newspaper tongue, of a conversation that took place with him, certain points being added by myself as further illustrations of points stated by him, for the reason that the points, as given in a rapid conversation, if reported literally, might not be understood by the public. I have given, for instance, the word "repudiation" in my report. I do not think that precise word was used by the President. He spoke very earnestly and very gravely of his fear that the public securities would be endangered by excessive expenditures, and by the apparent reluctance of Congress to increase taxation, while increasing the expenditures. I translated "danger to the public securities" into "repudiation." I heard—indeed, I saw in the New York Tribune—and I heard that Colonel Forney's paper, the Chronicle, had taken a view of this article as conveying the impression that the President wished to be understood as favoring repudiation, or in that direction. If that inference was drawn from my report, I was exceedingly unfortunate in expressing myself, for it should have been the direct reverse. I had had several conversations with the President previously, some of which I have reported; but this impressed me greatly as very important. The conversation may be characterized as a protest against a system of, or tendency to, excessive expenditures, which would finally result in jeopardizing the public securities, by increasing them to an amount which could not be paid.

Q. Are there any other particulars in which the article misrepresents, in any material point, the conversation?

A. The article speaks of the effects of the reconstruction bill as adding a large number of ignorant negroes to those entitled to suffrage. That point is more fully stated in this article than he gave it to me at our last conversation; but the additions made by me were in harmony with the substance of a very full conversation I had with him on that subject, a year and a quarter ago. I tried, before leaving New York, to find a copy of the paper in which I reported that conversation, but in the hurry of getting away could not find it. In this conversation he only briefly referred to one source of danger to the public securities, from increasing the number of comparatively ignorant individuals who would, under the reconstruction bill, be entitled to the privilege of suffrage. He referred to it very briefly this last time; but in stating it in this article I placed it more fully before the public, by recalling substantially the conversation which I had with him about a year and a quarter ago, and which was, I recollect, copied very widely through the country, and, I think, into the Independent, by Theodore Tilton. It was very widely copied by the press of the country. For the rest, the "cue points," as I may call them, of every paragraph, were impressed upon me by the President's conversation; certain of his peculiar phrases, which struck me as either odd or strong, I can recollect; beyond that, I can only say that it is a free newspaper report or translation, substantially, of the points he gave me. The reference to the very large amount of one hundred millions of dollars for internal improvements, I cannot say was by him. My impression is that while speaking of the tendency in Congress to extravagant expenditures, reference was made by the President to a bill introduced by Mr. Schenck; but whether the phrase given here in regard to one hundred millions for internal improvements, was introduced by Mr. Johnson or by me, I cannot now say. I can only say, the whole report is about as that last paragraph says it was. The point in which the President speaks of the probability of there being a financial crisis was introduced by me. In speaking of the general inactivity of trade in the city of New York, I mentioned that I had been informed that A. T. Stewart was not selling this year a quarter or a fifth the usual amount at this period. It was in that way the President came to speak of the probability of a crisis. The first part of this article, I may say, is almost verbatim; that is to say, it is as closely so as I could translate it into newspaper language.

Q. Down to what point?

A. Down to the last paragraph of the first column, with this exception, that I may have put in a line here and there occasionally, to elaborate some point more fully. I refer more particularly to the point where the article speaks of an aristocracy based on $3,000,000,000 of property in slaves disappearing at one end of the line, and an aristocracy based on $2,500,000,000 of public securities springing up at the other end of the line. Of course, a rapid conversation of that description is like a tide that ebbs and flows; or like two streams joining at a particular point, beyond which it is difficult for either party to claim that exact portion of the common tide which is his. I do not think there is any substantial point introduced in my report which was not received by me (though I may have misunderstood him) from the President's conversation.

Q. Have you any knowledge whether the President understood, or had reason to believe that you would print the conversation?

A. No, sir; though he might have drawn the inference, inasmuch as I had previously printed conversations of his, which at least received his silent approval, my previous reports having never called from him any rebuke, nor altered in any way our relations. It was for this reason, I think, I had the right to conclude it would be no violation of confidence on my part to print this conversation. I spoke to my partner, Mr. R. B. Roosevelt, a gentleman of large fortune, largely mixing with the moneyed classes, and largely interested in the public securities, stating to him briefly the points, before printing it; and I asked him whether I ought to do it. He saw the points were of great public interest, one way or the other, and advised me to print it, as I have done.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was this interview sought by you, or at the request of the President?

A. It was not sought by the President. I called upon the President as I have always been in the habit of doing when I came to the city.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Did you take any notes of the conversation before you returned to New York?

A. No, sir; I wrote it out from memory, as I have always been in the habit of doing. I do not use short-hand, or any other notes.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. How soon after the conversation was it written out?

A. The evening after, in the city of New York. It was dated at Washington, in accordance with the newspaper custom of dating the letter from the point at which the occurrence stated took place.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What was the date of this conversation?

A. The letter is dated on the 6th of March, which was Wednesday. The conversation occurred the day previous. I saw the President about half after four, and I had to go to New York by the 6:30 train.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know whether the President has seen this publication?

A. I have not heard anything from him or seen him. I only came to the city to-day. I take it for granted that he has.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Does he read your paper habitually?

A. That I cannot say.

Q. Did you send him a copy of it?

A. I did not. I took it for granted he would see it in other papers. It was published in the World, Herald, Tribune, &c.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Who opened this conversation, he or you?

A. I really could not say. The conversation grew as they grow with all of us. It would be very hard to say who does begin a conversation.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. Do you know whether the President is actually aware of the publication of this conversation?

A. I do not. I heard to-day from Mr. Hanscom, the editor of the Republican of this city, whom I met accidentally in the hotel, that the President had not expected the conversation to be published. Whether that statement is correct or not I cannot say. My own justification for my act is the fact, as I have stated, of having printed other conversations on topics of public interest, without disapprobation on his part. I may add this, perhaps, that at the time I left the President, he asked me was I going away soon. I said no, I was not going for a day or two, and would do myself the honor, probably, of calling again before I left. He said if I would call the following day, at 12 o'clock, he would see me. On my return to Major General Hunter's, (at whose house I usually stay when here,) I learned of a serious illness in my family at home, and I had to start by the 6:30 train. I did not see the President again, therefore, as I had promised, at 12 m. next day; and, perhaps if I had, he would have told me the conversation of the previous evening was private.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Have you been long on intimate terms with the President?

A. I never saw Mr. Johnson until after he was President. I saw him shortly after—probably three or four months after Mr. Lincoln's death.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1867.

HENRY M. FLINT sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is your occupation?

A. Corresponding with newspapers.

Q. Were you corresponding with any paper during the summer and fall of 1866?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. With what paper?

A. The New York News and New Orleans Picayune were the principal ones. I corresponded with the Chicago Times and some other papers in the West.

Q. Did you ever furnish the matter contained in any articles that appeared in the Philadelphia Ledger?

A. I never wrote a word for that paper.

Q. Did you furnish any information touching any subject matter of any article or articles which appeared in that paper?

A. I suppose you allude to certain questions which appeared in that paper, and which attracted considerable attention at the time. These questions were written by me, but I did not write them for the Ledger, nor to the Ledger.

Q. You refer to the questions, published in that paper, alleged to have been submitted by the President of the United States to the Attorney General?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you write these questions for any newspaper?

A. No, sir.

Q. By what means did the publishers of the Ledger get possession of them?

A. I cannot tell you of my own knowledge, but I will tell you to the best of my ability. I sent these questions to a friend of mine in New York, Mr. F. A. Abbott. I knew that he was connected with newspapers. I did not know that he was connected with the Ledger, and I did not know when I submitted these questions that they would appear in the Ledger. That is, however, no doubt, the way they came to appear in the Ledger.

Q. Did you inform him that these questions had been submitted by the President to the Attorney General of the United States?

A. If you will allow me, perhaps I had better tell you in my own way the circumstances connected with the whole matter. At the time I wrote these questions I had been investigating, for my own satisfaction, the subject to which they alluded, namely, whether the 39th Congress, as then constituted, was a constitutional and legal Congress. I was unable to convince myself, from the study I had devoted to it, that it was, particularly as the Constitution declares so positively that the Congress must be composed of the Senators and Representatives from each one of the States, as the questions in the Ledger state. I found, also, in the way I gathered news upon other subjects, that other persons in the city, officials and, as I understood, the President, were devoting, in some degree, attention to this subject. After investigating the matter in that way, and studying it, I wrote out these questions, which were questions, as I supposed, the President would be naturally desirous of asking of his proper legal adviser, if the subject had engaged his attention, as I understood it had. I sent the questions to Mr. Abbott, in New York, with a note, a copy of which I did not retain, and cannot remember its precise contents. It was to the effect that these questions were, I believed, now being considered by the President, and would be, or had been, submitted by him to the Attorney General. I think I stated to Mr. Abbott that nothing would be more likely than that such subjects should present themselves to the President's mind, and that if so of course he would consult the Attorney General upon the subject. When I sent these questions to Mr. Abbott, I had no knowledge that he would have them published, nor did I send them particularly for publication; at the same time, knowing that Mr. Abbott was connected with the press, I supposed it quite likely the questions would appear, in some form, in some paper—what newspaper I did not know. I believe these are the main facts connected with the matter, so far as I had anything to do with them.

Q. What reason had you to believe the President had submitted, or would submit, these questions to the Attorney General?

A. I supposed he would not take any action upon so serious a matter without making himself entirely certain as to the legal questions involved, and I thought the Attorney General was the person he would naturally consult.

Q. What reason had you to believe that the President had any such subject under consideration?

A. Because I was convinced that the course of Congress, even at that time, had been one of such hostility to the President that unless he took some measures either to strengthen himself or stop their action, they would proceed to still stronger measures to deprive him of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with the President relative to the subject matter of these questions?

A. I had one conversation with him, but it was after the despatch had been published. I had none before.

Q. These questions were, then, the creation of your brain?

A. The questions were my own composition.

Q. And you had no reason for that composition except the operations of your own mind?

A. Yes, sir; I had. I could not give you my authority for believing that these questions were actually written and submitted to the Attorney General. I ascertained, or, at least, I was convinced, that the matter was actually being considered by the President.

Q. How did you ascertain that?

A. I cannot tell you from whom I had the information. I would willingly tell you if I could recall any particular person from whom I received the information. I know I had that impression.

Q. Did you receive that information from any person?

A. Of course, I must have received it from some persons, but I cannot tell you the names of the persons.

Q. With whom did you converse upon the subject before these questions appeared in the public press?

A. I could not tell you that I had conversation with any person upon this subject.

Q. Had you received no information, in any way, from any person upon the subject?

A. I think the manner in which I derived my impression was from something that had appeared in the newspapers, perhaps; at any rate I derived in some way the impression that this subject was engaging the attention of the President, and that these were the questions, in substance, he would ask the Attorney General.

Q. What started that inquiry in your own mind?

A. It had been in my own mind for a good while. I suppose almost from the time the war was over, and the southern States sent their representatives here, demanding admission into the Senate and House of Representatives.

Q. Did you communicate to Mr. Abbott, in your note to him, that such questions had been addressed by the President to the Attorney General?

A. If I had my note I could tell you exactly. I think it was, in substance, this: "These questions are supposed, or are believed to have been submitted by the President to the Attorney General."

Q. Will you state the ground on which you believed they had been or would be submitted by the President to the Attorney General?

A. Because I was convinced the subject had occupied the President's mind.

Q. What convinced you of that fact?

A. The circumstances by which the President was surrounded. Congress had manifested such hostility to him that he would naturally be led to inquire whether that Congress, as then constituted, was a constitutional and legal Congress. He had recommended, I believe, the admission of the southern States to representation in Congress, and his recommendation had been disregarded.

Q. Do you say that you never received from any source information that the President was actually considering the propriety of submitting these questions to the Attorney General?

A. Nothing definite.

Q. Upon that question you are positive?

A. I think I may say I am.

Q. Did you ever receive information relative to the subject from any person connected with the Attorney General's department?

A. No, sir.

Q. Nor from any person connected with the executive department?

A. No, sir.

Q. It was simply, then, a creation of your own?

A. The impression was on my mind that these questions were being considered by the President. I cannot say they were my own creation, and I cannot tell you the process by which the conviction became fixed upon my mind; that it was a firm conviction upon my mind, I can assure you.

Q. You cannot recollect any fact from which that conviction resulted?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you receive any reply from Mr. Abbott to the note you sent him?

A. I do not remember whether I did or not, until after the publication in the Ledger, referred to. After that I received several telegrams from him

Q. Can you supply a copy of the note you addressed to him?

A. No, sir; I did not keep a copy. It was a very short note, not more than four or five lines, and was enclosed in the same envelope in which I sent the questions.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Look at the article in the first column of the Washington Daily Chronicle, of October 12, 1866, now shown you, and state whether or not that is the article you sent to Mr. Abbott.

A. The first part, down to the word "first," is not mine. The questions, I presume, are those I sent to Mr. Abbott. I think they are correctly printed. What follows the fifth question is not mine.

Q. Did you prepare these questions yourself?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who saw them before you transmitted them to New York?

A. No one saw them before Mr. Abbott did, unless they opened the letter.

Q. With whom did you consult in relation to the preparation of these questions?

A. No person.

Q. What did you expect Mr. Abbott would do with these questions when you sent them to him?

A. I will tell you, as I suppose I ought to tell you, that at that time I furnished Mr. Abbott, not daily, but occasionally, with items of news from Washington, at his request; not under any arrangement for pay, but merely as an old friend whom I wished to oblige. I knew that he was connected with several newspapers, and I had no doubt when I sent these questions that they would appear in some paper, in some shape.

Q. What object had you in view in preparing these questions?

A. The object I had in view in writing the questions, and in sending them to Mr. Abbott, was that they might appear before the public, and that the public mind might be directed to that point, and that the newspapers, particularly, might be led to express their sentiments upon the questions involved in it.

Q. How did they interest you particularly?

A. They did not interest me more than any other citizen of the United States. I was strongly impressed then, as I am now, with the belief that the 39th Congress was not such a Congress as the Constitution requires.

Q. With what persons have you ever talked upon that subject, as to whether the 39th Congress was a constitutional body or not?

A. No doubt I have conversed with a number of persons. I cannot remember any particular conversation on the subject.

Q. Have you ever conversed with President Johnson upon the subject?

A. I had a conversation with him after the despatch was published.

Q. How did you happen to have an interview with President Johnson on that subject?

A. The questions referred to had been published, and they had given rise to considerable discussion in the newspapers. I thought I ought to go to the President and tell him what part of the despatch was mine, and what connection I had had with the publication of it. I therefore went to him and gave him a frank explanation of the whole connection I had had with it, and how I came to write the questions. In the course of our conversation he took up a newspaper lying on his table, and showed me an article which I think appeared the day after the questions were published, in the Daily News of Philadelphia, which took pretty nearly the same ground my questions would indicate.

Q. What did he say about the article in the News?

A. He spoke of it or referred to it, rather approvingly, I could not tell you the exact words. I had remarked to him, "Mr. Johnson, it occurred to me that it would be by no means remarkable that you should prepare such questions as these, upon a subject which I know must have occupied your mind, as it has the public mind." I forget what reply he made; it was a sort of affirmative response or assent. He then took up the paper, and said, "Yes, have you seen this?"

Q. What was the character of that article?

A. It was an article taking very strong ground that the President might well write such questions, or that the subject might well occupy his mind; that there was good ground for at least asking these questions of the Attorney General, and then taking his advice on the subject.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did the President send for you on this occasion?

A. No, sir; I went to see him of my own accord.

Q. How long after these questions were published?

A. It was long enough for the eastern papers at least to have expressed their opinions on the subject. I think four or five days.

Q. Did he approve or disapprove of your conduct?

A. He disapproved of it. He remarked that on a subject of such magnitude, and before I sent the questions to the press, I should at least have called upon him, or upon some one who could have informed me, and ascertained whether there was foundation for the assertion that such questions had been propounded by him.

Q. Did he claim that there was no foundation for them?

A. No, sir, he did not. I did not question him, of course, and he did not deny that there was good reason for asking the questions. At the same time his whole conversation led me to understand that he had never submitted any such questions to the Attorney General.

Q. Did you converse with any person upon the subject before you called upon the President?

A. No, sir.

Q. Had you ever had any interviews with the President before?

A. I think not. I think this was the first interview I ever had with him.

Q. Did you inform the President, before you were admitted to an audience with him, who you were, and for what purpose you called to see him?

A. I first saw his son, Robert Johnson, and requested him to ask his father if he would see me for a moment. I told him for what purpose I wanted to see the President.

Q. Did you give him the names of two persons from whom you derived your authority?

A. No, sir. I told him how I had derived my information the same as I have told you.

Q. Do you say now that that statement about two men was not true?

A. I have explained how that statement came to be made. I made the statement about the two men to the Ledger man, because he came to my room and undertook to cross-question me, and this after I had told him frankly all the facts. To get clear of his importunities I informed him of those two men, but there were no such men.

Q. Who was the editor you refer to?

A. Mr. McKean, of Philadelphia.

Q. Did you give him the names of the two persons?

A. No, sir.

Q. Had you two persons in your mind as the persons you referred to?

A. Not two particular persons.

Q. Did he see you in this city?

A. Yes, sir; he came here.

Q. Why did he come here?

A. The Ledger people sent him. They were so determined, he said, to probe the matter to the bottom, that they sent him on to see me.

Q. Why were they determined to probe it to the bottom?

A. I cannot tell why, except that they were very much alarmed at having published the article referred to.

Q. Do you know the cause of their alarm?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether there had been any communication between them and the President on the subject?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Did Mr. McKean inform you that there had been?

A. I think he said he had seen the President.

Q. Did the President inform you that he had had any communication with the Ledger people?

A. No, sir, he did not.

Q. What did Mr. McKean say about it when he called upon you?

A. He said a great deal. The principal matter of the conversation was, that he wanted me to tell him where I got my information. Of course, I did not feel that he had any right to question me on that subject. I had not sent the article to the Ledger.

Q. Did he give any reason for his anxiety upon the subject?

A. Yes. He said the Ledger people wanted to publish a statement about it—stating the facts, exonerating them, and throwing the blame, if there was any blame in the matter, upon me.

Q. Did it occur to you when you sent these questions to Mr. Abbott, that there was anything improper in sending them without having consulted the President on the subject?

A. No, sir.

Q. You thought yourself justifiable, then, in representing to the country, through the public press, that the President had taken, or would take, the grave step of asking those questions?

A. I did not think it was improper.

Q. Did it occur to you at the time, that you might be placing the President in a false position in regard to a question of so grave public importance?

A. No, sir. I regretted it after I saw the direction things had taken. It did not occur to me before. What I mean by regretting it is, that I regretted having done anything to place the President in a false position in any way.

By Mr. BOUTWELL?

Q. In the conversation you had with the President, I understood you to say the President did not complain that you had misrepresented him, but of your taking the liberty of putting forward those views without consultation with him?

A. He did not say I had misrepresented him, but at the same time he might have thought so. He said it would have been better if I had acquainted myself positively with the fact whether such questions had been asked or not, before giving them to the public. I do not think he said two sentences about it; but what he did say was approving the position the questions would indicate.

Q. You say that the matter contained in the articles preceding the questions was not prepared by you. What did precede the questions as sent to you by Mr. Abbott?

A. Nothing but the note, which was enclosed in the same envelope.

Q. Can you tell wherein the note differed in substance with what precedes the questions in this article as published?

A. I believe that is the substance of what I wrote, except that my note, probably, commenced with, "It is believed," or, "It is understood."

Q. Did your note contain any portion of this article which follows the 5th question?

A. No, sir; not a word.

Q. Did it occur to you, at the time of sending these questions to Mr. Abbott, that their publication might, in some manner, affect the stock market?

A. Not the least; and for the reason that stocks and the money market are something I have never concerned myself with. I never wrote about them, except incidentally, and it did not occur to me at the time that the publication of this despatch would affect the stock market.

Q. Did you, in any way, express an opinion as to what might probably be the response of the Attorney General?

A. No. To the best of my recollection, I did not express any opinion as to what would be the probable reply.

Q. Can you procure a copy of the note you sent to Mr. Abbott?

A. I cannot, unless Mr. Abbott has preserved it.

Q. Have you had a conversation with any one on the subject since the conversation you had with the President?

A. I think not.

NOTE.—I called to see the President on Saturday morning. He might have said, in the course of our conversation, that the Ledger people had sent him a brief telegraphic despatch on the subject, but no other communication. It was a day or two after this that Mr. McKean called to see me. I think he said he had been to see the President. In my interview with the President I told him how I had derived my information, the same as I have told you, and I don't think I mentioned to him two particular persons.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Saturday, March 23, 1867.

CHARLES E. CAPEHART sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. I reside at present in the District of Columbia; my home is Wheeling, West Virginia.

Q. Where were you residing during the fall of 1866?

A. In the city of Washington.

Q. Did you make application to the President for the pardon of persons who had been in the military service of the United States, and who had deserted therefrom?

A. I did, through a second party.

Q. Who was the party?

A. Colonel McEwen, late medical director, United States army.

Q. For how many did you make application?

A. For five, who were all on the one list.

Q. When did you make the application?

A. About a week before the Pennsylvania State election, in 1866.

Q. Where did the parties reside?

A. Washington county, Pennsylvania.

Q. Did you have any understanding with those persons as to what their political action would be in the event of pardons being granted them?

A. No, sir. I never saw the men myself.

Q. Was there any understanding between them and any person connected with the case?

A. Yes. Colonel McEwen came to me and told me he had received powers of attorney from five men living in Washington county, Pennsylvania, to settle their cases in case they were pardoned. He asked me if I would use my influence or assist him in the case. I told him I would, and I did so. These men belonged to the twenty-second Pennsylvania cavalry. Colonel McEwen told me that the colonel and officers of the regiment had refused to sign any letter of recommendation for their pardon, as the men had deserted, taking their horses, arms, and equipments with them. Major Myers, who now has charge of the Agricultural Department here, was called upon by Colonel McEwen and asked if he would assist those men and recommend their pardon. They had belonged to his regiment. He said he could not and would not make any affidavit in those cases, as he considered they were deserters.

Q. State all you know about those cases.

A. There was a letter written to the President, stating the facts of the case, and stating that the district, in which there was a contest between William Montgomery and George V. Lawrence, was a very close one, and that a few votes would turn the tide in favor of Montgomery, the democratic candidate.

Q. Who wrote that letter?

A. That I do not know, but the papers, of course, can be found on file. (To Mr. Eldridge.) That letter was written to the President, and the President endorsed the papers. The papers were taken to the President about 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and the pardons were recommended to the War Department. The one-armed messenger, who is on duty in the Adjutant General's office (in General Vincent's office,) came to my house at three o'clock the same day with the five separate, distinct orders restoring these men, with their full pay and allowances. That is all I know about the case. There was a letter received afterwards by Colonel McEwen from Montgomery, the democratic candidate in that district, stating that those votes would help him considerably, and would, probably, with the influence he was using, cause his election, as the district was considered very close.

Q. Was a promise exacted from these men that they would vote for Montgomery?

A. Yes.

Q. Before the pardons were obtained?

A. Yes; I so understood.

Q. From whom did you understand it?

A. From Colonel McEwen, who had the cases.

Q. Was that understanding conveyed to the President?

A. O, yes; that was mentioned in the letter that was written to the President. The whole facts of the case were stated—that they were his friends, and would vote for him; and that, under the present laws of the State of Pennsylvania, they were disfranchised.

Q. Do you know of any other cases of that character?

A. I do not. I have heard of other cases, but I know nothing of them myself. These men wrote to Judge Lawrence to intercede for them, but Mr. Lawrence could not do anything for them. Lawrence told me so himself; and he told me that they were all democrats, and would, of course, vote against him if they were pardoned, but that he would do all he could for them, but could not do anything. The orders restoring these men were filed with Colonel Vedder, paymaster, now in the Union building.

Q. Can you give the names of the parties pardoned?

A. Not now. I do not recollect the names; but I will supply them to the committtee.

Q. Was Thomas B. Florence connected with the case?

A. Yes, sir. He was assisting Colonel McEwen. I believe Colonel Florence carried the papers to the President.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You say you never saw those persons?

A. I never saw them.

Q. You spoke very positively about there being an understanding that they would vote a certain way in case they were pardoned?

A. I so understood from Colonel McEwen. He told me so.

Q. Do you think yourself justified in swearing positively as to facts in that way?

A. I did not swear positively to the bargain being made. I said I so understood it.

Q. You spoke of a letter having been written to the President—why do you speak so positively of its contents?

A. I read part of the letter myself.

Q. How much of it did you read?

A. Four or five lines.

Q. Who wrote that letter?

A. That I do not know.

Q. How came you to see it?

A. I was in Colonel McEwen's office, and saw the letter lying on the table, partly written.

Q. Who had control of it at the time?

A. Colonel McEwen.

Q. Did anybody ask you to read it?

A. No, sir. Colonel McEwen and I were doing business together, settling claims belonging to our own original brigades. I was settling up the claims of my own regiment at the department.

Q. Do you consider yourself at liberty to read any gentleman's private letters?

A. I did, in an office in which I was connected and had an interest.

Q. That is your notion of propriety?

A. Yes.

Q. Whose name was to that letter?

A. That I do not know.

Q. Did you ever see it afterwards?

A. No, sir.

Q. How do you know that that letter was sent to the President?

A. I know that Colonel McEwen and Colonel Florence were in the office one day, and Colonel McEwen said to me, "Did you read that letter which I wrote in those cases of the 22d Pennsylvania cavalry?" I said, "I read a part of a letter which lay there on the table yesterday." He then pulled the letter out of the drawer and put it with other papers which he had in connection with the case, and he and Colonel Florence started to the President's together. That afternoon, at three o'clock, the papers came to me at my house.

Q. Did you see the letter when he took it out of the drawer?

A. I did not read the contents of it. He held it out and asked me if I had seen the letter which he had partly written yesterday. I told him I had.

Q. Have you not stated that you never did see it after the first time?

A. I did not see its contents. I saw what purported to be that letter.

Q. State what you did read of that letter.

A. I do not know that I can recollect the exact words. All that I remember of it was that it was a recommendation to the President for the pardon of those men, and stating the facts of the case, and that the district they lived in was a closely contested district, where a few votes would turn the scale.

Q. You recollect that?

A. I remember that distinctly. That is all that I remember of the contents of the letter.

Q. What was the length of the letter?

A. That I do not know, as I read only a part of it—four or five lines.

Q. You are connected in business with Colonel McEwen?

A. Yes.

Q. And are familiar with his handwriting?

A. Yes.

Q. And you do not know in whose handwriting the letter was?

A. I do not recollect now. I am satisfied it was not in his handwriting.

Q. Did you ever see that letter after Colonel McEwen took it out of the drawer?

A. Only as I stated before—in his hand. I did not read it. He asked me if I had seen that letter which he had written the day before. I told him I had. I do not know that that was the letter.

Q. Then by what authority did you speak of the endorsement that was put on it?

A. Colonel Florence told me that the President endorsed it and recommended them; that the papers would be back that afternoon, and that he had directed them to be sent to my house.

Q. You spoke very positively of an endorsement put on that letter by the President, while you now say you never saw the letter after you read it; how do you explain that?

A. I explain it in this way: In about one hour from the time that Colonel Florence went to the President he returned with Colonel McEwen, and told me that the President had ordered the reinstatement of those men. Another reason is, that I am pretty well conversant with the rules of the War Department, and I know that men will not be restored without the recommendation and endorsement of the President of the United States.

Q. And that is why you swear so?

A. That is the best of my knowledge and belief.

[Mr. MARSHALL said he wished it noted that he protested against the committee taking this class of testimony—regarding it as wholly unjustifiable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE said he joined in the protest, and had objected from the beginning.]

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You know the handwriting of Colonel McEwen very well?

A. Yes.

Q. And the letter was not in his handwriting?

A. It was not; at least I think not. I do not know positively, because it is a good while ago, and I have but a very faint recollection of the letter now. He very seldom did any writing himself; he generally dictated, and had a clerk to write.

Q. The letter, at the time you first saw it, was not completed?

A. No, sir.
Q. And was not signed by anybody?
A. No, sir.
Q. To whom was it addressed?
A. To the President of the United States.
Q. Was it dated?
A. I believe it was, if I recollect right, but I cannot say positively as to that.
Q. Did it contain the names of the parties for whose pardon you were applying?
A. I do not recollect; I think not at that time. There were only three or four lines of the letter written.
Q. Did you read all that was written at that time?
A. Yes.
Q. And did you read all that you have stated as being in the letter?
A. As near as I can recollect. I am not speaking positively as to the number of lines.
Q. Was your name mentioned in the letter?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you sign any paper to the President in the matter?
A. Not within my recollection.
Q. Who was present while you were reading the letter?
A. I do not think there was any one present.
Q. Was there no one in the office?
A. No, sir; I think not.
Q. Who was there at the time Colonel McEwen took the letter out and asked you if you read it?
A. Colonel Florence was present.
Q. Who else?
A. No person.
Q. Did you take the letter in your hand at that time?
A. No, sir.
Q. How near were you to Colonel McEwen?
A. I should judge about ten feet off—probably not so far. I was a few steps from the desk.
Q. Did he hold the letter up to you so that you could see the writing?
A. No, sir. It was folded up with other papers.
Q. How do you swear it was the same letter?
A. I did not swear so. He said to me, "Did you see that letter which I wrote yesterday?" holding it up in his hand. The letter was folded up with the other papers, and he took the letter out.
Q. Then you do not know that you saw this letter, except when you read the three or four lines.
A. I never saw the contents of that letter except the portion that I read the day before.
Q. Do you know that you ever saw the letter at all except when you read four lines?
A. I saw the letter which was partly written the day before, and what he said was that letter.
Q. Then you swear you saw the letter the second time?
A. No, sir. I saw what purported to be that letter. I cannot swear that the letter which he held in his hand was the one written the day before.
Q. Can you say that this letter, of which you read three or four lines, you ever saw again?
A. Not the inside.
Q. Did you ever see the outside?
A. Only what purported to be that letter.

Q. But the outside of a letter does not purport anything, does it? Do you swear that you ever saw the letter the second time?

A. No, sir; only when Colonel McEwen showed me what he said was that letter?

Q. Did he say that that was the letter which you read some of?

A. He did.

Q. How did he know you had read some of it?

A. Because I told him.

Q. When did you tell him that?

A. The same day that I saw the letter started—that afternoon.

Q If you told him that, how came he to ask you a day or so afterwards whether you had seen it?

A. The only reason I know is, because the letter was not finished. I told him I had seen the letter as it was started to be written—only a few lines.

Q. Then he asked you afterwards if you had seen that letter which he had written, and you told him what?

A. I told him I had seen that part of the letter written the day before.

Q. Then you told him that twice?

A. I do not know that I told him twice. I told him I had seen part of the letter which was partly written the day before.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to herewith submit to you the list of names of men who were pardoned, in accordance with my promise yesterday to your honorable body: Norvell Hartman, Franklin Fitzsimmons, William Didrich, Daniel Rohrer, A. P. Davis, late privates of companies A and B of the 22d Pennsylvania cavalry, or 3d provisional Pennsylvania cavalry.

I have, sir, the honor to remain, with high respect, your humble servant,

CHAS. E. CAPEHART,
Late Colonel U. S. Vol'n Cavalry.

Hon. Mr. WILSON, Chairman Judiciary Committee.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday, March 27, 1867.

MATTHEW MCEWEN sworn and examined.

By Mr. BENJ. F. BUTLER: (Who was permitted to examine the witness.)

Q. What was your rank in the army, and where were you stationed?

A. I was surgeon in the army. My brevet rank is brigadier general. In the early part of the war I was in charge of the United States general hospital in the valley of the Kanawha. I was afterwards assigned to the second cavalry division as surgeon. I was surgeon-in-chief of the brigade, of the division, and of the corps for a short time. I resided before the war in Charlestown, West Virginia.

Q. As such surgeon did you become acquainted with the fact that there was a large number of deserters from the army.

A. Yes, sir. I knew quite a number who were marked deserters, in our command especially.

Q. State whether, after you were discharged from the army, you conceived the idea of attempting to get those deserters, or any of them, restored?

A. I did. I knew a number of men who were marked deserters who should not have been so marked, and as far as that could be corrected, before the command was mustered out, it was done. I made application and had several restored. The applications were made to General Hancock, commanding the middle military division, and he restored those whom the evidence warranted him in restoring.

Q. Were you at Martinsburg some time last fall?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you make up a list of men to make application to have them restored?

A. I did.

Q. How many names did that list contain?

A. One hundred and ninety-three, I think.

(Witness produces a copy of the list, which is appended to his testimony, marked Exhibit A.)

Q. What was your motive in getting these men pardoned?

A. I expected to be paid for it, of course. I have been acting as claim agent for the soldiers of our division.

Q. Having this list, state whether you conceived the design of applying to anybody to get political influence for that purpose?

A. I did. I applied to Mr. Andrews, of Berkley county, the editor of the Era, who was then a candidate for Congress in opposition to Mr. Kitchen, the present member for that district. I applied to him through his son, the father being then absent canvassing.

Q. What was the message that you sent by the son to the father?

A. That the restoration of those men would be of great importance to him in his election. That was the subject we had in discussion.

Q. Did you receive an answer to that message?

A. I did, in the form of a letter to the President of the United States by Mr. Andrews. I think I have a copy of the letter, and, if so, I will furnish it to the committee. It stated that it would be a matter of great political importance to have those men restored; that they nearly all resided in his congressional district, and that the majority of them would vote the democratic ticket. I received this letter three or four days after I had sent the message by the son. Two or three telegraphic despatches had passed between us. The son named a time when the father would be at home. I went to see him, but he was not at home, and the son furnished me with this letter.

Q. What did you do with the letter?

A. I gave it, with the list, to Thomas B. Florence.

Q. How was this list headed?

A. "List of deserters," giving regiments and companies. My impression is that the original list had that heading, but I am not positive.

Q. Do you recollect whether you gave any other paper to Mr. Florence, except Mr. Andrews's letter and this list?

A. I do not think I did, unless it may have been some short statement of my own; but I do not recollect.

Q. What did you tell Mr. Florence that you desired to have done with the letter and list?

A. I wished him to get those men relieved of the charge of desertion, which would place them on the rolls again. He said he would attend to it. I think I saw him again about two days after that. He said that the application looked very favorable, and that he thought it probable the men would be restored. When I called again the second time he furnished me with the order of restoration.

(Witness produces the order removing all pains and penalties from the men named therein on account of the charge of desertion. It is dated Adjutant General's Office, November 21, 1866, signed by E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant General, and is addressed to "Dr. M. McEwen, care of Hon. T. B. Florence, Washington, D. C." The order and envelope in which it was enclosed are attached to this testimony, marked Exhibit B.)

Q. As to how many on that list did you, of your own knowledge, know anything of the merits of their application?

A. I was personally acquainted with nearly all the cavalry men.

Q. As to how many of them had you any written evidence of the merits of their application?

A. I had no evidence at all from their officers.

Q. Did you file any evidence in the War Department?

A. I did not. There were no papers filed except what I have already stated. I am satisfied that no one had anything to do with the application but myself.

Q. How long prior to the election did you get the order restoring these men?

A. A very few days—not over three or four.

Q. As claim agent, what did you suppose would be the amount of penalties and forfeitures that would be lost to those men in case they were not restored, and that would come to them in case they were restored?

A. Some ran as high as $600, and others not over $100. Taking them altogether, I suppose the aggregate amount might be safely put at $75,000.

Q. How much were you to have, as claim agent, in case they were restored?

A. Those with whom I had my understanding were to give me one half. With many of them I have had no understanding at all.

Q. With how many had you such an understanding?

A. With nearly all the cavalry men.

Q. You had no understanding with the infantry men?

A. No, sir; there has been nothing done with any of them.

Q. When you received that order from Thomas B. Florence, did you pay him any money therefor, as a reward for his services?

A. I did.

Q. How much?

A. I paid him $1,000.

Q. In what form?

A. In ten dollar notes.

Q. Did you take any receipt?

A. I did not.

Q. Do you know any other matter or thing in relation to these men which the committee ought to know?

A. I do not know of anything else. I think I have told all.

Q. Do you know one Capehart, who has been a witness before this committee?

A. Yes; he was lieutenant colonel of the 1st Virginia cavalry, a regiment in my division.

Q. Since he has been a witness has he made any communication to you in writing?

A. He has.

(Witness produces a letter from C. E. Capehart, dated March 23, 1867, which is put in evidence and is attached to this record, marked Exhibit C.)

Q. Did you receive this letter the day it is dated?

A. I did. He called at the office, but I was absent. I had not seen him or spoken to him for a long time, perhaps six months. He left the note for me. I did not call upon him, as he requested; but he watched for me and saw me on Seventh street. He asked me why I did not come. I told him I did not desire to come, as it was a matter which I did not suppose I had anything to do with. He entered into a conversation, and told me the importance of it. I told him I could not see it; that I could not see anything in it at all. The application for the restoration of those five men of the 22d Pennsylvania cavalry was made to General Hancock, and strong evidence was filed to show that they should be restored; and I did not see anything wrong in restoring them. That was about the substance of the conversation. They were recommended very strongly by Major Myers, also by Hon. George V. Lawrence. I have here a rough copy of Mr. Lawrence's recommendation. I think Mr. Lawrence's letter was written by himself.

(Witness produces the copy which is attached to this testimony, marked Exhibit D.)

Q. Can you state approximately the amount of forfeited pay that was coming to these five soldiers?

A. One was awarded $8 33, and one some $20. They were with the command till after the surrender of Lee, and they were restored because they had been good soldiers. They had gone home and overstayed their time, and were marked deserters. The aggregate amount coming to them was about $500, perhaps $550.

Q. Do you know any other thing about those men than what you have stated, which would be of interest to the committee?

A. No, I think not.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you recommend all those men to Mr. Florence as worthy of restoration?

A. I do not recollect that we had much conversation, if any, about them. I do not think there was any question or conversation between us on that subject.

Q. Did you make any recommendation to him at all?

A. Not that I am aware of. I do not recollect saying anything to him about them. I may have said to him that all these cavalry men were deserving men and should be restored. That was a fact. I think it probable I said so to Mr. Florence. I do not recollect, but I should say so to any one.

Q. Did you ask Mr. Florence to intercede for their restoration, without giving him any assurance that they were deserving of it?

A. I think the letter of Mr. Andrews was the principal ground I gave him.

Q. Did you know anything of the infantry deserters on the list?

A. I may have known two or three of them.

Q. Were they deserving men?

A. These two or three were very deserving men.

Q. Did you not tell Mr. Florence that?

A. No, sir. I did not call his attention to any particular case.

Q. Had you any information yourself about the other men?

A. No, sir.

Q. How did you come by their names?

A. I had the report furnished me by the adjutant general of the State.

Q. Have you become acquainted with any of those men since that time?

A. No, sir; nothing has been done with them since.

Q. Have you got your pay from any of them?

A. No, sir; not a cent. There have been only three claims filed, and those were of cavalry men.

Q. Where were you and Colonel Florence when you presented him with Mr. Andrews's letter?

A. I was in Colonel Florence's office, in this city. That was the 23d or 24th of October, 1866.

Q. Were you personally acquainted with Mr. Andrews?

A. No, sir. I knew Mr. Kitchen very well, but not Mr. Andrews.

Q. Did you make a like application to Mr. Kitchen?

A. No, sir.

Q. By what authority did you represent to Mr. Andrews that they would vote the democratic ticket?

A. I had no special authority for it. Mr. Andrews's son and I talked the matter over. We both entertained the idea that most of those men would vote the democratic ticket—at least they would vote for his father.

Q. Did you send that word to Mr. Andrews?
A. I do not know that I told his son to tell him so.
Q. What word did you send to Mr. Andrews?
A. That I wanted to get these men restored.
Q. For what reason?
A. It was a matter of business with me.
Q. What reason did you assign to him?
A. A political reason—that they would probably vote for him.
Q. By what authority did you state that, when you had never spoken to the men about it?
A. Some of them I knew would. I had no special authority from the men to say so.
Q. Did you know how any of those infantry men, excepting two of them, would vote?
A. No; I never consulted them on the subject.
Q. Do you know how they did vote?
A. They did not get to vote at all. The papers could not have reached them in time to vote. I knew a good many of the cavalry men who belonged to the democratic party.
Q. Did you know some of them who did not?
A. Yes. They do not all entertain the same political views in the army.
Q. Then your real purpose in representing that they would probably support Mr. Andrews was to get his influence?
A. Certainly. It was a business matter with me; with Mr. Andrews it was political, of course. The presumption was that they would vote for the man who had done them such a favor. They would be ungrateful if they did not.
Q. How long have you known Capehart?
A. I knew him in the army, from his regiment being a part of our command. I never was intimate with him.
Q. Where did you see him the other day?
A. On Seventh street. He was standing, waiting for me, I supposed. I did not want to see him. When he sent me the note I made up my mind that I would not go to see him.
Q. Why?
A. I did not want to have anything to do with him.
Q. Is he not a man of good character?
A. Some think a good deal of him. I do not. It is a difference of opinion. I would not want him to testify against me.
Q. Was that the reason you would not see him—because you thought him a man of bad character?
A. It was because I did not wish to have anything to do with him.
Q. Because you did not think him a man of good character?
A. That was my reason.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. When you had this interview with Mr. Florence was he to see the President of the United States?
A. He said he would.
Q. Did you put it on political grounds to Mr. Florence?
A. Yes, sir. I handed him the paper and told him to look over it, and he read it over. He is crowded in his office all the time, and I could hardly have a chance to talk to him. There was very little conversation between us the day I gave him the papers. There was no chance to talk to him.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was Capehart present at the time you handed the papers to Florence?

A. O, no; Capehart knew nothing about it.

Q. Was he present at any time when you saw Colonel Florence?

A. No, sir; I never went with him to Florence's office; and I never saw them together that I know of.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you recollect Florence being at your office in reference to the Pennsylvania deserters?

A. Mr. Florence never was at my office.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did Florence and you ever have anything to do about the five Pennsylvania men?

A. No, sir; I never saw him in reference to those men at all.

Q. Did you, yourself, write any letter to the President about those five men?

A. I think not. I do not know of any.

Q. Did you show a letter to Mr. Capehart which you said you had written, or partly written, to the President?

A. I think not. I have no knowledge of anything of the kind. He spoke to me about that, and I told him that I did not recollect any such paper.

Q. Were you and Capehart occupying the same office?

A. O, no.

Q. Were you and he very intimate?

A. No, sir; we did not even associate.

Q. Were you in partnership, or in company, in any way with him?

A. No, sir; he was assisting in getting some men of his own regiment restored through General Hancock.

Q. Did you share in the profits in any manner?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were you in the habit of writing letters and leaving them on your table, to be read by him when he came in?

A. Not that I know of. If he ever came in and read any there, I have no knowledge of it.

Q. Do you recollect showing him a letter, which purported to be written to the President, about these five men, and asking him to read it?

A. I do not.

Q. Or his telling you that he saw it on your desk, and read it?

A. I do not recollect any such letter. I do not recollect ever making any such appointment with him.

Q. When those five men were restored, were you on such relations that he was in your office while you were out?

A. He used to come to my office occasionally. I guess he came there very seldom.

Q. Did you write your own letters at that time, or were they written by a clerk?

A. I generally write all my own letters.

Q. Did your clerk write a letter for you, in reference to these five men, to the President?

A. No, sir.

Q. Are you sure of that?

A. I am sure of it. I am very sure of it.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1867.

WITNESS recalled and examination continued.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you made search for the copy of the letter from Mr. Andrews to the President of the United States?

A. I did, but I have been unable to find it, and I am inclined to think that I did not take a copy of it. It was an open letter. I have been thinking it over, and have made a memorandum of the substance of the letter, according to my best recollection.

(Witness produces the memorandum annexed.)

His Excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States:

SIR: The accompanying list embraces the names of nearly two hundred soldiers, who are disfranchised by the charge of desertion. The great majority of these men reside in my congressional district. It would be doing me a great service to have the charge removed, and thus enable them to vote at the approaching election. The contest will, without doubt, be a very close one, and I feel well assured the restoration of these men will result in my election, provided it can be done immediately.

The letter was dated, I think, about October 20, 1866.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You stated the other day that none of these persons did vote at the election?

A. No, sir; they did not get notice of it in time. There was considerable delay in the War Department.

AGENCY OF THE NORTH AMERICAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,

Washington, D. C., March 23, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I called to see you, but found you absent, and I had but one moment to stay. I was summoned to appear before the Judiciary Committee on the impeachment of the President, and was sworn and examined to-day. It was on the pardon of those five men, you remember, of the 22d Pennsylvania cavalry, of which you know all about. I want to see you this evening, as you will be summoned by the committee in the matter. Call at Mr. Hammond's restaurant at 6 o'clock, p. m. And I want to know whether you mentioned the matter to any one, as they had all the questions wrote out, and they appeared to know all about it. You will please call at the appointed time, as I can tell you all about it.

C. E. CAPEHART.

Colonel MCEWEN.

P. S —This matter is confidential on the part of the government, so say nothing to any one.

EXHIBIT D.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 7, 1866.

I know the soldiers named in the foregoing statement, made by H. A. Myers, late a major of said regiment. They all live in my neighborhood, are young men belonging to respectable families, and have borne excellent reputations as soldiers and citizens. It affords me much pleasure to endorse the affidavit of Mr. Myers. I do sincerely hope you will be able to remove the charge of desertion in these cases, otherwise they get no pay or bounty and are disfranchised for life. Trusting this application will receive your most favorable consideration, I have the honor to be,

Yours most respectfully,

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 4 and 5, 1867.

WILLIAM HUNTER, Second Assistant Secretary of State, sworn and examined.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. Did John McGinnis, jr., receive a commission as minister to Sweden?

A. He did.

Q. What is the date of the commission?

A. 16th November.

Q. When was the commission actually delivered to Mr. McGinnis?

A. 21st December.

(Witness produces a copy of the commission, which is appended to his testimony.)

Q. When was the commission actually made out?

A. I cannot say. It was made out by George Bartle, the commission clerk in the department.

Q. When was the order for the commission issued?

A. There is no written order on file in the department. The order, as I understand from Mr. Bartle, came to him from the chief clerk, to whom, I presume, it was orally communicated by the Secretary.

Q. Do you know of any commission from the State Department being antedated?

A. No, sir, I do not. The invariable rule is, when a man is appointed during the session of Congress, to have his commission dated from the day of his confirmation; and when he is appointed during the recess, his commission dates from the day of the President's order directing the appointment.

Q. You do not recollect how it was in this particular case?

A. I do not. I never saw Mr. McGinnis, to my knowledge, and knew nothing about him, and was very much surprised to hear of his appointment, under the circumstances.

Q. Can you tell, by any record in your office, at what time the President's order for this appointment was received in the State Department?

A. I cannot. Appointments are not invariably made on the written order of the President. Sometimes the order is conveyed orally to the Secretary of State, who puts the name on paper, and sends it to the commission clerk or chief clerk, with directions to have the commission made out.

Q. What do you understand to be the amount allowed to Mr. McGinnis, either as salary or outfit?

A. There is no outfit allowed now in any shape. If his commission were dated 16th November, and delivered to him 21st December, he was entitled to a month's salary, but not for a day beyond that. There is a very wise Act of Congress in relation to these diplomatic appointments, correcting an evil that formerly prevailed, and by which persons receiving commissions and awaiting instructions are limited to thirty days' salary. If they leave for their mission before the thirty days expire they are entitled to salary only for the time they wait; but if they wait a day or two, or any number of days after the thirty days, they do so at their own expense. Under the old system of outfits there were a great many abuses.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did Mr. McGinnis receive instructions about the time he left?

A. He did.

Q. And after the meeting of Congress?

A. After the meeting of Congress. I presume his commission and instructions were delivered to him at the same time.

Q. The effect of his leaving is that his salary goes on?

A. Yes, sir; until he receives notice of the decision of the Senate in relation to his appointment.

Q. Had not his nomination been already sent to the Senate at the time he received his commission?

A. I do not know about that.

Q. Do you know whether he was advised by anybody in the State Department, or in the Treasury Department, that he should leave the country without waiting for the action of the Senate?

A. I do not. I never saw Mr. McGinnis, and know nothing about his antecedents.

W. HUNTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1867.

GEORGE BARTLE sworn and examined.

By Mr. COOK:

Q. What is your official position?

A. Commission clerk in the State Department.

Q. Did you make out the commission of John McGinnis, jr., as minister resident to Stockholm?

A. I did, to the best of my knowledge. Sometimes I have a good deal of business on hand, and have my assistant in my room to make out commissions. My best impression is, that I made out this commission myself.

Q. Can you tell the committee what time you made it out?

A. I am not prepared to say, but I think I made it out the day that the commission bears date.

Q. Have you any means by which you can fix the exact time that it was made out?

A. I have not. I never keep a memorandum of the dates on which commissions are made out.

Q. How do you fix the date of the commission?

A. When the appointment is made during the recess of Congress, we date the commission from the day of the appointment. When the appointment is made during the session of Congress, the commission is dated the day of the confirmation.

Q. Are commissions always made out on written orders?

A. No, sir; sometimes there are verbal orders, and sometimes a mere pencil memorandum, which I afterwards throw aside.

Q. Do you know whether this commission of Mr. McGinnis was made out on a verbal or on a written order?

A. I do not, but my impression is that it was on a verbal order.

Q. Given by whom?

A. By Mr. Chew, I think, though I am not positive about that.

Q. Mr. Chew is the chief clerk?

A. Yes.

Q. When commissions are made out upon a verbal order, how do you designate the time that they are to bear date; is it by the time when you receive the order?

A. Yes, sir, that is the usual course pursued.

Q. Do you recollect whether or not this commission of Mr. McGinnis was dated on the day that it was actually prepared?

A. No, sir, I do not.

Q. Have you any recollection of the circumstances, so as to be able to state definitely whether it was made out on the day that you received the order from Mr. Chew?

A. My best recollection is that it was made out the day the order was given. I have never ante-dated a commission to my knowledge.

Q. If the order was given one day, and the commission were made out a subsequent day, must it not necessarily have been ante-dated?

A. If an order were given to-day, and I had not time to make out the commission, I might possibly date it to the next day, when I did make out the commission. The rule I have always observed is, that if I have an order to make out a commission to-day, and do not make it out until to-morrow, I date it the day I receive the order; but I might possibly date it the day I make out the commission.

Q. Then you have no rule on the subject?

A. No, sir.

Q. Suppose the order were a written one from the President of the United States, dated the 1st of February, and you should fill up the commission on the 1st of March, what date would you put on the commission?

A. If the order were received from the President on the 1st of February, and if there were no particular direction on the subject, I should date the commission on that day.

Q. Suppose the order were a verbal one, given you on the 1st of February, and you did not make out the commission until the 1st of March, what date would you put on the commission?

A. I do not know that I can answer that question, because I never left an order unfilled that length of time.

Q. Suppose there were five days between the date of the order and the time of filling the commission?

A. I would date it the day I received the order, although, as I said before, there was no rule on the subject.

Q. Suppose you received a verbal order, the last of November, to fill up a commission for a minister resident at Stockholm, and that you should delay doing so till the first Monday in December, the day Congress meets, what date would you put in that commission?

A. I should very likely put in the day when it was ordered.

Q. Why?

A. When an order is given during the recess of the Senate, we generally date the commission the day of the order; but when an order is given during the session of the Senate, we wait until the appointment is confirmed, and date the commission on that day. If this order were given during the recess of the Senate, we should probably date it the day of the order.

Q. And that whether the order was verbal or written?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did I understand you to say that you have no recollection of this particular case?

A. I have not. The best recollection I have of it is that the commission was made out on the day it was ordered.

Q. Do you know when it was delivered?

A. No, sir; that matter I do not have charge of. I merely make out the commission, and then it goes into the hands of another person.

Q. When did it go to the President for his signature?

A. That I cannot say. I kept no memorandum of that. I simply make out the commission, send it up for signature, record it when it returns, and then deliver it to the clerk who has charge of it.

Q. Who has charge of commissions after they are signed?

A. One of the diplomatic clerks—I think Mr. Chilton; although I am not sure.

Q. Who carries commissions to the President?

A. The messenger, I presume; I do not know.

Q. To whom did you deliver this commission of Mr. McGinnis, when you made it out, to be carried to the President?

A. I cannot answer that. I suppose I delivered it to one of the messengers to be brought down stairs. It is possible I may have carried it myself to Mr. Chilton. I have no recollection about it.

Q. Please to state what the records of the State Department show in reference to this appointment—as to the filling up of the commission, the signing of it by the President, the return to the department, and its delivery to Mr. McGinnis.

A. The records of the department will not show anything except the recording of the commission.

Q. Will not the records of the department disclose more than that concerning other commissions to persons appointed during the recess of the Senate?

A. No, sir, I do not think they will. There may possibly be some such cases, but I cannot call them to mind now.

Q. Are you positive that the order to fill out this commission of Mr. McGinnis was a verbal order?

A. No, sir; I am not.

Q. Can you ascertain whether or not it was a verbal order?

A. I don't think I can. As I said before, I have no memoranda. My impression is that the order came from Mr. Chew verbally.

Q. Do you not enter on books in your office the date of filling up of the commission?

A. Only such date as the commision bears; no other date.

Q. Then there is nothing on your books disclosing the time when the commission was actually made out?

A. No, sir, I do not think there has been any such record kept in the office.

Q. Into whose hands do commissions go after coming from the President?

A. They come to me for record.

Q. Can you inform the committee what was the date of the return to you of Mr. McGinnis's commission for record?

A. No, sir.

Q. Can you give the date of its being recorded?

A. No, sir; there has not been, since I have been in the department, any such entry made.

Q. Do you preserve those pencil memoranda or orders for commissions?

A. No, sir, I do not.

Q. How are those commissions recorded in your department?

A. There are special books for the different commissions—for commissions of ministers, of consuls, &c.

Q. According to your best recollection, you made out this commission of Mr. McGinnis in your own handwriting?

A. My impression is I did.

Q. How distinct is that impression?

A. It is very strong; although, as I stated before, it may have happened that I got my assistant to do it. I am very strongly impressed, however, that I made it out myself.

Q. You think the order to fill up this commission was communicated to you by Mr. Chew?

A. I think so.

Q. At what time did this commission leave your custody?

A. After it received the signature of the Secretary. Probably not more than a day elapsed, when it was sent to the clerk who has charge of these matters.

Q. Can you ascertain the date?

A. I cannot ascertain the date on which it left my custody.
Q. Into whose hands did it go when it left your custody?
A. It should have gone into Mr. Chilton Robb's.
Q. Do you know whether it did go into his hands?
A. I think it did.
Q. Is there any record kept of the time that the commission leaves the department?
A. No.
Q. No record of the date of its delivery?
A. There might be a record of its delivery by some other clerk. On making out commissions to the Post Office Department I do not write the letters accompanying them; I simply enclose them, when they are made out, to the Postmaster General.
Q. Of course, a commission of this kind would not go to any other department?
A. No, sir; nor would I know anything of its disposition after it left my hands.
Q. Do you know whether there is any record kept of the commissions sent by mail, or of those delivered in any other way?
A. I presume there might be a record in another branch of the department, but my work is done when I make out a commission of that character and report it.
Q. Who places the seal of the United States upon commissions?
A. I do.
Q. At what time do you affix the seal?
A. As soon as ever it receives the countersign of the Secretary.
Q. Which is after the signature by the President?
A. Yes.
Q. Is there any way by which you can ascertain the date of the sealing of a commission?
A. No.

By Mr. COOPER:

Q. You say this commission is recorded in a book; what commissions are recorded in that same book—the commissions merely of ministers?
A. All diplomatic officers, ministers resident, envoys extraordinary, secretaries of legation, and perhaps some others of a diplomatic character; but they are entirely kept separate from the consular.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can any member of the committee of the House of Representatives, charged with an investigation in connection with any act of the State Department, be privileged to examine the records of the department?
A. That question lies entirely with the Secretary.
Q. You have no rule upon the subject?
A. No.
Q. Is it customary or not to permit it?
A. I have never known a case in the business with which I am connected that any person was authorized to examine the records except myself. I might say, however, there might be cases where the Secretary may give permission. I don't know what he might authorize in such a matter, but I have no knowledge of any examination being made of the records.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18, 1867.

Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. In Executive Document No. 14, printed by the Senate at the present session, page four, is a list of names of officers of the internal revenue appointed during the recess of the Senate in 1865, whose names were withheld from the Senate the following session, but have continued in office to the adjournment thereof; have you the papers relating to the officers spoken of in that list?

A. I have brought with me a statement of the facts in each case to which my attention has been called, and which I hand to the committee for such use as they see proper to make of it. In each case the appointment clerk states that the nomination was accidentally omitted. I apprehend that the accidental omission is to be attributed to the fact that the secretary of the President having the matter in charge, was, near the close of the session, engaged elsewhere, and that the nominations were, therefore, overlooked.

Q. Is it the custom of the department to send to the President, at or about the commencement of the session, the names of persons who have been appointed during the recess?

A. The practice of the department is to send them in during the session; sometimes at an early day and sometimes at a later day. The custom officers were appointed for four years, and most of their terms expired during the recess, and all, or nearly all, of whom received temporary commissions. It was the intention of the department that all the nominations should be sent to the Senate. We sent to the President, I think, the nominations for all the offices which had been filled during the recess, to be filled permanently, with the consent of the Senate; and I supposed at the adjournment that all the nominations had been acted upon.

Q. Is it not the practice to prepare, with your list, the customary message which the President sends in making the nomination?

A. We do not usually send from the department a list of the offices to be filled. We send to the President separate nominations, with a statement of the recommendations, if there are any, in each case, and a letter of nomination, to be signed by the President and forwarded by him to the Senate; so that there is a communication to the Senate with each nomination.

Q. Considering for the present occasion, the names of the persons connected with the internal revenue offices, were there not many other appointments made during the recess besides these which were not sent in, as shown in this statement, and whose nominations were made to the Senate and acted upon during the session of 1865–'6.

A. I don't know how many in the Internal Revenue Bureau. There were very few changes made in the officers of internal revenue. There were no vacancies that I can remember of, occurring by death. Officers of the internal revenue hold their positions indefinitely. I do not think there were many nominations made. Nearly all the officers of customs, however, were temporarily appointed during the recess of the Senate, their terms of office having expired after the Senate adjourned.

Q. Your statement is, that these names were sent to the President to be nominated by him to the Senate, and, that until the adjournment, you supposed they had been nominated to the Senate for action?

A. That is my impression; in fact, I am quite sure of it. I supposed that all the nominations had been sent to the Senate, but upon ascertaining that such was not the fact, we immediately took the necessary steps to have the offices filled.

Q. Under the head of "remarks," it appears that some of these persons were not nominated to the Senate, and that they were still in office; have they been recommissioned, or are they still holding their old appointments?

A. Mr. Cadwallader, assessor of the fifth district of Pennsylvania, I think, has not been recommissioned. It was not discovered until some time after the Senate adjourned, that he had not been nominated for the place he held. The name of Nathan C. James was sent in as his successor during the present session, and his nomination has been rejected by the Senate. By some oversight, the fact that Mr. Cadwallader's name had not been sent to the Senate at the previous session was not discovered, and he continued to hold over under his old appointment.

Q. Was Peter McGough recommissioned?

A. He was not. His case was a singular one. He has been holding office without his nomination having been acted upon since 1864. The error was first committed in the office of internal revenue. As soon as it was discovered that his nomination had not been sent to the Senate, a nomination was sent in, and is now before the Senate.

Q. How soon after the adjournment of Congress did you discover that these errors had occurred?

A. The different errors were discovered from time to time. The fact that the nominations for surveyor of customs and naval officer for Philadelphia had not been sent to the Senate, was discovered pretty soon after the adjournment of the Senate, and on the 3d of August, temporary appointments were given to the officers who had been holding their respective offices for the previous four years.

Q. It appears that in the case of the naval officer, Joseph R. Flannigan was appointed in the place of Mr. Wallace on the 16th of September, 1866.

A. Mr. Wallace was recommissioned on the 3d of August, 1866, and removed on the 16th of September, by the appointment of Joseph R. Flannigan, whose name was sent to the Senate and has been acted upon unfavorably.

Q. Was there not a list made out at the internal revenue office soon after the adjournment of Congress showing the vacancies which existed in consequence of the failure to nominate to the Senate?

A. If so, it never came to my observation. My impression is that these errors were discovered at different times, and communicated by the Commissioner of internal revenue to the department, or else the discovery was made in the appointment office. I do not recollect by what means my attention was called to the omissions.

Q. In each case where a person appointed during the recess was confirmed by the Senate, it would be necessary for him to file a new bond and take the oath anew, would it not?

A. In all cases.

Q. Then the records of the office would show at once, would they not, who had been qualified from the several districts?

A. Certainly they ought, and do in cases where bonds are required.

Q. So that really there would be no difficulty in seeing at a glance on the books of the office whether these places had been filled in the regular way?

A. I do not know how the records are kept in the office of internal revenue. There should have been a list kept from which it would have been easy to have ascertained the omissions.

(The following addition to this answer was subsequently made by witness:)

The following statement by the appointment clerk affords the necessary information on this point: "In all cases the oath of office is required to be filed before the commission is issued, and in case of bonded officers commissions are not issued until the bonds are filed and approved, which requires considerable time. The appointment clerk is, or should be, notified by the commissioners of customs and of internal revenue when the parties commissioned have been duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties. When many cases are pending, errors and omissions will sometimes occur without being immediately discovered."

Q. Did you take any advice or form any opinion as to the legality of allowing these officers who had been appointed during the recess, and whose nominations were not sent in during the session of 1865, to hold office after the adjournment of Congress?

A. I supposed they held without authority of law, and therefore took the earliest opportunity to have new appointments made after my attention was called to the fact of the omissions referred to.

Q. The list shows two persons to have continued to hold on until now, under the appointment made during the recess, after the session of 1864–'65?

A. Yes; Mr. Cadwallader and Mr. McGough, in reference to whom statement has been made already.

Q. Does it not follow that all their proceedings are either void or voidable?

A. Hardly. I do not suppose their proceedings would be void. The only question considered was whether in case of any defalcation the sureties would be liable.

Q. What opinion did you have in regard to that?

A. My opinion was that the sureties would not be liable.

Q. Have you with you all the papers that have been filed in reference to the appointment, or applications for the appointment, in case of the naval officer at Philadelphia?

A. I have all the papers on file in regard to the appointment of Flannigan as naval officer. Mr. Flannigan was appointed by the President, and no papers are on file recommending him. It was one of the few appointments that were directed to be made by the President from his own personal knowledge and without any outside recommendations.

Q. Are there papers on file in regard to Wallace, or in regard to any other person who may have been an applicant for the place?

A. There are many papers on file recommending Joseph Severns for surveyor of the port of Philadelphia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of E. Reid Meyer.

Q. In regard to the appointment of Flannigan, have you any written direction for his appointment?

A. The only paper on file reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE, September 7, 1866.

Case of the application of J. R. Flannigan, for appointment as naval officer at Philadelphia, vice Dr. Wallace, removed.

Referred to the Hon. Secretary of the Treasury, who will please make this appointment.

By order of the President:

ROBERT JOHNSON, Private Secretary.

Q. Do you remember to have seen at any time any papers relating to the application of Mr. Flannigan?

A. I do not. My opinion is that this was an appointment made by the President from personal acquaintance with the applicant.

Q. The earliest appointment of any person to either of the offices named in the list of offices of the internal revenue is that of Andrew S. Holliday, of Nebraska, September 17, 1866. Were none of these ever discovered until at or about the time of this appointment?

(See statement appended.)

A. It is possible that my attention may have been called to the facts some little time before this appointment, but action was taken as soon as we had advice in regard to the proper persons to fill the vacancies. I do not think any considerable time intervened between my knowledge of the respective omissions and the necessary appointments.

Q. Why were these persons who had been appointed during the recess between the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth Congresses not reappointed?

A. A number of them were. Some of them were not, because other names were presented which were more acceptable to the Secretary and the President.

Q. Is it not true that the nominations of these appointees were withheld from the Senate because the occupants of the offices were unsatisfactory to the Secretary and the President?

A. I think not. My impression is that they were withheld purely from accident.

Q. What happened after the adjournment of the Senate, in reference to these men, which led to the substitution of others for them? Take, for instance, the case of Selfridge.

A. It was discovered that General Selfridge was holding without authority of law; that his name had not been sent to the Senate, and the question then came up, by whom should the office be filled? The President, on receiving satisfactory recommendation of Mr. Neimann, appointed him to the place held by General Selfridge.

Q. It was not the fault of General Selfridge that he held without authority of law, was it?

A. It was not. The fault in this case may have been in the Treasury Department, although I think our appointment clerk is of the opinion that General Selfridge's name was sent to the President. It is a matter about which I am not entirely clear. I know I was quite surprised that the Senate should adjourn without any action being taken in his case, and upon discovering that his nomination had not been acted upon, I took the necessary steps to have the omission corrected.

Q. If it was your intention, and the intention of the President, so far as known, to send in the name of General Selfridge, and that intention remained through the last session of the Senate, what occurred afterwards that changed your view, or that of the President, in reference to his being reappointed?

A. There was nothing special that I recollect of in the case. When it was discovered that the office was vacant, the question then arose, how should it be filled? And, after giving the matter a careful examination and examining the papers on file, the President concluded, I think, on the advice of the Secretary, to appoint Mr. Neimann in his place.

Q. Have you the papers in behalf of Mr. Neimann?

A. I have.

Q. Will you give the names of the parties who recommended Mr. Neimann, and the date of the recommendations?

A. There is one fact I have omitted to state. Soon after it was discovered that the name of General Selfridge had not been sent to the Senate, Charles Glanz was appointed, but declined to accept the appointment. He declined on the 29th of October, on the ground that he was engaged in brewing, and he thought it might be inconsistent with his duties to the government, as an officer, to continue his business, which he was not then in a condition to close up. In sending in his declination, he recommended Mr. Neimann, under date of October 29. On the 1st of November Mr. Neimann appears to have been recommended by D. M. Van Auken, and on the 6th of November by Philip Johnson, the representative of the district in Congress; on the 9th of the same month by O. B. Hetrich, the collector of the district.

Q. If there are other papers relating to that district, please give the names of the persons representing other parties.

A. General Selfridge had on file a number of endorsements which he wished to have returned, and which have been returned. There was one endorsement from General Sherman. The only paper I have with me, asking for the appointment of General Selfridge, is that of Mr. A. Miller, dated the 8th of November. There may have been other papers in his behalf which I did not suppose the committee would desire to inquire into, and which I have not here.

Q. In the case of the fifth district of Wisconsin, I ask you by whom was Mr. Sorrenson recommended?

A. The only paper I find on file is a letter I addressed to Postmaster General Randall, under date of September 25, asking him to name a man who, in his opinion, was most fit to be appointed as assessor in that district, and on that letter, which was returned, I find the name of Adolph Sorrenson in the handwriting of the Postmaster General. I apprehend he must have returned the letter personally.

Q. Mr. Garry had held office until the date of that letter, in September, 1866?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What objection had you to Mr. Garry which led you to ask the Postmaster General to suggest another name?

A. I knew nothing about the incumbent. The office was vacant, and I desired to have it filled in a manner which would meet the approbation of Mr. Randall, who, I supposed, would be as likely to give me reliable information in regard to the men who were applicants for offices in that State as any one.

Q. In the case of Nebraska, Mr. Holliday seems to have been appointed in the place of a man by the name of Burbank. What papers are on file in regard to this appointment?

A. There are on file the following papers: A communication to the President, dated August 28, 1866, recommending Mr. Holliday, signed by E. Worthney, H. C. Lett, James Berry, W. H. Hackney, S. R. Jamison, Samuel Crane, and James Craig. On the 7th of September a communication was received by the Secretary from General J. W. Denver, recommending Mr. Holliday, and asking for his appointment. These are all the papers on file relating to Mr. Holliday. There are other papers on file, under date of September 13—one from Mr. Hitchcock, the delegate from the Territory, recommending Frederick Renner, and one under date of January 29, also recommending him.

Q. According to this printed statement before referred to, a man by the name of Burbank was appointed in the place of Thomas W. Tipton. Are there any papers on file in relation to the appointment of Burbank?

A. It seems, from the papers, that Tipton was appointed in the place of Burbank, who resigned, and Holliday was appointed in place of Tipton, whose name had not been sent to the Senate.

Q. Are there any papers on file in relation to the second district of Georgia?

A. There are certain papers on file in regard to that case. J. E. Webster was appointed assessor on the recommendation of Governor Johnson, who addressed a letter in his behalf to the President, under date of June 19, 1865. Upon the discovery that his name had not been sent to the Senate, a temporary commission was issued to him on the 10th of October, 1866. He was nominated to the Senate January 14, 1867, and confirmed February 1, 1867.

Q. In the fifth Pennsylvania district what papers are on file in the case of A. S Cadwallader?

A. There are a number of papers on file. He was appointed on the 13th of September, 1865, in place of Cowan, resigned. It was not discovered or brought to my attention until a considerable time after the adjournment of the Senate that his nomination had not been sent to the Senate for action. As soon as practicable after the discovery of this omission was made, steps were taken to fill the vacancy, and the name of Nathan James was sent to the Senate on the 7th of January, 1867. No temporary appointment was made during the recess.

Q. Why was Mr. Cadwallader not continued in office?

A. I know of no other reason than that the President preferred, with the papers before him, to send to the Senate the name of Mr. James, who was strongly recommended.

Q. Please give the names of persons who recommended Mr. James, and the grounds on which they recommended him.

A. He was recommended by S. J. Randall, on the ground that his appointment would be satisfactory to the friends of the administration, and on account of his capacity and integrity. Mr. Cadwallader's removal was asked for by Mr. Ross, the democratic candidate for Congress, for the reason that he was contributing his money and means and individual exertions for his (Ross's) defeat. Mr. Ross recommended the appointment of James on political grounds.

Q. In any of the papers, so far as you know in this case, are there any charges of official misconduct or incapacity against Mr. Cadwallader?

A. None that I am aware of. His removal was strongly urged; but it was not thought advisable to remove him or take any action in his case until the Senate could have an opportunity to act upon the nomination of a successor.

Q. And Mr. James, recommended by Mr. Ross, was nominated at the present session?

A. He was. No removal was made, although Mr. Ross asked for it.

Q. In the case of the third district of Missouri, what papers are there on file in reference to the appointment of Mr. Glover?

A. The papers show that Mr. Ingham was appointed collector of that district, under a new organization of the Missouri districts, on the 29th of April, 1865. His name was accidentally omitted to be sent to the Senate, and on the 26th of September, Job W. Glover was appointed collector of that district.

Q. By whom was Glover recommended?

A. He was recommended for the place by the Missouri delegation to the Philadelphia Convention, in a communication addressed to the President, without date, but which seems to have been received by him on the 25th of August, 1866. That was the only recommendation.

Q. These papers state that Colonel Glover was previously nominated to that office by you; had Colonel Glover been nominated before?

A. I have no recollection of any previous nomination or appointment.

Q. In the letter of S. I. Glover the writer says that over three months ago his brother, J. W. Glover, was recommended by the people in that part of the State, &c.; have you any knowledge of that recommendation?

A. I do not find it on file; it may have been misplaced.

Q. In the case of the sixth Missouri district, what papers are on file in reference to the appointment of Mr. Black?

A. The only paper I find on file in relation to his appointment is a letter addressed to the Secretary under date of September 4, 1866, by Austin S. King.

Q. What reason did Mr. King offer for the appointment of Mr. Black?

A. In his letter to the Secretary he refers to certain recommendations of Mr. Black which had been forwarded to the President, but which I think have never been sent by the President to my department. He writes that that district is the most important one in the State, with a very heavy conservative population and great wealth; that under the deplorable political condition of the country, the people feel severely the opposition to the administration of President Johnson by the federal officers. He therefore asks the removal of the incumbent and the appointment of General Black. In this connection he does not allude to the qualifications of General Black, but refers to the strong recommendations that have been sent to the President.

Q. In the case of the fifth Michigan district, what papers are on file in support of the application of Seymour Brownell?

A. Mr. Brownell was recommended by a number of persons in a communication under date of August 29, by James B. Lee, a member of the State Executive Committee, under date of September 8, by General Morrow Morrill, by telegram, under date of October 1, and by a letter from D. E. Harborn, collector of the first district of Michigan, under date of October 16, and by Alfred Russell, by telegram of the same date.

Q. In Executive document No. 67, House of Representatives, present session, I find a list of names of persons appointed officers of the internal revenue, who have been rejected by the Senate in 1866; take as an example the case of Sloanaker, of the second district of Pennsylvania, who was rejected by the Senate July 10, 1866; what reasons, if any, existed for the reappointment of Mr. Sloanaker after he had been rejected by the Senate?

A. I am not aware of the reasons which influenced the President in that action. I think the President was advised that the Senate itself had reconsidered its action once or twice in relation to Sloanaker, and that he thought Sloanaker would make a good officer.

Q. He had been finally rejected by the Senate, however, had he not?

A. Yes, sir; and he was reappointed after his rejection.

Q. Do you know of any special reasons for the reappointment of any of these persons upon the list?

A. As this inquiry was not covered by the communication of the committee requesting me to appear before them, my attention has not been directed to these cases. I have some recollection of the cases of Glover and Crittenden, of the third and fifth districts of Missouri, Langdon of the first Ohio, and Loomis of the first Michigan. I think the appointments were made in these cases because the nominees had been soldiers, and were recommended as particularly meritorious. So far as the others are concerned, I have no recollection now of the reasons that operated upon my mind or the mind of the President (if they were ever communicated to me) for the action which was taken in their behalf.

Q. Did you recommend the reappointment of the persons you have named?

A. I recommended some of these persons myself. The offices were vacant, and I entertained the opinion that it was competent for the President to fill them by appointing the persons who were rejected by the Senate, notwithstanding their rejection.

Q. On this list there are two reappointments as early as the 3d of August, 1866, two or three days after the adjournment of the session. I refer to the cases of Sloanaker of Pennsylvania, and J. W. Stewart of the second Iowa district. By what means were you and the President informed that vacancies existed in these districts?

A. When nominations have been rejected by the Senate, advices of the rejections are sent to the President, and by the President to the Treasury Department. This is the usual course of procedure. The Senate advises the President of non-concurrence, in a communication sent to the Executive, which is in due time forwarded to the Treasury Department.

Q. One or two of these persons were rejected as early as the 26th of June. This was more than a month before the expiration of the session. Do you know why another nomination was not made?

A. I do not know. I have no particular recollection of any of these cases except the ones I have referred to. All the departments were crowded with business, and I presume that neither the President nor the Secretary in these cases could have acted advisedly more speedily than they did. I wish to say in regard to these nominations, which were to be sent by the President, that I had no reason to suppose that the omission was not purely accidental. I believe it to be attributable chiefly to the fact that Mr. Cooper, who had charge of these papers, was away from his office, and the papers of the office were therefore in some confusion.

The above testimony having been submitted to the witness, he added thereto the following:

I desire that the accompanying paper, &c., marked A, should be regarded as part of my testimony. H. McCULLOCH.

A.

The following answer is submitted in addition to the testimony of the Secretary before the Judiciary Committee, in reply to the question of Mr. Boutwell, which reads as follows: "The earliest appointment of any person to either of the offices named in the list of offices of the internal revenue is that of Andrew S. Holliday, of Nebraska, September 17, 1866; were none of these ever discovered until at or about the time of this appointment?"

The Appointment Bureau of the Secretary's office was in process of organization during the last session of Congress. The commissions for officers of customs, mint, assistant treasurers, supervising inspectors of steamboats, and heads of bureaus of Treasury Department, were issued from there during the session, and a complete record was kept of everything pertaining to appointments of the above description, and all applications for the offices kept properly filed. The fact that the nominations of two persons in the customs branch had been accidentally omitted from the Senate, was known at once by the appointment clerk, by reference to his records, and upon reporting the cases to the President, he directed temporary commissions to be immediately given to the officers whose nominations had been omitted, which was done three or four days after the adjournment of Congress.

It became the practice, during the second year of Mr. Chase's administration, of filing all applications for office under the internal revenue with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the commissions were made out there, and all information concerning appointments in that branch of the public service was kept by the Commissioner.

After the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the Secretary, in view of the inconvenience attending this arrangement, and the impossibility of keeping the records correct, directed on the 28th of August, 1866, (copy of order enclosed,) that all records, applications, &c., be transferred to his office and placed under charge of the appointment clerk, who was instructed thereafter to superintend the issuing of nominations and commissions, and the filing of applications, &c. The execution of this order occupied a week or more, and as soon as the transfer was completed, a thorough examination of the records revealed the fact that several persons were conducting offices without proper commissions. These facts were reported to the Secretary as fast as discovered, and action taken by him at the earliest practicable moment thereafter.

The foregoing are the reasons why the customs offices were filled at once by new appointments, and delay occasioned in cases of offices under the internal revenue similarly situated.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 28, 1866.

SIR: It has been decided, in view of the inconvenience experienced in this office by the filing of applications for officers under the internal revenue in your Bureau, to transfer all papers relating to appointments of collectors, assessors, and tax commissioners to the appointment room in the office of the Secretary; and you will therefore please turn over all such papers and records to Mr. Creecy, the appointment clerk, at the earliest practicable moment.

You will detail Mr. Goodhue, a clerk in your office, for temporary duty under the direction of Mr. Creecy.

I am, respectfully,

HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

E. A. ROLLINS, Esq.,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1867.

GEORGE PARNELL sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. State your name, residence, and occupation.

A. George Parnell; I reside in Washington City; I am at present Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Q. Is it within your knowledge that persons were appointed to the office of assessor or collector of internal revenue during the interval between the 38th and 39th Congresses, whose appointments were not submitted to the Senate at the next session?

A. Our records show that I was not in the office at that time.

Q. Have you examined the records to see how many such cases there were?

A. Not fully.

Q. Will you look at Executive Document No. 14, of the Senate, page 4, and see if the names contained in that list were so appointed and not nominated to the Senate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are there any others of the same slip whose names are not there?

A. I think not; I am not certain, however.

Q. Will you state what the practice of your office is in regard to appointments that are made during the recess of Congress?

A. We made out a list of such appointments after the meeting of Congress, and sent it over to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Q. Do you know how it was in December, 1865—whether such a list was made of the appointments?

A. I was not in the office at that time, but I have been told that such a list was made out some time prior to December 20.

Q. What officer had charge of that business at that time?

A. A clerk named Huntington had charge of it, under the deputy commissioner.

Q. When did you come into office?

A. About the 20th of December, I think.

Q. But you had been in the office before that in some capacity?

A. Yes, sir; I was, as revenue agent, and just previous to my appointment as deputy commissioner I acted as chief clerk, although holding my commission as revenue agent.

Q. What was done, if anything, in reference to appointments that had been made and not confirmed by the Senate?

A. I think lists were made out towards the close of the session, showing the disposition that had been made so far as we knew.

Q. What was done with those lists?

A. They were sent to the Secretary's office after the adjournment in July, 1866. A list of vacancies caused by the Senate not confirming the appointees was also made out.

Q. How soon after the adjournment?

A. I do not recollect; probably within a week or thereabouts.

Q. Do you know whether any request was made by the Secretary for any such list?

A. I do not recollect; I presume there was. There was a list of that character made informally, and was requested informally through the appointment clerk. We sent these lists to the Secretary's office, and, of course, could not speak as to their ultimate destination. It was presumed he sent them to the President, and in some cases other persons were substituted so that our records are incomplete.

Q. Are there any recommendations in favor of candidates for appointment in the office of internal revenue now in your office?

A. No, sir.

Q. What has been done with them?

A. They were transferred to the Secretary's office last summer

Q. At what time?

A. I think it was in August.

Q. What was the reason of the transfer?

A. I do not know. They were frequently called for from the Secretary's office, and I presume they were transferred for convenience.

Q. Were any representations made at any time by or through the internal revenue office to the Secretary of the Treasury concerning these vacancies at or about the time Congress adjourned, except the list you speak of?

A. Not that I know of.

Q. Was the question ever considered, so far as you know, by the Secretary of the Treasury or Commissioner of Internal Revenue,or any officer of the Treasury Department, whether these persons who had been appointed during the interval and not nominated to the Senate and continued in office, were legally in office after the adjournment of the Senate?

A. No, sir. I do not know that there was until quite recently.

Q. Were there many changes made in the internal revenue office, assessors and collectors, between July and November last?

A. Yes, sir; a large number.

Q. So far as you know, what was the effect of these changes upon the administration of the office in the collection of internal revenue?

A. I think it was bad.

Q. So far as you know, were any of the men removed for official misconduct or incapacity?

A. I have no case in my mind now.

Q. What was the character of these men who were removed, for experience, capacity, and fidelity?

A. I should say that it was good; as good, on an average, as those who were not removed.

Q. What has been the effect of the changes upon the business of the internal revenue office? Has it interfered with the management of it?

A. I should say that it made more work in the office.

Q. Do you know anything about its effect upon the revenue?

A. No, sir; not definitely—only by inference.

Q. What is your opinion about it?

A. My opinion is that it was disadvantageous on the whole.

Q. That less revenue has been collected?

A. I think so.

Q. Have you any idea of the extent to which the revenue was diminished?

A. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1867.

J. L. W. HUNTINGTON sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. I reside at present in Washington city. I am a clerk in the office of internal revenue.

Q. You have charge of the books and papers in the office relating to the appointment of assessors and collectors?

A. I had. There are no applications filed in our office at the present time. They were transferred to the Secretary's office last year, but I have charge of the books and papers relating to the appointment of subordinate officers.

Q. How long have you had charge of these books and papers?

A. I think since the 1st of August, 1865.

Q. Do you know whether at or about the meeting of Congress, in December, 1865, a list was made out which contained the names of persons who had been appointed to office during the recess of Congress?

A. I kept such a list for my own information, and I think I made out such a list at the request of Mr. Rollins.

Q. What was done with that list?

A. I made out a list and took it in to Mr. Rollins, and he desired me to make a copy of it. I think the copy was sent to Mr. Creecy, in the Secretary's office, for the information of the Secretary.

Q. Will you look at executive document No. 14, of the Senate, page 4, and state whether or not the names of assessors and collectors in the table on that page were among those who were in the list to which you have alluded?

A. Yes, sir. I think all of these were on that list, together with others.

Q. Was not a similar list made subsequently, or during the session of Congress that commenced December, 1865?

A. Yes, sir. One list was made just before the adjournment and another just after.

Q. What did the list made just before the adjournment contain?

A. It contained a list of all vacancies and those who had not been confirmed.

Q. Do you know whether the names contained on page 4 of the document referred to, was in that list made just before that adjournment, as not having been confirmed?

A. I do not know whether this was on the list made just before or just after.

Q. What was done with those lists?

A. I do not know. I think they were sent to the Secretary. Mr. Creecy, the appointment clerk in the Secretary's office, sent over and requested that such a list be made out. I made it out and sent it over to the Secretary's office.

Q. How long after the adjournment of Congress was it that the list was made out?

A. I could not tell exactly. It was a short time; probably about ten days.

Q. This last list, as I understand you, contained the names of the collectors and assessors of internal revenue whose nominations had not been confirmed by the Senate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in this last list were the names mentioned on page 4 of Senate document?

A. I think they were on the last list made out. There were also other names on this last list—names of collectors and assessors in Tennessee, and still others besides the Tennessee appointments.

Q. Were the Tennessee appointments made during the recess preceding the session of 1865?

A. Yes, sir. The nominations were made out and sent to the Secretary for the President. They were sent over to the President and were returned. They were, however, nominated to the Senate afterwards.

Q. Were the same persons nominated?

A. I think so, in many cases.

Q. Did you have charge of the papers relating to appointments?

A. They were kept in an adjoining room, but I always had access to them. When the commissioner wanted to see any of them he always called on me for them.

Q. Do you know whether there were any papers from the President relating to any of the districts specified in the table on page 4?

A. Yes, sir. There were numerous papers in the Pennsylvania districts.

Q. Do you remember whether the President's endorsement was upon them?

A. I do not remember.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 27, 1867.

CHARLES EATON CREECY sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Where do you reside, and what is your occupation?

A. I reside in Washington, and I am a clerk in the Treasury Department.

Q. Do you have charge of the papers relating to the appointment of assessors and collectors in the internal revenue office?

A. I do.

Q. How long have you had charge of these papers?

A. I have had charge of them since some time in September—probably the latter part of September last.

Q. Had you, previous to that time, the custody of papers relating to appointments to, and applications for, office in the Treasury Department?

A. Yes; the papers relative to all such appointments, of every description except the internal revenue, were in my possession prior to September last.

Q. Were they long in your possession prior to September last?

A. The appointment bureau was in process of organization, and from time to time the papers of various offices were thrown into that bureau. The customs office I had from the year before.

Q. Do you recollect, that on or about the time of the commencement of this session of Congress, in December, 1865, you received a list from the internal revenue office, which contained the names of the persons who had been appointed as assessors and collectors during the interval between the 38th and 39th Congresses?

A. I think there was such a list, but I cannot speak positively, there were so many lists sent to me. We were compelled to call every week for a list of papers of some sort. I recollect such a list was sent over, but I found it to be very incomplete.

Q. Have you this list now?

A. I might find it, but I don't recollect where it is.

Q. For what purpose was the list obtained?

A. In order to send the nominations in to the President.

Q. Were the nominations sent in to the President according to the list?

A. So far as I can recollect every one of them were. Every person on the list had his name sent in to the President.

Q. The first session of the 39th Congress terminated near the last of July, 1866; do you recollect whether any list was obtained from the internal revenue office, of vacancies after this list which you have spoken of?

A. There was such a list furnished at my request. I found there was some mistake, and I requested this list to be furnished, which was done. It was after the adjournment of Congress I asked for this list. I do not recollect any such list before then.

Q. How long after the adjournment of Congress did you obtain this list of which you have last spoken?

A. I do not recollect exactly, but it was probably eight or ten days. Then I requested the Secretary to have the documents transferred from the Internal Revenue Bureau in order that the proper record might be kept in his own office.

Q. What did this list, that was furnished soon after the adjournment of Congress, contain?

A. It contained a list of the names of those persons who were holding on without commissions.

Q. And that list was furnished at your request?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you directed to call for it by the Secretary or any superior officer?

A. No.

Q. What did you do with it?

A. I brought it to the notice of the Secretary, and he directed the appointments to be made in one or two cases.

Q. How soon after receiving the list did you call the attention of the Secretary to it?

A. A day or two after. It was impossible to find out whether the names had been sent to the Senate or not, or acted on. I went to the President's house, and resurrected all the lists and papers, and brought them back, and also got the papers from the internal revenue office, and made a complete examination of them, and then reported, as fast as I could find out, the nominations that had been sent and those which had been rejected or mislaid at the President's house.

Q. How soon did you commence reporting these cases to the Secretary?

A. I cannot tell the precise time, but I reported the day after, the cases of the two Philadelphia men, and temporary commissions were immediately issued to the surveyor and naval officer.

Q. You say these were issued on the day after you obtained the lists?

A. The day after I reported the facts.

Q. Wallace and Myers were in the custom-house?

A. Yes.

Q. Were they reappointed?

A. They were, with temporary commissions.

Q. Did you see the President personally in reference to these matters?

A. I did not, but I saw Colonel Cooper by direction of the Secretary, and called his attention to these cases several times. He said he was called to the House of Representatives, on the admission of Tennessee, and laid all these affairs in his desk, and that he could not get these nominations attended to. I went to his desk after the adjournment of the Senate, and got all the papers pertaining to the matter out of his desk. The Secretary himself discovered the fact that Selfridge was in office before I did.

Q. Examine executive document No. 14, at page 4, and tell me whether the persons' names on the list of internal revenue officers were on this list of which you have spoken, as furnished to you by the internal revenue office?

A. These names I see here were there, and there were others there, also, which had been found to be correct.

Q. All these names you think were in the list?

A. I am pretty sure all these names, and also other names, were in the list; other names which, upon examination, I found could not come under the term "names of officers." I found that in two of these cases, nominations had been sent in and rejected.

Q. Which two were these?

A. Ingham and Gary.

Q. Which district is Ingham in?

A. The third, in Missouri. The name of George C. Garty was submitted for the fifth district of the State of Wisconsin, and was rejected June 30, 1866. In the case of the third district of Missouri, instead of sending in the nomination of Mr. Ingham, the nomination of John A. Glover was sent in, and rejected July 17, 1866. These two names—Ingham and Gary—were reported to Congress as names having been left out in the Senate. I found these rejections in the internal revenue office.

Q. Have you charge of all the papers relating to appointments in the Treasury Department?

A. Yes.

Q. Are there any papers in your custody signed by the President, or endorsed by him, relating to appointments in either of the districts described in the table on page 4, or relating to appointments in these several districts?

A. There is only one I can call to my mind. That is in the case of Flannagan, directed to be appointed in the place of Wallace, who has a temporary commission.

Q. Wallace, the naval officer?

A. Yes.

Q. Was Flannagan appointed?

A. Yes.

Q. When was he appointed?

A. Since the close of last Congress, September 18, 1866.

Q. Is he still holding office?

A. He is. He was nominated and rejected.

Q. Nominated and rejected, and still holding office?

A. Yes. There is the case of Peter McGough, whose name was omitted in 1865, and also in 1866. His nomination is now before the Senate.

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Do you know why they were not sent in?

A. They were accidentally omitted.

WASHINGTON, March 19, 1867.

Major General O. O. HOWARD, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you in your possession a receipt signed by J. E. Davis, dated in January, 1867, purporting to be for rent of lands or plantations?

A. I have not. Such a receipt, if in existence, is in possession of the assistant Commissioner of Mississippi, General Gillem.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any payment by the government to J. E. Davis for rent of lands or buildings?

A. I have a history of the case in the endorsements on original papers, which are now in the possession of the assistant Commissioner of the State of Mississippi. I have in my endorsement books copies of these endorsements.

Q. Will you give a history of the case as it appears from these books?

A. Among the first papers I received was the application of Mr. Davis, accompanied by the following endorsement from the President:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, May 22, 1866.

Respectfully referred to Major General Howard, Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. By what terms is this property held? Why has it not been restored upon the application of the owner?

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President United States.

My answer to that was as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1866.

Respectfully returned to the President of the United States. This property, worth a large sum of money, was taken up by the Treasury Department as abandoned, and turned over to this Bureau on its organization. Mr. Davis never received this property because he has refused to make application for pardon, although he admitted he was worth over $20,000, had lived in the South, and was brother to the late President of the so-called confederate States. The property has been held as abandoned, belonging to Mr. J. E. Davis, who should receive a pardon before being entitled to a restoration of his property.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was there an application accompanying those endorsements?

A. Yes, sir; the application of Mr. Davis for the restoration of his property, and the above endorsements were made on this application.

Q. Have you that application here?

A. No, sir; it is with the assistant Commissioner for Mississippi. All the original papers in this case are in the possession of the assistant Commissioner; but I think the endorsement I will read will make the case clear. The next endorsement that I will read is made by General T. J. Wood, who was then assistant Commissioner of the Bureau for Mississippi, upon an application to him by Mr. Davis:

VICKSBURG, September 11, 1866.

Respectfully returned to Mr. Joseph E. Davis, with the information that the following evidence, required by orders, is necessary for the records of this office before restoration can be made: First, evidence of special pardon by the President; second, proof of title. It is further directed that the land under cultivation by loyal refugees or freedmen, and upon which crops are now growing, can only be restored when such crops are secured for the benefit of the cultivators, unless a full and just compensation is made for their labor and its products. It is suggested, under the existing circumstances, that the 1st of January proximo is as early a day as can be selected, taking the interest of all parties into consideration. But if Mr. Davis desires a more speedy restoration, if he will return this paper it will be transmitted to the President of the United States for further orders.

By order of Major General Wood:

A. W. PRESTON
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. Davis then returned the papers to General Wood with this endorsement:

VICKSBURG, MISS., September 12, 1866.

Respectfully returned to Major General Wood, Commissioner, with an authenticated copy of the President's pardon, and certificates of citizens of undoubted character and standing as to the ownership of the within-named plantation. It is impossible at this time to obtain abstracts of the title, as the records of the land office for this district are unknown, and the original certificates were burned. The land in question was entered by me in the year 1818, at the land office in Washington, Mississippi. No portion of the same has ever been sold or transferred to other parties, as the certificate of the probate court witnesses. As I am quite willing to allow a full and just compensation to the parties now cultivating these plantations, by fully and exactly carrying out the contract now in force between the Bureau and the colored people now cultivating it, I consider that it would be exceedingly unjust as well as unnecessary to postpone turning over the property until the 1st of January proximo, and consequently depriving me of my place of residence as well as materially interfering with arrangements necessary to be made for the next year's operations. I therefore will thank General Wood if he will return these papers to me as soon as possible, with his endorsement, as I desire to have them presented to the President by a friend, and thereby prevent the unavoidable delays incident to the official routine in transmitting papers to the President.

J. E. DAVIS.

This friend of Mr. Davis (I do not remember his name) came to me with the papers. I believe he had called at the Presidential mansion, and, having considerable trouble in getting an interview, he came to me first. I put the following endorsement on them:

WASHINGTON, September 26, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to the President, and attention asked to the endorsement of Major General T. J. Wood. I believe it would be better to date the formal restoration January 1st, proximo, for the reasons given. I shall direct the payment to Mr. Davis of rents due from and after his presentation of pardon to the assistant Commissioner, leaving his claim for back rents an open question.

The endorsement of General Wood, referred to above, was as follows:

VICKSBURG, September 13, 1866.

Respectfully returned to Mr. J. E. Davis, with the decision: first, that as the lands in question are now under lease to the 31st of December, proximo, from the government to numerous lessees now in possession, the assistant Commissioner does not feel he has authority to divest the lessees of the protection they have a right to demand from the lessor, (the government) by turning over the responsibility of giving that protection to a third party; and second, the assistant Commissioner does not consider himself authorized to make a decision which would deprive the government of the revenue from the lands in question for the current year. For these reasons the petition of Mr. Davis is returned, pursuant to his request, that he may lay it before his Excellency the President, for his orders in the premises. It may be observed that although Mr. Davis does not submit the most exact evidence of title, no doubt is entertained of the validity of his claim of ownership.

I endorsed the views of General Wood, and said that it would be better not to return the property until the 1st of January, proximo. The papers were laid before the President, but he declined to take any action in the premises, and said he would leave it to General Howard in accordance with orders already issued. When the papers were returned to me I endorsed them, referring them to the land division, stating that the President having declined to take any action upon them, the property would be retained, and all rents accruing after his pardon, (covering that time only) should be paid to him.

The following is the letter to General Wood on the subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES,
FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, September 28, 1866.

GENERAL: Major General Howard, Commissioner, &c., directs that possession of his property be given to J. E. Davis, at the expiration of the present lease thereon, he having received a pardon from the President, of date March 28, 1866. The whole amount of rents due, and that have been collected on his property, will be estimated as if paid in equal sums each month, and such a proportion of these rents as accrues after March 28, the date of Mr. Davis's pardon, will be paid to him.

Very respectfully,

S. ELDRIDGE,
Brevet Major and A. A. G.

Major General T. J. WOOD,
Assistant Commissioner, &c., Vicksburg, Mississippi.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. When was that application made?

A. I think the first one was in May, 1866. There were several applications, not from Mr. Davis, directly, but from his friends. They wished to get the property restored to him without receiving a pardon. Mr. Davis refused at first to make any application for pardon, alleging that he had done nothing. He finally obtained a pardon and the property was restored to him as in all other cases. The same course was pursued in his case as in all others.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What was the date of the pardon?

A. The date was March 28, 1866.

Q. Was that the date of the delivery of the pardon to him?

A. I do not know when the delivery was. The President, on the 26th of May, 1866, endorsed on an application to the President for the restoration to Mr. Davis of his property: "By what terms is this property held? Why has it not been restored on the application of the owner?" The papers were sent to Mississippi and came back to me with additional statements. Mr. Davis, in his application to General Wood, forwarded an authenticated copy of the President's pardon. This was on the 12th of September, and it was the first official knowledge we had of the pardon.

Q. I understand you that he refused to accept any pardon in the first instance on the ground that he had committed no crime?

A. Yes, sir. He refused at first to make any application, and his friends made application for him for pardon. I do not know that any was tendered him before he applied, but his friends applied for him, and he refused to concur with them.

Q. That was subsequent to this pardon?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Go on with your statement.

A. Here is another letter to General Wood in answer to one from him:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES,
FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, Octotober 8, 1866.

GENERAL: Major General Howard, Commissioner, &c., directs that you retain complete and exclusive control of the J. E. Davis property until the date of the formal restoration, January 1, 1867, collecting all rents, including those which you are to pay to Mr. Davis, and allowing no interference of any kind from Mr. Davis or any agent.

Very respectfully, &c.,

S. ELDRIDGE, A. A. G.

Major General T. J. WOOD,
Assistant Commissioner, &c., Vicksburg, Mississippi.

The object of this letter was to protect all persons who had leased property until the end of the year. I will also read another letter to General Wood in the same connection:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES,
FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, October 17, 1866.

GENERAL: Major General Howard directs that all expenses of collection of the rents of Mr. Davis's property be deducted from the amount paid to J. E. Davis, in compliance with orders from this office of date of September 28, 1866.

S. ELDRIDGE, A. A. G.

Major General T. J. WOOD,
Assitant Commissioner, &c.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What expenses were referred to?

A. The expenses of the collection of rents. What they are exactly, I cannot tell now.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Is that the entire record of the case?

A. Yes, sir; as far as appears on my books. My recollection of the case is this: an application first came to me, from some friends of Mr. Davis, for the restoration of his property. The names of the parties I cannot give now. They said that Mr. Davis had done nothing for which he required pardon, and that he refused to join with them in an application for pardon, and they wished me to restore his property to him. They said that he would be very fair in his dealings with the negroes, &c. I declined to do it, as he had not complied with my instructions. Afterwards application was made for his pardon, which he received, and his property was restored to him, as to every other in like situation, in accordance with the conditions contained in my order in Circular No. 15, of the series of 1865.

Q. What part of the order do you refer to?

A. On the face of it, it appears as my own order, approved by the President. Here is the paragraph alluded to:

"Abandoned lands held by this Bureau may be restored to owners pardoned by the President, by assistant commissioners, to whom application for such restoration should be forwarded, so far as practicable, through the superintendents of the districts in which the lands are situated. Each application must be accompanied by—1st. Evidence of special pardon by the President, or a copy of the oath of amnesty prescribed in the President's proclamation of May 19, 1865, when the applicant is not included in any of the classes therein excepted from the benefits of said oath; 2d. Proof of title. Officers of the Bureau through whom the application passes, will endorse thereon such facts as may assist the assistant commissioner in his decision, stating specially the use made by the Bureau of the land."

This order says "may be restored." The question then may arise, "Why did you restore under such circumstances?"—which will be explained by the following order from the President, in the case of B. B. Leake:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, August 16, 1865.

Respectfully returned to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. The records of this office show that B. B. Leake was specially pardoned by the President on the 27th ultimo, and was thereby restored to all his rights of property, except as to slaves. Notwithstanding this, it is understood that possession of his property is withheld from him. I have, therefore, to direct that General Fisk, assistant Commissioner at Nashville, be instructed by the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, &c., to relinquish possession of the property of Mr. Leake, held by him as assistant Commissioner, and that the same be immediately restored to said Leake. The same action will be had in all similar cases.

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

In accordance with these instructions, I restored property upon receipt of the pardon.

Q. Was Circular No. 15 prepared by you?

A. It was not fully prepared by me. I have the circular that was prepared by me, and issued as Circular No. 13, understanding that the President approved of it; but he sent for me and said there was something in it he did not like. The circular was returned to the Presidential mansion, where it was re-written completely, and it was issued as Circular No. 15. The difference between circulars No. 13 and No. 15 was in respect to the restoration of property on the receipt of the pardon of the President.

Q. Upon what ground did you put that provision in your original circular, which denied to the former owners the possession of tenements and lands that had been abandoned?

A. I gave the reasons in my first annual report to Congress, and the differences between myself and the Executive in regard to this matter. I will read an extract or two from House Ex. Doc. No. 11, 39th Congress, first session:

"With respect to abandoned lands, it was the evident intention of the Act of March 4 to give the Bureau control, solely for the purpose of assigning, leasing, or selling them to refugees and freedmen. It was impracticable to divide and assign them immediately. A great proportion of the lands was already under lease given by the treasury agents, and good policy, as well as the necessities of the Bureau, for which no appropriation had been made, demanded that all should be made immediately useful, and that none should remain unused and unproductive. In addition to the leases made by the treasury officials, others were made by the Bureau, which did not confine itself in its choice of tenants to the classes for whose relief the Bureau was organized. With respect to the abandoned houses and tenements turned over by the Treasury Department, the Bureau had no choice, except to follow the course which the law had marked out for that department, namely, to take charge of and lease such property for periods not exceeding twelve months. In determining its power over abandoned property, the Bureau has considered, therefore, not only the provisions of the Act of March 3, which gave it existence, but of such other Acts as have given agents of the treasury, and other departments who have transferred property, control over it. These acts are regarded as giving the Bureau every right to abandoned property which an actual owner could have, except, perhaps, the right of sale. It cannot convey a full and perfect title in fee simple, but its rights in every way to control the property, to lease it, and to take the rents and profits, is considered undeniable, so long as these Acts remain law. For all practical purposes, the tenure of the Bureau upon abandoned property has been considered as almost identical with an estate upon condition subsequent, that condition being the restoration of the property, by competent authority, to its former owner."

With reference to the restoration of property, I say: "Shortly after the organization of the Bureau, parties whose property was held by it commenced to apply for restoration of their former rights. The policy first adopted by the Bureau was to return estates to those only who could show constant loyalty, past as well as present—a loyalty which could not be established by the mere production of an oath of allegiance or amnesty—as the Bureau held property by authority of an Act of Congress for certain definite purposes, it was supposed that this tenure must continue to exist until those purposes were accomplished, that property must be surrendered only when it was evident that the control over it was unauthorized and improper."

This course did not meet with the approval of the President, who gave orders that a pardon either by special warrant or the provisions of his amnesty proclamation, entitled the party pardoned to demand and receive immediate restoration of all his property, except such as had been actually sold under a decree of confiscation. Shortly after this decision was made known, Circular No. 15, dated September 12, 1865, was issued from the Bureau, and embodying the provisions of the Act of Congress establishing it, promulgated for the first time definite rules regarding the restoration of this property to former owners.

Authority to restore was vested in the assistant Commissioners of the Bureau. They were directed to turn over at once all property held as abandoned, upon its appearing to their satisfaction that it did not fall within the terms of the definition laid down in the Act approved July 2, 1864. They were also directed to restore property when application was made for it through the superintendent of the districts in which it was situated, accompanied by proof of claimant's title, and of his pardon either by special warrant or the terms of the proclamation of amnesty of May 29, 1865. It was provided, however, that land cultivated by refugees or freedmen should be retained until the growing crops were gathered, unless the owner made full compensation for labor expended and its products.

Q. At the time Circular No. 13 was laid before the President, did you also lay before him the views you entertained as to the right of the Bureau to hold the lands under the law?

A. Yes, sir; I had an interview with him, and urged the case all I could.

Q. Did you state the facts you have just read?

A. Yes, sir; I said to the President that I wished to obstruct the restoration of this property to former owners every way I could.

Q. Do you know whether any opinion was given by the Attorney General to the President upon this point—upon the differences between the President and yourself?

A. I think there was an opinion given by the Attorney General, but it was with reference to confiscated property, I think, and not abandoned property.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the opinion of the Attorney General respecting abandoned property?

A. No other knowledge than that derived from a conversation I had with him in reference to the property of Mr. Cox, of Georgetown. It was held as abandoned property, though not by the Freedmen's Bureau. It was understood by me to be held by the sanction of the War Department, and used as an orphan asylum by an incorporated association of ladies.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Is that the case about which there was a lawsuit?

A. Yes, sir, that is the case; and in my conversations with Mr. Speed in relation to that, he urged me to make some conditions with Mr. Cox, thinking I held the property and had a right to act upon the same.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Had Mr. Cox been pardoned?

A. No, sir; and it was thought by the Attorney General that a pardon should not be issued to him until some conditions should be made between Mr. Cox and myself in relation to this property held by the orphan asylum; so from that I inferred that he was in favor of imposing conditions precedent to pardon. I recommended to the President, formally, the imposing of conditions, and I thought from my conversations with Mr. Speed that he agreed with me. Here is my letter recommending the imposing of conditions previous to the issue of a pardon:

The matter of imposing some conditions in the cases of pardoning those who have lands under cultivation by freedmen, for the benefit of this class of persons, having been presented to me by the Attorney General, and a plan having been suggested by a distinguished officer of the army which I heartily endorse, I deem it best to combine these suggestions in the following proposal, to-wit:

First. That hereafter pardons of the President of the United States extended to those who have been excepted in his proclamation of May 29, 1865, having more than $20,000 worth of property, be conditioned by a specific stipulation in each individual case, that the land owner agree to set apart and grant title in fee simple to each head of family of his former slaves a homestead varying in extent from five to ten acres, to be secured against alienation during the life time of the grantee. The location, precise extent, and other details to be determined by three referees, two to be chosen by the interested parties, each selecting one, and the two a third.

Second. That other persons, not land owners, be conditioned according to their several circumstances by equivalent or proper stipulations to be determined by a committee of three appointed by the President.

These suggestions came from Mr. Speed and General Meigs, with whom I had a conversation upon the subject, and I embraced them as my recommendation in the premises.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Was there a general form of pardon applicable to all cases?

A. I am not able to say. I think they were all substantially the same.

Q. Was there anything in the pardon importing restoration of property?

A. I could not say with regard to that. My attention was never called to the form of pardon with reference to the restoration of property. There was a large amount of property in Virginia that had been libelled and was about to be sold by the marshal of Virginia, when the sale was suspended by the Secretary of War for the purpose of using it for the freedmen.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Was there a decree of condemnation?

A. Yes, sir. I maintained that this property, although not actually sold, belonged to the government. When my circular No. 13 was before the President, this was one of the points of difference between us, he insisting that the claimant's right to claim the property did not cease until the property was sold. The matter was referred to the Attorney General, and the word "sold" was inserted in my circular; so that all this property was restored to its former owners.

Q. Who inserted the word "sold?"

A. It was inserted in my circular while it was in the President's possession. We had some discussion about it. He thought it would require an actual sale before the property became the property of the government. He referred the matter to the Attorney General, and when the circular came back to me the word "sold" was inserted.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you know whether the Attorney General gave any opinion in regard to it?

A. In my interview with the President, I urged as strongly as I could my views on the subject, and laid before him all the information I could collate upon this point. The interview was a very pleasant one, and he laughingly said he would refer the matter to the Attorney General. I went back to my headquarters, and when the circular came back to me the word "sold" was inserted. Whether it was inserted by the Attorney General or not, I could not say.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the sale, by the United States marshal of Louisiana, of the property of Pierre Soulé?

A. I had a telegram on the 29th of August, 1865, from the assistant Commissioner, T. W. Conway, as follows:

The residence of Pierre Soulé is advertised by the United States marshal for sale. We use the house as an orphan asylum for children of freedmen and colored soldiers. Can proceedings be ordered stayed? The property is confiscated by order of the United States court. Can I hold property which is confiscated, and which the Bureau needs? Will a notification of the marshal that we need it be sufficient to enable us to hold it?

My answer is dated September 1, 1865:

Get an officer of the government to bid in the Soulé property for the government, and then make a requisition for it.

This was for the marshal, or an officer of his selection, to bid it in, and then the assistant Commissioner to make a requisition for it.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Was this property confiscated or was it a tax sale?

A. It was libelled for confiscation. I have also a letter here from General Baird in relation to this property; it is dated September 2, 1865:

The Soulé property was, by a decree of the court, actually confiscated, but the sale not completed. The judge recalls the decree of condemnation and restores the property. Should we not resist? Answer. A. BAIRD.

My answer to this was as follows, December 4, 1865:

Get the marshal to suspend operations in the Soulé property until the decision of the President can be had. Send full particulars of the case to this office for General Howard's information.

By command of General Howard:

MAX WOODHULL, A. A. G.

I have also here a memorandum of the case:

The Pierre Soulé house and lot, valued at $29,000, seized in 1863, libelled and sold, and bought in by the United States government.

There was another piece of property belonging to Pierre Soulé, which was restored by Brigadier General Fullerton, who was then assistant Commissioner for Louisiana.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was the piece of property you have mentioned as having been withdrawn from sale by the Judge the same as that valued at $29,000.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then it had not been sold?

A. It was sold and bought in by the United States government; and General Fullerton, when he went down there, had some arrangement with the marshal about it. At that time the Bureau had no funds to use for such a purpose.

Q. But it seems that a decree of confiscation was made, and subsequently the Judge recalled this decree; now, after that, was there another decree and sale?

A. No, sir.

Q. When was this sale at which the property was bought in, and upon what decree?

A. I am not able to answer that now. I suppose General Baird means that the money was not paid; that the form of the sale was gone through with, but the money not paid. My information in regard to this is rather meagre, and I cannot state anything further without referring to the reports of the assistant Commissioners.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What evidence have you that there was an actual sale and purchase?

A. I have none here.

Q. Where did you obtain that memorandum you read?

A. I obtained that from the report of the assistant Commissioner at New Orleans.

IMPEACHMENT INVESTIGATION.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1867.

Major General O. O. HOWARD recalled and examination continued.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you any further information than that given by you yesterday in reference to the Soulé estate? If so, please present it.

A. My statements yesterday were very meagre. I find, on examining my books, that I had a little more information with reference to that property of Pierre Soulé. I have drawn off, in writing, a brief statement of all the circumstances concerning it, so far as my records go.

(Witness then read the following statement to the Committee, which was ordered to be made part of his testimony:)

The property of Pierre Soulé was first held by this Bureau as confiscable, and a portion used as an asylum. On the 19th of July, 1865, the property was condemned as forfeited to the United States, by decree of the district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and ordered to be sold. A bid for the property was made by this Bureau and afterwards withdrawn, with the consent of the United States marshal. On the 30th of October, 1865, Mr. Soulé received a special pardon. On the 20th of November, on motion of Mr. Soulé's attorney, and exhibition of his pardon, the United States district attorney was ordered to show cause why proceedings against the property should not be discontinued and the property returned to Mr. Soulé. The case was heard on the 29th of November, a decree of dismissal of the libel entered, and the property was ordered by the court to be restored to Mr. Soulé. The case was referred to the Attorney General in January, 1866, for an opinion as to whether the final decree of the district court was valid, and for an opinion as to what steps could be taken, by appeal or otherwise, to retain the property for the United States. No answer to this reference was received; and on the 8th of March, 1866, General Baird, assistant Commissioner for Louisiana, was ordered to give actual possession of the property to Mr. Soulé, which was done.

Q. Have you any information as to the value of the property?

A. Twenty-nine thousand dollars was its estimated value.

Q. Was anything paid to Mr. Soulé for the use of the property while the Government retained it?

A. Not to my knowledge. The Freedmen's Bureau had the actual possession of the property for the United States for use, but it was held by the United States marshal.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What had the President to do with that?

A. I do not know that the President had anything to do with it, except indirectly, by his pardoning Mr. Soulé. The United States marshal, I presume, receives his specific instructions through the regular channel.

Q. The President had nothing to do with it, that you know of, except to issue the pardon?

A. Nothing else, to my knowledge.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you know whether the property had been seized, or any steps taken to get possession of it, on account of the non-payment of taxes?

A. My impression is that it was not seized for non-payment of taxes, but as confiscable property.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was it the practice to seize property on which taxes were not paid in any other way than by selling it in the ordinary mode?

A. It was not. The telegram of August 29, 1865, which I read yesterday, says: "The property is confiscated by order of the United States Court." That is not the language used when property is sold for taxes. There is one point which needs a little explanation—Mr. Eldridge asked me yesterday in reference to it—about the completion of the sale. The statement which I have just read says: "A bid for the proper y was made by this Bureau and afterwards withdrawn, with the consent of the marshal." Now, the question is, why was this done? Mr. Conway misunderstood my telegram to him, which instructed that I would like to have the property bid in by an officer of the government of the United States. I did not mean for him to bid it in; but I wanted it bid in, if possible, by a government officer—say the marshal himself—and then to make application for it for the use of the Bureau, as we needed it for an asylum. Mr. Conway, misunderstanding me, bid it in himself before we had the means to pay for it; but as soon as he found that I did not want to pay for it to any other department of the government, and was not able to pay for it, he or his successor went to the marshal and got relieved from the bid. These are the circumstances of the case.

Q. Then was there no other actual sale of the property, except to Mr. Conway?

A. There was no other actual sale of the property, to my knowledge.

Q. And that was withdrawn at his request?

A. That was withdrawn at the assistant Commissioner's request.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you know anything of the property having been bid for by an officer of the Bureau, named Armstrong, for $23,000?

A. Armstrong was the financial officer of the assistant Commissioner in Louisiana, and he may have made the bid, but the assistant Commissioner was responsible for what Armstrong did.

Q. Do you know whether the money was actually paid to the marshal?

A. That I do not know.

Q. Have you any other information in reference to that estate?

A. I have here the telegrams with reference to it which passed back and forth, containing what is substantially stated in the paper I have read.

[The telegrams and circular No. 15 were put in evidence, and are as follows]:

Q. Please furnish a copy of No. 13, suppressed, of series 1865.

[Circular No. 13.—Not promulgated.—Rescinded by Circular 15, September 12, 1865.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, July 29, 1865.

In order to establish a definite and uniform policy relative to confiscated and abandoned lands, and other confiscated and abandoned property, which are now, or that may hereafter come, under the control of this Bureau by virtue of the Act approved March 3, 1865, establishing the Bureau, and other Acts and sections of Acts, and orders of the President relative to captured, confiscated, and abandoned property, to wit, section 2, Act approved July 2, 1864, and General Orders No. 110, War Department, January 7, 1865, the following rules and regulations are established:

I. All confiscated and abandoned lands, and other confiscated and abandoned property, that are now, or that may hereafter come, under the control of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, by virtue of said Acts and sections of Acts, and orders of the President, are and shall be set apart for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen, and as much as may be necessary assigned to them, as provided in section 4 of the Act establishing the Bureau, viz: "To every male citizen, whether refugee or freedman, as aforesaid, there shall be assigned not more than forty acres of such land, and the person to whom it was so assigned shall be protected in the use and enjoyment of the land for the term of three years, at an annual rent not exceeding six per centum upon the value of such land as it was appraised by the State authorities in the year 1860 for the purpose of taxation; and in case no such appraisal can be found, then the rental shall be based upon the estimated value of the land in said year, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may by regulation prescribe. At the end of said term, or any time during said term, the occupants of any parcel so assigned may purchase the land and may receive such title thereto as the United States can convey, upon paying therefor the value of the land as ascertained and fixed for the purpose of determining the annual rent aforesaid."

II. All lands or other property within the several insurrectionary States, viz., Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, to which the United States have or shall have acquired title by confiscation or sale or otherwise during the late rebellion; and all abandoned lands or other abandoned property in those States become so by the construction of section 2 of Act approved July 2, 1864, viz: "Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion," and which remains unsold or otherwise disposed of, are and shall be considered as under the control of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the purposes hereinbefore set forth, and for the time authorized by the Act establishing the Bureau; and no part or parcel of said confiscated or abandoned property shall be surrendered or restored to the former owner thereof, or other claimants thereto, except such surrender or restoration be authorized by such Commissioner.

III. Whenever any abandoned lands or other abandoned property, that shall have come into the possession of the Bureau, does not fall under the definition of "abandoned," as set forth in section 2 of the Act approved July 2, 1864, it will be formally surrendered by the Commissioner or assistant Commissioner of the Bureau, upon clear proof that the claimant did not abandon the property in the sense defined in said section and Act.

IV. In the surrender or restoration of any property, the requirements of Circular No. 3, current series, from this Bureau, will be carefully observed.

V. Assistant Commissioners will, as rapidly as possible, cause accurate descriptions of all confiscated and abandoned lands, and other confiscated and abandoned property, that are now, or that may hereafter come, under their control, to be made, and, besides keeping a record of such themselves, will forward monthly to the Commissioner of the Bureau copies of such descriptions, in the manner prescribed by Circular No. 10, of July 11, 1865, from this Bureau. They will, with as little delay as possible, select and set apart such confiscated and abandoned lands and property as may be deemed necessary for the immediate use of refugees and freedmen, the specific division of which into lots, and the rental or sale thereof, according to the law establishing the Bureau, will be completed as soon as practicable and reported to the Commissioner. In the selection and setting apart of such lands and property, care will be used to take that about which there is the least doubt as to the proper custody and control of this Bureau.

VI. The pardon of the President will not be understood to extend to the surrender of abandoned or confiscated property, which by law has been "set apart for refugees and freedmen," or "in use for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of the national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free."—(See Act of March 3, 1865, and Act of July 2, 1864, section 1, chap. 225.)

O. O. HOWARD, Major General,
Commissioner of Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

Official copy:

F. D. SEWALL,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

WITNESS. Circular 15, current series of 1865, states that property is not to be regarded as confiscated until condemned and sold. I had objected to the introduction of the word "sold," and had given all the reasons I could against it. The matter was referred to the Attorney General, and the word "sold" was introduced.

Q. Have you any other knowledge of the opinion given by the Attorney General, except that the word "sold" was introduced into Circular No. 15?

A. No, sir.

Q. When General Fullerton went to New Orleans to take Mr. Conway's place, did he receive instructions from you, or through you, as to his duties?

A. Yes, sir; he received general instructions.

Q. Were they in writing, or verbal?

A. They were the same general instructions given to every other assistant Commissioner. I conversed with him with reference to rentals particularly. He brought to me in writing, one morning, several questions with reference to public property, collection of taxes, collection of rents, &c., and I answered him on each point specifically. He appeared unsatisfied, and took those points to the President. What answer the President gave him I do not know.

Q. Have you a copy of those questions and answers?

A. I have not. He brought them to me in his hand, as something on which his mind was unsettled. I gave him the answer to each question as he presented it, specifically.

Q. Did you write down your answers, or were they oral?

A. They were oral. General Fullerton was then in constant communication with the President, and he was trusted completely by myself.

Q. Can you recall the questions and answers?

A. Not from memory; but all of them have been so definitely settled that I can easily give a transcript of them, substantially, from my records. I will furnish it to the Committee to-morrow.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You mentioned that you directed the payment of the rents to Mr. Davis, less the cost of collecting them; what costs did you refer to? Were not the rents collected by officers having salaries? and how could costs for collecting the rents accrue?

A. Where rents are a part of the crop, derived from taking a share of the crop, that implies the housing, storage, and sale of the crop, which involves expense.

Q. Was that so in the case of Mr. Davis's rents?

A. That I cannot tell. That is a mere presumption on my part. I cannot tell you the circumstances in relation to the costs in that case, without some reference. I will examine the records, and let the Committee know to-morrow. We had no agent at that place.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. The order to deduct expenses was according to your general practice, and was made without knowing whether any had been incurred on the Davis estate or not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where expenses were deducted from rents, did not the deduction enure to the benefit of the government?

A. Yes, sir; otherwise any expenses that might be incurred in that way would have to be borne by the government. This matter of the payment of rents was not anything agreed upon by any positive stipulation; but, after the pardon by the President, the rents accruing from and after were to be paid to the owner, and that was understood to be the net proceeds. There has been much said with reference to the restoration of property in Louisiana, and complaints were made of General Fullerton. My impression at the time was that General Fullerton obeyed the instructions he received from myself, and from the President. He restored a larger amount of property than I had anticipated. The reports of that restoration will be laid before the Committee in a report called for by the House of Representatives, and to be sent through the Secretary of War.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You state that it was your impression that General Fullerton obeyed the instructions of yourself and the President; have you any idea now that he violated those instructions?

A. I have no reason to change my views in that respect.

Q. You entertain the same opinion still?

A. Yes, sir. General Fullerton had the same orders precisely that Mr. Conway had. Mr. Conway had not restored this property. General Fullerton was only there a short time, and he restored more property than Mr. Conway did in all his administration, or than General Baird did subsequently. He restored it very rapidly.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. But it still was within the scope of your instructions?

A. Yes, sir; and in accordance with circular No. 15, which permitted such restoration. It says that abandoned lands held by the bureau may be restored to the owners thereof. It seemed to be understood by a good many who have conversed with me that he had overstepped his instructions.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did you visit New Orleans when General Fullerton was there as agent of the Bureau?

A. I did.

Q. Did you make any inquiry or investigation as to what he had done while there?

A. I called together colored people from every part of the city, and some prominent white men, and I inquired in the presence of General Fullerton with reference to the rumors which I had heard. Several of those men arose and made their statements. They said that since the arrival of General Fullerton colored people, very respectable, had been apprehended on the street and put in the calaboose; that he had restored property to virulent rebels, and that the address which he had issued to them was severe upon them and militated against them, and that they believed he was a rebel in disguise. I made a statement to them in reply, telling them that they were mistaken; that he was an officer of the army; that he had been fighting against the rebels for the last four years, and that I believed he had obeyed the instructions received from the President of the United States and from myself. General Fullerton made some statements much to the same effect in that meeting, and the colored people seemed to be satisfied. I met the people in public assembly—both colored and white—at the theatre in New Orleans, and addressed them and had intercourse with the leading men, and I detected the impression from that intercourse that General Fullerton was unfriendly to the interests of the colored people—an impression which I sought at that time diligently to remove.

Q. Did you have any conversation with General Fullerton on the matter of the restoration of the property, or of the address which he had issued to the colored people?

A. I conversed with him in relation to it, and stated my impression, and wherein I thought it was liable to misinterpretation. I conversed with him in relation to it in the presence of Governor Wells and several other gentlemen. I think the United S ates marshal was present. All of those gentlemen stated they were perfectly delighted with the address, and that it had done a great deal of good.

Q. Did you express any opinion to General Fullerton as to whether his conduct in restoring property met your approval or otherwise?

A. I do not think that I disapproved of it. I was not then aware of the extent of the restoration, and never was until I saw the report. My impression was, from my conversation with him, that he restored a good deal of it in obedience to specific instructions given him by the President. He is so reported to have given out himself in conversation with officers.

Q. Had you any knowledge of such special instructions from the President to restore property?

A. No, sir.

Q. They did not go through your office?

A. No, sir. General Fullerton did receive instructions directly from the President in reference to the tax that was levied in New Orleans for the support of the schools. He told me that he first telegraphed to my office, and that not getting an answer he telegraphed direct to the President, and the President advised him to suspend that tax, and he issued an order suspending the tax on the advice of the President. The order never went through my office. I did not consider it an order affecting me, and the tax was not suspended by me until subsequently, when the President gave me a direct order to suspend it, and it was suspended.

Q. Did General Fullerton represent to you, or in your presence, that he had received orders from the President in reference to the surrender of the property, which orders had not passed through your office?

A. I did not regard them as formal orders, but understood that he was carrying out the instructions which the President had given him privately. The President, in conversation with me prior to my leaving Washington, said very pleasantly that he believed General Fullerton understood this matter fully. That was said when conversing with him about the propriety of sending General Fullerton to New Orleans. He had several conversations with General Fullerton prior to his leaving for New Orleans.

Q. To what did the phrase "this matter," used by the President, refer?

A. All the Freedmen's Bureau operations, as I understood it—the best policy to be pursued. I do not know that the words "this matter" were the words used, but that was the impression.

Q. Had General Fullerton been previously connected with the Bureau?

A. Yes; from its organization, or very soon after its organization.

Q. In what capacity?

A. He was my adjutant general.

Q. Performing service here in Washington, or elsewhere?

A. In Washington, mainly. I sent him on one inspection to two or three southern States.

Q. Previous to his visit to New Orleans?

A. Yes, sir.

The following was subsequently furnished to the Committee by witness:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1867.

Such I believe to be substantially the questions proposed to me by General Fullerton prior to his leaving for Louisiana, and their answers.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General.

Memoranda.

1st. Shall we collect rents yet due for period prior to date of pardon? A. Yes.

2d. Shall we collect rents due for period between date of pardon and date of order restoring the property? A. No.

3d. Shall we restore to owners rents already collected for period between date of pardon and date of order restoring the property? A. Not necessarily, leaving owner's claim an open question.

4th. Can we order the restoration of rents under any conditions whatever, (after the same have been collected,) without the approval of the Commissioner? A. No.

5th. If a former owner of property held to be abandoned, and who has obtained special pardon, is entitled to restoration of rents from date of such pardon, is not the former owner, who does not need a special pardon, entitled to restoration of rents from the date of his amnesty oath, provided his property has not been libelled? A. He is. The same rule applies.

6th. Should not rents be restored from the date of dismissal of libel, or other decree of the federal court, making final disposition of property held to be abandoned? A. They should.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 16, 1867.

General J. S. FULLERTON, of St. Louis, Missouri, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you employed by the government in any capacity during the years 1865 and 1866?

A. Yes, sir; I was in the military service of the government. I was acting as assistant adjutant general of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, from about the middle of May, 1865, I think, until in October, when it was determined to relieve Mr. Conway, who had been acting as assistant Commissioner of the Bureau for the State of Louisiana. General Baird had been appointed his successor, but he was in the North on leave of absence, and it was impossible for him to go South as early as desired. It was the intention of General Howard to relieve Mr. Conway immediately, and I was sent to Louisiana to take charge of the affairs of the Bureau in that State, and to remain there until General Baird should arrive. I remained there, I think, perhaps four weeks, (the precise time I cannot state,) until General Baird arrived, when I was relieved, and came to the headquarters of the Bureau at Washington.

Q. At what time did you return to Washington?

A. I think it was in December, perhaps the middle of December; I am not certain of the date.

Q. Were you, after that, entrusted with an examination into the conduct of officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in the South?

A. That was after I left the Bureau. I had an order to proceed South, and examine into the affairs of the Bureau. I think the order was dated about the 4th or 5th of last April.

Q. By whom was that order given?

A. By the Secretary of War.

Q. What were your instructions in the discharge of your duty under that order?

A. I would rather present a copy of those instructions, which will give them more explicitly than I could verbally.

Q. From whom did you receive your instructions?

A. They were presented to me by Assistant Adjutant General Townsend, and were issued by the Secretary of War.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the President of the United States relative to the duties you were to discharge in the South?

A. I did. I had a conversation with him after I had left the Bureau. I wished to leave the United States service to return to my home in St. Louis. He requested me not to do so. In fact, I had put in my resignation and it had been accepted by the Secretary of War, to take effect at a date after that time, but a special order was issued revoking the acceptance of my resignation, and I was retained in the service. Some two weeks before I started south on the tour referred to, the President spoke to me, and said a great many complaints had been made to him from the South, by residents there, by officers of the government, and others, in relation to the misconduct of certain officers of the Freedmen's Bureau; that he did not know what to believe of these accounts; that he had been very much annoyed by hearing them, and wanted to know the truth respecting them. He requested me to go south on a tour of examination. I begged to be excused. I told him I did not wish to perform such duty at all—that I wished to return home. He told me to think the matter over. Subsequently he spoke to me again on the subject. I again declined. I told him I did not care about going; that, in fact, I did not wish to go, as I had been connected with the Bureau. I knew of certain improper practices upon the part of some of the officers of the Bureau, (some of whom it was impossible to relieve from duty with the Bureau,) but of these I did not inform the President. I preferred, therefore, not to go, because I did not want to report these matters, as I knew I would be obliged to, whenever they should come to my official notice. The President told me that General Steadman would also go with me on this tour. I said nothing more then about it. I received the order I have mentioned from the Secretary of War, and I started immediately afterwards.

Q. Were all the instructions received by you, either from the President or Secretary of War, embraced in the instructions to which you refer?

A. Yes, sir. I spoke to the Secretary of War about it one day, but he was not in a very good humor, and did not feel very much like talking. He told me he would like to see General Steadman before he went away. I do not know whether General Steadman had any conversation with him or not. I do not know whether the President gave him any instructions or had any conversation with him about the matter. The only instructions the President gave me were that he wished me to go south and see whether there were good grounds for the complaints which had been made.

Q. Did you receive any instructions that would guide you in your conduct when you went out as an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau to take charge of the district which had been formerly in charge of Mr. Conway?

A. I received only some written instructions from General Howard, which directed me to proceed to Louisiana and relieve Mr. Conway, and to remain there until General Baird arrived, when I should return to Washington; also instructing me to endeavor to act in harmony with the military commander of the department and with the Governor of the State—Governor Wells. These were the only instructions I received from General Howard. The President spoke about my going there also. At first General Howard himself wished to go and relieve Mr. Conway. I desired very much that he should not do so, as I knew very well what kind of a man Mr. Conway was, and that any person relieving him would be very much abused by him and his friends. This proved to be the fact, as I, as well as General Howard and the Bureau, were abused for it. The President said to me one day that Governor Wells had been writing to him a great many letters about this man Conway, and had complained very much about him; that he was doing a great deal of damage in Louisiana; that he was interfering with matters that did not belong to the Bureau; and the President said that somebody had better go and relieve Mr. Conway. I said nothing further about the matter until after I had received my orders to go there. The President then told me that as I was going down there he hoped I would make things all right and do what was proper. That was about all he said.

Q. Can you give a statement of the property in charge of the Bureau in Louisiana, during your administration there, restored to the claimants?

A. No, sir, I cannot. I would not like to venture to give an estimate without looking at the records. There was a large amount of property, over a million dollars, I think, but I would not like to make a statement about it without referring to the records.

Q. Was any of that property restored to disloyal persons?

A. That I could not say. Certainly some of it had been restored to persons who had been disloyal.

Q. Had you any instructions relative to the restoration of property that had been seized?

A. There were printed instructions from the Bureau, and I was guided entirely by them. Occasionally letters would be received, also, from the Bureau, instructing that certain property be restored.

Q. Do you remember the case of one Zacharie?

A. Yes, sir; I remember some facts in connection with it, but these things have, to a great extent, passed from my mind. I remember that property was restored to the claimant.

Q. Do you remember the circumstances of the case?

A. I do not. I think an order was received from the Bureau directing the restoration of that property; afterwards a letter was received from the Bureau directing that it be not restored at present; and afterwards another letter was sent directing that it be restored; and whether there are any other letters or not, I am not sure. I do not like to testify in reference to these matters unless I can examine the records.

Q. Did you restore any property except in pursuance of the orders received from General Howard?

A. I think not. I could tell by looking at the letters and orders I received. So many things have occupied my attention since that time that it is very difficult to recollect. In several of these cases special orders were issued directing restoration, I remember.

Q. Are these instructions on file?

A. No, sir. The special orders, letters, &c., are not on file here, but are in New Orleans. Of course, of all letters sent from the Freedmen's Bureau copies were retained.

Q. Did you turn over any property to claimants which had been leased to other persons, prior to the expiration of the lease.

A. I think I did; but I believe, in those cases, the rights of the lessees were not to be interfered with.

Q. Was that the case in the Zacharie estate?

A. I do not remember about that at all.

Q. Do you remember whether a subsequent agreement was required, in order to preserve the rights of the lessees?

A. I think that orders were issued for that purpose.

Q. Before you and General Steadman commenced your tour of inspection and examination in the South, did you agree upon any line of policy to be pursued before you left this city?

A. Not at all. In fact, I hardly saw General Steadman before I started. He had been in New York before that. He was telegraphed to several times to come on, and I think we started the next day after he arrived here. The manner in which we began our examinations, and the manner in which we made up our reports, was by taking up and following our written instructions, which were in several paragraphs. The first paragraph, for instance, called for the number of officers and civilians employed in the Bureau, the amount of salary paid, &c. The next was the amount of rations issued, &c. We would take a copy of our instructions and examine, under each paragraph, each of the Commissioners, assistant Commissioners, and agents. The information called for in the first paragraph, as to the number of officers, amount paid, &c., we would, generally, get from the headquarters of the Bureau in the different States.

Q. Have you stated all that you remember that transpired during the interviews you had with the President in reference to these matters?

A. Yes, sir. The President was remarkably reticent. In reference to going to Louisiana, the only thing he said to me was to do what was right down there.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was there any personal property included in what was delivered up by you in Louisiana?

A. No, sir; unless there was some furniture in some of the houses.

Q. Do you know whether there was a record kept of all the transactions while Mr. Conway was there?

A. I do not know; I think there was, but the record is somewhat defective. I am under the impression that some property was restored, of which there is no record at all. There was a man in the office when I went there, whom Mr. Conway spoke to me about retaining as chief clerk or property clerk, and who had a great deal to do with the restoration of property. As soon as I took possession of the Bureau—the very second day afterwards, I think—I found that this man had been bribed by several persons to restore their property. I brought the man before me, and he acknowledged that fact I saw Mr. Conway about it, and said I intended to kick the man out immediately. He advised me to keep the man, and said he was a very good man; that he knew all about the persons whose property was held by the Bureau. I discharged the man that day. There were various suspicions about the office, but nothing that I traced to any person except to this chief clerk, who, Mr. Conway told me, had been a "Peter Funk" auctioneer.

Q. Can you give the man's name?

A. His name is Black. He was in the quartermaster's department of the Bureau, and had charge of abandoned property.

Q. Was he an officer of the army?

A. No, sir; a civilian, who had been employed by Mr. Conway.

Q. Do you know his residence?

A. New Orleans. He had been a sort of bogus auctioneer before the war. Mr. Conway told me he knew he was not the right kind of a man; that he had been a "Peter Funk" auctioneer, but that he was a pretty smart fellow, and a valuable man; knew who was loyal and who disloyal; and knew the proper persons to whom property should be restored.

Q. In reference to whom did these suspicions you speak of about the office apply?

A. There were suspicions or rumors that bribes had been taken, but I do not like to say anything about this. I would not like to accuse any person, or mention any names.

Q. Was it in connection with the management of the office before you went there?

A. Yes, sir; but I did not examine into these matters at all. I had too much else to attend to while I was there.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You did, however, examine into one case?

A. Yes, sir. It was so patent that I could not avoid it, and the man confessed that he had accepted bribes, and asked me if I would relieve him without making the matter public.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Did you report that to the President?

A. I made a report of my administration. I was accused by several persons, and by Mr. Conway particularly, with actions which, if they had been true, would have been very outrageous; which representations were entirely false.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1867.

General J. S. FULLERTON, having been recalled, made the following statement:

I stated in my former examination that a large amount of property held by the Bureau in Louisiana had been restored under the general orders issued from the Bureau in Washington. When I went to Louisiana I found that Mr. Conway had an attorney in the employment of the Bureau. Cases were submitted to this attorney for examination and report. A great many cases so referred to him, and in which he had recommended restoration, remained not acted on. In compliance with the general instructions received from the Bureau in Washington, I proceeded to act at once upon these cases. The property held by the Bureau at that time was bringing a large rental, though not one per cent. of its actual value. Mr. Conway himself was not in the military service. A majority of the employés about the Bureau were not in the military service, and they were paid out of the proceeds arising from the rents of this property. I think the expenses of headquarters were about $3,000 a month, and part of those proceeds went to pay that. Afterwards, the attorney whom Mr. Conway had employed became unwell, and wished to go North. He went North, and I employed as attorney Mr. Tatum, one of the partners of the firm of Warmouth & Tatum, attorneys at law in New Orleans. Mr. Tatum continued the work of making examinations and reports in cases where application was made for the restoration of abandoned lands held by the Bureau in Louisiana, as the attorney employed by Mr. Conway had done before him. I took his reports, and made such examinations of the cases reported upon as I could, in addition, before acting upon them.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. What was the name of the attorney employed by Mr. Conway?

A. I do not remember; he was a man who had been employed by Mr. Conway. He was in delicate health; wished to go north; and I accepted his resignation of the office he held, to allow him to do so.

I was informed by General Howard that he had testified in relation to certain orders he had issued for the restoration of property. There was one order issued from the headquarters of the Bureau in Washington by myself, in the form of a letter sent to General Sprague, assistant Commissioner for the States of Missouri and Arkansas. It was sent, I think, during General Howard's absence, and may contain some information on the subject of restoration of property. I present the committee with a copy of that letter, which was promulgated by General Sprague, which is as follows:

[Circular No. 8.]

BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
FOR THE STATES OF MISSOURI AND ARKANSAS,
St. Louis, Mo., August 21, 1865.

The following letter and instructions are published for the information and guidance of all concerned:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES,
FREEDMEN AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, August 18, 1865.

General application for restoration of "abandoned lands" now in the possession of this Bureau, must be made by the applicants to the assistant Commissioners of the same for the States within which such lands are situated. These applications should then be forwarded to the Commissioner of the Bureau, who will direct what final action must be taken in the respective cases. The assistant Commissioners should also forward with such applications, statements as to whether the applicants are and always have been loyal citizens, or whether they have been pardoned by the President. Abandoned lands that have been taken possession of by the Commissioner of this Bureau, are, as it were, held for the time in trust by the government, awaiting the return of the loyal citizen, or in the case of a disloyal owner, awaiting proceedings for confiscation, which may be prevented or stayed by the pardon of the President. Where the lands belong to loyal citizens it will be restored to them upon proof of loyalty, and upon establishing their right of possession.

Where it belongs to those who have been disloyal, it will be returned only after they have been pardoned by the President, for by that act they are cleansed of treason, regenerated, and restored to full rights of citizenship. The lands cannot then be held "awaiting confiscation," for the citizen has been restored in accordance with the terms of pardon, "all rights of property except as to slaves." In all cases of the restoration of such abandoned lands, the provisions of Circular No. 3, from this Bureau, must be observed. The freedmen must not be deprived of the fruits of their industry. Where they have been cultivating such lands, they must remain in possession of the same until the crops now growing thereon have been secured for their benefit, or until full and just compensation be given to them for their labor and expenditures.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. S. FULLERTON,
Brevet Brigadier General and A. A. G.

1. All applications for the restoration of abandoned lands in the States of Missouri and Arkansas must conform strictly to the instructions contained in the above letter, and must be forwarded to the assistant Commissioner through the office of the local superintendent of this Bureau, on duty in the district where the lands are situated.

2. Each application must accurately describe the property whose restoration is applied for: if real estate, give metes and bounds, number of acres, &c.; and must state for what purpose the property is now being used.

3 The local superintendent will require the statement as to whether the applicant is and has always been a loyal citizen, or whether he has been pardoned by the President, to be attested by proof of the facts set forth in the statement, and he will endorse on each application all that he knows of the applicant and the property applied for that will assist in determining the question of restoration.

4. In addition to the statement as to whether the applicant is and has always been a loyal citizen, or whether he has been pardoned by the President, the local superintendent will require proof of the past and present loyalty and right of possession of the applicant, or of the fact of his having received the pardon of the President.

J. W. SPRAGUE,
Brigadier General, Assistant Commissioner.

Official:

GEO. E. DAYTON,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

The policy of the Bureau changed materially, I think, after the meeting of Congress, in relation to the restoration of property. General Howard was, as I said, away when that order was issued, but he said nothing about it when he returned. General Sprague had been writing, asking for instructions on the points covered in the letter, and I took upon myself the responsibility of writing the letter. I think it was in accordance with the policy of the Bureau at the time in reference to the restoration of such property.

Q. Did you confer with the Secretary of War in relation to this letter of August 18, 1865?

A. I think not. Other letters had been written, and orders issued similar in their purport, relative to the restoration of abandoned property. It was not intended that General Sprague should publish the letter as a general order. This matter had been talked over considerably in the Bureau.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the President relative to this letter of August 18, 1865?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was the letter then written by yourself upon your own responsibility?

A. Upon my own responsibility, (for I think General Howard was absent at the time,) understanding at that time that these views were to be carried out by the Bureau. The letter or no part of it was ever revoked.

Q. Look at the document marked "B" and state what it is, and whether you have any knowledge of it?

A. I cannot say that I do know what it is. When I left Louisiana, I had a list of the property restored by me while I was there, made out by the property clerk. I see here some mention of property restored by General Baird. That was after I left; so that this does not appear to be the list made out by me, or by my direction. I know that the list I refer to was altogether different in shape from this. This may contain the list of property restored by me as well as of that restored by Mr. Conway, but it is not the same list made out by my order. This contains property restored after I left New Orleans, down to as late as April, 1866. I left there in November, 1865. I do not remember many of the names here given as of persons to whom I caused property to be restored. Here is mention of a plantation restored to Pierre Soulé by General Fullerton. I think that must be a mistake. I do not remember anything of that kind, though it may be correct. There was some property of his in question before the United States District Court, I think, seized under the confiscation act. Whether that was restored during my term, or afterwards, I do not now remember. I think afterwards the case was before this court and was dismissed. I am quite sure I did not restore this property that the United States marshal had possession of. I cannot speak, however, with certainty in reference to those cases without consulting the records in New Orleans. In looking over this list I find that more property was restored by Mr. Conway than I supposed had been. This list is different, certainly, in some respects from the one I prepared. That not only gave the name of the owner, location, number of acres, reason of seizure, and date of restoration, which this gives, but also the estimated value of the property.

Q. Do you see upon this list property which purports to have been restored by you?

A. Yes; but I do not know whether it contains all that was restored by me. I could not state anything as to the correctness of this paper. I have already mentioned one piece of property given here as having been restored by me, of which I have no recollection, though I cannot say positively it was not restored by me.

I would like to make another statement as to the manner in which the papers of persons making application for the restoration of their property were prepared. In each case the applicant filed his affidavit, and all papers offered by him supporting his application there, in each case, were put in a separate envelope. The attorney for the Bureau, after having examined a particular case, wrote out his opinion and placed it in the same envelope. These papers, containing a full history in each case, are all, I presume, now on file with the assistant Commissioner at New Orleans. There were special difficulties under which I labored in discharging the duties imposed on me while acting as assistant Commissioner of the Bureau at New Orleans. I knew that difficulties would arise, and, in order to prepare for them as far as possible, before leaving Washington I wrote out certain questions which I wished General Howard to answer. He gave me a verbal answer to them, but did not wish to answer in writing. I was not sure of the law in some cases which I knew would arise, and thought I had better take them over to the President. I took the written questions to the Executive mansion, sent them in to the President by one of the private secretaries, and requested answers to them. I waited for two days after the time I had set to leave Washington, and receiving no response, I called personally to see the President. He returned the questions to me without answer, telling me I had better go there and be governed by the law in the case. And I had to use my own judgment in the matter. There were questions as to matters in which I desired to have positive instructions. For instance, a very considerable amount of property had been seized without the authority of any law of Congress whatever, which had been turned over to the Bureau, and by them leased to third parties, and the question arose in such cases whether after restoration the lessee should be allowed to remain during the full term of his lease, or whether the property should be at once restored to the owner, leaving the lessee to look to the government for damages, that is, damages for leasing to them property over which the government had no rightful control. Several cases of that kind arose while I was there, and not liking to act in the matter, definitely, I put them off. There arose other cases that came before me like this: Property was held by the Bureau as abandoned property, which had not been voluntarily abandoned, or in fact abandoned at all, which the owners had been compelled to leave, and then after a certain time the property had been seized as abandoned. There were plantations owned by parties living in the city, left in charge of agents, which had been seized as abandoned because the owner was not living on them. I allowed most of these cases to be continued without decision.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You say that certain property was taken as abandoned after the owners had been put out of it; put out by whom?

A. By provost marshals in some instances. A great deal of property was seized in Louisiana before the Bureau was organized, under the direction of the Treasury Department, which was turned over to the Bureau. The papers on file in New Orleans will show, in each case, how the Bureau came into possession of the property.

Q. Under what circumstances were the owners of this property of which you speak, put out, and the property seized?

A. I suppose the officers acting in the matter wanted the property for some purpose. There were a few cases of that kind reported to me, and affidavits presented that the owners had first been turned out, and afterwards their property seized as abandoned.

Q. What were they turned out for?

A. I do not know.

Q. You know what was the report or understanding, do you not?

A. My statement would be merely hearsay. During the military occupation of New Orleans, as well as other places, a great deal of property was seized for government use, and a great deal by officers for their own use for quarters, &c.; and after having been seized and occupied, much of it was turned over to the Bureau as abandoned.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Were these seizures during the war, or afterwards?

A. I went there after the surrender of the rebel armies. I could not tell when the seizures were made without looking over the papers in each case.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you a copy of the questions which you laid before the President for instructions?

A. I have not. I do not know whether I took it to New Orleans, even.

Q. Was the paper which you laid before the President prepared by you?

A. It was. I merely wished answers to the questions for my own guidance. The orders of the Bureau in reference to the restoration of property were not complete.

Q. Did you have any instructions from the President, either written or oral, at any time other than those you have spoken of?

A. No, sir; I could not get him to say anything. That was the difficulty under which I labored. I could not get instructions from General Howard as definitely as I wished, and I was compelled to act upon my own judgment. The Bureau had been organized but a short time before some confusion in the orders that had been issued existed, and the law in reference to abandoned lands was very indefinite.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you tell General Howard you had had frequent interviews with the President on these subjects, before you went there?

A. No, sir; I think not. The General knew I had seen the President. I told him I had. I had several interviews with the President at the time mentioned, for the purpose of requesting him to appoint some of the men who had served in the same army with me to places in the regular army.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did you or not tell General Howard that you had instructions from the President, oral or in writing, and of which General Howard himself had no knowledge except such as you gave him?

A. No, sir; General Howard knew that I took those written questions I have mentioned over to the President.

Q. Did you or not represent to anybody in New Orleans that you had the instructions of the President to surrender this property?

A. No, sir; I have heard of such remarks coming from some newspaper correspondents who were in New Orleans. Some of these men came to me while in the Bureau, and wished to know where my orders came from and what they were. I told them I had orders from Washington. I referred to the orders of the Bureau, without telling them they were such. The only orders or instructions I received from the President in reference to the matter were, to go to New Orleans, do what was right and obey the law—the orders of the Bureau.

Q. Did you have any authority from the President, or from any conversation you had with him, did you infer or assume that you had authority to do anything more or different than is set forth in Circular No. 15?

A. I never considered myself as having any authority to do anything conflicting with, or not in accordance with, the orders from the Bureau, except in one matter. I do not know whether Circular No. 15 was the last circular on that subject from the Bureau or not. I acted solely under instructions from the Bureau, except in reference to the single matter of stopping a tax that had been levied.

Q. What tax was that?

A. It was a tax ordered by General Banks while commanding the department of the Gulf, assessed upon the people for the support of schools for freedmen, but was not collected by him. Some time after the Freedmen's Bureau was organized, it appeared that some money, a good many thousand dollars, had been paid by the quartermaster's department to Mr. Conway for the support of freedmen's schools. The military authorities wished to get this money back. Mr. Conway asked General Howard for permission to collect the tax, which had been ordered some time before by General Banks to be collected, for the purpose of repaying this money to the quartermaster's department. General Howard telegraphed to General Canby on the subject, and it was agreed that the tax might be collected. When I arrived in Louisiana a large amount of money had been collected under this order, but not a cent had been applied to the repayment of this money to the quartermaster's department. It had all been used for the current support of freedmen's schools, payment of teachers, &c. I telegraphed the whole facts of the case, and also stated that many people had not the money to pay the tax, and were about to be arrested, because they could not, and received a reply from the President to this effect, that in the impoverished condition of the people, the further collection of the tax had better be suspended, not stopped, and I issued an order suspending any further proceedings in the matter. These were the only instructions I ever received from the President direct.

Q. Can you furnish the Committee with a copy of the instructions under which you acted while in New Orleans?

A. I presume I can get them from General Howard. This circular, No. 15, is one of them. I am aware that there was an impression more or less current in New Orleans, that I had received explicit and definite instructions from the President in reference to my action. I never contradicted anything. I allowed persons to think of me and my actions just as they pleased. Mr. Conway, my predecessor, had gathered around him a clique of men who paid much more attention to political matters than to the affairs of the Bureau. I knew that to relieve Mr. Conway was to bring down the abuse of this whole clique upon his successor. I was the victim. I paid no attention to them. I had no political or personal ends to carry out, or ambition to gratify, and I simply attended to the affairs of the Bureau, carrying out the general instructions from General Howard, under which I was acting, and doing what I could, and what I thought best for the benefit of the freedmen. I refused to have any participation in any political meetings, or to meddle with political affairs, or any affairs outside of the Bureau. The consequence was that I met with very much opposition. These persons took every opportunity to misrepresent me in everything I did. For instance, I issued an apprentice order. It was almost literally a transcript of General Howard's order, and of the apprentice law of one of the northern States. By a general order of the Commissioner of the Bureau I was obliged to act in the apprentice cases. No freedmen were apprenticed under it, but I was accused by reason of this of selling freedmen into slavery. At the time of the election, when Judge Warmouth announced himself a candidate to represent the people of the Territory of Louisiana in Congress, a great many freedmen voted for him. Two colored men were arrested by the police for creating a disturbance when voting. They were taken to the mayor, who sent them to my office. They were brought there when I was very busy, and the case was not presented to me. But one of my officers put them in prison; and then some of the men in my office went on the street, and said I had imprisoned colored men for voting. I knew nothing about the case whatever, until two days afterwards, when a committee came to me asking why these men were imprisoned. Everything that this clique could do was done to break me down and get me away from there. I was also accused by some members of it of accepting dinners from rebels. This was not true. I did receive an invitation to accept a dinner from citizens, some of whom were as loyal as any in New Orleans, but I refused to accept it. I wrote them a note declining. There was nothing which I did that was not known in Louisiana. There were men on my track who watched everything done by me, and who circulated the stories that were set afloat, for the purpose of breaking me down, and to get Conway back. General Howard was in New Orleans two or three days before I left. I showed him all of my orders, and informed him of all that I had done. He called a meeting of the colored people at my office, for the purpose of having a talk with them, at which he told them that he approved everything I had done, and told them that Mr. Conway had been removed for spending too much money, that he had not been sufficiently economical in his expenditures. Some newspapers published a statement telegraphed from Washington that I had been relieved from duty with the Bureau in Louisiana on account of my transactions in that State. Of course I paid no attention to any publication of reports in the newspapers. I did, however, communicate with the Bureau in Washington on the subject, and received, while on my way to Washington from New Orleans, the following telegraphic despatch in reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 24, 1865.

To Brigadier General J. S. FULLERTON, Chillicothe, Ohio:

No despatch was ever sent from or authorized by the Bureau, that your action in Louisiana had been disapproved, and that General Baird had been sent out to supersede you. Your appointment, when made, was merely temporary till General Baird should be able to go to New Orleans.

By order of Major General O. O. Howard:

MAX. WOODHULL,
Colonel and Acting Assistant Quartermaster.

I merely state these facts in order to let the Committee know what many of these stories, which have been in circulation, are worth.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did General Howard at any time find fault with you for having restored these lands too rapidly?

A. No, sir. There are certain matters I could state that would satisfy the Committee on that point, but as they involve the disclosure of private conversations between officers of the Bureau and myself, I do not care to do it.

Q. Did he at any time express to you the opinion that you had in any way gone beyond your orders in reference to the restoration of property?

A. No, sir. So far from that, after I returned from Louisiana, I wrote out my report of all transactions under my direction from the time I went to Louisiana until I left there, and submitted it to General Howard and to Colonel Eaton, who was then his assistant at the headquarters of the Bureau. They approved of it, except as to certain expressions relating to some officers in and who had been in the Bureau in Louisiana, which they feared might create unpleasant feelings on their part. These corrections were made, and the report as presented met with their entire approval.

Q. Were you in the habit, while in New Orleans, of associating almost exclusively with the class of men there styled as rebels?

A. If you include in that class Governor Wells, Dr. Tom Cottman, United States Marshal Bullitt, and General Sheridan, I was, for I associated with them more than with any other four men in Louisiana. I spent a part of every day with General Sheridan, in his private house. I had known the General previously when he commanded a division in the corps of which I was assistant adjutant general; had a very great admiration for him, and was glad to keep company with him.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Dr. Cottman formerly voted for the ordinance of secession, did he not?

A. I have been informed, since I left New Orleans, that he did. I did not know before that he had done so. He is very well known in Washington, I believe. He is considered very radical now, and was a strong Unionist when I was in New Orleans.

Q. Look at the paper marked "memorandum," attached to General Howard's testimony, and state whether the questions and answers contained in that paper correspond in form and substance to the questions submitted to General Howard and to the President by yourself?

A. I remember the first three questions; the others I do not. There were questions, also asked by me, which are not here. The answers I do not remember. If they were presented to the Committee by General Howard, I take it for granted they were given. I do not deny anything that General Howard states positively as true. I desire it to be distinctly understood that the answers given to persons in New Orleans, as to whose orders I was acting under, were given as they were, so as to avoid the constant running to me on the part of these men who seemed so anxious to give me instructions in my duties, and direct me how to carry out the orders of the Bureau.

Q. Did you give these people distinctly to understand that you were acting under special instructions?

A. I did not care what they understood. I merely said I was acting under instructions from Washington. The only orders I had were issued from Washington, from General Howard's office.

Q. Did you not encourage the idea that these people had—that you were acting under special instructions from the President?

A. I think not. My idea was to be very reticent. A correspondent of a New York paper asked me in Willard's hotel, a day or two ago, whether I told him, while in New Orleans, that I had some such instructions from the President. I made no reply, but turned the conversation. As I was under examination by this Committee, and did not know what questions might or might not be asked me while here, and knowing that certain parties circulated the report that I had special instructions from the President, I did not think it necessary to say anything in the matter until I had an opportunity to do so officially. I recollect that a lawyer in New Orleans, by the name of Lee, called to see the President in Washington in relation to the restoration of certain property in Louisiana, and the President told him he would have to return to Louisiana and see the assistant Commissioner there, and he gave him a letter of introduction to me. It was known in New Orleans that he brought a letter from the President to myself, and that fact was made use of to prove that I was acting under the special instructions of the President.

Q. Was Lee's property restored to him?

A. The matter was referred to the attorney, and I do not remember what was the result. I am not sure whether the property was his or belonged to some person for whom he was acting as attorney.

Q. Did you not proceed, while you were in Louisiana, upon the idea of restoring this property to those who had been pardoned as rapidly as possible?

A. Of course, as fast as cases came up, when the orders of the Bureau required it, I restored it. My object was to dispose of the business coming before me, of every description, promptly, and to have a clear table. As I remarked, a large number of applications which had been reported on by Mr. Conway's attorney, remained unacted on when I relieved him. I acted upon these cases as rapidly as I could after the necessary examinations, in order to clear them off my desk.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You mean, then, simply to say that you endeavored to discharge the duties imposed on you promptly?

A. Yes, sir; nothing more.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. You considered it your duty to restore property to claimants who had received the President's pardon, as rapidly as possible?

A. I considered it my duty to act promptly, under the orders of the Bureau, upon such cases as were presented to me; no more so in property cases than in any other that came before me.

(The following order, called for in the previous examination of the witness, was by him laid before the Committee):

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 7, 1866.

Ordered.—I. That Major General James B. Steadman and Brevet Brigadier General Joseph S. Fullerton, United States volunteers, be, and they are hereby, directed to make an inspection and report upon the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau in the following military departments: Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas.

In making said inspection, they will direct attention especially to the following points:

1. To the number of officers and persons employed by or attached to the Bureau in each department, whether civil or military, their rank and pay, and what duties they perform.

2. The number, age, and sex of the persons receiving aid from the said Bureau, and its mode of administration; the number of rations and other supplies issued each month since the 1st of December, and of what the rations and supplies consisted.

3. The necessity for the relief so furnished, and how long and to what extent it will continue.

4. To what extent the operations of the Bureau have been aided or opposed by the white people in each department.

5. What retrenchment or reform in the mode of administration and in the operations can properly be made, and the facts and reasons therefor.

6 The effect of the operations of the Bureau on the freedmen in respect to their habits and disposition to labor and support themselves.

7. The condition of the freedmen's settlements on the sea islands and seacoasts under General Sherman's order, and any other points that may arise in the course of inspection that will contribute to the efficiency of the Bureau or its operations, and any information that may be useful to the service.

II. Military officers on duty in the respective departments, and all officers, agents, and employés of the Freedmen's Bureau are directed to furnish such information and assistance as may be necessary to a full and fair inspection and report upon the operations of said Bureau.

III. The inspectors are authorized to employ such clerical assistance as may be necessary for this duty. Commanding officers will provide quarters, and officers of the quartermaster and subsistence departments will furnish transportation and subsistence when required.

IV. Special reports and recommendations will be made from time to time, as the inspection progresses.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Official:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WASHINGTON, Monday, March 25, 1867.

General RUFUS SAXTON, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Are you connected with the army; and, if so, in what capacity?

A. I am a captain in the quartermaster's department, and am brevet brigadier general in the army.

Q. During the years 1865–'6 were you in the military service?

A. Yes; I was brevet major general of volunteers and assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

Q. During the time you were acting as assistant Commissioner, did you take or have possession of abandoned lands within your district?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To what extent?

A. I seized, under General Sherman's special field order No. 15, the sea islands in South Carolina. Under the law of Congress establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and under the orders of the Commissioner of that Bureau, I seized all the abandoned lands which I could during the time I was operating, amounting, as estimated, to about 450,000 acres. I continued thus till October 2, 1865, when I received a telegram from the Commissioner of the Bureau directing me to seize no more abandoned lands. In accordance with the decision of the Attorney General authorizing it, and the order from the Commissioner, I made a requisition on the Treasury Department for all the abandoned property in its possession, for the use of the freedmen. The assistant treasurer, Mr.

Callicot, turned over to me nearly the entire city of Charleston. Under circular No. 15, from the Commissioner of the Bureau, the property was restored to its former owners—first, all who came under the amnesty proclamation of the President were considered as entitled to have their property restored; and, second, all those who received special pardons from the President.

Q. Do the 450,000 acres of which you speak include the sea islands?

A. No, sir, not altogether. They include a portion of the sea islands; but a greater proportion was on the main land. I had just got my forces in operation, seizing the land at a pretty rapid rate, when I was stopped by that order from the Bureau. I should very soon have had a much larger amount.

Q. Was any estimate made by you of the value of the property seized?

A. No, sir; but it was very great.

Q. Have you any opinion as to its value?

A. No, sir; but it must have amounted to a good many millions.

Q. What was the value of the sea islands at the time the war opened, 1860–'1?

A. I should think they were valued at some twenty dollars an acre.

Q. How many acres in the sea islands were there?

A. I do not think I can make an estimate. I colonized some forty thousand negroes, and each head of a family was to receive forty acres of land.

(Witness here produced General Sherman's field order No. 15, and his own order under it, which were made part of the record, and are as follows:)

[Circular No. 4.]

HEADQUARTERS, BEAUFORT, S. C., April 22, 1865.

It having been reported to me that unauthorized persons are now settling on lands which have been reserved and set apart for the freedmen, the following is published for the information of all concerned:

[Special Field Orders, No. 15.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
In the Field, Savannah, Ga., January 16, 1865.

I. The islands from Charleston south, the abandoned rice fields along the rivers for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. John's river, Florida, are reserved and set apart for the settlement of the negroes now made free by the acts of war and the proclamation of the President of the United States.

II. At Beaufort, Hilton Head, Savannah, Fernandina, St. Augustine, and Jacksonville, the blacks may remain in their chosen or accustomed vocations; but on the islands and in the settlements hereafter to be established, no white person whatever, unless military officers and soldiers detailed for duty, will be permitted to reside; and the sole and exclusive management of affairs will be left to the freed people themselves, subject only to the United States military authority and the acts of Congress. By the laws of war and orders of the President of the United States, the negro is free, and must be dealt with as such. He cannot be subjected to conscription or forced military service, save by the written orders of the highest military authority of the department. Under such regulations as the President or Congress may prescribe, domestic servants, blacksmiths, carpenters, and other mechanics will be free to select their own work and residence; but the young and able-bodied negroes must be encouraged to enlist as soldiers in the service of the United States, to contribute their share toward maintaining their own freedom, and securing their rights as citizens of the United States. Negroes so enlisted will be organized into companies, battalions, and regiments, under the orders of the United States military authorities, and will be paid, fed, and clothed according to law. The bounties paid on enlistment may, with the consent of the recruit, go to assist his family and settlement in procuring agricultural implements, seeds, tools, boats, clothing, and other articles necessary for their livelihood.

III. Whenever three respectable negroes, heads of families, shall desire to settle on land, and shall have selected for that purpose an island, or a locality clearly defined, within the limits above designated, the inspector of settlements and plantations will himself, or by such subordinate officer as he may appoint, give them a license to settle such island or district, and afford them such assistance as he can, to enable them to establish a peaceable agricultural settlement. The three parties named will subdivide the land, under the supervision of the inspector, among themselves, and such others as may choose to settle near them, so that each family shall have a plot of not more than forty (40) acres of tillable ground; and when it borders on some water channel, with not more than eight hundred feet front, in the possession of which land the military authorities will afford them protection until such time as they can protect themselves, or until Congress shall regulate their title. The quartermaster may, on the requisition of the inspector of settlements and plantations, place at the disposal of the inspector one or more of the captured steamers, to ply between the settlements and one or more of the commercial points heretofore named in orders, to afford the settlers the opportunity to supply their necessary wants, and to sell the products of their land and labor.

IV. Whenever a negro has enlisted in the military service of the United States, he may locate his family in any one of the settlements at pleasure, and acquire a homestead and all other rights and privileges of a settler, as though present in person. In like manner negroes may settle their families and engage on board the gunboats, or in fishing, or in the navigation of the inland waters, without losing any claim to land or other advantages derived from this system. But no one, unless an actual settler as above defined, or unless absent on government service, will be entitled to claim any right to land or property in any settlement, by virtue of these orders.

V. In order to carry out this system of settlement, a general officer will be detailed as inspector of settlements and plantations, whose duty it shall be to visit the settlements, to regulate their police and general management, and who will furnish personally to each head of a family, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a possessory title in writing, giving as near as possible a description of boundaries, and who shall adjust all claims or conflicts that may arise under the same, subject to the like approval, treating such titles altogether as possessory. The same general officer will also be charged with the enlistment and organization of the negro recruits, and protecting their interests while so absent from their settlements, and will be governed by the rules and regulations prescribed by the War Department for such purpose.

VI. Brigadier General R. Saxton is hereby appointed inspector of settlements and plantations, and will at once enter on the performance of his duties. No change is intended or desired in the settlement on Beaufort island, nor will any rights to property heretofore acquired be affected thereby.

By order of Major General W. T. Sherman:

L. M. DAYTON,
Major and Assistant Adjutant General.

Having been detailed by the proper authority, and being held responsible for the enforcement of this order, I hereby warn all persons against violating any of its provisions, as all such will be held to the strictest accountability for trespass; their effects will be seized for the benefit of the freedmen, and themselves sent out of the department, or otherwise punished by sentence of a military commission. All superintendents of plantations, islands, &c., and all officers or other persons on duty in connection with the freedmen, are required to bring to the immediate notice of the inspector of settlements any violation of the provisions of this order.

Superintendents of islands and plantations will cause copies of this circular to be posted up in conspicuous positions, and take every opportunity to inform those concerned of its existence.

Thirty days will be allowed for the proper circulation of its contents, and all who fail to vacate premises which are occupied by them, contrary to General Sherman's order, No. 15, will be at once arrested. Should it be necessary to employ military force to carry out the provisions of this circular, application will at once be made to me for such force.

Official:

R. SAXTON, Brt. Maj. Gen.,
Inspector of Settlements and Plantations.

WITNESS. On applications for the restoration of the sea island lands, under Circular No. 15, I put the following endorsement on nearly every application:

Endorsement on application of Hon. William Aiken, for the restoration of his property in South Carolina.

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER, SOUTH CAROLINA,
Charleston, S. C., October 9, 1865.

Respectfully forwarded to Major General O. O. Howard, United States Army, Commissioner Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for his action.

In accordance with the requirements of special field order No. 15, Headquarters military division of Mississippi, dated January 16, 1865, I took possession of all the sea islands and abandoned rice fields along the rivers for thirty miles back from the sea, for the purpose of colonizing the freedmen thereon in tracts of forty acres. The freedmen were promised the protection of the government in their possessions. This order was issued under a great military necessity, with the approval of the War Department. More than forty thousand destitute freedmen have been provided with homes under its promises. Appointed ex-officers to carry it out. I should break faith with the freedmen now by recommending the restoration of these lands. In my view this order of General Sherman is as binding as a statute.

R. SAXTON,
Brevet Major General and Assistant Commissioner.

Official copy:

WILLIAM FOWLER,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

Q. What was the value of the lands seized on the main land?

A. I should think about the same value—twenty dollars an acre. It would have been very difficult to have purchased them of their former owners. They were held very high, and I doubt whether they could have been purchased at that price; but I should think that was a fair valuation.

Q. Can you state, more definitely than you have done, what proportion of the city of Charleston was in your hands as assistant Commissioner?

A. I should judge two-thirds of it, and possibly more.

Q. Can you state how many pieces of property were surrendered by you?

A. I have here four hundred and fifty orders for restoration of property to owners in the city of Charleston, each order covering from one to twenty-five dwellings; and eighty-five orders for the restoration of plantations, of one or more plantations. These dockets do not cover all the property I had. I was relieved about that time from my duties as assistant Commissioner, and my successor restored probably more than I did. I was notified by one or two leading rebels that the sea island property was to be given up, and that I had better give it up quietly or it would be worse for me.

Q. Who were those rebels?

A. One of them was William Whaley; I do not recollect the others. Whaley told me that the President had told him this property would be given up.

Q. When was this conversation with Whaley?

A. Shortly before I was relieved, which was the 15th of January, 1866. This was some time in December, 1865.

Q. What gave rise to that conversation?

A. I had delivered none of the sea island property, and had refused to give it without a special order in each case.

Q. Your conversation with Whaley related to that?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you deliver the property under circular No. 15, or had you any other order from the Bureau or the President?

A. I delivered it under circular No. 15, and under the additional order from General Howard saying that that circular should be carried out.

[Witness produces the additional order referred to, dated Washington, October 11, 1865, which is as follows:]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, October 11, 1865.

GENERAL: I am directed by Major General Howard to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 10th instant, and, in answer, to inform you that if the owner of the property therein referred to is entitled to it under circular No. 15, current series, from this Bureau, it must be restored to him.

If it becomes necessary to hire buildings for office and quarters, you are authorized to do so, paying a moderate rent for the same out of the funds of the Bureau in your possession.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MAX. WOODHULL,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Brevet Major General R. SAXTON,
Assistant Commissioner, &c., Charleston, S. C.

The above order is hereby modified as follows:

If buildings to be restored under circular No. 15, current series, from this Bureau, are occupied by the officials of this Bureau, or by the military authorities, the titles to the same will be restored as in other cases, but with the provision that possession be retained by said officials so long as the War Department authorizes the retention of buildings under military necessity, and a moderate rent be paid out of the funds of the Bureau for the buildings so occupied by its officials.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General and Commissioner.

WITNESS: The orders under which seizures of abandoned lands were made were dated from the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, June 20, 1865, June 26, July 27, August 9, (in which attention is specially called to the law authorizing the seizure of abandoned lands,) and August 19, (with circular No. 13.) This was sent to me by General Howard for my guidance, and was in operation about a month, when it was countermanded by, as General Howard informed me, the direction of the President, and circular 15 substituted for it. Circular No. 15 was the one that restored all the property which came under the amnesty proclamation and the special pardons of the President.

Q. Did you receive any other orders from the Bureau, or from the President, in reference to the restoration of lands?

A. I received from the Bureau this order of August 16, 1865. It was on this order that the restoration of the land was made.

(The order was put in evidence, and is as follows:)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, August 16, 1865.

GENERAL: In accordance with the following endorsement and order of the President, you will immediately restore the property of Mr. B. B. Leake to him without further orders.

[Endorsement.]

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, August 16, 1865.

Respectfully returned to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, &c. The records of this office show that B. B. Leake was specially pardoned by the President on the 27th ultimo, and was thereby restored to all rights of property, except as to slaves.

Notwithstanding this, it is understood that the possession of his property is withheld from him. I have, therefore, to direct that General Fisk, assistant Commissioner at Nashville, Tennessee, be instructed by the Commissioner of Bureau of Freedmen, &c., to relinquish possession of the property of Mr. Leake, held by him as assistant Commissioner, &c., and that the same be immediately restored to the said Leake.

The same action will be had in all similar cases.

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

By order of Major General O. O. Howard, Commissioner, &c.:
SAMUEL L. TAGGART,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Brigadier General C. B. FISK,
Assistant Commissioner, Nashville, Tennessee.

Q. Did you have possesion of any lands that had been seized under the confiscation act?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know anything of any such seizures?

A. No, sir; all the property I had was seized because it was abandoned, or was turned over to me by the agents of the Treasury Department.

Q. What proportion of the lands on the main land of South Carolina was surrendered by you before you were relieved from duty there?

A. I cannot say; but I should think the greater part of it. I did not consider that circular No. 15 applied to the sea island lands, and I refused to surrender them without a special order in each case.

Q. Do you know of any rebels in South Carolina who made application for pardon, and who were not pardoned by the President?

A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Were any persons pardoned who had been prominent in the rebellion?

A. Yes, sir; a large number of them.

Q. Can you name any of them?

A. Governor Aiken, who was a blockade runner, and who profited very largely by blockade running during the war, was pardoned; also William Whaley, who was a prominent rebel. I cannot recollect names, but I know there were a great many prominent men pardoned.

Q. Do you know anything of Trenholm, secretary of the rebel treasury?

A. He was not pardoned while I was there.

Q. Do you know anything of his operations in blockade running during the war?

A. I have understood that he was engaged in blockade running.

Q. Was he reputed to be wealthy?

A. He was reported to be very wealthy. I heard his property estimated at between five and fifteen millions.

Q. Was he a large claimant of lands?

A. He had a large amount of property in Charleston. The firm of Frazer & Co. are the wealthiest men in Charleston. I restored all their property under the order which I received.

Q. Did you have any special orders in their case?

A. I had special directions to restore their property.

Q. From whom were those directions?

A. I do not recollect, but I will endeavor to ascertain.

Q. Was Trenholm, the secretary of the rebel treasury, a member of that firm?

A. I have understood so.

Q. Was any portion of the sea island lands restored while you were assistant Commissioner?

A. Not by me.

Q. Have you any knowledge that restoration was made since?

A. I have understood that it was because I stood in the way of restoration of those lands that I was removed. I refused, without positive orders in each case, to restore any of them; and I did not, while I was assistant Commissioner, restore any of them. I saw a copy of the letter written by Wm. H. Trescott to the President, endorsed by Governor Orr, stating that it was impossible for him to do anything so long as General Saxton had control of affairs in the department, and urging my immediate removal; and I understood that I was removed on the strength of that letter. I certainly was removed within a month of the letter being sent to Washington. I have understood that a greater part of the freedmen who were colonized under that order of General Sherman's were turned out of their houses and lost their lands. I was more particular about giving up those sea island lands, from the fact that I had been ordered to pledge them to the freedmen, and I had done so. I had promised to them, on the faith of the government, that they should be retained in possession, and I was unwilling, under any circumstances, to give up the lands.

Q. By what authority did you make that pledge to them?

A. On the authority of the Secretary of War, and of General Sherman's order. I was positively ordered by the Secretary of War, in a conversation which I had with him on the steamer coming from Savannah to Beaufort, to carry out the order of General Sherman. I remonstrated with him about being made to enforce that order, because former promises which I had made to the freedmen with reference to the occupancy of land had been broken, and I feared that in the enforcement of that order they would be disappointed again. I begged the Secretary of War, therefore, to relieve me from the duty of carrying it out. He ordered me, with great emphasis, to enforce it to its fullest extent, and I promised him that I would do so. His exact words were, "General, I order you to do this thing, and you must carry out this order."

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. State whether the Secretary of War endeavored to have the order carried out.

A. I believe the Secretary did everything in his power to maintain me in the position which I took, and to enforce that order.

Q. State whether the order of General Sherman was ever revoked.

A. It was never formally revoked, but it was practically so; it was disregarded.

Q. Did President Lincoln ever issue any order on the subject of the seizure of lands?

A. He did, on December 31, 1863.

Witness produces a copy of President Lincoln's order, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 30, 1863.

GENTLEMEN: By direction of the President I transmit the following instructions, which you will observe in disposing of lands struck off to the United States. You will consider them as applying to all lands in your district which are now, or may be hereafter, owned by the United States, except such as are or may be set apart for military, naval, school, or revenue purposes, and the plantations on St. Helena Island, known as "Land's End" and the "Ben Chaplin Place," and the city of Beaufort, on Port Royal Island.

All previous instructions, or parts thereof, which conflict with those now given, are hereby repealed.

Yours respectfully,

S. P. CHASE.

TO UNITED STATES DIRECT TAX COMMISSIONERS.

ADDITIONAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE DIRECT TAX COMMISSIONERS FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA, IN RELATION TO THE DISPOSITION OF LANDS.

1. You will allow any loyal person of twenty-one years of age or upwards, who has at any time since the occupation by the national forces resided for six months, or now resides upon or is engaged in cultivating any lands in your district owned by the United States, to enter the same for pre-emption to the extent of one or, at the option of the pre-emptor, two tracts of twenty acres each, paying therefor one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. You will give preference in all cases to heads of families, and to married women whose husbands are engaged in the service of the United States or are necessarily absent.

2. You will permit each soldier, sailor, or marine, actually engaged in the service of the United States, or any who have been or hereafter shall be honorably discharged, to pre-empt and purchase, in person or by authorized agent, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, one tract of twenty acres of land if single, and if married two tracts of twenty acres each, in addition to the amount a head of family, or married woman in the absence of her husband, is allowed to pre-empt and purchase under the general privilege to loyal persons.

3. Each pre-emptor, on filing his claim and receiving his certificate of pre-emption, must pay in United States notes two-fifths of the price, and the residue on receiving a deed for the parcels of land pre-empted, and a failure to make complete payment on receipt of the deed will forfeit all rights under the pre-emption, as well as all partial payments for the land.

4. When persons authorized to purchase by pre-emption desire to enter upon and cultivate lands not yet surveyed, they may do so, but they will be required to conform in their selections as near as possible to the probable lines of the surveys, and to take and occupy them subject to correction of title and occupation by actual surveys when made.

5. In making surveys, such reservation for paths and roadways will be made as will allow easy and convenient access to the several subdivisions entered for sale and occupancy by pre-emption or otherwise.

Approved December 31, 1863.

A. LINCOLN.

He also submitted general orders No. 1, June 20; No. 2, June 26; No. 3, June 26; No. 4, July 27; No. 5, August 9; No. 9, August 19; No. 15, September 28—all relating to the seizure and restoration of lands, with passages marked, which are appended to his testimony:

[Circular No. 10.]

I. The following mentioned reports will be forwarded to this Bureau by the assistant Commissioners of the same, as hereinafter mentioned:

1st. Monthly report of refugees and freedmen, whether they are self-supporting or not; who are in colonies, camps, depots, or hospitals, and on government farms, or other lands under control of the assistant Commissioners. These reports will contain statements of the number of persons in each colony, camp, depot, hospital, or on each farm; the number and value of rations that have been furnished to agents, employés, refugees, and freedmen; and of the amount and value of clothing that has been furnished, if any, and whether the same has been obtained by donation or purchase; also, of the number of refugees and freedmen who may not be in colonies, camps, depots, hospitals, or on farms, to whom rations and clothing may have been issued; and the number and value of such rations; and the amount and value of such clothing so issued; and whether such clothing was obtained by donation or purchase. The statistics of colonies, camps, &c., will be entered on separate lines in these reports. Blank forms for the same will be furnished from this Bureau.

The first of these reports that the assistant Commissioners make, must cover the period from the time when they first entered upon their duties until the first of the month following the receipt of this circular.

2d. Land Reports.—There will be furnished, as soon as practicable, reports of all lands in the possession or under the control of the assistant Commissioners, or their agents, that are held for the use or benefit of loyal refugees or freedmen, if such reports have not already been made. They will contain statements as to whether such lands have been abandoned or confiscated; a brief or general description of each separate piece or tract, with its situation, and the names of the former owner or possessor of the same. After such reports have been forwarded, monthly reports of changes will be made, containing brief descriptions of any lands gained during the past month, with statements as to how the same were acquired, the situation and names of former owners. These reports will also account for all lands that have been lost since the last reports were made, with statements as to how the same were lost or given up. In columns of remarks will be stated the number of refugees or freedmen on each farm or tract of land, how they are employed, and whether they are self-supporting.

3d. School Reports.—Reports will be forwarded, as soon as practicable, of the number of schools, scholars, and teachers, at present under the general direction of the assistant Commissioners of this Bureau, in their respective districts, and afterwards monthly reports of changes in the same will be made.

4th. Rosters of all officers and civilians on duty with, or employed by assistant Commissioners, as sub-assistant Commissioners, staff officers, or agents, giving the names of such persons, and rank, if they are officers of the army; also, stating the duty performed by each, by what order officers were assigned to such duty, the rate of salary allowed civilians, and how the fund for paying such salaries has been raised. This roster will be forwarded as soon as possible, and afterwards monthly reports of changes of officers and agents will be made. All monthly reports called for in this circular will be made and forwarded on the first of each month. All other reports heretofore called for by the Commissioners of this Bureau will be made as usual.

II. Assistant Commissioners will forward to this Bureau copies of all circulars and orders that they have issued. They will also, hereafter, at the time of issuing such, forward copies of the same.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General, Commissioner.

Official:

By order of R. Saxton, Brevet Major General, Assistant Commissioner:

STUART M. TAYLOR, A. A. General.

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, AND FLORIDA,
Beaufort, S. C., August 9, 1865.

The following circular from Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, is hereby published for the guidance of all assistant and sub-Commissioners, and all others whom it may concern, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida:

[Circular No. 11.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., July, 1865.

Instructions to Assistant Commissioners and other officers.

Each assistant Commissioner will be careful in the establishment of sub-districts to have the office of his agent at some point easy of access for the people of the sub-district.

He will have at least one agent, either a citizen, military officer, or enlisted man, in each sub-district. This agent must be thoroughly instructed in his duties. He will be furnished with the proper blanks for contracts, and will institute methods adequate to meet the wants of his district, in accordance with the rules of this Bureau. No fixed rates of wages will be prescribed for a district, but in order to regulate fair wages in given individual cases, the agent should have in mind minimum rates for his own guidance. By careful inquiries as to the hire of an able-bodied man, when the pay went to the master, he will have an approximate test of the value of labor. He must, of course, consider the entire change of circumstances, and be sure that the laborer has due protection against avarice and extortion. Wages had better be secured by a lien on the crops or land. Employers are desired to enter into written agreements with the employes, setting forth the stated wages, or securing an interest in the crop or land, or both. All such agreements will be approved by the nearest agent, and a duplicate filed in his office. In case there should be no agent within reach, the nearest postmaster will forward the duplicate of contracts direct to the assistant Commissioner for the State.

Attention is especially called to section four of the law establishing the Bureau with regard to setting apart land to every male citizen, whether refugee or freedman, &c., and the same arrangement is recommended when it can be effected between private parties. Already many farmers have rented land to freedmen and refugees. This course is a recognition of the priciple in the law.

In order to enforce the fulfillment of contracts on both contracting parties, the Commissioner of the Bureau lays down no general rule. The assistant Commissioner must use the privileges and authority he already has. Provost courts, military commissions, and local courts, when the freedmen and refugees have equal rights with other people, are open to his use. In the great majority of cases, his own arbitrament, or that of his agent, or the settlement by referees will be sufficient.

No assistant Commissioner or agent is authorized to tolerate compulsory unpaid labor, except for the legal punishment of crime. Suffering may result to some extent: but suffering is preferred to slavery, and is, to some degree, the necessary consequence of events.

In all actions the officer should never forget that no substitute for slavery, like apprenticeship, without proper consent, or peonage, i. e., either holding the people by debt, or confining them without consent to the land, by any system, will be tolerated.

The assistant Commissioner will designate one or more of his agents to act as the general superintendent of schools (one for each State) for refugees and freedmen. This officer will work as much as possible in conjunction with State officers who may have school matters in charge. If a general system can be adopted for a State, it is well: but if not, he will take cognizance of all that is being done to educate refugees and freedmen, secure proper protection to schools and teachers, promote method and efficiency, correspond with the benevolent agencies which are supplying his field, and aid the assistant Commissioner in making his required reports.

Surgeon C. W. Horner, chief medical officer of the Bureau, will have general supervision of all medical matters connected with refugees and freedmen.

The assistant Commissioners will instruct their medical officers, as they have instructed other officers, to make the medical department self-supporting as far as possible.

All public addresses, of a character calculated to create discontent, are reprehensible; but the assistant Commissioner and his agents must explain, by constant recapitulation, the principles, laws, and regulations of this Bureau to all parties concerned. It is recommended to the assistant Commissioners to draw up in writing a careful summary, to be publicly and privately read by agents throughout their respective districts.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General, Commissioner.

By order of Brevet Major General R. Saxton:

STUART M. TAYLOR,
Assistant Adjutant General.

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, AND FLORIDA,
Beaufort, South Carolina, August 19, 1865.

The following circular from the War Department is hereby republished for the information and guidance of all concerned:

[Circular No. 13.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1865.

In order to establish a definite and uniform policy relative to confiscated and abandoned lands, and other confiscated and abandoned property, which are now, or that may hereafter come, under the control of this Bureau by virtue of the Act approved March 3, 1865, establishing the Bureau, and other Acts and sections of Acts, and orders of the President relative to captured, confiscated, and abandoned property, to wit, section 2, Act approved July 2, 1864, and General Orders No. 110, War Department, June 7, 1865, the following rules and regulations are established:

I. All confiscated and abandoned lands, and other confiscated and abandoned property, that now are, or that may hereafter come, under the control of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, by virtue of said Acts and sections of Acts, and orders of the President, are and shall be set apart for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen, and so much as may be necessary assigned to them, as provided in section 4 of the Act establishing the Bureau, viz: "To every male citizen, whether refugee or freedman, as aforesaid, there shall be assigned not more than forty acres of such land, and the person to whom it was so assigned shall be protected in the use and enjoyment of the land for the term of three years, at an annual rent not exceeding six per centum upon the value of such land as it was appraised by the State authorities in the year 1860 for the purpose of taxation; and in case no such appraisal can be found, then the rental shall be based upon the estimated value of the land in said year, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may by regulation prescribe. At the end of said term, or any time during said term, the occupants of any parcel so assigned may purchase the land and may receive such title thereto as the United States can convey, upon paying therefor the value of the land as ascertained and fixed for the purpose of determining the annual rent aforesaid."

II. All lands or other property within the several insurrectionary States, viz., Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, to which the United States have or shall have acquired title by confiscation or sale or otherwise during the late rebellion; and all abandoned lands or other abandoned property in those States, become so by the construction of section 2 of Act approved July 2, 1864, viz: "Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion," and which remains unsold or otherwise disposed of, are and shall be considered as under the control of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the purposes hereinbefore set forth, and for the time authorized by the Act establishing the Bureau; and no part or parcel of said confiscated or abandoned property shall be surrendered or restored to the former owners thereof, or other claimants thereto, except such surrender or restoration be authorized by said Commissioner.

III. Whenever any abandoned lands or other abandoned property, that shall have come into the possession of the Bureau, does not fall under the definition of "abandoned," as set forth in section 2 of the Act approved July 2, 1864, it will be formally surrendered by the Commissioner or assistant Commissioner of the Bureau, upon clear proof that the claimant did not abandon the property in the sense defined in said section and Act.

IV. In the surrender or restoration of any property, the requirements of Circular No. 3, current series, from this Bureau, will be carefully observed.

V. Assistant Commissioners will, as rapidly as possible, cause accurate descriptions of all confiscated and abandoned property that are now, or that may hereafter come under their control, to be made, and besides keeping a record of such themselves, will forward monthly to the Commissioner of the Bureau copies of such descriptions, in the manner prescribed by Circular No. 10, of July 11, 1865, from this Bureau.

They will, with as little delay as possible, select and set apart such confiscated and abandoned lands and property as may be deemed necessary for the immediate use of refugees and freedmen, the specific division of which into lots, and the rental or sale thereof, according to the law establishing the Bureau, will be completed as soon as practicable and reported to the Commissioner. In the selection and setting apart of such lands and property, care will be used to take that about which there is the least doubt as to the proper custody and control of this Bureau.

VI. The pardon of the President will not be understood to extend to the surrender of abandoned or confiscated property which by law has been "set apart for refugees and freedmen," or in use "for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States, formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free." [See Act of March 3, 1865, and act of July 2, 1864, Sess. I., Chap. 225.]

O. O. HOWARD, Major General,
Commissioner Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

By order of Brevet Major General R. Saxton:

STUART M. TAYLOR,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Official:

Assistant Adjutant General.

[General Orders No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA AND FLORIDA.
Beaufort S. C., June 20, 1865.

I. The following circular from headquarters Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands, is republished for the information of all whom it may concern:

[Circular No. 3.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1865.

Whereas, a large amount of land in the State of Virginia, and in other States that have been in insurrection, has been abandoned by disloyal owners, and is now being cultivated by freedmen: and, whereas, the owners of such lands are attempting to obtain possession of them, and thus deprive the freedmen of the fruits of their industry: it is ordered that all abandoned lands in said States now under cultivation by the freedmen be retained in their possession, and the crops now growing shall be secured for their benefit, unless full and just compensation be made for their labor and its products, and for expenditures.

The above order will not be so construed as to relieve disloyal persons from the consequences of their disloyalty, and the application for the restoration of their lands by this class of persons will, in no case, be entertained by any military authority.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General,
Commissioner Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 22, 1865.

All military authorities will sustain the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and abandoned Lands, and aid him in the execution of the above order.

By direction of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

II. The provisions of the above circular will be strictly enforced throughout the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Complaints have been made at these headquarters that, in many instances, former owners of plantations and slaves—who are now allowed to remain on their lands upon condition that they announce to their former slaves that they are free, and make with them fair and equitable agreements, whereby full and just compensation shall be made for their labor and its products—are, in defiance of this order, still forcing their former slaves to work for them, and continue to hold them in slavery, even to the extent of shooting them down, if they dare to assert their freedom, and fail utterly to admit or announce to them in any way that they are free. Such acts are disloyal to the government, and in plain violation of its policy.

It is hereby ordered, that all persons employing the freedmen in agricultural and mechanical pursuits within the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, who fail to announce to those in their employ the fact that they are free, and fail to recognize them as free men, and to make suitable agreements with them, whereby a just and equitable compensation will be secured to them for their labor, will be held as disloyal to the United States government, and their property will be subject to seizure and division among the freedmen, in accordance with the provisions of Sec. 4 of an "Act to establish a Bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees, approved March 3, 1865."

III. As the harvest time is near, and the freedmen have been regarded as free by the United States government since January, 1863, and as a measure of necessity to prevent them from becoming paupers on its bounty, the freedmen must be paid for their labor on all lands, not abandoned, since the commencement of the preparation of the ground for seed, up to the harvest time of this year; and unless full compensation is made, to the satisfaction of this Bureau, the freedmen will be entitled to, and will receive, one-half of the crop raised.

IV. Any person who shall whip, or otherwise maltreat any freedman because he asserts that freedom, or for other cause, will be held guilty before the law, and punished for assault and battery; and any one who shall take the life of any freedman for like cause, he will be held guilty of murder.

V. No person will be permitted to drive the aged, infirm, and helpless from their present places of abode. They must be allowed to remain where they are until such time as the government shall make proper provisions for their support.

VI. The assistant Commissioners in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida are required to enforce this order to the extent of their power, and to report to these headquarters all violations of it. The aid of every friend of justice and fair dealing between man and man is also requested to bring to the notice of the Freedmen's Bureau any failure to comply with its provisions.

When the rules of exact justice shall be observed in the relations between all—employer and employed—and each shall regard the other's rights, then will be practically demonstrated so clearly that none can doubt, the advantages of the free labor system.

By order of Brevet Major General R. Saxton, Assistant Commissioner.

STUART M. TAYLOR, A. A. General.

[General Orders, No. 2.]

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, AND FLORIDA,
Beaufort, South Carolina, June 26, 1865.

The following circular from headquarters of Freedmen's Bureau is republished for the information of all general and assistant superintendents, and others interested, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida:

[Circular No. 2.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1865.

By appointment of the President, I assume charge of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

I. Commissioners will be at once appointed for the insurrectionary States. To them will be entrusted the supervision of abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen in their respective districts. All agents in the field, however appointed, are requested to report to them the condition of their work. Refugees and freedmen, not already provided for, will inform them of their wants. All applications for relief will be referred to them or their agents by post and district commanders.

II. But it is not the intention of government that this Bureau shall supersede the various benevolent organizations in the work of administering relief. This must still be afforded by the benevolence of the people through their voluntary societies, no governmental appropriations having been made for this purpose. The various Commissioners will look to the associations laboring in their respective districts to provide, as heretofore, for the wants of these destitute people. I invite, therefore, the continuance and co-operation of such societies. I trust they will still be generously supported by the people, and I request them to send me their names, lists of their principal officers, and a brief statement of their present work.

III. The demands for labor are sufficient to afford employment to nearly, if not quite, all the able bodied refugees and freedmen. It will be the object of all Commissioners to introduce practical systems of compensated labor; and to this end they will endeavor to remove the prejudices of their late masters unwilling to employ their former servants; to correct the false impressions sometimes entertained by the freedmen, that they can live without labor, and to overcome that false pride which renders some of the refugees more willing to be supported in idleness than to support themselves. While a generous provision should be made for the aged, infirm, and sick, the able bodied should be encouraged and, if necessary, compelled to labor for their support.

IV. The educational and moral condition of these people will not be forgotten. The utmost facility will be afforded to benevolent and religious organizations and State authorities in the maintenance of good schools, (for refugees and freedmen,) until a system of free schools can be supported by the reorganized local governments. Meanwhile, whenever schools are broken up by any authorized agent of the government, it is requested that the fact and attendant circumstances be reported to the Bureau.

Let me repeat, that in all this work it is not my purpose to supersede the benevolent agencies already engaged in it, but to systematize and facilitate them.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General,
Commissioner Bureau Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

Official:

SAMUEL L. TAGGART,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant General.

The provisions of the above circular will be carried out by all assistant Commissioners and superintendents in these States, and the co-operation of all benevolent and religious societies, and also of individuals, is invited to aid the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau.

By order of R. Saxton, Brevet Major General, Assistant Commissioner:

STUART M. TAYLOR,
Assistant Adjutant General.

[General Orders No. 3.]

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, AND FLORIDA,
Beaufort, South Carolina, June 26, 1865.

The following rules and regulations, issued from Headquarters Freedmen's Bureau, are republished for the guidance of all officers of the army and agents employed in the freedmen's department, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida:

[Circular No. 5.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., May 30, 1865.

Rules and Regulations for Assistant Commissioners.

I. The headquarters of the assistant Commissioners will, for the present, be established as follows, viz:

For Virginia, at Richmond; for North Carolina, at Raleigh; for South Carolina and Georgia, at Beaufort, S. C.; for Alabama, at Montgomery; for Kentucky and Tennessee, at Nashville; for Missouri and Arkansas, at St. Louis, Mo.; for Mississippi, at Vicksburg; for Louisiana, at New Orleans; for Florida, at Jacksonville.

II. Assistant Commissioners not already at their posts, will make all haste to establish their headquarters, acquaint themselves with their fields, and to do all in their power to quicken and direct the industry of refugees and freedmen, that they and their communities may do all that can be done for the season already so far advanced, to prevent starvation and suffering, and promote good order and prosperity. Their attention is invited to circular No. 2, from this Bureau, indicative of the objects to be attained.

III. Relief establishments will be discontinued as speedily as the cessation of hostilities and the return of industrial pursuits will permit. Great discrimination will be observed in administering relief, so as to include none that are not absolutely necessitous and destitute.

IV. Every effort will be made to render the people self-supporting. Government supplies will only be temporarily issued, to enable destitute persons speedily to support themselves, and exact accounts must be kept with each individual, or community, and held as a lien upon their crops. The ration for the destitute will be that already provided in general orders No. 30, War Department, series 1864. The Commissioners are especially to remember that their duties are to enforce, with reference to these classes, the laws of the United States.

V. Loyal refugees, who have been driven from their homes, will, on their return, be protected from abuse, and the calamities of their situation relieved as far as possible. If destitute, they will be aided with transportation and food, when deemed expedient, while in transitu, returning to their former homes.

VI. Simple good faith, for which we hope on all hands from those concerned in the passing away of slavery, will especially relieve the assistant Commissioners in the discharge of their duties towards the freedmen, as well as promote the general welfare. The assistant Commissioners will, everywhere, declare and protect their freedom, as set forth in the proclamation of the President and the laws of Congress.

VII. In all places where there is an interruption of civil law, or in which local courts, by reason of old codes, in violation of the freedom guaranteed by the proclamation of the President and the laws of Congress, disregard the negro's right to justice before the laws, in not allowing him to give testimony—the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen being committed to this Bureau—the assistant Commissioners will adjudicate, either themselves or through officers of their appointment, all difficulties arising between negroes themselves, or between negroes and whites or Indians, except those in military service, so far as recognizable by military authority, and not taken cognizance of by the other tribunals, civil or military, of the United States.

VIII. Negroes must be free to choose their own employers, and be paid for their labor. Agreements should be free, bona fide acts, approved by proper officers, and their inviolability enforced on both parties. The old system of overseers, tending to compulsory, unpaid labor, and acts of cruelty and oppression, is prohibited. The unity of families and all the rights of the family relation will be carefully guarded. In places where the local statutes make no provisions for the marriage of persons of color, the assistant Commissioners are authorized to designate officers, who shall keep a record of marriages which may be solemnized by any ordained minister of the Gospel, who shall make a return of the same, with such items as may be required for registration, at places designated by the assistant Commissioner. Registrations already made by the United States will be carefully preserved.

IX. Assistant Commissioners will instruct their receiving and disbursing officers to make requisitions upon all officers, civil or military, in charge of funds, abandoned lands, &c., within their respective territories, to turn over the same, in accordance with the orders of the President. They will direct their medical inspectors to ascertain the facts and necessities connected with the medical treatment and sanitary condition of refugees and freedmen. They will instruct their superintendents of education to collect the facts in reference to the progress of this work, and aid it with as few changes as possible to the close of the present season. During the school vacations of the hot months, special attention will be given to the provision of the next year.

X. Assistant Commissioners will aid refugees and freedmen in securing titles to land according to law. This may be done for them as individuals, or by encouraging joint companies.

XI. This Bureau being in the War Department, all rules and regulations governing officers under accountability for property, apply as set forth in the Revised Regulations of the Army. All other persons in the service of the Bureau are also subject to military jurisdiction.

XII. Assistant Commissioners will require regular and complete reports from their subordinates, and will themselves report quarterly, as directed by law, and correspond frequently with this Bureau, directing to the Commissioner in person.

O. O. HOWARD, Major General,
Commissioner Bureau Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

Official:

SAMUEL L. TAGGART,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant General.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA,
Charleston, S. C., September 28, 1865.

The following circular from the War Department, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, is hereby republished for the information of all concerned. It will be substituted in place of circular No. 13, of July 28, 1865, from the Bureau, as promulgated in general orders No. 9, current series, from these headquarters.

[Circular No. 15.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1865.

I. Circular No. 13, of July 28, 1865, from this Bureau, and all portions of circulars from this Bureau conflicting with the provisions of this circular, are hereby rescinded.

II. This Bureau has charge of such "tracts of land within the insurrectionary States as shall have been abandoned, or to which the United States shall have acquired title by confiscation, or sale, or otherwise," and no such lands now in its possession shall be surrendered to any claimant except as hereinafter provided.

III. Abandoned lands are defined in section 2, of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, as lands, "the lawful owner whereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged either in arms or otherwise in aiding or encouraging the rebellion."

IV. Land will not be regarded as confiscated until it has been condemned and sold by decree of the United States Court for the district in which the property may be found, and the title thereto thus vested in the United States.

V. Upon its appearing satisfactorily to any assistant Commissioner that any property under his control is not abandoned as above defined, and that the United States has acquired no title to it by confiscation, sale, or otherwise, he will formally surrender it to the authorized claimant or claimants, promptly reporting his action to the Commissioner.

VI. Assistant Commissioners will prepare accurate descriptions of all confiscated and abandoned lands under their control, keeping a record thereof themselves, and forwarding monthly to the Commissioner, copies of these descriptions in the manner prescribed in circular No. 10, of July 11, 1865, from this Bureau.

They will set apart so much of said lands as is necessary for the immediate use of loyal refugees and freedmen, being careful to select for this purpose those lands which most clearly fall under the control of this Bureau, which selection must be submitted to the Commissioner for his approval.

The specific division of lands so set apart into lots, and the rental or sale thereof, according to section 4 of the law establishing the Bureau, will be completed as soon as practicable, and reported to the Commissioner.

VII. Abandoned lands held by this Bureau may be restored to owners pardoned by the President, by the assistant Commissioners, to whom applications for such restoration should be forwarded, so far as practicable, through the superintendents of the districts in which the lands are situated.

Each application must be accompanied by:

1st. Evidence of special pardon by the President, or a copy of the oath of amnesty prescribed in the President's proclamation of May 29, 1865, when the applicant is not included in any of the classes therein excepted from the benefits of said oath.

2d. Proof of title.

Officers of the Bureau, through whom the application passes, will endorse thereon such facts as may assist the assistant Commissioner in his decision, stating especially the use made by the Bureau of the land.

VIII. No land under cultivation by loyal refugees or freedmen, will be restored under this circular, until the crops now growing shall be secured for the benefit of the cultivators, unless full and just compensation be made for their labor and its products, and for their expenditures.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

Approved:

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

Official:

F. D. SEWALL,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

Satisfactory proof will be required of the correctness of all statements on which applications for restoration of property are grounded. To facilitate the action of the assistant Commissioners, the proof of titles should be clearly set forth. The provisions of this circular will be strictly enforced throughout the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

By order of Brevet Major General R. Saxton, Assistant Commissioner.

O. D. KINSMAN,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, March 12, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report containing all the information which can be derived from the records of the land division of this Bureau, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated February 21, 1867. The report gives the names of all persons in the State of Louisiana whose property is, or has been, in the possession of this Bureau, a description of the property and its character, i. e., whether abandoned, confiscated, or confiscable.

Against such property as has been restored is noted the date of restoration, and by whose order the restoration is made. The date of seizure is given whenever it can be ascertained from the records of this division. Almost the entire amount of property was taken by Treasury agents prior to the organization of the Bureau. The exact date when it was turned over by them to this Bureau can be ascertained, but the date of original seizure can be accurately obtained in but very few instances. The assessed value of the plantations which are and have been in possession of the Bureau is not known. It became necessary to restore many of them before even the number of acres they contained could be learned. The estimated value of all property of this character which has been controlled by the Bureau is a little more than two million dollars.

I also give a statement from the records of the finance officer of this Bureau, showing the amount of money received from the rental and sale of abandoned and confiscated property in the State of Louisiana.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

P. S.—In the land reports received from Louisiana, a number of pieces of property were marked, "Restored by order of the President of the United States." Upon investigation it appeared that this statement did not refer to a direct order from the President, but to the fact that the owner of the property had received a special pardon, and restoration was necessary in compliance with instructions from the President in case of B. B. Leake, of Tennessee, dated August 16th, 1865, and in circular 15, series 1865.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

Copy of endorsement on case of B. B. Leake, of Tennessee.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, August 16, 1865.

Respectfully returned to the Commissioner of Bureau Refugees, &c.

The records of this office show that B. B. Leake was specially pardoned by the President on the 27th ultimo, and was thereby restored to all his rights of property, except as to slaves. Notwithstanding this, it is understood that the possession of his property is withheld from him. I have, therefore, to direct that General Fisk, assistant Commissioner at Nashville, Tennessee, be instructed by the Commissioner of Bureau of Freedmen, &c., to relinquish possession of the property of Mr. Leake, held by him as assistant Commissioner, and that the same be immediately restored to the said Leake. The same action will be had in all similar cases.

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands, Office Chief D. O., Washington, March 12, 1867.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1867.

DANIEL R. GOODLOE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you hold any official position under the government of the United States?

A. Yes, sir; I am United States marshal for the district of North Carolina.

Q. Have you had any correspondence with the United States district attorney for North Carolina in relation to proceedings against abandoned and confiscable property in the State of North Carolina.

A. Yes, sir. We travelled together around the circuit in November, 1865, and again in April, 1866, and on both occasions we talked about that kind of property—abandoned property—belonging to the rebel confederacy, and Mr. Starbuck, the district attorney, was very anxious to have it confiscated. I felt an interest in it myself, as we both had fees contingent upon it. I think he said there were parties looking up property, and I believe he said he was cognizant of the fact that there was a railroad in the State built by the confederacy. I felt quite solicitous about it, although I did not want the confiscation of private property, as I felt for their families in such cases. Mr. Starbuck wanted some instructions from Washington before instituting any proceedings, and he requested me to call when I went to Washington at the Attorney General's office. I did so, and wrote to him.

Q. What railroad was alluded to?

A. The road from Danville to Greensboro'. I cannot say now whether I saw Mr. Speed, or his chief clerk, the first time. I saw him afterwards on the same subject. I wrote to Mr. Starbuck, as I was told at the Attorney General's office that that matter had been placed in the hands of the Treasury Department, and it would be better to let it alone.

Q. Did you make an inquiry at the Treasury Department?

A. I do not think I did, as that was putting it out of our sphere entirely.

Q. What reason, if any, was given by the Attorney General for turning this property over to the Treasury Department?

A. I do not think any was given.

Q. Do you know what disposition was made of that road by the government?

A. I do not know, except from hearsay.

Q. When were you appointed United States marshal for North Carolina?

A. I was appointed in September, 1865, but was not sworn in till the 5th of October, 1865.

Q. Did you proceed to North Carolina immediately after your appointment?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you remain there?

A. I was backward and forward continually when I first went there. I remained about a month and then returned to Washington, and I alternated between North Carolina and Washington. I was in Washington most of the time.

Q. What seemed to be the tone of the public sentiment of the people of the State towards the government of the United States at the time you were there performing the duties of your office?

A. When I first went there I think the actual feeling was better than it is now.

Q. What was the feeling at that time?

A. It was a feeling of subjugation; they felt they were conquered.

Q. Did they seem, generally speaking, to "accept the situation," as it is commonly termed?

A. Yes, sir, I think so. The convention was in session when I went there, and I had an opportunity of seeing many of the leading men of the State.

Q. Have you noticed any change in the feeling of the people towards the government of the United States?

A. There is a good deal of irritation and complaint among the people towards the course of Congress. They all protest that they are willing to submit to the government. Then I have heard some sentiments, on the other hand, a little defiant.

Q. Is the sentiment of the people improved as respects loyalty towards the government of the United States, or otherwise?

A. I do not think it is. I am inclined to think they have been a little more outspoken for the last twelve months than they were before.

Q. What is the cause of that change?

A. I think it was the split between the President and Congress. I think they were encouraged by the speeches of the President more particularly. Their idea was that through the President they could be able to resist the policy of Congress.

Q. About what time did this change in the sentiment of the people occur?

A. I noticed it when I went back in the spring. I left there in December and returned again in April.

Q. You were not there about the time of the President's celebrated 22d of February speech and his vetoes of the Civil Rights and Freedmen's Bureau bills?

A. No, sir; I was here. I went back there shortly afterwards. I remember at the town of Washington, North Carolina, when I was there in April, 1866, a rumor was prevalent that the President was going to bring 70,000 or 75,000 men to Washington city, and was going to displace Congress and do as he pleased. It was manifest to me that they wanted to believe it, and I took occasion to speak very emphatically about it, saying that they were doing great injustice to the President, but that if he dared to disperse Congress it would cost him his office and his head. The statement was made by intelligent men, and the report was circulated on the authority of a very intelligent lawyer, who had been to Washington city and had just returned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1867.

D. H. STARBUCK, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Salem, Forsythe county, North Carolina.

Q. Did you hold an official position under the government of the United States?

A. I am United States district attorney for North Carolina.

Q. Do you know of any railways which were constructed by the confederate government, so-called, during the progress of the war, in the State of North Carolina?

A. I do. At least it is my impression they were constructed by the confederate government.

Q. State what road, and between what points it runs.

A. Between Greensboro', North Carolina, and Danville, Virginia.

Q. What is the length of the road?

A. To the best of my recollection it is forty-four miles. In regard to its being constructed by the confederate government—I do not mean to say that the confederate government was the contractor. It is my impression that it was built with the funds of the confederate government directly appropriated for that purpose, or loaned to the company. I made inquiries upon that subject of different persons, citizens of Greensboro', soon after I was appointed district attorney, for the purpose of satisfying myself that the road was built with the funds of the confederate government, intending, with the sanction of the authorities, to take proceedings to have it condemned for the benefit of the government. I inquired as to the stockholders, and had the names of individual stockholders given me. I do not now remember their names. I understood that individuals, however, owned only a small portion of the stock. It was necessary that a certain number of individuals should be stockholders, for the purpose of having directors chosen. I was afterwards informed that the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company was the principal stockholder in it. The confederate government, however, as I have said, furnished the funds to build it.* It was a connection of the Richmond and Danville line with the North Carolina railroad.

NOTE.—I have, since my answer above, examined the statutes of the rebel congress at Richmond, and find an act appropriating one million of dollars to be used in constructing this railroad.

Q. Can you state what the object of the construction of that road was?

A. I can, for I had the best opportunities of knowing. I was in the convention of 1861, which passed the ordinance of secession; not at its organization, but before it closed. One of the delegates of my county resigned and I was elected to fill the vacancy in December, I think. I was elected over the secession candidate, who was a preacher, and who ran against me. I was in the convention when the charter to construct that link between Greensboro' and Danville was granted. There had been a great effort to construct that route before; but it had always been defeated by the opposition of the Wilmington road, and other eastern influences. When the question came up before the convention, it never would have passed but for the argument that it was a military necessity for the purpose of affording means of transporting troops and munitions of war to and from Virginia. I am not sure but something of that sort is contained in the charter.

Q. Was the convention which granted this charter called for any other purpose than to cause the State of North Carolina to secede from the Union, so far as they could effect that object?

A. It could not have been done, I presume, if it had not been for that purpose. There were, however, many other measures necessarily incident to that, which the convention took cognizance of. There was a good deal of legislation done.

Q. By what party in North Carolina was that State convention called?

A. The secession party.

Q. Was this charter granted at the instance of the parties in the convention who favored the secession of the State?

A. Chiefly; though men who opposed secession voted for it. The local influences in that section were of course in favor of the construction of the road. I said this convention was called for the purpose of passing an ordinance of secession. The people of North Carolina had voted down a convention proposed for that purpose by some 30,000 majority. Then in two or three months afterwards the legislature, directly in the teeth of this verdict of the people, called another convention, without submitting it to the people, and made provision for the election of delegates.

Q. Did that convention provide any other means for aiding the military operations of the southern States, or the State of North Carolina, than the passage of this charter?

A. Yes, sir. It made provision for the furnishing of troops, and for contributing North Carolina's quota of troops. There was a call, I think in February, by the Jeff. Davis government at Richmond, for troops, and North Carolina's quota was designated, and the convention in session at that time, made provision for furnishing these troops. There was a draft in that State before the convention finally adjourned.

Q. Did the secession party in this convention regard or treat the construction of the Danville and Greensboro' railroad as a military measure?

A. Certainly, as a military necessity. That was the term used in the debate. I do not now remember, certainly, but I think perhaps it was used in the charter.

Q. Can you state the corporate name of the company to which this charter was granted?

A. I believe it is the Piedmont Railroad Company. I may be mistaken.

Q. Were the corporators named in the charter, members of the secession party?

A. I do not know that they were confined to that. I do not think they were, because through that section of country, people were very anxious for the road. They had been struggling for years in the legislature to get it, but never could succeed. The strongest secession locality in North Carolina was on the seaboard, and that region of country had always been hostile to this road, because by making this connecting link, it would give an opportunity for a portion of the products of western North Carolina to go directly through to Virginia. While there was no such link everything passed through Wilmington and the seaboard towns. It was the secession influence that gave us the passage of this ordinance.

Q. This Piedmont company is distinct, is it not, from the Richmond and Danville company?

A. Certainly it is. I can state, further, that my purpose in making these inquiries was to take proceedings under the act of July, 1861, which declares that all property used in aid of the rebellion shall be subject to seizure and condemnation by the government. Hence I inquired to ascertain whether the road was built by the confederate government as a stockholder, and to the best of my judgment, the Danville and Richmond Railroad Company were ascertained to be the principal stockholders, but were furnished with means by the confederate government. Furthermore, I am informed by a gentleman, in whose knowledge and truthfulness I have every reason to confide, that officers and men were detailed from the confederate army to assist in the construction of it.

Q. Did you commence proceedings for its condemnation?

A. I did not.

Q. Why did you not do so?

A. The reason I commenced no proceedings was, perhaps, in consequence of a communication I received from Mr. Goodloe, United States marshal of North Carolina. I wrote to him to make inquiries in regard to the subject; and I understood him that it was not the desire of the authorities that proceedings should be taken; that there was some arrangement between the stockholders with regard to the road, and they did not wish interference with it. I do not remember that I have retained any communication upon that subject. I think I have not. This was soon after I was appointed, when I was inexperienced in the business. It is my impression that Mr. Goodloe said it was not the desire of the Secretary of the Treasury—at least, that the authorities here at Washington did not wish any proceedings at that time taken in regard to it. I think he said he had talked with some of the authorities here, and that there was some arrangement going on between the authorities at Washington and the company; and that they did not desire any proceedings of that kind.

Q. Is the road in operation now?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By whom is it operated?

A. By the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, as I understand. Their cars run through from Richmond to Greensboro', North Carolina. It is a separate charter, however, although they own nearly all the stock.

Q. Do you know anything about the orders turning that road over to the Richmond and Danville company?

A. I do not. I made some inquiries in regard to it of Governor Morehead. I understood from him that the matter was arranged, and the road turned over to them

Q. What is the probable value of that road?

A. There were forty-four miles of road. The construction cost, I suppose, would be about $20,000 a mile. I presume it would not sell for that. At that rate the amount would be $880,000. It is the great connecting link in the upper line of railways between the North and the South.

Q. Was the road supplied with rolling stock?

A. They had rolling stock on it during its occupancy by the confederacy, which was supplied, I presume, as the road was built, with the means of the confederate government. It is my impression, though I may be mistaken in it, that laborers were detailed also to work on this road from a draft of slaves which was made in the South to aid in the construction of breastworks and all that sort of thing. This draft was at the instance of the confederate government, though made directly by the State authorities.

Q. Are you acquainted with the members of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company?

A. No, sir.

Q. Are you acquainted with any of the directors and officers?

A. No, sir, I am not. I remember making inquiry of Robert P. Dick, who was formerly United States district attorney of North Carolina, who, I believe, gave me a portion of the information I have received.

Q. Did you receive from the government at Washington any instructions relative to your duties as United States district attorney with regard to the property belonging to the confederate government in the State of North Carolina?

A. I received, soon after my appointment, printed instructions from the Attorney General's office at Washington, calling the attention of district attorneys to their duties in enforcing the provisions of these different acts. I think the act of July, 1862, is specified in the order; and probably the act of August 6, 1861, is specified. At any rate, it was a circular such as had been addressed during the war to district attorneys. I was appointed in August, 1865. In October, 1865, I was in Washington, and met Mr. Speed, the Attorney General. I remember his remarking to me, in substance, that he was glad to see me in regard to some instructions, (referring to these instructions,) and remarked that it was not the desire of the government that I should take proceedings, unless in a case where the parties were contumacious, as he expressed it. The remark was made, I do not recollect whether by him or by myself, that these were instructions that properly he could not commit to writing.

Q. Did you commence proceedings for the condemnation of any property?

A. No, sir; that prevented me from doing so. After Mr. Speed resigned, I had some correspondence in regard to taking proceedings under the act of August 6, 1861, confiscating other property. I had in view certain real estate that had been used by parties in aid of the rebellion, for the purpose of establishing commissary and quartermaster's establishments, gun-factories, and that sort of thing. I received instructions that it was not desired by the government that I should take any proceedings for the present. Then a few weeks ago there was some information filed with me from Wilmington, for the purpose of having condemned a certain wharf and warehouse and other property that had been constructed for the purpose of aiding in running the blockade, and aiding the rebellion; but, on account of instructions I had previously received, I enclosed this information to Mr. Edward Jordan. There were certain instructions to the district attorneys that they should not take proceedings in instituting suits in behalf of the government without consulting the Solicitor of the Treasury, as the matter seemed to be under his supervision. Information was filed against the property of one George Davis, for the purpose of having certain real estate of his in the town of Wilmington confiscated, under the Act of July, 1862. This was more than three or four weeks ago. I enclosed the information to the Attorney General, and received instructions from him to take no proceedings in the case without further directions.

Q. Had Davis been pardoned?

A. I was under the impression that he had been, until this information was filed.

Q. Had it not been for the instructions you received from Washington, would you, as United States district attorney for the district of North Carolina, have proceeded against property within your district, under the Act of August 6, 1861, and the other acts relative to confiscation?

A. I certainly should have felt it my duty to have done so, in obedience to the laws.

Q. Then you have not discharged that duty because of the instructions received from Washington?

A. Yes, sir, on account of instructions I received, considering myself under the control of the Attorney General in regard to the matter, and also under the control of the Solicitor of the Treasury, in accordance with instructions I had received.

Q. Have you knowledge of property in North Carolina subject to condemnation under the acts of Congress?

A. There is property there, I doubt not, liable to confiscation, although this legal question has been raised. When I wrote to the Solicitor of the Treasury in regard to this matter, Mr. Jordan was then absent. This was last summer. His assistant answered me in this way: That this Act of August, 1861, was by many considered a war measure, and that there were doubts whether it applied to property which should be seized after the termination of hostilities and condemned, as it was subject to seizure and condemnation during the war. It was a long letter, and not satisfactory to my mind at all.

Q. Can you furnish the Committee with copies of the instructions and correspondence which you have received from the officers of the government here?

A. I can of the two letters from the present Attorney General—one in regard to property and seizure generally, and one in regard to this Davis' property. (See letters annexed.)

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 24, 1866.

SIR: Your letter of August 6th last, to the Solicitor of the Treasury, has just been referred by him to this office.

1. In so far as real property conveyed to the so-called Confederate States is concerned, that is disposed of by the Freedmen's Bureau Act of 1866, which authorizes such property to be held and disposed of for the benefit of the freedmen.

2. No proceedings are desired to be instituted for the present under the act of August 6, 1861, against real property used for rebel purposes, but not under seizure at the date of pacification.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HUBLEY ASHTON,
Assistant Attorney General.

D. H. STARBUCK, esq.,
United States Attorney, North Carolina.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 18, 1867.

SIR: The Attorney General directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, enclosing an information filed against certain real estate of George Davis, late Attorney General of the so-called Confederate States; and to say that you are hereby instructed not to commence proceedings in the case mentioned, without further advice from this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. T. PLEASANTS, Chief Clerk.

D. H. STARBUCK, esq.,
United States District Attorney, Salem, North Carolina.

Q. Were you in North Carolina at the time of the final surrender of the rebel army?

A. I was during the whole war, and at the time of the surrender.

Q. What was the disposition of the people of the State at that time relative to a quiet submission to the authority of the United States?

A. At that time they were very submissive.

Q. Has there been any change in that disposition since that time?

A. There has been a very great change in newspapers, and in the sentiments of many persons. If they entertained any spirit of hostility towards the government at that time, they did not breathe it, but now they are outspoken.

Q. What has produced that change?

A. I am very decidedly of the opinion that if they had not been pardoned, or if there had not been such general exercise of the pardoning power, the sentiment in North Carolina would have been much more loyal at the present time than it is. At that time, I must confess, I was deceived myself. I believed that the people were honest and sincere in their professions of loyalty. I told the President so in an interview I had with him in August. He was inquiring as to the condition of things in North Carolina, and I remarked that a majority of the people had always been opposed to secession—were at the beginning of the war, and I was satisfied from what I had seen and heard that they were opposed to secession during the war; that the vast majority of the people were gratified at the result of the war; that a large majority of those who had been in favor of it, not only accepted the situation in good faith, but that many of them were gratified with the result. I remember using the expression that three-fourths of our people were satisfied with and accepted the situation in good faith; that three-quarters of them were satisfied, or rejoiced at the result. He then said we need have no apprehension in regard to North Carolina, if three-fourths were loyal in their sentiments to the Union. I believed then that they were capable of appreciating the magnanimity that was exercised towards them. I had been a Union man myself, and was disposed to be magnanimous and gracious towards them. I feel satisfied now that a large number of them were entirely incapable of appreciating anything of that sort—that since the fear of punishment and confiscation of property have passed away, a bad effect has been produced.

Q. What effect did the attitude of the President, as evidenced by his speech on the 22d of February, 1866, his veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and his veto of the Civil Rights bill, seem to have on the people of North Carolina?

A. I do not know that I am able to answer that question. The disloyal men were very much gratified, there is no doubt, but as to the effect of it, I think relieving them from fear of punishment and confiscation had more to do with the present condition of sentiment than anything else. If that had been held over them as security for their good behavior, I think it would have had a good effect.

Q. What has been the tendency of public feeling in the State of North Carolina since the dates to which I have called your attention?

A. There has been a gradually increasing spirit of disaffection towards the government, and an outspoken feeling of disloyalty. The rebel newspapers of North Carolina, at the close of the war, had not a word to say against the government of the United States. Through the whole State you would not see a single utterance against the government; and in that way they deceived the Union men. When our convention was called in October, 1865 by Mr. Holden, provisional Governor, we passed an ordinance declaring the old ordinance of secession to have been null and void from its beginning, and an ordinance abolishing slavery, and an ordinance declaring the war debt null and void. We then adjourned to meet again in May, 1866. I could see a marked difference in many members of the convention who belonged to the secession party during the time in which the convention took a recess, from October, 1865, until May, 1866, when the convention again met.

Q. What was the cause of that change of sentiment among members of the convention?

A. I think the same cause spoken of—a too liberal exercise of the pardoning power. In other words the fear of the penalties of confiscation and punishment seemed to have passed away from them; and that, I believe, was on account of the exercise of the pardoning power.

Q. Did the position assumed by the President during the first session of the 39th Congress have any effect in developing this spirit of hostility towards the authority of the United States among the members of the convention and the people of North Carolina?

A. I think it must have had that effect. I am well satisfied it did.

Q. Has not the want of due respect towards the authority of the government of the United States been increasing among the people of that State since the date to which I last referred?

A. I think it has been gradually on the increase from that cause, commencing prior to that time. Commencing, I should say, from the beginning of the exercise of the pardoning power.

Q. Are the people of North Carolina as willing now to comply with such terms as the Congress of the United States may exact of them, as conditions precedent to a restoration to its former relations, as they were prior to the exercise of the pardoning power of which you speak, and the course pursued by the President, as indicated by him during the last session and up to the present time?

A. They are by no means as ready to accept the action of Congress as they were soon after the close of the war.

Q. Do you know of any efforts of the President, or persons acting for him, to prevent the ratification of the constitutional amendment submitted to the States by the 39th Congress, by the legislature of North Carolina?

A. No, sir; I do not. I discovered that the division between the two great arms of the government—the executive and legislative—which had been united during the war, and by hard blows had suppressed the rebellion, had encouraged the out-cropping of disloyalty, when this division began to be noticeable and marked. I have heard of expressions being used that it would create a division in the North, and that in a case of difficulty they would have friends there.

Q. With which department of the government did the disloyal element among the people of the North take sides?

A. They did not take sides with Congress. Of course they approved of the course of the President. Between the two, they took sides with the President all the time.

Q. You say you have heard persons speak of possible difficulty in the future?

A. It has come to my ears as district attorney. I have frequently heard of remarks of that kind being made by disloyal persons. They would, of course, hardly utter such sentiments in my presence.

Q. State what you have heard relative to a possible difficulty in the future?

A. I could not say that any such remark was general; but I did hear of remarks of that kind being made by disloyal persons—that in case of difficulty hereafter they would have friends in the North, and that there would be a division of the power that had crushed the rebellion.

Q. Was that in connection with this difficulty, or difference between the President and Congress?

A. I do not know that I am able to state any connection whatever. There are many people of disloyal sentiments, who, in speaking of the suppression of the rebellion, would sometimes launch out in invectives against the government.

Q. What proportion of the people of North Carolina may be regarded as entertaining disloyal sentiments?

A. I have never thought there was a majority of them. There is in certain localities. I think a majority of the white population in North Carolina are true and loyal to the Union, and desire to support and maintain the government.

Q. What would you say in answer to that question, confining it to the eastern part of the State?

A. In the eastern part of the State a majority of the people would, I think, prefer the re-establishment of the confederacy, if they believed the confederate government could succeed.

Q. Is it not your opinion that a majority of the white population of the eastern part of the State are disloyal?

A. I do not think a majority of them have that loyalty to the Union they ought to have.

Q. Do you think a majority of the whites in that section of the State would prefer the establishment of the confederacy?

A. If they believed it could be done with security, a majority of the people of eastern North Carolina would, I think. The majority of them certainly do not entertain proper loyal sentiments to the Union.

Q. Can the laws of the United States be fairly and impartially administered in the State of North Carolina?

A. I think they can; on all questions, at least, which we have had in the federal courts. We are careful in selecting our jurors. We instruct the clerks, in drawing the names of jurors, not to draw them indiscriminately.

Q. What is the tendency of the jurors in such counties as you now speak of, since the exercise of the pardoning power of which you speak, and the course of the President towards Congress during its last session?

A. I do not know in regard to jurors. We had no trial of these cases until the spring term of last year. I can say for the judges, and for the people generally of North Carolina, that they have been in the habit of paying great regard to the law, and that the judiciary have always been careful to warn their jurors against being carried off by feeling or prejudice. Our judges, in their charges to the jury, have charged them to make no difference between negroes and white persons; and, I think that, without an exception, they have acted conscientiously in the discharge of their duties. We have laws upon our statute books providing the punishment of whipping for larceny, and the judges believing in administering the laws of the State as they found them, prescribe that punishment in certain cases; but as often upon white men as upon negroes. In getting jurors for the United States courts, we endeavor to select loyal counties, and get the names of loyal men as far as we can. In that way I think the laws can be enforced.

Q. How would it be if the jurors were drawn from the people at large?

A. I can get a jury in North Carolina who would hang Jeff. Davis.

Q. How, if they were taken from the citizens of North Carolina who had been engaged in the rebellion?

A. That is a hard question to answer.

Q. Suppose in the selection of jurors, you should not confine your officers to a certain class of the population, but should select your jurors from the body of the people?

A. In some counties in selecting a jury indiscriminately there might be difficulty in executing some of the laws, but I do not believe that would apply to all the counties; but that course is not pursued in the United States courts. We require jurors to be drawn from particular counties, and we are careful to select, as far as possible, loyal counties. If we were to take them from people indiscriminately, the interest of the government might not be promoted, but proceeding as we do we find no difficulty. Any loyal man has a very fair chance of having justice done him in the United States courts.

Q. How is it with regard to the administration of justice in the courts of the State?

A. We have some excellent judges. Our superior judges, who were appointed by the loyal convention of 1865, are of the best material. I do not think there is a judge on the bench in North Carolina who would not endeavor to administer the laws of the State fairly.

Q. Does a man who is known to be loyal to the government of the United States stand as well in the courts of North Carolina as a man who participated in the rebellion?

A. In some counties they do not; in other counties they do. In the county I live in, a jury drawn from the people at large would convict a secessionist as quick as they would a Union man. In some other portions of North Carolina grand juries are said to be very prompt in presenting offences committed by Union men where offences committed by rebels are passed over.

Q. Has that tendency of jurors, in the counties you speak of, increased or diminished since the exercise of the pardoning power referred to, and the attitude assumed by the President towards Congress in the last session?

A. I do not know in regard to jurors. We had no trial of these cases until the spring term of last year. There were some instances in which soldiers from the army were indicted in some of the western counties of North Carolina. The Attorney General requested me to go to the county of Madison, some two hundred miles west of where I live, to attend to some of these cases, and have them removed to the United States court, under the act of Congress providing for such removal. I was obliged to be in Newbern, to attend to my duties there, and I wrote to a Union lawyer there to attend to the matter for me. He wrote me in reply that he did not attend that court, but I understood that in consequence of the action of the authorities in reference to it the cases have been discontinued, and a nolle prosequi entered. I can say this in reference to the judges of the State courts of North Carolina. The people of that State pay great regard to law. The judges on the bench have always been careful to warn juries not to allow themselves to be carried away by their feelings. They have charged the juries to make no difference between the white and colored people, and I can say that they are endeavoring honestly and conscientiously to discharge their duties. We have a law upon our statute books which provides the punishment of whipping in cases of larceny, and our judges have believed in administering the laws as they exist, but they apply this punishment to whites as well as negroes.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, February 7, 1867.

JOHN H. JAMES, of Nashville, Tenn., farmer, sworn and examined.

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio:

Q. State to the committee whether you had charge of the Northwestern railroad.

A. No, sir; I had no charge of it. It was in charge of Captain Ruger, the quartermaster. He is dead. I was quartermaster for Mr. Johnson while he was acting governor of Tennessee; but I had no connection with the road, except so far as transportation was concerned. My orders for transportation over the road were good; but the construction of the road was under Captain Ruger, the quartermaster.

Q. Was that road built to Kingston Springs under the direction of the quartermaster?

A. Yes sir; it was built by the government.

Q. Then you had only charge of the transportation after the road was built?

A. Yes, and while it was building; the same as any quartermaster has charge in furnishing transportation for troops or government stores—nothing but that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where did you reside prior to your entering the service as quartermaster?

A. In Chattanooga, Tenn.

Q. Were you interested in any of those Tennessee railroads?

A. No, sir; I never was interested in railroad stock to the value of a hundred dollars. The Northwestern railroad was built through the agency of Mr. Johnson, the President. It appeared to be a favorite scheme of his, as you may call it, and it was of great benefit in supplying the army. The government took possession of it in accordance with his recommendation, and built it from about Kingston Springs to Johnsonville, about sixty miles. The government must have built not far from seventy miles of that road. The government cut and graded the road, and put iron on it, and stocked it. I have seen the bills for the iron. In fact, I believe I did have control of transporting the iron through the city of Nashville for the road.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Can you give the committee any idea of the cost of the road?

A. No, sir, I cannot.

Q. Do you know where the iron was bought?

A. It came from Pittsburg to Nashville. It was brought there on towboats.

Q. Who has possession of the road now?

A. The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company. Mr. Burns is president of both roads, of the Northwestern road, and the Nashville and Chattanooga road. Colonel Ennis, of the 10th Michigan engineers, is superintendent of the road. He was the engineer who had charge of the construction; and Mr. Yates, of the same regiment, was the assistant superintendent, and is the assistant superintendent of both roads now.

Q. When was the road turned over by the government to the company?

A. I cannot tell exactly; but I do not think it was more than two months after Mr. Johnson took his seat as President.

Q. Do you know what the arrangement was between the company and the government?

A. The company was to buy the rolling stock and to pay for it in instalments. I do not think the company paid anything for the track, but just bought the rolling stock. Captain Hammond had charge at the time it was turned over.

Q. Were the iron and other materials that were used in the construction of the road carried on your account as quartermaster?

A. No, sir; they were on Major Crilly's, and before him on Colonel Crane's.

Q. Was the road bed as well as the stock of the road turned over to the company.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know what the arrangement was about the track?

A. I think there was no account taken of that at all, but that the company just took it.

Q. All the work was done and all the materials were furnished by the government?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you suppose was the cost of the grading and the construction of the road, exclusive of the rolling stock?

A. There was not less than $2,000,000 spent by the government for the building of the road. I am estimating it at about $20,000 a mile; but it cost more than that. There are some very deep cuts in it.

Q. What would it have cost the company to have constructed these seventy miles of road?

A. I think $2,000,000 would have done it; that is, before the war prices.

Q. Would it not have cost the company more than the government to have done it, taking into consideration the fact that the company would have been compelled to employ laborers, whereas the government used soldiers in its construction?

A. Yes, sir; I suppose it would. It would have cost the company more to build at that time on account of labor being high.

Q. You think the actual cost to the government is about $2,000,000?

A. About $2,000,000.

Q. This work was undertaken by the government at the suggestion of Mr. Johnson while he was acting military Governor of Tennessee?

A. Yes, sir; it was.

Q. So that he was conversant with the work from its commencement to its completion?

A. It was built at his suggestion. He was considered to be, and in fact told me himself he was, the father of the road.

Q. Do you know how the drafts were paid which were issued in connection with the road, whether through the quartermaster's department or the War Department proper?

A. The money was drawn through the quartermaster's department, and the hands were paid by Captain Ruger, who was acting quartermaster. General Donaldson was chief quartermaster of the department. The iron was bought and vouchers given by Captain Ruger. The rolling stock was to be paid for in instalments. I do not know the amount. I think Mr. Burns told me that the rolling stock for the Nashville and Chattanooga road was about $1,500,000—more than the roads could ever pay. That does not include the Northwestern road.

Q. What was the amount of the stock transferred to the company on the Northwestern road?

A. That I do not know.

Q. Have you any idea of it?

A. Very little. It may be that it was not transferred in the name of that road. Both roads belong to the same company, and they use the stock on both roads.

Q. Had the construction of this Northwestern road been contemplated before the commencement of the war?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had a company been chartered for the purpose by the Tennessee legislature?

A. It had, and a few miles of the road were built.

Q. Do the same persons control the company now who controlled it before the commencement of the war?

A. The road belongs to the same stockholders.

Q. Were the parties controlling this road engaged in the rebellion against the government of the United States?

A. Yes, sir; I suppose three-fourths or more of them were engaged in it.

Q. What proportion of the stock was owned by those who were engaged in the rebellion?

A. I do not know; the biggest part of it though.

Q. In what manner were they engaged in the rebellion?

A. They held positions of different kinds in the rebel service, both in the military and civil service.

Q. Did this company receive any bonus from the State of Tennessee for the construction of the road?

A. I think a bill passed the Legislature about two months ago allowing them a loan. I do not recollect how much, but I think about $10,000 a mile. The State issued bonds and delivered them to the company. I saw some of them.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That was for the construction of a road which had been built and paid for by the government and turned over to the company, without any return from he company for it?

A. The representations made were that the roads were in debt and not paying expenses, and they had to borrow this money from the State to keep them up.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. Is it not a fact that when the charter was granted the State pledged its credit to the company?

A. The State does that always. There is not a road built in Tennessee to which the State has not given $10,000 a mile. This that I speak of is a special loan of $10,000 a mile in addition to the other which was paid when the road was built. The Nashville and Chattanooga road was built ten or fifteen years ago. As to the Northwestern railroad that was paid some time ago. The company got that money twelve months ago.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The result of that is that the road, being built by the government, the company got it for nothing and $10,000 a mile from the State, and then an additional loan of the credit of the State to the amount of $10,000 a mile, under a recent act of the Legislature?

A. Yes. It may not be as much as $10,000 a mile; but it is a considerable amount of money.

Q. Was there any reservation on the part of the government when this road was turned over to the company of the amount which the company was to receive from the State for the construction of the road?

A. I do not think there was any understanding about it at all.

Q. Have you ever seen the order turning over the road to the company?

A. Yes, sir; I have read the order.

Q. Do you recollect its contents?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know where the order can be found?

A. I have at home a copy of every order issued on military railroads, including this order.

Q. Can you supply those orders to the Committee?

A. Yes, sir; I can send a copy.

Q. By whom were those orders signed?

A. By General Thomas. The original order, directing the road to be turned over to the company, was signed by President Johnson.

A. To whom was that order directed?

A. To General Thomas. I think it came direct to General Thomas; but it may have come through the War Department.

Q. Have you a copy of the agreement between the government and the company transferring the stock of the road?

A. No, sir; I have seen it.

Q. Do you know where the agreement can be had?

A. It is in the hands of Mr. Michael Burns, the president of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad. He resides at Nashville.

Q. Were there any other railroads constructed by the government in Tennessee?

A. I do not know of any but that one. The Edgefield and Kentucky railroad, which was built before the war, was destroyed in one of Morgan's raids, and the government rebuilt it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1867.

MICHAEL BURNS, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Nashville, Tennessee.

Q. Are you connected with any railroads in Tennessee? If so, what roads, and in what capacity?

A. I am president of the Nashville, Chattanooga, and Northwestern railroad.

Q. You have testified before the special committee of the House concerning the transfer of railways in the South by the government to the stockholders?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In that testimony you have given, I believe, some account of your agency in the payment of two notes of acceptance, or drafts, for President Johnson?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know anything of the origin of these liabilities?

A. Not of my own knowledge; only from hearsay.

Q. Do you know of any person who has that knowledge?

A. I think Senator Fowler has. He was auditor or comptroller of the State of Tennessee at that time.

Q. What was the amount of these liabilities?

A. I think the original liabilities were $20,000 each, on two banks, with interest accrued.

Q. Were they notes or drafts?

A. I think they were drafts.

Q. What date did they bear?

A. I do not recollect. I think they were given in 1863 or '64. I do not know exactly.

Q. When did you first know of the existence of these liabilities upon the part of the President?

A. I was a director of the Union Bank at one time, when Governor Johnson applied to the bank for some money. I think the allegation was that these banks had helped the rebels, and should do something for the Union soldiers, for the lunatic asylum, which was then out of funds. He wanted a very large amount. I think, to the best of my recollection, he proposed to get $200,000 from each bank. I had heard that he had orders to assess them to that amount. After a good deal of conversation with the president of the banks, I think $20,000 each was agreed to be given him, and for that amount these drafts were given.

Q. Do you mean to be understood as saying that this was a false loan levied upon the banks against their will?

A. I think so. I do not think they liked very well to pay the money.

Q. How was it with the Union Bank, with which you were connected?

A. When we found that the draft was drawn on the United States, there was no objection. Our money was then at a discount, and we were perfectly willing to take a draft on Washington.

Q. In what sort of currency did they pay the draft?

A. I presume in their own paper. They had nothing else at the time that I know of.

Q. What rate of discount did the notes of these banks bear to Government funds, or greenbacks, at that time?

A. I think twenty, or twenty-five per cent, perhaps. I do not recollect precisely how much.

Q. The draft, I understand, was drawn by Mr. Johnson, he being then Governor of Tennessee, upon the United States Treasury?

A. Yes, sir; upon the United States Treasury, and, I think, in favor of Mr

Fowler. I am not sure. I think this was in 1863, if I am not mistaken. It was pretty soon after Mr. Johnson went there as Governor. I do not think more than a month or two. There may have been other drafts drawn, for anything I know. These were the only ones I know anything about.

Q. Did you make any effort to collect that draft at any time?

A. I think not.

Q. Why not? Was it a sight draft?

A. I think not.

Q. How much time?

A. I do not remember. I know it was not a sight draft.

Q. When was the first effort made by the Union Bank to collect this draft?

A. I think they sent on Mr. White here, some four, five, or six months ago, for that purpose.

Q. There was no effort made during Mr. Lincoln's life?

A. I do not know that there was.

Q. Why not?

A. I do not know. Soon after the draft was drawn I ceased to be a director of that bank, and became director of a national bank.

Q. Was there any arrangement made by which it was to be collected of the United States?

A. I do not know. Mr. John Kirkman was president of the bank.

Q. Was the draft ever protested?

A. I presume so. That is the usual custom with banks.

Q. Why did not the bank collect it of the Government?

A. The State had not been received into the Union. The bank went into liquidation, and made an assignment. There was an assignee appointed to wind up the affairs of the bank. This was among other claims referred to him—among the assets and liabilities.

Q. Did this draft go into the hands of the assignee?

A. I think so.

Q. You do not know whether it was ever presented to the Treasurer of the United States for payment?

A. I do not.

Q. It has been finally paid by Mr. Johnson?

A. It has been finally paid at a discount.

Q. Do you know whether he ever received the money from the United States?

A. I do not. I have been led to believe he did not; but, of course, I have no data to go by. We had supposed he would probably lose the whole amount. He signed it individually and became the last endorser. They were about bringing a suit on it. The cashier told me they were going to bring suit on him.

Q. How long since he told you that?

A. Within the last month.

Q. Did you come here to Washington soon after the cashier told you that?

A. This is the first time I have been here since he told me. I think I was in Washington in November last.

Q. Did you see the President in November?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him in regard to these liquidations?

A. Yes, sir; I spoke to him about them. He said he would like to have them arranged. He also said that they did not get much value from them; that he paid it out to some troops, and got a good deal of cursing because it was paid in depreciated currency. He did not want to have any trouble made about it; he would rather pay it. Some time afterwards I telegraphed to him to see what arrangement he would make.

Q. In one of his despatches he talked about paying them with twenty per cent. Tennessee bonds, did he not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did your railroads receive any bonds in aid of their construction?

A. The Nashville and Northwestern received a great many in aid of its construction. The Chattanooga road was completed before the State improvement law was passed. They issued some company bonds, which the State endorsed, to build some bridges, and for other purposes.

Q. When were the last ones received by that road?

A. Some seven or eight years ago.

Q. When were the last bonds received by the Nashville and Chattanooga and Northwestern road?

A. I received some little during this year.

Q. Did you not receive some in 1866?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many, in all?

A. I think I have received nine hundred and some odd thousand dollars since the close of the war.

Q. On what grounds did you receive them?

A. To finish the road. The State had advanced $1,455,000, and I represented to Governor Brownlow that this would all be lost, and that it would be better to advance a little more and get the road finished, and that it would probably be able to pay interest. I spoke to some members of the Legislature also, and they took my view of the case and authorized more bonds to be issued.

Q. You were allowed under the general law ten thousand dollars a mile, were you not?

A. That was the general law. We got sixteen thousand dollars per mile.

Q. What is the length of the road built by the government during the war?

A. Probably five hundred miles, or thereabouts.

Q. Did not the government build the Northwestern road for a long distance?

A. No, sir. It did not, in my opinion, exceed five miles; that is, the grading was done, and we had iron at both ends of the road and enough cross-ties, or nearly so, for the entire road. The United States came there and took it away, and just put it wherever they had need for it. Subsequently they relaid the track, but with iron of a lighter quality—at least some of it.

Q. Did they build any portion of the other road?

A. No, sir; that was in running order, as far as I know.

Q. Do you mean to say that the United States built only four or five miles?

A. About five miles; and none of the Chattanooga road, which was completed before the war. There were some bridges destroyed on that road.

Q. Do you know of a Mr. James who was connected with one of the roads?

A. Quartermaster? yes, sir, I know him.

Q. Have you not spoken, in your testimony before the railway committee, of the United States having built about forty-three miles of that road.

A. I did. It was laying the iron according to the estimate of the engineer. They had 115,100 cubic yards of excavation, and then they laid the iron on about forty-three and one-half miles.

Q. Who furnished that iron?

A. The United States. They took our iron, and replaced it with this iron. I do not know where they got it; probably some of theirs was repaired. Five miles would cover the whole distance of grading done by them, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. How much did the Northwestern road lack of being completed before the war?

A. It lacked about one-half.

Q. What is the whole length of the road?

A. When we made a survey, the engineer estimated it at 172¼ miles. The distance has been shortened to 169 miles. One end of the road started on the Mississippi river at Hickman, and was built for a distance of about 55 miles. Commencing at the other end, at Nashville, about 25 or 30 miles had been completed; and then at an intermediate point about six miles of the road was built, leaving an intervening gap of about 43½ miles to the Tennessee river, which was all graded except about five miles. The United States completed the road, and laid the track 43½ miles, making the connection between Nashville and the Tennessee river. From the other end of the road, at Hickman, they took the iron and carried it off. I do not know where.

Q. Do you know how much the government expended in the construction of that road?

A. I do not; I am told, however, a very large amount.

A. And you have received, since the war, over $900,000 in Tennessee bonds, to aid you in completing the road?

A. Yes, sir; I think about $975,000.

Q. Have you those bonds on hand?

A. No, sir; we have used them.

Q. Do your books show how all of them were disposed of?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What amount did you receive for them?

A. I generally hypothecated them at the National Bank of the Republic in New York. I would deposit $100,000 in bonds, and probably receive $40,000 or $50,000; and then the bank would sell them at the market price. I usually deposited them there as security for money loaned. I recollect I disposed of three hundred bonds for iron, which was the largest amount I ever deposited there at one time. I paid some of them also to the contractors—the gentlemen from St. Louis—contractors for finishing the road. They were to receive in payment so many State bonds, so many mortgage bonds, and so much money; and I paid them out as the engineer's estimates came in.

Q. Your books show the names of the persons who received the bonds?

A. They show what we have done with the bonds, and the amounts received for them. We sold them for the market price at the time.

Q. Where are the books of this company?

A. They are at Nashville.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with the President in regard to the transfer of this road, or either of these roads, to the stockholders?

A. Yes, sir; I spoke to him about it several times while he was military Governor. I also spoke to General Grant and to General Thomas about it.

Q. Have you spoken with the President about it since he became President of the United States?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When?

A. After his inauguration, I think in May. I was here in May.

Q. What did you say to him then with regard to the transfer of these roads?

A. I tried to impress on him the saving it would be to the government to turn them over to us.

Q. How long did you remain when you were here in May?

A. About two weeks, or more.

Q. Did you see the Secretary of War in regard to the transfer?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any interview with the President when the Secretary of War was present?

A. No, sir; I had only one interview with the Secretary of War. That was during the lifetime of Mr. Lincoln.

Q. You did not see the Secretary of War, after Mr. Johnson became President?

A. No, sir, not to speak to him.

Q. What did Mr. Johnson say to you about the transfer?

A. I do not recollect exactly what he said. He said it should be done sometime.

Q. Did he hesitate about it, or did he come to that conclusion at once?

A. He would not conclude until he could see General Thomas, then in command of our department.

Q. Did you have more than one interview with him in 1865?

A. Yes, sir, several.

Q. Did you converse each time upon this subject?

A. No, sir.

Q. How many times upon this subject?

A. I do not remember; I think not over twice.

Q. Did the President manifest any disposition to have the roads transferred to them?

A. He wanted to consult General Thomas.

Q. When did you next see the President?

A. Some time in the latter part of that year.

Q. Was General Thomas in this city when you were here in May?

A. He was here. I cannot be accurate as to the month. I think it was in April or May.

Q. Do you know whether the President saw General Thomas?

A. We both met in the President's office. General Thomas came to the conclusion that it was not right, at that time, to turn over the roads.

Q. What did the President then say?

A. His only remark that I recollect was, that there were a great many poor people among the stockholders who needed it; and that it ought to be turned over as soon as possible.

Q. Did General Thomas say when that ought to be done?

A. I think he said within six months, or a year.

Q. What reasons did General Thomas give?

A. That a great many government supplies were on the line of road; that peace had not been declared, or something of that sort.

Q. Do you say you saw the President again some time in the latter part of that year? Was it after the roads had been turned over, or before?

A. I think before. I think it was when I went North with my family, and may have been somewhere about September.

Q. At what time did you return to Tennessee with your family?

A. I think the roads were turned over some time in September, and that I returned some time in September.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him in reference to the transfer of the roads at that visit?

A. I think so.

Q. What was the result of that interview with the President?

A. I do not remember. It was not important enough to fix it in my memory.

Q. You urged upon him the importance of turning the roads over?

A. Yes, sir. I always kept at that.

Q. What did he say in reference to that?

A. I do not remember what he said upon that question. He was always, I believe, in favor of getting that burden off the government. He thought it was a serious burden of expense to carry on these roads, and that he had better let the companies have them.

Q. Did you disclose to him what the roads cost, or had earned in former times?

A. I do not know that I did. I always impressed upon him that it was costing the government a very large amount, and proposed to carry the troops and all supplies myself if the road was turned over to the company.

Q. He was acquainted with the roads, was he not, and knew the cost of them?

A. I presume so.

Q. He knew what the government had done in repairing them?

A. I suppose so.

Q. What has been the net income of these roads since they were turned over?

A. The first nine months and a half the net income was something over $412,000.

Q. And they have now been in your possession nearly eighteen months? Have your accounts been made up to the 1st of January last?

A. They have. I think the net income was something like $524,000.

Q. That is, after paying the running expenses, necessary repairs, &c.?

A. Yes; what we term net profits. A great deal of that, however, we got no money for—though, of course, it amounted to the same thing—for carrying troops, mails, &c.

Q. You say you talked with Mr. Johnson about transferring these roads in Tennessee to the government. What was the nature of the conversation between you and him at that time?

A. It was only a general conversation. I always impressed upon him my belief that it was for the interest of the government to turn them over.

Q. What was his view of the matter then?

A. His view then was, to hold on until the war was over, if he had any view at all.

Q. When did you employ Judge Patterson as your agent?

A. Early in 1865.

Q. For what purpose did you employ him?

A. To see what he could do about getting the roads turned over.

Q. The roads had been turned over in 1865, had they not?

A. I think so. I recollect now that Senator Patterson was employed before they were turned over.

Q. What did you expect him to do?

A. I did not know what he could do. We were all in confusion out there. I thought, perhaps, he might aid us in getting some settlement of the matter.

Q. You stated that you saw the President in April or May, in Washington, and that he represented himself in favor of turning the roads over; and that you saw him some time in the fall of that year, and that he was then of the same opinion. What, then, did you expect that Judge Patterson could do?

A. Judge Patterson was employed by me in 1865, before the roads were turned over. The President was then in favor of holding on until the close of the war.

Q. Did you employ Judge Patterson before the war ceased?

A. I think so.

Q. Was that after the inauguration of Mr. Johnson?

A. No; I think previous. I think it was before he was a candidate, though I may be mistaken. I am not very sure it was in 1865 that I employed him, but think so.

Q. Then it was the spring Mr. Johnson was inaugurated?

A. Yes. It was about March or April, 1865.

Q. Was not your arrangement with Mr. Patterson made after you were here in April or May, 1865?

A. Previous to that. If I recollect, we had a little quarrel on the subject at Willard's during that visit. He came on from Nashville here with me.

Q. Had he been here before that?

A. I think not. I had employed him before then.

Q. How long before you left Nashville had you made arrangements with him?

A. Some two or three months.

Q. Why had he not been on before to attend to it?

A. The principal business he had been engaged in for me was, to see General Thomas, and ascertain what he could do with him to fix up matters, or arrange them. I did not know what could be done. The stockholders were clamorous that I should do something.

Q. Did not you make a special bargain with him for $2,500 to do what he could do?

A. I paid him $2,500, and I think I paid him what I promised.

Q. Did you agree to pay him $2,500 for what he could do with General Thomas in this matter?

A. With General Thomas, with the quartermaster, and with the military authorities.

Q. He came on to Washington?

A. I think there was no understanding that he was to come to Washington.

Q. Was this arrangement made before or after Mr. Johnson was inaugurated?

A. It was before. The payment was after.

Q. What sort of trouble had you with him at Willard's, in the spring of 1865?

A. Something about this claim. He swore that he would have nothing at all to do with it further; that he would wash his hands of it. His father-in-law was then President, and he desired not to have anything further to do with it; he got quite angry.

Q. In your testimony before the special committee on railroads, you stated that on a certain occasion you offered Mr. Johnson one-half of your salary in case you were made president of the road, if a certain thing could be done, and you gave as a reason that Mr. Johnson was a poor man. What reason had you to suppose that?

A. I had learned that he was a poor man; that he had been driven from his home, and everything had been destroyed. He declined the offer with considerable anger and feeling, and, as I thought, unnecessarily.

Q. How does it happen that Mr. Johnson employed you to negotiate for the payment of these two drafts, obtained when he was Governor of Tennessee?

A. I was one night at his office, and he mentioned the subject to me. He said he wanted to settle the matter, and that he would probably telegraph to me about it in a few days to Tennessee.

Q. You were here at about what time when you had this conversation at his office?

A. I think it was in November. This is an almost direct route from Nashville to New York, where I have frequent business.

Q. When you had this conversation with Mr. Johnson about the payment of the two drafts, did you also have a conversation about the railways at that time?

A. Not that I remember. I had ceased talking to him about railways.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about railways when you were in Washington, in November last?

A. I think not.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about the payment for the rolling stock?

A. I do not remember that I did. I regarded the whole matter as out of his hands some time before.

Q. You had agreed to pay for the rolling stock at a certain time?

A. Yes, sir; the bonds show that.

Q. When did these bonds become due?

A. I think they were payable in monthly instalments.

Q. Did you not at the same time have a conversation with Mr. Johnson about postponing the payment of them?

A. I found Mr. McClellan coming on, and I sent word by him that it was impossible to make the payments, that I was carrying the mails, carrying the troops, and carrying supplies, and that I could not make payment on the bonds for the rolling stock.

Q. Why could you not make these payments, if it was true that your net profits had exceeded $500,000?

A. I had paid some floating debts, and made payments to the United States in cash and transportation.

Q. Had you also paid the interest on your bonds that had accrued in the two or three years during the war?

A. Yes, sir. I think that was the stipulation in the order, that I was not to pay any dividends until I had paid the bonds and the interest.

Q. Did you understand this order as directing you to pay the over-due interest on the bonds before you paid the government for its rolling stock, which they gave up to you?

A. I did not so understand it. I discovered that the government was very largely in our debt.

Q. How did you discover that?

A. I got an account rendered in accordance with that order.

Q. Did it show that the government was indebted to you?

A. Yes, sir; $3,134,004.

Q. Did not they also show a large account for construction?

A. They did not render any account to me.

Q. When you say you ascertained they were three millions in debt to you, you mean to say that that was the amount on your side, and not that there was a much larger amount ascertained against you on the part of the government?

A. I do not know that.

Q. Have you not good reason for believing that to be the fact?

A. I believe the contrary.

Q. Did not they claim that you owed the government a great deal more than the government owed you?

A. I never had a claim presented.

Q. Do you not know that that was the statement made up?

A. General Meigs always made that claim when I talked to him.

Q. Then did it not follow that you were liable to pay the government for the rolling stock you received?

A. I was to pay it in carrying troops, supplies, mails, and money. The government had the use of our road from 1862, until it was turned over in 1865. There was a gentleman detailed to make out the account, and I got his statement of the amount due us, $3,134,004, and I knew the condition of the road when the government got control of it, and if there was extravagance in the quartermaster's department, while the government had it in charge, I do not think I should be charged with it.

Q. Did you not, when you were here in November last, have a conversation with the President in regard to the rolling stock?

A. I do not remember any such conversation that I had with him.

Q. When were you last here before November?

A. In June.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him then on the subject?

A. I recollect one conversation in which I proposed to turn over all the rolling stock ever received from the government back again, sooner than be harrassed as I was. It was then in better condition than when we received it.

Q. What did he say in reply?

A. He did not make any reply one way or the other, that I remember. He is not a very talkative man.

Q. You did finally obtain an extension of your bonds?

A. We did.

Q. How did you obtain that?

A. Mr. McClellan came on here. I sent word to him that we could not pay the instalments due, and that we wanted an extension of the bonds.

Q. Who is Mr. McClellan?

A. A citizen of Nashville.

Q. What was his position during the rebellion?

A. He was a loyal man.

Q. He never went into the rebellion?

A. No, sir; he was a thoroughly loyal man.

Q. Did you incur any expense in obtaining that extension?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you pay Mr. McClellan anything?

A. Nothing at all. He was coming on here on business of his own. He is an assessor of internal revenue, and he came on here in regard to matters connected with the department.

Q. Is he a stockholder in either of these roads?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is Mr. Johnson a stockholder?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is Mr. Patterson?

A. Yes, sir; in the Chattanooga road.

Q. How long has he been a stockholder?

A. I think since the early part of 1866.

Q. Is any other member of Mr. Johnson's family a stockholder in either of the roads?

A. I do not think there is.

Q. Of whom did Mr. Patterson obtain his stock?

A. I think of Governor Brown, of Georgia.

Q. Did you pay both of these notes or drafts to the two banks in Tennessee, you have mentioned?

A. The drafts were paid here.

Q. Mr. Johnson's name was not mentioned in the drafts?

A. Yes, sir; I drew drafts on Mr. Johnson payable at the First National Bank, in Washington.

Q. Mr. Johnson's name was not mentioned in the drafts?

A. Yes. The original draft was enclosed in a letter to Jay Cooke & Co.'s bank—the First National Bank. Then the draft I drew, I think, was sent to the bank for collection. If the draft I drew was paid, the original draft enclosed in a letter was to be handed Mr. Johnson. If it was not, it was to be returned to Nashville.

Q. Was Mr. Johnson's name mentioned in the draft you drew?

A. Yes, sir; I drew on Mr. Johnson, payable at the First National Bank.

Q. In your testimony before the railway committee, you say that Mr. McPherson, in stating the account of the road upon the basis of the order, credited the road something over $2,000,000, and debited it with a very much larger sum. How do you know they debited you with a very much larger sum?

A. That portion of testimony, I think, you have mistaken. Mr. McPherson did not give any debit account at all. There was a statement of General Meigs against the road of four million and some odd dollars, but rendered me by neither.

Q. Then, on the account as made up in the department, there was $300,000, or more, claimed against you, in addition to the sum due by you for rolling stock?

A. Yes, sir; that was the claim they made, but I dispute that whole item. I had information of the condition of the road when they got it.

Q. If you had neglected to pay the accumulated interest on the bonds, would there have been any difficulty in your paying for the rolling stock according to the terms of the bond given by the road when you received the rolling stock?

A. I presumed they could have done it. I was not inclined to do it from the fact that I believed there was a debt owing to us.

Q. You did not go north when you made these drafts for the payment of these claims against Mr. Johnson?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know anything as to how the money was to be raised to meet the drafts you drew?

A. No, sir.

Q. Mr. Johnson speaks of twenty State bonds. Do you know how he obtained those bonds?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were they bonds issued to your road by the State of Tennessee?

A. They were not. At least he did not get them from me, nor from any one else on my account, or for the company.

Q. When did you first become acquainted with Mr. Johnson?

A. About 1854.

Q. You were a sympathizer with the rebellion, were you not?

A. I sympathized with it as the State went out; but I staid at home.

Q. You did nothing for the Union cause?

A. No; but I did nothing against it.

Q. Did you keep up your acquaintance with Mr. Johnson during the war after he returned to Tennessee?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you intimate with him after that time?

A. Yes, sir; I was frequently with him.

Q. On what business?

A. A little of everything; and sometimes I called on him without any business.

Q. What business had you during the two or three years of the war?

A. My business house went on. I spent two summers in Connecticut.

Q. You had no particular business?

A. Not further than stated. Sometimes I would go and ask for some fellow's pardon who was in the penitentiary, or something of that sort.

Q. He knew what your political sentiments were?

A. Perfectly well. He was entirely satisfied with my good faith. He never asked me to take an oath, and I could get a pass from him or from any of the military authorities to go anywhere.

Q. He knew your sympathies were with the rebellion?

A. Yes, sir, I suppose so; but he knew I would not do anything to injure him or the United States.

Q. You were engaged in the manufacture of harness and leather work at that time, were you not?

A. No, sir. I was engaged in the saddlery business. I did not manufacture myself, but sold to others.

Q. How long were you engaged in that?

A. I had goods in the store during the war—after the rebellion broke out, and several years previous.

Q. For what did you sell them—for use by the rebels?

A. Very likely. I sold them to whoever wanted to purchase, but took no contracts from the rebels.

Q. Did you have any communication with the people on the other side of the line after our army took possession of Nashville?

A. I observed my faith as well as I knew how.

Q. Your road had a lot of cotton South during the rebellion?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. That you got out?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How did you obtain permit to get it out?
A. General Thomas gave it to me.
Q. Who solicited General Thomas?
A. Myself. I first got the order from the department at Washington—such as the President was issuing to various parties.
Q. Were you acquainted with Secretary Stanton?
A. I had a few lines from Mr. Lincoln to him.
Q. Had you known Mr. Lincoln previously?
A. Yes, sir. I had a letter of introduction from Governor Johnson to him.
Q. When was that?
A. I have the letter before me, dated August 3, 1864, which the Committee can examine if they desire.
Q. You saw the Secretary of War upon the endorsement of Mr. Lincoln on this letter?
A. I did.
Q. Did you have any conversation with him then in regard to bringing out the cotton the road owned?
A. No, sir. My business was to get the roads turned over to the companies.
Q. Did you succeed at all?
A. No, sir.
Q. What was the difficulty?
A. He remarked that it was not in his department; that it was in the quartermaster's department.
Q. Did you go to the quartermaster's department?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. With what success?
A. None.
Q. Did you do anything then about the cotton on that visit to Washington?
A. No, sir.
Q. When did you obtain an order to bring out the cotton?
A. In May, after Mr. Johnson became President.
Q. From whom did you obtain that order?
A. I got an order from the President—such as they were in the habit of issuing then.
Q. Was it printed?
A. It was printed or photographed. It did not do me any good, anyhow.
Q. When did you get the order upon which you got the cotton?
A. In 1865 or 1866, from General Thomas.
Q. Did he receive any order from the President in regard to it?
A. I showed him the document I had from the President.
Q. Was it signed by the President?
A. I think not; I cannot say positively.
Q. How many bales of cotton did you bring out?
A. To the best of my knowledge it was 1,254 bales.
Q. That cotton was purchased with the proceeds of that rolling stock carried off by some of the officers of your road to the Southern country during the war, was it not?
A. That is what I believe.
Q. Did you obtain the rolling stock they carried off?
A. A portion of it.
Q. How much did this cotton yield you?
A. For five hundred bales I obtained about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, in Boston. The remainder I shipped to Liverpool. I do not remember what it brought.

Q. What was about the entire amount received?

A. About two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, net proceeds.

Q. What was done with that money?

A. What we obtained in Boston was deposited in a bank in New York, to pay interest. That obtained from Liverpool I deposited in the Bank of the Republic, also in New York, to pay coupons due there.

Q. You say in your testimony that the roads in 1865 had become a burden to the government, and that they were about abandoning them? to what road do you refer?

A. To the Northwestern road.

Q. What reason had you for supposing that?

A. There was an order issued, I think as early as July, to abandon it, but the military superintendent would not do it; and they did not do it until the 1st of September.

Q. Does the State of Tennessee owe for any other bonds except those issued to railroads, and if so, is there any difference in the market price of them?

A. There were some five per cent. bonds issued, I think.

Q. Were they issued in behalf of railroads?

A. No; they are what are called "Capitol Bonds," and were for building the State Capitol, as I suppose.

Q. Do you know which bonds the President proposed to sell?

A. I do not. I presume they were the issues of before the war, and probably in behalf of railroads there.

Q. All of the nine hundred thousand dollar bonds you received from the State of Tennessee have been disposed of, and you have received the money for them?

A. Yes, sir; except that I gave some for iron and some to contractors.

Q. Who else have received these bonds, except that which you have paid for iron and to contractors?

A. I paid a portion to the Union Bank, for the old debt the company owed.

Q. Have you disposed of them to anybody else?

A. No, sir; not that I recollect.

Q. Have you any on hand at present?

A. I sent 178 to New York. These are the last I had. There are some more coming to me yet.

Q. Then those you have stated make up the whole amount?

A. Yes, sir; the whole, to my knowledge. They were all appropriated to the use they were intended for—that is, the building of the road, and the payment of its debts.

Q. Within the last two years has your road paid out any money for any purposes except for the repairs of the road, running expenses, and interest on its bonds?

A. It paid some for the old debts.

Q. Debts contracted when?

A. Previous to the war.

Q. Have you paid out any money for assistance and advice, except as you have stated?

A. Nothing, directly, or indirectly, to my knowledge. I recollect when young Meigs was here, once, that he assisted me, and I gave him a trifle.

Q. You drew on the President at two different times?

A. Yes, sir; one draft for fifteen thousand dollars, and one for fourteen thousand six hundred dollars.

Q. But you, in reality, paid one of these banks $16,250 (?) and drew on the President for fifteen thousand dollars; that left you out of pocket $1,250. On what ground did you do that?

A. I telegraphed him that I could arrange it for that amount, but I found I could not do it. I got angry, and paid it myself. I never mentioned it to Mr. Johnson, and should not have done so if it had not been brought out on my examination before the railroad committee.

Q. In your testimony before the railway committee, you state that when Mr. Johnson became President he endeavored to lessen the expenses of the government, and found that these roads cost a vast amount of money. How did you learn that?

A. Through one of our quartermasters.

Q. Did you not learn it from Mr. Johnson himself?

A. No, sir; that fact was well known to me.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.
Nashville, Tennessee, January 24, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure of commending to your consideration my old friend, Michael Burns, of the city of Nashville.

Mr. Burns is a gentleman of high standing in the city, and rare business qualifications. He is the president of the Nashville and Chattanooga, and the Northwestern railroads, and by his energy, skill and capital, has contributed largely to the successful progress of the latter road, which, as you are advised, is now in running order to the Tennessee river. The government owes him much for his hearty co-operation with the Secretary of War, and others, in constructing this great military and commercial enterprise, by which we soon can be relieved from the exacting extortions of the Louisville and Nashville road, and all the troops and munitions of war can be transported over a much shorter, cheaper and more secure, and at all seasons, certain line, to this point.

Mr. Burns visits Washington on important business, which he will lay before you, and any assistance or kindness you may be pleased to give him will be heartily appreciated and conferred upon an esteemed friend and worthy gentleman.

I have the honor to be, with great regard, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN,
President of the United States.

[Endorsed.]

Hon. Secretary of War, please see and hear the bearer, Mr. Burns.

A. LINCOLN.

August 3, 1864.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1867.

Hon. J. S. FOWLER, United States Senator, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you any knowledge of two notes or drafts made by Andrew Johnson, while provisional Governor of Tennessee, which were discounted at banks in that State?

A. Yes, sir; I know there were two notes of twenty thousand dollars each, sometime in the latter part of the summer of 1862. I could not give the precise date of the notes, but I remember it was after General Buell fell back to Louisville. We commenced early in the spring of 1862 to raise a regiment in the city of Nashville, and did raise a number of troops, and the regiment was partly filled up when General Buell fell back. The men were poor, and their families were on our hands, and had to be supported. We made distributions out of the funds collected from the State government to the wives of these soldiers. When General Buell fell back, no paymaster could come through, and these families were still in distress. The money of the State banks there was then about twenty per cent. discount. The soldiers said they were willing to take the money of the Union and Planters' banks, and would be very glad to receive it.

I urged Mr. Johnson, at the time, to borrow the money, and we borrowed it from the banks. I recollect that I was on both of the notes myself. We were to pay six per cent., the legal rate of interest, and the notes were to be paid in the funds of the Planters' and Union banks. Over thirty-three thousand dollars of this was expended in paying off the regiment for one or two months' service, and also battery A, of Tennessee. This money was refunded by the government of the United States.

Q. Refunded to whom?

A. The draft was given to Governor Johnson for between thirty-three and thirty-four thousand dollars, and the remainder of the funds received from the banks, over six thousand dollars, I had expended in support of the Lunatic Asylum. That amount I subsequently refunded, making up the forty thousand dollars received by Governor Johnson. The thirty-three thousand dollars was drawn from the United States depository at Louisville, after having been refunded by the United States, and I took it from there, with the other six or seven thousand dollars, and deposited it in the United States depository at Cincinnati, and took certificates for the amount for Governor Johnson.

Q. When was that?

A. The precise date of that I cannot give you. It was more than a year afterwards.

Q. Was it eighteen months afterwards?

A. I could not say. It was between a year and eighteen months, perhaps more. I know I took out four certificates, of ten thousand dollars each, which were given to me. Then of course he was to meet those notes. I was very much pressed afterwards to pay the notes, and annoyed in reference to them. I presented the matter to Governor Johnson after he became acting President of the United States, and what was done in regard to it I do not know personally. All I know is what I have heard through Mr. Burns.

Q. What did Mr. Johnson say to you when you called his attention to the fact that the notes were unsettled?

A. The last time I called his attention to it he remarked: "Let them call on me and I will attend to it," or words to that effect.

Q. How long ago was that?

A. It was in the summer of 1865, either in June or September. I apprehend it was in September.

Q. Did you speak to him about the matter at any other time?

A. Yes, sir; I had spoken to him before that, at precisely what time I do not know.

Q. Was that the last time you spoke to him?

A. Yes, sir; I determined at that time to have nothing further to do with the matter. The parties in Nashville sent some letters here to me, which I sent to him. These banks were put into the hands of receivers, having made an assignment. A Mr. Allen was the receiver, and he gave my letters to the President. I know he was receiver of the Union Bank, and I think he was of the Planters', but I cannot speak certainly as to that.

Q. Do you know whether or not Michael Burns had any connection with this business in any way.

A. I know nothing of that, except what he has told me since he came here a few days ago.

Q. As I understand you, you delivered to Mr. Johnson those certificates, and deposited that ten thousand dollars each with the United States assistant Treasurer at Cincinnati?

A. Yes, sir; my recollection is that I did that on my way to Memphis. I recollect very well that the Secretary of State went with me, and saw me take the certificates at Cincinnati. I sent the certificates to President Johnson from Nashville by Judge Milligan.

Q. Did you hold any office in Tennessee at the time this loan was obtained?

A. I was comptroller.

Q. Was this loan from the Planters' and Union Banks in any sense a forced loan?

A. No, sir; not at all. They were not anxious to loan the money, but when we represented the case to them, that it was for the families of these men who were suffering, and pressed upon them the necessity of our having the money, they gave it to us.

Q. Were you acquainted with Michael Burns before the war?

A. O, yes, sir.

Q. Do you know anything of his standing during the war, in reference to the rebellion?

A. Nothing, only what I have heard.

Q. What was his reputation as to loyalty?

A. He was regarded as a disloyal man during the war.

Q. That was his common reputation in Nashville, Tennessee?

A. Yes, sir; and he stands with that class of men, or is inclined that way. I will mention one fact in regard to him. There was a battery in the confederate army called after him—the Burns battery. Whether he contributed to that I do not know, but I suppose he must have done so. These things were done there for the purpose of inducing wealthy citizens to contribute for their equipments.

Q. Was he a wealthy man?

A. He is a wealthy man. He is a very enterprising man. He belongs to the working class of society. He came to Nashville a very poor man.

Q. Is he a foreigner by birth?

A. Yes, sir; an Irishman.

Q. Has he been naturalized?

A. Yes, sir, many years ago. He was an intimate friend of President Johnson. The President has always expressed a warm friendship for him. As soon as the federal army arrived, Mr. Burns showed them a great deal of friendship, as he did to everybody connected with the federal army. I am satisfied, from what I knew of him before, that it was not his wish that the State should go into the rebellion; but when that was done, he decided to give his aid in that direction?

Q. How has it been since the war? Has he had the confidence of the rebels of Tennessee in Nashville?

A. Yes, sir; I am satisfied he has had it; at the same time I think there is nothing in his character or conduct, or in sentiment, calculated to produce rebellion. They know that he would harmonize with them generally if the State should go into rebellion, or if the South should go into rebellion, for, as a matter of course, his property and everything would go in that direction. They do not look upon him as an active rebel. I believe his judgment is with the government of the United States and with the Union people, and that it is only his interest that leads him to associate with the other class. He gave his sympathy to all our public affairs. Indeed, I enjoyed his confidence very largely. He was very liberal in giving donations in support of poor people, always visited the officers of the State government, and gave his countenance to them; at the same time he never took any active part in those measures which tended to produce a restoration of the State.

Q. Are you acquainted with the line of the Nashville and Northwestern road?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When our forces got possession of that country, was that road completed?

A. There was about twenty-eight miles of it completed; that is, the track was laid for about that distance.

Q. How much remained?

A. About fifty-six miles. The great portion of that remaining was graded, but there were some few excavations and fills to make; a portion of the work had been done, but of course it had been destroyed, and had to be done over again.

Q. Was that finished at the expense of the government, during the military occupation of the country?

A. Yes, sir; entirely so.

Q. Under whose direction was it done?

A. My understanding was that it was done under the direction of Governor Johnson, by order of the Secretary of War.

Q. Governor Johnson had a knowledge of the road, and of the expenditure of the government incurred on the road?

A. Yes, sir; a full knowledge, for it all came under his observation, as I understood.

Q. What is the value of that road as a line of communication, as far as profit is concerned?

A. At the present time, I am informed by Mr. Burns that it is not profitable.

Q. You have no personal knowledge outside of what you got from Mr. Burns?

A. No, sir. The road is only finished to the Tennessee river. Mr. Burns is now at work finishing the part between the Tennessee river and the extension from the Mississippi river.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1867.

WILLIAM S. HUNTINGTON sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am cashier of the First National Bank, of Washington.

Q. Do you, or have you at any time kept an account with President Johnson?

A. I have, and do now.

Q. When did it commence?

A. About the time he was made President.

Q. Do you know of two drafts paid by Mr. Johnson, drawn by Michael Burns, of Tennessee?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether or not any such drafts were presented at your bank for payment?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Through whose hands at your bank would such drafts, if presented for payment, pass?

A. Through the hands of the collection clerk, Mr. Pratt.

Q. Have you, through your bank, made any collection of coupons for Mr. Johnson?

A. Yes; once in a while.

Q. Of what bonds?

A. Railroad and Tennessee State bonds.

Q. What railroad bonds?

A. The Louisville and Nashville, I think. Colonel Morrow would bring them in, and we would give him the money on them.

Q. To about what amount, at any one time?

A. I do not recollect. I did not pay much attention to them—not very large amounts. I think at one time the interest had not been paid for a long time, and the amount was larger—probably $3,000 had accumulated, in part on State bonds and in part on railroad bonds.

Q. When was that payment made?

A. Probably a year ago.

Q. Will your books show the amount?

A. Probably they will; I am not certain.

Please examine your books as to that fact, and also as to the payment of the drafts mentioned.

A. I will do so.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday, March 26, 1867.

WILLIAM S. HUNTINGTON recalled and examination continued.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you any information in reference to the check or drafts on Mr. Johnson, of which inquiry was made when you were last before the Committee?

A. I find that on the 25th of January last a draft of Michael Burns on Andrew Johnson came into our bank, was accepted by him, and by his order charged to his account. It was for $15,000.

Q. Do your accounts show the payment of any other draft on Mr. Johnson, about the same time?

A. No, sir; I did not notice any other.

Q. Have you made an examination?

A. I asked the head book-keeper this morning to look over the books from the first of January last up to this time. He found the $15,000 draft, but no other.

Q. Have you any account of the purchase of coupons by your bank, from Mr. Johnson?

A. We have these entries: January 20, 1866, $167 07; July 25, $541 50; February 8, 1867, $1,081 50.

Q. Did you see the bonds from which they were detached?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know what bonds they were from?

A. My impression is—though I am not certain of it—that they were Tennessee State and railroad bonds.

Q. Were the coupons that were purchased in February last all payable at the same time?

A. I have no record of that.

Q. You do not know whether they were all then recently due, or whether some of them were due six months or more?

A. I do not.

Q. Were the coupons that were purchased in February from the same bonds as those that were purchased before?

A. I have no knowledge as to that.

Q. Was Michael Burns' draft charged to Andrew Johnson?

A. Yes, sir; it was charged to his account. It was accepted by him and made payable at our bank here.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the transaction with which the draft was connected?

A. I know nothing about it.

Q. Will you furnish the Committee with a statement of Mr. Johnson's account for January and February, 1867, in detail?

A. I think I ought not to do so. At the same time, I think there is nothing in it that the Committee would desire to know.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1867.

W. S. HUNTINGTON recalled and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

The Committee have decided to insist on an answer to the question propounded when you were last before them.

A. I have here and lay before the Committee the account of President Johnson with the First National Bank of Washington, commencing January 1, 1867, until the present time. I do not want the Committee to misunderstand my refusal to give a transcript of the account when I was before them the other day. I had never been called on before to disclose the account of any of the customers of the bank.

Q. Will you furnish a transcript of the account of President Johnson with your bank from the time it commenced until the present time?

A. I will have it made out when I return to the bank.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any other draft on President Johnson being paid at your bank, than the one referred to in this account, under date of January 25?

A. Some time previous a draft was sent to us for collection, for something over $15,000, which Mr. Johnson declined to pay, stating that the amount was too large; that he had settled a similar claim for $15,000, and that this one ought to be settled for that amount.

Q. When was the draft drawn which Mr. Johnson refused to pay?

A. I could not tell without looking at our books. I think afterwards a new draft was made, which Mr. Johnson authorized us to pay.

Q. Do you remember by whom the draft which was not paid was drawn?

A. By one of the Tennessee banks; I do not remember the name.

The paper presented in evidence by witness is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 30, 1867.

W. S. HUNTINGTON recalled and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Please produce the statement of Mr. Johnson's account, called for when you were last before the Committee.

A. I lay it before the Committee. It commences June 27, 1865, and continues down to the present time.

Q. What balance now appears to his credit?

A. $57,302 27.

Q. Does this transcript presented by you contain a true statement of all the transactions between President Johnson and your bank?

A. It does, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. It is a true transcript from your books?

A It is.

Q. What was the largest deposit made as shown by the account, and when was it made?

A. The largest deposit was $64,947, and was made December 15, 1866.

Q. If you have any personal knowledge of that deposit, please state what it was.

A. It was the proceeds of a lot of United States bonds which had been lying on special deposit in the bank for a long time. I suggested to him one day that he had better sell them, as the price was pretty good. He did so, and I placed the amount of proceeds to his credit.

Q. Were there any other stocks or bonds except United States bonds sold at that time?

A. No, sir.

Q. How long had the bonds been with you on special deposit?

A. I cannot tell; a long time. $50,000 United States seven-thirties had been on deposit, I think, for over a year. $10,000 additional, I think, were purchased January 22, 1866.

Q. Did you, as cashier of the bank, purchase the whole of these bonds when they were purchased?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From what source was the money derived from which the purchases were made?

A. When he first opened an account he had certificates of deposit, I think, of the assistant Treasurer in Cincinnati for $50,000, which had been for some time on interest, and which he desired to have invested in the way I thought best. I invested an even amount of, I think, $50,000 in seven-thirties, and placed the balance to his credit on the books of the bank.

Q. You made an entry of the proceeds of the certificates of deposit on your books?

A. No, sir; only the balance placed to his credit was entered on the books. Seven-thirties were below par at that time, and the $50,000 purchased for him, I think, cost about $48,000.

Q. On the 17th of May, 1866, there is an entry to his credit of $4,534 70; have you any knowledge of that entry other than is here shown?

A. No.

Q. Do the books of the bank show the nature of the transaction?

A. No; they only show so many checks for such an amount, and so much cash received.

Q. Under date of November 5, 1866, I find, "draft, M. Burns, $14,600;" have you any knowledge of that transaction?

A. It came to us for collection from the Union Bank of Tennessee, drawn on the President at sight, and he ordered us to pay it.

Q. Under date of January 25, 1867, I find a similar entry of $15,000; can you explain that?

A. It was a draft drawn by the same party through the same bank in Tennessee. Under instructions from the President we paid it, and charged it to his account.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Does President Johnson know of your producing this account here?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did he know about it?

A. I was in the other evening to see him upon some business, and mentioned that I had been requested to produce his bank account. He asked what for. I told him I was sure I did not know, but that I supposed I would be compelled to produce it, as I would that of any other customer under like circumstances.

Q. You objected to producing it when first asked by the Committee, did you?

A. Yes, sir. Not for any special reason; simply upon the general principle of never imparting any information to outsiders in regard to the business of our customers.

Q. The President did not make any objections to its production?

A. None whatever. He smiled, and said he had no earthly objection to have any of his transactions looked into; that he had done nothing clandestinely, and desired me to show them any thing I had relating to his transactions.

Q. The objection you made to producing the account was before you had had this conversation with the President?

A. It was based upon general principles alone. I had not seen him until after I had made out the account to bring before the Committee.

Q. These certificates of deposit on the government depositary in Cincinnati had been on interest for how long before you received them?

A. For more than a year; I do not remember the exact time.

Q. What was their face amount, less interest?

A. Fifty thousand dollars, I think, or between forty and fifty thousand dollars. The original transaction does not appear on our books in any way.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1867.

Hon. E. M. STANTON sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you in your possession any orders issued in relation to the transfer of railways within the State of Tennessee to the companies now operating them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you produce such orders before the Committee?

A. I will. Shortly after the surrender of the rebel armies, the attention of the War Department was directed to the proper disposition to be made of the railroads and railroad stock throughout the rebel States which came into our possession, either by capture or construction. It was the subject of a good deal of consultation and conference between the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General. It was the opinion of the Secretary of War that it was wholly impracticable for the government to operate these railroads under any system, and that it would tend greatly to the advantage of the country to take such disposition as would allow them, as speedily as possible, to become what they were designed—channels of commerce and trade between the States; and that any terms on which that could be done would be advantageous. This was especially the case in regard to the western and southwestern railroads, where it was said there were large amounts of cotton that would be available to remove North, in exchange for supplies to go South, of which it was said they were greatly in want. The first case, I think, in which the matter came up for practical action, was in reference to the Orange and Alexandria railroad. In the case of this road an arrangement was made by which it was turned over to the company, the details of which I am not now able to state. An officer in the quartermaster's department is engaged in getting the papers together, and they will be furnished. The attention of the department, some time prior to the 27th of June, was called to the railroads in Tennessee by a correspondence between the Quartermaster General and General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the department of the Cumberland, copies of which I hereby present. I have the originals here, which the Committee may examine if they desire. On the 7th of July the Quartermaster General submitted to the Secretary of War a report upon the subject, relating to a communication from M. Burns, president of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, which is annexed with the other papers. These views of the Quartermaster General were concurred in by the Secretary of War generally, and so endorsed on the report on the 11th of July, 1865. At the time of my approval of the report, I did not advert to the observations which had been made by the Quartermaster General in the close of his report, in regard to the act of Congress of the 31st of January, 1862. My construction of the law differs from that which seemed to be entertained by the Quartermaster General in regard to that subject. I have not regarded that act as having anything to do with roads in Tennessee, or in any of the other States where they were captured by our armies, or were enemy's property acquired by military occupation.

Q. Were any railroads in the State of Tennessee taken possession of under the act of January, 1862?

A. None that I am aware of, except the Nashville and Northwestern railroad. The United States came into possession of the railroads in Tennessee and in the southwestern States by force of arms and capture.

Q. By whom was the Nashville and Northwestern railroad constructed?

A. I do not know.

Q. State any other orders by the War Department in relation to the railroads in Tennessee.

A After the approval of the report of the Quartermaster-General of July 7, 1865, above mentioned, an order appears to have issued from the Quartermaster General to General McCallum, the general superintendent of railroads, directing him to make a transfer of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, and a letter of instructions, written by the Quartermaster General, on the 20th of July, to the same effect, which papers are annexed. Subsequently, to wit, on the 8th of August, 1865, a general order was issued from the War Department to Major General Thomas, commanding the military division of the Tennessee, specifying the terms and conditions on which the government would surrender control over the railroads in Tennessee, and their continuation in the adjoining States, a copy of which is annexed. And afterwards, on the 14th of October, that order was extended to all the railroads within the division of the Tennessee, which comprehended the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. I am not certain whether it comprehended Florida or not.

Q. Were all the roads in Tennessee delivered over to their respective companies in pursuance of the general orders to which you have just referred?

A. That I cannot say; the reports of General Thomas will show as to that. The matters coming under my immediate attention were only when some principle came up to be settled, the details under which never came to my eye.

Q. Do you know whether any special order was issued directing the surrender of the Nashville and Northwestern road to the company now operating it?

A. I know of no special order, except the one I have before specified, of July 20, which was superseded by the general order of August 8.

Q. Would the records of the War Department disclose all orders that may have been issued in relation to the transfer of roads in the State of Tennessee?

A. The records of the quartermaster's department ought to show, if they were returned from the headquarters of General Thomas. The whole subject, by order of August 8, was put under the general direction of Major General Thomas, and by him, I think, was placed in charge of a quartermaster who was assigned to that particular duty. It would be his duty to report to the Quartermaster General at Washington, and to send copies of all orders issued there; and the orders issued here ought to have been directed either to General Thomas or to the quartermaster in charge of railroads at Nashville.

Q. In case of the construction of a railroad by the government, the government furnishing the material and the labor, what has been the custom of the department in surrendering such roads to companies claiming them?

A. In all instances, I think, such roads have been surrendered in the same manner as if they had been originally constructed by the companies. That subject was talked of, and was the subject of a good deal of conference between myself and the Quartermaster General. My own view was that the great object, on the part of the government, was to get these roads operated; and that to go into an inquiry as to the cost of construction would be impracticable, either as to the actual cost of construction or as to any certain rule of compensation, because many of them were constructed at a much larger expense than companies would construct them. They were constructed under the pressure of war, and for temporary purposes. The object of arriving at the actual cash or money value or equivalent for the roads was not only impracticable, but really of but very little practical interest in comparison with the great end of having the channels of commerce in the rebel States opened and carried on, with a view of getting out their produce, furnishing supplies, and getting commerce into its regular channels. In my own view that appeared to be the most certain and most speedy system of reconstruction we could adopt, and that it would tend more to establish harmony than any other thing that could be done by the government. In view of all this, and after the most deliberate consideration we could give to it, it was the opinion of the Quartermaster General and myself—certainly my own—that it would be impracticable to make any distinction; and, so far as I know, no distinction was made in any part of the country in reference to roads built by the government and roads that had been constructed by companies before the war commenced.

Q. Suppose the government, at its own expense, had constructed seventy miles of railroad in one of the rebel States, and that, at the close of the war, a company should apply to the executive department of the government for a transfer of the road so constructed, to it; by what authority or provision of law would the executive department be authorized to transfer the road so constructed to the company making the application?

A. I do not know of any act of Congress that directly, or in terms, would authorize any such transfer; but regarding the construction of the road in time of war, simply as a means or instrument of carrying on war, when the war was over, I would conceive it to be strictly proper and within the scope of the powers of the general commanding, or especially of the President of the United States, as the commander-in-chief of the army, to render that instrument as available for peace purposes as possible. And inasmuch as the road would be entirely useless unless it was operated, and it would be for the benefit and interest of the public to have it operated as speedily as possible, I should think it would be in the exercise of a wise discretion, and exercising proper authority, to turn over that road to any company or individual who would operate it; for, in that way, he would be applying the war material to the only available use to which it could be applied.

Q. Would you regard it as a proper use of that power for the President of the United States to turn over to a railway company rolling stock, locomotives, and cars of various descriptions, which had been purchased or constructed by the government, without exacting compensation therefor from the company?

A. I would regard the rolling stock as coming, to a certain extent, within the same principle. If the thing was done in good faith, with a view of keeping open important channels of trade and commerce, and the government had on hand a surplus of stock which it did not desire to use for its own purposes, I would think it properly within the scope and power of the President to authorize the transfer to be made. A disposition of surplus war material, not available for any other purpose, could in this way be rendered more available to the public, for public use and public benefit, than in any other mode.

Q. I ask you whether the transfers of railways and rolling stock in Tennessee have been made in pursuance of the laws passed by Congress?

A. That being a question in reference to law, and the construction of law, I think this Committee are the proper judges to determine the question, and not me as a witness.

Q. Has compensation been exacted of any of these companies, for roads transferred to them, or any part of the property including rolling stock, which has been transferred?

A. In regard to the railroads I don't know that any compensation has ever been exacted or required for any transfers in Tennessee or elsewhere. The rolling stock, I think, was appraised, and in all cases either payment or bond required, so far as I am advised. What payments have been made upon them, I am unable to state. The Quartermaster General will be able to show.

Q. Has any of this property spoken of been disposed of by public sale in Tennessee?

A. I am unable to state from my own knowledge. The reports of the officers of the quartermaster's department and of General Thomas will show.

Q. In all cases, as far as your knowledge extends, where companies claiming ownership of lines of railway in the State of Tennessee, have applied for rolling stock for use upon their respective roads, has not the stock so applied for been turned over to them without being exposed to sale?

A. With those details I am unacquainted. I do not know whether they have been or not. My impression is that instructions were given not to allow any company to purchase under that order more stock than was wanted to operate their own road. This was for the purpose of preventing one or more roads from combining to monopolize the stock and levy contributions from other roads. I know that was a point on which I had a good deal of anxiety, and that precautions were made use of to prevent it. I do not know that the instructions limited the amount of stock they might purchase, except to prevent them from purchasing more than was necessary for operating their own road.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1867.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON recalled and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Since your former examination, have you made an investigation of the official records of your office relative to the construction and transfer of certain railroads belonging to the government? and if so, state fully the result of such investigation.

A. At the time of my former appearance before the Committee I had not made any examination of the records of the department, having no knowledge of the subject upon which I would be required to testify. I spoke from the impressions then on my mind in regard to the events that had transpired during and subsequent to the war, in relation to the railroads. I have since made an examination of the records and correspondence, and furnish herewith a detailed statement of the facts in relation to the general disposition of the railroads after the termination of hostilities, and also of the facts particularly relating to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, which I request to be taken as part of my testimony in the case. Official copies of the papers are also herewith furnished. I also submit a report made since that time, to wit: on the 27th of February, 1867, by the acting Quartermaster General, in respect to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad.

Q. State any further facts you may deem proper in relation to the subject of this inquiry.

A. No other facts occur to me; but I desire to correct an error in my former testimony in regard to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad. In answer to the sixth interrogatory, I stated that I knew of no special order in relation to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, except that of July 30, superseded by that of August 8. On examination, it appears that there was a special order issued by the President, and also by the War Department, in respect to that road, which orders are mentioned in the statement now submitted, and copies thereof furnished among the official copies submitted. I desire also to qualify my answer to interrogatory number ten, in this respect; that while I am of opinion that the temporary use of rolling stock might be permitted for the purpose of opening, and keeping open, channels of commerce closed by the act of war, yet as such stock had a market value and was not attached to the freehold, and the title was absolutely vested in the United States either by construction, purchase, or capture, such property ought to be held for its value for the benefit of the public treasury, and such sale would not be attended with any of the questions and difficulties belonging to the sale or disposal of the railroad track and fixtures, and for these, among other reasons, a difference was made in the disposal of the rolling stock and of the railroads. I desire it also further to be noted relative to the term "transfer," as frequently used in the questions and answers of my former testimony before this committee; that in my use of that term, in respect to railroads, I wish to be understood as speaking only of the relinquishment of military possession or control over the railroads as specified in the order of August 8, and not as speaking of the transfer of the title, which I do not conceive the military had the power to make in respect to the railroads, for reasons I have already mentioned. No transfer of title was at any time made, so far as I know, or could be made, but only possession turned over. When the military use was no longer required, the railroads were turned over to the original owners, or their representatives, with permission to use them. These railroads, their plant track and fixtures, were real property, of which the military authorities had only the possessory right and use, but the rolling stock and equipments, and iron not laid down, were personal property, which, by capture, or purchase, or construction, belonged to the United States. Sale could be made and was made of the personal property at its value estimated by the proper officers. That which constituted real estate, to wit: the railroad track, fixtures, &c., the military authorities might abandon altogether, or relinquish control and turn over the possession to those who would make a beneficial use of it, by working the road. Being in the nature of real estate, no title of the government or of other persons could be divested and conveyed by military authority, but only the control relinquished and the use permitted during the existence of military authority in the department where the roads were situated. The action of the War Department on these subjects was as follows:

During the continuance of the war the following named railroads, which had been operated by the quartermaster's department, were abandoned: In 1862, the Franklin road in Pennsylvania; in 1863, the Western Maryland in Maryland, the Hanover branch and the Gettysburg in Pennsylvania; and in 1864, the McMinnville and Manchester in Tennessee, Mt. Pleasant branch in Tennessee, the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac, and the Richmond and York river in Virginia, the Macon and Western in Georgia, and the Mississippi Central in Mississippi.

After the close of the war, on May 6, 1865, Governor Pierpoint, of Virginia, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War suggesting that government should put the railroads in Virginia in running order. To this the Secretary of War replied on the 9th of the same month, enclosing, and expressing concurrence in, a report upon the latter by General Grant, to the effect that while repairs to railroads in the States which had been in rebellion should be made only where it might be necessary to keep up communications for the supply of garrisons in the interior, yet facilities should be allowed to loyal stockholders of southern roads to repair and run their roads at the earliest day, subject to restrictions to prevent disloyal stockholders from receiving any of the profits.

On May 19, 1865, the Quartermaster General submitted to the Secretary of War the case of the Orange and Alexandria railroad, for the possession of which applications were made by Governor Pierpoint on behalf of gentlemen designated by the board of public works, and by John C. Barbour, president of the company for many years, on behalf, as he claimed, of the stockholders; and in this report the Quartermaster General also recommended the following principles to govern the general disposition of southern railroads:

I.—PLAN OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

1st. Every railroad in charge of the quartermaster's department to be turned over, as soon as no longer required, to the applicants seeming to have the best claim to it, and being able to operate it the most efficiently for the transportation of stores and troops.

2d. No charge to be made against the railroad for expense of material or operation.

3d. All material for permanent way used in the repair and construction of the road, and all damaged material of this class left along its route, to be considered part of the railroad given up with it.

4th. No payment or credit to be given the road for occupation or use during the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it; the return of the road with repairs being a full equivalent for its use.

5th. All moveable property and rolling stock belonging to the United States, to be sold at auction, after ample notice, to the highest bidder.

6th. All rolling stock and material which belonged to the road before the war or before possession by United States forces, to be given up to the proper agents of the road as soon as no longer required.

7th. When there are State boards of public works able and willing to take roads, the roads to be given up to such boards, leaving to the State authorities and judicial tribunals the determination of rival claims.

8th. Railroads not operated by the quartermaster's department not to be interfered with unless under military necessity; but to be left with present possessors, subject only to removal of every official and operative who had not taken the oath of allegiance.

9th. The 8th condition not being enforced, a receiver accountable for receipts to the board of directors to be appointed.

10th. In Virginia no obstacle to be interposed to possession by the board of public works of all the roads not in use by the United States military forces; and those thus used to be turned over to the board when no longer required. In States holding bonds of the roads, but not having boards of public works, roads to be turned over to the State authorities, or to receiver appointed by the Treasury Department at the instance of the War Department, to take possession of them as abandoned property.

A general plan was not at this time formally adopted; but under orders of General Halleck, commanding the department of Virginia, control was relinquished over the Richmond and Petersburg railroads, and its Clover Hill branch, the Richmond and Danville railroad, Norfolk and Petersburg railroad, and the Seaboard and Roanoke railroad. And on June 22, an order was issued from the War Department, for the transfer of the Orange and Alexandria railroad to the representatives of the board of public works for Virginia, also for the lease, at regular rates, of locomotives and cars not required by government; and upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, an order for the transfer of the Alexandria, Loudon and Hampshire railroad to the board of public works, was issued on July 7.

On June 27, 1865, M. Burns, president of the Nashville and Northwestern

Railroad Company, addressed a communication to General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the division of the Tennessee, asking that the road known by the above name should be turned over to his company, and suggesting the following terms: The road with all its appurtenances, such as water-tanks, depot-stations, tools necessary for keeping the road in repair, rolling stock to operate the road, &c., to be turned over to the company; the property to be receipted for by the company, to be held subject to the military authority, and to be taken at a valuation when a general settlement should be made with the government; the property to be kept in good order, and the company to carry out the wishes of the military authorities.

General Donaldson forwarded this to the Quartermaster General, remarking that Major General Thomas desired to have the road transferred, as it was no longer required for military purposes.

On July 7, the Quartermaster General submitted the application and General Donaldson's report to the Secretary of War, with an unfavorable recommendation as to the acceptance of Mr. Burns's application, and with a reiteration of the principles set forth in his report of May 19, upon which he thought the roads should be turned over to their owners. It was objected that rolling stock and machinery should not be sold except at auction to the highest bidder, after due public notice, nor hired except at the rates heretofore adopted in case of hire of rolling stock between the United States and other railroads. And as to taking the rolling stock and material at a valuation upon a "final settlement," it was stated that the quartermaster's department was not competent to make such final settlement; that under the laws of January 31, 1862, damages could not be ascertained nor allowed except upon the report of three commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and whose report should be submitted to Congress. This report of the Quartermaster General was approved by the Secretary of War on July 11, 1865.

Approval was on July 21, given to the Quartermaster General's recommendation for the transfer of the Southside railroad to the company, and on July 28, to that for the transfer of the Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria railroad, to its company, both upon the plan of May 19. The Atlantic and North Carolina, Wilmington and Weldon, and New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern railroads were also turned over under the provisions of the same plan.

On July 17, the Quartermaster General submitted an estimate of funds required by disbursing officers for railroads at Nashville, showing that the roads had been costing $1,300,000 monthly, during that year, and recommended their restoration to the companies as soon as possible, upon the basis of his plan of May 19. This recommendation was approved by the Secretary of War on July 21, and the Quartermaster General was directed to turn over the roads immediately. This plan as approved by the Secretary of War was not strictly followed in all its details. It provided for the lease of rolling stock and material to the companies at regular rates, or for their sale at public auction to the highest bidder. But in July, on the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, a six months credit sale of material of the value of $65,000, to the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad Company, was authorized, because of its inability to make a cash payment, and a bond was required from the company. On August 1, for the same reason, a credit sale for the same period, and of material valued at $70,000, was made to the Virginia Central Railroad Company.

II.—THE EXECUTIVE ORDER OF AUGUST 8, FOR THE RELINQUISHMENT OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL OVER ROADS IN TENNESSEE.

On the 8th of August, 1865, an executive order was made by the President, which the Secretary of War communicated to Major General Thomas, for the relinquishment to their owners of government control over all railroads in Tennessee, and their continuations in the adjoining States, which having been, or then being, in military charge and occupancy, were no longer needed for military purposes, upon the following principles:

1st. Every company to reorganize and elect a board of directors whose loyalty should be established to General Thomas' satisfaction.

2d. A complete inventory of rolling stock, tools, and other material and property on each road to be made out in triplicate.

3d. Separate inventories of rolling stock and other property originally belonging to each road, and that furnished by and belonging to the government.

4th. Bonds satisfactory to the government for payment, within twelve months from transfer or such other reasonable time as should be agreed upon, of a fair valuation of government property turned over upon an adequate appraisement—the United States reserving government dues for carrying mails and other service by each company until payment of obligations by the companies, and the balance of unliquidated indebtedness remaining at the maturity of the debt to be paid by the companies in money.

5th. Tabular statements to be made of all expenditures by the government for repairs to each road, with full statements of receipts from private freights, passage, and other sources, and of the number of persons and amount of freight transported, and the distance in each case. All of said reports or tabular statements to be made in triplicate, one each for the Secretary of War, the military headquarters of the department, and the railroad company.

6th. All railroads in Tennessee to be required to pay arrearages of interest due on bonds issued by that State, prior to the date of its pretended secession, to aid in construction of the roads, before declaration or payment of dividends to stockholders.

7. Buildings erected for government purposes on the line of railroads, and not valuable or useful for business of the companies, not to be a charge against the companies, and charge not to be made for rebuilding houses, bridges, or other structures which were destroyed by the federal army.

8th. Authority given General Thomas to give to quartermasters within his division any orders necessary for the carrying out of this plan.

Proceeding under this executive order, Major General Thomas, on the 1st of September, 1865, submitted to the Secretary of War a copy of an agreement and bond to be executed by the companies, making the directors jointly and individually liable with the company. General Thomas deeming this form the best because the companies being already mortgaged could not execute a bond in favor of the United States which would have precedence over those already given, and the directors were unwilling to give their personal bonds, but proposed to have the title to the property remain with the United States, and to execute a deed of trust to that effect.

III.—EXECUTIVE ORDER OF OCTOBER 14, 1865, EXTENDING THE PRIVILEGES OF THE ORDER OF AUGUST 8, TO ALL ROADS WITHIN GENERAL THOMAS' COMMAND.

After consideration of this report of General Thomas, and of the reports forwarded by him concerning the expenditure necessary for operating other military railroads than those included in the executive order of August 8, and after conference between the Quartermaster General and the Secretary of War, the Quartermaster General, on October 14, 1865, submitted a form of bond, based upon those already given in cases of credit to eastern roads, and a draft of an order to General Thomas extending the benefits of the order of August 8 to all the roads within his command, and also authorizing him to direct the sale to any such railroads of rolling stock then within his command, not needed for the United States for actual use, upon the following conditions, if preferred to the order of August 8, and to the individual security thereunder required by General Thomas: The property to be distributed according to the actual needs of the road, and none sold in excess of the requirements of a road; bonds of the form prepared by the Quartermaster General to be required, binding companies to payment of full appraised value of the property purchased in equal monthly instalments at the rate of 7 3-10 per cent. per annum, within two years, credit being given at the established rates allowed northern railroads, on the first of each month, for service rendered the United States during the preceding month; full reports of sales to be made to the War Department; the serviceable railroad iron at Chattanooga to be excepted and sold only for cash, at the price fixed by the War Department.

This report having been submitted to and approved by the President, a corresponding order to General Thomas was issued by the Secretary of War; and under these two orders the roads within General Thomas' command were turned over to the companies.

IV.—EXTENSION OF THE PRIVILEGE OF EXECUTIVE ORDERS TO OTHER COMMANDS.

Upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, the privileges of executive orders were extended to the following roads, not within General Thomas' division: the Orange and Alexandria; Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire; Wilmington and Weldon; Atlantic and North Carolina; the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern, and the Memphis and Little Rock.

V.—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The first extensions of time for the payment of indebtedness to the government were given by order of Major General Thomas on the 29th of March, 1866; when upon representations of the inability of the East Tennessee and Virginia, and the East Tennessee and Georgia railroad companies to commence regular monthly payments, and in consideration of the same inability, and a disposition to meet its liabilities to the government on the part of the Mississippi and Tennessee, he directed extension to be granted to these three companies. By direction of General Thomas extensions were also allowed: on April 5 to the McMinnville and Manchester railroad company, upon representation that such extension would be the best arrangement for payment that the company could make; on April 10 to the New Orleans and Ohio, upon the application of the company; on April 12 to the Nashville and Northwestern, upon the application of the company; on April 17 to the Nashville and Chattanooga, because the money which should have been applied to liquidation of indebtedness to the government had been paid out; on April 26 to the Mobile and Great Northern, and the Mississippi, Gainesville, and Tuscaloosa, on the application of the companies, and the recommendation of the quartermaster charged with the management of the affairs of military railroads and the collection of indebtedness; on May 7 to the Mississippi Central, and the Nashville and Decatur line, upon the solicitation and representations of the companies.

Extensions were granted by order of the Secretary of War: on May 11 to the Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville railroad, upon the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General, based upon the representation of the embarrassment of the stockholders, and the outlay required for repairs to the road; on July 20 to the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General, based on the inability of the company to pay, and the defeat of the purpose of the transfer which would result from attempt at enforcement of immediate payment; on August 3 to the Alabama and Florida, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General; on August 28 to the Atlantic and Western, on the application of the Governor of Georgia, and to obtain further security by enactment of the Georgia legislature for the payment of the indebtedness; on November 21 to the Nashville and Decatur line, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas, based upon the disposition of the company to act in good faith, the greater security for payment, the advantage to the government in having the road resume operation, and the disadvantage of selling the property at public sale; on December 5 to the Selma and Meridian, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General; on December 6 to the Mobile and Ohio, on the recommendation of Major General Thomas and the Quartermaster General.

By direction of the President extensions were given: on April 22, 1866, to the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad company, upon representations made as to the need of the company for delay, until a settlement should be made with the government or the road be put in successful operation; on July 20 to the Edgefield and Kentucky, on the recommendation of the quartermaster in charge of military railroads in the division of the Tennessee, and of Major General Thomas.

To roads not within Major General Thomas' command extensions were granted by order of the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation of the Quartermaster General: to the Petersburg railroad company on January 10, 1866; to the Virginia Central railroad company on February 6; to the Orange and Alexandria on April 21; the Wilmington and Weldon, May 21; the Petersburg railroad, June 29; the Memphis and Little Rock on July 19, upon the urgent representation of General Reynolds and General Sherman, as well as the recommendation of the Quartermaster General; the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire October 3, and to the Petersburg on January 9, 1867.

Applications for extension have been submitted, and pending their consideration proceedings against the companies suspended, in the cases of the East Tennessee and Georgia, East Tennessee and Virginia, and the Memphis and Charleston railroads, in each of which cases the department awaits a report from Major General Thomas.

The Nashville and Northwestern railroad remained as it had been at the beginning of the war, with only twenty-five miles completed—from Nashville to Kingston Springs—until October, 1863. On the 22d of that month the Secretary of War ordered that the construction of the road from Nashville to the Tennessee river, for military purposes, should be placed in charge of Governor Johnson; that supplies should be furnished by the quartermaster's and subsistence departments; that military protection should be afforded, and that on being completed, the road should be turned over to the general manager of military railways, as a military road, and be used like other railroads in the possession of the government. On the 17th of February, 1864, Colonel McCallum, general manager of military railroads, was assigned to the supervision of the construction of the road. In May, 1864, it was complete to the Tennessee river, an addition of 50¾ miles, at a total cost for material and labor of $1,469,733 20. The names of the officers charged with its construction are furnished by the accompanying copy of a report of the Quartermaster General. During the progress of its construction, on the 2d of April, the Secretary of War notified General Sherman (who complained, with special reference to another road, viz., the one between Nashville and Chattanooga, of the interference of private freights with the transportation of army supplies,) that under the provisions of an act of Congress he was authorized by the President to take military possession of railroads within his command, to the exclusion of all other business, when in his opinion the necessities of the service required such exclusive use. Not until August 5, however, did General Sherman report that the time had come for exclusive military use of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, of which, as the General stated, Governor Johnson retained the management, for some reason, under former orders from the Secretary of War. Upon receipt of this report, General Sherman and Governor Johnson were both informed by the Secretary that exclusive military possession of the road would be authorized by the President, under the provisions of the act of Congress; and an order (which, however, did not cite or advert to an act of Congress,) was issued, directing exclusive military possession and control until further orders, and the revocation of all conflicting orders.

In the meanwhile, in June, 1864, by letter and subsequently in person, Mr. Burns applied, in behalf of the stockholders, for possession of both the Nashville and Chattanooga and the Nashville and Northwestern railroads, and a settlement of accounts; and, on August 15, the War Department notified him of the unfavorable consideration of his request. In June, 1865, after the close of the war, Mr. Burns applied to General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the division of the Tennessee, for possession of the road, and rolling stock to operate it, to be held subject to military use, and to be paid for at a valuation upon final settlement with the government. In forwarding this, General Donaldson said that Major General Thomas desired that the road should be transferred. The Quartermaster General submitted the case to the Secretary of War, recommending refusal of Mr. Burns' proposition—stating that final settlement could be made only in the manner prescribed by act of Congress, and setting forth again the plan previously presented by him, upon which all military railroads should as speedily as possible be relinquished, and which contemplated the surrender of the permanent way of roads to boards of public works or companies, the lease at the regular rates of rolling stock, &c., and, when the latter should be finally disposed of, the sale of the same at public auction to the highest bidder. The views of the Quartermaster General were approved by the Secretary, and notification duly sent to the chief quartermaster at Nashville. The same views were, later in the month, again approved by the Secretary, when an estimate of the cost of operating the roads was submitted, and directions for the transfer of all roads in Tennessee, upon the Quartermaster General's plan were given. On August 8, 1865, an executive order was issued to General Thomas, prescribing regulations upon which the roads should be surrendered, and rolling stock sold upon a credit to be given upon individual security. And under this plan the Nashville and Northwestern railroad was, on September 1, 1865, turned over to the company. But in making the transfers and requiring bonds, General Thomas found difficulty in obtaining individual security, and he so reported, and submitted a draft of a bond suggested by this difficulty. Upon consultation between the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General, the latter, on October 14, submitted another order to General Thomas, and a form of bond, based upon that already required in cases of credit sale in the East, of which the companies who preferred them to the plan of August 8, were to be allowed to avail themselves. Having received the approval of the President, this second order was sent to General Thomas. On the 30th of November, 1865, the Nashville and Northwestern railroad company executed a bond for $529,201 45, the value of the rolling stock sold to it by General Thomas, under his authority. In April, 1866,—having meanwhile made further purchases of over $5,000, but having made no payment of monthly instalments under the bond, the sum then due being, with accrued interest, $109,239,—the company was called upon for payment. But not being able to pay, an extension was asked for and was given by General Thomas, under which, payment of instalments was to commence on the expiration of one year from the date of the company's bond, which was dated November 30, 1865, and was to continue thereafter monthly, in accordance with the bond; the interest accruing monthly was to be paid on the last day of each month, if possible; and transportation accounts were to be applied to the indebtedness of the company. A bond for the additional purchases (above adverted to) made in April, 1866, and aggregating to $5,079 55, was sent in April to the superintendent for execution. But, alleging various pretexts, and evincing no disposition to meet the obligations of the company, the officers of the road failed to execute the bond. Major Hamill then, in order to force the giving of the bond threatened to take possession of the road. At the instance of Senator Fowler, who submitted a telegram from Mr. Burns, representing that the seizure of the road at that time would be "a dead loss to the State [of Tennessee] and to the United States," the Secretary of War, on the 19th of January, 1867, directed Major Hamill to suspend action against the company, and to report the state of its account and the reasons for taking possession. On the 20th of the same month Major Hamill reported the reasons above stated, together with the fact that his course had had the desired effect, inasmuch as the officers of the road intimated their willingness to execute a bond and forward it the next day, the 21st of January. Major Hamill also reported the arrears of instalments and interest due and unpaid as $329,888 29; the total indebtedness, $539,185 16; the credits given for transportation services (no cash payments having been made by the company) $26,704 74.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose certain papers relative to the Orange and Alexandria railroad.

The Governor of Virginia, Hon. F. H. Pierpoint, asks that the road be placed in the possession of certain gentlemen appointed by the board of public works to receive it. His letter is addressed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. John C. Barbour, president of the Orange and Alexandria railroad for many years, encloses to Major General Augur, commanding the Department of Washington, an order from General Ord, placing him in charge of that part of the railroad in the Deparment of Virginia not in use by the military authorities. He asks authority to take possession of the property of the company in the city of Alexandria. He states that he has complied with the regulations, i. e. taken the amnesty oath, and that he has held no military office under the rebel government while governing the road during the last four years of rebellion. He claims to represent the stockholders. I have been advised that there are stockholders—loyal men of the North—whose property was seized four years ago, and who have not been allowed any voice in the control of the affairs of the road, or in the election of the president or directors. I doubt whether taking the amnesty oath reëstablishes any person elected by disloyal votes as the legal or equitable president of a railroad from which all loyal men have been excluded during the past four years.

The State of Virginia has a board of public works, charged with the general supervision of railroads and other public works of the State. I am advised that the State holds an interest of three-fifths in all the railroads and canals and turnpikes. Mr. John C. Barbour, however, informs me that the Orange and Alexandria railroad is an exception to this rule; that it is the property almost entirely, if not entirely, of private parties. Others deny this.

The question of the disposition of the railroads in the States lately in rebellion is a large one; and, after reflection, I have the honor to advise that the following principles be established to govern the quartermaster's department, and of the military authorities in disposing of all of them:

1st. The United States will, as soon as it can dispense with the military occupation and control of any road of which the quartermaster's department is now in charge, turn it over to the parties asking to receive it who may appear to have the best claim, and be able to operate it in such manner as to secure the speedy movement of all military stores and troops; the Quartermaster General, upon the advice of the military commander of the department, to determine when this can be done, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

2d. No charge to be made against the railroad for expense of material or expense of operation.

3d. All materials for permanent way used in the repair and construction of the road, and all damaged material of this class which may be left along its route, having been thrown there during the operations of destruction or repair, to be considered as part of the road and given up with it.

4th. No payment or credit to be given to the railroad for its occupation or use by the United States during the continuance of the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it by capture from the public enemy. The recovery of the road from the public enemy, and its return to loyal owners, and the vast expenditure of defence and repair are a full equivalent and more than an equivalent for its use.

5th. All moveable property, including rolling stock of all kinds, the property of the United States, to be sold at auction, after full public notice, to the highest bidder.

6th. All rolling stock and material, the property before the war of railroads and captured by the forces of the United States, to be placed at the disposal of the roads which originally owned it, and to be given up to these roads as soon as it can be spared and they appear by proper agents authorized to receive it.

7th. When a State has a board of public works, able and willing to take charge of its railroads, the railroads in the possession of the quartermaster's department to be given up to this board of public works, leaving it to the State authorities and to the judicial tribunals to regulate all questions of property between said boards, agents, or stockholders.

8th. Roads not being operated by the United States quartermaster's department not to be interfered with unless under military necessity. Such roads to be left in possession of such persons as may now have possession, subject only to the removal of every agent, director, president, superintendent, or operative who has not taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, which rule should be rigidly enforced.

9th. When the superintendents in actual possession decline to take such oath, some competent person to be appointed as receiver of the railroad, who shall administer the affairs of the road and account for its receipts to the board of directors who may be formally recognized as the legal and loyal board of managers. This receiver to be appointed, as in the case of other abandoned property, by the Treasury Department.

10th. I recommend that the Governor of Virginia be informed that the War Department will interpose no obstacles to the board of public works of the State taking possession of all the railroads in the State not in use and occupation of the military forces of the United States by the quartermaster's department, and that as soon as the military occupation of any of the roads can be safely dispensed with, the road will be transferred to the charge of the board of public works.

In some of the States the State is a large bondholder on the roads, and though there may be in such States no board of public works, it is probable that the State authorities will be willing to receive and take charge of the roads; if not, a receiver should be appointed by the Treasury Department, upon application of the War Department, to take charge of them as abandoned property.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

[Telegram.]

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, May 22, 1865.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

The president and directors of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company have asked that the railroad and all the rolling stock, &c., belonging to the company, now under the control of the United States, be restored to them. Am I authorized to restore their property and road?

GEO. H. THOMAS, Major General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1865.

Philip Quigley and Andrew Jamison, agents of the board of public works of Virginia, request to be allowed to run the Orange and Alexandria railroad.

Referred to Brigadier General McCallum, with directions to turn over the Orange and Alexandria railroad to these parties, to be repaired and run as they propose, on his being satisfied that they have authority from the board of public works of Virginia.

General McCallum is also authorized to lease to the road any locomotives and cars that may be spared without inconvenience to the public service, and transportation required by the government upon the road, to be performed by the parties now put in charge of it at regular rates.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE RICHMOND, FREDERICKSBURG, AND POTOMAC RAILROAD COMPANY, Richmond, Va., Jan. 9, 1865.

SIR: I am informed that the railroad bureau of the War Department has on hand at Alexandria, City Point, and perhaps other places within this military division, a large quantity of railroad materials, such as rails, cross-ties, bridge timbers, &c. All these articles are now much needed by this company for the speedy restoration and reopening of this the shortest route between Washington and Richmond and the Atlantic States; and as there is much difficulty in procuring them elsewhere so early as they could be obtained from the government, by whom, since the termination of the war, they will be no longer needed, but must be sold probably at a loss, I would respectfully propose to purchase of the government what this company needs of these materials, at such prices as the residue shall bring at auction, or as may be agreed on by competent and impartial valuers, to be paid for either in mail or other transportation for the government, or in such other mode as may be in accordance with law and the regulations of the department, and may consist with the present crippled condition of this company.

The details of any such arrangement may be communicated to the superintendent of this company, who will present this, Mr. S. Ruth.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. V. DANIEL,
For President . Co.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

[Endorsements on foregoing application.]

Referred for report to General McCallum.

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1865.

SIR: I would recommend that the United States military railroad quartermaster in charge of property be directed to sell to the Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company the materials required to repair that road, and at such rates as will protect the government against loss.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. McCALLUM,
Brevet Brigadier General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

JUNE, 28, 1865.

Referred to the Quartermaster General, with authority to make sale of such of the railroad materials, within mentioned, as are not needed by the government, upon such terms as may be just and reasonable, bearing in view the advantage to the public service of speedy restoration of railroad communication.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1865.

SIR: In the case of the application of the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac railroad, (the railroad between Richmond and Aquia Creek,) referred to the Quartermaster General, with authority to make sale of such railroad material, the property of the quartermaster's department, as is not needed by the United States government, and is needed for the repair and reconstruction of said railroad, upon such terms as may be just and reasonable, bearing in mind the advantage to the public service of speedy restoration of railroad communication, I have the honor to recommend that there be delivered to the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac Railroad Company, from the stores in possession of the quartermaster's department at City Point and Alexandria, the iron chairs, spikes, cross-ties, and bridge timber necessary to relay such railroad, the prices of the iron chairs and spikes to be the same as they now bring in New York, viz: For iron, per ton, $80; chairs, per pound, 6 cents; spikes, per pound, 6 cents; cross-ties, each, 50 cents; bridge timber, per M feet, B. M., $37 50. The company to give their obligations to pay for the material sold them within six months, being allowed a credit upon the same for all service of transporting troops and military supplies under the orders of the military authorities, at the rates allowed for such service to northern railroads.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Brevet Colonel U. S. A.

[Endorsement on foregoing report.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 29, 1865.

This measure is approved. The obligation of the company to be given in form satisfactory to the War Department, and with the condition that the War Department shall, if it is not paid punctually on maturity, be authorized to place an agent in charge of the railroad, who shall collect its revenues and apply them to the payment to the United States of the sums which may be due for the materials delivered to the railroad under this arrangement.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 7, 1865.

The Quartermaster General recommends that the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire Railroad be turned over to the board of public works of Virginia as soon as they can take charge of it.

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General is approved, and the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire Railroad will be turned over to the board of public works of the State of Virginia.

No claims upon this road, nor any rights of property which the United States have acquired therein during the course of the war, will be compromised, nor will any questions respecting the same be considered as affected by thus turning over the road.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. A. DANA, Assistant Secretary of War.

NASHVILLE, TENN., June 27, 1865.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit to your consideration the following proposition on behalf of the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company, of which I am the president. In pursuance of an interview with his Excellency the President of the United States, and the commanding general, General G. H. Thomas, who told me the government was willing to turn over to the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company their road, with all the appurtenances belonging thereto, such as water tanks, depot stations, and wharf property at Johnsonville, with wood, and steam saws, and tools necessary for keeping the road in repair, together with rolling stock, such as engines and cars, as are necessary to operate the road with; such property to be receipted for by the company, and held subject to the order of the military authority, and to be taken at a valuation when a general settlement is made with the government. The company pledging themselves to use all diligence and care to protect and keep such property in good order, and the company pledge themselves to do everything in their power to faithfully carry out the wishes of the military authority in all things connected with the road.

I would respectfully state, on behalf of the company, that I think the following amount of stock will be needed to successfully operate the road and keep it in good running order, say: Six (6) first class locomotives, and two (2) second class, in all eight; four (4) first class passenger cars, one hundred (100) box and freight cars, fifty (50) flat cars, four (4) baggage cars, eleven (11) hand cars, truck and frames for freight cars, fifteen (15) sets of trucks for passenger cars, three sets complete.

And would further respectfully request the use of the machine shops at the Chattanooga road, to repair our rolling stock and keep it in order, or the use of tools to carry out the repairs. All of which is respectfully submitted to your just consideration.

I have the honor to remain, General, your obedient servant,

M. BURNS,
President Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company.

Brigadier General J. L. DONALDSON,
Chief Quartermaster, Department of the Cumberland.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Nashville, Tenn., June 29, 1865.

GENERAL: The President of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, Mr. M. Burns, has applied to have turned over to the company, at a valuation, the road, rolling stock, material, wood, water tanks, &c., as you will see by the enclosed letter. Major General Thomas has directed me to refer the matter to you, with the remark that he desires the road, &c., transferred, as it is no longer needed for military purposes.

The same remark is applicable to the Edgefield and Kentucky road, from Nashville to Clarksville, and it also might be transferred to its owners.

With respect, your obedient servant,

J. L. DONALDSON,
Brevet Brigadier General U. S. Army,
Chief Quartermaster Military Division of the Tennessee.

Brevet Brigadier General M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to submit copies of a report from Brevet Brigadier General J. L. Donaldson, chief quartermaster military division of the Tennessee, with communication from M. Burns, esq., president of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, asking that that railroad, with all appurtenances thereto, such as water tanks, depot stations, and wharf property at Johnsonville, with wood, and steam saws, and tools necessary for keeping the road in repair, be turned over to the company. He also asks that rolling stock, such as engines and cars sufficient to operate the road successfully, say, eight locomotives, four first class passenger cars, one hundred box and freight cars, fifty flat cars, four baggage cars, eleven hand cars, truck and frames for freight cars, fifteen sets of trucks for passenger cars, three sets complete, be placed in the possession of this road; the property to be receipted for by the company, and held subject to the order of the military authority, and to be taken at a valuation when a general settlement is made with the government: the company pledging themselves to use all diligence and care to protect and keep such property in good order.

I cannot recommend that this proposition be acceded to. I am of the opinion that this and most other railroads should be resigned to their owners at the earliest possible day. For the conditions upon which they shall be delivered up, I respectfully refer to my report of 19th May, 1865, of which, for ready reference, a copy is enclosed.

I cannot recommend that any rolling stock or machinery, the property of the United States, be placed in the hands of this or any other railroad company, except upon the terms of sale at auction to the highest bidder, after due public notice. Should the road be destitute of rolling stock, a portion might be hired to it at the rates heretofore adopted in cases of hire of rolling stock between the United States and other railroads; the stock to be returned whenever called for by the United States, which should effect the sale at auction of all this property as soon as practicable

Mr. Burns asks that the company take the machinery and rolling stock at a valuation to be allowed in final settlement between the United States and this railroad.

This department is not competent to make any such final settlement, and should insist upon prompt payments for what it hires or sells to the company. The law of January 31, 1862, prescribes a special mode of ascertaining the damages or compensation to be allowed to any railroad taken possession of by the United States. It requires the appointment of three commissioners for the purpose, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose award shall not be paid by the Executive department, but shall be submitted to Congress for its action before payment.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1865.

* * * * * *

The question of the disposition of the railroads in the States lately in rebellion is a large one, and after reflection I have the honor to advise that the following principles be established to govern the action of the quartermaster's department, and of the military authorities in disposing of all of them:

1st. The United States will, as soon as it can dispense with the military occupation and control of any road of which the quartermaster's department is now in charge, turn it over to the parties asking to receive it who may appear to have the best claim, and be able to operate it in such a manner as to secure the speedy movement of all military stores and troops. The Quartermaster General upon the advice of the military commander of the department to determine when this can be done, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

2d. No charge to be made against the railroad for expense of material or expense of operation.

3d. All materials for permanent way used in the repairs and construction of the road, and all damaged materials of this class which may be left along its route, having been thrown there during the operation of destruction or repair, to be considered as parts of the road and given up with it.

4th. No payment or credit to be given to the railroad for its occupation or use by the United States, during the continuance of the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it by capture from the public enemy. The recovery of the road from the public enemy and its return to loyal owners, with the vast expenditure of defence and repair, are a full equivalent for its use.

5th. All moveable property, including rolling stock of all kinds, the property of the United States, to be sold at auction, after full public notice, to the highest bidder.

6th. All rolling stock and material, the property before the war of railroads, and captured by the forces of the United States, to be placed at the disposal of the roads which originally owned it, and to be given up to these roads as soon as it can be spared, and they appear by proper agents authorized to receive it.

7th. When a State has a board of public works able and willing to take charge of a railroad, the railroads in possession of the quartermaster's department to be given up to the board of public works, leaving it to the State authorities and to the judicial tribunals to regulate all questions of property between railroads, agents or stockholders.

8th. Roads not being operated by the United States quartermaster's department not to be interfered with unless under military necessity. Such roads to be left in possession of such persons as may now have possession, subject only to the removal of every agent, director, president, superintendent, or operative who has not taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, which rule should be rigidly enforced.

9th. When the superintendents in actual possession decline to take such oath, some competent person to be appointed as receiver of the railroad, who shall administer the affairs of the road and account for its receipts to the board of directors who may be formally recognized as the legal and loyal board of managers. This receiver to be appointed, as in the case of other abandoned property, by the Treasury Department.

10th. I recommend that the Governor of the State of Virginia be informed that the War Department will interpose no obstacles to the board of public works of that State taking possession of all the railroads in the State not in use and occupation of the military forces of the United States by the quartermaster's department, and that as soon as the military occupation of any of the roads can be safely dispensed with, the road will be transferred to the charge of the board of public works.

In some of the States the State is a large bondholder in the road, and though there may be in such States no board of public works, it is probable that the State authorities will be willing to receive and take charge of the roads. If not, receivers should be appointed by the Treasury Department to take charge of them as abandoned property.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

A true extract:

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Lieutenant Colonel, Quartermaster's Department.

NOTE.—In the 10th proposition, 5th line, the word "safely" is omitted in this copy, before the words "dispensed with."

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 20, 1865.

GENERAL: Your letter of June 29th, enclosing application of the president of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad to have the road turned over to the company, and stating that it was no longer required for military purposes, was duly received and referred to the War Department.

The Quartermaster General is of opinion that this and most other railroads should be relinquished to their owners at the earliest possible day on certain conditions; but that no rolling stock, the property of the United States should be placed in the hands of this or any other railroad company, except upon terms of sale at auction to the highest bidder, after due public notice, though in case of roads destitute of rolling stock, a portion might be hired to them at the rates heretofore adopted in such cases of hire between the United States and other railroads; the stock to be returned whenever called for by the United States, which should effect the sale at auction of such property as soon as practicable.

These views are concurred in by the Secretary of War, and directions have been given to the general manager of military railroads to transfer this road in accordance therewith.

By order of the quartermaster general:

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ALEXANDER BLISS,
Lieutenant Colonel, acting in charge Fourth Division.

Brevet Major General J. L. DONALDSON,
Chief Quartermaster, Military Division of the Tennessee, Nashville, Tennessee.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 17, 1865.

SIR: I submit herewith an estimate for funds required by the disbursing officer for railroads at Nashville, Tennessee.

The remittances to Nashville on account of railroads in the southwest, in 1865, are as follows, viz:

In March, on the November, 1864 estimate	$1,805,500 00
In March, on the December, 1864 estimate	1,000,000 00
On May 2, on the January, 1865 estimate	1,400,000 00
On May 2, on the February, 1865 estimate	1,400,000 00
On May 30, on the April, 1865 estimate	1,400,000 00

The estimate for March was held back by General McCallum, it being supposed that the sums required on the previous estimates, and on that for April, would be sufficient to pay off all his indebtedness to the 30th of June, owing to expected reductions in the establishment.

General McCallum reports (on the 3d instant) that one million of dollars will be sufficient on the estimate for March, to enable Captain Crilly to pay off his indebtedness.

It will be perceived from the foregoing statement that these railroads have been costing, during the present year, upwards of $1,300,000 monthly; and the expenditures are still going on.

These expenditures were necessary during the war, but it appears to me that the government should be relieved from this heavy expenditure by the restoration of the railroads to the companies: and I recommend that this be done as soon as it is possible to make arrangements for the transfer, on the basis of my report of 19th of May last.

The appropriation for transportation of the army is exhausted, and there is no money in the Treasury for army transportation against which requisitions can be drawn.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1865.

The Quartermaster General reports on the application of the Southside railroad company for possession of their road, and recommends that the railroad between Burkeville and City Point be turned over to the company upon the terms specified in the Quartermaster General's report of May 19, provided that such portions of the track and side tracks near City Point needed for the storage and preservation of the rolling stock, engines and other property of the United States shall be reserved until the sale of the rolling stock can be effected. Provided, also, that the buildings, wharves and docks erected by the United States shall remain the property of the United States, and subject to sale at auction, as recommended June 27.

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General is approved.

By order of the Secretary of War.

THOMAS T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 28, 1865.

The Quartermaster General recommends that the Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown railroad be turned over to the company upon the terms of his report of the 19th of May, the government reserving the right to pass free all persons in the employ of the United States military railroad to and from Alexandria to Washington until the government business is closed.

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General is approved.

By order of the Secretary of war:

THOMAS T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, August 8, 1865.

GENERAL: It having been determined by the government to relinquish control over all railroads in the State of Tennessee, and their continuations in adjoining States, that have been in charge of and are now occupied by the United States military authorities, and no longer needed for military purposes, you are hereby authorized and directed to turn over the same to the respective owners thereof, at as early a date as practicable, causing, in all cases of transfer, as aforesaid, the following regulations to be observed and carried out:

1st. Each and every company will be required to reorganize and elect a board of directors, whose loyalty shall be established to your satisfaction.

2d. You will cause to be made out in triplicate, by such person or persons as you may indicate, a complete inventory of the rolling stock, tools and other materials and property on each road.

3d. Separate inventories will be in the same manner made of the rolling stock and other property originally belonging to each of said roads, and that furnished by and belonging to the government.

4th. Each company will be required to give bonds satisfactory to the government that they will in twelve months from the date of transfer, as aforesaid, or such other reasonable time as may be agreed upon, pay a fair valuation for the government property turned over to said companies—the same being first appraised by competent and disinterested parties, at a fair valuation; the United States reserving all government dues for conveying mails and other service performed by each company until such obligations are paid; and if, at the maturity of said debt, the amount of government dues retained, as aforesaid, does not liquidate the same, the balance is to be paid by the company in money.

5th. Tabular statements will be made of all expenditures by the government for repairing said road, with a full statement of receipts from private freight, passage, and other sources; also a full statement of all transportation performed on government account, giving the number of persons transported, and amount of freight, and the distance carried in each case; all of said reports or tabular statements to be made in triplicate, one each for the Secretary of War, the military headquarters of the department, and the railroad company.

6th. All railroads in Tennessee will be required to pay all arrearages of interest due on the bonds issued by that State, prior to the date of its pretended secession from the Union, to aid in the construction of said roads, before any dividends are declared or paid to the stockholders thereof.

7th. Buildings erected for government purposes on the line of railroads, and not valuable or useful for the business of said companies, should not form a legitimate charge against such companies, nor should they be charged for rebuilding houses, bridges, or other structures which were destroyed by the federal army.

8th. You are authorized to give any orders to quartermasters within your division which you may deem necessary to carry into execution this order.

By order of the President:

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Major General GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Commanding Military Division of Tennessee, Nashville, Tennessee.

[Telegram.]

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, August 16, 1865.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

I propose to convene a board of appraisers of government military railroad property ordered in your letter of instructions of the 8th instant, to consist of Brevet Major General B. Towers, United States volunteers; Colonel Yates, first Michigan engineers and mechanics; Colonel W. E. Merrill, first United States volunteer engineers; W. J. Stephens, general superintendent military railroads, &c.; and L. H. Eckaltz, chief engineer United States military railroads; and Brevet Major G. C. Kellogg, assistant adjutant general, recorder, if you approve the detail.

GEORGE H. THOMAS, Major General.

[Telegram.]

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, August 17, 1865.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

Since my telegram of yesterday I have learned of the following gentlemen, perfectly competent and entirely disinterested in the military railroads, whom I propose to substitute for W. J. Stephens and L. H. Eckaltz, namely: Albert Fink, Louisville; Walter McQueen, superintendent Schenectady Locomotive Works; I. Farnsworth, Madison, Indiana. Am I authorized to invite them to act on the board of appraisal?

GEORGE H. THOMAS, Major General.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, September 1, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a copy of agreement and bond, to be executed by the different railroad companies in this military district desiring to purchase rolling stock, &c., from the United States, under your letter of instructions of August 8. The bond is intended to make the directors jointly and individually liable with the company.

After due consideration, I believe this to be the only kind of bond which will secure the payment of the amount due at the specified time, for the reason that all the companies are mortgaged now, and it would be impossible for them to execute any bond as a company in favor of the United States that would have precedence over those already given. The president and directors are strongly opposed to giving their personal bonds, but propose that the title to the property remain with the United States until payment is made, and to execute a deed of trust to that effect. A large amount of the property turned over to them will be soon expended, and even the rolling stock is liable to accidents common to railroads, and might at any time be entirely destroyed by fire or collision. I respectfully request that I may receive instructions as to what form of bond will be considered satisfactory to the government.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Major General United States Army, Commanding.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major General

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a form of bond and a draft of an order to Major General Thomas, commanding the military division of the Tennessee, in which I have endeavored to embody the conclusions reached in conference this morning.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C., October 14, 1865.

GENERAL: The provisions and benefits of the Executive order of 8th of August are hereby extended to all railroads within the limits of your command desiring to purchase railroad rolling stock and material from the United States for the purpose of repairing the losses of the war.

You are also authorized to direct the sale to any such railroads of rolling stock now within the limits of your command, and not needed by the United States for actual use, upon the following conditions, if they are preferred to the terms of the order of 8th August, and the individual security required by you under that order.

You will take care that this property is distributed among the several roads in proportion to their actual needs, and that none is sold to any railroad in excess of the reasonable requirements of its business, or to be used for purposes of speculation, sale, or hire to other roads.

You will require from all such railroad companies satisfactory bonds, in the form herein enclosed, binding them to the payment to the United States of the full appraised value of the property sold to them, in equal monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, within two years, credit being allowed to them on the first of each month for any service of military transportation rendered by them during the preceding month, at the established rates now allowed to northern railroads for such service.

Full reports of all sales under this order will be made to the War Department from time to time, as required by existing orders.

The serviceable railroad iron in possession of the quartermaster's department at Chattanooga and Nashville is excepted. It will be sold only for cash, at the prices fixed by the War Department.

By order of the President:

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Major General GEO. H. THOMAS,
Commanding Military Division of the Tennessee, Nashville, Tenn.

Bond.

Know all men by these presents that the ——— railroad company, duly incorporated by the act of the ———, of the State of ———, by ———, its president, acting for and in behalf of said railroad company, do hereby acknowledge itself and its successors held and firmly bound unto the United States of America in the full and just sum of ——— dollars, lawful money of the United States, for which payment, well and truly to be made to the disbursing quartermaster of the United States military railroads, at his office in Nashville, or to such other disbursing quartermaster as may be designated by the War Department, within two years from the date of these presents, the said railroad company, by its president, hereby binds itself and its successors firmly by these presents.

Sealed with its corporate seal, attested by the signature of its president, and affixed by the express authority of its directors, this ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty ——— (186 .)

The nature of the above obligation is such that

Whereas, the above bounden railroad company has purchased and received, or shall receive, from the War Department of the United States, rolling stock, iron rails, cross ties, chairs, spikes, timber, and other materials for repairing and operating its railroad, in quantities, at prices, and to an amount and value which shall be evidenced by the receipts given for the same by the said railroad company to the proper officer of the said War Department, upon a credit of two years from the date of these presents, payable in equal monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, within the said two years, either in cash to the disbursing quartermaster of the United States military railroads, at his office in Nashville, or to such other disbursing quartermaster as may be designated for this purpose by the War Department, or in transportation of the troops or military supplies of the United States, under the orders of the proper military authorities, at the rates of fare and tolls allowed for such service to northern railroads; and

Whereas, the said railroad company desires, and by these presents intends, to secure to the United States the complete and punctual payment, as aforesaid, of the amounts which may be due for the said materials received, or to be received, by it from the United States:

Now, therefore, if the said railroad company shall well and truly pay as aforesaid, either in cash, in equal monthly instalments, or in transportation as aforesaid, to the United States, within two years from the date of these presents, all that shall be due as aforesaid to the United States on account and in payment for all the materials received as aforesaid from the United States, then this obligation shall be void and of no effect.

But if the said railroad company shall fail to pay to the United States all or any portion of what may be due to the United States on account of the said materials received from the United States, within two years from the date of these presents, either in cash as aforesaid, or in transportation as aforesaid, or shall fail to pay any of the monthly instalments aforesaid, punctually when due, then this obligation shall remain in full force and effect to the extent that may be necessary to fully repay to the United States for the full amount which may be due on account of the said materials so received as aforesaid; and all loss or damage which may have been incurred by the United States by reason of the said railroad company's failure to pay for the same, what shall be due therefor, when the same shall be due; and

As a further security for such payment and indemnity to the United States, the United States shall have a lien upon the property sold to said company, and in default of such complete and punctual payment of all moneys which may be due on account of the aforesaid purchase of materials be fully authorized to take possession of and sell said property, and also to place in charge and control of the said company's railroad an agent of the said United States, who shall be fully empowered, and by these presents is fully empowered, in case of such default as aforesaid, to collect all the revenues of the said company and apply the same to the payment to the United States of all the moneys which shall be due at the times of such application of such revenues to the United States for any such materials which shall have been delivered by the United States to the said railroad company, or by reason of any loss or injury to the United States resulting from such default in payment of the same. And the said company shall have no authority to sell or convey out of its possession, without the consent of the United States first in writing obtained, of any of the property referred to in this agreement, but shall hold and retain the same to the exclusive use of said company in carrying on the business of transportation of persons and property over its line of road until the whole is fully paid as aforesaid.

In witness whereof the corporate seal of said railroad company is affixed hereto, by authority of its directors, and attested by its president.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, November 1, 1865.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

Paragraph 21, special order 571, War Department, October 27, relieves Brevet Major William E. Merrill, captain United States engineers, from duty in military division of Tennessee. He is on duty as a member of the board of appraisers for United States railroad property, which will close its business about the 15th instant. I respectfully request that he be permitted to remain till the board completes its work, as he cannot now be spared without detriment to the interest of the government.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major General.

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 10, 1865.

Major General GEO. H. THOMAS, Nashville, Tennessee:

Your appointment of the railroad board, and the changes or substitution of names proposed by you, is approved. The department confides in your sound discretion in the execution of the order relating to railroads, &c.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a report of Brevet Colonel F. J. Crilly, assistant quartermaster, by whom the Nashville and Northwestern railroad was turned over to the company by direction of Major General George H. Thomas, in pursuance of executive order of August 8, 1865, inviting attention to the relations of this road to the government

This road, when turned over, was seventy-eight (78) miles long. When taken possession of by the United States, but twenty-five (25) miles of it were completed. The remaining fifty-three (53) miles were constructed almost wholly by the United States government after it took possession.

This road therefore stands upon a different footing from other railroads which have been returned to the respective companies, having been originally constructed for fifty-three miles of its length of seventy-eight miles, by the government, at its cost.

The cost of this original construction, as distinct from what was expended in reconstruction and maintenance, is estimated to have been $1,469,733 20. Of this sum the United States has received, and has as yet demanded, no reimbursement.

In turning over this road to the company the government has therefore, to this extent, transferred to the company property of the government. In the desire to relieve the government from the expense and difficulty of operating railroads after the cessation of hostilities, it was recommended by the commanding general of the military division of the Tennessee, in June, 1865, that this road should be turned over to the company as were other railroads, for the same reasons, but it has been, I think, through an inadvertence that this transfer has been hitherto placed upon the same footing as that of other railroads.

In addition to the above indebtedness of $1,469,733 20 for original construction, this road owes the government for railroad material purchased the sum of $552,422 09. The latter indebtedness is an ascertained and acknowledged debt, and the government holds the bond of the company as security for it.

The indebtedness of $1,469,733 20 is not a debt acknowledged by the company, nor has any claim for it as yet been made, but the amount is believed to be within that properly chargeable to the company.

It is not, I think, within the province of the Quartermaster General to determine whether or not this amount is chargeable to the company, or within his authority to enforce collection of it.

I therefore respectfully submit the above statement, together with the enclosed papers, fully setting forth the facts, with the recommendation that such action be taken through the legal advisers of the government, or otherwise, as the Secretary of War may see proper, as will determine and enforce the rights of the government in the premises.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. H. RUCKER,
Acting Quartermaster General, Brevet Major General U. S. A.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROAD OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1867.

GENERAL: In connection with my report of the 15th instant, relative to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, it has been noticed that there is a large sum—nearly a million and a half of dollars—chargeable to the company owning the same, on account of construction of the road.

I enclose a copy of the report alluded to for such action in the case as may be thought proper.

This road was transferred by me under the orders of Major General Thomas, in accordance with the provisions of executive orders of August 8, 1865. It not being within my duties to make out the charges for construction and repairs, I did not notice the large amount chargeable to this company for the construction of the new part of the road.

In the same connection, I would respectfully call your attention to the fact that this company purchased from the United States property to the amount of $525,400 26, on which they have paid, up to January 31, only $26,704 74. There was due on this account, including interest, on January 31, the sum of $552,422 09. This, in connection with the large amount above reported as due for construction, will make $2,022,155 29 due the United States, which the company appear to be making no effort to pay.

The facts are respectfully submitted for such action as may be thought proper.

A detailed statement of the cost of construction of the road from the records of this office is transmitted herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Colonel and Assistant Quartermaster U. S. A.

General D. H. RUCKER,
Acting Quartermaster General, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROAD OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1867.

GENERAL: In reply to your endorsement of the 12th instant, calling for a report of the cost to the government of the construction of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, and names of the officers charged with the same, I have the honor to report as follows:

The Nashville and Northwestern railroad runs from Nashville, Tennessee, to Johnsonville on the Tennessee river.

"At the beginning of the war this road had been completed to Kingston Springs, twenty-five miles from Nashville, and some work had been done on it thence to the Tennessee river. It remained in this condition until, by order of the Secretary of War, dated Louisville, Kentucky, October 22, 1863, it was placed under the control of the military governor of the State of Tennessee, under whose direction the work of construction commenced, and was continued until February 17, 1864, when the supervision of the work of construction was placed in charge of General D. C. McCallum by direction of General Grant. The road was connected through between Nashville and the Tennessee river on the 10th of May, 1864."

The total cost of the construction chargeable to this road, as reported by Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer of military railroads, under whose immediate direction the work was performed, was $1,471,397 96. Colonel Wright also reports that the foregoing does not include the work performed by soldiers, which is as follows, viz:

"The twelfth regiment United States colored infantry, commanded by Colonel Thompson, commenced work on the 15th day of November, 1863, and was relieved April 23, 1864. Average number of men employed during this time, two hundred, (200.)

"The thirteenth regiment United States colored infantry, commanded by Colonel Jno. A. Hollenstein, commenced work on the 19th of November, 1863, and was relieved May 10, 1864. Average number of men employed, five hundred, (500.)

"The first Missouri engineers, commanded by Colonel Henry Feasel, commenced work on the 24th of February, 1864, and was relieved August 1, 1864. Average number of men employed, one thousand, (1,000.)

"The first Michigan engineers, commanded by Colonel William P. Innes, was employed on the road for some time, but I was unable to obtain a statement of the number of effective men or the length of time they worked.

"All this work done by soldiers, together with all done by civilian laborers, up to September 1, 1864, is properly chargeable to construction of new road."

The average number of soldiers employed and length of time engaged on this road is thus stated, except for the first Michigan engineers.

The records of the Adjutant General's office show that 23 officers and 540 men of this regiment were employed on the road from March 1, 1864, until September 30, 1864.

In order to estimate the cost of this labor performed by the soldiers, the average cost to the United States of the officers and soldiers thus employed is calculated to be $1,15 per day each, which would be as follows:

Twelfth United States colored troops, 200 men, 161 days, at $1 15 per day each	$37,030 00
Thirteenth United States colored troops, 500 men, 174 days, at $1 15 per day each	100,050 00
First Missouri engineers, 1,000 men, 159 days, at $1 15 per day each	182,850 00
First Michigan engineers, 563 men, 184 days, (not including September,) at $1 15 per day each	119,030 80
	438,960 80

Giving $438,960 80 as the cost of the labor performed by soldiers, which, added to the amount already mentioned, makes $1,910,458 76 as the total cost of construction. As stated by Colonel Wright, (and noted above,) all work performed up to September 1, 1864, is properly chargeable to construction of new road. It will, therefore, be necessary to deduct from $1,910,458 76, which is the total cost of construction, $440,725 56, the amount reported as expended subsequent to September 1, 1864; this will leave $1,469,733 20 properly chargeable to the construction of the new road.

The names of the officers employed are Colonel William P. Innes, first Michigan engineers, and Major J. B. Yates, of the same regiment; Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer military railroads; W. R. Kingsley, assistant engineer; and Lieutenant Colonel John Clark, third Pennsylvania reserves; also the commanding officers of the regiments above mentioned.

The letter of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, with the instructions endorsed thereon, is respectfully returned herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Colonel and Assistant Quartermaster U. S. A.

Major General D. H. RUCKER,
Acting Quartermaster General U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

A true copy:
F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Colonel and Assistant Quartermaster U. S. A.

UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROAD OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1867.

I certify that the foregoing statement of the cost of construction of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad is a true extract from the report of Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer military railroads, military division of the Tennessee.

F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Colonel and Assistant Quartermaster U. S. A.

NASHVILLE AND NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD.

Graduation.—The amount of grading was very considerable, but I am unable to give the number of cubic yards moved, because, when we took charge of this road, I had no time to measure it, and I had no assistants to do it for me. By the time I procured the requisite assistance much of the work had been done.

Thorough cuts of as much as 40 and 50 feet in depth and 800 feet in length were taken out, and high embankments made. Even where the grading had been done previously, much labor was required to dress up the embankments and clean out the cuts.

Superstructure.—The total length of track laid was on—

Main line	46½ miles.
Sidings	4¼ "
Total	50¾ "

Seven different patterns of rails were used in the track; the amount of each kind is given below.

With the exception of No. 1 and the U rail the iron was purchased by the government. No. 1 pattern is the fish-joint bar belonging to this road, and the U rail was taken from the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad:

Pattern.	Weight per yard. Pounds.	Tons.
No. 1	56½	1,315.61
No. 2	49¼	149.70
No. 3	45	382.11
No. 4	45	40.04
No. 5	60	1,096.84
No. 6	56½	1,469.48
U	48	23.59
Total		4,477.25
Deduct No. 1 pattern		1,315.61
Balance furnished by Government		3,161.67

One hundred and seven thousand cross-ties were used in laying the track. A considerable number was found on the line of this road, but we had to make the greater part.

Bridging.—The following table shows the location, dimensions, and amount of bridges and trestles on this road. Many of these structures had to be rebuilt several times in consequence of being carried away by high water or destroyed by the enemy:

All this work done by soldiers, together with all done by civilian laborers up to September 1, 1864, is properly chargeable to construction of new road.

The following tabular statements of cost of labor performed, and materials purchased previous to the time the road was placed entirely under the control of the military railroad department, have been furnished by Major S. W. Wills, assistant quartermaster, from the papers of Captain F. H. Ruger, assistant quartermaster, who was quartermaster for the road, but is since deceased.

NASHVILLE, TENN., April 2, 1864—11 a. m.

Lieutenant General U. S. GRANT, General-in-Chief:

I am just back, having passed over my whole front and spending a day with all my army commanders, possessing myself of the information necessary to act with intelligence. The problem of supplies is the most difficult. The road can now supply the wants of the army, but does not accumulate a surplus; but I think by stopping the carriage of cattle and men, and by moving the cars on the circuit from Nashville to Tuscumbia and Decatur, it can be done with the present cars and locomotives. The superintendent of railroads here, Mr. Anderson, the quartermaster, Colonel Donaldson, and myself will determine to-night. I find too many citizens and private freights along the road which are utterly inconsistent with our military necessities at this time. I will aim to accumulate in all April, at Decatur and Chattanooga, a surplus of seventy days' provisions and forage for one hundred thousand men.

Major General SHERMAN, Nashville, Tenn.:

In the absence of Lieutenant General Grant, now at Fortress Monroe, your telegram of 11 a. m. of this date has been submitted to me.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress you are authorized by the President to take military possession of railroads within your command to the exclusion of all other business when it is your opinion the service requires such exclusive use. Colonel McCallum has made provision for a large increase of motive power and rolling stock. General Grant's return is expected to-morrow.

Honorable E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

The time has now come that we must have the exclusive use of the Northwestern road from Nashville to Reynoldsburg. It has been substantially done for some time, but Governor Johnson retains the management of it for some reason under your former orders. But to be of service to us in the present emergency it must be in the control of Mr. Anderson, superintendent of military roads, that trains may run continuously from the Tennessee river at Reynoldsburg to our camp. This main road has been admirably managed and has supplied the vast army so that not a man, horse, or mule has been for a day without food and abundant supplies of clothing and ammunition. Our progress may be slow to you all at a distance, but if you ever cross this ground you will not accuse us of being idlers.

Take your time and do your work in your own way. This department is only anxious to afford you every assistance within its power.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 6, 1864.

Major General W. T. SHERMAN, near Atlanta, Georgia:

The following is a special order of the President's relating to the Northwestern railroad, from Nashville to Reynoldsburg: Whereas, The exclusive use of the Northwestern railroad from Nashville to Reynoldsburg is necessary for the military operations under command of Major General Sherman, the President does therefore order and direct that Major General Sherman take military possession of the said Northwestern railroad, its stock, equipments, appendages, and appurtenances, for the exclusive use of the United States, and hold, use, manage, and employ the same by his officers, agents, superintendents, and employés, exclusively for the use aforesaid, so long and to such extent as in his judgment such exclusive use is required for military operations, or until further orders; and that all conflicting orders and authority be, and they are hereby, revoked and annulled.

By order of the President:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

NASHVILLE, June 14, 1864.

SIR: The president and directors of the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company of Tennessee respectfully submit the following facts in reference to their road:

The United States is now running that portion of their road from Nashville west to Tennessee river, a distance of seventy-five miles; that the United States graded five miles of the road, and laid the iron on forty miles of the road that was finished at the time the United States took possession of it; and that the other portion of the road was in running order, and the company had, at the time of the occupation of Nashville by the United States troops, railroad iron, with spikes, fastenings, &c., enough or nearly so to complete the road, and had two locomotives with six railroad cars of various kinds, all of which was taken by the military authorities, and which the company has never been credited with. The company earnestly request that you would order an account taken by a board of commissioners, or otherwise, as you in your wisdom may suggest, to take an account as between the United States and the company, and that the company may be allowed all their just credits; and would also respectfully ask that they may be allowed the same rates for freights and passengers that are paid to the roads south of the Ohio river, as the company are desirous that the United States may be paid the money they expended in completing the road.

We would also beg to submit the following statement in reference to what the company expended on the road from Nashville to the Mississippi river, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles:

The amount of the cost of the road for all kinds of expenses was $3,579,930 00; and that the company owe laborers and contractors for work done on the road, and also interest on bonds issued by the State, which bonds are chiefly held by parties in the northern States; and that they are wholly dependent on the earnings of the road to pay their just debts, and would earnestly request that one-half of the earnings may be paid them to enable them to pay their debts, the other half to be credited to them by the United States to pay for the completion of the road; and would respectfully say that the company are willing and prepared to run the road under the conditions and regulations that other similar roads are run in the South, as they feel confident that they would be able to give as much satisfaction to the government in its management as is given or can be given in any other way.

Your obedient servant,

M. BURNS, President,
For the Directors of the Nashville and Northwestern Railroad.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, August 15, 1864.

SIR: Referring to your communication of the 14th of June last, and to your personal application to the department for a settlement of accounts between the United States and the Nashville and Chattanooga and the Nashville and Northwestern railroad companies, and for the delivery of the roads into the hands of the stockholders, to be worked by them, I am instructed by the Secretary of War to transmit to you the enclosed copy of the report on the subject by the Quartermaster General, whose views receive the approval of this department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

MICHAEL BURNS, Esq.,
President, &c., Nashville, Tennessee.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 9, 1864.

SIR: I have received from Michael Burns, esq., president of Nashville and Chattanooga and Nashville and Northwestern railroads, a letter requesting a settlement of accounts between the United States and these two railroad companies, payment for past use of the road by the United States, and the delivery of the road into the hands of the stockholders to be worked by them, protection being given by the United States.

The Nashville and Chattanooga railroad was captured from the rebels by the United States. It has been run since its capture, with many interruptions by the rebel army, or by guerrillas or rebel sympathizers along its route.

The rolling stock originally upon the road was in great part carried off by the rebel army. Much has been destroyed by the use of torpedoes placed on the track, or by tearing up the rails by these enemies of the United States. The rolling stock now on the road has nearly all of it been purchased or impressed from loyal citizens and workshops and railroads at heavy expense to the loyal people of the country.

It is necessary for the safety and sustenance of the army operating in Georgia, and for the defence of Tennessee itself, that this road be run with all the energy, certainty, and means which the military power of the government can insure. The stockholders, certainly many of them, are disloyal.

The road is captured property—a great military engine, which, during the continuance of active operations in the country which it traverses, and that which it supplies, must necessarily remain under the control and in the hands of the United States. When the war is over, and the road saved from entire destruction by the power and at the expense of the United States, it can be turned over to the company under such conditions as Congress may prescribe.

The Nashville and Northwestern railroad was never finished by the company. On the urgent representation of Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, in view of the promised advantages of the use of this road as a second line of supply for Nashville, the quartermaster's department, at great expense, has completed the grading and bridging and ironing of that portion of the road from Nashville to the Tennessee river.

The road was abandoned when the government undertook this work. The demands of the railroad service south of Nashville have been so great that it has not as yet been possible to make much use of this road, but as the navigation of the Cumberland is nearly at an end, attention is now being given to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, which, it is hoped, will be brought into more active use. These roads have cost the United States to repair, protect, maintain, and operate, more than they ever cost the stockholders.

I am of the opinion that the United States should retain possession of both roads, and that the prayers of the stockholders, as presented by Mr. Burns, president of the companies, should be denied. The interests in these roads, not settled by legal proceedings under the confiscation act, should, it appears to me, be settled finally by legislation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster General and Brevet Major General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE, NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA,
AND NASHVILLE AND NORTHWESTERN RAILROADS,
Nashville, Tennessee, April 11, 1866.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to request that the time for the payment of the first instalment due the United States government from the Nashville and Northwestern railroad company, on account of purchases of material under the provisions of executive orders of August 8, and October 14, 1865, be extended to one year from date of the bond given by the company to secure the payment of this debt.

Payment of instalments to commence on that date and continue thereafter monthly, in accordance with the terms of the bond. I will agree, in behalf of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad company, to pay the interest accruing, monthly, on the last day of each month, if possible. Transportation accounts due the company by the United States to be applied on this indebtedness of the company.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 19, 1867.

Captain HAMILL, Assistant Quartermaster, &c., Nashville:

Suspend any action against the Nashville and Northwestern railroad until further order, and report immediately the state of the account against said road, and the reasons for which you propose to take possession of it.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE,
GENERAL DISBURSING OFFICE,
Louisville, Kentucky, January 20, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram, directing a suspension of action against the Nashville and Northwestern railroad. In compliance with the direction contained therein, I respectfully submit the following statement of the account of that road:

The original debt, for which a bond was executed dated November 30, 1865, amounted to five hundred and twenty-nine thousand two hundred and one dollars and forty-five cents, ($529,201 45.) Purchases were made by the Nashville and Northwestern railroad company in February, 1866, amounting to two thousand six hundred and seventy-four dollars and fifty-five cents, ($2,674 55.) On the first day of April, 1866, with accrued interest, the amount due from the Nashville and Northwestern railroad company was one hundred and nine thousand two hundred and thirty-nine dollars, ($109,239.) I notified the president of the company, (Mr. Burns,) at this time, that the payment of arrears of instalments and interest must be provided for. In reply, he stated the inability of the company to make payment, and asked for an extension, as follows, viz: "The payment of instalments to commence in one year from the date of purchase, and continue thereafter monthly, in accordance with the terms of the bond." Mr. Burns agreed, at the same time, on behalf of the company, "to pay the interest accruing monthly, on the last day of each and every month." An extension, upon the terms proposed by Mr. Burns, was granted by the major general commanding.

In the month of April additional purchases, amounting to two thousand four hundred and five dollars, ($2,405,) were made by the company. I caused a bond to be prepared for the purchases made in February and April, 1866, and sent it to the superintendent of the road, with a letter, requesting its immediate execution. After sufficient time had elapsed I called upon Colonel Innes, the superintendent, for the bond, (Mr. Burns being absent,) when I was informed that it had been handed to Mr. Burns, and would be returned to me, duly executed, upon his return. This promise was repeated upon subsequent application for the bond, and as the delay in forwarding it was deemed to be without sufficient cause I pursued the policy adopted with the approval of the major general commanding in a similar case, and notified Mr. Burns that I would take possession of the property if a bond was not immediately executed.

This I conceived to be the only means whereby the studied indifference manifested by Mr. Burns regarding all matters pertaining to the indebtedness of the company to the government could be overcome. I am happy to say it had the desired effect.

Although the superintendent, Colonel Innes, assured me that the bond was already executed and ready for delivery, he having purchased the internal revenue stamps, it now appears that it has been mislaid; but I am informed of their willingness to execute another bond, which will be forwarded to-morrow, the 21st instant.

The Nashville and Northwestern Railroad Company are indebted to the government as follows, viz:

December 31, 1866, arrears of instalments due and unpaid	$302,788 30
Arrears of interest due and unpaid	27,099 99
Total	329,888 29
Total indebtedness	$549,185 16

The total amount received from the company on account of the indebtedness, from November 30, 1865, up to date, is twenty-six thousand four hundred and seven dollars and seventy-four cents, ($26,407 74,) none of which amount was paid in money, but consisted of credits given the company for transportation services performed for the government, the bills for which were presented to me and payment withheld.

It may be proper that I should state that my action in the case before you has received the approval of Major General Thomas, to whom it has been submitted.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. HAMILL,
Brevet Major and Assistant Quartermaster.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith letter of the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives, inquiring the cost to government of the construction of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, and the names of the officers charged with the construction of the same.

The letter was referred for report to Brevet Colonel F. J. Crilly, acting quartermaster United States military railroads. Colonel Crilly's report is herewith enclosed, by which it appears that the cost of construction of this road was as follows:

By labor of civil employés	$1,471,397 96
By estimated labor of soldiers	439,060 80
Total cost of construction and repair during the war	1,910,458 76
Amount expended subsequently to September 1, 1864	440,725 66
Leaving amount chargeable to construction of new road	1,469,732 20

And the names of the officers charged with the construction of the same were Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer United States military railroads; W. R. Kingsley, assistant engineer United States military railroads; Lieutenant Colonel John Clark, third regiment Pennsylvania Reserves; Colonel William P. Innes, first regiment Michigan engineers; Major J. B. Yates, first regiment Michigan engineers; Colonel Thompson, twelfth regiment United States colored troops; Colonel J. A. Hollenstein, thirteenth regiment United States colored troops; Colonel Henry Fladel, first Missouri engineers.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. H. RUCKER,
Brevet Major General U. S. A., Acting Quartermaster General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROAD OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1867.

GENERAL: In reply to your endorsement of the 12th instant, calling for report of the cost to the government of the construction of the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, and names of the officers charged with the same, I have the honor to report as follows:

The Nashville and Northwestern railroad runs from Nashville, Tennessee, to Johnsonville, on the Tennessee river.

"At the beginning of the war this road had been completed to Kingston Springs, twenty-five miles from Nashville, and some work had been done upon it thence to the Tennessee river." It remained in this condition until by order of the Secretary of War, dated Louisville, Kentucky, October 22, 1863, it was placed under the control of the military governor of the State of Tennessee, under whose direction the work of construction commenced, and was continued until February 17, 1864, when the supervision of the work of construction was placed in charge of General D. C. McCallum, by direction of General Grant. "The road was connected through between Nashville and the Tennessee river, on the 10th day of May, 1864."

The total cost of the construction chargeable to this road, as reported by Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer of military railroads, under whose immediate direction the work was performed, was $1,471,397 96. Colonel Wright also reports that the foregoing does not include the work performed by soldiers, which is as follows, viz:

"The twelfth regiment United States infantry, commanded by Colonel Thompson, commenced work on the 15th day of November, 1863, and was relieved April 23, 1864; average number of men employed during this time, two hundred, (200.)

"The thirteenth regiment United States colored infantry, commanded by Colonel John A. Hollenstein, commenced work on the 19th of November, 1863, and was relieved May 10, 1864; average number of men employed, five hundred, (500.)

"The first Missouri engineers, commanded by Colonel Henry Fludel, commenced work on the 24th of February, 1864, and was relieved August 1, 1864; average number of men employed, one thousand, (1,000.)

"The first Michigan engineers, commanded by Colonel William P. Innes, was employed on the road for some time, but I was unable to obtain a statement of the number of efficient men or the length of time they worked.

"All this work done by soldiers, together with all done by civilian laborers, up to September 1, 1864, is properly chargeable to construction of new road."

The average number of soldiers employed and length of time engaged on this road is thus stated, except for the first Michigan engineers.

The records of the Adjutant General's office show that twenty officers and five hundred and forty men of this regiment were employed on the road from March 14, 1864, until September 30, 1864.

In order to estimate the cost of this labor performed by soldiers, the average cost to the United States of the officers and soldiers thus employed is calculated to be $1 15 per day each, which would be as follows:

12th U. S. colored troops, 200 men, 161 days, at $1 15 per day each	$37,030 00
13th U. S. colored troops, 500 men, 174 days, at $1 15 per day each	100,050 00
1st Missouri engineers, 1,000 men, 159 days, at $1 15 per day each	182,850 00
1st Michigan engineers, 563 men, 184 days, (not including September,) at $1 15 per day each	119,030 80
	439,060 80

Giving $439,060 80 as the cost of the labor performed by soldiers, which, added to the amount already mentioned, makes $1,910,458 76 as the total cost of construction. As stated by Colonel Wright, and noted above, all work performed up to September 1, 1864, is properly chargeable to construction of new road. It will, therefore, be necessary to deduct from $1,910,458 76, which is the total cost of construction, $440,725 56, the amount reported as expended subsequent to September 1, 1864; this will leave $1,469,733 20 properly chargeable to the construction of the new road.

The names of the officers employed are Colonel William P. Innes, 1st Michigan engineers, and Major J. B. Yates of the same regiment; Colonel W. W. Wright, chief engineer military railroads; W. R. Kingsley, assistant engineer, and Lieutenant Colonel John Clark, 3d Pennsylvania reserves; also, the commanding officers of the regiments above mentioned.

The letter of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, with the instructions endorsed thereon, is respectfully returned herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Colonel and A. Q. M. U. S. Army.

Major General D. H. RUCKER,

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, March 29, 1866.

CAPTAIN: The Major General commanding is in receipt of two letters, one from the president of the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad, and the other from the president of the East Tennessee and Georgia railroad, each representing that for various reasons it is impossible for them at present to commence, and continue regularly, monthly payments on the government account, but that they will be able to do so after July next.

In view of the statements made, the Major General commanding directs that the time for paying the first monthly instalment due the United States from these roads for property purchased be extended until the 1st day of August next, when it is expected that they will be ready to commence their payments and continue them regularly thereafter according to the terms of their bonds.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM D. WHIPPLE,
Brevet Brigadier General and Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, March 26, 1866.

CAPTAIN: The Major General commanding is in receipt of a communication from Minor Merriweather, secretary and treasurer of the Mississippi and Tennessee railroad, stating the inability of the company to which he belongs, to continue the regular payment of the monthly instalments due to the United States for property purchased by them for the road, and asking an extension of twelve months to the time required by their bond, in which to make their payments.

As the company has manifested a disposition to meet their liabilities to the government, and as the reasons given by Mr. Merriweather for asking an extension of time are considered good and sufficient by the Major General commanding, the latter directs that the amount originally due the United States from this road be divided into thirty-six equal parts, one part to be paid monthly, counting from the time when the first 1-24 monthly instalment under the bond becomes due; that is to be considered as the date of the first of the thirty-six instalments under this arrangement, with interest at 7 3-10.

Credit will be given the road for any surplus that may have been paid in, but no interest thereon will be returned.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. D. WHIPPLE,
Brevet Brigadier General and Chief of Staff.

CAPTAIN: I therefore, in behalf of the above-named company, ask that the time for the payment of the indebtedness of this road be extended. The company will pay the United States on the first day of July, A. D. 1867, one instalment of one-twenty-fourth part of the amount of purchase money, together with accrued interest from date of purchase, and will thereafter pay monthly the instalments and interest as they fall due, if the payments under the bond already executed by the company to secure the payment of the indebtedness aforesaid are made to commence at that time, instead of the date of purchase.

I would respectfully represent that this I believe to be the very best arrangement the company are prepared to make, but if it is found that payments can be made sooner than is proposed in this communication, they will be made.

Very respectfully,

By command of Major General Thomas:

W. D. WHIPPLE,
Brevet Brigadier General, Chief of Staff.

CLARKSVILLE, TENNESSEE, March 10, 1866.

SIR: As receiver of the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad, on the part of the State of Tennessee, I beg leave to state that in July last the railroad referred to was placed in my hands, in accordance with the law in regard to railroad companies failing to pay interest as it became due upon bonds granted by the State to aid in the construction or equipment of railroads.

In consequence of the war, the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad company were not able to meet interest promptly upon bonds granted to said company, and during the first year of the war the bridges upon the road were all destroyed, excepting one permanent and one draw-bridge over the Cumberland river; also the greater portion of the tressle on the line of the road, and the road-bed itself has been greatly injured during the past five years—cuts filling up and embankments being washed away.

The Legislature, during the present session, funded the interest due on the bonds of the State, the larger portion of which had been issued in aid of different railroad companies: and the Legislature also appropriated, to put the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad in running order, State bonds amounting to four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000).

In obedience to instructions from his excellency the Governor, Wm. G. Brownlow, I purchased, as receiver for the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad, from the United States government, rolling stock, such as engines, passenger and freight cars, and other material and supplies, all of which amounted to over three hundred thousand dollars. The road is now being put in order, and it is believed will be operated over the entire line from the State line of Kentucky to Paris, Tennessee, by the first day of June next. All of the means appropriated by the Legislature will be required for the rebuilding of bridges, and repairs necessary to put the road in good condition; consequently, I shall not have any means to meet the monthly instalments due the United States government, the collection of which has up to this time been suspended by Major General Thomas, commanding.

The Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad forms an important link in the line of railroad connecting Louisville with Memphis, New Orleans, and Mobile, and will, when in operation, have a large portion of passage and freight traffic from the north and east to the south and southwest. But, in consequence of the embarrassed condition of the road, financially, I am satisfied the instalments due to the United States government cannot be met for some time to come, as the proceeds of the road will be required for the betterment of the road, so as to make it what it should be, a first class road.

I therefore, sir, in behalf of the State of Tennessee, whose interest in this road is large, and in behalf of the stockholders of the road, most of whom have been greatly embarrassed by the prostration of their business for the past five years, pray you to suspend the collection of the claim of the United States government for two years; at the expiration of that time I feel justified in stating that I believe the monthly instalments will be met promptly.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

GEORGE T. LEWIS.
Receiver Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroad.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

[Endorsement.]

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, March 20, 1866.

Respectfully referred to Major General George H. Thomas, commanding division of the Tennessee, for report. To be returned.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, April 7, 1866.

SIR: As you are aware, the paper I submitted to the Secretary of War was referred to Major General George H. Thomas, and by him referred to you, in which I asked for an extension of two years upon the debt due to the United States government by the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad for rolling stock and railroad material.

Since I parted with you, Captain, I have concluded that in all probability I shall be in condition to pay all of the interest, and one twenty-fourth part of the principal, in two years from date of purchase, and thereafter meet monthly instalments promptly, until the debt is cancelled, and hope, sir, you will make your report to General Thomas, framing my application for an extension in accordance with what I have here stated.

With my regards to you, sir, I beg leave to say I am, Captain, your obedient servant.

GEORGE T. LEWIS,
Receiver Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroad Company.

Captain S. R. HAMILL,
Assistant Quartermaster, Nashville, Tennessee.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENN.,
GENERAL DISBURSING OFFICE U. S. MILITARY RAILROADS,
Nashville, Tennessee, April 7, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to state that Mr. G. T. Lewis, receiver on the part of the State of Tennessee for the Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville railroad, has proposed the following terms for the payment of the purchase money due the United States government for material purchased for the use of that road:

He will execute a bond in the penal sum of six hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and sixty-four dollars and seventy-two cents, ($664,164 72,) being double the amount of purchase, conditional for the payment in two years from the date of purchase, (November 30, 1865,) of one instalment of one twenty-fourth part of the purchase money, together with accrued interest at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, and the monthly payment of the balance in twenty-three equal instalments with interest at the same rate per cent.

He further proposes that if the receipts of the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad will justify it, the payment of instalments shall commence at an earlier date than November 30, 1867.

From all the information I can obtain regarding the condition of the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad, I believe the terms proposed are the best that can be made, and would respectfully recommend that a bond be required in accordance therewith.

I have the honor to be, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. HAMILL, Captain, A. Q. M.
Disbursing Q. M., U. S. Military Railroads, Military Division of the Tennessee.

Respectfully returned to the Adjutant General of the army, inviting attention to enclosed letter of Captain S. R. Hamill, chief quartermaster United States military railroads, military division Tennessee.

I concur in the recommendation that the extended time asked for be granted the Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville railroad for reasons given by Captain Hamill.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 11, 1866.

Recommendation of Quartermaster General is approved.

By order of the Secretary of War:

THOS. T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE ALABAMA AND TENNESSEE RIVER R. R. CO.,
Selma, Ala., May 24, 1866.

SIR: The undersigned, president pro tem. of the above-named company, by order of its board of directors, begs leave to represent to you that the company is at this time unable to pay the monthly instalments due the United States government for locomotives and cars purchased in September, 1865.

Some of the causes leading to this disability may be stated as follows:

Near the close of the late war our road was greatly damaged by the forces of the United States under General Wilson. Our machine shops and machinery, engine-house, and seven locomotives, foundry and tools, depots, station-houses, water stations, most of our bridges, and much of our track, were burned or otherwise destroyed, as also many of our cars, a large assortment of fuel, and material for repairs. The iron works and other manufacturing interests, from which the road derived a large share of its business, were generally destroyed.

The prostrate condition in which the country along the line of our road was left at the close of the war rendered many of our citizens destitute of means; added to which the want of provisions, money, teams, and labor prevented the usual attention to agriculture.

Having succeeded by great effort in repairing our road and machinery in some degree, the company were enabled to resume business partially in July last, and within a few months thereafter the trains were enabled to run regularly over the entire line of 135 miles.

The business, though comparatively small, was more than the road could perform with its very limited supply of machinery, until the arrival, long delayed by unavoidable circumstances, of the locomotives and cars purchased of the United States.

Limited as has been the business, the company might, notwithstanding, have been able to make the monthly payments due the United States, or at least a considerable part of them, but for the large floating indebtedness necessarily contracted in reparing the road and machinery, and rebuilding the bridges, &c. This indebtedness is due in great part to laboring men who are dependent on their labor for subsistence, rendering it indispensable in most cases that they should be paid.

Our board are now engaged in closing a contract with parties of large means for the completion of our road to Dalton, Georgia, by the terms of which the company can, within twelve months from this date, commence the payment of monthly instalments on the amount then due the government, and can liquidate the entire debt within three years from the date of its creation.

The sources from which our company expect to derive the means to liquidate this debt to the government are as follows:

First, from the income from the lease of the road fixed at a given rate, monthly, increasing each year until it reaches seventeen hundred and fifty dollars per mile per annum.

Secondly, from the sale of first mortgage bonds, which will be prepared at an early day and placed on the market under auspices deemed favorable to their early negotiation on good terms.

Thirdly, from the sale of lands, of which the company own 375,000 acres, entirely unincumbered. These lands embrace valuable mines of coal, iron, and copper, and early steps will be taken to place them on sale in a way to secure to the company something near their value.

From all these sources the board feel confident the debt due the United States can and will be satisfied within the time above indicated. It is therefore hoped and desired that the government will so extend the time of payment that our company shall be enabled to meet the instalments monthly after the expiration of one year from this date.

All which is most respectfully submitted and subscribed by the undersigned, president pro tem., the president elect not having qualified.

Thus done by authority of the board of directors under the seal of the company.

[SEAL.] GEO. C. PHILLIPS,
President pro tem.

Attest:

A. M. GOODWIN, Secretary.

General GEO. H. THOMAS,
Commanding District of Tennessee.

NASHVILLE, May 30, 1866.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to report that in obedience to your order of the 11th instant, I repaired to Selma, Alabama, where I remained for several days, awaiting the action of the board of directors of the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad company.

During my stay I held frequent conversations with a portion of the directory—there being no president qualified to act as yet.

I also had access to the books of the treasurer, and examined them fully. The treasurer also gave me the report of the president and directors of the company, embracing the period from June 1, 1864, to March 31, 1866, which report I herewith hand you, together with the report of George C. Phillips, esq., president pro tem., made by direction of the board of directors, in which he sets forth the cause of delay as well as the reasons for requesting an extension of the time of payment to the government. I would remark that the contract mentioned in Mr. Phillips's report had not been executed when I left Selma, but was being written up, the parties having agreed upon the several points to be named in the same. The one in which the government is most interested is the item of rent. The company by such agreement, are to receive $500 per mile per annum for the 135 miles completed and now running, for the first year; $1,000 for the second; $1,250 for the third; $1,500 for the fourth; and $1,750 for the fifth year, per mile; which amounts are to extend over each mile of new road that may be completed in each year, payments to be made monthly. There is a floating debt due citizens along the line, amounting to from $60,000 to $80,000, in sums from $5 to $500 to each party. Humanity demands that this debt be paid first, as these creditors are most dependent. Many of them, I have no doubt, are to-day supported in part by the government.

The contract before mentioned provides that the floating debt be paid first, out of the rent next the debt due the government.

From my investigation of the books of the company, I am pleased to say that the entire income of the road has been most economically, as well as intelligently, devoted to the restoration of the road to usefulness, and think the officers deserve great credit for the condition of the road under the circumstances. I will therefore respectfully suggest to you, and through you to the major general commanding, that the time asked—one (1) year—be granted for the commencement of the payment of instalments, with the understanding that the entire amount due the government shall be paid within the three years as proposed.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I am, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE, U. S. MILITARY RAILROADS,
Nashville, May 31, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to Brigadier General W. D. Whipple, chief of staff, military division of the Tennessee, with the recommendation that the extension requested by the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad company be granted, in accordance with the recommendation of S. B. Brown, esq., special agent.

S. R. HAMILL, Captain,
Chief Q. M. U. S. Mil. Railroads, Military Div. of the Tennessee.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant General of the army, for the orders of the honorable Secretary of War, with recommendation that the extension of time asked for by the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad company be granted.

GEO. H. THOMAS,
Major General Commanding.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War.

W. A. NICHOLS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to return the application of the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad company for an extension of time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased. Major General George H. Thomas was charged with the execution of executive orders of August 8, and October 14, 1865, under which this railroad made the purchases and incurred the debt. A delay of twelve months from the date of the application (May 24, 1866) is asked for the commencement of the payment of the equal monthly instalments due the government. The statement is made that the entire debt can be liquidated within three years from the date of its creation.

General Thomas recommends the extension, believing, from an examination of the papers, that the road is actually unable to meet its engagements with the United States, and that to attempt to enforce prompt payments will be to arrest the operations of the road, and thus to defeat the objects of the Executive in the policy which dictated executive order of August 8, 1865; and, considering that delay has been granted to the roads in the southwest, I recommend that the extension as asked be granted, interest to be charged the company from the origin of the debt.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1866.

MAJOR: The application of the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad company for an extension of time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased, forwarded with recommendation by Major General George H. Thomas, June 6, 1866, to the Secretary of War, was referred to this office for report.

The Secretary of War on July 20, 1866, granted the delay asked by this road.

You will make such arrangements with the company as may be necessary to secure to the United States the payment of the amount due, in accordance with the terms of the extension, viz: That on May 31, 1867, (one year from the date of the application,) one instalment of one-eighteenth part of the amount of purchase, with all accrued interest, shall be paid the United States, and the balance in seventeen equal monthly instalments, with interest at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, promptly as they fall due, to the end that the entire debt shall be discharged on October 31, 1868, three years from the date of its creation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Brevet Major S. R. HAMILL,
Assistant Quartermaster, Nashville, Tenn.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE, ALABAMA AND FLORIDA R. R. CO. OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, July 12, 1866.

SIR: I respectfully ask for indulgence until the 1st day of October next on the payments now due by this company and to become due up to that date, for the purchase of locomotives, cars, and machinery from the United States government. When I made the purchase I expected the amount due by the government for transportation, for which we had vouchers, amounting to upwards of $12,000, but which have only been allowed for $8,999 28, and the mail pay of the company, which will amount up to the 1st day of July to about $5,000, would have been made available to meet the payments, as they are about $2,500 monthly, and I paid up to the 30th day of March. You will see that the amount of vouchers allowed, $8,299 28, and the mail pay of $5,000, making a total of $13,299 28, would very nearly have provided for the instalments for the six months from April 1 to 1st of October. The whole of this sum has been stopped by order of the quartermaster's department at Washington and applied to the payment of a claim for repairs of road when it was in possession of the military authorities, amounting to $27,109 04. I was not here when the road was delivered up to the company, and, from the report of the superintendent, who was here, I was led to believe that but little had been done by the military authorities, and as they had used the road for transportation of troops and supplies, I hoped such an allowance would be made for transportation as would pay for the repairs made. The purchases made from the government at Nashville and the rolling stock of the company saved in Georgia were delayed until very late in the business season, because the Montgomery and West Point railroad, over which it had to be transported, had such a small outfit as to be unable to do it. This delay continued until the rise of water in the Alabama river brought the steamboats directly in competition with the road. This competition, connected with the fact that the quantity of cotton left in this section of country to be transported was very small, rapidly reduced after the 1st of January the receipts of the road, and since April they have not amounted to enough to pay working expenses and necessary repairs, which have been very heavy throughout the year, to keep the road up to a safe working condition. It has been necessary to put into track since the 1st of October last about one hundred thousand new cross-ties, and to rebuild some of the most important bridges. Up to the 1st of January I felt so much encouraged with the receipts of the road that I ventured to resume the payment of interest on the bonded debt of the company by providing for and paying the interest coupons due on that day, the creditors of the company having, without exception so far, funded the large amount of coupons which became due during the war in eight per cent. five year bonds; but between January and April the receipts so rapidly declined that I was compelled to let the April coupons go unpaid, and as you will see by the statement of the auditor, which I herewith submit, and as I have before stated that the receipts from 1st of April to 1st of July will not pay expenses. Since my return to my office, from which I have been absent since the 11th of May, I have been without the services of the superintendent, Mr. Jones, who has been and is still very ill with typhoid fever; hence the delay in making the application. I hope the indulgence asked for will be granted. By the 1st of October the business of the country will revive, and even if our net earnings will not by that time pay up all arrearages, we may be enabled to borrow, which we cannot now do, and I pledge myself to use every possible effort to pay up at the time specified.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES T. POLLARD, President.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C. July 30, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to return the application of the Alabama and Florida Railroad for an extension of time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States, referred by the War Department, July 26, to this office for report.

This road leads from Brewton's Station to Montgomery, Alabama, and is one hundred and five (105) miles long. It is charged with fifty-one thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars ($51,912) for material purchased of the United States under executive order of October 14, 1865; for the prompt payment of which, in equal monthly instalments within two years, with interest at the rate of 7 3/10 per cent. per annum, the railroad company, by Charles T Pollard, president, has given bond, November 30, 1865, to the amount of one hundred thousand, five hundred and ninety-six dollars and thirty-four cents, ($100,596 34.) A further charge of twenty-seven thousand one hundred and nine dollars and four cents ($27,109 04) is made by the quartermaster's department against this railroad for expenses incurred and labor performed in reconstructing the railroad during the months of May, June, and July, 1865, making the debt of this company, exclusive of interest, amount to seventy-nine thousand and twenty-nine dollars and four cents, ($79,029 04.)

The following is a statement of its indebtedness July 31, 1866:

Value of purchases made and expenses in reconstructing road	$79,021 04
Interest to July 31, 1866	2,757 04
Total	81,778 08
Payments	21,259 29
Amount due	60,518 79

Accompanying the application is a statement prepared by the auditor of the railroad of its receipts and expenditures during the months of April, May, and June, 1866, upon examination of which it will be found that the expenses of operating the road during that period have exceeded its receipts.

The statement is made that it has been necessary to put into track since October, one hundred thousand (100,000) new cross-ties, and to rebuild some of the most important bridges.

The president asks indulgence until the 1st of October next on the payments now due by this company and to become due up to that date, and pledges himself to use every possible effort to pay up at the time specified.

Brevet Major S. R. Hamill, chief quartermaster of United States military railroads, military division of the Tennessee, recommends that the extension applied for by this railroad be granted, and Major General George H. Thomas, to whom the executive orders committed the transfer of the United States rolling stock in his military division, concurs in the recommendation of Major Hamill.

In consideration of the disposition evinced on the part of this railroad, of willingness and its apparent inability to meet its engagements with the United States, the very reasonable request it makes under the circumstances, and that delay has been granted other roads in the southwest, I recommend that the extension asked be granted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS.
Brevet Maj. Gen. U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August, 3, 1866.

Approved by order of the Secretary of War:

THOS. T. ECKERT,
Assistant Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1866.

MAJOR: By order of the Secretary of War, August 3, 1866, the application of the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company for an extension of the time of payment of its indebtedness for railway material purchased of the United States, is granted.

You will therefore make such arrangements with the company as may be necessary to secure to the United States the money due, in accordance with the terms asked for and granted, viz: that an indulgence be allowed till October next on the payment now due by this company, and to become due by that date.

By order of the Quartermaster General:

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Colonel Q. M. Dep't, in charge of Fourth Division.

NASHVILLE AND DECATUR RAILROAD LINE,
GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
Nashville, October 26, 1866.

SIR: In consequence of the depressed monetary condition of the affairs of the companies composing the Nashville and Decatur railroad line, arising from the necessity of rebuilding bridges, trestle-work, depots, machine shops, round-houses; the necessity of rebuilding a McCallum bridge over Carter's Creek, at a cost of between seven and eight thousand dollars, and the necessity, during this year and the next, of rebuilding every McCallum bridge on the road, seven in number. Our structure over Duck River, 620 feet in length, built by military authorities, is six feet below high water mark, and I fear that that bridge will be lost to us, and we will have to replace it at an early day.

Purchase of passenger cars, general repairs of track, light business of the road, and the prospect of a continuance of the same, owing to the almost entire failure of the crops along the line, opening of competing lines of railroad, thereby materially reducing the earnings of the line, as the accompanying table will show: for the above reasons the companies are at present wholly unable to meet the demands of the general government, and would therefore respectfully urge that the government will allow the companies of this line, and the line, to suspend the payment of their indebtedness to the general government until January 1, 1869, at which time the companies will be able to resume the payment of their instalments to the general government, and hope to be able to resume the payment of their interest on the 1st of January, 1868. The companies earnestly request that this favor be granted them, as their only means of relief.

The accompanying table will show a great decrease in the earnings of the road from January 1, to October 1, 1866, while the necessities of repair and renewal remain imperative, as the roads when received from the United States government were greatly out of repair, and destitute of machine shops, engine houses, depots, &c. It is absolutely necessary to expend every dollar of the earnings for the operating and rebuilding of the road. This line of railroad was originally intended to extend to Montgomery, Alabama, and from thence to Pensacola, Florida. The road was completed from Nashville, Tennessee, to Decatur, Alabama, and a large portion of the grading done between Decatur and Montgomery, before the war. After the commencement of the war the work was abandoned for want of means to carry it on. I desire to inform you that it is proposed to extend the road from Decatur to the city of Montgomery, Alabama, within the next few years, thereby forming a continuous line of road of the same gauge from Pensacola, Florida, to Louisville, Kentucky. For this purpose, the preliminary arrangements have already been made by the companies owning the same, with other railroad companies interested in the proposed extension, to lend them such aid as will insure success. The increase of business afforded by this extension of the line will amply secure to the general government the payment of the companies' indebtedness. I would also state that we have heretofore promptly paid the instalments with the accumulated interest, amounting to some one hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. SLOSS,
President Nashville and Decatur Railroad Line.

Brevet Major S. R. HAMILL,
Chief Quartermaster United States Military Railroads.

QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROADS,
Nashville, Tennessee, October 27, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to Brigadier General William D. Whipple, chief of staff, department of the Tennessee, with recommendation that the extension applied for be granted for the following reasons:

I. The Nashville and Decatur railroad line, and the different companies composing that line, have hitherto paid promptly all instalments and interest falling due upon their indebtedness for material purchased under executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, and have in every manner shown a desire to act in good faith toward the government.

II. The payment of the indebtedness is rendered more secure than by urging immediate compliance with the terms of purchase.

1st. Because to my personal knowledge the Nashville and Decatur railroad line is at present in a condition requiring extensive repairs, absolutely essential to its successful or even safe operation.

2d. Without the extension of time proposed the Nashville and Decatur railroad line must, in my opinion, remain in its present depleted condition financially. By reference to any railroad map it will be seen at a glance that it can now only rely upon local trade, as through freights to Memphis or other portions of the Southwest, as well as travel, will naturally seek the shorter lines of the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville, and Edgefield and Kentucky railroads. The extension of line proposed to Montgomery via Montevallo will at once form the shortest all-rail line from the commercial cities of the Northwest to the extreme Southwest, and will pass through some of the richest lands in the Southwest, both as regards agricultural and mineral wealth, thus insuring a local trade which in itself would secure the ability for the payment of the indebtedness upon the terms proposed in the within application. If this extension be not granted it is my firm belief that the balance of the indebtedness cannot be collected without enforcing the penalties of the bond executed by the companies making this bond, and retaking possession of the property sold to them.

III. Believing further that it was the intention of the government in disposing of material to southern railroads on the terms of the executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1866, to benefit these roads by enabling them to resume successful operation, I believe the extension would be strictly within the spirit of the orders above referred to, whilst it would inure to the advantage of the government, as it is manifestly not to the interest of the United States to expose the property at public sale.

I therefore respectfully recommend that the application be granted.

S. R. HAMILL,
Brevet Maj., A. Q. M., in charge U. S. Mil. Railroads, Dept. of Tenn.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE,

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 21, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War.

The executive orders of August 8 and October 14 commit to Major General Geo. H. Thomas the duty of disposing of the government railroad property in the Southwest and of regulating the terms and conditions of its sale to railroad companies.

General Thomas has approved this application, and being satisfied that he would not have done so unless convinced that it was judicious, I recommend that the extension as approved by General Thomas be granted.

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. Army, Quartermaster General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 1, 1866.

MAJOR: The Secretary of War, under date of November 21, 1866, has approved the application of the four railroads forming the Nashville and Decatur railroad line, viz: Tennessee and Alabama railroad, Central Southern railroad, Tennessee and Alabama Central railroad, and Nashville and Decatur railroad, for an extension of time of payment of their indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased.

The terms of the extension are that on January 1, 1869, an instalment of $\frac{1}{4}$ part of the amount of purchase, with all accrued interest, shall be paid the United States, and the balance in twenty-three equal monthly instalments, with interest at 7$\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., promptly as they fall due thereafter; and that during the extension they make such payments as they may be able.

You will notify the company accordingly, and require from them a strict compliance on their part with the above terms.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

Colonel Q. M. Department, in charge of Fourth Division.

OFFICE SELMA AND MERIDIAN RAILROAD,
Demopolis, Alabama, October 29, 1866.

SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant, post-marked 19th, was received by our last mail on the 27th instant, containing statement of indebtedness to 30th instant.

Our company would respectfully ask you to suspend the penalty of the bond for the following reasons: 1st, that this company paid a large amount on its original purchase before the monthly instalments became due; 2d, that this company has paid the monthly instalments of interest, and promises to do so for the future; 3d, that the United States is indebted to this company in an unadjusted account of over ten thousand dollars, for the transportation of paroled prisoners, troops, and munitions, and is further indebted for the carriage of the mails for the past fourteen months, which are to be applied to our credit on indebtedness in your office when settled.

To make our road valuable we were compelled to build a large and costly bridge over the Tombigbee river, and five miles of expensive trestle and road bed, thus connecting our road through from Selma to Meridian. This connection is now completed, but has absorbed every available dollar of our assets, and we have opened up to us a valuable and profitable business. We have been disappointed in our financial arrangements by the failure of the crops of the country, and are just now unable, from this cause, to raise the amount to pay our deficit on the purchase of railroad material.

We can safely promise to pay the instalment falling due thereafter, and can pay in a few months—say by the 1st of April next—the balance of instalments past due, amounting to about thirteen thousand seven hundred dollars, ($13,700.)

Respectfully soliciting an early reply to our application for this extension of credit from you.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. Y. SHARPE, Sec'y and Treasurer.

MAJOR: The Secretary of War, under date of December 5, 1866, has approved the application of the Selma and Meridian railroad for a suspension of the penalty of its bond and for an extension of time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased.

The terms of the extension are, that the company pay on November 30, 1866, one monthly instalment, and that thereafter one instalment regularly and promptly be paid each respective month until April 1, 1867, when payment in full of the amount due at that date, as per terms of sale, will be made to the United States, and that during the extension they shall pay promptly the accruing interest monthly as it falls due.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith vouchers in duplicate for $70,249 81 in your favor, being amount of treasury award No. 9,457. You will please sign the receipts and return to me as soon as possible. Said voucher was left at this office by an agent of your company, saying that you wished the award to be applied in a different way, &c.

In reply to your message by your agent I would state that, inasmuch as it has been already reported to the Quartermaster General, the disposition cannot now be changed.

Your company having met their payments with so much promptness, and having evinced a disposition to comply strictly with their obligations, if, in future, you find yourselves positively unable to meet your payments regularly, I have no doubt that an extension of time will be granted by the Major General commanding, upon proper application.

I also return statements for May, 1866, also left by your agent.

CAPTAIN: I forwarded you by express yesterday the vouchers for the award of $70,249 81, duly signed. I regret very much that the award was not equally applied to both purchases, as it would have relieved the company greatly and given them longer relief. As it now is, we have gained but little time, and will be compelled to resume payments sooner than we anticipated. We are expecting further awards from the government on account of transportation and postal services, which I hope will be made in time to meet our instalments, else we may be temporarily compelled to ask for that indulgence that you mention in your complimentary concluding paragraph.

Very respectfully,

A. L. WILLOUGHBY,

You will see that your company is now in arrears in payment of both interest and instalments.

You are respectfully informed that unless the payment of all arrears is provided for by the 31st instant, I shall proceed to enforce the terms of the bond given by your company. My orders are imperative, and a prompt response on your part is expected.

S. R. HAMILL, Captain,
Brevet Major Volunteers, Assistant Quartermaster.

DEAR SIR: The failure of the cotton crop, and the great decrease of freight and travel on the Mobile and Ohio railroad, and the consequent decrease of our income, renders it necessary for us to ask an extension of time on our indebtedness to the government for rolling stock and railroad supplies. We made large purchases, paying cash for our first purchases, (amounting, according to my recollection, to about seventy thousand dollars.) We then made purchases at Richmond and Nashville, on time, payable in twenty-four instalments. We have, until lately, paid these instalments as they fell due, with exact punctuality, and had the honor to be complimented for it by a letter from Major Hamill. This letter was addressed to our secretary, dated July 5, 1866, a copy of which is herewith filed; a copy of our secretary's reply is also herewith filed; a copy of Major Hamill's recent letter, urging immediate payment of the amount due, is also filed. I called this morning to see Major Hamill to ask for a statement in our favor, but learned he had gone to Louisville.

It will be seen by Major Hamill's letter, and the account appended, that the whole amount of our indebtedness to the government is $289,623 91. Of this, at the date of his letter, there was only $45,820 85 past due. One more payment matures to-day. We have just claims against the government for postal service and transportation, for nearly or quite the amount of our matured indebtedness, but which cannot be offset until the same is audited, and then only when an order is made to that effect

We have been, and now are, devoting every dollar of our surplus earnings to the payment of this debt, and the payment of the interest on our debt to the State of Tennessee, asking and obtaining the consent of our private creditors to give way to the superior nature of these obligations. But lately our income has so run down that we have had, for several months, no surplus above running expenses. We hope this will, after a while, change, and our income again become good, as in former days. At present it is impossible to meet our engagements punctually. Under the existing condition of things, it is out of our power to go out and raise money in the ordinary modes in which money was raised in former days. We have nothing to rely on but our income.

The largest interest in the Mobile and Ohio railroad is held in Europe. I expect to sail from New York on the 28th of this month to consult with our creditors and bond-holders in London, and appeal to them for relief and assistance. I have every reason to hope for success. If this claim of the government is pressed on us, and the fact becomes publicly known, it will throw great difficulties in the way, and perhaps defeat my negotiations. In view of the whole case, I respectfully request that further payments on our debt be suspended for six months. The debt is a perfectly safe one, and time will not make it less so. But for the failure of the cotton crop, and the consequent failure of our income, you would not have been troubled with this application.

Most respectfully yours,

MILTON BROWN,
President Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

Major General THOMAS:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1866.

MAJOR: The Secretary of War, under date of December 6, 1866, has approved the application of the Mobile and Ohio railroad for an extension of the time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased.

The terms of the extension are, that the company be permitted to suspend payment of instalments for six months, with the contingency that, during the extension, they shall pay promptly the accruing interest monthly as it falls due.

You will notify the company accordingly, and require from them a strict compliance, on their part, with the above terms.

WASHINGTON, April 20, 1866.

SIR: M. Burns, president of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, at Nashville, Tennessee, requested me to say to your excellency that he is sorely pressed by the officers of the government to pay in part for the material he purchased for the use of this road from the quartermaster's department. He says that he was induced to believe that the government would not urge the payment of those claims until time could be had to make a settlement for the use of the road, upon a basis proposed by him (Burns) to Quartermaster General Meigs, in the presence of Mr. Lincoln.

Acting upon this belief, he advertised that he was ready to pay the interest on the bonds of the company in New York on a certain day, and made all his preparations for it, but in the meantime the above demand was made, accompanied by threats that they would again seize the road.

Now, what he most urgently desires of you is, that the payment of these claims be ordered to be suspended until the settlement can be had, or to give him time to make the road earn the money. The road is doing well, and all that the company want is time. The amount now on deposit to meet interest on bonds would pay the amount now due the government.

You see how ruinous it would be to him, to the credit of the company and the credit of the State, if he is forced to comply with this demand.

Very respectfully,
JNO. MCCLELLAN,
For M. BURNS.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.

Respectfully referred to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, with directions that collection be suspended until further orders.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1866.

SIR: In compliance with the order of the President of the United States, dated April 25, 1866, endorsed upon an application of Jno. McClellan, for M. Burns, president of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, directing that collection be suspended of the indebtedness of said road to government until further orders, I have the honor to report: This order having been referred by the Secretary of War to the Quartermaster General for his action, that I have caused the order to be carried out.

I enclose a copy of instructions to Captain Hamill, assistant quartermaster, to suspend collection of this company's indebtedness. The indebtedness of this company is the largest incurred by any railroad, amounting to $1,564,836 99, on which the instalment and interest now due amount to $325,398 99.

CAPTAIN: An order of the President of the United States, dated April 25, 1866, and referred to this office by the Secretary of War, April 30, 1866, directs that collection be suspended until further orders, of the indebtedness of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad to the United States. You will be governed accordingly.

ALEXANDER BLISS, Col. Q. M. Dep't.

NASHVILLE, June 8, 1866.

DEAR SIR: As receiver of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad, I beg leave to state that it is out of my power to meet the instalments due the United States government as they fall due, from the fact that the connecting line which gives business to the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad is not yet repaired and open for traffic. I allude to the Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville railroad, which, in connection with the Memphis and Ohio railroad, makes the shortest and most direct route from this city to Memphis, and by other lines to New Orleans and Mobile.

The business of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad, when the line is open, which will be during the next month, promises to be remunerative, and I feel satisfied will, after it is put in good condition, pay its interest due to the State, and gradually liquidate the debt due to the United States, but in order that this line may be relieved of financial embarrassment, I appeal to you, sir, for an extension of time upon the claims against the road I now represent, now in your hands. If the government will in its magnanimity extend the time two years from date of purchase, making the first instalment to fall due in December, 1867, I feel quite certain that the amount due the government will be paid in the twenty-four monthly instalments, as they may fall due. Do please, Captain, aid me in this matter, by recommending to the War Department to grant the extension asked for.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. CHEATHAM,
Receiver for Edgefield and Kentucky Railroad.

Captain S. R. HAMILL,
Chief Quartermaster U. S. Military Railroads, Mil. Div. of the Tenn.

NASHVILLE, June 14, 1866.

DEAR SIR: In addition to the communication of the 8th instant, I herewith submit a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad for the past seven months, accompanied by the affidavit of the superintendent and treasurer of the road.

The appropriations made by the Legislature will be entirely absorbed in building bridges, trestles, and machine shops, and supplying the road with additional rolling stock. Should the receipts hereafter increase sufficient to commence payment of instalments due the United States government earlier than asked for, I shall immediately advise the proper officer of the fact.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. CHEATHAM,
Receiver for E. and K. R. R.

Captain S. R. HAMILL,
Chief Q. M. U. S. Mil. R. R'ds, Mil. Div. of the Tenn.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT, MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE, GENERAL DISBURSING OFFICE,
Nashville, Tennessee, June 14, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to enclose herewith the application of R. B. Cheatham, esq., receiver, on the part of the State of Tennessee, for the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad, for an extension of the time of payment of the purchase money due from that road to the United States, with accompanying statements. By reference to the sworn statement of Boyd M. Cheatham, superintendent, it will be seen that the expenditures of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad have exceeded the revenues during the past seven months to the amount of $8,091 54. In view of the facts set forth in the application of Mr. Cheatham, receiver, and the shown helplessness of the road, I respectfully recommend that the extension of the time of payment of the money due, on account of material purchased for the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad, be granted upon the following terms, viz: "That one instalment of one twenty-fourth ($\frac{1}{24}$) part of the amount of purchase, with all accrued interest, shall be paid in two years from the 30th of November, 1865, and the balance in twenty-three (23) equal monthly instalments, with interest, promptly, as they fall due thereafter."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. HAMILL,
Capt., Chief Quartermaster U. S. Military Railroads,
Military Division of the Tennessee.

Brigadier General W. D. WHIPPLE,
Chief of Staff, Military Division of the Tennessee.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, June 16, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant General, United States army, for the orders of the Secretary of War, recommending that the extension of time asked for by the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad be granted, as recommended by Captain Hamill.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 27, 1866.

Referred to the Quartermaster General for report.
By order of the Secretary of War:

THOS. T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to return the application of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad for an extension of time of payment of their debt to the United States, referred to this office for report.

This railroad leads from Edgefield to Memphis Junction, Tennessee, and is forty-seven miles long. It is charged with ninety-three thousand three hundred and eighty-five $\frac{35}{100}$ ($93,385\frac{35}{100}$) dollars, for material purchased from the United States, under executive order of October 14, 1865, in November, 1865, for the prompt payment of which, in equal monthly instalments, within two years, with interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, the State of Tennessee, by W. G. Brownlow, Governor, has given bond, June 1, 1866, to the amount of $94,142 85, with interest thereon at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, from November 30, 1865, to date of bond. Additional purchases of material, to the amount of twenty-one thousand three hundred and eighty-seven $\frac{77}{100}$ ($21,387\frac{77}{100}$) dollars, were made for the use of this railroad, and first reported in the month of February, 1866. Captain S. R. Hamill, assistant quartermaster United States military railroads, Nashville, Tennessee, has transmitted to this office a second bond of this company, executed by the State of Tennessee, in the same general form and tenor as that above mentioned, for the amount of purchases first reported in February, ($21,387 77,) with interest thereon to February 28, 1866.

The receiver of the road presents monthly statements of the receipts and expenditures during the seven months ending April, 1866, and the statement is made that it has expended of certain appropriations of the State of Tennessee, amounts not known to this department, in building bridges, trestles, machine shops, and in supplying new rolling stock. The receiver hopes that the revenues of the road will improve upon the completion of certain connecting lines. The receiver, Mr. R. B. Cheatham, is the rebel general of that name.

He asks that the payment of the first instalment, due December 31, 1865, be deferred until the month of December, 1867, and hopes that the road will be able after that time to pay its debt in twenty-four equal monthly instalments, beginning at that date. Captain Hamill, in view of the insolvent condition of the road, recommended that the indulgence asked be granted, with conditions that one-twenty-fourth part of the amount of purchase, with all accrued interest, shall be paid at the end of two years from the 30th of November, 1865, and the balance in twenty-three (23) equal monthly instalments, with interest, promptly, as they shall fall due thereafter.

Major General Thomas, to whom the executive order committed the transfer of the United States military railroad rolling stock in his military division, concurs in the report and recommendation of Captain Hamill.

It is stated that indulgence has been granted to the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville railroad, Mississippi and Tennessee railroad, Mississippi Central railroad, Nashville and Decatur railroad line, and Nashville and Chattanooga railroad—roads in the same district of country. I cannot recommend the extension.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, July 20, 1866.

Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster General, whose attention is called to the order of the Secretary of War endorsed hereon.

W. A. NICHOLS, Assistant Adjutant General.

By order of the President referred back to the Quartermaster General, with directions to grant the extension asked for.

JULY 20. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1866.

CAPTAIN: By order of the President of the United States, and by direction of the Secretary of War, July 20, 1866, the application of the Edgefield and Kentucky railroad for an extension of time of payment of its indebtedness to the United States for railway materials and supplies purchased, is granted.

You will, therefore, make such arrangements with the company as may be necessary to secure to the United States the payment of the money due, in accordance with the terms of the extension asked for and granted, viz: That one instalment of one twenty-fourth ($\frac{1}{24}$) part of the amount of purchase, with all accrued interest, shall be paid in two years from the 30th of November, 1865, and the balance in twenty-three equal monthly instalments with interest, promptly as they fall due thereafter.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General, Quartermaster General.

Captain S. R. HAMILL,
Assistant Quartermaster, Nashville, Tennessee.

OFFICE WESTERN AND ATLANTIC RAILROAD,
Atlanta, Georgia, December 13, 1865.

SIR: Will you permit me to call your attention to a matter pertaining to the Western and Atlantic railroad, an institution belonging exclusively to the State of Georgia?

This road was turned over to me at the instance of Major General Thomas, under instructions emanating from the War Department, under date of the 8th of August, 1865. Before running the road I proposed under said instructions to purchase rolling stock, consisting of engines, cars, &c., from the government, on condition that the State of Georgia would have two years to make payment. I did so from a knowledge of the destitute condition of the road, as well as the reduced condition of the State, and would not have made purchases to one-half the extent I did, but for the promise to have the time above specified. General Thomas acceded to the request, and I proceeded to make purchases to a large amount. The articles assigned the road have not all yet been received, and as yet I have not been advised as to the amount of purchase, and have made no arrangements to meet the payments as they are demanded.

A large amount of iron on the road was torn up, burnt, crooked, and then straightened and relaid, which is necessary to be replaced as soon as possible, to lessen the recurrence of accidents happening on the road in consequence of defective iron. The bridges, to the number of fourteen, were destroyed, and temporary trestle work substituted, which will be swept away by winter freshets. These fourteen bridges I now have under contract for Howe's truss bridges, which are to be completed by Christmas or early in January. These will cost about two hundred thousand dollars.

I have also bought fifty thousand dollars worth of iron, to commence relaying the road. In addition to these heavy demands, on the 3d inst., F. J. Crilly, major and assistant quartermaster, United States, made requisition for payment of monthly instalments on account of purchases made by this road from the United States, each instalment being $19,500, which, if there are twenty-four instalments, will be a large drain on the road at a time when it is unable to respond.

At this time I am ignorant of the prices of cars, engines, &c., as the appraised value has not been furnished me. By the terms of agreement there was to be an inventory of all receipts on the road for freight, passengers, &c., and a settlement to be made before the bonds for payment were to be given; this, if carried out, will greatly relieve the road, and at the same time be much more satisfactory.

In addition to the wants of the road, there is needed eight miles of iron to relay a portion of the road from the junction near Chickamauga to Chattanooga; to supply the use of this road we are using the East Tennessee and Georgia Railroad, at an expense of two thousand dollars.

This should be accounted for, as the iron was torn up and removed by the United States military authorities.

In short, if we are forced to settle as we are now required, the loss to this road will be immense. Since receiving the order to pay up the $19,500 monthly instalment, I saw Major General George H. Thomas and repeated our agreement which he remembers, and advises me to confer with your department. He will recognize the contract of two years time, and is well acquainted with all the transactions. A day or two since I received a telegram from Major Crilly, assistant quartermaster United States military railroads, saying General Thomas had ordered the demand suspended until the first of January next, when we are required to pay up all instalments up to this time, and give bond to pay as the instalments become due, and in the event the amount is not paid, then the road to be seized and taken possession of by the United States until the debt is paid. I requested Governor Johnson, who has the appointing power over the road, to correspond with you. But as the time is approaching to meet the payments, I deem it proper to advise you in advance as to how matters stand, and to request of him to have all further matters suspended until the terms can be carried out. By your consent, the government will send us a person properly empowered to do all things to carry out the contract. Will you be so kind as to advise me of your action on receipt of this letter, and much oblige,

Yours, very respectfully,

ROBERT BAUGH,
Superintendent Western and Atlantic Railroad.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, U. S.

By order of the Secretary of War:

THOMAS T. ECKERT,
Assistant Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, December 28, 1865.

Respectfully referred to Brevet Major F. J. Crilly for endorsement, and for statement of the indebtedness of the Western and Atlantic railroad to the United States for stock purchased by that road.

By command of Major General Thomas:

WILLIAM D. WHIPPLE,
Brigadier General, Assistant Adjutant General.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville January 4, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 25th ultimo, calling my attention to a late contract of purchase between the United States authorities and Robert Baugh, esq., superintendent of the Western and Atlantic railroad, and desiring to have this contract placed on a basis which will be satisfactory to the government of the United States, and disembarrass your administration of heavy monthly payments. You inform me that Mr. Baugh made large purchases from the United States under the impression that there was a credit of two years allowed on his purchases on giving satisfactory personal security, and representing that these terms could not be complied with for the reason that the Western and Atlantic railroad being owned by the State, and every citizen having an interest in it, still there are none who could be called upon to give the requisite personal security.

I am also in receipt of a communication on the same subject from Mr. Baugh to the honorable Secretary of War, of date December 15, 1865, in which he states that he made the purchases from the United States to a much greater extent than he otherwise would have done, had he not been promised by me that the State of Georgia would have two years time in which to make payment. He, however, says nothing as to his inability to furnish the personal security.

The order of the War Department, under which Mr. Baugh purchased railroad property from the United States for the Western and Atlantic railroad company, was, that payment should be made within one year, without interest. Mr. Baugh took the property, as did all the other roads, on these terms.

The executive order of October 14 extended the time of payment to two years, with monthly payments, with interest. Mr. Baugh and most of the roads accepted the latter terms, and all but the Western and Atlantic railroad complied with the provisions thereof. Both orders required that each company should give bond satisfactory to the government, by which the latter would be secured the payment of the debt incurred. Under the first of these orders, viz: general order No. 20, of August 24, 1865, was issued, copy herewith enclosed. No other terms than the above have been offered by me to any person, and Mr. Baugh is wrong in stating that I promised any other. When Mr. Baugh proposed to take the property it was with a clear understanding that the conditions were as expressed in my general order No. 20, and they were accepted by him, with the understanding, however, that the Western and Atlantic railroad should receive the benefit of any more favorable terms which might be offered by the government.

It seems strange to me that Mr. Baugh should so soon have forgotten the conversation on this subject, held at my headquarters in the presence of Major Crilly, A. Q. M.

If Mr. Baugh considers the first mentioned terms as more favorable than the second, he is still at liberty to accept. I will, however, assist the State in this juncture, and since under the peculiar circumstances under which the road is owned, and the impossibility for it to give the requisite security, I am willing for the present to defer the collection of the stipulated monthly instalments until the legislature has time to provide for a compliance without condition, and I will instruct Major Crilly to defer the collection of the monthly payments, if you will urge upon the legislature at its next session the propriety and necessity of authorizing Mr. Baugh and the treasurer of the State to execute a bond pledging the faith of the State to the payment of the debt incurred by it, in the purchase from the United States of railroad property, within a period not exceeding two years, with interest at 7 3-10 per cent per annum.

As for the other matter presented in your letter, also in that of Mr. Baugh to the Secretary of War, viz: The claim which the Western and Atlantic railroad may have against the United States for all profits and money received by them from the road, is in no way connected with the matter of indebtedness of the State to the United States, in so far as the turning over of the road to the State is concerned.

The settlement of that claim is provided for by act of Congress, approved January 31.

1862, which provides for the appointment of commissioners who shall assess and determine the amount of compensation, if any, to be paid the road.

GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Major General U. S. Army, Commanding.

His Excellency CHARLES J. JENKINS,
Governor of Georgia, Augusta, Georgia.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, with report.

W. A. NICHOLS,

[Telegram.]

Major General THOMAS, Commanding, &c., Nashville:

Governor Jenkins has made application for delay in collecting the instalments due, or to become due, for railroad stock purchased on behalf of the State of Georgia, until the 1st of November, at which time the interest will be paid up in full to that date, and action had by the State legislature to furnish adequate security. This proposition has been approved by the President, and you will suspend any proceedings in respect to the stock purchased and the debt thereby incurred, until the 15th of November, and then report whether the interest has been paid.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Milledgeville, Georgia, October 30, 1866.

SIR: Enclosed I beg leave to lay before you, for the consideration of yourself and the Secretary of War, the draft of a bill to be laid before the general assembly, (soon to convene,) to carry into effect the understanding arrived at in the month of August last, between the Departments of War and of Law, representing the government of the United States, and myself, representing the State of Georgia.

It would be more regular to make this communication directly to the War Department, but although not given to attach confidence to the statements of Washington letter writers, I have been impressed with the belief that Mr. Stanton's retirement is imminent. Should this communication fall into the hands of a successor, he would neither comprehend the purpose without explanation, nor perceive any reason for referring to yourself. I have then to request that you do me the favor of conferring with the actual incumbent of that department, when you shall have received this, or inform me, or cause me to be informed, whether or not the proposed enactment will be satisfactory. If not so, I will be obliged by the draft of a bill that will be so. Please have the enclosed returned.

I have ordered the interest due 1st November proximo, paid, and have no doubt it will be done.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES J. JENKINS,
Governor of Georgia.

Hon. Mr. STANBERY,
Attorney General, United States.

A BILL to be entitled "An act to declare the force and effect of a certain bond executed by the State of Georgia, through Campbell Wallace, superintendent of the Western and Atlantic railroad, and John Jones, treasurer of said State, on the first day of April, A. D. 1866, and to make said bond valid for the purposes therein set forth, as now understood and agreed by the parties"

Whereas, the late provisional superintendent of the Western and Atlantic railroad purchased from the government of the United States a considerable quantity of railroad property, in the month of October, 1865, amounting to four hundred and seventy-two thousand nine hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-six cents ($472 944 66) by the invoice, and to be thereafter delivered, for the amount of which purchase, with interest thereon, at the rate of 7.30 per cent. per annum, bond was required to be given.

And, whereas, by an act of the general assembly, approved 13th of March, 1866, Campbell Wallace, superintendent of said railroad, and John Jones, treasurer of the State, were authorized to execute to the United States of America a bond, pledging the faith of the State of Georgia for the payment of the purchase money of the property aforesaid, stated in said act to be four hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and fifty-two dollars and twenty-five cents, ($464, 152 25,) which sum proved to be less than the amount actually purchased by invoice.

And, whereas, upon public information a penal bond in the sum of nine hundred and eighty-two thousand three hundred and ten dollars and seventy-two cents ($982,310 72) was executed and delivered by said officers, binding the State of Georgia to the complete and punctual payment in monthly instalments, within two years from the purchase of the amounts which may be due for the said materials, received or to be received by it from the United States.

And, whereas, the Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War of the United States, did on the 27th day of August, 1866, agree and consent with Charles J. Jenkins, Governor of Georgia, to release the said State from the payment of monthly instalments on said debt, provided the general assembly of said State would, by act, declare the said bond valid for the payment, at the expiration of two years from the time of purchase, of the principal and interest of said debt then remaining due, and provided that all interest due the first day of November, 1866, be then paid and accruing interest quarterly thereafter. Now, therefore, for the purpose of correcting all mistakes, and more clearly defining the liability of said State, the general assembly of the State of Georgia do enact that the true intent and meaning, the force and effect of said before-mentioned bond is, that at or before the expiration of two years from the time of purchase aforesaid, the amount of principal due on said purchase shall be paid in full, and the interest paid quarterly from and after the first of November, 1866, and for such payment of principal and interest, the faith of the State is solemnly pledged by said bond, and by this act.

[Endorsement.]

I have examined the enclosed draft of the bill, and am of opinion that it is sufficient to validate the bond, and pledge the faith of the State for its payment. I therefore respectfully refer the matter to the Secretary of War for his action in the premises.

HENRY STANBERY, Attorney General.

NOVEMBER 4, 1866.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 6, 1866.

The Attorney General has expressed the opinion that the proposed bill would be sufficient to validate the bond, and pledge the faith of the State for its payment, and the papers have been referred by me to the Quartermaster General, the officer in charge of the Bureau to which the matter immediately appertains.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Milledgeville, Georgia, December 15, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you a copy of "An act of the General Assembly of Georgia," approved yesterday, which is an exact transcript of the draft approved by yourself and the Attorney General, which I trust will be considered a compliance in part thus far with the terms upon which you consented to dispense with monthly payments in the case referred to.

The quarterly interest will be cared for.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES J. JENKINS, Governor.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War, United States.

AN ACT to declare the force and effect of a certain bond, executed by the State of Georgia through Campbell Wallace, superintendent of the Western and Atlantic railroad, and John Jones, treasurer of said State, on the first day of April, A. D. 1866, and to make said bond valid for the purposes therein set forth, as now understood and agreed by the parties:

Whereas, the late provisional superintendent of the Western and Atlantic railroad purchased from the government of the United States a considerable quantity of railroad property in the month of October, 1865, amounting to four hundred and seventy-two thousand nine hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-six cents, ($472,944 66,) by the invoice, and to be thereafter delivered, for the amount of which purchase, with interest thereon at the rate of 7.3 per cent. per annum, bond was required to be given; and

Whereas, by an act of the general assembly, approved March 13, 1866, Campbell Wallace, superintendent of said railroad, and John Jones, treasurer of the State, were authorized to execute to the United States of America a bond, pledging the faith of the State of Georgia for the payment of the purchase money of the property aforesaid, stated in said act to be four hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and fifty-two dollars and twenty-five cents, ($464,152 25,) which sum proved to be less than the amount actually purchased by invoice; and

Whereas, upon fuller information, a penal bond, in the sum of nine hundred and eighty-two thousand three hundred and ten dollars and seventy-two cents, ($982,310 72,) was executed and delivered by said officers, binding the State of Georgia to the complete and punctual payment, in monthly instalments, within two years from the purchase, of the amounts which may be due for the said materials received or to be received by it from the United States; and

Whereas, the Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War of the United States, did, on the 27th day of August, 1866, agree and consent with Charles J. Jenkins, Governor of Georgia, to release the said State from the payment of monthly instalments on said debt, provided the general assembly of said State would by act declare the said bond valid for the payment at the expiration of two years from the time of purchase, of the principal and interest of said debt then remaining due; and provided that all the interest due the first day of November, 1866, be then paid, and accruing interest quarterly thereafter.

Now, therefore, for the purpose of correcting all mistakes, and more clearly defining the liability of said State,

SECTION 1. The general assembly of the State of Georgia do enact, that the true intent and meaning, the force and effect of said before-mentioned bond is, that at or before the expiration of two years from the time of purchase aforesaid, the amount of principal due on said purchase shall be paid in full, and the interest paid quarterly from and after the 1st of November, 1866; and for such payment of principal and interest the faith of the State is solemnly pledged by said bond and this act.

The above and foregoing three written pages contain a true and correct copy of the original act on file in this office.

N. C. BARNETT, Secretary of State.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1867.

MAJOR: Herewith is respectfully transmitted, for your information and action, a true copy of an act of the general assembly of Georgia, for the purpose of correcting all mistakes in a certain bond given by said State to the United States, to secure payment for railway material purchased for the use of the Western and Atlantic railroad, and clearly defining the liability of said State for such purchases.

In the passage of this act is involved a change in the conditions of payment of this debt from those originally fixed, to wit: That at or before the expiration of two years from the creation of the debt, the amount of principal due thereon shall be paid in full, the interest (at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum) being payable quarterly from and after the first of November, 1866. You will be governed accordingly.

By order of the Quartermaster General:

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Brevet Colonel U. S. Army, in charge Fourth Division.

Brevet Major S. R. HAMILL,
Assistant Quartermaster, Louisville, Kentucky.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 10, 1866.

SIR: About the 14th of July, 1865, I, on behalf of the Petersburg railroad company, made application to purchase of the United States government a quantity of railroad iron, spikes, and sills, amounting in the aggregate to sixty-five thousand dollars, on twelve months credit. The application was granted, with the change of twelve to six months' credit.

Our company was in hopes to rebuild and equip with rolling stock their road, and derive sufficient income to pay this debt, but now find that it has been impossible to do so out of the receipts of the four months that the road has been in operation, and I now respectfully ask that my application for the twelve months be granted.

It may be proper to state why the company is not able at this time to pay the sixty-five thousand dollars, and also to state in a general way the condition of the company before the war, and its present condition, in order that you may judge of the propriety of granting this request.

The property of the company amounted to about $1,350,000, ascertained by taking an account of stock. The damages done to this property during the war was about $150,000, leaving $1,200,000 as its present value. All these sums are estimates of value in gold. The receipts of this road were steadily increasing, and it was being constantly improved, so that the stock was selling at $110 for $100 paid. The dividends were ten per cent. It paid all dues in cash, and since 1858 had not given a bond, note, or any obligation. Its bonded debt was but $73,000, payable about an average of $10,000. Its receipts were about the same as at present, say $330,000 per annum.

Such was the flourishing condition of this road before the war that its stock was sought for as an investment, and holders of liabilities were loth to present their claims.

Upon the return of the road to our possession, is was ascertained that sixteen miles of the road next to Petersburg had been so far destroyed that at least ten miles of new iron would be required, and application was made to the United States government for the purchase of this quantity on credit, as we had no money in our treasury. It was also found that but thirty cars could be found fit for service; that some of the locomotives had been burned, and that all were more or less in such a crippled condition that at least two new locomotives would be required, and will be purchased if you will grant the extension of credit now asked for.

Since the road was opened the receipts may be stated at $100,000; the expenses have been about 50 per cent., or $50,000, for operating the road. We have paid in cash to the United States government about $30,000 for cars, and there is due us by the United States government for transportation about $14,000, which sums deducted from the gross receipts leaves, say $6,000 only, as the available cash in the hands of our treasurer.

Although the road was injured to the extent of $150,000 in gold, it is believed that about $120,000 in currency will so far put the road in order as to convey all that may be offered to it.

I would respectfully propose to renew our bond due next Saturday, and extend it for six months longer, and deem it but fair and right that interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. should be paid during this extended time.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. O. SANFORD,
President Petersburg Railroad Company.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

JANUARY 10, 1866.

Referred to the Quartermaster General, with authority to give the extension if he deems it compatible with the interest of the government, upon payment of the interest.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

[Endorsement.]

JANUARY 10, 1866.

Referred to Colonel Bliss, division of railroad transportation. I believe that it will be to the interest of the United States to extend the time of this payment rather than to take possession of the railroad, and attempt to collect the debt out of the revenue thereof. Let the note for bond given as security be extended, with the added condition of payment of interest, in such manner as to guard the interests of the United States as far as possible.

M. C. MEIGS, Quartermaster General.

VIRGINIA CENTRAL RAILROAD,
Richmond, January 30, 1866.

SIR: On the 17th of August, 1865, the Virginia Central Railroad Company purchased from the government iron and chairs to the amount of $70,000, for which a credit of six months was given the company, they giving a bond conditioned for the surrender of their road to the government to work out the amount in the event of the non-payment of the debt on the 17th of February, 1866.

The condition of the road has been such as to render it impossible to lay by a sum to meet this claim, now in a few days due. Up to this time we have met promptly all our dues to the government, but with every disposition to do so, I am unable to make the payment now coming due. I learn that further indulgence has been extended to other roads circumstanced as the Virginia Central railroad is, and I therefore ask that an extension of sixteen months be granted the company, the amount due to carry interest at the rate of 7 3/10 per cent. per annum, and to be paid in sixteen monthly instalments, the condition of surrender of the road to remain in force as security for prompt payment.

I submit herewith an abstract of the receipts and disbursements of the company from April 1, 1865, to January 1, 1866, which will show that the funds of the company have been properly expended.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. WICKHAM,
President Virginia Central Railroad Company.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

[Endorsement.]

THOMAS T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1866.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War with the recommendation that the extension of sixteen (16) months asked for be granted upon the payment at expiration of original term of six months of interest, at the rate of 7 3/10 per cent. per annum to that date, and thereafter the amount due be paid in equal monthly instalments with interest at 7 3/10 per cent. per annum. This road will thus be placed on nearly the same footing with those of the Southwest.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1866.

GENERAL: The Secretary of War has, at the request of the Virginia Central Railroad Company, and upon recommendation of the Quartermaster General, granted an extension of sixteen (16) months for payment of their indebtedness to the United States for railroad supplies, amounting to $70,000, due February 17, 1866, and secured by their bond for $140,000, dated August 1, 1865.

The extension is granted upon the following terms, viz:

Payment by the company at the expiration of original term of six months, to wit: February 17, 1866, of interest to that date of seven and three-tenths per cent., and thereafter payment of amount due in sixteen equal monthly instalments, with interest at 7 3/10 per cent.

You will please cause the above payment of interest to be received by the disbursing quartermaster of military railroads at Washington, and the bond of the company to be given to secure the future payments of principal and interest, to bear date February 17, 1866, to be duly executed and transmitted for deposit in this office.

The original bond of the company bore date August 1, 1865, and therefore fell due February 1, 1866; but as the orders for delivering the material were not given till the 12th, and the first delivery made August 17, the term of six months may be considered as commencing from that date.

By order of the Quartermaster General:

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Brevet Colonel and Assistant Quartermaster, in charge Fourth Division.

Brevet Brigadier General D. C. MCCALLUM,
General Superintendent United States Military Railroads, Washington, D. C.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., March 31, 1866.

SIR: I would respectfully submit, on behalf of the directors of the Orange and Alexandria railroad, the following application, viz.: That an extension of credit be allowed to the said company on a bond given to the United States in the sum of $200,000 to secure purchases of supplies and material made for said company by A. Jamison and P. Quigley, agents for same, and approved by the board of public works of Virginia, to the amount of about $90,000, which bond was executed on the 5th of August last, and payable six months after date. The authority of the above named agents having been revoked by the said board of public works, and the undersigned legally authorized to act as president of the company, as will appear from the copy of the order of the board of public works herewith filed, it is respectfully asked that the rule adopted in regard to other southern railroads be extended to this company, and that the usual obligations to pay in monthly instalments within two years' time be received, and the undersigned recognized as the proper officer on behalf of the company to execute the same.

The means of the company have been applied so far to the reconstruction of its road and equipment, leaving it unable to get along without this relief for the present. The ability of the company to pay ultimately is undoubted, and in the meantime the government retains its lien and remedy, as is provided in the bond heretofore executed.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

J. S. BARBOUR, President, &c.

P. S. — I enclose herewith an official statement from the books of the company.

Major General MEIGS,
Quartermaster General U. S. A.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith application of J. S. Barbour, president of the Orange and Alexandria railroad, for an extension of period of payment of a bond executed by A. Jamison and P. Quigley, agents of the board of public works of Virginia, for said road in the sum of $200,000, to secure payment in six (6) months, for railroad supplies sold to said road by the United States, dated August 5, 1865, to the amount of about $90,000.

Payment by the terms of the bond became due February 5, 1866, but as the bond was not accepted by the Secretary of War, and the stores not delivered, except a small part, until October 12, 1865, payment is not equitably due until April 12, 1866.

I recommend that to equalize, as nearly as may be, the terms of sale to this road with those granted the roads in the Southwest, and subsequently to several roads in the Atlantic States, that the company be permitted to substitute for the present bond a new bond of the company, as at present organized, of the same general form and tenor as prescribed by the executive order of October 14, 1865, to double the amount due from said company for stores sold it to date, to secure payment of the amount so due in two (2) years from October 12, 1865, with interest at 7 3/10 per cent. from that date. Payment to be made in eighteen (18) equal monthly instalments, with interest as aforesaid, until the whole amount shall have been paid. The first monthly instalment, together with the interest accrued on the entire amount from October 12, 1865, to be due and payable on the 12th of May, 1866.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. Army, Quartermaster General.

SIR: You are respectfully informed that the request of the Wilmington and Weldon and the Orange and Alexandria railroad companies for the transfer from the former to the latter company of the two locomotive engines, purchased of the United States by the Wilmington and Weldon railroad company, November 20, 1865, for twenty-eight thousand five hundred dollars, ($28,500,) payable in two years, in equal monthly instalments, with interest at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, with the transfer, also, of the entire indebtedness of the Wilmington and Weldon railroad company to the United States on account of said purchase, has been granted by the Quartermaster General, but to be made only upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: The payment of the entire instalments and interest due will be the condition of the transfer, which will otherwise not be permitted.

The Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company will also be required to give bond in the usual form for double the value of the engines, (less the amount of instalments due and to be paid,) payable in equal monthly instalments, with seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, within eighteen months from the 20th day of May, 1866.

Upon your complying with the above, viz., transmitting to General H. L. Robinson, assistant quartermaster, Washington, D. WASHINGTON, D. C., June 26, 1866.

SIR: You have already rendered the Petersburg railroad company a great service by giving it a year's credit upon a purchase of railroad iron from the government.

The original indebtedness was about $66,000, and this is now reduced by government transportation over the road to about $18,000. Until we get receipts from the transportation of cotton and tobacco, it would distress our company greatly to raise the money to pay this indebtedness on the 12th of July next. I respectfully ask that you permit our bond to be renewed, with interest, for twelve months, as by that time all the next crop of cotton and tobacco will have been removed.

NOTE.—Please report at as early a moment as convenient.

JAMES A. HARDIE, Inspector General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith application of C. O. Sanford, president of the Petersburg railroad company, for an extension of period of payment of two (2) bonds, executed in the penal amount of $65,000 each by said company July 12, 1865, to secure payment of $32,500 on each, or $65,000 altogether, in six (6) months from date of bonds, for railroad supplies sold to said road by the United States, and which bonds were renewed for the same amounts and upon the same terms for the further period of six (6) months from the 12th day of January, 1866.

Payment by the terms of the present bonds will become due July 12, 1866. Where application has been made for extension by roads which received originally six months' credit without interest, I have recommended, and the Secretary of War has authorized, the substitution of a credit of two years with monthly instalments and interest in place of the original terms granted, in order to equalize the terms of payment with those granted the southwestern railroads under executive orders. This road, at the expiration of its original credit of six months, preferred to these terms a further extension of six months only with interest, believing that they would be able to pay at the termination of that period. They have paid on account to date of principal $16,600 87, and interest $1,411 80, leaving about $48,000 now due.

The president of the road proposes in enclosed letter to make a further payment of $20,000 in cash on July 12, 1866, making in all paid to that date $36,600, together with interest in full, and the balance then remaining due, about $28,000, at the expiration of six months, with interest thereon at 7 3-10 per cent. per annum from said July 12, 1866, the present bond being renewed for that term.

Believing this arrangement quite as favorable to the government as the extension of two years with instalments and interest, which has been granted other roads, I recommend that the extension be granted on the terms asked.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. Army, Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

PETERSBURG RAILROAD OFFICE,
Petersburg, Va., June 28, 1866.

SIR: I learn from the Secretary of War that many of the railroad companies have not paid instalments upon their indebtedness, and that he wished some disposition should be shown to fulfil engagements.

In order to meet his views upon this subject, I respectfully request to withdraw the application which I made three days since, and now propose to pay $20,000 on the 12th day of next July, the day on which our bond is due, and ask for an extension of the balance, say $20,000, for six months, with interest at rate of 7 3-10 per cent. per annum.

We have complied with all the requirements of our understanding to this time.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Upon application of the Petersburg railroad company, and in accordance with the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War, June 29, 1866, these bonds are hereby renewed for the same amounts for the further period of six months from this date, upon payment by said railroad company—receipt of which is hereby acknowledged to Brevet Brigadier General W. L. James, chief quartermaster at Richmond, Virginia, as per his letter hereto attached—of the sum of four hundred and twelve and $\frac{29}{100}$ dollars, ($412\frac{29}{100}$) being amount in full of interest due to this date, and of the further sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) on account of the principal due, the remaining indebtedness ($28,399 13) to be paid at the expiration of six months, with interest thereon at 7 3-10 per cent. per annum from this date, payable to the United States disbursing quartermaster at Richmond, Virginia.

By D. G. POTTS, Treasurer.
ALEXANDER BLISS,
Col Q. M. Dep't, in charge of Fourth Division.

Know all men by these presents:

That we, Charles O. Sanford, president, and David G. Potts, treasurer, of the Petersburg railroad company, (railroad from Petersburg, Virginia, to Weldon and Gaston, North Carolina,) for and in behalf of said company, are held and firmly bound unto the United States of America, in the sum of sixty-five thousand dollars ($65,000) lawful money of the United States, to be paid to the United States, for which payment, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves and our successors and representatives firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated this tenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and sixty-five, and in the ninetieth year of the independence of said States.

The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the quartermaster's department of the United States army, by and with the consent of the War Department, has agreed to sell to the said railroad company certain railroad materials in possession of the quartermaster's department, at City Point and Alexandria, Virginia, not needed by the United States, to the amount of sixty-five thousand dollars' ($65,000) worth, as follows, to wit: iron rails at eighty dollars ($80) per ton, iron chairs at six cents per pound, iron spikes at six cents per pound, cross-ties at fifty cents each, for the repair and reconstruction of said railroad.

Now if the above bounden C. O. Sanford, president, and D. G. Potts, treasurer, shall pay or cause to be paid to the United States, the full amount for the materials furnished to said company as above, in six months from the above date, then the above obligation to be void. Otherwise the United States is authorized to place an agent in charge of said railroad, who shall collect the revenues, and apply them to the payment to the United States of the sums which may be due for the materials delivered to the said railroad company under this arrangement.

C. O. SANFORD, President. [SEAL.]

This bond is renewed for same amount and upon the same terms for the further period of six months from this 12th day of January, 1866, interest to be paid from this date, at the rate of 7 3-10 per cent. per annum upon the amount due the United States, payable monthly to the United States disbursing quartermaster at Richmond. It is understood that the company is to be credited with the amount of their vouchers as audited.

In witness whereof we hereunto for and on behalf of the Petersburg railroad company, affix our hands and seals this 12th day of January, 1866.

The bond should be double the value of the property turned over. The Quartermaster General may turn over one-half the amount of this bond, and if more property be afterwards required a bond can be given to cover it.

CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE, DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA,
Richmond, Va., July 13, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to state that I have received from D. G. Potts, treasurer Petersburg railroad company, the sum of two hundred and ninety-four dollars and forty-three cents, ($294 43,) being interest from June 1, 1866, to June 30, 1866, on $48,399 13; balance due the United States on bonds for $65,000, dated January 12, 1866.

I have also received from treasurer of said company, drafts for twenty thousand dollars, ($20,000,) which amount I have credited, on July 10, 1866, on bonds held by me and credited upon my own account.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. L. JAMES,
Brevet Brigadier General and Chief Q. M., Department of Virginia.

Major General M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 19, 1866.

GENERAL: Yours of the 13th instant, reporting payment, on the 10th instant, by the Petersburg railroad company of $294 43, being interest due on amount of indebtedness to the United States, June 30, 1866, and of $20,000 to be applied upon the principle due, is received.

An extension of credit has been granted by the Secretary of War, June 29, 1866, to the Petersburg railroad company for the payment of its indebtedness for the further period of six (6) months from the 12th of July, 1866, upon the payment, by said company, of the amount of interest in full from June 1 to July 12, 1866, $412 20, and of the further sum of 20,000 on account of the principal due; the remaining indebtedness, $28,399 13, to be paid at the expiration of six months, with interest thereon, at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum from said date.

The company, as appears from your letter, having made the payment of $20,000 on account of the principal, and of $294 43 on account of interest to June 30, 1866, should now pay the interest to July 12, 1866, $117 77, when the extension referred to will be granted.

Notify this office of your action in the premises, and be governed by the conditions above stated in the collection of the amount remaining due the United States by the Petersburg railroad on account of railroad property purchased.

By order of the Quartermaster General.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

BENJ. C. CARD,
Brevet Brig. General and Col. Quartermaster's Department.

Brevet Brig. Gen. W. L JAMES,
Chief Quartermaster Dep't of Va. Richmond, Va.

CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE, DEP'T OF VA.,
Richmond, Va., July 25, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to respectfully inform you that I have this day received from D. G. Potts, esq., treasurer of Petersburg railroad company, the sum of one hundred and seventeen dollars and seventy-seven cents, (117 77,) being interest from July 1 to July 12, 1866, on bonds due the United States.

In accordance with instructions I have credited the amount of twenty thousand dollars paid on account of principal on bonds by me, and notified the Petersburg railroad company of an extension of six months having been granted.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. L. JAMES,
Brv't Brig. Gen. and Chief Q. M. Dep't of Va.

Major General M. C. MEIGS,

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
St. Louis, Missouri, March 6, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 1, 1866, enclosing the bond and other papers relating to the Memphis and Little Rock railroad, with instructions to modify the bond and make it conform to the specific instructions embraced in the letter of the Quartermaster General of February 14, last.

I will transmit these papers to Major General J. J. Reynolds, with instructions to cause the changes to be made in the bond as required. I did approve that bond, and still judge it better in its present form than in the one suggested. The estimates were made by good judges on the spot, and I know that the locomotives and passenger cars are very inferior, and were valued as high as they deserved. Why General Reynolds consented to the payment in gross with interest, instead of by monthly instalments, I cannot recall, but he knows that the road is poor and needs a helping hand. I fear that hard terms will discourage Mr. Brinkley, and cause him to drop the road, and leave it to decay and go to ruin, more to the loss of the United States than of any other party interested.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,
Major General.

General E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF ARKANSAS,
Little Rock, Ark., April 12, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor herewith to return the bond of the Memphis and Little Rock railroad company, and accompanying papers, together with letters of instructions from Major General Sherman, marked A; also, letter from this office to the president of the road, marked B, and his reply, marked C.

I would respectfully invite attention to the fact that the bond is based upon paragraph four, executive order of August 8, 1865, and letter of instructions from the Quartermaster General, dated September 6, 1865, from which the two extracts following are made:

"The President directs that the arrangement made in turning over the Tennessee railroads be applied in this case."

"General Thomas has assembled a board of officers and others to value the stock and material to be delivered to the railroads in Tennessee, under executive order of 8th August."

From the instructions in the case I understood the executive order of 8th August to be the basis of action. "The arrangement made in turning over the Tennessee railroads" conforms to the spirit of the executive order of August 8, which reads: "In twelve months from date of transfer as aforesaid, or such other reasonable time as may be agreed upon."

The arrangement with the Tennessee roads gives a credit of two years, payable in equal monthly instalments.

The Memphis and Little Rock railroad company could not make similar payments, and cannot now undertake to do it. (See letter of the president, Mr. Brinkley, marked C.)

The bond of the Memphis and Little Rock railroad company stipulates for one payment at the end of eighteen months, and is fully as much in accordance with the executive order of August 8, as the arrangement with the Tennessee roads.

The precise arrangement with the Tennessee roads could not be carried out with the Memphis and Little Rock road, and the orders in the case were not understood as demanding it. The arrangement made with the Memphis and Little Rock road was made after full deliberation and examination, and is believed to be the best that can be made for the interests of the government. If this arrangement is annulled much of the stock which has been received by the road must be returned to the government, and as it cannot be bought by this road, it would command a much lower price for any other railroad.

If the orders in the case had been understood to demand precise conformity to the arrangement with the Tennessee roads, this explanation, now submitted, would have been submitted before any action was taken, but I understood the spirit of paragraph 4, "or such other reasonable time as may be agreed upon," to be the basis of action, and proceeded accordingly.

With this explanation, which it is hoped will prove satisfactory, the bond is respectfully resubmitted for consideration. If approved, the seal of the company and the revenue stamps, inadvertently omitted, will be supplied. If disapproved, reference is made to the letter of the president of the road, marked C, and further instructions respectfully requested.

I have the honor to be, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. J. REYNOLDS,
Major General Commanding.

To the ADJUTANT GENERAL U. S. A.,
Washington, D. C., through Headquarters
Military Division of the Mississippi, St. Louis, Mo.

[Endorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
St. Louis, Missouri, April 18, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to the War Department. I have not a word to say. The road in question is very poor, and will be an elephant on our hands. We have not public business to warrant our running it, and to attempt to make profits by carrying private freight will be a losing business. Of course, my opinion is that the bargain made by General Reynolds on the spot was the best possible.

W. T. SHERMAN,
Major General Commanding.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, April 23, 1866.

Respectfully referred to the Quartermaster General.

W. A. NICHOLS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for the action of the Secretary of War, the bond given by the Memphis and Little Rock railroad, under direction of Major Generals Thomas and Reynolds, to secure payment to the United States for the purchase of railroad material made by this company, to the value of $151,979 73, according to accompanying schedule.

This bond was, upon its first receipt by the Quartermaster General, returned to the Secretary of War with letter of February 23, 1866, (copy enclosed,) calling attention to certain discrepancies between this bond and the form prescribed by the executive order of October 14, 1865, which form had been furnished General Sherman.

These discrepancies were deemed so material by me that I could not approve the bond as executed.

The bond having been referred by the Secretary of War to General Sherman, has been returned with letter of General Reynolds and endorsement of General Sherman, advising that the bond be taken as it is. The difference between this bond and the prescribed form, so far as relates to terms of payment, is explained by General Reynolds, and is not, in my opinion so material. But the other objections, pointed out by my letter of February 23, so far impair the security sought to be afforded of ultimate payment that I am unwilling to cause the bond to be accepted as an equivalent for the large amount of railroad property of the United States transferred to this road—exceeding $150,000—without again inviting attention to its imperfections.

Under this bond the company may offer in payment of its indebtedness accounts for transportation services, made up not "at rates allowed by government to northern roads," as other bonds all read, but "at rates charged to government by southern roads."

The rates allowed by government to northern roads afford a positive standard by which the money value of the transportation services rendered by the road may be computed with decision. What rates may be charged to government by some southern roads cannot be known with certainty, and there is no limit to the amount which the company may set up as offsets to its indebtedness.

I have caused an examination to be made of the schedule of property sold. The prices of many of the articles are very considerably lower than those at which similar articles have been appraised and sold east of the Mississippi; but I presume that care has been taken by the officers under whose direction the appraisal was made to secure to the United States their just value at the locality. Several considerable errors in extension and addition of figures, however, are observable on the face of the schedule, which should be corrected. By the correction of these errors the total of the value of the articles sold is changed from $151,979 73 to $153,257 47.

I recommend that a new bond be required to be given by the company, retaining, if thought necessary by Generals Sherman and Reynolds, the period of payment already conceded by them, but conforming to all the other bonds given by indebted roads in the rates at which their transportation services shall be allowed for—the bond to be in the penal sum of $306,574 94 to secure the sum of $153,287 47, the true amount of the indebtedness of the company, according to appraisal of the property received by it; revenue stamps of the value of $76 65 to be affixed to the bond; the present bond to be cancelled as soon as replaced by the new one.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

[Endorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 19, 1866.

The report of the Quartermaster General is approved, and the Adjutant General will transmit a copy of it to Major General Sherman.

By order of the Secretary of War:

THOS. T. ECKERT,
Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

OFFICE ASS'T Q. M. U. S. MIL. RAILROADS,
Washington, D. C., August 21, 1866.

SIR: You are respectfully informed that there is now due the United States, for railroad material purchased December 30, 1865, for the use of the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire Railroad Company, by Messrs. Lewis McKenzie, Joseph Thornton, and Joseph B. Stewart, amounting to sixty-two thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars and ninety-six cents, ($62,592 96,) and for which a penal bond in the sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand, one hundred and eighty-five dollars and ninety-two cents, ($125,185 92,) was filed with General L. H. Robinson, assistant quartermaster United States military railroads, signed by the aforementioned Lewis McKenzie, Joseph Thornton, and Joseph B. Stewart, as agents of the board of public works of Virginia for said railroad, the sum of twenty thousand nine hundred and twenty-one dollars and sixty-seven cents, (20,921 67,) being instalments and interest due from December 30, A. D. 1865, to July 31, A. D. 1866. You will please transmit at once to this office the above named sum of twenty thousand, nine hundred and twenty-one dollars and sixty-seven cents, ($20,921 67,) in current funds of the United States, or in transportation vouchers, or both.

Please acknowledge the receipt of this communication at your earliest convenience.

A true copy:

F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Lieut. Col. and A. Q. M. U. S. A.

ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, September 1, 1866.

MAJOR: The undersigned, agent of the board of public works of Virginia, for the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire railroad, acknowledges the receipt of yours of the 21st ultimo in regard to the amount due upon our purchases of railroad materials and supplies from the quartermaster's department.

Fully appreciating as we do the obligations under which we lie for important aid derived from the supplies and materials, we regret that for the want of means, we have thus far been unable to use them to advantage, and that a considerable portion of them remain on hand unemployed until our road is rebuilt to Leesburg. In rebuilding our road thus far we have been compelled to expend much of our means for cross-ties, labor, and other materials than those which we derived from the government.

The value of the property upon which this debt is secured is ample to insure its safety, and there can be no possible danger of loss. With our constant efforts to put the road in repair, that value is constantly increasing.

In view of these statements, we trust your department will extend us further time, assuring you of our unremitting endeavor to commence payment at an early date.

We are now running the cars to within seven miles of Leesburg, the receipts of which, however, do not much more than pay the current expenses. The value of this road amounts to nearly one million of dollars in property, and there are very few claims against it save those of the government. I mention this that you may be well assured of the safety of the debt.

I am, very repectfully, your obedient servant,

LEWIS McKENZIE,
Pres't A., L. and H. Railroad, and one of the Agents of Public Works of Virginia.

OFFICE OF ASS'T Q. M. U. S. MIL'Y RAILROADS,

F. J. CRILLY,

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith the communication of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel F. J. Crilly, assistant quartermaster United States military railroads, reporting the nonpayment by the Alexandria, Loudon and Hampshire railroad, of any part of its indebtedness to the United States—amounting to $62,592 96, and upon which there was due July 31, 1866, principal and interest, $20,921 67—and the correspondence with the company on the subject. I do not advise enforcement of the penalty of the bond—the taking possession by the United States of the railroad and its effects—because I believe it would not be expedient to do so, but I report the facts, and the explanations of the president of the road. I also forward herewith a statement showing the names of the railroads which, so far as reported to date, have made no payment on account of their indebtedness.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Respectfully referred to Lieutenant Colonel F. J. Crilly, assistant quartermaster military railroads, Washington, D. C., for report.

By order of the Quartermaster General:

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Colonel Quartermaster's Department, in Charge.

OFFICE ASSISTANT QUARTERMASTER
UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROADS,
Washington. D. C., September, 21, 1866.

Respectfully returned to General M. C. Meigs, Quartermaster General United States Army. From the best information I can procure, I find that the Alexandria, Loudon and Hampshire railroad is barely paying its expenses. The company claim, however, that they have no other indebtedness except what is due government. The road has just been opened to within five miles of Leesburg, which point they expect to reach and have in running order prior to 1st January next. The president of the company claims that this will increase the receipts fifty per cent. He is unable to fix any definite time at which he can commence paying his instalments regularly, but promises on the first of January next to pay all accrued interest on his indebtedness to the government. He also states that he has large amounts owing him from the Orange and Alexandria and Washington and Alexandria railroads, which these companies are unable to pay, owing to their crippled condition. In view of all the facts in the case, I would recommend that an extension of six months from October 1, be granted to the company on their instalments, with the understanding that all back interest due be paid January 1, and also that during this extension, if granted, they make such payments as they may be able to.

F. J. CRILLY,
Brevet Lieutenant Colonel, and Assistant Quartermaster U. S. A.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 25, 1866.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, with recommendation that an extension of six (6) months from October 1, 1866, be granted this company in the payment of their instalments; that is, that the payment of instalments shall commence on that day, and be thereafter monthly made, with the understanding that all back interest due be paid January 1, 1867, and also that during the extension, if granted, they make such payments as they may be able.

M. C. MEIGS,
Brevet Major General U. S. A., Quartermaster General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 3, 1866.

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General is approved.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 11, 1866.

COLONEL: The Secretary of War, under date of October 3, 1866, has authorized an extension to be granted to the Alexandria, Loudon, and Hampshire railroad, in the payment of its debt to the United States, on account of railroad material purchased.

The terms of the extension are, that an extension of six months from October 1, 1866, be granted this company in the payment of their instalments; that is, that the payment of instalments shall commence on that day, and be thereafter monthly made, with the understanding that all back interest due be paid January 1, 1867, and also, that during the extension, they make such payments as they may be able.

You will notify the company accordingly, and require from them a strict compliance, on their part, with the above terms.

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Col. of Quartermaster's Department, in charge of Fourth Division.

Brevet Lieutenant Colonel F. J CRILLY,
Assistant Quartermaster U. S. Military Railroads.

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1867.

DEAR SIR: It is with great reluctance that I again ask a renewal of a part of the note due to the United States by the Petersburg railroad company.

The note was originally for $65,000, which has been reduced to $28,399 13, and I now propose to reduce it to $20,000, and to be extended for six months.

Our company can pay $6,000 in cash, and we have accounts for government transportation amounting to between $2,400 and $2,500, which are being audited.

Owing to the impoverished condition of the country, the failure of the crops, and, consequently, the light travel, our receipts have been much less than they otherwise would have been, which, of course, has lessened our ability to pay more at this time.

We purchased of the government about $100,000 worth of iron and rolling stock, and I now respectfully ask that we obtain an extension of credit for six months on one-fifth of this sum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. O. SANFORD,
President Petersburg Railroad Company.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

[Endorsement.]

JANUARY 8, 1867.

Referred to the Quartermaster General for report.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 21, 1867.

COLONEL: The Secretary of War, under date of January 9, 1867, has granted to the Petersburg railroad company an extension of the time fixed on the 12th of July, 1866, for the extinguishment of their indebtedness to the United States for railroad material purchased, which was January 12, 1867.

The terms of the extension are, that the company discharge the amount in full of interest due January 15, 1867, and on that date reduce their debt, twenty-eight thousand, three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and thirteen cents, ($28,399 13,) to twenty thousand dollars, ($20,000.) The payment of the residue to be made on the 12th of July, 1867, with interest thereon at seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum, from January 15, 1867.

You will notify the company accordingly, and require from them a strict compliance on their part with the above terms.

By order of the Quartermaster General:

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,
Colonel Q. M. Department, in charge of Fourth Division.

Brevet Colonel F. J. CRILLY,
Assistant Quartermaster U. S. Military Railroads, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1867.

Hon. J. W. HUNTER, M. C., sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you know anything of an organization having for its object the support of the President in his office in case articles of impeachment should be preferred against him?

A. No, sir; I never heard of any such organization.

Q. Do you know of any plan or movement to support the President against Congress' depriving him of his power during the pendency of proceedings for impeachment?

A. No, sir; I never heard of any such organization.

Q. Do you know anything of any organization which contemplates, or has for its object, resistance to any action which Congress may see fit to take in regard to the President?

A. I never heard of any, here or elsewhere. I have heard individual expressions about standing by the President because he was President. I do not know of any organization; I never heard of any.

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1867.

JOSEPH H. GEIGER, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your residence and position.

A. I reside at Columbus, Ohio. I am a revenue agent of the United States.

Q. When and by whom were you appointed?

A. I was appointed in February or March last. My commission was signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and countersigned by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Q. Was your appointment made upon the order of the President?

A. That I do not know. The President was anxious for my appointment—I know that; whether he ordered it or not, I do not know.

Q. What duties appertain to your office?

A. We are acting under the orders of the department, and under those orders go around and examine whatever they direct, looking into frauds, and preventing them as far as possible.

Q. What territory was embraced in your district at the time you were appointed?

A. No particular territory at the time I was appointed. My district embraces now the States of Ohio, Maryland, and West Virginia.

Q. Do you have any part of Pennsylvania under your jurisdiction?

A. No, sir. I was sent up to the twenty-fourth district of Pennsylvania, soon after my appointment, to make an investigation of a fraud. I do not know what action has been taken with regard to that investigation. I know that forty-five thousand dollars was found due the government of the United States. I understand that the government has got no part of it. It was the case of William Gray.

Q. Is the District of Columbia embraced in your district?

A. No, sir. They told me it was embraced in my district when I got the paper, and I did not know it was not until two or three months afterwards. Mr. Johnson, a clerk in the Internal Revenue Bureau, told me that was to be in my district.

Q. Was there any special consideration for a formation of the district with these boundaries?

A. None that I know of.

Q. When did you first apply for the position?

A. I first applied to Senator Sherman for some position that would be a suitable one for myself, soon after his election to the Senate—some time probably in January or February. I went with him, before I was appointed, to Mr. McCulloch, and to see the President also. I know that Mr. Sherman was a good deal fretted because of the delay in the appointment for me.

Q. You said that the President was anxious that you should be appointed. Can you state any reason for his anxiety on that subject?

A. I cannot state any particular reason.

Q. Was there any understanding that you were to support his policy?

A. Nothing was said about my supporting his policy at all. I believed with him in doctrine at that time.

Q. I understand you that at the time you were appointed, no district was assigned you?

A. None at all.

Q. During what portion of the time since you have been appointed agent have you been engaged in the business appertaining properly to that agency?

A. I suppose that off and on, I have not rendered more than four or five months active service in all; but I was ready to do duty whenever the department called on me to do it.

Q. During what part of the time have you been engaged in political transactions?

A. During last fall I was in the first place at the Philadelphia convention—senatorial delegate from Ohio. During the campaign of the fall I made speeches in different parts of the State.

Q. Those speeches were in support of the Presidential party?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What emoluments are attached to the office?

A. Two thousand dollars a year, as salary, and expenses while attending to the duties of the office, for which an oath has to be taken that they were expended in the duties of the office.

Q. What amount has been paid you for expenses during the time you have occupied the position?

A. I do not remember what has been paid. I have had to swear that everything which has been paid me was necessarily expended in the discharge of my duty.

Q. Are those accounts rendered monthly?

A. Monthly, or once in two months, as you please.

Q. Do you remember any bill rendered by you for board—nineteen days at Willard's Hotel, in this city?

A. I do not remember whether I did or not. It may be that I did; I was here.

Q. What time were you here—for what length of time?

A. I do not remember the exact length of time. I was here very anxious to have the bonds of Stone pressed. He had been collector out there in our district; had killed himself, and was a defaulter to the amount of $102,400. The securities were anxious that it should be pushed by the government, and I was endeavoring to have it done. While engaged in my investigations in Cincinnati, I found that Sands and that Corwine had been swindling the government in the decrees of the United States courts there, and I was anxious there should be some action taken in reference to them. I wanted them both removed. I put in my charges to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he telegraphed me to come on. When I got here you know how fast a subaltern is able to work business along in the department. I kept working at that here until I got the matter into Attorney General Speed's hands. The thing still drags along. I have been attending to it since I have been here this time. I considered myself occupied in the performance of the duties of my office while I was here.

Q. Were you engaged in anything else than the duties of your office while you were here?

A. Nothing else at all. I had nothing else to do.

Q. Are you privileged to go at any time into any part of the district to investigate any act connected with the revenue, at your own option, or do you act solely upon the orders of the department?

A. I find that I am privileged to go to any portion of my territory, but if the department orders me to any place of course I am compelled to obey the order.

Q. Is it the same with all the other agents?

A. I do not know; I presume it is.

Q. How many distilleries have you investigated?

A. I have looked at the distilleries up in Butler county—two or three of them. Then I have been to Harris' distillery in Montgomery county. I was two or three weeks in that investigation. It was a very tedious, troublesome one. I was at Hamilton Turner's distillery and investigated that. I believe those are all.

Q. How many other cases of alleged fraud have you investigated?

A. No other that I recollect this moment, except one in Pennsylvania.

Q. What other duties have you performed?

A. I have been to the offices of a number of the collectors to see about the condition of their bonds; to the offices of the two districts in Cincinnati, to that of Hamilton, and to the Cleveland office. I have been at various places for different purposes. Those are all the special duties which I now recollect that I have performed.

Q. You say you came to Washington in connection with the case of Sands and Corwine. Was it a part of your duty as revenue agent to attend to that case?

A. Yes, sir. It was a fraud upon the revenue department, and I desired to have them removed. Corwine resigned and Sands was removed.

Q. How long were you occupied in presenting charges and procuring their removal?

A. I do not know how long it was, but some time before I could get a hearing. I kept pressing the matter.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation in this city with any person, in which you used the language that you "didn't care a damn for the business of the office of revenue agent; that that was not your business," or words to that effect?

A. I do not think I ever used such language as that. It would certainly have been more foolish than I usually am.

Q. Are you certain that the President did not issue an order for your appointment, and that you did not receive it and carry it to the Treasury Department?

A. I did not receive it and carry it to the Treasury Department. I would not degrade myself by going there. I went to see Mr. McCulloch afterwards, and he told me he had appointed me.

Q. During those visits to Washington, did you not attend considerably to political affairs?

A. I used to talk politics, of course. If by political affairs you mean that I was conniving in any way with anybody or anything, I say that I did not.

Q. Was there not an understanding between you and the President that you were to be a pretty active political agent?

A. There was never anything that I remember as to any understanding on that subject.

Q. Have you not had conversations about that?

A. I have talked with the President about politics frequently.

Q. Has he not requested you to act as political agent in Ohio?

A. No, sir, he never asked me. On the contrary, when I have spoken to the President pointedly about some things, he has always been very reticent, as I thought, about them.

By Mr. Cook:

Q. During the months of August, September, and October of last year, were you engaged in the United States service connected with the revenue; and if so, in what?

A. I do not remember what I was doing during those months, exactly. I was out, I think, at different points, to see about the frauds I spoke of, but exactly where, I cannot at this time designate. I know I was at Cincinnati to look up the matters there of the fraud of Sands and Corwine, and of F. M. Wright. I think that was in the month of August, before the Philadelphia Convention. I was there, I think, twice or three times looking into the matter —two or three days, perhaps, each time.

Q. Were all the times you have spoken of, in the month of August?

A. I think so, but my recollection of dates is not sufficiently distinct to enable me to swear to it. I think, during the three months you have mentioned, I was at Zanesville, at Dayton, and perhaps at Hamilton. I would like, if you would allow me, to make a statement, to be put down, in regard to the duties I have performed connected with my office. My appointment at first was perhaps objectionable to Mr. Rollins. I was sent to Pennsylvania, as I have stated, to Mr. Lawrence's district, to make an investigation. I investigated the case very closely, and made a report which I submitted to Judge Swayne, who is my friend and near neighbor, and he thought the report was perfectly irresistible in its arguments and conclusions. But when it got to the department, it was met with scoffs and ridicule, more than anything else. I was under the impression that I possessed, perhaps, as much brains as the ordinary clerks of a department, and could as well appreciate when a case was properly made out for the department. But that report, as I have stated, was made the subject of ridicule, and nothing done in reference to it, so far as I know. After I came here, in connection with the Cincinnati case, I was subjected to every mortification, and met with nothing but scoffs and abuse while in the discharge of my duty. In the next place, the Attorney General of the State of Ohio, W. H. West, called my attention to frauds upon the part of the United States courts in Cincinnati, and insisted upon my investigation. I went there to investigate these frauds. I found that F. M. Wright had procured a decree of the court for forty-eight thousand dollars, one-half of which was due to the government of the United States, he being also entitled to a moiety as informer, and I came here with that and other cases at the time the bill for nineteen days' expenses is charged. I pursued the investigation, following it from room to room in the department, being received with no more consideration than a common loafer, and being subjected to every annoyance and mortification. I was compelled to go about a marked man in the department. Still I persisted in the investigation and found that the entire amount he had collected and paid over to the government was not more than six thousand dollars; and when the matter was reported to the department, instead of allowing me to go on with the investigation, they sent for Mr. Case, revenue agent of Indiana, to pursue it. I of course felt that the department did not want me. I knew that I was spotted, and determined from that time to wait until I was called on. Then Mr. Stone was a defaulter of $102,400 in my own town of Columbus. I made up a report of the matter and sent it to Washington, after which the department sent out there a man by the name of Thompson, from Washington, to reinvestigate the matter. I thought the department was determined to get rid of me, and that I would wait for orders. That is the reason why I have done no more active duty than I swear to having done.

Q. What portion of the time between the Philadelphia convention and the November following were you engaged in political campaigning?

A. I think I made probably twenty-three or four speeches in the State of Ohio during the campaign. I spoke three times in the wigwam in Brooklyn—one night twice, and another night once. During this time, of course, I bore my own expenses. I went from New York up to Plattsburg, and spoke from town to town all along Lake Champlain and the railroad. I think I made eleven speeches during the campaign in New York. When I came here I asked Mr. Rollins to assign me to other duty, but he said that would encroach upon the territory of others.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1867.

RUSH R. SLOAN sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Sandusky, Ohio.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am president of the Cincinnati, Dayton, and Eastern railroad; by profession a lawyer, and ex-special agent of the Post Office Department.

Q. Are you acquainted with President Johnson?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever have any interview with him in relation to a foreign appointment?

A. I do not think I ever did. I have no remembrance of any interview with the President, with regard to a foreign appointment.

Q. Did he ever tender an appointment, either in the diplomatic or civil service, to you?

A. He never did. I was in a position when I had my interview with the President. I had such a position tendered me, but not through the President. Through some personal friends in that State, who had the promise of one of several places for me. Senator Sherman was my particular friend.

Q. Were you holding any political position at the time you had any interviews with the President?

A. I was chairman of the Union central committee of Ohio.

Q. Was there anything said in any of your interviews with the President as to what he desired you to do, in reference to your position as chairman of that committee?

A. Mr. Johnson was very anxious to head off the action of the intense radical men in Congress, such as Stevens and Kelley of Pennsylvania, and Ashley of Ohio. He was very much opposed to their propositions when Congress convened in December, 1865. In the interviews I had with him, he was hoping that we in our State would not endorse their course. This was before the agreement of Congress upon the Constitutional amendment, while he was advocating his policy of allowing the loyal men in the southern States to govern these States. I will say to you here why I went to see the President. Several of the President's friends came to me while in Washington, and said the President wanted to see me. I went up there, sent in my card, and was received at once. I had never seen him before, but Mr. Johnson seemed to know all about me. We had a discussion on the topics of the day, which, I think, was the day of the Connecticut election. Mr. Johnson said it was very important, indeed, that the schemes of these men in Congress should not take possession of the hearts of the people of our State, and of the country. He was anxious to have everything done to head them off. I told the President that, before saying what we would be willing to do in Ohio, I wanted to know what he intended to do. I said it was charged against him that he proposed to organize a Johnson party; that others were saying he was going to revive the old democratic party; while his friends said that he intended to remain in the Union party. Mr. Johnson expressly said to me that he had no idea of doing anything else than remaining in the Union party. He said to me, "For everything I am, I am indebted to that party;" and he gave me that assurance in the strongest possible manner. I then said to the President that, as then advised, I concurred with him that the loyal men of the South should govern the South, and that I was willing to do what I could to carry out his policy. I had several interviews with him from that time until the passage of the Constitutional amendment. I was in favor of that amendment, and labored arduously in our State to secure, in the June convention of Ohio, an endorsement of that amendment, which we succeeded in doing. I then returned to Washington, and urged Mr. Johnson to accept the Constitutional amendment, assuring him that it was a plank, in my judgment, on which he could get back into the Union party. This interview occurred about the last of June, or the first day or two of July, and I had it partly at the instance of Governor Cox, of our State, who had been acting in concert with us up to that time, and who desired me to impress upon Mr. Johnson the importance of accepting that amendment. In this interview I plead with Mr. Johnson, to the extent of my ability, to accept this amendment. The President said he was very much incensed at what had been done, and regretted that the extreme radicals had not carried out their programme. I left with the understanding that the amendment did not meet with the approbation of the President. After that I kept on pursuing my official duties, and do not think I ever saw the President.

Q. Then I understand you to say that either directly or indirectly the President never indicated that patronage could be used for the purpose of advancing his own policy, and his opposition to Congress?

A. I do not think I said that. I said that the President, so far as he was concerned, did not offer me anything for pursuing the course I did.

Q. Did he offer anything for others?

A. He did say to me that in carrying out our views in Ohio, the offices should be given to his friends, and in pursuance of that statement, Colonel L. D. Campbell, J. H. Geiger, and General H. L. Burnett and myself waited upon the President once together, having united upon several changes in the State, and they were made.

Q. Did you at any time understand that the President desired the defeat of the Constitutional amendment?

A. This was before its passage. After its passage I had no interview with the President.

Q. This was, then, after you had the understanding that he desired to act with the Union party?

A. Yes, sir. The President said, "I have never appointed a copperhead to office, and so help me God, I never will." I recollect his making that exclamation.

Q. Did you have any interview with him, or communication from him, directly or indirectly, after the passage of the Constitutional amendment, and after he had taken his position in regard to it, in relation to the disposition of the patronage in Ohio?

A. Not after that, because the President understood from me that I went for the Constitutional amendment. After that the whole Johnson element was opposed to me, while I continued consistently straight-forward in support of the Constitutional amendment. I suppose I was the only federal officer in that State who did not respond to the Randall-Cowan-Doolittle circulars. They were sent to me one after another, but I did not respond to them.

Q. Were you removed, or did you resign?

A. I was removed. An intimation was given to me, not directly from the President, but directly from General Steadman and others, that I could remain in office if I went the policy. One gentleman visited me in Sandusky upon the subject.

Q. Who was he?

A. Mr. Armstrong, editor of the Cleveland Plaindealer. I told him I had no favors to ask of him or General Steadman; that I could take care of myself.

Q. You were removed then, as I understand, in consequence of your refusal to support his policy. Who was appointed in your place?

A. I held the double appointment of special agent of the Post Office Department for the State of Ohio, and of general agent for the northwest in charge of the contract service, provided by the bill for 1864–'65, and I was the only one in connection with the department who could fill the place. S. M. Penn was appointed special agent of Ohio, while the contract service was taken back to the department in Washington.

Q. Did Penn support the policy?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were Penn's political associations prior to his appointment?

A. Penn was a contestant with me for the appointment of special agent in the State of Ohio, and was an intense radical. I was subsequently appointed special agent at large, and Penn received that appointment, but a few months afterwards he was removed for inefficiency. I thought that injustice had been done him, and got him reinstated; but the department again removed him in a short time, as Judge Blair told me, for inefficiency. He was then a radical, and came to the State convention at Columbus an intense radical; but after the speech I made at the opening of the convention through which he found I was going the other chute, he filed off in the other direction and gained his appointment, also the appointment of his brother as collector.

Q. He then took his position in favor of the President, so far as you know, before any tender had been made to him of the office which he held?

A. My belief is that he changed during the convention, probably rather in the hope of getting office than in consequence of any promise made.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 14, 1867.

Hon. JEREMIAH S. BLACK affirmed and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Your residence is Washington?

A. I am a housekeeper here for the winter, but my proper residence is York, Pennsylvania.

Q. Did you prepare or have any part in the preparation of the message of the President vetoing the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, sent into the House of Representatives near the close of the last Congress?

WITNESS. There have been several communications between the President and me, entirely private and confidential, some of them relating to the subject indicated by your question. I do not think you ought to insist upon that question. I wish simply to enter a protest against your right to demand an answer. I am on record for this opinion, that a witness sworn to testify before any tribunal is bound in conscience to answer a question which that tribunal declares he ought to answer; that he is himself not the judge of what he ought to answer and what he ought not. Besides that, you have the power to compel an answer under penalties which I cannot resist. If, therefore, you insist upon my stating what private intercourse took place between me and the President upon this subject, or upon any other, I suppose I am bound to answer; but I submit to the Committee that you ought not to press that question. I ask the Committee to decide whether they will or not.

[The Committee, after consultation, determined to require the question to be answered.]

A. If the question relates to this paper as a whole, then I answer "no." If you mean to inquire whether any portion of the paper was suggested by me, or whether any part of it originated with me in form of expression, I answer "yes."

Q. Will you examine the printed copy of the message now shown you and marked "A," and state what parts of it were prepared by you?

A. I do not believe that I can do so. Some of these expressions were put into writing by me, but nearly the whole, if not quite all of them, after being submitted to the President, were by him, or by somebody else, very much changed. If I had written the message, or if I had had a carte blanche to write it, and the President had signed what I would have written, or what I did write, it would have been a much more objectionable document to the majority in Congress than it is; much more in violation of what now seems to be the sentiment in Congress upon the subject; not objectionable to me and that class of people in this country who think as I do upon constitutional questions. The beginning of this paper—that portion of it especially which analyzes the bill vetoed—I think, was used by him out of material that I furnished more freely and with less alteration than any other part. But everything that I wrote was afterwards toned down, whether by him or some one else I do not know, because I never had any communication with him after I handed over the paper. I have not seen him since.

Q. To what point in the message does the first part of which you speak and which you say has been adopted by the President with less alteration than any other, extend?

A. None of it was adopted without any alteration at all. It extends until the close of the analysis which is made of the law. First, it takes up the preamble of the bill, and denies that the ground for it is sufficient in point of fact. Then it analyzes the bill itself, and states the apparent object of it. That is the portion of it to which I refer.

Q. On what page does that part of the message end?

A. It runs down to the seventh page.

Q. Can you point out any parts of the message which did not originate with you, either in substance or form?

A. Yes; here is a paragraph which did not originate with me, and yet it is expressed exactly in my language. It originated with somebody else; I cannot tell you who; I presume with the President himself. It was originally very much more extended than it is here. I reduced, in my own language, what I thought was the substance of a very long paper into this one paragraph, which you will find on pages eight and nine, commencing, "Invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence were anticipated when the government was framed." That paragraph is a reduction of mine of a disquisition upon the same subject, more diffused. I repeat that I do not think there is a paragraph in this paper as printed in the exact language written by me, and I repeat that the difference between anything I wrote and anything that is found in this message is, that it is all toned down from much stronger expressions in the same direction into something considerably tame. Now, you ask me for something I did not have anything to do with. The paragraph contained in page nine, commencing, "This is a bill passed by Congress in time of peace," and continuing on to the first break on page eleven, I never saw until after the message was delivered. The next paragraph, about trial by jury, is one which is partly mine. I have a weakness for that portion of the Constitution. I never did, and I suppose I will go to my grave without being able to, speak of a violation of that portion of the Constitution without a certain amount of boiling and indignation. What I would have written in the shape of a message, if I were allowed to take my own way, would have been more strong in vindication of that right; and what I did write on that subject I suppose was a little too strong—thought, I suppose, to be so—and there is very little of it here. And what is here said about the writ of habeas corpus and warrant without arrest is mine. I do not think, however, there is much use to talk about the writ of habeas corpus and warrant without arrest, if the fundamental principle that a man is to have the right to a trial by a jury of his countrymen, is to be disregarded. It is not worth while to talk of anything else; all the rest is but "leather and prunella." The next paragraph to the last, which is a long one, is a spliced concern. I do not recognize it as coming from me, though there are expressions scattered here and there through it that I think I must have used. It begins, "The evils which spring from the unsettled state of our government will be acknowledged by all," and asserts the necessity of settling it by adherence to the Constitution, or by some plan or course of administration which will be within the Constitution, and the admission of representatives of the southern States into Congress. That question about the admission of the southern States, or of members of Congress from the southern States, is one I do not pretend to have written. I never expressed anything upon the subject, except the general right of the States to be represented.

Q. Was the argument which you prepared, in your own estimation, a paper covering the entire ground of a veto message, substantially, and in what you would regard as the proper form of a veto message?

A. It was in that form. The President did not request me to put it in any particular form. He wanted me to put in form—that is, to put in writing—expressions which he had given, and in which we perfectly agreed, which I did; for instance, in this first paragraph; and the paper which I wrote then went on as if it might have been signed and sent in as a message, but there was no understanding that was to be done. It was distinctly understood that he was to change, alter, or modify it as he pleased.

Q. This work was done by you on the request of the President, was it?

A. Yes, I may say that it was done at the request of the President, to the extent that he requested it.

Q. You did not volunteer your services?

A. No, sir.

Q. When, as far as you recollect, did you first converse with the President upon the subject treated in the message?

A. In the fall of 1860.

Q. And when since then?

A. The President and I, when these troubles first broke out, happened to coincide in our opinions exactly. I approved of his course, very fully, in the Senate, and he did of mine as a member of the executive administration. We had some little conversation at that time, and possibly took some little fancy for one another, in consequence of our agreement of opinion. I saw something of him again, just before he went to Tennessee, soon after the new inauguration of the administration, and we agreed then. After the war broke out, I saw but little of him. After he became President, I did not see him for three or four months, and then perhaps would not have seen him, except for the fact that a friend of his induced me to believe that he would be glad to see me. I did see him, and in the conversation which we had, spoke only of public questions, and of the dangers which I regarded the country as exposed to. From that time to this, we have never spoken upon any other subject that I know of. I am unable to recall a single conversation between him and me upon any subject but what related to the public affairs of the country—occasionally, of course, we would speak of men in connection with it.

Q. Have you at any time within the last two years had any conversation with the President upon the question whether the Thirty-ninth Congress was a constitutional organization or not?

A. Never. I considered that a closed question with him.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Friday, March 29th, 1867.

THOMAS B. FLORENCE sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. My residence is in Philadelphia. I am a sojourner in this city.

Q. There has been some testimony before the committee in reference to some soldiers of West Virginia, whose names had been struck from the rolls for desertion or other military offences, and who were restored last October, by order of the President, and the testimony is that you had some agency in the restoration. Do you recollect the circumstances referred to?

A. Yes; there were two matters of that kind which I had some agency in; one of a Pennsylvania, and the other of a West Virginia regiment. Four or five days before the Pennsylvania election of 1866, a person well known as Colonel Capehart, a stranger to me, called on me, and said that Mr. William Montgomery, of Pennsylvania, a former member of Congress, had written to him to ask me to aid him in getting certain persons, who otherwise would be disfranchised from voting, and saying that, as the election would be pretty close, these six votes might determine the result. I asked him what interest he had in the matter, and he said he desired that Montgomery would be elected; I said, "So do I. My sympathies are running in that direction, and if these people ought to be restored to the service, and have been unjustly deprived of their franchise, you may bet your life I will try and get them restored, especially to benefit my friend Montgomery." I went to the President's, and saw Robert Johnson. I said to him, "These men have served faithfully. Colonel Capehart says they have been unjustly deprived of their privileges. Here are evidences enough to satisfy me, at least, that they have been; and I think you ought to restore them. That is my judgment about it." He said, "I will speak to the President in reference to it." I am not certain that I did not write a letter on the subject; but I think not, because the letters were sufficient to show that the men were unjustly dealt with. I do not recollect the circumstances of the case, except that they had been prisoners of war, I think, and that they were put down as deserters. That is what Capehart said. I saw the President's private secretary, and said to him, "Here are six men who, I think, ought to be restored to the service. They have been unfairly stricken from the rolls. I wish you would take an interest in it. I feel anxious that they should be restored, for two reasons: first, if they have been unjustly deprived of their right of franchise, they ought to be restored to it; and, in the next place I would like to serve Bill Montgomery." I believe they were restored; and that is the whole of that.

In reference to the West Virginia men, that was just the same case. A gentleman came to me saying that these men had been left off the rolls because they had been held as prisoners of war, and were not at the muster—or something of that kind. I went up again to the Executive mansion and said: "Here is an identical case. All the officers of the regiment allege that these men were unfairly deprived of their privileges, or will be, under the laws of West Virginia, if they are not restored to the service." That is all. I think they were restored. I think the Secretary of War was present at the time, and that the papers were presented to him in the Executive mansion. I think the process was pretty close on the election, within a very few days of the election.

Q. Did you have an interview with the President in reference to these West Virginia men.?

A. No, sir. I never spoke to the President on the subject.

Q. Did you have a letter addressed to the President on the subject?

A. No, sir; I am not sure that I had.

Q. A letter from Mr. Andrews, the candidate for Congress?

A. I do not recollect it. There may have been such a paper with the papers, but I do not know anything at all about it. It was an affair con amore with me. I did not ask what the men's politics were, and do not know to this hour. I presumed that they were going to vote right as I understood it.

Q. Did Mr. McEwen have an interview with you on the subject?

A. Yes; he called my attention to it.

Q. Do you recollect whether he put into your hands a letter from Mr. Andrews to the President?

A. No, sir; I think not. I had no letters to the President per se. Whatever letters there were, were cumulative evidence in the case.

Q. Did you yourself take any letters or papers to the Executive mansion in reference to the West Virginia cases?

A. My judgment is that I took all the papers there. I took the case there and called Bob Johnson's attention to it, and said that it was a case which ought to have early consideration. My sympathies were aroused. I thought they were men who had served faithfully in the army, and that by an accident of war they had been deprived of their privileges. There were some two or three hundred of them, I think. I made no particular examination, as it was put upon the ground that it was a simple act of justice.

Q. Are you able to recollect any of the names?

A. No, sir. I went over to General Townsend's office, and saw that the thing had been ordered by the Secretary of War. I did not suppose that he would do anything that was wrong in itself, and it never entered my brain that there was anything in it but justice. I was a general volunteer in doing a good act, as I understood it. I never opened my lips to the President on the subject. I supposed it was to go through the hopper of the War Department I never brought anything to the Executive mansion requiring official consideration of the government, that had action upon it until it was investigated.

Q. Those papers you took direct to the executive department?

A. Yes, sir; that is my habit. I like papers to start there, because it saves the trouble of their coming back. If I have letters asking appointments in any of the departments, I almost always go with them to the head and leave them, not with the President, because I seldom see him. I have no time to wait an opportunity to see him. I did not regard this as a matter that required his personal intervention.

Q. You did not yourself make any examination of these papers to know whether the deprivation of privileges in those cases was due to actual wilful desertion?

A. No, sir. I understood it to arise from the accidents of war. The letters seemed to be from such sources that there could be no doubt about it. They were from the officers of the regiment, who certified to the facts. I was satisfied in my own mind, without any critical examination, that the men should be restored.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Mr. McEwen has spoken of a letter written by Mr. Andrews, one of the candidates for Congress from that district, addressed to the President, and has stated that he delivered it to you with other papers?

A. It is possible. (The substance of the letter was here read to the witness from McEwen's testimony.) I think there was such a letter, now that my memory is refreshed. There may have been something of a political nature that impressed me. I think I recollect something of that kind. I do not believe the President ever saw the letters. I think they went at once to the War Department or to the Secretary of War. They certainly had the consideration of the War Department and its consent. I looked over all the letters as a mere matter of form. They were cumulative as to the justice of the act to be done.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you bring back a letter from the President to Capehart?

A. Certainly not. The President never gave me a letter in his life. I did not see the President at all on the subject.

Q. Did you in any way procure a letter from the President?

A. No; certainly I did not.

Q. Did you procure an order from the President for these men to be discharged, and did you deliver it to Capehart or McEwen?

A. No, sir; of course I did not.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Did you receive any pecuniary or other consideration for your services in that matter?

A. I respectfully decline to answer. I can say, however, that this service was performed by me without any hope or expectation of pecuniary consideration.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you know Capehart?

A. Not intimately.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

A. You are the editor of the Constitutional Union newspaper?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you ever submitted to the President any articles prepared for your paper before their being printed?

A. No, sir; never. I never submitted an article to him before it was printed, and never conversed with him on the subject.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did the President ever write any articles for your paper?

A. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 1, 1867.

Hon. E. M. STANTON recalled and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you in your possession, as Secretary of War, the papers relating to the pardon of certain West Virginia soldiers, about 192 in number, in October or November last?

A. I have, and here produce the papers, except the rolls, before the Committee. The first purports to be a letter dated at Washington city, October 22, 1866, addressed to his Excellency, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and signed "M. McEwen, M. D., late surgeon-in-chief 2d cavalry division, and brevet colonel U. S. volunteers." Endorsed thereon is an order signed by Andrew Johnson, dated October 23, 1866, to the following effect: "Referred to the honorable the Secretary of War All pains and penalties attaching to these men on account of the charge of desertion are remitted, and the charge will be removed from the rolls. Andrew Johnson. October 23, 1866." Immediately below it is an endorsement by myself, to the following effect: "Referred to the Adjutant General to issue an order in conformity with the above by the President. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War."

Q. As far as the files of the department show, was there any paper transmitted to your department from the President, at the same time the one last referred to was received?

A. There was none at that time that I have any knowledge of. The letter of Surgeon McEwen, with the endorsement of the President, was brought to me by some one, I cannot now recollect whether by Mr. McEwen or whether it was transmitted in the ordinary course by the President. I read the order of the President and immediately endorsed my order below, and sent it down to the Adjutant General. The letter of Surgeon McEwen I did not then read, and have never read it since.

Q. Was there any investigation made into the nature of the offences committed, or said to have been committed, by these men, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were real deserters, or nominal deserters?

A. No investigation was made by me. Shortly after the order was sent to the Adjutant General, probably the same day, he reported to me that he thought the President had been deceived in reference to that application, for he found that one or more of the persons ordered to be relieved had deserted to the enemy. I immediately went to the President, and asked him whether he was aware of that fact, and whether he desired to have such persons released. He said he was not aware of the fact and certainly did not mean to order their release, and directed me to have an investigation made as to how many of them belonged to that class. I returned instantly to the War Department and gave directions to the Adjutant General to examine how many of them belonged to that class, and not to embrace them in the order. I understood that on examination it was found that only one belonged to that class, and he was not embraced in the order. What investigation was made in reference to the others I am unable to say. I acted upon the order that was endorsed upon the letter.

Q. Have you any knowledge of a letter to the President from a man of the name of Andrews, of West Virginia, in reference to the cases named?

A. I have not; I do not think I ever heard of such a letter. At some later period after this transaction it was reported to me by the Adjutant General that the description of some of the persons was found to be erroneously stated on an examination of the rolls, and I directed him to correct and make the description in accordance with the rolls.

Q. Do you know anything of any other case of a character similar to these?

A. I cannot specify any particular case. I know that frequent applications are made to me to relieve persons who are marked on the roll as deserters, and it may be that some have been ordered by the President. Wherever I have thought a case to be meritorious, I have directed a corresponding entry to be made on the rolls, so as to relieve the party from an erroneous charge of desertion. A resolution of Congress has called for a report embracing all the cases of that kind, and it is now in course of preparation in the War Department.

Q. Is it your practice to order an inquiry into each particular case?

A. My general practice is to refer the application to the officer of the War Department who has charge of the subject, for report. If, however, the papers were such as to satisfy me that an error or mistake had been committed to the prejudice of the soldier, I would make the order without further investigation. I suppose it has been done in both cases. Unless I was satisfied upon the papers presented that an error had been committed, I have always directed an examination to be made, and then sometimes I overrule the report of the officer if he comes to a conclusion different from what in my judgment the facts warrant.

Q. Will you furnish the Committee with copies of the papers you have presented this morning, and also with a copy of the order issued by the War Department?

A. I have here and now deliver to the Committee a certified copy of the order issued from the War Department, and will furnish copies of the other papers. The order referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 1, 1867.

It appears from the records of this office that the annexed copy of special orders, No. 582, November 21, 1866, is a true copy of the original order on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I, Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Department of War of the United States of America to be hereunto affixed on this first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Official:

R. WILLIAMS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Q. Have you seen the diary said to have been taken from the body of J. Wilkes Booth after his death?

A. I have; I saw it the day on which it was brought to town by the officers who captured Booth. I examined it carefully at that time, and directed it to be delivered to the Judge Advocate General, in whose possession I think it has been from that time until it was produced here before the Committee on a former occasion, and returned by the Committee to Judge Holt, in the committee-room. I have not seen it since.

Q. From whom did you receive the diary?

A. It was brought to my house by provost marshal Baker and some other person with him, whose name I do not now remember. General Eckert, assistant Secretary of War, either came with them, or was sent for, and came a few minutes after they did. They—Baker and the officer—came together, according to my present recollection, and brought the diary wrapped in an envelope or newspaper, with other things taken from the body of Booth.

Q. Was the diary left with you at that time, or did Baker take it away?

A. It was not retained in my possession. It was either taken away by Baker or by General Eckert at the time, to be delivered to the Judge Advocate General, with the other matters found on the person of Booth.

Q. Can you state more definitely the day on which you first saw this diary?

A. I cannot fix the date, except by the fact that it was the first time I had seen Baker after the capture of Booth. I understood at the time that he—Baker—had just reached town; had gone to the War Department, found me absent, and then came to my house. This was about the 26th of April, 1865.

Q. Was the diary at any other time in your possession?

A. Never. It may have been in my presence at the time the Judge Advocate General and Mr. Bingham, and other officers were consulting in regard to the case. I have no recollection, however, of that fact.

Q. When you saw the diary in the room of the Committee on the Judiciary, was your attention called to the circumstance that certain leaves had been cut or torn from it?

A. My attention was called to it at that time. I had observed the fact at the time on which I first saw the diary. I examined it then with great care; read over all the entries in it, and noticed that leaves had been cut or torn from it at the time.

Q. According to your recollection, was the diary, when you saw it in the committee-room, in the same condition it was when you first saw it?

A. It was precisely in the same condition, so far as I could judge—not an entry added or abstracted from it. On both occasions I examined it very carefully. The impression on my mind at the time I examined it was, that it was a book which had been carried in the pocket of Booth, from which he had cut or torn out leaves as he desired to use them, or wanted to destroy something written on them. I saw no evidence that it contained or had contained anything in relation to the assassination of Mr. Lincoln except what was in it the last time it was before the Committee. I had no suspicion at the time that it had, and I examined with great care for the purpose of ascertaining whether there could be any trace of other persons connected with Booth in the assassination conspiracy. There were in the book, as the chairman of the Committee will remember, certain photographs of ladies, which were replaced in it at the time it was delivered to the Judge Advocate General in the committee-room.

Q. Do you know whether there is in the War Department a report made by General Baker to General Fry or the Secretary of War, in reference to pardons of persons who had been convicted by courts or military commissions?

A. There may be, but I have no recollection of seeing any such report.

Q. Will you cause an examination to be made, and, if such a report exists, furnish the Committee with it?

A. I will.

Q. Have you any recollection of a paper which purported to be a copy of portions of letters examined in Canada by General Baker, and said to relate to the assassination of Lincoln?

A. I remember a paper, containing what purported to be extracts from several letters said to have been written by Mr. Davis, being shown to me either by Baker or Judge Holt. My best recollection is that they were shown to me by Judge Holt, who consulted with me as to the means of getting possession of the letters. The matter was left entirely to his judgment and action, and I think that the paper was taken away by him. It was taken by whoever showed it to me. I did not retain it in my possession, and never saw it but once.

Q. Have you any definite recollection of the contents of that paper?

A. I have not. I could not now repeat a word it contained.

Q. What was the report made to you, if any, as to the probability of obtaining these letters, and at what cost?

A. The report made to me was, that such letters were in existence, and could be procured for a large sum of money. The precise sum I do not recollect, but I think it was about $10,000. I declined to authorize that or any sum to be paid for the letters unless the originals were produced to Judge Holt, and he was satisfied that they were genuine letters, and that they contained evidence of sufficient importance to the government to warrant the payment of the money demanded, or for which they could be procured. I required him to be satisfied of these facts, and to make an official report to me in regard to it before I would determine to make any advance of money.

Q. Did you inform the President of the fact, as made known to you at any time, that these letters were supposed to be in existence?

A. I did not. I never communicated with the President on the subject. The investigation of the subject-matter was in charge of the Judge Advocate General as the proper officer of the War Department. He made his application to me when he wanted either an advance of money or authority, and it was given or withheld by me on my own responsibility, according as my judgment of the interests of the government and of truth and justice required.

Q. Did the President at any time give you any direction or advice, or make any suggestion as to what should or should not be done in reference to the investigation of the subject of the assassination?

A. He never did. I think the subject was never mentioned between him and me. I believed that in the hands of the Judge Advocate General everything would be done that was proper to be done to discover the facts, and procure all the testimony in existence upon the subject. I conceived my own powers to be ample. I had no disposition to stint the exercise of those powers, and no occasion to apply to the President for any authority upon the subject, and I never consulted him in regard to it, so far as I have any recollection.

The following papers, called for by the Committee, were subsequently handed in by the witness:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 2, 1867.

SIR: By direction of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to enclose herewith certified copies of letter dated October 22, 1866, from Dr. M. McEwen to the President, with two enclosures and endorsements of the President and Secretary of War, in relation to removing penalties of desertion from certain West Virginia soldiers.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, pro tem.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 1, 1867.

It appears from the records of this office that the annexed documents are true copies of the originals on file.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Be it known that E. D. Townsend, who has signed the foregoing certificate, is an assistant adjutant general of the army of the United States, and that to his attestation as such, full faith and credit are and ought to be given.

In testimony whereof, I, Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Department of War of the United States of America to be hereunto affixed on this first day of April, one thousand, eight hundred and sixty-seven.

[SEAL.] EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., October 22, 1866.

SIR: The soldiers whose names will be found in the accompanying list were nearly all marked absent without leave in the year 1864, during that terrible campaign to Lynchburg, under command of Major General Hunter. In the cavalry those so marked had their horses killed, and were obliged like the disabled infantry to make their way back within our lines or hide in the mountains until the command returned. If a soldier is absent at three roll calls, and the officers do not know where he is, he is marked a deserter. When that record is made, a trial by court-martial is necessary to remove the charge. This opportunity these men never had. They rejoined their respective commands and served nobly to the end of the war; when mustered out of service they were unable to draw the pay due them.

You will perceive there has been a selection made of the deserving men from each regiment; the small number taken from each is proof of that fact. I do not consider these men deserters; they certainly never intended or thought of deserting, and justice requires that the charge should be removed, and thus restore them to all the rights and privileges of soldiers and citizens. These men are registered and want to vote, but will be debarred unless the disability is removed.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, yours,

M. McEWEN, M. D.,
Late Surgeon-in-Chief 2d Cav. Div., and Bv't Col. U. S. A.

His Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

The communication of which the foregoing is a copy, bears the following endorsements:

"Referred to the honorable the Secretary of War. All pains and penalties attaching to these men on account of the charge of desertion are remitted, and the charge will be removed from the rolls.

"ANDREW JOHNSON.

"OCTOBER 23, 1866."

"Referred to the Adjutant General to issue order in conformity with above by the President.

"E. M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War."

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 24, 1866.

Assistant Adjutant General.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 2, 1867.

Hon. JOSEPH HOLT sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. You were examined before the Judiciary Committee of the 39th Congress?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you in your possession a book, understood to be the diary taken from the body of J. Wilkes Booth, after his death?

A. I have, and now present it to the Committee.

Q. When and from whom did you receive it?

Q. I stated, I think, in my former examination that I could not say positively from whose hands I received it. It came to me through the War Department or from some one of the officers connected with the pursuit and capture of Booth. The precise person who gave it into my hands I cannot now designate; nor can I state the precise time. It was, I think, during the trial of the assassins. I remember having it in my possession during that trial, and to have examined a witness relative to the following passage which occurs in it: "This night, before the deed, I wrote a long article and left it for one of the editors of the National Intelligencer, in which I fully set forth our reasons for our proceedings." Having seen that, I sent for Mr. Coyle, the principal publisher of the Intelligencer, as was understood, and examined him before the military commission as to whether any such article had been received, or whether he had any knowledge whatever of its existence. He stated that he had no knowledge whatever of any such article. There was nothing in the diary which I could conceive would be testimony against any human being, or for any one except Booth himself, and he being dead, I did not offer it to the Commission. I will state that it has been in my possession ever since, and kept locked up at my residence almost invariably. It is now in precisely the same condition that it was when it came into my hands.

Q. How long after the death of Booth was it, according to your recollection, when you first saw the diary?

A. As I stated, I think it was during the trial, and very soon after the body of Booth was brought here. I do not remember the date. The diary was in the possession of other officers of the Department—probably with the Secretary of War, or assistant Secretary—before it came to me.

Q. General Eckert was assistant Secretary?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you first saw the diary, did you observe that leaves were missing?

A. Oh, yes, sir; just as it is now. There is one leaf as you observe in there, on which a note was written to Dr. Stewart, I think, some one who had denied him hospitality on the way, which seems to have been torn from the diary.

Q. Are you in possession of any fact which furnishes an explanation of the absence of these leaves?

A. I am not. I have only my conjectures about it. I have nothing on which to base them. You observe this is an old diary, one which had evidently been a good deal used by him. I think it not unlikely that the missing leaves contained current entries in regard to his personal matters which he did not choose to have exposed, and that he had torn them out himself; or, there is another theory which may possibly have been the correct one; they may have contained entries which compromised his friends and co-conspirators, and he for that reason tore them out. I am rather inclined to the other opinion, because the entry begins with April 13, 1865, the day before and the day of the assassination. Probably it contains all that was in the diary on that subject. It was evidently written after the events, because the language is a recitation or narrative of what had occurred, and was evidently (I think there can be no doubt about that, if you examine it carefully,) written for publication, in view of the possibility, as I suppose, of his capture; it being a somewhat dramatic, passionate vindication of himself and exultation over his crime. The entries continue down to the 21st of April. They are not continued up to his capture. It does not appear even that he had crossed the river when they ceased.

Q. Have you an opinion as to whether the leaves were torn or cut out?

A. I should suppose the leaves were cut out.

Q. At one time, or at different times?

A. I do not think it would be possible to form an opinion as to that?

Q. Do you know whether or not any copy of what is written in the diary has ever been taken?

A. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Q. Will you read the entries in the diary?

The entries are in pencil, and read as follows:

"April 13 and 14; Friday, the ides. Until to-day, nothing was ever thought of sacrificing to our country's wrongs. For six months we had worked to capture, but our cause being almost lost, something decisive and great must be done. But its failure was owing to others who did not strike for their country with a heart. I struck boldly, and not as the papers say. I walked with a firm step through a thousand of his friends, was stopped, but pushed on; a Colonel was at his side; I shouted 'sic semper' before I fired; in jumping broke my leg; I passed all his pickets; rode sixty miles that night, with the bone of my leg tearing the flesh at every jump. I can never repent it, though we hated to fail. Our country owed all her troubles to him, and God simply made me the instrument of his punishment. The country is not what it was. This forced Union is not what I have loved. I care not what becomes of me. I have no desire to outlive my country. This night, before the deed, I wrote a long article, and left it for one of the editors of the National Intelligencer, in which I fully set forth our reasons for our proceedings. (There is here a sentence not finished—something about the government.)

"Friday, 21. After being hunted like a dog, through swamps, woods, and last night being chased by gunboats, until we were forced to return, wet, cold, and starving, with every man's hand against me, I am here in despair, and why? For doing what Brutus was honored for, what made Tell a hero; and yet, I, for striking down a greater tyrant than they ever knew, am looked upon as a common cut-throat. My action was purer than either of theirs. One hoped to be great; the other had not only his country's but his own wrongs to revenge. I hoped for no greatness. I knew no friend's wrong; I struck for my country, and that alone—a country that groaned beneath this tyranny, and prayed for this end; and yet, now, behold the cold hand they extend to me. God cannot pardon me, if I have done wrong; yet, I cannot see my wrong, except in seeing a degenerate people. The little, the very little I left behind to clear my name, the government will not allow to be printed.

"So ends all. For my country I have given up all that makes life sweet and holy, brought misery upon my family, but am sure there is no pardon in the heavens for me, since man condemns me so. I have only heard of what was done, except what I did myself, and it fills me with horror. God try and forgive me and bless my mother.

"To-night I will once more try the river with the intent to cross, though I have a greater desire, and almost a mind, to return to Washington, and in a measure clear my name, which I feel I can do. I do not repent the blow I struck. I may before my God, but not to man. I think I have done well, though I am branded with the curse of Cain upon me, when if the world knew my heart, that one blow would have made me great, though I did desire no greatness.

"To-night, I try to escape these bloodhounds once more. Who, who, can read his fate? God's will be done. I have too great a soul to die like a criminal. Oh! may He, may He, spare me that, and let me die bravely. I bless the entire world. I have never hated or wronged any one. This last, was not a wrong, unless God deems it so, and it is with him to condemn or bless me. And, for this brave boy, who often prays, yes, before and since, with a true and sincere heart, was it a crime in him? If so, why can he pray the same? I do not wish to shed a drop of blood, 'but I must fight the course,' it is all that is left me."

This is all that is written in the diary, except some figures and letters, unintelligible to me, though it is probable they were memoranda intended to indicate where he was in his flight on certain days of the week and month.

WASHINGTON, May 6, 1867.

GEORGE A. TRENHOLM sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Give your name and occupation.

A. Charleston, South Carolina; no occupation at present. I was a merchant previous to November, 1864.

Q. Were you secretary of the treasury of the confederate States, so called, during the rebellion?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what period of time?

A. From July, 1864, until the 1st of April, 1865.

Q. Had you been connected with the operations of the confederate government in any way previous to the time you were in the treasury; if so, in what way?

A. No. I was not connected with their operations in any way. The house of John Fraser & Co., of which I was a partner previous to this, frequently sold the confederate government, goods, but they had no connection, properly speaking, with them; that is, no different relations with them than would any other citizen of the so called confederacy. Perhaps I should add that we did sometimes transact business required to be done by them in Charleston, such as purchasing bills of exchange, &c., but we were not their agents, nor had we any official connection with them.

Q. Had you a house or a branch house in Liverpool or elsewhere abroad?

A. Yes, sir; we had a house in Liverpool, of which some of the members of the house in Charleston were partners, and some members of the Liverpool house were partners in the Charleston house.

Q. Were you a partner in the Liverpool house?

A. I was.

Q. Was the Liverpool house in any way the agent of the confederacy?

A. Yes, sir; the Liverpool house was their financial agent, or rather their depository in Liverpool—not, properly speaking, their financial agent, because they had other financial agents in Europe—in Liverpool and elsewhere.

Q. As a depository, what services did your house perform?

A. They received and sold cotton shipped to their address by the confederate government, and paid the drafts drawn against the same. They negotiated no loans, and made no negotiations of any kind for, or in behalf of, the confederate government.

Q. Did they at any time purchase or contract for building vessels?

A. They did, but not directly as the agent of the confederate government.

Q. Was your house in Charleston engaged during the war in bringing any goods from England and elsewhere?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To what extent or to what amount was that business carried on during the war?

A. I could hardly state. I was not always in Charleston; indeed, I was very little there. I left Charleston, and resided in Columbia very soon after the commencement of the war. In July, 1861, I went to Richmond, and in November, 1864, I retired from the firm and business altogether.

Q. You say that contracts were made by your house in Liverpool in behalf of the confederate government for the building of ships, with other agents of the confederate government; can you name these agents?

A. I think their chief and, in fact, only direct contract was made with Mr. McRae from Alabama—I do not remember his first name—who went out there as the agent of the confederate government.

Q. Was that contract fulfilled before the end of the war?

A. No, it was not.

Q. To what did it relate?

A. To the building of some steamers for running the blockade, not war vessels.

Q. How many steamers were to be built?

A. I do not remember; I think it was seven.

Q. Who was the contractor to build them?

A. I do not know.

Q. And those steamers were not delivered either to your house or to the confederate government.

A. No; not to my knowledge. One or two of them may have been delivered. There were very large operations carried on by these agents of the confederate government in England, of which I had no knowledge at all, and after I retired from the firm in 1864, I had no correspondence at all with the Liverpool house. What I heard of the operations of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., after I came into the treasury department in Richmond, was incidental. There were a good many transactions on the part of these agents of the confederate government which came under my observation, for the quartermaster's, ordnance, and commissary departments. They all had agents of their own abroad.

Q. Did the confederate government agent McRae furnish funds to your house in Liverpool for the payment of these vessels?

A. No; it was a part of the contract that our house was to advance the money.

Q. Do you know whether they did advance the money to the contractor who was to build the ships?

A. I do not know, of my own knowleege; I have no doubt they did. The money account of the house with the confederate government at that time did not admit of anything except paying ordinary drafts drawn upon them. The steamers were built, and the money, I have no doubt, was advanced by our house in Liverpool.

Q. Have you the means of ascertaining fully the account of goods imported by your house, during the war, by running the blockade?

A. I really cannot tell; I might ascertain the amount in Charleston, perhaps. A great many books were lost, but I think they preserved most of the books of the firm.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Could you not form an approximate estimate of the amount?

A. I do not think I could.

Q. Would it amount to as much as a million?

A. I presume it would; and if you include the cargoes belonging to other parties consigned to them, it would amount to much more than that. They did not seek these consignments; they rather sought not to have them. In fact, the very first cargo that came to the port of Charleston after the blockade had been established, came consigned to them without any previous knowledge at all of the enterprise on their part. It was a vessel owned entirely by British subjects.

Q. Had your house any vessels employed in running the blockade?

A. Yes; they owned several vessels, and they lost several by capture.

Q. And these vessels continued to run the blockade during the war, whenever they found it practicable?

A. Yes; carrying cotton out and bringing goods back.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Suits have been instituted by the United States against your house in England, have they not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know when the first proceedings were instituted?

A. No, I don't; in fact I have very little information about these suits except what I have seen in the papers. As I said before, I have had no correspondence with the members of the firm, although my intimacy still continues with them individually.

Q. As a partner, are you interested in the result of these suits?

A. No, sir; I am not. I terminated, bona fide, my interest in both houses in 1864, and have not been connected with any transactions of theirs' since that time.

Q. You have not been consulted in regard to the management of the house abroad?

A. Not at all; indeed I do not think they ever consulted their partners in Charleston. In fact their partners in this country knew nothing of the contract, or of the proceedings or transactions connected with it, until the termination of the war.

Q. Have you obtained a pardon from the President of the United States?

A. Yes; I received a pardon about six months ago. I do not recollect the exact date.

Q. Do you remember about the time it was dated?

A. I do not.

Q. How soon after the date did you receive it?

A. I received it two or three days after its date.

Q. Did you make application, personally, to the President or Attorney General in connection with it?

A. No, I did not. This is the first time I have been in Washington since the termination of the war. I made application by letter; I wrote to the President directly.

Q. Have you a copy of the letter you addressed to him?

A. I have not. I addressed him in his official capacity. I never wrote a private letter to him. Everything I wrote to him must be on file in the pardon bureau. In fact the last letter I wrote, I think I sent through the pardon bureau directed to the President, under cover of the bureau.

Q. Did you employ anybody as solicitor or attorney to aid you in obtaining the pardon.?

A. No; I did not. When the war terminated by the surrender of the confederate armies, I made up my mind that all hostility was at an end. I had entire confidence in the magnanimity of the American people, and in the clemency of the government. I made no attempt to conceal myself, or to escape, but went directly home. Very soon after, I wrote a letter to the President stating what my offence had been and soliciting a pardon. My friend, the Rev. Mr. Porter, came to Washington some time last fall, had a personal interview with the President, and obtained a pardon He had the endorsement of General Sickles and General Howard, the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. He had also the endorsement of some gentlemen, personal friends of his, not known to me.

Q. The Rev. Mr. Porter resides in Charleston?

A. Yes, sir; he is the pastor of the church of the Holy Communion in that city.

Q. As I understand you, you addressed a letter to the President very soon after the surrender; did you get any response to that letter?

A. No, I did not.

Q. When did you next communicate with the President?

A. I addressed him the first letter, I think before his proclamation of amnesty of the 29th of May, 1865, came out. The second application was addressed to him from Fort Pulaski. I think it must have been in the month of July, 1865.

Q. Did you get any response to that?

A. That communication I sent through the pardon bureau, enclosed to Mr. Pleasants, chief clerk, with the request that he would deliver it to the President of the United States. I got a note from Mr. Pleasants saying he had delivered it to the President's private secretary. I got no answer from the President himself. I had never seen him until Saturday morning last, when I called upon him simply to pay him my respects.

Q. When did you next make application after July, 1865?

A. That was when I got my pardon. I think it must have been about six months ago, but really, I have no recollection of the precise date. It must have been in September last, I think, on more reflection. I know that Mr. Porter's family were in Virginia, and that he brought them home with him when he came, and I think that was in September.

Q. Did you set forth in any of these letters to the President any of the facts of your own connection with the rebellion?

A. Yes, sir; I simply stated that I had been a merchant all my life; that I was no politician; had never been in public life except for a short time, and then against my own inclination; that I had served as secretary of the treasury from July until the first of April.

Q. Did you make any statement in either of these letters of the connection of your house with blockade running?

A. I did not deem it necessary, as that was not one of the exceptions in the grant of amnesty, and I knew of other parties similarly engaged who had been pardoned.

Q. Did you make any payment of money to any person in connection with either of your applications for pardon?

A. Not a cent. I paid Rev. Mr. Porter's traveling expenses to Washington and back—about one hundred dollars, I think. His circumstances did not admit of his taking the expenses upon himself, and I did not think it proper for him to do so. What he did was a matter of friendship exclusively.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know of the disposition of any money or of property which had belonged to the confederate government after the termination of the war?

A. No, I do not. When I was arrested on my way to Fort Pulaski, I was carried to General Gilmore's headquarters at Hilton Head. While there I mentioned to General Gilmore the mistake I thought the government was pursuing by the seizure of cotton upon insufficient grounds in small parcels, a good deal of which belonged to innocent parties, the result of which was that a great deal of injustice was being done through the means of designing men, while the government was not obtaining anything like the amount of cotton which properly belonged to it, and which should be obtained for the purpose of securing the ends of justice. I mentioned a gentleman by the name of Roane, who was chief clerk in what was called the produce bureau of the confederate government. I recommended the General to write to the Secretary of the treasury in Washington, where Mr. Roane was well known, and see if they could not, through him, get possession of the books belonging to that department, through which most of the cotton owned by the confederate government could be ascertained. He did so, the services of Mr. Roane were secured, and I then gave all the information within my possession on the subject, as nearly as I possibly could. The amount of specie within my possession as secretary of the Treasury was very inconsiderable. I had $50,000 in gold when I left Danville with Mr. Davis, that I turned over to Mr. Reagan, who distributed it to the confederate troops when they left North Carolina, as I learned. Then there was two hundred and odd thousand dollars belonging to the confederate government in the depository of Augusta, which had been removed to Abbeville, and there, when the soldiers passed through in retiring, I understood this money was distributed to them. I know of no other gold in the hands of the confederate government, and I gave to the proper authorities all the information I possessed.

Q. Did the confederate government have a printing establishment at Anderson or some point in South Carolina?

A. In Columbia, South Carolina, they did; not at Anderson.

Q. Was there any money or other property at that point at the close of the war belonging to the confederacy?

A. No money; there were printed treasury notes to a very large amount, but no coin. There had been some coin in the hands of the depository there, by the name of McLaughlin or Laughlin, but that had been removed before the advance of General Sherman's army. It was a small amount in silver dollars, and it constituted a part of the 50,000 which I mentioned just now as being in my possession at Richmond, and which was distributed in North Carolina. I do not think that the entire amount of coin in the possession of the confederate government at the termination of the war amounted to $400,000, and in fact probably not to $300,000.

Q. During the progress of the war an appeal was made to the people of the South to furnish their plate, jewelry, &c., for the support of the government; can you state what was done with the plate and jewelry thus collected?

A. There was none contributed. A few people in Richmond and the immediate vicinity sent some small articles of plate to the treasury department, but I returned them. I thought it a cruel appeal to the people. They were not in a condition to give anything. They had been impoverished to the last extremity. There were many, and indeed a majority, of the respectable families in Richmond who did not have meat upon their tables for weeks together. I did not think these persons ought to be compelled to give their spoons and little articles of that kind; and such as were contributed I returned, saying to the parties that whenever there was a general contribution I would let them know, and they might again contribute.

Q. Have you any information relative to the construction of a railway between Danville, Virginia, and Greensboro', North Carolina?

A. I have no particular information except the general knowledge that it was done by the so-called confederate government. I understood that it was completed or nearly so when I went to Richmond. I have no knowledge of the manner in which it was built.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you know of any cotton or other property belonging to the confederate government which has been surrendered since the termination of the war to private claimants by the Federal government?

A. I have never heard of a case.

Q. State by what conveyance your pardon was forwarded.

A. Mr. Porter brought it himself. He received it personally and brought it with him.

Q. Were you conversant with the state of the contraband trade at Wilmington?

A. Yes, sir; I was.

Q. Do you know of any docks constructed there by the confederate government for the accommodation of blockade runners?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know of any property owned or claimed by them?

A. No, I do not. I do not think any could have been constructed by the confederate government there. I think I should have heard of it if there had been. There was a floating dock in Charleston which was private property, not owned by the confederate government at all, and which was, as I understand, destroyed.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You stated that General Sickles and General Howard recommended your pardon—in what form did they make their recommendation?

A. Mr. Porter submitted to General Sickles a letter which I had addressed to the President, and which he was about to bring on, and General Sickles either endorsed upon the back of that letter his recommendation, or gave him a separate letter, in which he expressed his sentiments and views in regard to it. General Howard's recommendation was, I think, procured in New York. My impression is that Mr. Porter met him in Brooklyn, at Dr. Littlejohn's house, and that with other parties he recommended my pardon. I never saw the papers after they left North Carolina, but Mr. Porter told me he obtained several endorsements in New York, all parties whose names I do not remember, and in Cincinnati, which were obtained at the instance of a mutual friend. Among others was that of Mr. Cook, chairman of the board of trade or chamber of commerce. Another was by his partner, a gentleman whose name I do not recollect now. They were almost all strangers to me, however. They were procured by friends of mine. General Sickles, as well as I recollect, put his recommendation upon the ground of my conduct since the return of peace, and he probably may have mentioned that the young men of my family were among the first to take the oath of allegiance, and the first in South Carolina to make contracts with the freedmen. We had endeavored to conform to the wishes of the government so far as it was in our power to do.

Q. Did you make more than three applications to the President?

A. I think not.

Q. In connection with the contraband trade which has been spoken of, do you know of any special permits given to parties by the federal authorities to transact business with the confederate government or agents of the confederate government?

A. I have a distinct recollection of one, and it seems to me that it was the only one that came in official form. There were numerous parties coming to Richmond constantly through the lines applying for permission to purchase cotton, but they generally came with verbal statements of their own as to what they could accomplish in the way of passing cotton. They usually had nothing but their own personal guarantees that they would deposit the proceeds of the cotton after it should have been passed through the lines, which could not be acceded to. The only case to which I refer was a letter addressed by President Lincoln to General Grant, in favor of General Singleton. I do not remember his first name. General Singleton came to Richmond and exhibited to me an autograph letter from Mr. Lincoln to General Grant. I do not remember the precise terms, but it was to this effect: That General Singleton had authority to carry through the lines any southern produce that he might purchase in the southern States unmolested, provided that his transactions in that way did not, in General Grant's opinion, interfere with military operations. I think that was the sum of the letter.

Q. Do you know of any transactions under it?

A. There were no transactions under it. He brought a letter to me which was addressed to General Grant. General Grant, as General Singleton told me, did not approve of the proposition. I have met General Grant since I have been in the city, and recalled to him the circumstance, which he recollected perfectly, and stated the matter in precisely the same form that General Singleton had told me at the time—that he objected to the whole thing, but that in deference to Mr. Lincoln's views, which were explained to him by General Singleton, as I suppose, he allowed him to go through the lines. It appears that at that time Mr. Lincoln was strongly impressed with the idea that it was a bad thing for the finances of the United States that so much cotton should be destroyed in the South; that in preference to its destruction it would be better to permit it to come out, especially if it could be done under circumstances in which the United States should derive some advantage by it. The idea, I think, was founded upon solid reason. For example, if General Singleton could have carried out his plans, and purchased cotton in the confederacy at anything like the price at which it was then ruling there, and then obtained for the United States the benefit of the difference between that price and the price abroad, the country would have been benefitted very largely by it. The object however, of General Singleton, if his proposition had been acceded to, as I understood, was for his own individual profit and that of the others concerned with him.

Q Were there any other transactions proposed by General Singleton, during that visit, to the confederate government or its officers?

A. He proposed to do something in relation to tobacco. There was a large quantity of tobacco in Richmond and Petersburg. General Grant had given a qualified assent to some transactions of this character, that he would guarantee that any private property in cotton or tobacco which was carried through the lines and came into the power of the United States government should not be made subject to capture or confiscation. I think I heard that General Singleton made some purchases of tobacco from private individuals, which came to Fredericksburg. His proposition to me, however, was to negotiate with the confederate government itself for large quantities of cotton and tobacco; and if he had been successful, there would have been no necessity for any transactions in relation to private purchases. I have no knowledge in regard to his private transactions in tobacco which went to Fredericksburg.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. Was the confederate government at that time destroying cotton in the South?

A. Cotton was being destroyed everywhere by the confederate forces, as the United States forces advanced. This was particularly the case in the West. I do not think anything of the kind took place in the East.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Were any arrangements entered into with General Singleton in regard to any purchases by you or by any officer of the confederate government?

A. There were none entered into by me, and, I think, none by any other officer. There were constant proposals coming to me to exchange supplies for cotton, but whatever may have been done in that direction, was done by the other departments.

Q. Was any permission given to General Singleton to engage in trade, so far as you were concerned?

A. No; it could not have been done under our regulations, because General Singleton was not prepared to pay for his purchases, and I told him there was no other way by which he could obtain the cotton of the confederate government, except by paying money for it when purchased. The operations proposed by him were precisely such as were proposed by other parties—to take the goods across the line and deposit the pay for them in New York, or abroad, after the cotton was sold.

Q. By what authority did General Singleton go to Richmond?

A. He passed General Grant's headquarters, and under that authority he was admitted within the confederate lines.

Q. He was passed through your lines?

A. I do not remember whether he had a pass from General Lee or not I knew nothing of his movements until he presented himself at my office in Richmond.

Q. And that was the only actual permit that you ever saw?

A. It was the only actual permit that I saw from any functionary of the United States government, of which I have any recollection whatever.

Q. Do you know of any person being captured by your forces with permits upon him?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any arrangement made between the confederate government and any officer of the federal government, by which any sort of traffic was carried on in passing goods through the lines?

A. I have no knowledge of any such thing. My knowledge, however, was confined chiefly to the Atlantic coast. I knew little or nothing of what was going on in the west. There were rumors of collusions taking place on the western waters between parties and military officers of the two armies. But I never saw a permit and never knew of a contract with any federal officer by means of which any supplies were obtained. Supplies, however, in very considerable quantities were brought in. I knew that to have been the case.

Q. At what points?

A. Some were brought into North Carolina. My information, however, is second-hand, from Mr. Northrup, who was commissary of the confederate government. He told me that he had an arrangement with parties to bring him in supplies of beef and pork in exchange for cotton.

Q. Who commanded the federal lines at those points at that time?

A. That I cannot state.

Q. Do you know of any other transactions of this nature?

A. I do not; and the information I have in regard to this is from Mr. Northrup. I can procure his full name for you in the course of the day, if you desire it. He was commissary general of the confederate government at that time.

Q. When was that?

A. That was in the winter of 1864 and '5. He did not say his arrangements were with any federal officer, and I have no reason to think they were. There were parties going there constantly with such propositions, but their negotiations, when they made any, were always with the departments requiring supplies.

Q. How were they enabled to pass the confederate lines?

A. I asked them that question several times. They told me they got across the Potomac somehow.

Q. Can you give the names of any of these parties?

A. I cannot; I never had any transactions with them myself, and considered them improper. They would come to me and show me letters from parties in the North, recommending them as to their responsibility and respectability. But I never had any transactions with them.

Q. Do you know from what source the supplies of the confederate army were derived in general?

A. The chief supplies, except of food, were obtained by running the blockade. The confederate government had agents at Nassau, Bermuda, and England. Large purchases were made in England and shipped to these points for the purpose of running the blockade; and I think Mr. Northrup could give you very full information in regard to commissary supplies, and Mr. Gorgas, chief of ordnance department, could give you information in regard to the supplies of that department. I ought, perhaps, to state, in regard to this application upon the part of General Singleton, how it terminated. Mr. Davis was as much opposed to letting cotton go out of the country as the United States government was solicitous to prevent it from being exported. I told Mr. Singleton of his opposition to allowing cotton to go out, particularly in such large quantities as he proposed. I differed, however, from Mr. Davis in this respect, and I was willing to enter into Mr. Singleton's views and the views of Mr. Lincoln as explained by him, and to allow cotton to go out of the confederate States under a special arrangement which I proposed, notwithstanding Mr. Davis's opposition, believing that I could arrange so as to carry out the proposal. My proposition was that the United States government should agree to allow cotton to pass their lines, and when it came within their military occupation, cotton belonging to private individuals should be respected and not treated as the spoils of war. I would then agree to export cotton, giving the United States one bag out of every four; and cotton falling into the hands of the United States was to be treated in the same proposition; we guaranteeing its safety within our lines, and the United States within its own lines. General Singleton returned to Washington with the proposal, and said he was sure he could get Mr. Lincoln's assent to it. He came back, however, shortly afterwards, having failed to obtain his assent, and then renewed his proposition to ship cotton through the lines, and deposit the proceeds in New York, which proposition I declined.

Q. How long a time transpired between his visits?

A. Not more than a week, I think.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Was the Charleston house in which you were a partner more largely engaged in blockade running than any other establishment in the South during the war?

A. Probably it was. Certainly it was if you include cargoes owned by other parties consigned to us.

Q. Did the so-called confederacy have any other depository in Liverpool, except the house of which you were a member?

A. No other depository. There were other financial agents.

Q. What profits did your Charleston house realize during the war, or during the time you remained a member of it?

A. My impression is that they made nothing by running the blockade. I believe all the partners of the house would now cheerfully give all they possessed to have back what they had at the commencement of the war. They lost all their gains in confederate bonds. They got nothing but confederate money, and invested it in confederate bonds.

Q. And that is the sense in which you say they gained nothing?

A. It is.

Q. Were any proceedings for confiscation instituted against you?

A. No, sir.

Q. What amount of property or valuables did you have subject to confiscation?

A. I am not aware that I had any. There was a good deal of property which fell into the hands of the military there and was sold for taxes and otherwise, but I was not aware that there were any proceedings for confiscation. I cannot tell you the value of the property the firm held in Charleston. They held a considerable amount of real estate, probably five or six hundred thousand dollars' worth.

Q. Do you speak of all the property, real and personal, of all the partners of the firm?

A. Yes; of all the members of the firm in Charleston, myself included.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. Had the confederate government any agent in Canada during the latter part of the war?

A. I knew of none, except from general report.

Q. Had they any funds deposited there?

A. They had funds deposited there.

Q. Do you know what disposition they made of them?

A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know of any purchases of vessels upon the lakes with any such funds?

A. I do not. Their agents, whoever they were, and the funds, were sent there before I went to Richmond, and what disposition of them was made I never knew. None of the correspondence with them came under my observation.

Q. Do you know whether the confederate government had any property in Canada at the close of the war?

A. I do not. If I had known of any such, I would have stated it.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Have you any knowledge of the existence of any secret societies in the North, whose object was to promote the interests of the rebels?

A. I have not. I never heard of any such thing.

Q. Do you know whether General Singleton had any such connection?

A. I do not. He certainly never said anything of the sort to me, and I never heard of such a thing. General Singleton's object appeared to be simply commercial speculation, and it would have been a very good one if he could have accomplished it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1867.

GEORGE A. TRENHOLM, recalled at his own request, made the following additional statement:

I desire to state, in further reply to the question put to me concerning Anderson, that I met a gentleman from Columbia at the hotel this morning, and in conversation with him, I learned that after the advance of General Sherman upon Columbia, the printing establishment, and the treasurer's office connected with it, at Columbia, were compelled to move into the interior; that they were, for a time, located at Greenville, South Carolina, and for a short time, between the capture of Columbia and the surrender of General Lee, located at Anderson. I was not aware of that fact until he stated it to me, and I thought it proper to give the information to the Committee.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did this assistant treasurer have the treasury itself or any funds with him?

A. He had treasury notes; and this gentleman told me this morning that the assistant treasurer, Mr. Leach, had had, he understood, about $4,000 in specie. Whether that is true or not I do not know. I only know this by information from this gentleman of whom I spoke, and whose name is James G. Gibbs, of Columbia, South Carolina.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1867.

JAMES T. WELSMAN, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. In Charleston.

Q. Were you residing there during the progress of the rebellion against the government of the United States?

A. I was in New York when the war broke out, and remained there until August or September of that year. Having remained as long as I considered it personally safe, I went into Canada and went across the water, where I remained until the month of January, 1863, when I left and returned to the confederacy, from Southampton via St. Thomas and Nassau, running the blockade into Wilmington, North Carolina, in April, 1863.

Q. Have you received the pardon of the President of the United States?

A. I have.

Q. When did you receive it?

A. In September, 1865.

Q. In what manner did you apply for it?

A. I was in New York on my return from England, and received a letter from one of my partners in Charleston, stating that it was proper for me to apply for a pardon. Mr. Campbell, a lawyer of Charleston, whom I had known for a long time, was then, as I supposed, in Washington. I telegraphed to Willard's hotel to know if Mr. Campbell was still there, and received a reply from Mr. Campbell stating that he was still there, and that if I wanted to see him I had better come on there, as it was not practicable for him to go to New York and see me. I immediately came to Washington, and got him to draw an application for pardon. I copied it off in a fair hand, and in due course of time received a pardon. I returned to New York, having still some business there to attend to

Q. How long after the application was made did you receive your pardon?

A. Very promptly. I arrived in Washington on Thursday; I saw Mr. Campbell that day; the application was drawn the next morning and copied; I went with it to the office of the Attorney General, or pardoning clerk's office, on Saturday. On Monday morning I went with many others, as was then the custom for applicants for executive clemency, to see the President. The pardon was that day signed and sent to the Secretary of State. I received it that afternoon, and returned to New York.

Q. Was any other person than Mr. Campbell employed to assist you?

A. The application was endorsed by an officer of the United States army, to whom I had rendered some service in Charleston while he was there as a prisoner during the war, and which he had not forgotten. I lent money to him, and to a number of others, not expecting at that time ever to receive any return from it. I heard, however, that he was in this city, ascertained where he was, and went to see him. He was very glad to meet me, and asked if he could do anything for me. I told him I was an applicant for a pardon. He said he would endorse the application himself, and see his superior officer, I think General Custar, which he did, and upon his recommendation obtained General Custar's endorsement, having stated to him what he knew of what I had done for imprisoned federal officers in Charleston. The name of this officer was General McKibben. He was a captain when I knew him in Charleston.

Q. Did you pay any money in person for the procurement of your pardon?

A. Not one dollar, except notary's fees; nor do I expect to pay any; nor is there or has there been any understanding that I should pay hereafter. Mr. Campbell made me no charge whatever; indeed I never asked him whether he charged or not. He was a friend of mine, and simply drew the application.

There were fees of notaries amounting to a dollar and seventy-five cents, I think. I had to take the oath, and to declare what section of the President's amnesty proclamation I came under, &c. I paid nothing else.

Q. Were there any other persons who endorsed that application except the federal officers named?

A. I do not remember. If there was it was done between Friday and Monday morning.

Q. What was the name of the firm with which you were connected in Charleston?

A. John Fraser & Co., of Charleston, Trenholm Bros. & Co., New York, and Fraser, Trenholm & Co., Liverpool.

Q. Did you close up the business of your New York firm?

A. I endeavored to do so, but it was not closed when I left.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Were you at any time in the employment of the confederate government?

A. No, sir; I never had any office under the confederate government. I was at one time an officer of a volunteer organization for guard duty in the city during the war. It had military regulations, but the service performed was in the nature of police duty.

Q. Had you any personal acquaintance with the President previous to making your application for pardon?

A. I never saw him in my life until that occasion, and I have never seen him since, until since I have been in Washington within the last few days.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. The Charleston firm with which you were connected was engaged in blockade running?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What profits did your firm realize during the war from blockade running?

A. That is something I cannot tell. The profits were sometimes very large, and our losses were very heavy.

Q. How many vessels had you engaged?

A. That I cannot tell; six, eight, or ten steamers, and several sailing vessels probably. We lost a good many of them.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you had any property restored to you which was seized by the United States?

A. The property of the firm in real estate was in possession of the United States for some time. I held in my own name only two or three small houses, and they were never in possession of the military authorities. A good deal of the property held by the firm in Charleston was in their possession.

Q. Was that property restored after the individual members of the firm had been pardoned?

A. I think it was restored before Mr. Trenholm received his pardon.

Q. Do you know whether any steps had been taken to condemn the property before its restoration?

A. I never heard of any.

Q. What was the value of the property restored?

A. I cannot tell. It consisted mostly of real estate. Some of it was not worth much, and some was more valuable.

Q. Was it all city property?

A. Our property is not all city property. Our city property, however, as I said, was more or less in the possession of the military authority and the Freedmen's Bureau.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. What would that property have been worth before the war?

A. It would be the merest guess—I suppose, four, five, or six hundred thousand dollars. This was not, however, all acquired during the war. We also had property outside of Charleston.

Q. How much?

A. That I cannot tell. We had town property in some of the interior towns, and we had plantations, but I cannot form any estimate of the value. I should suppose there were more than five thousand acres.

Q. Were there not 20,000 acres?

A. Unless I set about making a calculation, with our books before me, it would be a mere guess, and might be very wide of the mark. We had some plantations purchased during the war, some swamp lands, and some pine lands.

Q. Taking the value of that property prior to the war, what is your general estimate of its worth outside of Charleston?

A. I could not venture upon an estimate.

Q. Would it be worth a million?

A. I should not say it would be worth half that.

Q. Your firm made money during the war by blockade running?

A. We made some money, but the amount has been very largely overstated in the newspapers and elsewhere.

Q. Has Mr. George Trenholm other property outside the firm?

A. He has other property. He has a house in Charleston, and a place near Columbia. He was a man of considerable property before the war.

Q. What was he worth.

A. I do not know what he was individually worth The firm of John Fraser & Co. was worth more than a million and a half before the war. When I joined the firm some years ago, I think his interest in the profits or income of the firm was forty per cent. His interest was subsequently reduced by other partners becoming connected with the firm.

Q. But he is worth more now than before the war?

A. I should suppose so.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. State the names of the members of the firm of John Fraser & Co.

A. George A. Trenholm, Theodore D. Wagner, J. T. Welsman, William L. Trenholm, and Frederick Fanning. Another young man has since been added. I have withdrawn from the firm, and Mr. Trenholm withdrew in 1864.

Q. Have they all obtained pardons?

A. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1867.

THOMAS C. WEATHERLY sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you at any time since the close of the rebellion visited Washington previous to this?

A. I was in Washington in December last.

Q. Did you have an interview with the President at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did that interview relate to any public measures that you deemed important to your section of country?

A. That was the object of the interview.

Q. To what measures?

A. I cannot say positively as to what measures. It was more as to the general condition of my section of country than anything else.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the President in regard to the Constitutional amendment which was then pending?

A. Yes, sir; it was mentioned with other matters.

Q. Did the President express any opinion or give you his views as to whether it should or should not be ratified by South Carolina and the other States?

A. I understood the President's position upon that subject very well. It was mentioned and talked of; he did not say anything in the way of advice as to what my State should do.

Q. What did you understand his position to be?

A. I understood his position to be, as the country understood it, as opposed to the amendment.

Q. Did you understand that from your conversation with him and others?

A. I understood it before I saw him, and if I had not known his position I should have come to that conclusion from what he said. It would be unsafe for me, after this lapse of time, to say what language precisely was used. I can only speak of impressions.

Q. Do you recollect a communication on that subject published in the Charleston Courier, December 25?

A. Yes, sir; it was false in many particulars. I came out a few days afterwards with a letter to the Mercury, which was copied by the Courier with comments, stating some of the falsehoods.

Q. In what particulars was the statement of the Courier false?

A. I do not remember. I have not the paper with me. If you have the paper containing my communication with the comments of the Courier, it will show in what particulars the first publication was false; it was false from the commencement, by stating that I was a commissioner from the senate; it was false in stating that the President had advised me to return and do certain things.

Q. The Courier, according to the report which I have, states: "Colonel Weatherly had subsequent interviews with President Johnson, to whom he was informally deputed. We learn that the interview with the President was of some duration, as well as free and candid, during which he expressed the hope that the southern States would remain firm in their position as regards the Constitutional amendment, and steadfastly reject it, believing it to be an advance step to the inauguration of a despotism, in doing which he said he hoped they would be guarded in their reasons assigned for its rejection, and avoid any language that might, by any possible means, be taken to give offense to the opposing party. The President feels confident, from a recent decision given by the Supreme Court, that he will be sustained by that law-abiding body, and that in a short time a returning sense of reason will point out some middle ground between the Constitutional amendment and the projected territorial scheme, upon which our country may become united, and peace will again smile upon us with all its blessings."

A. There is a good deal of that statement which is not true. If you will allow me I will state all that occurred between myself and the President. I have been very much annoyed by the newspaper statements in reference to it. A scoundrel overheard a conversation between myself and a friend; he came in and sat near me while the conversation was going on, and then published what he pretends to have heard of the conversation as a statement of facts. I will state, as briefly as possible, the circumstances under which I came into Washington. I am a member of the senate of the State of South Carolina. A few days before its close, and before anything had been done definitely as to the Constitutional amendment by either the house or the senate, while it was still before the committee, a member of the senate came to me, at my seat, and made this suggestion: said he, "Have you any information from Washington or from the government as to what is going on?" I told him I had not. Said he, "Do you not feel great solicitude about it?" I told him I did. He asked if I did not think it would be wise for some one to go and find out how matters stood. This was about the 18th or 20th of December. Since the meeting of Congress we had seen nothing which would indicate what was likely to be done. I agreed with him entirely. After that he circulated round and talked with several others, and in half an hour afterwards a letter was handed me requesting me to take the trip. I started that evening, without instructions as to what I should do or who I should consult with. I took with me letters of introduction to the President, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to several others. I delivered no letters, however, after arriving here, except to Secretary McCulloch and to the President. As I was coming on I determined on the course I would pursue; that I would, if I could, get an interview with some members of the Republican party, and find out what he had to expect from them. The day after I arrived here was Cabinet day, and I did not see the President. That evening I met Judge Cartter, chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to whom I had a letter of introduction. He called to see me that evening between five and six o'clock. We had a lengthy conversation, and afterwards went to Senator Chandler's room, where we met other Senators. We had an appointment for the next day which I did not keep. The next day I went up to see the President. After a delay of an hour I was admitted. I told him the object of my visit was to find out the condition of affairs, and what we might expect in the future; that we were then in a bad condition; that this uncertainty was operating very badly upon an already perishing people financially; that I felt very great solicitude. He very readily commenced a reply. He said our condition was a very bad one; that we had his sympathy, &c.; that he had hoped to see the country restored before this time; that he deemed it as important to the North as to the South. He said he had a hope of seeing the country restored at an early day. I asked him upon what those hopes were based; that the condition looked to me very dark and gloomy. He replied that he had no hesitation in saying upon what his hopes were based; that the Supreme Court had made a decision, perhaps the day before, which indicated the course they would take; and that he entertained a hope that he would be able to save the country by carrying out his policy under his plan. The subject of the Constitutional amendment was then mentioned by myself. I said to him that we were in such trouble that some of us were disposed to weaken upon that subject if it would restore the country. He said we had no assurance that that would restore the country; that it would give up everything. That is my recollection of what he said upon that subject; that it would be giving up the country, the Constitution, &c That is about all that occurred between us.

Q. Did he say anything about the adoption of the Constitutional amendment being the beginning of the despotism?

A. No; I do not think he used words of that kind. The impression made upon my mind is that he thought it might be regarded as giving up the Constitution, giving up the country, which it was as important to the North as to the South should be preserved. He went on to speak very earnestly, as I thought, upon his views. The purport of what he said upon the subject of the Constitutional amendment was against its ratification. That is the impression upon my mind. He regarded it as giving up the whole question. If the State of South Carolina and the other States were to adopt the Constitutional amendment, it would, in fact, be giving up everything, and he would regard it as the destruction of the Constitution and the country.

Q. Did you report to your brother senators on your return that the President was against the ratification of the Constitutional amendment by your State?

A. When I got back the legislature had adjourned, and I made no formal report. I had conversations with one or two senators, but I made no formal report to the senate.

Q. As far as you had conversations with these senators, what view did you take?

A. I unquestionably expressed the opinion that the President was opposed to the Constitutional amendment.

Q. And did not desire to have South Carolina ratify it?

A. I could not say exactly that his conversation would justify that conclusion. It had no special reference to the State of South Carolina. My impression is very clear now, and then, that he was opposed to its ratification, but that he said anything in the way of advice I could not say. My impression is that he did not. He expressed his opinions very distinctly in relation to the amendment itself.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he express any determination to use his influence as Chief Executive of the United States in opposition to the adoption of the amendment?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he go beyond an expression of his opinion in opposition to the policy of the adoption of the amendment?

A. I did not think so.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did he not state to you that he intended to defeat the Constitutional amendment, through his policy or that of the Supreme Court?

A. My understanding was that he would do everything that he could do constitutionally against the Constitutional amendment, and to protect the States.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he give any intimation as to his belief of what he could constitutionally do in opposition to the amendment?

A. He said he hoped to be able to save the country from it. We were speaking then more of his policy and of the policy of the opposite party. I cannot say that the Constitutional amendment was the principal matter in conversation at that time.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did he inform you what his expectations were as to the questions which would be decided by the Supreme Court?

A. He said that if Congress persisted, the question would be made before the Supreme Court as to the constitutionality of these proposed changes, and that the country would abide by the decision of that Court.

Q. He expected the decision would be adverse to the Constitutional amendment?

A. He expressed the hope that our view of the case might prevail, but said that whatever might be the result, he would have the consolation of knowing that he had done what he thought was right. The impression made upon my mind was that the President was entirely honest.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Had you a general conversation in regard to the condition of the country, and the controversies between the different States?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the President was not undertaking to give any advice, but merely stating the conflict of opinions?

A. That was it. I am sorry I have not a copy of the letter of introduction to the President.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. When the President said to you he hoped to save the country from the effects of the Constitutional amendment, was he not expressing himself as hoping to save the country from the effects of the radical policy?

A. My impression is now, and was then, that he regarded the policy pursued by the radical party as destructive to the Constitution, and that he hoped to save the country from it. He believed his course was the proper one.

Q. Did he, at any time, express to you any desire that your State should act one way or the other upon the Constitutional amendment directly.

A. No, sir. He did not say so, that I remember. He did not advise how my State should act.

Q. You told him the state of feeling in South Carolina at that time?

A. I do not recollect that I did. The only expression that would indicate any change going on was the one I have mentioned—that we were so much distressed at our apprehensions of the future; that a great many persons were "weakening" upon the subject of the Constitutional amendment, which was the fact. The legislature had delayed action for a long time, and still delayed after I left Columbia.

Q. But they acted before you returned, and before you made any communication to them?

A. I cannot say that.

Q. How long after you left before they adjourned?

A. About five days. I should have returned the day of the adjournment.

Q. How long after you left here?

A. Two days.

Q. How long from the time you left until your return?

A. About six days.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did not the President express the opinion that the South ought not to ratify the Constitutional amendment?

A. I cannot pretend to say that he did. The general impression made upon my mind was that the South ought not to ratify it.

Q. Did not you have very free conversation with the President, and did he not state that he hoped they would not ratify it?

A. I certainly do not remember that the President said he hoped my State, or any other particular State, would not ratify it. The general impression made upon my mind was that he was opposed to the Constitutional amendment, and would regard it as unfortunate to the country if the South should adopt it.

Q. State the reasons he gave for his opposition to the Constitutional amendment?

A. I cannot state any reason other than that he would regard it as fatal to civil liberty in this country.

Q. Was the impression made upon your mind, from the conversation you had, that this Constitutional amendment would go before the Supreme Court for decision?

A. Perhaps not directly. I do not know in what way it was to go before the Supreme Court, unless in carrying the proposed change into effect.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you not infer from his remark that he had reference to the radical laws passed by Congress, and that they would go before the Supreme Court?

A. That was my impression. It was not the Constitutional amendment especially that induced this conversation.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. Did you communicate with any member of the senate of South Carolina, after coming here, before the senate adjournment?

A. No, sir; I telegraphed to the member of the house from whom I had brought letters of introduction to the President.

Q. What was that communication?

A. The understanding was that if I received no information which, in my judgment required the continuance of the session, I would communicate it. I telegraphed to Mr. Campbell, from whom I brought letters, that there was nothing in my judgment requiring the action of the legislature, from any information I had received.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. By which you meant to convey the idea that, in your judgment, the amendment ought not to be ratified?

A. I cannot say so, for in my conversation with those senators in reference to my going to Washington, I do not think, the constitutional amendment was ever mentioned.

Q. What then was there to prolong the session connected with your visit to Washington, if it had not reference to this question of the Constitutional amendment? Did you not come to Washington on that point?

A. No, sir; I stated in the outset that I came here to ascertain, if I could, what was likely to be our condition in the future. The proposition that I should come here came from the extreme men of the senate, who were known as "leading secessionists" before the war—men who were not likely to favor the adoption of the Constitutional amendment. My idea was that they wanted some information.

Q. Was there any question of national concern depending there except this one question of the adoption of the Constitutional amendment?

A. No question of national importance was pending before the legislature except that.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Would you have come here but for that question?

A. I cannot answer that question. I should not have come here but for the solicitude that was felt as to the condition of the country.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. Did your conversation with the President encourage and strengthen you in your opposition to the amendment?

A. I must say that the influence upon me personally was to strengthen my opposition to the Constitutional amendment.

Q. Did you so report to your fellow-members whom you saw after your return to South Carolina?

A. I perhaps made use of this expression, that I felt very strongly the impropriety of adopting the Constitutional amendment, and more strongly than I had done before coming to Washington.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You had an interview with Senator Chandler; did that interview incline you to go for the Constitutional amendment?

A. Personally it did; at least, my interviews with the various senators tended in that way. I asked Senator Chandler, with whom I had an interview, whether if the State of South Carolina were to adopt the Constitutional amendment, it would stop further aggression, and the State be allowed to return to her place in the Union. He said he thought so now, but that he would say to me very candidly that there was a growing opposition to it.

Q. What other Senators did you meet there?

A. Mr. Cresswell was there, and I met in the course of my visit here several others whose names I do not remember.

Q. But after having interviews with the President and with these Senators, your opposition to the Constitutional amendment was strengthened?

A. Yes, sir; it was rather strengthened. I was afraid of that growing change which was spoken of, and that it would do no good for the State to adopt it.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. And your increased opposition was because you thought you had a friend in the President on whom you could rely?

A. I was very much afraid the President had not power to save us.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. But you did not think that Senator Chandler could save you?

A. Yes, sir; I thought Mr. Chandler and the party with whom he was acting could do about what they pleased.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. If the President had expressed to you the opinion that the southern States ought to ratify the Constitutional amendment, would not you have so telegraphed to the member of the house to whom you refer, to have continued the legislature in session?

A. I would. I should have regarded that as an expression of sufficient importance to have retained the legislature for a few days for the purpose of acting upon the amendment. I would have regarded that as a very important expression of opinion.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. I understood you to say that the President remarked, in answer to your suggestion that your people were weakening down, that by the adoption of that amendment you surrendered the point of dispute between the North and the South, and that it would involve the ruin of the country.

A. I do not think he made use of any expression that would justify me in saying that he would regard it as the ruin of the country, but as the surrender of the Constitution and the government; in other words, as the destruction of the government. That was the impression made upon my mind.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How far do you reside from Anderson, South Carolina?

A. About two hundred and fifty miles.

Q. Do you know whether the confederate government had a branch of their treasury there at any time during the war?

A. The confederate government during the war had its treasury here and there and everywhere, and I am not sure but it may have been located at Anderson at one time.

Q. Do you know whether they had any gold there at the close of the war?

A. I do not, of my own knowledge.

Q. Have you any information upon that subject?

A. I have not. I have heard various rumors.

Q. What was the purport of the rumors and their source?

A. It would be very hard for me to say. I have heard some rumors of what they had there, but I cannot pretend to give it shape, for it was a matter I felt no interest in.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You stated that you contradicted an article in the Charleston Courier. At what time was that?

A. Some two or three weeks after its appearance. There was a freshet in the Pedee river at the time, so that I did not get the Courier for a week or two, as our mail could not be carried across the river. I then went to see this man, and told him he had grossly misrepresented me and must publish my reply, which he did, as all the other papers did.

Q. You have been pardoned?

A. Yes, sir; I was one of the earliest pardoned under the $20,000 clause.

Q. Through what instrumentalities were you pardoned?

A. I do not know of any especially. There were several, General McQueen and others applying at the same time. We got a young man to bring on our applications for pardon. He came here, remained a week or ten days, obtained the pardons, and returned with them.

Q. Did he employ any agent here?

A. None that I am aware of.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you procure any recommendations?

A. None at all, except that of Governor Perry, who had just then been appointed provisional governor. We got the ordinary certificate from him which he gave to nearly every one, I believe.

Q. Did this young man of whom you speak procure a recommendation from any persons in the North?

A. None that I am aware of, and I am very sure that he did not, or I should have heard of it.

Q. Were you personally acquainted with the President at that time?

A. No, sir; I never saw the President to know him until I saw him in December.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you know of any money paid by any other persons in your State upon the receipt of their pardons?

A. I do not know of any, and I don't think I have heard reports of that kind.

Q. What is your profession?

A. I am a planter. I was a country merchant for a while in my youth.

WASHINGTON, D. C. May 7, 1867.

T. S. MOORE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you employed by Adams' express company in any capacity?

A. As agent now.

Q. How long have you been in the employ of the company?

A. Since October 7, 1861.

Q. In this capacity?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what capacity were you acting before you became agent?

A. In 1861, when I first became connected with the company, I was an ordinary clerk, in the capacity of an assistant delivery clerk.

Q. Do you know of any pardons granted by the President being conveyed by Adams' express from this city to any part of the country?

A. A number of pardons and papers, I do not know what they contained at all, were sent through the express; they were all enclosed in wrappers.

Q. Can you state how many such packages were sent?

A. No, sir; it would be impossible—a good many, I know.

Q. Have you any means by which you can ascertain the number?

A. No, sir; I do not think it would be possible to do so, from the fact that these packages were received and sent out, and the entries upon our books would not show the nature of their contents; they were just entered as packages.

Q. Do you know whether anything was to be collected on these packages?

A. In some instances it is possible there was, but I cannot say positively. I have not very definite information on this subject, for I have never been receiving clerk. You might obtain more information from the clerk who receives all such packages.

Q. Can you ascertain in your office the amount of any bill received and collected on such packages?

A. I do not think I could; I do not think it would be possible. I could ascertain whether the information could be obtained by reference to our books. I will explain that persons coming there with packages to be sent away, for instance, claim agents in this city, intending to collect their fees, would bring their packages in an envelope addressed to the party for whom they were intended, and present to us a bill which we were to present on the delivery of the package—what we term a "C. O. D." bill—i. e., collect on delivery. We receive a great many such packages, and it is possible that in some cases such bills have accompanied pardons coming to our office to be sent away.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. How can you ascertain in your office what a particular package contains or whether it contains a pardon?

A. It is difficult, and I do not think it would be possible now, to obtain that information; it might possibly be done by tracing up the packages sent by those known to be pardon brokers.

Q. Do you know when a package is presented at your office what it contains?

A. In many cases when it is presented, but no entry would be made of it; we simply have a record that a package was received "C. O. D." for such an amount.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. At the time such a package was presented how could you tell whether it contained a pardon or not?

A. The party might state that it was a pardon. I think in some instances the fact that it contained pardon papers was endorsed on the packages. I never received such papers personally at all.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you know that there are any such cases?

A. I know that many pardon papers were sent through the express, but whether there were collections on them or not I am not able to state.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Are you certain that the fact of their containing pardon papers was marked on any of these packages?

A. I am not. I have frequently heard the receiving clerk speak of receiving pardon papers.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were not those pardons enclosed in the official envelope from the Attorney General's office?

A. That I cannot state. Mr. Robert Ireland, the money clerk, could tell that.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Is there any requirement in your office that the packages passing through your hands should specify what they contain?

A. In all cases where packages are sent with a "C. O. D." bill, the bill as a matter of course will indicate what the services were, and if it were for obtaining a pardon, as a matter of course it should so state.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any such thing?

A. No, sir; I have not. I merely know, in the way I have stated, that pardon papers were sent through the office; whether there were "C. O. D." bills sent with them I cannot state.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. Your books will show the persons by whom the packages were deposited and also to whom the money was paid, will they not?

A. The money would be paid to the shipper, as a matter of course, or on his order, and then the party would have to be regularly identified.

Q. Please give the names of any of these persons depositing these packages.

A. I will do so on referring to the books at the office, if the Committee require it.

(At a later period in the day the witness returned to the Committee room, and made the following statement:)

Since my examination this morning I have made inquiry of the money clerk, who states that there were no bills for collection sent out with any of these parcels which were stated to be pardons. I asked him how he knew they were pardons, and he said, in this way: that it is customary when packages are presented, to ask the shipper the value of the package. These packages were marked "Valuable papers," and it was desired to ascertain what value was attached to them, and the answer would often be that they contained pardons. In that way it was ascertained that they were pardons, but he says he has no recollection of any such packages being accompanied with bills for collection.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you call his attention to the fact which was embodied in one of my questions as to whether they were enclosed in official envelopes from the Attorney General's office?

A. I did ask that question and he says he has no recollection of any such case at all.

Q. Would your books show whether bills accompanied any of these packages supposed to contain pardons?

A. The money clerk says there is nothing on the books showing that they were pardons, and that he only ascertained the fact in the way I have stated.

Q. Will they not show, where money was collected, by whom the money was received?

A. They would, but it would be very difficult to ascertain whether the money was collected for pardons.

Q. Suppose you had the name of some agent, might you not ascertain from your books the amount of money received by him through your office?

A. Yes, sir; I suppose so.

Q. And your books would show how many packages have been sent by him on which money has been collected?

A. Yes, sir; they would show every package sent "C. O. D."

Q. Who was the agent of the office during the fall of the year 1865?

A. C. C. Dunn. I became agent, temporarily, on the first of August, 1866, and was afterwards appointed as permanent agent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1867.

CALVIN L. SAYRE, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you reside in this city?

A. Montgomery, Alabama, is my home. I have been here since last September a year ago. I call Alabama my home.

Q. What business have you been engaged in here?

A. I have been acting as agent for the State of Alabama, by request, first of Governor Parsons, and then afterwards by request of Governor Patton.

Q. What are your duties as such agent of the State?

A. When I was first requested to act as such by Governor Parsons, there were no mail facilities in the South, no post offices. The citizens of the State had a great deal of business which they wished attended to here, more particularly in respect to pardons, and which I attended to, and when they were issued, forwarded them to the persons for whom they were issued.

Q. How many pardons did you receive at your agency?

A. I could not say; I never kept any account of them.

Q. Were there many of them?

A A great portion of the persons in Alabama who have been pardoned have received their papers through my hands.

Q. Have you received pardons for citizens of any other State?

A. No, sir; except in perhaps two or three instances, friends of mine asked me to file their petitions for them, and I gave directions to have them sent.

Q. Did you attend to all these applications personally?

A. No, sir; to a great many of them I did. They were sent to me and I would file them. When they were granted, they were delivered to me to send to the parties, and in some instances I gave the address to the department, and they were forwarded directly to the parties.

Q. Did you ever employ any other person to assist you in these applications?

A. No, sir; no one whatever.

Q. What compensation did you receive?

A. The State paid me nothing. It was left discretionary with parties for whom I obtained pardons whether they paid me or not. I know in two or three cases where applications were sent to me I made a specific charge. I generally left it optional with the parties.

Q. How did you forward pardons to the parties?

A. During the first few months I was here, I generally sent them through the express, because there were no mails at all. Probably in the months of September, October, November, and December, 1865.

Q. Were there any charges accompanying them when you sent them by express to be collected?

A. I think I sent three cases in which such charges were made.

Q. What was the amount of charges in each case?

A. I do not recollect; I think probably a hundred dollars. Whenever I thought a man wanted me to work for him for nothing, I would make a specific charge. I cannot recollect that I have had more than three or four such cases.

Q. Did you receive money in return?

A. I think in one case I did. It has been some time ago; I never kept any books or accounts.

Q. How much do you suppose you have received in the aggregate for your services as pardon agent—stating, also, whether you have given any portion of what you have received to any other person?

A. I could not tell how much I have received. I have never given any person any portion of that compensation. I am not a business man; never had any business in my life until I came here. I never kept any books, and do not know what I have received.

Q. State, as nearly as you can, the amount you have received.

A. I have no idea of the amount. I made a living, and I have lived pretty fast, as has been my usual custom all my life.

Q. Did you say that in all the cases sent by express, there were not more than four or five on which you charged the fee of $100?

A. I said that I recollect of but three or four cases, and three I sent to West Point, Georgia, which is the post office for Chambers, Alabama. I sent these three cases "C. O. D.," I think, a hundred dollars each. They were applications given me to file, as agent of the State, and receiving no compensation from the State, I charged these men $100 each. If you will allow me, I would like to make this explanation: After the surrender took place, I was in Montgomery. The lawyers there were drawing out applications for persons worth the $20,000, and coming under that exception, charging them from $100 to $300 for drawing their applications. They would send their applications to me, after I came here, expecting me to do all the work for nothing—the lawyers getting all the pay.

Q. Did you ever receive more than $100, in any case, for your services?

A. I do not recollect; I expect I have.

Q. How much more?

A. I could not tell; I think it is probable I have received more than that.

Q. In how many cases have you received more than a hundred dollars?

A. I could not tell, for, as I have stated, I keep no books.

Q. Have you no means of ascertaining?

A. No, sir; I recollect at one time three hundred pardons were delivered to me, which I forwarded to the Governor at Montgomery, and never received one cent for any of them. After they were delivered, one gentleman sent me fifty dollars, but from the others I never received anything. I have in my office, not exactly an appointment, but a request both from Governor Parsons and from Governor Patton, in which they ask the Secretary of State to deliver such pardons to me. I had lived in Washington before the war. There were then, as I said, no mail facilities in the South, and the people were very anxious, a great many of them, to obtain their pardons. Many of them came on here, at great expense, which they could ill afford to bear, to attend to their own cases, and it was thought that I could benefit the people by remaining here.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Except in these three or four cases where you made a specific charge, did you trust to the generosity of the parties themselves for your compensation?

A. Yes, sir; I would write them letters, saying that the State paid me nothing, and that if they chose they could send me twenty or twenty-five dollars—anything they pleased. I was living here, boarding at the hotels, and at great expense.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In any of those cases was any other agent or attorney employed by the persons for whom you made applications for pardons?

A. No, sir. Very frequently I had lawyers in Alabama send papers to me, but no one else was employed here. I recollect that there was a Union man in my town, by the name of Owen, who brought on a hundred cases. He told the people there that he was a Union man, and that if he came here he would have great favors shown him. They gave their cases to him. He brought them here, but after a while became tired and disgusted in waiting, and asked me to attend to them for him. I sent them to him, and never received a cent for it.

Q. Have you ever had any representations made to you, by persons for whom you have obtained pardons, that they had paid, or were to pay, any other person for assistance?

A. I have had persons in Alabama, who had sent their applications to me, write to me that they had employed persons at home to get their pardons, and paid them, and that they could not pay me.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What is your professional business?

A. I have no profession. I was an officer in the marine corps, before the war, resigned and went home.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you participate in the war?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what capacity?

A. Lieutenant colonel.

Q. In relation to these applications for pardons, what course did you pursue? Did you wait on the President personally?

A. I never saw the President but twice. When I first saw him here, I came for the specific purpose to get my mother and my brother and myself a pardon. We were all supposed to be worth $20,000 each, and I was in an excepted class, because I had been an officer in the United States marine corps. I came for the express purpose of getting these three pardons, intending then to return home. I succeeded in getting a pardon for my mother and brother, I suppose after I had been here perhaps a month. I then went in with the crowd to the President, who would open his doors, and fifty or a hundred or two hundred persons would go in and ask for their pardons. I went in on two occasions with the crowd. My card was handed to him, and I do not suppose he would know me from the Japanese now. After a while Governor Parsons got him to pardon me, and I have never seen him since.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you pay anybody for procuring your pardon?

A. Not a cent; I would not have given three cents for it. I did not think it amounted to much, although I was anxious to get it.

Q. By whom were the persons you refer to as applying for pardon recommended?

A. By supposed Union men in the communities in which they lived, and by the Governor of the State.

Q. Was every application accompanied by a recommendation?

A. Yes, sir; as a general rule. I know that when I made my application I paid a lawyer fifty dollars for writing it out, and that in and around Montgomery, where I was born and raised, I got a lot of Union men to recommend me. They all had sons in the rebel army, but they recommended me.

Q. As far as these cases came under your knowledge, did they all bring such recommendations?

A. All were recommended by the provisional Governor; and, after the provisional Governor, they were all, as a general rule, recommended by the Governor elect.

Q. And by any other parties in each case?

A. Generally, they would have the name of some Union man on them. I know it was very necessary to have the name of the provisional Governor endorsing them. It was supposed that he would not recommend anybody unless they were worthy of it, and were asking for it in good faith.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You stated that you belonged to the marine corps before the war; how did you get out of it?

A. I resigned in February, 1861.

Q. With a view of going into the rebel army?

A. This was in February before the war. I had just come from a cruise of four years.

Q. But was it in anticipation of the rebellion?

A. Not exactly; I had intended to resign anyhow; I had become tired of it. It was about the first of February that I resigned. I had not been home, as I said, for four or five years. There was a great deal of excitement. I came first to New York and then to Washington, and when I got here I resigned.

Q. Was the fact of your resignation brought to the notice of the President?

A. I stated it in my application. There was no war when my resignation took effect. Trouble was anticipated. If I am not mistaken, the conference committee was in session in Washington at that time.

Q. You stated that you would not give three cents for a pardon. You regarded it then as of no value?

A. I meant that it did not make any difference to me whether I had a pardon or not. I was merely an individual, and as a general practice I thought it a good plan to ask no favors of anybody. I had no political aspirations, and it made no difference to me whether I was pardoned or not.

Q. You supposed there would be no punishment of treason?

A. I did not think of that at all. I did not think I would be punished.

Q. Then you relied on the lenity of the President?

A. I was very bitter against the President when I first came here.

Q. But you changed your mind afterwards?

A. I thought he would be very bitter against the southern people. He had been treated worse there than any other man. He had been slapped in the face, and treated with every indignity; and I thought he would be bitter against our people. I knew he could not hurt me.

Q. But you thought better of him on account of your pardon?

A. I did not think much about him one way or the other.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did not you think that the States were out of the Union, and could not commit any treason?

A. I am not a politician or a lawyer, and did not know anything about it. I was very anxious that my mother, who was an old lady, should receive her pardon.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1867.

MATTHEW F. PLEASANTS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you the pardon clerk in the Attorney General's office?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you been acting in that capacity?

A. I was, up to May of last year; I am now chief clerk.

Q. How long did you act in the capacity of pardoning clerk in the office of the Attorney General?

A. I think since the fall of 1863.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with L. C. Baker upon the subject of pardons?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether a pardon was granted to a man in Richmond by the name of Myers?

A. I really do not remember.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Baker respecting a man by the name of Myers?

A. No, sir; I never saw Mr. Baker to my knowledge.

Q. Have you any knowledge, direct or indirect, of any character whatever, relative to money being paid for procuring pardons, or for services in connection with the procurement of pardons?

A. None, whatever, except the knowledge that the public have in the case referred to—in the trial of Mrs. Cobb, and that I only know from the same source that the public generally know it.

Q. Were you acquainted with Mrs. Cobb?

A. I know her; yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with her in regard to pardons?

A. General conversations about a great many pardons.

Q. Was she in the habit of visiting your office?

A. She has been in there a good many times.

Q. Did she receive any pardons in the office for persons?

A. No, sir; there are no pardons given in our office.

Q. Did she file any papers in the office.

A. Only in that one case that I remember.

Q. That is the only case in which she filed papers for pardons?

A. As far as my knowledge goes that is the only case.

Q. Do you know whether she ever received money for procuring pardons?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether any complaint was ever made of this to Attorney General Speed?

A. I never heard of any complaint.

Q. Do you know whether any complaint was ever made to Attorney General Speed to the effect that you had sent a messenger to Mrs. Cobb desiring that she should give you a portion of the money she received for procuring the pardon of a man by the name of Myers, at Richmond?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any person receiving money for procuring pardons?

A. No, sir; I have no such knowledge.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was there any instance in which you insisted that Mrs. Cobb should not take a pardon away until she gave you one-third of the proceeds?

A. No, sir; of course not. No question of money was ever raised between Mrs. Cobb and myself; nothing of that kind whatever.

Q. And no conversation ever took place upon the subject with Colonel Baker?

A. No, sir; I never saw Colonel Baker in my life to know him.

Q. Or with any person unknown to you, on the subject?

A. With no person whatever, known or unknown.

Q. Did you know that there were questions raised in regard to your participating in the proceeds of money obtained for pardons?

A. I have been told that Baker accused me to the President of having received fifty dollars from Mrs. Cobb. That is the only instance that I ever heard that I was suspected of any money connections with pardons.

Q. That is the only information you have upon the subject?

A. That is my only information upon the subject.

Q. Did you have any conversation with any person whose name was unknown to you upon that subject?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. What is the course of business in the office in regard to applications for pardons for political offences?

A. The applications were at once referred by the Attorney General to me. My business was to examine them and to see under what exceptions in the President's proclamation they came. As soon as that was done, my general instructions were to issue the common $20,000 cases, or to make requisition for these pardons on the Secretary of State, if they were recommended by the governors of the States.

Q. Did these applications go to the President at all?

A. Very rarely; or at least I do not think they were ever examined there. Those that went to the President would come down in their original wrappings immediately to my office.

Q. Has it ever occurred that orders have come to your office from the President to issue pardons?

A. Very frequently.

Q. Do you recollect any cases in which that course has been pursued?

A. It occurs so frequently that I cannot specify. It occurs almost daily now. I recollect this one case to which I referred before—that case which was filed by Mrs. Cobb. It occurs, however, every day.

Q. Has it ever occurred in any other case in which Mrs. Cobb appeared?

A. No, sir; I do not remember of her appearing except in that single case.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did Mrs. Cobb ever profess to you to be making money out of procuring pardons?

A. I cannot say that she ever did. I never paid the slightest attention to her talk. I never attached any weight or credit to anything she said. I did infer that she was acting as an attorney and charging fees.

Q. But you knew nothing of her transactions except in the single case to which you have referred?

A. I cannot say exactly that. I knew of her saying that she was attempting to get some pardons from the President which were on his table awaiting his signature.

Q. Do you know the cases?

A. They were some Richmond cases—a number of them.

Q. Cannot you mention them?

A. I cannot; I recollect that there were numbers of what was known as the ambulance committee.

Q. You cannot remember any of the names?

A. I remember the names of Messrs. Isaacs and Enders, who were here representing that committee for the purpose of obtaining pardons, and she was looking after their applications as well as others.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You say you did not regard any statements coming from her as worthy of any credit. Was that from the nature of your knowledge of her general character, or from anything you know yourself?

A. Only from her general character and her general talk.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was her general character good or bad?

A. I do not know her general character except for veracity. I did not believe anything she said.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1867.

ROBERT IRELAND sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you inform the Committee of the number of packages sent through the Adams express from this city by Colonel Calvin A. Sayre?

A. I cannot.

Q. Can you inform the committee of the number of "C. O. D." packages sent by him?

A. No, sir; I cannot.

Q. Can you give any information on that subject?

A. Nothing further than that he has sent "C. O. D." packages through the express at different periods. What they contained I cannot say. I might say that, to the best of my knowledge, he has sent, perhaps, twenty such packages.

Q. Have you the books of the company with you?

A. I have.

Q. Will they show the number?

A. They will.

Q. Please say, from the books, what packages have been so sent by Colonel Sayre with bills for collection.

A. The book I have only shows the several amounts of money received by Colonel Sayre. I see here a return of $250 from Cincinnati, December 8, 1865; that is not signed by Sayre, but signed by a clerk who has charge of our branch office. He left the order with him to deliver to his agent, Mr. Baird, anything coming for him—that is the only package which this book shows.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Your books show that package to have been sent from here to Cincinnati, and that this money was collected upon the package?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you do not know what it was for?

A. No, sir; I could not say anything about that.

Q. Do your books show to whom it was sent?

A. Another book that I have, not with me, would show that.

Q. What period of time does this book cover?

A. From November 16, 1865, until December.

Q. Do you know Lafayette C. Baker?

A. I have seen him at the time the war was going on; I would not remember him now.

Q. Did he ever apply to you to find out anything about Sayre sending pardons through your office?

A. I could not say. I do not recollect of any person applying for any such information. He may have done it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you remember his ever having come to you with Mr. Dunn, who was the agent in 1865?

A. Mr. Dunn has come to me with several gentlemen; I do not recollect whether Lafayette C. Baker was one or not; he may possibly have been.

Q. Do you remember any of these parties caxmining your books to ascertain whether packages had been sent or money received for any other parties?

A. We have had our books examined so much in regard to rascality of different kinds that it is difficult to remember. The detectives are in the habit of examining our books for various purposes.

Q. Are you always at the office?

A. Except at meal times.

Q. Does any other person have charge of these books except yourself?

A. They are open to the corresponding clerk, and to my assistant in the office at any time they choose to refer to them.

Q. Whose business is it to take charge of these books and to be responsible for them?

A. It is mine.

Q. Will you bring before the committee the other book of which you speak?

A. I will.

(At a subsequent period of the day the witness returned to the committee room with the book called for.)

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Please to go on with your statement of the number of packages sent by Colonel Sayre, and state in detail how they were sent.

A. On referring to the book I have brought with me, and commencing with September, 1865, the first package I find is dated November 10, 1865, C. O. D. $100, addressed to W. C. Darding, West Point, Georgia; and subsequently I find, November 11, C. O. D. $100, M. L Walker, West Point, Georgia; November 15, $250, C. O. D., John Maloney, Athens, Alabama; same date, $100, C. O. D., Amos Hegely; November 21, $100, C. O. D., George Hillyer, Atlanta, Georgia. I would state that that package was returned by instructions of the agent in Washington, under the direction of Colonel Sayre. January 3, 1866, C. O. D., $50, H. Blackman, Tuscogo, Alabama; February 3, C. O. D., $110, James H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama; same date, C. O. D, $25, W. P. Chilton, Montgomery, Alabama; same date. C. O. D., $200, James H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama; March 13, 1866, C. O. D., $125, James H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama, returned by order, $25; same date, $10, C. O. D., James H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama; March 19, C. O. D., $12 50, James H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama; March 21, C. O. D., package, J. H. Sloss, Tuscumbia, Alabama, returned unpaid; March 28, 1866, $50, C. O. D., J. A. Coleman, Livingston, Alabama. This covers all the entries I find in the books from September 1, 1865, down to the present date.

Q. Can it be determined by your books how many packages have been sent from here by any particular person except those sent out as C. O. D. packages?

A. No, sir; we never take the name of the shipper at all, except where the package is sent C. O. D. or F. C.

A. Could any person go into your office, with your assistance, and by examining these books ascertain the names of the sender of these packages unless they appeared on the books as C. O. D. packages?

A. No, sir; for we make no record on the books at all of the shipper except C. O. D. packages, and the drafts.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1867.

EDWARD W. ANDREWS, sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. State your residence and occupation?

A. I am a lawyer; my residence is Martinsburg, Berkley county, Virginia.

Q. Have you any knowledge, and if so, what, of an application made to the President, in the autumn of 1866, for the restoration of about one hundred and ninety men who were upon the books of the War Department as deserters, and who belonged to two regiments of Virginia men, one of infantry and one of cavalry?

A. I know nothing of any such application except what I have heard through a speech in the House, made by General Butler, in which allusion was made to the democratic candidate for Congress, and which I applied to myself, as I was the only candidate in that district in opposition to the present member. I know of no deserters there whatever at the close of the war, and have no knowledge as to any application. I had heard that an application was made in behalf of some of the stragglers of the fifth artillery. I had a son who commanded a company in that regiment when on Hunter's raid. Application was made to relieve some men of that regiment from the charge of desertion on the road. On their way across the mountain from Salem, while being pursued by Early, a great many of them gave out, and some perished from actual starvation; of course those who were stragglers and missing at the roll call for three days were reported as deserters, and, although they joined their command afterwards, they could not get their pay while standing on the rolls as deserters. I do not know anything about any application being presented for their relief, nor did I know any of them.

Q. Did you, at any time, write a letter to the President in regard to these men or any other men who were on the rolls as deserters?

A. I have never written any letter to the President in my life, nor do I know him at all, except as the President. I may possibly have signed some petition for some official position, but I never wrote him a letter. After I saw that speech, I asked Mr. Kitchen, the present member from that district, what it meant, for the matter was all new to me.

Q. Do you know of any other person making application in regard to these men?

A. Nothing but what I have heard; I have heard since that some Doctor McEwen made application, and I have seen a letter, explanatory of the statement made in General Butler's speech, written by Doctor McEwen, which was published in the Baltimore Sun and other papers.

Q. Did you know Dr. McEwen?

A. No, sir; I never have seen him to my knowledge. I remarked when I saw his letter that he stated that no application had ever been made by the democratic candidate for Congress, and he explained that the whole thing occurred out of his effort to relieve the men who had fallen out on that terrible march from the charge still remaining on the roll, of desertion. If a letter was ever written to the President by any person on that subject over my signature, it was a forgery.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did your son apply to you to give any recommendation for the restoration of these soldiers?

A. No, never, sir; if he ever took any action it was in my absence, and without my knowledge at all, and I do not know that he did.

Q. Here is a letter which purports to be written by you, bearing date October 20, 1866:

His Excellency, ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States:

SIR:—The accompanying list embraces nearly 200 soldiers who are disfranchised by the charge of desertion. The great majority of these men reside in my congressional district. It would be doing me a great service to have the charge removed, and thus enable them to vote at the approaching election. The contest will, without doubt, be a very close one, and I feel assured the restoration of these men will result in my election, provided it can be done immediately.

A. No, sir; that is the first I have ever heard of that letter or seen it, and it is entirely new to me. At the time it purports to be written I was 200 miles away from Martinsburg.

Q. You never gave your son any such letter as that to be presented to Dr. McEwen?

A. No, sir; never.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any reason to suppose that your son sent any such letter?

A. Not at all. He saw Dr. McEwen, so Mr. Logan told me, and whether he signed any petition in my name I do not know. I was entirely ignorant of the whole transaction, as I have stated, until the matter was alluded to in Congress.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Where does your son reside, and what is his full name?

A. He is now, I believe, at Harper's Ferry, Jefferson county, Virginia; his name is Samuel J. Andrews.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q You were the only democratic candidate in that district?

A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you the editor of the New Era?

A. I was at that time. I am still part owner of the paper, but have not been connected with it otherwise for some time.

Q. Did you ever receive any communication, verbally or otherwise, from Dr. McEwen, through your son, relative to this transaction?

A. No, sir; I never had heard of Dr. McEwen, and did not know his name until I saw it in connection with this matter. It was rather a matter of joke with us when we first heard of it. I asked what it meant, and did not know until his letter of explanation was published.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1867.

WILLIAM L. TRENHOLM sworn and examined.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you received a pardon from the President?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was it dated?

A. I think it was in October, 1865. It may have been later.

Q. When, and in what way did you make application for it?

A. By letter to the Secretary of State, from Charleston.

Q. Was it accompanied by any testimonials or recommendations?

A. No, sir; it was not accompanied by any testimonials or recommendations. It was in the form in which applications were directed to be made, accompanied by the necessary oaths. I was not recommended by anybody.

Q. How long previous to the time when the pardon was granted was the application made?

A. It was not more than two or three weeks. I sent it by a friend of mine, a young lawyer from Charleston by the name of Julian Mitchell. He told me there was no difficulty in obtaining it, and I am disposed to believe that the reason why it passed so easily was that I had taken the amnesty oath of President Lincoln before the proclamation of Mr. Johnson, superseding that amnesty, was issued. I was one of the first who took the amnesty oath myself, and induced others to do so. The war was at an end, and I thought there was no use in remaining in a position of hostility to the government. Having taken that oath, I did not think it was necessary to make application for a pardon, and I did not make one until October. Some of my friends then told me I had better do so, and I made the application and forwarded it by mail.

Q. Did you pay any money to anybody in connection with that application?

A. Not a cent of money.

Q. Did you promise or suggest any payment?

A. None at all.

Q. Did you have any report from Mr. Mitchell as to the steps taken by him to procure the pardon?

A. Nothing except that he wrote to me that it had been issued. He told me afterwards that he found my application on file in the Secretary of State's office, and that he got it sent in to the President; that it had been favorably reported on in the Secretary of State's office. It was in the class of a number of applications considered unimportant. It was made under the $20,000 clause, although at that time I considered it doubtful whether I was quite worth $20,000.

Q. Were you a member of the firm of Fraser, Trenholm & Co.?

A. I have been junior partner of the company some years, and have a small interest in it.

Q. For how long a time?

A. Since 1857 or 1858.

Q. Was that fact stated in your application for pardon?

A. No, sir; it was not. It was not required to be stated, I think, by the published requirements.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What was your interest in the firm?

A. A one-tenth interest.

Q. How many partners?

A. The number of partners varied from time to time during the period in which I was connected with it.

Q. How many during the rebellion or at the time the war closed?

A. Our firm is peculiar in this respect. There is a firm in Charleston and a firm in Liverpool, and at the close of the war there were three persons members of both firms. The firm in Charleston consisted of five.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Were you interested in both firms?

A. I was.

Q. What was the business of the Charleston firm during the war?

A. I left the business early in 1861, and did not go back into the firm until the end of 1865; and did not during that time do any of the business of the firm.

Q. Have you any knowledge, from the books of the firm or from other sources, of what business they carried on?

A. I know that during the war they were engaged in exporting cotton and importing goods through the blockade. They owned steamers engaged in running the blockade.

Q. Can you state the amount of goods imported during the war?

A. No; I have not the remotest idea. The books are immense volumes, and I never thought of examining them. Their transactions were very numerous.

Q. Would not the aggregate amount to as much as $1,000,000 in gold?

A. I take it for granted that it must have amounted to as much as that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know whether the confederate government had any property or money at Anderson, South Carolina, at the close of the war?

A. No, sir; I do not. I was not at Anderson during the war except twice, and then merely to pass through on the railroad. I was an officer of the army during the whole war, was with the army and knew nothing of the operations of the government or of the business of the firm in Charleston, except what I heard incidentally.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Had the firm of which you were a member any real estate at the close of the war?

A. Yes, sir; they owned a good deal of real estate in South Carolina.

Q. Town and country property?

A. Yes, sir; both.

Q. Can you furnish any estimate of its value?

A. Much of it has no value now that could be stated. The value of this property before the war would have been considerable. I could not form any estimate of how much, and it would take a long time to make a calculation. I suppose at prices before the war it would be worth perhaps a million of dollars.

Q. Was not all this property seized by the federal government before the close of the war, or after it?

A. I do not know whether the property was seized by the federal government or not. Having spent the summer of 1865 in the North in order to ascertain the position of political affairs there, and what course had better be taken in my own State and in the South, politically and commercially; having been a great deal in New York and several times in Washington, I returned to Charleston in October or November, 1865, and found the real estate of the firm in the possession of the Freedmen's Bureau, held as abandoned property. How it came in possession of the Freedmen's Bureau I never was very distinctly informed, and I did not know until that time what was the condition of the property.

Q. How was it with regard to the country property?

A. Some of our property in the neighborhood of Charleston was held in the same way. I had a small country place of my own some ten miles from Charleston, on which the dwelling-house had been burned down just before the evacuation of Charleston, which I found in the possession of the Freedmen's Bureau. The rest of our property, pretty generally, in the country, was not in their possession.

Q. Had any proceedings been initiated for the confiscation of any of this property in the courts?

A. None that I ever heard of.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Was this property which was held by the Freedmen's Bureau as abandoned, subsequently restored to you and the firm?

A. It was restored by General Saxton under an order issued by himself and delivered to me personally in his office, in compliance with an order from President Johnson, which directed the restoration of the property of certain firms in Charleston.

Q. That order in Charleston specified the firms?

A. It specified the firms by name.

Q. Have you a copy of that order?

A. I have not here. I suppose it is on file in the Freedmen's Bureau in Charleston.

Q. Do you know how it was obtained from the President?

A. I do not. I understood it was obtained through the representations of certain leading citizens of Charleston in relation to the condition of property there. The war had left no money in the South. The only thing we possessed was property, and that was in the possession of the government. It was impossible for us to raise money to meet our every day necessities. It was the only way by which the people there could be kept from starvation, and it was in consequence of these representations, I suppose, that the President issued the order which enabled us, to a certain extent, to obtain means to remove to the seacoast the cotton of the country, and to rebuild and equip the railroads which had been destroyed. When I went back there the South Carolina railroad, which was the main railroad in that country, had been burned from Branchville sixty miles in the direction of Columbia, and sixty miles in the other direction. All the bridges and trestle work of all the other railroads leading to Charleston had been burned or destroyed. The whole country was in a state of great destitution, and it was impossible to afford relief to the community without some means of raising money. The government also for the same reason relinquished possession of the railroads about the same time, and during the summer of 1865 the president of the South Carolina railroad succeeded in making contracts for iron and supplies upon the strength of the road having been relinquished by the government. I believe that without some such action on the part of the government it would have been impossible for our people to have recovered from the state of destitution which they were in at the close of the war. So far as our firm was concerned, as soon as this action had been taken we set to work in making repairs and in the employment of mechanics in the city. A great deal of property held by the Freedmen's Bureau had been injured by shells during the bombardment and during the conflagration one way or another, and it had been in the possession of persons who took no care of it. We set to work to repair this property, which we did at great expense. I myself expended upwards of $25,000 upon one piece of property of my own, and it has remained unprofitable to me ever since.

Q. When was the order issued for the restoration of this property?

A. I think in September, 1865; and the property was restored to me in November, if I am not mistaken.

Q. What amount of property was held by your firm in Charleston at its present value?

A. That is a question that it would be impossible for me to answer.

Q. What proportion does it bear to all the real estate in Charleston?

A. A very small proportion. I have never formed any estimate of it. If the Committee desire the information specially, I will furnish them, after my return, the amount of our city tax, which perhaps is as good a criterion as I could furnish, and which the Committee may compare with the tax upon the entire real estate of Charleston.

Q. Do you suppose it amounts to one fiftieth or hundredth of the whole?

A. I should be speaking entirely at random in any estimate I could make.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. You held more real estate at the close of the war than at the commencement?

A. We did, but we held a great deal less of other things, which it had become necessary for us to part with from time to time. We held less stocks, State bonds, and railroad bonds, than at the commencement of the war. The change in value of the different securities made it desirable, as a commercial question, from time to time for us to change our investments. We had a very large commercial capital before the war, both in England and in this country, and in this country we had invested very largely in railroad bonds and State stocks, and also in State bonds, mostly of the southern States. We were large owners of the State bonds of South Carolina. In the course of events these became advanced in value, while real estate became proportionately cheaper, and we were constantly buying and selling. The consequence was that at the close of the war we found ourselves with a great deal more real estate than we ought to have had.

Q. What is the relative proportion to that you had at the commencement?

A. I cannot tell; more than double; perhaps, more than quadruple. Our losses, of course, were very heavy upon this country property, which we always purchased with the negroes upon it.

Q. Was this restoration of the property held by the Freedmen's Bureau made before or after the pardon of the members of the firm?

A. I think my own pardon had not then been received. I did not receive possession of my dwelling-house until sometime afterwards. The property in the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau, which was restored at that time, required a large expenditure of money to place it in repair. It consisted, to a great extent, of wharf property, large storehouses, and property of that sort.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did your firm abandon that property when it was seized by the government?

A. No, sir; it did not.

Q. Was there always some one of the firm there?

A. No; not always some one of the firm, but there was always a representative of the firm. I was in the army; my father withdrew from the firm on accepting office in Richmond during the war, and the only other member of the firm resident in Charleston, Mr. Wagner, went out of Charleston just before the evacuation; but a representative of the firm was left there with power of attorney and full authority to act in their name. This gentleman was required by General Hatch, who commanded the city after its evacuation by the confederate troops, to give a schedule of what property was held by the firm. He gave a schedule of their property, signed as agent of John Fraser & Co. It was received by General Hatch, who then took military possession of the property.

Q. Was any of your property individually abandoned by you at the time it was seized?

A. Nothing was abandoned. We were very careful to abandon nothing. We had not a piece of property of our own on which there was not a person holding possession under our authority, as agent or otherwise.

Q. After this property was taken possession of by the Freedmen's Bureau, what became of the tenants?

A. They suffered them to remain and collected the rents from them. The occupants holding under our leases were required to take out new leases, and to pay to the officers of the bureau the rent, and as they had their leases at a mere nominal rent during the whole war, they were of course glad to retain possession of the property.

Q. Was this done in every instance, or were the tenants in some instances dispossessed?

A. That I cannot tell, not to my knowledge; I think it very likely there were such cases. I do not see why there should not have been, but I do not know. As I said before, I was in the North in the summer of 1865. The property was first taken possession of by military authority, and the tenants were required to pay rents to an officer designated as treasurer under our leases. This property was subsequently turned over to the Treasury Department, and an officer of the Treasury Department designated to receive it. The rents were then paid to the Treasury Department, as I understood. The Freedmen's Bureau next took possession and required new leases to be made.

Q. Was this while General Saxton was in command?

A. Yes, sir; it was from him I received the order for the restoration of my property.

Q. Do you know of any instances in which officers of the Freedmen's Bureau turned people out of possession in order to seize the lands?

A. I do not know of any such instances. I know of instances in which officers of the Freedmen's Bureau had possession of the houses of persons and declined to vacate them.

Q. Do you know how these officers came into possession?

A. I think the houses were not tenanted when they came into possession. A very large portion of the lower part of Charleston, perhaps three-fourths of the city in superficial extent, was empty during the bombardment in the summer.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You spoke of the value of the real estate held by the firm as to what it would be worth at the commencement of the war, and stated you thought it would be worth a million. What was that property worth at the close of the war, or in the fall of 1865?

A. It had no market value at the close of the war, and you could not sell it at any price; nor can you sell it now at any price. The piece of property on which I have stated I expended $25,000 in repairs, I would be glad now to take $60,000 for. After it was repaired I rented it at $6,000 a year. The lessee soon became bankrupt and gave it up. I suppose before the war it was worth $100,000 in gold.

Q. If put up at forced sale, how much would the property have brought?

A. It would not have brought anything at all. There was no money in the country; all that our people had was property. During the spring of 1866 there was a sort of feverish speculation in some things, but it did not extend to real estate; that has never revived; there has been no building, though a large portion of the city has been burned down. Many of the wharves have been suffered to go to pieces, and no effort has been made to repair them. All the building and repairing done in Charleston has been done by our firm, and we have done very little building; we have done a great deal of repairing.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have the rents collected by the Freedmen's Bureau and military officers been repaid to you by the government?

A. No, sir; in fact we were required to sign an agreement never to come back on the government for it; that was required by the bureau, under a printed form, in every instance, before the property was restored.

WASHINGTON, May 13, 1867.

Lieutenant Colonel E. J. CONGER, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you engaged in the military service of the United States in the year 1865?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have anything to do with the capture of J. Wilkes Booth?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you present at the time he was shot?

A. I was.

Q. Who was the first person to examine his body after he was shot?

A. I was.

Q. What articles did you find upon his person?

A. I found a diary, bills of exchange, greenbacks, a compass, key, &c.

Q. Did you take possession of these articles?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To whom did you deliver them?
A. To Mr. Stanton.
Q. Did he retain possession of the diary?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know who has it now?
A. Judge Holt.
Q. Do you know when he received it?
A. I do not.
Q. Who was present when you delivered the diary to Mr. Stanton?
A. Colonel L. C. Baker.
Q. Have you seen that diary since?
A. Yes, sir; I saw it to-day.
Q. State whether it is in the same condition as when you delivered it to Mr. Stanton?
A. I think it is.
Q. Have you examined it closely?
A. I have.
Q. Are there any leaves cut or torn out?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were they torn out when you first had possession of it?
A. There were some out and I think the same.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did you make any memorandum of the contents of the diary in writing at the time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you that memorandum?
A. No, sir.
Q. What did you do with it?
A. I gave it to Colonel L. C. Baker.
Q. When did you give it to Colonel Baker?
A. I cannot say; some weeks after—perhaps not more than a week, and perhaps five or six, I am not able to say.
Q. Was that memorandum an abstract or a transcript of the contents of the diary?
A. So far as it went, it was a transcript of the diary. I am not certain whether it was all of it or not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you examine what was written in the diary, this morning?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you remark anything different from your memorandum in the diary now?
A. I cannot remember. I do not know. I may say this: I had nothing in my transcript except what was in the diary.

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1867.

Lieutenant Colonel E. J. CONGER appeared, and his examination was continued as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Will you examine the article I now hand you, and state when and where you first saw it?

A. I took it from the body of J. Wilkes Booth, on the morning of the 26th of April, 1865, I believe.

Q. Is that what is known as J. Wilkes Booth's diary?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you examine it carefully and state whether it is in the same condition it was when you took it from the body of Booth?

A. It is in the same condition, with the exception that there are some shavings in it which were taken out of his pocket. I have read it carefully over.

Q. State whether all that was written in the book when you first took it from Booth's body, is in it at this time?

A. I think it is.

Q. Do you remember having noticed the absence of the leaves that seem to have been out of the book when you first examined it?

A. There were some cut when I got it.

Q. Was the entry dated November 13th and 14th, commencing "Friday the ides. Until to-day nothing was ever thought of sacrificing to our country's wrongs," &c., the first that was written in the book when you saw it.

A. I think it was the first, but I may be mistaken in my impression in regard to it. Before having seen it my impression was that that which was written as of April 14th was dated at a later day.

Q. Did any writing precede that when you first examined the book after taking it from the body of Booth?

A. I should say not.

Q. How much of that entry did you embrace in the transcript you made?

A. I am unable to say. It may be that I copied all of it; I cannot tell now, I have forgotten. I have an indistinct recollection that I did not finish it for some reason, but I am not certain.

Q. Did it remain in your hands from the time you took it from the body of Booth until you delivered it to the Secretary of War?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it examined by any other person in the meantime?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. You say you took a copy of the writing in the diary sometime after you took it from Booth's person. Was there anything in the book then, so far as you can recollect—any writing or memorandum—that is not in the book now?

A. Allow me to make an explanation before I answer. My ideas in regard to it are not exactly what the writings are now, still my belief is that there is no change in the book now. I did think it read a little differently, but it is so long since, I may have forgotten.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Where were you when Booth was shot?

A. I was on the farm of a man named Garrett, about three miles from Port Royal, on the road to Bowling Green, Virginia.

Q. Did you see Booth shot?

A. I did not.

Q. Did you see him before he died?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where were you when he was shot?

A. I do not know the points of the compass; I was by the side of the tobacco house. The man who shot him was on the next side around the corner of the house. They called it a barn; it was built for a tobacco house.

Q. Did you hear the report of the gun?

A. I did.

Q. How soon after that did you see Booth?
A. Just as soon as I could get in.
Q. Who went in with you?
A. Lieutenant L. B. Baker, usually known as Byron Baker.
Q. Were you the first that went up to the body of Booth after he was shot?
A. Lieutenant Baker went through the door before I did.
Q. Where was the man who shot him?
A. He was outside the barn.
Q. He did not go in?
A. Not that I know of, at all.
Q. Then Baker was the first there, and you next?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you do when you first went in?
A. I stooped down and lifted up Booth's head.
Q. What did Baker do?
A. He looked at him.
Q. Did he do anything of the kind?
A. No, sir.
Q. What next did you see?
A. I called in a soldier; and he, with myself and Baker, carried Booth out on the grass.
Q. Who was the soldier?
A. I do not know his name. They were all strangers to me at the time. I never saw them before I went on that expedition.
Q. What did you next do?
A. I went back to the barn and tried to put out the fire.
Q. How long did you remain at the fire?
A. About a minute, perhaps—not more than that.
Q. Did you make any effort to put out the fire?
A. Yes, sir; I tried to put the straw out; I tried to lay a big table upon it to put it out.
Q. Was there anybody to help you?
A. Yes, sir; the soldiers. We did not succeed in putting it out; it only scattered it and made it burn faster. I remained there just long enough to satisfy myself that I could not do any good. There was no water there, and the fire was burning very rapidly. There was a pile of straw and loose rubbish, about three feet deep, thrown up from the bottom in the corner; the fire was in that.
Q. What did you do next?
A. I went back and had Booth taken up to the porch in front of the house.
Q. Who was in charge of him while you were inside the barn?
A. I do not know that anybody was; nobody directly. I just carried him out, and had him laid on the grass. I thought he was dead.
Q. What was Baker doing at the time?
A. I do not know; he may have been with Booth's body, and he may have been in the barn.
Q. Was Booth dead when you carried him out?
A. He was not in fact; he appeared so.
Q. Was Baker with him when you got back from the barn?
A. That I do not know. I suppose some one was with him, but I do not remember who.
Q. How long did Booth live?
A. He was shot about four o'clock, or a quarter after, and died at seven o'clock and fifteen minutes the same morning.
Q. Who helped carry Booth up on the porch?
A. The soldiers; and I presume Baker and myself assisted.
Q. Did you remain at the house until he died?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you remain with him until he died?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You did not leave after you came back from trying to put out the fire?

A. No, sir; I did not. I may not have staid directly by his side all the time until he died; but I did not leave the porch, so far as I remember.

Q. Did he remain on the porch all the time until he died?

A. Yes, sir; he was not moved.

Q. Did you do anything for him?

A. Yes, sir; I gave him water and whiskey.

Q. Did you have any physician for him?

A. Yes, sir; I do not remember the man's name. I sent a soldier to Port Royal for a doctor.

Q. Were you in command of the men who were there?

A. I was.

Q. What position had Byron Baker?

A. He had been a lieutenant and quartermaster of the regiment of which I had command in the cavalry service, Colonel Baker's force.

Q. Was Colonel Baker's force under your command?

A. They were under my command. I was an officer detailed by the War Department to report to Colonel Baker for duty.

Q. Did you obey Colonel Baker's commands?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you put Baker in charge of Booth, and give directions what was to be done?

A. Yes; I directed him what to do and how to do.

Q. Are you certain you remained in sight of him all the time after he was carried on the porch?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Baker take particular charge of him, waiting upon him, holding his head, standing by him, &c.?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you first examine his pockets?

A. When I determined to leave and go to Washington myself. I am not able to say the hour; it was before he died. My recollection is very uncertain as to the particular time.

Q. State as near as possible.

A. I should say it was about six o'clock, or half-past—perhaps a couple of hours after he was shot. I fix that time, because I remember I thought he was conscious; that he looked up, and knew what was being done. I think after that time he was still alive, but did not know anything. I watched to see whether he would get better or worse. I remained there until he died. The doctor came before I got away, and I waited to see what would be the result.

Q. Who was present when you examined his pockets?

A. Lieutenant Baker and the soldiers.

Q. Did you personally take these things from his pockets or did Baker do it?

A. I did it myself.

Q. Did Baker examine his pockets?

A. I should say not.

Q. Did you hand the things to Baker when you took them out of his pockets?

A. I did not. I laid them on the handkerchief by the side of him.

Q. Did Baker examine them?

A. I should say no more than to see them as I took them out and laid them down by my side.

Q. Did you find the things in more than one pocket?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you certain where you found the memorandum book?

A. I do not remember which pocket.

Q. Did not Baker, in fact, hand to you the memorandum?

A. It is barely possible that he did. My impression is that I took all the things out myself.

Q. Did not Baker examine that memorandum book in your presence, take what was in it out, and look it through?

A. I should say not.

Q. Did you open it at the time?

A. I think not.

Q. Was it opened by any one there?

A. I should think not.

Q. Do you mean by that that you have a distinct recollection of the circumstance?

A. I mean that to the best of my recollection such is the case. It is barely possible I may be mistaken.

Q. Did Booth have anything to say after he was shot?

A. He said, "Tell my mother I die for my country." That was the first thing he said after his consciousness began to return.

Q. When was that?

A. It was while he was on the grass. I was not certain whether I understood him; he talked by gasps. I repeated it to him and asked him if that was what he said. He said yes. He said afterwards, "Tell my mother I did what I thought was for the best." This was while he was on the grass, before he was taken to the porch.

Q. After you took him to the porch did he say anything?

A. He asked me if "Jett" betrayed him.

Q. Who did he mean by "Jett?"

A. He was one of the three rebel soldiers who took him across the river; a man I captured at Bowling Green. Jett was his surname; I do not know his other name.

Q. Did you hear him say anything else?

A. I heard him say something about his hands, either to hold them up or have them washed. Lieutenant Baker was washing his face, and he said something about his hands, to hold them up, or wash them, or something of that sort, and then he said it was useless. I think that is all I heard him say.

Q. Did you hear him converse with Byron Baker?

A. Only what I have said.

Q. Did you see him and Baker in conversation?

A. I did not.

Q. Did Baker hold his head all the time he was on the porch until he died?

A. Nobody held his head; he was on a straw bed, and his head was supported by pillows or something.

Q. Did not Baker hold him up against his breast with his arm around him part of the time?

A. I think, perhaps, he did hold him up.

Q. Did he not hold him up with his head laying against his breast?

A. I rather think he did.

Q. Did not Booth die while he was holding him in that way?

A. No, sir; after he was brought to the porch a straw bed was brought out from the house, and after that I do not think he was raised at all, unless for the purpose of giving him water or whiskey. I remember now that he once asked to be turned over on his back.

Q. Did he send any other message to his mother, or to any friend?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he say anything about any person having been engaged with him?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he speak of any person except Jett?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he say anything of his mother having knowledge of what he was doing?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he not tell Baker, in your hearing, that he had no idea of assassination until a day or two before it was done?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you hear him say there was no design of killing Lincoln by anybody but himself?

A. I did not. I did not hear him say anything with regard to that or any thing at all except what I have stated.

Q. Did you hear him say he did not intend to do anything wrong or hurt anybody until a day or two before?

A. I did not.

Q. Can you say whether he talked with Baker when you did not hear him?

A. I cannot say.

Q. You stated in answer to a question by the Chairman, that your impression was that this memorandum book read differently from what it does now. State your impression as to how it read.

A. My impression with regard to its commencement was, that what was written on the first page was dated at a later period.

Q. The Chairman read to you the first sentence, and it was in answer to that that you said you thought it did not read in that way.

A. I had no reference to the first sentence read by the Chairman, except as to the date. My impression, however, was that it read something like this, "Here I am waiting cold and hungry, hunted like a dog, with every man's hand turned against me."

Q. Is not that in it now?

A. There is nothing exactly like that in so many words.

Q. Is that the only difference you find between your impression and the reading of it now?

A. I see no material difference from what I expected to find. It is not worded exactly as I thought it was.

Q. Where were you when you copied what was written in the book?

A. On the steamer coming from Belle Plain to Washington.

Q. Did you copy everything that was written in it?

A. I am not certain. I have an indistinct recollection that I did not, but what prevented me I don't now remember.

Q. I understood you to state, yesterday, that if you did not copy it all that it was a mistake, that you intended to copy it?

A. I intended to copy it all when I started, but I have an impression that for some reason I did not quite get through.

Q. What part of it did you not copy?

A. The last part of it. I commenced at the beginning.

Q. Did you copy the first page?

A. Yes, I think so; but am unable to say where I left off.

Q. Did you copy what was written on the loose sheet?

A. No, sir; I saw the sheet at the time.

Q. Do you remember that distinctly?

A. I had read it, but I do not think I copied it.

Q. Were these photographs in the book?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many were there?

A. I am unable to say.

Q. Could you remember if any were taken away?
A. I could not. I can remember that some were there.
Q. Was there anything in this memorandum book at the time you took it from Booth that is not in it now?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Did he have a wallet besides this, in which there was money?
A. That I do not remember; I do not remember whether the greenbacks were taken from this or not.
Q. How much money did he have?
A. I could not say.
Q. Do you remember the number of bills or their denominations?
A. I do not; I paid very little attention to the money.
Q. Did you carry the book immediately to Mr. Stanton?
A. I went to Colonel Baker's office first, and from there to Mr. Stanton.
Q. Did you not give the book to Colonel Baker?
A. No, sir.
Q. Are you sure about that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did Baker have it in his possession before Stanton had it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did he examine it in your presence before you delivered it to Mr. Stanton?
A. No, sir; the things were tied together in a handkerchief, and the handkerchief was not opened after I went to Colonel Baker's office until it was given to Mr. Stanton.
Q. Did Baker know you had the book?
A. He knew I had some things that were taken from Booth's body; that was all.
Q. When you carried it to Stanton did you undo it or did you hand it to him folded up?
A. I am not certain about that.
Q. You untied it on the boat and examined the articles?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you examine it with any one?
A. No, sir.
Q. Can you undertake to swear with any definiteness that all these leaves were out when you handed it to Mr. Stanton?
A. My impression is that it is in the same condition now that it was then.
Q. Can you undertake, from the examination you have made, to swear that it is?
A. I say that, to the best of my knowledge, it is.
Q. Did you count the number of leaves cut out?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you see it examined in Mr. Stanton's presence?
A. I did. He looked at it and passed it over to General Baker.
Q. Did he ask you anything about these leaves?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did Baker take it away with him?
A. I should think not. Stanton looked at it; handed it to him; they looked over the figures together, and Mr. Stanton retained it in his possession.
Q. You did not express any opinion as to how these leaves came to be out?
A. I did not. I have no opinion upon that subject at all.
Q. Did you see that memorandum book after you gave it to Stanton, until you saw it yesterday?
A. No, sir.
Q. Who gave it to you yesterday?
A. General Holt.

Q. Did you examine it carefully with him?

A. Yes, sir. He gave it to me and I looked it through carefully.

Q. And since you looked at it your opinion is, that it is in the same condition as when you gave it to Stanton?

A. My impression after reading it was that, to the best of my recollection, it was in the same condition.

Q. Were you sworn before the military commission that tried Mrs. Surratt?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you any knowledge or information that Booth had this diary at Dr. Mudd's house during his flight?

A. No, sir; I have no information about it.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Have you mentioned all the things you took from the person of Booth?

A. I believe I have.

Q. What was the amount of the bill of exchange?

A. I think £50; I have forgotten. They were drawn in favor of J. Wilkes Booth on some bank in Canada. There were three of them, but marked 1st, 2d, and 3d, all for the same amount.

Q. Did you find any gold on him?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you any better recollection now as to the amount of money you took from him?

A. I am unable to say. It was not very much. I know we thought he had not got rich if that was all he had.

Q. Did you deliver that to Mr. Stanton?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything else you took from Booth which you have not mentioned?

A. I hardly know what I did mention. I took his diary, these bills of exchange, money, keys, compass, shavings, tobacco, and a little knife.

Q. Were there any papers upon his person?

A. Only the papers in this book; no others that I remember.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. How long was this diary in your possession?

A. From the time I took it from Booth until about 4 o'clock the same afternoon.

Q. You observe in the entry now the printed page, headed December, 1864, and that on the next leaf is the entry commencing April 13th and 14th. Do you remember whether these pages were opposite each other when you first saw the diary?

A. I have no remembrance about that.

Q. Was it in your mind in looking over the diary to discover whether it might give any clue to Booth's movements before the assassination, or of persons who were acting with him?

A. Yes, sir; that was in my mind.

Q. Was there anything in the book giving any clue to his movements before the assassination, or to the persons who acted with him?

A. Nothing that gave me any idea or any information whatever on these subjects. I took this copy because of what seemed to me its peculiar character. I thought it was something I would like to keep.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you know what became of the copy you took?

A. I do not.

Q. When did you give it to General Baker?

A. It was some time afterwards, I do not know how long. It may have been five or six weeks. I do not think I kept it very long.

Q. Why did you give it to General Baker?

A. After having it in my possession I felt as if I had no right to retain it without permission. I told General Baker of it, and asked him to ascertain from Mr. Stanton if I might retain it. Subsequently he said that Mr. Stanton did not want that I should have it, and I gave it to him. I do not know what he did with it.

Q. Did you ever say anything to Mr. Stanton about it?

A. I did not.

Q. And you do not know whether he knew that you had it, except what General Baker told you?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you read that copy over after you had surrendered the book to Mr. Stanton?

A. I presume I did, although I do not remember any definite time when I read it.

Q. Did you read it to any one?

A. I read it to one man.

Q. To whom?

A. To George Emerson.

Q. Where is he?

A. He is dead. I do not think I read it to any one else, and I have no recollection of any particular time of reading it all, although I have no doubt I read it over, and I presume I read it several times.

Q. At the time you handed it to General Baker, did he read it?

A. I do not think I saw him read it. I just handed it to him and he put it away.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You stated that the diary was not in Baker's possession at all until after you handed it to the Secretary of War, and that the Secretary examined it himself at that time.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Baker have it in his hand and examine it at that time?

A. Yes.

Q. How long did he have it in his possession?

A. Long enough to read it. He looked it over while Mr. Stanton was looking at some other things.

Q. Do you think Baker read all the entries in the book at that time?

A. I do not know.

Q. You are positive you delivered the book yourself to the Secretary of War?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember any pencil sketch of a house in the book at that time?

A. I do not.

Q. Did you have any conversation with General Baker about a pencil sketch of a house upon a piece of paper, in order to determine whether it was the house in which Mrs. Surratt lived?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you remember seeing a sketch which seemed to mark roads, &c., now in the book?

A. Yes, sir; that was in it.

Q. Did you ever talk with Baker about that?

A. No; General Baker has since stated it was his recollection that there was a sketch of a house in the book.

Q. When did he state that, and where?

A. I think, in Philadelphia, about three weeks ago. I went there to see General Baker.

Q. At whose request?

A. At my own instance, in reference to a purely business transaction.

Q. Had you command of all the troops that were engaged in the search of Booth's party on the line of his escape?

A. I had only command of the men that were with me, twenty-six or twenty-seven in number.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you go, after returning to Washington, directly to Mr. Stanton with Colonel Baker?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were any orders or directions given to you about the book or of the other things by Mr. Stanton?

A. He said, "Baker, you take care of these things," referring to the money and bills of exchange.

Q. Did he give them into his possession?

A. Yes, sir; but he retained the memorandum book himself. The money and bills of exchange were lying on the table, and Colonel Baker gathered them up and took them away with him.

Q. Was there any direction given to Colonel Baker to give the book to Judge Holt?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where did you and Baker go from Mr. Stanton's office?

A. Back to Baker's office.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know General Eckert?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he present at the Secretary's house?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he come in while you were there?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you go immediately to Mr. Stanton's house from Baker's office?

A. We went first to the War Department and then to the Secretary's dwelling house.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Baker about the pencil sketch of a house, except the one you mentioned in Philadelphia about three weeks ago?

A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Are you one of the persons whose services were recognized in the capture of Booth in the distribution of rewards?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What amount was awarded to you?

A. Fifteen thousand dollars.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 13, 1867.

Hon. ALEXANDER W. RANDALL sworn and examined.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. In your answer to the House resolution calling for information in regard to appointments to office, you designated as causes in a great many cases, thirteen or fourteen hundred in all, "political reasons." The term is a very vague one, and I will be obliged to you to state more distinctly what you mean by it.

A. There were about twelve or fourteen hundred in all, and part of them were for political reasons.

Q. Referring to your printed answer, I find that you state the whole number of removals to be 1,604, and that of these 1,283 were for "political reasons;" and you state afterwards that eight were for "political reasons and neglect of duty," thereby implying, I suppose, something more than mere neglect of duty?

A. In those cases there were charges against the individuals as well as political reasons; perhaps inattention to duty. I do not remember the particulars in these cases. I suppose the statement which you have read is a correct statement. I will answer that "political reasons" embrace a good many things. Removals for that cause have been frequent in almost every administration. When we began, we turned out men because they did not vote for Lincoln; that was a political reason, and it was so stated. If men voted the democratic ticket or were opposed to the policy of Mr. Lincoln, they were removed for that cause—it was designated "political reasons."

Q. I am speaking now of the removals made by the President in office, and the removals to which you refer in this answer.

A. I was proceeding to state that opposition to the policy of the present administration, which is understood to be the policy of Mr. Lincoln, was a cause for which many of these men were removed. It was opposition to Lincoln's policy, which Mr. Johnson was trying to carry out, and the general term "political reasons" was used, that is the general term used to cover a great variety of circumstances. A man may have been very abusive of Mr. Johnson, denouncing him on the street as a traitor; he would be turned out of office, and it would be stated "for political reasons." If he was abusive of the Postmaster General, denouncing him in the same way, we would turn him out and assign the reason for it as "political."

Q. I wish you would state, in the cases referred to in this answer, whether "political reasons" were not difference of opinion with the Executive in regard to his policy in the reconstruction of the southern States?

A. Not altogether; these questions entered into it. It went both ways; for instance, Republican members of Congress would come into the department and complain of a man as having been opposed to the war, as denouncing Lincoln and Johnson, and wanted me to turn him out. I would turn him out and assign as cause "political reasons." On the other hand, complaint would come that a man was abusing Mr. Johnson, calling him a traitor for carrying out his policy in opposition to Congress. He would be turned out and the cause assigned "political reasons." Without my attention being called to particular cases, I can only state the meaning of the term in this general way, and I have simply intended to give you a general idea.

Q. I wish you would state whether, in a majority of cases, these removals were not made simply from the fact that the persons harmonized in sentiment with Congress in the matter of reconstruction?

A. In a great many cases it was so, but I cannot say in a majority. I could not from memory, undertake to say with accuracy what proportion.

Q. Let me ask whether any of these parties were turned out because they differed in opinion with Congress or spoke disparagingly of it?

A. I do not remember any complaint made of that kind. Some republican members would complain of men that they were opposed to the war and opposed to Mr. Lincoln, and wish me to turn them out, which in many cases I did.

Q. Did you turn out any men because of complaints of their disparaging the Congress of the United States?

A. I do not remember any case of that kind.

Q. Would you have turned any man out because of such complaint?

A. If a man was very abusive of any branch of the government, and it was brought to my attention, I would turn him out. I acted myself, personally, upon pretty near all the cases reported in this answer. Very few of them were investigated by the President or acted upon by him, except to approve my recommendation.

Q. In the cases of what are termed "Presidential appointments," the appointing and removing power was with the President?

A. It was.

Q. In the list furnished here, one of which designates the Presidential appointments, you have given the reasons for action, so that you seem to be aware of the reasons upon which the President acted in cases where the appointing power was exercised by him?

A. I have stated the reasons in all cases. But the attention of the President was rarely called in any case, except in a few instances where there was dispute and in reference to the large offices. He nearly always took my judgment in each case, and approved my action without any investigation on his part.

Q. Were there any cases falling within his jurisdiction where he did not make the appointments?

A. He made all appointments, but upon my investigation, and in accordance with my recommendation, in most cases, except in the large offices and in cases of controversy.

Q. State, if you please, the process by which the appointments are made in cases where the appointing power is lodged with the President?

A. We make up at the department a brief of each case; for instance, if in the Pittsburg case there are two or three applicants and a large number of letters and recommendations, for or against each, a brief is made in the department stating the nature of each letter or recommendation for or against each applicant. After looking them over, I select the one which seems to me it is proper to appoint, and place his name on the outside. The case then goes to the President, who simply endorses his initials, "A. J.," upon the papers. It is considered as an order for the appointment, and the papers are again filed in the department; that is done in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred without the President ever taking out the documents at all.

Q. Please go back a little further and state the inauguration of the procedure; in those cases where are applications lodged?

A. Sometimes the petitions come through the President, and sometimes through the department. When they come to the President, they are immediately sent to the department, and go on our files with the papers in the same case coming direct to the department. The President himself keeps no file of such papers. When they come to him originally, they are referred immediately to the department.

Q. I wish to ask you whether the President ever makes appointments without consulting you, and where there are no papers on file?

A. I have no recollection of any such case. Sometimes he sends down a direction to appoint such a man to such a place, or a request that he be appointed, when the case is made up in our department and goes on our records.

Q. Does he make any appointments in cases where the power is lodged with you?

A. No, sir; he sometimes sends down recommendations. The applications originally come to him in cases of these appointments as frequently as in Presidential appointments, but I make them up.

Q. I wish to know whether in some cases he has not directed the appointment of postmasters in cases that fall within your jurisdiction?

A. No, sir; I do not recollect any such case. It is possible there may be a case where it has been done; I do not, however, remember any. Memorandums sometimes come down from the President requesting certain parties to be appointed.

Q. When an individual has been designated in a case falling within the ap pointing power of the President, what is the next step; what disposition do you make of the case?

A. We brief the case, and the President directs the appointment, usually, of the parties selected by me and whose name is placed on the outside of the papers. The case in that shape comes to the President, who indorses his initials on the outside of the paper. It is then returned to the department and constitutes a part of our record. I then send out an appointment signed by myself, certifying that the President has appointed John Doe, postmaster of Pittsburg, requiring him to execute and return to the department the necessary bonds and oaths. When this is done and properly certified, they go on file and I certify to the Secretary of State that such a man was appointed at such a time by the President, that his bond has been executed and oath returned to the department. I ask him to cause a commission to issue; he makes out a commission in form, which is signed by the President and sent back to the Department of State, and countersigned and sealed by the Secretary.

Q. Do you make out the list of appointments that are made during the vacation of Congress to be sent to the Senate?

A. I have never made out a regular list. I say to the President that there are ten or twenty cases ready to be sent to the Senate. I take them up as it seems to me proper, and as fast as they are sent to the President he transmits them to the Senate, and his clerks keep a record in his office of the nominations made.

Q. The President, then, through his private secretary, keeps a record of commissions issued in vacation also, does he not?

A. He does, and also a record of the confirmations and rejections by the Senate.

Q. I find in this letter some seventy-five cases of appointments made during the recess of the Congress commencing on the 4th of March, 1865; will you please state whether these names were sent in to the President by you?

A. Some of them were; quite a number of them were not. Quite a number of them—I think forty or fifty—should have been sent by Mr Lincoln, and failed to be sent in this way: On the last day of the session of the Senate Mr. Lincoln went down stairs to a reception of Mrs. Lincoln. I was there waiting for him to get through with the reception, in order to send in these cases, but before they had been sent in, the Senate had adjourned. That, as a matter of history, was the reason why this number of cases were not sent in. During the recess, I think, most of these men were reappointed. Mr. Lincoln took the ground that if a case went over he had the right to appoint, as had always been done before. And I think in most cases the same persons were again appointed. I do not remember in respect to every case.

Q. As a general rule his appointments would expire in 1865, would they not, having been made at the beginning of his administration and for four years?

A. Some of them would, and a good many of them would not. Quite a considerable number of them were made at the called session of the Senate, immediately after the 4th of March, when Mr. Lincoln came into office, and would therefore expire early in March, 1865, while others would expire along during the summer.

Q. Did you call the attention of the President to those cases which were omitted in the session of 1865–'6?

A. No, sir; I was not Postmaster General then. I called his attention to the matter, and he complained that they had not been sent to the Senate before, and told me to have everything in readiness for the purpose of having names sent for every office during the last session.

Q. When were you appointed Postmaster General?

A. In July, 1866. In the session of 1865–'6 Mr. Dennison was Postmaster General. I do not know whether he called the attention of the President to them or not. The papers were all filed in my bureau as First Assistant Postmaster General, and it was, perhaps, as much my fault as it was Mr. Dennison's. It may have been my business, probably, to have called Mr. Dennison's attention to it, but I had a great deal of business to do in campaigning that fall, and did not give as much attention to the duties of the office as, perhaps, I ought to have done.

Q. Will you please bring before the Committee, when you next appear, the papers in the case of Pittsburg, and that of Lancaster, Pennsylvania?

A. I will. I do not think, however, there has been any removal in Lancaster. If there was an appointment, I think it was not perfected, but that Mr. Stevens' man has been in office all the time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are the reasons upon which these removals were made given on the papers on file in every case?

A. In most of the cases they are; it depends very much on circumstances. Frequently appointments were made in this way: A member of Congress would come in, make a verbal statement to me, and ask me to remove some postmaster in his district and appoint another man, giving his name. I would give the order for the removal and appointment and merely indorse a memorandum upon the papers myself. During the administration of Mr. Lincoln, removals and appointments in hundreds of cases were made in that way merely upon the verbal statements of members of Congress. Recently we have been more careful to keep our files more full. Until a resolution had passed Congress allowing every member to see the papers relating to offices in his district, our democratic friends did not as a general thing have a chance to see the papers in cases called up by them, while republican members in every instance were allowed to see them. Under that resolution they are shown to any member of Congress on his request.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You stated you removed a great many men in Mr. Lincoln's time on the application of members of Congress; I desire to know if you did that upon the application of democratic members?

A. I never did, and I do not think Mr. Kasson ever did. It was very rare to find a democratic member in whom we had political confidence during that time.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Have not all, or nearly all, the removals made by you since you have been in office as Postmaster General, been made at the request of democratic members of Congress?

A. No, sir; I have had republican members come to me and say they wanted such or such a man removed in their district, and that they did not care to go on record as asking it, and I have had the men turned out. It is proper, perhaps, to say that I have turned out more men upon application of republican members in this way, than I have put in on their recommendations.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. Have you appointed any man who you knew had opposed the war, as postmaster?

A. No, sir; and whenever I have ascertained that any such man has been appointed I have turned him out.

Q. Have you appointed a man who could not take the test oath of 1862?

A. No, sir; not a man has ever received a commission until the proper oaths required by law have been received at the department, so far as I know.

Q. Has that been the case in the lately rebellious States?

A. Always. There has never been a case in the Post Office Department where a commission has been issued without the proper oaths in full having been required, that I am aware of.

Q. Have you any mutilated oaths on file, such as they have in the revenue department.

A. Yes, sir; I think there are two or three. I do not remember the cases. In these cases we never sent the commission. If they cannot take the entire oath, without mutilating it, that is enough for us to reject them.

Q. In every case you have required the oath prescribed by law?

A. In every case. I had a conversation or discussion upon that point, in which I insisted upon adhering in every case to the rule.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Where was that conversation?

A. In the department.

Q. With whom?

A. There was a time when there was a serious question raised whether men could be found who could take the oath for all the offices in the South which it was desirable to open, and whether these offices could be opened unless we modified the oath. On one occasion, at some kind of a meeting, a proposition was made that the oath should be modified. For this reason I insisted that it should not be; that, as we had kept our records clear so far, we should continue to keep them clear. There were a good many cases in which they were very anxious to have post offices, where they stated they could not find any man to take the oath. I told them if they could not find a man, to find a woman; to get anybody who was qualified by law to be commissioned as postmaster.

Q. With whom was this discussion?

A. It was a consultation with Governor Dennison. He became at one time impressed with the idea that there was a necessity that the oath should be modified, and I believe so reported to Congress.

Q. Have any contracts for carrying the mails been made with parties who did not take the test oath?

A. Not that I know of. It is possible that there may have been something of the kind that escaped my attention. I have required it to be done in every instance, although I do not think that the law does require it. I do not think a contractor is an officer or an agent within the meaning of the law.

Q. Are you acquainted with Bryan Tyson?

A. I have seen him.

Q. How many contracts have you let to him?

A. I could not tell; I suppose wherever he has been the lowest bidder. I do not examine personally into many of the contracts. I merely sign them as a matter of form.

Q. Have you any knowledge of a circular which he issued and sent South?

A. I saw it in the department; that is the only knowledge I have of the thing.

Q. Will you state what its contents were?

A. I cannot tell you that; it contained a great many foolish things. Perhaps I can find the circular in the department; if so, I will bring it to the Committee.

Q. Does Tyson hold any position under the government?

A. Not that I know of; I do not know if he ever did. He ought to have been kicked out if he did, and probably has been; he is a crazy fellow on some things.

Q. There were certain officers appointed during the recess of the Senate whose names were not submitted to the Senate; were they paid their salaries during the time they continued to act?

A. I presume so; they should have been. The form usually in which they receive their compensation is this: They make return to the department of the proceeds of the office—so much expenses, so much salary, &c. The salary is deducted by them from the proceeds of the office, and they pay over the balance. The accounts of these men may not all have been settled, but they have, I do not doubt, retained their salaries in their own hands, as they were entitled to do.

Q. Do you remember now the number of appointments which were not sent to the Senate, which, under the statutes, should have been sent during the last two sessions of Congress?

A. I do not think there are any cases in which nominations have not been sent to the Senate this last session. I think that the name of some man has been sent to the Senate for every office. The President directed that every vacancy should be filled, so far as he was concerned, by sending a nomination for every office to the Senate.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. I want to understand this: Do you say that there are any cases of Presidential appointments requiring the confirmation of the Senate that were not sent to the Senate for confirmation during the last session?

A. None that I am aware of; we intended that every one should be sent. It may be that cases have been overlooked. The President, as I said, complained that his attention had not been called to such cases previously.

Q. Do I understand you to say that during the first session of the thirty-ninth Congress there were some Presidential appointments that were not sent to the Senate at all?

A. Yes, sir; some which ought to have been sent.

Q. Did the President know of that fact?

A. I do not think he did.

Q. When he ascertained the fact what did he say?

A. He complained that they had been left so long, and said that cases must be made up and nominations sent to Congress during that session.

Q. How many of these had been overlooked to your recollection?

A. I do not know; probably forty or fifty.

Q. Whenever the President's attention has been called to that fact has he directed nominations to be sent?

A. I called his attention to that fact last fall, before the commencement of the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, and he complained that his attention had not been called to the matter before.

Q. Why were they left over?

A. Through carelessness, I suppose; I do not know. We had generally good men in the offices, I believe.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. During the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress you were not Postmaster General?

A. No, sir; although it was perhaps through my carelessness that I did not call Governor Dennison's attention to these cases.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were any nominations held back by design in any case?

A. No, sir; never. It was merely carelessness of the department, either of myself or of Governor Dennison. When we came to look the cases over, there was a much larger number than I had supposed.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. Were any of these nominations retained from the Senate under an apprehension that they would not be confirmed?

A. Not that I know of; I never heard of such a thing.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. I understand you that the President keeps a record of all the names sent in by him, and also of all the commissions issued during the recess; had not then the President the means within his own possession of ascertaining where vacancies existed, and of what commissions had been issued during the recess?

A. The names were on the books in his office, I suppose.

Q. Was not the reason why many of these appointments, made in the recess of 1865, were not sent because the men did not harmonize with the President in regard to the reconstruction policy of the government?

A. I never heard of it.

Q. Did he intend to send them in?

A. Of course, I cannot say as to that. I do not suppose he knew anything about it, unless the information came to him from the department. I do not suppose he reads one letter in a thousand that he receives in regard to these political matters. It would be physically impossible for him to do so. I do not read myself but a small portion of the letters that come to me as Postmaster General.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. I ask you whether it would not be utterly impossible for the President to give his personal attention to these things, and to know personally in regard to all these appointments, although the information may be on the books in his office?

A. It is impossible for him to do it, and it is impossible for the head of a department to do it. The number of the departments of the government will have to be multiplied before long to enable the head of a department to attend properly to the business coming within his charge.

Q. You have given us the practice of sending in names to the President; I wish to know whether or not the same practice prevailed since Mr. Johnson became President as before?

A. Yes, sir; Mr. Lincoln did the same thing, although I was not then Postmaster General. I went to him nearly every week with a number of cases, and he would say, "Is this right?" and then put his initials on them without ever looking at the details of the cases.

Q. Were not nominations sent to the Senate that were not confirmed, but left in the Senate—not acted upon?

A. Yes, sir; there were quite a number of nominations which the Senate failed to confirm, and left the offices vacant, in some cases rejecting three or four successively for the same place; and there were also cases in which they failed to act at all. I have one or two in mind now. Finley, Ohio, Tecumseh, Michigan, and Milton, Pennsylvania, were, I think, in that class of cases. At Milton there were one or two rejections; and then another name was sent up, and they did not act upon it at all.

Q. You stated that you had made removals for political reasons; do you know of cases sent to the Senate where the nominations were rejected for political reasons?

A. I know what Senators have said; I do not know what took place in executive session of the Senate, of course.

Q. I wish to know if, during the period at which the President and Congress have differed in policy, you have removed and made appointments upon representations of republican members of Congress?

A. Yes, sir; a good many; and so has the President in the case of Presidential appointments.

Q. I wish to know whether that is the case with men who agreed with Congress and differed with the President?

A. Yes, sir; the papers will show that.

Q. I wish to know whether you have appointed anybody to office upon the recommendation of the Senators of a State, in any case, who has been rejected by the Senate?

A. Yes, sir; the President nominated a man to the office at Litchfield, Illinois, who was recommended, among others, by the two Senators of that State, and who was rejected by the Senate, I believe, twice.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. State whether you recollect any case where Mr. Lincoln failed to send in the names of parties to the Senate who had been appointed during the vacation.

A. I do not know about that; their terms just began to expire about the last part of Mr. Lincoln's time.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. How long have you been connected with the Post Office Department officially?

A. I went in there in 1862. I was appointed in October of that year, I think, and commenced my duties immediately after the election in November.

Q. State whether it has been the practice of the department to remove for the reasons assigned here ever since you have been connected with the department.

A. Yes, sir; it has always been done. There have been fewer removals and appointments of that kind since Mr. Johnson was President than before, I think.

Q. Since there has been a difference between the President and Congress, has there been a greater number of changes than when Mr. Lincoln came into office?

A. No; they were removed then three or four thousand in a year.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Were not nearly all the changes made by Mr. Lincoln made for political reasons?

A. Yes; I believe removals and appointments were made in nearly every office considered worth having. This is always the case when a new administration comes in.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you know of cases where there was a difference of opinion between President Lincoln and the majority in Congress, in which removals were made because the parties favored the majority in Congress against the President?

A. I do not know. There was a time when a majority of both houses appeared to be opposed to Mr. Lincoln, but he continued to make appointments upon the recommendations of republican members, although they were opposed to him.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1867.

Hon. ALEXANDER W. RANDALL appeared, and his examination was continued as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. If you have the papers before you in the case of the city of Pittsburg, I desire you to state what are the recommendations for the appointment of Mr. Wade Hampton.

A. From the brief in that case, it appears that Mr. Wade Hampton was recommended by the National Union Club of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, signed by the president and secretaries, and endorsed by Hon. Edgar Cowan, asking that Mr. Hampton's nomination be sent in.

Q. Please give the date.

A. There does not seem to be any date to the letter to the President. It is filed April 23, 1866. The letter is as follows:

Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: The National Union Club of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, respectfully recommend the appointment of Wade Hampton, esq., for postmaster of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. In making this recommendation, the name of a true and warm friend of your administration is presented for your consideration.

(Signed) NATHANIEL R. SAWYER, President.

(Signed) HALL PATTERSON,
JAMES BLACKMORE,
Secretaries.

Mr. Hampton's nomination was rejected by the Senate. Mr. McClellan was then nominated. These are the recommendations, so far as I have any knowledge of them. Charles Knap recommends Mr. McClellan, and the recommendation is endorsed by Mr. Moorhead. Mr. Knap was secretary of the National Union Club, and Mr. Moorhead a member of Congress from that district. Mr. McClellan was confirmed by the Senate.

Q. Be good enough now to turn to the Philadelphia case, and state what papers are on file in reference to that.

A. I have found considerable material in that case. Mr. Walborn was removed, and Hall appointed, September 18.

Q. Please state what papers are on file for his removal.

A. That was done on the order of the President. What papers he had I do not know; I do not find any, except a communication signed by the private secretary of the President, requesting the removal of Walborn and the appointment of Hall. I may say that I was sorry to have Walborn removed; he was a liberal man, and a good friend of our cause.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. I desire to enquire whether he contributed more liberally for that cause than he did for the Lincoln campaign, 1864?

A. Postmasters came down very liberally all over the country in 1864.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Were they asked to contribute?

A. Certainly they were asked. It was not exacted of them; they were asked to contribute, if they were so inclined.

Q. Were there any removals upon the ground that they did not contribute?

A. None that I know of. Many were removed because they wrote very impudent letters, but none because they did not contribute.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was the invitation sent to them to contribute the same as in the campaign for Mr. Lincoln?

A. Substantially; I do not know as to language. They were asked, if they felt inclined to sustain the principles held by Mr. Lincoln, to contribute—that was all.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Be good enough to turn to the case of Chambersburg, and state what papers are on file in relation to that.

A. At Chambersburg, Diehl was removed upon the petition of citizens stating that he was a member of the Philadelphia convention, but subsequently denounced it and the friends of the administration. The petition was enclosed by Hon. Montgomery Blair, who recommended the appointment of Welsh. On these papers Welsh was appointed in place of Diehl, but was rejected by the Senate.

Hampshire was then appointed, and rejected by the Senate. Mathew R. Welsh was again appointed, and confirmed on the 23d of April.

Q. Read the petition referred to.

A. It is as follows:

To the Postmaster General of the United States:

The undersigned, supporters of Andrew Johnson's policy, residing in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, and vicinity, would respectfully recommend Mathew R. Welsh, of said place, for appointment to the post office of the said borough.

Mr. Welsh was one of the supporters of Abraham Lincoln for President of the United States, and adhered to that party until the advent of Mr. Johnson; and when the latter announced his policy, Mr. Welsh endorsed it, and has ever since given it his warmest advocacy. Mr. Welsh is in every way fitted for the position. We respectfully request that he may be appointed.

(Signed) JOHN K. ARMSTRONG,
(and eighteen others.)

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Were these nominations made upon the express order of the President, or in the ordinary way?

A. In the ordinary way. I took the case up to him, and I do not think he ever saw the papers.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Is not the order of the President necessary for an appointment in all Presidential cases?

A. He puts his initials to it, as I explained the other day, but without taking up the paper at all.

Q. Please turn to the case of West Manchester, and state what papers are on file.

A. That is a case within my jurisdiction. I did not know of the change until it was made. It was made by General Skinner. The papers are as follows:

1. Petition of nineteen citizens against Ross, and for the appointment of Johnston.

2. Dr. Armstrong says the office is conducted by a boy who is unfit for his duties, and great inconvenience results from his mismanagement. He recommends Miss Wallace, and has thirty-three copied names attached.

3. N. R. Sawyer, editor of the Pittsburg Republic, for Johnson's administration, recommends Johnston for Ross's position.

4. Petition of four hundred and two citizens for Mrs. Stewart, vice Ross, who neglects his duty.

5. Application of Mr. Johnston. Postmaster at Pittsburg recommends Johnston, under letter received October 20, 1866, referring to this and other appointments.

6. Petition of thirty-eight citizens for street letter-boxes and cars, sent by postmaster, to which is added a request for the removal of the postmaster, and appointment of Johnston. General J. Bowen Sweitzer recommends and endorses the removal of Ross, and the appointment of Johnston.

Q. Please read the letter of Mr. Sawyer in this case?

A. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE REPUBLIC,
Pittsburg, August 9, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: I desire to call your attention to the appointment which was asked by me some time ago for the post office of West Manchester, of this county. W. B. Ross, the present postmaster, is an active and bitter opponent of President Johnson and his policy, and it is very desirable to have a man of different political views in his place. We have such a man in the person of Mr. Johnston, an active and energetic young man of good character and standing, and who would be a valuable auxiliary in our cause in this important borough. In appointing Mr. Johnston postmaster, instead of Mr. W. B. Ross, you would subserve our cause, and much oblige,

Yours, respectfully,

NATHANIEL R. SAWYER,
Editor of Republic.

Hon. ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,
Washington, D. C.

Q. Turn now, if you please, to Sharpsburg, and state what papers are on file in this case.

A. There is a petition of thirteen citizens for Cline. N. P. Varry says Cline is a friend of the administration, and Barker politically opposed. This is not a Presidential office.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did the President know anything personally of that?

A. No, sir

Q. Please state upon whose recommendation the officer at Pittsburg, who was removed, was appointed, and by whom the appointment was made.

A. The appointment was made by Mr. Lincoln. I believe I wrote to Hon. J. K. Moorhead whether it was proper to appoint Van Bonhurst. There is an endorsement to that, "Mr. Moorhead says it is all right."

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Turn now to Lancaster.

A. In that case an order was made for removal. The case was then suspended by direction of the President, who said that Mr. Stevens was very bitter towards him, and it would look as if he had made a personal fight with Stevens on his postmaster, and he would have nothing done in reference to it. The same man, therefore, has remained in office ever since. The order stands for his removal, but action on it was suspended.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Who made the order for the removal?

A. It is made by the President.

Q. Who directed it to be suspended?

A. The President.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Upon whose recommendation was the order for removal made?

A. I find by the brief that twelve prominent citizens recommend Mr. Caldwell, and that the Hon. Edgar Cowan says, "make this at once, as all the friends of the administration have harmonized on this name." I may say that each case is peculiar to itself. There are all sorts of things said about a great many of these men politically, as well as charges against them. There are a great many charged with inefficiency in the discharge of the duties of their office —neglect, children interfering, persons under a legal age interfering with the handling of the mail, &c., &c. Sometimes these charges came alone, and sometimes in connection with political charges; sometimes political charges came alone.

Q. Please read the petition in the Lancaster case.

A. It was as follows:

DEAR SIR: Deeply interested in the success of the present movement to overthrow the radical element of the country, which has arrayed itself against you and your policy, we believe that the most effective way to destroy its influence is to remove those who hold the offices, and use the political power of office against you, to further the interests of your opponents. In our opinion great good will result from prompt action on your part in making a change in the post office in this city; and after a fair investigation of the matter we have come to the conclusion that no better man can be appointed to fill the place than J. Caldwell, esq., who has already made application, endorsed by prominent men, who have no other interest in the matter than sincere desire to see your wise policy trample on the mad schemes of the bold, bad men who control the majority in Congress.

Hoping that you will view this matter as we do, and promptly act, we are, very respectfully, yours,

SAMUEL H. REYNOLDS,
(and twelve others.)

To his Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON.

Q. Where there have been charges of inefficiency, you have noted it in your statement to Congress, have you not?

A. Yes, sir; I have intended to do so.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. What papers have you in the case of Finley post office, Ohio?

A. Wilson was appointed postmaster November 10, and his nomination was sent to the Senate on the 18th of March and 19th of April, but no action was reported upon it from the Senate.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. How is the office held now?

A. I think that is a case where I sent a special agent to take charge of the office.

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1867.

ALFRED R. SPEER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State all you know respecting the pardon granted to Clarence J. Howell by the President of the United States.

A. I know that General Baker got Mr. H. H. Hine to represent Clarence J. Howell in making application for pardon. He went to Mrs. Cobb, who agreed to furnish a pardon for $300 within a specified time, I forget the time—I think two or three days. He paid her a hundred dollars in cash; the balance was to be paid when the pardon was produced. He called on Mrs. Cobb at the time agreed upon, but did not get it. She said she would have it by the next evening certainly. He called the next evening and the pardon was there, but she could not deliver it to him because he had not taken the oath, which was necessary. She had the pardon ready for him if he would go and take the necessary oath. She said she got it on her own word that he would make the proper oath. I went down the same evening with General Baker to get back the money he had advanced to Hine to pay for the pardon. He made a demand for it; she refused. He then invited her to accompany him up to his headquarters. After a great deal of delay she consented to do so. Her husband also accompanied her there. When she arrived at Baker's headquarters, I believe she was asked where the pardon was. She stated it was down in her room at the Avenue House; that her husband knew where it was; that he would go with me and get it. We went down in a carriage together and got the pardon; I opened it and read it. The pardon was for Clarence J. Howell, whose name I believe never appeared on any record in the department as having anything criminal charged against him. I then delivered the pardon to General Baker. That was the last I saw of it. There was also a note addressed to the Secretary of State, enclosed in an envelope, sealed. I did not open it, but delivered that also to General Baker.

Q. Is your opinion in regard to the arrangements between Baker's detectives and Mrs. Cobb derived from him, or from your personal knowledge?

A. It is derived from Baker and from Hine.

Q. You were not present when the arrangement was made?

A. No, sir; I think no one was present but Hine and himself when the arrangement was made in reference to Mrs. Cobb.

Q. Were you present at any of the interviews between Mrs. Cobb and Hine?

A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. Then all you know in regard to it is from hearsay?

A. That is all.

Q. How do you know the amount that was agreed to be paid for the procurement of the pardon?

A. I got it from Hine, and before the last $200 were paid I saw the bills and marked them myself. I knew from Baker that it was going to be done. He called me up in his private office and asked me to mark the bills so that I would know them when I saw them.

Q. Do you know whether Mrs. Cobb applied to the President for this pardon?

A. I do not know whether she did or not.

Q. Do you know what papers were presented to the President when the pardon was obtained?

A. No, sir; I do not know anything about that.

Q. I understand, then, that all the facts of which you have personal knowledge are those that occurred after the pardon was granted.

A. Yes, sir; after the pardon was granted. I saw the pardon, and had it in my own hands and read it, as I have stated, and I also saw a note to the Secretary of State.

Q. Did you recover the bills which you had marked?

A. General Baker did. I saw them afterwards.

Q. Who delivered these bills to Mrs. Cobb?

A. Hine.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I do not know it personally. I knew the bills, and that General Baker and myself went down within a half a square of Hine on his way to the Avenue House. When the bills were recovered from Mrs. Cobb I saw them, and they were the same bills.

Q. Did you see them taken from Mrs. Cobb?

A. No, sir; she delivered them to General Baker after she went to his headquarters.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. How do you know she delivered them to him after she went to the headquarters?

A. I heard her say so, and heard General Baker say so.

Q. Was there any conversation between General Baker and Mrs. Cobb in reference to these bills?

A. Yes, sir; in the shape of a demand. General Baker demanded the money in my presence, down at the hotel. She refused to give it to him.

Q. During this conversation at the Avenue House did she admit that she had these bills?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did she say from whom she received them?

A. She said she received them from Mr. Howell, as she called him, (Mr. Hine.)

Q. Where is Hine; what is his full name?

A. At Lafayette, Indiana. His name is Henry H. Hine.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know whether the President had a knowledge of the character of Mrs. Cobb at the time she received this pardon for Mr. Howell?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. Do you know whether she had a personal interview with the President in regard to this pardon?

A. No, I do not. I have seen her go into the President's reception room a great many times. I mean the room where the President receives everybody, up stairs.

Q. Do you know to whom she delivered the papers, and from whom she received the pardon?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether she was to give any portion of the $300 to any person to aid her in procuring the pardon?

A. I do not know, except what I have heard.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You say you have seen Mrs. Cobb go into the President's reception room on several occasions; can you state whether she was announced formally or not, or went in without ceremony?

A. She went in without ceremony on the last occasion. I saw her go in. It was when the doors were thrown open and everybody who was there went in.

Q. How was it on the other occasion of which you speak?

A. She was let in by the attendant at the door.

Q. Was that immediately upon her application?

A. No, sir.

Q. State whether she was let in in preference to other persons who had been waiting.

A. I do not know that she was.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What is your profession or business?

A. My business is railroading.

Q. What do you mean by railroading—traveling on railroads?

A. Yes, sir; I have been traveling for twelve years.

Q. As brakesman, conductor, or what?

A. No, sir; as general agent for railroads.

Q. For what company?

A. I have traveled for the Quincy and Chicago company, at that time called the North Cross road, running from Galesburg to Quincy, Illinois. I have traveled for the Chicago and Northwestern; for the Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati; and for the Ohio and Mississippi. I first commenced as agent for the New York and Erie.

Q. What were your duties?

A. Looking after the ticket and passenger business, and generally visiting the ticket offices and seeing that bills were properly posted, and that no partiality was shown to other roads as against ours.

Q. What has been your profession for the last few years?

A. I think in 1862 I quit railroading in St. Louis. I then went with contractors in the army, and was in that business for two years.

Q. What do you mean by that?

A. I had charge of their beef contracts to supply the army with beef.

Q. How could you supply beef?

A. I would drive the cattle, and then on the proper requisition would have them slaughtered.

Q. Then you were a drover?

A. No, sir; I simply executed the contracts.

Q. In whose service were you?

A. In that of Parmer & Hascall, at one time. Then with Worth. Then I got one or two contracts of my own to fill with beef, which I did not fill, however, but sold them out.

Q. What did you do then?

A. Then I came to New York, and from there came to Washington, where I made the acquaintance of General Baker.

Q. How long ago is that?

A. I think about three years ago.
Q. Where did you make his acquaintance?
A. Here in Washington.
Q. In what way?
A. I stopped at the same house he did, on G street, back of the avenue, near Thirteenth street.
Q. What was your business here at that time?
A. I was here with Major Hascall, at that time as clerk for him. I came on with him from New York.
Q. Was he one of the beef men?
A. He was, and came on with the expectation of getting the contract for the District here.
Q. What time was that?
A. I think, February, 1864. I am not positive about the year.
Q. Was it that year or the year before?
A. I am not positive; I think it was in 1864.
Q. What profession did you then adopt?
A. General Baker one evening came into Major Hascall's office and got to talking about cotton frauds that were going on down South; Hascall said to him, that as he had not obtained this contract, I would be just the man to investigate the frauds. On the strength of that, General Baker hired me to investigate these frauds.
Q. At what price?
A. At $150 per month and my expenses paid.
Q. Your board paid?
A. While I was traveling. I paid my own board here in Washington.
Q. What did you call your profession?
A. I do not know exactly what to call it. It was to investigate cotton frauds, and I suppose it might be called an investigator.
Q. Did you have any other commission, except from Mr. Baker?
A. No, sir.
Q. The President or Mr. Stanton gave you no commission?
A. No, sir; I was simply employed by Mr. Baker.
Q. Where did you get your pay?
A. From General Baker.
Q. How long did you investigate cotton frauds?
A. I was down at Norfolk for about two months, I suppose.
Q. Did you, yourself, make any money out of that investigation?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you make anything for General Baker out of it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you not make your wages?
A. No, sir; I made a report, however.
Q. Do you say you did not make anything out of that investigation?
A. I did not.
Q. Did not ever state to Mr. Hascall that you did?
A. No, sir.
Q. How long did you follow it?
A. I made my report, and then went with Mr. Washburne, who was on the Committee of Commerce here, down to Norfolk.
Q. In what capacity did you go?
A. In no special capacity. I went to post him up.
Q. Were you employed by General Baker still?
A. Yes.
Q. At whose request did you go?

A. Mr. Washburne requested me to go, and I refused. He then made the request of General Baker, and General Baker ordered me to go.

Q. Did you get any pay from the Committee?

A. No, sir.

Q. What then did you do?

A. I went to New York to investigate bounty-jumping frauds.

Q. What part of New York?

A. The city. I was at the Astor House.

Q. Who sent you?

A. General Baker telegraphed me to go.

Q. Did you dive into that pretty deep and get out some frauds?

A. I did.

Q. Did you make any money out of it?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you make any money for General Baker?

A. No, sir.

Q. How long did you follow that?

A. I cannot say how long. I was then sent out to Chicago by General Baker to investigate frauds out there.

Q. What frauds?

A. Bounty-jumping frauds, &c. I remained in Chicago until the assassination of President Lincoln.

Q. Did you smell out any frauds there?

A. I was in a fair way of doing it when the assassination took place and our operations were suspended. I should have done it had I been permitted to carry it through.

Q. Did you make any money out of it?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you make anything for General Baker?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you make a report?

A. I did.

Q. In writing?

A. Yes, sir; all my reports were in writing.

Q. What did you do then?

A. I sent it to General Baker.

Q. What then did you do?

A. I was then telegraphed to come to Washington by General Baker.

Q. In all this time did you get the sum of $150 a month?

A. Yes, sir; and my traveling expenses.

Q. After you returned here, in what were you employed then?

A. I was then sent to various parts of the country to look after paymasters, quartermasters, &c., &c.

Q. When did you first become acquainted with Mrs. Cobb?

A. The first time I ever got acquainted with Mrs. Cobb was the night I called with General Baker at the Avenue House. That was the first interview and the last.

Q. Did you know what General Baker was going to do with Mrs. Cobb, or that he had made the bargain with her you spoke of?

A. Not until I went up to mark these bills. Captain Hine told me General Baker wanted me to mark these bills so that I would know them again when I saw them.

Q. Was that the first you knew about it?

A. It was.

Q. And you had not seen Mrs. Cobb until that time?

A. Yes, sir; I had seen her before.

Q. Then you had some acquaintance with her before?
A. I had seen her before, about the city, but I had not any interview with her.
Q. When was she first introduced to you?
A. I was not introduced.
Q. How did you come to find her out without being introduced?
A. I went down there, and General Baker introduced himself.
Q. How did you know her before?
A. By her being pointed out to me as a somewhat notorious character.
Q. How did you find her out, or know her from any other woman?
A. I cannot tell you how. She must have been pointed out to me, or I certainly would not have known her.
Q. What did you call your profession when you engaged in this business of Mrs. Cobb and General Baker?
A. I was on General Baker's force then. I belonged to the War Department.
Q. Did General Baker tell you, previous to this, about Mrs. Cobb procuring pardons?
A. No, sir.
Q. Had you not been told that Mrs. Cobb was dealing very largely in pardons?
A. No; not by General Baker. I had returned from some place only the night before. The scheme for employing Captain Hine to apply to Mrs. Cobb for a pardon was already concocted when I was away.
Q. Who is this Captain Hine?
A. He was once assistant provost marshal general of Missouri. He is a very intelligent man.
Q. How long had you known him?
A. I had probably known him four or five months previous to that occurrence.
Q. Is he a respectable man?
A. A very respectable man.
Q. An honest man?
A. I think so, as far as I have had dealings with him.
Q. Did he always tell the truth?
A. Always to me; I never caught him in any lie in my life.
Q. Do you think he told the truth to Mrs. Cobb?
A. I do not know; I do not think he did.
Q. Was he part of General Baker's force attached to the War Department?
A. I do not know whether he was or not; I never saw his name on the pay-roll.
Q. Please tell the Committee who General Baker's force were at the time when you were here.
A. I can give you the names of some of them; I could not of all. There were a great many There was a man by the name of Odell.
Q. Where is he now?
A. At Cleveland.
Q. Was he here at that time?
A. I could not say. He was, like myself, traveling.
Q. Was he traveling on the same pay and expenses you were?
A. Yes, sir. There was a man by the name of Samuel Jones.
Q. Where is he?
A. The last I heard of him he was in New York.
Q. Is he located in New York?
A. He was, but was talking of going away.
Q. Was he getting the same pay and expenses?

A. I do not know what pay he was getting.

Q. Did he belong to the War Department too?

A. He belonged to General Baker's force, and General Baker represented the War Department, as I understood.

Q. Who else?

A. John B. Hubbard. He came, originally, from California, but since that time has lived in Connecticut. He was, a week ago, in New York. He has now gone South—left for there on Saturday.

Q. Where has he gone?

A. He has gone down to Charleston to report to General Sickles for some special duty.

Q. In whose employ is he?

A. If he is employed by General Sickles, I suppose he is employed by the government. I do not know in whose special employ he is.

Q. Who else?

A. A man by the name of Trail; I do not recollect his first name, and I do not know where he is.

Q. Was he getting the same pay you were?

A. I do not know. There was also a man by the name of Isaac Reynolds. I have not seen him for a long time.

Q. Was he attached to the War Department too?

A. He was attached to General Baker's force.

Q. What did he get?

A. I do not know. There was another man by the name of Thomas Bowles. He was not here, however, at that time. He was located in New York. There was also a man by the name of Collins, of Philadelphia. I do not know his first name, and do not know where he is now.

Q. Was he attached to the War Department?

A. He was on General Baker's force. There was also a man by the name of Roberts. I think he is here in the Capitol on duty. I have not seen him on duty, but I heard that he was here. These are about all I remember. There were others, but I do not call them to mind.

Q. You say that you and Baker got this money from Mrs. Cobb?

A. No, sir, I did not say so. I stated that General Baker got it; at least General Baker said so, and I heard him swear to it in court.

Q. Did you hear General Baker say that?

A. I did.

Q. Do you know that she recovered a judgment against him in court?

A. Not for this money.

Q. Were you sworn on that trial?

A. I was.

Q. Did you swear to the same thing you have here?

A. I believe so, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. You stated Mrs. Cobb went up to General Baker's office with you after some little delay. Did she go readily with General Baker?

A. Not very readily, but she concluded to go.

Q. Did you not tell her she would have to go?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did she not remonstrate about going?

A. She did not want to go.

Q. Did she not tell you she would not go, at first?

A. No, sir; she wanted to know what authority he had for requiring her to go.

Q. When did you first have a conversation with Mrs. Cobb?

A. I have never had a conversation with Mrs. Cobb.

Q. When did you first hear a conversation between Mrs. Cobb and anybody else?

A. In her room at the Avenue hotel.

Q. Who was in her room?

A. A man represented to be her husband, General Baker, and myself.

Q. Did you go in when General Baker did?

A. I did.

Q. What did you tell Mrs. Cobb you had come there for?

A. I did not tell her anything.

Q. What did General Baker tell her?

A. He told her he had come there for his money.

Q. Was that the first thing he said to her?

A. That was the first thing, I believe.

Q. By what authority did he claim to demand it?

A. As being his own.

Q. What did she say?

A. I think she said she did not have any of his money, or something to that effect.

Q. What did he say to that?

A. He said she had, because it had just been paid to her by Captain Hine or Howell, I think he called him.

Q. This man's real name you say was Hine?

A. Yes, sir; Henry H. Hine.

Q. And his pretended name Howell?

A. Yes, sir; Clarence J. Howell.

Q. What did she say to that?

A. She did not deny it, I believe.

Q. When did she give up the money?

A. When she went to General Baker's headquarters, I was told.

Q. What do you mean by "General Baker's headquarters?"

A. At his office and place of business.

Q. Where was it?

A. On Eighteenth street, I think.

Q. You took Mrs. Cobb and her husband and carried them up to General Baker's headquarters?

A. No, sir; Mrs. Cobb was invited to accompany General Baker to his headquarters.

Q. Do you say that Mrs. Cobb went there on a simple invitation?

A. She was invited to go there. No threats were used.

Q. Do you mean to tell the Committee that she went there voluntarily on mere invitation, or because you took her there?

A. She went there on his invitation; no hands were laid on her.

Q. Did not you tell her she must go?

A. No, sir; I told her nothing.

Q. Did not General Baker tell her so?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did not General Baker give her to understand she must go?

A. No, sir.

Q. She went on a simple invitation to go to General Baker's office?

A. She did not, as I said before, go at first. Then when she concluded to go she wanted to have her husband go with her. The General said he could go.

Q. He first wanted her to go without her husband?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any controversy about that?

A. No, sir.

Q. You speak of a pardon that you saw, signed by Andrew Johnson; did you ever see Andrew Johnson write?

A. No, sir.

Q. How do you know the pardon was signed by President Johnson?

A. I have seen what purported to be his signature.

Q. Do you undertake to swear that he signed it?

A. I could not swear positively that it was signed by him, for I did not see him sign it, and never saw him write.

Q. Did you read that pardon?

A. I did at the time.

Q. How do you know that it was not a bogus pardon gotten up by Baker?

A. I do not believe it was.

Q. Do you know it was not?

A. No; I could not swear it was not.

Q. Was not Baker in the habit of playing that sort of trick on persons?

A. Not getting up bogus pardons.

Q. Did he not get up a bogus application for a pardon for Mrs. Cobb to obtain?

A. I do not think he did.

Q. Did he not suggest that?

A. I do not think he got up any application.

Q. Was not all that plan his?

A. I do not know.

Q. Did he not tell you so?

A. He did not tell me that they had made an arrangement with Mrs. Cobb to get a pardon.

Q. Did he not tell you that it was a plan of his to catch her in reference to this pardon business?

A. He never went into the details of it at all.

Q. Did he not tell you that?

A. No, sir; I do not think he did.

Q. Did he not tell you, in substance, that?

A. I do not know, really, what he did say.

Q. Did you not understand that it was Baker's pardon?

A. Yes, sir; I construed it that way.

Q. You played your part in it with that understanding?

A. I had no part to play; I simply went down with General Baker to get his money.

Q. Supposing Mrs. Cobb had not given up the money, did not Baker intend to take it from her?

A. If he did I did not know anything about it.

Q. Did not Baker accuse her of getting the money wrongfully?

A. I do not remember whether he did or not.

Q. Did he not tell her that he would have her arrested?

A. He might have said so; I do not think he did.

Q. Did he not tell her he would have her arrested if she did not go voluntarily to his office?

A. I did not hear him tell her so. I do not think she would have gone if she had not wanted to.

Q. What were you there for?

A. I cannot say. I was requested by General Baker, my superior officer, to go there.

Q. When you got to his office, you say she first told you where the pardon was?

A. No, sir; she did not tell me.

Q. Did she not tell you and Baker?

A. No, sir. She did not tell Baker, and I did not see her after she went up into his private office till she came down.

Q. Who was in that private office into which General Baker took her?

A. A young man by the name of Jacob Smith, I believe, his private secretary.

Q. Was he sworn on this trial?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is he?

A. He is in New York city, I believe. That is his place of residence.

Q. Did you say you were not present when the conversation took place between Mrs. Cobb and General Baker?

A. No, sir; I was outside of the building.

Q. Did not you go into his office?

A. No, sir; not into his private office.

Q. How long did he leave Mrs. Cobb there?

A. I think an hour and a half or two hours; I could not say positively.

Q. Where were you when you heard Mrs. Cobb tell General Baker that she had the money?

A. Down at the Avenue hotel; she said she had received it for a pardon.

Q. Where did you hear her say that the pardon was in her bureau drawer, and that her husband knew where it was?

A. I was out in the hall at General Baker's office. General Baker's main office is down stairs; his private office is up stairs.

Q. I understood you to say that you did not see her after she went into his office?

A. I did not see her after she went into his private office.

Q. Did he take her immediately to his private office?

A. No, sir; she stopped down stairs for five minutes perhaps, and then went up stairs to General Baker's private office.

Q. Did not you say once that she acknowledged in General Baker's office that she had this money?

A. I said I heard her acknowledge that at the Avenue hotel.

Q. When and where precisely did you hear her say the pardon was in her bureau drawer?

A. I will tell you how I came to hear her say that. While I was down stairs the porter told me that General Baker wanted to see me. I went up stairs; General Baker was standing in the door. I had not got quite to the door when he told me to go down after the pardon. She spoke then in my hearing, and said that the pardon was in the bureau drawer, and that her husband would go with me to get it. Whether she addressed General Baker or myself I do not know, but I supposed she spoke to me, although I was outside of the door, and did not see her. I went down stairs and told her husband where she said it was. He went with me, got it out of the bureau drawer, handed it to me, and I read it.

Q. Did General Baker allow her husband to go into his private office?

A. No, sir; he took her alone.

Q. Did he forbid her husband from going?

A. No, sir; he did not ask him to go; he did not say anything about it.

Q. Did he permit him to go?

A. I do not suppose he would have done so. Mr. Cobb did not make any demand to go, but I do not suppose the General would have allowed him to have gone even if he had.

Q. Can you tell the purpose General Baker had in getting her into his private office alone?

A. I do not know.

Q. Did he not declare it to you?

A. No, sir.

Q. You have no idea?

A. I might guess; but you say I have no right to guess.

Q. Her husband remained down stairs?

A. Yes, sir; he and I once went out together and took a drink.

Q. It was your business, then, to take care of her husband down stairs while General Baker was taking care of his wife up in his private office?

A. I had nothing to do with him at all. It was a little chilly, and I invited him to go out and take a drink.

Q. It was cool, and you took the husband out while Baker took Mrs. Cobb in?

A. No, sir.

Q. You intended to make him as comfortable as you could?

A. No, sir; I had no idea about it.

Q. But you think he would not have been permitted to go in where General Baker and his wife were?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did not you understand what the arrangement was?

A. No, sir.

Q. You had no sort of understanding about it?

A. None whatever.

Q. You left the plan to be arranged as it came up?

A. I had nothing to do with the arrangement.

Q. What was this man Smith doing all this time?

A. He was up there in his private office with Mrs. Cobb and General Baker.

Q. How much money was paid over?

A. Three hundred dollars.

Q. How much money had been paid to her in all?

A. I think $100 at first and $200 afterwards; I am not sure.

Q. When was the $200 paid?

A. $100 I understood to have been paid in advance, and the $200 when the pardon was obtained.

Q. Was the $100 the money that you marked?

A. No, sir; the money I marked was what was to be paid when the pardon was delivered.

Q. Do you know when the bargain was made?

A. No, sir.

Q. When were you first let into the secret?

A. I think the night before; I think I had just returned from a trip to Portland, Maine; I will not be positive, however.

Q. Will you swear that Hine paid her $100?

A. I swear that he said he paid it.

Q. Where were you when it was paid?

A. I think I was in the Avenue hotel.

Q. I understood you to say you were a block and a half off.

A. No, sir; I said General Baker and myself started after Hine, and were within a block and a half of him all the way to the hotel. When Hine went to Mrs. Cobb's room General Baker and I went into the office of the hotel, and I think it probable that the money was paid while we were sitting there.

Q. Did not you swear, in answer to a question by the Chairman, that you were a block and a half off when the money was paid?

A. No, sir; I said we followed, a block and a half off.

Q. What is the reason the pardon was not delivered when you made your first visit?

A. It was not procured.

Q. At what time was that?

A. That was, I think, the day before it was delivered.
Q. Had you anything to do with Mrs. Cobb about that?
A. No, sir.
Q How do you know then?
A. I heard Hine say so; I heard him say that the reason why he had not got it was because she had not received it.
Q. Do you know that he had been to see Mrs. Cobb?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How do you know?
A. I saw him go there.
Q. When?
A. The night before the pardon was delivered. I went through the same performance that night as on the night the pardon was delivered.
Q. You had marked the bills before?
A. Yes, sir; the bills were all marked, but she had not the pardon and he did not pay the money. She agreed to have it the next evening.
Q. You say the pardon purported to be signed by Andrew Johnson; was it signed by anybody else?
A. Yes, sir; I think it had the Secretary of State's name on it.
Q. Do you recollect the date of it?
A. No, sir; it was some time in May; it may have been the 6th, 7th, or 8th.
Q. You said this man Hine's name did not appear on the records of the department anywhere; how do you know that?
A. I said Howell's name did not.
Q. Do you know that fact?
A. I heard Hine say so and heard General Baker say so. General Baker went to look, and I heard him say it was not there.
Q. You did not know it yourself then?
A. I did not know it positively; I know it from their statements.
Q. Where did you find this letter that was addressed to the Secretary of State?
A. Mr. Cobb took it, I believe, out of the top of a valise and handed it to me. It was not with the pardon.
Q. What did you do with it?
A. I delivered it to General Baker.
Q. What did he do with it?
A. I could not tell you that.
Q. How came you to get that if it was not with the pardon?
A. I was ordered to get it by General Baker.
Q. Did she say anything about the letter?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you tell her husband anything about the letter?
A. I did.
Q. You have not mentioned that she said anything about the letter before.
A. She did not.
Q. Then how did you know about it?
A. When she showed the pardon to Captain Hine she showed him the letter.
A. And you told her husband to get it?
A. I did.
Q. By whose authority?
A. I said to him, "There is a letter somewhere," and he said there was and he would get it. It appeared to have been hidden away.
Q. In whose handwriting was it?
A. It was in Mrs. Cobb's, I guess; but I would not be positive. It looked like a lady's writing.
Q. Did you ever see Mrs. Cobb write?
A. No, sir.

Q. What makes you guess it was in her handwriting?
A. It looked like a lady's handwriting.
Q. Did she say it was written by her?
A. No, sir.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. I believe you said you had arrived here just the night before you went down to the Avenue hotel?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. There were two trips to the hotel?
A. I arrived the night before the first one. I think I returned here about the 6th of May. I am not positive.
Q. When did this occur?
A. It must have been about the 8th, if I returned on the 6th.
Q. From where did you arrive here?
A. I think I had been to Portland, Maine. I had been absent for some time. I went from Portland to Augusta, and from there around to New York.
Q. How long did you remain in Washington after this occurrence?
A. I could not be positive in regard to that. I suppose probably a week.
Q. Where did you go to from here?
A. I do not recollect. I think I went to New York.
Q. Were you ever employed in any special business here in Washington?
A. No, sir; I was always here in Washington when I had not business away. My headquarters were at Washington.
Q. What proportion of your time did you spend here?
A. I suppose I would spend about a quarter of it. Sometimes I would be here three or four weeks.
Q. Was this in May of last year?
A. No, sir; in 1865.
Q. You stated in your examination that you never met Mrs. Cobb till you went there with General Baker.
A. I never met Mrs. Cobb for her to know who I was until that time. I have met her on the street and at the White House before.
Q. Did you not make the statement that you had never met her before?
A. I have seen her on the street and at the White House—had her pointed out to me.
Q. Do you deny that you stated that you never had seen her before?
A. If I said so I did not say what I intended to say.
Q. Did you call on the President at the time you saw her at the White House?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you ever have an interview with her at the Executive mansion?
A. No, sir; I have never spoken to her in my life. I have seen her frequently.
Q. How many times did you visit the Executive mansion during the summer of 1865?
A. I could not say how many times?
Q. What was the character of your business there?
A. Nothing; I would just drop in. In coming from the Treasury Department I passed by the White House.
Q. What business did you have at the public offices and at the White House?
A. None whatever. I went there as a citizen, supposing everybody had a right to go there.
Q. Was it a matter of curiosity that took you there?
A. As much that as anything else.
Q. I ask you again how many times you frequented these public offices?
A. I recollect certainly two or three times.

Q. Are you certain you were there as often as twice?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who went with you?

A. I am certain that I went more than twice. I had friends who came to Washington, and I went there with them, among other places.

Q. Who went with you?

A. I went once with a brother, and again with a gentleman from Long Island.

Q. Did they both go with you at the same time?

A. No, sir; at different times. I once went there with Mr. Wright, of California, who used to be a member of Congress. He stepped in to see President Johnson, and I stopped with him.

Q. When was that?

A. It was about that time.

Q. Was that the last occasion when you were there?

A. No, sir. I recollect Mrs Cobb was there at that time.

Q. Who was with you when you went the first time?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. When you went there with this California gentleman you saw Mrs. Cobb. Did you see her when you went with the gentleman from Long Island?

A I do not recollect. I recollect she was there when I went with Mr. Wright, because he wanted to know who that pretty black-eyed woman was. I recollect that circumstance distinctly.

Q. You knew her then?

A. Yes, sir; I knew her as Mrs. Cobb.

Q. Can you remember any other time?

A. I presume I have been there at other times. I cannot specify distinctly.

Q. Why do you presume that? What is your recollection about it?

A. I think I have.

Q. Can you state on your oath that you have?

A. I think I have.

Q. At what time.

A. I cannot say at what time.

Q. What was your business; did you just drop in there to loaf?

A. No, sir; I did not loaf anywhere.

Q. Was it a favorite place of resort with you?

A. No, sir; not at all. It was on my way from the War Department to my lodgings, and I would just drop in to see whether there was any one there whom I knew. I recollect these three times, and I may have been there a half dozen times, but I could not give you the dates.

Q. Under what circumstances did you see Mrs. Cobb at that time when with Mr. Wright?

A. She was in the lobby leaning over the balustrade, talking with the porter. She staid there while Mr. Wright went in to see President Johnson. When Mr. Wright came out the door was thrown open, and Mrs. Cobb went in.

Q. Was there anybody else there at the time?

A. I do not suppose there were more than three persons there.

Q. You could have gone in then if you had wished to?

A. I could, but I had no desire to.

Q. And you only remember those three times when you went there?

A. Yes; I recollect I went there once to see Mr. Jones, who was one of Baker's men. He was stationed there.

Q. When was that?

A. I do not recollect. I think he was stationed there at the request of President Johnson. I do not know that fact. I know when I went there he was in with Mr. Johnson. I told the doorkeeper I wanted to see him, and he went in and spoke to him.

Q. Mrs. Cobb was there then?

A. She was there in the lobby trying to get in.

Q. Did she get in?

A. No, sir; the doorkeeper did not admit her.

Q. That makes four times, then. Do you remember any other time?

A. I suppose I could, if I could take time to think. I do not recollect of any other cases specially now.

Q. Have you talked with any one in regard to your evidence in this case, what it was to be?

A. I told Mr. Ashley that I did not know of anything which would be of any service to him, and wondered why I had been subpœnaed.

Q. How many times have you talked with Mr. Ashley?

A. Only once.

Q. Have you been informed by any one what General Baker's testimony was?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you state what your evidence would be?

A. I told him what I knew about the Cobb matter. I did not think it was worth coming here for at all.

Q. You have not stated these matters to any one else?

A. Yes, sir; I spoke to the clerk of the Committee here about the time when Mrs. Cobb was brought to General Baker's headquarters. I had forgotten the date, although I have a memorandum of it at home.

Q. When did you see General Baker last?

A. I should say about four months ago, in New York.

Q. Did you have any talk with him about this matter?

A. Not the slightest.

Q. You have not been informed by any one what your testimony should be?

A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you say that this Howell pardon was procured in May?

A. I think it was in May—about the eighth of May, or it may have been April; I am not positive in regard to the date.

Q. Were you here at the time of the review of the Army of the Potomac and Sherman's army?

A. I was.

Q. Was it before or after that review?

A. After.

Q. Do you remember at what time the review took place?

A. No, sir.

Q. How long after the review was it?

A. It was a long time after. I know that I was in Elmira when the review was to come off, and that I came to Washington to see it. I think it must have been the next spring after the review. I know it was a long time after when this pardon was procured.

Q. Then it was in 1866?

A. I do not think it was in 1866, but I am not positive about it. I could be positive if I could see my memorandum at home. I kept a regular diary.

Q. What causes you to believe it was in the spring of the year?

A. I recollect that it was quite chilly that night. That was the reason why I invited Mr. Cobb out to drink.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

Q. When were you mustered out of the service?

A. I drew my pay up to the 15th of May, 1866.

Q. Was General Baker then mustered out?

A. He was mustered out before that as a Brigadier General, but when he was mustered out as a Brigadier General, he was not mustered out of his position.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What do you mean by being mustered out? Were you in the military service?

A. No, sir. When my services were no longer required, I suppose I was mustered out?

Q. Did you ever tell Mr. Ashley you were in the military service?

A. No, sir.

Q. How did you lead him into that error?

A. I do not know.

Q. Are you sure you were not in the military service?

A. No, sir. I was not in the regular or volunteer service. General Baker's force was not in the military service. I presume you know as much about that as I do. General Baker's men were paid by the War Department.

Q. Did you wear a uniform and have a commission?

A. No, sir; I had no regular commission, except one from General Baker; I have shown that to a great many Brigadier Generals, and to one Major General, and they have always respected it. I never exhibited it to one without being able to go under it wherever I pleased. It used to make them shake.

Q. What Brigadier General shook when you showed your commission from General Baker?

A. I remember one who did. He was tried subsequently for robbing a safe, and convicted here in this city.

Q. Who was he?

A. General Briscoe.

Q. And when you showed him your commission he trembled?

A. He did.

Q. Did you show your commission to Mrs. Cobb?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did she tremble when she saw it?

A. No, sir.

Q. She was not one of the shaking kind?

A. I should say not.

Q. Did you show your commission to anybody else who trembled?

A. Oh, yes, sir.

Q. To whom?

A. Major Ladd.

Q. Your commission was a terror to the Generals in the army?

A. It was to those who had any occasion to fear it.

Q. But those who were straightforward in their conduct were not afraid of it?

A. They were not.

Q. Were you armed?

A. No, sir; I never carried any arms; I never had any occasion to carry any.

Q. Did you make the rebel generals tremble?

A. No, sir; I never came in contact with them.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE:

Q. At what time was it that you marked this money?

A. I took the number of bills, and also made pin-holes through them.

Q. What were the bills?

A. They were fifty-dollar bills—greenbacks,

Q. Who was present when you marked them?

A. General Baker and Captain Hine.

Q. Who came down to General Baker's office in the carriage that night?
A. Mr. Cobb, Mrs. Cobb, General Baker, and myself.
Q. Was there any other mark on these bills except what you have stated?
A. No, sir. I took the number of the bills.
Q. Did General Baker put any mark on them?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Did Mrs. Cobb complain of General Baker's treatment?
A. Not to me; I did not hear it.

(The witness subsequently corrected his testimony by giving the date of Mrs. Cobb's visit to Baker's office, as November 8, '65, instead of April 8.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1867.

SAMUEL J. ANDREWS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. At Harper's Ferry.
Q. Where does your father reside?
A. At Harper's Ferry. He does business in Berkley county.
Q. What is his full name?
A. E. W. Andrews.
Q. Was he, at any time, editor of the Era, published in Berkley county, and a candidate for Congress last year?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Dr. Matthew McEwen?
A. I met him once only.
Q. When did you meet him?
A. I believe it was last October, just previous to the election.
Q. Did he seek the interview with you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what occurred at that interview.
A. Dr. McEwen came to Martinsburg, as he told me, for the purpose of seeing my father. My father was absent, in the upper part of the county, canvassing his district. The doctor stated that he was very anxious to see him; that he wanted to get a letter from him to the President of the United States. This was about three or four days before the election. He wished to get a letter recommending the pardon of one hundred and ninety-three deserters, I believe that was the number, in that Congressional district, and in father's absence he asked me to write a letter in father's name. I declined to do so for some time. I told him I did not feel justified in using his name. He urged me, and I finally told him I would call in a friend of mine to consult with him, and if he advised me to do it, I would do it. I called in Mr. Logan, now the editor of the New Era; I consulted with him, and he advised me to do it. Dr. McEwen stated, I think, that he had got, or would get, a letter from Benjamin H. Smith, who was then running for Governor, to the same effect, asking for the pardon of these men. Dr. McEwen sat down and wrote off in pencil a letter which I copied, and then signed father's name to it and gave it to him.
Q. Did you inform your father of what you had done?
A. Yes, sir; I believe I did, afterwards.
Q. When did you inform him?
A. I told him, after he returned, that I had written a letter to the President for Dr. McEwen, recommending the pardon of one hundred and ninety-three deserters. Father did not get home until after the election. I forget the date of the election. This was a day or two after.

Q. What did he say when you told him what you had done?

A. I do not recollect of his saying anything.

Q. Did he approve or disapprove of what you had done?

A. I am not able to say.

Q. Do you remember what that letter contained?

A. As near as I can remember it requested a pardon for one hundred and ninety-three deserters. I think it said the list was enclosed—I did not see any list—that the district was going to be pretty close, or something to that effect, and in all probability these deserters, if they were pardoned, would have the effect of carrying the election. I think that was about it, as near as I can recollect; I did not pay much attention to it.

Q. If you should hear the letter read do you think you would remember it?

A. I might; (letter produced by witness McEwen read.) It is some time since, and I did not pay much attention to it; I hardly think I should recognize it as the same letter. I may be mistaken, however.

Q. You asked for the restoration of these men to citizenship for the purpose of getting their votes in the election, did you?

A. Yes, sir; I think I did.

Q. You stated that the election would be close?

A. Yes, sir; I am pretty sure I did.

Q. And that their votes would probably determine the result?

A. I am not so sure about the latter part of it.

Q. Did McEwen offer you anything as a reward or compensation for giving this letter?

A. No, sir.

Q. He held out no other inducement than a probability that it might result in the election of your father?

A. That is all. That is the only ground upon which I wrote the letter.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Did you give the letter to Dr. McEwen the first time he called on you?

A. He made a draft of the letter in pencil on a piece of paper at the desk, which I copied, and signed father's name to.

Q. Did he tell you what kind of men these were—whether they were, in fact, deserters, or men who had become detached, accidentally or otherwise, from their regiments, straggled off?

A. I do not recollect that he stated that circumstance. He seemed to be in a great hurry; he said he had to go back to Washington, that Mr. Tom. Florence would help him with the President.

Q. He told you that a letter of this sort would help him with the President?

A. I do not recollect that he said that. He wanted the letter, and said that Mr. Florence was going to help him to get these men restored; he said it was of great importance for him to have the letter.

Q. Did you know any of these men?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever see the list of them?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were you in the United States service, or have you been?

A. No, sir. I had been in the quartermaster's department. I was maimed before the war, and not able to go into active service; I was in the quartermaster's department as citizen clerk not sworn in.

Q. Are you certain that you mentioned this to your father?

A. Yes, sir; I am pretty certain, because I should hardly do such a thing as that without mentioning it to him.

Q. But you do not remember that he made any reply?
A. He may have made a reply; I do not recollect what he said.
Q. Do you know that he understood you at the time you told him?
A. I suppose he did, if I told him.
Q. Do you know it?
A. I do not know that he did, of course.
Q. Have you seen your father since he was here?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you talk with him about this matter?
A. We had a few words about it.
Q. Did you tell him that you informed him of it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did he think about it?
A. He thought that I had not. He said if I had, that he had entirely forgotten it. It is something that I did not think much of at the time.
Q. At what place did you meet Dr. McEwen?
A. At my father's office. He came there to see my father, as he said to me.
Q. You stated, when this letter was read, that you did not recognize it as the one to which you signed your father's name?
A. I would not like to say it was not. I simply made a copy of what was written, and have no very distinct recollection of the language used.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. You feel sure that Dr. McEwen only called on you once?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And that the letter was written by him, and copied by you, and delivered at the same interview?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And that he took the letter away with him?
A. He did.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You are sure you did not send the letter afterwards to him at Washington?
A. I am sure of it, and Mr. Logan can affirm what I say.
Q. What is Mr. Logan's full name?
A. William T. Logan.
Q. Did you receive any telegraphic despatches at any time from Dr. McEwen?
A. Yes, sir; I forgot about that. A telegraphic despatch came, before he called, enquiring when my father would be home. I telegraphed back that he would be on Saturday; he was not home, however, on that day. He was in the upper part of the district.
Q. Are you sure that this telegraphic despatch was not in reference to sending the letter written by you for your father?
A. No, sir; it was simply making an inquiry whether father was at home, and if not, when he would be at home; I think that was it.
Q. How many telegrams did you receive?
A. One. That was addressed to father. I opened it, and answered that father would be back on Saturday.
Q. You are sure you did not receive but the one?
A. That is all.
Q. And that was simply inquiring when your father would return?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You are sure it did not relate to the sending of the letter?
A. No, sir; it did not.
Q. You are sure that the letter written by you, in your father's name, was handed by you to the doctor?
A. Yes, sir; he took it immediately after I had finished copying it.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did you retain a copy of this letter?

A. I thought, for a while, I did, but when I came to look for it again I could not find it, and I came to the conclusion that I did not keep a copy. My father searched for it when I spoke to him about it.

Q. Have you since seen the draft McEwen made for you?

A. No, sir; he took it away with him.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Dr. McEwen states that he received the letter three or four days after he saw you.

A. I am positive that he took it away with him

Q. Was Mr. Logan present when you delivered the letter to him?

A. I think he was.

Q. Did Mr. Logan read the letter himself?

A. Yes, sir; I think he did.

Q. Did he advise you in regard to it that day?

A. He did. I wished to consult about it with Mr. Logan. Dr. McEwen went out down street, and was gone for three-quarters of an hour; when he came back I told him I had concluded to write it, and he then sat down and wrote the draft.

Q. Did you really think the district was very close?

A. There was a great deal of talk about that time on that subject, and I heard that opinion expressed.

Q. Did you think that one hundred and ninety-three votes would change the result?

A. That was Dr. McEwen's opinion. I really did think at the time that the district was pretty close, but I also thought at the time that these men would not be able to vote, it was so near the day of the election. I thought they would not be pardoned in time to vote.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did Mr. McEwen state that Florence had had an interview with the President in regard to pardoning of these men?

A. I think he did.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You say that you did not know these men; what reason did you have for supposing they would vote for your father?

A. Mr. McEwen represented so to me; that is all. I had never heard of the deserters before he came into the office, nor ever afterwards. I never saw or heard of one of them.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1867.

Major General E. R. S. CANBY, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you had any occasion to examine any cases of alleged cotton frauds practiced upon the government?

A. A great many cases came under my examination when I was in command in the southwest.

Q. In any of these transactions were any officers belonging to the executive department of the government involved or implicated?

A. Not directly, I think.

Q. Indirectly?

A. Some of the subordinate officers were suspected of complicity in frauds.

Q. Do you remember a claim in which a man by the name of Violet was involved?

A. That did not pass directly under my examination. I was summoned as a witness in that case. It was in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana. The control of the matter had passed out of my hands. It had been transferred by me to the Treasury Department, under instructions of the Secretary of War.

Q. Can you state the circumstances connected with that case?

A. Mr. Violet was a citizen of New Orleans—a refugee, or sent out by General Butler, I am not sure which. He was himself in Mobile, and had a contract with the rebel government for the transportation of cotton and the importation of supplies. I ascertained that from correspondence captured from the rebel government, which I used in connection with a lot of captured cotton, which was claimed by Violet as property belonging to him. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War directed that all captured property, except so much as was required for the army, and as came under the proviso to the first section of the act of March 12, 1863, should be turned over to the agents of the Treasury Department. That was done, but some time subsequent to that transfer I learned in New Orleans that a portion of this captured cotton had been released by an agent of the Treasury Department, and was then in the city, about to be shipped to a foreign port. I caused that property to be seized and turned over to the civil authorities, and the case was tried before the court in the eastern district of Louisiana.

Q. Do you know what was the result of the case?

A. I left New Orleans while the case was still pending.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Who was that suit instituted by?

A. By the District Attorney, I think. I turned the case over to the District Attorney, and furnished him with the evidence. I think the suit was instituted by him in behalf of the United States.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was an order given in that case directing you to return the cotton over to Violet?

A. No, sir.

Q. Or in any other case in which Violet was interested?

A. I think not. Property of that kind did not remain under the control of the military commanders. The law of March 12, 1863, instructs the War (and Treasury) Departments to have it turned over to the agents of the Treasury Department, and after that transfer I did not interfere with it, except upon very positive evidence or suspicion of fraud, or at the request of the agents of the Treasury Department. I interfered in the case of Violet because the history of the case had been known to me more than a year before, and because the captured correspondence I had referred to showed that he had a contract with the rebel government for the exportation of cotton; and there was evidence that a part of this cotton was obtained by him directly from the rebel government.

Q. You say there was no officer of the executive branch of the government except subordinate officers who were at all compromised in this case?

A. No, sir, I think not.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did you see Mr. Covode in New Orleans when he went there to investigate these matters?

A. I saw him in New Orleans.

Q. Did you assist him in any way in making his investigations?

A. I gave him whatever assistance he asked for.

Q. Did he investigate the Violet case?

A. I do not know that he did. I do not know what his instructions were.

Q. Under what did Violet claim to be carrying on this trade?

A. Under a contract with the rebel government. That is my recollection. He was not within our lines.

Q. By whose permission did he claim to be acting on this side?

A. There was no claim that he was acting under orders on our side of the lines. He was himself within the rebel lines, and his transactions were within their lines.

Q. Did he not claim to have permission to go through our lines?

A. No, sir; I think not. He was, as I said, either a refugee, or compelled by General Butler to leave upon his refusing to renew his allegiance to the United States. He was either away from New Orleans before its occupation by the United States forces, or else when called upon by General Butler to renew his allegiance he refused to do it and was sent out of the lines.

Q. How was he enabled to furnish the confederates with the supplies?

A. By running the blockade.

Q. Had he vessels of his own in which he was running the blockade?

A. I think not of his own. I think he had associates who furnished the vessels.

Q. Who were his associates?

A. That I do not know. There were one or two persons associated with him in New Orleans, who were arrested by me on the charge of furnishing aid to the enemy.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do you recollect the whole name of this man Violet?

A. W. G., I think, are his initials.

Q. Do you know anything about the restoration of his property in New Orleans?

A. I do not. All had passed from under my control soon after the termination of hostilities.

Q. Were you in New Orleans when General Fullerton was there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you had no personal or authentic knowledge in regard to the restoration of any property by him?

A. Only in incidental cases. Sometimes appeals were made to me from his decision, and the matter came under my supervision as his superior military officer.

Q. Upon what grounds were appeals taken from him to you?

A. Upon the ground that he had either exceeded or fallen within the limits of his instructions. There were one or two cases where complaints were made to me by parties interested that persons to whom property was restored were excluded under the President's amnesty proclamation.

Q. Do you recollect whether or not complaint was made in the case of Violet?

A. I do not recollect.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you know of a man called Colonel Broadwell, of New Orleans?

A. I think not.

Q. Or Colonel Dillon?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of John S. Clark?

A. Not by those initials; there was a man by the name of Clark, of the firm of Clark & Fowler.

Q. Do you know of their having been engaged in furnishing supplies to the confederates, or either one of them, and getting cotton in return—carrying on their business on the Pearl river?

A. No, sir; I do not. I know the firm was always under a cloud; were always suspected, and were, I think, twice under arrest, and some of their cotton at one time seized.

Q. Were you at New Orleans when General Butler was there?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any persons carrying on their business on Pearl river, supplying confederates and receiving cotton in return, claiming to act under orders of General Butler?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you hear of such transactions there?

A. I had very good evidence that a great deal of contraband trade was carried on.

Q. Carried on under the claim of an order from General Butler?

A. No, sir; I never heard of that. There were charges of that kind made before I went to New Orleans. I know nothing of them except from the public records.

Q. What knowledge have you from these?

A. I could not state in detail without referring to the records again. There were several vessels seized, I recollect, for violation of the internal as well as external blockade, and some of these cases came before the district court.

Q. What are these records to which you refer?

A. To the public records, military as well as civil. I know the fact that there was a good deal of that trade carried on; I know that officially from the capture of records, in which records there were the names of parties engaged within our lines.

Q. Do you know under what pretense of authority they claimed to act on our side?

A. The parties engaged on our side had no authority except that of Treasury permits, under the authority of the President to give such permits or license.

Q. You know of no authority given by General Butler only in the way I state?

A. I have knowledge from the public records of persons presenting themselves to the rebel authorities, claiming to have the authority of General Butler to trade, and asking for a similar permission from the rebel government.

Q. Where are those records?

A. Some of them are at New Orleans, and some have been sent to the War Department.

Q. Can you furnish those records?

A. No, sir; they are not within my control.

Q. Can you give the Committee such knowledge as will enable them to ascertain where they are?

A. They are in the War Department proper, or among the rebel archives of the War Department.

Q. Can you mention any particular case?

A. The case of John A. Stevenson was one of the cases I refer to. There were two or three French houses that were so engaged; I do not recollect the names.

Q. Do you remember what particular record was captured in regard to either of these firms you have in your mind?

A. In some cases it was an application for authority to carry on this trade; in other cases it was the authority of the rebel government to carry it on, and prescribing the conditions under which it should be carried on.

Q. Did persons having such authority claim also to have authority from the federal government?

A. The application generally stated that fact.

Q. Did you capture any papers of that sort?

A. There were some; I do not remember the number.

Q. In relation to the firm of John A. Stevenson, will the records show these facts in relation to them?

A. I think there were such papers captured in reference to that firm.

Q. Do you recollect in reference to the firm of which Clark was a member, and which you have mentioned?

A. No, sir; I do not recollect.

Q. How long after General Butler left New Orleans before you were in command there?

A. Rather more than one year. General Butler left about the middle of December, 1862, and I did not go down until May, 1864.

Q. Who was your predecessor?

A. General Banks was my predecessor in command of the department. My command, however, extended over two or three departments.

Q. Was your command the same in extent as that of General Butler's?

A. It had a much greater extent.

Q. Was there any one preceding you with a like command?

A. No, sir; it was a new command, created in the spring of 1864.

Q. Who commanded at New Orleans immediately before your going there?

A. General Butler was the first commander; General Banks succeeded him. General Banks continued in that command for some time after I had command of a division.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do I understand that among these captured papers there is any other evidence that General Butler issued orders for the trade of which you have spoken, than the application of the parties to the rebel government, in which they asserted it?

A. Nothing but these papers.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You can mention no other parties in this connection except Stevenson?

A. That is the only case I recollect. I can furnish other names if the Committee desire it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1867.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD sworn and examined.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You seem to have been charged with the relations of this government with the rebel States, and you were therefore requested to bring with you any orders you may have prohibiting individuals elected in the rebel States from a discharge of their official duties, and any orders setting aside enactments of rebel States, suppressing newspapers, &c. I wish you to state whether you have any such papers on record in your office? and if so, whether you have brought them?

A. Without admitting or demurring to the recital in the question, I have had a careful examination made in my department, by the chief clerk, and by the late chief clerk, and I find that there are no copies of orders or records, or records of orders, prohibiting individuals elected in rebel States from entering upon a discharge of their official duties; and no orders setting aside enactments of legislatures of said States, and no order for suppressing newspapers therein. And under the word "orders," I include directions, commands, and every other form of process, mandate, or direction. I have no recollection of any such papers.

Q. Have you a recollection of the case of Semmes, elected, I believe, to the office of judge of probate for the city of Mobile, whether there was any order made by the government in that case?

A. I remember there was an election of Semmes, as a historical fact, and that he had been captain of the "Alabama;" and after his election to office I seem to remember that he was not allowed to take his office. There were, however, no orders made in my department, or any direction given by me. What was done by any other officer of the government I cannot state. I remember a conversation about the case in the government, but my memory is not charged with it. I have no knowledge of any proceeding, officially, in regard to it.

Q. I see that in a report to the President, which accompanies his message of March 6, 1866, in relation to a resolution of the Senate requesting information in regard to the provisional governors of the States, you remarked that it appeared thereby that all the persons appointed were required to take the oath prescribed by the act of Congress, except Mr. Holden, appointed provisional governor of North Carolina; that he, however, took the amnesty oath subsequently, and that there is no record in your department of the oaths which were taken. Governor Sharkey, I believe, and perhaps also Governor Parsons, state that they were furnished from the State Department with a form of oath which was not the test oath, as it is generally called, the oath prescribed by act of Congress. Be good enough to state what you know in regard to the preparation of any such oath?

A. I have no recollection of the case at all, and I have no knowledge or recollection in regard to the subject; I barely remember, since your reference to that report, that I ascertained the facts which were stated in my report, and stated them as I then ascertained them to be, but I have no recollection of any form of oath being prepared in the department, nor have I now any recollection about it. I remember causing an inquiry in regard to it, so as to give the information required. Except as my memory is now refreshed by the reading of the report, I should have no recollection of any such oath being prepared or delivered.

Q. State whether there was any consultation with the President at any time in regard to modifying the oath.

A. I have no recollection of any conversation with the President upon the question of what oath should be taken, and no belief that any was had, because I have no recollection of it; I think I should remember if there had been.

Q. When an oath accompanies a commission, is it not your practice to require it to be returned and filed in the archives of the department?

A. That I cannot answer, because, I am sorry to say, I do not understand the details of the administration of the department in that respect. It has never come to my knowledge, that I now remember, what form of practice is used in the delivery or return of an oath in any of these cases. I suppose the oaths are filed somewhere.

Q. How is it in regard to foreign ministers; are not their oaths filed in the department?

A. No, sir; not necessarily. The law requires the person shall take an oath; and whether he does take it or not, I suppose some of the records will show, but it does not come to my knowledge that it has been done. There is no reason why such an oath should be submitted to me; it would be merely a matter of routine.

Q. Be good enough to direct an enquiry as to whether the provisional Governors did take the oath prescribed by act of Congress?

A. I will not only direct the enquiry, but I will put the entire office under the direction and examination of the Committee. There is nothing I desire to conceal in relation to it. The commission was not, of course, prescribed by any law. The commission referred to in this message of the President, if I remember rightly, was a short letter addressed by me, by direction of the President, to the provisional Governor. After that, I have no knowledge or recollection upon the subject of their appointment. I have not a clear recollection about these details. As I now remember, the first provisional Governor appointed was Andrew Johnson, Governor of Tennessee, and the question was raised how he was to be appointed. I remember distinctly conversing with him about taking the office, and consulting with the Secretary of War and the President on the subject. He was finally appointed, as I suppose, by some letter signed either by me or by the Secretary of War, I do not recollect which. I have no distinct recollection that the authority emanated directly from me; I rather think it did, because we adopted that form subsequently.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Was not Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, made a Brigadier General before he was made provisional Governor?

A. He was made a Brigadier General.

Q. The other provisional Governors were not made military officers?

A. Not that I remember. These transactions were fresh in my mind when I drew this report, or caused the necessary search to be made, required for the information, and if you desire further search to be made on the subject I will cause it to be made immediately.

Q. I will now direct your attention to the case of Governor Sharkey. He states that he took an oath of office which was administered to him in this office; that he does not recollect precisely the phraseology of it, but that it did not contain the substance of what was known as the "test oath;" that there was nothing of that sort in it; that it was administered by Judge Wylie, and the form made out by the Secretary of State. I understand you to say that there is no such oath on file in the State Department, so far as you remember.

A. I said I had no recollection about it. So far as this report is concerned, it was made upon an examination of the office. I do not state anything that is in the office upon my recollection of it. I know that at the time I directed the examination to be made which was required to enable me to answer the questions propounded, and I suppose the information there stated was correctly ascertained.

Q. You have no recollection in this case of the preparation of any oath?

A. None whatever. I will cause search again to be made in the department. I should say that if any oath was drawn in the State Department, as Governor Sharkey states he remembers there was, it would be drawn, prepared, and delivered by the chief clerk, Mr. Hunter, now assistant Secretary of State, and I have no reason to believe that in any such case such an oath would come to me for examination, because it would be presumed to be properly prepared.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Would it have gone to the President?

A. In no case, that I can conceive, would it have gone to the President. My own oath of office I do not think ever went to him, nor that of any other officer, unless there was some particular occasion for it. I have no recollection of any such case.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. But this being not a matter of form, but a matter of substance, relating to a subject of great importance, might you not have had personal cognizance of it?

A. I might have had at the time.

Q. Will you state, if you please, whether there have been any consultations in regard to the surrender of Jefferson Davis, in reply to a habeas corpus by the circuit or district court of the United States for the State of Virginia, as to the form of the writ, or as to the question of discharge on bail?

A. Whether it has been the subject of consultation or conference with the President and those who are generally called his advisers or Cabinet officers in regard to these particular points, I am not able to say. Some months ago there were consultations with the President with regard to the holding of Jefferson Davis, his place of confinement, and the disposition to be made in regard to his surrender to the civil authorities. The result of the consultation, if I remember rightly, appeared in a correspondence between the Attorney General and the district attorney for Virginia, published at the time. If there were any consultations with the President with reference to the recent procedures on the discharge of Jeff. Davis, they were to this effect, and I am not quite clear about the fact that when the writ of habeas corpus should be issued, or when it was announced that it would be issued by a judge of one of the United States courts, it was decided that the Secretary of War should be directed to surrender Jefferson Davis on the demand of the marshal of the district, or of the proper civil authorities. Nothing further, to my knowledge, has been consulted with the President on the subject.

Q. There was no direction, if I understand you, either as to the manner of the return of the writ, or as to his discharge on bail?

A. Nothing of the kind.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you know Lafayette C. Baker?

A. Very well; yes, sir; he is General Baker, the detective.

Q. Do you know anything of his being engaged in writing a book on his experiences during the last four years?

A. Nothing.

Q. Are you acquainted with a firm in New York by the name of Derby & Miller?

A. I am; at least there was such a firm. I do not know whether it exists under that name now or not.

Q. Are you acquainted with the fact of that firm being engaged in the publication of a book descriptive of Baker's experience during the war?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you interfered with, or attempted to prevent the publication of any such book by Baker, or by any publishing house?

A. An Irishman, when he wanted to vote for General Jackson, was asked whether he could take the prescribed oath, and the qualifications required were described to him in a way intended to terrify him. His reply was, "Faith, and I should like to see the oath I couldn't take." I can say I think I never interfered with Baker in any publication he proposed to make, nor with anybody else, unless it may be a man who, during the war, proposed to publish the constitution of the confederate States for sale in New York. I think I gave him notice that if he did he would come to grief, or something of that sort.

Q. I base this question upon statements made by General Baker in his testimony.

A. If he makes such a statement it is a misapprehension upon his part. I think it possible there may be some truth in his statement so far as his apprehension was concerned. There has been no such thing so far as I am concerned. Derby & Miller were booksellers in Auburn for many years before I came to Washington. They were old friends of mine, and excellent men. I may be said to have been a patron of them. Certainly they were kind patrons of me. After they removed to New York, the firm failed several years ago. Mr. Derby was appointed despatch agent for the State Department, which office he still continues to hold. Mr. Miller is in business with an express company in New York. I think it likely that they still continue some connection with book-making, but I do not know the fact. They are very earnest friends of mine, both of them, and they have many friends in the State Department. I can imagine it very well that Lafayette C. Baker has carried on with Mr. Derby, or with some subordinate in the State Department, some such conversation as he states, but not with my knowledge or authority, nor with that of anybody else authorized to speak for the State Department. I perhaps owe it to Mr. Baker to say that I have always thought him to be a patriotic, loyal, earnest, zealous man. I had him in the detective service, and always thought well of him. I thought him a very zealous and perhaps indiscreet man, but supposed him to be a truthful man.

Q. This statement of his, then, so far as you are concerned, had no foundation in fact?

A. Certainly not. You can very well conceive, however, that a person coming to the State Department, and having conversations with the subordinates in the State Department, may go away with the impression that he has obtained his answer, encouragement, refusal, or position officially, when in fact the party with whom he has been talking has no authority and knows nothing about it, and the head of the department was perhaps himself too much occupied to be even consulted about it.

Q. Please state, directly, whether the President has, to your knowledge, ordered or directed any modification of the oath prescribed by law to be administered to any of the officials appointed by him?

A. I cannot say what the President may have ordered or intended to do. During an early stage of the return to peace, after we got into the southern States, there was great difficulty about finding persons who could take the oath, and who were proper persons to be entrusted with duties of postmasters and revenue officers in the southern States. It was represented that there were places where no persons could be found able to take the oath, and who were responsible and able to assume the performance of these duties. The question was brought up once or twice by the gentlemen connected with these departments, "If you can find nobody, what then?" I remember to have urged that the revenue of this government should not be permitted to suffer, nor the postal service at important points be discontinued, for want of an oath. I remember advising to fill the offices and then submitting the facts to Congress, and let them determine what was best to be done. Whether that was done, or whether directions were given by the President, I am not sure.

Q. In giving this advice, did you give it on your own responsibility, or by direction of the President?

A. I gave it on my own.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Did you give that advice to the President?

A. I gave it in presence of the President to the officers having these responsibilities upon them.

Q. In executive document No. 81, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, there is a communication to the President from the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of March 19, 1866, in which he says:

SIR: Herewith I hand you the names of collectors of internal revenue, assessors, assistant assessors, collectors and surveyors of customs, &c., &c., appointed since the overthrow of the rebellion in the southern States, who have not been able to take, literally, the oath of office prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862. Besides these officers, a considerable number, perhaps the larger proportion, of those holding subordinate positions in the revenue departments have been also unable to comply with the requirements of the statute.

* * * * * * * * *

As the country was passing from a state of war to a state of peace, and the emergency seemed to be too pressing to admit of delay until the meeting of Congress, it was thought that the test oath might, in view of the great objects to be attained, in some cases be dispensed with; or rather, that persons might be permitted to hold revenue offices who could take it only in a qualified form. No one could have regretted more than yourself and the members of your Cabinet the necessity which existed for this course.

Was the advice which you have given to the President in Cabinet consultation what is probably referred to in this communication?

A. I suppose it is; that agrees with my recollection.

Q. Did other members of the Cabinet advise the same course, or have you any recollection on that subject?

A. I should rather be excused from stating the opinions of other members of the Cabinet, although I should have no hesitation in doing so if I was certain in my recollection of what was said.

Q. Did the President assent to the view taken by you?

A. I do not remember any decision having been come to on the subject, or the President having expressed any opinion or decision on the subject. What I do remember is what I have told you, that the question occurred and was debated from time to time, and that I expressed that opinion. It does not often happen that the President debates or decides these questions. Each head of a department will state some question that has arisen. Suggestions will perhaps be made and it will pass off. They are not all cardinal questions; there is no record of the proceedings, and you cannot tell always exactly what was concluded.

Q. On the 6th of March, 1866, the President sent to the Senate what is published as executive document No. 26. On page fifty-five there is a letter dated "Department of State, Washington, June 18, 1865," and which is as follows:

SIR: The President directs me to inform you that he has appointed you provisional Governor of the State of Mississippi. A copy of his proclamation, of this date, for the reorganization of the government of that State, is herewith communicated, and also an official oath, which you will cause to be administered to you by a magistrate competent for that purpose.

Your compensation will be at the rate of three thousand dollars a year, from this date. You may draw for it as it may become due, monthly or quarterly, directing your draft to this department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

W. L. SHARKEY, Esq., Washington.

State, if you please, whether that letter was written by the authority of the President?

A. Yes, sir, it was.

Q. And the other letters corresponding to this, written to the other provisional Governors, were also by his authority?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How were the payments made of compensation to these provisional Governors?

A. From the beginning of the appointment of provisional or military Governors these expenses were paid by the War Department; and although they were directed in this case to be paid by draft on the State Department, they were in fact, I believe, paid by direction of the President through the War Department. They were reported to the State Department, but the contingent fund or proper fund of the War Department was the only one from which they could with propriety be paid.

Q. You have said that these provisional Governors appointed by President Johnson were not military officers?

A. I do not remember that any provisional Governor held a military office, except Mr. Johnson.

Q. By what mode was the amount of salary fixed?

A. I have a general recollection that in the beginning, if I am correct in saying that Tennessee was the first case where we appointed a provisional governor, I made an enquiry of the Secretary of War, and that the amount was based upon that allowed by the constitution and laws of Tennessee to the Governor of that State. If I am right in that recollection, the amount was fixed in that way on the analogy of the duties of the office corresponding in some measure to those of Governor, the compensation was regulated by that allowed to the Governor. That was believed to be a reasonable sum, and not extravagant.

Q. Was not the salary of Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, fixed by the amount he was entitled to receive by virtue of his holding the office of Brigadier General?

A. That may have been so. At the same time I remember to have inquired what the Governor of that State was entitled to receive under their constitution and laws. We made him a Brigadier General in order to make him Governor. It was thought he would need some military power or authority to be vested in him, and very likely his compensation as Governor was fixed with reference to that pertaining to the office of Brigadier General.

Q. Was not Governor Johnson confirmed a Brigadier General by the Senate?

A. I believe so. I remember very well at the time he was appointed that he was in the Senate; that I saw the Secretary of War, compared opinions with him, and proceeded to the lodgings of Mr. Johnson. He was not then prepared to decide as to his acceptance of the office. We got in some of his friends, and he finally determined to accept; and I know that it was then considered necessary, if he was to go into a revolutionary State as Governor, that he should go with some military power or prestige in order to be able to enforce his authority.

Q. These other provisional Governors, however, had not military authority?

A. There was a provisional Governor in North Carolina, Mr. Stanley, who had not, I think. Since the administration of Mr. Johnson, none of them, I think, have been officers of the army.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. How many of these provisional Governors did Mr. Lincoln appoint?

A. He appointed, I think, a provisional Governor in Louisiana, and one in North Carolina. It seems to me that during the administration of Mr. Lincoln, Hamilton was appointed over Texas, though I do not think he succeeded in getting into the State at that time. He was again sent there after Mr. Johnson became President.

Q. How many of these Governors were clothed with any military offices other than such as this appointment of Governor would confer?

A. I do not remember that any other was, except Governor Johnson. Military Governors were appointed during the war and provisional Governors after that.

Q. In respect to taking the test oath, I ask you whether it was not notorious that Governor Parsons, of Alabama, had been a member of the rebel legislature?

A. I cannot answer that. I do not remember the history of Governor Parsons; at least I don't remember what was then known of it.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Did you have any consultation with President Johnson with regard to the appointment of Holden, of North Carolina, or Parsons, of Alabama, previous to their appointment?

A. I cannot answer that question with precision. Some of these provisional Governors I did have conversation with him about and recommended; others were designated by him, and I was directed to appoint them before having any such consultation. With regard to Governor Holden and Governor Parsons, I am not clear whether I knew beforehand either was to be appointed or not. It was a matter of accident whether I would or would not be consulted.

Q. Do you recollect whether at any time the loyalty of Holden and Parsons, or the course they had pursued during the rebellion, was a subject of conversation between you and the President?

A. No, sir; I only remember that they were understood at the time they were appointed to be loyal men, and earnestly desirous of the restoration of the government. I do not recollect any conversation with the President upon that subject.

Q. Had the President, within your knowledge, any policy as to whether the previous conduct of persons during the rebellion should be considered in making appointments, or whether reference should be had solely to what was then understood to be their state of mind in reference to the restoration of the Union?

A. All that I can say about that is, that when a provisional Governor was to be appointed we endeavored to get a loyal man, in favor of the restoration of the government upon the principles we proposed, and, if practicable, one who had been consistent in his loyalty to the Union throughout. That was our endeavor, whether we succeeded or not.

Q. Is it within your knowledge whether the President, in the case of Holden and Parsons, instituted any inquiry as to the conduct of these men during the rebellion?

A. No; I have no knowledge that any such inquiry was instituted. The record or history of these prominent men in the South was public, and I suppose each person, in relation to them, acted upon what he understood himself to be their course of action.

Q. Is it within your knowledge or not that the fact that a man had been engaged in the rebellion was, in the judgment of the President, a bar to his appointment to office, if it was understood at the time when the appointment was made that the person under consideration professed to be loyal?

A. It was not a bar in the President's judgment if he was then loyal and qualified to perform the duties of his office.

Q. If his participation in the rebellion was known to have extended so far as to render him unable to take the test oath, was he thereby disqualified in the judgment of the President for appointment to office?

A. I do not think I ever heard that question discussed, or ever heard him express an opinion thereon.

Q. State whether, other than the arrest of Surratt, in reference to which you have testified heretofore, any steps have been taken by the State Department, or persons acting under its authority, since the execution of Payne and his associates, for the purpose of discovering who the persons were that contrived the plan which resulted in the assassination of President Lincoln. If so, what steps?

A. Colonel Sharp, who was provost marshal of the army of Virginia, Grant's army, was sent to London to see whether he could there procure any evidence from persons connected with the rebellion, or sympathizing with it, that would affect any persons other than those who were tried and convicted. He went to London last winter, and has been there since, and is now, as I learn, in Rome, thus far having succeeded in obtaining no material information. Mr. John A. Bingham was by me, upon consultation with Judge Holt, invited to assist the district attorney in the trial of Surratt. He conferred with me, and told me of a paper which he thought threw some light upon the subject, and which he represented as having been published in the Baltimore Sun during the time of the trial of the conspirators, I think. At his instance I sent a confidential person to Baltimore, obtaining the paper referred to, no file of it having been found in this city, and communicated it to him or to the district attorney. At his suggestion Mr. Riddle, of this city, was requested to assist in the trial. I know of no other proceedings that have been taken by the State Department in the direction you speak of beyond what I have heretofore communicated to Congress or the Committee on the Judiciary.

Q. When did Colonel Sharp go abroad for that purpose?

A. I think about the time I was last before the Committee. I think I mentioned, informally, the last time I was before you, that an agent had been sent or would be sent.

Q. Was he sent upon your own suggestion, or upon the suggestion of any other person?

A. My own.

Q. Since the time of the execution of Payne and his associates, have you received from the President any advice or suggestion in reference to the discovery of persons who originated the plot for the assassination of the President, Mr. Lincoln?

A. I do not think I have had any conversation with the President on the subject, other than what occurred when I reported to him what proceedings I was taking, and to which he assented. I have never had any advice or direction, or suggestion from him.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Were any of the appointments by President Lincoln of military Governors, who held military offices, made after the passage of the Act of Congress of February 9, 1863?

A. That is a historical or chronological fact easily ascertained from the records; I cannot answer from memory.

Q. Can you state whether either of these provisional Governors, who held no military office, was paid any salary?

A. I cannot say affirmatively that they were, because, if I remember right, they were not paid by me. I have no doubt that they were paid by the War Department. I have no doubt that all military Governors were paid.

Q. Can you state why the correspondence with the provisional Governors appointed by President Johnson was entrusted to the State Department rather than to the War Department?

A. I do not know that I can state the reason. I can state a reason why it was or why it might have been done. The theory of the State Department, as I have always understood it to be, is, that it is charged specially with correspondence and the conduct of the political affairs between the United States and foreign nations, and between the United States and the several States of the Union. That is the theory upon which we have proceeded. By illustration: the Governor of a Territory is a political officer; the Secretary of a Territory is a political officer. The appointment of these officers and the conduct of these affairs are vested in the Department of State upon the ground that they are political officers in inchoate States, so the correspondence with Governors of States is legitimately through the Department of State. I do not know that this is the reason, but is a reason why that might have been so.

Q. Was there any reason why all this business of reorganization under President Johnson was regarded as the exercise of a civil power rather than a military power; and if it were military power, would not the charge of it properly belong to the War Department?

A. I cannot answer what was thought by anybody on that subject. I can say that, in my own judgment, the proper direction in that regard was taken. When the State of Tennessee was first organized the matter fell within my province—it being the reorganization of the State of Tennessee, at least provisionally—but we had no money in the State Department, and we required the strong arm of the military for the purpose of carrying out efficiently the organization. Therefore the supervision of that organization was in the Department of State, although the military support and the payment of the Governor's salary was in the War Department.

Q. Did not your department regard this matter of reorganization after the surrender of the rebel Joe Johnston as the exercise of a civil power?

A. I regarded it as the exercise of the civil power in co-operation with the military power.

Q. And the military subordinate to the civil?

A. In co-operation. I cannot say that I regarded it as subordinate; I do not now.

Q. The reorganization of Tennessee commenced, did it not, in a movement of the people themselves?

A. I cannot answer as to that fact. I should think not. You may be more familiar with the subject than I am. All that I remember is that I was anxious to have a Governor appointed, and that he should be invested with military power sufficiently to enable him to enforce his acts.

Q. Have you examined the report of the Reconstruction Committee in regard to the State of Tennessee?

A. No, sir; I have not examined the report of the Reconstruction Committee at all, upon any subject.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Were all these appointments made substantially in the same form both by President Lincoln and President Johnson?

A. They were all intended to be; I cannot say whether they were or not. I think no appointment was ever made without my drawing it or causing or directing it to be drawn; and so far as I remember, there was no departure from the policy or principle originally decided upon in regard to their functions, power, responsibility, or anything else. I thought I was doing the same thing, but I am not very much a slave to forms, and very likely one case may differ in phraseology from another. I may say this: that there was no one of these Governors ever commissioned that I did not write or dictate the terms of the commission, and that not one word was altered or changed by the President or any one.

Q. And in principle you followed the Tennessee appointment?

A. In principle I thought I did.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is the plan of reconstruction applied by the President to the rebel States a system of his own creation, or how was it agreed upon?

A. I think it grew during the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the administration of Mr. Johnson, and it was modified from time to time by the circumstances as they occurred. The first act of reorganization, as I have mentioned, was in the case of Tennessee. I think I am the author of that. I think, so far as I know, that plan of reconstruction was pursued, at least until the time I was taken sick and went to my bed, in the month of April, 1865. When I came out of the sick room, the first day I went to the Cabinet, I think the draught of the President's proclamation, or a plan of proclamation, was submitted to me. I found that it substantially accorded with what I had understood to be my own plan, and I accepted it as being the same.

Q. Do you refer to the proclamation now in the case of North Carolina?

A. I refer now to the general proclamation of amnesty and reconstruction of Mr. Johnson. How far it differed from other plans submitted I do not remember. When this question came up before the President and in Cabinet, it was discussed and adopted during my sickness, and was understood and stated, I believe, as one which harmonized with what had previously been done, but modified by the circumstance of the close of the war, and other things.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Was there not this difference, that Mr. Lincoln's plan was adopted during the war as a war measure, while Mr. Johnson's plan was adopted after the war had ceased?

A. There was a difference both of time and circumstance.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I find the proclamation for the organization of a provisional government of North Carolina was dated May 29, 1865; was that proclamation considered in Cabinet before it was published?

A. That and the other proclamation referred to were all subjects of frequent discussion and very careful deliberation before any one was issued. I think that when the proclamation was reduced definitely to the form which it now has it was submitted to the whole Cabinet, but I cannot certainly say as to the fact that it was. My recollection is that all the provisions contained in it were carefully considered by the President in Cabinet. I am not able to state, however, positively about that. I see, by looking at the date, that at that time I had only partially recovered, and I was unable to be in Cabinet in all its meetings. I remember, when I arose from my sickness, that I took the papers then presented to me, and made some suggestions to it in the way of amendment, which were accepted.

Q. Was there any suggestion within your recollection, at or before the time the proclamation was agreed upon, as to the convocation of Congress, or the necessity of borrowing the aid of the legislative power in carrying out this design?

A. I do not remember that there was.

Q. Was not the object of the administration, or of the President, to hurry through and to consummate his process or project of reconstruction before the meeting of the next Congress?

A. No; the object was to proceed with the work of the restoration of the Union as speedily and effectively and wisely as possible, having no reference as to whether Congress would be in session or not.

Q. Did not he urge these parties to be prepared to be at the doors of Congress by the time of its next meeting?

A. Very likely he did. I do not know the fact. I know I was very anxious that these States should be represented in Congress, and that he was equally so that they should be provided with representatives who could be admitted.

Q. You stated in reply to a question put by Mr. Lawrence, as to the reason why these matters have been committed to your department, that it has been the usage to refer the relations between the general government and the Territories to that department; do you remember any precedents as to States and correspondence between the general government and the States?

A. Yes, sir; the whole correspondence from the beginning, as I recollect, has been with the State Department; that is the political relations of States.

Q. Do you recollect any case of controversy between the general government and some State?

A. I do not remember a case of controversy precisely of that description. I remember correspondence relating to the rights of citizens of States quite abundant; where, for instance, the rights of a citizen of the United States or of the State of Pennsylvania is affected by some particular action, in which it becomes necessary that there should be correspondence in reference to it between the general government and the government of that State, and that such correspondence has been carried on by the Secretary of State and the Governor of the State in question.

Q. Is not that because it relates to the foreign relations of the government?

A. No; not exclusively. I do not say that other departments may not correspond with the States. I say that correspondence affecting our political relations is carried on by the President through the State Department.

Q. You stated that there had been a consultation in reference to the disposition made of Jefferson Davis. Be good enough to say whether in the course of that consultation any reference was had to the fact that he was held in military custody by virtue of the proclamation under which he was captured, on charge of complicity in the assassination of the President?

A. My recollection is that before that question occurred the Secretary of War had withdrawn the proclamation issued, and that, therefore, no such state of facts existed.

Q. Was there not a reward offered by proclamation for the capture of Jefferson Davis, on charge of complicity in the assassination, and was not that reward paid?

A. I have heard that it was. I was sick at the time and knew nothing of it. I remember a time when the Secretary of War, under whose sanction the proclamation was issued, came into Cabinet and recommended the withdrawal or discontinuance of it, and that it was withdrawn or discontinued; and I have reason to suppose, as every one else has who has read the public prints, that there were claims for the rewards offered by that proclamation for the arrest of the offenders. Whether they have been paid, or what disposition has been made of them, I only know from the newspapers, and not from any special information in my possession.

Q. There was a withdrawal of the proclamation in the case of Surratt about the time of his arrival in England, and before he had been captured; was that the case in respect to Davis and the others enumerated?

A. I ought to be guarded in speaking of these proclamations, for I was too ill to know anything about them when they were issued, and since then it has not been within my province to know anything about them except what I have seen in the ordinary newspaper reports.

Q. You do not, then, undertake to say positively that this proclamation for the arrest of Davis was withdrawn?

A. I know nothing about it except historically.

Q. Are we to understand you, then, as saying that no reference was had to the fact of his being held under military arrest at this time, upon the hypothesis, as you suppose, that proceedings of that character had been withdrawn and discontinued?

A. No; there was not any such conversation that I ever had or heard of with the President. Jefferson Davis was then in Fortress Monroe, in custody of the military authorities, and the simple and only question was whether he should be surrendered to the civil authorities if they should demand him, and it was decided or understood that he should be.

Q. There was nothing said as to his being held in the way I speak of, or upon that charge?

A. Nothing. I never had it in my view, or heard it alluded to at all. My own theory about Jefferson Davis has been simple and continuous that, until that proclamation was withdrawn and peace was proclaimed by the President, Jefferson Davis was amenable to, and ought to have been tried for, the alleged complicity with the assassin in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, if there was evidence in the judgment of the authorities who had charge of the administration of military justice to put him on trial, and that in any case he ought to be tried before a military commission for treason; but that when he was not tried, contrary to my advice, by the military authorities, he then ought to be tried for treason by the civil authorities, and the sooner he was tried the better. I, perhaps, ought to state that from the beginning I have never heard or seen any indication on the part of the President to prevent a trial. On the contrary' every time the question has been raised in his presence, within my knowledge' he has always been anxious for the trial of Jefferson Davis by a civil tribunal' after it was decided that he should not be tried by a military tribunal—and that decision was reached very early in Cabinet—in which I was overruled.

Q. Was that decision ever made public?

A. No, sir; it was not necessary to make it public. It was the opinion of the Attorney General, and upon his recommendation the decision was made.

Q. Was the question made at that time as to his complicity in the assassination?

A. There was a talk at that time as to his complicity, but they failed to procure evidence of it. I remember at one time one or two witnesses were examined before the President and myself upon that subject, and that I examined one or both of these witnesses, or heard what they said. Some time after that, as I supposed, the testimony of these witnesses was discredited and destroyed by transactions in which Sanford Conover appeared, and the evidence of the alleged complicity of Jefferson Davis thereupon failed.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Do you know what directions were given to the District Attorney in Richmond, recently, in regard to the question as to whether Mr. Davis should be allowed his liberty upon bail?

A. I do not know that any directions were given to him. I have no knowledge or information that any were given whatever, or what they were if there were any. The matter fell within the province of the Attorney General as the judiciary officer of the government, and it was never discussed in my presence, in the Cabinet or elsewhere, with him or anybody else.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You spoke of putting him on trial before a military commission, and for alleged complicity in the assassination of the President. I wish to know if you can state any other reason why that was not done?

A. I do not know. I only know that it was not done, that we were inquiring about these witnesses, and that was the last I remember to have heard of it in connection with any officer of the government. I afterwards heard of proceedings in connection with Sanford Conover, which, as I understood, destroyed the testimony of the witnesses examined by me.

Q. It was destroyed then because the evidence was insufficient?

A. You require me to draw an inference. I do not know anything about it.

Q. Was not that the reason you dismissed the subject?

A. The reason why I dismissed the subject was that my attention was never drawn to it again. It would be only accidental that my attention would ever be called to that subject. It would be only fair to imagine that, having been myself a sufferer in that business, the subject would be a delicate one for me to pursue without seeming to be over zealous or demonstrative.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Have you any knowledge of a confession made by Payne before his execution in regard to his attempt to take your own life?

A. Yes, sir; I have.

Q. There was such a confession made?

A. I will tell you what I know of that. Major Eckert, Assistant Secretary of War, at the time of these prosecutions, was a very kind friend of mine and a frequent visitor at my house. He told me that Payne made some statements of confession to him before his conviction, I think it was; whether before his trial or not I do not remember; that he took it down in short-hand, if I recollect right, (I think he wrote short-hand) He told me the substance of it, or at least so much as I then supposed to be material or pertinent to the subject. . Some question, as I understood, arose, whether that confession of Payne could be put in evidence on the trial, or whether, after the trial, it should be given to the world as justifying the punishment. I think that Major Eckert told me it was not made use of chiefly because there was proof enough without to satisfy the minds of all persons, and that it might seem to weaken the power of the conviction or judgment to make use of a confession made by one of the parties convicted. Major Eckert told me after that time that he meant to draw out Payne's statements for my own use and satisfaction. I told him I would be pleased to have it. When I have seen him since I have asked him, and he said he was going to do it. The last time I saw him he repeated that he would draw it out and give it to me, but I have never seen it.

Q. Did you understand whether that confession in any way implicated any of the rebel authorities?

A. If I am correct, and it is a pretty important question to speak to, it did not. I think I understood that Payne utterly and absolutely refused to implicate even the parties that the proof implicated. He declined to give any information even as to his known confederates. At least that is the impression left upon my mind, that he was obstinately determined to go to the grave without breaking the confidence he was supposed to have held.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. In any consultation with President Johnson did he ever advise against, or in any other way attempt to prevent the prosecution of Jefferson Davis for complicity in the assassination?

A. He never advised against his prosecution for anything. He was most strenuous in insisting upon the prosecution and trial of Jefferson Davis for whatever could be laid to his charge.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Has that been so at all times?

A. Always, when it has been the subject of discussion or debate. With the lapse of time this got to be an old affair, and is not often referred to.

Q. Did I understand you that his trial by a military commission was abandoned upon the advice of Attorney General Speed?

A. It was not abandoned because it was never determined on. I urged it, or at least I was willing to see it done, but in that I was not sustained by the advice of the Attorney General. Three counsel were chosen to prosecute, and we reported our proceedings from time to time. We then held conversations from time to time about the selection of counsel. Mr. Clifford, of Massachusetts; Mr. Evarts, of New York, and Mr. Rousseau, of Kentucky, were appointed, and I always supposed they were going on to prosecute the case, until after awhile I saw that Governor Clifford had dropped out; and Mr. Rousseau, I do not know how he got out, or whether he is yet out. Mr. Evarts is still retained.

By Mr. CHURCHILL:

Q. How recently have you heard the President express an opinion that Jefferson Davis should be tried?

A. I cannot say how recently, because I cannot remember that it has been the subject of conversation in that connection for some time. At various times I have heard it discussed, and while it remained as a practical or living subject of debate, that was the expression of the President.

Q. Have you heard him express any opinion since this question of habeas corpus has been before the country?

A. I have not. The Cabinet meets twice a week, but I do not remember to have heard any conversation on that subject since the habeas corpus was issued, unless it was our discussion of the question whether we should deliver him to the civil authorities on the habeas corpus, or subsequent to the issuing of the writ, which, I cannot tell. I can say very safely that I never heard any intimation from the President that Jefferson Davis should not be tried just as soon as it was practicable.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You state that the President has been, so far as you know, very solicitous to bring him to trial. Has it been his idea that he should be tried before a court sitting in Virginia?

A. No, sir. The advice of the counsel was followed when that question was considered. Many months ago that question was under consideration. There were various suggestions, that he should be tried in Tennessee, in Virginia, in Maryland, and in Pennsylvania. The President always required the law officer of the government to see that he was tried at the place where the best possible case could be made.

Q. Was it not the opinion of the Attorney General that he might be tried in some of the loyal States and convicted of treason?

A. I do not know what the opinion of the Attorney General was, for I do not remember to have heard that question discussed by him. I remember the question generally was discussed during the administration of the previous Attorney General, and what his opinion was upon this point I could not now tell you. I rememder being in Philadelphia, and having a conversation with Mr. Meredith upon the subject, and that he was very decided in his opinion that there would be a conviction, and, I think, he was of the opinion that he could be convicted in Virginia I know it was debated in the presence of lawyers, and in the presence of the Attorney General. I am not now a lawyer and have no opinion upon the question.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. On the 23d of July, 1865, Provisional Governor Sharkey sent a communication to you, as appears by Executive Document No. 27, second session Thirty-ninth Congress, which he asked you to lay before the President, and to which you replied as follows:

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, July 24, 1865.

W. L. SHARKEY,
Provisional Governor of Mississippi, Jackson:

Your telegram of the 21st has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored, with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Q. Was that by direction of the President?

A. That telegram was written by me, and was sent by authority of the President, but I have some recollection that in the haste in which the business was then transacted the language used was stronger than he understood it to be. It was not his dictation, but my own. It was sent probably with his approval, but I do not think it was considered thoroughly by him.

Q. There were other telegrams to the other provisional Governors, saying substantially that their proceedings respecting reorganization would be subject to the approval of Congress. Were they also sent by direction of the President?

A. They were all sent in the same way. They were written by me, and not disapproved by him.

Q. On page 17 of this document, is a communication from the State Department, to provisional Governor Holden, in which you say: "The amount thus reasonably estimated will be paid at the War Department as an expense incident to the suppression of the rebellion. The estimates, however, will carefully exclude all expenses which may arise from the administration of the civil government of the State, including the charities thereof. It is understood here that, besides cotton which has been taken by the Secretary of the Treasury under acts of Congress, there were quantities of resin and other articles, as well as funds, lying about in different places in the State, and elsewhere, not reduced into possession by United States officers as insurgent property. The President is of the opinion that you can appropriate these for the inevitable and indispensable expenses of the civil government of the State during the continuance of the provisional government. He is also of the opinion that you can levy taxes or assessments for these inevitable and indispensable expenses, and enforce their collection. Should you adopt this course, and find yourself impeded or embarrassed in the execution of the measure, you will then report to this department, and orders will be given by the War Department to the military authorities to take charge of the matter." Are you able to state what kind of cotton, resin, and other property was taken in pursuance of this letter?

A. I am not able to state how much was taken in pursuance of that letter. I remember that Governor Worth and others from North Carolina came up here and made representation that they could not carry on any government without some help or relief; that there was property in North Carolina belonging to the State as distinct from the confederacy; and amongst other things, I think, they said that there was cotton that was claimed as belonging to the State, which had made separate and distinct contracts for it; that the subject was one of careful examination, lasting a day or two, or three. And the conclusion was, I think, on consultation with the Treasury and some others of the departments, or officers of government, that if there was property there of that kind, it was in such small quantities and lying in such condition that it could never practically be realized for the government, while the State, having the necessity upon it, might be able to make something out of it. What was done I do not know. I remember since then to have seen one or two facts throwing some light upon the subject. I think I have seen a statement in a rebel book of a gentleman who went to London for the State of South Carolina, and that cotton was sold for that State and accounted for; also reference made to some litigation arising in London upon the question whether, in the case of property owned by the State of North Carolina, and to be used for the prosecution of the war, the State had now a valid claim to that property. The amount was small, but I remember that question was raised.

Q. You never required a report of the amount so used in North Carolina?

A. No, sir; I remember there was a careful consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury about it, and that the letter was modified before being sent, to meet the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to one or two points.

Q. And no report was ever made to you or to the government on the subject?

A. None to me.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. I see it stated in the same communication that he may levy taxes for the purpose of meeting these necessary expenditures. Governor Sharkey, in his testimony before the committee, refers to the same subject. Be good enough to state whether any report was ever made to any department of the government of proceedings taken by the provisional Governors of any of the rebel States in that direction?

A. Not to my knowledge. I have no recollection or knowledge about it.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. When the proclamation was issued, after the re-establishment of a provisional government in North Carolina and the other States, and provisional Governors were appointed, was it a matter of consultation with the President and his Cabinet?

A. The proclamation was the result of many consultations and conferences.

Q. If it is proper, will you be good enough to state whether the action of the President in these proclamations met with the approval of his Cabinet officers?

A. I have no recollection that there was any dissent from the proclamations by anybody.

Q. Will you state, so far as you know, what the motives were which actuated the President of the United States in issuing these proclamations?

A. It was to bring the country to its normal condition, the States into their constitutional relations with the United States, preserve peace, and reduce the expenses of the government as rapidly as possible.

Q. Was the question discussed as to the power of the President, without the sanction of Congress, to go on and re-establish these State governments?

A. I do not remember that there was ever any discussion about it. I never had any doubt about it.

Q. Your own opinion was that he had that power?

A. I thought so; I think so still. Since my attention has been called to the fact that Governor Sharkey says he was authorized to levy taxes, and indemnify himself, it refreshes my recollection upon the subject of the pay of provisional Governors. I now recollect the fact, which I did not remember when I stated that all the Governors were paid by the War Department.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25, 1867.

Upon these notes being submitted to me, I desire to say that I have now obtained information that Major Eckert does not write short-hand, and that the statements made to him by Payne, as mentioned by me, were, probably, not reduced to writing at all, but mentioned to me by Major Eckert from memory.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1867.

JAMES L. SELFRIDGE sworn and examined.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. State your residence.

A. Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

Q. State if you were appointed to any office in the Congressional district in which you reside.

A. In the latter part of June, 1865, I was appointed assessor of internal revenue of the eleventh district of Pennsylvania, to fill a vacancy.

Q. How long did you continue to hold that office?

A. I held it until the 20th of November, 1866.

Q. State, if you please, whether you held a commission in the usual form.

A. Yes, sir; I held a commission from the Secretary of the Treasury until the adjournment of the Senate.

Q. Now state, if you please, whether your name was sent in to the Senate for confirmation?

A. So far as I know, it was not sent in.

Q. Did you bring the matter, at any time during the session of the Senate, to the notice of the Treasury Department?

A. I came down here the 5th of June, I think; I do not recollect distinctly whether I saw the assistant Secretary that day or the next day; the 5th or 6th of June I called at the Treasury Department with the view of urging him to send my name in.

Q. You know, then, that it had not been sent in?

A. I so understood. I was unable to see the Secretary, and saw assistant Secretary Chandler, who, after a moment, referred me to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He seemed to be aware that my name had not been sent in. Mr. Rollins could not be seen, and I saw Mr. Whitman, the deputy Commissioner. I told him that I had been over to the Secretary's office and stated my business there, and that they had referred me to the Commissioner's office. I inquired why the name had not been sent in; he replied that Mr. Cowan had charge of the Pennsylvania appointments, and that when Mr. Cowan said the name should go in it would go, and not until then.

Q. State whether you called at any time upon the President himself in regard to it?

A. No, sir; I called on Mr. Cowan, and stated to him what I had learned at the Department. He replied that he supposed that was so.

Q. Did he give you any advice?

A. He told me to go home and support the President and his policy, and he would attend to the matter. I saw him before the adjournment of Congress on the 3d day of July, in the city of Philadelphia. He there intimated to me that the name would not be sent in. He told me that if I stopped taking radical papers, and supported the President and his policy, the President might reappoint me, but he would appoint no one who took radical papers.

Q. You had no conversation with any officers connected with the Treasury Department in regard to the matter after that?

A. I saw the Secretary of the Treasury subsequently, I think about the 25th or 26th of February, and I inquired of him how the matter was. He said he supposed it was an omission. I told him I knew how it was; that the matter had been left entirely with Mr. Cowan. He made no reply.

Q. Did Mr. Cowan state to you, as if by authority, what was the President's policy?

A. He stated very emphatically that, so far as I was concerned, unless I stopped taking radical papers, and supported the President's policy, I would not be reappointed. I held the office after the adjournment of the Senate until November. I have a letter here from the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department, dated May 8, 1867, in which he speaks of there having been an omission in sending in my name, and they refused to pay my salary and commissions after the adjournment of the Senate. I wrote to him about the matter, and he replied that there seemed to be an omission to send in my name, and that I therefore ceased to be entitled to receive compensation as assessor on the 28th of July, 1866.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. On whose recommendation were you first appointed?

A. I was in the army at the time I was appointed. There were several applicants for the position. I was recommended by a number of citizens of Philadelphia and my own district.

Q. Who recommended you?

A. Judge Knox, of Philadelphia, was one; the entire Congressional delegation from Philadelphia, with the exception of the first district; Judge Kelly, Mr. O'Neil, Mr. Myers, Mr. Thayer, and Colonel Thomas, the collector of the district, and Mr. Milward, the marshal, recommended me.

Q. Were you the first assessor of the district?

A. No, sir; the first assessor was Samuel Oliver. He resigned, and I was appointed to fill his place.

Q. Were you originally recommended by Mr. Cowan?

A. No, sir; I do not think that Mr. Cowan knew I was appointed until the appointment was announced.

Q. Were you recommended by Senator Buckalew?

A. No, sir.

Q. You never saw the President about the matter at all, and had no communication with him?

No, sir.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. When were you superseded, and by whom?

A. In September a man by the name of Charles Glantz was appointed to relieve me. Charges were preferred against him that he was a brewer at the time, and not eligible to the position, and his commission was withdrawn. I held over until the 20th of November, when David H. Neiman was appointed. He was rejected by the Senate, and William Mutchler was appointed and confirmed.

Q. Was the man who was appointed immediately after you engaged in brewing at the time, or immediately before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who made charges against him?

A. A number of citizens.

Q. Did you make them?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you get them to be made?

A. No, sir; I knew nothing about them until they were made.

Q. Who is this Neiman?

A. He was editor of a paper in Easton.

Q. What are his politics?

A. He is a democrat.

Q. Always a democrat?

A. Yes, sir; his press was destroyed in 1861.

Q. By whom?

A. By returned soldiers from the three months' service.

Q. Did you have any part in that?

A. No, sir; I was in Harrisburg raising a new regiment at that time?

Q. Who was his successor?

A. William A. Mutchler.

Q. What is his business?

A. He has been an office-holder ever since I knew him. He has been deputy sheriff, and has been prothonotary for that county.

Q. Was he always a democrat?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is this a democratic district where you live?

A. Yes, sir; it is called "the tenth legion of democracy."

Q. Who represents that district in Congress?

A. Mr. Van Auken. Philip Johnson was the representative, but died toward the latter part of his term.

Q. What was the reason of the attack of the soldiers on Mr. Neiman's press?

A. His opposition to the war.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What were your politics at the time you were appointed?

A. I was a republican—always a republican.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1867.

SAMUEL S. JONES sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you on duty at the White House in 1865?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In what capacity?
A. As an officer.
Q. What kind of officer?
A. I was employed by General Baker as an officer.
Q. A police officer, or detective, or what?
A. A detective officer, I think they term it.
Q. Who assigned you to duty at the White House?
A. I think Colonel Assmosson sent me there.
Q. Who is he?
A. He was employed by General Baker.
Q. How long were you on duty at the White House?
A. I could not tell; two or three weeks I reckon I was there.
Q. What time in the year was it?
A. I could not tell you that. It was about the time that they had the news that Surratt was coming here to assassinate the President in the winter.
Q. What Surratt?
A. John Surratt, I suppose.
Q. Was that in the winter of 1865–66?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was it the time that Baker caused the arrest of Mrs. Cobb?
A. Before that time.
Q. Did you know of any improper influences that were used by persons having cases at the White House, in order to obtain pardons?
A. No, sir.
Q. In the way of the payment of money, or any other improper or unlawful influence?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were you acquainted with any of the persons who were understood to be in the pardon brokerage business in this city at that time?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you ever see any of those persons about the White House?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who?
A. I saw a lady engaged in that business, by the name of Mrs. Cobb, a great deal.
Q. How often did you see Mrs. Cobb?
A. Sometimes two or three times a day.
Q. Was she there every day?
A. No, sir; I did not see her there every day. She would be there in some days two or three times, and the next day she would not be there at all. She was there more or less every day or two.
Q. Did you know what her business was on those occasions?
A. Nothing more than that I heard it said she was there after pardons.
Q. Who did you hear state that?
A. I heard a man by the name of Dunn, who staid at the door of the White House, and she told me herself that she was in the pardon business.
Q. Did you ever know of her obtaining any pardons?
A. Yes, sir; I believe she did obtain one, to my knowledge.
Q. Was that in the Howell case?

A. His is the only case that I ever knew that she had got pardons in?

Q. Did she seem to have free access to the house?

A. Yes, sir; whenever I saw her.

Q. And to the audience room of the President?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you know whether she was there for any other business connected with the official acts of the President, besides the granting of pardons?

A. No, sir.

Q. What other pardon brokers did you ever see about the White House?

A. I know a man—I could not tell you his name. I have seen him about here to-day. He was engaged in the pardon business and had an office.

Q. Would you know his name if you were to hear it?

A. I do not think I would. He was, I think, a colonel in the rebel army.

Q. Was he an agent for the State of Alabama?

A. I think he was.

Q. Where did he have his office?

A. I think he had an office opposite Willard's Hotel.

Q. Do you know whether he was acquainted with Mrs. Cobb?

A. I do not.

Q. Was he there frequently?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know of his obtaining many pardons?

A. I used to see him with a great many papers in his hand. I know nothing about what was in them.

Q. What was your official duty as an officer at the White House?

A. I was sent there to see if any of those parties came. I knew Surratt, and I was there to see who approached the President. I remained with the President in his private office when the doors were thrown open for common receptions, and when he walked about the grounds I usually remained near him.

Q. Were you in his room when he was receiving the public?

A. Not when members of Congress and others were received privately; but when the doors were thrown open I usually stood near the table by him.

Q. Are these the only two persons engaged in the pardon business that you know visited the White House frequently?

A. I could mention Mrs. Washington.

Q. Did you know whether she obtained any pardons?

A. Only one, to my knowledge.

Q. In what case was that?

A. Captain Kelly.

Q. State what you know about that case?

A. I only know that she obtained a pardon for him.

Q. Do you know of any cases of pardons being granted, in which there was any improper or unlawful inducement offered or given to the President, or any officer about the White House?

A. No, sir; nothing of the kind.

Q. During the three weeks you were there on duty, were you about the house all the time?

A. Most of the time, except when I went to get my meals. It was my business to be there from the time they opened until the police came around and relieved me, at night, about eight or nine o'clock in the evening. The doors were closed at three o'clock, and no one was admitted unless he had a card to the President.

Q. Did you report to General Baker any improprieties that you saw going on about the White House?

A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did you report to him about any woman, or other persons being about the house, acting in an improper manner?

A. I do not know but I may have said at the time that it was a great place for men to assemble to pick up women. I do not know that I ever said anything else that I can recollect at the present time.

Q. Did you report that there were any improprieties which you saw there with the President?

A. No, sir.

Q. So far as you know, if there were any improprieties there he had no knowledge of it?

A. I do not think he did.

Q. Did you ever report to Baker, or any other person, that any money was being used in the pardon business?

A. No, sir.'

Q. Did you have any reason to believe that any was used?

A. None, except what Mrs. Cobb said to me, that she had to use money with the heads of the departments to get these things through, and that is merely hearsay, of course.

Q. Were you sent to the White House with the knowledge of the President of the reason of your being there?

A. I told the President why I was sent there. He used to speak with me almost every day; asked me if I saw anything. I told him that I did not.

Q. Was Baker absent from the city at the time?

A. Yes, sir; I think he was in Philadelphia.

Q. On his return did he send for you?

A. He recalled me from the White House.

Q. Who was on duty with you at the White House?

A. A man by the name of William R. Speer went there with me first.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of John Odell?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he on duty with you?

A. Not there.

Q. Did you have an interview with Baker, at which Odell was present, at any time while you were on duty at the White House?

A. Not to my knowledge; I do not remember. We were often in the office together, but I do not recollect any special interview.

Q. Were you directed by Baker's assistant to call on him after his return?

A. General Baker sent a note to me requesting me to come from the White House back to the office.

Q. Were you on duty after that at the White House?

A. No, sir. You asked me about improper conduct. There was an officer who gave an affidavit which I reported to Baker. I never knew anything of the kind myself; my name may have been used to the Committee in connection with that.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. What was your business before you were on duty as an officer with General Baker?

A. I was in the United States Marshal's office, in New York city—there and with General Dix.

Q. What position did you hold there?

A. Deputy United States Marshal.

Q. How came you to be connected with General Baker?

A. I knew of a fraud that was committed on a soldier in New York, who got beat out of money by a man, and I went and told him.

Q. Did you get employed immediately by General Baker?

A. No, sir; I was not out of the situation then.

Q. How long after that before you were employed by him?

A. Some time, I am not sure how long. I used to do work for him occasionally when I was in the office in New York.

Q. Did you know him before that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you first know Baker?

A. Three or four years ago.

Q. While he was in the employment of the government?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you were employed by Baker, what reward did you get for your services?

A. $145 a month.

Q. And your board besides?

A. No, sir; I boarded myself.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there any other man by the name of Jones in Baker's employ in the city at that time?

A. Not that I knew of.

Q. Did you tell the President that you were on duty there by order of General Baker?

A. No, sir; I do not think I did. I merely told him I was sent there to keep a lookout; I presume he had heard what we were sent there for. There was a common report about it. Some one telegraphed to the War Department that Surratt was coming to assassinate the President, and we were sent there.

Q. Did you carry a message, either verbal or written, from the President to Baker to the effect that he wanted to see him?

A. Yes, sir; the President told me one day to go and tell General Baker that he wanted to see him.

Q. Do you know what he wanted to see him for?

A. No, sir; he did not tell me.

Q. When the President told you that he wanted to see Baker, was he angry?

A. I do not know whether he was angry or not; he spoke rather quick.

Q. Did you tell General Baker that the President was furious and a little drunk?

A. No; I do not know as I did.

Q. Did you?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Suppose you had told him that, would it have been true?

A. I should have told him the truth if I told him anything.

Q. Was he drunk at the time?

A. I never saw the President drunk.

Q. Then you did not tell General Baker that he was drunk?

A. No, sir; it is a hard thing to tell when a man is drunk.

Q. Did you tell Baker that the President was furious?

A. I told General Baker—says I, "the President wants to see you;" I think that was all I said. I just walked over from the President's House and told General Baker that, and then went down to the hotel where I was stopping; that was all I said.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Where did you see General Baker when you told him the President wanted to see him?

A. In his office. I then went to the hotel where I was stopping—Willard's.

Q. Did you meet General Baker when he was going down to the President's House after you had told him?

A. I did not see him until the next morning.

Q. On or after he had been to the President's House, did you have any conversation like that inquired about by the Chairman?

A. No, sir.

Q. You did not talk to Mr. Baker at all about the President being drunk?

A. No, sir; I never told him, for I had no reason to tell him. I never saw the President drunk. He always treated me like a gentleman all the time I was there.

Q. When you were first in the employ of Baker, what business were you engaged in?

A. I think I went out and picked up a couple of bounty jumpers.

Q. How long after that before you were sent to the President's House?

A. It was more than a year.

Q. Did you say you were acquainted with Surratt?

A. I had seen John Surratt.

Q. Had you ever seen any of the other Surratts?

A. I had seen the daughter and the mother.

Q. Was the Surratt you had seen the one lately brought back from Europe?

A. Yes, sir; I suppose so. I do not know that he was; I suppose he is the same one who is here under arrest. They sent a telegram that he was coming on h re to assassinate the President. I thought it was a very foolish thing to send a despatch. If it was true they should have followed him and arrested him.

Q. Did you remain at the President's House, when you were on the watch, all the time?

A. I staid in the house. I would go out sometimes and stand around the door, e else up in the room with the President. I had free access everywhere except in his private apartments.

Q. Did you ever see Mrs. Cobb go into the room where he receives people?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many times?

A. I do not know.

Q. Did you ever see her go in alone?

A. I have seen her at the door, and she would go in. I never saw her open the door and go in. She would go up stairs and go to the door, and if the President was not busily engaged she would be admitted. Very often she would go to another door, where a man by the name of Colonel Browning was, I think, and she could have gone into the President's room from that room.

Q. Was it her practice to go in that way, or was she let in when the door was open for everybody?

A. Sometimes she would go in one way, and sometimes another. She came sometimes quite early in the morning, as soon as eight or nine o'clock.

Q. Were you not there expressly to watch Mrs. Cobb?

A. No, sir; not especially for that.

Q. Did not General Baker tell you to watch Mrs. Cobb?

A. Not until the day the President sent for him.

Q. Did not he tell you to watch Mrs. Cobb the day the President sent for him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you in the room with the President when Mrs. Cobb was there?

A. I do not believe I ever was more than once.

Q. Were you ever in the President's room when Mrs. Cobb and the President were the only persons there?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were you ever in the President's room when she was there with others?

A. With people who came in?—yes, sir.

Q. What was her business on these occasions?
A. I do not know.
Q. Did she have papers with her?
A. Not to my knowledge; she may have had them, however, and I not seen them.
Q. Did you know, when Mrs. Cobb went into the room where Colonel Browning was, that she saw the President at those times?
A. I did not.
Q. Then you mean to be understood by that merely that she may have gone there?
A. Certainly; I do not know whether she did or not.
Q. Did you know that she and Colonel Browning were acquainted?
A. I have seen them walking together on the street, and I have seen her speak to him in the house.
Q. Did you ever introduce anybody to Mrs. Cobb?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who?
A. Captain Howell.
Q. The man who got the pardon?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where was that?
A. At Willard's Hotel.
Q. At what place at Willard's Hotel?
A. Up stairs in the parlor.
Q. How came you to do that?
A. Mrs. Cobb asked me to do it, and Captain Howell asked me to do it.
Q. Where were you when Mrs. Cobb asked you to give her that introduction?
A. I think she was in Georgetown.
Q. Where was Mr. Howell when he asked you?
A. At Willard's Hotel.
Q. Was he stopping there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was Mrs. Cobb in the habit of going to Willard's Hotel into the parlor?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you go there with Howell at the time you introduced him?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was that previous to his getting the pardon which she obtained?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you know of that plan to get her to procure a pardon before it was carried out?
A. I knew that Captain Howell wanted a pardon?
Q. Did he actually want one, or was he after a bogus one?
A. I always thought he wanted one.
Q. Why?
A. I believe he used to live in the rebel States; I thought so.
Q. Did he tell you he needed one?
A. I am under the impression that he did.
Q. Was that on the occasion of introducing him to Mrs. Cobb?
A. No, sir; he made the remark that he wanted a pardon.
Q. Do you recollect at what time he told you that?
A. No, sir; I could not tell you. It was in the winter season some time.
Q. How long before the pardon was procured by Mrs. Cobb?
A. A week, I think, or somewhere in that neighborhood.
Q. You say that was in the winter—which winter?
A. A year ago last winter, I think.
Q. Was Captain Howell in the employment of Baker?

A. I could not answer that question, I never knew. He was around there and was off a good deal.

Q. Do you know what his purpose was?

A. No, sir; I never asked. He was a man I never had much to say to in any shape or fashion.

Q. Did you hear the interview between the President and Baker when he came back?

A. Oh no, sir; I did not go to the White House; I went to Willard's Hotel.

Q. Baker says that when he came back he met you and came back with you?

A. I could not say whether he did or not. I was thinking I did not see him until the next morning; I may be mistaken.

Q. You did not hear the conversation between him and the President?

A. No, sir; I did not go to the President's House at all.

Q. Why did Baker recall you from that service?

A. I guess the President did not want any more of his men around there.

Q. He did not recall you because he was not satisfied with the manner in which you had conducted yourself?

A. No, sir; there was no fault found with me. I think he found out that the President did not want any of the men there?

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You spoke of seeing Mrs. Cobb at different places in the White House frequently. I wish to ask you whether the White House was not open to the public?

A. To every one who wished to go there.

Q. Nobody is excluded?

A. No, sir; not to my knowledge. The doors are open at fixed hours, and everybody has a right to go into the rooms which are public rooms.

Q. Were there not several offices in the Executive mansion besides the President's rooms—rooms where his assistants were?

A. Yes, sir; there were two on the side of his private office, and two on the opposite of the hall.

Q. Are there not a great many persons who go there who have business in these offices who do not see the President at all?

A. Yes, sir; a great many. Perhaps she may have gone in there to see some one of his subordinates rather than the President. I do not pretend to say about that, for I know nothing about it.

Q. I ask you if hundreds do not go there to the Executive mansion that the President never sees, and knows nothing of their presence?

A. Certainly, thousands of them. They are going there every day.

Q. I ask you whether objectionable persons might not go there without his knowing anything about it, or having any control over it?

A. He would not know anything about it.

Q. At the time Mrs. Cobb came there and had interviews with the President, was it when he was receiving other persons?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You never saw her go in there to the exclusion of other persons entitled to go in?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is not the custom of the President, as far as he can, to see every one who calls to see him on business?

A. Yes, sir; I have been there when the doors were thrown open, and twenty-five or thirty or forty people would come in. He would shake hands with them and answer a great many foolish questions that I thought nobody ought to detain the President to ask. He would then ask if there were any more. If he was told that there were twenty-five or thirty more waiting, he would say, "Let them come in," and he would go through the same performance of shaking hands and answering their foolish questions.

Q. I ask you if, during the time you were there, you ever saw any impropriety of any kind whatever on the part of the President?

A. I never did.

Q. And you also state that you never saw him intoxicated or under the influence of liquor?

A. I never did. I never saw any liquor in the house, nor anything approaching to intoxication. He always treated me very kindly. He took me down once to see a new carriage that he had just purchased. I never saw anything on his part that was not gentlemanly and proper.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1867.

JOHN B. HUBBARD sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. My home is in Connecticut.

Q. Were you in this city in the spring of 1865, about the time of the assassination of the President?

A. At the time of the assassination of the President I was in Chicago, having just come there from Springfield, Illinois. I left that afternoon for Washington.

Q. Were you in the city during the time of the trial of the assassins?

A. I was.

Q. What was your business at that time?

A. I was with General Baker.

Q. Were you on duty at the arsenal during the trial?

A. I was there, I think, from the 29th of April until about the 12th or 13th of July, when I was discharged from there.

Q. What was your business there?

A. There were four of us on duty, which was to watch. We were each on six hours every day.

Q. Do you know whether any of these prisoners made confessions?

A. I do not know that any of them made a confession. I do know that Atzerodt, after the sentence or death warrant was read to them the day before they were to be hung, made a confession or a part of a confession. Colonel Fredericks, who was in command, under General Hartranft, was writing down what I supposed to be a confession, but a priest came in and it was broken off before it was finished.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I only know that Colonel Fredericks was there writing, and that it was broken off. I should suppose it was a confession. I have no means of knowing other than that.

Q. You do not know that it was a confession?

A. No, sir; I never saw it afterwards.

Q. Do you know whether Payne made a confession?

A. I do not know that he did. I rather think that he did not.

Q. Do you know where Colonel Fredericks is?

A. He lives in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, or did at that time.

Q. Did any of the other prisoners make a confession?

A. I never saw or heard of any confession being made by any one except the one I have mentioned.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. How long had you been in Colonel Baker's employ?
A. From the 25th of March until his force was disbanded.
Q. What pay did you receive?
A. One hundred and fifty dollars a month.
Q. Were you in the army?
A. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 18, 1867.

Hon. E. M. STANTON sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. In executive document No. 26, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, page 3, it appears that payments were made to provisional Governors Perry, Holden, Parsons, and Johnson; will you state by whose direction these payments were made?

A. The payments specified in my letter of January 8, which forms part of that document, were made by my order.

Q. On page 11, from the same document, is a letter from the Secretary of State to provisional Governor Holden, notifying him of his appointment, fixing his salary at $3,000. I desire you to state how that amount was fixed—whether it was in pursuance of that letter, by direction of the President, or otherwise.

A. I cannot state from recollection. I remember that some claim of some Governor was referred to me by Mr. Seward. I could not tell, without looking at the papers in my office, whether I fixed it myself as a reasonable compensation for the service which he rendered, or whether it was fixed with any reference to this paper or not. I had no order from the President in regard to it that I now remember. My recollection is that the bills came to me, and either were presented by the Governors individually, or transmitted by mail, or transferred to me from the State Department. Some of them, I think, were presented individually. Governor Parsons presented his bill in person. I think Governor Perry also presented his in person, and I think Governor Johnson did. I recollect I had some conversation with them in regard to their bills. Whatever may have taken place in regard to them, if there was any improper payment out of army contingencies, I am the proper party to be held to account, because I would not pay a claim out of army contingencies at the request of Mr. Seward or anybody else if I did not think it was right—at least, without the order of the President.

Q. Do you mean to say if Mr. Seward, by direction of the President, fixed the amount of their compensation, and notified them that it should be paid, that if you, in pursuance of that notification made by the President, had afterwards paid it, you alone would be responsible?

A. I did not mean to express an opinion on that subject. That would be a matter of law as to who would be responsible. I mean that I would not exonerate myself by saying that I paid it out of my department at the request of anybody else.

Q. In executive document No. 81, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, page 2, there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, in which he says, in speaking of the condition of the country, that as the country was passing from a state of war to a state of peace, and the emergency seemed to be too pressing to admit of delay until the meeting of Congress, it was thought that the test oath might, in view of the great objects to be attained, in some cases be dispensed with, or rather that persons might be permitted to hold revenue offices who could take it only in a qualified form; and it is stated that no one could have regretted more than the President and members of the Cabinet the necessity which existed for this course. Were you present at the Cabinet meeting when that subject was discussed?

A. He did not say that it was discussed in Cabinet meeting.

Q. Were you present at any Cabinet meeting when the subject of dispensing with the test oath was discussed?

A. I was present at several Cabinet meetings when that subject was discussed.

Q. State, if you will, what directions were given by the President in relation to it.

A. I do not know of any directions that were given by the President. I do not recollect that I ever heard him give any directions in regard to it.

Q. Did you hear him express any opinions or sentiments in regard to it?

A. I do not think I did; I do not recollect having heard him express any opinion upon the subject. It was discussed by members of the Cabinet.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any recollection as to who first proposed a modification of the oath so as to permit parties who could not take it literally to enter upon the discharge of official duties?

A. I have not.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Be good enough to state whether any orders passed through your department in reference to the release of Jeff. Davis on the return of the writ of habeas corpus by the officer who held him in custody?

A. Yes, sir; an order was issued from the War Department to General Burton upon that subject.

Q. What was the tenor of that order?

A. The papers will show the tenor of the order and all the facts within my knowledge in regard to it. I will state that application was made to me by the District Attorney, Mr. Chandler, for an order directing the officer commanding at Fortress Monroe to turn over Mr. Davis upon any process that might be issued by the Federal court. I referred that to the President for his instructions. He sent it back to me with directions to issue the order to General Burton to turn over Mr. Davis upon such process. I directed the Adjutant General to issue the order and to transmit a copy of it to the District Attorney and to General Burton. That was done. I know nothing more of any other order; but I will furnish copies of these papers to the Committee and they will show what they contain.

Q. Is that all the official knowledge you have in relation to his discharge?

A. That is all. Since that time General Burton has made a report of the order, as I understood, to the Adjutant General. I have not seen it.

Q. There were no instructions as to the form of return?

A. None at all.

Q. Was it for his absolute delivery?

A. It was, as requested by the District Attorney.

Q. Were you present at any consultation of the President with his Cabinet in reference to the disposition to be made of Mr. Davis?

A. Yes, sir. It was, I think, a few days before that the subject was mentioned. My impression is that I had seen a notice of an application for a writ of habeas corpus, or that the habeas corpus had been granted. The question was mentioned in Cabinet. The President asked for the opinion of the members of the Cabinet as to what should be done. Without stating the opinions of other members of the Cabinet I advised compliance with the writ.

Q. Was there anything said about the effect of his being held in military custody by virtue of his arrest under the proclamation of the President?

A. There was nothing said about it. The only question discussed was what should be done with the process if the writ of habeas corpus should be granted.

Q. There was nothing said about the alleged complicity of Mr. Davis in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln?

A. The only question discussed, as I recollect, was what should be done with the process if the writ of habeas corpus was granted, and I think I advised that he should be turned over to the civil authorities. The whole history of the case, so far as I know anything about it, if the Committee desire it, is this: At the time of the capture of Mr. Davis those immediately engaged in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln were either on trial or about to be put on trial before a military commission. It was thought expedient by me to withhold any proceedings against Mr. Davis until developments should be made on that trial. After the trial the question of the disposition of Mr. Davis was the subject of frequent consultation in the Cabinet. There was a great diversity of opinion in the matter as to whether Davis should be tried first for the crime of high treason. That subject, as I said, was discussed frequently in the Cabinet as to what was proper to be done in regard to it. After several consultations it was referred to the Attorney General, Mr. Speed, by the President, for an opinion, as to how, when, and where Davis should be tried. Mr. Speed mentioned that the case was one in which he thought he ought to have assistant counsel. We all agreed that he should have any assistance he wanted. Several counsel were mentioned. I recommended the employment of Governor Clifford, of Massachusetts, who had been a distinguished criminal lawyer. Mr. Seward recommended Mr. Evarts. Mr. Speed himself expressed a desire to retain for his assistance General Rousseau, and he was authorized to employ those three or any others as counsel that he chose, and consult with them upon the subject, and report to the President and Cabinet upon these questions. Considerable time elapsed before any report was made. My impression is that I was informed that there was a consultation in New York between these counsel upon the subject. At all events, Mr. Speed made a report, in which he gave it as the opinion of himself and his associates that Davis ought to be tried by a civil tribunal. There had been discussions, and different places were named, as to where he was to be tried with best prospect of a fair trial—whether it should be in Virginia, in East Tennessee, in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere. Mr. Speed, I recollect, was of opinion himself that he could get a fair trial in Kentucky. On his report coming in and being considered by the Cabinet, a vote was taken as to what tribunal he should be tried before. I voted for the report, believing that Davis ought not to be tried before any tribunal whose jurisdiction was seriously questioned or disputed, but that he should be tried in such a manner as should be most satisfactory to the national sense of justice. I voted for his trial before a civil tribunal, if a fair trial could be had. The matter was then, according to my recollection, referred back to Mr. Speed for such action as he might think proper for the purpose of bringing on the trial. The subject was occasionally mentioned in Cabinet, but no action was taken or reported by Mr. Speed, that I have any recollection of, during his continuance in office. In answer to calls from Congress I made two reports, I think, to the President, or two to Congress, which were transmitted to Congress, as to the circumstances under which Mr. Davis was held. They will probably be found among the public documents. Some time last fall, I should think it was, the subject was again brought up, and some correspondence was had between the President and the Chief Justice, which appeared in the public papers at the time, in regard to the holding court in Virginia, or the trial of Mr. Davis. I think, but I am not certain, that this correspondence was transmitted to Congress. From the period that it was determined Davis should be brought to trial before a civil tribunal, I was anxious to be relieved from his military custody. My recollection is that there was some correspondence with the Attorney General and District Attorney, in which the District Attorney thought Mr. Davis could be more comfortably provided for at Fortress Monroe than he possibly could be by being taken to Richmond. That is the only reason, I think, why he was suffered to remain at Fortress Monroe. The matter continued undisposed of until the recent action of Judge Underwood in granting the writ of habeas corpus.

Q. Did the consultation to which you refer have any reference to a trial for any other crime than that of treason—or, in other words, to his alleged complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln?

A. The conversations and reference to Mr. Speed related to the whole subject of Mr. Davis's liability to the laws of the United States for any crime. It was left him to determine for what crimes he should be arraigned and brought to trial.

Q. Do you know whether, after the report of the Attorney General, any direction was given to him or his subordinates, upon the part of the Executive, for the purpose of bringing him to trial?

A. I do not know anything that passed between him and the Executive.

Q. Have you a recollection of a despatch of General Baird, of New Orleans, on the 28th of July, 1866?

A. I recollect that despatch; I cannot now recollect the date. It will appear in the report of the committee on the New Orleans riot.

Q. Referring to the despatch of the 28th of July, by General Baird, I ask you whether that despatch, on its recept, was communicated?

A. I received that despatch on Sunday forenoon. I examined it carefully and considered the question presented. I did not see that I could give any instructions different from the line of action which General Baird proposed, and made no answer to the despatch.

Q. I see it is stated that this was received at 10.20 p.m. Was that the hour at which it was received by you?

A. That is the date of its reception in the telegraph office, Saturday night. I received it on Sunday forenoon, at my residence. A copy of the despatch was furnished to the President several days afterwards, along with all the other despatches and communications on that subject, but it was not furnished by me before that time. I suppose it may have been ten or fifteen days afterwards.

Q. The President himself being in correspondence with those parties upon the same subject, would it not have been proper to have advised him of the reception of that despatch?

A. I know nothing about his correspondence, and know nothing about any correspondence except this one despatch. We had intelligence of the riot on Thursday morning. The riot had taken place on Monday. The despatch to which you refer is in these words:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., July 28, 1866.

To Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

"A convention has been called with the sanction of Governor Wells, to meet here on Monday. The Lieutenant Governor and city authorities think it unlawful, and propose to break it up by arresting the delegates. I have given no orders on the subject, but have warned the parties that I could not countenance or permit such action without instructions to that effect from the President.

Please instruct me at once by telegraph.

A. BAIRD, Brevet Major General.

Q. You recollect, I suppose, that there was complaint made by General Sheridan that a part of one of those despatches was suppressed. Do you recollect what despatch that was?

A. I think the despatch of August 1, found on page 9 of this report.

Q. Did you mark, or can you recollect now, what part was suppressed?

A. I cannot now with certainty say. I only remember to have read the despatch, and to have seen a discrepancy in it, as first published and as published afterwards.

Q. Do you recollect how it got to the public?

A. I have no knowledge upon that subject. The despatch was given by me to the President as it was received from General Sheridan. As to how or by whose authority the newspaper despatch was published I have no knowledge. I know it was not by me, or by my sanction or knowledge.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Recurring to the subject of these appointments, do you remember that in one of the Cabinet consultations in relation to appointments, and in relation to the test oath, Mr. McCulloch expressed a purpose to the President or any of his advisers to appoint revenue officers who could not take the test oath, unless in a modified form?

A. I cannot; I could not undertake to recall what any member of the Cabinet said about it.

Q. If you remember any dissent expressed by the President, you may state it.

A. I do not recollect whether he expressed any dissent or not. I do not recollect about it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that the course agreed in by the Cabinet?

A. I cannot say anything about that. I do not know whether it was or was not. I have no recollection of any Cabinet vote on the question. I expressed no dissent, that I recollect. I was called on by a letter from the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee to furnish to the Committee certified copies of all military orders setting aside rebel State governments or prohibiting officers from discharging their duties. In answer, I have to state that all the rebel authorities were overthrown, as I understood it, by the war and by the capture of their States. I do not know of any military orders other than those relating to the prosecution of the war, from time to time, setting them aside. There were one or two instances of orders, perhaps more, after the President's proclamation for reconstruction, prohibiting certain individuals from exercising functions under the reconstructed government. One of these cases, I think, was at Richmond—I have not been able to recall the name of the party or the circumstances—in which General Terry gave such an order. One was in the case of Raphael Semmes, who, being an unpardoned rebel on parole, was elected probate judge at Mobile, and the inquiry was made by the military commander of the department, or district—which I cannot tell certainly now—as to whether he should be permitted to exercise the functions of that office. I instructed him that Semmes should not be permitted to exercise that function while he was an unpardoned rebel. These papers we have, and will furnish them to the Committee. I cannot now remember any other questions. It is possible there may have been others.

The Committee also desire copies of papers and all correspondence relative to what was called the Johnston-Sherman arrangement and treaty, and a copy of the arrangement itself. I have these papers now here, but not entirely complete, and will, as soon as copies have been made of all of them, furnish them entire to the Committee.

I am also requested to furnish to the Committee copies of all despatches sent by the President relative to the action of the Tennessee legislature in regard to the Constitutional amendment, and to the members of that body, relative to the same. I have no knowledge of any such despatches, and have never seen any. Indeed, I do not know who the members of the legislature of Tennessee were, and, unless I had some clue to their names, I could not tell whether despatches were sent to them or not. I have no knowledge of any despatches sent by the President on that subject.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. I have an impression that there were some cases in which Governors elect, under the President's plan, were prohibited from entering upon the duties of their office; and also of other orders setting aside enactments of legislatures convened in pursuance of that plan; and of others suppressing the press in those States. Have you any such orders in your department?

A. None that I know of. All that business is is managed through the State Department. There was never any such order made through my department at all, of which I have any knowledge.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. From publications made during the progress of the war, and subsequently to the surrender of the rebel armies, there appear to have been orders as follows: On May 21, 1865, an order by Major General Canby to Major General Warren, commanding the district of Mississippi, directing and warning him not to recognize any officer of the confederate or a State government within the limits of his command; and a similar order of May 14, 1865, by General Gilmore, annulling the proclamation of Governor Brown, of Georgia, calling an extra meeting of the legislature; and a similar order from Major General Gilmore, of May 14, 1865, annulling the acts of Governor Magrath, of South Carolina; also, an order sent by President Lincoln, April 12, 1865, to General Weitzel, commanding at Richmond, prohibiting the meeting of the rebel legislature. Will you furnish to the Committee these and similar orders, if any?

A. I do not know whether these orders are on file at the War Department; but, if they cannot be obtained there, I will endeavor to procure them from the respective headquarters from whence they were issued. The order of Mr. Lincoln, of April 12, is on file in the War Department, and was the last order he ever made, of which I have any knowledge. It was made the last time he was in the War Department. The circumstances relating to that order, and which probably led to the other orders, were these: Immediately after the capture of Richmond, Mr. Lincoln went to that city, and some intercourse took place between him and Judge Campbell, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States, and General Weitzel, which resulted in the call of the rebel legislature to Richmond. Mr. Lincoln, on his return from Richmond to Washington, reconsidered that matter. The policy of undertaking to restore the government through the medium of rebel organizations was very much opposed by many persons, and very strongly and vehemently opposed by me. I had several very earnest conversations with Mr. Lincoln upon the subject, and advised that any effort to reorganize the government should be under the federal authority solely, and to treat the rebel organizations and governments as absolutely null and void. On the day preceding his death a conversation took place between him, the Attorney General, and myself, upon the subject at the Executive mansion. An hour or two afterwards, and about the middle of the afternoon, Mr. Lincoln came over to the War Department and renewed the conversation. After I had repeated my reasons against allowing the rebel legislatures to assemble, or the rebel authorities to have any participation whatever in the business of reorganization, he sat down at my desk, took a piece of paper and wrote a telegram to General Weitzel, and handed it to me. "There," said he, "I think that will suit you." I told him no, it did not go quite far enough; that the members of the rebel legislature would probably come to Richmond; that General Weitzel ought to be directed to prohibit their assembling. He took up his pen again and made that addition to his telegram, and signed it. He handed it to me. I said that, I thought, was exactly right. It was transmitted immediately to General Weitzel, and was the last act that was ever performed by Mr. Lincoln in the War Department. Some of the other rebel States, after the surrender of the armies of the rebel government, called together their legislatures, and, either pursuant to instructions from the War Department, or pursuing, on their own motion, the policy which was indicated by the order of the President to General Weitzel, the commandants prohibited the assembling of those bodies.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Was there any conference or consultation to your knowledge between President Johnson and any member of his Cabinet as to the policy of convening Congress after the surrender of Lee's armies?

A. I do not recollect of any; I cannot affirm that there was or was not. I do not remember any conversation upon that subject.

Q. Did any one of the Cabinet express a doubt of the power of the executive branch of the government to reorganize state governments which had been in rebellion without the aid of Congress?

A. None whatever. I had myself entertained no doubt of the authority of the President to take measures for the organization of the rebel States on the plan proposed during the vacation of Congress, and agreed in the plan specified in the proclamation in the case of North Carolina. It may be proper to add, in regard to the history of this subject, that on the day succeeding the date of the telegram to General Weitzel, and on the last day of Mr. Lincoln's life, there was a Cabinet meeting, at which General Grant and all the members of the Cabinet except Mr. Seward were present. General Grant at that time made a report of the condition of the country as he conceived it to be, and as it would be on the surrender of Johnston's army, which was regarded as absolutely certain. The subject of reconstruction was talked of at considerable length. Shortly previous to that time I had myself, with a view of putting in a practicable form the means of overcoming what seemed to be a difficulty in the mind of Mr. Lincoln as to the mode of reconstruction, prepared a rough draft of a form or mode by which the authority and laws of the United States should be re-established and governments reorganized in the rebel States under the federal authority, without any necessity whatever for the intervention of rebel organizations or rebel aid. In the course of that consultation Mr. Lincoln alluded to the paper, went into his room, brought it out, and asked me to read it, which I did, and explained my ideas in regard to it. There was one point which I had left open; that was as to who should constitute the electors in the respective States. That I supposed to be the only important point upon which a difference of opinion could arise—whether the blacks should have suffrage in the States, or whether it should be confined for the purposes of reorganization to those who had exercised it under the former State laws. I left a blank upon that subject to be considered. There was at that time nothing adopted about it and no opinions expressed; it was only a project. I was requested by the other members of the Cabinet, and by Mr. Lincoln, to have a copy printed for each member for subsequent consideration. My object was simply to bring to the attention of the President and Cabinet, in a practical form, what I thought might be possible means of organization without rebel intervention. Mr. Lincoln seemed to be laboring under the impression that there must be some starting point in the reorganization, and that it could only be through the agency of the rebel organizations then existing, but which I did not deem to be at all necessary. That night Mr. Lincoln was murdered. Subsequently, at an early day, the subject came under consideration, after the surrender of Johnston's army, in the Cabinet of Mr. Johnson. The project I had prepared was printed, and a copy in the hands of each member of the Cabinet and the President. It was somewhat altered in some particulars, and came under discussion in the Cabinet, the principal point of discussion being as to who should exercise the elective franchise. I think there was a difference of opinion in the Cabinet upon that subject. The President expressed his views very clearly and distinctly. I expressed my views, and other members of the Cabinet expressed their views. The objections of the President to throwing the franchise open to the colored people appeared to be fixed, and I think every member of the Cabinet assented to the arrangement as it was specified in the proclamation relative to North Carolina. After that I do not remember that the subject was ever again discussed in the Cabinet.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. In this connection be good enough to state who prepared that proclamation.

A. I do not know who prepared it.

Q. Was it submitted by the President to the Cabinet?

A. Yes, sir. The project I had was different in this respect—that mine was in the form of an order. I proposed as an order, "Ordered" so and so. The President modified it by certain recitals which I thought an improvement, and it emanated from the State Department.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Do the Committee understand that in your project you provided that all loyal male citizens twenty-one years of age should vote, and all disloyal persons should be excluded, or how otherwise?

A. My own position was in favor of that; the plan I proposed left it in the alternative. I stated it both ways, considering it a question on which there would be difference of opinion. How it was printed I do not now remember.

Q. Did Mr. Lincoln ever see the printed copy?

A. No; the manuscript of it was only given to him the last day of his life. He produced the paper and asked me to read it and explain it to the members of the Cabinet. That night he was murdered.

Q. The North Carolina proclamation excluded the colored people from suffrage did it not?

A. That is my recollection of it.

Q. And permitted a portion of those who had been in rebellion to vote?

A. The proclamation itself will show that.

Q. Did Mr. Lincoln express any opinion in regard to your project upon the point of suffrage?

A. No, sir; I think there was no opinion expressed by anybody. I do not think I myself expressed an opinion; I only stated the question. I had only prepared it as a project for discussion. My principal object was to convince the President that there was no necessity for what he thought should be the starting point—that the first measures taken should be sanctioned by the rebel legislatures.

Q. As I understand the form of your draft, it was that of a military order?

A. It was in the form of an executive order.

Q. Was it a military order, or not?

A. That was a question I had not myself determined—from what department it should issue; whether it should issue from the military department or from the State Department. The only change in form that I remember is the recital which prefaces the North Carolina proclamation.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Had any States been organized or been in process of organization before this?

A. In Louisiana, in Tennessee, and in Arkansas there had been organizations.

Q. How did the plan proposed before differ from that?

A. I never knew, and am unable to state now what the plan of organization for Louisiana was. It was a matter managed by Mr. Lincoln. In Arkansas I do not know what the plan was; and the plan in Tennessee was under the direction of Governor Johnson, the details of which I cannot undertake to say.

Q. Are you aware of the difference in any of these plans adopted from that which was adopted in regard to North Carolina?

A. As I do not know what they were, I cannot say whether they were different, or whether they were the same. I do not know exactly what the plan of organization for Louisiana was, and I do not know whether there was any plan, or how it grew up. There has always been a dispute about that, I believe. I took no part in these organization measures, and I have not a distinct recollection either in respect to Louisiana, Arkansas, or Tennessee, as to the system or plan on which they were organized.

Q. Were you not consulted in regard to these matters by Mr. Lincoln?

A. No, sir; not that I know of. I made an appeal to him not to require me to look into matters outside of my own department unless it was absolutely essential. My time was all occupied in carrying on the war, and I had no opportunity or occasion to busy myself about matters not coming specially under my charge.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. After the surrender of Lee's army and the virtual suppression of the rebellion, what was Mr. Lincoln's plan for the reorganization and restoration of these States as far as it was developed by his conversation?

A. I do not think that I can state. There are some papers, some correspondence, I believe, between him and General Weitzel, in regard to it, but I cannot, without reference to these papers, state precisely what it was. All I know is, that it included an organization preliminarily through the medium of rebel legislatures. How they were to assemble, or what they were to do, as he had it in mind at that time, I do not remember.

Q. The organization was to be through that medium?

A. That was the claim; I think Mr. Lincoln insisted that he had never given authority to that extent.

Q. I am not asking what his authority was, but what his plan was?

A. That we did not discuss. I do not know that he had himself matured any plan.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You state that there was difference of opinion between you and Mr. Lincoln?

A. That was in regard to the preliminary steps for an organization.

Q. And Mr. Lincoln's idea was to act through the rebel legislatures?

A. That was the impression I derived from him.

Q. You understood that the rebel legislature of Virginia was to assemble in pursuance of the encouragement or advice which he had given?

A. He denied that he had given authority to that extent I think that his permission was simply that it might assemble, and revoke all their laws and all their ordinances of disunion; nothing beyond that. In other words, they might undo all that they had done hostile to the government, but I do not think he contemplated anything beyond that. I thought it ought to be placed on the ground of overthrow by the power of the United States; that their troops had been conquered, and their authority overthrown by the authority of the United States and by the war.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. You say you do not think Mr. Lincoln had finally matured any plan which he had determined positively to carry out at the time of his death?

A. When I say that, I mean he never expressed any to me. He made a speech a day or two before his death, but I do not remember whether he indicated anything as to a plan of organization. In his conversation with me he did not detail any plan.

Q. I will ask you whether it did not seem to be his conviction up to the last that it was necessary to commence this restoration or organization by assembling the rebel legislature?

A. No, sir; after consultation on that subject he was satisfied that the rebel legislature of Virginia ought not to assemble.

Q. You think, from his conversation with you, and his order prohibiting the rebel legislature of Virginia to assemble, that he abandoned that idea?

A. Entirely, if he entertained it. I do not think his conversation with me suggested it, or that he entertained it, except to undo what had been done. I think that the conclusion stated in his telegram to General Weitzel, not to permit the rebel legislature of Virginia to assemble, indicated his intention not to use the rebel organization in any form whatever.

Q. You think it was not intended as a temporary suspension of that plan, but that it was a revocation and abandonment of it?

A. I do not think it was the abandonment of any plan, for I do not know that he had any such plan, except to accomplish a temporary organization and to permit them to revoke certain things they had done, such as their ordinance of secession and the laws passed by them hostile to the United States.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was it not his plan that that action being taken by the rebel legislature of Virginia, recognized by the rebel citizens of Virginia as legal authority, it would induce the rebel soldiers still in arms to retire from the rebel army?

A. This call of the rebel legislature of Virginia was made before any rebel army had been withdrawn from the field except that of Lee. Johnston still remained in the field; Kirby Smith and his army remained in the field; and a very large force at different points in the South still remained in the field in hostility to the United States. Mr. Lincoln expected that a recall by the legislature of their troops would prevent the protraction of the war, and that he explained as the only motive or inducement in his mind by which the assembling of that legislature could be justified at all; that it would tend to shorten or prevent the protraction of the war.

Q. It looked, then, rather to the putting an end to the war than to reconstruction?

A. It was a measure looking to the withdrawal of rebel troops, and to that extent to reconstruction.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Did Mr. Lincoln during his administration ever submit to his Cabinet any plan for the reorganization of the rebel States, or did the Cabinet ever agree upon any plan of reorganization?

A. Not to my knowledge.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. The Cabinet did agree unanimously, as I understood you to say, on the North Carolina proclamation?

A. Yes, sir; that is, Mr. Johnson's proclamation; and when I say unanimous I mean all who were present. I wish to say this: that I do not desire here to state what other people agreed to; that is what I agreed to, and I do not know of any dissent by any member of the Cabinet.

Q. That was a plan of reorganization, was it not?

A. Yes, sir; strictly a plan of reorganization. The war was then over.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. I ask you whether, from the time of the surrender of Lee's army to the time of his death, Mr. Lincoln did not give a great deal of his mind and thought and express a great anxiety about the adoption of some plan for the reorganization of those States?

A. I cannot say as to that. Mr. Lincoln was alive only a few days after the surrender of Lee's army. The news reached here on Sunday night, and was communicated to him by me about the hour of ten o'clock that night. He was killed on the Friday night following. The only times I saw him during that period, various subjects were discussed in regard to the reduction of the forces and the general affairs of the government, and in reference to the assembling of the Virginia legislature. His mind appeared to be devoted to the general interests of the country in adapting the operations of the government to the new condition of things which then existed, and which were to be apprehended as soon at hand. I cannot say how much time he devoted to the consideration of the subject.

Q. How did you get the impression that Mr. Lincoln had a conviction upon his mind that it would be necessary to use the existing governments in the rebel States as a basis of reorganization?

A. I think it is too strongly stated to say that he had any such conviction on his mind. In his conversations with me it seemed to me that while at Richmond, in conversation with Judge Campbell, he had received an impression that these organizations might be advantageously used for reorganization to some extent as well as for the suspension of hostilities, and to prevent the protraction of the war. This is my impression derived from him in conversation.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. I understood you to say that when you held a conversation with him and the Attorney General upon the subject you vehemently opposed him?

A. If I did I stated incorrectly. I vehemently opposed that view of the question. I opposed making any use of the rebel legislatures. I do not think in that conversation he himself presented any view; I think he only listened.

Q. He presented the subject?

A. No; I think I presented the subject. I think he only listened to the discussions that took place.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. You stated that you prepared a rough draft of an order upon the subject of reorganization, and that it was not determined whether it should issue from the War Department or from the State Department. Will you state whether the orders which issue from the State Department are regarded as belonging to the civil administration of the government, and those from the War Department as belonging to the military administration of the government?

A. I cannot say how the people regarded them.

Q. How are they regarded by the Cabinet?

A. I believe Mr. Seward at one period of the war, prior to my becoming Secretary of War, exercised some considerable military power. I consider myself, as Secretary of War, as in charge of the military department, and Mr. Seward in charge of the civil department.

Q. In executive document No. 6, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, there is a telegram under date of July 24, 1865, from the State Department to provisional Governor Sharkey, in which it is said that the government of the State will be provisional only, until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress. On page 205 of the same document there is a telegram from the State Department to provisional Governor Marvin, of Florida, in which it is said that it must be distinctly understood that the restoration to which his proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress. Will you state whether the opinions expressed in these telegrams were approved by the Cabinet, and whether they expressed the opinions which have been entertained by the Cabinet in relation to the work of reorganization?

A. I do not know anything about these telegrams, and never saw them until I saw them in public prints. I do not know by whom they were approved.

Q. You have expressed an opinion as to the power to issue proclamations for reorganization. Do you mean by the opinion you have expressed to include any opinion as to the final legality of the organizations to be accomplished under such plan of reorganization; in other words, whether that reorganization would be final and conclusive, and that Congress would have no right to regulate and control it?

A. My opinion upon that point is only the opinion of an individual citizen. My opinion is, that the whole subject of reconstruction, and the relation of a State to the federal government is subject to the controlling power of Congress; and while I believe that the President and his Cabinet were not violating any law, but were faithfully performing their duty in endeavoring to organize provisional governments in those States, I supposed then, and still suppose, that the final validity of such organizations would rest with the law-making power of the government. That, however, as I said, is but the opinion of an individual.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE?

Q. Do you mean to be understood that the question of legality of your acts in the past are to be determined by Congress, or does that belong to the courts?

A. I think it has got to be determined by Congress, and is properly determined by them. What the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court may be over the political power of Congress is a question upon which I do not feel called upon to swear.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Can you state whether the North Carolina proclamation was adopted in the shape in which it was presented by the President, or whether it was modified in any way?

A. I do not know of any modification. There could not have been any material modification without my observing it.

Q. Then that is the project which came from the President originally?

A. Yes, sir; that is my recollection.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q Have you any official knowledge, and if so, what, of the pardon of one Kohnstamm, who was sent to Sing Sing, New York, under conviction upon the charge of fraud against the government?

A. I have read in the newspapers that Kohnstamm had been pardoned and been released. I do not know it officially. I do know officially that several applications were made within the last year, all of which I opposed. They were very strongly recommended by very excellent men, good citizens. They succeeded and I was defeated.

Q. When you say you opposed the application, do you mean in Cabinet meeting, or to the President, or both?

A. To both. I have understood from some source that his pardon was determined on in Cabinet. If that was so, I was not present at the time.

Q. How recently was the subject considered in the Cabinet in your presence?

A. Two or three months ago; I do not remember the exact date.

Q. Did you at any time state, in the presence of the President, the reason you had for opposing the pardon of Kohnstamm?

A. I did.

Q. Substantially what reasons were presented?

A. I stated that I regarded Kohnstamm as a great malefactor, who had organized a system of fraud against the government with deliberation and great ability, by means of which it had been plundered of large sums; that he had been tried before a learned judge, defended by able counsel, and was fairly convicted; that I could not perceive any circumstances of mitigation whatever that would operate on my mind in his favor. Strong circumstances were urged, however, by those who advocated the pardon, as for instance his ill-health, his long imprisonment, his threatened insanity, and other arguments of like character.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Was it urged that he paid any considerable portion of the sums charged as having been obtained by him fraudulently?

A. This was before the sums were paid. I do not remember that the matter came up in my presence after the judgment was paid. It was urged, however, by his friends that a large sum of the money lost had been paid back, I believe.

Q. Did you make any statement to the President as to the number of indictments, and the extent to which the government had suffered by Kohnstamm's frauds, and detail to him the means by which the frauds had been perpetrated?

A. No. I do not think I ever knew the number of indictments that were found against him. The extent of the frauds was variously estimated. It was urged on his behalf that he was a man of education, wealth, and good repute before his conviction, which I thought was rather an aggravation of the offence than a mitigation.

By Mr. MARSHALL:

Q. Do you know upon whose recommendations the pardon was granted?

A. I do not know. I do know that a number of the members of the bar and persons occupying high positions in society recommended it.

Q. Do you recollect whether Governor Fenton did?

A. I have seen in the newspapers that Governor Fenton recommended it. I do not remember seeing the name among the papers.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Is it the usual practice of the President to take the advice of members of the Cabinet in the exercise of his function of the pardoning power?

A. He often consults me in cases pertaining to my department. I do not know how it is with the other members of the Cabinet. I suppose he does in cases pertaining to theirs. I know the President showed a great deal of hesitation for a long time in this case. This matter was pressed upon him long before the pardon was granted.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Were the frauds committed by Kohnstamm upon the War Department?

A. Yes, sir; I made a representation on that account, and probably by his invitation.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. In your examination before this committee some time about the first of April, the subject of the pardon and restoration of quite a number of soldiers from West Virginia was under examination, and a letter was inquired for as having been written by Mr. Andrews to the President. Have you made examination for that letter since?

A. Yes, sir; I think it was never sent to the department; I have no recollection that way.

Q. No such letter is to be found on the files of the department?

A. No, sir; I think it never came to the department; I examined the files myself, and it could not be found among them.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is it customary in such cases for all the papers to be filed in the department?

A. Yes, sir; such as are transmitted for its action, and these papers were taken and sent down to the Adjutant General at the time. There is no reason why it should have been withdrawn at all.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. When the President refers an application of that sort to you, does he send all the papers along?

A. I cannot say what papers the President sent; I know what papers I received.

Q. What is the general custom in that respect when the President refers a case to the department for action?

A. I should consider that he only desired my action upon the papers he sent to me. I should never think of inquiring whether he had other papers in the case or not.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. You were also inquired of at that time in reference to a memorandum book found upon the body of Booth. How long did you retain that book in your hands after it was presented to you?

A. I should suppose half or three-quarters of an hour.

Q. Did you retain it sufficiently long to examine it carefully?

A. I did examine it carefully, and read every word that was written in every page in it.

Q. Was your attention called at the time to leaves being torn from the book?

A. I noticed the fact that leaves had been torn from the book?

Q. Did you count the number of them?

A. I think I did.

Q. Do you recollect what number was absent?

A. I do not now recollect the number. I should say somewhere from fifteen to twenty.

Q. Do you recollect distinctly who presented to you that book?

A. Two persons came together—Baker and an officer, who I think now was Lieutenant Colonel Conger. I do not remember whether the book was given to me by Colonel Conger or General Baker. I know they came together to my house, and that the book was handed to me by one of them.

Q. Have you conversed with Colonel Conger since your examination?

A. I have not seen him.

Q. Have you been informed what he testified to?

A. No, sir; though I have heard through Judge Holt or somebody else that Conger had stated that he brought them here and handed them to me. I think I may have heard that fact, and that, probably, it was as stated.

Q. Do you know anything of an article spoken of by Booth in that memorandum book as having been left for publication in the Intelligencer?

A. I know nothing about such an article.

Q. Has no such article been presented to you?

A. None. I never heard of the article except the mention of it that is made in the memorandum book.

Q. Did you see Booth's body after his death?

A. I do not know that I ever saw him, alive or dead.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that Booth is not dead?

A. None whatever. I had a board to inspect and examine his body when it was on the iron-clad, consisting of the Surgeon General and some officers whose names I cannot now mention. Dr. May, who knew Booth personally, was also with the board. They reported that it was the body of J. Wilkes Booth.

Q. Was Dr. May a member of the board?

A. Dr. May was not on the board, but he was examined by the board. I believe that that was the body of Booth, upon the testimony as given at the time, as certainly as I believe I am now in existence.

Q. What was done with the body of Booth?

A. I did not see him interred. I gave directions that he should be interred on the premises of the Ordnance Department; and the officer to whom I gave the directions reported that he was so interred.

Q. Did you give directions as to the particular manner in which he should be interred.

A. I gave directions that he should be interred in that place, and that the place should be kept under lock and key.

Q. What was the occasion of mystery about his burial?

A. I do not know that there was any mystery about it other than this: I thought the body should be interred, so that if there was any disposition to do so, the body might not be made the subject of glorification by disloyal persons and those sympathizing with the rebellion. I thought it would be a source of irritation to the loyal people of the country if his body was permitted to be made the instrument of rejoicing at the sacrifice of Mr. Lincoln; and that it would help to keep up the feeling of excitement and animosity on the part of those who sympathized, if they did not participate, with him in the act of Mr. Lincoln's murder.

Q. There was nothing about the identity of Booth that entered into your consideration in making the burial a secret?

A. Nothing whatever. It was done simply and solely for the purpose of preventing him from being made the subject of rebel rejoicing.

Q. Who were the officers that buried him?

A. The officer in charge, to whom I gave my directions, was Colonel Benton, of the Ordnance Bureau.

Q. Did he report to you?

A. He reported that he had buried him.

Q. Do you know who else besides Colonel Benton were employed?

A. He employed some persons in his department. I was not present, and do not know who was present. He reported that he had acted in accordance with my orders.

Q. Was there anything buried with the body of Booth?

A. Nothing whatever, so far as I have any knowledge. Colonel Benton can tell.

Q. Was there any purpose in so burying the body of Booth that no history could ever give an account of the spot where he was buried?

A. None whatever. The only object was to place his body where it could not be made an improper use of until the excitement had passed away, and then, I supposed, at the proper time, it would be given to his friends.

Q. There was a rumor published in the papers that he was dropped into the sea.

A. That was a story gotten up for sensation. There was not a particle of truth in it.

Q. You did not cause it to be given out?

A. Certainly not. I was disgusted with it.

Q. Is there any record in the department of the place where he was buried which could remain as a historical record of the place?

A. I do not know whether there is or not. I know, verbally, that the place of burial is in a vault which is under lock and key ever since.

Q. Is there anything which would preserve an evidence of the place in the department?

A. I think very likely there is; I cannot tell positively whether there is or not. I do not remember what reports were made on the subject.

Q. Were the remains applied for by his relatives?

A. I do not think his remains have been applied for. The remains of Mrs.

Surratt have been applied for, and I think the remains of one or two of the others have been.

Q. Did not Edwin Booth apply for the remains of his brother?

A. I do not know; it is very possible he may have done so; if he did, it is very probable that he received the assurance that at the proper time it would be delivered to him.

GENERAL ORDERS No. 63.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
Hilton Head, South Carolina, May 15, 1865.

I. The proclamation of A. G. Magrath, styling himself Governor of South Carolina, dated at headquarters, Columbia, South Carolina, May 2, 1865, declaring that all subsistence stores and the property of the Confederate States within the limits of the State should be turned over and accounted for by the agents of the State appointed for that purpose, and directing that the subsistence and other stores shall be used for the relief of the people of the State; and the proclamation of Joseph E. Brown, styling himself Governor of Georgia, dated at the capital of the State, on the 3d day of May, 1865, requiring the officers and members of the general assembly to meet in extraordinary session at the capitol, in Milledgeville, on Monday, the 22d day of May, 1865; and the proclamation of A. K. Allison, styling himself acting Governor of Florida, dated at Tallahassee, on the 8th day of April, 1865, giving notice and direction that an election will be held on Wednesday, the 7th day of June, 1865, for Governor of the State of Florida, are, each and all of them, declared null and void, it having become known to me, from trustworthy information, that the aforesaid A. G. Magrath, Joseph E. Brown, and A. K. Allison are disloyal to the United States, having committed sundry and divers acts of treason against the same, in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

The persons and peoples to whom the proclamations herein above referred to have been respectively addressed are, therefore, enjoined and commanded to give no heed whatever thereto, or to any orders, proclamations, commissions, or commands emanating from persons claiming the right to exercise the functions and authority of Governor in either of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, or Florida, unless the same shall have been promulgated by the advice or consent of the United States authorities.

II. The policy and wishes of the general government towards the people of these States, and the method which should be pursued by them in resuming or assuming the exercise of their political rights, will doubtless be made known at an early day.

It is deemed sufficient, meanwhile, to announce that the people of the black race are free citizens of the United States; that it is the fixed intention of a wise and beneficent government to protect them in the enjoyment of their freedom and the fruits of their industry, and that it is the manifest and binding duty of all citizens, whites as well as blacks, to make such arrangements among themselves, for compensated labor, as shall be mutually advantageous to all parties. Neither idleness nor vagrancy will be tolerated, and the government will not extend pecuniary aid to any persons, whether white or black, who are unwilling to help themselves.

III. District and post commmanders throughout this department will at once cause this order to be circulated far and wide by special couriers or otherwise, and will take such steps to secure its enforcement as may by them be deemed necessary.

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Major General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY AND DIVISION OF WEST MISSISSIPPI,
Mobile, Alabama, May 20, 1865.

By direction of the President you will not recognize any officer of the confederate or State governments within the limits of your command as authorized to exercise in any manner whatever the functions of their late offices. You will prevent by force, if necessary, any attempt on the part of the legislature of any of the States in insurrection to assemble for legislative purposes, and you will arrest and imprison any member or other person who may attempt to exercise these functions in opposition to your orders, reporting your action through these headquarters for the information of the President. The civil officers of the confederate and State governments are not included in the capitulation of the military forces, but in notifying them that military commanders have no authority to entertain any question touching political relations of the seceded States to the general government or the status of citizens, I have advised them to return to their posts, taking with them the archives and other property in their charge, and to report to the military authorities to await the action of the government in their cases. When this is done in good faith, you can allow them to remain at their houses without molestation by the military authorities, so long as they conduct themselves with propriety, and there is no attempt to evade the legal responsibilities they have incurred. This, of course, does not include the high officers of the confederate or State governments. It is of great importance to the government and to the people that all judicial, law and other records affecting the title to property and other private interests should be secured and preserved, and you will spare no exertions to get possession of them.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF LOUISIANA,
New Orleans, Louisiana, March 18, 1866.

It appearing that John T. Monroe and James O. Nixon, who received, respectively, at the late municipal election a majority of votes for the offices of mayor and alderman, may come within the classes of exceptions mentioned in the President's proclamation of amnesty, neither having received a special pardon, they are suspended from the exercise of any of the functions of those offices until their cases can be investigated, and the pleasure of the President be made known; but they will be allowed to take the oath of office, and the mayor elect will be allowed to administer the usual oath to the persons elected.

The remaining persons elected will, upon complying with the requirements of the constitution and laws of the State, be inducted into office, and the municipal government of the city as thus constituted, and with the two exceptions above mentioned, is declared to be organized and in full force and vigor.

Hon. JOHN T. MONROE, Mayor of New Orleans, Louisiana:

SIR: You have been suspended from the exercise of the functions of the office to which you have been elected, upon the following charges:

1. For a violation of the laws of war in inciting, by incendiary letters, speeches, and proclamations, the populace of New Orleans to acts of violence and resistance to the authorities of the United States, after the defence of that city had been abandoned by the confederate army, to which it had been entrusted. This in April and May, 1862, while in exercise of the office of mayor of the city of New Orleans.

2. That by declining the amnesty, and refusing to take the oath of allegiance offered by the Commander of the Gulf, you have voluntarily brought yourself under the tenth (10th) exception to the President's proclamation of May 29, 1865.

The evidence in support of these charges will be forwarded to the War Department for the information of his Excellency the President, and if you desire it I will forward at the same time any evidence or statement that you may wish to make in relation thereto.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1865.

Major General WEITZEL, Richmond, Virginia:

I have just seen Judge Campbell's letter to you of the 7th. He assumes, as appears to me, that I have called the insurgent legislature of Virginia together, as the rightful legislature of the State, to settle all differences with the United States I have done no such thing. I spoke of them not as a legislature, but as "the gentlemen who have acted as the legislature of Virginia in support of the rebellion." I did this on purpose, to exclude the assumption that I was recognizing them as a rightful body. I dealt with them as men having power de facto to do a specific thing, to wit, "to withdraw the Virginia troops and other support from resistance to the general government," for which, in the paper handed Judge Campbell, I promised a specific equivalent, to wit, a remission to the people of the State, except in certain cases, of the confiscation of their property. I meant this, and no more. Inasmuch, however, as Judge Campbell misconstrues this, and is still pressing for an armistice, contrary to the explicit statement of the paper I gave him, and particularly as General Grant has since captured the Virginia troops, so that giving a consideration for their withdrawal is no longer applicable, let my letter to you, and the paper to Judge Campbell, both be withdrawn or countermanded, and he be notified of it.

Do not allow them to assemble; but, if any have come, allow them safe return to their homes.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 18, 1867.

Brigadier General HENRY S. BURTON sworn and examined.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Be good enough to state whether you were the officer in charge of Jefferson Davis at Fortress Monroe.

A. I have been during the last eight months.

Q. You made a return of the writ of habeas corpus issued by the district court of the eastern district of Virginia; be good enough to state if you had any instructions under which you made that return.

A. I had.

Q. State from whom those instructions were received.

A. They were by order of the President of the United States, coming through the War Department, signed by an assistant Adjutant General of the army.

Q. Had you any special instructions in regard to the form of return?

A. No, sir, I had not.

Q. Had you any instructions or advice in regard to any other charge upon which he was held, except that of treason?

A. I had not.

Q. Did you prepare the return yourself?

A. I did; but at the same time it is proper to say that I had the assistance, in preparing the legal document, of United States District Attorney Chandler.

Q. In your conversation with the district attorney, was there anything said in regard to the fact of Davis being held as a military prisoner by virtue of his capture under the proclamation of the President?

A. No, sir; it was simply upon the fact that he was held by military authority.

Q. Was there anything said in regard to the necessity of returning to the court the causes of detention or the charges upon which he was held by you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you return anything of that sort?

A. No, sir; I returned that I held him by a military order—nothing further.

Q. Was that by the advice of the district attorney with whom you consulted?

A. Yes, sir; I had never received any instructions as regards his detention other than that I was to confine him as a military prisoner in Fort Monroe.

Q. There was nothing in the shape of a military commitment—nothing coming into your hands as to why he was detained?

A. No, sir; I received no confidential papers of any kind or description as regards Mr. Davis.

Q. Were not you advised by the district attorney of the necessity of stating the causes of detention?

A. The writ required me to do that, but I could only state that I held him, by order of the President of the United States, as a military prisoner.

Q. Have you a copy of your return?

A. No, sir; it is in the Adjutant General's office. The writ is also there.

Q. You say, then, if I understand you correctly, that you had no other instructions than those you state, from the Secretary of War, or from any department of the government?

A. I have not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you apply to the district attorney for advice?

A. Yes, sir, I did; he being the United States attorney, and I, as a military officer, not understanding the form in which that return should be made, asked him how it should be done. I thought he, being an officer of the government, was the proper person to apply to.

Q. Was that entirely on your own motion, or had you been advised by some other person to apply to him for counsel?

A. It was entirely on my own motion.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did he say anything to you of the fact of his being held on the charge of complicity in the assassination of the late President Lincoln?

A. No, sir; he did not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you have any information of the causes of detention other than the order of the President that you were to hold him as a military prisoner?

A. No, sir; I did not.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Where were you when you made your return of the writ?

A. I was in Richmond, in the court-house, before the district court of the United States.

Q. When you found it necessary to make a return, not being acquainted with the form, you applied to the district attorney to ascertain what would be the legal form; you had no orders from anybody to do that?

A. None at all.

Q. No communication with the President on the subject?

A. Not a word, except that I was told to obey the writ.

Q. In holding Jefferson Davis there, you simply held him as an officer under the orders of your superiors?

A. Certainly, sir. General Miles received Jefferson Davis at Fortress Monroe; what instructions or papers he may have had I do not know. He took them from the post, all of them, to Washington. He did not turn over to me a scrap of paper for my guidance, and I held no special orders in regard to him.

Q. Had you any orders from anybody, in case a writ of habeas corpus was served on you, what to do?

A. My orders were to obey the writ.

Q. Do you know that that order came from the President of the United States in any other way than that it purported to be signed by order of the President?

A. That was all.

Q. If you have a copy of that order please read it to the Committee.

A. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 8, 1867.

Brevet Brig. Gen. H. S. BURTON, U. S. A., or Commanding Officer Ft. Monroe, Virginia:

SIR: The President directs you to surrender Jefferson Davis, now held in confinement by military authority in Fort Monroe, to the United States marshal, or his deputies, upon any process which may issue by the federal courts in the State of Virginia. You will report the action taken by you under this order, and forward a copy of any process served upon you to this office.

By order of the President:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1867.

Hon. HENRY STANBERY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You were requested to bring with you the papers in the case of the pardon of Joseph R. Anderson, of Richmond; have you them with you?

A. I have them here.

Q. State the contents of the paper in that case, by whom the pardon was recommended, and upon what grounds.

A. This pardon appears to have been granted on the 22d of September, 1865, about a year before I was made Attorney General. I know nothing of the case, or of the circumstances attending the pardon, except what appears in the papers on file in the office of the Attorney General, which I now present. They consist of a petition for a pardon, a letter from Hon. J. K. Moorhead, two letters from Governor Pierpoint of Virginia, a letter from William H. Marbury, Dilworth, Porter & Co., of Pittsburg, Asa Snyder, John W. Duncan, A. A. Lockrum; indorsed by James Johnson, C. L. Moseby. I have also the President's order for the pardon.

Q. Furnish to the Committee, if you please, copies in full of the papers in the case.

A. I will do so.

Q. Have you a knowledge of any facts relative to the pardon of Anderson, other than those which are in the papers presented to the Committee?

A. I have not. I do not know that I had ever heard of the case until I received notice from this Committee.

Q. Have you the papers in the case of the pardon of Solomon Kohnstamm?

A. I have.

Q. Please state the facts within your knowledge relative to the pardon in that case.

A. Shortly after I became Attorney General my attention was called to this case, the petition for the pardon and the various papers relating to it being then in my office. From time to time I made examination of the case, and held it under consideration before arriving at a definite conclusion for several months. On the 30th of April I came to the conclusion that it was a proper case for executive clemency, and so reported to the President. While the matter was pending it was more than once the subject of discussion, and from time to time additional papers and recommendations were furnished. The facts and considerations upon which I finally arrived at the conclusion which I have stated I will attempt to state as briefly as possible. It appeared that the petitioner had been engaged in mercantile and banking business in New York for many years, and had acquired a high standing as a man of integrity. In the early part of the rebellion he took a decided stand in favor of the government, and contributed, among other things, the gratuitous use of a large and valuable building or warehouse to the government for a period of more than a year. Being a German, he came to be interested in German regiments which were organized in New York, and made advances towards these organizations, and was involved, as it was charged, in the presentation of forged vouchers upon which he received large sums of money; that he was arrested by orders from Washington in the fall, I think, of 1862, and under these charges imprisoned for a time in Fort Lafayette and in the Old Capitol prison at Washington, but was released finally from that imprisonment; that when so released he returned to New York and remained there, making no attempt to escape, expressing a readiness at any time to meet the charges that had been made; that at some subsequent time, either in the fall of 1863 or early in 1864, he was again arrested by the civil authorities, and indicted in the United States court at New York for obtaining payment of fraudulent vouchers. He was tried upon one or more of these indictments at the May term of 1865, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary at Sing Sing. His conviction was founded mainly upon the testimony of parties who admitted their participation in the frauds. In the year 1865 his petition for a pardon appears to have been presented, and was referred to the then Attorney General, Mr. Speed, who made a report unfavorable to the application. After I came into office the application was again renewed; additional papers were presented, and the following case upon the application was made out: That his confinement in the prison was gradually undermining not only his general health, but that his mind was giving way, and physicians of great eminence, such for instance as Doctor Van Buren and Doctor Grisom, concurred in the opinion of the attending physicians of the institution, that if his imprisonment continued it would inevitably result in a total destruction of his intellect. The warden of the prison also reported that he had never known an instance of any prisoner so confined upon whom the confinement had operated with so much severity. Among other things stated as to the amount of punishment, even for the time in which he had been confined, the warden thought he had suffered more than convicts usually would have suffered during the whole period of their sentence. In addition to this, the recommendations for his pardon were numerous, and from gentlemen of the very highest standing and intelligence. Among these petitioners are the following senators and representatives: Ira Harris, E. N. Hubbell, James M. Marvin, Hamilton Ward, C. T. Hulburd, John W. Chanler, H. Van Aernam, Stephen Taber, Henry J. Raymond, Robert S. Hale, Thomas T. Davis, Burt Van Horn, John H. Ketcham, D. Morris, Roscoe Conkling, W. A. Darling, W. E. Dodge, John A. Griswold, Teunis G. Bergen, A. H. Laflin, C. H. Winfield, G. W. Hotchkiss, James Humphrey, Demas Hubbard, jr., Roswell Hart, William Radford, Charles Goodyear, Reverdy Johnson, and J. M. Howard; and also a letter from Senator Morgan, accompanying, dated United States Senate Chamber, December 23, 1865, addressed to the President. The letter is as follows:

* * * * * *

Other recommendations were also filed from Robert J. Walker, James T. Brady, Senator Nye, E. S. Van Winkle, Augustus Schell, Mrs. Moses Odell, James Bates, J. W. Hoffmann, William M. Evarts, Governor Fenton, Simeon Draper. The letters of Governor Fenton, dated 17th November, 1865, and that of Simeon Draper, dated ———, are as follows:

* * * * * *

There is also a letter, under date of "December 22, 1865," from Mrs. Stephen A. Douglas. The letters from Germany, introducing Mrs. Bergher, and the letter from Robert J. Walker, are also of the same character, and express the opinion that it is a case for clemency. There are also recommendations and letters from merchants and citizens of New York city, as follows:

* * * * * *

While the matter was under my consideration, I received letters from Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, of New York, who was the special agent of the government, retained as such in prosecuting the indictments against Kohnstamm, and the civil suit brought against him to recover the money which he had obtained from the government by these fraudulent vouchers. Mr. Pierrepont knowing that there were applications for pardons pending, advised me of the pendency of proceedings to recover back the money, and expressed his opinion that the Executive ought not to extend pardon to Kohnstamm until restoration was made. On the 5th of January, 1867, I received this letter from Pierrepont on the subject:

* * * * * * *

On the 14th of January, 1867, I received this further letter from Mr. Pierrepont:

* * * * * * *

When, after this, I was advised of the payment of the money, I hesitated no longer, but concluded to recommend the pardon to the President I had, during the pendency of the case, received recommendations from Mr. Evarts, who was counsel for Kohnstamm, and have his letter, written shortly before the pardon was granted, in which he urges it as an act of proper clemency. I can only say that, as far as I was concerned, I felt authorized to make the recommendation.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Do you entertain that opinion now, or have you seen any reason to change it?

A. I have seen no reason to change it, and entertain that opinion now.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was your attention directed to this case by the President, by verbal or written request that you should examine it?

A. I have no recollection that at any time the President specially called my attention to the case. My attention was particularly called to it by Mr. Van Winkle and by Mr. Evarts, and finally by the application of Mrs. Bergher, the sister of Kohnstamm, who came here just before the pardon was granted.

Q Have you any reason to believe that a pardon would have been granted in this case, had your report upon it been adverse?

A. No, sir; I am satisfied the President would not have granted it, had I not recommended it. I never heard the President express any opinion with reference to it, except to acquiesce in my report.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What was the extent of the pardon? Did it go to all indictments, whether tried or not?

A. Yes, sir. There was no other prosecution then being carried on against him; it was, as I suppose, a general pardon.

Q. I saw it stated in a report that there were nearly fifty indictments against him of a like character.

A. Yes, sir; but I did not know that there was any continued prosecution, or intended prosecution. The suit brought against him was for the recovery of the whole amount, and the judgment against him was for the whole amount covered by all the indictments which the proof made out against him, I may also state, in his absence.

Q. There was an appearance for him in his absence, was there not?

A. I suppose so. Mr. Van Winkle was his trustee, and no doubt appeared for him, and he is a lawyer of eminence.

Q. Do you remember how much was claimed by the government in that case?

A. I do not. Mr. Pierrepont, who represented the government, states in this letter that the amount received was not, in his judgment, sufficient.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. On or about the 11th day of October, 1866, an article appeared in the Philadelphia Ledger, from which article I read as follows: (Questions alleged to have been propounded by the President to the Attorney General, copied in the testimony of the witness Flint.) Will you please state whether there is any truth in that statement that such question, or questions of similar import, were ever submitted to you?

A. Not a word of truth in it. No such questions, or anything like them, were ever sent by the President to me.

Q. Were any such question, or questions of similar import, discussed between you and the President?

A. Never. My attention was called to that publication at the time, and I denied it at once by telegraph to various places. It created a great sensation over the country, and I at once denounced it as a fabrication.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Is there anything within your knowledge out of which that report originated?

A. There is not. I should have been startled at any such questions from the President.

Q. Then the whole report is a pure fabrication?

A. Entirely so.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Will you be good enough to state whether, as the chief law officer of the government, you ever instituted or directed proceedings, either in person or in rem, for the purpose of enforcing the acts of Congress in relation to confiscation of the property of rebels, or for the punishment of crimes of a political character?

A. I have no recollection of directing any proceedings for confiscation. I must speak with some reservation, however, as the question covers the entire period of my official action for the last ten months. There is no case within my recollection that now occurs to me.

Q. Have you ever had instructions from the President to proceed with any case for confiscation?

A. I do not remember it.

Q. Has he ever called your attention to confiscation proceedings, or proceedings of a criminal nature, against men who were implicated in the rebellion?

A. I do not now recollect any instance, unless it may be in relation to Mr. Davis. He has spoken to me about that case.

Q. It has been stated here by a witness, who was the district attorney for the district of North Carolina, that there were some cases instituted, arising under the laws in regard to confiscation of rebel property, which were brought to your notice, and in reference to which you instructed him he should not take any further proceedings at present. Was that a fact?

A. Yes, sir; that, however, enters upon a new field. The other question was as to instructions from the President.

Q. State, if you please, whether you have adopted any policy in regard to cases of that sort?

A. My views in regard to proceedings for confiscation are these: That after pacification and the establishment of peace, these laws which were, during the continuance of hostilities, war measures, practically ceased to be operative; and, unless proceedings had gone to the extent that the rights of third parties had intervened, my instructions were that these cases should not further be carried on.

Q. That is to say, you discontinued proceedings which had already been commenced?

A. Yes, sir, where they had not proceeded to condemnation and sale. There were all over the southern country, in Missouri and other States, a host of suits prosecuted and commenced, either just before, or after the termination of the rebellion, against parties implicated in it, which involved immense costs, and did not promise anything even if they were carried on, but in which vast amounts of costs had accumulated in the way of publication and otherwise. I stopped proceedings in all such cases when they were brought to my notice.

Q. I understand that you did that, and under instructions from the President?

A. I recollect no instructions from the President. It was in accordance with my own views. I should not have gone to the President for instructions in reference to it. It occurred in the course of my correspondence with the district attorneys for the several districts, and in this I think I followed the precedent set by my predecessor, Mr. Speed. I do not think I adopted any new policy; that was my impression.

Q. Are we to understand, then, that you did not conceive it to bey our duty as the law officer of the government to enforce these laws; that you considered them no longer applicable?

A. According to my construction of these laws, it was not my duty to prosecute under them after pacification.

Q. Did you entertain the opinion that the restoration of peace amounted substantially to a repeal of the laws, or that they ceased to operate?

A. My opinion, from the tenor of the laws, was that they were war measures, and where the rights of third parties had not intervened, and no judgment, condemnation, or sale had taken place, I did not consider it wise to continue the prosecution. I did not interfere with cases that had proceeded thus far.

Q. Were there cases in which you consented to a revocation where judgment had already been pronounced?

A. I do not recollect of any. I cannot speak very accurately, however; I have had a great deal of correspondence with the district attorneys.

Q. Do you recollect whether such was the fact in respect to the property of Pierre Soulè, in which the property was restored to him after judgment and condemnation?

A. That was before my time, I presume; I have no recollection of the case.

Q. Do you know of any instructions having been given by the President to Mr. Speed, your predecessor, upon that subject?

A. I do not.

Q. Be good enough to state whether you gave any instructions to the District Attorney of Virginia in regard to the question of discharging Jefferson Davis on bail?

A. The District Attorney and Mr. Evarts, the counsel employed by the government, were in my office before going on the day fixed for the return of the habeas corpus. The habeas corpus, issued by Judge Underwood, was made returnable on Monday, May 13. We had a general consultation, first as to the question whether the offence was bailable, and whether the government should resist the application for bail under the circumstances. I think we all agreed in the opinion that under the present statutes of the United States the offence is bailable.

Q. What section of the statute was he indicted under?

A. I have never seen the indictment, but I understood it was under the act of 1862.

Q. You supposed it to be bailable under the first section of that act, which prescribes the alternative of death?

A. If the first section of that act had been the only law upon the subject it might have been more questionable.

Q. What was your understanding in regard to the indictment?

A. I understood that it was a prosecution under a section prescribing the punishment of death or imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Q. Was that your opinion as a lawyer, having reference also to the act of 1793, prescribing that bail shall not be taken where the punishment may be death?

A. Yes, sir; I am of opinion that treason has always been bailable, in the discretion of the district court of the United States, since the act of 1789.

Q. And you gave that advice to the District Attorney?

A. I concurred with him and Mr. Evarts in the opinion that Mr. Davis was bailable.

Q. Did you instruct him to make any objection to Mr. Davis being set at liberty on bail?

A. I can hardly say that I gave any instructions at all. The question was whether it was a bailable offence, and whether application for bail should be resisted upon that ground. I did not see how such an application could, under the circumstances, successfully be resisted, and I gave them my opinion about it.

Q. Did you give any advice in regard to the return to be made to the writ of habeas corpus, having reference to his alleged complicity, under which he was arrested, in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln?

A. I did not. Mr. Evarts took charge of that, and I think wrote the return to the writ himself. I have so understood it.

Q. Was there anything said in this conversation in relation to the fact that Jefferson Davis was held as a prisoner by the military authorities under the proclamation by the President offering a reward for his capture on the charge of complicity in the assassination?

A. I think not; it was well understood that he was not so held.

Q. Was he not arrested upon that charge?

A. I so understand.

Q. Was he not held under that charge?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why not?

A. I came into the Cabinet long after his arrest, but I know that in making up a report to Congress upon the subject, which report was made by myself, and transmitted through the President to Congress in answer to a resolution calling for the reason why he was held in military custody, it was stated that he was held ready to answer any writ that should issue by the proper civil authorities?

Q. He was held in the military custody of Brigadier General Burton?

A. Undoubtedly; but I do not think he was held under any such charge as complicity in the assassination.

Q. Was not that the original cause of his detention?

A. I have always understood something of that sort. I have myself no personal knowledge on the subject. Long before I came into the office, Mr. Speed gave to the President a written opinion that it was not a case for trial by military commission; that he ought to be held for prosecution for treason by the civil authorities. I have here the letter of Mr. Speed, dated January 6, 1866, to the President on that subject, which is as follows:

[Copy.]

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 6, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from you of a copy of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of date the 21st December, 1865. In that resolution the Senate respectfully requests to be informed upon what charges, or for what reasons, Jefferson Davis is still held in confinement, and why he has not been put upon his trial.

When the war was at its crisis, Jefferson Davis, the commander-in-chief of the army of the insugents, and other prominent rebels, were taken prisoners by the military forces of the United States. It was the duty of the military so to take them. They have been heretofore, and are yet, held as prisoners of war. Though active warfare has ceased, a state of war still exists over the territory in rebellion. Until peace shall come, in fact and in law, they can rightfully be held as prisoners of war.

I have ever thought that trials for high treason cannot be had before a military court. The civil courts have alone jurisdiction of that crime. The question then arises, where and when must the trials thereof be held?

In that clause of the Constitution mentioned in the resolution of the Senate it is plainly written that they must be held in the State and district "wherein the crime shall have been committed." I know that many persons of learning and ability entertain the opinion that the commander-in-chief of the rebel armies should be regarded as constructively present with all the insurgents who prosecuted hostilities and made raids upon the northern and southern borders of the loyal States. This doctrine of constructive presence, carried out to its logical consequences, would make all who had been connected with the rebel armies liable to trial in any State and district into which any portion of those armies had made the slightest incursion. Not being persuaded of the correctness of that opinion, but regarding the doctrine mentioned as of doubtful constitutionality, I have thought it not proper to advise you to cause criminal proceedings to be instituted against Jefferson Davis, or any other insurgent, in the States or districts in which they were not actually present during the prosecution of hostilities.

Some prominent rebels were personally present during the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, but all or nearly all of them received military paroles upon the surrender of the rebel armies. Whilst I think that those paroles were not ultimate protection against prosecutions for high treason, I have thought that it would be a violation of the paroles to prosecute those persons for crimes before the political power of the government has proclaimed that the rebellion has been suppressed.

It follows from what I have said that I am of the opinion that Jefferson Davis and others of the insurgents ought to be tried in some of the States or districts in which they in person respectively committed the crime with which they may be charged. Though active hostilities and flagrant war have not for some time existed between the United States and the insurgents, the peaceful relations between the government and the people in the States and districts in rebellion have not yet been fully restored. None of the Justices of the Supreme Court have held circuit courts in these States and districts since actual hostilities ceased.

When the courts are open, and the laws can be peacefully administered and enforced in those States whose people rebelled against the government: when thus peace shall have come in fact and in law, the persons now held in military custody as prisoners of war, and who may not have been tried and convicted for offences against the laws of war, should be transferred into the custody of the civil authorities of the proper districts, to be tried for such high crimes and misdemeanors as may be alleged against them.

I think that it is the plain duty of the President to cause criminal prosecutions to be instituted before the proper tribunals and at the proper times against some of those who were mainly instrumental in inaugurating and most conspicuous in conducting the late hostilities.

I should regard it as a direful calamity if many whom the sword has spared the law should spare also; but I would deem it a more direful calamity still if the Executive, in performing his constitutional duty of bringing these persons before the bar of justice to answer for their crimes, should violate the plain meaning of the Constitution, or infringe in the least particular the living spirit of that instrument.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

JAMES SPEED, Attorney General.

To the PRESIDENT.

Q. There seems to be no reference made there to the charge made in the proclamation to which I refer of complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln. Will you state whether you had any conversation with the President upon that subject?

A. I do not recollect any.

Q. Did you receive any instructions from him in relation to the disposition of Davis, or did you consult with him upon the disposition to be made of him by the court?

A. I had no such instruction or consultation whatever. I will state that the matter of issuing an order to the military authorities at Fortress Monroe to hold Davis subject to any writ of habeas corpus or capias to be issued from the court at Richmond, was an order directed in Cabinet, having been submitted by the President to his constitutional advisers there.

Q. Was it your understanding then that he was to go at large if released on bail under this indictment?

A. I feel myself, and have frequently said so, that we were in a false position so far as Jefferson Davis was concerned; that he was captured by us and held as a prisoner of war, and continued to be so held in time of peace, with no charges against him, subject to jurisdiction by any military court. The charges on which he was arrested were limited as early as January, 1866. I felt that we were in a false position in holding him in military custody; and that it was proper, when an opportunity offered, to surrender him to the civil authorities to be dealt with by them.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Have you, as the law officer of the government, in your hands, or is there within your knowledge, evidence which would warrant you in putting Jefferson Davis upon trial for complicity in the assassination?

A. Nothing has come to my knowledge which would warrant such a prosecution.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. Have you at any time considered the matter of having another indictment against Jefferson Davis found either in Virginia, Alabama, Tennessee, or otherwise?

A. No, sir. He is now answerable to the present indictment in Virginia.

A. Have you considered the statute of '62 in connection with the original statute covering treason, with reference to the possibility of indicting him in such a manner as that he would not be permitted to give bail?

A. No, sir, I have not. I was of the opinion that under the circumstances of the case as he was indicted it was a bailable offence. I may be in error about it, but that is my opinion.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Do you know whether any indictment for treason was made against Jefferson Davis in Washington, in this District?

A. I do not; I think I have heard of something of the sort. I have some impression of that sort, but I have no official information of it.

Q. Have you any doubt as to his being triable here—as to the fact of his actual presence here at the outset of the rebellion?

A. I might say this in regard to the opinion given on the subject of constructive presence by my predecessor: I was hardly satisfied that he was right in saying that Jefferson Davis would not properly have been held to have been constructively present in Pennsylvania, at Gettysburg, or in Maryland, at Antietam.

Q. Did the President give any direction in regard to Davis being held on bail, or as to the form of return of the officer having him in custody?

A. I do not recollect the slightest communication between the President and myself either verbally or in writing. It was a matter that pertained to my office. I will simply state, that so far as the question of official duty was concerned, I did not consider it then my duty as Attorney General to intervene in the case any further than to give advice upon questions asked; that it was not a part of my duty to go to Richmond and prosecute in person, was plain, as I am directed to be here and argue cases in the Supreme Court. I have not considered it as coming within my province to do any more than to give advice or instructions upon such questions as are presented.

Q. In any opinion you gave upon this subject of Davis being admitted to bail, were you guided by any advice or instruction from the President?

A. None whatever. The President left me entirely to the exercise of my own discretion upon the subject.

Q. Mr. Evarts was employed by the government to prosecute this case?

A. Mr. Evarts and Mr. Clifford, of Massachusetts, were employed. Mr. Clifford, however, retired from the case; Mr. Evarts remained.

Q. Mr. Evarts was present at the time he was held to bail?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

Q. What reasons existed, in your knowledge, which led Mr. Chandler to state to the court that the government was not ready to proceed with the trial of the case?

A. I am not aware what were the reasons, except as stated to me by Mr. Chandler.

Q. I will ask you whether, as far as you know, the government was ready to proceed with the trial of Jefferson Davis?

A. That was a question for the District Attorney to decide.

Q. Was there any fact within your knowledge indicating that the government was not ready?

A. I do not know of any, except from the District Attorney.

Q. You know of no reason why the government might not have gone on with the trial last Monday?

A. I do not know of any reason, except what I have from the District Attorney?

Q. What reason did he give?

A. He thought it was not a proper time to proceed with the trial, and I understand he was not then prepared to go on with it.

Q. Did he state any particulars in which he was lacking in his readiness to go on with the trial?

A. He mentioned, among other things, that he was not satisfied with the present indictment. He thought it would be better to have a further indictment; that he had prepared the present indictment for the grand jury in great haste, under instructions to have the matter started, and that he was not entirely satisfied to go to trial upon that indictment.

Q. When did he make that statement to you first?

A. Some time before the meeting of the court.

Q. Was not the grand jury is session at this term of court prior to last Monday, in Richmond?

A. I do not know whether they were in session prior to that day or not.

Q. Did you give the District Attorney any instructions as to whether he should or should not obtain a new indictment?

A. I told him by all means to take care that he had an indictment he could rely upon. I have never seen his indictment.

Q. When did you make that statement?

A. I suppose at the time he was in the city prior to the meeting of the court. I do not recollect the particular day.

Q. It was some time prior to the recent session of the court?

A. Yes, sir. I do not know whether he had had an opportunity for preparing any other indictment or not.

Q. Did he say whether he required any assistance in the preparation of the indictment?

A. No, sir; he seemed to express the opinion that he was competent to frame an indictment. Of course he would have Mr. Evarts with him, and I think he said he would consult with Mr. Evarts about the indictment, and under any circumstances he would hardly ask for my assistance in framing the indictment. It would not be usual for a District Attorney to do that.

Q. Is it your opinion or expectation that Jefferson Davis, if he presents himself in November next, is to be tried?

A. I hardly know what expectation to express. I do not know what circumstances may arise.

Q. I ask you for your own expectation, opinion, or desire.

A. It is a case pending against a party who is bound to be there. I have no idea of instructing the District Attorney to enter a nolle prosequi, or to relieve him from the duty of prosecuting Mr. Davis.

Q. Do you know whether it is the purpose of the District Attorney to procure any other indictment against Mr. Davis in any other State?

A. He has never mentioned to me that he expected such a thing.

Q. Is not this case one of such character in reference to its history and the reputation of the country that it ought to be taken especially in charge by the first law officer of the government, so far as it needs special instructions as to how it is to be managed?

A. As to that, as a matter of course on the application of the District Attorney, I should take very great care to give him the best instructions I could.

Q. Was not the case of such magnitude that it would seem to be the duty of the administration to assume the general conduct of it, without waiting for the District Attorney to make application?

A. Counsel of the first eminence were employed to manage the case. I have not considered it my duty to interfere in the case, except to give such instructions or advice as may be called for during its progress.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. The government have employed eminent counsel, specially with reference to this case, have they not?

A. Yes, sir; I have so stated.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. When you gave an opinion upon the subject of bail in a case of that sort, say in this case, was your attention called to the provisions of the acts of '93 upon that subject?

A. Not specially.

Q. I ask you to look at it now, and say whether, in view of that act specifically, without reference to any other legislation, he would be bailable?

A. I have stated my opinion that under the act of 1789 he would be bailable; but in this case I took into consideration the subsequent legislation.

Q. What subsequent legislation?

A. The act of 1862, which prescribes the punishment as death or imprisonment for life in the alternative.

Q. Taking that act in connection with the act of '93, which prescribes that offences shall not be bailable where the punishment is death, would you still think the party ought to be admitted to bail?

A. What I mean to say is, that under the statute of 1862, under which, I learn, Mr. Davis is indicted, I believe he is bailable by a court of the United States, not to say anything of a commission.

Q. Nothwithstanding the act of '93?

A. Certainly.

Q. Supposing the offence to have been bailable, I ask you whether, under the hypothesis that he was arrested by virtue of a proclamation, charging him with complicity in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, it was not the duty of the government to surrender him to the civil authorities for trial under that charge, and not allow him to be set at large under another charge?

A. I am not advised that Davis was held under a charge of complicity in the assassination.

Q. What would be the duty of the government upon such a state of facts? Would it not be to surrender him to the civil authorities upon that charge, in order that he might be discharged in due course of law from military custody under the proclamation; and would it not be right and proper to make a return, stating the causes of detention, and not allow him to go at large upon bail?

A. I can only say, speaking for myself and the President, that I cannot imagine in what way he or I could interfere with the return of that officer, or give any instructions about making his return.

Q. The President is by the Constitution commander-in-chief of the army, and that officer is his subordinate. Davis was virtually in the custody of the President, and the act of the officer was virtually his act, as I understand it?

A. As to that, as a matter of course the officer holding him in custody was subordinate of the President; but the President did not order him to be discharged; he caused him to be handed over to the civil authorities, to be dealt with by them. I do not know that the President gave any instructions or had ground for giving any instructions for having him prosecuted for complicity in the assassination. I never heard from him, however, in regard to that subject.

Q. Suppose a sheriff held a party under arrest, whether in consequence of executive proclamation or otherwise, would it not have been proper for him in making his return to call the attention of the court to that fact?

A. Undoubtedly, a sheriff who has a prisoner in custody states in his return by what authority he holds him. If he says he holds him on a charge of complicity in an assassination, I suppose that would be a proper return. If he says he holds him by authority of a writ, that would be his return.

Q. Would it be a proper return to say that he held him by virtue of a warrant?

A. I will only state that according to any knowledge or information that I have, going as far back as January, 1866, Mr. Davis was simply held as a prisoner of war, and was expected only to be indicted for treason. At that time the legal officer of the government did not seem to be under the impression that he was held on any charge of complicity in the assassination, and since I have been in office I have never been advised that he was held otherwise than as a prisoner of war.

Q. Were you not aware of the fact that an inquiry was pending before the Judiciary Committee of the 39th Congress upon the very subject of the charge referred to in the proclamation under which Jefferson Davis was arrested?

A. I think I have heard by rumor that there was such an inquiry.

Q. Has it not been a matter of public notoriety that there has been?

A. I think so; and I suppose that if any matter of that kind had come to the notice of a committee of Congress, we should at least have had some report or resolution upon the subject. Resolutions were passed upon the subject and referred to the Attorney General, but they were in reference to his trial for treason rather than anything else, and we have had several resolutions from Congress desiring to know upon what ground he was held. Congress did not seem to know. We have again and again reported that he was held as a prisoner of war, and that we were ready to deliver him up at any moment to the civil authorities. Congress has seemed to take no action upon these resolutions.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Referring back to a point under consideration a little while since, are we to understand that you entertained the opinion that Mr. Davis is liable to be tried in Maryland or Pennsylvania, although he was not personally present in either of the battles in those States; that he could be properly tried as commander-in-chief of the rebel army?

A. That is a very grave question. My impression is that he would be triable in either of those States, supposing that the acts committed there were incited by him.

Q. Have you advised the officers of the law in Maryland or Pennsylvania that there is such a power in them to try him there?

A. I have not.

Q. Do you propose to advise the officers of the law as to that?

A. I do not. There is a prosecution already pending against him.

Q. Have you advised the President of the United States of your opinion on that subject?

A. I have not.

Q. Do you propose to advise the President of that fact?

A. I do not know that I do.

Q. Would it not be proper for you to advise the District Attorneys, who are your subordinates, upon a question of that sort?

A. Yes, sir; it is my duty to give advice whenever they require it.

Q. You never volunteer it?

A. Not unless some inquiry is made.

Q. Referring again to your opinion, do not you think that a trial could be had in Maryland or Pennsylvania with less embarrassment than in Virginia?

A. I do not know that I have formed any opinion upon that subject.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any knowledge as to whether C. C. Clay, jr., was or was not indicted for treason in the United States court in Alabama?

A. There have been proceedings against Mr. Clay, but I would like to refer to my office before answering the question definitely.

Q. I ask you to refer to the letters on file in your office, and ascertain whether you have any record of that fact; and whether any instructions have been given by you or by your predecessor relative to indictments against Clay; and if so, to furnish copies to the Committee.

A. I will do so.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE:

Q. Is there to your knowledge any civil warrant or other process by which Jefferson Davis was held until he was surrendered to the civil authorities?

A. My impression is that there was not. I think he was not held in custody upon any civil or criminal process.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Did the records about your office show that instructions were given to the District Attorney of Maryland in reference to indictments pending there for treason?

A. They will show if any such instructions were given.

Q. I would be obliged to you to furnish any such instructions to the Committee.

A. I will do so.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., February 21, 1867.

Hon. HENRY STANBERY, U. S. Attorney General, Washington, D. C.:

RESPECTED SIR: Your communication of the 15th instant, directing me to suspend all further proceedings in the case of the United States vs. a large quantity of old iron, brass, and machinery, pending now in the district court, wherein one A. K. Shephard is the claimant, and report as early as practicable the grounds of prosecution; and also to suspend action and make report in like manner in the cases of the United States vs. thirty acres of land at Selma, and the United States vs. Naval foundry, rolling mills, and iron-works lots, has been received by me on yesterday, and, in reply, I will state that the directions in reference to the two latter cases come too late, as the sale of the property under condemnation and decree of court took place on the 18th instant at Selma.

No steps are being taken at present in the case where A. K. Shephard is claimant, except that the proceeds of the sale are ordered to be deposited in the registry of the court, to await further proceedings at the next term of the court, in May. I enclose, as requested, a statement of each proceeding, from which it will be seen that the facts are different from the "judicial record and other documents which have been filed in your office."

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

(Signed) JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE
FOR NORTHERN AND MIDDLE DISTRICTS OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, , 186 .

(93.) United States of America, vs. Naval foundry, rolling mills, and iron-works lots, and appurtenances, in Selma.

The land in this case was purchased by the agents of the late so-called confederate States during the rebellion, who erected thereon a naval foundry, rolling mills, and iron works, for the manufacture of cannon, shot, shell, and other warlike materials. On the capture of Selma, in April, 1865, by the United States forces, commanded by Major General Henry Wilson, all the buildings were burned and destroyed; and on the 15th of September, 1865, I filed a libel of information, under the act of 6th August, 1861, against the land and appurtenances, consisting of brick, old iron, brass, old machinery, and scrap iron. A warrant of seizure issued from the district court, and on the 10th of October the marshal made seizure, and on the warrant the following return:

"Came to hand September 10, 1865, and in obedience to the within warrant I have arrested one lot of land, and a large quantity of brick, boilers, engines, scrap iron, old iron, and many other appurtenances thereon—the land commencing fronting Sylvian street, extending and lying immediately between the Burnsville road and the Alabama and Tennessee railroad track, to the lot of land belonging to F. A. Woodson, in the city of Selma, being the same mentioned in the warrant, in the district aforesaid; and I have cited all persons having, or pretending to have, any right, title, or interest therein, to appear at the next term of the United States district court, as I am by this warrant commanded to do. October 10, 1865.
"JOHN HARDY, U. S. Marshal."

On the 15th of October, 1865, the above property was advertised by the marshal, and all persons notified to appear and show cause why the same should not be condemned—a copy of which notice is attached, with the notice of other property seized in other cases. This notice brought into court several claimants for the land, who were represented by able counsel, who prosecuted for the respective claimants until the May term of court, 1866, when the claims were withdrawn and a decree of condemnation rendered, and an order of sale made directing the marshal to sell the land in the manner therein ordered, which order, as before stated, had been carried out before the receipt of the Attorney General's communication.

Some time after the seizure by the marshal of the property in this case, and the seizure of a large quantity of other property, representations were made to me by the assistant commissioner of freedmen for Alabama, General Swayne, and his agent, a Colonel Gardner, at Selma, that there were large numbers of freedmen who had no places to reside on, or to erect huts, and asked me to direct the marshal to permit them to use property libelled for confiscation during the pendency of the proceedings of confiscation in court. I directed the marshal to permit the assistant commissioner of freedmen to use the houses and lands libelled for confiscation for the freedmen, during the pendency of proceedings in court, as a matter of humanity, which was done. The land libelled in this case was used and occupied under this distinct understanding. But, nevertheless, the assistant commissioner of freedmen, in bad faith, unknown to the marshal, and during my absence from the district, and without consulting me, sold, privately, large quantities of the brick, and other materials on the naval foundry lots—sold, as is alleged, to one A. K. Shephard, all the old iron, scrap iron, brass, and machinery on the naval foundry lots, for half the value of what would have been obtained at public sale, and actually attempted to sell the land to this same Shephard, who for some time claimed to be the owner thereof. The houses which were permitted to be used, at the request of the assistant commissioner of freedmen, by the marshal, were rented out, and the rents collected—the poor freedmen did not occupy them—and what part of the rents were used for this charitable purpose I do not know.

It will be noticed that the marshal's seizure, under warrant, and his published notice thereunder, was in October, 1865. Yet this supposed sale took place in May, 1866, eight months thereafter. Shephard had full notice of all the proceedings in the district court, so did the assistant commissioner, but paid no attention to them: the sale and purchase being made, as before stated, in private, without the marshal's knowledge, and while I was out of this district. It is stated in the Attorney General's communication, founded on "records and other documents filed in his office, that subsequently to said sale a libel was filed by (you) me in the United States district court for the confiscation of a lot of such debris, of which nearly the whole consisted of a part of what had been so purchased by Shephard." The subsequent libel here referred to was filed under the following circumstances: The sale and purchase to Shephard being unknown to either myself or to the marshal, and the old iron, brass, and scrap iron having been moved to a private warehouse by Shephard, the transaction passed for some time unnoticed, until I received information that a large quantity of old iron, brass, and other materials liable to confiscation, were in a warehouse in Selma. Warrant was issued for its seizure. This done, Shephard appears as claimant, and it is developed that this is the same old iron, brass, and scrap iron seized under the warrant of 15th September, 1865, and was upon the naval foundry, rolling mills, and iron works lots, where the assistant commissioner was permitted to take charge of the land during the pendency of proceedings in court, and which permission on the part of the marshal and myself has been abused. I hold the old iron, brass, and scrap iron under the proceedings of the 15th September, 1865, and not under the proceedings subsequent to the purchase by Shephard. The later proceedings were commenced under the circumstances before stated.

I have thought it best to be thus particular, so that from a full statement, this matter may be understood by the Attorney General, stripped of all the interested representations of Mr. Shephard and the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen for Alabama, from which it will appear that the cases of the United States vs. Naval foundry, rolling mills, and iron-works lots and appurtenances, and the United States vs. A large quantity of old iron, brass, and scrap iron, represented by Shephard, are one and the same transaction, and compose but one case.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
FOR THE NORTHERN AND MIDDLE DISTRICTS OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, 186.

(85.) United States of America vs. Thirty (30) acres of land and improvements, in the city of Selma.

Part of the land mentioned in this proceeding was purchased by the late so-called confederate States for the purpose of using it as an addition to a naval foundry and rolling mill. The other part was used for rebel purposes, in various ways. On the 20th of September, 1865, a bill of information was filed in the district court for the confiscation of the land, under the act of August 6, 1861. On the 10th of October, 1865, the marshal seized the land, and made publication thereof, which will be seen attached to the statement of case 93, forwarded with this to the Attorney General. Various claimants appeared by able counsel, and contested the question of liability for three terms of the court, on the grounds of want of consideration, (confederate notes having been paid therefor,) and decrees in the sale of land, at the May term, 1867. It appearing that the owner of that part of the land not sold was specially pardoned by the President, the proceedings were dismissed as to so much of the land as proceeded against for the use thereof, and the case proceeded with as to the balance. After a lengthy trial and full argument of all the questions involved, a decree of condemnation was rendered against eight acres and a fraction of an acre of land, embracing all the land deeded to the rebel government. An order of sale was issued, which order was executed by the marshal on the 18th instant, as will appear from his notice, enclosed with letter to the Attorney General, and sent with this statement. The decree of condemnation was appealed from to the Supreme Court, but the appellants failing to execute the necessary bond to effect a supersedeas within the ten days prescribed by the statute, the decree was executed. The appeal, nevertheless, I understand, will be prosecuted.

Some time after the seizure of the land, and after the publication by the marshal of such seizure, the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen for this State, through the special request of his under-agent in Selma, was permitted to use the land during the pendency of the proceedings for condemnation in the United States district court for the benefit of destitute freedmen, then in large numbers in that city; and whilst the land was thus to be used for a humane purpose by the permission of the marshal and myself, and whilst we supposed it was being used to benefit destitute freedmen, without the knowledge or consent of either, the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen attempted to sell this land to one A. K. Shephard, (who for some time claimed ownership) and pretended to pass a valid title therefor, when he knew that the rights of various claimants were being investigated in the district court as to whether the property was liable to condemnation. The houses on this land, instead of being used for the destitute freedmen, as contemplated under the circumstances, were rented to parties who paid rents, and various lots divided off and sold to freedmen for money by the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen's agent in Selma. This was certainly bad faith to the officers of the court, bad faith to the government, and worse faith to take money from freedmen, when it was known no titles could pass to them.

Under all the circumstances, and under the bad faith and unwarranted acts of the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen and his under-agent, I was not disposed, if possible, to have any conflict, and to this end addressed a communication to the Hon. James Speed, then Attorney General, setting forth the whole facts, asking his instructions, and stating if no instructions were received by me, I should not consider any act done by the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen, but proceed as if nothing had been done by him. I received no instructions, but was afterwards informed by him in Washington that no title to lands could pass through or from the Bureau, and I learn the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen was so informed at the time, and that a sale of lands by him, if not ratified by Congress, would pass no title to the purchaser. After it became manifest that no power to sell lands was invested in the Bureau, the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen for Alabama claimed to act under an order issued by the President. The President told me, however, which was very manifest from its language, that this order was not intended, nor could it be construed to do anything more than permit the Bureau to use property whilst it should be in progress of condemnation in the courts.

I have been thus particular to explain fully matters which I know are misrepresented to the Attorney General, in order that he may clearly see the position of the cases inquired about, and every step taken in their progress to condemnation.

The assistant Commissioner of Freedmen in Alabama has also, I understand, sold to the same A. K. Shephard & Co. the Brierfield iron and coal lands, 3,690 acres of land, valued at from three to five hundred thousand dollars, for $45,000 at private sale. This land was libelled by me in September, 1865, and publication made thereof, and the case now pending with various claimants, the facts fully known to the assistant Commissioner of Freedmen; and yet he sells this land without notice to the marshal or myself, and without even making provision for expenses incurred by the seizure and proceedings, and fees for officers of the court.

United States Attorney.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 22, 1865.

JAMES Q. SMITH, Esq., U. S. Attorney, Montgomery, Alabama:

SIR: The Central Bank of Alabama has informed this office through its counsel in this city, W. D. Davidge, esq., that certain cotton belonging to that corporation has been seized at Selma by the marshal of your district, acting under your order, with a view to the institution of proceedings to confiscate the property under the act of July 17, 1862.

This office has heretofore been, and is now of the opinion that a proceeding will not be and cannot be sustained in law under that statute to enforce the confiscation of the property of a corporation for any acts done by the directors or agents of the corporation in contravention of the statute. Such acts can only render the directors or agents personally responsible to the law. They cannot render the corporation liable to the penalties of the confiscation act. The directors, being but attorneys, could do no act, unless within the scope of their authority, to bind their principals. Were the rule different, the loyal stockholders and creditors of the corporation, including those who may never have been in the rebellious States, would lose their property without having been in any way in fault. If the law were otherwise, the property of every town and city whose officers may have applied any part of the corporation funds in aid of the rebellion would be liable to confiscation; and thus loyal citizens as well as rebels might be punished for acts in which they had no personal share or sympathy.

You are authorized, in the case of the Central Bank of Alabama, to govern your official action by this opinion, and to abandon the seizure. If, however, you should be of a contrary opinion, and do not concur in the view of the law here stated, you will report your reasons to this office, and await its further decision of the question. But pending its action on your report, you will not take any further steps in the case to the prejudice of the corporation.

Very respectfully, &c.,

(Signed) J. HUBLEY ASHTON,
Assistant Attorney General..

If the property mentioned in your letter belonged to the confederate government, you will take steps to have the same seized and confiscated.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1866.

SIR: It is represented to this office that you have instituted proceedings to confiscate 749 bales of cotton, claimed as belonging to the Bank of Louisiana. It has been heretofore held by this office that proceedings for confiscation will not be, under the statute of 1862, against the property of a corporation, the view being that a corporate body is not capable of doing any of the acts denounced by the statute, and which subject property to confiscation.

If, therefore, the case to which I have referred comes within the application of this ruling, you will discontinue the present proceedings. If, however, the facts present a different case from the one supposed, you will suspend further action in the case, whether for sale or condemnation, until you shall have reported the facts of the case, and the grounds of condemnation, and receive further instructions from this office.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Under no circumstances, however, could this office consent to pay a commission to assistant or associate counsel upon the amounts realized in any suits to which the United States are concerned or have an interest, and for the very plain reason that it has no authority to make any such arrangement with anybody. Your application, therefore, cannot at present be allowed.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1866.

SIR: In the matter of the United States vs. 192 bales cotton, claimed by the Bank of Louisiana, you are instructed to consent to the substitution of a bond executed by claimants, and sufficient sureties for the value of the property, in the place of cotton: and on the filing of such bond, to direct the delivery of the property in the custody of the marshal to the claimants or their agent. An affidavit by J. C. B. Mitchell may be sent to you in regard to the facts of the case, as they will be sworn to by that gentleman.

You are instructed to take that affidavit into consideration, and to report your opinion as to the probability of the success of the government on the hearing on the merits. If you are of opinion, on the whole case, that the testimony under your control will not justify the conclusions stated to this office in your report of May 7th, you are authorized to discontinue the suit. It would seem that you relied on the supposed tesimony of Mr. Mitchell. It is not for this office to determine the weight of the whole evidence in your possession. This you will determine, and report your opinion in regard to it at your earliest convenience. It is not the purpose of the government to oppress any one, and unless such evidence is in your possession as would justify condemnation of the property, it is not desired that the claimants should be inconvenienced any further by delay.

Very respectfully, yours,

(Signed) JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General.

This office does not intend to pass upon any question in the case. The object of these instructions is simply to convey to you authority in case the court thinks it has jurisdiction to open the judgment, and if the parties lay good grounds therefor, to consent that they shall have the opportunity to plead their defence before the court.

Lyon—the same having been sold to him by General Swayne, of the Freedmen's Bureau—unless Mr. Lyon should prefer that, for the purpose of securing and perfecting the title, they should be continued for his own use and benefit, and in that case the proceeding will be carried on in the name of the United States at the costs and charges of Mr. Lyon. In case of such dismissal it will be made without costs to Mr. Lyon.

WILLARD'S HOTEL,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1867.

RESPECTED SIR: My special business to Washington, from my home in Montgomery, Alabama, was to see you and have a conference with you. In this I have signally failed, in consequence of your great press of official business. I am compelled to be in Alabama to attend to matters connected with my office on the 3d of February, and I leave Washington to-day for that purpose. Under the circumstances I will respectfully ask you, before acting on any matter or charge preferred against me, to do me the justice and favor of furnishing me with a statement or copy of any matter or charge, in order that I may have an opportunity to explain or refute them. I certainly cannot be asking too much in this, for no person knows better than yourself how easy it is to assail one's character or position, when the ex parte statements of malicious or interested parties are alone received. If furnished with the name or names of my accusers, I have no doubt in clearly showing that it is not the country's good they seek, but to gratify hatred and personal revenge.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 15, 1867.

SIR: From transcripts of judicial record and other documents which have been filed in this office, it appears that a large quantity of old iron, brass, and other debris of certain manufacturing establishments, the property of the late so called confederate States, was sold in May, 1866, at public sale, by a treasury agent, with the express co-operation of the assistant commissioner of freedmen for Alabama, one A. K. Shephard becoming the purchaser, and paying therefor $17,268 53; and that subsequently to such sale a libel was filed by you in the United States district court for the confiscation of a lot of such debris, of which nearly the whole consisted of a part of what had been so purchased by Shephard, and of which the treasury of the United States had already realized the proceeds. It does not appear that a final decree of condemnation has passed, but that the property or its proceeds are in court.

I have to direct you to suspend all further proceedings in this case until otherwise instructed from this office, and to report, as early as practicable, the grounds of the prosecution. You will also suspend action and make report in like manner in the cases following, which passed to condemnation:

United States vs. Thirty acres of land, at Selma.
United States vs. Naval foundry and rolling mill.

Very respectfully, &c.,

BALTIMORE, April 1, 1867.

SIR: There remain still on the docket of the circuit court (the April term of which commenced to-day) a number of treason cases growing out of the 19th of April, '61, riots, resisting passage of troops, &c.

These cases have been continued from time to time, and the parties are urging that some definite action should be had in them, and that they be finally disposed of.

There has been a good deal of correspondence between my predecessors in office and the government in regard to them, as I learn. The latter has not, heretofore, been disposed to try them.

I beg to be informed what is your pleasure in the premises.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) ANDREW STERRETT RIDGELY,
United States District Attorney, Maryland District.

Hon. HENRY STANBERY,
United States Attorney General.

[Copy.]

BALTIMORE, April 4, 1867.

SIR: In a communication from your office of date yesterday, in reply to mine of 1st instant I am instructed to "dismiss all indictments for treason pending in this district based on acts committed by parties acting in a military capacity during the war."

There are on the docket some fifteen cases or more for treason, of which only three, so far as can be ascertained from the pleadings, were "committed by parties acting in a military capacity during the war." Most of the others grew out of obstructing the railways and the passage of troops to Washington, on and about the 19th of April, 1861. Some of the parties connected with these latter acts were acting in a pseudo military capacity, as patrol guards and auxiliaries to the police force, but can scarcely come within the limits of your instructions. They are anxious to have their cases disposed of, and the court is pressing me to take some final action in regard to them, they having been continued from term to term for the last four or five years, or since the November term, 1861. Many, or most of them, seem to me to have been the result of mere riotous excitement, highly discreditable, considering the character and position of those offending, yet scarcely at this late day, I think, demanding to be regarded or punished as treason.

They will be called up, seriatim, by the court, for final disposition, to-morrow, Friday, the 5th instant, and I desire to know the pleasure of the government in regard to them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) ANDREW STERRETT RIDGELY,
United States District Attorney, Maryland District.

Hon. HENRY STANBERY, Attorney General.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, September 20, 1865.

RESPECTED SIR: I have the honor to lay before you, and through you, the President of the United States, the following facts just disclosed in this city:

A. D. Barnett, Isaac Micon, A. Kirk, and others, compose the firm of "Barnett, Micon, & Company," of Montgomery, and are the owners and proprietors of the Tallassa factory, situate in Tallapoosa county, in this State. This company is made up of men of known hostility to the United States government, and of active participants in the late rebellion, to which they have rendered the most material aid and assistance. They have had, since the commencement of the rebellion, large contracts for the manufacture of clothing for the rebel army, the cotton being furnished by the late confederate States for this purpose. I am informed this company have refused, during the late rebellion, to furnish the almost naked people with cloth from their factory, giving as a reason that, as contractors for the rebel government, they could alone furnish that government and the soldiers thereof with cotton cloth. At the close of the rebellion this firm found themselves in the possession of about 25,000 bales of cotton, with large quantities of other property, most of the cotton belonging to the rebel government, sent to the factory to be manufactured into clothing. The company immediately set about to find a means of protecting themselves and all the property in possession from condemnation as forfeited to the United States. Under the act of Congress they first set about procuring pardons for each member of the company, and proposed and contracted with a prominent lawyer in this city, (now dead,) named Seibles, to give him (Seibles) one-third of all the cotton if he would procure them pardons. The petitions were prepared, recommended, sent to the President, and the pardons returned. When the pardons were received the original contract was set aside, and $60,000 paid to the lawyer for his services. This company now boast of the handsome manner in which they procured pardons, thereby saving all the property in possession; and not satisfied, I learn they have filed with the Secretary of the Treasury a large claim for some damages sustained at the hands of the United States soldiers. The proof in the above matter can be made; it is the common conversation on the streets of this city. Other cases of a like kind are known. I present this one, however, for your consideration, and that of the President, in order that I may receive such instructions in the premises as will tend to reach such imposition on the President, and punish the parties concerned. Can pardons obtained in this manner be used to cover up property which, of right, ought to belong to the government of the United States?

I have the honor, sir, to be your obedient servant,

(Signed) JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

Hon. JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General United States.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
MIDDLE DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, September 22, 1865.

RESPECTED SIR: Your communication of the 22d instant, containing opinion in reference to the proceedings instituted by me against the "Central Bank of Alabama," of Montgomery, a corporation, is now before me, delivered by the president of that institution. In it you request the abandonment of the seizure made by the marshal, and state it as your opinion, a proceeding under the act of July 17, 1861, cannot be sustained against the Central Bank of Alabama, a corporation, for acts done by the directors thereof; and further, you state, after advising a discontinuance of proceeding, that if I should be of a contrary opinion to report the reasons to your office, and pending such report, to take no further steps to the prejudice of the corporation. I see no reason whatever to have a contrary opinion to the one contained in the communication; the opinion is the law. But there is both a misunderstanding as to the facts and also as to the proceedings instituted by me against the Central Bank property. I have not instituted proceedings against the corporation as a corporation, nor under the act of July 17, 1862; the proceedings are against property used and employed for insurrectionary purposes, in aiding, assisting, and abetting an insurrection against the laws, and permitting the same to be used knowingly, and with the consent of the owners, in aiding, abetting, and promoting persons engaged in rebellion, under the act of August 6, 1861.

The facts are as follows: The Central Bank of Alabama has, at various times during the existence of the late rebellion, loaned the State of Alabama and the late so-called "confederate States of America," large quantities of gold and bank bills, to the amount probably of three hundred thousand dollars. For this loan the bank received State bonds issued for war purposes, and the bonds of the rebel government. The bank bills were converted into greenbacks and the greenbacks into gold, and sent through the blockade to purchase ships and munitions of war for the rebel navy. The bank was used as a circulating office for rebel currency and rebel bonds; the bank house was used and occupied, with the consent of the stockholders here and directors, as a confederate States depository, for receiving confederate currency, and the sale and distribution of confederate bonds, and for the receipt of cotton subscribed to rebel loan. The president of this bank was sent to Richmond as a delegate to a bank convention, the object of which was to devise ways and means to uphold and sustain the credit of the rebel government, and prevent rebel currency from depreciation. It appears to me the act of 6th of August, 1861, has no meaning unless the bank building of the Central Bank of Alabama, used, occupied, and employed as above, is liable to confiscation and sale. The "Central Bank of Alabama," during the late rebellion, has, with confederate currency and bonds, purchased large quantities of cotton, some of which, I am informed, was received from rebel cotton agents, and some from persons engaged in rebellion; all of which is confiscable as being sold, purchased, acquired, and given for rebel purposes, and in aiding, abetting, and promoting an insurrection. Cotton subscribed to the rebel cotton loan was delivered at this bank; the bank received it, and paid the rebel government its value in currency, keeping the cotton. This is the cotton seized by the marshal for condemnation under the act of 6th August, 1861, as being sold, purchased, and acquired, and as being sold and given, and suffered to be used and employed in aiding, abetting, and promoting insurrection. It strikes me very forcibly that this property is clearly covered by the act last stated; otherwise I do not see its object.

I cannot see how the wrong and injury referred to in your opinion can arise, as all persons having or claiming to have any cause why the property seized should not be condemned are notified to be and appear at the next term of the court and propound their claim. Innocent parties may show that they neither authorized nor ratified the act done which rendered the interest of the claimant liable. This would be a full defence to loyal stockholders. As for bona fide creditors having a lien, they are never affected by confiscation acts.

It is a sound legal proposition that the directors of a corporation or agents can do no act outside the line and scope of their authority which would bind the stockholders; but suppose, as is the fact, that the stockholders of Central Bank authorized the acts complained of, or assented and ratified them after they were done, I take it that in such a case the stockholders would be bound by their own direction and assent.

The Central Bank of Alabama at this time cannot be considered in existence; it has no habitation or place of business; its banking house is rented to other parties; the bills are valueless, refused as currency. What was known as the Central Bank of Alabama exists now only for the purpose of suits in law or equity; all the tangible effects of the bank are sold, exchanged, or given to the State of Alabama, or to the rebel States, for the purpose of aiding, assisting, and abetting the rebellion, except the bank building and the cotton seized by the marshal, and when this property is released, the proceeds thereof will be in the pockets of a few sharp officers of what was known as the Central Bank in thirty-six hours thereafter; in fact, it is said now to be transferred to a man of straw. Suppose proceedings to be instituted (as is the fact) against the individual stockholders of the corporation, what can be seized? Simply the interests of such stockholders in the proceeds of a bank building and cotton in the pocket of some agent of the bank, and which would be probably immediately distributed.

Innocent stockholders are not in a worse condition when the property of the corporation has been seized for some unlawful act; all the goods are seized in consequence of some act committed by a part. The honest shipper in this case must show the innocence of his goods, when they are released on "probable cause."

The most extensive and effective aiders and abettors of the late rebellion in this State are corporations; the foundries, factories, machine shops, rolling mills, coal and iron mines, belong to the corporations. All the clothing for the army, the shot, shell, cannon, and small-arms were made by corporations; many of the corporations have received large advancements of money from the late rebel government to build their foundries, factories, machine shops, and rolling mills; and men have been detached to work in those establishments, and to mine coal and iron. The rebellion being over, they find themselves in possession of extensive works and large quantities of material. They claim all as corporation property, and if,

according to your opinion, this kind of property, knowingly used and employed by the miners, with the consent of the owners thereof, in aiding, abetting, and promoting an insurrection against the government of the United States cannot be reached, then the great criminals in the late rebellion go unwhipped of justice, and property partly owned by the late rebel government itself cannot be reached by the act of August 6, 1861.

I have felt it my duty to lay this matter of the Central Bank before you fully, and my views thereon, as it is only one of more than fifty of a like kind under investigation; and having given the facts and circumstances, and my opinion, if the Attorney General should still be of the same opinion, and that the case vs. the Central Bank should be dismissed, and the seizure abandoned, it shall be done with pleasure; in the mean time no steps will be taken to the prejudice of the corporation.

I am, sir, with the highest consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

Attorney General United States, Washington.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, October 14, 1865.

RESPECTED SIR: Your communication of the 2d instant is just received, stating that "on yesterday the President received a telegram from a Mr. Parkman, complaining about the seizure of some cotton, which he claims to own, and which, he says, is not subject to be seized, because of his pardon."

This communication would have received an earlier reply only for the fact that it was directed to Selma instead of to Montgomery, and therefore was not received in proper time.

The marshal of this district has strict orders from me to seize no property of persons who have the President's pardon, and your letter contained the first intimation that any property of Mr. Parkman's was seized by the marshal, who is now in a distant part of the district. When he comes back, or if I can communicate with him, the property seized will be delivered up.

Cotton has been seized by the marshal in and about Selma, not as belonging to individuals, but as the property of the late so-called confederate States. This Mr. Parkman was an officer in what was called the Selma bank—not now in existence. This bank was a confederate States depository for bonds, and the paper currency of the rebel government. This bank acted as the agent of the rebel government in purchasing large quantities of cotton—to the amount, I am informed, of fifteen or twenty thousand bales. This cotton was stored on the plantations of the persons from whom he purchased, and was there at the time of the surrender of this department. Since the surrender, and while everything was in confusion, (and before the officers of the district court arrived here,) the greater part was shipped to Mobile and to New York, by F. W. Siddons, Washington Smith, and this same Parkman—all officers and agents of the rebel government—now pardoned. Each of those individuals having obtained pardon and amnesty, extending to person and property, are not satisfied, but have sold and claimed, and now claim, the confederate States cotton, which they, as agents, knew all about, its location, &c.

Under your directions, contained in communication of the 28th of September, cotton or other property belonging to the late rebel government has, and will be, seized—such property not being covered by pardon.

I am satisfied that the President will have various complaints from persons who state individual property has been seized after obtaining pardon; but let me assure the Attorney General, and through him the President of the United States, who he will please hand this letter to, that no property of persons pardoned by him shall be seized by the marshal; and when such representations are made, it will appear on investigation to be property attempted to be covered by pardon, when it was property belonging to the rebel government. And as an instance of my respect for the President's action, I herewith enclose copy of a notice inserted by me in the city paper.

I would further state to the Attorney General that I am at the original capital of the rebellion. They were all rebels here, and are yet, if circumstances would permit. Disloyal language is often made use of. This, in connection with being the fountain-head of precipitation, may also be considered the last ditch. As the rebels' territory became contracted, the property was concentrated mostly in Alabama. Vast amounts of rebel property, mostly cotton, are all over the country, in the hands of persons who either acted as agents of the rebel government, or were well posted in its location, or on the plantations of persons who sold it, or in the possession of manufacturing companies who received it to work into cloth. This being the case, when the marshal seizes such property, the parties in possession will immediately claim it as individual property, covered by pardon.

I am satisfied, when the President understands the reason why such seizures are made, he will not permit persons to cover up the property of the rebel government, and which now, in fact, belongs to the United States.

I am, sir, with the highest consideration, your obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

Hon. JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General United States, Washington.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, October 3, 1865.

All persons having obtained pardons from the President of the United States, and whose property has been seized by the United States marshal of the middle district of Alabama, will have the same released by plea of pardon, made by counsel at the next term of the court.

All persons whose property has been seized as liable to confiscation, and who have applied for pardon, and whose applications have been recommended by the provisional Governor, but pardons not obtained, may have their cases continued at the next term of the district court, upon a proper showing of the facts by the counsel, for a reasonable time, in order to permit such persons to receive their pardons.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, October 26, 1865.

RESPECTED SIR: Yours of the 18th inst. was received, directing me to release any corporation property that may have been seized, and cause no more seizures of such property to be made.

On receipt of former letter, and before the receipt of your last, all such property has been released from seizure by the marshal, and none others have or will be made.

This I do not understand, however, to be a release of property owned by the late so-called confederate States, and in the possession of corporations now. Cotton, wool, iron, and other materials have been furnished by the late rebel government to corporation companies, and left in their possession when the rebellion closed. Am I to release this property, or refrain from seizing it?

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, very respectfully,

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, December 1, 1865.

RESPECTED SIR: I have just returned from North Alabama, (Huntsville,) and find two communications from you. I will, in reply, state that your instructions will be strictly followed, and your request complied with as soon as possible.

The district court is now in session here; no business except regulating future practice, and some routine matters, will be transacted.

I will write the Attorney General fully after court adjourns, and also expect to see him in Washington, where many matters concerning my proceedings will be fully and satisfactorily explained.

I have the honor to be the Attorney General's obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, March 12, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: Permit me to call your attention, and ask your advice and instructions on the following cases, many of which have arisen in this district:

During the existence of the rebel government, the planters subscribed largely to what was known as the confederate States loan, taking bonds or confederate scrip therefor, the cotton to be sent to warehouses, or kept on plantations until called for by confederate agents. When the United States army took possession of the country, much of this cotton was on plantations where purchased, but never moved. The original owners immediately cut from off the ends of the cotton bales C. S. A., and in some instances repacked the cotton, substituting other marks; then selling the cotton and appropriating the proceeds to their own use. In some instances the planters will not sell the cotton themselves, but permit others to take it at a certain amount per bale, the purchaser agreeing to run all risks. The sharp cotton speculators, knowing where cotton was located, purchased with a full understanding of the facts. When the evidence is clear I intend to sue such parties for a conversion of this property, but would first like to get your opinion.

During the rebellion several companies were organized here and in Georgia, styled the "direct importing and exporting" companies, expressly for the sole purpose of purchasing cotton and running the blockade to Liverpool, and bring back necessary articles for sale. The members subscribed cotton as stock, and made fortunes by this direct trade. When the confederacy ended, this cotton was in various sections of the country—much of which can yet be found. These companies were formed for illegal purposes, and it appears to me that the cotton itself is liable under the act of March 6, 1861.

Under your instructions of November 24, 1865, (enclosing letter from the Secretary of the Treasury,) I have carefully abstained from seizing this cotton, and gave the whole matter up to treasury agents. I was, however, of the opinion then, and convinced now, that the Secretary of the Treasury made a grand mistake, as under this treasury cotton agency system the most glaring frauds have been committed. Through the court at least 15,000 bales could have been secured the government. The treasury agents, having concluded their operations, are leaving. I have some of the cotton subscription books, and some of the blockade subscription books, with evidence. I have caused some seizures, and would like to know whether I ought to proceed against this blockade cotton.

The principal cotton books used by the blockaders are in Columbus, Georgia, but I cannot reach them; the parties will not give them up. How could I get the books? The Secretary of the Treasury was under the impression that large quantities of cotton had been seized here. There was a large quantity—the property of persons engaged in the rebellion—seized under the act of July, 1862. The parties having been specially pardoned by the President, of course the cotton seized, with other property, was immediately given up.

Hoping to hear from you, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

Hon. JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General United States, Washington, D. C.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, March 21, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR; Some time since I filed information and caused warrants to be issued against various pieces of property, (real estate,) which during the rebellion were purchased by the late rebel government for mining purposes, for the erection of gun factories, foundries, and machine-shops, deeds having passed from the owners, in most cases, to the rebel government. There are now, however, claimants intervening, and claiming to have interest in this property, and have complied with the rules of the court in doing so. General Swayne, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, during my absence in Washington, and knowing that the marshal had seized and advertised the property as prescribed by law, advertised and sold the same at public outcry, appropriating the proceeds thereof to the use of the bureau. This is done, I learn, under an order from the President, (a copy of which is attached,) but it appears to me the order in no way authorizes the sale of real estate, and certainly can have no reference to property in the charge of the marshal. I had directed the marshal long before this order was issued, to permit the bureau to have the use and custody of this property until the same was disposed of by law, but the sales and appropriation of the proceeds to the use of the bureau I did not anticipate.

I do not wish to have any conflict with the officers of the bureau; on the contrary I have done all in my power for them, but I cannot permit this unauthorized proceeding to pass. The President's order does not cover the case, and it simply amounts to this, that the officers of the United States court have performed services in the line of their duty, yet the officers of the bureau take and sell the property in court under warrant. What title is given under such sale amounts to nothing. What would the Attorney General advise under the circumstances? As between the treasury cotton agents taking cotton out of the marshal's possession, under orders from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the officers of the bureau taking and selling the real estate in possession of the marshal, the United States court is a thing in name, but of no practical purpose, and the officers will have to get into the bureau or Treasury Department for subsistence.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney, Alabama.

Hon. JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General United States, Washington, D. C.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Washington City, November 11, 1865.

Ordered, That the civil and military agents of the government transfer to the Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands for Alabama the use and custody of all real estate, buildings, or other property held by them in that State, as belonging to the late rebel government, together with such funds as may arise, or have arisen, from the rent, sale or disposition of such property which have not been finally paid into the treasury of the United States.

(Signed,) E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, May 7, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: Your communication about certain cotton seized in this district and now claimed by the Bank of Louisiana has been received, to which I would respectfully reply as follows:

It is not true that 749 bales of cotton, as stated in your communication, has been seized. There have been seized by the United States marshal, under warrant founded on an information of an informer, under the act of August 6, 1861, 192 bales of cotton. This cotton was subscribed and sold in the year 1862, by one J. C. B. Mitchell, of this county, to one James A. Farley, agent for the late rebel cotton produce loan, "for the defence of the confederate States." I have now before me the original subscription lists, showing the subscription of Mitchell to said loan, headed "subscription of cotton for the defence of the confederate States." Mitchell was in my office on Saturday, 5th instant, and states to me that he did sell this cotton to the rebel cotton agent, Farley; that he is prepared to come into court and prove this fact; and, further, that it is the same cotton subscribed by him, which now of right should be condemned to the use of the United States, under Dick Taylor's surrender to General Canby, at New Orleans.

This cotton has not been seized as belonging to the Bank of Louisiana, but as cotton "knowingly used and employed, sold and acquired" in "aiding, abetting, and promoting an insurrection and resistence to the laws and authority of the United States." Upon these cotton sales and subscriptions "for the defence of the confederate States," the confederate States were enabled to obtain advancements on credit and all securities in Europe.

I will now state to the Attorney General how the agents of the Bank of Louisiana claim to have cotton in the State of Alabama. The Bank of Louisiana loaned the rebel government several hundred thousand dollars in gold before the capture of New Orleans. After the occupation of that city by General Butler, he issued an order prohibiting the further circulation of confederate notes or bonds. The President and other officers of the bank procured permission from the rebel government to come into Alabama and other rebellious States and receive cotton for the loan made by the bank, and also to purchase cotton with the confederate notes and other securities in the possession of the bank, then useless in New Orleans. This could not be done, however, without the consent of General Butler. This consent was obtained, the bank paying General Butler five thousand dollars for the necessary papers. Of course, I state the Butler part of this transaction not from my own knowledge of it, but from information of reliable persons who were so informed by the bank officers and agents, and who saw the papers after they were brought from New Orleans. Under this authority the bank agents received and purchased not less than ten thousand bales.

Whilst in Washington, in January, I had a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury on this Louisiana bank cotton matter, and it was his opinion the cotton was manifestly liable to condemnation, but he would prefer that his treasury agents, then in Alabama, should seize and forward it for sale to New York, and requested me to assist them, if necessary. I have done so. But all the treasury agents have been withdrawn from the State, hence my action in the premises. I now am satisfied it was unfortunate for the treasury that all this cotton, ten thousand bales, were not seized under proper process, and have all this transaction investigated judicially. When all the facts and circumstances are disclosed, it will be difficult to see why the officers of the Louisiana Bank and agents could, under the circumstances, and at a time when, under the law and proclamation of the President, commercial intercourse was prohibited, receive, purchase, and acquire property in Alabama for paper currency issued by the rebel government for rebel purposes, and which was by military order prohibited in New Orleans from circulation, then brought for the purposes aforesaid to Alabama.

Under your order of November last I have released all property belonging to corporations, even where the chartered rights disclose that the corporation was organized with the special and particular intent and specified object of aiding and assisting the rebellion by the manufacture of shot, shell, and small-arms, and I have not since caused any seizure of such property, although Judge Busteed did not, nor does he now, hold to the opinion of the Attorney General, at least so far as property acquired for rebel purposes and the costs incurred in making seizures. I have, under said order, specially given, directed the marshal to release 1,300 bales of cotton in his possession, and claimed by the "Central Bank of Alabama," of this city, as property belonging to a corporation. The cotton has been shipped to Liverpool, the money distributed between the officers of an institution not in existence for twelve months; and in investigating other frauds I find that not one bale of this 1,300 bales was the bona fide property of the bank, and the only interest the bank ever had in said cotton was, that when the United States army, under General Wilson, had captured Selma and approached this city, and it having been stated that all the cotton would be destroyed, the bank chartered some steamboats and transported the 1,300 bales up the Alabama and into the Tallapoosa river for safety, where it was seized by the United States marshal, and released as aforesaid. This cotton was marked C. S. A. when stored in Montgomery, the marks afterwards torn off. It may be just to state, however, that the bank had cotton stored, probably to an equal amount, in the warehouses, but in the confusion of the occasion 1,300 bales of rebel cotton were substituted and taken by the bank. Is not the bank liable for the cotton, or the value thereof, now? The evidence is full and complete on the subject.

I will further state, in reference to the Louisiana bank cotton, that I am credibly informed all the interest the bank had has been transferred or assigned to one Josiah Morris, a wealthy cotton speculator of this city, who buys all sorts of property, "running all risks," and that the counsel engaged in Washington, who have no doubt called upon the Attorney General, are employed by him.

Having written fully on the subject inquired about, I have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

(Signed) JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney, Northern District of Alabama.

Hon. JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General United States, Washington, D. C.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, May 9, 1867.

Under the act of August 2, 1861, 12 Stat., 268, I would respectfully ask that you authorize me to retain, in the name of the United States, assistant counsel to assist me in the prosecution of some large cotton cases, prepared for the present term.

The defendants are wealthy cotton speculators, and have retained several able attorneys in each case.

The act prescribes that you shall stipulate with such assistant counsel the amount of compensation. I do not see how this can be done, unless you are informed of the sum involved in each case where assistance is necessary.

With your permission and direction I can procure the services of Benjamin L. Whelan, esq., of this State, (now recommended for United States district attorney of the southern district of Alabama.) He is a lawyer of fine ability, and I can make the following arrangement with him:

Ten per cent. on amounts recovered in any case by the United States, and no fee or compensation where the United States is not successful, and no fee or compensation in any case where judgment is not for the government.

I consider this a good and reasonable proposition, and if acceptable to you I would be pleased to know it immediately, as our court opens 28th of May.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney, Alabama.

JAMES Q. SMITH,

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, June 13, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: I am in receipt of the following despatch, and would like to be informed if it was sent by you. The name signed is John M. Speed. I know of no such person as Attorney General.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1866.

("Received at Montgomery June 11.)

"To JAMES Q SMITH, United States District Attorney:

"JOHN M. SPEED, Attorney General."

I cannot act on this despatch, and would be pleased to receive a letter on the subject. I will, of course, follow your instructions. I have suspended proceedings in the Louisiana bank case, and would like to know what course can be adopted as to costs incurred by the marshal, and information filed by informers under the act of August 6, 1861. I will respectfully request the Attorney General to give this matter his attention.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, June 12, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: The case of the United States and an informer vs. 192 bales of cotton claimed by Josiah Morris, agent of the Bank of Louisiana, was set for hearing on the day after your telegram of the 10th instant, directing me to suspend proceedings in the case, was received. I have suspended further action until I hear fully what I am to do. Some three weeks since I received a communication from the assistant Attorney General on the subject of this cotton. I forwarded a full statement, setting forth the fact that 150 bales of the 192 was subscribed to the rebel cotton loan; that the balance was purchased by the agents of the Bank of Louisiana, at a time when by act of Congress and the proclamation of the President all commercial intercourse between States and parts of States in rebellion and insurrection was forbidden. The agents of the bank were permitted to leave New Orleans under passport from Major General Butler, he receiving $5,000 therefor, the object being to use the scrip and bonds of the rebel government in the purchase of cotton. This cotton is manifestly liable. The officers of the bank know this, and have refused to take any steps or file claims. This is done by a few sharp cotton speculators, who propose to give attorneys large portions if successful in obtaining its release. I will ask the Attorney General to examine the statement sent by me on this subject. Under the act of August 6, 1861, an informer is entitled to certain portions of property condemned. In the cotton cases instituted by me, and particularly the case of 192 bales, information has been filed by an informer, who has filed the necessary bond for prosecution. Much expense has been incurred. The proceedings are for an informer, as well as the United States. Can such cases be dismissed where the rights of third parties have accrued under the statute; and if so, shall the informer, acting under an act of Congress in good faith, have to pay large costs and lawyer's fees? It appears to me that this would be real injustice, and the consequence will be that where much property can be secured to the United States under said act, if cases commenced under it are dismissed, after large expenses incurred in getting up a case, and providing and paying witnesses' fees, no person would become an informer for the United States.

I would respectfully ask the Attorney General to look into this matter. The counsel for informants deny the right to dismiss, where the proceedings are for an informer and the United States, when bond for costs is filed, and the United States under no costs or obligation whatever. I will await instructions, and if such cases are to be dismissed, I would like to be advised who should pay the costs and fees.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

MONTGOMERY, June 11, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: Your communication of the 7th instant, asking for the facts in the case of the United States vs. John M. Parkman, of Selma, Alabama, has been received, to which I reply as follows:

In September, 1865, some of the property of Parkman was seized by the marshal, under information founded on the act of July 17, 1862, he being worth twenty thousand dollars, and having acted in the confederate States depository as an officer (civil) to pay the rebel employés, who built gunboats, cast cannon, and built ships. Just after the seizure I was informed he had obtained a pardon from the President, and without ever seeing the pardon, and only acting on general information, I caused the property seized to be released. The only question left was to inquire as to his liability for court costs. This could only be done by letting me see his pardon, letter of acceptance and oath, or produce the same in court, and have the proceedings dismissed. This, Mr. Parkman, an original precipitating fire-eater of the Yancey school, could not stoop to do. He could apply to the President for a pardon, but could not stoop to show that pardon to the law officer of the government, or in the usual way plead it in court, so that the case may be dismissed. This is all of Mr. Parkman's case, and you will see it is no case at all, nor even founded on the plainest principles of propriety or thankfulness for the President's favor.

No less than two hundred cases where persons have been pardoned have been dismissed last week by the court on my motion, the pardons having been produced in court, and copies filed in court. This universal course the rebel Mr. Parkman wishes to be an exception to, hence his letter to the President. I find that Mr. Parkman, like many others has, when filing his letter of acceptance, failed to take and subscribe to the oath prescribed in the President's amnesty proclamation, and did not do so until after proceedings commenced, and I am under the impression he would not have done so only for the steps taken.

You will please to present this letter as my report of Mr. Parkman's case to the President.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES Q. SMITH,
United States District Attorney.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, FOR THE NORTHERN AND MIDDLE DISTRICTS OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Alabama, August 4, 1866.

RESPECTED SIR: Yours of the 30th of July, instructing me to consent to the opening of a judgment in the case of the United States vs. School lot, claimed by the city of Selma, has been received.

I will consent to the opening of the judgment, so that the city of Selma may file claim, and put in defence, when application is made to the court for that purpose.

What defence the city of Selma can make I am at a loss to know, as by a vote of the common council, the proceedings of which I have, they direct the sale of the lot to the confederate States government for $4,000, to be used for an arsenal ground for making guns, swords, pistols, &c., &c. The city of Salem executed its deed of conveyance under the supervision of the city authority. The deed is now in my possession. I have not been informed before that the city desired a defence put in. The lot was advertised by the marshal in the city paper, calling upon all persons having, or claiming to have, any interest therein to appear and show cause why the lot should not be condemned. This notice by advertising is dated October, 1865. Two terms of court have since passed, but no claim has been put in.

The sale takes place shortly, under the supervision of the marshal, who has the order of sale. The judge is absent from the State, and no steps can be had to set aside the order.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
