[21] In Buckley, the Supreme Court provided the genesis for the concept of issue and express advocacy communications. In order to avoid invalidation of a provision of FECA on grounds of unconstitutional vagueness, the Court applied a limiting construction so that the provision applied only to noncandidate "expenditures for communications that in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate for federal office" (that is, express advocacy). In a footnote, the Court explained that this limiting construction would restrict the application of the provision to communications containing express advocacy terms, such as "vote for," "elect," "support," "cast your ballot for," "Smith for Congress," "vote against," "defeat," and "reject." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 44, n.52.

Amdt1.7.11.4 Campaign Finance Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has generally affirmed the constitutionality of campaign disclosure requirements. In Buckley v. Valeo, the Court identified three governmental interests justifying Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) disclosure requirements.[1] First, the Court determined that disclosure provides the electorate with information as to the source of campaign money, how it is spent, and "the interests to which a candidate is most likely to be responsive"—an informational interest.[2] Second, the Court stated that disclosure serves to deter corruption and its appearance by uncovering large contributions and expenditures "to the light of publicity," observing that with this information, voters are better able to detect illicit "post-election special favors" by an officeholder in exchange for the contributions.[3] Third, the Court identified disclosure requirements as an essential method of detecting violations for referral to law enforcement.[4] In upholding the constitutionality of FECA's disclosure requirements for independent expenditures, the Court determined that so long as they encompass only funds used for express advocacy communications, the requirement is constitutional.[5] Likewise, in McConnell v. FEC, rejecting a facial challenge to enhanced disclosure requirements, the Court observed that the Buckley ruling distinguished between express advocacy and issue advocacy for the purposes of statutory construction, not constitutional command, and therefore, the First Amendment did not require creating "a rigid barrier" between the two in this case.[6] In other words, the Court determined, because electioneering communications are intended to influence an election, the absence of "magic words" of express advocacy does not obviate the government's interest in requiring disclosure of such ads in order to combat corruption or its appearance.[7]

Expanding on its holding in Buckley, in subsequent campaign finance disclosure cases, the balancing of interests has tipped in favor of the constitutionality of disclosure requirements under the First Amendment. In Citizens United v. FEC, the Court upheld FECA's disclosure requirements for electioneering communications as applied to a political documentary and broadcast advertisements promoting it.[8] The Court determined that while they may burden the ability to speak, disclosure requirements "impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities," and "do not prevent anyone from speaking."[9] Accordingly, the Court evaluated the requirements under a standard of "exacting scrutiny," a less-rigorous standard than the "strict

---

[1] See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 66–68.

[2] Id. at 66–67.

[3] Id. at 67.

[4] See id. at 66–68.

[5] See id. at 79–80. ("[W]hen the maker of the expenditure is . . . an individual other than a candidate or a group other than a 'political committee,' the relation of the information sought to the purposes of the Act may be too remote. To insure that the reach . . . is not impermissibly broad, we construe 'expenditure' . . . to reach only funds used for communications that expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate. This reading is directed precisely to that spending that is unambiguously related to the campaign of a particular federal candidate.").

[6] Id. at 193, 201–02.

[7] Id. at 193–94.

[8] See Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 366–371.

[9] Id. at 366 (quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 64).

scrutiny" standard the Court has used to evaluate restrictions on campaign expenditures.[10] Exacting scrutiny requires a "substantial relation" between the disclosure requirement and a "sufficiently important" government interest, the Court announced.[11] Further, in Doe v. Reed, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a Washington State public records law.[12] Categorizing the statute as a disclosure requirement and, therefore, "not a prohibition of speech," the Court evaluated the law under the standard of exacting scrutiny.[13] The Court determined that the law was substantially related to the governmental interest of safeguarding the integrity of the electoral process and announced that public disclosure "promotes transparency and accountability in the electoral process to an extent other measures cannot."[14]

Similar to disclosure requirements, the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality under the First Amendment of campaign finance disclaimer requirements.[15] In McConnell v FEC, the Supreme Court upheld the facial validity of the FECA disclaimer requirements, as amended by Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA).[16] Specifically, the Court determined that the FECA disclaimer requirement "bear[ ] a sufficient relationship to the important governmental interest of 'shedding the light of publicity on campaign financing.'"[17] Revisiting the issue in Citizens United, the Court upheld the disclaimer requirement in BCRA as applied to a political documentary and the broadcast advertisements that an organization planned to run promoting the movie.[18] According to the Court, while they may burden the ability to speak, like disclosure requirements, disclaimer requirements "impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities," and "do not prevent anyone from speaking."[19]

[10] See id. at 366–67.

[11] Id. The Court expressly rejected the argument that the scope of FECA's disclosure requirements for electioneering communications must be limited to speech that is express advocacy, or the "functional equivalent of express advocacy." Id. at 369–370. See also Indep. Inst. v. FEC, 216 F. Supp. 3d 176, 189 (D.D.C. 2016), summ. aff'd, Indep. Inst. v. FEC, No. 16–743 (U.S. Feb. 27, 2017) (summarily affirming a three-judge federal district court ruling that upheld the constitutionality of FECA's disclosure requirements for electioneering communications, after determining that the First Amendment does not require limiting disclosure requirements to speech that is the functional equivalent of express advocacy).

[12] 561 U.S. 186 (2010).

[13] Id. at 196.

[14] Id. at 199. See also, Americans for Prosperity Foundation v. Bonta, No. 19–251, slip op. at 2, 11 (U.S. July 1, 2021) (subjecting a California disclosure law to an exacting scrutiny standard that requires a "narrow tailoring" to a sufficiently important governmental interest asserted; while not a campaign finance case, the ruling may have consequences for the constitutionality of campaign finance disclosure requirements going forward).

[15] Although FECA does not contain the term "disclaimer," the law specifies the content of attribution statements to be included in certain communications, which are known as disclaimer requirements. See, e.g., FEC webpage, Advertising and disclaimers, available at https://www.fec.gov/help-candidates-and-committees/making-disbursements/advertising/ (last visited Dec. 29, 2021).

[16] See McConnell, 540 U.S. at 230–31.

[17] Id. at 231.

[18] See Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 367.

[19] Id. at 366.

Amdt1.7.11.5 Lobbying

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

To lobby means generally "to try to persuade a government official . . . in an attempt to influence some action proposed to be taken."[1] In its most basic form, lobbying is a form of petitioning the government,[2] a right protected under the First Amendment.[3]

While the First Amendment protects the right to petition, the Supreme Court has determined that Congress may regulate individuals who are paid to lobby Congress. For example, Congress may require that lobbyists register, make specific disclosures, and submit reports to Congress. In United States v. Harriss, individuals charged with violating the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act argued that the registration, reporting, and disclosure requirements of that statute violated their right to petition under the First Amendment.[4] In upholding the Act, the Court recognized that "[p]resent-day legislative complexities are such that individual members of Congress cannot be expected to explore the myriad pressures to which they are regularly subjected."[5] According to the Court, it is important that elected representatives have the necessary information to be able to "evaluate such pressures."[6] Rather than prohibiting lobbying, the Act merely required a "modicum of information" from those hired to influence Congress to make transparent "who is being hired, who is putting up the money, and how much."[7] Requiring disclosures about lobbying activities was within Congress's "power of self-protection," for the purpose of maintaining "the integrity of a basic governmental process."[8]

Beyond regulating paid lobbyists, the Court has also held that Congress has no obligation to subsidize the lobbying activities of private entities. In Cammarano v. United States, the Court upheld a regulation that denied a tax deduction for business expenses spent on lobbying.[9] The Court explained that the taxpayers were not being denied a tax deduction for engaging in constitutionally protected activities, rather, they were "simply being required to pay for those activities entirely out of their own pockets."[10] Citing Cammarano, the Court subsequently upheld a statutory provision that similarly denied tax benefits for lobbying activities.[11] In Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, a nonprofit organization challenged the denial of its tax-exempt status under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue

---

[1] Lobby, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[2] See Amdt1.10.1 Historical Background on Freedoms of Assembly and Petition.

[3] See Eastern R.R. Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, 365 U.S. 127, 137 (1961) (recognizing that "[i]n a representative democracy such as this, these branches of government act on behalf of the people and, to a very large extent, the whole concept of representation depends on the ability of the people to make their wishes known to their representative").

[4] United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 617 (1954).

[5] Id. at 625.

[6] Id.

[7] Id.

[8] Id.

[9] 358 U.S. 498, 513 (1959).

[10] Id.; see also Textile Mills Sec. Corp. v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 314 U.S. 326 (1941) (holding that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue properly disallowed a tax deduction for an expense paid by a corporation to hire a publicist and two legal experts to help secure the passage of certain legislation).

[11] Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540 (1983).

Code because a substantial part of its activities were lobbying related.[12] The organization claimed, among other things, that the prohibition on lobbying activities under 501(c)(3) violated the First Amendment.[13] In rejecting this argument, the Court determined that Congress had not infringed on or regulated any First Amendment activity, rather, it had "merely refused to pay for the lobbying our of public moneys."[14]

Although the Court has allowed Congress to regulate paid lobbyists and to decline to subsidize lobbying activity, it has refused to apply other laws when their application chills the underlying exercise of the right to petition the government. For example, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine—established by Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc.[15] and United Mine Workers v. Pennington[16]—provides limited immunity from antitrust liability for those "engaging in conduct . . . aimed at influencing decisionmaking by the government."[17] Under this line of cases, competitors who work in concert to influences the government do not violate the Sherman Antitrust Act.[18] The Court has reiterated that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine was crafted to "avoid chilling the exercise of the First Amendment right to petition the government for the redress of grievances."[19] The right to petition extends to "all departments of the Government," and includes access to administrative agencies and courts.[20] The Noerr-Pennington doctrine shields efforts to influence public officials "regardless of intent or purpose."[21] The Court, however, has recognized a "sham exception" to the doctrine, excluding conduct from immunity that is a "mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor."[22]

Amdt1.7.11.6 Legislative Investigations

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As discussed in an earlier essay, Congress possesses an inherent power of investigation in aid of legislation.[1] Nonetheless, the government's power of investigation is subject to First

---

[12] Id. at 542.

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 545–46. See Amdt1.7.13.3 Conditions on Tax Exemptions.

[15] 365 U.S. 127 (1961).

[16] 381 U.S. 657 (1965).

[17] Octane Fitness, LLC v. ICON Health & Fitness, Inc., 572 U.S. 545, 555–56 (2014).

[18] Pennington, 381 U.S. at 669; see also City of Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 379–80 (1991) (reiterating that the "federal antitrust laws also do not regulate the conduct of private individuals in seeking anticompetitive action from the government"); Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492 (1988) (declining to extend the Noerr-Pennington immunity to efforts to influence a private association).

[19] Octane Fitness, LLC, 572 U.S. at 556 (citing Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 56 (1993)).

[20] California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510 (1972).

[21] Omni, 499 U.S. at 380 (citing Pennington, 381 U.S. at 670).

[22] Octane Fitness, LLC, 572 U.S. at 556. For example, litigation can be considered a "sham" under this doctrine if it is (1) "objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits," and if it conceals "'an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor,' . . . through the 'use [of] the government process—as opposed to the outcome of that process.'" Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc., 508 U.S. at 60–61.

[1] See ArtI.S8.C18.7.3 Congress's Investigation and Oversight Powers (1787–1864) to ArtI.S8.C18.7.7 Constitutional Limits of Congress's Investigation and Oversight Powers.

Amendment restrictions when the power as exercised results in deterrence or penalization of protected beliefs, associations, and conduct. In early cases, the Supreme Court narrowly construed the authority of congressional committees in order to avoid First Amendment infringement.[2] Later cases introduced a test that balanced the interests of the legislative bodies in inquiring about both protected and unprotected associations and conduct against what were perceived to be limited restraints upon the speech and association rights of witnesses, and upheld committee investigations.[3] Later, the Court articulated the balance somewhat differently and required that the investigating agency show "a subordinating interest which is compelling" to justify the inquiry's restraint on First Amendment rights.[4]

Amdt1.7.12 Compelled Speech

Amdt1.7.12.1 Overview of Compelled Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

For both the religion and speech clauses of the First Amendment, liberty of belief is the foundation of the liberty to practice one's religion and to express one's opinions.[1] As the Supreme Court has stated: "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."[2] Speaking in the context of religious freedom, the Court said that, although the freedom to act on one's beliefs could be limited, the freedom to believe what one will "is absolute."[3] Accordingly, as discussed in the following essays, courts will ordinarily subject government actions that compel speech to heightened constitutional scrutiny—but courts will more readily uphold certain types of disclosure requirements, particularly in the commercial context. An earlier essay discussed the Court's jurisprudence involving disclosures and disclaimers imposed in the context of campaign finance and electioneering regulations.[4]

---

[2] See United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41, 44–46 (1953); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 197–98 (1957); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 249–51 (1957).

[3] Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (1959); Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U.S. 399 (1961); Braden v. United States, 365 U.S. 431 (1961).

[4] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1963). See also DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825 (1966).

[1] West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303–04 (1940); United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78 (1944); Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961); American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 408 (1950); Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116, 132 (1966); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958); Baird v. State Bar of Arizona, 401 U.S. 1, 5–6 (1971) (plurality opinion), and id. at 9–10 (Stewart, J., concurring).

[2] West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943). See Amdt1.4.2 Laws Regulating Religious Belief.

[3] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940).

[4] Amdt1.7.11.4 Campaign Finance Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements.

Amdt1.7.12.2 Flag Salutes and Other Compelled Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

One question the Supreme Court has considered is whether the government may compel a person to declare or affirm publicly a personal belief. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis,[1] the Supreme Court had upheld the power of Pennsylvania to expel from its schools children who refused upon religious grounds to join in a flag salute ceremony and recite the pledge of allegiance. The Court explained that "[c]onscientious scruples have not, in the course of the long struggle for religious toleration, relieved the individual from obedience to a general law not aimed at the promotion or restriction of religious beliefs."[2] But three years later, in West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette,[3] a 6-3 majority of the Court overturned Gobitis.[4] Focusing on the free speech arguments rather than protections for religious exercise, the Court said that the state policy constituted "a compulsion of students to declare a belief," requiring "the individual to communicate by word and sign his acceptance of the political ideas [the flag] bespeaks."[5] The Court ruled that the power of a state to follow a policy that "requires affirmation of a belief and an attitude of mind," however, is limited by the First Amendment, which, under the standard then prevailing, required the state to prove that for the students to remain passive during the ritual "creates a clear and present danger that would justify an effort even to muffle expression."[6]

The rationale of Barnette became the basis for the Court's decision in Wooley v. Maynard,[7] which voided a requirement by the state of New Hampshire that motorists display passenger vehicle license plates bearing the motto "Live Free or Die."[8] Acting on the complaint of a motorist who again raised religious objections to this statement, the Court held that the plaintiff could not be compelled by the state to display a message making an ideological statement on his private property. In a subsequent case, however, the Court found that compelling property owners to facilitate the speech of others by providing access to their property did not violate the First Amendment, at least where the speech was not likely to be identified with the owner and the owner could effectively disavow any connection with the speaker's message.[9]

---

[1] 310 U.S. 586 (1940).

[2] 310 U.S. at 594. Justice Stone alone dissented, arguing that the First Amendment religion and speech clauses forbade coercion of "these children to express a sentiment which, as they interpret it, they do not entertain, and which violates their deepest religious convictions." Id. at 601.

[3] 319 U.S. 624 (1943).

[4] Justice Felix Frankfurter dissented at some length, denying that the First Amendment authorized the Court "to deny to the State of West Virginia the attainment of that which we all recognize as a legitimate legislative end, namely, the promotion of good citizenship, by employment of the means here chosen." 319 U.S. at 646, 647. Justices Roberts and Stanley Reed simply noted their continued adherence to Gobitis. Id. at 642.

[5] 319 U.S. at 631, 633.

[6] 319 U.S. at 633, 634. See also Janus v. American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31, 585 U.S. ____, No. 16-1466, slip op. at 9 (U.S. June 2018) (noting that compelled speech imposes a distinct harm by "forcing free and independent individuals to endorse ideas they find objectionable").

[7] 430 U.S. 705 (1977).

[8] The state had prosecuted vehicle owners who covered the motto on their vehicle's license plate.

[9] See PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 85–88 (1980) (upholding a state requirement that privately owned shopping centers permit others to engage in speech or petitioning on their property).

The Supreme Court has also held other governmental efforts to compel speech to violate the First Amendment; these include a North Carolina statute that required professional fundraisers for charities to disclose to potential donors the gross percentage of revenues retained in prior charitable solicitations,[10] a Florida statute that required newspapers to grant political candidates equal space to reply to the newspapers' criticism and attacks on their records,[11] an Ohio statute that prohibited the distribution of anonymous campaign literature,[12] a Massachusetts statute that required private citizens who organized a parade to include among the marchers a group imparting a message—in this case support for gay rights—that the organizers did not wish to convey,[13] and a California law that required certain pro-life centers that offer pregnancy-related services to provide certain notices.[14] The Court also struck down a federal funding condition that required funding recipients to adopt a policy explicitly opposing sex trafficking.[15]

The principle of Barnette, however, does not extend so far as to bar a government from requiring employees or certain persons seeking professional licensing or other benefits to swear an oath that they will uphold and defend the Constitution.[16]

In contrast to the arguably political speech at issue in Barnette, the Supreme Court has at times found no First Amendment violation when government compels the disclosure of information in a commercial or professional setting. Regarding compelled disclosures in commercial speech, the Court held that an advertiser's "constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal," and accordingly, a provision requiring a seller to disclose factual information about his goods or services will not violate the First Amendment so long as the requirement is "reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers."[17]

Moreover, the Court has upheld regulations of professional conduct that only incidentally burden speech. For example, in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, the [10] Riley v. National Fed'n of the Blind of North Carolina, 487 U.S. 781 (1988). In Illinois ex rel. Madigan v. Telemarketing Assocs., Inc., 538 U.S. 600, 605 (2003), the Supreme Court held that a fundraiser who has retained 85% of gross receipts from donors, but falsely represented that "a significant amount of each dollar donated would be paid over to" a charitable organization, could be sued for fraud.

---

[11] Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). In Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Public Utilities Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1 (1986), a Court plurality held that a state could not require a privately owned utility company to include in its billing envelopes views of a consumer group with which it disagrees.

[12] McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995).

[13] Hurley v. Irish-American Gay Group, 515 U.S. 557 (1995).

[14] See Nat'l Inst. of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra, 585 U.S. ___, No. 16-1140, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 2018). Specifically, in National Institute of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra, the Court reviewed a California law that, in relevant part, required medically licensed crisis pregnancy centers to notify women that the State of California provided free or low-cost services, including abortion. Id. at 2–4 (describing the California law). For the Court, "[b]y requiring [licensed clinics] to inform women how they can obtain state-subsidized abortions—at the same time [those clinics] try to dissuade women from choosing that option," the California law "plainly alters the content" of the clinics' speech, subjecting the law to heightened scrutiny. Id. at 7 (internal citations and quotations omitted).

[15] Agency for Int'l Dev. v. Alliance for Open Soc'y Int'l, Inc., 570 U.S. 205, 221 (2013). For additional discussion of this case, see Amdt1.7.13.9 Conditions Exceeding the Scope of the Program.

[16] Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676 (1972); Connell v. Higginbotham, 403 U.S. 207 (1971); Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966); Knight v. Board of Regents, 269 F. Supp. 339 (S.D.N.Y. 1967) (three-judge court), aff'd, 390 U.S. 36 (1968); Hosack v. Smiley, 276 F. Supp. 876 (C.D. Colo. 1967) (three-judge court), aff'd, 390 U.S. 744 (1968); Ohlson v. Phillips, 304 F. Supp. 1152 (C.D. Colo. 1969) (three-judge court), aff'd, 397 U.S. 317 (1970); Law Students Civil Rights Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 161 (1971); Fields v. Askew, 279 So. 2d 822 (Fla. 1973), aff'd per curiam, 414 U.S. 1148 (1974). For additional discussion of cases involving employee oaths, see Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech and Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits.

[17] Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626, 651, 652 n.14 (1985). See Milavetz, Gallop, & Milavetz v. United States, 559 U.S. 229 (2010) (requiring advertisement for certain "debt relief" businesses to disclose that the services offered include bankruptcy assistance). For additional discussion of the Court's treatment of commercial speech, see Amdt1.7.6.1 Commercial Speech Early Doctrine.

Court considered a law requiring physicians to obtain informed consent before they could perform an abortion.[18] Specifically, the law at issue in Casey required doctors to tell their patients prior to an abortion about the nature of the procedure, the health risks involved, the age of the unborn child, and the availability of printed materials from the state about various forms of assistance.[19] In a plurality opinion, the Court rejected a free-speech challenge to the informed consent requirement, viewing the law as "part of the practice of medicine" and a permissible incidental regulation of speech.[20]

However, the Court has cautioned that reduced scrutiny for compelled commercial and professional speech is limited to particular contexts. For example, limited scrutiny of compelled commercial disclosures only applies to requirements that sellers provide "purely factual" and "uncontroversial information" in their commercial dealings.[21] As a result, in considering the constitutionality of a California law requiring certain medically licensed, pro-life crisis pregnancy centers to disclose information to patients about the availability of state-subsidized procedures, including abortions, the Court in National Institute of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra concluded that the Zauderer rule for compelled disclosures of purely factual, uncontroversial information was inapplicable.[22] Specifically, the Court noted that the notice requirements were unrelated to services that the clinics provided and that the notice included information about abortion, "anything but an 'uncontroversial' topic."[23]

In that same ruling, the Court rejected the argument that the California law's disclosure requirements were comparable to the informed consent regulations upheld in Casey.[24] In contrast to the law in Casey, the National Institute of Family and Life Advocates Court concluded that the disclosure requirements were not tied to a particular medical procedure and did not require disclosure of information about the risks or benefits of any medical procedures the clinics provided.[25] In this sense, the California law, unlike the informed consent law in Casey, did not incidentally burden speech, but instead "regulat[ed] speech as speech."[26]

The Supreme Court has also rejected a First Amendment challenge to the compelled labeling of foreign political propaganda. Specifically, in Meese v. Keene, the Court upheld a provision of the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938 that required that, when an agent of a foreign principal seeks to disseminate foreign "political propaganda," he must label such

---

[18] See 505 U.S. 833, 881 (1992) (plurality opinion).

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 884.

[21] See, e.g., Nat'l Inst. of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra, No. 16-1140, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 2018).

Moreover, even under Zauderer, commercial disclosure requirements cannot be unjustified or unduly burdensome. See 471 U.S. at 651. Applying this limit on the Zauderer rule, the National Institute of Family and Life Advocates Court reviewed a separate provision of the California law discussed above that required unlicensed crisis pregnancy centers to notify women that California has not licensed the clinics to provide medical services. Id. at 4–5 (describing the requirements for the unlicensed centers). The Court, noting the lack of evidence in the record that pregnant women were unaware that the covered facilities were not staffed by medical professionals and remarking on the breadth of the regulations that required a posting of the notice "no matter what the facilities say on site or in their advertisements," concluded that the regulations of unlicensed crisis pregnancy centers unduly burdened speech. Id. at 18–19.

[22] Id. at 9.

[23] Id.

[24] Id. at 11.

[25] Id.

[26] Id. Having concluded that the California disclosure requirements for licensed crisis pregnancy centers should be evaluated under a more rigorous form of scrutiny than what the Court employed in Zauderer or Casey, the National Institute of Family and Life Advocates Court, employing intermediate scrutiny, held that the California law likely violated the First Amendment. Id. at 14. Specifically, the Court viewed the law to be both underinclusive—the law excluded several similar clinics without explanation—and overinclusive—the state could have employed other methods, such as a state-sponsored advertising campaign, to achieve its purpose of informing low-income women about its services without "burdening a speaker with unwanted speech." Id. at 14–16 (internal citations omitted).

material with certain information, including his identity, the principal's identity, and the fact that he has registered with the Department of Justice. The Court emphasized that "Congress did not prohibit, edit, or restrain the distribution of advocacy materials," but only "required the disseminators of such material to make additional disclosures that would better enable the public to evaluate the import of the propaganda."[27]

Amdt1.7.12.3 Compelled Subsidization

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

It is to be expected that disputes will sometimes arise between an organization and some of its members regarding the organization's messaging or expression. Of course, unless there is some governmental connection, there will be no federal constitutional application to any such controversy.[1] But, in at least some instances, when government compels membership in an organization or in some manner lends its authority to such compulsion, there may be constitutional limitations arising from the First Amendment's protections for speech and association.[2] It does not always violate the constitution when compulsory fees are used to subsidize the speech of others.[3] However, the Court has recognized constitutional limitations can arise, for example, in connection with union shop labor agreements permissible under the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act.[4] The Court has recognized in this context that "'compelled funding of the speech of other private speakers or groups' presents the same dangers as compelled speech."[5]

In Railway Employees' Dep't v. Hanson, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a law authorizing private union shop agreements that required employees to join a union, [27] Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 480 (1987).

[1] The Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, 73 Stat. 537, 29 U.S.C. §§ 411–413, enacted a bill of rights for union members, designed to protect, among other things, freedom of speech and assembly and the right to participate in union meetings on political and economic subjects.

[2] This essay discusses the free speech aspects of these cases. For a discussion of the free association aspects, see Amdt1.8.4.1 Union Membership and Fees.

[3] For instance, the Court has said that the First Amendment did not preclude a public university from charging its students an activity fee used to support student organizations that engage in extracurricular speech, provided that the money was allocated to those groups by use of viewpoint-neutral criteria. Board of Regents of the Univ. of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000) (upholding fee except to the extent a student referendum substituted majority determinations for viewpoint neutrality in allocating funds). Nor did the First Amendment preclude the government from "compel[ling] financial contributions that are used to fund advertising," provided that such contributions did not finance "political or ideological" views. Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc., 521 U.S. 457, 471, 472 (1997) (upholding Secretary of Agriculture's marketing orders that assessed fruit producers to cover the expenses of generic advertising of California fruit). But the Court has emphasized that the advertising funded by compelled financial contributions in Glickman was "ancillary to a more comprehensive program restricting marketing autonomy" and not "the principal object of the regulatory scheme." United States v. United Foods, Inc., 533 U.S. 405, 411, 412 (2001) (striking down Secretary of Agriculture's mandatory assessments, used for advertising, upon handlers of fresh mushrooms). The Court held that the First Amendment, however, was not violated when the government compelled financial contributions to fund government speech, even though the contributions were raised through a targeted assessment rather than through general taxes. Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Ass'n, 544 U.S. 550 (2005).

[4] Section 8(a)(3) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, 61 Stat. 140, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), permits the negotiation of union shop agreements. Such agreements, however, may be outlawed by state "right to work" laws. Section 14(b), 61 Stat. 151, 29 U.S.C. § 164(b). See Lincoln Fed. Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U.S. 525 (1949); AFL v. American Sash & Door Co., 335 U.S. 538 (1949). In industries covered by the Railway Labor Act, union shop agreements may be negotiated regardless of contrary state laws. 64 Stat. 1238, 45 U.S.C. § 152, Eleventh; see Railway Employes' Dep't v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225 (1956).

[5] Harris v. Quinn, 573 U.S. 616, 647 (2014) (quoting Knox v. SEIU, Local 1000, 567 U.S. 298, 309 (2012)).

noting that the record in the case did not indicate that union dues were being "used as a cover for forcing ideological conformity or other action in contravention of the First Amendment," such as by being spent to support political candidates.[6] In International Ass'n of Machinists v. Street, where union dues had been collected pursuant to a union shop agreement and had been spent to support political candidates, the Court avoided the First Amendment issue by construing the Railway Labor Act to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political causes.[7]

The Supreme Court held in Janus v. American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31, that "public sector agency-shop arrangements violate the First Amendment,"[8] overruling a forty-year old precedent, Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, that had generally approved of such arrangements.[9] However, even Abood itself had only permitted some aspects of compelled fee regimes,[10] and the Court had, for years prior to Janus, signaled its growing discomfort with Abood.[11] Understanding the historical course of the jurisprudence governing compelled agency fees is important to understand the ramifications of Janus.

In Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Education,[12] the Court found Hanson and Street applicable to the public employment context.[13] Recognizing that any system of compelled support restricted employees' right not to associate and not to support, the Court nonetheless found the governmental interests served by an "agency shop" agreement[14]—the promotion of labor peace and stability of employer-employee relations—to be of overriding importance and to justify the impact upon employee freedom.[15] But the Court drew a different balance when it considered whether employees compelled to support the union were constitutionally entitled to object to the use of those exacted funds to support political candidates or to advance ideological causes not germane to the union's duties as collective-bargaining representative. The Court believed that to compel one to expend funds in such a way is to violate his freedom of belief and the right to act on those beliefs just as much as if government prohibited him from acting to further his own beliefs.[16] The Court's remedy, however, was not to restrain the union from making non-collective bargaining related expenditures, but was to require that those funds come only

---

[6] 351 U.S. 225, 238 (1956).

[7] 367 U.S. 740, 749–50 (1961). Justices William O. Douglas, Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, and John Harlan would have reached the constitutional issue, with differing results. On the same day that it decided Street, the Court, in Lathrop v. Donohue, 367 U.S. 820 (1961), declined to reach the constitutional issues presented by roughly the same fact situation in a suit by lawyers compelled to join an "integrated bar." These issues, however, were faced squarely in Keller v. State Bar of California, 496 U.S. 1, 14 (1990), which held that an integrated state bar may not, against a members' wishes, devote compulsory dues to ideological or other political activities not "necessarily or reasonably related to the purpose of regulating the legal profession or improving the quality of legal service available to the people of the State."

[8] No. 16-1466, slip op. at 33 (U.S. June 2018).

[9] 431 U.S. 209, 229 (1977).

[10] Id. at 235.

[11] See, e.g., Harris v. Quinn, 573 U.S. 616 (2014). In Friedrichs v. California Teachers Association the Court was equally divided on the question of whether to overrule Abood. No. 14-915, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Mar. 2016).

[12] 431 U.S. 209 (1977).

[13] That a public entity was the employer and the employees consequently were public employees was deemed constitutionally immaterial for the application of the principles of Hanson and Street, id. at 226–32, but, in a concurring opinion joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice Harry Blackmun, Justice Lewis Powell found the distinction between public and private employment crucial. Id. at 244.

[14] An agency shop agreement requires all employees, regardless of union membership, to pay a fee to the union that reflects the union's efforts in obtaining employment benefits through collective bargaining. The Court in Abood noted that it is the "practical equivalent" of a union shop agreement. 431 U.S. at 217 n.10.

[15] 431 U.S. at 217–23. For a similar argument over the issue of corporate political contributions and shareholder rights, see First National Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 792–95 (1978), and id. at 802, 812–21 (White, J., dissenting).

[16] 431 U.S. at 232–37.

from employees who do not object. Therefore, the lower courts were directed to oversee development of a system under which employees could object generally to such use of union funds and could obtain either a proportionate refund or a reduction of future exactions.[17] Later, the Court further tightened the requirements. It concluded that a proportionate refund was inadequate because "even then the union obtains an involuntary loan for purposes to which the employee objects";[18] an advance reduction of dues corrected the problem only if accompanied by sufficient information by which employees may gauge the propriety of the union's fee.[19] Therefore, the union procedure must also "provide for a reasonably prompt decision by an impartial decisionmaker."[20]

In Davenport v. Washington Education Ass'n,[21] the Court noted that, although it had previously outlined the minimum "procedural requirements that public-sector unions collecting agency fees must observe in order to ensure that an objecting nonmember can prevent the use of his fees for impermissible purposes,"[22] it "never suggested that the First Amendment is implicated whenever governments place limitations on a union's entitlement to agency fees above and beyond what Abood and Hudson require."[23] Thus, the Court held in Davenport that the State of Washington could prohibit "expenditure of a nonmember's agency fees for election-related purposes unless the nonmember affirmatively consents."[24] The Court added that "Washington could have gone much further, restricting public-sector agency fees to the portion of union dues devoted to collective bargaining. Indeed, it is uncontested that it would be constitutional for Washington to eliminate agency fees entirely."[25]

In Knox v. Service Employees International Union,[26] the Court suggested constitutional limits on a public union assessing political fees in an agency shop other than through a voluntary opt-in system. The union in Knox had proposed and implemented a special fee to fund political advocacy before providing formal notice with an opportunity for non-union employees to opt out. Five Justices characterized agency shop arrangements in the public sector as constitutionally problematic, and described the Court's prior jurisprudence allowing opt-out provisions as anomalous, in the sense of the burdens it imposed on the constitutional rights of objecting nonmembers. The majority more specifically held that the Constitution required that separate notices be sent out for special political assessments that allowed non-union employees to opt in rather than requiring them to opt out.[27]

Doubts on the constitutionality of mandatory union dues in the public sector intensified in Harris v. Quinn.[28] Building on concerns outlined in Knox, the Court expressed reservations [17] 431 U.S. at 237–42. On the other hand, the Court ruled that nonmembers could be charged for such general union expenses as contributions to state and national affiliates, expenses of sending delegates to state and national union conventions, and costs of a union newsletter. Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507 (1991). The Court said a local union could also charge nonmembers a fee that went to the national union to pay for litigation expenses incurred on behalf of other local units, but only if (1) the litigation is related to collective bargaining rather than political activity, and (2) the litigation charge is reciprocal in nature, that is, other locals contribute similarly. Locke v. Karass, 129 S. Ct. 798, 802 (2009).

---

[18] Ellis v. Brotherhood of Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 444 (1984).

[19] Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292 (1986).

[20] 475 U.S. at 309.

[21] 551 U.S. 177 (2007).

[22] 551 U.S. at 181, citing 475 U.S. 292, 302, 304–310 (1986).

[23] 551 U.S. at 185, quoting Keller v. State Bar of Cal., 496 U.S. 1, 17 (1990), and adding emphasis.

[24] 551 U.S. at 184.

[25] 551 U.S. at 184 (citations omitted).

[26] 567 U.S. 298 (2012).

[27] Id. (Alito, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., Scalia, Kennedy, and Thomas, JJ.).

[28] 573 U.S. 616 (2014).

about Abood's central holding that the collection of an agency fee from public employees withstood First Amendment scrutiny because of the desirability of "labor peace" and the problem of "free ridership." Specifically, the Court questioned (1) the scope of the precedents (like Hanson and Street) that the Abood Court relied on; (2) Abood's failure to appreciate the distinctly political context of public sector unions; and (3) Abood's dismissal of the administrative difficulties in distinguishing between public union expenditures for collective bargaining and expenditures for political purposes.[29] Notwithstanding these concerns about Abood's core holding, the Court in Harris declined to overturn Abood outright. Instead, the Court focused on the peculiar status of the employees at issue in the case before it: home health care assistants subsidized by Medicaid. These "partial-public employees" were under the direction and control of their individual clients and not the state, had little direct interaction with state agencies or employees, and derived only limited benefits from the union.[30] As a consequence, the Court concluded that Abood's rationale—the labor peace and free rider concerns—did not justify compelling dissenting home health care assistants to subsidize union speech.[31]

In Janus v. American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31, the Supreme Court formally overruled Abood and held "that public sector agency-shop arrangements violate the First Amendment."[32] The Court rejected the governmental interests said to justify the compelled fees in Abood, holding instead that labor peace can be achieved through less restrictive means and that the government does not have a "compelling interest" in avoiding free riders.[33] The majority opinion criticized Abood's extension of Hanson and Street, saying neither of those cases "gave careful consideration to the First Amendment" and arguing that Abood's reliance on those cases led it to apply an overly deferential standard to analyze public-sector agency fee arrangements.[34] In the Court's view, granting too much deference to legislative judgments about the strength of asserted government interests or about whether the challenged action truly supports those interests "is inappropriate in deciding free speech issues."[35] The Court also disagreed with additional justifications said to justify the agency-shop arrangements, notably holding that they could not be upheld under Pickering v. Board of Education,[36] a case in which the Court acknowledged that public employers may sometimes place certain restrictions on employees' speech.[37] Accordingly, after Janus, "States and public-sector unions may no longer extract agency fees from nonconsenting employees."[38]

Turning to government restrictions on union support, in Ysursa v. Pocatello Education Ass'n,[39] the Court upheld an Idaho statute that prohibited payroll deductions for union political activities. Because the statute did not restrict political speech, but merely declined to subsidize it by providing for payroll deductions, the state did not abridge the union's First Amendment right and therefore could justify the ban merely by demonstrating a rational basis

[29] Id. at 8–20.

[30] Id. at 24–27.

[31] Id. at 27.

[32] No. 16-1466, slip op. at 33 (U.S. June 2018).

[33] Id. at 12–13.

[34] Id. at 36.

[35] Id. at 37.

[36] 391 U.S. 563 (1968). See Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

[37] Janus, slip op. at 26.

[38] Id. at 48.

[39] 129 S. Ct. 1093 (2009).

for it. The Court found that it was "justified by the State's interest in avoiding the reality or appearance of government favoritism or entanglement with partisan politics."[40]

The Court has held that a labor relations body may not prevent a union member or employee represented exclusively by a union from speaking out at a public meeting on an issue of public concern, simply because the issue was a subject of collective bargaining between the union and the employer.[41]

Amdt1.7.13 Unconstitutional Conditions on Speech

Amdt1.7.13.1 Overview of Unconstitutional Conditions Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The "unconstitutional conditions" doctrine reflects the Supreme Court's repeated pronouncement that the government "may not deny a benefit to a person on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected interests."[1] Although the doctrine is not limited to the First Amendment context,[2] many of the leading Supreme Court cases on unconstitutional conditions have involved the freedom of speech. While the doctrine does not have a formal test,[3] the basic principle is that the government normally may not require a person, as a condition of receiving a public benefit, to relinquish a constitutional right—most notably, by speaking or refraining from speaking on a certain subject.[4] How this principle applies in a [40] 129 S. Ct. at 1098. The unions had argued that, even if the limitation was valid as applied at the state level, it violated their First Amendment rights when applied to local public employers. The Court held that a political subdivision, "created by the state for the better ordering of government, has no privileges or immunities under the federal constitution which it may invoke in opposition to the will of its creator." Id. at 1101, quoting Williams v. Mayor of Baltimore, 289 U.S. 36, 40 (1933).

[41] Madison School Dist. v. WERC, 429 U.S. 167 (1977).

[1] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972) ("For at least a quarter-century, this Court has made clear that even though a person has no 'right' to a valuable governmental benefit and even though the government may deny him the benefit for any number of reasons, there are some reasons upon which the government may not rely.").

[2] Cf., e.g., Nollan v. Cal. Coastal Comm'n, 483 U.S. 825, 837 (1987) (conditioning a building permit's issuance upon an uncompensated, public right-of-access across the permit applicant's property violated the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause); Donald v. Phila. & Reading Coal & Iron Co., 241 U.S. 329, 332 (1916) (holding that Wisconsin exceeded its authority by revoking out-of-state corporations' business licenses for removing lawsuits brought by Wisconsin citizens to federal court). See Richard A. Epstein, Unconstitutional Conditions, State Power, and the Limits of Consent, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 5 (1988) (explaining that the doctrine is not "anchored to any single clause of the Constitution," and has been invoked in cases involving Congress's spending power, the states' police power, individual liberties, property rights, substantive due process, and equal protection).

[3] See, e.g., Kathleen M. Sullivan, Unconstitutional Conditions, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 1415, 1419 (1989) (positing that the unconstitutional conditions doctrine "serves a limited but crucial role" in that it "identifies a characteristic technique by which government appears not to, but in fact does burden [individual] liberties, triggering a demand for especially strong justification by the state"); Mitchell N. Berman, Coercion Without Baselines: Unconstitutional Conditions in Three Dimensions, 90 Geo. L.J. 1, 5–6, 10 (2001) (advancing a "unified theory" of unconstitutional conditions that "centers on coercion" but also accounts for "particularistic constitutional doctrine").

[4] Perry, 408 U.S. at 597. Some legal scholars have argued that this principle is rooted in substantive due process considerations. See, e.g., Zygmunt J.B. Plater & Michael O'Loughlin, Semantic Hygiene for the Law of Regulatory Takings, Due Process, and Unconstitutional Conditions: Making Use of a Muddy Supreme Court Exactions Case, 89 U. Colo. L. Rev. 741, 745, 796 (2018) (situating the unconstitutional conditions inquiry for permit exactions under Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rather than the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause).

particular legal challenge depends in part on the "benefit" offered by the government, which can take different forms, including public employment, a tax exemption, or government funding.[5]

Amdt1.7.13.2 Conditions of Public Employment

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Some of the earliest unconstitutional conditions cases involving free speech arose in the public employment context. Perry v. Sindermann, a 1972 case, involved a state college's decision not to renew the contract of a professor who had publicly criticized the college administration's policies.[1] The Supreme Court held that, even though the professor did not have a "contractual or tenure right to re-employment," he could still contend that the college impermissibly retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment rights.[2] The Court reasoned that "if the government could deny a benefit to a person because of his constitutionally protected speech or associations, his exercise of those freedoms would in effect be penalized and inhibited," thus allowing the government to "'produce a result which [it] could not command directly.'"[3]

The Court reiterated its skepticism of "indirect" constraints on freedom of speech in its 1976 decision in Elrod v. Burns. In Elrod, the Court ruled unconstitutional a county sheriff's practice of firing non-policymaking employees solely because of their political party affiliation after a change in leadership.[4] Writing for a plurality of the Court, Justice William Brennan reasoned that the "threat of dismissal" for failure to support "the favored political party" "unquestionably inhibits protected belief and association."[5] Like the Perry Court, the Elrod plurality rejected the "notion that because there is no right to a government benefit, such as public employment, the benefit may be denied for any reason."[6] Instead, it concluded that the government cannot use an indirect means (that is, the benefit of public employment) "to achieve what it may not command directly" (that is, support for a particular political party).[7] [5] Licenses and permits sometimes are considered a government benefit that is subject to the unconstitutional conditions doctrine. Compare Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Mgmt. Dist., 570 U.S. 595, 604 (2013) (discussing the "special application" of the unconstitutional conditions doctrine in the context of land-use permits), with Matal v. Tam, No. 15-1293, slip op. at 19 (U.S. June 19, 2017) (plurality opinion) (concluding that unconstitutional conditions cases did not apply to a restriction on federal trademark registration). However, the state interests at issue in licensing may justify restrictions on protected speech and expression in some circumstances. See, e.g., California v. La Rue, 409 U.S. 109, 118 (1972) (upholding a state regulation prohibiting nude dancing in establishments licensed by the state to serve alcohol).

---

[1] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 595 (1972).

[2] Id. at 596–98 (reaffirming the holdings of Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960) and Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)).

[3] Id. at 597 (quoting Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958)). The Court remanded the case for consideration of whether the college, in fact, declined to renew the professor's contract on an "impermissible basis" and whether due process entitled the professor to a hearing on the grounds for the college's decision. Id. at 598, 603.

[4] Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 353 (1976) (plurality opinion); see also id. at 374–75 (Stewart and Blackmun, JJ., concurring in the judgment) ("The single substantive question involved in this case is whether a nonpolicymaking, nonconfidential government employee can be discharged or threatened with discharge from a job that he is satisfactorily performing upon the sole ground of his political beliefs. I agree with the plurality that he cannot.").

[5] Id. at 359 (plurality opinion).

[6] Id. at 360.

[7] Id. at 361.

While acknowledging the long history of patronage politics in America,[8] the plurality evaluated the dismissal practice under the "exacting" scrutiny standard used to judge the validity of other "significant impairment[s]" of free speech rights.[9] If patronage dismissal was to "survive constitutional challenge," Justice William Brennan wrote, "it must further some vital government end by a means that is least restrictive of freedom of belief and association."[10] The plurality rejected the argument that patronage dismissals further "government effectiveness and efficiency."[11] While acknowledging that the practice might foster "political loyalty" or preserve aspects of the democratic process, the plurality concluded that the practice was not narrowly tailored to achieve these ends.[12]

Following Elrod, the Court clarified in Branti v. Finkel that "the ultimate inquiry" in evaluating a patronage dismissal "is not whether the label 'policymaker' or 'confidential' fits a particular position."[13] Instead, "the question is whether the hiring authority can demonstrate that party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved."[14] In the case of an assistant public defender, the Court found it "manifest" that the attorney's continued employment could not "properly be conditioned upon his allegiance to the political party in control of the county government."[15] The Court reasoned that the "primary, if not the only, responsibility of an assistant public defender is to represent individual citizens in controversy with the State"—a duty untethered to "partisan political interests."[16]

The Court extended the reasoning of Elrod and Branti to other forms of political patronage decisions in Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois.[17] The Rutan Court held that a state governor's office could not constitutionally base "promotion, transfer, recall [after a layoff], and hiring decisions involving low-level public employees . . . on party affiliation and support."[18] The Court concluded that, like patronage dismissals, these practices significantly infringed public employees' First Amendment rights.[19] The Court then held that the political patronage practices were not "narrowly tailored to further vital governmental interests."[20] Citing less speech-restrictive alternatives, the Court reasoned that a "government's interest in securing effective employees can be met by discharging, demoting, or transferring staff members whose work is deficient," and its "interest in securing employees who will loyally implement its policies can be adequately served by choosing or dismissing certain high-level employees on the basis of their political views."[21]

---

[8] Id. at 362.

[9] Id. (citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 64–65 (1976); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 460–61 (1958)).

[10] Id. at 363.

[11] Id. at 364–66.

[12] See id. at 367, 369.

[13] Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 518 (1980).

[14] Id.

[15] Id. at 519.

[16] Id. at 519.

[17] Rutan v. Republican Party of Ill., 497 U.S. 62, 79 (1990); see also O'Hare Truck Serv. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 726 (1996) (extending "the protections of Elrod and Branti" to situations "where government retaliates against a contractor, or a regular provider of services, for the exercise of rights of political association or the expression of political allegiance").

[18] Rutan, 497 U.S. at 65.

[19] Id. at 73.

[20] Id. at 74.

[21] Id.; see also id. at 78 (finding no "vital" governmental interest in patronage hiring practices for the same reasons).

Amdt1.7.13.3 Conditions on Tax Exemptions

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has treated tax exemptions as a kind of government subsidy subject to the unconstitutional conditions doctrine. In an early unconstitutional conditions case, Speiser v. Randall, the Supreme Court considered a California law requiring applicants for a veterans' property tax exemption to sign an oath that they "do not advocate the overthrow" of the federal or state government "by force or violence or other unlawful means."[1] The Court stated that to "deny an exemption to claimants who engage in certain forms of speech is in effect to penalize them for such speech."[2] In the Court's view, such a requirement would "coerc[e] the claimants to refrain from the proscribed speech."[3]

In another decision concerning tax exemptions, Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington (TWR), the Supreme Court held that the government need not subsidize private entities' speech to comply with the First Amendment.[4] Specifically, the TWR Court upheld the Internal Revenue Code's ban on "substantial lobbying" activities by tax-exempt Section 501(c)(3) organizations.[5] In the statutory scheme before the Court, both Section 501(c)(3) "charitable" and Section 501(c)(4) "social welfare" organizations were exempt from federal taxation.[6] However, only donations to Section 501(c)(3)s were tax deductible.[7] The Supreme Court held that the "substantial lobbying" restriction on Section 501(c)(3) organizations was not an unconstitutional condition.[8] Unlike in Speiser where the taxpayer had to refrain from speaking in order to qualify for a tax exemption, the Court reasoned, TWR could engage in substantial lobbying activities, while still qualifying as a tax-exempt organization (albeit not one that could receive tax-deductible contributions).[9] The Court concluded that the lobbying restriction merely reflected Congress's decision "not to subsidize" substantial lobbying.[10]

---

[1] Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 515 (1958) (quoting Cal. Rev. & Tax Code § 32 (1953)).

[2] Id. at 518.

[3] Id. at 519. The Speiser Court did not hold that speech advocating the overthrow of the government is protected by the First Amendment. Rather, it held that the process of claiming the California exemption was unconstitutionally coercive because it would potentially chill protected speech. In the Court's view, the public would be wary of "the line separating the lawful and the unlawful," and would therefore "steer far wider of the unlawful zone." Id. at 522–29,

[4] Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540 (1983).

[5] Id. at 551.

[6] Id. at 554; see also 26 U.S.C. § 501(c)(3)–(4).

[7] Taxation with Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. at 554.

[8] Id. at 551

[9] Id. at 544.

[10] Id. at 549–51; see also Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498, 512–13 (1959) (holding that the exclusion of lobbying expenses from income tax deduction for ordinary and necessary business expenses did not violate the First Amendment).

Amdt1.7.13.4 Conditions on Federal Funding

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

From 1980 to 2020, much of the Court's jurisprudence on free-speech-related unconstitutional conditions developed in the context of conditions on federal funding, specifically federal grant programs.[1] These cases proceeded from the principle, identified in Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington,[2] that the government is not required to subsidize speech with which it does not agree.

Amdt1.7.13.5 Restrictions on Editorializing

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, the Court considered a condition prohibiting any "noncommercial educational broadcasting station" that received certain federal grants from "editorializing."[1] The Court rejected the Government's argument that this condition was a permissible exercise of Congress's spending power in the form of a decision not to "subsidize" editorializing by public broadcast stations.[2] Unlike the organization in TWR, the Court reasoned, a regulated station had no way "to segregate its activities according to the source of its funding," creating a complete bar to editorializing.[3]

Finding TWR inapposite, the Court analyzed the condition as a restriction on a broadcaster's speech according to First Amendment standards.[4] After affirming that Congress has more leeway to regulate broadcasting than other types of media such as newspapers,[5] the Court stated that the condition against editorializing was constitutional only if it was "narrowly tailored to further a substantial governmental interest."[6] After considering three different potential government interests, the Court ultimately concluded that the condition failed to meet this standard.[7] First, the Court reasoned, the condition did not substantially advance an interest in protecting grantee-stations from "governmental coercion and

---

[1] The Supreme Court has found unconstitutional funding conditions outside of the free-speech context as well. E.g., Nat'l Fed. of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519 (2012). See Intro.7.3 Federalism and the Constitution; ArtI.S8.C1.2.1 Overview of Spending Clause.

[2] 461 U.S. 540 (1983).

[1] FCC v. League of Women Voters of Cal., 468 U.S. 364, 366 (1984) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting 47 U.S.C. § 399). The condition applied to recipients of grants from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, a private, nonprofit corporation established by the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 to, among other duties, "make grants to local broadcasting stations that would 'aid in financing local educational . . . programming costs of such stations.'" Id. at 369 (quoting 47 U.S.C. § 396(g)(2)(C) (1976 ed.))).

[2] Id. at 399.

[3] Id. at 400.

[4] Id. at 374–80.

[5] See id. at 375–80 (reasoning that due to "spectrum scarcity" (that is, the limited number of broadcast frequencies) and other factors, "the broadcasting industry plainly operates under restraints not imposed upon other media," and stating that if "a similar ban on editorializing [were] applied to newspapers and magazines, we would not hesitate to strike it down as violative of the First Amendment").

[6] Id. at 380. See Amdt1.7.10.1 Overview of Media Regulation.

[7] League of Women Voters of Cal., 468 U.S. at 398–99.

interference" that might be associated with federal funding, nor was it narrowly tailored to further that asserted interest.[8] Second, the Court recognized the government's interest in preventing viewer or listener confusion about the source of the editorializing, but concluded that a less-restrictive disclaimer requirement would have served this interest as effectively.[9] Third, the Court reasoned that the condition was not narrowly tailored to Congress's substantial interest in "ensuring adequate and balanced coverage of public issues"—an interest "already secured by a variety of other regulatory means that intrude far less drastically upon the 'journalistic freedom' of noncommercial broadcasters."[10]

Amdt1.7.13.6 Selective Funding Arrangements

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Because the Constitution does not require the government to subsidize speech,[1] the Court has held that the government may "selectively fund a program to encourage certain activities," including activities that involve speech, "without at the same time funding" other activities.[2] The Court announced this rule in 1991 in Rust v. Sullivan, a case involving funding for family-planning services under Title X of the Public Health Service Act.[3] That act provides that no funds appropriated under Title X "shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning."[4] For the Supreme Court, there was "no question" that this restriction was constitutional.[5] The Court held that the government made a permissible choice to "fund one activity to the exclusion of the other."[6]

The challenged regulations implementing this statutory restriction posed a closer question, but the Court ultimately upheld the regulatory conditions as well. One provision barred a Title X project from providing "counseling concerning the use of abortion as a method of family planning" or "referral[s] for abortion as a method of family planning."[7] The Court rejected the argument that the prohibition on abortion counseling and referrals discriminated on the basis of viewpoint.[8] The Court reasoned that the government was not "suppressing a dangerous idea"; it was prohibiting "a project grantee or its employees from engaging in

---

[8] Id. at 390 (reasoning that several other aspects of the act "substantially reduce the risk of governmental interference with the editorial judgments of local stations without restricting those stations' ability to speak on matters of public concern"). In the Court's view, the condition also did "virtually nothing . . . to reduce the risk that public stations will serve solely as outlets for expression of narrow partisan views" from private factions. Id. at 397.

[9] Id. at 395 (suggesting a disclaimer that "the editorial represents only the view of the station's management and does not in any way represent the views of the Federal Government or any of the station's other sources of funding").

[10] Id. at 380, 397–98 (quoting Columbia Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 110 (1973)).

[1] Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540 (1983); see, e.g., Lyng v. Int'l Union, United Auto., Aerospace and Agric. Implement Workers of America, 485 U.S. 360 (1988) (holding that a condition barring households of striking workers from food stamp eligibility did "not infringe either the associational or expressive rights" of union members, reasoning that while "[e]xercising the right to strike inevitably risks economic hardship," the First Amendment does not compel the "Government to minimize that result by qualifying the striker for food stamps").

[2] Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 193–95 (1991).

[3] Id. at 178.

[4] Id. (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 300a-6).

[5] Id. at 192.

[6] Id. at 193.

[7] Id. at 179 (quoting 42 C.F.R. § 59.8(a)(1) (1989)).

[8] Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 194 (1991).

activities outside of the project's scope"; the program was "designed" to "encourage family planning," not fund "prenatal care."[9] The Court concluded that "when the Government appropriates public funds to establish a program[,] it is entitled to define the limits of that program."[10]

In addition, the Court upheld provisions in the regulations prohibiting Title X projects from "engaging in activities that 'encourage, promote or advocate abortion as a method of family planning'" and requiring Title X projects to be "'physically and financially separate' from prohibited abortion activities."[11] In the Court's view, the regulations did not "force the Title X grantee to give up abortion-related speech; they merely require[d] that the grantee keep such activities separate and distinct from Title X activities," thereby ensuring that public funds are "spent for the purposes for which they were authorized."[12] In other words, the regulations governed "the scope of the Title X project's activities," leaving "the grantee unfettered in its other activities."[13]

Building on Rust, the Court in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley suggested that including some subjective criteria in competitive grantmaking does not necessarily amount to impermissible viewpoint discrimination.[14] There, the Court upheld a federal statute requiring the NEA, in awarding grants, to "tak[e] into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public."[15] The Court concluded that this "advisory language" imposed "no categorical requirement" to reject applicants whose works did not meet the "decency and respect" provision.[16] Thus, the Court held, the provision did not "introduce considerations that, in practice, would effectively preclude or punish the expression of particular views."[17] Instead, the Court concluded, the provision "merely adds some imprecise considerations to an already subjective selection process."[18] As such, it did not violate the First Amendment on its face.[19]

Amdt1.7.13.7 Government's Message Versus Private Speakers

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Court has cautioned that "Congress cannot recast a condition on funding as a mere definition of its program in every case, lest the First Amendment be reduced to a simple

---

[9] Id. at 193–94 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[10] Id. at 194.

[11] Id. at 180, 196 (quoting 42 C.F.R. §§ 59.9, 59.10(a)).

[12] Id. at 196

[13] Id.

[14] Nat'l Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 587–88 (1998).

[15] Id. at 572 (quoting 20 U.S.C. § 954(d)(1)).

[16] Id. at 581.

[17] Id. at 583.

[18] Id. at 589; see also id. at 585 ("Any content-based considerations that may be taken into account in the grant-making process are a consequence of the nature of arts funding. The NEA has limited resources and it must deny the majority of the grant applications that it receives . . . . The agency may decide to fund particular projects for a wide variety of reasons. . . .").

[19] Id. at 590. The Court did not foreclose an "as-applied" challenge if, for instance, "the NEA were to leverage its power to award subsidies on the basis of subjective criteria into a penalty on disfavored viewpoints." Id. at 587.

semantic exercise."[1] In Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez, the Court struck down a condition on federal grants to local organizations providing free legal services to indigent clients.[2] The condition prohibited grantees from representing clients in cases which "involve an effort to amend or otherwise challenge existing law" regarding "a Federal or State welfare system."[3] As interpreted by the government, the condition required lawyers working for a grantee both to decline a representation that would involve such arguments and to withdraw from a representation when such arguments "became apparent after representation was well underway."[4]

The Court held that the condition was unconstitutional.[5] The Court distinguished Rust, explaining that in the circumstances presented there, the government "used private speakers to transmit information pertaining to its own program"[6] In other words, the government was the speaker in Rust through its program.[7] In contrast, the Court reasoned, the federal program in Velazquez "was designed to facilitate private speech, not to promote a governmental message."[8] Congress funded the program so that grantees could "provide attorneys to represent the interests of indigent clients."[9] In addition, a lawyer working for a grantee speaks on her client's behalf; she is "not the government's speaker."[10] The condition, the Court reasoned, could prohibit lawyers from presenting "all the reasonable and well-grounded arguments necessary for proper resolution" of welfare cases, thereby "distort[ing]" the "usual functioning" of the legal system to the detriment of individual clients and the courts deciding those cases.[11] The Court observed that while Congress "was not required to fund the whole range of legal representations or relationships," it could not use funding of private speech to "suppress[ ]. . . ideas thought inimical to the Government's own interest."[12]

Amdt1.7.13.8 Public Entities and Private Access

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In 2003, the Court upheld a speech-related condition on funding for a governmental entity. The case, United States v. American Library Association (ALA), concerned two federal programs that provided rebates and grants to help public libraries provide internet access for

---

[1] Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 547 (2001).

[2] Id. at 536.

[3] Id. at 538 (quoting Omnibus Consolidated Rescissions and Appropriations Act of 1996, § 504, 110 Stat. 1321–53).

[4] Id. at 539.

[5] Id. at 549.

[6] Id. at 541 ("As we said in Rosenberger, 'when the government disburses public funds to private entities to convey a governmental message, it may take legitimate and appropriate steps to ensure that its message is neither garbled nor distorted by the grantee.'" (quoting Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 833 (1995))).

[7] The Velazquez Court acknowledged that the Rust Court did not explicitly rely on the government speech rationale, but noted that later Supreme Court cases "explained Rust on this understanding." Id. See Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker.

[8] Legal Servs. Corp., 531 U.S. at 542.

[9] Id.

[10] Id.

[11] Id. at 543–54.

[12] Id. at 548–49.

patrons.[1] A condition on both programs required recipient libraries to install filtering software to block access to pornographic sites and other material deemed harmful to minors.[2] The ALA argued that this condition violated libraries' First Amendment right to provide constitutionally protected speech to the public.[3]

The Court rejected ALA's unconstitutional conditions argument without resolving whether public libraries, as governmental entities, have First Amendment rights.[4] A plurality of the Court reasoned that, as in Rust, Congress was defining the limits of the programs it was funding—programs designed to help libraries "fulfill their traditional role of obtaining material of requisite and appropriate quality for educational and informational purposes."[5] More specifically, the plurality explained, the required filtering software blocks online materials that libraries traditionally would have excluded from their off-line collections.[6] Echoing TWR and Rust, the plurality also concluded that the condition did not "penalize" a recipient's decision to "provide [its] patrons with unfiltered Internet access"; it "simply reflect[ed] Congress's decision not to subsidize" such access.[7]

Amdt1.7.13.9 Conditions Exceeding the Scope of the Program

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Ten years after United States v. American Library Association, in Agency for International Development v. Alliance for Open Society International, the Court considered a condition requiring recipients of federal funding for global HIV/AIDs programs to "have a policy explicitly opposing prostitution and sex trafficking."[1] A group of funding recipients—domestic organizations with programs outside the United States—challenged this policy requirement on free speech grounds, arguing that it would require them to limit even their privately funded activities.[2] During the course of the litigation, the federal government issued guidelines allowing funding recipients to work with affiliate organizations that did not have the specified policy so long as the recipients "retain 'objective integrity and independence from any affiliated organization.'"[3]

The Court acknowledged that the government could not adopt the policy requirement "as a direct regulation of speech."[4] Because the policy requirement was a funding condition,[5]

---

[1] United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. 194, 199 (2003) (plurality opinion).

[2] Id. at 201 (citing 20 U.S.C. §§ 9134(f)(1)(A)(i), (B)(i) (2001) and 47 U.S.C. §§ 254(h)(6)(B)(i), (C)(i) (2001)).

[3] Id. at 210.

[4] Id. at 210–11. Although only four Justices joined the main opinion, two additional Justices concurred in the Court's judgment. Id. at 214–215 (Kennedy, J.); id. at 215–20 (Breyer, J.). The Court also rejected the ALA's argument that the condition exceeded Congress's spending power by requiring public libraries to violate their patrons' First Amendment rights. Id. at 202–08, 214 (plurality opinion).

[5] Id. at 211 (plurality opinion). The plurality rejected an analogy to Velazquez, reasoning that unlike lawyers for indigent clients, public libraries "have no comparable role that pits them against the Government" such that restrictions on their speech threaten to "distort" libraries' usual functions. Id. at 213.

[6] Id. at 212.

[7] Id. at 199.

[1] 570 U.S. 205, 208 (2013) (quoting 22 U.S.C. § 7631(f) (2012)).

[2] Id.

[3] Id. at 211 (quoting 45 C.F.R. § 89.3).

[4] Id. at 213.

however, the Court considered whether it "define[d] the limits of the government spending program" or sought "to leverage funding to regulate speech outside the contours of the program itself."[6] For a majority of the Court, the policy requirement clearly fell "on the unconstitutional side of [that] line."[7] The Court reasoned that "the condition by its very nature affects 'protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program'" because it requires recipients to "adopt—as their own—the Government's view on an issue of public concern."[8] The government's guidelines about affiliation with noncompliant entities did not "save" the condition because they required the recipient to either distance itself from its affiliate and their shared message, or clearly identify with its affiliate while espousing the government's message "only at the price of evident hypocrisy."[9]

The "distinction drawn in these cases—between conditions that define the federal program and those that reach outside it—is not always self-evident."[10] Nevertheless, it appears to be the line that the Supreme Court has drawn in analyzing funding conditions that affect a recipient's speech—that is, at least for restrictions that the government could not impose directly.[11]

Amdt1.7.13.10 Requirements That Can Be Imposed Directly

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In a 2006 decision, the Supreme Court held that a funding condition that affects speech is not an unconstitutional condition "if it could be constitutionally imposed directly."[1] In Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic & Institutional Rights, the Court considered a law that required a federal department to withhold certain funds from any higher education institution that had "a policy or practice" of giving military recruiters less favorable access to its campus and students than non-military recruiters.[2] The requirement comported with the First Amendment, the Court held, because it primarily regulated conduct and the government's interest in supporting military recruiting was sufficient to justify any incidental burdens on expression.[3] Because Congress could directly require higher education institutions to provide

---

[5] See id. at 214 (explaining that if a party objects to a funding condition, its usual "recourse is to decline the funds," even if the condition affects the party's First Amendment rights, but that in some situations, "a funding condition can result in an unconstitutional burden on First Amendment rights").

[6] Id. at 214–15.

[7] Agency for Int'l Dev.v. All. for Open Soc'y Int'l, 570 U.S. 205, 217 (2013).

[8] Id. at 218.

[9] Id. at 219. In 2020, the Supreme Court upheld the same policy condition as applied to the plaintiffs' foreign affiliates, holding that the First Amendment did not protect separately incorporated, foreign organizations operating abroad. Agency for Int'l Dev. v. All. for Open Soc'y Int'l, No. 19-177, slip op. at 1–7 (U.S. June 29, 2020). The Court explained that the plaintiffs, while domestic organizations, could not "export their own First Amendment rights to shield foreign organizations from Congress's funding conditions." Id. at 6–7.

[10] Alliance for Open Soc'y Int'l, 570 U.S. at 217.

[11] Rumsfeld v. Forum for Acad. & Inst'l Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 59–60 (2006).

[1] Rumsfeld v. Forum for Acad. & Inst'l Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 59–60 (2006).

[2] Id. at 52–55 (quoting 10 U.S.C. § 983(b) (2000 ed., Supp. IV)).

[3] Id. at 60–70 (reasoning that while "recruiting assistance provided by the schools often includes elements of speech," the burden on such speech was incidental to its regulation of conduct in the form of recruiting practices, and concluding in the alternative that the law met the intermediate scrutiny standard applicable to regulations of expressive conduct).

equal access to military recruiters, it could also take the indirect measure of conditioning funding on compliance with the equal-access requirement.[4]

Amdt1.7.14 Symbolic Speech

Amdt1.7.14.1 Overview of Symbolic Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Communication of political, economic, social, and other views is not accomplished solely by face-to-face speech, broadcast speech, or writing in newspapers, periodicals, and pamphlets. There is also "expressive conduct" or "symbolic speech," which includes activities such as picketing and marching, distribution of leaflets and pamphlets, door-to-door solicitation, flag desecration, and draft-card burnings.[1] Sit-ins and stand-ins may effectively express a protest about certain things.[2]

The Supreme Court has said that conduct will be sufficiently "communicative . . . to bring the First Amendment into play" if there is an "intent to convey a particularized message, and . . . the likelihood was great that the message would be understood by those who viewed it."[3] Further, the conduct must itself be "inherently" expressive—merely "combining speech and conduct" is not sufficient to "transform conduct into 'speech.'"[4] Expressive conduct is evaluated under a "less stringent" constitutional standard than pure speech and thus more subject to regulation and restriction.[5] Some expressive conduct may be forbidden altogether, when "a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element" of the activity justifies "incidental limitations" on the protected expression.[6] The relevant test is an intermediate scrutiny standard that was announced in United States v. O'Brien: "a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the [1] See, e.g., City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 289 (2000) (plurality opinion). The concept of expressive conduct has also come up in the context of government speech. E.g., Walker v. Tex. Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 576 U.S. 200, 216 (2015). For a discussion of these cases, see Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker.

[4] Id. at 59–60.

[2] In Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966), the Court held protected a peaceful, silent stand-in in a segregated public library. Speaking of speech and assembly, Justice Abe Fortas said for the Court: "As this Court has repeatedly stated, these rights are not confined to verbal expression. They embrace appropriate types of action which certainly include the right in a peaceable and orderly manner to protest by silent and reproachful presence, in a place where the protestant has every right to be, the unconstitutional segregation of public facilities." Id. at 141–42. See also Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U.S. 157, 185, 201 (1961) (Harlan, J., concurring). On a different footing is expressive conduct in a place where such conduct is prohibited for reasons other than suppressing speech. See Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288 (1984) (upholding Park Service restriction on overnight sleeping as applied to demonstrators wishing to call attention to the plight of the homeless).

[3] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 404 (1989) (quoting Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405, 410–11 (1974)) (internal quotation mark omitted).

[4] Rumsfeld v. Forum for Acad. & Institutional Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 67 (2006) (holding that conduct was not "inherently expressive" where it was "expressive only because the [litigants] accompanied their conduct with speech explaining it"). Cf. United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376 (1968) (saying conduct may be protected when "'speech' and 'nonspeech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct").

[5] Johnson, 491 U.S. at 403.

[6] O'Brien, 391 U.S. at 376.

furtherance of that interest."[7] This intermediate standard is related to the idea that even regulations of pure speech may sometimes be justified if they regulate only the time, place, or manner of the speech—that is, focusing on non-content elements of the speech.[8] If speech is oral, it may be noisy enough to be disturbing,[9] and, if it is written, it may be litter;[10] in either case, the noise or litter aspects of the speech may be regulable.[11]

United States v. O'Brien[12] affirmed a conviction and upheld a congressional prohibition against destruction of draft registration certificates; O'Brien had publicly burned his draft card. Finding that the government's interest in having registrants retain their cards at all times was an important one and that the prohibition of destruction of the cards worked no restriction of First Amendment freedoms broader than necessary to serve the interest, the Court upheld the statute. Subsequently, the Court upheld a "passive enforcement" policy singling out for prosecution for failure to register for the draft those young men who notified authorities of an intention not to register for the draft and those reported by others.[13]

Amdt1.7.14.2 Leaflets and Handbills

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Lovell v. City of Griffin,[1] the Supreme Court struck down a permit system applying to the distribution of circulars, handbills, or literature of any kind. The First Amendment, the Court said, "necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets," which "have been historic weapons in the defense of liberty, as the pamphlets of Thomas Paine and others in our own history abundantly attest."[2] State courts, responding to what appeared to be a hint in Lovell that prevention of littering and other interests might be sufficient to sustain a flat ban on literature distribution,[3] upheld total prohibitions and were reversed in Schneider v. State.[4] The Court held that "[m]ere legislative preferences" for keeping "the streets clean and of good appearance is insufficient to justify an ordinance which prohibits a person rightfully on a public street from

---

[7] Id. at 377.

[8] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 662 (1994) (equating the O'Brien standard with the intermediate scrutiny standard applicable to content-neutral restrictions); see also Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech; Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

[9] E.g., Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948); Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949).

[10] E.g., Schneider v. Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147 (1939).

[11] Cf. Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971).

[12] 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

[13] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598 (1985). The incidental restriction on First Amendment rights to speak out against the draft was no greater than necessary to further the government's interests in "prosecutorial efficiency," obtaining sufficient proof prior to prosecution, and promoting general deterrence (or not appearing to condone open defiance of the law). See also United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675 (1985) (order banning a civilian from entering military base upheld as applied to attendance at base open house by an individual previously convicted of destroying military property).

[1] 303 U.S. 444 (1938).

[2] 303 U.S. at 452.

[3] 303 U.S. at 451.

[4] Schneider v. Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147, 161, 162 (1939). The Court noted that the right to distribute leaflets was subject to certain obvious regulations, id. at 160, and called for a balancing, with the weight inclined to the First Amendment rights. See also Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943).

handing literature to one willing to receive it."[5] In Talley v. California,[6] the Court struck down an ordinance that banned all handbills that did not carry the name and address of the author, printer, and sponsor. The Court noted that "[a]nonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind," allowing criticism of "oppressive practices and laws either anonymously or not at all."[7] Imposing identification requirements "might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance."[8] Responding to the city's defense that the ordinance was aimed at providing a means to identify those responsible for fraud, false advertising, and the like, the Court noted that "the ordinance is in no manner so limited," saying the Court would not, therefore, "pass on the validity of an ordinance limited to these or any other supposed evils."[9]

Talley's anonymity rationale was strengthened in McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n,[10] invalidating Ohio's prohibition on the distribution of anonymous campaign literature. There is a "respected tradition of anonymity in the advocacy of political causes," the Court noted, and neither of the interests asserted by Ohio justified the limitation. The Court held that the state's interest in informing the electorate was "plainly insufficient," and, although the more weighty interest in preventing fraud in the electoral process might be accomplished by a direct prohibition, it could not be accomplished indirectly by an indiscriminate ban on a whole category of speech.[11] Ohio could not apply the prohibition, therefore, to punish anonymous distribution of pamphlets opposing a referendum on school taxes.[12]

The handbilling cases were distinguished in City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent,[13] in which the Court held that a city may prohibit altogether the use of utility poles for posting of signs. Although a city's concern over visual blight could be addressed by an anti-littering ordinance not restricting the expressive activity of distributing handbills, in the case of utility pole signs "it is the medium of expression itself" that creates the visual blight. Hence, the city's prohibition, unlike a prohibition on distributing handbills, was narrowly tailored to curtail no more speech than necessary to accomplish the city's legitimate purpose.[14] Ten years later, however, the Court unanimously invalidated a town's broad ban on residential signs that permitted only residential identification signs, "for sale" signs, and signs warning of safety

---

[5] 308 U.S. at 161, 162.

[6] 362 U.S. 60 (1960).

[7] 362 U.S. at 64.

[8] 362 U.S. at 65.

[9] 362 U.S. at 64. In Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241 (1967), the Court directed a lower court to consider the constitutionality of a statute which made it a criminal offense to publish or distribute election literature without identification of the name and address of the printer and of the persons sponsoring the literature. The lower court voided the law, but changed circumstances on a new appeal caused the Court to dismiss. Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969).

[10] 514 U.S. 334 (1995).

[11] 514 U.S. at 348–49.

[12] In Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation, 525 U.S. 182 (1999), the Court struck down a Colorado statute requiring initiative-petition circulators to wear identification badges. It found that "the restraint on speech in this case is more severe than was the restraint in McIntyre" because "[p]etition circulation is a less fleeting encounter, for the circulator must endeavor to persuade electors to sign the petition. . . . [T]he badge requirement compels personal name identification at the precise moment when the circulator's interest in anonymity is greatest." Id. at 199. In Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y v. Village of Stratton, 536 U.S. 150, 166 (2002), concern for the right to anonymity was one reason that the Court struck down an ordinance that made it a misdemeanor to engage in door-to-door advocacy without first registering with the mayor and receiving a permit.

[13] 466 U.S. 789 (1984).

[14] Justice William Brennan argued in dissent that adequate alternative forms of communication were not readily available because handbilling or other person-to-person methods would be substantially more expensive, and that the regulation for the sake of aesthetics was not adequately justified.

hazards.[15] Prohibiting homeowners from displaying political, religious, or personal messages on their own property entirely foreclosed "a venerable means of communication that is unique and important," and that is "an unusually cheap form of communication" without viable alternatives for many residents.[16] The ban was thus reminiscent of total bans on leafleting, distribution of literature, and door-to-door solicitation that the Court had struck down in the 1930s and 1940s. The prohibition in Vincent was distinguished as not removing a "uniquely valuable or important mode of communication," and as not impairing citizens' ability to communicate.[17]

Amdt1.7.14.3 Flags as a Case Study in Symbolic Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Very little expression is "mere" speech. Conduct may have a communicative content, intended to express a point of view. Expressive conduct may consist of flying a particular flag as a symbol[1] or in refusing to salute a flag as a symbol.[2]

In one case, the Supreme Court concluded that "the flag salute is a form of utterance," explaining that symbolism is communication, and "[t]he use of an emblem or flag to symbolize some system, idea, institution, or personality is a short cut from mind to mind."[3] When conduct or action has a communicative content to it, governmental regulation or prohibition implicates the First Amendment, but this does not mean that such conduct or action is necessarily immune from governmental process.

The Court divided when it had to deal with one of the more popular forms of "symbolic" conduct of the late 1960s and early 1970s—flag burning and other forms of flag desecration. Thus, in Street v. New York,[4] the defendant had been convicted under a statute punishing desecration "by words or act" upon evidence that when he burned the flag he had uttered contemptuous words. The conviction was set aside because it might have been premised on his words alone or on his words and the act together, and no valid governmental interest supported penalizing verbal contempt for the flag.[5]

A few years later the Court reversed two other flag desecration convictions, one on due process/vagueness grounds, the other under the First Amendment. In Smith v. Goguen,[6] a statute punishing anyone who "publicly . . . treats contemptuously the flag of the United States" was held unconstitutionally vague, and a conviction for wearing trousers with a small [15] City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994).

---

[16] 512 U.S. at 54, 57.

[17] 512 U.S. at 54. The city's legitimate interest in reducing visual clutter could be addressed by "more temperate" measures, the Court suggested. Id. at 58.

[1] Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

[2] West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943).

[3] 319 U.S. at 632.

[4] 394 U.S. 576 (1969).

[5] 394 U.S. at 591–93. In Radich v. New York, 401 U.S. 531 (1971), aff'g, 26 N.Y.2d 114, 257 N.E.2d 30 (1970), an equally divided Court, Justice William O. Douglas not participating, sustained a flag desecration conviction of one who displayed sculptures in a gallery, using the flag in apparently sexually bizarre ways to register a social protest. Defendant subsequently obtained his release on habeas corpus, United States ex rel. Radich v. Criminal Court, 459 F.2d 745 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 115 (1973).

[6] 415 U.S. 566 (1974).

United States flag sewn to the seat was overturned. The language subjected the defendant to criminal liability under a standard "so indefinite that police, court, and jury were free to react to nothing more than their own preferences for treatment of the flag."[7]

The First Amendment was the basis for reversal in Spence v. Washington,[8] which set aside a conviction under a statute punishing the display of a United States flag to which something is attached or superimposed. The defendant had hung his flag from his apartment window upside down with a peace symbol taped to the front and back. The act, the Court thought, was a form of communication, and because of the nature of the act, and the factual context and environment in which it was undertaken, the Court held it to be protected. The context considered by the Court included the fact that the flag was privately owned, that it was displayed on private property, and that there was no danger of breach of the peace. The Court also emphasized that the act was intended to express an idea and it did so without damaging the flag. The Court assumed that the state had a valid interest in preserving the flag as a national symbol, but left unclear whether that interest extended beyond protecting the physical integrity of the flag.[9]

The underlying assumption that flag burning could be prohibited as a means of protecting the flag's symbolic value was later rejected. Twice, in 1989 and again in 1990, the Court held that prosecutions for flag burning at a public demonstration violated the First Amendment. First, in Texas v. Johnson[10] the Court rejected a state desecration statute designed to protect the flag's symbolic value, and then in United States v. Eichman[11] rejected a more limited federal statute purporting to protect only the flag's physical integrity. Both cases were decided by 5-4 votes, with Justice William Brennan writing the Court's opinions.[12] The Texas statute invalidated in Johnson defined the prohibited act of "desecration" as any physical mistreatment of the flag that the actor knew would seriously offend other persons. This emphasis on causing offense to others meant that the law was not "unrelated to the suppression of free expression" and that consequently the deferential standard of United States v. O'Brien, discussed in an earlier essay, was inapplicable.[13] Applying strict scrutiny instead, the Court ruled that the state's prosecution of someone who burned a flag at a political protest was not justified under the state's asserted interest in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity. The Court's opinion left open the question whether the Court would uphold a "content-neutral" statute protecting the physical integrity of the flag.

Immediately following Johnson, Congress enacted a new flag protection statute providing punishment for anyone who "knowingly mutilates, defaces, physically defiles, burns,

---

[7] 415 U.S. at 578.

[8] 418 U.S. 405 (1974).

[9] 418 U.S. at 408–11, 412–13. Subsequently, the Court vacated, over the dissents of Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, and William Rehnquist, two convictions for burning flags and sent them back for reconsideration in the light of Goguen and Spence. Sutherland v. Illinois, 418 U.S. 907 (1974); Farrell v. Iowa, 418 U.S. 907 (1974). The Court, however, dismissed, "for want of a substantial federal question," an appeal from a flag desecration conviction of one who, with no apparent intent to communicate but in the course of "horseplay," blew his nose on a flag, simulated masturbation on it, and finally burned it. Van Slyke v. Texas, 418 U.S. 907 (1974).

[10] 491 U.S. 397 (1989).

[11] 496 U.S. 310 (1990).

[12] In each case Justice William Brennan's opinion for the Court was joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun, Antonin Scalia, and Anthony Kennedy, and in each case Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justices White, John Paul Stevens, and Sandra Day O'Connor dissented. In Johnson the Chief Justice's dissent was joined by Justices Byron White and Sandra Day O'Connor, and Justice John Paul Stevens dissented separately. In Eichman Justice John Paul Stevens wrote the only dissenting opinion, to which the other dissenters subscribed.

[13] 491 U.S. at 407–08. For discussion of the O'Brien intermediate scrutiny standard, see Amdt1.7.14.1 Overview of Symbolic Speech.

maintains on the floor or ground, or tramples upon any flag of the United States."[14] The law was designed to be content-neutral and to protect the "physical integrity" of the flag.[15] Nonetheless, the 1990 decision in United States v. Eichman overturned convictions of flag burners, as the Court found that the law suffered from "the same fundamental flaw" as the Texas law in Johnson.[16] The government's underlying interest, characterized by the Court as resting upon "a perceived need to preserve the flag's status as a symbol of our Nation and certain national ideals,"[17] still related to the suppression of free expression. Support for this interpretation was found in the fact that most of the prohibited acts are usually associated with disrespectful treatment of the flag; this suggested to the Court "a focus on those acts likely to damage the flag's symbolic value."[18] As in Johnson, such a law could not withstand strict scrutiny analysis.

Amdt1.7.14.4 Public Issue Picketing and Parading

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In its early cases, the Supreme Court held that picketing and parading were forms of expression entitled to some First Amendment protection.[1] Those early cases did not, however, explicate the difference in application of First Amendment principles that the difference between mere expression and speech-plus would entail. Many of these cases concerned disruptions or feared disruptions of the public peace occasioned by the expressive activity and the ramifications of this on otherwise protected activity.[2] A series of other cases concerned the permissible characteristics of permit systems in which parades and meetings were licensed, and expanded the procedural guarantees that must accompany a permissible licensing system.[3] In Hughes v. Superior Court, however, the Supreme Court upheld an injunction against picketers asking a grocery store to adopt a quota-hiring system for Black employees, affirming the state court's ruling that picketing to coerce the adoption of racially discriminatory hiring was contrary to state public policy.[4]

A series of civil rights picketing and parading cases led the Court to formulate standards seemingly more protective of expressive activity. The process began with Edwards v. South Carolina,[5] in which the Court reversed a breach of the peace conviction of several Black protesters for their refusal to disperse as ordered by police. The statute was so vague, the Court concluded, that the demonstrators had been convicted simply because they peaceably

---

[14] The Flag Protection Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-131 (1989).

[15] See H.R. Rep. No. 231, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. 8 (1989) ("The purpose of the bill is to protect the physical integrity of American flags in all circumstances, regardless of the motive or political message of any flag burner").

[16] 496 U.S. at 317–19.

[17] 496 U.S. at 316.

[18] 496 U.S. at 317.

[1] Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951).

[2] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942); Terminiello v. City of Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949); Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951).

[3] See, e.g., Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969); National Socialist Party v. Village of Skokie, 432 U.S. 43 (1977); Carroll v. President & Commr's of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175 (1968).

[4] Hughes v. Superior Court, 339 U.S. 460 (1950).

[5] 372 U.S. 229 (1963).

expressed unpopular views. Describing the demonstration upon the grounds of the legislative building in South Carolina's capital, Justice Potter Stewart observed that "[t]he circumstances in this case reflect an exercise of these basic [First Amendment] constitutional rights in their most pristine and classic form."[6] In subsequent cases, however, the Court rejected the idea that the First Amendment "afford[s] the same kind of freedom to those who would communicate ideas by conduct such as patrolling, marching, and picketing on streets and highways, as . . . to those who communicate ideas by pure speech."[7] The Court emphasized that "certain forms of conduct mixed with speech may be regulated or prohibited," and further concluded that picketing and parading may be regulated under a sufficiently narrowly drawn statute "even though [such conduct is] intertwined with expression and association."[8]

The Court must determine, of course, whether the regulation is aimed primarily at conduct, or whether instead the aim is to regulate the content of speech. In a series of decisions, the Court refused to permit restrictions on parades and demonstrations, and reversed convictions for breach of the peace and similar offenses, when, in the Court's view, opponents of the demonstrators' messages had created the disturbance.[9] Subsequently, however, the Court upheld a ban on residential picketing in Frisby v. Shultz,[10] finding that the city ordinance was narrowly tailored to serve the "significant" governmental interest in protecting residential privacy. As interpreted, the ordinance banned only picketing that targeted a single residence, and it is unclear whether the Court would uphold a broader restriction on residential picketing.[11]

In 1982's NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co.,[12] the Justices confronted a case, that, like Hughes v. Superior Court,[13] involved a state court injunction on picketing, although this one also involved a damage award. The case arose in the context of a protest against racial conditions by Black citizens of Claiborne County, Mississippi. Listing demands that included desegregation of public facilities, hiring Black policemen, hiring more Black employees by local stores, and ending verbal abuse by police, the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Inc. (NAACP) unanimously voted to boycott the area's White merchants. The boycott was carried out through speeches and nonviolent picketing and solicitation of others to cease doing business with the merchants. Individuals were designated to watch stores and identify Black people patronizing the stores; their names were then announced at meetings and published. Persuasion of others included social pressures and threats of social ostracism. Acts of violence did occur from time to time, directed in the main at Black people who did not observe the boycott.

---

[6] 372 U.S. at 235. See also Fields v. South Carolina, 375 U.S. 44 (1963); Henry v. City of Rock Hill, 376 U.S. 776 (1964).

[7] Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 555 (1965). Nonetheless, in this opinion, the Court concluded that a state breach-of-the-peace law granting city officials "completely uncontrolled discretion" to permit parades or demonstrations was unconstitutional. Id. at 557–58. The Court described the facts as "strikingly similar to those present in Edwards v. South Carolina." Id. at 544–45.

[8] Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 563 (1965). The Court ruled the state law at issue in this opinion sufficiently narrowly drawn, as it targeted picketing near a courthouse, with the intent of interfering with the administration of justice. Id. at 562, 564.

[9] Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965); Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969); Bachellar v. Maryland, 397 U.S. 564 (1970). See also Collin v. Smith, 447 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Ill.), aff'd, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir.), stay denied, 436 U.S. 953, cert. denied, 439 U.S. 916 (1978).

[10] 487 U.S. 474 (1988).

[11] An earlier case involving residential picketing had been resolved on equal protection rather than First Amendment grounds, the ordinance at issue making an exception for labor picketing. Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980).

[12] 458 U.S. 886 (1982).

[13] 339 U.S. 460 (1950).

The state Supreme Court imposed joint and several liability upon leaders and participants in the boycott, and upon the NAACP, for all of the merchants' lost earnings during a seven-year period on the basis of the common law tort of malicious interference with the merchants' business, holding that the existence of acts of physical force and violence and the use of force, violence, and threats to achieve the ends of the boycott deprived it of any First Amendment protection.

Reversing, the Supreme Court observed that the goals of the boycotters were legal and that most of their means were constitutionally protected; although violence was not protected, its existence alone did not deprive the other activities of First Amendment coverage, particularly where there was no evidence that the boycott organizers authorized, ratified, or even had specific knowledge of the violence. Thus, speeches and nonviolent picketing, both to inform the merchants of grievances and to encourage others to join the boycott, were protected activities, and association for those purposes was also protected.[14] The Court ruled that the activity was protected even though nonparticipants had been urged to join by threats of social ostracism: "[s]peech does not lose its protected character . . . simply because it may embarrass others or coerce them into action."[15] The boycott had a disruptive effect upon local economic conditions and resulted in loss of business for the merchants, but in the Court's view, these consequences did not justify suppression of the boycott. Government may regulate certain economic activities having an incidental effect upon speech (for example, labor organizing or business conspiracies to restrain competition),[16] but that power of government does not extend to suppression of picketing and other boycott activities involving, as this case did, speech upon matters of public affairs with the intent of affecting governmental action and motivating private actions to achieve racial equality.[17]

The critical issue for the lower court, however, had been the occurrence of violent acts. The Supreme Court first affirmed that the "First Amendment does not protect violence" or prevent a state "from imposing tort liability for business losses that are caused by violence and by threats of violence."[18] Nonetheless, the Court stressed that the First Amendment demands precision of regulation "[w]hen such conduct occurs in the context of constitutionally protected activity," limiting "the grounds that may give rise to damages liability and . . . the persons who may be held accountable for those damages."[19] In other words, the states may impose damages for the consequences of violent conduct, but they may not award compensation for the [14] NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 907–08 (1982).

[15] 458 U.S. at 910. The Court cited Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 537 (1945), a labor picketing case, and Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 419 (1971), a public issues picketing case, which had also relied on the labor cases. Compare NLRB v. Retail Store Employees, 447 U.S. 607, 618–19 (1980) (Stevens, J., concurring) (labor picketing that coerces or "signals" others to engage in activity that violates valid labor policy, rather than attempting to engage reason may be prohibited). To the contention that liability could be imposed on "store watchers" and on a group known as "Black Hats" who also patrolled stores and identified Black patrons of the businesses, the Court responded: "There is nothing unlawful in standing outside a store and recording names. Similarly, there is nothing unlawful in wearing black hats, although such apparel may cause apprehension in others." 458 U.S. at 925.

[16] See, e.g., FTC v. Superior Court Trial Lawyers Ass'n, 493 U.S. 411 (1990) (upholding application of per se antitrust liability to trial lawyers association's boycott designed to force higher fees for representation of indigent defendants by court-appointed counsel).

[17] In evaluating the permissibility of government regulation in this context that has an incidental effect on expression, the Court applied the standards of United States v. O'Brien, which permits a regulation "if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restiction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." 458 U.S. at 912, n.47, quoting O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376–77 (1968) (footnotes omitted).

[18] 458 U.S. at 916.

[19] 458 U.S. at 916–17.

consequences of nonviolent, protected activity.[20] Thus, the state courts had to compute, upon proof by the merchants, what damages had been the result of violence, and only those nonviolent persons who associated with others with an awareness of violence and an intent to further it could similarly be held liable.[21] Because most of the acts of violence had occurred early on, in 1966, there was no way constitutionally that much if any of the later losses of the merchants could be recovered in damages.[22] As to the field secretary of the local NAACP, the Court refused to permit imposition of damages based upon speeches that could be read as advocating violence, because they did not meet the standard for speech likely to incite imminent lawless action.[23] The award against the NAACP fell with the denial of damages against its local head, and, in any event, the protected right of association required a rule that would immunize the NAACP without a finding that it "authorized—either actually or apparently—or ratified unlawful conduct."[24]

Claiborne Hardware is, thus, a seminal decision in the Court's effort to formulate standards governing state power to regulate or to restrict expressive conduct that comes close to or crosses over the line to encompass some violent activities; it requires great specificity and the drawing of fine discriminations by government so as to reach only that portion of the activity that does involve violence or the threat of violence.[25]

More recently, disputes arising from anti-abortion protests outside abortion clinics have occasioned another look at principles distinguishing lawful public demonstrations from proscribable conduct. In Madsen v. Women's Health Center,[26] the Court refined principles governing issuance of "content-neutral" injunctions that restrict expressive activity.[27] The [21] 458 U.S. at 918–29, relying on a series of labor cases and on the subversive activities association cases, e.g., Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961), and Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961).

---

[20] 458 U.S. at 917–18.

[22] 458 U.S. at 920–26. The Court distinguished Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U.S. 287 (1941), in which an injunction had been sustained against both violent and nonviolent activity, not on the basis of special rules governing labor picketing, but because the violence had been "pervasive." 458 U.S. at 923.

[23] 458 U.S. at 926–29. The field secretary's "emotionally charged rhetoric . . . did not transcend the bounds of protected speech set forth in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)."

[24] 458 U.S. at 931. In ordinary business cases, the rule of liability of an entity for actions of its agents is broader. E.g., American Soc'y of Mech. Eng'rs v. Hydrolevel Corp., 456 U.S. 556 (1982). The different rule in cases of organizations formed to achieve political purposes rather than economic goals appears to require substantial changes in the law of agency with respect to such entities. Note, 96 HARV. L. REV. 171, 174–76 (1982).

[25] "Concerted action is a powerful weapon. History teaches that special dangers are associated with conspiratorial activity. And yet one of the foundations of our society is the right of individuals to combine with other persons in pursuit of a common goal by lawful means."

"[P]etitioners' ultimate objectives were unquestionably legitimate. The charge of illegality . . . derives from the means employed by the participants to achieve those goals. The use of speeches, marches, and threats of social ostracism cannot provide the basis for a damages award. But violent conduct is beyond the pale of constitutional protection."

"The taint of violence colored the conduct of some of the petitioners. They, of course, may be held liable for the consequences of their violent deeds. The burden of demonstrating that it colored the entire collective effort, however, is not satisfied by evidence that violence occurred or even that violence contributed to the success of the boycott. [The burden can be met only] by findings that adequately disclose the evidentiary basis for concluding that specific parties agreed to use unlawful means, that carefully identify the impact of such unlawful conduct, and that recognizes the importance of avoiding the imposition of punishment for constitutionally protected activity. . . . A court must be wary of a claim that the true color of a forest is better revealed by reptiles hidden in the weeds than by the foliage of countless freestanding trees." 458 U.S. at 933–34.

[26] 512 U.S. 753 (1994).

[27] The Court rejected the argument that the injunction was necessarily content-based or viewpoint-based because it applied only to anti-abortion protesters. The Court stated: "An injunction by its very nature applies only to a particular group (or individuals) . . . . It does so, however, because of the group's past actions in the context of a specific dispute between real parties." There had been no similarly disruptive demonstrations by pro-abortion factions at the abortion clinic. 512 U.S. at 762. For more discussion of the standards for content-based and content-neutral regulations in public forums, see Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

appropriate test, the Court stated, is "whether the challenged provisions of the injunction burden no more speech than necessary to serve a significant governmental interest."[28] Regular time, place, and manner analysis (requiring that regulation be narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest) "is not sufficiently rigorous," the Court explained, "because injunctions create greater risk of censorship and discriminatory application, and because of the established principle that an injunction should be no broader than necessary to achieve its desired goals."[29] Applying its new test, the Court upheld an injunction prohibiting protesters from congregating, picketing, patrolling, demonstrating, or entering any portion of the public right-of-way within thirty-six feet of an abortion clinic—after concluding that the injunction targeted this particular group of protesters because of their past actions, rather than because of the content or viewpoint of their speech. The Court also upheld the injunction's noise restrictions designed to ensure the health and well-being of clinic patients. Other aspects of the injunction, however, did not pass the test. The Court believed inclusion of private property within the thirty-six-foot buffer was not adequately justified, nor was inclusion in the noise restriction of a ban on "images observable" by clinic patients. A ban on physically approaching any person within 300 feet of the clinic unless that person indicated a desire to communicate burdened more speech than necessary, in the Court's view. Also, a ban on demonstrating within 300 feet of the residences of clinic staff was not sufficiently justified, as the Court said the restriction covered a much larger zone than an earlier residential picketing ban that the Court had upheld.[30]

In Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York,[31] the Court applied the Madsen test to another injunction that placed restrictions on demonstrating outside an abortion clinic. The Court upheld the portion of the injunction that banned "demonstrating within fifteen feet from either side or edge of, or in front of, doorways or doorway entrances, parking lot entrances, driveways and driveway entrances of such facilities"—what the Court called "fixed buffer zones."[32] It struck down a prohibition against demonstrating "within fifteen feet of any person or vehicles seeking access to or leaving such facilities"—what it called "floating buffer zones."[33] The Court cited "public safety and order"[34] in upholding the fixed buffer zones, but it found that the floating buffer zones "burden[ed] more speech than is necessary to serve the relevant governmental interests"[35] because they made it "quite difficult for a protester who wishes to engage in peaceful expressive activity to know how to remain in compliance with the injunction."[36] The Court also upheld a "provision, specifying that once sidewalk counselors who had entered the buffer zones were required to 'cease and desist' their counseling, they had to retreat 15 feet from the people they had been counseling and had to remain outside the boundaries of the buffer zones."[37]

In Hill v. Colorado,[38] the Court upheld a Colorado statute that made it unlawful, within 100 feet of the entrance to any health care facility, to "knowingly approach" within eight feet of another person, without that person's consent, "for the purpose of passing a leaflet or handbill

[28] 512 U.S. at 765.

[29] 512 U.S. at 765.

[30] Referring to Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988).

[31] 519 U.S. 357 (1997).

[32] 519 U.S. at 366 n.3.

[33] 519 U.S. at 366 n.3.

[34] 519 U.S. at 376.

[35] 519 U.S. at 377.

[36] 519 U.S. at 378.

[37] 519 U.S. at 367.

[38] 530 U.S. 703 (2000).

to, displaying a sign to, or engaging in oral protest, education, or counseling with such other person."[39] This decision is notable because it upheld a statute, and not, as in Madsen and Schenck, merely an injunction directed to particular parties. The Court found the statute to be a content-neutral time, place, and manner regulation of speech that "reflect[ed] an acceptable balance between the constitutionally protected rights of law-abiding speakers and the interests of unwilling listeners."[40] The restrictions were content-neutral because they regulated only the places where some speech may occur, and because they applied equally to all demonstrators, regardless of viewpoint. Although the restrictions did not apply to all speech, the Court deemed the "kind of cursory examination" that might be required to distinguish casual conversation from protest, education, or counseling not "problematic," noting that it often would not be necessary to know the exact content of speech to determine whether a person's course of conduct was covered by the law.[41] The Court further held that the law was narrowly tailored to achieve the state's interests, saying that the eight-foot restriction did not significantly impair the ability to convey messages by signs, and ordinarily allowed speakers to come within a normal conversational distance of their targets. Because the statute allowed the speaker to remain in one place, persons who wished to hand out leaflets could position themselves beside entrances near the path of oncoming pedestrians, and consequently were not deprived of the opportunity to get the attention of persons entering a clinic.

In McCullen v. Coakley, the Court applied the same content-neutral analysis as that in Hill, but nonetheless struck down a statutory thirty-five-foot buffer zone at entrances and driveways of abortion facilities.[42] The Court concluded that the buffer zone was not narrowly tailored to serve governmental interests in maintaining public safety and preserving access to reproductive healthcare facilities, the concerns claimed by Massachusetts to underlie the law.[43] The opinion cited several alternatives to the buffer zone that would not curtail the use of public sidewalks as traditional public forums for speech, nor significantly burden the ability of those wishing to provide "sidewalk counseling" to women approaching abortion clinics. Specifically, the Court held that, to preserve First Amendment rights, targeted measures, such as injunctions, enforcement of anti-harassment ordinances, and use of general crowd control authority, as needed, are preferable to broad, prophylactic measures.[44]

Different types of issues were presented by Hurley v. Irish-American Gay Group,[45] in which the Court held that a state's public accommodations law could not be applied to compel private organizers of a St. Patrick's Day parade to accept in the parade a unit that would proclaim a message that the organizers did not wish to promote. Each participating unit affects the message conveyed by the parade organizers, the Court observed, and application of the public accommodations law to the content of the organizers' message contravened the "fundamental rule . . . that a speaker has the autonomy to choose the content of his own message."[46]

---

[39] 530 U.S. at 707.

[40] 530 U.S. at 714.

[41] 530 U.S. at 722.

[42] 573 U.S. ___, No. 12-1168, slip op. at 11–18 (2014).

[43] Id. at 19–23.

[44] Id. at 23–29.

[45] 515 U.S. 557 (1995).

[46] 515 U.S. at 573.

Amdt1.7.14.5 Labor Union Protests and Marches

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has suggested that "public-issue picketing" rests "on the highest rung of the hierarchy of First Amendment values," while labor picketing might be treated somewhat differently.[1] Though the public issue cases are "logically relevant" to labor picketing, the cases dealing with application of economic pressures by labor unions are set apart by different "economic and social interests."[2]

It was in a labor case that the Court first held picketing to be entitled to First Amendment protection.[3] Striking down a flat prohibition on picketing with intent to influence or induce someone to do something, the Court said: "In the circumstances of our times the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution."[4] The Court further reasoned that "the group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussion of matters of public interest merely on a showing that others may thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with its interests."[5]

The Court soon recognized several caveats to this protection, saying, for example, that peaceful picketing may be enjoined if it is associated with violence and intimidation.[6] Although initially the Court continued to find picketing protected in the absence of violence,[7] it soon decided a series of cases recognizing a potentially far-reaching exception: injunctions against peaceful picketing in the course of a labor controversy may be enjoined when such picketing is counter to valid state policies in a domain open to state regulation.[8] The apparent culmination of this course of decision was International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. Vogt, in which Justice Felix Frankfurter broadly rationalized all the cases and derived the rule that "a State, in enforcing some public policy, whether of its criminal or its civil law, and whether announced by its legislature or its courts, could constitutionally enjoin peaceful picketing aimed at

---

[1] Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 466–67 (1980).

[2] Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 276 (1951).

[3] Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940). Picketing as an aspect of communication was recognized in Senn v. Tile Layers Union, 301 U.S. 468 (1937).

[4] 310 U.S. at 102.

[5] 310 U.S. at 104. See also Carlson v. California, 310 U.S. 106 (1940). In AFL v. Swing, 312 U.S. 321 (1941), the Court held unconstitutional an injunction against peaceful picketing based on a state's common-law policy against picketing in the absence of an immediate dispute between employer and employee.

[6] Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U.S. 287 (1941).

[7] Bakery & Pastry Drivers Local v. Wohl, 315 U.S. 769 (1942); Carpenters & Joiners Union v. Ritter's Cafe, 315 U.S. 722 (1942); Cafeteria Employees Union v. Angelos, 320 U.S. 293 (1943).

[8] Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490 (1949) (upholding on basis of state policy forbidding agreements in restraint of trade an injunction against picketing to persuade business owner not to deal with non-union peddlers); International Bhd. of Teamsters v. Hanke, 339 U.S. 470 (1950) (upholding injunction against union picketing protesting non-union proprietor's failure to maintain union shop card and observe union's limitation on weekend business hours); Building Service Emp. Intern. Union v. Gazzam, 339 U.S. 532 (1950) (injunction against picketing to persuade innkeeper to sign contract that would force employees to join union in violation of state policy that employees' choice not be coerced); Local 10, United Ass'n of Journeymen Plumbers v. Graham, 345 U.S. 192 (1953) (injunction against picketing in conflict with state's right-to-work statute).

preventing effectuation of that policy."[9] Although the Court has not disavowed this broad language, the Vogt exception has apparently not swallowed the entire Thornhill rule.[10] The Court has indicated that "a broad ban against peaceful picketing might collide with the guarantees of the First Amendment."[11]

Amdt1.7.14.6 Solicitation

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Martin v. City of Struthers, the Supreme Court struck down an ordinance forbidding solicitors or distributors of literature from knocking on residential doors in a community, the asserted aims of the ordinance being to protect privacy, to protect the sleep of many who worked night shifts, and to protect against burglars posing as canvassers. The 5-4 majority concluded that "[t]he dangers of distribution can so easily be controlled by traditional legal methods, leaving to each householder the full right to decide whether he will receive strangers as visitors, that stringent prohibition can serve no purpose but that forbidden by the Constitution, the naked restriction of the dissemination of ideas."[1]

Later, although striking down an ordinance because of vagueness, the Court observed that it "has consistently recognized a municipality's power to protect its citizens from crime and undue annoyance by regulating soliciting and canvassing" with a more "narrowly drawn ordinance, that does not vest in municipal officers the undefined power to determine what messages residents will hear."[2] However, an ordinance that limited solicitation of contributions door-to-door by charitable organizations to those that use at least 75% of their receipts directly for charitable purposes, defined so as to exclude the expenses of solicitation, salaries, overhead, and other administrative expenses, was invalidated as overbroad.[3] The Court rejected a privacy rationale, as just as much intrusion was likely by permitted as by non-permitted solicitors. A rationale of prevention of fraud was also unavailing, as the Court did not believe that all associations that spent more than 25% of their receipts on overhead were actually engaged in a profit-making enterprise, and, in any event, more narrowly drawn regulations, such as disclosure requirements, could serve this governmental interest.

---

[9] International Bhd. of Teamsters v. Vogt, 354 U.S. 284, 293 (1957). See also American Radio Ass'n v. Mobile Steamship Ass'n, 419 U.S. 215, 228–32 (1974); NLRB v. Retail Store Employees, 447 U.S. 607 (1980); International Longshoremens' Ass'n v. Allied International, 456 U.S. 212, 226–27 (1982).

[10] The dissenters in Vogt asserted that the Court had "come full circle" from Thornhill. 354 U.S. at 295 (Douglas, J., joined by Warren, C.J., and Black, J.).

[11] NLRB v. Fruit & Vegetable Packers, 377 U.S. 58, 63 (1964) (requiring—and finding absent in NLRA—"clearest indication" that Congress intended to prohibit all consumer picketing at secondary establishments). See also Youngdahl v. Rainfair, 355 U.S. 131, 139 (1957) (indicating that, where violence is scattered through time and much of it was unconnected with the picketing, the state should proceed against the violence rather than the picketing).

[1] Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 147 (1943).

[2] Hynes v. Mayor of Oradell, 425 U.S. 610, 616–17 (1976).

[3] Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 U.S. 620 (1980). See also Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228 (1982) (state law distinguishing between religious organizations and their solicitation of funds on basis of whether organizations received more than half of their total contributions from members or from public solicitation violates the Establishment Clause). Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414 (1988) (criminal penalty on use of paid circulators to obtain signatures for ballot initiative suppresses political speech in violation of First and Fourteenth Amendments).

The Court similarly invalidated laws regulating solicitation in Secretary of State v. Joseph H. Munson Co.,[4] and Riley v. National Federation of the Blind.[5] In Munson, the Court invalidated an overbroad Maryland statute limiting professional fundraisers to 25% of the amount collected plus certain costs, and allowing waiver of this limitation if it would effectively prevent the charity from raising contributions. In Riley, the Court invalidated a North Carolina fee structure containing even more flexibility.[6] The Court saw "no nexus between the percentage of funds retained by the fundraiser and the likelihood that the solicitation is fraudulent," and expressed concern about the law placing the burden on the fundraiser to show that a fee structure is reasonable.[7] Moreover, a requirement that fundraisers disclose to potential donors the percentage of donated funds previously used for charity was also invalidated in Riley, the Court indicating that the "more benign and narrowly tailored" alternative of disclosure to the state (accompanied by state publishing of disclosed percentages) could make the information publicly available without so threatening the effectiveness of solicitation.[8]

In Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y v. Village of Stratton, the Court struck down an ordinance that made it a misdemeanor to engage in door-to-door advocacy—religious, political, or commercial—without first registering with the mayor and receiving a permit.[9] "It is offensive to the very notion of a free society," the Court wrote,"that a citizen must first inform the government of her desire to speak to her neighbors and then obtain a permit to do so."[10] The Court ruled that the ordinance violated the right to anonymity, burdened the freedom of speech of those who hold "religious or patriotic views" that prevent them from applying for a license, and effectively banned "a significant amount of spontaneous speech" that might be engaged in on a holiday or weekend when it was not possible to obtain a permit.[11]

Amdt1.8 Freedom of Association

Amdt1.8.1 Overview of Freedom of Association

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The First Amendment protects many activities, such as communication, assembly, and worship, that are not solely personal but may be based on communities and relationships of all kinds (that is, association). Even though the First Amendment's text does not expressly

[4] 467 U.S. 947 (1984).

[5] 487 U.S. 781 (1988).

[6] A fee of up to 20% of collected receipts was deemed reasonable, a fee of between 20% and 35% was permissible if the solicitation involved advocacy or the dissemination of information, and a fee in excess of 35% was presumptively unreasonable, but could be upheld upon one of two showings: that advocacy or dissemination of information was involved, or that otherwise the charity's ability to collect money or communicate would be significantly diminished.

[7] 487 U.S. at 793.

[8] 487 U.S. at 800. North Carolina's requirement for licensing of professional fundraisers was also invalidated in Riley, id. at 801–02. In Illinois ex rel. Madigan v. Telemarketing Assocs., 538 U.S. 600 (2003), the Court held unanimously that the First Amendment does not prevent a state from bringing fraud actions against charitable solicitors who falsely represent that a "significant" amount of each dollar donated would be used for charitable purposes.

[9] 536 U.S. 150 (2002).

[10] 536 U.S. at 165–66.

[11] 536 U.S. at 167.

identify a "freedom of association,"[1] the Supreme Court has recognized this right as "an indispensable means of preserving" other First Amendment freedoms.[2] Specifically, the Court "has recognized a right to associate for the purpose of engaging" in "speech, assembly, petition for the redress of grievances, and the exercise of religion."[3]

This right of "expressive association" is the focus of this set of essays.[4] The Court has also recognized a "personal liberty" interest in "certain intimate human relationships," protected not only by the First Amendment, but also by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[5] This concept of "intimate association" is discussed at the end of this section and in the essays on substantive due process.[6]

The Supreme Court did not always recognize a constitutional right of association. In 1886, in a case involving the formation of state militias, the Court decreed that state governments "have the power to regulate or prohibit associations and meetings of the people, except in the case of peaceable assemblies" formed to petition the government.[7] It would be fifty years before the Court came to see the right of assembly as a distinct avenue for other kinds of association.[8] In 1937, the Court held that the "right of peaceable assembly is a right cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental."[9] The Court applied this interpretation of the freedom of assembly in a 1945 case, holding that the right of union organizers to inform others about the advantages and disadvantages of joining a union "is protected not only as part of free speech, but as part of free assembly."[10]

Starting in the 1950s, the Court began to refer to the freedom of association as a right distinct from, but closely related to, the freedoms of speech and assembly, which are expressly listed in the First Amendment.[11] By 1958, the Court considered it "beyond debate that freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect of" civil liberties such as the freedom of speech.[12] Although political association is a classic

---

[1] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482 (1965).

[2] Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 618 (1984).

[3] Id.

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 617–18. See, e.g., Griswold, 381 U.S. at 486 (recognizing marriage as a protected relationship); Obergefell v. Hodges, 576 U.S. 644, 675 (2015) (holding that "same-sex couples may exercise the fundamental right to marry," that is "inherent in the liberty of the person" and protected under the Fourteenth Amendment). Although these two conceptions of associational freedom differ, the Court has explained that "[i]n many cases, government interference with one form of protected association will also burden the other form of association." Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club, 481 U.S. 537, 544 (1987).

[6] Roberts, 468 U.S. at 618. See Amdt14.S1.6.3.4 Family Autonomy and Substantive Due Process and Amdt14.S1.6.3.5 Marriage and Substantive Due Process.

[7] Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252, 267 (1886). See Amdt1.10.1 Historical Background on Freedoms of Assembly and Petition.

[8] See Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530 (1945) ("It was not by accident or coincidence that the rights to freedom in speech and press were coupled in a single guaranty with the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition for redress of grievances. All these, though not identical, are inseparable.").

[9] De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364 (1937).

[10] Thomas, 323 U.S. at 532, 539–40.

[11] U.S. Const. amend. I; e.g., Am. Commc'ns Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 409 (1950).

[12] NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 460 (1958). Legal scholars have debated whether the Court initially grounded this right of association in the First Amendment (applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment) or in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. See John D. Inazu, The Strange Origins of the Constitutional Right of Association, 77 Tenn. L. Rev. 485, 501–17, 530–33 (2010) (discussing these two constitutional arguments and the early legal commentary after NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson); Kenneth L. Karst, The Freedom of Intimate Association, 89 Yale L.J. 624, 624 (1980) (writing that before the Court's 1965 decision in Griswold v. Connecticut, "the notion of constitutional protection of the freedom of association was a First Amendment doctrine and little more"). Ultimately, the Court recognized two different strands of freedom of association, tying the freedom of example of expressive association,[13] the First Amendment also protects "forms of 'association' that are not political in the customary sense but pertain to the social, legal, and economic benefit of the members."[14]

Only a few Supreme Court decisions involving the freedom of association concern direct restrictions on association. For example, in Coates v. Cincinnati, the Court held that a local ordinance violated the freedoms of association and assembly on its face.[15] The challenged ordinance made it a crime for "three or more persons to assemble . . . on any of the sidewalks . . . and there conduct themselves in a manner annoying to persons passing by."[16] According to the Court, this ordinance was "aimed directly at activity protected by the Constitution"—the freedoms of association and assembly.[17]

More commonly, the Court has considered cases in which the regulation of other behavior indirectly affects the freedom to associate. For example, because association supports other First Amendment activity, the Court has recognized that compelling disclosure of one's associations can inhibit exercising protected First Amendment rights, particularly where disclosure would subject an individual to threats, harassment, or economic reprisals.[18] Accordingly, First Amendment protections "are triggered not only by actual restrictions on an individual's ability to join with others to further shared goals," but also by laws or regulations that may have a "chilling effect on association."[19]

The Court's decisions in this area, though not always reconcilable, reflect a balancing of First Amendment rights and governmental interests as well as the major political and social events of the era. For example, in the 1950s and 1960s, the Court adjudicated many cases in which the government asked U.S. citizens to reveal or disavow their actual or perceived affiliations with the Communist Party.[20] The Court largely credited concerns that states and the federal government expressed at that time about the security threat that Communism posed to the United States,[21] even while applying increasing First Amendment scrutiny to expressive association to the First Amendment and the freedom of intimate association primarily to the Fourteenth Amendment. See Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 617–18 (1984).

---

[13] See Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 245 (1957) (plurality opinion) (calling the "freedom of political association" a "highly sensitive area[ ]" of First Amendment activity requiring investigations to be "carefully circumscribed"); Cal. Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 575 (2000) (observing the "special place the First Amendment reserves" for a political party's selection of its own candidate).

[14] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 483 (1965); see also Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. at 460–61 (stating that "it is immaterial," for First Amendment purposes, "whether the beliefs sought to be advanced by association pertain to political, economic, religious or cultural matters").

[15] 402 U.S. 611, 615 (1971). The Court also held that the ordinance was unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Id. at 614–15.

[16] Id. at 611 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[17] Id. at 616. By comparison, in City of Chicago v. Morales, a plurality of the Court concluded that a Chicago loitering ordinance did not substantially affect protected association because the ordinance defined loiter as "remaining in one place 'with no apparent purpose.'" 527 U.S. 41, 53 (1999). The Court nevertheless held that the ordinance was unconstitutionally vague in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Id. at 51.

[18] Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. at 462–63. See Amdt1.8.3.2 Disclosure of Membership Lists.

[19] Ams. for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta, No. 19-251, slip op. at 19 (U.S. July 1, 2021). Government actions other than compelled disclosure can also burden the freedom of association. See, e.g., NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 931 (1982) (reasoning that holding an organization liable for unlawful conduct that it neither authorized nor ratified "would impermissibly burden the rights of political association").

[20] See Amdt1.8.3.1 Associational Privacy to Amdt1.8.3.5 Donor Disclosure Requirements.

[21] See, e.g., Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, 80 (1959) (holding that New Hampshire's interest in ferreting out "subversive activities" outweighed the associational-privacy interests of attendees at a summer camp run by suspected Communists).

laws that burdened the association of other groups.[22] Describing its own decisions in 1963, the Court explained, "the Communist Party is not an ordinary or legitimate political party[,]" and thus, Party membership "is a permissible subject of regulation and legislative scrutiny."[23] While the Court later abandoned some of its presumptions about the dangers of bare association, the Court's care with respect to issues of national security remained evident in later cases, such as a 2010 decision upholding a ban on domestic support of designated foreign terrorist organizations.[24]

Although many of the leading Supreme Court decisions on the freedom of association concerned burdens on association, the Court has also held that "compelled association" can violate the First Amendment.[25] For example, in some circumstances, laws requiring organizations to include persons with whom they disagree on political, religious, or ideological matters can violate members' freedom of association, particularly if those laws interfere with an organization's message.[26]

As with other individual rights protected by the Constitution, the freedom of association is not absolute.[27] First, the government may prohibit "agreements to engage in illegal conduct," even though such agreements "undoubtedly possess some element of association."[28] Second, forms of association that are neither "intimate" nor "expressive" within the meaning of First Amendment case law may not receive constitutional protection.[29] Third, as noted above, even when a law implicates protected association, the government's interests may outweigh the burdens on association in some circumstances.[30] Finally, although individuals have a right to organize as a group to express their views, there is no corresponding constitutional obligation on the part of the government to listen to the group's concerns.[31]

---

[22] See, e.g., Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. at 463 (holding that Alabama did not have a "subordinating" interest in obtaining the NAACP's membership lists "sufficient to justify the deterrent effect" that disclosure could have on NAACP members' right of association).

[23] Gibson v. Fla. Legis. Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 547 (1963).

[24] See Amdt1.8.2.5 Material Support Bar.

[25] Special rules apply in the context of certain religious organizations. For example, the First Amendment protects a religious organization's freedom to select its own ministers to a greater degree than a secular organization's selection of its employees. See Amdt1.2.3.4 Church Leadership and the Ministerial Exception. The Supreme Court has explained that, although the "right to freedom of association is a right enjoyed by religious and secular groups alike," the First Amendment itself "gives special solicitude to the rights of religious organizations" through its Religion Clauses. Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church & Sch. v. EEOC, 565 U.S. 171, 189 (2012).

[26] Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 644 (2000). See Amdt1.8.4.2 Nondiscrimination and Equal-Access Requirements.

[27] U.S. Civ. Serv. Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548, 567 (1973).

[28] Brown v. Hartlage, 456 U.S. 45, 55 (1982); see also Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., 512 U.S. 753, 776 (1994) (stating that the freedom of association "does not extend to joining with others for the purpose of depriving third parties of their lawful rights").

[29] For example, in 1989 the Court ruled that a state could license dance halls that were open only to teenagers. Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 28 (1989). Excluding adults did not infringe the teenagers' right to associate with persons outside of their age group, the Court held, declaring that there is no "generalized right of 'social association' that includes chance encounters in dance halls." Id. at 25.

[30] E.g., Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1, 40 (2010).

[31] See Minn. State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 288 (1984) (recognizing the "government's freedom to choose its advisers" in upholding a state law requiring public universities to "meet and confer" with the faculty union rather than individual faculty members); Smith v. Ark. State Highway Emps., 441 U.S. 463, 465 (1979) (per curiam) (stating that although the First Amendment protects a public employee's right to "associate and speak freely and petition openly," it "does not impose any affirmative obligation on the government to listen, to respond or, in this context, to recognize the association and bargain with it"); Babbitt v. UFW Nat'l Union, 442 U.S. 289, 313 (1979) (holding that a state "was not constitutionally obliged to provide a procedure pursuant to which agricultural employees, through a chosen representative, might compel their employers to negotiate").

Amdt1.8.2 Restrictions on Expressive Association

Amdt1.8.2.1 Barriers to Group Advocacy and Legal Action

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The Supreme Court has recognized that joining together to advance political and civil rights is "expressive and associational conduct at the core of the First Amendment's protective ambit."[1] Accordingly, when the government regulates in ways that restrict or burden such association, it typically must show that its law or action is narrowly drawn to achieve a compelling governmental interest.[2] In the Supreme Court's words, "[b]ecause First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive, government may regulate in the area only with narrow specificity."[3]

A state generally has the authority to regulate professions that it licenses, including attorneys.[4] That authority may apply even to professionals' speech, especially in a commercial context. For example, a state may restrict "in-person solicitation by lawyers who seek to communicate purely commercial offers of legal assistance to lay persons" in certain places, such as an accident scene, where consumers are particularly vulnerable to undue influence.[5]

When professionals are engaged in "political expression and association," however, a state "must regulate with significantly greater precision."[6] In particular, the freedom of association includes a "basic right to group legal action" and protects "collective activity undertaken to obtain meaningful access to the courts."[7] This protection extends to the activities of lawyers and legal organizations themselves in some circumstances.[8] Thus, a state may not bar organizations that use "litigation as a vehicle for effective political expression and association" from offering legal services to prospective clients based on "some potential" for violation of ethical standards.[9]

The 1963 case NAACP v. Button established that the First Amendment protects "cooperative, organizational activity" to pursue "legitimate political ends" through litigation.[10] The case involved a Virginia law banning "the improper solicitation of any legal or professional business," which the Virginia courts had construed to ban certain outreach activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Inc. (NAACP) related to the provision of legal assistance.[11] The Supreme Court began its analysis by clarifying that "abstract discussion is not the only species of communication which the Constitution protects; the First Amendment also protects vigorous advocacy, certainly of lawful ends, against

---

[1] In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412, 424 (1978).

[2] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963).

[3] Id.

[4] In re Primus, 436 U.S. at 422.

[5] Id. at 422 (citing Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978)). Courts generally review First Amendment challenges to commercial speech restrictions under a less-rigorous standard called "intermediate scrutiny." See Amdt1.7.6.1 Commercial Speech Early Doctrine.

[6] Id. at 438.

[7] United Transp. Union v. State Bar of Mich., 401 U.S. 576, 585 (1971).

[8] E.g., Button, 71 U.S. 415.

[9] In re Primus, 436 U.S. at 431.

[10] 371 U.S. at 430.

[11] Id. at 419–26.

governmental intrusion."[12] Although the NAACP "is not a conventional political party," the Court explained, its litigation activity enables "the distinctive contribution of a minority group to the ideas and beliefs of our society."[13] "For such a group," the Court continued, "association for litigation may be the most effective form of political association."[14] The Court therefore held that Virginia's broadly construed law violated the First Amendment "by unduly inhibiting protected freedoms of expression and association."[15]

Following the Button decision, the Court held in three cases that labor unions enjoyed First Amendment protection in assisting their members to pursue legal remedies. In the first case, the union advised members to seek legal advice before settling injury claims and recommended particular attorneys;[16] in the second, the union retained attorneys on a salaried basis to represent members;[17] in the third, the union recommended certain attorneys whose fee would not exceed a specified percentage of the recovery.[18] In each case, the Court concluded that the government had an insufficient regulatory interest to prohibit the legal services at issue because the government relied on a remote possibility of harm to prospective clients resulting from unethical practices.[19]

Because not all forms of advocacy are protected under the First Amendment, not all associations for the purpose of advocacy are protected to the same degree. In Scales v. United States, the Court upheld the "membership clause" of the Smith Act, which, under the Court's interpretation, made it a felony for an individual to be an active member of an organization that advocates the overthrow of the U.S. government by force or violence if the individual shares that specific intent.[20] The defendant in Scales was convicted based on his membership in the Communist Party of the United States.[21] That group's advocacy, the Court explained, "is not constitutionally protected speech."[22] The Court reasoned that membership in a group engaged in "forbidden advocacy" should receive no greater First Amendment protection than the proscribable speech itself.[23]

Additionally, although access to the courts was a key consideration in Button, not all laws limiting such access burden the freedom of association. For example, the Court upheld a statutory limit on attorney's fees for certain veterans' benefits claims, reasoning that the limitation did not infringe the freedom of association because it applied "across-the-board to individuals and organizations alike."[24] In another case, the Court concluded that waiving the

---

[12] Id. at 429.

[13] Id. at 431.

[14] Id. The Court later employed a similar rationale in extending the First Amendment's protection to a lawyer's solicitation of a client on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). In re Primus, 436 U.S. at 431–32.

[15] Button, 371 U.S. at 437.

[16] Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen v. Virginia, 377 U.S. 1 (1964).

[17] United Mine Workers v. Ill. State Bar Ass'n, 389 U.S. 217 (1967).

[18] United Transp. Union v. State Bar of Mich., 401 U.S. 576 (1971).

[19] Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen, 377 U.S. at 6–8; United Mine Workers, 389 U.S. at 225; United Transp. Union, 401 U.S. at 583.

[20] 367 U.S. 203, 205, 221–22 (1961).

[21] Id. at 205–06.

[22] Id. at 228. Eight years later, in Brandenburg v. Ohio, the Court revised the standard applied in Scales for distinguishing between "abstract advocacy" of illegal conduct (which the First Amendment protects) and "incitement" (which the government can proscribe and punish). Under Brandenburg, speech falls outside the First Amendment's protection only if it is directed to producing imminent lawless action and likely to produce such action. 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969).

[23] Scales, 367 U.S. at 229.

[24] Walters v. Nat'l Ass'n of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305, 335 (1985) superseded by statute, Veterans' Judicial Review Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-687, 102 Stat. 4105.

court fees of indigent individuals, but not organizations, did not violate the First Amendment.[25] Because an organization could qualify for the fee waiver only if its members were individually indigent anyway, the Court reasoned, litigating as an organization would not materially assist their expressive capacity.[26] Thus, it appears that barriers to litigation are unlikely to impede the freedom of association if they have similar effects on individuals and organizations.

Amdt1.8.2.2 Election Laws

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Even though states have broad authority to administer their elections, the Court has recognized the potential for state election laws to burden the associational rights of voters, candidates, and political parties.[1] Whether an election law "governs the registration and qualifications of voters, the selection and eligibility of candidates, or the voting process itself," it "inevitably affects" an "individual's right to vote and his right to associate with others for political ends."[2] In evaluating whether such a law comports with the First Amendment, the Supreme Court has balanced the interests of the state in administering its elections with the burdens of the challenged requirement on individual rights.[3]

States may impose some restrictions on a candidate's or party's access to the ballot. For example, the Court held that a state may require political parties to "demonstrate a significant, measurable quantum of community support" in order to appear on a general election ballot.[4] Such a requirement serves the state's "vital interests" in preserving "the integrity of the electoral process" and "regulating the number of candidates on the ballot to avoid undue voter confusion."[5] The Court also upheld, on similar grounds, a California election law prohibiting an individual from running as an independent candidate if that individual was defeated in another party's primary during the same election cycle or had a registered affiliation with another political party within the preceding year.[6]

The Court has found other ballot-access requirements to unduly infringe the associational rights of candidates and voters.[7] In 1974, the Court struck down an Indiana law forbidding a

---

[25] Rowland v. Cal. Men's Colony, 506 U.S. 194, 211–12 (1993).

[26] Id.

[1] See Kusper v. Pontikes, 414 U.S. 51, 57 (1973) ("[I]n exercising their powers of supervision over elections and in setting qualifications for voters, the States may not infringe upon basic constitutional protections.").

[2] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 788 (1983).

[3] See Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 358 (1997).

[4] Am. Party of Tex. v. White, 415 U.S. 767, 782 (1974); see also Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 193 (1986) (reaffirming that this rule applies to minor-party and independent candidates); Jenness v. Fortson, 403 U.S. 431, 438 (1971) (upholding Georgia's requirement that a prospective candidate who did not receive at least 20% of the votes in a primary election submit a nominating petition with the signatures of 5% of the eligible electorate in order to appear on the general election ballot); N.Y. State Bd. of Elections v. Lopez Torres, 552 U.S. 196, 204 (2008) (holding that a state "may similarly demand a minimum degree of support for candidate access to a primary ballot").

[5] Am. Party of Tex., 415 U.S. at 782 n.14.

[6] Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 733 (1974).

[7] See, e.g., Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 31, 34 (1968) (reasoning that Ohio's ballot access requirements gave "the two old, established parties a decided advantage over any new parties struggling for existence and thus place[d] substantially unequal burdens on both the right to vote and the right to associate" in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause).

political party from appearing on an election ballot unless it filed an affidavit stating under oath that it did not advocate the overthrow of the government by force or violence.[8] The Court held that the state could not condition access to the ballot on such a "loyalty oath," because the First Amendment protects advocacy of violent overthrow as an "abstract doctrine."[9] In another case, the Court held that an Ohio law requiring individuals to file a statement of candidacy for the presidency in March—well before the major parties' primaries and the November general election—unconstitutionally burdened the associational rights of independent voters.[10] In 1992, the Court reversed a state supreme court decision barring a new political party from appearing on the ballot under a particular name.[11]

The right of association generally protects a political party's decisions about its internal structure and processes for choosing candidates for national office.[12] According to the Court, "a State cannot justify regulating a party's internal affairs without showing that such regulation is necessary to ensure an election that is orderly and fair."[13] Several cases illustrate these principles. In Democratic Party of the United States v. Wisconsin, the Court held that while a state was free to allow non-Democrats to vote in its Democratic primary, it could not constitutionally compel the Democratic Party to seat the state's delegates (who were bound by the primary results) at the party's national convention.[14] In Tashjian v. Republican Party, the Court held that a state could not prohibit the Republican Party from opening up its primary to independents.[15] In California Democratic Party v. Jones, the Court held that California's "blanket primary" violated political parties' freedom of association because it "force[d] political parties to associate with—to have their nominees, and hence their positions, determined by—those who, at best, have refused to affiliate with the party, and, at worst, have expressly affiliated with a rival."[16] Similarly, in upholding a Puerto Rico law authorizing an incumbent political party to fill an interim vacancy in a legislative seat held by that party, the Court ruled that the party did not need to open its election to nonmembers, analogizing the process to a party's primary election.[17]

---

[8] Communist Party of Ind. v. Whitcomb, 414 U.S. 441, 450 (1974).

[9] Id. at 442, 450. See Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths to Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

[10] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 806 (1983).

[11] Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 290 (1992) (reasoning that the state's interest in "electoral order" did not justify the state supreme court's "inhospitable reading" of the statutory requirements for a new party to access the ballot).

[12] Tashjian v. Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208, 224 (1986). Cf. Marchioro v. Chaney, 442 U.S. 191, 199 (1979) (stating that "[t]here can be no complaint that the party's right to govern itself has been substantially burdened by statute when the source of the complaint is the party's own decision to confer critical authority" on a state committee).

[13] Eu v. S.F. Cnty. Democratic Cent. Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 233 (1989); see also Cousins v. Wigoda, 419 U.S. 477, 491 (1975) (explaining that a state's "interest in protecting the integrity of its electoral process" is not "compelling in the context of the selection of delegates to" a national party convention, given the national nature of the convention and the need for uniform standards).

[14] 450 U.S. 107 (1981).

[15] Tashjian, 479 U.S. at 225. But cf. Clingman v. Beaver, 544 U.S. 581, 587 (2005) (upholding an Oklahoma law barring parties from opening their primaries to voters other than registered party members and registered independents).

[16] 530 U.S. 567, 577 (2000). Cf. Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 552 U.S. 442, 458–59 (2008) (upholding a state law allowing voters to vote for any candidate appearing on a primary ballot listing candidates along with their "party preference," because that law did not "on its face provide for the nomination of candidates or compel political parties to associate with or endorse candidates").

[17] Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party, 457 U.S. 1, 14 (1982). Despite the Court's solicitude for political parties' rights to control their own procedures and organization, those associational rights may be constrained by other constitutional rights. See Morse v. Republican Party, 517 U.S. 186, 228 (1996) (plurality opinion) (stating that associational rights "could not justify a major political party's decision to exclude eligible voters from the candidate selection process because of their race" because the Fifteenth Amendment "foreclose[s] such a possibility").

The Court is willing to let states restrict some individual political activity in order to protect the integrity and effectiveness of political associations. For example, the Court upheld a New York law requiring a voter to enroll as a party member at least thirty days before the general election each year in order to vote in the next primary for that party.[18] The Court reasoned that the law was intended to prevent "party 'raiding,' whereby voters in sympathy with one party designate themselves as voters of another party so as to influence or determine the results of the other party's primary," and that this was a "particularized legitimate purpose."[19] In contrast, the Court found the anti-raiding rationale insufficient to sustain an Illinois law that prohibited an individual from voting in a primary election because she had voted in another party's primary within the preceding twenty-three months.[20] Unlike New York's law, the Illinois law effectively "'lock[ed]' voters into a pre-existing party affiliation from one primary to the next," requiring them to "forgo voting in any primary for a period of almost two years" in order to "break the 'lock.'"[21]

Like election laws, government-imposed limits on contributions to political candidates or political organizations also can burden associational rights of candidates or organizations and their supporters.[22] For example, the Court held that a local ordinance that imposed a $250 limit on "contributions to committees formed to support or oppose ballot measures" violated the freedom of association of the committees and their contributors.[23] A key factor for the Court was that "an affluent person" could "spend without limit to advocate individual views on a ballot measure," but the ordinance restricted only contributions "made in concert with one or more others in the exercise of the right of association."[24]

The Supreme Court commonly analyzes First Amendment challenges to contribution limits and related campaign finance laws in terms of the burdens they might place on both the freedoms of speech and association.[25] These cases are discussed in the Freedom of Speech section of the First Amendment essay.[26]

Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Generally speaking, the First Amendment prohibits the government from denying an individual access to a job or profession because of the individual's current or past associations alone. There are, however, some instances in which the Court has upheld employment-related restrictions on association, as discussed below.

---

[18] Rosario v. Rockefeller, 410 U.S. 752 (1973).

[19] Id. at 760, 762.

[20] Kusper v. Pontikes, 414 U.S. 51, 61 (1973).

[21] Id. at 60–61.

[22] See McCutcheon v. FEC, 572 U.S. 185, 204 (2014) (plurality opinion) (explaining how an "aggregate limit on how many candidates and committees an individual may support through contributions" limits an individual's associational rights by potentially forcing him to "choose which of several policy concerns he will advance" (emphasis removed)).

[23] Citizens Against Rent Control/Coalition for Fair Hous. v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290, 291, 300 (1981).

[24] Id. at 296.

[25] See id. at 300 (explaining that the "two rights overlap and blend; to limit the right of association places an impermissible restraint on the right of expression").

[26] See Amdt1.7.11.1 Overview of Campaign Finance to Amdt1.7.11.6 Legislative Investigations.

During the 1950s and 1960s, the Supreme Court considered actions taken by the federal and state governments to address Communism in the workplace. In 1950, the Court considered the "grave and difficult problem" presented by a federal law that effectively "discouraged" unions from electing members of the Communist Party to leadership positions in the union.[1] While recognizing that the law affected protected association, the Court reasoned that the statute mainly regulated "harmful conduct" in the form of political strikes designed to obstruct labor relations and interstate commerce.[2] The Court upheld the law, concluding that it was directed not at what Communists "advocate or believe," but what "they have done and are likely to do again."[3]

Two years later, in Adler v. Board of Education, the Court upheld a New York law that disqualified members of the Communist Party and other state-designated organizations from holding offices or teaching positions in the public school system.[4] The Court concluded that the state may deny these individuals "the privilege of working for the [public] school system" because of their "unexplained membership in an organization found by the school authorities, after notice and a hearing, to teach and advocate the overthrow of the government by force or violence, and known by such persons to have such purpose."[5]

By the mid-1960s, however, the Court largely had abandoned Adler's reasoning.[6] For example, in 1966, the Court considered an Arizona law that subjected a state employee to "immediate discharge and criminal penalties" if, at the time of taking the oath of office or thereafter, the employee knowingly was a member of the Communist Party or any other organization whose purposes included the overthrow of the state government.[7] The Court held that this "guilt by association" approach violated the First Amendment.[8] That the statute applied only to individuals who knew of the organization's unlawful purpose did not save it.[9] The Court held that a "law which applies to membership without the 'specific intent' to further the illegal aims of the organization infringes unnecessarily on protected freedoms."[10]

In 1967, the Court likewise held unconstitutional a provision of the federal Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 that prohibited a member of a "Communist-action organization" from gaining employment "in any defense facility."[11] The Court concluded that the statute violated the First Amendment right of association because it swept "indiscriminately across all types of association with Communist-action groups, without regard to the quality and degree of membership."[12] More precise regulation was needed, the Court explained, to address "the congressional concern over the danger of sabotage and espionage in national defense industries" and comply with the First Amendment.[13] "It would indeed be ironic," the Court

---

[1] Am. Commcn's Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 393 (1950). Specifically, the law required the officers of each union to file an affidavit stating that they were not members of the Communist Party in order for the National Labor Relations Board to entertain claims filed by that union. Id. at 385.

[2] Id. at 396.

[3] Id.

[4] 342 U.S. 485, 492 (1952).

[5] Id.

[6] Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 595, 606 (1967).

[7] Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 13, 16 (1966).

[8] Id. at 19.

[9] Id. at 13.

[10] Id. at 19; see also Keyishian, 385 U.S. at 606 (similarly distinguishing "[m]ere knowing membership" from "a specific intent to further the unlawful aims of an organization").

[11] United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 260 (1967) (quoting Section 5(a)(1)(D) of the act).

[12] Id. at 262.

[13] Id. at 266–67.

observed, "if, in the name of national defense, we would sanction the subversion of one of those liberties—the freedom of association—which makes the defense of the Nation worthwhile."[14]

In a series of cases involving political patronage requirements that began in the 1970s, the Supreme Court held that the government cannot fire or demote a public employee because of the employee's political affiliation except in narrow circumstances involving high-ranking employees with policy-making functions.[15]

Related to association-based employment restrictions are cases involving "loyalty oaths" that required government employees to disclaim membership in certain organizations. These cases are discussed in the Freedom of Speech essay because they involved compelled speech.[16] The extent to which the government can require a prospective employee or applicant for a professional license to disclose prior associations is discussed in more detail in another essay.[17]

While the foregoing cases dealt with employment, the Court has also signaled that group association cannot be the sole basis for denying public benefits. For example, the Court held that a public university's refusal to register a student group because of its affiliation with a national organization violated the students' freedom of association.[18] Similarly, a state may not require an individual to "forfeit" the right of association "as the price for exercising another" protected right.[19]

Amdt1.8.2.4 Conditions of Incarceration

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Incarceration is a special context in which the government has more authority to restrict the freedom of association. The Supreme Court has explained that the "fact of confinement and the needs of the penal institution impose limitations on constitutional rights," most notably, the freedom of association.[1] Accordingly, the standard of review for freedom-of-association claims is deferential to the government and prison administrators. The Court has held that [14] Id. at 264. For a case in which the Court found national security interests to justify restrictions on protected speech and association with foreign organizations, see Amdt1.8.2.5 Material Support Bar.

---

[15] See Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 372 (1976) (plurality opinion) (concluding that political patronage dismissals, in which a public employer fires an employee because of the employee's affiliation or non-affiliation with a particular political party, violate the First Amendment as a general practice, because they "severely restrict political belief and association"); id. at 375 (Stewart, J., concurring in the judgment). See also Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 519 (1980) (holding that "the continued employment of an assistant public defender cannot properly be conditioned upon his allegiance to the political party in control of the county government"); Rutan v. Republican Party, 497 U.S. 62, 65 (1990) (holding that "promotion, transfer, recall, and hiring decisions involving low-level public employees" may not be "based on party affiliation and support"); O'Hare Truck Serv. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 726 (1996) (generally extending "the First Amendment safe-guards of political association afforded to employees" to "independent contractors"). See Amdt1.7.13.2 Conditions of Public Employment.

[16] See Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths to Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

[17] See Amdt1.8.3.3 Character and Fitness and Evidentiary Disclosures.

[18] Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 186–87 (1972). However, the Court stated that the university could require applicants to affirm that they will comply with reasonable campus regulations. Id. at 193.

[19] Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801, 807–08 (1977) (holding that a state may not require a person to waive the person's Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination as a condition of holding a political party office); Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 507 (1964) (holding that a state may not restrict the right to travel based on an individual's membership in a particular association).

[1] Jones v. N.C. Prisoners' Labor Union, Inc., 433 U.S. 119, 125 (1977). See Amdt1.7.8.4 Prison Free Speech and Government as Prison Administrator.

"when a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."[2] In evaluating reasonableness, the Court has considered: (1) whether there is a "valid, rational connection between the prison regulation" and a "legitimate and neutral" governmental interest; (2) whether prison inmates have "alternative means of exercising the right" available to them; (3) the "impact accommodation of the asserted constitutional right will have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally"; and (4) the "absence of ready alternatives" to the regulation.[3]

Applying the "reasonable relationship" test, the Court upheld a ban on inmate solicitation and group meetings for a prisoners' union;[4] restrictions on visitation by children;[5] and restrictions on certain types of correspondence between inmates.[6] In contrast, the Court struck down a regulation prohibiting prisoners to marry only with the permission of the prison's superintendent and only for "compelling reasons."[7] The Court held that the fundamental constitutional right to marry—a right of intimate association—applies in the prison context and that the regulation at issue was "not reasonably related" to the prison's "security and rehabilitation concerns."[8]

Amdt1.8.2.5 Material Support Bar

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Although foreign organizations operating abroad generally do not have First Amendment rights,[1] the First Amendment does protect the associations of U.S. persons and residents, even if those associations are with foreign persons.[2] Still, the government may proscribe some types of interactions with foreign groups or individuals in the interest of national security.[3]

In Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, two U.S. citizens and six domestic organizations challenged the constitutionality of a federal ban on providing material support or resources to designated foreign terrorist organizations.[4] They argued that the law criminalized protected speech and association with two foreign groups that the United States had designated as foreign terrorist organizations.[5] The Supreme Court agreed that the law restricted the freedom

[2] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89 (1987), superseded by statute, Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, Pub. L. No. 103-141, 107 Stat. 1488 (codified at 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb).

[3] Id. at 89–90 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[4] Jones, 433 U.S. at 129–33.

[5] Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126 (2003).

[6] Turner, 482 U.S. at 93; see also Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 231 (2001) (declining "to cloak the provision of legal assistance with any First Amendment protection above and beyond the protection normally accorded prisoners' speech" under Turner).

[7] Turner, 482 U.S. at 98–99.

[8] Id. at 95–97.

[1] See Agency for Int'l Dev. v. All. for Open Soc'y Int'l, Inc., No. 19-177, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 29, 2020).

[2] See Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 762–70 (1972) (reasoning that the government's denial of a visa to a foreign scholar implicated the First Amendment rights of American professors who wished to meet and confer with him in person, but holding that the Executive Branch had discretion to deny the visa for a "facially legitimate" reason).

[3] See Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1 (2010).

[4] Id. at 10 (citing 18 U.S.C. § 2339B).

[5] Id. at 14–15.

of speech, but it held that the United States's interests in national security and combating international terrorism justified the prohibition.[6]

With regard to the plaintiffs' freedom-of-association claim, the Court concluded that the statute did "not penalize mere association with a foreign terrorist organization," suggesting that the First Amendment would protect membership in a foreign terrorist organization or independent advocacy of the group's political goals.[7] Instead, the Court reasoned, the statute prohibited only providing specified forms of material support to such organizations.[8] In the plaintiffs' case, that support took the form of providing training or legal expertise on issues of peaceful dispute resolution and humanitarian aid.[9] To the extent the prohibition burdened association, the Court held, it was justified on the same national security grounds as the statute's restrictions on speech.[10]

Amdt1.8.3 Disclosure of Association

Amdt1.8.3.1 Associational Privacy

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The Supreme Court has recognized "the vital relationship between freedom to associate and privacy in one's associations."[1] In some circumstances, government-compelled disclosure of an individual's affiliations can expose that individual to harm in the form of threats, harassment, or economic reprisals.[2] This potential exposure may dissuade individuals from joining together for the purpose of collective advocacy, thus chilling protected speech and association.[3] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has barred the government from compelling organizations to reveal their members, or individuals to reveal their memberships, in some circumstances.[4]

At the same time, the Court has not recognized an absolute right to privacy of one's associations, often weighing the government's interests in disclosure against the likelihood of harm resulting from the exposure.[5] In some cases, this analysis took the form of a balancing test, with the government's interests presumptively tipping the scales.[6] In other cases, the Court applied a form of heightened scrutiny under which the government bore the burden of demonstrating that its interests in disclosure were sufficiently important to justify the intrusion into associational rights.[7]

---

[6] Id. at 28–39 (applying strict scrutiny).

[7] Id. at 39.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 10, 14–15.

[10] Id. at 40.

[1] NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958).

[2] Id. at 462–63.

[3] Id.

[4] E.g., Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449.

[5] E.g., Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 65–66 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81.

[6] E.g., Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 126, 134 (1959).

[7] E.g., Ams. for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta, No. 19-251, slip op. at 9 (U.S. July 1, 2021).

Whether disclosure will be public also appears to be a factor in the Court's analysis. For example, in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, former President Richard M. Nixon challenged a federal law directing the Administrator of General Services to take custody of President Nixon's papers and tape recordings and issue regulations governing the archival screening of the materials and public access to archived materials.[8] The case involved several constitutional claims,[9] one of which was that the screening process violated the President's "rights of associational privacy and political speech."[10] The Supreme Court acknowledged that "involvement in partisan politics is closely protected by the First Amendment" and that compelled disclosure "can seriously infringe on privacy of association and belief," but it ultimately concluded that the President's First Amendment claim was "clearly outweighed by the important governmental interests promoted by" the federal law.[11]

Amdt1.8.3.2 Disclosure of Membership Lists

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The Supreme Court began to apply heightened scrutiny in cases involving compelled disclosure of association in a series of cases in the 1950s and 1960s in which certain states were attempting to thwart the activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Inc. (NAACP).[1] In NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, the Court unanimously set aside a state court's contempt order against the NAACP for refusing to produce a list of its members within the state.[2] The state ostensibly requested the information to verify compliance with business registration requirements. The Court, however, held that the state had failed to demonstrate a need for the identities of the organization's "rank-and-file members" that would outweigh the harm to publicly exposed members in the form of "economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion, and other manifestations of public hostility."[3]

The Court in Bates v. City of Little Rock also held that a city government could not constitutionally compel the NAACP to disclose its local members.[4] In that case, there was "substantial uncontroverted evidence" that publicly identified members had experienced "harassment and threats of bodily harm."[5] The asserted governmental interest in that case was the assessment of occupational license taxes.[6] Although the Court found this interest to be sufficiently compelling, it concluded that the city failed to demonstrate that obtaining and publishing local membership lists was "reasonably related" to this interest, given that the city

---

[8] 433 U.S. 425, 429 (1977).

[9] See ArtII.S3.4.1 Overview of Executive Privilege and ArtI.S9.C3.3.1 Overview of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[10] Nixon, 433 U.S. at 466.

[11] Id. at 452, 467–68. The Court appeared to suggest that the law satisfied "a compelling public need that cannot be met in a less restrictive way"—a standard akin to strict scrutiny. Id. at 467.

[1] See Ams. for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta, No. 19-251, slip op. at 6 (U.S. July 1, 2021) (discussing Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)).

[2] 357 U.S. at 460–61.

[3] Id. at 462–464.

[4] Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 527 (1960).

[5] Id. at 524.

[6] Id. at 525.

could obtain information about businesses and occupations without collecting information about individual members.[7] The Court reaffirmed in Louisiana ex rel. Gremillion v. NAACP, another case involving compelled disclosure of membership lists, that "regulatory measures . . . no matter how sophisticated, cannot be employed in purpose or in effect to stifle, penalize, or curb the exercise of First Amendment rights."[8]

By contrast, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge by the Communist Party of the United States to the federal Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.[9] Pursuant to the Act, the U.S. government determined that the Communist Party must register with the U.S. Attorney General as a Communist-action organization and provide the names and addresses of its officers and any individuals who were members during the previous twelve months.[10] Registration, in turn, triggered other regulatory requirements.[11]

After the Court upheld the "Communist action organization" designation as merely "regulatory," it turned to the registration requirement itself, considering whether it infringed the right of party members to associate anonymously.[12] The Court acknowledged its holdings in NAACP and Bates, but it held that the federal government had a greater interest in registration than the state parties in those cases because Communist-action organizations are "substantially dominated or controlled" by foreign powers seeking "the overthrow of existing government by any means necessary."[13]

Amdt1.8.3.3 Character and Fitness and Evidentiary Disclosures

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Under Supreme Court precedent, states can require applicants for professional licenses to meet qualifications that are rationally related to the profession, including demonstrating "good moral character."[1] However, as discussed in a previous section, a state generally cannot deny an individual a professional license solely on the basis of his or her past or present, lawful affiliations.[2] In a similar vein, inquiries into an applicant's associations must be sufficiently tailored in light of their potential chilling effect on association.[3]

Character and fitness cases once produced "[s]harp conflicts and close divisions" in the Court, particularly following the federal and state investigations into Communist activity in

---

[7] Id.

[8] 366 U.S. 293, 297 (1961). The Court also held unconstitutional, on due process grounds, a statute requiring certain businesses with out-of-state contacts to certify that none of their officers is a member of a Communist or subversive organization, as a condition of doing business in the state. Id. at 294–95.

[9] Communist Party of United States v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 4 (1961).

[10] Id. at 8–9.

[11] Id. at 9.

[12] Id. at 81.

[13] Id. at 88–89.

[1] Schware v. Bd. of Bar Exam'rs of N.M., 353 U.S. 232, 239 (1957); see also Adler v. Bd. of Educ., 342 U.S. 485, 493 (1952) (reasoning that a public school a prospective teacher's "associates, past and present" in "determining fitness and loyalty").

[2] See, e.g., Schware, 353 U.S. at 245–46 (holding that a state bar association could not refuse to admit a prospective lawyer on the assumption that "his past membership in the Communist Party" indicated present "bad moral character"). See Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits.

[3] Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 488 (1960).

the 1950s.[4] In general, the Court's decisions show a concern for character inquiries based on membership in Communist organizations, but more suspicion about inquiries based on other kinds of association. Thus, in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, the Court allowed a state bar association to question an applicant, in private, about his prior membership in the Communist Party, citing California's "interest in having lawyers who are devoted to the law in its broadest sense," including "its procedures for orderly change."[5] And a decade later, the Court reaffirmed that "Bar examiners may ask about Communist affiliations as a preliminary to further inquiry into the nature of the association and may exclude an applicant for refusal to answer."[6] On the same day, however, a plurality of the Court concluded that the State Bar of Arizona could not deny admission to a candidate based on her refusal to divulge whether she had ever been a member of the Communist Party or any organization "that advocates overthrow of the United States Government by force or violence."[7] The difference between these two cases, in the plurality's view, appeared to be the Arizona bar's interest in organizations other than the Communist Party, which the plurality characterized as "[b]road and sweeping."[8]

The breadth of the state's inquiry was also at issue in Shelton v. Tucker.[9] There, the Court ruled that, though a state had a broad interest in ensuring the fitness of its school teachers, that interest did not justify a regulation requiring all teachers to list all organizations to which they had belonged within the previous five years.[10] The Court explained that the "unlimited and indiscriminate sweep of the statute" defeated its connection to a "legitimate inquiry into the fitness and competency" of public school teachers.[11]

Disclosure of a person's associations may be permissible during a sentencing hearing following a criminal conviction. The Supreme Court has explained that the "Constitution does not erect a per se barrier to the admission of evidence concerning one's beliefs and associations at sentencing simply because those beliefs and associations are protected by the First Amendment."[12] However, those associations must be relevant to proving aggravating or mitigating circumstances, not just the defendant's "abstract beliefs."[13]

---

[4] Baird v. State Bar of Ariz., 401 U.S. 1, 2–3 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[5] 366 U.S. 36, 49–54 (1961).

[6] Law Students C.R. Rsch. Council, Inc. v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 165–66 (1971) (rejecting a facial challenge to the New York Bar Association's screening process).

[7] Baird, 401 U.S. at 4–5 (plurality opinion) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); see also In re Stolar, 401 U.S. 23, 30 (1971) (plurality opinion) (reaching the same conclusion with respect to an applicant for admission to the Ohio Bar who refused to answer a similar question).

[8] Baird, 401 U.S. at 6 (plurality opinion); see also In re Stolar, 401 U.S. at 27–28 (plurality opinion) (holding that Ohio could not require an applicant to the state bar association to "list all the organizations to which he has belonged since registering as a law student and those of which he has ever been a member").

[9] 364 U.S. 479 (1960).

[10] Id. Cf. Beilan v. Bd. of Pub. Educ., 357 U.S. 399, 404 (1958) (holding that a public school district could fire a teacher for "statutory 'incompetency' based on his refusal to answer the Superintendent's questions" about his affiliation with a Communist political association).

[11] Shelton, 364 U.S. at 490; Schneider v. Smith, 390 U.S. 17, 23, 26–27 (1968) (holding that a federal statute authorizing the executive branch to "safeguard" U.S. merchant ships against "sabotage or other subversive acts," 50 U.S.C. § 191(b), did not authorize regulations establishing a screening program for personnel on such vessels that delved into their past associations, ideas, and beliefs).

[12] Dawson v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159, 165 (1992).

[13] Id. at 165–67 (holding that the sentencing court improperly admitted evidence of the defendant's membership in the Aryan Brotherhood that focused only on the organization's "racist beliefs").

Amdt1.8.3.4 Legislative Inquiries

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The First Amendment constrains government action, not just in the administration and enforcement of public laws, but also in conducting legislative investigations.[1] A legislature's power of inquiry is "broad," encompassing "inquiries concerning the administration of existing laws as well as proposed or possibly needed statutes."[2] Legislative investigations "may properly probe historic events for any light that may be thrown on present conditions and problems."[3] The Court has warned, however, that even if "the general scope of the inquiry is authorized and permissible," a legislature is not necessarily "free to inquire into or demand all forms of information."[4] Because of First Amendment constraints, a legislature may not "probe" an individual's associations "at will and without relation to existing need."[5]

The test to be applied in balancing legislative interests against individual rights of association is not entirely settled. In a case concerning a state legislature's investigation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Inc. (NAACP), the Court stated that to "intrude[ ] into the area of constitutionally protected rights of speech, press, association and petition," the state must show "a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest."[6] This test mirrors the exacting scrutiny standard the Court has applied in other contexts involving government-compelled disclosure of private associations.[7]

The Supreme Court appears to have applied a more relaxed standard of review in other cases involving legislative inquiries decided during the same time period,[8] particularly those involving investigations into the associations and activities of members or suspected members of the Communist Party.[9] For example, in Barenblatt v. United States, the Court held that a Subcommittee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities could question a witness about his membership in the Communist Party without violating the First Amendment.[10] The Court reasoned that the hearing, which concerned "alleged Communist infiltration into the field of education," involved a "valid legislative purpose," because Congress had "wide power to

---

[1] Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 197 (1957).

[2] Gibson v. Fla. Legis. Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 545 (1963). See ArtI.S8.C18.7.3 Congress's Investigation and Oversight Powers (1787–1864) to ArtI.S8.C18.7.7 Constitutional Limits of Congress's Investigation and Oversight Powers.

[3] DeGregory v. Att'y Gen., 383 U.S. 825, 829 (1966).

[4] Gibson, 372 U.S. at 545.

[5] DeGregory, 383 U.S. at 829.

[6] Gibson, 372 U.S. at 546.

[7] See generally Amdt1.8.3.5 Donor Disclosure Requirements.

[8] E.g., Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, 78 (1959) (reasoning that the state legislature's requests related "directly to the Legislature's area of interest" and that the subpoena demand was not "burdensome").

[9] See Gibson, 372 U.S. at 547 (distinguishing Barenblatt v. United States, Wilkinson v. United States, and Braden v. United States, reasoning that "the necessary preponderating governmental interest and, in fact, the very result in those cases were founded on the holding that the Communist Party is not an ordinary or legitimate political party . . . and that, because of its particular nature, membership therein is itself a permissible subject of regulation and legislative scrutiny"). See Amdt1.7.5.3 Incitement Movement from Clear and Present Danger Test.

[10] 360 U.S. 109 (1959).

legislate in the field of Communist activity in this Country" as a means of "self-preservation."[11] If the Court applied a balancing test in this decision, it did not discuss the witness's countervailing First Amendment interests.[12]

Although both state and federal legislatures may conduct investigations, congressional inquiries have the added protection of the Speech or Debate Clause, which generally protects the legislative actions of Members of Congress from judicial interference.[13] In the 1975 Eastland decision, the Supreme Court cited the Speech or Debate Clause in declining to adjudicate a freedom-of-association-based challenge to a subpoena from a congressional subcommittee.[14] Eastland involved a pre-enforcement challenge to a congressional subpoena, but the other cases discussed above suggest that a First Amendment defense may yet be available in a contempt proceeding for refusal to comply with a congressional subpoena.[15]

Amdt1.8.3.5 Donor Disclosure Requirements

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

As previously discussed, the Supreme Court has recognized a First Amendment interest in the privacy of one's associations and held that compelled disclosure of an organization's members can chill that protected association.[1] In 1976, in Buckley v. Valeo, the Court extended this reasoning to disclosure of a political candidate's financial contributors required by federal campaign finance laws.[2] The Court observed that the "invasion of privacy of belief may be as great when the information sought concerns the giving and spending of money as when it concerns the joining of organizations, for '[f]inancial transactions can reveal much about a person's activities, associations, and beliefs.'"[3]

In view of these considerations, the Court applied a heightened standard of review called "exacting scrutiny," which the Court derived from its analysis in NAACP v. Alabama ex rel.

---

[11] Id. at 113. The Court upheld the contempt-of-Congress convictions of two other witnesses on similar grounds in Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U.S. 399 (1961) and Braden v. United States, 365 U.S. 431 (1961). By contrast, the Court overturned the contempt conviction of a New Hampshire resident, with a plurality of the Court concluding that the state attorney general's questioning of the witness about his and others' involvement in the Progressive Party exceeded the legislature's investigative mandate. Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 251–54 (1957) (plurality opinion).

[12] Barenblatt, 360 U.S. at 134. In this case, the Court appeared to place the burden on the witness to show why his interests "were not subordinate to those of the state." Id. According to the Court, there was "no indication" in the record that the subcommittee "was attempting to pillory witnesses" or employed "indiscriminate dragnet procedures, lacking in probable cause." Id.

[13] See ArtI.S6.C1.3.1 Overview of Speech or Debate Clause to ArtI.S6.C1.3.7 Persons Who Can Claim the Speech or Debate Privilege.

[14] Eastland v. U.S. Servicemen's Fund, 421 U.S. 491, 501 (1975).

[15] See Id. at 515–16 (Marshall, J., concurring in the judgment) (positing that the defendant in a contempt trial "may defend on the basis of the constitutional right to withhold information from the legislature, and his right will be respected along with the legitimate needs of the legislature").

[1] See Amdt1.8.3.2 Disclosure of Membership Lists.

[2] 424 U.S. 1, 65–66 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81. The Court determined that the challenged contribution and expenditure limitations also implicated the freedom of association, as well as the freedom of speech; its holdings on these limitations are discussed in Freedom of Speech: Campaign Finance and the Electoral Process, Amdt1.7.11.1 Overview of Campaign Finance to Amdt1.7.11.6 Legislative Investigations.

[3] Id. at 66 (quoting Cal. Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 78–79 (1974) (Powell, J., concurring)).

Patterson.[4] Under Buckley's formulation of exacting scrutiny, the government must show a "substantial relation" between a "subordinating" state interest and the information required to be disclosed.[5] Ultimately, the Court in Buckley concluded that the federal government's interests in an informed electorate, deterring corruption, and detecting violations of certain contribution limits outweighed the right to contribute anonymously in that case.[6]

The Court reached a different conclusion with respect to state campaign finance disclosures as applied to "the Socialist Workers Party, a minor political party which historically has been the object of harassment by government officials and private parties."[7] In reasoning analogous to NAACP, the Court found that disclosure of either the parties' contributors or the recipients of their campaign disbursements would "subject those persons identified to the reasonable probability of threats, harassment, or reprisal."[8]

The Court also applied exacting scrutiny in a 2010 case involving the disclosure of petition sponsors rather than donors.[9] In Doe v. Reed, voters seeking to challenge a state law through the referendum process had to submit a petition with the requisite number of signatures to the secretary of state.[10] Such petitions were subject to public disclosure and included the names and addresses of signatories.[11] The Court held that petition activity is protected by the First Amendment and that disclosure requirements in the electoral context are subject to exacting scrutiny.[12] Balancing the relevant interests, the Court held that "preserving the integrity of the electoral process" by combating "petition-related fraud" was a sufficiently important purpose to justify the "modest burdens" that disclosure might cause.[13]

The balance of interests tilted in favor of the organizations and their donors in the Court's 2021 decision in Americans for Prosperity Foundation v. Bonta.[14] That case involved a California regulation requiring charities soliciting funds in the state to disclose to the State Attorney General the names, addresses, and total contributions of an organization's significant donors.[15] Although the Justices in the majority divided over the applicable level of First Amendment scrutiny,[16] they agreed that under exacting scrutiny, the government must "narrowly tailor" a disclosure requirement to the asserted governmental interest.[17] The majority concluded that California's disclosure rule failed this requirement because of the [4] Id. at 64 (citing NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)).

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 68.

[7] Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Comm., 459 U.S. 87, 88 (1982).

[8] Id. at 101–02.

[9] Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186 (2010).

[10] Id. at 190–91.

[11] Id. at 192–93.

[12] Id. at 195–96. "Exacting scrutiny" is a First Amendment standard of review developed to evaluate disclosures in the election context. Id. at 196 (citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 64 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81)).

[13] Id. at 198–201.

[14] No. 19-251, slip op. at 19 (U.S. July 1, 2021).

[15] Id. at 2.

[16] The plurality suggested that any disclosure requirement affecting association should receive exacting scrutiny. Id. at 7–8 (plurality opinion). Several Justices whose concurrence was necessary to the result in Bonta questioned this conclusion. See id. at 1–4 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (arguing that the Court's precedents require application of strict scrutiny, a higher standard), and id. at 2 (Alito, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (stating that he and Justice Gorsuch are "not prepared at this time to hold that a single standard applies to all disclosure requirements").

[17] Id. at 9–11 (majority opinion).

"dramatic mismatch" between the state's interest in preventing charitable fraud and its "up-front," "blanket demand" for the disclosure.[18]

Amdt1.8.4 Compelled Association

Amdt1.8.4.1 Union Membership and Fees

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

The First Amendment comes into play when the government or a public employer requires employees to join or financially support a union as a condition of employment.[1] Requiring employees to subsidize a union—even when membership is not required[2]—compels employees to fund the union's speech, implicating both speech and expressive association.[3]

For over forty years, the Court's decisions allowed such government-compelled union fees to some extent. In 1977, in Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, the Court ruled that public-sector employers could require their employees to pay agency fees to their union representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance procedures.[4] Compulsory union fees—also called "agency fees"—could not, however, be used for political purposes.[5] The Court reasoned that the First Amendment bars a state from compelling an individual "to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition" of public employment.[6]

Abood's allowance of fees for activities germane to collective bargaining, though criticized at times by Members of the Court,[7] held sway until 2018, when the Supreme Court overruled this aspect of the decision in Janus v. American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31.[8] The Janus Court held that compulsory agency fees unduly burdened the speech and association of public-sector employees who did not want to join or financially support their workplace union.[9]

---

[18] Id. at 12–14.

[1] Similar arrangements in the private sector would not trigger First Amendment protection absent governmental action. Janus v. AFSCME, Council 31, No. 16-1466, slip op. at 35 n.24 (U.S. June 27, 2018).

[2] See Ry. Emps.' Dep't v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225, 231, 238 (1956) (suggesting that "forcing ideological conformity" through union membership would violate the First Amendment).

[3] See Knox v. SEIU, Local 1000, 567 U.S. 298, 310–11 (2012) (explaining that when the government "exacts compulsory union fees as a condition of public employment," those fees "constitute a form of compelled speech and association").

[4] 431 U.S. 209, 225–26 (1977), overruled by Janus v. AFSCME, Council 31, No. 16-1466, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 27, 2018).

[5] Id. at 235–36.

[6] Id. at 235.

[7] Cases applying or questioning the Abood decision are discussed in more detail in Amdt1.7.12.3 Compelled Subsidization.

[8] Janus, 3slip op. at 497.

[9] Id. at 12, 17, 33.

Amdt1.8.4.2 Nondiscrimination and Equal-Access Requirements

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Nondiscrimination laws implicate the freedom of association to the extent that they require organizations to admit or otherwise associate with individuals that they would otherwise exclude. While the Supreme Court has recognized a right not to associate, it has also held that the Constitution "places no value on discrimination."[1] Many of the cases involving freedom of association thus concern the interplay between government-imposed nondiscrimination or equal-access requirements and a group's freedom to associate with individuals of its choosing.[2] The Supreme Court decisions in this area also are informed, in part, by the Court's solicitude for an organization's own freedom of speech.[3]

In general, the government may impose nondiscrimination requirements on private, social organizations through public accommodations laws and other statutory requirements if those laws "serve compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms."[4] In Roberts v. United States Jaycees, the Court held that Minnesota, through its public accommodations law, could require the United States Jaycees to include women in its membership.[5] The Court reasoned that the government had a compelling interest in ensuring that women had equal access to publicly available goods and services, including the programs offered by the Jaycees.[6] Additionally, applying the law to the Jaycees advanced that interest through "the least restrictive means."[7] The exclusion of women, the Court ruled, was not necessary to preserve the integrity of the organization's own expressive activities, which included civic, charitable, lobbying, fundraising, and other activities that did not depend on an all-male membership.[8] The Court reached a similar decision, based on similar reasoning, three years later in Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte.[9]

Consistent with Roberts and Duarte, in New York State Club Association v. City of New York, the Court upheld New York City's Human Rights Law, which prohibited race, creed, sex, and other discrimination in places "of public accommodation, resort, or amusement," and

---

[1] Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 469–70 (1973) (explaining that "[i]nvidious private discrimination may be characterized as a form of exercising freedom of association protected by the First Amendment, but it has never been accorded affirmative constitutional protections"); see also Ry. Mail Ass'n v. Corsi, 326 U.S. 88, 93–94 (1945) (rejecting a claim that New York Civil Rights Law interfered with an organization's "right of selection to membership" in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

[2] See, e.g., Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 78 (1984) (rejecting a law firm's argument that applying a federal nondiscrimination statute to its decision not to promote a female associate to partner would violate the firm's freedom of association); Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 178 (1976) (holding that Congress can prohibit private schools from excluding children on the basis of race without violating a parent's or a child's right to free association).

[3] E.g., Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000).

[4] Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 623 (1984).

[5] Id. at 628–29.

[6] Id. at 623–26.

[7] Id. at 626.

[8] Id. at 627. The Court also held that the Jaycees did not have a right of "intimate association," because they lacked "the distinctive characteristics" of that form of association, such as small size, identifiable purpose, and selectivity in membership. Id. at 621.

[9] 481 U.S. 537, 547, 549 (1987).

extended to certain private clubs.[10] The Court reasoned that the City's antidiscrimination law was neither invalid in all its applications nor "substantially overbroad" because the city could constitutionally apply the law to large clubs with commercial operations.[11]

Essential to the holding of Roberts and Rotary International was the Court's conclusion that including women in those organizations would not impinge on the organization's ability to present its message. In contrast, where nondiscrimination requirements would affect an organization's messaging, the Court has been more protective of the right of association under the First Amendment. In Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, & Bisexual Group of Boston, the private organizers of Boston's St. Patrick's Day parade denied a group's request to march in the parade.[12] The group claimed that its exclusion was based on its members' sexual orientation and thus violated the state's public accommodations law.[13] The parade organizers responded that application of that statute would violate their freedom of expressive association.[14] The Supreme Court agreed with the parade organizers. It first held that parades are a form of expression even if they lack a "particularized message" because marchers in a parade are usually "making some sort of collective point."[15] The Court next reasoned that the group sought to engage in expressive speech by marching as a unit celebrating its members' gay, lesbian, and bisexual identities and Irish heritage.[16] Because "every participating unit affects the message conveyed by the private organizers," the Court reasoned, application of the statute would effectively conflict with the First Amendment by requiring the private organizers to "alter the expressive content of their parade."[17] The Court distinguished Roberts and New York State Club Association as not involving "a trespass on the organization's message itself."[18] Even if the parade could be analogized to a large, private club, such that Massachusetts could "generally justify a mandated access provision," the Court reasoned, the First Amendment would still allow such a group to "exclude an applicant whose manifest views were at odds with a position taken by the club's existing members."[19]

In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, the Court similarly held that the First Amendment allowed the Boy Scouts of America to refuse a leadership role to an "avowed homosexual," despite New Jersey's public accommodations law.[20] Citing Hurley, the Court held that "[t]he forced inclusion of an unwanted person in a group infringes the group's freedom of expressive association if the presence of that person affects in a significant way the group's ability to advocate public or private viewpoints."[21] The Boy Scouts, the Court found, engaged in expressive activity in seeking to transmit a system of values, which, for that organization, included opposing homosexual conduct.[22] The Court also gave "deference to [the] association's view of what would impair its expression."[23] Allowing a gay rights activist to serve in the [10] 487 U.S. 1, 10 (1988) (quoting N.Y.C. Admin. Code § 8-109(1) (1986)).

[11] Id. at 11–15.

[12] 515 U.S. 557, 561 (1995).

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 562–63.

[15] Id. at 568–69.

[16] Id. at 570.

[17] Id. at 572–73.

[18] Id. at 580.

[19] Id. at 580–81.

[20] 530 U.S. 640, 644 (2000).

[21] Id. at 648.

[22] Id. at 651.

[23] Id. at 653.

Scouts would "force the organization to send a message . . . that the Boy Scouts accepts homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior."[24]

The Court distinguished Dale in Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, Inc.[25] In holding that a law requiring colleges to allow military recruiters on campus did not violate the schools' freedom of expressive association, the Court observed that "[r]ecruiters are, by definition, outsiders who come onto campus for the limited purpose of trying to hire students—not to become members of the school's expressive association."[26]

The "close scrutiny" given to public accommodations laws that limit associational freedom in cases ranging from Roberts to Dale may not apply in all contexts.[27] Christian Legal Society Chapter of the University of California v. Martinez concerned a public law school's "accept-all-comers policy" that required student organizations to "open eligibility for membership and leadership to all students" as a condition of registration.[28] A student organization argued that this policy violated their associational rights because the organization wanted to accept or exclude students based on their religion or sexual orientation.[29] The Court did not ask whether the policy was the least restrictive means of advancing the school's interests in nondiscrimination. Instead, it analogized the school's program for registered student organizations to a "limited public forum" where a regulation of First Amendment activity need only be reasonable and viewpoint-neutral.[30] The Court held that the policy met both of those requirements.[31]

Amdt1.8.5 Intimate Association

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

While the previous sections have focused on expressive association, the Constitution also protects certain forms of "intimate association."[1] These protections primarily extend from the personal liberty interests protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,[2] which the Court has construed to include an implied "right of personal privacy."[3] The relationships "entitled to this sort of constitutional protection" are "those that attend the

[24] Id.

[25] 547 U.S. 47 (2006).

[26] Id. at 69. For additional discussion of Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, Inc., see Amdt1.7.13.10 Requirements That Can Be Imposed Directly.

[27] Christian Legal Soc'y Chapter of the Univ. of Cal. v. Martinez, 561 U.S. 661, 680 (2010).

[28] Id. at 668.

[29] Id.

[30] Id. at 680–83.

[31] Id. at 697.

[1] Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 618 (1984).

[2] Although the Court has characterized the right of intimate association as having First Amendment dimensions, it has not recognized any intimate relationships that qualify for constitutional protection under the First Amendment, other than those identified in its due process decisions. See See id. at 619–20 (citing due process decisions).

[3] Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 684 (1977); see also, e.g., Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923) (stating that "[w]ithout doubt," the "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment "denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual" to marry and to "establish a home and bring up children").

creation and sustenance of a family,"[4] including those formed through marriage,[5] childbirth,[6] child-rearing,[7] and "cohabitation with one's relatives."[8] Those constitutional liberties are discussed more fully elsewhere in the Constitution Annotated.[9]

Infrequently, the Supreme Court has considered the degree to which the First Amendment may also protect association in family and intimate relationships. In Lyng v. International Union, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to a federal law that denied eligibility for food stamps while any member of a household was on strike.[10] The Court reasoned that the law did not violate the freedom of association of close relatives because it did not "directly and substantially interfere with family living arrangements."[11]

Amdt1.9 Freedom of the Press

Amdt1.9.1 Overview of Freedom of the Press

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Some have raised the question of whether the Free Speech Clause and the Free Press Clause are coextensive, with respect to protections for the media. A number of Supreme Court decisions considering the regulation of media outlets analyzed the relevant constitutional protections without significantly differentiating between the two clauses.[1] In one 1978 ruling, the Court expressly considered whether the "institutional press" is entitled to greater freedom from governmental regulations or restrictions than are non-press individuals, groups, or associations. Justice Potter Stewart argued in a concurring opinion: "That the First Amendment speaks separately of freedom of speech and freedom of the press is no constitutional accident, but an acknowledgment of the critical role played by the press in American society. The Constitution requires sensitivity to that role, and to the special needs of

---

[4] Roberts, 468 U.S. at 619.

[5] See, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967) (reasoning that for a state to deny the "fundamental freedom" to marry on "so unsupportable a basis" as race would "deprive all the State's citizens of liberty without due process of law"); Obergefell v. Hodges, 576 U.S. 644, 675 (2015) (holding that "same-sex couples may exercise the fundamental right to marry," that is "inherent in the liberty of the person").

[6] See Carey, 431 U.S. at 685 (stating that "the decision whether or not to beget or bear a child is at the very heart" of choices protected by the right of personal privacy implicit in the Fourteenth Amendment). See Amdt14.S1.6.3.6 Sexual Activity, Privacy, and Substantive Due Process.

[7] See, e.g., Meyer, 262 U.S. at 399 (reversing a teacher's conviction for teaching a student the German language, reasoning that the prohibition on teaching languages other than English in primary schools interfered with, among other things, "the power of parents to control the education of their own").

[8] Roberts, 468 U.S. at 619. See, e.g., Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 506 (1977) (holding that an ordinance that prohibited certain relatives outside of the "nuclear family" from living together violated the Fourteenth Amendment).

[9] See Amdt14.S1.6.3.4 Family Autonomy and Substantive Due Process and Amdt14.S1.6.3.5 Marriage and Substantive Due Process.

[10] 485 U.S. 360, 362 (1988).

[11] Id. at 365–66 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court also held that the law did not violate the associational rights of the striking worker and the worker's union. Id. at 366–68. See also Dep't of Hous. v. Rucker, 535 U.S. 125, 130, 136 n.6 (2002) (stating that Lyng "forecloses" tenants' freedom-of-association challenge against a statute authorizing local public housing authorities to "evict tenants for the drug-related activity of household members and guests whether or not the tenant knew, or should have known, about the activity").

[1] See, e.g., Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, 130 (1937) (ruling that applying an antitrust law to the Associated Press did not violate either the freedom of speech or of the press); see also Amdt1.7.10.2 Taxation of Media; Amdt1.7.10.3 Labor and Antitrust Regulation of Media.

the press in performing it effectively."[2] But, in a plurality opinion, Chief Justice Warren Burger wrote: "The Court has not yet squarely resolved whether the Press Clause confers upon the 'institutional press' any freedom from government restraint not enjoyed by all others."[3] The plurality ultimately concluded that the First Amendment did not grant media the privilege of special access to prisons.[4]

Several Supreme Court holdings firmly point to the conclusion that the Free Press Clause does not confer on the press the power to compel government to furnish information or otherwise give the press access to information that the public generally does not have.[5] Nor, in many respects, is the press entitled to treatment different in kind from the treatment to which any other member of the public may be subjected.[6] The Court has ruled that "[g]enerally applicable laws do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects."[7] At the same time, the Court has recognized that laws targeting the press, or treating different subsets of media outlets differently, may sometimes violate the First Amendment.[8] Further, it does seem clear that, to some extent, the press, because of its role in disseminating news and information, is entitled to heightened constitutional protections—that its role constitutionally entitles it to governmental "sensitivity," to use Justice Potter Stewart's word.[9]

Amdt1.9.2 Protection of Confidential Sources

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

News organizations have claimed that the First Amendment compels a reporter's privilege: an exception to the ancient rule that every citizen owes to his government a duty to give what testimony he is capable of giving.[1] The Court rejected the argument for a limited

---

[2] Houchins v. KQED 438 U.S. 1, 17 (1978) (concurring opinion). Justice Potter Stewart initiated the debate in a speech, subsequently reprinted as Stewart, Or of the Press, 26 HASTINGS L. J. 631 (1975). Other articles are cited in First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 798 (1978) (Burger, C.J., concurring).

[3] 435 U.S. at 798.

[4] 435 U.S. at 15–16.

[5] Houchins v. KQED, 438 U.S. 1 (1978), and id. at 16 (Stewart, J., concurring); Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 843 (1974); Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974); Nixon v. Warner Communications, 435 U.S. 589 (1978). The trial access cases recognize a right of access of both public and press to trials. Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980); Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 U.S. 596 (1982).

[6] Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) (grand jury testimony by newspaper reporter); Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978) (search of newspaper offices); Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979) (defamation by press); Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991) (newspaper's breach of promise of confidentiality).

[7] Cohen v. Cowles Media, 501 U.S. 663, 669 (1991).

[8] See, e.g., Grosjean v. Am. Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 244 (1936) (holding that a tax focused exclusively on newspapers violated the freedom of the press); see also Amdt1.7.10.2 Taxation of Media.

[9] E.g., Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974); Landmark Communications v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829 (1978). See also Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 563–67 (1978), and id. at 568 (Powell, J., concurring); Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 709 (1972) (Powell, J., concurring). Several concurring opinions in Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980) imply recognition of some right of the press to gather information that apparently may not be wholly inhibited by nondiscriminatory constraints. Id. at 582–84 (Stevens, J.), 586 n.2 (Brennan, J.), 599 n.2 (Potter, J.). Yet the Court has also suggested that the press is pro tected in order to promote and to protect the exercise of free speech in society at large, including peoples' interest in receiving information. E.g., Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 218–19 (1966); CBS v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367, 394–95 (1981).

[1] 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE 2192 (3d ed. 1940). See Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281 (1919); United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331 (1950).

exemption permitting reporters to conceal their sources from a grand jury and to keep confidential certain information they obtain and choose at least for the moment not to publish in Branzburg v. Hayes.[2] Emphasizing the importance of the grand jury in creating a "[f]air and effective law enforcement [system] aimed at providing security for the person and property of the individual," the Court concluded the public interest "in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings" overrode "the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering" that would result from requiring reporters to respond to relevant grand jury questions.[3] Not only was it uncertain to what degree confidential informants would be deterred from providing information, said Justice Byron White for the Court, but the conditional nature of the alleged reporter's privilege might not mitigate the deterrent effect, eventually leading to claims for an absolute privilege. Confidentiality could be protected by the secrecy of grand jury proceedings and by the experience of law enforcement officials in themselves dealing with informers. Difficulties would arise as well in identifying who should have the privilege and who should not. But the principal basis of the holding was that the investigation and exposure of criminal conduct was a governmental function of such importance that it overrode the interest of reporters in avoiding the incidental burden on their newsgathering activities occasioned by such governmental inquiries.[4]

The Court observed that Congress, as well as state legislatures and state courts, are free to adopt privileges for reporters.[5] As for federal courts, Federal Rule of Evidence 501 provides that the common law generally governs a claim of privilege.[6] The federal courts have not resolved whether the common law provides a journalists' privilege.[7]

Nor does the status of an entity as a newspaper (or any other form of news medium) protect it from issuance and execution on probable cause of a search warrant for evidence or other material properly sought in a criminal investigation, the Court held in Zurcher v. Stanford

---

[2] 408 U.S. 665 (1972). "The claim is, however, that reporters are exempt from these obligations because if forced to respond to subpoenas and identify their sources or disclose other confidences, their informants will refuse or be reluctant to furnish newsworthy information in the future. This asserted burden on news gathering is said to make compelled testimony from newsmen constitutionally suspect and to require a privileged position for them." Id. at 682.

[3] 408 U.S. at 690–91. The cases consolidated in Branzburg all involved grand juries, so the reference to criminal trials should be considered dictum.

[4] Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Harry Blackmun, Lewis Powell, and William Rehnquist joined the Court's opinion. Justice Lewis Powell, despite having joined the majority opinion, also submitted a concurring opinion in which he suggested a privilege might be available if, in a particular case, "the newsman is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationships without a legitimate need of law enforcement." 408 U.S. at 710. Justice Potter Stewart's dissenting opinion in Branzburg referred to Justice Lewis Powell's concurring opinion as "enigmatic." Id. at 725. Judge Tatel of the D.C. Circuit wrote, "Though providing the majority's essential fifth vote, he [Justice Lewis Powell] wrote separately to outline a 'case-by-case' approach that fits uncomfortably, to say the least, with the Branzburg majority's categorical rejection of the reporters' claims." In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 397 F.3d 964, 987 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (Tatel, J., concurring) (citation omitted), rehearing en banc denied, 405 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (Tatel, J., concurring), cert. denied, 545 U.S. 1150 (2005), reissued with unredacted material, 438 F.3d 1141 (D.C. Cir. 2006).

One commentator noted that: "courts in almost every circuit around the country interpreted Justice Lewis Powell's concurrence, along with parts of the Court's opinion, to create a balancing test when faced with compulsory process for press testimony and documents outside the grand jury context." Association of the Bar of the City of New York, The Federal Common Law of Journalists' Privilege: A Position Paper 4–5 (2005), http://www.abcny.org/pdf/report/White%20paper%20on%20reporters%20privilege.pdf (citing examples).

[5] 408 U.S. at 706.

[6] Rule 501 also provides that, in civil actions and proceedings brought in federal court under state law, the availability of a privilege shall be determined in accordance with state law.

[7] See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 397 F.3d 964, 972 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (Tatel, J., concurring) (citation omitted), rehearing en banc denied, 405 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (Tatel, J., concurring), cert. denied, 545 U.S. 1150 (2005), reissued with unredacted material, 438 F.3d 1141 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia "is not of one mind on the existence of a common law privilege").

Daily.[8] The press had argued that to permit searches of newsrooms would threaten the ability to gather, analyze, and disseminate news, because searches would be disruptive, confidential sources would be deterred from coming forward with information because of fear of exposure, reporters would decline to put in writing their information, and internal editorial deliberations would be exposed. The Court thought that First Amendment interests were involved, but it seemed to doubt that the consequences alleged would occur. It observed that the built-in protections of the warrant clause would adequately protect those interests and noted that magistrates could guard against abuses when warrants were sought to search newsrooms by requiring particularizations of the type, scope, and intrusiveness that would be permitted in the searches.[9]

Amdt1.9.3 Access to Government Places and Papers

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Conflict between constitutional rights is not uncommon. One difficult conflict to resolve is the conflict between a criminal defendant's Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights to a fair trial and the First Amendment's protection of the rights to obtain and publish information about defendants and trials. Convictions obtained in the context of prejudicial pre-trial publicity[1] and during trials that were media spectaculars[2] have been reversed, but the prevention of such occurrences is of paramount importance to the governmental and public interest in the finality of criminal trials and the successful prosecution of criminals. However, the imposition of gag orders preventing press publication of information directly confronts the First Amendment's bar on prior restraints,[3] although the courts have a good deal more discretion in preventing the information from becoming public in the first place.[4]

When the Court held that the Sixth Amendment right to a public trial did not guarantee access of the public and the press to pre-trial suppression hearings,[5] the decision raised questions concerning the extent to which, if at all, the speech and press clauses protected the public and the press in seeking to attend the trials themselves.[6] In a split ruling in Richmond

---

[8] Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 563–67 (1978). Justice Lewis Powell thought it appropriate that "a magistrate asked to issue a warrant for the search of press offices can and should take cognizance of the independent values protected by the First Amendment" when he assesses the reasonableness of a warrant in light of all the circumstances. Id. at 568 (concurring). Justices Potter Stewart and Thurgood Marshall would have imposed special restrictions upon searches when the press was the object, id. at 570 (dissenting), and Justice John Paul Stevens dissented on Fourth Amendment grounds. Id. at 577.

[9] Congress enacted the Privacy Protection Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96-440, 94 Stat. 1879, 42 U.S.C. § 2000aa, to protect the press and other persons having material intended for publication from federal or state searches in specified circumstances, and creating damage remedies for violations.

[1] See, e.g., Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 (1961); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963).

[2] Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966); compare Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965), with Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981).

[3] Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976).

[4] See, e.g., Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991) (disciplinary rules restricting extrajudicial comments by attorneys are void for vagueness, but such attorney speech may be regulated if it creates a "substantial likelihood of material prejudice" to the trial of a client); Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, 467 U.S. 20 (1984) (press, as party to action, restrained from publishing information obtained through discovery).

[5] Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979).

[6] DePasquale rested solely on the Sixth Amendment, the Court reserving judgment on whether there is a First Amendment right of public access. 443 U.S. at 392.

Newspapers v. Virginia, the Court held that the First Amendment protected the right of access to criminal trials against the wishes of the defendant.[7]

Chief Justice Warren Burger pronounced the judgment of the Court, but his opinion was joined by only two other Justices.[8] The Chief Justice emphasized the history showing that trials were traditionally open. This openness, moreover, was no "quirk of history" but "an indispensable attribute of an Anglo-American trial."[9] He explained that this characteristic flowed from the public interest in seeing fairness and proper conduct in the administration of criminal trials; the "therapeutic value" to the public of seeing its criminal laws in operation, purging the society of the outrage felt at the commission of many crimes, convincingly demonstrated why the tradition had developed and been maintained.[10] Thus, the opinion concluded that "a presumption of openness inheres in the very nature of a criminal trial under our system of justice."[11] Ultimately, the plurality ruled that "in the context of trials . . . the First Amendment guarantees of speech and press, standing alone, prohibit government from summarily closing courtroom doors which had long been open to the public at the time that amendment was adopted."[12]

Justice William Brennan, joined by Justice Thurgood Marshall, followed a different route to the same conclusion. He argued that rather than solely protecting individual communications, "the First Amendment . . . has a structural role to play in securing and fostering our republican system of self-government."[13] He argued that in order to secure robust public debate and "other civic behavior," the First Amendment must also ensure that debate is "informed," protecting not only "communication itself but also . . . the indispensable conditions of meaningful communication."[14]

Two years later, the Supreme Court articulated a standard for determining when the government's or the defendant's interests could outweigh the public right of access. Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court[15] involved a statute, unique to one state, that mandated the exclusion of the public and the press from trials during the testimony of a sex-crime victim under the age of 18. For the Court, Justice William Brennan wrote that the First Amendment guarantees press and public access to criminal trials, both because of the tradition of openness[16] and because public scrutiny of a criminal trial serves the valuable functions of enhancing the quality and safeguards of the integrity of the factfinding process, of fostering the appearance of fairness, and of permitting public participation in the judicial process. The right recognized by the Court was not absolute; instead, in order to close all or part of a trial

---

[7] 448 U.S. 555 (1980). The decision was 7-1, with Justice William Rehnquist dissenting, id. at 604, and Justice Lewis Powell not participating. Justice Lewis Powell, however, had taken the view in Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 397 (1979) (concurring), that the First Amendment did protect access to trials.

[8] See Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 582 (1980) (Stevens, J., concurring).

[9] 448 U.S. at 569 (plurality opinion).

[10] Id. at 570–71.

[11] Id. at 573.

[12] 448 U.S. at 564–69. The emphasis on experience and history was repeated by the Chief Justice in his opinion for the Court in Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986) (Press-Enterprise II).

[13] Id. at 587 (Brennan, J., concurring in the judgment).

[14] Id. at 587–88.

[15] 457 U.S. 596 (1982). Chief Justice Warren Burger, with Justice William Rehnquist, dissented, arguing that the tradition of openness that underlay Richmond Newspapers, was absent with respect to sex crimes and youthful victims and that Richmond Newspapers was unjustifiably extended. Id. at 612. Justice John Paul Stevens dissented on the ground of mootness. Id. at 620.

[16] That there was no tradition of openness with respect to the testimony of minor victims of sex crimes was irrelevant, the Court argued. As a general matter, all criminal trials have been open. The presumption of openness thus attaches to all criminal trials and to close any particular kind or part of one because of a particular reason requires justification on the basis of the governmental interest asserted. 457 U.S. at 605 n.13.

government must show that "the denial is necessitated by a compelling governmental interest, and [that it] is narrowly tailored to serve that interest."[17] The Court was explicit that the right of access was to criminal trials,[18] leaving open the question of the openness of civil trials.

The Court next applied and extended the right of access in several other areas of criminal proceedings, striking down state efforts to exclude the public from voir dire proceedings, from a suppression hearing, and from a preliminary hearing. The Court determined in Press-Enterprise I[19] that historically voir dire had been open to the public, and that "[t]he presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest."[20] No such findings had been made by the state court, which had ordered closed, in the interest of protecting the privacy interests of some prospective jurors, forty-one of the forty-four days of voir dire in a rape-murder case. The trial court also had not considered the possibility of less restrictive alternatives, for example, in camera consideration of jurors' requests for protection from publicity. In Waller v. Georgia,[21] the Court held that "under the Sixth Amendment any closure of a suppression hearing over the objections of the accused must meet the tests set out in Press Enterprise,"[22] and noted that the need for openness at suppression hearings "may be particularly strong" because the conduct of police and prosecutor is often at issue.[23] And, in Press Enterprise II,[24] the Court held that there is a similar First Amendment right of the public to access most criminal proceedings (here a preliminary hearing) even when the accused requests that the proceedings be closed. Thus, an accused's Sixth Amendment-based request for closure must meet the same stringent test applied to governmental requests to close proceedings: there must be "specific findings . . . demonstrating that first, there is a substantial probability that the defendant's right to a fair trial will be prejudiced by publicity that closure would prevent, and second, reasonable alternatives to closure cannot adequately protect the defendant's fair trial rights."[25] Openness of preliminary hearings was deemed important because, under California law, the hearings can be "the final and most important step in the criminal proceeding" and therefore may be "the sole occasion for public observation of the criminal justice system," and also because the safeguard of a jury is unavailable at preliminary hearings.[26]

---

[17] 457 U.S. at 606–07. Protecting the well-being of minor victims was a compelling interest, the Court held, and might justify exclusion in specific cases, but it did not justify a mandatory closure rule. The other asserted interest—encouraging minors to come forward and report sex crimes—was not well served by the statute.

[18] The Court throughout the opinion identifies the right as access to criminal trials, even italicizing the words at one point. 457 U.S. at 605.

[19] Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501 (1984).

[20] 464 U.S. at 510.

[21] 467 U.S. 39 (1984).

[22] Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979), did not involve assertion by the accused of his Sixth Amendment right to a public trial; instead, the accused in that case had requested closure. "[T]he constitutional guarantee of a public trial is for the benefit of the defendant." Id. at 381.

[23] 467 U.S. at 47.

[24] Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986).

[25] 478 U.S. at 14.

[26] 478 U.S. at 12.

Amdt1.10 Freedoms of Assembly and Petition

Amdt1.10.1 Historical Background on Freedoms of Assembly and Petition

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The right of petition took its rise from the modest provision made for it in chapter 61 of the Magna Carta (1215).[1] To this meager beginning are traceable, in some measure, Parliament itself and its procedures for the enactment of legislation, the equity jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, and proceedings against the Crown by "petition of right." Thus, while the King summoned Parliament for the purpose of supply, the latter—but especially the House of Commons—petitioned the King for a redress of grievances as its price for meeting the financial needs of the Monarch, and as the House of Commons increased in importance, it came to claim the right to dictate the form of the King's reply, until, in 1414, the House of Commons declared itself to be "as well assenters as petitioners." Two hundred and fifty years later, in 1669, the House of Commons further resolved that every commoner in England possessed "the inherent right to prepare and present petitions" to it "in case of grievance," and of the House of Commons "to receive the same" and to judge whether they were "fit" to be received. Finally chapter 5 of the Bill of Rights of 1689 asserted the right of the subjects to petition the King and "all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning to be illegal."[2]

The Supreme Court has asserted a similarly historical basis for the right of peaceable assembly for lawful purposes, saying "it is, and always has been, one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government."[3] One commentator has noted that the Court originally conceived the rights of petition and assembly as components of a single right but that the Court later treated the right of assembly as protecting a distinct interest in "the holding of meetings for peaceable political action."[4]

The right of petition recognized by the First Amendment first came into prominence in the early 1830s, when petitions against slavery in the District of Columbia began flowing into Congress in a constantly increasing stream, which reached its climax in the winter of 1835. Finally on January 28, 1840, the House adopted as a standing rule: "That no petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever." Because of efforts of John Quincy Adams, this rule was repealed five years later.[5] For many years the rules of the House of Representatives have provided that Members having petitions to present may deliver them to the Clerk and the petitions, except such as in the judgment of the Speaker are of an obscene or

---

[1] C. Stephenson & F. Marcham, Sources of English Constitutional History 125 (1937).

[2] 12 Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences 98 (1934).

[3] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 551 (1876).

[4] Edward S. Corwin, The Constitution and What It Means Today 293–94 (Harold W. Chase & Craig R. Ducat eds., 1973) (citations omitted). Comparing United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 552 (1876) to De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364–365 (1937), Corwin observed: "Historically, the right of petition is the primary right, the right peaceably to assemble a subordinate and instrumental right, as if Amendment I read: 'the right of the people peaceably to assemble' in order to 'petition the government.' Today, however, the right of peaceable assembly is the language of the Court, 'cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental. . . . The holding of meetings for peaceable political action cannot be proscribed.'" Id.

[5] The account is told in many sources. E.g., Samuel flagg Bemis, John Quincy Adams and the Union, chs. 17, 18 and pp. 446–47 (1956); William Lee Miller, Arguing About Slavery: The Great Battle in the United States Congress (1996), 465–487; David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: Descent into the Maelstrom, 1829–1861 (2005), 3–23.

insulting character, shall be entered on the Journal.[6] Even so, petitions for the repeal of the espionage and sedition laws and against military measures for recruiting resulted, in World War I, in imprisonment.[7] Processions for the presentation of petitions in the United States have not been particularly successful. In 1894 General Coxey of Ohio organized armies of unemployed to march on Washington and present petitions, only to see their leaders arrested for unlawfully walking on the grass of the Capitol. The march of the veterans on Washington in 1932 demanding bonus legislation was defended as an exercise of the right of petition. The Administration, however, regarded it as a threat against the Constitution and called out the army to expel the bonus marchers and burn their camps. Marches and encampments have become more common since, but the results have been mixed.

Amdt1.10.2 Doctrine on Freedoms of Assembly and Petition

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The right of assembly was first before the Supreme Court in 1876[1] in United States v. Cruikshank.[2] The Enforcement Act of 1870[3] forbade conspiring or going onto the highways or onto the premises of another to intimidate any other person from freely exercising and enjoying any right or privilege granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States. Defendants had been indicted under this Act on charges of having deprived certain citizens of their right to assemble together peaceably with other citizens "for a peaceful and lawful purpose." Although the Court held the indictment inadequate because it did not allege that the attempted assembly was for a purpose related to the Federal Government, its dicta broadly declared the outlines of the right of assembly:

> The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for anything else connected with the powers or the duties of the National Government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of, and guaranteed by, the United States. The very idea of a government, republican in form, implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances. If it had been alleged in these counts that the object of the defendants was to prevent a meeting for such a purpose, the case would have been within the statute, and within the scope of the sovereignty of the United States.[4]

Absorption of the Assembly and Petition Clauses into the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment means that the Cruikshank limitation is no

---

[6] Rule 22, ¶ 1, Rules of the House of Representatives, H.R. Doc. No. 256, 101st Congress, 2d Sess. 571 (1991).

[7] 1918 Att'y Gen. Ann. Rep. 48.

[1] See, however, Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35 (1868), in which the Court gave as one of its reasons for striking down a tax on persons leaving the state its infringement of the right of every citizen to come to the seat of government and to transact any business he might have with it.

[2] 92 U.S. 542 (1876).

[3] Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 141 (1870).

[4] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 552–53 (1876). See also Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252, 267 (1886) (describing Cruikshank as holding "that the right peaceably to assemble was not protected by the [First Amendment] . . . , unless the purpose of the assembly was to petition the government for a redress of grievances").

longer applicable.[5] Today the right of peaceable assembly is, in the language of the Court, "cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental."[6] Broadly, the Court has said that the government may not proscribe "peaceable assembly for lawful discussion," and even though participants may "have committed crimes elsewhere, ... mere participation in a peaceable assembly and a lawful public discussion" may not provide "the basis for a criminal charge" absent evidence that their speech "transcend[ed] the bounds of the freedom of speech which the Constitution protects."[7]

Illustrative of this expansion is Hague v. CIO,[8] in which the Court, though splintered with regard to reasoning and rationale, struck down an ordinance that vested an uncontrolled discretion in a city official to permit or deny any group the opportunity to conduct a public assembly in a public place. Justice Roberts, in an opinion that Justice Hugo Black joined and with which Chief Justice Charles Hughes concurred, described the right of assembly as one that "is not absolute, but relative, and must be exercised in subordination to the general comfort and convenience, and in consonance with peace and good order; but it must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied."[9] In Coates v. Cincinnati, the Court described the right of assembly as protecting "the right of the people to gather in public places for social or political purposes," and struck down an ordinance prohibiting "annoying" assemblies as containing "an obvious invitation to discriminatory enforcement."[10]

Furthermore, the right of petition has also expanded beyond what might be implied by the language of "a redress of grievances." For example, the Supreme Court has recognized that the clause protects a right of access to the courts, beyond just a right to petition the legislature.[11] The clause also goes beyond a narrow idea of "grievances" and comprehends demands for an exercise by the government of its powers in furtherance of the interest and prosperity of the petitioners and of their views on politically contentious matters.[12] The right extends to all departments of the government, including the "approach of citizens or groups of them to administrative agencies (which are both creatures of the legislature, and arms of the executive) and to courts, the third branch of Government."[13]

Later cases recognize overlap between the rights of assembly and petition and the speech and press clauses, and, indeed, all four rights may well be considered as elements of an

---

[5] DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937); Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945).

[6] De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364, 365 (1937). See also Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242 (1937).

[7] 299 U.S. at 365.

[8] 307 U.S. 496 (1939).

[9] 307 U.S. at 515. For another holding that the right to petition is not absolute, see McDonald v. Smith, 472 U.S. 479 (1985) (the fact that defamatory statements were made in the context of a petition to government does not provide absolute immunity from libel).

[10] Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611, 615–16 (1971).

[11] See, e.g., Bill Johnson's Rests. v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731, 742–43 (1983) (holding that the First Amendment protects "[t]he filing and prosecution of a well-founded lawsuit"); Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, No. 17-21, slip op. at 12 (U.S. June 18, 2018) (outlining constitutional protections against retaliation for filing a lawsuit against a city); but see, e.g., Octane Fitness, LLC v. ICON Health & Fitness, Inc., 572 U.S. 545, 556–57 (2014) (holding that the right to petition does not extend to grant immunity from an "exceptional" award of attorney's fees in patent litigation).

[12] See Eastern R.R. Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, 365 U.S. 127 (1961). For further discussion of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine providing limited antitrust immunity for constitutionally protected lobbying activity, see Amdt1.7.11.5 Lobbying.

[13] California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510 (1972). See also NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 913–15 (1982); Missouri v. NOW, 620 F.2d 1301 (8th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 842 (1980) (because of its political nature, a boycott of states not ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment may not be subjected to antitrust suits).

inclusive right to freedom of expression.[14] While certain conduct may still be denominated as either petition[15] or assembly[16] rather than speech, similar standards will likely be applied in most cases.[17] For instance, as discussed in an earlier essay, where a public employee sues a government employer under the First Amendment's Speech Clause, the employee must show that he or she spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern.[18] In Borough of Duryea, Pennsylvania v. Guarnieri,[19] the Court similarly held that a police chief who alleged retaliation for having filed a union grievance challenging his termination was not protected by the right to petition, because his complaints did not go to matters of public concern.[20] Further, the right of assembly has largely been superseded by the Court's recognition of an right of an implied right of association.[21]

[14] See, e.g., NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 460 (1958) (noting "the close nexus between the freedoms of speech and assembly," and saying the "freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect of the 'liberty' assured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which embraces freedom of speech").

[15] E.g., United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612 (1954); Eastern R.R. Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight, 365 U.S. 127 (1961); BE & K Construction Co. v. NLRB, 536 U.S. 516 (2002).

[16] E.g., Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971).

[17] See, e.g., Borough of Duryea, Pennsylvania v. Guarnieri, 564 U.S. ___, No. 09-1476, slip op. at 7 (2011) ("It is not necessary to say that the [Speech and Petition] Clauses are identical in their mandate or their purpose and effect to acknowledge that the rights of speech and petition share substantial common ground"); But see id. ("Courts should not presume there is always an essential equivalence in the [Speech and Petition] Clauses or that Speech Clause precedents necessarily and in every case resolve Petition Clause claims").

[18] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983); Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

[19] 564 U.S. ___, No. 09-1476, slip op. (2011).

[20] Justice Antonin Scalia, in dissent, disputed the majority's suggestion that a petition need be of "public concern" to be protected, noting that the Petition Clause had historically been a route for seeking relief of private concerns. slip op. at 5–7 (2011) (Scalia, J., dissenting). Justice Antonin Scalia also suggested that the Clause should be limited to petitions directed to an executive branch or legislature, and that grievances submitted to an adjudicatory body are not so protected. Id. at 1–3.

[21] Amdt1.8.1 Overview of Freedom of Association.

SECOND AMENDMENT
RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS

SECOND AMENDMENT
RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

SECOND AMENDMENT—RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS

Amdt2.1 Overview of Second Amendment, Right to Bear Arms

For much of its early history, the Second Amendment went largely unscrutinized by the Supreme Court. The few nineteenth century cases implicating the Second Amendment established for a time that the Amendment was a bar to federal, but not state, government action,[1] and the Court's only significant Second Amendment decision in the twentieth century seemed to suggest that the right protected under the Amendment was tied only to state militia use of certain types of firearms.[2] In this relative vacuum, the lower federal courts and legal scholars disputed the meaning of the Second Amendment and how it applied, if at all, to an expanding universe of federal, state, and local laws governing the private possession and sale of firearms.[3]

By the beginning of the twenty-first century, many of the U.S. Courts of Appeals that considered the matter concluded that the Second Amendment protected a collective right tied to militia or military use of firearms,[4] while some courts and commentators maintained that the Amendment enshrined an individual right to possess firearms outside the context of militia or military activity.[5] In the 2008 case District of Columbia v. Heller,[6] the Supreme Court held, after a lengthy historical analysis, that the Second Amendment protects an individual right to possess firearms for historically lawful purposes, including self-defense in the home.[7] The Heller majority also provided some guidance on the scope of the right, explaining that it "is not unlimited" and that "nothing in [the] opinion should be taken to cast doubt" on "longstanding prohibitions" like "laws forbidding the carrying of firearms in sensitive places such as schools and government buildings," among other "presumptively lawful" regulations.[8]

Two years after Heller, the Court revisited the question of whether the Second Amendment applies to the states, concluding in McDonald v. City of Chicago[9] that the right to keep and bear arms is a "fundamental" right that is incorporated through the Fourteenth Amendment against the states.[10] In a subsequent decision in Caetano v. Massachusetts,[11] the Court issued a brief, per curiam opinion vacating a Massachusetts Supreme Court decision that had upheld

---

[1] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1875); Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252 (1886); Miller v. Texas, 153 U.S. 535 (1894). The Fourteenth Amendment, through which the Second Amendment was later held to be applicable to the states, was ratified following the Civil War, in 1868. See infra Amdt14.1 Overview of Fourteenth Amendment, Equal Protection and Rights of Citizens.

[2] United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, 178 (1939) (explaining that the Second Amendment was enacted "[w]ith obvious purpose to assure the continuation and render possible the effectiveness of [militia] forces" and "must be interpreted and applied with that end in view").

[3] See, e.g., Richard A. Allen, What Arms? A Textualist View of the Second Amendment, 18 Geo. Mason U. C.R. L.J. 191, 191–93 (2008) (explaining the views taken by courts and scholars following Miller); Brian L. Frye, The Peculiar Story of United States v. Miller, 3 N.Y.U. J. L. & Liberty 48, 49 & n.4 (2008) (collecting cases on both sides of the debate).

[4] E.g., United States v. Nelson, 859 F.2d 1318, 1320 (8th Cir. 1988) (stating that cases after Cruikshank had "analyzed the second amendment purely in terms of protecting state militias, rather than individual rights," and the defendant had "made no arguments that the [challenged statute] would impair any state militia"); Gillespie v. City of Indianapolis, 185 F.3d 693, 710 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[T]he Second Amendment establishes no right to possess a firearm apart from the role possession of the gun might play in maintaining a state militia."); United States v. Napier, 233 F.3d 394, 403 (6th Cir. 2000) (recognizing that as of the date of decision, the lower federal courts had uniformly held that the Second Amendment protects a collective, rather than an individual, right).

[5] See, e.g., United States v. Emerson, 270 F.3d 203, 260 (5th Cir. 2001); Sanford Levinson, The Embarrassing Second Amendment, 99 Yale L.J. 637 (1989).

[6] 554 U.S. 570 (2008).

[7] Id. at 595.

[8] Id. at 626–27 & n.26.

[9] 561 U.S. 742 (2010).

[10] Id. at 778, 791 (plurality op.); id. at 806 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

a law prohibiting the possession of stun guns. The Court in Caetano reiterated that the Second Amendment applies to the states and extends to "bearable arms" that "were not in existence at the time of the founding."[12]

In the 2022 case New York State Rifle & Pistol Association v. Bruen,[13] the Court considered the constitutionality under the Second Amendment of a portion of New York's firearms licensing scheme that restricts the carrying of certain licensed firearms outside the home. In a 6-3 decision, the Court struck down New York's requirement that an applicant for an unrestricted license to carry a handgun outside the home for self-defense must establish "proper cause," ruling that the requirement is at odds with the Second Amendment.[14] In doing so, the Court recognized that the Second Amendment protects a right that extends beyond the home[15] and also clarified that the proper test for evaluating Second Amendment challenges to firearms laws is an approach rooted in text and the "historical tradition" of firearms regulation, rejecting a "two-step" methodology employed by many of the lower courts.[16]

Amdt2.2 Historical Background on Second Amendment

Second Amendment:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Historical surveys of the Second Amendment often trace its roots, at least in part, through the English Bill of Rights of 1689,[1] which declared that "subjects, which are protestants, may have arms for their defence suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law."[2] That provision grew out of friction over the English Crown's efforts to use loyal militias to control and disarm dissidents and enhance the Crown's standing army, among other things, prior to the Glorious Revolution that supplanted King James II in favor of William and Mary.[3]

The early American experience with militias and military authority would inform what would become the Second Amendment as well. In Founding-era America, citizen militias drawn from the local community existed to provide for the common defense, and standing armies of professional soldiers were viewed by some with suspicion.[4] The Declaration of Independence listed as greivances against King George III that he had "affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power" and had "kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures."[5] Following the Revolutionary War, several states codified constitutional arms-bearing rights in contexts that echoed these concerns—for instance, Article XIII of the Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights of 1776 read:

---

[11] 577 U.S. 411 (2016).

[12] Id. at 412.

[13] No. 20-843 (U.S. June 23, 2022).

[14] Id. at 62–63.

[15] Id. at 23–24.

[16] Id. at 8–15.

[1] See William Rawle, A View of the Constitution of the United States of America 126 (1829) ("In England, a country which boasts so much of its freedom, the right was secured to protestant subjects only, on the revolution of 1688; and it is cautiously described to be that of bearing arms for their defence, 'suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law.'").

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1891 (1833).

[3] Joyce Lee Malcolm, To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origins of an Anglo-American Right 115–16 (1994).

[4] See The Federalist No. 29 (Alexander Hamilton) (referencing proposition that "standing armies are dangerous to liberty" and militias are "the most natural defense of a free country").

[5] The Declaration of Independence paras. 13–14 (U.S. 1776).

> That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the state; and as standing armies in the time of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up; And that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power.[6]

Similarly, as another example, Massachusetts's Declaration of Rights from 1780 provided:

> The people have a right to keep and to bear arms for the common defence. And as, in time of peace, armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained without the consent of the legislature; and the military power shall always be held in an exact subordination to the civil authority, and be governed by it.[7]

Mistrust of standing armies, like the one employed by the English Crown to control the colonies, and anti-Federalist concerns with centralized military power colored the debate surrounding ratification of the federal Constitution and the need for a Bill of Rights.[8] Provisions in the Constitution gave Congress power to establish and fund an Army,[9] as well as authority to organize, arm, discipline, and call forth the militia in certain circumstances (while reserving to the states authority over appointment of militia officers and training).[10] The motivation for these provisions appears to have been "recognition of the danger of relying on inadequately trained soldiers as the primary means of providing for the common defense."[11] However, despite structural limitations such as a two-year limit on Army appropriations and certain militia reservations to the states, fears remained during the ratification debates that these provisions of the Constitution gave too much power to the federal government and were dangerous to liberty.[12]

In the Federalist, James Madison argued that "the State governments, with the people on their side," would be more than adequate to counterbalance a federally controlled "regular army," even one "fully equal to the resources of the country."[13] In Madison's view, "the advantage of being armed," together with "the existence of subordinate governments, to which the people are attached, and by which the militia officers are appointed, forms a barrier against the enterprises of ambition, more insurmountable than any which a simple government of any form can admit of."[14] Nevertheless, several states considered or proposed to the First Congress constitutional amendments that would explicitly protect arms-bearing rights, in various formulations.[15]

---

[6] Pa. Declaration of Rights § XIII (1776), in 5 The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws 3083 (Francis N. Thorpe ed., 1909).

[7] Ma. Declaration of Rights § XVII (1780), in 3 id. at 1892.

[8] See, e.g., 3 The Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, As Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, at 401 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1836) (statement of Gov. Edmund Randolph) ("With respect to a standing army, I believe there was not a member in the federal Convention, who did not feel indignation at such an institution.").

[9] U.S. Const. art. II, § 8, cl. 12.

[10] Id. art. II, § 8, cl. 15–16.

[11] Perpich v. Dep't of Def., 496 U.S. 334, 340 (1990).

[12] See Steven J. Heyman, Natural Rights and the Second Amendment, in The Second Amendment in Law and History: Historians and Constitutional Scholars on the Right to Bear Arms 200–01 (Carl T. Bogus ed., 2000) (collecting anti-federalist objections regarding power over militia and "to raise a standing army that could be used to destroy public liberty and erect a military despotism").

[13] The Federalist No. 46 (James Madison).

[14] Id.

[15] E.g., Amendments Proposed by the Virginia Convention June 27, 1788, in Creating the Bill of Rights: the Documentary Record from the First Federal Congress 19 (Helen E. Veit et al. eds., 1991) (proposing among other things, "[t]hat the people have a right to keep and bear arms; that a well regulated Militia composed of the body of the people

Amdt2.2
Historical Background on Second Amendment

Tasked with "digesting the many proposals for amendments made by the various state ratification conventions and stewarding them through the First Federal Congress,"[16] James Madison produced an initial draft of the Second Amendment as follows:

> The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; a well armed and well regulated militia being the best security of a free country: but no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms shall be compelled to render military service in person.[17]

The committee of the House of Representatives that considered Madison's formulation altered the order of the clauses such that the militia clause now came first, with a new specification of the militia as "composed of the body of the people," and made several other wording and punctuation changes.[18]

Debate in the House largely centered on the proposed Amendment's religious-objector clause, with Elbridge Gerry, for instance, arguing that the clause would give "the people in power" the ability to "declare who are those religiously scrupulous, and prevent them from bearing arms."[19] Gerry proposed that the provision "be confined to persons belonging to a religious sect scrupulous of bearing arms," but his proposed addition was not accepted.[20] Other proposals not accepted included striking out the entire clause, making it subject to "paying an equivalent," which Roger Sherman found problematic given religious objectors would be "equally scrupulous of getting substitutes or paying an equivalent,"[21] and adding after "a well regulated militia" the phrase "trained to arms," which Elbridge Gerry believed would make clear that it was "the duty of the Government" to provide the referenced security of a free State.[22]

As resolved by the House of Representatives on August 24, 1789, the version of the Second Amendment sent to the Senate remained similar to the version initially drafted by James Madison, with one of the largest changes being the re-ordering of the first two clauses.[23] The provision at that time read:

> A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the People, being the best security of a free State, the right of the People to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed, but no one religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person.[24] trained to arms is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free State[,]" and "[t]hat any person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms ought to be exempted upon payment of an equivalent to employ another to bear arms in his stead"); Amendments Proposed by the New York Convention July 26, 1788, in id. at 22 (proposing similar language but omitting religious-objector provision); Amendments Proposed by the New Hampshire Convention June 21, 1788, in id. at 17 (proposing that "Congress shall never disarm any Citizen unless such as are or have been in Actual Rebellion").

---

[16] Saul Cornell, A Well-Regulated Militia: The Founding Fathers and the Origins of Gun Control in America 59 (2006).

[17] 1 Annals of Cong. 451 (1789) (Joseph Gales ed., 1834).

[18] The Complete Bill of Rights: The Drafts, Debates, Sources, & Origins 264 (Neil H. Cogan ed., 2015) (House Committee of Eleven Report, July 28, 1789) [hereinafter, Complete Bill of Rights].

[19] 1 Annals of Cong. 778 (1789) (Joseph Gales ed., 1834).

[20] Id. at 779.

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 780.

[23] Complete Bill of Rights, supra note 18, at 267 (House Resolution, August 24, 1789).

[24] Complete Bill of Rights, supra note 18, at 267 (House Resolution, August 24, 1789).

The Amendment would take what would become its final form in the Senate, where the religious-objector clause was finally removed and several other phrases were modified.[25] For instance, the phrase referencing the militia as "composed of the body of the People" was struck, and the descriptor of the militia as "the best security of a free State" was modified to "necessary to the security of a free State."[26] Several other changes were proposed and rejected, including adding limitations on a standing army "in time of peace" and adding next to the words "bear arms" the phrase "for the common defence."[27] The final language of the Second Amendment was agreed to and transmitted to the states in late September of 1789.[28]

Amdt2.3 Early Second Amendment Jurisprudence

Second Amendment:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

For most of its history, the Second Amendment was not substantively addressed by the Supreme Court. Few nineteenth and early twentieth century cases implicated the Second Amendment directly, and thus the small number of references in early cases were glancing and largely unilluminating as to the nature and scope of the right protected by the Amendment.

In the 1820 case Houston v. Moore,[1] the Court addressed the constitutionality of a state statute providing for state court-martial punishment of militia members called into the service of the United States who refused deployment.[2] The case turned not on the Second Amendment but rather on the nature of federal and state authority over the militia, with the Court concluding that the state retained concurrent jurisdiction, at least where not withdrawn by Congress, to punish militia members in such circumstances.[3] In a dissenting opinion, Justice Joseph Story agreed that "a State might organize, arm, and discipline its own militia in the absence of, or subordinate to, the regulations of Congress." Justice Story explained that "[the Second Amendment] may not, perhaps, be thought to have any important bearing on this point. If it have, it comfirms and illustrates, rather than impugns the reasoning already suggested."[4] Although Justice Story did not provide further elaboration of how the Second Amendment might "confirm[ ] and illustrate[ ]" the proposition that a state retains concurrent, subordinate authority over the militia, it seems he may have been suggesting that the Amendment's reference to the importance of a "well regulated militia" supported such authority.

Another passing reference to the Second Amendment in a pre-Civil War case came in the infamous and now-superseded Dred Scott v. Sandford[5] decision. In holding that Black Americans were not citizens of the United States, the majority opinion in Dred Scott listed among the implications of an alternative conclusion that citizenship "would give them the full

---

[25] Any Senate debate of what would become the Second Amendment does not survive in recorded form. See James H. Hutson, The Creation of the Constitution: The Integrity of the Documentary Record, 65 Tex. L. Rev. 1, 36 (1986) ("The documentary record of debates on the Bill of Rights consists . . . of deliberations in the House of Representatives.").

[26] Complete Bill of Rights, supra note 18, at 270.

[27] Complete Bill of Rights, supra note 18, at 268–69.

[28] Complete Bill of Rights, supra note 18, at 274.

[1] 18 U.S. 1 (1820).

[2] Id. at 12.

[3] Id. at 14.

[4] Id. at 21 (Story, J., dissenting).

[5] 60 U.S. 393 (1857), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV.

liberty of speech in public and in private . . . ; to hold public meetings upon political affairs, and to keep and carry arms wherever they went."[6]

Following the Civil War, the Court issued several opinions that more squarely implicated the Second Amendment and established for a time that the Amendment was a bar only to federal government action.[7] In United States v. Cruikshank,[8] the Court vacated the convictions of a group of men under a federal statute proscribing conspiracies to deprive citizens of rights "granted or secured . . . by the constitution or laws of the United States," among other things.[9] The indictment averred, in relevant part, that the defendants intended to prevent two Black men from exercising their right "of 'bearing arms for a lawful purpose.'"[10] The Court rejected the proposition that this could be a valid basis for a violation of the statute, as "[t]his is not a right granted by the Constitution."[11] Rather, according to the Court, the Second Amendment "means no more than that it shall not be infringed by Congress," i.e., it "has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government," and thus the actions of private "fellow-citizens" could not deprive the victims of a right covered by the Second Amendment.[12] In the 1886 case Presser v. Illinois,[13] the Supreme Court addressed a Second Amendment challenge to Illinois laws prohibiting "bodies of men to associate together as military organizations, or to drill or parade with arms in cities and towns unless authorized by law."[14] The Court held that these provisions did not infringe the right of the people to keep and bear arms, as the Second Amendment "is a limitation only upon the power of congress and the national government, and not upon that of the state."[15]

Given scant guidance from the Supreme Court, there was no definitive resolution in the twentieth century of what the right protected by the Second Amendment encompasses, and what role, if any, the textual reference to a "well regulated Militia" plays in addressing that question. The Second Amendment is divided into a first clause ("A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State") and a second clause ("the right of the people to keep and bear Arms shall not be infringed"). Courts, commentators, and Congress debated, over the course of decades, the meaning of, and relationship between, these two clauses, primarily with respect to whether (1) in light of the first clause, the Amendment protects a collective right tied [6] Id. at 417; see also id. at 450 (stating, in reference to the applicability of the Bill of Rights to the territories, that Congress could not "deny to the people the right to keep and bear arms, nor the right to trial by jury, nor compel any one to be a witness against himself in a criminal proceeding."). In a later case, the Court in dicta suggested that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms . . . is not infringed by laws prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons." Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 281–82 (1897). As described infra, the Court has since squarely addressed a Second Amendment challenge to state laws restricting public carry, in New York State Rifle & Pistol Assocation v. Bruen, No. 20-843 (U.S. June 23, 2022).

[7] This view of the Second Amendment has been invalidated by subsequent Supreme Court precedent. See Amdt2.5 Post-Heller Issues and Application of Second Amendment to States; see also Amdt14.S1.4.1 Overview of Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[8] 92 U.S. 542 (1875).

[9] Id. at 548.

[10] Id. at 553.

[11] Id.

[12] Id.

[13] 116 U.S. 252 (1886).

[14] Id. at 264–65.

[15] Id. at 265; see also Miller v. Texas, 153 U.S. 535, 538 (1894) (stating that it was "well settled" that the Second Amendment "operate[s] only upon the federal power, and [has] no reference whatever to proceedings in state courts").

to maintaining formal, organized militia units; or (2) in light of the second clause, the Amendment protects an individual right to possess a firearm unconnected with service in a militia.[16]

The Supreme Court's most thorough consideration of the Second Amendment in the twentieth century came in United States v. Miller,[17] a 1939 decision that seemed to tie the Second Amendment right "to keep and bear arms" to militia use. Miller involved a federal statute, the National Firearms Act, which required registration of short-barreled shotguns, among other things.[18] After reciting the original provisions of the Constitution dealing with the militia, the Miller Court observed that "[w]ith obvious purpose to assure the continuation and render possible the effectiveness of such forces the declaration and guarantee of the Second Amendment were made. It must be interpreted with that end in view."[19] The significance of the militia, the Court continued, was that it was composed of "civilians primarily, soldiers on occasion."[20] It was upon this force that the states could rely for defense and securing of the laws, on a force that "comprised all males physically capable of acting in concert for the common defense," who, "when called for service . . . were expected to appear bearing arms supplied by themselves and of the kind in common use at the time."[21]

The Miller Court accordingly rejected the proposition that the federal restriction on short-barreled shotguns violated the Second Amendment, holding that absent evidence "tending to show that possession or use of" a short-barreled shotgun "at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia, [the Court] cannot say that the Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear such an instrument."[22] According to the Court, there was no indication that such weapons were "any part of the ordinary military equipment or that [their] use could contribute to the common defense."[23] Years after Miller, the Court, in upholding a federal firearms statute prohibiting a convicted felon from possessing a firearm, characterized in a footnote Miller's holding as being that "the Second Amendment guarantees no right to keep and bear a firearm that does not have 'some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia.'"[24]

The lack of clarity regarding the fundamental nature and scope of the Second Amendment following Miller fueled disagreement in the latter part of the twentieth century as to its application to an expanding set of federal, state, and local laws governing the private possession and sale of firearms. Writing in dissent in Adams v. Williams,[25] a 1972 Fourth

---

[16] A sampling of the diverse literature in which the same historical, linguistic, and case law background shows the basis for strikingly different conclusions includes: Staff of Subcomm. on the Constitution, S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Congress, 2d Sess., The Right to Keep and Bear Arms (Comm. Print 1982); Don B. Kates, Handgun Prohibition and the Original Meaning of the Second Amendment (1984); Gun Control and the Constitution: Sources and Explorations on the Second Amendment (Robert J. Cottrol ed., 1993); Stephen P. Halbrook, That Every Man Be Armed: The Evolution of a Constitutional Right (1984); Symposium, Gun Control, 49 Law & Contemp. Probs. 1 (1986); Sanford Levinson, The Embarrassing Second Amendment, 99 Yale L.J. 637 (1989); Joyce Lee Malcolm, To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origins of an Anglo-American Right (1994); Glenn Harlan Reynolds, A Critical Guide to the Second Amendment, 62 Tenn. L. Rev. 461 (1995); William Van Alystyne, The Second Amendment and the Personal Right to Bear Arms, 43 Duke L.J. 1236 (1994); Symposium, Symposium on the Second Amendment: Fresh Looks, 76 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 3 (2000).

[17] 307 U.S. 174 (1939).

[18] Id. at 175.

[19] Id. at 178.

[20] Id. at 179.

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 178.

[23] Id.

[24] Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55, 65 n.8 (1980).

[25] 407 U.S. 143 (1972).

Amendment case involving an arrest for unlawful possession of a handgun without a permit, Justice William O. Douglas, joined by Justice Thurgood Marshall, underscored his view that the Second Amendment "was designed to keep alive the militia" and thus would not pose an obstacle even to a ban on the possession of pistols by "everyone except the police."[26] In a concurring opinion in the later case Printz v. United States,[27] involving the background check process for certain firearm purchases under the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act, Justice Clarence Thomas acknowledged that the Second Amendment was "somewhat overlooked" in the Court's jurisprudence but had "engendered considerable academic, as well as public, debate."[28] On the latter point, Justice Thomas alluded to "an impressive array of historical evidence" in scholarly commentary indicating that the Second Amendment protects a "personal right" to keep and bear arms and suggested that such an understanding supported an argument that the federal government's regulation of at least the "purely intrastate sale or possession of firearms" would be unconstitutional.[29]

Lower courts and at least one congressional subcommittee weighed in as well. In the ninety-seventh Congress, the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on the Constitution issued a report concluding, among other things, that the Second Amendment protects "a right of the individual citizen to privately possess and carry in a peaceful manner firearms and similar arms."[30] By the turn of the century, most U.S. Courts of Appeals to have considered the matter interpreted the Second Amendment as speaking of a collective right tied to military or militia use of firearms,[31] though a divided panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in 2001 reached a contrary conclusion.[32] Then, in 2007, a split panel of the D.C. Circuit struck down District of Columbia restrictions on the private possession of handguns as inconsistent with the Second Amendment,[33] and the Supreme Court granted review,[34] leading to the Court's first significant pronouncements on the Second Amendment in almost seventy years.

---

[26] Id. at 150–51 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[27] 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[28] Id. at 938 n.2 (Thomas, J., concurring).

[29] Id. at 939.

[30] Staff of Subcomm. on the Constitution, S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 97th Congress, 2d Sess., The Right to Keep and Bear Arms 11 (Comm. Print 1982).

[31] E.g., United States v. Nelson, 859 F.2d 1318, 1320 (8th Cir. 1988) (stating that cases after Cruikshank had "analyzed the [S]econd [A]mendment purely in terms of protecting state militias, rather than individual rights," and the defendant had "made no arguments that the [challenged statute] would impair any state militia"); Gillespie v. City of Indianapolis, 185 F.3d 693, 710 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[T]he Second Amendment establishes no right to possess a firearm apart from the role possession of the gun might play in maintaining a state militia."); United States v. Napier, 233 F.3d 394, 403 (6th Cir. 2000) (recognizing that, as of the date of decision, the lower federal courts had uniformly held that the Second Amendment protects a collective, rather than an individual, right).

[32] United States v. Emerson, 270 F.3d 203, 260 (5th Cir. 2001). One judge on the panel wrote a special concurrence refusing to join in the section of the opinion concluding that the Second Amendment protected an individual right, characterizing it as dicta and unnecessary to resolve the case. Id. at 272 (Parker, J., specially concurring).

[33] Parker v. District of Columbia, 478 F.3d 370, 400–01 (D.C. Cir. 2007).

[34] District of Columbia v. Heller, 552 U.S. 1035 (2007) (mem.) (order granting petition for writ of certiorari, as limited).

Amdt2.4 Heller and Individual Right to Firearms

Second Amendment:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Before the Supreme Court's decision in District of Columbia v. Heller,[1] the District of Columbia had a web of regulations governing the ownership and use of firearms that, taken together, amounted to a near-total ban on operative handguns in the District. One law generally barred the registration of most handguns.[2] Another law required persons with registered firearms to keep them "unloaded and either disassembled or secured by a trigger lock, gun safe, locked box, or other secure device."[3] A third law prohibited persons within the District of Columbia from carrying (openly or concealed, in the home or elsewhere) an unlicensed firearm.[4] In 2003, six D.C. residents challenged these measures as unconstitutional under the Second Amendment, arguing that the Constitution provides an individual right to keep and bear arms.[5] In particular, the residents contended that the Second Amendment provides individuals a right to possess "functional firearms" that are "readily accessible to be used . . . for self-defense in the home."[6]

The challenge made its way to the Supreme Court, which, in a 5-4 decision authored by Justice Antonin Scalia, concluded that the Second Amendment provides an individual right to keep and bear arms for lawful purposes.[7] The majority arrived at this conclusion after undertaking an extensive analysis of the founding-era meaning of the words in the Second Amendment's "prefatory clause" ("A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State") and "operative clause" ("the right of the people to keep and bear Arms shall not be infringed").[8] Applying that interpretation to the challenged D.C. firearm laws, the Court concluded that the District's functional ban on handgun possession in the home and the requirement that lawful firearms in the home be rendered inoperable were unconstitutional.[9]

The majority analyzed the Second Amendment's two clauses and concluded that the prefatory clause announces the Amendment's purpose.[10] Furthermore, although there must be some link between the stated purpose in the prefatory clause and the command in the operative clause, the Court concluded that "the prefatory clause does not limit . . . the scope of the operative clause."[11] Accordingly, the Court assessed the meaning of the Second Amendment's two clauses.

Beginning with the operative clause, the Supreme Court first concluded that the phrase the "right of the people," as used in the Bill of Rights, universally communicates an individual right, and thus the Second Amendment protects a right that is "exercised individually and

---

[1] 554 U.S. 570 (2008).

[2] Parker v. District of Columbia, 478 F.3d 370, 373 (D.C. Cir. 2007).

[3] See id.

[4] See id.

[5] Parker v. District of Columbia, 311 F. Supp. 2d 103, 103–04 (D.D.C. 2004).

[6] Parker, 478 F.3d at 374.

[7] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 595, 626–27 (2008).

[8] Id. at 577.

[9] The Court did not evaluate the challenged licensing law on that ground that the District had asserted that, "'if the handgun ban is struck down and respondent registers a handgun, he could obtain a license, assuming he is not otherwise disqualified,'" which the Court interpreted to mean that "he is not a felon and is not insane." See id. at 630–31.

[10] Id. at 577.

[11] Id. at 577–78.

belongs to all Americans."[12] Next, the Court turned to the meaning of "to keep and bear arms."[13] "Arms," the Court asserted, has the same meaning now as it did during the eighteenth century: "any thing that a man wears for his defence, or takes into his hands, or use[s] in wrath to cast at or strike another," including weapons not specifically designed for military use.[14] The Court then turned to the full phrase "keep and bear arms." To "keep arms," as understood during the founding period, the Court maintained, was a "common way of referring to possessing arms, for militiamen and everyone else."[15] The Court further explained that "bearing arms," during the founding period as well as currently, means to carry weapons for the purpose of confrontation; but even so, the Court added, the phrase does not "connote[] participation in a structured military organization."[16] Taken together, the Court concluded that the Second Amendment "guarantee[s] the individual right to possess and carry weapons in case of confrontation."[17] The Court added that its textual analysis was supported by the Amendment's historical background, which was relevant to its analysis because, the Court reasoned, the Second Amendment was "widely understood" to have codified a pre-existing individual right to keep and bear arms.[18]

Turning back to the prefatory clause, the Supreme Court majority concluded that the term "well-regulated militia" does not refer to state or congressionally regulated military forces as described in the Constitution's Militia Clause;[19] rather, the Second Amendment's usage refers to all "able-bodied men" who are "capable of acting in concert for the common defense."[20] The Court opined that the security of a free "state," does not refer to the security of each of the several states, but rather the security of the country as a whole.[21]

Coming back to the Court's initial declaration that the two clauses must "fit" together, the majority concluded that the two clauses fit "perfectly" in light of the historical context showing that "tyrants had eliminated a militia consisting of all the able-bodied men . . . by taking away the people's arms."[22] Thus, the Court announced the reason for the Second Amendment's codification was "to prevent elimination of the militia," which "might be necessary to oppose an oppressive military force if the constitutional order broke down."[23] The Court clarified that the reason for codification does not define the entire scope of the right the Second Amendment guarantees.[24] This is so because, the Court explained, the Second Amendment codified a pre-existing right that included using firearms for self-defense and hunting, and thus the pre-existing right also informs the meaning of the Second Amendment.[25]

The Supreme Court majority added that its conclusion was not foreclosed by its earlier ruling in Miller, which seemed to tie the Second Amendment right to militia use. The Supreme Court in Heller concluded that Miller addressed only the type of weapons eligible for Second

[12] Id. at 579–81.

[13] Id. at 581–91.

[14] Id. at 581.

[15] Id. at 582–83.

[16] Id. at 584.

[17] Id. at 592.

[18] Id. at 592–95.

[19] U.S. CONST. art I, § 8, cl. 15 ("The Congress shall have Power . . . to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions.").

[20] Heller, 554 U.S. at 595–96.

[21] Id. at 597.

[22] Id. at 598.

[23] Id. at 599.

[24] Id.

[25] Id. at 599–600.

Amendment protection.[26] Furthermore, in the Court's view, the fact that Miller assessed a type of unlawfully possessed weapon supported its conclusion that the Second Amendment protects an individual right, with the Court noting that "it would have been odd to examine the character of the weapon rather than simply note that the two crooks were not militiamen."[27] Nor, the Court added, did Miller "purport to be a thorough examination of the Second Amendment," and thus, the Court reasoned, it could not be read to mean more than "say[ing] only that the Second Amendment does not protect those weapons not typically possessed by law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes, such as short-barreled shotguns."[28]

After announcing that the Second Amendment protects an individual's right to possess firearms, the Supreme Court explained that, "[l]ike most rights, the right secured by the Second Amendment is not unlimited."[29] Nevertheless, the Court left for another day an analysis of the full scope of the Second Amendment.[30] The Court did clarify, however, that "nothing in our opinion should be taken to cast doubt on longstanding prohibitions on the possession of firearms by felons and the mentally ill, or laws forbidding the carrying of firearms in sensitive places such as schools and government buildings, or laws imposing conditions and qualifications on the commercial sale of firearms," among other "presumptively lawful" regulations.[31] As for the kind of weapons that may obtain Second Amendment protection, the Court explained that Miller limits Second Amendment coverage to weapons "in common use at the time" that the reviewing court is examining a particular firearm, which, the Court added, "is fairly supported by the historical tradition of prohibiting the carrying of dangerous and unusual weapons."[32]

Finally, the Supreme Court applied the Second Amendment, as newly interpreted, to the contested D.C. firearm regulations and concluded that they were unconstitutional.[33] First, the Court declared that possessing weapons for self-defense is "central to the Second Amendment right," yet D.C.'s handgun ban prohibited "an entire class of 'arms' that is overwhelmingly chosen by American society for that lawful purpose."[34] Moreover, the handgun prohibition extended into the home, where, the Court added, "the need for defense of self, family, and property is most acute."[35] Additionally, the requirement that firearms in the home be kept inoperable is unconstitutional because, the Court concluded, that requirement "makes it impossible for citizens to use them for the core lawful purpose of self-defense."[36] Thus, the Court ruled that D.C.'s handgun ban could not survive under any level of scrutiny that a court typically would apply to a constitutional challenge of an enumerated right.[37]

---

[26] Id. at 621–22.

[27] Id. at 622.

[28] Id. at 623–25.

[29] Id. at 626.

[30] Id.

[31] Id. at 626–27 & n.26.

[32] Id. at 627 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted); id. at 582 ("Some have made the argument, bordering on the frivolous, that only those arms in existence in the 18th century are protected by the Second Amendment. We do not interpret constitutional rights that way. Just as the First Amendment protects modern forms of communication . . . and the Fourth Amendment applies to modern forms of search . . . the Second Amendment extends, prima facie, to all instruments that constitute bearable arms, even those that were not in existence at the time of the founding.").

[33] Id. at 628–36.

[34] Id. at 628.

[35] Id. at 628–29.

[36] Id. at 630.

[37] Id. at 628–29.

Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented.[38] Justice Stevens did not directly quarrel with the majority's conclusion that the Second Amendment provides an individual right, asserting that it "protects a right that can be enforced by individuals."[39] But he disagreed with the majority's interpretation of the scope of the right, contending that neither the text nor history of the Amendment supports "limiting any legislature's authority to regulate private civilian uses of firearms" or "that the Framers of the Amendment intended to enshrine the common-law right of self-defense in the Constitution."[40] Additionally, he characterized the majority's interpretation of Miller as a "dramatic upheaval in the law."[41] In his view, Miller interpreted the Second Amendment as "protect[ing] the right to keep and bear arms for certain military purposes" and not "curtail[ing] the Legislature's power to regulate the nonmilitary use and ownership of weapons." This interpretation, Justice Stevens added, "is both the most natural reading of the Amendment's text and the interpretation most faithful to the history of its adaptation."[42]

Justice Stephen Breyer, joined by Justices Stevens, David Souter, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, authored another dissent.[43] Although agreeing with Justice Stevens that the Second Amendment protects only militia-related firearm uses, in his dissent he argued that the District's laws were constitutional even under the majority's conclusion that the Second Amendment protects firearm possession in the home for self-defense.[44] He began by assessing the appropriate level of scrutiny under which Second Amendment challenges should be analyzed.[45] Justice Breyer suggested an interest-balancing inquiry in which a court would evaluate "the interests protected by the Second Amendment on one side and the governmental public-safety concerns on the other, the only question being whether the regulation at issue impermissibly burdens the former in the course of advancing the latter."[46] In making that evaluation, Justice Breyer would have asked "how the statute seeks to further the governmental interests that it serves, how the statute burdens the interests that the Second Amendment seeks to protect, and whether there are practical less burdensome ways of furthering those interests."[47] Applying those questions to the challenged D.C. laws, Justice Breyer concluded that (1) the laws sought to further compelling public-safety interests; (2) the D.C. restrictions minimally burdened the Second Amendment's purpose to preserve a "well regulated Militia" and burdened "to some degree" an interest in self-defense; and (3) there were no reasonable but less restrictive alternatives to reducing the number of handguns in the District.[48] Thus, in Justice Breyer's view, the District's gun laws were constitutional. He also anticipated that the majority's decision would "encourage legal challenges to gun regulation throughout the Nation."[49] The majority did not seem to voice disagreement with this [38] Id. at 636–80 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

[39] Id. at 636.

[40] Id. at 636–37.

[41] Id. at 639.

[42] Id. at 637–38.

[43] Id. at 681–723 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[44] Id. at 681–82.

[45] Id. at 687–91.

[46] Id. at 689–90. The majority explicitly rejected Justice Breyer's suggested approach. Id. at 634 (majority op.) ("We know of no other enumerated constitutional right whose core protection has been subjected to a freestanding 'interest-balancing' approach. The very enumeration of the right takes out of the hands of government—even the Third Branch of Government—the power to decide on a case-by-case basis whether the right is really worth insisting upon.").

[47] Id. at 693 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[48] Id. at 691–719.

[49] Id. at 718.

prediction, but noted that "since this case represents this Court's first in-depth examination of the Second Amendment, one should not expect it to clarify the entire field."[50]

Amdt2.5 Post-Heller Issues and Application of Second Amendment to States

Second Amendment:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

The Supreme Court's decision in Heller left several questions regarding the scope and application of the Second Amendment unanswered, including what methodology or level of scrutiny should ordinarily apply to laws implicating the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms and how far Second Amendment protections extend, if at all, beyond keeping firearms for self defense in the home. Additionally, because Heller involved a challenge to a D.C. law, which is generally not treated as a state for purposes of constitutional law,[1] a question beyond the scope of Heller was whether the Second Amendment applies to the states. Several Supreme Court cases near the end of the nineteenth century established the Second Amendment as a constraint only on federal government action.[2] However, as the Supreme Court noted in Heller, those decisions "did not engage in the sort of Fourteenth Amendment inquiry required by" later Supreme Court cases[3]—specifically, cases establishing the doctrine of "selective incorporation" through which particular provisions in the Bill of Rights that are "fundamental to our scheme of ordered liberty" and "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition" are considered to be incorporated in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment such that they apply to the states.[4]

The Supreme Court revisited the issue of whether the Second Amendment applies to the states in the 2010 case McDonald v. City of Chicago,[5] concluding that it does. McDonald involved Second Amendment challenges to ordinances banning handgun possession in the City of Chicago and its neighboring suburb of Oak Park, Illinois.[6] The lower courts held that they were bound by the Supreme Court precedent establishing that the Second Amendment does not apply to the states, but the Supreme Court reversed in a 4-1-4 ruling.[7] The Court, in an opinion authored by Justice Alito, concluded that "the Framers and ratifiers of the Fourteenth Amendment counted the right to keep and bear arms among those fundamental rights necessary to our system of ordered liberty."[8] Thus, a plurality of the Court held that the Second Amendment is applicable to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[9] The plurality first noted that Heller makes "unmistakabl[e]" that the basic right to self-defense is a "central component" of the Second Amendment and "deeply rooted in this

---

[50] Id. at 635 (majority op.).

[1] See Hepburn & Dundas v. Ellzey, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 445 (1805).

[2] See supra Amdt2.3 Early Second Amendment Jurisprudence.

[3] District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 620 n.23 (2008).

[4] See infra Amdt14.S1.4.1 Overview of Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[5] 561 U.S. 742 (2010).

[6] Nat'l Rifle Ass'n of Am., Inc. v. City of Chicago, 567 F.3d 856, 857 (7th Cir. 2009).

[7] McDonald, 561 U.S. at 749.

[8] Id. at 778.

[9] Id. at 791. Although Justice Thomas was part of the five-Justice majority of the McDonald Court who agreed that the Second Amendment was applicable to the states via the Fourteenth Amendment, he disagreed with his colleagues' view that the Due Process Clause served as the proper basis for this incorporation. Id. at 805–58 (Thomas, J., concurring). In Justice Thomas's view, the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause provided the source for incorporation. Id. at 805–06, 855.

Nation's history and tradition."[10] The Court reiterated much of the information recited in Heller about the founders' relationship to arms, including the fear many held—based on King George III's attempts to disarm the colonists—that the newly created federal government, too, would disarm the people to impose its will.[11] The Court explained that, even though the initial perceived threat of disarmament had dissipated by the 1850s, "the right to keep and bear arms was highly valued for purposes of self-defense."[12] The Court also pointed to congressional debate in 1868 of the Fourteenth Amendment, during which Senators had referred to the right to keep and bear arms as a "fundamental right deserving of protection."[13]

In his concurring opinion, Justice Thomas said that he would have construed the Second Amendment to be applicable to the states via the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because, in his view, "the right to keep and bear arms is guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment as a privilege of American citizenship."[14] Justice Thomas's opinion nevertheless provided the crucial fifth vote to hold that the Second Amendment applies to the states.

Justice Breyer dissented (joined by Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor), contending that "nothing in the Second Amendment's text, history, or underlying rationale . . . warrant[s] characterizing it as 'fundamental' insofar as it seeks to protect the keeping and bearing of arms for private self-defense purposes."[15] Additionally, he asserted that the Constitution provides no authority for "transferring ultimate regulatory authority over the private uses of firearms from democratically elected legislators to courts or from the States to the Federal Government."[16]

Justice Stevens authored another dissenting opinion, arguing that the question before the Court was not whether the Second Amendment, as a whole, applies to the states, but rather whether the Fourteenth Amendment requires that the liberty interest asserted—"the right to possess a functional, personal firearm, including a handgun, within the home"—be enforceable against the states.[17] In his view, the Second Amendment is not enforceable against the states, particularly because the Amendment is a "federalism provision" that is "directed at preserving the autonomy of the sovereign States, and its logic therefore resists incorporation by a federal court against the states."[18]

Between McDonald in 2010 and New York State Rifle & Pistol Association v. Bruen in 2022, the Supreme Court issued only one other decision substantively addressing the Second Amendment.[19] In Caetano v. Massachusetts,[20] the Court issued a brief, per curiam opinion vacating a Massachusetts Supreme Court decision that upheld a law prohibiting the [10] Id. at 767–68 (internal emphasis, citations, and quotation marks omitted) (plurality op.).

[11] Id. at 768.

[12] Id. at 770.

[13] Id. at 775–76 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted).

[14] Id. at 778 (Thomas, J., concurring).

[15] Id. at 913 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[16] Id.

[17] Id. at 858, 884, 890 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

[18] Id. at 897 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted).

[19] In 2019, the Court granted review in a case challenging portions of New York City's handgun licensing regime that limited the transportation of firearms to shooting ranges and second homes outside the city, but changes to the laws at issue prompted the Court to effectively dismiss the case as moot in April 2020 without ruling on the merits. See N.Y. State Rifle & Pistol Ass'n v. City of New York, 140 S. Ct. 1525, 1526 (2020). Several Justices wrote or joined separate opinions in the case signaling concern that the Second Amendment was not being properly applied by some courts. E.g., id. at 1527 (Kavanaugh, J., concurring) ("[I] share Justice Alito's concern that some federal and state courts may not be properly applying Heller and McDonald.").

[20] 577 U.S. 411 (2016).

possession of stun guns. The Supreme Court reiterated in Caetano that the Second Amendment applies to the states and extends to "bearable arms" that "were not in existence at the time of the founding."[21]

The plethora of Second Amendment challenges to federal, state, and local gun laws in the years following Heller and McDonald, coupled with the lack of guidance from the Supreme Court on questions such as what standard of review governs and whether the Second Amendment applies outside the home, led the lower federal courts to develop their own rules and frameworks for analyzing Second Amendment cases. With respect to the question of how to evaluate the constitutionality of gun laws under the Second Amendment, the lower federal courts in post-Heller cases generally applied a two-step framework.[22] At step one, a court would ask whether the law at issue burdened conduct protected by the Second Amendment, which typically involved an inquiry into the historical meaning of the right.[23] If the law did not burden protected conduct, it was upheld.[24] If the challenged law did burden protected conduct, a court would next apply either strict scrutiny—an exacting form of constitutional review requiring the government to show that the law is narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest[25]—or a somewhat lower standard of "intermediate scrutiny" to determine whether the law was nevertheless constitutional.[26] Whether a court applied intermediate or strict scrutiny would ordinarily depend on whether the law severely burdened the "core" protection of the Second Amendment.[27] What precisely constituted the "core" of the Second Amendment, however, produced some disagreement among the U.S. Courts of Appeals, particularly with respect to whether it extended beyond the home.[28] Nonetheless, using the two-step framework, the U.S. Courts of Appeals after Heller upheld many firearms regulations, [22] See, e.g., Powell v. Tompkins, 783 F.3d 332, 347 n.9 (1st Cir. 2015) (collecting cases).

[21] Id. at 412.

[23] E.g., Silvester v. Harris, 843 F.3d 816, 820–21 (9th Cir. 2016); Ezell v. City of Chicago, 651 F.3d 684, 701 (7th Cir. 2011). Courts at step one sometimes recognized a safe harbor for the kinds of "longstanding" and "presumptively lawful" regulations that the Supreme Court in Heller appeared to insulate from doubt. E.g., United States v. Bena, 664 F.3d 1180, 1183 (8th Cir. 2011) ("It seems most likely that the Supreme Court viewed the regulatory measures listed in Heller as presumptively lawful because they do not infringe on the Second Amendment right."). In a variation, some courts treated such regulations not as per se constitutional but merely as being entitled to a presumption of constitutionality. See, e.g., Tyler v. Hillsdale Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 837 F.3d 678, 686 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Heller only established a presumption that such bans were lawful; it did not invite courts onto an analytical off-ramp to avoid constitutional analysis.")

[24] E.g., Medina v. Whitaker, 913 F.3d 152, 160 (D.C. Cir. 2019) (concluding that, based on historical evidence, "a felony conviction removes one from the scope of the Second Amendment").

[25] E.g., NIFLA v. Becerra, 138 S. Ct. 2361, 2371 (2018) (describing strict scrutiny standard in the context of the First Amendment).

[26] Courts sometimes would go on to step two in an "abundance of caution" even if it was doubtful that a challenged law burdened conduct protected by the Second Amendment. Nat'l Rifle Ass'n of Am., Inc. v. ATF, 700 F.3d 185, 204 (5th Cir. 2012); see Woollard v. Gallagher, 712 F.3d 865, 875 (4th Cir. 2013) ("[W]e and other courts of appeals have sometimes deemed it prudent to instead resolve post-Heller challenges to firearm prohibitions at the second step[.]").

[27] E.g., Nat'l Rifle Ass'n, 700 F.3d at 195.

[28] Compare Kachalsky v. Cnty. of Westchester, 701 F.3d 81, 94 (2d Cir. 2012) ("The state's ability to regulate firearms . . . is qualitatively different in public than in the home."); Gould v. Morgan, 907 F.3d 659, 672 (1st Cir. 2018) (stating that the right "is at its zenith inside the home" and "is plainly more circumscribed outside the home"); and Bonidy v. U.S. Postal Serv., 790 F.3d 1121, 1126 (10th Cir. 2015) ("If Second Amendment rights apply outside the home, we believe they would be measured by the traditional test of intermediate scrutiny."), with Wrenn v. District of Columbia, 864 F.3d 650, 661 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (recognizing that the right of law-abiding citizens to carry a concealed firearm is a core component of the Second Amendment); and Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933, 942 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The Supreme Court has decided that the amendment confers a right to bear arms for self-defense, which is as important outside the home as inside.").

often after concluding that the "core" of the Second Amendment was not severely burdened and thus intermediate scrutiny should be applied.[29]

Amdt2.6 Bruen and Concealed-Carry Licenses

Second Amendment:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

The Supreme Court in the 2022 case New York State Rifle & Pistol Association v. Bruen[1] considered the constitutionality of a portion of New York's handgun licensing regime relating to concealed-carry licenses for self-defense. The laws at issue in the case generally required a New York resident wishing to possess a firearm in public to get a "carry" license authorizing concealed carry, which typically required the license applicant to show "proper cause"—for carry unrelated to specific purposes like hunting or target practice, a "special need for self-protection distinguishable from that of the general community."[2]

The lower court in Bruen upheld the challenged laws based on the two-step inquiry described above,[3] but in a 6-3 decision, the Supreme Court reversed.[4] The majority opinion, authored by Justice Clarence Thomas, began by addressing the proper standard for evaluating Second Amendment challenges to firearm regulations and rejected the two-step framework that "combines history with means-end scrutiny."[5] In the majority's view, the two-step approach was inconsistent with Heller, which focused on text and history and "did not invoke any means-end test such as strict or intermediate scrutiny."[6] As such, the Court concluded that the standard for applying the Second Amendment is rooted solely in text and history, stating the test as follows:

> When the Second Amendment's plain text covers an individual's conduct, the Constitution presumptively protects that conduct. The government must then justify its regulation by demonstrating that it is consistent with the Nation's historical tradition of firearm regulation. Only then may a court conclude that the individual's conduct falls outside the Second Amendment's "unqualified command."[7]

Turning, then, to the first question in the analysis—whether the Second Amendment's text covers the conduct at issue—the majority opinion concluded that it did, as the word "bear" in [29] E.g., Gould, 907 F.3d at 676–77; Bonidy, 790 F.3d at 1128–29; Kanter v. Barr, 919 F.3d 437, 450–51 (7th Cir. 2019). Not all firearms regulations were upheld, however. See, e.g., N.Y. State Rifle & Pistol Ass'n v. Cuomo, 804 F.3d 242, 264 (2d Cir. 2015) (concluding that a law limiting the number of rounds that could be loaded into a firearm did not survive intermediate scrutiny on the record before the court); Wrenn, 864 F.3d at 667 (holding that restrictions on obtaining concealed carry license effectively banned exercise of core Second Amendment right and were thus unconstitutional); but see Kachalsky, 701 F.3d at 94 (applying intermediate scrutiny and upholding similar restrictions after concluding that possession of firearms outside the home is outside core of Second Amendment).

---

[1] No. 20-843 (U.S. June 23, 2022).

[2] Id. at 3 (quoting In re Klenosky, 428 N.Y.S.2d 256, 257 (N.Y. App. Div. 1980)).

[3] N.Y. State Rifle & Pistol Ass'n v. Beach, 818 F. App'x 99, 100 (2d Cir. 2020) (summary order) (citing Kachalsky v. Cnty. of Westchester, 701 F.3d 81, 83, 100–01 (2d Cir. 2012)).

[4] Bruen, slip op. at 63.

[5] Id. at 8.

[6] Id. at 13.

[7] Id. at 15 (quoting Konigsberg v. State Bar of Cal., 366 U.S. 36, 50 n.10 (1961)).

the text "naturally encompasses public carry."[8] As such, according to the majority, the Second Amendment "presumptively guarantees . . . a right to 'bear' arms in public for self-defense."[9]

On the next question of consistency with the country's "historical tradition of firearm regulation," the majority opinion provided some further guidance as to how to conduct the analysis, acknowledging that the "regulatory challenges posed by firearms today are not always the same as those that preoccupied the Founders in 1791 or the Reconstruction generation in 1868."[10] For this reason, the majority explained that historical analysis of modern-day gun laws may call for reasoning by analogy to determine whether historical and modern firearm regulations are "relevantly similar."[11]

With respect to how to determine what qualifies as relevantly similar, the majority opinion identified "at least two metrics: how and why the regulations burden a law-abiding citizen's right to armed self-defense."[12] As an example of modern laws that could pass muster by means of historical analogy, the majority opinion pointed to laws prohibiting firearms in "sensitive places" such as schools or government buildings, though the majority rejected the proposition that the "sensitive place" category could apply so broadly as to cover "all places of public congregation that are not isolated from law enforcement."[13]

Throughout the majority opinion, the Court provided further guideposts as to what sort of historical evidence would be most valuable, cautioning, among other things, against reading too much into early English law that did not necessarily "survive[] to become our Founders' law" or ascribing too much significance to post-enactment history, at least where that history was inconsistent with the original meaning of the constitutional text.[14] The majority declined to weigh in on whether the prevailing historical understanding for analytical purposes should be pegged to when the Second Amendment was adopted in 1791 or when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in 1868, as the majority opinion concluded that the public understanding was the same at both points for relevant purposes with respect to public carry.[15]

With framework and guidance in place, the majority opinion turned to its historical analysis, assessing whether a variety of laws from England and the United States proffered by the respondents met the burden of establishing that New York's laws were consistent with the country's historical tradition of firearms regulation.[16] Ultimately, the majority concluded that the respondents did not meet the burden "to identify an American tradition justifying the State's proper-cause requirement."[17] While acknowledging that history reflected restrictions on public carry, which limited "the intent for which one could carry arms, the manner by which one carried arms," or the particular circumstances "under which one could not carry arms," the majority opinion concluded that "American governments simply have not broadly prohibited the public carry of commonly used firearms for personal defense" or made public carry

[8] Id. at 23.
[9] Id. at 24.
[10] Id. at 18.
[11] Id. at 20.
[12] Id.
[13] Id. at 21–22.
[14] Id. at 26–28.
[15] Id. at 29.
[16] Id. at 29–62.
[17] Id. at 30.

contingent on a showing of a special need.[18] The few historical laws that the majority viewed as extending that far were, according to the opinion, "late-in-time outliers."[19]

Justice Samuel Alito joined the Court's majority opinion in full but wrote separately to respond primarily to points made by the dissent. Justice Alito emphasized in his concurrence that the majority opinion did not disturb Heller or McDonald and said nothing about who may be prohibited from possessing a firearm, what kinds of weapons may be possessed, or the requirements for purchasing a firearm.[20] Justice Brett Kavanaugh, joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, agreed that the New York's licensing regime violated the Second Amendment but wrote separately to underscore that the Court's decision would not prohibit states from imposing licensing requirements for public carry based on objective criteria so long as the requirements "do not grant open-ended discretion to licensing officials and do not require a showing of some special need apart from self-defense."[21] Justice Kavanaugh, quoting from Heller, reiterated that the Second Amendment right is not unlimited and may allow for many kinds of gun regulations.[22] Justice Amy Coney Barrett wrote a solo concurrence to highlight two open methodological questions regarding the role of post-ratification practice in historical inquiry and whether 1791 or 1868 should be the relevant benchmark year.[23] She underscored that both questions were unnecessary to resolve in the present case but might have a bearing on a future case.[24]

Justice Stephen Breyer authored a dissent, joined by Justices Elena Kagan and Sonia Sotomayor. The dissent objected to deciding the case on the pleadings without an evidentiary record as to how New York's standard was actually being applied.[25] More fundamentally, Justice Breyer disagreed with the majority's "rigid history-only approach," which he argued unnecessarily disrupted consensus in the U.S. Courts of Appeals, misread Heller, and put the Second Amendment on a different footing than other constitutional rights.[26] The dissent also viewed the history-focused approach as "deeply impractical" because it imposed on judges without historical expertise—and courts without needed resources—the task of parsing history, raised numerous intractable questions about what history to consider and how to weigh it, and would "often fail to provide clear answers to difficult questions" while giving judges "ample tools to pick their friends out of history's crowd."[27] The dissent viewed the majority's historical analysis regarding public carry as an embodiment of these impracticalities, as the majority found reasons to discount the persuasive force of numerous historical regulations similar to New York's that appeared to meet the Court's "analogical reasoning" test.[28]

[18] Id. at 62.

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 2 (Alito, J., concurring).

[21] Id. at 1–2 (Kavanaugh, J., concurring).

[22] Id. at 3.

[23] Id. at 1–2 (Barrett, J., concurring).

[24] Id. at 2.

[25] Id. at 14 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[26] Id. at 21–25.

[27] Id. at 25–34.

[28] Id. at 34–50.

THIRD AMENDMENT
QUARTERING SOLDIERS

THIRD AMENDMENT
QUARTERING SOLDIERS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

THIRD AMENDMENT—QUARTERING SOLDIERS

Amdt3.1 Overview of Third Amendment, Quartering Soldiers

The Third Amendment limits the federal government's ability to use private homes as lodging for soldiers. The Supreme Court has never decided a case directly implicating the Third Amendment and has cited it only in a handful of opinions.[1] As a result, some legal scholars consider the Amendment to be "an interesting study in constitutional obsolescence."[2] When ratified, however, the Third Amendment enshrined "protections of great importance,"[3] reflecting the Founders' pre-Revolutionary experiences with British soldiers and centuries of English history.[4]

Despite the Amendment's near-disuse as to its original protections,[5] it took on a new dimension in the second half of the twentieth century, with courts and scholars citing it as one of the constitutional "guarantees creat[ing] zones of privacy"[6] and for a "traditional and strong resistance of Americans to any military intrusion into civilian affairs."[7]

Amdt3.2 Historical Background on Third Amendment

Third Amendment:

> No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

The practice of quartering soldiers dates back to at least the Roman Republic, when territorial governors used it as a tool of oppression and source of income.[1] In seventeenth-century Britain, the Petition of Right of 1628 levied multiple complaints against King Charles I, including maintaining a standing army and the involuntary quartering of soldiers;[2] it called on King Charles to end those practices.[3] When quartering continued, the English Parliament in 1679 passed the Anti-Quartering Act, which prohibited the involuntarily quartering and billeting of soldiers.[4] A decade later, the Declaration of Rights (later codified as the Bill of Rights of 1689) cited King James II's continued practices of

---

[1] See infra Amdt3.3 Government Intrusion and Third Amendment.

[2] Morton J. Horwitz, Is the Third Amendment Obsolete?, 26 Val. Univ. L. Rev. 209, 212 (1991); accord William S. Fields & David T. Hardy, The Third Amendment and the Issue of the Maintenance of Standing Armies: A Legal History, 35 Am. J. Legal Hist. 393, 393 (1991).

[3] Fields & Hardy, supra note 2, at 394.

[4] See infra Amdt3.2 Historical Background on Third Amendment.

[5] Contra Engblom v. Carey, 677 F.2d 957 (2d Cir. 1982).

[6] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 484 (1965); see also Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 350 n.5 (1967).

[7] Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 15 (1972); see Amdt3.3 Government Intrusion and Third Amendment.

[1] R. Morris Coates & Gary M. Pecquet, The Calculus of Conquests: The Decline and Fall of the Returns to Roman Expansion, 17 Indep. Rev. 517, 528 (2013).

[2] Petition of Right 1628, 3 Car. 1, c. 1, § VI (Eng.) ("[O]f late great Companies of Souldiers and Marriners have been dispersed into divers Counties of the Realme, and the inhabitants against their wills have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourne against the Lawes and Customes of this Realme and to the great grievance and vexacion of the people.").

[3] Id. § VIII (demanding that the King "remove the said Souldiers and Mariners and that your people may not be soe burthened in tyme to come").

[4] 31 Car. 2, c. 1 (1679) (Eng.) ("Noe officer military or civill nor any other person whatever shall from henceforth presume to place quarter or billet any souldier or souldiers.").

maintaining a standing army and quartering as two justifications for his ouster in the "Glorious Revolution."[5] The Mutiny Act of 1689 further codified protections against quartering.[6]

Concerns over the existence of standing armies and their quartering in private homes spread to the American colonies. The Mutiny Act's prohibitions on quartering did not extend to the colonies, where involuntary quartering continued.[7] Although colonial legislatures attempted to regulate quartering to varying degrees,[8] the British Parliament did not extend the Mutiny Act's protections to the colonies until 1765.[9] The Quartering Act forbade quartering in private homes but required the colonies to bear the costs of barracks and supplies for British soldiers or, in the alternative, to house British soldiers in "inns, livery stables, ale-houses, victualling-houses," and other such establishments.[10]

The Quartering Act of 1765 contributed to growing tensions between the colonists and British Forces. This friction ultimately led to outright conflict, one notable example being the Boston Massacre in 1770.[11] In response to these hostilities, the British Parliament passed the so-called "Intolerable" or "Coercive Acts," including the Quartering Act of 1774.[12] The 1774 Act expanded British officers' ability to refuse unsuitable housing and seize "uninhabited houses, out-houses, barns, or other buildings" for purposes of quartering soldiers.[13] As opposition to the Intolerable Acts led to revolution, the colonists' experiences with quartering influenced the Declaration of Independence, which counted among its grievances against King George III the "Quartering [of] large bodies of armed troops among us."[14]

As the newly independent states adopted organic laws, four states—Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire—included restrictions on quartering.[15] These early state

---

[5] Bill of Rights 1689, 1 W. & M. 2d sess., c. 2.

[6] 1 W. & M., c. 6.

[7] William S. Fields & David T. Hardy, The Third Amendment and the Issue of the Maintenance of Standing Armies: A Legal History, 35 Am. J. Legal Hist. 393, 406, 414 (1991).

[8] See id. One such law was the New York Assembly's 1683 Charter of Libertyes and Privilidges, which provided: "Noe Freeman shall be compelled to receive any Marriners or Souldiers into his house and there suffer them to Sojourne, against their willes provided Alwayes it be not in time of Actuall Warr within this province." B. Carmon Hardy, A Free People's Intolerable Grievance: The Quartering of Troops and the Third Amendment, in The Bill of Rights—A Lively Heritage 74 (Jon Kukla ed., 1987).

[9] 5 Geo. 3 c. 33 (1765).

[10] Id.

[11] See Fields & Hardy, supra note 7, at 415–16; Morton J. Horwitz, Is the Third Amendment Obsolete?, 26 Val. Univ. L. Rev. 209, 210 (1991).

[12] 14 Geo. 3 c. 54 (1774). Other Intolerable Acts included the Boston Port Act, 14 Geo. 3 c. 19 (1774) (prohibiting the use of the Port of Boston in commerce); the Administration of Justice Act, 14 Geo. 3 c. 39 (1774) (authorizing British officials to be tried in Great Britain instead of Massachusetts "to prevent a failure of justice"), and the Massachusetts Government Act, 14 Geo. 3 c. 45 (1774) (placing the Massachusetts colony directly under the British government's control).

[13] 14 Geo. 3 c. 54, ¶ 2. The interpretation of the Quartering Act of 1774—including whether it permitted quartering in private homes-is the subject of some debate. Compare Fields & Hardy, supra note 7, at 416 ("The 1774 Act, one of the so called 'Intolerable Acts,' was even more onerous than the 1765 Act in that it authorized the quartering of soldiers in the private homes of the colonists."), with David Ammerman, In the Common Cause: American Response to the Coercive Acts of 1774, at 10 (1974) ("The act did not, as has often been asserted, provide for billeting soldiers in private homes.").

[14] The Declaration of Independence para. 13 (U.S. 1776).

[15] Each of these states prohibited peacetime quartering in any house without the owner's consent. Del. Declaration of Rights § 21 (1776); Md. Const. art. XXVIII (1776); Mass Const. art. XXVII (1780); N.H. Const. art. I, § XXVII (1784). In wartime, Delaware and Maryland limited quartering to "such manner only as the Legislature shall direct," Del. Declaration of Rights § 21 (1776); Md. Const. art. XXVIII (1776), while Massachusetts and New Hampshire permitted wartime quartering when authorized "by the civil magistrate" under the legislature's direction, Mass Const. art. XXVII (1780); N.H. Const. art. I, § XXVII (1784).

protections initially had no national analogue: the Articles of Confederation contained no restrictions on quartering.[16] Likewise, although the Framers of the Constitution considered including such a restriction,[17] it was not part of the final draft submitted to the states for ratification. Some Framers objected to the omission, arguing that the Constitution's failure to prohibit quartering, while allowing standing armies, strengthened the central government's power.[18]

Reflecting this concern, five states' ratifying conventions recommended amending the Constitution to include a prohibition on quartering in the Bill of Rights.[19] The proposed amendments took two forms. Maryland and New Hampshire proposed amendments that would have prohibited involuntary quartering during peacetime but were silent as to quartering during wartime.[20] In contrast, Virginia, New York, and North Carolina proposed amendments with the same peacetime restrictions that also subjected wartime quartering to limits imposed by law.[21] This second version formed the basis for the amendment as introduced in the House of Representatives by James Madison[22] and ultimately adopted as the Third Amendment.

Amdt3.3 Government Intrusion and Third Amendment

Third Amendment:

> No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

The Third Amendment has rarely been the subject of litigation.[1] The Supreme Court has never directly construed it, and only two lower federal courts—the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit—have examined the Third Amendment in depth.[2] This lack of judicial interpretation may be due to the Amendment's straightforward phrasing. As Justice Joseph Story stated in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, the "provision speaks for itself" as

---

[16] See Articles of Confederation of 1781.

[17] See, e.g., James Madison, Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787 Which Framed the Constitution of the United States of America (Gaillard Hunt & James Brown Scott eds., 1920) ("Mr. Pinkney submitted to the House . . . the following propositions . . .'No soldier shall be quartered in any House in time of peace without consent of the owner.'").

[18] See, e.g., Letter from the Federal Farmer, no. 16 (1788), reprinted in 5 The Founder's Constitution 217 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987) ("[I]s there any provision in the constitution to prevent the quartering of soldiers on the inhabitants? . . . Though it is not to be presumed, that we are in any immediate danger from this quarter, yet it is fit and proper to establish, beyond dispute, those rights which are particularly valuable to individuals . . . .").

[19] Tom W. Bell, Note, The Third Amendment: Forgotten but Not Gone, 2 Wm. & Mary Bill of Rts. J. 117, 129 (1993); Fields & Hardy, supra note 7, at 81.

[20] Bell, supra note 19, at 129–30.

[21] Bell, supra note 19, at 129–30.

[22] 1 Annals of Cong. 451 (1789) (Joseph Gales ed., 1834) (statement of Rep. James Madison) ("No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor at any time, but in a manner warranted by law.").

[1] Although the United States quartered troops during both the War of 1812 and the Civil War, see Tom W. Bell, Note, The Third Amendment: Forgotten but Not Gone, 2 Wm. & Mary Bill of Rts. J. 117, 136–39 (1993), there do not appear to have been any cases alleging Third Amendment violations based on this quartering. Congress did, however, authorize compensation for damage caused by quartering during the War of 1812. See, e.g., Act of Apr. 17, 1822, ch. 22, 6 Stat. 264 (authorizing payment "for the loss of a house by fire . . . while, without the consent of the owner, it was occupied by the troops of the United States").

[2] Engblom v. Carey, 522 F. Supp. 57 (S.D.N.Y. 1981), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 677 F.2d 957 (2d Cir. 1982).

"secur[ing] the perfect enjoyment of that great right of the common law, that a man's house shall be his own castle, privileged against all civil and military intrusion."[3]

The few Supreme Court cases that mention the Third Amendment support this view. In Griswold v. Connecticut, a case involving the constitutional right to contraception, the Court included the Third Amendment as one of several constitutional guarantees with "penumbras" that "create zones of privacy."[4] Likewise, in Katz v. Connecticut, concerning the meaning of a "search" or "seizure" under the Fourth Amendment, the Court noted the Third Amendment as "another aspect of privacy from governmental intrusion."[5] Finally, in Laird v. Tatum, involving a challenge to an army surveillance program directed at civilians, the Supreme Court cited the Third Amendment as an example of "a traditional and strong resistance of Americans to any military intrusion into civilian affairs."[6]

Engblom v. Carey, the only federal appeals court case to examine the Third Amendment in depth, concerned whether the State of New York violated correction officers' Third Amendment rights when it used their state-owned residences without their consent to house members of the New York National Guard.[7] The Second Circuit recognized the Third Amendment as "designed to assure a fundamental right of privacy."[8] The court further held that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the Third Amendment and made it enforceable against the states.[9] However, the Second Circuit did not reach the issue of whether the State of New York violated the plaintiffs' Third Amendment rights because it decided the case on procedural grounds.

---

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1893 (1833); accord Warren E. Burger, Introduction, in Burnham Holmes, The American Heritage History of the Bill of Rights: The Third Amendment 6 (1991) ("[T]he Third Amendment still embodies the same basic principles: that the military must be subject to civilian control, and that the government cannot intrude into private homes without good reason."); see also Samuel F. Miller, Lectures on the Constitution of the United States (1891) (reflecting Justice Miller's view that the Third Amendment "seems to have been thought necessary" and "is so thoroughly in accord with all our ideas, that further comment is unnecessary").

[4] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 484 (1965).

[5] Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 350 n.5 (1967). For more information about Katz, see Amdt4.3.3 Katz and Reasonable Expectation of Privacy Test.

[6] Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 15 (1972).

[7] Engblom v. Carey, 677 F.2d 957, 958–59 (2d Cir. 1982).

[8] Id. at 962 (citing Griswold, 381 U.S. at 484).

[9] Id. at 961 ("[W]e agree with the district court that the Third Amendment is incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment for application to the states."); see Engblom v. Carey, 552 F. Supp. 57, 65 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) ("Here, it should not be necessary to wander too far into the thicket of incorporation jurisprudence. Under any of the theories extant . . . the right not to have troops quartered in one's home must be considered so incorporated." (internal citations omitted)). For more information on the Fourteenth Amendment's incorporation of the Bill of Rights, see Amdt14.S1.4.1 Overview of Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

FOURTH AMENDMENT
SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

FOURTH AMENDMENT
SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

TABLE OF CONTENTS

FOURTH AMENDMENT—SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

Amdt4.1 Overview of Fourth Amendment, Searches and Seizures

Informed by common law practices, the Fourth Amendment[1] protects the "full enjoyment of the rights of personal security, personal liberty, and private property"[2] by prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures. In particular, the Fourth Amendment provides that warrants must be supported by probable cause and that the person to be seized, the place to be searched, and the evidence to be sought is specified in the warrant. The Supreme Court, however, has interpreted the Fourth Amendment to allow exceptions to the warrant requirement.

Amdt4.2 Historical Background on Fourth Amendment

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Few provisions of the Bill of Rights grew so directly out of the colonial experience as the Fourth Amendment, which protects against the government's use of "writs of assistance."[1] Although it does not appear to have been discussed in political tracts published in the colonies until 1772,[2] the idea that freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures is a fundamental right had been a long-standing tenet of English political thought. "Every man's house is his castle" was a celebrated maxim in England, as demonstrated in the 1603 Semayne's Case.[3] A civil case regarding execution of process, Semayne's Case recognized the homeowner's right to defend his house against unlawful entry, even by the King's agents, and the authority of government officers to enter property upon notice in order to arrest or execute the King's process.[4] Two other landmark English cases were Entick v. Carrington[5] and Wilkes v. Wood.[6] In Wilkes, John Wilkes sued officers, challenging the legality of warrants issued against him for his political activity.[7] The court declared that the warrants amounted to "a discretionary power given to messengers to search where their suspicions may chance to fall. If such a power is

---

[1] U.S. Const. amend. IV.

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1902 (1833).

[1] See Riley v. California, 573 U.S. 373, 403 (2014) (explaining that "the Fourth Amendment was the founding generation's response to the reviled 'general warrants' and 'writs of assistance' of the colonial era, which allowed British officers to rummage through homes in an unrestrained search for evidence of criminal activity").

[2] Apparently the first statement of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures appeared in The Rights of the Colonists and a List of Infringements and Violations of Rights, 1772, which Samuel Adams took the lead in drafting. 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 199, 205–06 (1971).

[3] 5 Coke's Repts. 91a, 77 Eng. Rep. 194 (K.B. 1604). One of the most forceful expressions of the maxim was that of William Pitt in Parliament in 1763: "The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the crown. It may be frail—its roof may shake—the wind may blow through it—the storm may enter, the rain may enter—but the King of England cannot enter—all his force dares not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement."

[4] Id. at 195–96 ("In all cases when the King is party, the Sheriff (if the doors be not open) may break the party's house, either to arrest him, or to do other execution of the K.'s process, if otherwise he cannot enter. But before he breaks it, he ought to signify the cause of his coming, and to make request to open doors.").

[5] 19 Howell's State Trials 1029, 95 Eng. Rep. 807 (1765).

[6] 19 How. St. Tr. 1153, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (1763)

[7] Id. at 490. It was alleged that "Mr. Wood, with several of the King's messengers, and a constable, entered Mr. Wilkes's house; that Mr. Wood was aiding and assisting to the messengers, and gave directions concerning breaking truly invested in a Secretary of State, and he can delegate this power, it certainly may affect the person and property of every man in this kingdom, and is totally subversive of the liberty of the subject."[8] Entick v. Carrington was one of a series of civil actions against state officers who, pursuant to general warrants, had raided many homes and other places in search of materials connected with John Wilkes' polemical pamphlets attacking not only governmental policies but the King himself.[9]

Entick, an associate of Wilkes, sued because agents had forcibly broken into his house, broken into locked desks and boxes, and seized many printed charts, pamphlets, and the like.[10] In an opinion sweeping in terms, the court declared the warrant and the behavior it authorized subversive "of all the comforts of society," and the issuance of a warrant for the seizure of all of a person's papers rather than only those alleged to be criminal in nature "contrary to the genius of the law of England."[11] Besides its general character, the court said, the warrant was bad because it was not issued on a showing of probable cause and no record was required to be made of what had been seized.[12]

The Supreme Court has said that Entick v. Carrington is a "great judgment," "one of the landmarks of English liberty," "one of the permanent monuments of the British Constitution," and a guide to an understanding of what the Framers meant in writing the Fourth Amendment.[13] It is these landmark cases, the Court has noted that "the battle of individual liberty and privacy was finally won."[14]

In the colonies, smuggling rather than seditious libel afforded the leading examples of the necessity for protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. In order to enforce the revenue laws, English authorities made use of writs of assistance, which were general warrants authorizing the bearer to enter any house or other place to search for and seize "prohibited and uncustomed" goods, and command all subjects to assist in these endeavors. Once issued, the writs remained in force throughout the lifetime of the sovereign and six months thereafter. When, upon the death of George II in 1760, the authorities were required to obtain new writs, James Otis attacked such writs on libertarian grounds in 1761, asserting the authorizing statutes were invalid because they conflicted with England's constitution.[15] Otis lost and the writs were issued and used, but his arguments were much cited in the colonies not only on the immediate subject but also with regard to judicial review.

The provision that became the Fourth Amendment underwent some modest changes in Congress. James Madison's introduced version provided: "The rights to be secured in their persons, their houses, their papers, and their other property, from all unreasonable searches open Mr. Wilkes's locks, and seizing his papers . . . ." Id. at 489; see also id. at 499 ("As to the proof of what papers were taken away, the plaintiff could have no account of them; and those who were able to have given an account . . . have produced none.").

---

[8] Id. at 498.

[9] See also Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. 489 (C.P. 1763); Huckle v. Money, 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (K.B. 1763), aff'd 19 Howell's State Trials 1002, 1028, 97 Eng. Rep. 1075 (K.B. 1765).

[10] Id. at 807–08.

[11] 95 Eng. Rep. 817, 818 (1705).

[12] See Id. at 817 ("[O]ur law holds the property of every man so sacred, that no man can set his foot upon his neighbour's close without his leave; if he does he is a trespasser, though he does no damage at all; if he will tread upon his neighbour's ground, he must justify it by law.").

[13] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 626 (1886).

[14] Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476, 483 (1965).

[15] The arguments of Otis and others as well as much background material are contained in Quincy's Massachusetts Reports, 1761–1772, App. I, pp. 395–540, and in 2 Legal Papers of John Adams 106–47 (Wroth & Zobel eds., 1965). See also Dickerson, Writs of Assistance as a Cause of the American Revolution, in The Era of the American Revolution: Studies Inscribed to Evarts Boutell Greene 40 (R. Morris, ed., 1939).

and seizures, shall not be violated by warrants issued without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, or not particularly describing the places to be searched, or the persons or things to be seized."[16] As reported from committee, with an inadvertent omission corrected on the floor,[17] the section was almost identical to the introduced version. The House defeated a motion to substitute "and no warrant shall issue" for "by warrants issuing" in the committee draft. The rejected language, however, was ultimately included in the ratified constitutional provision.[18]

As noted above, the noteworthy disputes over search and seizure in England and the colonies involved the character of warrants. There were, however, lawful warrantless searches, primarily searches incident to arrest, and these apparently elicited less controversy. Thus, the question arises whether the Fourth Amendment's two clauses should be read together to mean that searches and seizures that are "reasonable" are those which meet the requirements of the second clause; that is, are searches and seizures pursuant to warrants issued under the prescribed safeguards, or whether the two clauses are independent, so that searches under warrant must comply with the second clause but that there are "reasonable" searches under the first clause that need not comply with the second clause.[19] Over time, the Court has considered the scope of the right to search incident to arrest.[20]

Amdt4.3 Scope of Protected Rights

Amdt4.3.1 Overview of Unreasonable Searches and Seizures

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. For a judge to issue a search warrant, there must be probable cause and a particularized description of what is to be searched or seized. In Harris v. United States,[1] the Supreme Court approved as "reasonable" the warrantless search of a four-room apartment pursuant to the arrest of the man found

[16] 1 Annals of Congress 434–35 (June 8, 1789).

[17] The word "secured" was changed to "secure" and the phrase "against unreasonable searches and seizures" was reinstated. Id. at 754 (August 17, 1789).

[18] Id. It has been theorized that the author of the defeated revision, who was chairman of the committee appointed to arrange the amendments prior to House passage, simply inserted his provision and that it passed unnoticed. N. Lasson, The History and Development of The Fourth Amendment to The United States Constitution 101–03 (1937).

[19] The amendment was originally in one clause as quoted above; it was the insertion of the defeated amendment to the language which changed the text into two clauses and arguably had the effect of extending the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures beyond the requirements imposed on the issuance of warrants. It is also possible to read the two clauses together to mean that some seizures even under warrants would be unreasonable, and this reading has indeed been effectuated in certain cases, although for independent reasons. Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886); Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921), overruled by Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967); but see id. at 303 (reserving the question whether "there are items of evidential value whose very nature precludes them from being the object of a reasonable search and seizure.")

[20] Approval of warrantless searches pursuant to arrest first appeared in dicta in several cases. Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 392 (1914); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 158 (1925); Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 30 (1925). Whether or not there is to be a rule or a principle generally preferring or requiring searches pursuant to warrant to warrantless searches, however, has ramifications far beyond the issue of searches pursuant to arrest. See e.g., United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 319–20 (1972).

[1] 331 U.S. 145 (1947).

there. A year later, the Court's majority set aside a conviction based on evidence seized during a warrantless search pursuant to an arrest and adopted the "cardinal rule that, in seizing goods and articles, law enforcement agents must secure and use search warrants wherever reasonably practicable."[2]

This rule was set aside two years later, when the Court held that the test "is not whether it is reasonable to procure a search warrant, but whether the search was reasonable."[3] Whether a search is reasonable, the Court said, "must find resolution in the facts and circumstances of each case."[4] The Court, however, returned to its emphasis upon a warrant in Chimel v. California.[5] In Chimel, the Court held that "[t]he [Fourth] Amendment was in large part a reaction to the general warrants and warrantless searches that had so alienated the colonists and had helped speed the movement for independence. In the scheme of the Amendment, therefore, the requirement that 'no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause,' plays a crucial part."[6] Therefore, the Court explained, "the police must, whenever practicable, obtain advance judicial approval of searches and seizures through a warrant procedure."[7] Search warrant exceptions would depend on the rationale for the exception, and the scope of such a search would be similarly limited.[8]

During the 1970s, the Court was closely divided on which standard to apply.[9] For a while, the Court adopted the view that warrantless searches were per se unreasonable, with a few carefully prescribed exceptions.[10] Gradually, however, guided by the variable-expectation-of-privacy approach to the Fourth Amendment's coverage, the Court broadened its view of permissible exceptions and the scope of those exceptions.[11] In 1991, the Court held that "[t]he

---

[2] Trupiano v. United States, 334 U.S. 699, 705 (1948). See also McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451 (1948).

[3] United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56, 66 (1950).

[4] Id. at 63.

[5] 395 U.S. 752 (1969).

[6] Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 761 (1969)

[7] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 20 (1968). In United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 321 (1972), Justice Lewis Powell explained that the "very heart" of the Fourth Amendment's mandate is "that where practical, a governmental search and seizure should represent both the efforts of the officer to gather evidence of wrongful acts and the judgment of the magistrate that the collected evidence is sufficient to justify invasion of a citizen's private premises or conversation." Thus, what is "reasonable" in terms of a search and seizure depends on the warrant. Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 473–84 (1971). See also Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721, 728 (1969); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 356–58 (1967); Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 299 (1967).

[8] Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 762–64 (1969) (limiting scope of search incident to arrest). See also United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972) (rejecting argument that it was "reasonable" to allow President through Attorney General to authorize warrantless electronic surveillance of persons thought to be endangering the national security); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967) (although officers acted with great self-restraint and reasonably in engaging in electronic seizures of conversations from a telephone booth, a magistrate's antecedent judgment was required); Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964) (warrantless search of seized automobile not justified because not within rationale of exceptions to warrant clause). There were exceptions, e.g., Cooper v. California, 386 U.S. 58 (1967) (warrantless search of impounded car was reasonable); United States v. Harris, 390 U.S. 234 (1968) (warrantless inventory search of automobile).

[9] See, e.g., Almighty-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266 (1973), Justices Potter Stewart, William O. Douglas, William Brennan, and Thurgood Marshall adhered to the warrant-based rule, while Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, and William Rehnquist, and Chief Justice Warren Burger placed greater emphasis upon whether the search was reasonable. Id. at 285. Justice Lewis Powell generally agreed with the former group of Justices, id. at 275 (concurring).

[10] E.g., G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 352–53 (1977) (unanimous); Marshall v. Barrow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 312 (1978); Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 506 (1978); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 390 (1978) (unanimous); Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 824–25 (1982).

[11] E.g., Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970) (warrantless search of automobile taken to police station); Texas v. White, 423 U.S. 67 (1975) (same); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981) (search of vehicle incident to arrest); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982) (automobile search at scene); Brigham City, Utah v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398 (2006) (warrantless entry into a home when police have an objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant is touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness," and that the Amendment "merely proscribes [state-initiated searches and seizures] which are unreasonable."[12] By 1992, the "reasonableness" approach prevailed over the "warrants-with-narrow-exceptions" standard.[13] The Court held that "reasonableness, in turn, is measured in objective terms by examining the totality of the circumstances," and the Court had "consistently eschewed bright-lines rules."[14] Since the 1990s, the Court has recognized more exceptions to the warrant requirement, tending to confine the warrant requirement to cases that are exclusively "criminal" in nature. Furthermore, even within that core area of "criminal" cases, the Court broadened some exceptions. Nevertheless, throughout the years, the Court has grappled with what constitutes a search[15] or a seizure,[16] what does it mean to establish probable cause,[17] when are warrants necessary,[18] and what are the various exceptions to the warrant requirement.

Administrative searches justified by "special needs beyond the normal need for law enforcement" are the most important exception to the warrant requirement.[19] Under this general rubric the Court has upheld warrantless searches by administrative authorities in public schools,[20] government offices,[21] and prisons,[22] and drug testing of public and transportation employees.[23] In all of these instances, the warrant and probable cause requirements are dispensed with in favor of a reasonableness standard that balances the government's regulatory interest against the individual's privacy interest. The breadth of the administrative search exception is shown by the fact overlapping law enforcement objectives seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury); Michigan v. Fisher, 558 U.S., No. 09-91 (2009) (applying Brigham City). On the other hand, the warrant-based standard did preclude a number of warrantless searches. E.g., Almighty-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266 (1973) (warrantless stop and search of auto by roving patrol near border); Marshall v. Barrow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307 (1978) (warrantless administrative inspection of business premises); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978) (warrantless search of home that was "homicide scene"); Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S., No. 07-542 (2009) (search of vehicle incident to arrest where arrestee had no access to vehicle).

---

[12] Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 250 (1991).

[13] Of the Justices on the Court in 1992, only Justice John Paul Stevens frequently sided with the warrants-with-narrow-exceptions approach. See, e.g., Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 189 (1990) (Marshall, J., dissenting joined by Stevens, J.); New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 370 (1985) (Stevens, J., dissenting); California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565, 585 (1991) (Stevens, J., dissenting).

[14] Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39 (1996).

[15] See e.g., Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351–52 (1967) ("What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection. But what he seeks to preserve as private, even in an area accessible to the public, may be constitutionally protected.").

[16] See e.g., Torres v. Madrid, No. 19-292, slip op. at 3 (U.S. March 25, 2021) ("The 'seizure' of a 'person' plainly refers to an arrest."); see also Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); but see Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 304 (1967) (explaining the Court's "shift in emphasis from property to privacy ha[d] come about through a subtle interplay of substantive and procedural reform").

[17] See e.g., Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98, 102 (1959) ("Probable cause exists if the facts and circumstances known to the officer warrant a prudent man in believing that the offense has been committed.)".

[18] See e.g., Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 20 (1968) ("[T]he police must, whenever practicable, obtain advance judicial approval of searches and seizures through the warrant procedure.").

[19] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 351 (1985) (Blackmun, J., concurring).

[20] Id. at 341 (holding that "the accommodation of the privacy interests of schoolchildren with the substantial need of teachers and administrators for freedom to maintain order in the schools does not require strict adherence to the requirement that searches be based on probable cause to believe that the subject of the search has violated or is violating the law").

[21] See O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 724–25 (1987) (holding that "a probable cause requirement" for searches conducted to work-related investigations "would impose intolerable burdens on public employers").

[22] See Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526 (1984) (explaining that a prisoner has no expectation of privacy and, accordingly, "the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches does not apply within the confines of the prison cell").

[23] See Skinner v. Ry. Labor Exec. Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 614 (1989); Nat'l Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656, 672 (1989) and administrative "special needs" do not require a warrant; instead, the Court has upheld warrantless inspection of automobile junkyards and dismantling operations in spite of the strong law enforcement component of the regulation.[24]

Although search warrants are generally required in law enforcement contexts, the Court has relaxed this requirement. For example, the Court expanded the scope of valid "incident to arrest" searches from areas within the immediate reach of the arrested suspect to a "protective sweep" of the entire home, if arresting officers have a "reasonable" belief that the home harbors an individual who may pose a danger.[25] The Court has also recognized that exigent circumstances may justify officers performing a blood test on a motorist without a warrant to determine his or her blood alcohol concentration (BAC).[26] In another case, the Court shifted its focus from whether exigent circumstances justified an officer's failure to obtain a warrant, to whether an officer had a "reasonable" belief that the circumstances constituted an exception to the warrant requirement.[27] The Court has also held exigent circumstances merited an exception even if police conduct had caused the exigency, so long as the police conduct was "reasonable" in that it neither threatened to violate nor violated the Fourth Amendment.[28]

The Court has addressed the Fourth Amendment's scope with respect to whom the Fourth Amendment protects; that is, who constitutes "the people," reasoning that it "refers to a class of persons who are part of a national community or who have otherwise developed sufficient connection with [the United States] to be considered part of that community."[29] The Fourth Amendment therefore does not apply to the search and seizure by United States agents of property that is owned by a nonresident alien and located in a foreign country.[30] The community of protected people includes U.S. citizens who go abroad, and aliens who have voluntarily entered U.S. territory and developed substantial connections with this country.[31] There is no resulting broad principle, however, that the Fourth Amendment constrains federal officials wherever and against whomever they act.

Amdt4.3.2 Early Doctrine on Fourth Amendment

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but

[24] New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691 (1987).

[25] Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990).

[26] See Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 156 (2013) (rejecting a per se exception to the warrant requirement for BAC blood testing in suspected "drunk-driving" cases and requiring that exigent circumstances be evaluated under a "totality of the circumstances" test). Cf. Mitchell v. Wisconsin, No. 18-6210, (U.S. June 27, 2019) (plurality opinion) (declining to "revisit" the rule established in McNeely but concluding that in circumstances involving unconscious drivers, where a breath test for BAC cannot be performed, exigent circumstances generally exist to take a warrantless blood test).

[27] Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990).

[28] Kentucky v. King, 563 U.S. 452 (2011) (police justified in entering apartment after smelling burning marijuana in a hallway, knocking on apartment door, and hearing noises consistent with evidence being destroyed).

[29] United States v. Vertigo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 265 (1990).

[30] Id. at 266 ("[T]he purpose of the Fourth Amendment was to protect the people of the United States against arbitrary action by their own Government; it was never suggested that the provision was intended to restrain the actions of the Federal Government against aliens outside of the United States territory.")

[31] Id. at 271–72.

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

For the Fourth Amendment to apply, there must be a "search" and "seizure" with a subsequent attempt to use what was seized judicially.[1] Whether a search and seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment has occurred, and whether a complainant's interests were constitutionally infringed, often turns upon the complainant's interest and whether the government officially abused it. In Entick v. Carrington, Lord Camden summarized British law on searches and seizures, writing:

> The great end for which men entered in society was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole. . . . By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set foot upon my ground without my license but he is liable to an action though the damage be nothing . . . .[2]

The Court's view of the Fourth Amendment as protecting property interests[3] has informed its approach in numerous cases.[4] For example, in Olmstead v. United States,[5] the Court noted that the Fourth Amendment did not cover wiretapping because the defendant's premises had not been physically invaded; the Court determined, however, that where there was an invasion—a technical trespass—the Fourth Amendment applied to electronic surveillance.[6]

With the invention of the microphone, telephone, and dictagraph recorder, government officers could "eavesdrop" with much greater secrecy and expediency. Inevitably, the use of electronic devices in law enforcement was challenged, and in 1928 the Court reviewed convictions obtained based on evidence gained by taps on telephone wires in violation of state law. On a 5-4 vote, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not cover wiretapping.[7] Writing for the Court, Chief Justice William Taft relied on two lines of argument for the conclusion. First, because the Fourth Amendment was designed to protect one's property interest in one's premises, there was no search so long as there was no physical trespass on premises owned or controlled by the defendant.[8] Second, the government had obtained all the evidence by listening, but intercepting a conversation could not qualify as a seizure because [1] See, e.g., California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626 (1991) (explaining that, because there was no "seizure" of the defendant as he fled from police before being tackled, the drugs that he abandoned in flight could not be excluded as the fruits of an unreasonable seizure).

---

[2] 19 Howell's State Trials 1029, 1035, 95 Eng. Reg. 807, 817–18 (1765).

[3] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 627 (1886); Adams v. New York, 192 U.S. 585, 598 (1904).

[4] Thus, the rule that "mere evidence" cannot be seized but only the fruits of crime, its instrumentalities, or contraband, turned upon the public's right to possess the materials or the police power to make possession unlawful. Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921), overruled by Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967). See also Davis v. United States, 328 U.S. 582 (1946). Standing to contest unlawful searches and seizures was based upon property interests, United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48 (1951); Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), as well as upon the validity of a consent to search. Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961); Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964); Frazier v. Culp, 394 U.S. 731, 740 (1969).

[5] 277 U.S. 438 (1928). See also Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129, 135 (1942) (holding that a detectaphone placed against wall of adjoining room did not constitute a search or a seizure).

[6] Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505, 509–10 (1961) (holding that a "spike mike" pushed through a party wall until it hit a heating duct by police officers violated the Fourth Amendment, and conversations overheard by the officers were inadmissible).

[7] Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928).

[8] Id. at 464–65.

the Fourth Amendment referred only to seizing tangible items.[9] Finally, violating state law did not render the evidence excludable, since the exclusionary rule operated only on evidence seized in violation of the Constitution.[10]

Six years after Olmstead, Congress enacted the Federal Communications Act (FCA). FCA Section 605 included a broadly worded proscription which the Court viewed as limiting governmental wiretapping.[11] Thus, in Nardone v. United States,[12] the Court held that wiretapping by federal officers could violate Section 605 if the officers both intercepted and divulged the contents of conversation they overheard, and that testimony in court would constitute a form of prohibited divulgence. Such evidence was therefore excluded, although wiretapping was not illegal under the Court's interpretation if the information was not used outside the governmental agency. Because Section 605 applied to intrastate as well as interstate transmissions,[13] the ban appeared intended to govern state police officers, but the Court declined to apply either the statute or the due process clause to exclude such evidence from state criminal trials.[14] The Court held that state efforts to legalize wiretapping pursuant to court orders to be precluded because Congress had intended to occupy the field completely through Section 605.[15]

The Court used Olmstead's trespass rationale in cases concerning "bugging" premises rather than tapping telephones. Thus, in Goldman v. United States,[16] the Court found no Fourth Amendment violation when a listening device was placed against a party wall in order to overhear conversations on the other side. But when officers drove a "spike mike" into a party wall until it came into contact with a heating duct and thus broadcast defendant's conversations, the Court determined that the trespass brought the case within the Fourth Amendment.[17] In so holding, the Court overruled, in effect, Olmstead's second rationale that conversations could not be seized.

---

[9] Id. at 464.

[10] Among the dissenters were Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who characterized "illegal" wiretapping as "dirty business," 277 U.S. at 470, and Justice Louis Brandeis. Id. at 485.

[11] Ch. 652, 48 Stat. 1103 (1934), providing, inter alia, that "no person not being authorized by the sender shall intercept any communication and divulge or publish the existence, contents, purport, effect, or meaning of such intercepted communication to any person." The legislative history did not indicate what Congress had in mind in including this language. The section, which appeared at 47 U.S.C. § 605, was rewritten by Title III of the Omnibus Crime Act of 1968, 82 Stat. 22, § 803, so that the "regulation of the interception of wire or oral communications in the future is to be governed by" the provisions of Title III. S. Rep. No. 1097, 90th Cong., 2d Sess. 107–08 (1968).

[12] 302 U.S. 379 (1937). Derivative evidence—evidence discovered as a result of information obtained through a wiretap—was similarly inadmissible (Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338 (1939)) although the testimony of witnesses might be obtained by exploiting wiretap information. Goldstein v. United States, 316 U.S. 114 (1942). Eavesdropping on a conversation on an extension telephone with the consent of one of the parties did not violate the statute. Rathbun v. United States, 355 U.S. 107 (1957).

[13] Weiss v. United States, 308 U.S. 321 (1939).

[14] Schwartz v. Texas, 344 U.S. 199 (1952). At this time, evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment could be admitted in state courts. Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949). Although Wolf was overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), it was some seven years later and after wiretapping itself had been made subject to the Fourth Amendment that *Schwartz*was overruled in Lee v. Florida, 392 U.S. 378 (1968).

[15] Bananti v. United States 355 U.S. 96 (1957).

[16] 316 U.S. 129 (1942).

[17] Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961). See also Clinton v. Virginia, 377 U.S. 158 (1964) (physical trespass found with regard to amplifying device stuck in a partition wall with a thumb tack).

Amdt4.3.3 Katz and Reasonable Expectation of Privacy Test

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Following Olmstead v. United States and Goldman v. United States, the Court determined in May 1967 that "[t]he premise that property interests control the right of the government to search and seize has been discredited" and that "the principal object of the Fourth Amendment is the protection of privacy rather than property."[1] Overruling Olmstead and Goldman in December 1967, the Court dispensed with the requirement of actual physical trespass because the Fourth Amendment "protects people, not places" to make electronic surveillance subject to the Amendment's requirements.[2]

The test, the Court propounded in Katz v. United States, examined the expectation of privacy upon which one may "justifiably" rely.[3] The Court stated: "What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection. But what he seeks to preserve as private, even in an area accessible to the public, may be constitutionally protected."[4] That is, the "capacity to claim the protection of the Amendment depends not upon a property right in the invaded place but upon whether the area was one in which there was reasonable expectation of freedom from governmental intrusion."[5]

In Kyllo v. United States,[6] the Court revitalized Katz's focus on privacy when it invalidated the warrantless use of a thermal imaging device directed at a private home from a public street. To limit police use of new technology that can "shrink the realm of guaranteed privacy," the Court stated that "obtaining by sense-enhancing technology any information regarding the interior of the home that could not otherwise have been obtained without physical 'intrusion into a constitutionally protected area' . . . constitutes a search—at least where (as here) the technology in question is not in general public use."[7] Relying on Katz, the Court rejected as

---

[1] Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 304 (1967).

[2] Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 353 (1967) (warrantless use of listening and recording device placed on outside of phone booth violates Fourth Amendment). See also Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 32–33 (2001) (holding presumptively unreasonable the warrantless use of a thermal imaging device to detect activity within a home by measuring heat outside the home, and noting that a contrary holding would permit developments in police technology "to erode the privacy guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment."

[3] 389 U.S. at 353. Justice John Harlan, concurring, formulated a two pronged test for determining whether the privacy interest is paramount: "first that a person have exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy and, second, that the expectation be one that society is prepared to recognize as 'reasonable.'" Id. at 361.

[4] 389 U.S. at 351–52.

[5] Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 368 (1968) (official had a reasonable expectation of privacy in an office he shared with others, although he owned neither the premises nor the papers seized). Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91 (1990) (overnight guest in home has a reasonable expectation of privacy). But cf. Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83 (1998) (a person present in someone else's apartment for only a few hours for the purpose of bagging cocaine for later sale has no legitimate expectation of privacy); Cf. Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978) (auto passengers demonstrated no legitimate expectation of privacy in glove compartment or under seat of auto). The Fourth Amendment protects property rights however. A "seizure" of property can occur when there is some meaningful interference with an individual's possessory interests in that property, and regardless of whether there is any interference with the individual's privacy interest. Soldal v. Cook County, 506 U.S. 56 (1992) (a seizure occurred when sheriff's deputies assisted in the disconnection and removal of a mobile home in the course of an eviction from a mobile home park). The reasonableness of a seizure, however, is an additional issue that may still hinge on privacy interests. United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 120–21 (1984) (DEA agents reasonably seized package for examination after private mail carrier had opened the damaged package for inspection, discovered presence of contraband, and informed agents).

[6] 533 U.S. 27 (2001).

[7] 533 U.S. at 34.

"mechanical" the Government's attempted distinction between off-the-wall and through-the-wall surveillance. Permitting all off-the-wall observations, the Court observed, "would leave the homeowner at the mercy of advancing technology—including technology that could discern all human activity in the home." To some extent, the Court grounded its concern about privacy expectations in "Founding-era understandings,"[8] explaining that the Fourth Amendment "seeks to secure 'the privacies of life' against 'arbitrary power,'"[9] and that "a central aim of the Framers was 'to place obstacles in the way of a too permeating police surveillance.'"[10]

Although the Court strongly reaffirmed the sanctity of the home, protection of privacy in other contexts became more problematic. A two-part test that Justice John Harlan suggested in Katz often provided a starting point for analysis.[11] The first element, the "subjective expectation" of privacy, has largely dwindled as a viable standard, because, as Justice John Harlan noted in a subsequent case, "our expectations, and the risks we assume, are in large part reflections of laws that translate into rules the customs and values of the past and present."[12] As for the second element, whether one has a "legitimate" expectation of privacy that society finds "reasonable" to recognize, the Court has said that "[l]egitimation of expectations of privacy by law must have a source outside of the Fourth Amendment, either by reference to concepts of real or personal property law or to understandings that are recognized and permitted by society."[13]

Thus, protecting the home is at the apex of Fourth Amendment coverage because of the right associated with ownership to exclude others;[14] but ownership of other things, that is, automobiles, does not carry a similar high degree of protection.[15] The Court usually considers whether a person has taken normal precautions to maintain his privacy—that is, precautions customarily taken by those seeking to exclude others—to be significant when determining legitimacy of expectation.[16] On the other hand, the Court has held that "a person has no legitimate expectation of privacy in information he voluntarily provides to third parties."[17]

---

[8] Carpenter v. United States, No. 16-402, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 22, 2018).

[9] Id. (quoting Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1886)).

[10] Id. (quoting United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S. 581, 595 (1948)).

[11] Justice John Harlan's opinion has been much relied upon. See, e.g., Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 19 (1968); Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 143–144 n.12 (1978); Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 740–41 (1979); United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 91–92 (1980); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 105–06 (1980); Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334, 338 (2000).

[12] United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745, 786 (1971). See Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 740 n.5 (1979) (government could not condition "subjective expectations" by, say, announcing that henceforth all homes would be subject to warrantless entry, and thus destroy the "legitimate expectation of privacy").

[13] Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 144 n.12 (1978).

[14] E.g., Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165 (1969); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 31 (2001).

[15] E.g., United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982). See also Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594 (1981) (commercial premises); Maryland v. Macon, 472 U.S. 463 (1985) (no legitimate expectation of privacy in denying to undercover officers allegedly obscene materials offered to public in bookstore).

[16] E.g., United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 11 (1977); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 352 (1967). But cf. South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976) (no legitimate expectation of privacy in automobile left with doors locked and windows rolled up). In Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980), the fact that the defendant had dumped a cache of drugs into his companion's purse, having known her for only a few days and knowing others had access to the purse, was taken to establish that he had no legitimate expectation the purse would be free from intrusion.

[17] Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 74344 (1979). See also United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 442 (1976). Concurring in United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 400 (2012), Justice Sonia Sotomayor questioned the continuing viability of this principle in "the digital age, in which people reveal a great deal of information about themselves to third parties in the course of carrying out mundane tasks." Id. at 417 (Sotomayor, J., concurring). Relying on this concurrence, the Carpenter Court recognized a limit to the third-party doctrine when it "decline[d] to extend Smith and Miller" to "the qualitatively different category of cell-site records." Carpenter, slip op. at 11. The Court noted that this data provides

Some expectations, the Court has held, are simply not among those that society is prepared to accept.[18] In the context of rapidly evolving communications devices, the Court was reluctant to consider "the whole concept of privacy expectations," preferring other decisional grounds. The Court stated: "The judiciary risks error by elaborating too fully on the Fourth Amendment implications of emerging technology before its role in society has become clear."[19]

The Court's balancing standard required "an assessing of the nature of a particular practice and the likely extent of its impact on the individual's sense of security balanced against the utility of the conduct as a technique of law enforcement." Whereas Justice John Harlan saw a greater need to restrain police officers from intruding on individual privacy through the warrant requirement,[20] the Court's solicitude for law enforcement may have provided a counterbalance.

Weighing law enforcement investigative needs[21] and privacy interests led the Court to apply a two-tier or sliding-tier scale of privacy interests. The Court originally designed the privacy test to determine whether the Fourth Amendment protected an interest.[22] If so, then ordinarily a warrant was required, subject only to narrowly defined exceptions, and the scope of the search was "strictly tied to and justified by the circumstances which rendered its initiation permissible."[23] The Court used the test to determine whether the interest invaded is important or persuasive enough to require a warrant;[24] if the individual has a lesser expectation of privacy, then the invasion may be justified, absent a warrant, by the reasonableness of the intrusion.[25] Exceptions to the warrant requirement are no longer evaluated solely by the justifications for the exception, for example, exigent circumstances, and

---

"an all-encompassing record of the [cell phone] holder's whereabouts," tracking "nearly exactly the movements of [the cell phone's] owner" and operating both prospectively and retroactively. Id. at 2217–18. Instead, the Court held that "an individual maintains a legitimate expectation of privacy in the record of his physical movements as captured through" cell-site location information. Id. at 2217.

[18] E.g., United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976) (bank records); Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979) (numbers dialed from one's telephone); Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984) (prison cell); Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765 (1983) (shipping container opened and inspected by customs agents and resealed and delivered to the addressee); California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988) (garbage in sealed plastic bags left at curb for collection).

[19] City of Ontario v. Quon, 560 U.S. 746, 759 (2010). The Court cautioned that "[a] broad holding concerning employees' privacy expectations vis-a-vis employer-provided technological equipment might have implications for future cases that cannot be predicted." Id. at 760.

[20] United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745, 786–87 (1971) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

[21] E.g., Robbins v. California, 453 U.S. 420, 429, 433–34 (1981) (Powell, J., concurring), quoted with approval in United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 815–16 & n.21 (1982), [22] Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351–52 (1967).

[23] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 19 (1968).

[24] The prime example is the home, so that for entries either to search or to arrest, "the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant." Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 590 (1980); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 212 (1981); Kirk v. Louisiana, 536 U.S. 635 (2002) (per curiam). See also Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978). Privacy in the home is not limited to intimate matters. "In the home all details are intimate details, because the entire area is held safe from prying government eyes." Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 37 (2001).

[25] One has a diminished expectation of privacy in automobiles. Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753, 761 (1979) (collecting cases); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 804–09 (1982). A person's expectation of privacy in personal luggage and other closed containers is substantially greater than in an automobile, United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 13 (1977); Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979), although, if the luggage or container is found in an automobile as to which there exists probable cause to search, the legitimate expectancy diminishes accordingly. United States v. Ross, supra. There is also a diminished expectation of privacy in a mobile home parked in a parking lot and licensed for vehicular travel. California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386 (1985) (leaving open the question of whether the automobile exception also applies to a "mobile" home being used as a residence and not adapted for immediate vehicular use).

the scope of the search is no longer tied to and limited by the justification for the exception.[26] The result has been a considerable expansion, beyond what existed prior to Katz, of the power of police and other authorities to conduct searches.

In Berger v. New York,[27] the Court confirmed the obsolescence of the alternative holding in Olmstead that conversations could not be seized in the Fourth Amendment sense.[28] Berger held unconstitutional on its face a state eavesdropping statute under which judges were authorized to issue warrants permitting police officers to trespass on private premises to install listening devices. The warrants were to be issued upon a showing of "reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime may be thus obtained, and particularly describing the person or persons whose communications, conversations or discussions are to be overheard or recorded."[29] For the five-Justice majority, Justice Tom Clark invalidated the statute, explaining that wiretapping is a search and seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and, as such, there must be a showing of probable cause and the warrant must particularly describe the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized, disallowing "general warrants."[30]

Amdt4.3.4 Current Doctrine on Searches and Seizures

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In United States v. Jones,[1] the Court seemed to revitalize the significance of governmental trespass in determining whether a Fourth Amendment search has occurred. In Jones, the Court considered whether the attachment of a Global Positioning System (GPS) device to a car used by a suspected narcotics dealer and the monitoring of such device for twenty-eight days, constituted a search. Although the Court ruled unanimously that this month-long monitoring violated Jones's rights, it splintered on the reasoning. A majority of the Court relied on the theory of common law trespass to find that attaching the device to the car represented a physical intrusion into Jones's constitutionally protected "effect" or private property.[2] While [26] E.g., Texas v. White, 423 U.S. 67 (1975) (if probable cause to search automobile existed at scene, it can be removed to station and searched without warrant); United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973) (once an arrest has been validly made, search pursuant thereto is so minimally intrusive in addition that scope of search is not limited by necessity of security of officer); United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974) (incarcerated suspect; officers need no warrant to take his clothes for test because little additional intrusion). But see Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979) (officers on premises to execute search warrant of premises may not without more search persons found on premises).

[27] 388 U.S. 41 (1967).

[28] Id. at 50–53.

[29] Id. at 54.

[30] Id. at 58.

[1] 565 U.S. 400 (2012).

[2] Id. at 403–07. The physical trespass analysis was reprised in subsequent opinions. In its 2013 decision in Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013), the Court assessed whether a law enforcement officer had the legal authority to conduct a drug sniff with a trained canine on the front porch of a suspect's home. Reviewing the law of trespass, the Court observed that visitors to a home, including the police, must have either explicit or implicit authority from the homeowner to enter upon and engage in various activities in the curtilage (that is, the area immediately surrounding the home). Finding that the use of the dog to find incriminating evidence exceeded "background social norms" of what a visitor is normally permitted to do on another's property, the Court held that the drug sniff constituted a search. 569 U.S. 1, 7–10 (2013). Similarly, in its 2015 per curiam opinion in Grady v. North Carolina, the Court emphasized the "physical intru[sion]" on a person when it found that attaching a device to a person's body, without consent, for the

this holding obviated the need to assess the month-long tracking under Katz's reasonable expectation of privacy test, five Justices, who concurred either with the majority opinion or concurred with the judgment, would have held that long-term GPS tracking can implicate an individual's expectation of privacy.[3] Some have read these concurrences as partly premised on the idea that while government access to a small data set—for example, one trip in a vehicle—might not violate one's expectation of privacy, aggregating a month's worth of personal data allows the government to create a "mosaic" about an individual's personal life that violates that individual's reasonable expectation of privacy.[4]

The Court confirmed in Carpenter v. United States that the Fourth Amendment is implicated when government action violates individuals' "reasonable expectation of privacy in the whole of their physical movements," regardless of whether the challenged conduct constitutes a physical trespass.[5] The Court held that the > government could not, without a warrant, access seven days of a defendant's cell-site location information, which is data that continuously tracks the location of a cell phone.[6] Observing that "historical cell-site records present even greater privacy concerns than the GPS monitoring of a vehicle we considered in Jones," the Court highlighted the continuing importance of the expectations-of-privacy test.[7] The Court acknowledged that it had previously declined to extend Fourth Amendment protection to information that a person had voluntarily given to a third party like a wireless carrier, but declined to extend that line of cases to "the qualitatively different category of cell-site records."[8]

Amdt4.3.5 Open Fields Doctrine

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but purpose of tracking the person's movements, constitutes a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. 575 U.S. 306, 309–11 (2015). Neither the majority in Jardines nor the Court in Grady addressed whether the challenged conduct violates a reasonable expectation of privacy under Katz v. United States. Grady, 575 U.S. at 309–19; Jardines, 569 U.S. at 10–12.

---

[3] Jones, 565 U.S. at 400, 431 (Alito, J., concurring in the judgment, joined by Ginsburg, Breyer, Kagan, JJ.) (concluding that respondent's reasonable expectations of privacy were violated by the long-term monitoring of the movements of the respondent's vehicle); id. at 415 (Sotomayor, J., concurring) (disagreeing with Justice Samuel Alito's "approach" to the specific case but agreeing "longer term GPS monitoring in investigations of most offenses impinges on expectations of privacy.").

[4] See, e.g., In re Application for Telephone Information Needed for a Criminal Investigation, 119 F. Supp. 3d 1011, 1021–22 (N.D. Cal. 2015) (discussing the import of the two concurring opinions from Jones); United States v. Brooks, 911 F. Supp. 2d 836, 842 (D. Ariz. 2012) (noting that "[w]hile it does appear that in some future case, a five justice 'majority' is willing to accept the principle that Government surveillance can implicate an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy over time, Jones does not dictate the result of the case at hand . . . "); but see United States v. Graham, 824 F.3d 421, 435–36 (4th Cir. 2016) (arguing that Justice Samuel Alito's Jones concurrence should be read more narrowly so as to not implicate government access to information collected by third-party actors, no matter the quantity of information collected); In re Application of FBI, No. BR 14– 01, 2014 WL 5463097, at *10 (FISA Ct. Mar. 20, 2014) ("While the concurring opinions in Jones may signal that some or even most of the Justices are ready to revisit certain settled Fourth Amendment principles, the decision in Jones itself breaks no new ground . . . .").

[5] No. 16-402, slip op. at 12 (U.S. June 22, 2018).

[6] Id. at 11–12.

[7] Id. at 13.

[8] Id. at 11.

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In Hester v. United States,[1] the Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not protect "open fields" and that, therefore, police searches in such areas as pastures, wooded areas, open water, and vacant lots need not comply with the requirements of warrants and probable cause. The Court's announcement in Katz v. United States[2] that the Amendment protects "people not places" cast some doubt on the vitality of the open fields principle, but all such doubts were cast away in Oliver v. United States.[3] Invoking Hester's reliance on the literal wording of the Fourth Amendment (open fields are not "effects") and distinguishing Katz, the Court in Oliver ruled that the open fields exception applies to fields that are fenced and posted. The Court held that "an individual may not legitimately demand privacy for activities conducted out of doors in fields, except in the area immediately surrounding the home."[4] The Court further explained that an individual may not demand privacy for activities conducted within outbuildings and visible by trespassers peering into the buildings from just outside.[5] Even within the curtilage and notwithstanding that the owner has gone to the extreme of erecting a ten foot high fence in order to screen the area from ground-level view, there is no reasonable expectation of privacy from naked-eye inspection from fixed-wing aircraft flying in navigable airspace.[6] Similarly, naked-eye inspection from helicopters flying even lower contravenes no reasonable expectation of privacy.[7] Furthermore, aerial photography of commercial facilities secured from ground-level public view is permissible, the Court finding such spaces more analogous to open fields than to the curtilage of a dwelling.[8]

Amdt4.3.6 Seizure of Property

Amdt4.3.6.1 Inspections

Fourth Amendment:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but

---

[1] 265 U.S. 57 (1924). See also Air Pollution Variance Bd. v. Western Alfalfa Corp., 416 U.S. 86 (1974).

[2] 389 U.S. 347, 353 (1967). Cf. Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 450 (1973) (citing Hester approvingly).

[3] 466 U.S. 170 (1984) (approving warrantless intrusion past no trespassing signs and around locked gate, to view field not visible from outside property).

[4] 466 U.S. at 178. See also California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988) (approving warrantless search of garbage left curbside "readily accessible to animals, children, scavengers, snoops, and other members of the public").

[5] United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987) (determining that space immediately outside a barn, accessible only after crossing a series of "ranch-style" fences and situated one-half mile from the public road, constitutes unprotected "open field").

[6] California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986). Activities within the curtilage are nonetheless still entitled to some Fourth Amendment protection. The Court has described four considerations for determining whether an area falls within the curtilage: proximity to the home, whether the area is included within an enclosure also surrounding the home, the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and the steps taken by the resident to shield the area from view of passersby. See California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35, 37 (1988) (holding that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit warrantless searches and seizures of garbage left for collection outside the curtilage of a home); United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987) (barn 50 yards outside of fence surrounding home, used for processing chemicals, and separated from public access only by a series of livestock fences, by a chained and locked driveway, and by one-half mile's distance, is not within curtilage). See also Collins v. Virginia, No. 16-1027, slip op. at 6 (U.S. May 2018) ("Just like the front porch, side garden, or area 'outside the front window,' the driveway enclosure where Officer Rhodes searched the motorcycle . . . is properly considered curtilage." (quoting Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 6 (2013))).

[7] Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445, 451–52 (1989) (holding that a view through partially open roof of greenhouse did not constitute a "search" requiring a warrant).

[8] Dow Chemical Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227, 233–35 (1986) (suggesting that aerial photography of the curtilage would be impermissible).

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Certain early cases held that the Fourth Amendment applied only when a search was undertaken for criminal investigatory purposes,[1] and the Supreme Court initially employed a reasonableness test for such searches without requiring either a warrant or probable cause in the absence of a warrant.[2] But, in 1967, the Court held in Camara v. Municipal Court and See v. City of Seattle that administrative inspections to detect building code violations require warrants if the occupant objects.[3] The Supreme Court stated, "We may agree that a routine inspection of the physical condition of private property is a less hostile intrusion than the typical policeman's search for the fruits and instrumentalities of crime. . . . But we cannot agree that the Fourth Amendment interests at stake in these inspection cases are merely 'peripheral.' It is surely anomalous to say that the individual and his private property are fully protected by the Fourth Amendment only when the individual is suspected of criminal behavior."[4] In 1970 and 1972, however, the Supreme Court ruled certain administrative inspections used to enforce regulatory schemes with regard to alcohol and firearms, respectively, to be exempt from the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement and able to be authorized by statute.[5]

Reaffirming Camara and See in its 1978 Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc. decision,[6] the Court held that an Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) provision that authorized federal inspectors to search work areas of employment facilities covered by OSHA for safety hazards and regulatory violations, without a warrant or other legal process violated the Fourth Amendment. The Court distinguished the liquor and firearms exceptions based on a long tradition of close government supervision in those industries, so that a person in those businesses gave up his privacy expectations. Noting that Congress had recently enacted OSHA, which regulated practically every business in or affecting interstate commerce, the Court reasoned that a legislature cannot extend regulation and then follow it with warrantless inspections. The Court further noted that OSHA inspectors had unbounded discretion in choosing which businesses to inspect and when to do so, leaving businesses at the mercy of possibly arbitrary actions and without assurances as to limitations on scope and standards of inspections. Further, warrantless inspections did not serve an important governmental interest, as the Court expected most businesses to consent to inspections and that OSHA could resort to an administrative warrant in order to inspect sites where a business refused consent.[7]

---

[1] In re Strouse, 23 F. Cas. 261 (No. 13,548) (D. Nev. 1871); In re Meador, 16 F. Cas. 1294, 1299 (No. 9375) (N.D. Ga. 1869).

[2] Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217 (1960); Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360 (1959); Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186 (1946).

[3] Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967) (home); See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541 (1967) (commercial warehouse).

[4] Camara, 387 U.S. at 530.

[5] Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States, 397 U.S. 72 (1970); United States v. Biswell, 406 U.S. 311 (1972). Colonnade, involving liquor, was based on the long history of close supervision of the industry. Biswell, involving firearms, introduced factors that were subsequently to prove significant. Thus, although the statute was of recent enactment, firearms constituted a pervasively regulated industry, so that dealers had no reasonable expectation of privacy, because the law provides for regular inspections. Further, warrantless inspections were needed for effective enforcement of the statute.

[6] 436 U.S. 307 (1978). Dissenting, Justice John Paul Stevens, with Justices William Rehnquist and Harry Blackmun, argued that not the warrant clause but the reasonableness clause should govern administrative inspections. Id. at 325.

[7] Administrative warrants issued only on a showing that a specific business had been chosen for inspection based on a general administrative plan would suffice. Even without a necessity for probable cause, the requirement would assure the interposition of a neutral officer to establish that the inspection was reasonable and properly authorized.

In Donovan v. Dewey,[8] the Court clarified Barlow's reach, articulating a new standard that appeared to permit some governmental inspection of commercial property without a warrant. Under the Federal Mine Safety and Health Act (FMSHA), governing underground and surface mines (including stone quarries), federal officers must inspect underground mines at least four times a year and surface mines at least twice a year, pursuant to extensive safety regulations. FMSHA specifically allowed inspections to be absent advanced notice and required the Secretary of Labor to institute court actions for injunctive and other relief if inspectors were denied admission. Sustaining FMSHA, the Court proclaimed that government had "greater latitude" to conduct warrantless inspections of commercial property than of homes, because "the expectation of privacy that the owner of commercial property enjoys in such property differs significantly from the sanctity accorded an individual's home, and that this privacy interest may, in certain circumstances, be adequately protected by regulatory schemes authorizing warrantless inspections."[9]

The Court distinguished Dewey from Barlow's in several ways. First, Dewey involved a single industry, unlike Barlow's broad coverage. Second, OSHA gave minimal direction to inspectors as to time, scope, and frequency of inspections, while FMSHA specified a regular number of inspections pursuant to standards. Third, the Court deferred to Congress's determination that unannounced inspections were necessary to enforce safety laws effectively. Fourth, FMSHA provided businesses an opportunity to contest the search in the civil proceeding the Secretary had to bring if the business denied consent.[10] The Court explained that if only lengthy government supervision made warrantless inspections permissible, "absurd results would occur," because "new and emerging industries . . . that pose enormous potential safety and health problems" would escape warrantless inspections.[11]

Applying the Dewey three-part test in New York v. Burger[12] to automobile junkyard and vehicle dismantling operation inspections, for which administrative and penal objectives overlapped, the Court concluded that New York has a substantial interest in stemming automobile thefts, that regulating vehicle dismantling operations reasonably serves that interest, and that statutory safeguards provide adequate substitutes for a warrant requirement. The Court rejected the suggestion that the warrantless inspection provisions were designed as an expedient means to enforcing penal laws and instead saw them serving narrower, valid regulatory purposes, such as establishing a system for tracking stolen automobiles and parts, and enhancing legitimate businesses' ability to compete. "[A] State can 436 U.S. at 321, 323. The dissenters objected that the warrant clause was being constitutionally diluted. Id. at 325. Administrative warrants were approved also in Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523, 538 (1967). Previously, one of the reasons given for finding administrative and noncriminal inspections not covered by the Fourth Amendment was the fact that the warrant clause would be as rigorously applied to them as to criminal searches and seizures. Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360, 373 (1959). See also Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 275 (1973) (Powell, J., concurring) (suggesting a similar administrative warrant procedure empowering police and immigration officers to conduct roving searches of automobiles in areas near the Nation's borders); id. at 270 n.3 (indicating that majority Justices were divided on the validity of such area search warrants); id. at 288 (White, J., dissenting indicating approval); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 547 n.2, 562 n.15 (1976).

[8] 452 U.S. 594 (1981).

[9] Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594, 598–99 (1981).

[10] 452 U.S. at 596–97, 604–05. Pursuant to the statute, however, the Secretary has promulgated regulations providing for the assessment of civil penalties for denial of entry and Dewey had been assessed a penalty of $1,000. Id. at 597 n.3. It was also true in Barlow's that the government resorted to civil process upon refusal to admit. 436 U.S. at 317 & n.12.

[11] Dewey, 452 U.S. at 606. Duration of regulation will now be a factor in assessing the legitimate expectation of privacy of a business. Id. Accord, New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691 (1987) (although duration of regulation of vehicle dismantling was relatively brief, history of regulation of junk business generally was lengthy, and current regulation of dismantling was extensive).

[12] 482 U.S. 691 (1987).

address a major social problem both by way of an administrative scheme and through penal sanctions," the Court declared; in such circumstances warrantless administrative searches are permissible even though they may uncover evidence of criminal activity.[13]

In its 2015 City of Los Angeles v. Patel decision, the Court declined to extend the "more relaxed standard" applying to searches of closely regulated businesses to hotels when it invalidated a Los Angeles ordinance that gave police the ability to inspect hotel registration records without advance notice and carried a 6-month term of imprisonment and a $1,000 fine for hotel operators who failed to make such records available.[14] The Patel Court, characterizing inspections pursuant to this ordinance as "administrative searches,"[15] held "that a hotel owner must be afforded an opportunity to have a neutral decision maker review an officer's demand to search the registry before he or she faces penalties for failing to comply" for such a search to be permissible under the Fourth Amendment.[16] In so doing, the Court expressly declined to treat the hotel industry as a "closely regulated" industry subject to the more relaxed standard applied in Dewey and Burger on the grounds that doing so would "permit what has always been a narrow exception to swallow the rule."[17] The Court emphasized that, over the prior forty-five years, it had recognized only four industries as having "such a history of government oversight that no reasonable expectation of privacy . . . could exist for a proprietor over the stock of such an enterprise."[18] These four industries involve liquor sales, firearms dealing, mining, and running an automobile junkyard, and the Court distinguished hotel operations from these industries, in part, because "nothing inherent in the operation of hotels poses a clear and significant risk to the public welfare."[19] However, the Court also suggested that, even if hotels were to be seen as pervasively regulated, the Los Angeles ordinance would still be deemed unreasonable because (1) there was no substantial government interest informing the regulatory scheme; (2) warrantless inspections were not necessary to further the government's purpose; and (3) the inspection program did not provide, in terms of the certainty and regularity of its application, a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.[20]

In contexts not directly concerned with whether an industry is comprehensively regulated, the Court has elaborated the constitutional requirements affecting administrative inspections

[13] 482 U.S. at 712.

[14] 135 S. Ct. 2443, 2444 (2015). Patel involved a facial, rather than an as-applied, challenge to the Los Angeles ordinance. The Court clarified that facial challenges under the Fourth Amendment are "not categorically barred or especially disfavored." Id. at 2449. Some had apparently taken the Court's earlier statement in Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968), that "[t]he constitutional validity of a warrantless search is pre-eminently the sort of question which can only be decided in the concrete factual context of the individual case," id. at 59, to foreclose facial Fourth Amendment challenges. Patel, 135 S. Ct. at 2449. However, the Patel Court construed Sibron's language to mean only that "claims for facial relief under the Fourth Amendment are unlikely to succeed when there is substantial ambiguity as to what conduct a statute authorizes." Id.

[15] Patel, 135 S. Ct. at 2452.

[16] Id. at 2453. The Court further noted that actual pre-compliance review need only occur in those "rare instances" where a hotel owner objects to turning over the registry, and that the Court has never "attempted to prescribe" the exact form of such review. Id. at 2452–53.

[17] Id. at 2454–55.

[18] Id. (quoting Barlow's, 436 U.S. at 313).

[19] Id. The majority further stated that the existence of regulations requiring hotels to maintain licenses, collect taxes, and take other actions did not establish a "comprehensive scheme of regulation" distinguishing hotels from other industries. Id. at 2455. It also opined that the historical practice of treating hotels as public accommodations does not necessarily mean that hotels are to be treated as comprehensively regulated for purposes of warrantless searches. Id. at 2454–55.

[20] Id. at 2456. Specifically, the Court noted that the government's alleged interest in ensuring that hotel operators not falsify their records, as they could if given an opportunity for pre-compliance review, applied to every recordkeeping requirement. Id. The Court similarly noted that there were other ways to further the city's interest in warrantless inspections (for example, ex parte warrants) and that the ordinance failed to sufficiently constrain a police officer's discretion as to which hotels to search and under what circumstances. Id.

and searches. In Michigan v. Tyler,[21] for example, the Court subdivided the process by which an investigation of the cause of a fire may be conducted. Entry to fight the fire is, of course, an exception based on exigent circumstances, and no warrant or consent is needed; fire fighters on the scene may seize evidence relating to the cause under the plain view doctrine. Additional entries to investigate the cause of the fire must be made pursuant to warrant procedures governing administrative searches. Evidence of arson discovered in the course of such an administrative inspection is admissible at trial, but if the investigator finds probable cause to believe that arson has occurred and requires further access to gather evidence for a possible prosecution, he must obtain a criminal search warrant.[22] In other cases, the Court approved a system of "home visits" by welfare caseworkers, where recipients must admit the worker or lose eligibility for benefits[23] and held that a sheriff's assistance to a trailer park owner in disconnecting and removing a mobile home constituted a "seizure" of the home.[24]

The Court has recognized situations, some of them analogous to administrative searches, where "'special needs' beyond normal law enforcement . . . justify departures from the usual warrant and probable cause requirements."[25] In Skinner, the Court applied the Dewey/Burger warrantless search rationale to urinalysis drug testing, reasoning that, because of the history of pervasive regulation of the railroad industry, railroad employees have a diminished expectation of privacy, which makes mandatory urinalysis less intrusive and more reasonable.[26]

With respect to automobiles, the Court has distinguished random automobile stops from activities to inventory and secure valuables and firearms. The Court held random stops of automobiles to check drivers' licenses, vehicle registrations, and safety conditions to be too intrusive; the degree to which random stops would advance the legitimate governmental interests involved did not outweigh the individual's legitimate expectations of privacy.[27] In contrast, in South Dakota v. Opperman,[28] the Court sustained the admission of evidence that

[21] 436 U.S. 499 (1978).

[22] The Court also held that, after the fire was extinguished, if fire investigators were unable to proceed at the moment, because of dark, steam, and smoke, it was proper for them to leave and return at daylight without any necessity of complying with its mandate for administrative or criminal warrants. 436 U.S. at 510–11. But cf. Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287 (1984) (no such justification for search of private residence begun at 1:30 p.m. when fire had been extinguished at 7 a.m.).

[23] Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309 (1971). It is not clear what rationale the majority used. It appears to have proceeded on the assumption that a "home visit" was not a search and that the Fourth Amendment does not apply when criminal prosecution is not threatened. Neither premise is valid under Camara and its progeny, although Camara preceded Wyman. Presumably, the case would today be analyzed under the expectation of privacy/need/structural protection theory of the more recent cases.

[24] Soldal v. Cook County, 506 U.S. 56, 61 (1992) (home "was not only seized, it literally was carried away, giving new meaning to the term 'mobile home'").

[25] City of Ontario v. Quon, 560 U.S. 746 (2010) (reasonableness test for obtaining and reviewing transcripts of on-duty text messages of police officer using government-issued equipment); Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 873 (1987) (administrative needs of probation system justify warrantless searches of probationers' homes on less than probable cause); Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526 (1984) (no Fourth Amendment protection from search of prison cell); New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985) (simple reasonableness standard governs searches of students' persons and effects by public school authorities); O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987) (reasonableness test for work-related searches of employees' offices by government employer); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602 (1989) (neither probable cause nor individualized suspicion is necessary for mandatory drug testing of railway employees involved in accidents or safety violations).

[26] Skinner, 489 U.S. at 627.

[27] Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979). Standards applied in this case had been developed in the contexts of automobile stops at fixed points or by roving patrols in border situations. Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266 (1973); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975); United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891 (1975); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976).

[28] 428 U.S. 364 (1976). The Court emphasized the reduced expectation of privacy in automobiles and the noncriminal purpose of the search.

police found when they impounded an automobile from a public street for multiple parking violations and entered the car to secure and inventory valuables for safekeeping, discovering marijuana in the glove compartment. Further, in Cady v. Dumbrowski,[29] the Court upheld the constitutionality of a warrantless search of an out-of-state policeman's automobile following an accident in order to find and safeguard his service revolver, which yielded criminal evidence.[30] The Court in Cady recognized that local police often engage in "community caretaking functions" that are "totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute,"[31] and in the context of "the extensive regulation of motor vehicles and traffic," such a warrantless "caretaking 'search'" of a vehicle that had been towed and stored at a garage was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when undertaken to secure a firearm that could pose a risk to public safety.[32]

In Caniglia v. Strom,[33] the Court declined to extend Cady beyond the automobile context. In Caniglia, police responded to a request for a welfare check of a potentially suicidal man at his home and, following removal of the man from his porch for a psychiatric evaluation at a hospital, conducted a warrantless search of the man's home to seize firearms he might have used to harm himself or others.[34] The lower court concluded that the decision to remove the man and his firearms was permissible under the Fourth Amendment pursuant to "a freestanding community-caretaking" doctrine drawn from Cady "that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home."[35] The Supreme Court disagreed.[36] The Court in Caniglia stated that Cady made an "unmistakable distinction between vehicles and homes," noting that the location of the Cady search in an impounded vehicle rather than a home was "'a constitutional difference' that the [Cady] opinion repeatedly stressed."[37] As such, the Court in Caniglia reiterated that "[w]hat is reasonable for vehicles is different from what is reasonable for homes," clarifying that Cady did not suggest a broader "community caretaking" doctrine independently justifying warrantless searches in the home.[38]

Amdt4.3.6.2 Property Subject to Seizure

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

While search warrants have long been issued to seize contraband and the fruits and instrumentalities of crime,[1] in 1921, a unanimous Court in Gouled v. United States,[2] limited property subject to seizures to contraband and the fruits and instrumentalities of crime and

[29] 413 U.S. 433 (1973).

[30] Id. at 447–48.

[31] Id. at 441.

[32] Id. at 441, 447–48.

[33] 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021).

[34] Id. at 1598.

[35] Id.

[36] Id.

[37] Id. at 1599.

[38] Id. at 1600.

[1] United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452, 465–66 (1932). Of course, evidence seizable under warrant is subject to seizure without a warrant in circumstances in which warrantless searches are justified.

refused to permit a seizure of "mere evidence," consisting of the defendant's papers for use as evidence against him at trial. The Court recognized that there was "no special sanctity in papers, as distinguished from other forms of property, to render them immune from search and seizure,"[3] but their character as evidence rendered them immune. The Court explained that immunity "was based upon the dual, related premises that historically the right to search for and seize property depended upon the assertion by the Government of a valid claim of superior interest, and that it was not enough that the purpose of the search and seizure was to obtain evidence to use in apprehending and convicting criminals."[4]

In 1967, the Court overturned the "mere evidence" rule in Warden v. Hayden.[5] It is now settled that such evidentiary items as fingerprints,[6] blood,[7] urine samples,[8] fingernail and skin scrapings,[9] voice and handwriting exemplars,[10] conversations,[11] and other demonstrative evidence may be obtained through the warrant process or without a warrant where "special needs" of government are shown.[12] However, the Court has held some medically assisted bodily intrusions impermissible, for example, forcible administration of an emetic to induce vomiting[13] and surgery under general anesthetic to remove a bullet lodged in a suspect's chest.[14] In determining which medical tests and procedures are reasonable, the Court has considered the extent to which the procedure threatens the individual's safety or health, "the extent of the intrusion upon the individual's dignitary interests in personal privacy and bodily integrity," and the importance of the evidence to the prosecution's case.[15]

Amdt4.3.6.3 Property Seizures and Self-Incrimination Protections

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but

---

[2] 255 U.S. 298 (1921). United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452 (1932), applied the rule in a warrantless search of premises. The rule apparently never applied in case of a search of the person. Cf. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966).

[3] Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298, 306 (1921).

[4] Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 303 (1967). See Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298, 309 (1921). The holding was derived from dicta in Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 624–29 (1886).

[5] Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967).

[6] Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969).

[7] Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602 (1989) (warrantless blood testing for drug use by railroad employee involved in accident).

[8] Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602 (1989) (warrantless drug testing of railroad employee involved in accident).

[9] Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291 (1973) (sustaining warrantless taking of scrapings from defendant's fingernails at the station house, on the basis that it was a very limited intrusion and necessary to preserve evanescent evidence).

[10] United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973); United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (both sustaining grand jury subpoenas to produce voice and handwriting exemplars, as no reasonable expectation of privacy exists with respect to those items).

[11] Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41, 44 n.2 (1967). See also id. at 97 n.4, 107–08 (Harlan and White, JJ., concurring), 67 (Douglas, J., concurring).

[12] An important result of Warden v. Hayden is that third parties not suspected of criminal culpability are subject to warrants for searches and seizures of evidence. Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 553–60 (1978).

[13] Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952).

[14] Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985).

[15] Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 761–63 (1985). Chief Justice Burger concurred on the basis of his reading of the Court's opinion "as not preventing detention of an individual if there are reasonable grounds to believe that natural bodily functions will disclose the presence of contraband materials secreted internally." Id. at 767. Cf. United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985).

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Supreme Court has distinguished the Fourth Amendment protection from unreasonable searches from the Fifth Amendment protection from self-incrimination. While the Court initially appeared to find some overlap between these two protections in its 1886 decision, Boyd v. United States,[1] the Court's modern jurisprudence views the two Amendments as addressing different concerns.

In its first lengthy consideration of the Fourth Amendment, the Court addressed the protections the Fourth and Fifth Amendments afforded. In Boyd, the Government had alleged that goods had been imported illegally and were thereby subject to forfeiture pursuant to a quasi-criminal proceeding. In assessing the legality of a statute that authorized courts to require defendants to produce any document that might "tend to prove any allegation made by the United States,"[2] the Court unanimously agreed that there was a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination problem. Justice Joseph Bradley for a majority of the Court, however, also relied on the Fourth Amendment. Although the statute did not authorize a search but instead compelled production of documents, Justice Joseph Bradley concluded that the law was within Search and Seizure Clause restrictions.[3] With this point established, Justice Joseph Bradley relied on Lord Camden's opinion in Entick v. Carrington[4] for the proposition that seizure of items to be used only as evidence was impermissible. Justice Joseph Bradley announced that the "essence of the offence" committed by the government against Boyd:

> is not the breaking of his doors, and the rummaging of his drawers . . . but it is the invasion of his indefeasible right of personal security, personal liberty and private property. . . . Breaking into a house and opening boxes and drawers are circumstances of aggravation; but any forcible and compulsory extortion of a man's own testimony or of his private papers to be used as evidence to convict him of crime or to forfeit his goods, is within the condemnation of that judgment. In this regard the Fourth and Fifth Amendments run almost into each other.[5]

Although it may be doubtful that equating search warrants with subpoenas and other compulsory process ever really amounted to much of a limitation,[6] the Court currently dispenses with any theory of "convergence" of the two amendments.[7] In Warden v. Hayden,[8] Justice William Brennan for the Court cautioned that the items seized were not "'testimonial' or 'communicative' in nature, and their introduction therefore did not compel respondent to become a witness against himself in violation of the Fifth Amendment. . . . This case thus does

---

[1] 116 U.S. 616 (1886).

[2] Act of June 22, 1874, § 5, 18 Stat. 187.

[3] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 622 (1886).

[4] Howell's State Trials 1029, 95 Eng. Rep. 807 (1765).

[5] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1886) See Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 33–34 (1925) ("It is well settled that, when properly invoked, the Fifth Amendment protects every person from incrimination by the use of evidence obtained through search or seizure made in violation of his rights under the Fourth Amendment."); Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192, 194 (1927) ("It has long been settled that the Fifth Amendment protects every person against incrimination by the use of evidence obtained through search or seizure made in violation of his rights under the Fourth Amendment.").

[6] E.g., Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 208–09 (1946).

[7] Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976); Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 405–14 (1976). Fisher states that "the precise claim sustained in Boyd would now be rejected for reasons not there considered." Id. at 408.

[8] 387 U.S. 294, 302–03 (1967). Seizure of a diary was at issue in Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 805 (1971), but it had not been raised in the state courts and was deemed waived.

not require that we consider whether there are items of evidential value whose very nature precludes them from being the object of a reasonable search and seizure."

Following Warden, police executed a warrant to search the defendant's offices for specified documents pertaining to a fraudulent land sale in Andresen v. Maryland.[9] The Andresen Court sustained the lower court's admission of the papers discovered as evidence at the defendant's trial. The Court held that the Fifth Amendment did not apply because the defendant had not been forced to produce or authenticate the documents.[10] As for the Fourth Amendment, because the "business records" seized were evidence of criminal acts, the Court held that they could be seized under Warden v. Hayden; the fact that they were "testimonial" in nature (records in the defendant's handwriting) was irrelevant.[11] Acknowledging that "there are grave dangers inherent in executing a warrant authorizing a search and seizure of a person's papers," the Court observed that, although some "innocuous documents" would have to be examined to ascertain which papers were to be seized, authorities, just as with electronic "seizures" of telephone conversations, "must take care to assure that [searches] are conducted in a manner that minimizes unwarranted intrusions upon privacy."[12] As Andresen concerned business records, it is unclear whether its discussion equally applies to "personal" papers, such as diaries and letters, for which the privacy interest is greater.[13]

Amdt4.3.7 Unreasonable Seizures of Persons

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

That the Fourth Amendment was intended to protect against arbitrary arrests as well as against unreasonable searches was early assumed by Chief Justice John Marshall[1] and is now established law.[2] At common law, warrantless arrests of persons who had committed a breach of the peace or a felony were permitted,[3] and this history is reflected in the fact that the Fourth Amendment is satisfied if the arrest is made in a public place on probable cause, regardless of whether a warrant has been obtained.[4] To determine whether an officer has probable cause to

[9] 427 U.S. 463 (1976).

[10] 427 U.S. at 470–77.

[11] 427 U.S. at 478–84.

[12] 427 U.S. at 482, n.11. Minimization, as required under federal law, has not proved to be a significant limitation. Scott v. United States, 425 U.S. 917 (1976).

[13] E.g., United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 440, 444 (1976); Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 401 (1976); California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 78–79 (1974) (Powell, J., concurring).

[1] Ex parte Burford, 7 U.S. (3 Cr.) 448 (1806).

[2] Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480, 485–86 (1958); United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 416–18 (1976); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 583–86 (1980); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 211–13 (1981).

[3] 1 J. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England 193 (1883). At common law warrantless arrest was also permissible for some misdemeanors not involving a breach of the peace. See the lengthy historical treatment in Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318, 326–45 (2001).

[4] United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976). See also United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976) (sustaining warrantless arrest of suspect in her home when she was initially approached in her doorway and then retreated into house). However, a suspect arrested on probable cause but without a warrant is entitled to a prompt, nonadversary hearing before a magistrate under procedures designed to provide a fair and reliable determination of probable cause in order to keep the arrestee in custody. Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975). A "prompt" hearing now means a hearing that is administratively convenient. See County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56 (1991) (authorizing "as a make a warrantless arrest, courts consider the "totality of the circumstances," examining "the events leading up to the arrest" and deciding "whether these historical facts, viewed from the standpoint of an objectively reasonable police officer, amount to" probable cause.[5] Probable cause is not a "high bar,"[6] requiring only a "probability or substantial chance of criminal activity, not an actual showing of such activity."[7] However, in order to effectuate an arrest in the home, absent consent or exigent circumstances, police officers must have a warrant.[8]

The Fourth Amendment applies to "seizures," and it is not necessary that a detention be a formal arrest in order to bring to bear the requirements of warrants, or probable cause in instances in which warrants are not required.[9] Some objective justification must be shown to validate all seizures of the person,[10] including seizures that involve only a brief detention short of arrest, although the nature of the detention will determine whether probable cause or some reasonable and articulable suspicion is necessary.[11] general matter" detention for up to 48 hours without a probable-cause hearing, after which time the burden shifts to the government to demonstrate extraordinary circumstances justifying further detention).

---

[5] Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 371 (2003) (internal citations and quotations omitted). The totality of circumstances approach requires courts to consider the "whole picture" and to not look at each fact as presented to the reasonable officer in isolation. See District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 588 (2018). Moreover, the existence of an "innocent explanation" for a particular circumstance is insufficient to deny probable cause for an arrest when, in considering all of the circumstances, including any plausible innocent explanations, a reasonable officer can conclude that there is a "substantial chance of criminal activity." Id. at 588.

[6] Kaley v. United States, 571 U.S. 320, 338 (2014).

[7] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 232 (1983).

[8] Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980) (voiding state law authorizing police to enter private residence without a warrant to make an arrest); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981) (officers with arrest warrant for A entered B's home without search warrant and discovered incriminating evidence; violated Fourth Amendment in absence of warrant to search the home); Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985) (officers went to suspect's home and took him to police station for fingerprinting).

[9] United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980) ("a person has been 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment only if, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave"). See also Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 878 (1975); Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 16–19 (1968); Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626 (2003). Apprehension by the use of deadly force is a seizure subject to the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement. See, e.g., Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985) (police officer's fatal shooting of a fleeing suspect); Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593 (1989) (police roadblock designed to end car chase with fatal crash); Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007) (police officer's ramming fleeing motorist's car from behind in attempt to stop him); Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765 (2014) (police use of fifteen gunshots to end a police chase). The "application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued." Torres v. Madrid, No. 19-292, slip op. at 17 (U.S. Mar. 25, 2021).

The Court has also made clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to pre-trial detention. See Manuel v. Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911, 914 (2017) (holding that a petitioner who "was held in jail for seven weeks after a judge relied on allegedly fabricated evidence to find probable cause that he had committed a crime" could "challenge his pretrial detention on the ground that it violated the Fourth Amendment").

[10] The justification must be made to a neutral magistrate, not to the arrestee. There is no constitutional requirement that an officer inform an arrestee of the reason for his arrest. Devenpeck v. Alford, 543 U.S. 146, 155 (2004) (the offense for which there is probable cause to arrest need not be closely related to the offense stated by the officer at the time of arrest).

[11] Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 650 (1979) ("unreasonable seizure . . . to stop an automobile . . . for the purpose of checking the driving license of the operator and the registration of the car, where there is neither probable cause to believe nor reasonable suspicion" that a law was violated); Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 51 (1979) (detaining a person for the purpose of requiring him to identify himself constitutes a seizure requiring a "reasonable, articulable suspicion that a crime had just been, was being, or was about to be committed"); Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438, 441 (1980) (requesting ticket stubs and identification from persons disembarking from plane not reasonable where stated justifications would apply to "a very large category of innocent travelers," for example, travelers arrived from "a principal place of origin of cocaine"); Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 705 (1981) ("it is constitutionally reasonable to require that [a] citizen . . . remain while officers of the law execute a valid warrant to search his home"); Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326 (2001) (approving "securing" of premises, preventing homeowner from reentering, while a search warrant is obtained); Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. 609 (2007) (where deputies executing a search warrant did not know that the house being searched had recently been sold, it was reasonable to hold new

The Fourth Amendment does not require an officer to consider whether to issue a citation rather than arresting (and placing in custody) a person who has committed a minor offense—even a minor traffic offense. In Atwater v. City of Lago Vista,[12] the Court, even while acknowledging that the case before it involved "gratuitous humiliations imposed by a police officer who was (at best) exercising extremely poor judgment," refused to require that "case-by-case determinations of government need" to place traffic offenders in custody be subjected to a reasonableness inquiry, "lest every discretionary judgment in the field be converted into an occasion for constitutional review."[13] Citing some state statutes that limit warrantless arrests for minor offenses, the Court contended that the matter is better left to statutory rule than to application of broad constitutional principle.[14] Thus, Atwater and County of Riverside v. McLaughlin[15] together mean that—as far as the Constitution is concerned—police officers have almost unbridled discretion to decide whether to issue a summons for a minor traffic offense or whether instead to place the offending motorist in jail, where she may be kept for up to 48 hours with little recourse. Even when an arrest for a minor offense is prohibited by state law, the arrest will not violate the Fourth Amendment if it was based on probable cause.[16]

Until relatively recently, the legality of arrests was seldom litigated in the Supreme Court because of the rule that a person detained pursuant to an arbitrary seizure—unlike evidence obtained as a result of an unlawful search—remains subject to custody and presentation to court.[17] But the application of self-incrimination and other exclusionary rules to the states and the heightening of their scope in state and federal cases alike brought forth the rule that verbal evidence, confessions, and other admissions, like all derivative evidence obtained as a result of unlawful seizures, could be excluded.[18] Thus, a confession made by one illegally in custody must be suppressed, unless the causal connection between the illegal arrest and the confession had become so attenuated that the latter should not be deemed "tainted" by the former.[19] Similarly, fingerprints and other physical evidence obtained as a result of an unlawful arrest must be suppressed.[20] homeowners, who had been sleeping in the nude, at gunpoint for one to two minutes without allowing them to dress or cover themselves, even though the deputies knew that the homeowners were of a different race from the suspects named in the warrant).

---

[12] 532 U.S. 318 (2001).

[13] Id. at 346–47.

[14] Id. at 352.

[15] 500 U.S. 44 (1991).

[16] Virginia v. Moore, 128 S. Ct. 1598 (2008). See also Heien v. North Carolina, 574 U.S. 54, 60–61 (2014) (holding that a mistake of law can give rise to the reasonable suspicion necessary to uphold the seizure of a vehicle). The law enforcement officer in Heien had stopped the vehicle because it had only one working brake light, which the officer understood to be a violation of the North Carolina vehicle code. Id. at 57–58. However, a North Carolina court subsequently held, in a case of first impression, that the vehicle code only requires one working brake light. Id. at 58–59. In holding that reasonable suspicion can rest on a mistaken understanding of a legal prohibition, a majority of the Supreme Court noted prior cases finding that mistakes of fact do not preclude reasonable suspicion and concluded that "reasonable men make mistakes of law, too." Id. at 61 (citing Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 183–86 (1990), and Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 802–05 (1971), as cases involving mistakes of fact).

[17] Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 440 (1886); see also Albrecht v. United States, 273 U.S. 1 (1927); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952).

[18] Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963). Such evidence is the "fruit of the poisonous tree," Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338, 341 (1939), that is, evidence derived from the original illegality. Previously, if confessions were voluntary for purposes of the self-incrimination clause, they were admissible notwithstanding any prior official illegality. Colombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961).

[19] Although there is a presumption that the illegal arrest is the cause of the subsequent confession, the presumption is rebuttable by a showing that the confession is the result of "an intervening . . . act of free will." Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 486 (1963). The factors used to determine whether the taint has been dissipated are the time between the illegal arrest and the confession, whether there were intervening circumstances (such as

The Court has also recognized that the Fourth Amendment prohibits "unreasonable seizure[s] pursuant to legal process," sometimes referred to as "malicious prosecution."[21] Malicious prosecution is actionable as a Fourth Amendment violation "to the extent that the defendant's actions cause the plaintiff to be 'seized' without probable cause."[22] In Thompson v. Clark, a plaintiff brought a claim for malicious prosecution in violation of the Fourth Amendment under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.[23] When determining the elements of a constitutional tort claim under § 1983, the Court must first look to the elements of "the most analogous tort as of 1871, when § 1983 was enacted."[24] In Thompson, the Court identified the tort of malicious prosecution as the most analogous to plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim.[25] The Court held that a malicious prosecution may constitute a Fourth Amendment "seizure" for purposes of Section 1983 if the plaintiff proves the "favorable termination" of the underlying criminal case against him, a standard that does not require some affirmative indication of the plaintiff's innocence.[26]

Amdt4.4 Probable Cause

Amdt4.4.1 Overview of Probable Cause

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Requirements for establishing probable cause through reliance on information received from an informant has divided the Court in several cases. Although involving a warrantless arrest, Draper v. United States[1] may be said to have begun the line of cases. A previously reliable, named informant reported to an officer that the defendant would arrive with narcotics on a particular train, and described the clothes he would be wearing and the bag he would be carrying; the informant, however, gave no basis for his information. FBI agents met the train, consultation with others, Miranda warnings, etc.), and the degree of flagrancy and purposefulness of the official conduct. Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975) (Miranda warnings alone insufficient); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687 (1982); Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626 (2003). In Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), the fact that the suspect had been taken before a magistrate who advised him of his rights and set bail, after which he confessed, established a sufficient intervening circumstance.

---

[20] Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687 (1982). In United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463 (1980), the Court, unanimously but for a variety of reasons, held proper the identification in court of a defendant, who had been wrongly arrested without probable cause, by the crime victim. The court identification was not tainted by either the arrest or the subsequent in-custody identification. See also Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 815 (1985), suggesting in dictum that a "narrowly circumscribed procedure for fingerprinting detentions on less than probable cause" may be permissible.

[21] Thompson v. Clark, No. 20-659, at slip op. at 4 (U.S. April 4, 2022) (noting that "[t]his Court's precedents recognize such claim," (citing Manuel v. Joliet, 580 U.S. 357, 363–64, 367–68 (2017); Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 271 (1994) (plurality opinion))).

[22] Id. at 5 (quoting Pitt v. District of Columbia, 491 F. 3d 494, 510–11 (D.C. Cir. 2007)).

[23] Id. at 3.

[24] Id. at 5.

[25] Id. at 6.

[26] Id. at 1.

[1] 358 U.S. 307 (1959). For another case applying essentially the same probable cause standard to warrantless arrests as govern arrests by warrant, see McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967) (informant's statement to arresting officers met Aguilar probable cause standard). See also Whitely v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560, 566 (1971) (standards must be "at least as stringent" for warrantless arrest as for obtaining warrant).

observed that the defendant fully fit the description, and arrested him. The Court held that the corroboration of part of the informer's tip established probable cause to support the arrest. A case involving a search warrant, Jones v. United States,[2] apparently considered the affidavit as a whole to see whether the tip plus the corroborating information provided a substantial basis for finding probable cause, but the affidavit also set forth the reliability of the informer and sufficient detail to indicate that the tip was based on the informant's personal observation. Aguilar v. Texas[3] held insufficient an affidavit that merely asserted that the police had "reliable information from a credible person" that narcotics were in a certain place, and held that when the affiant relies on an informant's tip he must present two types of evidence to the magistrate. First, the affidavit must indicate the informant's basis of knowledge—the circumstances from which the informant concluded that evidence was present or that crimes had been committed—and, second, the affiant must present information that would permit the magistrate to decide whether or not the informant was trustworthy. Then, in Spinelli v. United States,[4] the Court applied Aguilar in a situation in which the affidavit contained both an informant's tip and police information of a corroborating nature.

The Court rejected the "totality" test derived from Jones and held that the informant's tip and the corroborating evidence must be separately considered. The tip was rejected because the affidavit contained neither any information which showed the basis of the tip nor any information which showed the informant's credibility. The corroborating evidence was rejected as insufficient because it did not establish any element of criminality but merely related to details which were innocent in themselves. No additional corroborating weight was due as a result of the bald police assertion that the defendant was a known gambler, although the tip related to gambling. Returning to the totality test, however, the Court in United States v. Harris[5] approved a warrant issued largely on an informer's tip that over a 2-year period he had purchased illegal whiskey from the defendant at the defendant's residence, most recently within 2 weeks of the tip. The affidavit contained rather detailed information about the concealment of the whiskey, and asserted that the informer was a "prudent person," that the defendant had a reputation as a bootlegger, that other persons had supplied similar information about him, and that he had been found in control of illegal whiskey within the previous 4 years. The Court determined that the detailed nature of the tip, the personal observation thus revealed, and the fact that the informer had admitted to criminal behavior by his purchase of whiskey were sufficient to enable the magistrate to find him reliable, and that the supporting evidence, including defendant's reputation, could supplement this determination.

The Court expressly abandoned the two-part Aguilar-Spinelli test and returned to the "totality of the circumstances" approach to evaluate probable cause based on an informant's tip in Illinois v. Gates.[6] The main defect of the two-part test, Justice William Rehnquist concluded for the Court, was in treating an informant's reliability and his basis for knowledge as independent requirements. Instead, "a deficiency in one may be compensated for, in determining the overall reliability of a tip, by a strong showing as to the other, or by some other

[2] 362 U.S. 257 (1960).

[3] 378 U.S. 108 (1964).

[4] 393 U.S. 410 (1969). Both concurring and dissenting Justices recognized tension between Draper and Aguilar. See id. at 423 (White, J., concurring), id. at 429 (Black, J., dissenting and advocating the overruling of Aguilar).

[5] 403 U.S. 573 (1971). See also Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 147 (1972) (approving warrantless stop of motorist based on informant's tip that "may have been insufficient" under Aguilar and Spinelli as basis for warrant).

[6] 462 U.S. 213 (1983). Justice William Rehnquist's opinion of the Court was joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and by Justices Harry Blackmun, Lewis Powell, and Sandra Day O'Connor. Justices William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and John Paul Stevens dissented.

indicia of reliability."[7] In evaluating probable cause, "[t]he task of the issuing magistrate is simply to make a practical, commonsense decision whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the affidavit before him, including the 'veracity' and 'basis of knowledge' of persons supplying hearsay information, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place."[8]

Amdt4.4.2 Probable Cause Doctrine

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Much litigation has concerned the sufficiency of the complaint to establish probable cause. Mere conclusory assertions are not enough.[1] In United States v. Ventresca,[2] however, an affidavit by a law enforcement officer asserting his belief that an illegal distillery was being operated in a certain place, explaining that the belief was based upon his own observations and upon those of fellow investigators, and detailing a substantial amount of these personal observations clearly supporting the stated belief, was held to be sufficient to constitute probable cause. "Recital of some of the underlying circumstances in the affidavit is essential," the Court said, observing that "where these circumstances are detailed, where reason for crediting the source of the information is given, and when a magistrate has found probable cause," the reliance on the warrant process should not be deterred by insistence on too stringent a showing.[3]

Amdt4.4.3 Non-Traditional Contexts and Probable Cause

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Where the warrant process is used to authorize seizure of books and other items that may be protected by the First Amendment, the Court has required government to observe more exacting standards than in other cases.[1] Seizure of materials arguably protected by the First Amendment is a form of prior restraint that requires strict observance of the Fourth Amendment. At a minimum, a warrant is required, and additional safeguards may be required for large-scale seizures. Thus, in Marcus v. Search Warrant,[2] the seizure of 11,000 copies of 280

---

[7] 462 U.S. at 213.

[8] 462 U.S. at 238. For an application of the Gates "totality of the circumstances" test to the warrantless search of a vehicle by a police officer, see, e.g. Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237 (2013).

[1] Byars v. United States, 273 U.S. 28 (1927) (affiant stated he "has good reason to believe and does believe" that defendant has contraband materials in his possession); Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480 (1958) (complainant merely stated his conclusion that the defendant had committed a crime). See also Nathanson v. United States, 290 U.S. 41 (1933).

[2] 380 U.S. 102 (1965).

[3] 380 U.S. at 109.

[1] Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 730–31 (1961); Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476, 485 (1965).

[2] 367 U.S. 717 (1961). See Kingsley Books v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436 (1957).

publications pursuant to warrant issued ex parte by a magistrate who had not examined any of the publications but who had relied on the conclusory affidavit of a policeman was voided. Failure to scrutinize the materials and to particularize the items to be seized was deemed inadequate, and it was further noted that police "were provided with no guide to the exercise of informed discretion, because there was no step in the procedure before seizure designed to focus searchingly on the question of obscenity."[3] A state procedure that was designed to comply with Marcus by the presentation of copies of books to be seized to the magistrate for his scrutiny prior to issuance of a warrant was nonetheless found inadequate by a plurality of the Court, which concluded that "since the warrant here authorized the sheriff to seize all copies of the specified titles, and since [appellant] was not afforded a hearing on the question of the obscenity even of the seven novels [seven of fifty-nine listed titles were reviewed by the magistrate] before the warrant issued, the procedure was . . . constitutionally deficient."[4]

Confusion remains, however, about the necessity for and the character of prior adversary hearings on the issue of obscenity. In a later decision the Court held that, with adequate safeguards, no pre-seizure adversary hearing on the issue of obscenity is required if the film is seized not for the purpose of destruction as contraband (the purpose in Marcus and A Quantity of Books), but instead to preserve a copy for evidence.[5] It is constitutionally permissible to seize a copy of a film pursuant to a warrant as long as there is a prompt post-seizure adversary hearing on the obscenity issue. Until there is a judicial determination of obscenity, the Court advised, the film may continue to be exhibited; if no other copy is available either a copy of it must be made from the seized film or the film itself must be returned.[6]

The seizure of a film without the authority of a constitutionally sufficient warrant is invalid; seizure cannot be justified as incidental to arrest, as the determination of obscenity may not be made by the officer himself.[7] Nor may a warrant issue based "solely on the conclusory assertions of the police officer without any inquiry by the [magistrate] into the factual basis for the officer's conclusions."[8] Instead, a warrant must be "supported by affidavits setting forth specific facts in order that the issuing magistrate may 'focus searchingly on the question of obscenity.'"[9] This does not mean, however, that a higher standard of probable cause is required in order to obtain a warrant to seize materials protected by the First Amendment. "Our reference in Roaden to a 'higher hurdle . . . of reasonableness' was not intended to establish a 'higher' standard of probable cause for the issuance of a warrant to seize books or films, but instead related to the more basic requirement, imposed by that decision, that the police not rely on the 'exigency' exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement, but instead obtain a warrant from a magistrate . . . ."'[10]

In Stanford v. Texas,[11] the Court voided a seizure of more than 2,000 books, pamphlets, and other documents pursuant to a warrant that merely authorized the seizure of books,

---

[3] Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 732 (1961).

[4] A Quantity of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205, 210 (1964).

[5] Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483 (1973).

[6] Id. at 492–93. But cf. New York v. P.J. Video, Inc., 475 U.S. 868, 875 n.6 (1986), rejecting the defendant's assertion, based on Heller, that only a single copy rather than all copies of allegedly obscene movies should have been seized pursuant to warrant.

[7] Roaden v. Kentucky, 413 U.S. 496 (1973). See also Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979); Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980). These special constraints are inapplicable when obscene materials are purchased, and there is consequently no Fourth Amendment search or seizure. Maryland v. Macon, 472 U.S. 463 (1985).

[8] Lee Art Theatre, Inc. v. Virginia, 392 U.S. 636, 637 (1968) (per curiam).

[9] New York v. P.J. Video, Inc., 475 U.S. 868, 873–74 (1986) (quoting Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 732 (1961)).

[10] New York v. P.J. Video, Inc., 475 U.S. 868, 875 n.6 (1986).

[11] 379 U.S. 476 (1965).

pamphlets, and other written instruments "concerning the Communist Party of Texas." "[T]he constitutional requirement that warrants must particularly describe the 'things to be seized' is to be accorded the most scrupulous exactitude when the 'things' are books, and the basis for their seizure is the ideas which they contain. . . . No less a standard could be faithful to First Amendment freedoms."[12]

However, the First Amendment does not bar the issuance or execution of a warrant to search a newsroom to obtain photographs of demonstrators who had injured several policemen, although the Court appeared to suggest that a magistrate asked to issue such a warrant should guard against interference with press freedoms through limits on type, scope, and intrusiveness of the search.[13]

Amdt4.5 Warrant Requirement

Amdt4.5.1 Overview of Warrant Requirement

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Emphasis upon the necessity of warrants places the judgment of an independent magistrate between law enforcement officers and the privacy of citizens, authorizes invasion of that privacy only upon a showing that constitutes probable cause, and limits that invasion by specification of the person to be seized, the place to be searched, and the evidence to be sought.[1] Although a warrant is issued ex parte, its validity may be contested in a subsequent suppression hearing if incriminating evidence is found and a prosecution is brought.[2]

Amdt4.5.2 Neutral and Detached Magistrate

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but

---

[12] 379 U.S. at 485–86. See also Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 723 (1961).

[13] Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978). See id. at 566 (containing suggestion mentioned in text), and id. at 566 (Powell, J., concurring) (more expressly adopting that position). In the Privacy Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 96-440, 94 Stat. 1879 (1980), 42 U.S.C. § 2000aa, Congress provided extensive protection against searches and seizures not only of the news media and news people but also of others engaged in disseminating communications to the public, unless there is probable cause to believe the person protecting the materials has committed or is committing the crime to which the materials relate.

[1] Although the exceptions may be different for arrest warrants and search warrants, the requirements for the issuance of the two are the same. Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 112 n.3 (1964). Also, the standards by which the validity of warrants are to be judged are the same, whether federal or state officers are involved. Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963).

[2] Most often, in the suppression hearings, the defendant will challenge the sufficiency of the evidence presented to the magistrate to constitute probable cause. Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969); United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573 (1971). He may challenge the veracity of the statements used by the police to procure the warrant and otherwise contest the accuracy of the allegations going to establish probable cause, but the Court has carefully hedged his ability to do so. Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978). He may also question the power of the official issuing the warrant, Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 449–53 (1971), or the specificity of the particularity required. Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192 (1927).

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In numerous cases, the Court has referred to the necessity that warrants be issued by a "judicial officer" or a "magistrate."[1] "The point of the Fourth Amendment, which often is not grasped by zealous officers, is not that it denies law enforcement the support of the usual inferences which reasonable men draw from evidence. Its protection consists in requiring that those inferences be drawn by a neutral and detached magistrate instead of being judged by the officer engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime. Any assumption that evidence sufficient to support a magistrate's disinterested determination to issue a search warrant will justify the officers in making a search without a warrant would reduce the Amendment to a nullity and leave the people's homes secure only in the discretion of police officers."[2] These cases do not mean that only a judge or an official who is a lawyer may issue warrants, but they do stand for two tests of the validity of the power of the issuing party to so act. "He must be neutral and detached, and he must be capable of determining whether probable cause exists for the requested arrest or search."[3] The first test cannot be met when the issuing party is himself engaged in law enforcement activities,[4] but the Court has not required that an issuing party have that independence of tenure and guarantee of salary that characterizes federal judges.[5] And, in passing on the second test, the Court has been essentially pragmatic in assessing whether the issuing party possesses the capacity to determine probable cause.[6]

Amdt4.5.3 Probable Cause Requirement

Fourth Amendment:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The concept of "probable cause" is central to the meaning of the Warrant Clause. Neither the Fourth Amendment nor the federal statutory provisions relevant to the area define

---

[1] United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452, 464 (1932); Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480, 486 (1958); Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 270 (1960); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 356 (1967); United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 321 (1972); United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 9 (1977); Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979).

[2] Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 13–14 (1948).

[3] Shadwick v. City of Tampa, 407 U.S. 345, 354 (1972).

[4] Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 449–51 (1971) (warrant issued by state attorney general who was leading investigation and who as a justice of the peace was authorized to issue warrants); Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 370–72 (1968) (subpoena issued by district attorney could not qualify as a valid search warrant); Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979) (justice of the peace issued open-ended search warrant for obscene materials, accompanied police during its execution, and made probable cause determinations at the scene as to particular items).

[5] Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 270–71 (1960) (approving issuance of warrants by United States Commissioners, many of whom were not lawyers and none of whom had any guarantees of tenure and salary); Shadwick v. City of Tampa, 407 U.S. 345 (1972) (approving issuance of arrest warrants for violation of city ordinances by city clerks who were assigned to and supervised by municipal court judges). The Court reserved the question "whether a State may lodge warrant authority in someone entirely outside the sphere of the judicial branch. Many persons may not qualify as the kind of 'public civil officers' we have come to associate with the term 'magistrate.' Had the Tampa clerk been entirely divorced from a judicial position, this case would have presented different considerations." Id. at 352.

[6] 407 U.S. at 350–54 (placing on defendant the burden of demonstrating that the issuing official lacks capacity to determine probable cause). See also Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245 (1977) (unsalaried justice of the peace who receives a sum of money for each warrant issued but nothing for reviewing and denying a warrant is not sufficiently detached).

"probable cause"; the definition is entirely a judicial construct. An applicant for a warrant must present to the magistrate facts sufficient to enable the officer himself to make a determination of probable cause. "In determining what is probable cause . . . [w]e are concerned only with the question whether the affiant had reasonable grounds at the time of his affidavit . . . for the belief that the law was being violated on the premises to be searched; and if the apparent facts set out in the affidavit are such that a reasonably discreet and prudent man would be led to believe that there was a commission of the offense charged, there is probable cause justifying the issuance of a warrant."[1] Probable cause is to be determined according to "the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act."[2] Warrants are favored in the law and their use will not be thwarted by a hypertechnical reading of the supporting affidavit and supporting testimony.[3] For the same reason, reviewing courts will accept evidence of a less "judicially competent or persuasive character than would have justified an officer in acting on his own without a warrant."[4] Courts will sustain the determination of probable cause so long as "there was substantial basis for [the magistrate] to conclude that" there was probable cause.[5]

Amdt4.5.4 Particularity Requirement

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"The requirement that warrants shall particularly describe the things to be seized makes general searches under them impossible and prevents the seizure of one thing under a warrant describing another. As to what is to be taken, nothing is left to the discretion of the officer executing the warrant."[1] This requirement thus acts to limit the scope of the search, as the executing officers should be limited to looking in places where the described object could be

---

[1] Dumbra v. United States, 268 U.S. 435, 439, 441 (1925). "[T]he term 'probable cause'. . . means less than evidence which would justify condemnation." Lock v. United States, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 339, 348 (1813). See Steele v. United States, 267 U.S. 498, 504–05 (1925). It may rest upon evidence that is not legally competent in a criminal trial, Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307, 311 (1959), and it need not be sufficient to prove guilt in a criminal trial. Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 173 (1949). See United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102, 107–08 (1965). An "anticipatory" warrant does not violate the Fourth Amendment as long as there is probable cause to believe that the condition precedent to execution of the search warrant will occur and that, once it has occurred, "there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a specified place." United States v. Grubbs, 547 U.S. 90, 95 (2006), quoting Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238 (1983). "An anticipatory warrant is 'a warrant based upon an affidavit showing probable cause that at some future time (but not presently) certain evidence of a crime will be located at a specified place.'" 547 U.S. at 94.

[2] Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 175 (1949).

[3] United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102, 108–09 (1965).

[4] Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 270–71 (1960). Similarly, the preference for proceeding by warrant leads to a stricter rule for appellate review of trial court decisions on warrantless stops and searches than is employed to review probable cause to issue a warrant. Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690 (1996) (determinations of reasonable suspicion to stop and probable cause to search without a warrant should be subjected to de novo appellate review).

[5] Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 111 (1964). It must be emphasized that the issuing party "must judge for himself the persuasiveness of the facts relied on by a [complainant] to show probable cause." Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480, 486 (1958). An insufficient affidavit cannot be rehabilitated by testimony after issuance concerning information possessed by the affiant but not disclosed to the magistrate. Whiteley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560 (1971).

[1] Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192, 196 (1927). See Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476 (1965). Of course, police who are lawfully on the premises pursuant to a warrant may seize evidence of crime in "plain view" even if that evidence is not described in the warrant. Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 464–71 (1971).

expected to be found.[2] The purpose of the particularity requirement extends beyond prevention of general searches; it also assures the person whose property is being searched of the lawful authority of the executing officer and of the limits of his power to search. It follows, therefore, that the warrant itself must describe with particularity the items to be seized, or that such itemization must appear in documents incorporated by reference in the warrant and actually shown to the person whose property is to be searched.[3]

Amdt4.5.5 Knock and Announce Rule

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fourth Amendment's "general touchstone of reasonableness . . . governs the method of execution of the warrant."[1] Until recently, however, most such issues have been dealt with by statute and rule.[2] It was a rule at common law that before an officer could break and enter he must give notice of his office, authority, and purpose and must in effect be refused admittance,[3] and until recently this has been a statutory requirement in the federal system[4] and generally in the states. In Ker v. California,[5] the Court considered the rule of announcement as a constitutional requirement, although a majority there found circumstances justifying entry without announcement.

In Wilson v. Arkansas,[6] the Court determined that the common law "knock and announce" rule is an element of the Fourth Amendment reasonableness inquiry. The rule is merely a presumption, however, that yields under various circumstances, including those posing a

---

[2] In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 17–19, (1968), the Court wrote: "This Court has held in the past that a search which is reasonable at its inception may violate the Fourth Amendment by virtue of its intolerable intensity and scope. Kremen v. United States, 353 U.S. 346 (1957); Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 344, 356–58 (1931); see United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S. 581, 586–87 (1948). The scope of the search must be 'strictly tied to and justified by' the circumstances which rendered its initiation permissible. Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 310 (1967) (Fortas, J., concurring); see, e.g., Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364, 367–368 (1964); Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 30–31 (1925)." See also Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463, 470–82 (1976), and id. at 484, 492–93 (Brennan, J., dissenting). In Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 569 (1969), Justices Potter Stewart, William Brennan, and Byron White would have based the decision on the principle that a valid warrant for gambling paraphernalia did not authorize police upon discovering motion picture films in the course of the search to project the films to learn their contents.

[3] Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551 (2004) (a search based on a warrant that did not describe the items to be seized was "plainly invalid"; particularity contained in supporting documents not cross-referenced by the warrant and not accompanying the warrant is insufficient); United States v. Grubbs, 547 U.S. 90, 97, 99 (2006) (because the language of the Fourth Amendment "specifies only two matters that must be 'particularly describ[ed]' in the warrant: 'the place to be searched' and 'the persons or things to be seized[,]' . . . the Fourth Amendment does not require that the triggering condition for an anticipatory warrant be set forth in the warrant itself."

[1] United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65, 71 (1998).

[2] Rule 41(c), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, provides, inter alia, that the warrant shall command its execution in the daytime, unless the magistrate "for reasonable cause shown" directs in the warrant that it be served at some other time. See Jones v. United States, 357 U.S. 493, 498–500 (1958); Gooding v. United States, 416 U.S. 430 (1974). A separate statutory rule applies to narcotics cases. 21 U.S.C. § 879(a).

[3] Semayne's Case, 5 Coke's Rep. 91a, 77 Eng. Rep. 194 (K.B. 1604).

[4] 18 U.S.C. § 3109. See Miller v. United States, 357 U.S. 301 (1958); Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963).

[5] 374 U.S. 23 (1963). Ker was an arrest warrant case, but no reason appears for differentiating search warrants. Eight Justices agreed that federal standards should govern and that the rule of announcement was of constitutional stature, but they divided 4-4 whether entry in this case had been pursuant to a valid exception. Justice John Harlan who had dissented from the federal standards issue joined the four finding a justifiable exception to carry the result.

[6] 514 U.S. 927 (1995).

threat of physical violence to officers, those in which a prisoner has escaped and taken refuge in his dwelling, and those in which officers have reason to believe that destruction of evidence is likely. The test, articulated two years later in Richards v. Wisconsin,[7] is whether police have "a reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing their presence, under the particular circumstances, would be dangerous or futile, or that it would inhibit the effective investigation of the crime." In Richards, the Court held that there is no blanket exception to the rule whenever officers are executing a search warrant in a felony drug investigation; instead, a case-by-case analysis is required to determine whether no-knock entry is justified under the circumstances.[8] Similarly, if officers choose to knock and announce before searching for drugs, circumstances may justify forced entry if there is not a prompt response.[9] Recent federal laws providing for the issuance of warrants authorizing in certain circumstances "no-knock" entries to execute warrants will no doubt present the Court with opportunities to explore the configurations of the rule of announcement.[10] A statute regulating the expiration of a warrant and issuance of another "should be liberally construed in favor of the individual."[11] Similarly, just as the existence of probable cause must be established by fresh facts, so the execution of the warrant should be done in timely fashion so as to ensure so far as possible the continued existence of probable cause.[12]

Amdt4.5.6 Other Considerations When Executing a Warrant

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Because police actions in execution of a warrant must be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion, and because privacy of the home lies at the core of the Fourth Amendment, police officers violate the Amendment by bringing members of the media or other third parties into a home during execution of a warrant if presence of those persons was not in aid of execution of the warrant.[1]

In executing a warrant for a search of premises and of named persons on the premises, police officers may not automatically search someone else found on the premises.[2] If they can articulate some reasonable basis for fearing for their safety they may conduct a "patdown" of

---

[7] 520 U.S. 385, 394 (1997).

[8] The fact that officers may have to destroy property in order to conduct a no-knock entry has no bearing on the reasonableness of their decision not to knock and announce. United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65 (1998).

[9] United States v. Banks, 540 U.S. 31 (2003) (forced entry was permissible after officers executing a warrant to search for drugs knocked, announced "police search warrant," and waited fifteen to twenty-five seconds with no response).

[10] In narcotics cases, magistrates are authorized to issue "no-knock" warrants if they find there is probable cause to believe (1) the property sought may, and if notice is given, will be easily and quickly destroyed or (2) giving notice will endanger the life or safety of the executing officer or another person. 21 U.S.C. § 879(b). See also D.C. Code, § 23-591.

[11] Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206 (1932).

[12] Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206 (1932).

[1] Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999). Accord, Hanlon v. Berger, 526 U.S. 808 (1999) (media camera crew "ride-along" with Fish and Wildlife Service agents executing a warrant to search respondent's ranch for evidence of illegal taking of wildlife).

[2] Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979) (patron in a bar), relying on and reaffirming United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S. 581 (1948) (occupant of vehicle may not be searched merely because there are grounds to search the automobile). But the person, but in order to search they must have probable cause particularized with respect to that person. However, in Michigan v. Summers,[3] the Court held that officers arriving to execute a warrant for the search of a house could detain, without being required to articulate any reasonable basis and necessarily therefore without probable cause, the owner or occupant of the house, whom they encountered on the front porch leaving the premises. The Court determined that such a detention, which was "substantially less intrusive" than an arrest, was justified because of the law enforcement interests in minimizing the risk of harm to officers, facilitating entry and conduct of the search, and preventing flight in the event incriminating evidence is found.[4] For the same reasons, officers may use "reasonable force," including handcuffs, to effectuate a detention.[5] Also, under some circumstances, officers may search premises on the mistaken but reasonable belief that the premises are described in an otherwise valid warrant.[6]

Limits on detention incident to a search were addressed in Bailey v. United States, a case in which an occupant exited his residence and traveled some distance before being stopped and detained.[7] The Bailey Court held that the detention was not constitutionally sustainable under the rule announced in Summers.[8] According to the Court, application of the categorical exception to probable cause requirements for detention incident to a search is determined by spatial proximity, that is, whether the occupant is found "within the immediate vicinity of the premises to be searched,"[9] and not by temporal proximity, that is, whether the occupant is detained "as soon as reasonably practicable" consistent with safety and security. In so holding, the Court reasoned that limiting the Summers rule to the area within which an occupant poses a real threat ensures that the scope of the rule regarding detention incident to a search is confined to its underlying justification.[10]

Although, for purposes of execution, as for many other matters, there is little difference between search warrants and arrest warrants, one notable difference is that the possession of see Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366 (2003) (distinguishing Ybarra on basis that passengers in car often have "common enterprise," and noting that the tip in Di Re implicated only the driver).

---

[3] 452 U.S. 692 (1981).

[4] 452 U.S. at 701–06. Ybarra was distinguished on the basis of its greater intrusiveness and the lack of sufficient connection with the premises. Id. at 695 n.4. By the time Summers was searched, police had probable cause to do so. Id. at 695. The warrant here was for contraband, id. at 701, and a different rule may apply with respect to warrants for other evidence, id. at 705 n.20. In Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. 609 (2007), the Court found no Fourth Amendment violation where deputies did not know that the suspects had sold the house that the deputies had a warrant to search. The deputies entered the house and found the new owners, of a different race from the suspects, sleeping in the nude. The deputies held the new owners at gunpoint for one to two minutes without allowing them to dress or cover themselves. As for the difference in race, the Court noted that, "[w]hen the deputies ordered white respondents from their bed, they had no way of knowing whether the African-American suspects were elsewhere in the house." Id. at 613. As for not allowing the new owners to dress or cover themselves, the Court quoted its statement in Michigan v. Summers that "[t]he risk of harm to both the police and the occupants is minimized if the officers routinely exercise unquestioned command of the situation." Id. at 1993 (quoting 452 U.S. at 702–03).

[5] Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 98–99 (2005) (also upholding questioning the handcuffed detainee about her immigration status).

[6] Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79 (1987) (officers reasonably believed there was only one "third floor apartment" in city row house when in fact there were two).

[7] 568 U.S. 186 (2013). In Bailey, the police obtained a warrant to search Bailey's residence for firearms and drugs Id. at 190. Meanwhile, detectives staked out the residence, saw Bailey leave and drive away, and then called in a search team. Id. While the search was proceeding, the detectives tailed Bailey for about a mile before stopping and detaining him. Id. at 190–92.

[8] As an alternative ground, the district court had found that stopping Bailey was lawful as an investigatory stop under Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 20 (1968), but the Supreme Court offered no opinion on whether, assuming the stop was valid under Terry, the resulting interaction between law enforcement and Bailey could independently have justified Bailey's detention. Bailey, 568 U.S. at 202.

[9] Bailey, 568 U.S. at 202–04.

[10] Id. at 202.

a valid arrest warrant cannot authorize authorities to enter the home of a third party looking for the person named in the warrant; in order to do that, they need a search warrant signifying that a magistrate has determined that there is probable cause to believe the person named is on the premises.[11]

Amdt4.6 Exceptions to Warrant Requirement

Amdt4.6.1 Overview of Exceptions to Warrant Requirement

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Although the Supreme Court stresses the importance of warrants and has repeatedly referred to searches without warrants as "exceptional,"[1] it appears that the greater number of searches, as well as the vast number of arrests, take place without warrants. The Reporters of the American Law Institute Project on a Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure have noted "their conviction that, as a practical matter, searches without warrant and incidental to arrest have been up to this time, and may remain, of greater practical importance" than searches pursuant to warrants. "[T]he evidence on hand . . . compel[s] the conclusion that searches under warrants have played a comparatively minor part in law enforcement, except in connection with narcotics and gambling laws."[2] Nevertheless, the Court frequently asserts that "the most basic constitutional rule in this area is that 'searches conducted outside the judicial process, without prior approval by judge or magistrate, are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specially established and well-delineated exceptions.'"[3] The exceptions are said to be "jealously and carefully drawn,"[4] and there must be "a showing by those who seek exemption . . . that the exigencies of the situation made that course imperative."[5] Although the record indicates an effort to categorize the exceptions, the number and breadth of those exceptions have been growing.

Amdt4.6.2 Consent Searches

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but

---

[11] Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981). An arrest warrant is a necessary and sufficient authority to enter a suspect's home to arrest him. Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980).

[1] E.g., Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 14 (1948); McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451, 453 (1948); Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523, 528–29 (1967); G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 352–53, 355 (1977).

[2] American Law Institute, A Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure, Tent. Draft No. 3 (Philadelphia: 1970), xix.

[3] Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 454–55 (1971) (quoting Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 357 (1967)); G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 352–53, 358 (1977).

[4] Jones v. United States, 357 U.S. 493, 499 (1958).

[5] McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451, 456 (1948). In general, with regard to exceptions to the warrant clause, conduct must be tested by the reasonableness standard enunciated by the first clause of the Amendment, Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 20 (1968). The Court's development of its privacy expectation tests substantially changed the content of that standard.

upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Fourth Amendment rights, like other constitutional rights, may be waived, and one may consent to a search of his person or premises by officers who have not complied with the Amendment.[1] The Court, however, has insisted that the burden is on the prosecution to prove the voluntariness of the consent[2] and awareness of the right of choice.[3] Reviewing courts must determine on the basis of the totality of the circumstances whether consent has been freely given or has been coerced. Actual knowledge of the right to refuse consent is not essential for a search to be found voluntary, and police therefore are not required to inform a person of his rights, as through a Fourth Amendment version of Miranda warnings.[4] But consent will not be regarded as voluntary when the officer asserts his official status and claim of right and the occupant yields because of these factors.[5] When consent is obtained through the deception of an undercover officer or an informer's gaining admission without advising a suspect who he is, the Court has held that the suspect has simply assumed the risk that an invitee would betray him, and evidence obtained through the deception is admissible.[6] Moreover, while the Court has appeared to endorse implied consent laws that view individuals who engage in certain regulated activities as having implicitly agreed to certain searches related to that activity and the enforcement of such laws through civil penalties,[7] the implied consent doctrine does not extend so far as to deem individuals to have impliedly consented to a search on "pain of committing a criminal offense."[8]

Additional issues arise in determining the validity of consent to search when consent is given not by the suspect, but by a third party. In the earlier cases, third-party consent was deemed sufficient if that party "possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected."[9] Now, however, actual common authority over the premises is not required; it is sufficient if the searching officer had a reasonable but mistaken belief that the third party had common authority and could consent

[1] Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313 (1921); Zap v. United States, 328 U.S. 624 (1946); Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973).

[2] Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968).

[3] Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 13 (1948).

[4] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 231–33 (1973). See also Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996) (officer need not always inform a detained motorist that he is free to go before consent to search auto may be deemed voluntary); United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 207 (2002) (totality of circumstances indicated that bus passenger consented to search even though officer did not explicitly state that passenger was free to refuse permission).

[5] Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313 (1921); Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948); Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968).

[6] On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747 (1952); Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427 (1963); Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966); Lewis v. United States, 385 U.S. 206 (1966); United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971). Cf. Osborn v. United States, 385 U.S. 323 (1966) (prior judicial approval obtained before wired informer sent into defendant's presence). Problems may be encountered by police, however, in special circumstances. See Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964); United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984) (installation of beeper with consent of informer who sold container with beeper to suspect is permissible with prior judicial approval, but use of beeper to monitor private residence is not).

[7] See, e.g., Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 161 (2013) (plurality opinion) (discussing implied consent laws that "require motorists, as a condition of operating a motor vehicle, . . . to consent to [blood alcohol concentration] testing if they are arrested or otherwise detained on suspicion of a drunk-driving offense" or risk losing their license); South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. 553, 554, 563–64 (1983); see also Mitchell v Wisconsin, No. 18-6210 (U.S. June 27, 2019) (upholding Wisconsin's implied consent law that allows for taking a blood sample from an unconscious drunk driver).

[8] See Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2185–86 (2016).

[9] United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 (1974) (valid consent by woman with whom defendant was living and sharing the bedroom searched). See also Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961) (landlord's consent insufficient); Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964) (hotel desk clerk lacked authority to consent to search of guest's room); Frazier v. Culp, 394 U.S. 731 (1969) (joint user of duffel bag had authority to consent to search).

to the search.[10] If, however, one occupant consents to a search of shared premises, but a physically present co-occupant expressly objects to the search, the search is unreasonable.[11] Common social expectations inform the analysis. A person at the threshold of a residence could not confidently conclude he was welcome to enter over the express objection of a present co-tenant. Expectations may change, however, if the objecting co-tenant leaves, or is removed from, the premises with no prospect of imminent return.[12]

Amdt4.6.3 Exigent Circumstances and Warrants

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Court has recognized "the exigencies of the situation" as an exception to the warrant requirement, which "make the needs of law enforcement so compelling that the warrantless search is objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment."[1] Exigent circumstances requires a court "to examine whether an emergency justified a warrantless search in each particular case."[2] The Court has identified several types of circumstances that give rise to an exigency sufficient to justify a warrantless search, including a search incident to arrest,[3] law enforcement's need to provide emergency aid,[4] "hot pursuit" of a fleeing suspect,[5] and the [10] Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990). See also Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 251 (1991) (it was "objectively reasonable" for officer to believe that suspect's consent to search his car for narcotics included consent to search containers found within the car).

---

[11] Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. 103 (2006) (warrantless search of a defendant's residence based on his estranged wife's consent was unreasonable and invalid as applied to a physically present defendant who expressly refused to permit entry). The Court in Randolph admitted that it was "drawing a fine line," id. at 121, between situations where the defendant is present and expressly refuses consent, and that of United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 (1974), and Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990), where the defendants were nearby but were not asked for their permission. In a dissenting opinion, Chief Justice John Roberts observed that the majority's ruling "provides protection on a random and happenstance basis, protecting, for example, a co-occupant who happens to be at the front door when the other occupant consents to a search, but not one napping or watching television in the next room." 547 U.S. at 127.

[12] Fernandez v. California, 571 U.S. 292 (2014) (consent by co-occupant sufficient to overcome objection of a second co-occupant who was arrested and removed from the premises, so long as the arrest and removal were objectively reasonable).

[1] Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 394 (1978); see also Kirk v. Louisiana, 536 U.S. 635, 638 (2002) (per curiam) (holding that "police officers need either a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances in order to make a lawful entry into a home"); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 590 (1980) ("[T]he Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant.").

[2] Riley v. California, 573 U.S. 373, 402 (2014).

[3] See Amdt4.6.4.1 Search Incident to Arrest Doctrine.

[4] Michigan v. Fisher, 558 U.S. 45, 47–48 (2009) (per curiam); Brigham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398, 403 (2006); see also McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451, 455 (1948) ("Absent some grave emergency, the Fourth Amendment has interposed a magistrate between the citizen and the police.").

[5] United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42–43 (1976); see also Birchfield v. North Dakota, 579 U.S. 438, 456 (2016) ("The exigent circumstances exception allows a warrantless search when an emergency leaves police insufficient time to seek a warrant. It permits, for instance, the warrantless entry of private property when there is a need to provide urgent aid to those inside, when police are in hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect, and when police fear the imminent destruction of evidence."); Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509–10 (1979) (recognizing entering a burning building to put out a fire and investigate its cause constitutes exigent circumstances).

prevention of the imminent destruction of evidence.[6] In situations absent dangerous and life-threatening circumstances, the Court recognizes that warrantless searches are permissible in circumstances where "there is a compelling need for official action and no time to secure a warrant."[7]

The Court has refused to adopt a categorical rule as to what circumstances constitutes an exigency and, instead, applies a case-by-case analysis dependent on "all of the facts and circumstances of the particular case."[8] To determine whether exigent circumstances existed to justify a warrantless search, the Court "looks to the totality of circumstances."[9] In rendering emergency assistance, the officer must have "an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that an individual within the home was in need of immediate assistance.[10] When the police, in executing a warrantless search, have not created the exigency in question, the Court has held that such "warrantless entry to prevent the destruction of evidence is reasonable and thus allowed."[11] In contrast, the Court in Johnson v. United States rejected the government's claim that exigent circumstances justified a warrantless search of an individual's home.[12] In Johnson, the police gained entry into the suspect's home after a "demand[ ] under color of office."[13] The Court, in rejecting the government's claim that the search was conducted because of the "opium smell in the room," held that the government offered no reason "for not obtaining a search warrant except the inconvenience to the officers and some slight delay necessary to prepare papers and present the evidence to a magistrate."[14] The Court reasoned that "[t]hese are never very convincing reasons and, in these circumstances, certainly are not enough to by-pass the constitutional requirement. No suspect was fleeing or likely to take flight. The search was of permanent premises, not of a movable vehicle. No evidence or contraband was threatened with removal or destruction, except perhaps the fumes which [the Court] suppose[d] in time would disappear."[15]

In terms of determining the reasonableness for the police to proceed without a warrant when they are in hot pursuit of a suspect, the Court has held that, in such circumstances, "the need to act quickly . . . is even greater . . . while the intrusion is much less."[16] For example, the Court has held that the "Fourth Amendment does not require police officers to delay in the [6] Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291, 296 (1973); Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 40–41 (1963); see Brigham City, 547 U.S. at 403; Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. 103, 116, n. 6, (2006); Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 100 (1990). See also Amdt4.6.4.1 Search Incident to Arrest Doctrine and Amdt4.6.4.2 Vehicle Searches.

---

[7] Tyler, 436 U.S. at 509.

[8] Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 151–52 (2013); Cf. id. at 150, n. 3 (discussing "a limited class of traditional exceptions to the warrant requirement that apply categorically and thus do not require an assessment of whether the policy justifications underlying the exception"); but see Brigham City, 547 U.S. at 403 (listing prior holdings that found exigent circumstances)

[9] Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 149 (2013); see also City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398, 406 (2006)

[10] Michigan v. Fisher, 558 U.S. 45, 47 (2009) (per curiam) (quoting Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)).

[11] Kentucky v. King, 563 U.S. 452, 462 (2011); id. at 470 ("Any warrantless entry based on exigent circumstances must, of course, be supported by a genuine exigency."); see also Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 42 (1963) (upholding a warrantless search of an apartment, finding that "[t]he officers had reason to act quickly because of Ker's furtive conduct and the likelihood that the marijuana would be distributed or hidden before a warrant could be obtained at that time of night").

[12] 333 U.S. 10 (1948).

[13] Id. at 13.

[14] Id. at 15.

[15] Id.

[16] United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42 (1976); See id. at 43 ("[A] suspect may not defeat an arrest which has been set in motion in a public place . . . by the expedient of escaping to a private place."); Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 297–98 (1967) course of an investigation if to do so would gravely endanger their lives or the lives of others."[17] In Lange v. California, the Court reiterated that the exigent circumstances exception is generally applied on a "case-by-case basis,"[18] and declined to hold that pursuing a misdemeanor suspect categorically qualifies as an exigent circumstance exception to the warrant requirement.[19]

Amdt4.6.4 Warrantless Searches Dependent on Probable Cause

Amdt4.6.4.1 Search Incident to Arrest Doctrine

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The common-law rule permitting searches of the person of an arrestee as an incident to the arrest has occasioned little controversy in the Court.[1] The Court has even upheld a search incident to an illegal (albeit not unconstitutional) arrest.[2] The dispute has centered around the scope of the search. Because it was the stated general rule that the scope of a warrantless search must be strictly tied to and justified by the circumstances that rendered its justification permissible, and because it was the rule that the justification of a search of the arrestee was to prevent destruction of evidence and to prevent access to a weapon,[3] it was argued to the Court that a search of the person of the defendant arrested for a traffic offense, which discovered heroin in a crumpled cigarette package, was impermissible, because there could have been no destructible evidence relating to the offense for which he was arrested and no weapon could have been concealed in the cigarette package. The Court rejected this argument, ruling that "no additional justification" is required for a custodial arrest of a suspect based on probable cause.[4]

The Court has disavowed a case-by-case evaluation of searches made post-arrest[5] and instead has embraced categorical evaluations as to post-arrest searches. Thus, in Riley v.

---

[17] Warden, 387 U.S. at 298–99.

[18] No. 20-18, slip op. at 4 (U.S. June 23, 2021).

[19] Id. at 16.

[1] Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 392 (1914); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 158 (1925); Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 30 (1925).

[2] Virginia v. Moore, 128 S. Ct. 1598 (2008) (holding that, where an arrest for a minor offense is prohibited by state law, the arrest will not violate the Fourth Amendment if it was based on probable cause).

[3] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 19 (1968); Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 762, 763 (1969). The Court, in Birchfield v. North Dakota, explained that the precedent allowing for a warrantless search of an arrestee in order to prevent the destruction of evidence applies to both evidence that could be actively destroyed by a suspect and to evidence that can be destroyed due to a natural process, such as the natural dissipation of the alcohol content in a suspect's blood. 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2182–83 (2016).

[4] United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218, 235 (1973). See also id. at 237–38 (Powell, J., concurring). The Court applied the same rule in Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973), involving a search of a motorist's person following his custodial arrest for an offense for which a citation would normally have issued. Unlike the situation in Robinson, police regulations did not require the Gustafson officer to take the suspect into custody, nor did a departmental policy guide the officer as to when to conduct a full search. The Court found these differences inconsequential, and left for another day the problem of pretextual arrests in order to obtain basis to search. Soon thereafter, the Court upheld conduct of a similar search at the place of detention, even after a time lapse between the arrest and search. United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974).

[5] In this vein, the search incident to arrest exception to the warrant requirement differs from other exceptions to the warrant requirement, such as the exigent circumstances exception. See Birchfield, 136 S. Ct. at 2174 (noting that California,[6] the Court declined to extend the holding of United States v. Robinson to the search of the digital data contained in a cell phone found on an arrestee. Specifically, the Court distinguished a search of cell phones, which contain vast quantities of personal data, from the limited physical search at issue in Robinson.[7] Focusing primarily on the rationale that searching cell phones would prevent the destruction of evidence, the government argued that cell phone data could be destroyed remotely or become encrypted by the passage of time. The Court, however, both discounted the prevalence of these events and the efficacy of warrantless searches to defeat them. Rather, the Court noted that other means existed besides a search of a cell phone to secure the data contained therein, including turning the phone off or placing the phone in a bag that isolates it from radio waves.[8] Because of the more substantial privacy interests at stake when digital data is involved in a search incident to an arrest and because of the availability of less intrusive alternatives to a warrantless search, the Court in Riley concluded that, as a "simple" categorical rule, before police can search a cell phone incident to an arrest, the police must "get a warrant."[9]

Two years after Riley, the Court again crafted a new brightline rule with respect to searches following an arrest in another "situation[ ] that could not have been envisioned when the Fourth Amendment was adopted."[10] In Birchfield v. North Dakota, the Court examined whether compulsory breath and blood tests administered in order to determine the blood alcohol concentration (BAC) of an automobile driver, following the arrest of that driver for suspected "drunk driving," are unreasonable under the search incident to arrest exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.[11] In examining laws criminalizing the refusal to submit to either a breath or blood test, similar to Riley, the Court relied on a general balancing approach used to assess whether a given category of searches is reasonable, weighing the individual privacy interests implicated by such tests against any legitimate state interests.[12] With respect to breath tests, the Birchfield Court viewed the privacy intrusions posed by such tests as "almost negligible" in that a breath test is functionally equivalent to the process of using a straw to drink a beverage and yields a limited amount of useful information for law enforcement agents.[13] In contrast, the Court concluded that a mandatory blood test raised more serious privacy interests,[14] as blood tests pierce the skin, extract a part of the subject's body, and provide far more information than a breathalyzer test.[15] Turning to the state's interest in obtaining BAC readings for persons arrested for drunk driving, the Birchfield Court acknowledged the government's "paramount interest" in preserving public safety on highways, including the state's need to deter drunk driving from occurring in the first place through the imposition of criminal penalties for failing to cooperate with drunk driving investigations.[16] Weighing these competing interests, the Court ultimately concluded that the while "other exceptions to the warrant requirement 'apply categorically'," the exigent circumstances exception to the warrant requirement applies on a case-by-case basis (quoting Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 150 n.3 (2013))).

---

[6] 573 U.S. 373 (2014).

[7] "Cell phones differ in both a quantitative and a qualitative sense from other objects that might be kept on an arrestee's person." Id. at 393.

[8] Id. at 390.

[9] Id. at 403.

[10] See Birchfield, 136 S. Ct. at 2176.

[11] Id. at 2176.

[12] Id.

[13] Id. at 2176–78. The Court disclaimed a criminal defendant's possessory interest in the air in his lungs, as air in one's lungs is not a part of one's body and is regularly exhaled from the lungs as a natural process. Id. at 2177.

[14] "Blood tests are a different matter." Id. at 2178.

[15] Id. at 2177–78.

[16] Id. at 2178–79.

Fourth Amendment permits warrantless breath tests incident to arrests for drunk driving because the "impact of breath tests on privacy is slight," whereas the "need for BAC testing is great."[17] In so doing, the Court rejected the alternative of requiring the state to obtain a warrant prior to the administration of a BAC breath test, noting (1) the need for clear, categorical rules to provide police adequate guidance in the context of a search incident to an arrest and (2) the potential administrative burdens that would be incurred if warrants were required prior to every breathalyzer test.[18] Nonetheless, the Court reached a "different conclusion" with respect to blood tests, finding that such tests are "significantly more intrusive" and their "reasonability must be judged in light of the availability of the less intrusive alternative of a breath test."[19] As a consequence, the Court held that while a warrantless breath test following a drunk-driving arrest is categorically permissible as a reasonable search under the Fourth Amendment, a warrantless blood test cannot be justified by the search incident to arrest doctrine.[20]

However, the Justices have long found themselves in disagreement about the scope of the search incident to arrest as it extends beyond the person to the area in which the person is arrested—most commonly either his premises or his vehicle. Certain early cases went both ways on the basis of some fine distinctions,[21] but in Harris v. United States,[22] the Court approved a search of a four-room apartment pursuant to an arrest under warrant for one crime, where the search turned up evidence of another crime. A year later, in Trupiano v. United States,[23] a raid on a distillery resulted in the arrest of a man found on the premises and a seizure of the equipment; the Court reversed the conviction because the officers had had time to obtain a search warrant and had not done so. "A search or seizure without a warrant as an incident to a lawful arrest has always been considered to be a strictly limited right. It grows out of the inherent necessities of the situation at the time of the arrest. But there must be something more in the way of necessity than merely a lawful arrest."[24] The Court in Lange v. California declined to classify categorically the hot pursuit of a fleeing misdemeanor suspect as an exigent circumstance justifying warrantless entry of a premise. Instead, the Court held that the need for a warrant will depend on the totality of the circumstances and a case-by-case analysis of the exigencies present "to determine whether there is a law enforcement emergency."[25]

The Court overruled Trupiano in United States v. Rabinowitz,[26] in which officers had arrested the defendant in his one-room office pursuant to an arrest warrant and proceeded to search the room completely. The Court observed that the issue was not whether the officers

[17] Id. at 2184.

[18] Id. at 2179–81. The Birchfield Court also rejected "more costly" and previously tried alternatives to penalties for refusing a breath test, such as sobriety checkpoints, ignition interlocks, and the use of treatment programs. Id. at 2182–83.

[19] Id. at 2184. In so doing, the Court rejected the argument that warrantless blood tests are needed as an alternative to warrantless breath tests to detect impairing substances other than alcohol or to obtain the BAC of an unconscious or uncooperative driver. Id. at 2184. In such situations, the Court reasoned that the state could obtain a warrant for the blood test, or in the case of an uncooperative driver, prosecute the defendant for refusing to undergo the breath test. Id. at 2184–85.

[20] Id. at 2186–87.

[21] Compare Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192 (1927), with Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 344 (1931), and United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452 (1932).

[22] 331 U.S. 145 (1947).

[23] 334 U.S. 699 (1948).

[24] 334 U.S. at 708.

[25] No. 20-18, slip op. at 16 (U.S. June 23, 2021)

[26] 339 U.S. 56 (1950).

had the time and opportunity to obtain a search warrant but whether the search incident to arrest was reasonable. Though Rabinowitz referred to searches of the area within the arrestee's "immediate control,"[27] it provided no standard by which this area was to be determined, and extensive searches were permitted under the rule.[28]

In Chimel v. California,[29] however, a narrower view was asserted, the primacy of warrants was again emphasized, and a standard by which the scope of searches pursuant to arrest could be ascertained was set out. "When an arrest is made, it is reasonable for the arresting officer to search the person arrested in order to remove any weapons that the latter might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape. Otherwise, the officer's safety might well be endangered, and the arrest itself frustrated. In addition, it is entirely reasonable for the arresting officer to search for and seize any evidence on the arrestee's person in order to prevent its concealment or destruction. And the area into which an arrestee might reach in order to grab a weapon or evidentiary items must, of course, be governed by a like rule. A gun on a table or in a drawer in front of someone who is arrested can be as dangerous to the arresting officer as one concealed in the clothing of the person arrested. There is ample justification, therefore, for a search of the arrestee's person and the area 'within his immediate control'—construing that phrase to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence."

"There is no comparable justification, however, for routinely searching any room other than that in which an arrest occurs—or, for that matter, for searching through all the desk drawers or other closed or concealed areas in that room itself. Such searches, in the absence of well-recognized exceptions, may be made only under the authority of a search warrant."[30]

Although the viability of Chimel had been in doubt for some time as the Court refined and applied its analysis of reasonable and justifiable expectations of privacy,[31] it has in some but not all contexts survived the changed rationale. Thus, in Mincey v. Arizona,[32] the Court rejected a state effort to create a "homicide-scene" exception for a warrantless search of an entire apartment extending over four days. The occupant had been arrested and removed and it was true, the Court observed, that a person legally taken into custody has a lessened right of privacy in his person, but he does not have a lessened right of privacy in his entire house. And, in United States v. Chadwick,[33] emphasizing a person's reasonable expectation of privacy in his luggage or other baggage, the Court held that, once police have arrested and immobilized a suspect, validly seized bags are not subject to search without a warrant.[34] Police may, however,

---

[27] 339 U.S. at 64.

[28] Cf. Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 764–65 & n.10 (1969). But, in Kremen v. United States, 353 U.S. 346 (1957), the Court held that the seizure of the entire contents of a house and the removal to F.B.I. offices 200 miles away for examination, pursuant to an arrest under warrant of one of the persons found in the house, was unreasonable. In decisions contemporaneous to and subsequent to Chimel, applying pre-Chimel standards because that case was not retroactive, Williams v. United States, 401 U.S. 646 (1971), the Court has applied Rabinowitz somewhat restrictively. See Von Cleef v. New Jersey, 395 U.S. 814 (1969), which followed Kremen; Shipley v. California, 395 U.S. 818 (1969), and Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970) (both involving arrests outside the house with subsequent searches of the house); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 455–57 (1971). Substantially extensive searches were, however, approved in Williams v. United States, 401 U.S. 646 (1971), and Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797 (1971).

[29] 395 U.S. 752 (1969).

[30] 395 U.S. at 762–63.

[31] See, e.g., Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 492, 493, 510 (1971), in which the four dissenters advocated the reasonableness argument rejected in Chimel.

[32] 437 U.S. 385, 390–91 (1978). Accord, Flippo v. West Virginia, 528 U.S. 11 (1999) (per curiam).

[33] 433 U.S. 1 (1977). Defendant and his luggage, a footlocker, had been removed to the police station, where the search took place.

[34] If, on the other hand, a sealed shipping container had already been opened and resealed during a valid customs inspection, and officers had maintained surveillance through a "controlled delivery" to the suspect, there is no in the course of jailing an arrested suspect, conduct an inventory search of the individual's personal effects, including the contents of a shoulder bag, since "the scope of a station-house search may in some circumstances be even greater than those supporting a search immediately following arrest."[35]

Chimel has, however, been qualified by another consideration. Not only may officers search areas within the arrestee's immediate control in order to alleviate any threat posed by the arrestee, but they may extend that search if there may be a threat posed by "unseen third parties in the house." A "protective sweep" of the entire premises (including an arrestee's home) may be undertaken on less than probable cause if officers have a "reasonable belief," based on "articulable facts," that the area to be swept may harbor an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene.[36]

Stating that it was "in no way alter[ing] the fundamental principles established in the Chimel case," the Court in New York v. Belton[37] held that police officers who had made a valid arrest of the occupant of a vehicle could make a contemporaneous search of the entire passenger compartment of the automobile, including containers found therein. Believing that a fairly simple rule understandable to authorities in the field was desirable, the Court ruled "that articles inside the relatively narrow compass of the passenger compartment of an automobile are in fact generally, if not inevitably, within 'the area into which an arrestee might reach in order to grab a weapon or evidentiary ite[m].'"[38]

Belton was "widely understood to allow a vehicle search incident to the arrest of a recent occupant even if there is no possibility the arrestee could gain access to the vehicle at the time of the search."[39] In Arizona v. Gant,[40] however, the Court disavowed this understanding of Belton[41] and held that "[p]olice may search a vehicle incident to a recent occupant's arrest only if the arrestee is within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search or it is reasonable to believe that the vehicle contains evidence of the offense of arrest."[42] reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the container, and officers may search it upon the arrest of the suspect, without having obtained a warrant. Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765 (1983).

---

[35] Illinois v. LaFayette, 462 U.S. 640, 645 (1983) (inventory search) (following South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976)). Similarly, an inventory search of an impounded vehicle may include the contents of a closed container. Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367 (1987). Inventory searches of closed containers must, however, be guided by a police policy containing standardized criteria for exercise of discretion. Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1 (1990).

[36] Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 334 (1990). This "sweep" is not to be a full-blown, "top-to-bottom" search, but only "a cursory inspection of those spaces where a person may be found." Id. at 335–36.

[37] 453 U.S. 454, 460 n.3 (1981).

[38] 453 U.S. at 460 (quoting Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 763 (1969)). In this particular instance, Belton had been removed from the automobile and handcuffed, but the Court wished to create a general rule removed from the fact-specific nature of any one case. "'Container' here denotes any object capable of holding another object. It thus includes closed or open glove compartments, consoles, or other receptacles located anywhere within the passenger compartment, as well as luggage, boxes, bags, clothing, and the like. Our holding encompasses only the interior of the passenger compartment of an automobile and does not encompass the trunk." 453 U.S. at 460–61 n.4.

[39] Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 341 (2009).

[40] 556 U.S. 332 (2009).

[41] "To read Belton as authorizing a vehicle search incident to every recent occupant's arrest would . . . untether the rule from the justifications underlying the Chimel exception . . . ." 556 U.S. at 343.

[42] 556 U.S. 332, 351 (2009). Justice Samuel Alito, in a dissenting opinion joined by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Anthony Kennedy and in part by Justice Stephen Breyer, wrote that "there can be no doubt that" the majority had overruled Belton. 556 U.S. at 356.

Amdt4.6.4.2 Vehicle Searches

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In the early days of the automobile, the Court created an exception for searches of vehicles, holding in Carroll v. United States[1] that vehicles may be searched without warrants if the officer undertaking the search has probable cause to believe that the vehicle contains contraband. The Court explained that the mobility of vehicles would allow them to be quickly moved from the jurisdiction if time were taken to obtain a warrant.[2]

Initially, the Court limited Carroll's reach, holding impermissible the warrantless seizure of a parked automobile merely because it is movable, and indicating that vehicles may be stopped only while moving or reasonably contemporaneously with movement.[3] The Court also ruled that the search must be reasonably contemporaneous with the stop, so that it was not permissible to remove the vehicle to the station house for a warrantless search at the convenience of the police.[4]

The Court next developed a reduced privacy rationale to supplement the mobility rationale, explaining that "the configuration, use, and regulation of automobiles often may dilute the reasonable expectation of privacy that exists with respect to differently situated property."[5] "One has a lesser expectation of privacy in a motor vehicle because its function is transportation and it seldom serves as one's residence or as the repository of personal effects. . . . It travels public thoroughfares where both its occupants and its contents are in plain view.'"[6] Although motor homes serve as residences and as repositories for personal effects, and their contents are often shielded from public view, the Court extended the automobile exception to them as well, holding that there is a diminished expectation of privacy in a mobile home parked in a parking lot and licensed for vehicular travel, hence "readily mobile."[7]

---

[1] 267 U.S. 132 (1925). Carroll was a Prohibition-era liquor case, whereas a great number of modern automobile cases involve drugs.

[2] 267 U.S. at 153. See also Husty v. United States, 282 U.S. 694 (1931); Scher v. United States, 305 U.S. 251 (1938); Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160 (1949). All of these cases involved contraband, but in Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970), the Court, without discussion, and over Justice John Harlan's dissent, id. at 55, 62, extended the rule to evidentiary searches.

[3] Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 458–64 (1971). This portion of the opinion had the adherence of a plurality only, Justice John Harlan concurring on other grounds, and there being four dissenters. Id. at 493, 504, 510, 523.

[4] Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964); Dyke v. Taylor Implement Mfg. Co., 391 U.S. 216 (1968).

[5] Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753, 761 (1979).

[6] Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 590 (1974) (plurality opinion), quoted in United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 12 (1977). See also United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 896 (1975); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 561 (1976); South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364, 367–68 (1976); Robbins v. California, 453 U.S. 420, 424–25 (1981); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 807 n.9 (1982).

[7] California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386, 393 (1985) (leaving open the question of whether the automobile exception also applies to a "mobile" home being used as a residence and not "readily mobile").

The Court has stated, however, that the automobile exception "does not permit an officer without a warrant to enter a home or its curtilage in order to search a vehicle therein."[8] This limit to the exception exists because "the scope of the automobile exception extends no further than the automobile itself."[9] To search a vehicle under the automobile exception, an officer "must have a lawful right of access" to that vehicle,[10] and generally, law enforcement officers have no right to enter a home or its curtilage without express or implied permission or without a warrant.[11]

The reduced expectancy concept has broadened police powers to conduct automobile searches without warrants, but they still must have probable cause to search a vehicle,[12] and they may not make random stops of vehicles on the roads but instead must base stops of individual vehicles on probable cause or some "articulable and reasonable suspicion"[13] of traffic or safety violation or some other criminal activity.[14] If police stop a vehicle, then the vehicle's passengers as well as its driver are deemed to have been seized from the moment the car comes to a halt, and the passengers as well as the driver may challenge the constitutionality of the stop.[15] A driver with lawful possession and control of a rental car may also be able to challenge the constitutionality of a stop, even if that driver is not listed as an authorized driver on the rental agreement.[16] Likewise, a police officer may frisk (pat down for weapons) both the driver and any passengers whom he reasonably concludes "might be armed and presently dangerous."[17]

---

[8] Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663, 1675 (2018); see also Caniglia v. Strom, No. 20-157, slip op. at 3–4 (U.S. May 17, 2021) (rejecting an expanded "community caretaking" rule and holding that there is an "unmistakable distinction between vehicles and homes," and declining to "expand the scope of exceptions to the warrant requirement to permit warrantless entry into the home").

[9] Id. at 1671.

[10] Id. at 1672.

[11] See, e.g., Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 7–8 (2013).

[12] Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266 (1973) (roving patrols); United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891 (1975). Cf. Colorado v. Bannister, 449 U.S. 1 (1980). An automobile's "ready mobility [is] an exigency sufficient to excuse failure to obtain a search warrant once probable cause is clear"; there is no need to find the presence of "unforeseen circumstances" or other additional exigency. Pennsylvania v. Labron, 527 U.S. 465 (1996). Accord, Maryland v. Dyson, 527 U.S. 465 (1999) (per curiam). Cf. Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237 (2013).

[13] Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 663 (1979) (discretionary random stops of motorists to check driver's license and automobile registration constitute Fourth Amendment violation); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975) (affirming an appellate court's judgment that stopping a vehicle on a highway near an international border merely because the occupants appeared to be of Mexican ancestry was an unconstitutional search for unlawfully present aliens). But cf. United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266 (2002) (reasonable suspicion justified stop by border agents of vehicle traveling on unpaved backroads in an apparent effort to evade a border patrol checkpoint on the highway). In Prouse, the Court cautioned that it was not precluding the states from developing methods for spot checks, such as questioning all traffic at roadblocks, that involve less intrusion or that do not involve unconstrained exercise of discretion. 440 U.S. at 663.

[14] For example, an officer who learns, through a license plate search of a vehicle, that the registered owner has a revoked license may have a reasonable suspicion to stop that vehicle if it matches the description of the registered car and if, at the time of the stop, the officer has no countervailing reason to think the driver is not the registered owner. Kansas v. Glover, 140 S. Ct. 1183, 1184, 1191 (2020). An officer who observes a traffic violation may stop a vehicle even if his real motivation is to investigate for evidence of other crime. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996). The existence of probable cause to believe that a traffic violation has occurred establishes the constitutional reasonableness of traffic stops regardless of the actual motivation of the officers involved, and regardless of whether it is customary police practice to stop motorists for the violation observed. Similarly, pretextual arrest of a motorist who has committed a traffic offense is permissible. Arkansas v. Sullivan, 532 U.S. 769 (2001) (per curiam) (upholding search of the motorist's car for a crime not related to the traffic offense).

[15] Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 263 (2007).

[16] Byrd v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1518, 1523–24 (2018). But see id. at 1529 (noting that a "car thief would not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in a stolen car").

[17] Arizona v. Johnson, 129 S. Ct. 781, 786 (2009).

By contrast, fixed-checkpoint stops in the absence of any individualized suspicion have been upheld for purposes of promoting highway safety[18] or policing the international border,[19] but not for more generalized law enforcement purposes.[20] Once police have validly stopped a vehicle, they may also, based on articulable facts warranting a reasonable belief that weapons may be present, conduct a Terry-type protective search of those portions of the passenger compartment in which a weapon could be placed or hidden.[21] And, in the absence of such reasonable suspicion as to weapons, police may seize contraband and suspicious items "in plain view" inside the passenger compartment.[22]

Although officers who have stopped a car to issue a routine traffic citation may conduct a Terry-type search, even including a pat-down of driver and passengers if there is reasonable suspicion that they are armed and dangerous, they may not conduct a full-blown search of the car[23] unless they exercise their discretion to arrest the driver instead of issuing a citation.[24] And once police have probable cause to believe there is contraband in a vehicle, they may remove the vehicle from the scene to the station house in order to conduct a search, without thereby being required to obtain a warrant.[25] "[T]he justification to conduct such a warrantless search does not vanish once the car has been immobilized; nor does it depend upon a reviewing court's assessment of the likelihood in each particular case that the car would have been driven [18] Michigan Dep't of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990) (upholding a sobriety checkpoint at which all motorists are briefly stopped for preliminary questioning and observation for signs of intoxication).

[19] United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976) (rejecting a Fourth Amendment challenge to a Border Patrol stop of vehicles at a permanent checkpoint designed to apprehend unlawfully present aliens). See also United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. 149 (2004) (upholding a search at the border involving disassembly of a vehicle's fuel tank).

[20] City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000) (vehicle checkpoint set up for the "primary purpose [of] detect[ing] evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing" (here interdicting illegal narcotics) does not fall within the highway safety or border patrol exception to the individualized suspicion requirement, and hence violates the Fourth Amendment). Edmond was distinguished in Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. 419 (2004), upholding use of a checkpoint to ask motorists for help in solving a recent hit-and-run accident that had resulted in death. The public interest in solving the crime was deemed "grave," while the interference with personal liberty was deemed minimal.

[21] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049 (1983) (holding that contraband found in the course of such a search is admissible).

[22] Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983). Similarly, because there is no reasonable privacy interest in the vehicle identification number, required by law to be placed on the dashboard so as to be visible through the windshield, police may reach into the passenger compartment to remove items obscuring the number and may seize items in plain view while doing so. New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106 (1986). Because there also is no legitimate privacy interest in possessing contraband, and because properly conducted canine sniffs are "generally likely[ ] to reveal only the presence of contraband," police may conduct a canine sniff around the perimeter of a vehicle stopped for a traffic offense so long as the stop is not prolonged beyond the time needed to process the traffic violation. Compare Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S. 405 (2005) (a canine sniff around the perimeter of a car following a routine traffic stop does not offend the Fourth Amendment if the duration of the stop is justified by the traffic offense) with Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 1609, 1613, 1614–15 (2015) (finding that the stop in question had been prolonged for seven to eight minutes beyond the time needed to resolve the traffic offense in order to conduct a canine sniff).

[23] Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113 (1998) (invalidating an Iowa statute permitting a full-blown search incident to a traffic citation).

[24] See Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318 (2001) (police officers, in their discretion, may arrest a motorist for a minor traffic offense rather than issuing a citation); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981) (officers who arrest an occupant of a vehicle may make a contemporaneous search of the entire passenger compartment, including closed containers); Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615 (2004) (the Belton rule applies regardless of whether the arrestee exited the car at the officer's direction, or whether he did so prior to confrontation); Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 351 (2009)(the Belton rule applies "only if the arrestee is within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search or it is reasonable to believe that the vehicle contains evidence of the offense of arrest"); Arkansas v. Sullivan, 532 U.S. 769 (2001) (pretextual arrest of motorist who has committed a traffic offense is permissible even if purpose is to search vehicle for evidence of other crime).

[25] Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. 259 (1982). The same rule applies if it is the vehicle itself that is forfeitable contraband; police, acting without a warrant, may seize the vehicle from a public place. Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559 (1999).

away, or that its contents would have been tampered with, during the period required for the police to obtain a warrant."[26] Because of the lessened expectation of privacy, inventory searches of impounded automobiles are justifiable in order to protect public safety and the owner's property, and any evidence of criminal activity discovered in the course of the inventories is admissible in court.[27] The Justices were evenly divided, however, on the propriety of warrantless seizure of an arrestee's automobile from a public parking lot several hours after his arrest, its transportation to a police impoundment lot, and the taking of tire casts and exterior paint scrapings.[28]

Police in undertaking a warrantless search of an automobile may not extend the search to the persons of the passengers therein[29] unless there is a reasonable suspicion that the passengers are armed and dangerous, in which case a Terry pat down is permissible,[30] or unless there is individualized suspicion of criminal activity by the passengers.[31] But because passengers in an automobile have no reasonable expectation of privacy in the interior area of the car, a warrantless search of the glove compartment and the spaces under the seats, which turned up evidence implicating the passengers, invaded no Fourth Amendment interest of the passengers.[32] Luggage and other closed containers found in automobiles may also be subjected to warrantless searches based on probable cause, regardless of whether the luggage or containers belong to the driver or to a passenger, and regardless of whether it is the driver or a passenger who is under suspicion.[33] The same rule now applies whether the police have probable cause to search only the containers[34] or whether they have probable cause to search the automobile for something capable of being held in the container.[35]

Amdt4.6.4.3 Containers in Vehicles

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Not only is the warrant requirement inapplicable to brief stops of vessels, but also none of the safeguards applicable to stops of automobiles on less than probable cause are necessary

---

[26] Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. at 261. See also Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970); Texas v. White, 423 U.S. 67 (1975); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 807 n.9 (1982).

[27] Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973); South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976). See also Cooper v. California, 386 U.S. 58 (1967); United States v. Harris, 390 U.S. 234 (1968). Police, in conducting an inventory search of a vehicle, may open closed containers in order to inventory contents. Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367 (1987).

[28] Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583 (1974). Justice Lewis Powell concurred on other grounds.

[29] United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S. 581 (1948);Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 94–96 (1979).

[30] Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 118 (1998).

[31] Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366 (2003) (probable cause to arrest passengers based on officers finding $783 in glove compartment and cocaine hidden beneath back seat armrest, and on driver and passengers all denying ownership of the cocaine).

[32] Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978).

[33] Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 307 (1999) ("police officers with probable cause to search a car may inspect passengers' belongings found in the car that are capable of concealing the object of the search").

[34] California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991) (overruling Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979).

[35] United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982). A Ross search of a container found in an automobile need not occur soon after its seizure. United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. 478 (1985) (three-day time lapse). See also Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991) (consent to search automobile for drugs constitutes consent to open containers within the car that might contain drugs).

predicates to stops of vessels. In United States v. Villamonte-Marquez,[1] the Court upheld a random stop and boarding of a vessel by customs agents, lacking any suspicion of wrongdoing, for purpose of inspecting documentation. The boarding was authorized by statute derived from an act of the First Congress[2] and hence had "an impressive historical pedigree" carrying with it a presumption of constitutionality. Moreover, "important factual differences between vessels located in waters offering ready access to the open sea and automobiles on principal thoroughfares in the border area" justify application of a less restrictive rule for vessel searches. The reason why random stops of vehicles have been held impermissible under the Fourth Amendment, the Court explained, is that stops at fixed checkpoints or roadblocks are both feasible and less subject to abuse of discretion by authorities. "But no reasonable claim can be made that permanent checkpoints would be practical on waters such as these where vessels can move in any direction at any time and need not follow established 'avenues' as automobiles must do."[3] Because there is a "substantial" governmental interest in enforcing documentation laws, "especially in waters where the need to deter or apprehend smugglers is great," the Court found the "limited" but not "minimal" intrusion occasioned by boarding for documentation inspection to be reasonable.[4] Dissenting Justice William Brennan argued that the Court for the first time was approving "a completely random seizure and detention of persons and an entry onto private, noncommercial premises by police officers, without any limitations whatever on the officers' discretion or any safeguards against abuse."[5]

Amdt4.6.4.4 Plain View Doctrine

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Somewhat similar in rationale is the rule that objects falling in the "plain view" of an officer who has a right to be in the position to have that view are subject to seizure without a warrant[1] or that, if the officer needs a warrant or probable cause to search and seize, his lawful

---

[1] 462 U.S. 579 (1983).

[2] 19 U.S.C. § 1581(a), derived from § 31 of the Act of Aug. 4, 1790, ch. 35, 1 Stat. 164.

[3] 462 U.S. at 589. Justice William Brennan's dissent argued that a fixed checkpoint was feasible in this case, involving a ship channel in an inland waterway. Id. at 608 n.10. The fact that the Court's rationale was geared to the difficulties of law enforcement in the open seas suggests a reluctance to make exceptions to the general rule. Note as well the Court's later reference to this case as among those "reflect[ing] longstanding concern for the protection of the integrity of the border." United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 538 (1985).

[4] 462 U.S. at 593.

[5] 462 U.S. at 598. Justice William Brennan contended that all previous cases had required some "discretion-limiting" feature such as a requirement of probable cause, reasonable suspicion, fixed checkpoints instead of roving patrols, and limitation of border searches to border areas, and that these principles set forth in Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979), should govern. Id. at 599, 601.

[1] Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1 (1982) (officer lawfully in dorm room may seize marijuana seeds and pipe in open view); United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976) ("plain view" justification for officers to enter home to arrest after observing defendant standing in open doorway); Harris v. United States, 390 U.S. 234 (1968) (officer who opened door of impounded automobile and saw evidence in plain view properly seized it); Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963) (officers entered premises without warrant to make arrest because of exigent circumstances seized evidence in plain sight). Cf. Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 464–73 (1971), and id. at 510 (White, J., dissenting). Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990) (items seized in plain view during protective sweep of home incident to arrest); Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983) (contraband on car seat in plain view of officer who had stopped car and asked for driver's license); New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106 (1986) (evidence seen while looking for vehicle identification number). There observation will provide grounds therefor.[2] The plain view doctrine is limited, however, by the probable cause requirement: officers must have probable cause to believe that items in plain view are contraband before they may search or seize them.[3]

The Court has analogized from the plain view doctrine to hold that, once officers have lawfully observed contraband, "the owner's privacy interest in that item is lost," and officers may reseal a container, trace its path through a controlled delivery, and seize and reopen the container without a warrant.[4]

Amdt4.6.5 Warrantless Searches Not Dependent on Probable Cause

Amdt4.6.5.1 Terry Stop and Frisks Doctrine and Practice

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

While arrests are subject to Fourth Amendment requirements, courts have followed the common law in upholding the authority of police officers to take a person into custody without a warrant if they have probable cause to believe the person has committed a felony or a misdemeanor in their presence.[1] Probable cause must be satisfied by conditions existing prior to the arrest and cannot be established retroactively.[2] There are, however, instances when a person's conduct or manner arouse a police officer's suspicions, but probable cause to arrest such a person is lacking.[3] In its 1968 Terry v. Ohio decision,[4] the Court, with only Justice William O. Douglas dissenting, approved a police officer's on-the-street investigation that involved "patting down" the subject of the investigation for weapons.

Terry arose when a police officer observed three individuals engaging in conduct that appeared to him, on the basis of training and experience, to be "casing" a store for a likely armed robbery. Upon approaching the men, identifying himself, and not receiving prompt identification, the officer seized one of the men, patted the exterior of his clothes, and discovered a gun. For the Court, Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote that the Fourth Amendment applies "whenever a police officer accosts an individual and restrains his freedom to walk away."[5] Because the warrant clause is necessarily and practically of no application to the type is no requirement that the discovery of evidence in plain view must be "inadvertent." See Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128 (1990) (in spite of Amendment's particularity requirement, officers with warrant to search for proceeds of robbery may seize weapons of robbery in plain view).

---

[2] Steele v. United States, 267 U.S. 498 (1925) (officers observed contraband in view through open doorway; had probable cause to procure warrant). Cf. Taylor v. United States, 286 U.S. 1 (1932) (officers observed contraband in plain view in garage, warrantless entry to seize was unconstitutional).

[3] Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987) (police lawfully in apartment to investigate shooting lacked probable cause to inspect expensive stereo equipment to record serial numbers).

[4] Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 771 (1983) (locker customs agents had opened, and which was subsequently traced). Accord, United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109 (1984) (inspection of package opened by private freight carrier who notified drug agents).

[1] United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976).

[2] Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98 (1959); Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 16–17 (1948); Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 62–63 (1968).

[3] "The police may not arrest upon mere suspicion but only on 'probable cause.'" Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 454 (1957).

[4] 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

[5] Id. at 16. See id. at 16–20.

of on-the-street encounter present in Terry, the Chief Justice considered whether the policeman's actions were reasonable. The Chief Justice reasoned that the test of reasonableness in this sort of situation is whether the police officer can point to "specific and articulable facts which, taken together with rational inferences from those facts" would lead a neutral magistrate on review to conclude that a man of reasonable caution would be warranted in believing that possible criminal behavior was at hand and that both an investigative stop and a "frisk" was required.[6] Because the police officer witnessed conduct that reasonably led him to believe that an armed robbery was in prospect, he was as reasonably led to believe that the men were armed and probably dangerous and that his safety required a "frisk." Because the object of a "frisk" is to discover dangerous weapons, "it must therefore be confined in scope to an intrusion reasonably designed to discover guns, knives, clubs, or other hidden instruments for the assault of the police officer."[7]

In a later case, the Court held that an officer may seize an object if, in the course of a weapons frisk, "plain touch" reveals the presence of the object, and the officer has probable cause to believe it is contraband.[8] The Court viewed the situation as analogous to that covered by the "plain view" doctrine: obvious contraband may be seized, but a search may not be expanded to determine whether an object is contraband.[9] Also impermissible is physical manipulation, without reasonable suspicion, of a bus passenger's carry-on luggage stored in an overhead compartment.[10]

Terry did not address the grounds that could permissibly lead an officer to stop a person on the street or elsewhere in order to ask questions rather than frisk for weapons, the right of the stopped individual to refuse to cooperate, and the permissible response of the police to that refusal. The Court provided a partial answer in its 2004 decision, Hiibel v. Sixth Judical District Court, when it upheld a state law that required a suspect to disclose his name in the course of a valid Terry stop.[11] Questions about a suspect's identity "are a routine and accepted part of many Terry stops," the Court explained.[12]

After Terry, the standard for stops for investigative purposes evolved into one of "reasonable suspicion of criminal activity." That test permits some stops and questioning without probable cause in order to allow police officers to explore the foundations of their

---

[6] Id. at 20, 21, 22.

[7] Id. at 23–27, 29. See also Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968) (after policeman observed defendant speak with several known narcotics addicts, he approached him and placed his hand in defendant's pocket, thus discovering narcotics; this was impermissible, because he lacked a reasonable basis for the frisk and in any event his search exceeded the permissible scope of a weapons frisk); Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972) (stop and frisk based on informer's in-person tip that defendant was sitting in an identified parked car, visible to informer and officer, in a high crime area at 2 a.m., with narcotics and a gun at his waist); Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977) (after validly stopping car, officer required defendant to get out of car, observed bulge under his jacket, and frisked him and seized weapon; while officer did not suspect driver of crime or have an articulable basis for safety fears, safety considerations justified his requiring driver to leave car); Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 413 (1997) (after validly stopping car, officer may order passengers as well as driver out of car; "the same weighty interest in officer safety is present regardless of whether the occupant of the stopped car is a driver or passenger"); Arizona v. Johnson, 129 S. Ct. 781, 786 (2009) (after validly stopping car, officer may frisk (pat down for weapons) both the driver and any passengers whom he reasonably concludes "might be armed and presently dangerous").

[8] Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993).

[9] 508 U.S. at 375, 378–79. In Dickerson the Court held that seizure of a small plastic container that the officer felt in the suspect's pocket was not justified; the officer should not have continued the search, manipulating the container with his fingers, after determining that no weapon was present.

[10] Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334 (2000) (bus passenger has reasonable expectation that, although other passengers might handle his bag in order to make room for their own, they will not "feel the bag in an exploratory manner").

[11] Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. Ct., 542 U.S. 177 (2004).

[12] 542 U.S. at 186.

suspicions.[13] Although it did not elaborate a set of rules to govern applying the tests, the Court was initially restrictive in recognizing permissible bases for reasonable suspicion.[14] The Court invalidated extensive intrusions on individual privacy, for example, transporting a person to the station house for interrogation and fingerprinting, absent probable cause,[15] and the Court has held that an uncorroborated, anonymous tip is an insufficient basis for a Terry stop and that there is no "firearms" exception to the reasonable suspicion requirement.[16] Since the 1980s, however, the Court has taken less restrictive approaches.[17]

The Court's approach for when a "seizure" has occurred for Fourth Amendment purposes has evolved. The Terry Court recognized in dictum that "not all personal intercourse between policemen and citizens involves 'seizures' of persons," and suggested that "[o]nly when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen may we conclude that a 'seizure' has occurred."[18] In the 1980 United States v. Mendenhall decision, Justice Potter Stewart, joined by Justice William Rehnquist, proposed a similar standard—that a person has been seized "only if, in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave."[19] A majority of the Justices subsequently endorsed this reasonable perception standard[20] and applied it in several later cases in which the admissibility of evidence turned on whether police actions prior to uncovering evidence violated the Fourth Amendment. No seizure occurred, for example, when Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) agents seeking to identify unlawfully present aliens conducted workforce surveys within a garment factory; while some agents were positioned at exits, others systematically moved through the factory and questioned employees.[21] The Court held this brief questioning, even with blocked exits, amounted to "classic consensual encounters rather than Fourth Amendment seizures."[22] The Court has also ruled that no seizure occurred when police in a squad car drove alongside a [13] In United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981), a unanimous Court attempted to capture the "elusive concept" of the basis for permitting a stop. Officers must have "articulable reasons" or "founded suspicions," derived from the totality of the circumstances. The Court stated "Based upon that whole picture the detaining officer must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity." Id. at 417–18. The inquiry is thus quite fact-specific. In the anonymous tip context, the same basic approach requiring some corroboration applies regardless of whether the standard is probable cause or reasonable suspicion; the difference is that less information, or less reliable information, can satisfy the lower standard. Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325 (1990).

---

[14] E.g., Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47 (1979) (individual's presence in high crime area gave officer no articulable basis to suspect him of crime); Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979) (reasonable suspicion of a license or registration violation is necessary to authorize automobile stop; random stops impermissible); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975) (officers could not justify random automobile stop solely on basis of Mexican appearance of occupants); Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980) (no reasonable suspicion for airport stop based on appearance that suspect and another passenger were trying to conceal the fact that they were traveling together). But cf. United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976) (halting vehicles at fixed checkpoints to question occupants as to citizenship and immigration status permissible, even if officers should act on basis of appearance of occupants).

[15] Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979). Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000) (unprovoked flight from high crime area upon sight of police produces "reasonable suspicion").

[16] Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266 (2000) (reasonable suspicion requires that a tip be reliable in its assertion of illegality, not merely in its identification of someone).

[17] See, e.g., Prado Navarette v. California, 572 U.S. 393 (2014) (anonymous 911 call reporting an erratic swerve by a particular truck traveling in a particular direction held to be sufficient to justify stop); United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 9 (1989) (airport stop based on drug courier profile may rely on a combination of factors that individually may be "quite consistent with innocent travel"); United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985) (reasonable suspicion to stop a motorist may be based on a "wanted flyer" as long as issuance of the flyer has been based on reasonable suspicion).

[18] 392 U.S. at 19, n.16.

[19] 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980).

[20] See, e.g., Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983), in which there was no opinion of the Court, but in which the test was used by the plurality of four, id. at 502, and also endorsed by dissenting Justice Harry Blackmun, id. at 514.

[21] INS v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210 (1984).

[22] 466 U.S. at 221.

suspect who had turned and run down the sidewalk when he saw the squad car approach. Under the circumstances (no siren, flashing lights, display of a weapon, or blocking of the suspect's path), the Court concluded the police conduct "would not have communicated to the reasonable person an attempt to capture or otherwise intrude upon [one's] freedom of movement."[23]

The Court later ruled that the Mendenhall "free-to-leave" inquiry was misplaced in the context of a police sweep of a bus, but that a modified reasonable perception approach still governed.[24] In conducting a bus sweep aimed at detecting illegal drugs and their couriers, police officers typically board a bus during a stopover at a terminal and ask to inspect tickets, identification, and at times, the luggage of selected passengers. The Court did not focus on whether an "arrest" had taken place, but instead suggested that the appropriate inquiry is "whether a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter."[25] "When the person is seated on a bus and has no desire to leave," the Court explained, "the degree to which a reasonable person would feel that he or she could leave is not an accurate measure of the coercive effect of the encounter."[26]

The Supreme Court's analysis of seizure, however, is different in the context of fleeing suspects, where the Court seemingly applies a more formalistic approach than the Mendenhall reasonable-perception standard. In Brower v. County of Inyo, the Supreme Court concluded that a seizure occurred when a suspect's car collided with a police roadblock, and explained that a "[v]iolation of the Fourth Amendment requires an intentional acquisition of physical control."[27] The Court reasoned that such a use of force becomes a seizure "only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied."[28] The Court seemingly modified that standard in California v. Hodari D., another Fourth Amendment case involving a fleeing suspect.[29] In Hodari D., the Court held that an actual chase with evident intent to capture did not amount to a "seizure" because the suspect had not complied with the officer's order to halt. The Court reasoned that Mendenhall stated a "necessary" but not a "sufficient" condition for a seizure of the person is through a show of authority.[30] A Fourth Amendment "seizure" of the person, the Court determined, is the same as a common law arrest; there must be either application of physical force (or the laying on of hands) or submission to the assertion of authority.[31] Three decades after Hodari D., the Court revisited the nature of seizure in the context of a fleeing suspect in its 2021 Torres v. Madrid decision.[32] In Torres, the Court held that a suspect was seized when struck twice by bullets

[23] Michigan v. Chesternut, 486 U.S. 567, 575 (1988).

[24] Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991).

[25] 501 U.S. at 436.

[26] Id. The Court asserted that the case was "analytically indistinguishable from Delgado. Like the workers in that case [subjected to the INS 'survey' at their workplace], Bostick's freedom of movement was restricted by a factor independent of police conduct—i.e., by his being a passenger on a bus." Id. See also United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194 (2002), applying Bostick to uphold a bus search in which one officer stationed himself in the front of the bus and one in the rear, while a third officer worked his way from rear to front, questioning passengers individually. Under these circumstances, and following the arrest of his traveling companion, the defendant had consented to the search of his person.

[27] Brower v. Cty. of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596 (1989).

[28] Id. at 597.

[29] 499 U.S. 621 (1991).

[30] Id. at 628. As in Michigan v. Chesternut, the suspect dropped incriminating evidence while being chased.

[31] Adherence to this approach would effectively nullify the Court's earlier position that Fourth Amendment protections extend to "seizures that involve only a brief detention short of traditional arrest." United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 878 (1975), quoted in INS v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210, 215 (1984).

[32] No. 19-292, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Mar. 25, 2021).

fired by law enforcement, even though she temporarily evaded capture.[33] The Court reasoned that the "application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, "even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person."[34] According to the Court, such a seizure lasts "only as long as the application of force."[35] Thus, in Torres, officers seized the suspect "the instant that the bullets struck her."[36] The Court clarified that, unlike seizure by application of force, seizure by show of authority still requires either "voluntary submission" or "termination of freedom of movement."[37]

Amdt4.6.5.2 Terry Stop and Frisks and Vehicles

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

A Terry search need not be limited to a stop and frisk of the person, but may extend as well to a protective search of the passenger compartment of a car if an officer possesses "a reasonable belief, based on specific and articulable facts . . . that the suspect is dangerous and . . . may gain immediate control of weapons."[1] How lengthy a Terry detention may be varies with the circumstances. In approving a twenty-minute detention of a driver made necessary by the driver's own evasion of drug agents and a state police decision to hold the driver until the agents could arrive on the scene, the Court indicated that it is "appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly, during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant."[2]

Similar principles govern detention of luggage at airports in order to detect the presence of drugs; Terry "limitations applicable to investigative detentions of the person should define the permissible scope of an investigative detention of the person's luggage on less than probable cause."[3] The general rule is that "when an officer's observations lead him reasonably to believe that a traveler is carrying luggage that contains narcotics, the principles of Terry . . . would permit the officer to detain the luggage briefly to investigate the circumstances that aroused his suspicion, provided that the investigative detention is properly limited in scope."[4] Seizure of luggage for an expeditious "canine sniff" by a dog trained to detect narcotics can satisfy this test even though seizure of luggage is in effect detention of the traveler, since the procedure

[33] Id. at 1–3.

[34] Id. at 1.

[35] Id. at 10.

[36] Id. at 11.

[37] Id. at 14–15.

[1] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983) (suspect appeared to be under the influence of drugs, officer spied hunting knife exposed on floor of front seat and searched remainder of passenger compartment). Similar reasoning has been applied to uphold a "protective sweep" of a home in which an arrest is made if arresting officers have a reasonable belief that the area swept may harbor another individual posing a danger to the officers or to others. Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990).

[2] United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675, 686 (1985). A more relaxed standard has been applied to detention of travelers at the border, the Court testing the reasonableness in terms of "the period of time necessary to either verify or dispel the suspicion." United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 544 (1985) (approving warrantless detention for more than 24 hours of traveler suspected of alimentary canal drug smuggling).

[3] United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 709 (1983).

[4] 462 U.S. at 706.

results in "limited disclosure," impinges only slightly on a traveler's privacy interest in the contents of personal luggage, and does not constitute a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.[5] By contrast, taking a suspect to an interrogation room on grounds short of probable cause, retaining his air ticket, and retrieving his luggage without his permission taints consent given under such circumstances to open the luggage, since by then the detention had exceeded the bounds of a permissible Terry investigative stop and amounted to an invalid arrest.[6] But the same requirements for brevity of detention and limited scope of investigation are apparently inapplicable to border searches of international travelers, the Court having approved a twenty-four hour detention of a traveler suspected of smuggling drugs in her alimentary canal.[7]

Amdt4.6.6 Special Needs Doctrine

Amdt4.6.6.1 Overview of Border Searches

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Congress has broad authority to regulate persons or items entering the United States, an authority rooted in its power to regulate foreign commerce and to protect the integrity of the Nation's borders.[1] Authorized by the First Congress,[2] customs searches at the border require no warrant, probable cause, or even a showing of some degree of suspicion that accompanies investigatory stops.[3] The Supreme Court has described searches at the international border as "necessary to prevent smuggling and to prevent prohibited articles from entry."[4] Despite this seemingly broad authority to search persons and items at the border, the Fourth Amendment provides some constraints. The Fourth Amendment generally requires a government officer to secure a warrant based on probable cause before conducting a search or seizure.[5] Nonetheless, [5] 462 U.S. at 707. However, the search in Place was not expeditious, and hence exceeded Fourth Amendment bounds, when agents took ninety minutes to transport luggage to another airport for administration of the canine sniff. The length of a detention short of an arrest has similarly been a factor in other cases. Compare Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S. 405 (2005) (a canine sniff around the perimeter of a car following a routine traffic stop does not offend the Fourth Amendment if the duration of the stop is justified by the traffic offense) with Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 1609, 1613, 1614–15 (2015) (finding that the stop in question had been prolonged for seven to eight minutes beyond the time needed to resolve the traffic offense in order to conduct a canine sniff).

---

[6] Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983). On this much the plurality opinion of Justice Byron White (id. at 503), joined by three other Justices, and the concurring opinion of Justice William Brennan (id. at 509) were in agreement.

[7] United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985).

[1] See United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 538 (1985) (recognizing "Congress's power to protect the Nation by stopping and examining persons entering this country"); United States v. 12,200-Foot Reels of Super 8mm. Film, 413 U.S. 123, 125 (1973) ("The Constitution gives Congress broad, comprehensive powers '(t)o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations.'") (quoting U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 3)).

[2] See United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606, 616 (1977) (noting that Congress "enacted the first customs statute" in 1789).

[3] Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272 (1973); United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 376 (1971); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 154 (1925).

[4] 12,200-Foot Reels of Super 8mm. Film, 413 U.S. at 125 ("Historically such broad powers have been necessary to prevent smuggling and to prevent prohibited articles from entry.").

[5] See Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2482 (2014) ("Such a warrant ensures that the inferences to support a search are 'drawn by a neutral and detached magistrate instead of being judged by the officer engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime.'") (quoting Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 14 (1948)); Kentucky v.

because the "touchstone" of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness,[6] courts have recognized certain exceptions when the government may engage in a warrantless search or seizure.[7]

Amdt4.6.6.2 Searches at International Borders

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Under what is typically referred to as the "border search exception" to the Fourth Amendment, federal officers may generally conduct warrantless searches of persons and items upon their entry into the United States without needing reasonable suspicion or probable cause of wrongdoing.[1] The Supreme Court has stated, "[t]hat searches made at the border, pursuant to the longstanding right of the sovereign to protect itself by stopping and examining persons and property crossing into this country, are reasonable simply by virtue of the fact that they occur at the border, should, by now, require no extended demonstration."[2] The Court has cited a lower expectation of privacy at the border, articulating that "the Fourth Amendment balance between the interests of the Government and the privacy right of the individual is also struck much more favorably to the Government at the border."[3] While searches subject to this reduced Fourth Amendment scrutiny may potentially take place along any segment of the international border, stops and searches may also occur at the "functional equivalent" of the border, including international airports in the United States and post offices receiving international airmail.[4]

When determining whether a border search or detention is reasonable, courts have generally distinguished between routine and nonroutine searches and seizures—with the latter requiring a level of particularized suspicion of illegal activity. The Supreme Court has

---

King, 563 U.S. 452, 459 (2011) ("Although the text of the Fourth Amendment does not specify when a search warrant must be obtained, this Court has inferred that a warrant must generally be secured.").

[6] See United States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112, 118–19 (2001) ("The touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness, and the reasonableness of a search is determined 'by assessing, on the one hand, the degree to which it intrudes upon an individual's privacy and, on the other, the degree to which it is needed for the promotion of legitimate governmental interests.'") (quoting Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 300 (1999)).

[7] King, 563 U.S. at 459 ("[B]ecause 'the ultimate touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is "reasonableness"'. . . [t]he warrant requirement is subject to certain reasonable exceptions.") (quoting Brigham City, Utah v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398, 403 (2006)); Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730, 735 (1983) ("Our cases hold that procedure by way of a warrant is preferred, although in a wide range of diverse situations we have recognized flexible, common-sense exceptions to this requirement.").

[1] See Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. at 538 ("Routine searches of the persons and effects of entrants are not subject to any requirement of reasonable suspicion, probable cause, or warrant"); United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606, 616–19 (1977); Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272–73 (1973); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 154 (1925) ("Travelers may be so stopped in crossing an international boundary because of national self-protection reasonably requiring one entering the country identify himself as entitled to come in and his belongings as effects which may be lawfully brought in.").

[2] United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606, 616 (1977) (sustaining warrantless search of incoming mail). See also Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 773 (1983) (sustaining a customs inspector's opening of a locked container that had been shipped from abroad).

[3] United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 540 (1985).

[4] Id. at 538 (examining the detention and search of an air traveler arriving at an airport in the United States on an international flight); Ramsey, 431 U.S. at 620 (rejecting any distinction between items mailed to the United States and items carried into the United States); Almeida-Sanchez, 413 U.S. at 272–73 (describing the border's functional equivalent to include an international airport or "an established station near the border, at a point marking the confluence of two or more roads that extend from the border").

described a nonroutine search or seizure as one that goes beyond a limited intrusion, such as prolonged detentions, strip searches, body cavity searches, and involuntary x-ray searches.[5]

In United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, the Supreme Court ruled that a sixteen hour detention of an arriving airline traveler from Colombia did not violate the Fourth Amendment—even though it went beyond the scope of a routine customs inspection—because it was based on reasonable suspicion that she was smuggling contraband.[6] Additionally, according to the Court, an extended detention as a result of a border search may be constitutionally permissible if the detention "was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified it initially."[7]

In United States v. Flores-Montano, the Supreme Court held that federal officers may search motor vehicles at the border without a warrant, reasonable suspicion, or probable cause, even to the extent of removing, disassembling, and reassembling the fuel tank.[8] The Court observed, however, that there may be circumstances in which a search of a vehicle at the international border would "be deemed unreasonable because of the particularly offensive manner in which it is carried out."[9]

Amdt4.6.6.3 Searches Beyond the Border

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Under the "border search exception," federal officers may generally conduct routine, warrantless searches of persons and items entering the United States without reasonable suspicion or probable cause of unlawful activity. However, stops and searches conducted in areas farther from the border may require at least heightened suspicion or probable cause of unlawful activity to withstand Fourth Amendment scrutiny.

The Supreme Court has addressed Fourth Amendment limitations on "roving patrols" near the border.[1] In Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, the Court held that a warrantless stop

---

[5] Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. at 541 n.4. The Supreme Court has not explicitly defined the scope of searches that may be categorized as routine. According to lower courts, routine searches generally include searches of automobiles, baggage, purses, wallets, outer clothing, and other goods entering the country. See, e.g., Angulo v. Brown, 978 F.3d 942, 949 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The Government does not need to show any level of suspicion to thoroughly search an entrant's vehicle at the border."); Bradley v. United States, 299 F.3d 197 (3d Cir. 2002) (pat down over clothing); United States v. Johnson, 991 F.2d 1287 (7th Cir. 1993) (suitcase, purse, wallet, and overcoat); United States v. Sandoval Vargas, 854 F.2d 1132 (9th Cir. 1988) (car); United States v. Braks, 842 F.2d 509 (1st Cir. 1988) (dress); United States v. Flores, 594 F.2d 438 (5th Cir. 1979) (car); United States v. Lafroscia, 485 F.2d 457 (2d Cir. 1973) (car); United States v. Gonzalez, 483 F.2d 223 (2d Cir. 1973) (baggage); United States v. Stornini, 443 F.2d 833 (1st Cir. 1971) (baggage).

[6] Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. at 541. For more discussion about reasonable suspicion, see Amdt4.6.5.1 Terry Stop and Frisks Doctrine and Practice.

[7] Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. at 542; see also United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. 149, 155 n.3 (2004) (noting that a 1-hour delay incident to a border search did not render the search into one requiring reasonable suspicion, reasoning that "delays of one to two hours at international borders are to be expected").

[8] Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. at 155.

[9] Id. at 155 n.2 (internal quotation omitted).

[1] Roving patrols occur when immigration officers traverse certain areas near the border and stop vehicles suspected of carrying unlawfully present aliens or contraband, even in the absence of an indication that the vehicle had crossed the border. See United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 894 (1975) (noting that roving patrols "often operate at night on seldom-traveled roads" and "look for criminal activity, both alien smuggling and contraband smuggling").

and search of an automobile some twenty miles from the border violated the Fourth Amendment because the Border Patrol officers lacked probable cause to believe that the vehicle contained unlawfully present aliens.[2] While recognizing the government's authority to conduct routine inspections and searches at the border without a warrant or any individualized suspicion, the Court determined that vehicle searches in areas away from the physical border were "of a wholly different sort" because individuals have greater Fourth Amendment protections in the interior of the United States.[3]

In United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, the Supreme Court considered whether roving patrol stops for the more limited purpose of questioning motorists about immigration status or any suspicious circumstance is constitutionally permissible.[4] The Court held that roving patrol stops must be supported by "specific articulable facts, together with rational inferences from those facts, that reasonably warrant suspicion" that an automobile contains unlawfully present aliens.[5] The Court reasoned that stops absent suspicion would risk "potentially unlimited interference" with border area residents' use of the highways, and determined that the "reasonable suspicion" standard should apply to roving patrol stops given their "modest intrusion."[6] The Court held that federal officers who stopped a vehicle near the border lacked reasonable suspicion because they relied solely on the apparent Mexican ancestry of the vehicle's occupants, and that the occupants' ancestry in itself failed to provide reasonable belief that the vehicle concealed unlawfully present aliens.[7]

Applying Brignoni-Ponce's reasonable suspicion test, the Supreme Court held in United States v. Cortez that there was reasonable suspicion for a stop near the border because the agents had previously uncovered clues of alien smuggling in the area and knew where the suspects would likely appear.[8] In United States v. Arvizu, the Court concluded that a Border Patrol agent had reasonable suspicion to stop a minivan found to be carrying more than 100 pounds of contraband based on observing the van on a remote road often used by smugglers and other observations of the van's occupants.[9] "Taken together," these observations raised a reasonable inference of criminal activity.[10]

The Supreme Court has also addressed vehicle stops at fixed immigration checkpoints, which, unlike roving patrols, are typically located at stationary points on major highways near the border. In United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, the Supreme Court held that federal officers may briefly stop and question motorists at "reasonably located" checkpoints, even in the

---

[2] Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 273 (1973).

[3] Id. at 273–75. In a dissenting opinion, Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, William Rehnquist, and Chief Justice Warren Burger would have found the search reasonable based on Congress's determination that roving patrol searches were the only effective means to police border smuggling. Id. at 293, 298 (White, J., dissenting).

[4] United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 874 (1975).

[5] Id. at 884.

[6] Id. at 879–82. The Court cited its prior decisions in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), and Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972), which applied the reasonable suspicion standard to brief investigatory stops, and the Court stated that those cases "establish that in appropriate circumstances the Fourth Amendment allows a properly limited 'search' or 'seizure' on facts that do not constitute probable cause to arrest or to search for contraband or evidence of crime." Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. at 881. The Court concluded that applying this standard "allows the Government adequate means of guarding the public interest and also protects residents of the border areas from indiscriminate official interference." Id. at 883. The Court listed the criteria that would bear upon the reasonable suspicion analysis, including the characteristics of the area in which the vehicle is found, the vehicle's proximity to the border, the driver's physical characteristics and behavior, and the appearance of the persons inside the vehicle. Id. at 884–85.

[7] Id. at 885–86.

[8] United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 413–21 (1981).

[9] United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266, 269–70 (2002).

[10] Id. at 277–78.

absence of reasonable suspicion that a vehicle contains unlawfully present aliens.[11] Given the "regularized manner" of immigration checkpoints, the Court reasoned, motorists "are not taken by any surprise" when they see a checkpoint and can be reasonably certain that the stops are authorized.[12]

However, there are Fourth Amendment constraints on Border Patrol agents' ability to engage in more intrusive actions at fixed immigration checkpoints.[13] In United States v. Ortiz, the Supreme Court held that "at traffic checkpoints removed from the border and its functional equivalents, officers may not search private vehicles without consent or probable cause" of unlawful activity.[14] The Court reasoned that the routine nature of a checkpoint stop "does not mitigate the invasion of privacy that a search entails" and that allowing agents to have unlimited discretion to search a vehicle at a checkpoint would be antithetical to the Fourth Amendment.[15] Thus, in that case, the Court held that Border Patrol agents unlawfully searched a vehicle at a checkpoint because they lacked probable cause that the vehicle contained unlawfully present aliens.[16]

The Supreme Court has also considered the constitutionality of warrantless stops and inspections of vessels within interior U.S. waters away from the border.[17] In United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, the Court held that government officers may board vessels on inland waters with ready access to the open sea for routine document checks without suspicion of criminal activity.[18] The Court reasoned that the government has a strong interest in assuring compliance with vessel documentation requirements, especially in heavy drug trafficking areas, and that the nature of maritime commerce made it impracticable to stop all vessels at permanent water checkpoints.[19]

Amdt4.6.6.4 Drug Testing

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In two 1989 decisions the Court held that no warrant, probable cause, or even individualized suspicion is required for mandatory drug testing of certain classes of railroad and public employees. In each case, "special needs beyond the normal need for law enforcement" were identified as justifying the drug testing. In Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n,[1] the Court upheld regulations requiring railroads to administer blood, urine, and breath tests to employees involved in certain train accidents or violating certain safety

---

[11] United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 545, 562, 566 (1976).

[12] Id. at 559. Similarly, outside of the border context, the Court has upheld the use of fixed "sobriety" checkpoints at which all motorists are briefly stopped for preliminary questioning and observation for signs of intoxication. Michigan v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444, 455 (1990).

[13] Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. at 567.

[14] United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 896–97 (1975).

[15] Id. at 894–96.

[16] Id. at 897–98.

[17] United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579 (1983).

[18] Id. at 593.

[19] Id. at 588–92.

[1] 489 U.S. 602 (1989).

rules; in National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab[2] the Court upheld a Customs Service screening program requiring urine testing of employees seeking transfer or promotion to positions having direct involvement with drug interdiction or to positions requiring the incumbent to carry firearms.

The Court in Skinner found a "compelling" governmental interest in testing the railroad employees without any showing of individualized suspicion, since operation of trains by anyone impaired by drugs "can cause great human loss before any signs of impairment become noticeable."[3] By contrast, the intrusions on privacy were termed "limited." Blood and breath tests were passed off as routine; the urine test, although more intrusive, was deemed permissible because of the "diminished expectation of privacy" in employees having some responsibility for safety in a pervasively regulated industry.[4] The lower court's emphasis on the limited effectiveness of the urine test (it detects past drug use but not necessarily the level of impairment) was misplaced, the Court ruled. It is enough that the test may provide some useful information for an accident investigation; in addition, the test may promote deterrence as well as detection of drug use.[5]

In Von Raab the governmental interests underlying the Customs Service's screening program were also termed "compelling": to ensure that persons entrusted with a firearm and the possible use of deadly force not suffer from drug-induced impairment of perception and judgment, and that "front-line [drug] interdiction personnel [be] physically fit, and have unimpeachable integrity and judgment."[6] The possibly "substantial" interference with privacy interests of these Customs employees was justified, the Court concluded, because, "[u]nlike most private citizens or government employees generally, they have a diminished expectation of privacy."[7]

Emphasizing the "special needs" of the public school context, reflected in the "custodial and tutelary" power that schools exercise over students, and also noting schoolchildren's diminished expectation of privacy, the Court in Vernonia School District v. Acton[8] upheld a school district's policy authorizing random urinalysis drug testing of students who participate in interscholastic athletics. The Court redefined the term "compelling" governmental interest. The phrase does not describe a "fixed, minimum quantum of governmental concern," the Court explained, but rather "describes an interest which appears important enough to justify the particular search at hand."[9] Applying this standard, the Court concluded that "deterring drug use by our Nation's schoolchildren is at least as important as enhancing efficient enforcement of the Nation's laws against the importation of drugs . . . or deterring drug use by engineers and trainmen."[10] On the other hand, the interference with privacy interests was not great, the Court decided, since schoolchildren are routinely required to submit to various physical examinations and vaccinations. Moreover, "[l]egitimate privacy expectations are even less [for] student athletes, since they normally suit up, shower, and dress in locker rooms that afford no privacy, and since they voluntarily subject themselves to physical exams and other regulations

---

[2] 489 U.S. 656 (1989).

[3] 489 U.S. at 628.

[4] 489 U.S. at 628.

[5] 489 U.S. at 631–32.

[6] Von Raab, 489 U.S. at 670–71. Dissenting Justice Antonin Scalia discounted the "feeble justifications" relied upon by the Court, believing instead that the "only plausible explanation" for the drug testing program was the "symbolism" of a government agency setting an example for other employers to follow. 489 U.S. at 686–87.

[7] 489 U.S. at 672.

[8] 515 U.S. 646 (1995).

[9] 515 U.S. at 661.

[10] 515 U.S. at 661.

above and beyond those imposed on non-athletes."[11] The Court "caution[ed] against the assumption that suspicionless drug testing will readily pass muster in other contexts," identifying as "the most significant element" in Vernonia the fact that the policy was implemented under the government's responsibilities as guardian and tutor of schoolchildren.[12]

Seven years later, the Court in Board of Education v. Earls[13] extended Vernonia to uphold a school system's drug testing of all junior high and high school students who participated in extra-curricular activities. The lowered expectation of privacy that athletes have "was not essential" to the decision in Vernonia, Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for a 5-4 Court majority.[14] Rather, that decision "depended primarily upon the school's custodial responsibility and authority."[15] Another distinction was that, although there was some evidence of drug use among the district's students, there was no evidence of a significant problem, as there had been in Vernonia. Rather, the Court referred to "the nationwide epidemic of drug use," and stated that there is no "threshold level" of drug use that need be present.[16] Because the students subjected to testing in Earls had the choice of not participating in extra-curricular activities rather than submitting to drug testing, the case stops short of holding that public school authorities may test all junior and senior high school students for drugs. Thus, although the Court's rationale seems broad enough to permit across-the-board testing,[17] Justice Stephen Breyer's concurrence, emphasizing among other points that "the testing program avoids subjecting the entire school to testing,"[18] raises some doubt on this score. The Court also left another basis for limiting the ruling's sweep by asserting that "regulation of extracurricular activities further diminishes the expectation of privacy among schoolchildren."[19]

In two other cases, the Court found that there were no "special needs" justifying random testing. Georgia's requirement that candidates for state office certify that they had passed a drug test, the Court ruled in Chandler v. Miller[20] was "symbolic" rather than "special." There was nothing in the record to indicate any actual fear or suspicion of drug use by state officials, the required certification was not well designed to detect illegal drug use, and candidates for state office, unlike the customs officers held subject to drug testing in Von Raab, are subject to "relentless" public scrutiny. In the second case, a city-run hospital's program for drug screening of pregnant patients suspected of cocaine use was invalidated because its purpose was to

[11] 515 U.S. at 657.

[12] 515 U.S. at 665.

[13] 536 U.S. 822 (2002).

[14] 536 U.S. at 831.

[15] 536 U.S. at 831.

[16] 536 U.S. at 836.

[17] Drug testing was said to be a "reasonable" means of protecting the school board's "important interest in preventing and deterring drug use among its students," and the decision in Vernonia was said to depend "primarily upon the school's custodial responsibility and authority." 536 U.S. at 838, 831.

[18] Concurring Justice Stephen Breyer pointed out that the testing program "preserves an option for a conscientious objector," who can pay a price of nonparticipation that is "serious, but less severe than expulsion." 536 U.S. at 841. Dissenting Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg pointed out that extracurricular activities are "part of the school's educational program" even though they are in a sense "voluntary." "Voluntary participation in athletics has a distinctly different dimension" because it "expose[s] students to physical risks that schools have a duty to mitigate." Id. at 845, 846.

[19] 536 U.S. at 831–32. The best the Court could do to support this statement was to assert that "some of these clubs and activities require occasional off-campus travel and communal undress," to point out that all extracurricular activities "have their own rules and requirements," and to quote from general language in Vernonia. Id. Dissenting Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg pointed out that these situations requiring a change of clothes on occasional out-of-town trips are "hardly equivalent to the routine communal undress associated with athletics." Id. at 848.

[20] 520 U.S. 305 (1997).

collect evidence for law enforcement.[21] In the previous three cases in which random testing had been upheld, the Court pointed out, the "special needs" asserted as justification were "divorced from the general interest in law enforcement."[22] By contrast, the screening program's focus on law enforcement brought it squarely within the Fourth Amendment's restrictions.

Amdt4.6.6.5 National Security

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In Katz v. United States,[1] Justice Byron White sought to preserve for a future case the possibility that in "national security cases" electronic surveillance upon the authorization of the President or the Attorney General could be permissible without prior judicial approval.[2] The Executive Branch then asserted the power to wiretap and to "bug" in two types of national security situations, against domestic subversion and against foreign intelligence operations, first basing its authority on a theory of "inherent" presidential power and then in the Supreme Court withdrawing to the argument that such surveillance was a "reasonable" search and seizure and therefore valid under the Fourth Amendment. Unanimously, the Court held that at least in cases of domestic subversive investigations, compliance with the warrant provisions of the Fourth Amendment was required.[3] Whether or not a search was reasonable, wrote Justice Lewis Powell for the Court, was a question which derived much of its answer from the warrant clause; except in a few narrowly circumscribed classes of situations, only those searches conducted pursuant to warrants were reasonable. The Government's duty to preserve the national security did not override the guarantee that before government could invade the privacy of its citizens it must present to a neutral magistrate evidence sufficient to support issuance of a warrant authorizing that invasion of privacy.[4] This protection was even more

---

[21] Ferguson v. City of Charleston, 532 U.S. 67 (2001).

[22] 532 U.S. at 79.

[1] 389 U.S. 347, 363–64 (1967) (concurring opinion). Justices William O. Douglas and William William Brennan rejected the suggestion. Id. at 359–60 (concurring opinion). When it enacted its 1968 electronic surveillance statute, Congress alluded to the problem in ambiguous fashion, 18 U.S.C. § 2511(3), which the Court subsequently interpreted as having expressed no congressional position at all. United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 302–08 (1972).

[2] See also Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2206, 2220 (2018) ("[O]ur opinion does not consider other collection techniques involving foreign affairs or national security.").

[3] United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972). Chief Justice Warren Burger concurred in the result and Justice Byron White concurred on the ground that the 1968 law required a warrant in this case, and therefore did not reach the constitutional issue. Id. at 340. Justice William Rehnquist did not participate. Justice Lewis Powell carefully noted that the case required "no judgment on the scope of the President's surveillance power with respect to the activities of foreign powers, within or without this country." Id. at 308.

[4] The case contains a clear suggestion that the Court would approve a congressional provision for a different standard of probable cause in national security cases. "We recognize that domestic security surveillance may involve different policy and practical considerations from the surveillance of 'ordinary crime.' The gathering of security intelligence is often long range and involves the interrelation of various sources and types of information. The exact targets of such surveillance may be more difficult to identify than in surveillance operations against many types of crimes specified in Title III. Often, too, the emphasis of domestic intelligence gathering is on the prevention of unlawful activity or the enhancement of the Government's preparedness for some future crisis or emergency. . . . Different standards may be compatible with the Fourth Amendment if they are reasonable both in relation to the legitimate need of Government for intelligence information and the protected rights of our citizens. For the warrant needed in "national security cases" than in cases of "ordinary" crime, the Justice continued, because the tendency of government so often is to regard opponents of its policies as a threat and hence to tread in areas protected by the First Amendment as well as by the Fourth.[5] Rejected also was the argument that courts could not appreciate the intricacies of investigations in the area of national security or preserve the secrecy which is required.[6]

The question of the scope of the President's constitutional powers, if any, remains judicially unsettled.[7] Congress has acted, however, providing for a special court to hear requests for warrants for electronic surveillance in foreign intelligence situations, and permitting the President to authorize warrantless surveillance to acquire foreign intelligence information provided that the communications to be monitored are exclusively between or among foreign powers and there is no substantial likelihood any "United States person" will be overheard.[8]

Amdt4.6.6.6 School Searches

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In New Jersey v. T.L.O.,[1] the Court set forth the principles governing searches by public school authorities. The Fourth Amendment applies to searches conducted by public school officials because "school officials act as representatives of the State, not merely as surrogates for the parents."[2] However, "the school setting requires some easing of the restrictions to which searches by public authorities are ordinarily subject."[3] Neither the warrant requirement nor the probable cause standard is appropriate, the Court ruled. Instead, a simple reasonableness standard governs all searches of students' persons and effects by school authorities.[4] A search must be reasonable at its inception, that is, there must be "reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law application may vary according to the governmental interest to be enforced and the nature of citizen right deserving protection. . . . It may be that Congress, for example, would judge that the application and affidavit showing probable cause need not follow the exact requirements of § 2518 but should allege other circumstances more appropriate to domestic security cases. . . ." 407 U.S. at 322–23.

---

[5] 407 U.S. at 313–24.

[6] 407 U.S. at 320.

[7] See United States v. Butenko, 494 F.2d 593 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 881 (1974); Zweibon v. Mitchell, 516 F.2d 594 (D.C. Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976), appeal after remand, 565 F.2d 742 (D.C. Cir. 1977), on remand, 444 F. Supp. 1296 (D.D.C. 1978), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 606 F.2d 1172 (D.C. Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 453 U.S. 912 (1981); Smith v. Nixon, 606 F.2d 1183 (D.C. Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 453 U.S. 912 (1981); United States v. Truong Ding Hung, 629 F.2d 908 (4th Cir. 1980), after remand, 667 F.2d 1105 (4th Cir. 1981); Halkin v. Helms, 690 F.2d 977 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

[8] Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-511, 92 Stat. 1797, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1801–1811. See United States v. Belfield, 692 F.2d 141 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (upholding constitutionality of disclosure restrictions in Act).

[1] 469 U.S. 325 (1985).

[2] 469 U.S. at 336.

[3] 469 U.S. at 340.

[4] This single rule, the Court explained, will permit school authorities "to regulate their conduct according to the dictates of reason and common sense." 469 U.S. at 343. Rejecting the suggestion of dissenting Justice John Paul Stevens, the Court was "unwilling to adopt a standard under which the legality of a search is dependent upon a judge's evaluation of the relative importance of various school rules." Id. at n.9.

or the rules of the school."[5] School searches must also be reasonably related in scope to the circumstances justifying the interference, and "not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."[6] In applying these rules, the Court upheld as reasonable the search of a student's purse to determine whether the student, accused of violating a school rule by smoking in the lavatory, possessed cigarettes. The search for cigarettes uncovered evidence of drug activity held admissible in a prosecution under the juvenile laws.

In Safford Unified School District #1 v. Redding,[7] a student found in possession of prescription ibuprofen pills at school stated that the pills had come from another student, 13-year-old Savana Redding. The Court found that the first student's statement was sufficiently plausible to warrant suspicion that Savana was involved in pill distribution, and that this suspicion was enough to justify a search of Savana's backpack and outer clothing.[8] School officials, however, had also "directed Savana to remove her clothes down to her underwear, and then 'pull out' her bra and the elastic band on her underpants"[9]—an action that the Court thought could fairly be labeled a strip search. Taking into account that "adolescent vulnerability intensifies the patent intrusiveness of the exposure" and that, according to a study, a strip search can "result in serious emotional damage," the Court found that the search violated the Fourth Amendment.[10] "Because there were no reasons to suspect the drugs presented a danger or were concealed in her underwear," the Court wrote, "the content of the suspicion failed to match the degree of intrusion."[11] But, even though the Court found that the search had violated the Fourth Amendment, it found that the school officials who conducted the search were protected from liability through qualified immunity, because the law prior to Redding was not clearly established.[12]

Amdt4.6.6.7 Searches of Prisoners, Parolees, and Probationers

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The "undoubted security imperatives involved in jail supervision" require "defer[ence] to the judgment of correctional officials unless the record contains substantial evidence showing their policies are an unnecessary or unjustified response to the problems of jail security."[1] So saying, the Court, in Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders, upheld routine strip searches,

---

[5] 469 U.S. at 342. The Court has further elaborated that this "reasonable suspicion" standard is met if there is a "moderate chance" of finding evidence of wrongdoing. Safford Unified School District #1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 371 (2009).

[6] 469 U.S. at 342.

[7] 557 U.S. 364 (2009).

[8] 557 U.S. 364, 373–74 (2009).

[9] 557 U.S. at 374.

[10] 557 U.S. at 375.

[11] 557 U.S. at 368, 375. Justice Clarence Thomas dissented from the finding of a Fourth Amendment violation.

[12] See Amdt4.7.1 Exclusionary Rule and Evidence to Amdt4.7.4 Good Faith Exception to Exclusionary Rule. Justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg dissented from the grant of qualified immunity.

[1] Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders, 566 U.S. 318, 322–23, 330 (2012). See also, e.g., Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). The Florence Court made clear it was referring to "jails" in "a broad sense to include prisons and other detention facilities." 566 U.S. 318, 322 (2012).

including close-up visual cavity inspections, as part of processing new arrestees for entry into the general inmate population, without the need for individualized suspicion and without an exception for those arrested for minor offenses.[2] Correctional officials had asserted significant penological interests to justify routine strip searches of new arrivals: detecting and preventing the introduction into the inmate population of infections, infestations, and contraband of all sorts; and identifying gang members. Having cited serious concerns and having applied their professional expertise, the officials had, in the Court's opinion, acted reasonably and not clearly overreacted. But despite taking a deferential approach and recounting the grave dangers correctional officers face, the Florence Court did not hold that individuals being processed for detention have no privacy rights at all. In separate concurrences, moreover, two members of the five-Justice majority held out the prospect of exceptions and refinements in future rulings on blanket strip search policies for new detainees.[3]

The Court in Maryland v. King cited a legitimate interest in having safe and accurate booking procedures to identify persons being taken into custody in order to sustain taking DNA samples from those charged with serious crimes.[4] Tapping the "unmatched potential of DNA identification" facilitates knowing with certainty who the arrestee is, the arrestee's criminal history, the danger the arrestee poses to others, the arrestee's flight risk, and other relevant facts.[5] By comparison, the Court characterized an arrestee's expectation of privacy as diminished and the intrusion posed by a cheek swab as minimal.[6]

Searches of prison cells by prison administrators are not limited even by a reasonableness standard, the Court's having held that "the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches does not apply within the confines of the prison cell."[7] Thus, prison administrators may conduct random "shakedown" searches of inmates' cells without the need to adopt any established practice or plan, and inmates must look to the Eighth Amendment or to state tort law for redress against harassment, malicious property destruction, and the like.

Neither a warrant nor probable cause is needed for an administrative search of a probationer's home. It is enough, the Court ruled in Griffin v. Wisconsin, that such a search was conducted pursuant to a valid regulation that itself satisfies the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard (for example, by requiring "reasonable grounds" for a search).[8] "A State's operation of a probation system, like its operation of a school, government office or prison, or its supervision of a regulated industry, . . . presents 'special needs' beyond normal law enforcement that may justify departures from the usual warrant and probable cause requirements."[9] "Probation, like incarceration, is a form of criminal sanction," the Court noted, and a warrant or probable cause requirement would interfere with the "ongoing

[2] 566 U.S. 318 (2012). The Court upheld similarly invasive strip searches of all inmates following contact visits in Bell v. Wolfish. 441 U.S. 520, 558–60 (1979).

[3] 566 U.S. 318 (2012) (Roberts, C.J., concurring); 566 U.S. 318 (2012) (Alito, J., concurring). In the opinion of the dissenters, a strip search of the kind conducted in Florence is unconstitutional if given to an arriving detainee arrested for a minor offense not involving violence or drugs, absent a reasonable suspicion to believe that the new arrival possesses contraband. 566 U.S. 318 (2012) (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[4] 569 U.S. 435, 449 (2013).

[5] Id. at 449–56, 460–61.

[6] Id. at 460–64.

[7] Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526 (1984). See also Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 555–57 (1979) ("It is difficult to see how the detainee's interest in privacy is infringed by the room-search rule [allowing unannounced searches]. No one can rationally doubt that room searches represent an appropriate security measure . . . .").

[8] 483 U.S. 868 (1987) (search based on information from police detective that there was or might be contraband in probationer's apartment).

[9] 483 U.S. at 873–74.

[non-adversarial] supervisory relationship" required for proper functioning of the system.[10] A warrant is also not required if the purpose of a search of a probationer is investigate a crime rather than to supervise probation.[11]

"[O]n the 'continuum' of state-imposed punishments . . . , parolees have [even] fewer expectations of privacy than probationers, because parole is more akin to imprisonment than probation is to imprisonment."[12] The Fourth Amendment, therefore, is not violated by a warrantless search of a parolee that is predicated upon a parole condition to which a prisoner agreed to observe during the balance of his sentence.[13]

Amdt4.6.6.8 Workplace Searches

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Similar principles apply to a public employer's work-related search of its employees' offices, desks, or file cabinets, except that in this context the Court distinguished searches conducted for law enforcement purposes. In O'Connor v. Ortega,[1] a majority of Justices agreed, albeit on somewhat differing rationales, that neither a warrant nor a probable cause requirement should apply to employer searches "for noninvestigatory, work-related purposes, as well as for investigations of work-related misconduct."[2] Four Justices would require a case-by-case inquiry into the reasonableness of such searches;[3] one would hold that such searches "do not violate the Fourth Amendment."[4]

In City of Ontario v. Quon,[5] the Court bypassed adopting an approach for determining a government employee's reasonable expectation of privacy, an issue unresolved in O'Connor. Rather, the Quon Court followed the "special needs" holding in O'Connor and found that, even assuming a reasonable expectation of privacy, a city's warrantless search of the transcripts of a police officer's on-duty text messages on city equipment was reasonable because it was justified at its inception by noninvestigatory work-related purposes and was not excessively intrusive.[6] A jury had found the purpose of the search to be to determine whether the city's contract with its wireless service provider was adequate, and the Court held that "reviewing

---

[10] 483 U.S. at 879.

[11] United States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112 (2001) (probationary status informs both sides of the reasonableness balance).

[12] Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843, 850 (2006) (internal quotation marks altered).

[13] 547 U.S. at 852. The parole condition at issue in Samson required prisoners to "agree in writing to be subject to a search or seizure by a parole officer or other peace officer at any time of the day or night, with or without a search warrant and with or without cause." Id. at 846, quoting Cal. Penal Code Ann. § 3067(a).

[1] 480 U.S. 709 (1987).

[2] 480 U.S. at 725. Not at issue was whether there must be individualized suspicion for investigations of work-related misconduct.

[3] This position was stated in Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's plurality opinion, joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist and by Justices White and Lewis Powell.

[4] 480 U.S. at 732 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment).

[5] 560 U.S. 746 (2010).

[6] In Quon, a police officer was dismissed after a review of the transcripts of his on-duty text messages revealed that a large majority of his texting was not related to work, and some messages were sexually explicit.

the transcripts was reasonable because it was an efficient and expedient way to determine whether [the officer's] overages were the result of work-related messaging or personal use."[7]

Amdt4.7 Excluding Evidence

Amdt4.7.1 Exclusionary Rule and Evidence

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fourth Amendment declares a right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, but how this right translates into concrete terms is not specified. Several possible methods of enforcement have been suggested, but only one—the exclusionary rule—has been applied with any frequency by the Supreme Court, and Court in recent years has limited its application.

Theoretically, there are several alternatives to the exclusionary rule. An illegal search and seizure may be criminally actionable and officers undertaking one thus subject to prosecution, but the examples when officers are criminally prosecuted for overzealous law enforcement are extremely rare.[1] A police officer who makes an illegal search and seizure is subject to internal departmental discipline, which may be backed up by the oversight of police review boards in the few jurisdictions that have adopted them, but, again, the examples of disciplinary actions are exceedingly rare.[2]

Civil remedies are also available. Persons who have been illegally arrested or who have had their privacy invaded will usually have a tort action available under state statutory or common law, or against the Federal Government under the Federal Tort Claims Act.[3] Moreover, police officers acting under color of state law who violate a person's Fourth Amendment rights are subject to a suit in federal court for damages and other remedies[4] under a civil rights statute.[5] Although federal officers and others acting under color of federal law are

---

[7] 560 U.S. 746, 761 (2010).

[1] Edwards, Criminal Liability for Unreasonable Searches and Seizures, 41 VA. L. REV. 621 (1955).

[2] Goldstein, Police Policy Formulation: A Proposal for Improving Police Performance, 65 MICH. L. REV. 1123 (1967).

[3] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b), 2671–2680. Section 2680(h) prohibits suits against the Federal Government for false arrest and specified other intentional torts, but contains an exception "with regard to acts or omissions of investigative or law enforcement officials of the United States Government."

[4] If there are continuing and recurrent violations, federal injunctive relief would be available. Cf. Lankford v. Gelston, 364 F.2d 197 (4th Cir. 1966); Wheeler v. Goodman, 298 F. Supp. 935 (W.D.N.C. 1969) (preliminary injunction); Wheeler v. Goodman, 306 F. Supp. 58 (W.D.N.C. 1969) (permanent injunction), vacated on jurisdictional grounds sub nom., Goodman v. Wheeler, 401 U.S. 987 (1971).

[5] 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1964). See Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961). In some circumstances, the officer's liability may be attributed to the municipality. Monell v. New York City Dep't of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978). These claims that officers have used excessive force in the course of an arrest or investigatory stop are to be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, not under substantive due process. The test is "whether the officers' actions are 'objectively reasonable' under the facts and circumstances confronting them." Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 397 (1989) (cited with approval in Scott v. Harris, in which a police officer's ramming a fleeing motorist's car from behind in an attempt to stop him was found reasonable). Thus, the Court has noted, "[a]s in other areas of our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, '[d]etermining whether the force used to effect a particular seizure is reasonable' requires balancing of the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the relevant government interests." Cty. of L.A. v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1546 (2017) (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396) (rejecting the Ninth Circuit's "provocation rule" under which law enforcement officers who "make a 'seizure' of a person using force that is judged to be reasonable based on a consideration of the circumstances relevant to that determination" can "nevertheless be held liable for injuries caused not subject to this statute, the Supreme Court has held that a right to damages for a violation of Fourth Amendment rights arises by implication and that this right is enforceable in federal courts upon proof of injuries resulting from agents' violation of the Amendment.[6]

Although a damages remedy might be made more effectual,[7] legal and practical problems stand in the way.[8] Law enforcement officers have available to them the usual common-law defenses, the most important of which is the claim of good faith.[9] Such "good faith" claims, however, are not based on the subjective intent of the officer. Instead, officers are entitled to qualified immunity "where clearly established law does not show that the search violated the Fourth Amendment,"[10] or where they had an objectively reasonable belief that a warrantless search later determined to violate the Fourth Amendment was supported by probable cause or exigent circumstances.[11] On the practical side, persons subjected to illegal arrests and searches and seizures are often disreputable persons toward whom juries are unsympathetic, or they are indigent and unable to sue. The result, therefore, is that the Court has emphasized exclusion of unconstitutionally seized evidence in subsequent criminal trials as the only effective enforcement method.

---

by the seizure on the ground that they committed a separate Fourth Amendment violation that contributed to their need to use force"). "The operative question in excessive force cases is 'whether the totality of the circumstances justifie[s] a particular sort of search or seizure.'" Id. (quoting Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 8–9 (1985)).

[6] Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). The possibility had been hinted at in Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678 (1946); But see Egbert v. Boule, No. 21-147, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 8, 2022) (explaining that, since the Bivens decision, the Court has come "to appreciate more fully the tension between judicially created causes of action and the Constitution's separation of legislative and judicial power," that "recognizing a cause of action under Bivens is a disfavored judicial activity," and that "[a]t bottom, creating a cause of action is a legislative endeavor."); id. at 9 (holding that the Court of Appeals erred in creating a cause of action under Bivens for a Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim); id. at 1 (stating that, since Bivens, the Court has declined "11 times to imply a similar cause of action for other alleged constitutional violations.").

[7] See, e.g., Chief Justice Burger's dissent in Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 411, 422–24 (1971), which suggests a statute allowing suit against the government in a special tribunal and a statutory remedy in lieu of the exclusionary rule.

[8] Foote, Tort Remedies for Police Violations of Individual Rights, 39 MINN. L. REV. 493 (1955).

[9] This is the rule in actions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547 (1967), and on remand in Bivens the court of appeals promulgated the same rule to govern trial of the action. Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 456 F.2d 1339 (2d Cir. 1972).

[10] Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223 (2009), quoted in Safford Unified School District #1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 377 (2009). In Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), the Court had mandated a two-step procedure to determine whether an officer has qualified immunity: first, a determination whether the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right, and then a determination whether the right had been clearly established. In Pearson, the Court held "that, while the sequence set forth [in Saucier] is often appropriate, it should no longer be regarded as mandatory. The judges of the district courts and the courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand." 555 U.S. at 236. See also Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982).

[11] Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987). The qualified immunity inquiry "has a further dimension" beyond what is required in determining whether a police officer used excessive force in arresting a suspect: the officer may make "a reasonable mistake" in his assessment of what the law requires. Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 205–06 (2001). See also Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 201 (2004) (because cases create a "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force," an officer's misunderstanding as to her authority to shoot a suspect attempting to flee in a vehicle was not unreasonable); Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 345 (1986) (qualified immunity protects police officers who applied for a warrant unless "a reasonably well-trained officer in [the same] position would have known that his affidavit failed to establish probable cause and that he should not have applied for a warrant"). But see Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 310 (2015) (per curiam) ("The Court has . . . never found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone be the basis for denying qualified immunity.").

Amdt4.7.2 Adoption of Exclusionary Rule

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Exclusion of evidence as a remedy for Fourth Amendment violations found its beginning in Boyd v. United States,[1] which, as noted above, involved not a search and seizure but a compulsory production of business papers, which the Court likened to a search and seizure. Further, the Court analogized the Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination provision to the Fourth Amendment's protections to derive a rule that required exclusion of the compelled evidence because the defendant had been compelled to incriminate himself by producing it.[2] Boyd was closely limited to its facts and an exclusionary rule based on Fourth Amendment violations was rejected by the Court a few years later, with the Justices adhering to the common-law rule that evidence was admissible however acquired.[3]

Nevertheless, ten years later the common-law view was itself rejected and an exclusionary rule propounded in Weeks v. United States.[4] Weeks had been convicted on the basis of evidence seized from his home in the course of two warrantless searches; some of the evidence consisted of private papers such as those sought to be compelled in Boyd. Unanimously, the Court held that the evidence should have been excluded by the trial court. The Fourth Amendment, Justice William Day said, placed on the courts as well as on law enforcement officers restraints on the exercise of power compatible with its guarantees. "The tendency of those who execute the criminal laws of the country to obtain convictions by means of unlawful searches and enforced confessions . . . should find no sanction in the judgments of the courts which are charged at all times with the support of the Constitution and to which people of all conditions have a right to appeal for the maintenance of such fundamental rights."[5] The basis of the ruling is ambiguous, but seems to have been an assumption that admission of illegally seized evidence would itself violate the Fourth Amendment. "If letters and private documents can thus be seized and held and used in evidence against a citizen accused of an offense, the protection of the Fourth Amendment declaring his right to be secured against such searches and seizures is of no value, and, so far as those thus placed are concerned, might as well be stricken from the Constitution. The efforts of the courts and their officials to bring the guilty to

---

[1] 116 U.S. 616 (1886).

[2] "We have already noticed the intimate relation between the two Amendments. They throw great light on each other. For the 'unreasonable searches and seizures' condemned in the Fourth Amendment are almost always made for the purpose of compelling a man to give evidence against himself, which in criminal cases is condemned in the Fifth Amendment; and compelling a man in a criminal case to be a witness against himself, which is condemned in the Fifth Amendment, throws light on the question as to what is an 'unreasonable search and seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. And we have been unable to perceive that the seizure of a man's private books and papers to be used in evidence against him is substantially different from compelling him to be a witness against himself. We think it is within the clear intent and meaning of those terms." 116 U.S. at 633. It was this use of the Fifth Amendment's clearly required exclusionary rule, rather than one implied from the Fourth, on which Justice Hugo Black relied, and, absent a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination violation, he did not apply such a rule. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 661 (1961) (concurring opinion); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 493, 496–500 (1971) (dissenting opinion). The theory of a "convergence" of the two Amendments has now been disavowed by the Court. See Amdt4.3.6.2 Property Subject to Seizure.

[3] Adams v. New York, 192 U.S. 585 (1904). Since the case arose from a state court and concerned a search by state officers, it could have been decided simply by holding that the Fourth Amendment was inapplicable. See National Safe Deposit Co. v. Stead, 232 U.S. 58, 71 (1914).

[4] 232 U.S. 383 (1914).

[5] 232 U.S. at 392.

punishment, praiseworthy as they are, are not to be aided by the sacrifice of those great principles established by years of endeavor and suffering which have resulted in their embodiment in the fundamental law of the land."[6]

Because the Fourth Amendment does not restrict the actions of state officers,[7] there was originally no question about the application of an exclusionary rule in state courts[8] as a mandate of federal constitutional policy.[9] But, in Wolf v. Colorado,[10] a unanimous Court held that freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures was such a fundamental right as to be protected against state violations by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[11] However, the Court held that the right thus guaranteed did not require that the exclusionary rule be applied in the state courts, because there were other means to observe and enforce the right. "Granting that in practice the exclusion of evidence may be an effective way of deterring unreasonable searches, it is not for this Court to condemn as falling below the minimal standards assured by the Due Process Clause a State's reliance upon other methods which, if consistently enforced, would be equally effective."[12]

It developed, however, that the Court had not vested in the states total discretion with regard to the admissibility of evidence, as the Court proceeded to evaluate under the due process clause the methods by which the evidence had been obtained. Thus, in Rochin v. California,[13] evidence of narcotics possession had been obtained by forcible administration of an emetic to defendant at a hospital after officers had been unsuccessful in preventing him from swallowing certain capsules. The evidence, said Justice Felix Frankfurter for the Court, should have been excluded because the police methods were too objectionable. "This is conduct that shocks the conscience. Illegally breaking into the privacy of the petitioner, the struggle to open his mouth and remove what was there, the forcible extraction of his stomach's contents . . . is bound to offend even hardened sensibilities. They are methods too close to the rack and screw."[14] The Rochin standard was limited in Irvine v. California,[15] in which defendant was

[6] 232 U.S. at 393.

[7] Smith v. Maryland, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 71, 76 (1855); National Safe Deposit Co. v. Stead, 232 U.S. 58, 71 (1914).

[8] The history of the exclusionary rule in the state courts was surveyed by Justice Frankfurter in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 29, 33–38 (1949). The matter was canvassed again in Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 224–32 (1960).

[9] During the period in which the Constitution did not impose any restrictions on state searches and seizures, the Court permitted the introduction in evidence in federal courts of items seized by state officers which had they been seized by federal officers would have been inadmissible, Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 398 (1914), so long as no federal officer participated in the search, Byars v. United States, 273 U.S. 28 (1927), or the search was not made on behalf of federal law enforcement purposes. Gambino v. United States, 275 U.S. 310 (1927). This rule became known as the "silver platter doctrine" after the phrase coined by Justice Frankfurter in Lustig v. United States, 338 U.S. 74, 78–79 (1949): "The crux of that doctrine is that a search is a search by a federal official if he had a hand in it; it is not a search by a federal official if evidence secured by state authorities is turned over to the federal authorities on a silver platter." In Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206 (1960), the doctrine was discarded by a 5-4 majority, which held that, because Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), had made state searches and seizures subject to federal constitutional restrictions through the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause, the "silver platter doctrine" was no longer constitutionally viable. During this same period, since state courts were free to admit any evidence no matter how obtained, evidence illegally seized by federal officers could be used in state courts, Wilson v. Schnettler, 365 U.S. 381 (1961), although the Supreme Court ruled out such a course if the evidence had first been offered in a federal trial and had been suppressed. Rea v. United States, 350 U.S. 214 (1956).

[10] 338 U.S. 25 (1949).

[11] "The security of one's privacy against arbitrary intrusion by the police—which is at the core of the Fourth Amendment—is basic to a free society. It is therefore implicit in 'the concept of ordered liberty' and as such enforceable against the States through the Due Process Clause." 338 U.S. at 27–28.

[12] 338 U.S. at 31.

[13] 342 U.S. 165 (1952). The police had initially entered defendant's house without a warrant. Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas concurred in the result on self-incrimination grounds.

[14] 342 U.S. at 172.

[15] 347 U.S. 128 (1954).

convicted of bookmaking activities on the basis of evidence secured by police who repeatedly broke into his house and concealed electronic gear to broadcast every conversation in the house. Justice Robert Jackson's plurality opinion asserted that Rochin had been occasioned by the element of brutality, and that while the police conduct in Irvine was blatantly illegal the admissibility of the evidence was governed by Wolf, which should be consistently applied for purposes of guidance to state courts. The Justice also entertained considerable doubts about the efficacy of the exclusionary rule.[16] Rochin emerged as the standard, however, in a later case in which the Court sustained the admissibility of the results of a blood test administered while defendant was unconscious in a hospital following a traffic accident, the Court observing the routine nature of the test and the minimal intrusion into bodily privacy.[17]

Then, in Mapp v. Ohio,[18] the Court held that the exclusionary rule applied to the states. It was "logically and constitutionally necessary," wrote Justice Thomas Clark for the majority, "that the exclusion doctrine—an essential part of the right to privacy—be also insisted upon as an essential ingredient of the right" to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures. "To hold otherwise is to grant the right but in reality to withhold its privilege and enjoyment."[19] The Court further held that, because illegally seized evidence was to be excluded from both federal and state courts, the standards by which the question of legality was to be determined should be the same, regardless of whether the court in which the evidence was offered was state or federal.[20]

Important to determination of such questions as the application of the exclusionary rule to the states and the ability of Congress to abolish or to limit it is the fixing of the constitutional source and the basis of the rule. For some time, it was not clear whether the exclusionary rule was derived from the Fourth Amendment, from some union of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, or from the Court's supervisory power over the lower federal courts. It will be recalled that in Boyd[21] the Court fused the search and seizure clause with the provision of the Fifth Amendment protecting against compelled self-incrimination. In Weeks v. United States,[22] though the Fifth Amendment was mentioned, the holding seemed clearly to be based on the Fourth Amendment. Nevertheless, in opinions following Weeks the Court clearly identified the [16] 347 U.S. at 134–38. Justice Clark, concurring, announced his intention to vote to apply the exclusionary rule to the states when the votes were available. Id. at 138. Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented on self-incrimination grounds, id. at 139, and Justice William O. Douglas continued to urge the application of the exclusionary rule to the states. Id. at 149. Justices Frankfurter and Burton dissented on due process grounds, arguing the relevance of Rochin. Id. at 142.

[17] Breithaupt v. Abram, 352 U.S. 432 (1957). Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented. Though a due process case, the results of the case have been reaffirmed directly in a Fourth Amendment case. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966).

[18] 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

[19] 367 U.S. at 655–56. Justice Black concurred, doubting that the Fourth Amendment itself compelled adoption of an exclusionary rule but relying on the Fifth Amendment for authority. Id. at 661. Justice Potter Stewart would not have reached the issue but would have reversed on other grounds, id. at 672, while Justices John Harlan, Felix Frankfurter, and Charles Whittaker dissented, preferring to adhere to Wolf. Id. at 672. Justice Harlan advocated the overruling of Mapp down to the conclusion of his service on the Court. See Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 490 (1971) (concurring opinion).

[20] Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963).

[21] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886).

[22] 232 U.S. 383 (1914). Defendant's room had been searched and papers seized by officers acting without a warrant. "If letters and private documents can thus be seized and held and used in evidence against a citizen accused of an offense, the protection of the Fourth Amendment declaring his right to be secure against such searches and seizures is of no value, and, so far as those thus placed are concerned, might as well be stricken from the Constitution." Id. at 393.

basis for the exclusionary rule as the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[23] Then, in Mapp v. Ohio,[24] the Court tied the rule strictly to the Fourth Amendment, finding exclusion of evidence seized in violation of the Amendment to be the "most important constitutional privilege" of the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, finding that the rule was "an essential part of the right of privacy" protected by the Amendment.

"This Court has ever since [Weeks was decided in 1914] required of federal law officers a strict adherence to that command which this Court has held to be a clear, specific, and constitutionally required—even if judicially implied—deterrent safeguard without insistence upon which the Fourth Amendment would have been reduced to a 'form of words.'"[25] It was a necessary step in the application of the rule to the states to find that the rule was of constitutional origin rather than a result of an exercise of the Court's supervisory power over the lower federal courts, because the latter could not constitutionally be extended to the state courts.[26] In fact, in Wolf v. Colorado,[27] in declining to extend the exclusionary rule to the states, Justice Frankfurter seemed to find the rule to be based on the Court's supervisory powers. Mapp establishes that the rule is of constitutional origin, but this does not necessarily establish that it is immune to statutory revision.

Suggestions appear in a number of cases, including Weeks, to the effect that admission of illegally seized evidence is itself unconstitutional.[28] These suggestions were often combined

---

[23] E.g., Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298, 306, 307 (1921); Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313, 316 (1921); Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 33–34 (1925); McGuire v. United States, 273 U.S. 95, 99 (1927). In Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 462 (1928), Chief Justice Taft ascribed the rule both to the Fourth and the Fifth Amendments, while in dissent Justices Holmes and Brandeis took the view that the Fifth Amendment was violated by the admission of evidence seized in violation of the Fourth. Id. at 469, 478–79. Justice Black was the only modern proponent of this view. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 661 (1961) (concurring opinion); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 493, 496–500 (1971) (dissenting opinion). See, however, Justice Clark's plurality opinion in Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 30 (1963), in which he brought up the self-incrimination clause as a supplementary source of the rule, a position which he had discarded in Mapp.

[24] 367 U.S. 643, 656 (1961). Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 28 (1949), also ascribed the rule to the Fourth Amendment exclusively.

[25] Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 648 (1961) (emphasis added).

[26] An example of an exclusionary rule not based on constitutional grounds may be found in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), and Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), in which the Court enforced a requirement that arrestees be promptly presented to a magistrate by holding that incriminating admissions obtained during the period beyond a reasonable time for presentation would be inadmissible. The rule was not extended to the States, cf. Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 598–602 (1961), but the Court's resort to the self-incrimination clause in reviewing confessions made such application irrelevant in most cases in any event. For an example of a transmutation of a supervisory rule into a constitutional rule, see McCarthy v. United States, 394 U.S. 459 (1969), and Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969).

[27] Weeks "was not derived from the explicit requirements of the Fourth Amendment . . . . The decision was a matter of judicial implication." 338 U.S. 25, 28 (1949). Justice Black was more explicit. "I agree with what appears to be a plain implication of the Court's opinion that the federal exclusionary rule is not a command of the Fourth Amendment but is a judicially created rule of evidence which Congress might negate." Id. at 39–40. He continued to adhere to the supervisory power basis in strictly search-and-seizure cases, Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41, 76 (1967) (dissenting), except where self-incrimination values were present. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 661 (1961) (concurring). See also id. at 678 (Harlan, J., dissenting); Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 216 (1960) (Stewart, J., for the Court).

[28] "The tendency of those who execute the criminal laws of the country to obtain convictions by means of unlawful searches and enforced confessions . . . should find no sanction in the judgment of the courts which are charged at all times with the support of the Constitution . . . ." Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 392 (1914). In Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 655, 657 (1961), Justice Clark maintained that "the Fourth Amendment include[s] the exclusion of the evidence seized in violation of its provisions" and that it, and the Fifth Amendment with regard to confessions "assures . . . that no man is to be convicted on unconstitutional evidence." In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 12, 13 (1968), Chief Justice Warren wrote: "Courts which sit under our Constitution cannot and will not be made party to lawless invasions of the constitutional rights of citizens by permitting unhindered governmental use of the fruits of such invasions. . . . A ruling admitting evidence in a criminal trial . . . has the necessary effect of legitimizing the conduct which produced the evidence."

with a rationale emphasizing "judicial integrity" as a reason to reject the proffer of such evidence.[29] Yet the Court permitted such evidence to be introduced into trial courts when the defendant lacked "standing" to object to the search and seizure that produced the evidence or when the search took place before the announcement of the decision extending the exclusionary rule to the states.[30] At these times, the Court turned to the "basic postulate of the exclusionary rule itself. The rule is calculated to prevent, not to repair. Its purpose is to deter—to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the only effectively available way—by removing the incentive to disregard it."[31] "Mapp had as its prime purpose the enforcement of the Fourth Amendment through the inclusion of the exclusionary rule within its rights. This, it was found, was the only effective deterrent to lawless police action. Indeed, all of the cases since Wolf requiring the exclusion of illegal evidence have been based on the necessity for an effective deterrent to illegal police action."[32]

For as long as we have had the exclusionary rule, critics have attacked it, challenged its premises, disputed its morality.[33] By the early 1980s, a majority of Justices had stated a desire either to abolish the rule or to sharply curtail its operation,[34] and numerous opinions had rejected all doctrinal bases other than deterrence.[35] At the same time, these opinions voiced strong doubts about the efficacy of the rule as a deterrent, and advanced public interest values in effective law enforcement and public safety as reasons to discard the rule altogether or curtail its application.[36] Thus, the Court emphasized the high costs of enforcing the rule to exclude reliable and trustworthy evidence, even when violations have been technical or in good faith, and suggested that such use of the rule may well "generat[e] disrespect for the law and administration of justice,"[37] as well as free guilty defendants.[38] No longer does the Court

---

[29] Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 222–23 (1960); Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 660 (1961). See McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 339–40 (1943).

[30] Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618 (1965).

[31] Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 217 (1960).

[32] Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 636–37 (1965). The Court advanced other reasons for its decision as well. Id. at 636–40.

[33] Among the early critics were Judge Benjamin Cardozo, People v. Defore, 242 N.Y. 13, 21, 150 N.E. 585, 587 (1926) (the criminal will go free "because the constable has blundered"), and Dean Wigmore. 8 J. Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence 2183–84 (3d ed. 1940). For extensive discussion of criticism and support, with citation to the literature, see 1 Wayne R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment § 1.2 (4th ed. 2004).

[34] E.g., Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 496 (1976) (Chief Justice Burger: rule ought to be discarded now, rather than wait for a replacement as he argued earlier); id. at 536 (Justice Byron White: modify rule to admit evidence seized illegally but in good faith); Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 261 (1973) (Powell, J.,); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 609 (1975) (Powell, J.); Robbins v. California, 453 U.S. 420, 437 (1981) (Rehnquist, C.J.,); California v. Minjares, 443 U.S. 916 (1979) (Rehnquist, J., joined by Burger, C.J.); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 510 (1971) (Black, J., dissenting joined by Blackmun, J. that "the Fourth Amendment supports no exclusionary rule").

[35] E.g., United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433, 446 (1976) (deterrence is the "prime purpose" of the rule, "if not the sole one."); United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 347–48 (1974); United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 536–39 (1975); Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 486 (1976); Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 134 n.3, 137–38 (1978); Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 38 n.3 (1979). Thus, admission of the fruits of an unlawful search or seizure "work[s] no new Fourth Amendment wrong," the wrong being "fully accomplished by the unlawful search or seizure itself," United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. at 354, and the exclusionary rule does not "cure the invasion of the defendant's rights which he has already suffered." Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. at 540 (White, J., dissenting). "Judicial integrity" is not infringed by the mere admission of evidence seized wrongfully. "[T]he courts must not commit or encourage violations of the Constitution," and the integrity issue is answered by whether exclusion would deter violations by others. United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. at 458 n.35; United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. at 347, 354; United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. at 538; Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 450 n.25 (1974).

[36] United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433, 448–54 (1976), contains a lengthy review of the literature on the deterrent effect of the rule and doubts about that effect. See also Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 492 n.32 (1976).

[37] Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. at 490, 491.

[38] Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 416 (1971) (Burger, C.J., dissenting).

declare that "[t]he essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the Court but that it shall not be used at all."[39]

Although the exclusionary rule has not been completely repudiated, its use has been substantially curbed. For instance, defendants who themselves were not subjected to illegal searches and seizures may not object to the introduction of evidence illegally obtained from co-conspirators or codefendants,[40] and even a defendant whose rights have been infringed may find the evidence admitted, not as proof of guilt, but to impeach his testimony.[41] Further, evidence obtained through a wrongful search and seizure may sometimes be used directly in the criminal trial, if the prosecution can show a sufficient attenuation of the link between police misconduct and obtaining the evidence.[42] Defendants who have been convicted after trials in which they were given a full and fair opportunity to raise claims of Fourth Amendment violations may not subsequently raise those claims on federal habeas corpus because, the Court found, the costs outweigh the minimal deterrent effect.[43]

The exclusionary rule is inapplicable in parole revocation hearings,[44] and a violation of the "knock-and-announce" rule (the procedure that police officers must follow to announce their presence before entering a residence with a lawful warrant)[45] does not require suppression of the evidence gathered pursuant to a search.[46] If an arrest or a search that was valid at the time

---

[39] Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920).

[40] E.g., Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978); United States v. Padilla, 508 U.S. 77 (1993) (only persons whose privacy or property interests are violated may object to a search on Fourth Amendment grounds; exerting control and oversight over property by virtue of participation in a criminal conspiracy does not alone establish such interests); United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980). In United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727 (1980), the Court held it impermissible for a federal court to exercise its supervisory power to police the administration of justice in the federal system to suppress otherwise admissible evidence on the ground that federal agents had flagrantly violated the Fourth Amendment rights of third parties in order to obtain evidence to use against others when the agents knew that the defendant would be unable to challenge their conduct under the Fourth Amendment.

[41] United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980); Walder v. United States, 347 U.S. 62 (1954). Cf. Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20 (1925) (now vitiated by Havens). The impeachment exception applies only to the defendant's own testimony, and may not be extended to use illegally obtained evidence to impeach the testimony of other defense witnesses. James v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 307 (1990).

[42] Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 487–88 (1963); Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 180–85 (1969); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687 (1982); Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. 2056 (2016). United States v. Ceccolini, 435 U.S. 268 (1978), refused to exclude the testimony of a witness discovered through an illegal search. Because a witness was freely willing to testify and therefore more likely to come forward, the application of the exclusionary rule was not to be tested by the standard applied to exclusion of inanimate objects. Deterrence would be little served and relevant and material evidence would be lost to the prosecution. In New York v. Harris, 495 U.S. 14 (1990), the Court refused to exclude a station-house confession made by a suspect whose arrest at his home had violated the Fourth Amendment because, even though probable cause had existed, no warrant had been obtained. And, in Segura v. United States, 468 U.S. 796 (1984), evidence seized pursuant to a warrant obtained after an illegal entry was admitted because there had been an independent basis for issuance of the warrant. This rule also applies to evidence observed in plain view during the initial illegal search. Murray v. United States, 487 U.S. 533 (1988). See also United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984) (excluding consideration of tainted evidence, there was sufficient untainted evidence in affidavit to justify finding of probable cause and issuance of search warrant).

[43] Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 494 (1976).

[44] Pennsylvania Bd. of Probation and Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357 (1998).

[45] The "knock and announce" requirement is codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3109, and the Court has held that the rule is also part of the Fourth Amendment reasonableness inquiry. Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995).

[46] Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586 (2006). Writing for the majority, Justice Antonin Scalia explained that the exclusionary rule was inappropriate because the purpose of the knock-and-announce requirement was to protect human life, property, and the homeowner's privacy and dignity; the requirement has never protected an individual's interest in preventing seizure of evidence described in a warrant. Id. at 594. Furthermore, the Court believed that the "substantial social costs" of applying the exclusionary rule would outweigh the benefits of deterring knock-and-announce violations by applying it. Id. The Court also reasoned that other means of deterrence, such as civil remedies, were available and effective, and that police forces have become increasingly professional and it took place becomes bad through the subsequent invalidation of the statute under which the arrest or search was made, the Court has held that evidence obtained thereby is nonetheless admissible.[47] In other cases, a grand jury witness was required to answer questions even though the questions were based on evidence obtained from an unlawful search and seizure,[48] and federal tax authorities were permitted in a civil proceeding to use evidence that had been unconstitutionally seized from a defendant by state authorities.[49]

A significant curtailment of the exclusionary rule came in 1984 with the adoption of a "good faith" exception. In United States v. Leon,[50] the Court created an exception for evidence obtained as a result of officers' objective, good-faith reliance on a warrant, later found to be defective, issued by a detached and neutral magistrate. Justice Byron White's opinion for the Court could find little benefit in applying the exclusionary rule where there has been good-faith reliance on an invalid warrant. Thus, there was nothing to offset the "substantial social costs exacted by the [rule]."[51] "The exclusionary rule is designed to deter police misconduct rather than to punish the errors of judges and magistrates," and in any event the Court considered it unlikely that the rule could have much deterrent effect on the actions of truly neutral magistrates.[52] Moreover, the Court thought that the rule should not be applied "to deter objectively reasonable law enforcement activity," and that "[p]enalizing the officer for the magistrate's error . . . cannot logically contribute to the deterrence of Fourth Amendment violations."[53] The Court also suggested some circumstances in which courts would be unable to find that officers' reliance on a warrant was objectively reasonable: if the officers have been "dishonest or reckless in preparing their affidavit," if it should have been obvious that the magistrate had "wholly abandoned" his neutral role, or if the warrant was obviously deficient on its face (for example, lacking in particularity).

The Court applied the Leon standard in Massachusetts v. Sheppard,[54] holding that an officer possessed an objectively reasonable belief that he had a valid warrant after he had pointed out to the magistrate that he had not used the standard form, and the magistrate had indicated that the necessary changes had been incorporated in the issued warrant. Then, the Court then extended Leon to hold that the exclusionary rule is inapplicable to evidence obtained by an officer acting in objectively reasonable reliance on a statute later held to violate respectful of constitutional rights in the past half-century. Id. at 599. Justice Kennedy wrote a concurring opinion emphasizing that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule . . . is not in doubt." Id. at 603. In dissent, Justice Stephen Breyer asserted that the majority's decision "weakens, perhaps destroys, much of the practical value of the Constitution's knock-and-announce protection." Id. at 605.

---

[47] Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979) (statute creating substantive criminal offense). Statutes that authorize unconstitutional searches and seizures but which have not yet been voided at the time of the search or seizure may not create this effect, however, Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465 (1979); Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979). This aspect of Torres and Ybarra was to a large degree nullified by Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987), rejecting a distinction between substantive and procedural statutes and holding the exclusionary rule inapplicable in the case of a police officer's objectively reasonable reliance on a statute later held to violate the Fourth Amendment. Similarly, the exclusionary rule does not require suppression of evidence that was seized incident to an arrest that was the result of a clerical error by a court clerk. Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1 (1995).

[48] United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974).

[49] United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433 (1976). Similarly, the rule is inapplicable in civil proceedings for deportation of aliens. INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984).

[50] 468 U.S. 897 (1984). The same objectively reasonable "good-faith" rule now applies in determining whether officers obtaining warrants are entitled to qualified immunity from suit. Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335 (1986).

[51] 468 U.S. at 907.

[52] 468 U.S. at 916–17.

[53] 468 U.S. at 919, 921.

[54] 468 U.S. 981 (1984).

the Fourth Amendment.[55] Justice Harry Blackmun's opinion for the Court reasoned that application of the exclusionary rule in such circumstances would have no more deterrent effect on officers than it would when officers reasonably rely on an invalid warrant, and no more deterrent effect on legislators who enact invalid statutes than on magistrates who issue invalid warrants.[56] Finally, the Court has held that the exclusionary rule does not apply if the police conduct a search in objectively reasonable reliance on binding judicial precedent, even a defendant successfully challenges that precedent.[57]

The Court also applied Leon to allow the admission of evidence obtained incident to an arrest that was based on a mistaken belief that there was probable cause to arrest, where the mistaken belief had resulted from a negligent bookkeeping error by a police employee other than the arresting officer. In Herring v. United States,[58] a police employee had failed to remove from the police computer database an arrest warrant that had been recalled five months earlier, and the arresting officer as a consequence mistakenly believed that the arrest warrant remained in effect. The Court upheld the admission of evidence because the error had been "the result of isolated negligence attenuated from the arrest."[59] Although the Court did "not suggest that all recordkeeping errors by the police are immune from the exclusionary rule," it emphasized that, "[t]o trigger the exclusionary rule, police conduct must be sufficiently deliberate that exclusion can meaningfully deter it, and sufficiently culpable that such deterrence is worth the price paid by the justice system. As laid out in our cases, the exclusionary rule serves to deter deliberate, reckless, or grossly negligent conduct, or in some circumstances recurring or systemic negligence."[60]

Herring is significant because previous cases applying the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule have involved principally Fourth Amendment violations not by the police, but by other governmental entities, such as the judiciary or the legislature. Although the error in Herring was committed by a police employee other than the arresting officer, the introduction of a balancing test to evaluate police conduct raises the possibility that even

---

[55] Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987). The same difficult-to-establish qualifications apply: there can be no objectively reasonable reliance "if, in passing the statute, the legislature wholly abandoned its responsibility to enact constitutional laws," or if "a reasonable officer should have known that the statute was unconstitutional." Id. at 355.

[56] Dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor disagreed with this second conclusion, suggesting that the grace period "during which the police may freely perform unreasonable searches . . . creates a positive incentive [for legislatures] to promulgate unconstitutional laws," and that the Court's ruling "destroys all incentive on the part of individual criminal defendants to litigate the violation of their Fourth Amendment rights" and thereby obtain a ruling on the validity of the statute. 480 U.S. at 366, 369.

[57] Davis v. United States, 564 U.S. 229 (2011). Justice Stephen Breyer, in dissent, points out that under Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314 (1987), "a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions is to be applied retroactively to all cases, state or federal, pending on direct review or not yet final . . . ." Thus, the majority opinion in Davis would allow the incongruous result that a defendant could prove his Fourth Amendment rights had been violated, but could still be left without a viable remedy. Id. at 253 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

[58] 555 U.S. 135 (2009), Herring was a 5-4 decision, with two dissenting opinions.

[59] 129 S. Ct. at 698.

[60] 129 S. Ct. at 703, 702. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, in a dissent joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, and Stephen Breyer, stated that "the Court's opinion underestimates the need for a forceful exclusionary rule and the gravity of recordkeeping errors in law enforcement." Id. at 706. Justice Ginsburg added that the majority's suggestion that the exclusionary rule "is capable of only marginal deterrence when the misconduct at issue is merely careless, not intentional or reckless . . . runs counter to a foundational premise of tort law—that liability for negligence, i.e., lack of due care, creates an incentive to act with greater care." Id. at 708. Justice Breyer, in a dissent joined by Justice Souter, noted that, although the Court had previously held that recordkeeping errors made by a court clerk do not trigger the exclusionary rule, Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1 (1995), he believed that recordkeeping errors made by the police should trigger the rule, as the majority's "case-by-case, multifactored inquiry into the degree of police culpability" would be difficult for the courts to administer. Id. at 711.

Fourth Amendment violations caused by the negligent actions of an arresting officer might in the future evade the application of the exclusionary rule.[61]

For instance, it is unclear from the Court's analysis in Leon and its progeny whether a majority of the Justices would also support a good-faith exception for evidence seized without a warrant, although there is some language broad enough to apply to warrantless seizures.[62] It is also unclear what a good-faith exception would mean in the context of a warrantless search, because the objective reasonableness of an officer's action in proceeding without a warrant is already taken into account in determining whether there has been a Fourth Amendment violation.[63] The Court's increasing willingness to uphold warrantless searches as not "unreasonable" under the Fourth Amendment, however, may reduce the frequency with which the good-faith issue arises in the context of the exclusionary rule.[64]

Amdt4.7.3 Standing to Suppress Illegal Evidence

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Court for a long period followed a rule of "standing" by which it determined whether a party was the appropriate person to move to suppress allegedly illegal evidence. Akin to Article III justiciability principles, which emphasize that one may ordinarily contest only those government actions that harm him, the standing principle in Fourth Amendment cases "require[d] of one who seeks to challenge the legality of a search as the basis for suppressing relevant evidence that he allege, and if the allegation be disputed that he establish, that he himself was the victim of an invasion of privacy."[1] Subsequently, the Court departed from the concept of standing to telescope the inquiry into one inquiry rather than two. Finding that standing served no useful analytical purpose, the Court has held that the issue of exclusion is to be determined solely upon a resolution of the substantive question whether the claimant's [61] See United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 926 (1984) (articulating, in dicta, an "intentional or reckless" misconduct standard for obviating "good faith" reliance on an invalid warrant).

---

[62] The thrust of the analysis in Leon was with the reasonableness of reliance on a warrant. The Court several times, however, used language broad enough to apply to warrantless searches as well. See, e.g., 468 U.S. at 909 (quoting Justice Byron White's concurrence in Illinois v. Gates): "the balancing approach that has evolved . . . 'forcefully suggest[s] that the exclusionary rule be more generally modified to permit the introduction of evidence obtained in the reasonable good-faith belief that a search or seizure was in accord with the Fourth Amendment'"; and id. at 919: "[the rule] cannot be expected, and should not be applied, to deter objectively reasonable law enforcement activity."

[63] See Yale Kamisar, Gates, 'Probable Cause', 'Good Faith', and Beyond, 69 IOWA L. REV. 551, 589 (1984) (imposition of a good-faith exception on top of the "already diluted" standard for validity of a warrant "would amount to double dilution").

[64] See, e.g., Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990) (upholding search premised on officer's reasonable but mistaken belief that a third party had common authority over premises and could consent to search); Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973) (no requirement of knowing and intelligent waiver in consenting to warrantless search); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981) (upholding warrantless search of entire interior of passenger car, including closed containers, as incident to arrest of driver); Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 351 (2009) (the Belton rule applies "only if the arrestee is within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search or it is reasonable to believe that the vehicle contains evidence of the offense of arrest"); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982) (upholding warrantless search of movable container found in a locked car trunk).

[1] Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 261 (1960). That is, the movant must show that he was "a victim of search or seizure, one against whom the search was directed, as distinguished from one who claims prejudice only through the use of evidence gathered as a consequence of search or seizure directed at someone else." Id. See Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 174 (1969).

Fourth Amendment rights have been violated. "We can think of no decided cases of this Court that would have come out differently had we concluded . . . that the type of standing requirement . . . reaffirmed today is more properly subsumed under substantive Fourth Amendment doctrine. Rigorous application of the principle that the rights secured by this Amendment are personal, in place of a notion of 'standing,' will produce no additional situations in which evidence must be excluded. The inquiry under either approach is the same."[2] One must therefore show that "the disputed search and seizure has infringed an interest of the defendant which the Fourth Amendment was designed to protect."[3] The Court has clarified that this "concept of standing in Fourth Amendment cases . . . should not be confused with Article III standing," emphasizing that "Fourth Amendment standing is subsumed under substantive Fourth Amendment doctrine" and is not a preliminary "jurisdictional question."[4]

The Katz reasonable-expectation-of-privacy inquiry largely supplanted property-ownership concepts that previously might have supported either standing to suppress or the establishment of an interest that has been invaded—but has not entirely replaced or "repudiate[d]" the Fourth Amendment's "concern for government trespass."[5] In the 1960 case Jones v. United States, the Supreme Court held that a person could establish standing to challenge a search or seizure where that person was "legitimately on [the] premises" as a guest or invitee of the owner of the premises.[6] This statement about legitimate presence was later limited by the Court in Rakas v. Illinois,[7] which emphasized that to challenge a search, a person must assert a personal interest protected by the Fourth Amendment.[8] And while prior case law had seemed to suggest that ownership of a seized item would alone suffice to establish standing, the Court clarified in Rakas that under Katz, "capacity to claim the protection of the Fourth Amendment depends . . . upon whether the person who claims the protection of the Amendment has a legitimate expectation of privacy in the invaded place."[9] Under the

[2] Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 139 (1978).

[3] 439 U.S. at 140.

[4] Byrd v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1518, 1530 (2018).

[5] United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 400, 406–07 (2012) ("[F]or most of our history the Fourth Amendment was understood to embody a particular concern for government trespass upon the areas . . . it enumerates. Katz did not repudiate that understanding."). See also Grady v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 1368, 1370 (2015) (per curiam); Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 5–6 (2013).

[6] 362 U.S. 257, 266–67 (1960). See also United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48, 51–53 (1951) (allowing defendant with access to a hotel room to challenge the seizure of narcotics that were his property, concluding that the search and the seizure were "incapable of being untied").

[7] 439 U.S. 128, 143 (1978) ("[T]he Jones statement that a person need only be 'legitimately on premises' in order to challenge the validity of the search of a dwelling place cannot be taken in its full sweep beyond the facts of that case."). In Jones, the Court had also held that a person had standing "where the indictment itself charges possession." 362 U.S. at 264. But in Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 390 (1968), the Court held "that testimony given by a defendant" to establish possession of things searched or seized and meet standing requirements is not "admissible against him at trial on the question of guilt or innocence." The Court recognized that Simmons (among other legal developments) had undermined the justification for "automatic standing" on the basis of an indictment and overruled this part of Jones in United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 88–89 (1980).

[8] See Rakas, 439 U.S. at 136 ("A person who is aggrieved by an illegal search and seizure only through the introduction of damaging evidence secured by a search of a third person's premises or property has not had any of his Fourth Amendment rights infringed.") (citing Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 171–72 (1969)). See, e.g., id. at 143 (holding that defendants' "claims must fail" where, even though the defendants were in a car with the permission of the car's owner, "[t]hey asserted neither a property nor a possessory interest in the automobile, nor an interest in the property seized"). In Rakas, the Court distinguished United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48 (1951), by holding that "[s]tanding in Jeffers was based on Jeffers' possessory interest in both the premises searched and the property seized." 439 U.S. at 136.

[9] Rakas, 439 U.S. at 143. See also United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 92 (1980) ("We simply decline to use possession of a seized good as a substitute for a factual finding that the owner of the good had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the area searched."); see, e.g., Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 105–06 (1980) (holding defendant could reasonable-expectations-of-privacy test, a person may "have a legally sufficient interest" to implicate the protections of the Fourth Amendment even if that interest "might not have been a recognized property interest at common law."[10] Nonetheless, a "property" or "possessory interest" in the premises searched remains relevant to the inquiry.[11]

Amdt4.7.4 Good Faith Exception to Exclusionary Rule

Fourth Amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Another significant curtailment of the exclusionary rule involves the attenuation exception, which permits the use of evidence discovered through the government's unconstitutional conduct if the "causal link" between that misconduct and the discovery of the evidence is seen by the reviewing courts as sufficiently remote or has been interrupted by some intervening circumstances.[1] In a series of decisions issued over several decades, the Court has invoked this exception in upholding the admission of challenged evidence. For example, in Wong Sun v. United States, the Court upheld the admission of an unsigned statement made by a defendant who initially had been unlawfully arrested because, thereafter, the defendant was lawfully arraigned, released on his own recognizance, and, only then, voluntarily returned several days later to make the unsigned statement.[2] Similarly, in its 1984 decision in Segura v. United States, the Court upheld the admission of evidence obtained following an illegal entry into a residence because the evidence was seized the next day pursuant to a valid search warrant that had been issued based on information obtained by law enforcement before the illegal entry.[3]

More recently, in its 2016 decision in Utah v. Strieff, the Court rejected a challenge to the admission of certain evidence obtained as the result of an unlawful stop on the grounds that the discovery of an arrest warrant after the stop attenuated the connection between the unlawful stop and the evidence seized incident to the defendant's arrest.[4] As a threshold matter, the Court rejected the state court's view that the attenuation exception applies only in cases involving "an independent act of a defendant's 'free will.'"[5] Instead, the Court relied on not challenge seizure of his drugs from another's purse, where the defendant had no legitimate expectation of privacy in the purse). In Rakas, the Court distinguished United States v. Jones, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), by stating that in that case, "Jones not only had permission to use the apartment of his friend, but had a key to the apartment . . . . [and] [e]xcept with respect to his friend, Jones had complete dominion and control over the apartment and could exclude others from it," 439 U.S. at 149. Cf. Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 5 (2013) ("When 'the Government obtains information by physically intruding' on persons, houses, papers, or effects, 'a "search"' within the original meaning of the Fourth Amendment has 'undoubtedly occurred.'" (quoting United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 400, 406 n.3 (2012)) (emphasis added)).

---

[10] Rakas, 439 U.S. at 143.

[11] Id. at 148. See also, e.g., United States v. Padilla, 508 U.S. 77, 82 (1993) (per curiam) ("Expectations of privacy and property interests govern the analysis of Fourth Amendment search and seizure claims.").

[1] Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. 2056, 2061 (2016).

[2] 371 U.S. 471, 491 (1963).

[3] 468 U.S. 796, 813–16 (1984).

[4] Strieff, 136 S. Ct. at 2059. The state in Strieff had conceded that law enforcement lacked reasonable suspicion for the stop, id. at 2060, and the Supreme Court characterized the search of the defendant following his arrest as a lawful search incident to arrest, id. at 2063.

[5] Id. at 2061 (quoting State v. Strieff, 457 P.3d 532, 544 (Utah 2015)).

three factors it had set forth in a Fifth Amendment case, Brown v. Illinois,[6] to determine whether the subsequent lawful acquisition of evidence was sufficiently attenuated from the initial misconduct: (1) the "temporal proximity" between the two acts; (2) the presences of intervening circumstances; and (3) the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct.[7] On the whole, the Strieff Court, reiterating that suppression of evidence should be the courts' "last resort, not our first impulse,"[8] concluded that the circumstances of the case weighed in favor of the admission of the challenged evidence. While the closeness in time between the initial stop and the search was seen by the Court as favoring suppression,[9] the presence of intervening circumstances in the form of a valid warrant for the defendant's arrest strongly favored the state,[10] and in the Court's view, there was no indication that this unlawful stop was part of any "systematic or recurrent police misconduct."[11] In particular, the Court, relying on the second factor, emphasized that the discovery of a warrant "broke the causal chain" between the unlawful stop and the discovery of the challenged evidence.[12] As such, the Strieff Court appeared to establish a rule that the existence of a valid warrant, "predat[ing the] investigation" and "entirely unconnected with the stop," generally favors finding sufficient attenuation between the unlawful conduct and the discovery of evidence.[13]

[6] See 422 U.S. 590, 603–04 (1975) (holding that the state supreme court in this case had erroneously concluded that Miranda warnings always served to purge the taint of an illegal arrest).

[7] See Strieff, 136 S. Ct. at 2062–64.

[8] Id. at 2061 (quoting Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586, 591 (2006) (internal quotations omitted)).

[9] Id. at 2062 (noting that "only minutes" passed between the unlawful stop and the discovery of the challenged evidence).

[10] Id. at 2062–63. The Strieff Court emphasized that it viewed the warrant as "compelling" the officer to arrest the suspect. Id. at 2063; see also id. at 2062 (similar).

[11] Id. at 2063.

[12] Id. at 2063.

[13] Id. at 2062.

FIFTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS OF PERSONS

FIFTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS OF PERSONS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

FIFTH AMENDMENT—RIGHTS OF PERSONS

Amdt5.1 Overview of Fifth Amendment, Rights of Persons

The Fifth Amendment protects individuals by preventing the government from abusing its prosecutorial powers. For instance, the Fifth Amendment, provides a check on government prosecutions by requiring "presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury" for a "capital, or otherwise infamous crime."[1] Likewise, the Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause prevents the government from re-prosecuting a person for a crime for which he or she has been acquitted. The Fifth Amendment prohibition against requiring a person in a criminal case to testify against him- or herself secured a common law privilege that one commentator saw as preventing use of the "rack or torture in order to procure a confession of guilt,"[2] while the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause—"nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law"[3] —provided for "the right of trial according to the process and proceedings of the common law."[4] In interpreting the Due Process Clause, the Supreme Court has recognized that the Fifth Amendment guarantees procedural and substantive due process. The Fifth Amendment's guarantee of procedural due process often requires the federal government to provide notice and a hearing before depriving a person of a protected life, liberty, or property interest, while substantive due process generally protects certain fundamental constitutional rights from federal government interference in specific subject areas such as liberty of contract, marriage, or privacy. Finally, the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment requires that the government pay "just compensation" to owners of private property that the government takes for public use.

Amdt5.2 Grand Jury Clause

Amdt5.2.1 Historical Background on Grand Jury Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The history of the grand jury is rooted in the common and civil law, extending back to Athens, pre-Norman England, and the Assize of Clarendon promulgated by Henry II.[1] The right seems to have been first mentioned in the colonies in the Charter of Liberties and Privileges of 1683, which was passed by the first assembly permitted to be elected in the colony of New York.[2] Included from the first in James Madison's introduced draft of the Bill of Rights, the provision elicited no recorded debate and no opposition. "The grand jury is an English

---

[1] U.S. Const. amend. V.

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1788 (1833).

[3] U.S. Const. amend. V.

[4] 3 Story, supra note 2, at § 1789.

[1] Wayne L. Morse, A Survey of the Grand Jury System, 10 Ore. L. Rev. 101 (1931).

[2] 1 Bernard Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 162, 166 (1971). The provision read: "That in all Cases Capital or Criminal there shall be a grand Inquest who shall first present the offence. . . ."

institution, brought to this country by the early colonists and incorporated in the Constitution by the Founders. There is every reason to believe that our constitutional grand jury was intended to operate substantially like its English progenitor. The basic purpose of the English grand jury was to provide a fair method for instituting criminal proceedings against persons believed to have committed crimes. Grand jurors were selected from the body of the people and their work was not hampered by rigid procedural or evidential rules. In fact, grand jurors could act on their own knowledge and were free to make their presentments or indictments on such information as they deemed satisfactory. Despite its broad power to institute criminal proceedings the grand jury grew in popular favor with the years. It acquired an independence in England free from control by the Crown or judges. Its adoption in our Constitution as the sole method for preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice. And in this country as in England of old the grand jury has convened as a body of laymen, free from technical rules, acting in secret, pledged to indict no one because of prejudice and to free no one because of special favor."[3]

Amdt5.2.2 Grand Jury Clause Doctrine and Practice

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The prescribed constitutional function of grand juries in federal courts[1] is to return criminal indictments. But grand juries serve a considerably broader series of purposes as well. Principal among these is the investigative function, which grand juries serve by summoning witnesses, compelling testimony, and gathering evidence. Operating in secret, under the direction but not control of a prosecutor, grand juries may examine witnesses in the absence of their counsel.[2] The exclusionary rule is inapplicable in grand jury proceedings, with the result

---

[3] Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 362 (1956). "The grand jury is an integral part of our constitutional heritage which was brought to this country with the common law. The Framers, most of them trained in the English law and traditions, accepted the grand jury as a basic guarantee of individual liberty; notwithstanding periodic criticism, much of which is superficial, overlooking relevant history, the grand jury continues to function as a barrier to reckless or unfounded charges . . . . Its historic office has been to provide a shield against arbitrary or oppressive action, by insuring that serious criminal accusations will be brought only upon the considered judgment of a representative body of citizens acting under oath and under judicial instruction and guidance." United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 571 (1976) (plurality opinion). See id. at 589–91 (Brennan, J., concurring).

[1] This provision applies only in federal courts and is not applicable to the states, either as an element of due process or as a direct command of the Fourteenth Amendment. Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884); Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 323 (1937); Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625, 633 (1972).

[2] Witnesses are not entitled to have counsel present in the room. Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(d). The validity of this restriction was asserted in dictum in In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 333 (1957), and inferentially accepted by the dissent in that case. In re Groban, 352 U.S. at 346–47 (Black, J., distinguishing grand juries from the investigative entity before the Court). The decision in Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970), deeming the preliminary hearing a "critical stage of the prosecution" at which counsel must be provided, called this rule in question, inasmuch as the preliminary hearing and the grand jury both determine whether there is probable cause with regard to a suspect. See Coleman, 399 U.S. at 25 (Burger, C.J., dissenting). In United States v. Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 333 (1957), and inferentially accepted by the dissent in that case. In re Groban, 352 U.S. at 346–47 (Justice Black, distinguishing grand juries from the investigative entity before the Court). The decision in Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970), deeming the preliminary hearing a "critical stage of the prosecution" at which counsel must be provided, called this rule in question, inasmuch as the preliminary hearing and the grand jury both determine whether there is probable cause with regard to a suspect. See Coleman, 399 U.S. at 25 (Burger, C.J., dissenting). In United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 581 (1976) (plurality that a witness called before a grand jury may be questioned on the basis of knowledge obtained through illegally seized evidence.[3] Similarly, grand jury witnesses are not entitled to be informed that they may be indicted for the offense under inquiry.[4] While some constitutional guarantees that apply in other settings are thus inapplicable in grand jury proceedings, other guarantees do apply in such proceedings. For example, a grand jury may not compel a person to produce books and papers that would incriminate him or her.[5] Besides indictments, grand juries may also issue reports that may indicate nonindictable misbehavior, mis- or malfeasance of public officers, or other objectionable conduct.[6] Despite the vast power of grand juries, there is little in the way of judicial or legislative response designed to impose some supervisory restrictions on them.[7] opinion), Chief Justice Warren Burger wrote: "Respondent was also informed that if he desired he could have the assistance of counsel, but that counsel could not be inside the grand jury room. That statement was plainly a correct recital of the law. No criminal proceedings had been instituted against respondent, hence the Sixth Amendment right to counsel had not come into play." By emphasizing the point of institution of criminal proceedings, relevant to the right of counsel at line-ups and the like, the Chief Justice not only reasserted the absence of a right to counsel in the room but also, despite his having referred to it, cast doubt upon the existence of any constitutional requirement that a grand jury witness be permitted to consult with counsel out of the room, and, further, raised the implication that a witness or putative defendant unable to afford counsel would have no right to appointed counsel. Concurring, Justice William Brennan argued that access to counsel was essential and constitutionally required for the protection of constitutional rights; Brennan accepted the likelihood, without agreeing, that consultation outside the room would be adequate to preserve a witness's rights, Mandujano, 425 U.S. at 602–09 (with Justice Thurgood Marshall). Justices Potter Stewart and Harry Blackmun reserved judgment. Id. at 609.

---

[3] United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974). The Court has interpreted a provision of federal wiretap law, 18 U.S.C. § 2515, to prohibit use of unlawful wiretap information as a basis for questioning witnesses before grand juries. Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41 (1972).

[4] United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181 (1977). Because defendant when he appeared before the grand jury was warned of his rights to decline to answer questions on the basis of self-incrimination, the decision was framed in terms of those warnings, but the Court twice noted that it had not decided, and was not deciding, "whether any Fifth Amendment warnings whatever are constitutionally required for grand jury witnesses . . . ." Id. at 186.

[5] In Hale v. Henkel, the Supreme Court observed: "Of course, the grand jury's subpoena power is not unlimited. It may consider incompetent evidence, but it may not itself violate a valid privilege, whether established by the Constitution, statutes, or the common law . . . Although, for example, an indictment based on evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's Fifth Amendment privilege is nevertheless valid, the grand jury may not force a witness to answer questions in violation of that constitutional guarantee. . . . Similarly, a grand jury may not compel a person to produce books and papers that would incriminate him. The grand jury is also without power to invade a legitimate privacy interest protected by the Fourth Amendment. A grand jury's subpoena duces tecum will be disallowed if it is 'far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable' under the Fourth Amendment." Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 76 (1906). "Judicial supervision is properly exercised in such cases to prevent the wrong before it occurs." United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 346 (1974). See also United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1973). Grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment and may not harass the exercise of speech and press rights. Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 707–08 (1972). Protection of Fourth Amendment interests is as extensive before the grand jury as before any investigative officers, Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920); Hale, 201 U.S. at 76–77, but not more so either. United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973) (subpoena to give voice exemplars); United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (handwriting exemplars). The Fifth Amendment's Self-Incrimination Clause must be respected. Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 159 (1950); Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479 (1951). On common-law privileges, see Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 332 (1951) (husband-wife privilege); Alexander v. United States, 138 U.S. 353 (1891) (attorney-client privilege). The traditional secrecy of grand jury proceedings has been relaxed a degree to permit a limited discovery of testimony. Compare Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. United States, 360 U.S. 395 (1959), with Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855 (1966). See Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(e) (secrecy requirements and exceptions).

[6] The grand jury "is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime." Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281 (1919). On the reports function of the grand jury, see In re Grand Jury January, 1969, 315 F. Supp. 662 (D. Md. 1970), and Report of the January 1970 Grand Jury (Black Panther Shooting) (N.D. Ill., released May 15, 1970). Congress has now specifically authorized issuance of reports in cases concerning public officers and organized crime. 18 U.S.C. § 333.

[7] Congress has required that in the selection of federal grand juries, as well as petit juries, random selection of a fair cross section of the community is to take place, and has provided a procedure for challenging discriminatory selection by moving to dismiss the indictment. 28 U.S.C. §§ 1861–68. Racial discrimination in selection of juries is constitutionally proscribed in both state and federal courts.

Amdt5.2.2
Grand Jury Clause Doctrine and Practice

By its terms, the Grand Jury Clause applies only to "capital" or "otherwise infamous" crimes. Whether a crime qualifies as "infamous" depends on the quality of the associated punishment.[8] The Supreme Court has held that the prospect of imprisonment in a state prison or penitentiary[9] or hard labor at a non-penitentiary workhouse[10] are sufficient to render a crime "infamous" within the meaning of the Grand Jury Clause. By contrast, the Court has held that conduct punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than six months can be tried without indictment.[11] In analyzing whether a crime is "infamous," the pivotal question is whether the offense is one for which the court is authorized to award such punishment; the sentence actually imposed is immaterial.[12]

A person can be tried only upon the indictment as found by the grand jury—in particular, upon the language in the charging part of the instrument.[13] A change in the indictment that does not narrow its scope deprives the court of the power to try the accused.[14] Although additions to offenses alleged in an indictment are prohibited, the Supreme Court has ruled that it is permissible "to drop from an indictment those allegations that are unnecessary to an offense that is clearly contained within it," as, for example, a lesser included offense.[15]

Because there is no constitutional requirement that an indictment be presented by a grand jury as a body, an indictment delivered by the foreman in the absence of other grand jurors is valid.[16] If valid on its face, an indictment returned by a legally constituted, non-biased grand jury satisfies the requirement of the Fifth Amendment and is enough to call for a trial on the merits; such an indictment is not open to challenge on the ground that there was inadequate or incompetent evidence before the grand jury.[17]

Amdt5.2.3 Military Exception to Grand Jury Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be

[8] Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417 (1885).

[9] Mackin v. United States, 117 U.S. 348, 352 (1886).

[10] United States v. Moreland, 258 U.S. 433 (1922).

[11] Duke v. United States, 301 U.S. 492 (1937).

[12] Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. at 426.

[13] See Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960), which held that a variation between pleading and proof deprived petitioner of his right to be tried only upon charges presented in the indictment.

[14] Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12 (1887). In United States v. Cotton, the Supreme Court overruled Ex parte Bain in United States v. Miller, 471 U.S. 130 (1985), to the extent that it held that a narrowing of an indictment is impermissible. The Court also overruled Ex parte Bain to the extent that it held that a defective indictment was not just substantive error, but that it deprived a court of subject-matter jurisdiction over a case. United States v. Cotton, 535 U.S. 625 (2002). While a defendant's failure to challenge an error of substantive law at trial level may result in waiver of such issue for purpose of appeal, challenges to subject-matter jurisdiction may be made at any time. Thus, where a defendant failed to assert his right to a non-defective grand jury indictment, appellate review of the matter would limited to a "plain error" analysis. Cotton, 535 U.S. at 631.

[15] United States v. Miller, 471 U.S. 130, 144 (1985).

[16] Breese v. United States, 226 U.S. 1 (1912).

[17] Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956); Lawn v. United States, 355 U.S. 339 (1958); United States v. Blue, 384 U.S. 251 (1966). Cf. Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41 (1972).

compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Grand Jury Clause contains an exception for persons serving in the armed forces. All persons in the regular armed forces are subject to court martial rather than grand jury indictment or trial by jury.[1] The Supreme Court has held that the exception's limiting words—"when in actual service in time of War or public danger"—apply only to members of the militia, not to members of the regular armed forces.[2] Thus, members of the regular armed forces can be tried by court martial even when the alleged offenses are not connected to their service in the armed forces.[3]

Amdt5.3 Double Jeopardy Clause

Amdt5.3.1 Overview of Double Jeopardy Clause

Fifth Amendment:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Clause speaks of being put in "jeopardy of life or limb," which as derived from the common law, generally referred to the possibility of capital punishment upon conviction, but it is now settled that the Clause protects with regard "to every indictment or information charging a party with a known and defined crime or misdemeanor, whether at the common law or by statute."[1] Despite the Clause's literal language, it can apply as well to sanctions that are civil in form if they clearly are applied in a manner that constitutes "punishment."[2] Ordinarily, [1] Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U.S. 109, 114 (1895). See also Lee v. Madigan, 358 U.S. 228, 232–35, 241 (1959).

---

[2] Sayre, 158 U.S. at 114.

[3] Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435 (1987). The Solorio Court overruled O'Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969) in which the Court had held that offenses that are not "service connected" may not be punished under military law, but instead must be tried in the civil courts. Chief Justice William Rehnquist's opinion in Solorio for the Court was joined by Justices Byron White, Lewis Powell, Sandra Day O'Connor, and Antonin Scalia. Justice John Paul Stevens concurred in the judgment but thought it unnecessary to reexamine O'Callahan. Dissenting Justice Thurgood Marshall, joined by Justices William Brennan and Harry Blackmun, thought the service connection rule justified by the language of the Fifth Amendment's exception, based on the nature of cases (those "arising in the land or naval forces") rather than the status of defendants. Offenses against the laws of war, whether committed by citizens or by alien enemy belligerents, may be tried by a military commission. Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 44 (1942).

[1] Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 163, 169 (1874). The Clause generally has no application in noncriminal proceedings. Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391 (1938).

[2] The Clause applies in juvenile court proceedings that are formally civil. Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519 (1975). See also United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984); United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435 (1989) (civil penalty under the False Claims Act constitutes punishment if it is overwhelmingly disproportionate to compensating the government for its loss, and if it can be explained only as serving retributive or deterrent purposes); Montana Dep't of Revenue v. Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S. 767 (1994) (tax on possession of illegal drugs, "to be collected only after any state or federal fines or forfeitures have been satisfied," constitutes punishment for purposes of double jeopardy). But see Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250 (2001) (a statute that has been held to be civil and not criminal in nature cannot be deemed punitive "as applied" to a single individual). The issue of whether a law is civil or punitive in nature is essentially the same for ex post facto and for double jeopardy analysis. 531 U.S. at 263.

The Clause applies in juvenile court proceedings that are formally civil. Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519 (1975). See also United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984); United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435 (1989) (civil penalty under the False Claims Act constitutes punishment if it is overwhelmingly disproportionate to compensating however, civil in rem forfeiture proceedings may not be considered punitive for purposes of double jeopardy analysis,[3] and the same is true of civil commitment following expiration of a prison term.[4]

Amdt5.3.2 Historical Background on Double Jeopardy Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The concept of double jeopardy has a long history, but its development was uneven and its meaning has varied. The English view of double jeopardy, under the influence of Sir Edward Coke and William Blackstone, came gradually to mean that a defendant at trial could plead former conviction or former acquittal as a special plea in bar to defeat the prosecution.[1] In this country, the common-law rule was in some cases limited to this rule and in other cases extended to bar a new trial even though the former trial had not concluded in either an acquittal or a conviction.

The rule's elevation to fundamental status by its inclusion in several state bills of rights following the Revolution continued the differing approaches.[2] James Madison's version of the guarantee as introduced in the House of Representatives read: "No person shall be subject, except in cases of impeachment, to more than one punishment or trial for the same offense."[3] Some Members of the House opposed this proposal on the grounds that it could be construed to prohibit a second trial after a successful appeal by a defendant. They viewed this as problematic for two reasons. First, they argued that such a rule could constitute a hazard to the public by freeing the guilty. Second, they reasoned that prohibiting re-trials after successful the government for its loss, and if it can be explained only as serving retributive or deterrent purposes); Montana Dep't of Revenue v. Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S. 767 (1994) (tax on possession of illegal drugs, "to be collected only after any state or federal fines or forfeitures have been satisfied," constitutes punishment for purposes of double jeopardy). But see Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250 (2001) (a statute that has been held to be civil and not criminal in nature cannot be deemed punitive "as applied" to a single individual). The issue of whether a law is civil or punitive in nature is essentially the same for ex post facto and for double jeopardy analysis. 531 U.S. at 263.

---

[3] United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267 (1996) (forfeitures, pursuant to 19 U.S.C. § 981 and 21 U.S.C. § 881, of property used in drug and money laundering offenses, are not punitive). The Court in Ursery applied principles that had been set forth in Various Items of Personal Property v. United States, 282 U.S. 577 (1931) (forfeiture of distillery used in defrauding government of tax on spirits), and United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984) (forfeiture, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 924(d), of firearms "used or intended to be used in" firearms offenses). A two-part inquiry is followed. First, the Court inquires whether Congress intended the forfeiture proceeding to be civil or criminal. Then, if Congress intended that the proceeding be civil, the court determines whether there is nonetheless the "clearest proof" that the sanction is "so punitive" as to transform it into a criminal penalty. 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. at 366.

[4] Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 369–70 (1997) (commitment under state's Sexually Violent Predator Act).

[1] M. Friedland, Double Jeopardy part 1 (1969); Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 32–36 (1978), and id. at 40 (Powell, J., dissenting); United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 340 (1975).

[2] J. Sigler, Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy 21–27 (1969). The first bill of rights that expressly adopted a double jeopardy clause was the New Hampshire Constitution of 1784. "No subject shall be liable to be tried, after an acquittal, for the same crime or offence." Art. I, Sec. XCI, 4 F. Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitution, reprinted in H.R. Doc. No. 357, 59th Congress, 2d Sess. 2455 (1909). A more comprehensive protection was included in the Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights of 1790, which had language almost identical to the present Fifth Amendment provision. Id. at 3100.

[3] 1 Annals of Congress 434 (June 8, 1789).

appeals might make appellate courts less likely to reverse improper convictions.[4] Ultimately, the language barring a second trial was dropped in response to these concerns.[5]

Amdt5.3.3 Dual Sovereignty Doctrine

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Throughout most of its history, the Double Jeopardy Clause was only binding on the Federal Government. In Palko v. Connecticut,[1] the Supreme Court rejected an argument that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated all provisions of the first eight Amendments as limitations on the states. The Court, however, enunciated a due process theory under which some Bill of Rights guarantees are considered so "fundamental" that they are "of the very essence of the scheme of ordered liberty" and "neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed."[2] The Double Jeopardy Clause, like many other procedural rights of defendants, was not considered "fundamental" in Palko; it could be absent and fair trials could still be had. Still, a defendant's due process rights, absent double jeopardy, might be violated in the Court's view if the state "creat[ed] a hardship so acute and shocking as to be unendurable," but that was not the situation in Palko.[3]

In Benton v. Maryland, however, the Supreme Court concluded "that the double jeopardy prohibition of the Fifth Amendment represents a fundamental ideal in our constitutional heritage."[4] And, the Court noted, "[o]nce it is decided that a particular Bill of Rights guarantee is 'fundamental to the American scheme of justice,' the same constitutional standards apply against both the State and Federal Governments." Accordingly, after Benton, the double jeopardy limitation applies to both federal and state governments. State rules on double jeopardy, with regard to matters such as when jeopardy attaches, must be considered in light of federal standards.[5]

In a federal system, different governmental bodies[6] may have different interests to serve when defining crimes and enforcing their laws. Where different bodies have overlapping

---

[4] Id. at 753.

[5] 2 Bernard Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 1149, 1165 (1971). In Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 40 (1978) (dissenting), Justice Lewis Powell attributed to inadvertence the broadening of the "rubric" of double jeopardy to incorporate the common law rule against dismissal of the jury prior to verdict, a question the majority passed over as being "of academic interest only." Id. at 34 n.10.

[1] 302 U.S. 319 (1937).

[2] Id. at 325, 326.

[3] Id. at 328.

[4] 395 U.S. 784, 795 (1969) (citation omitted).

[5] Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 37–38 (1978). But see id. at 40 (Powell, J., dissenting, joined by Burger, C.J. & Rehnquist, J.) (standard governing states should be more relaxed).

[6] Id. See also cases cited in Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121, 132 n.19 (1959); Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187, 192–93 (1959).

jurisdiction, a person may engage in conduct that will violate the laws of more than one body.[7] Although the Court had long accepted in dictum the principle that prosecution by two governments of the same defendant for the same conduct would not constitute double jeopardy, it was not until United States v. Lanza[8] that the conviction in federal court of a person previously convicted in a state court for performing the same acts was sustained. The Lanza Court stated: "We have here two sovereignties, deriving power from different sources, capable of dealing with the same subject matter within the same territory. . . . Each government in determining what shall be an offense against its peace and dignity is exercising its own sovereignty, not that of the other."[9] The Court's reasoning came to be known as the "dual sovereignty" doctrine.

Although the Supreme Court has been asked to overrule the dual sovereignty doctrine in a number of cases, it has repeatedly declined to do so.[10] In 2019, in Gamble v. United States, the Court clarified that "where there are two sovereigns, there are two laws, and two 'offences.'"[11] The Court asserted that this dual sovereignty doctrine was justified by historical understandings of the Double Jeopardy Clause.[12] Observing that the Clause prohibits dual prosecution for the same "offence," the Court explained that at the time the Constitution was written, an "offence" was defined as a violation of a particular law.[13] In the Court's view, two sovereigns will have two different laws, meaning that violations of those laws will be two different offenses.[14] In Gamble, the Court emphasized that by 2019, the doctrine had been applied in "a chain of precedent linking dozens of cases over 170 years."[15]

In prior cases, the Supreme Court also recognized practical considerations justifying the dual sovereignty doctrine, noting that without this principle, states could "hinder[ ]" federal law enforcement by imposing more lenient sentences on defendants under state law, thereby barring federal prosecution even if the "defendants' acts impinge more seriously on a federal interest than on a state interest."[16] In Gamble, the Court also noted the international consequences of the doctrine, stating that if "only one sovereign may prosecute for a single act, no American court—state or federal—could prosecute conduct already tried in a foreign court."[17] If the Double Jeopardy Clause barred such U.S. prosecutions, the Court noted this could raise prudential concerns about the U.S. Government's ability to vindicate its interests in enforcing its own criminal laws, particularly if the foreign government's legal system is seen as somehow inadequate.[18]

---

[7] This issue was recognized as early as in Houston v. Moore, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 1 (1820), and the doctrine's rationale was confirmed within thirty years. Fox v. Ohio, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 410 (1847); United States v. Marigold, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 560 (1850); Moore v. Illinois, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 13 (1853).

[8] 260 U.S. 377 (1922).

[9] Id. at 382. See also Hebert v. Louisiana, 272 U.S. 312 (1924); Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 108 (1945); Jerome v. United States, 318 U.S. 101 (1943).

[10] Gamble v. United States, No. 17-646, slip op. at 3 (U.S. June 17, 2019); Abbate, 359 U.S. at 195; Bartkus, 359 U.S. at 138. The Court has applied the dual sovereignty doctrine without expressly reconsidering and reaffirming its validity in a number of additional cases, as detailed in Gamble, slip op. at 6, and Bartkus, 359 U.S. at 129–33.

[11] Gamble, slip op. at 3, 4 (quoting U.S. Const. amend. V).

[12] Id. at 4.

[13] Id. at 4.

[14] Abbate, 359 U.S. at 195; accord, e.g., United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. 313, 318 (1978).

[15] Gamble, slip op. at 8.

[16] Abbate, 359 U.S. at 195; accord, e.g., Wheeler, 435 U.S. at 318.

[17] Gamble, slip op. at 6.

[18] Id.

The dual sovereignty doctrine has also been applied to permit successive prosecutions by two different states for the same conduct,[19] and to permit a federal prosecution after a conviction in an Indian tribal court for an offense stemming from the same conduct.[20] When two different governmental bodies are subject to the same sovereign, however, the Double Jeopardy Clause bars separate prosecutions by those bodies for the same offense.[21]

In Puerto Rico v. Sanchez Valle,[22] the Supreme Court held that the separate prosecutions of an individual by the United States and Puerto Rico for the same underlying conduct violated the Double Jeopardy Clause because the two governments are not "separate sovereigns." Even though Puerto Rico has exercised self-rule through a popularly ratified constitution since the mid-twentieth century, the Court concluded that the "original source" of Puerto Rico's authority to prosecute crimes was Congress—specifically a federal statute authorizing the people of Puerto Rico to draft their own constitution.[23] As a result, both the United States and Puerto Rico were exercising prosecutorial authority that stemmed from the same source.

More recently, the Supreme Court has emphasized the source of the authority defining the offense, as opposed to the body carrying out the prosecution, when determining the dual sovereignty doctrine's applicability. In Denezpi v. United States,[24] the Court upheld a federal prosecution that followed a Court of Indian Offenses prosecution. According to the Court, even assuming that prosecution in the Court of Indian Offenses—which was created by the federal Executive Branch and operates pursuant to the Code of Federal Regulations[25]—is a form of prosecution by the United States, double jeopardy does not attach so long as the United States is prosecuting an offense defined by a separate sovereign, such as a federally recognized tribe. Because the defendant in Denezpi was convicted of violating a tribal ordinance in the first prosecution, the Double Jeopardy Clause did not prohibit a subsequent prosecution in federal court for a federal statutory offense arising from the same conduct.[26]

Amdt5.3.4 Re-Prosecution After Mistrial

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The common law generally provided that jeopardy attached only after a judgment of conviction or acquittal. But the constitutional rule is that jeopardy attaches much earlier, in [19] Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985) (defendant who crossed state line in the course of a kidnapping and murder was prosecuted for murder in both states).

---

[20] E.g., United States v. Lara, 541 U.S. 193, 199 (2004); Wheeler, 435 U.S. at 329–30.

[21] See, e.g., Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387 (1970) (trial by municipal court precluded trial for same offense by state court); Grafton v. United States, 206 U.S. 333 (1907) (trial by military court-martial precluded subsequent trial in territorial court).

[22] 579 U.S. 59 (2016).

[23] Id. at 61.

[24] No. 20-7622, slip op. at 5 (U.S. June 13, 2022).

[25] See 25 C.F.R. §§ 11.102 et seq.

[26] Denezpi, slip op. at 16.

jury trials when the jury is sworn, and in trials before a judge without a jury, when the first evidence is presented.[1] Therefore, if after jeopardy attaches the trial is terminated for some reason, it may be that a second trial, even if the termination was erroneous, is barred.[2]

The Supreme Court has justified this rule on the grounds that a defendant has a "valued right to have his trial completed by a particular tribunal."[3] According to the Court, this right is rooted in a defendant's interest in completing the trial "once and for all" and "conclud[ing] his confrontation with society,"[4] so as to be spared the expense and ordeal of repeated trials, the anxiety and insecurity of having to live with the possibility of conviction, and the possibility that the prosecution may strengthen its case with each try as it learns more of the evidence and of the nature of the defense.[5] These reasons both inform the determination of when jeopardy attaches and the evaluation of the permissibility of retrial depending upon the reason for a trial's premature termination.

A second trial may be permitted where a mistrial is the result of "manifest necessity"[6]—for example, when the jury cannot reach a verdict[7] or circumstances plainly prevent the continuation of the trial.[8] The question of whether there is double jeopardy becomes more difficult, however, with mistrials triggered by events within the prosecutor's control, prosecutorial misconduct, or judicial error. In such cases, courts ordinarily balance the defendant's right in having the trial completed against the public interest in fair trials.[9]

Thus, when a lower court granted a mistrial because of a defective indictment, the Supreme Court held that retrial was not barred. Instead, the Court explained in Illinois v. Somerville that a trial judge "properly exercises his discretion" in cases in which an impartial

---

[1] The rule traces back to United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579 (1824). See also Kepner v. United States, 195 U.S. 100 (1904); Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963) (trial terminated just after jury sworn but before any testimony taken). In Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28 (1978), the Court held this standard of the attachment of jeopardy was "at the core" of the Clause and it therefore binds the states. But see id. at 40 (Powell, J., dissenting). An accused is not put in jeopardy by preliminary examination and discharge by the examining magistrate, Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426 (1923), by an indictment which is quashed, Taylor v. United States, 207 U.S. 120, 127 (1907), or by arraignment and pleading to the indictment. Bassing v. Cady, 208 U.S. 386, 391–92 (1908). A defendant may be tried after preliminary proceedings that present no risk of final conviction. E.g., Ludwig v. Massachusetts, 427 U.S. 618, 630–32 (1976) (conviction in prior summary proceeding does not foreclose trial in a court of general jurisdiction, where defendant has absolute right to demand a trial de novo and thus set aside the first conviction); Swisher v. Brady, 438 U.S. 204 (1978) (double jeopardy not violated by procedure under which masters hear evidence and make preliminary recommendations to juvenile court judge, who may confirm, modify, or remand).

[2] Cf. United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470 (1971); Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963). The Supreme Court has stated: "Even if the first trial is not completed, a second prosecution may be grossly unfair. It increases the financial and emotional burden on the accused, prolongs the period in which he is stigmatized by an unresolved accusation of wrongdoing, and may even enhance the risk that an innocent defendant may be convicted. The danger of such unfairness to the defendant exists whenever a trial is aborted before it is completed. Consequently, as a general rule, the prosecutor is entitled to one, and only one, opportunity to require an accused to stand trial." Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 503–05 (1978) (citations omitted).

[3] Wade v. Hunter, 336 U.S. 684, 689 (1949).

[4] United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 486 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[5] Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 503–05 (1978); Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 35–36 (1978). See Peter Westen & Richard Drubel, Toward a General Theory of Double Jeopardy, 1978 Sup. Ct. Rev. 81, 86–97.

[6] United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579, 580 (1824).

[7] United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579 (1824); Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263 (1892). See Renico v. Lett, 559 U.S. 766 (2010) (in a habeas review case, discussing the broad deference given to trial judge's decision to declare a mistrial because of jury deadlock). See also, Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110, 118 (2009); Blueford v. Arkansas, 566 U.S. 599 (2012) (re-prosecution for a greater offense allowed following jury deadlock on a lesser included offense).

[8] Simmons v. United States, 142 U.S. 148 (1891) (juror's impartiality became questionable during trial); Thompson v. United States, 155 U.S. 271 (1884) (discovery during trial that one of the jurors had served on the grand jury that had indicted defendant and was therefore disqualified); Wade v. Hunter, 336 U.S. 684 (1949) (court-martial discharged because enemy advancing on site).

[9] Illinois v. Somerville, 410 U.S. 458, 463 (1973).

verdict cannot be reached or in which a verdict on conviction would have to be reversed on appeal because of an obvious error.[10] The Court stated: "If an error could make reversal on appeal a certainty, it would not serve 'the ends of public justice' to require that the government proceed with its proof when, if it succeeded before the jury, it would automatically be stripped of that success by an appellate court."[11]

On the other hand, in Downum v. United States, the Court held that a re-trial was not permissible when a prosecutor knew prior to jury selection that a key witness would be unavailable but later moved for a mistrial on the basis of that unavailability.[12] Although Downum appeared to establish the principle that a prosecutorial or judicial error could never constitute a "manifest necessity" for terminating a trial, Illinois v. Somerville distinguished and limited Downum to situations in which the error lends itself to prosecutorial manipulation.[13]

Another kind of case arises when the prosecutor moves for mistrial because of prejudicial misconduct by the defense. In Arizona v. Washington,[14] defense counsel made prejudicial comments about the prosecutor's past conduct, and the prosecutor's motion for a mistrial was granted over defendant's objections. The Court ruled that retrial was not barred by double jeopardy. While the Court acknowledged that mistrial was not literally "necessary" because the trial judge could have given limiting instructions to the jury, it deferred to the trial judge's determination that defense counsel's comments had likely impaired the jury's impartiality.[15]

The Supreme Court has considered the trial judge's motivation when the trial judge has erred in exercising discretion to declare a mistrial sua sponte or a prosecutor's motion. In Gori v. United States,[16] the Court permitted a defendant's retrial when the trial judge had, on his own motion and with no indication of the wishes of defense counsel, declared a mistrial because he thought the prosecutor's line of questioning was intended to expose the defendant's criminal record, which would have constituted prejudicial error. Although the Court thought that the judge's action was an abuse of discretion, the Court approved retrial on the grounds that the judge had intended to benefit the defendant by his decision to declare a mistrial.[17]

The Court, however, reached the opposite conclusion in other cases. For example, in United States v. Jorn, the Court refused to permit retrial where the trial judge discharged the jury erroneously because he disbelieved the prosecutor's assurance that certain witnesses had been properly apprised of their constitutional rights.[18] The Court observed that the "doctrine of manifest necessity stands as a command to trial judges not to foreclose the defendant's option [to go to the first jury and perhaps obtain an acquittal] until a scrupulous exercise of judicial discretion leads to the conclusion that the ends of public justice would not be served by a continuation of the proceedings."[19]

---

[10] Id. at 464.

[11] Id.

[12] Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963).

[13] Somerville, 410 U.S. at 464–65, 468–69.

[14] 434 U.S. 497 (1978).

[15] Id. at 497.

[16] 367 U.S. 364 (1961). See also United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463 (1964) (re-prosecution permitted after the setting aside of a guilty plea found to be involuntary because of coercion by the trial judge).

[17] Id.

[18] United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 483 (1971).

[19] Id. at 485. The opinion of the Court was by a plurality of four, but two other Justices joined it after first arguing that jurisdiction was lacking to hear the government's appeal.

Later cases appear to accept Jorn as an example of a case where the trial judge "acts irrationally or irresponsibly."[20] But if the trial judge acts deliberately, giving prosecution and defense the opportunity to explain their positions, and according respect to defendant's interest in concluding the matter before the one jury, then he is entitled to deference. This approach perhaps rehabilitates the result if not the reasoning in Gori and maintains the result and much of the reasoning of Jorn.[21]

In Jorn, the Supreme Court recognized that "a motion by the defendant for mistrial is ordinarily assumed to remove any barrier to reprosecution, even if the defendant's motion is necessitated by a prosecutorial or judicial error."[22] Similarly, in United States v. Scott, the Supreme Court noted that "Such a motion by the defendant is deemed to be a deliberate election on his part to forgo his valued right to have his guilt or innocence determined before the first trier of fact."[23] In United States v. Dinitz,[24] the trial judge had excluded defendant's principal attorney for misbehavior and had then given defendant the option of recess while he appealed the exclusion, a mistrial, or continuation with an assistant defense counsel.

Holding that the defendant could be retried after he sought a mistrial, the Court reasoned that, although the exclusion might have been in error, it was not done in bad faith to goad the defendant into requesting a mistrial or to prejudice his prospects for acquittal.[25] The Court explained that the defendant's choice to terminate the trial and go on to a new trial should be respected. To hold otherwise would require defendants to shoulder the burden and anxiety of proceeding to a probable conviction followed by an appeal and possible re-trial.[26]

But the Court has also reserved the possibility that the defendant's motion might be necessitated by prosecutorial or judicial overreaching motivated by bad faith or undertaken to harass or prejudice, and in those cases retrial would be barred.[27] It is unclear what types of prosecutorial or judicial misconduct would constitute such overreaching.[28] But in Oregon v. Kennedy,[29] the Court adopted a narrow "intent" test, so that "[o]nly where the governmental conduct in question is intended to 'goad' the defendant into moving for a mistrial may a defendant raise the bar of double jeopardy to a second trial after having succeeded in aborting the first on his own motion." Therefore, ordinarily, a defendant who moves for or acquiesces in a mistrial is bound by his decision and may be required to stand for retrial.

---

[20] Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 514 (1978).

[21] Id. at 515–16. See also Illinois v. Somerville, 410 U.S. 458, 462, 465–66, 469–71 (1973) (discussing Gori and Jorn).

[22] United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 485 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[23] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 93 (1978).

[24] 424 U.S. 600 (1976). See also Lee v. United States, 432 U.S. 23 (1977) (defendant's motion to dismiss because the information was improperly drawn made after opening statement and renewed at close of evidence was functional equivalent of mistrial and when granted did not bar retrial, Court emphasizing that defendant by his timing brought about foreclosure of opportunity to stay before the same trial).

[25] United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600 (1976).

[26] Id. at 609.

[27] Id. at 611.

[28] Compare United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600, 611 (1976), with United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463, 468 n.3 (1964).

[29] 456 U.S. 667, 676 (1982). The Court thought a broader standard requiring an evaluation of whether acts of the prosecutor or the judge prejudiced the defendant would be unmanageable and would be counterproductive because courts would be loath to grant motions for mistrials knowing that re-prosecution would be barred. Id. at 676–77. The defendant had moved for mistrial after the prosecutor had asked a key witness a prejudicial question. Four Justices concurred, noting that the question did not constitute overreaching or harassment and objecting both to the Court's reaching the broader issue and to its narrowing the exception. Id. at 681.

Amdt5.3.5 Re-Prosecution After Conviction

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

A basic purpose of the Double Jeopardy Clause is to protect a defendant "against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction."[1] It is "settled" that "no man can be twice lawfully punished for the same offense."[2] The defendant's interest in finality, which informs much of double jeopardy jurisprudence, is quite attenuated following conviction, and he will most likely appeal, whereas the prosecution will ordinarily be content with its judgment.[3] Double jeopardy issues involving re-prosecution ordinarily arise, therefore, only in the context of successful defense appeals and controversies over punishment.

Generally, a defendant who is successful in having his conviction set aside on appeal may be tried again for the same offense, on the grounds that defendants "waived" objections to further prosecution by appealing.[4] An exception to this rule exists, however, when a defendant tried for one offense is convicted of a lesser offense and succeeds in having that conviction set aside. In Green v. United States,[5] the defendant had been tried for first-degree murder but convicted of second-degree murder. The Court held that, following reversal of that conviction, the defendant could not be tried again for first-degree murder, on the theory that the first verdict was an implicit acquittal of the first-degree murder charge.[6] The defendant could, however, be re-tried for second-degree murder.[7]

Another exception to the "waiver" theory involves appellate reversals grounded on evidentiary insufficiency. Thus, in Burks v. United States,[8] the appellate court set aside the defendant's conviction on the basis that the prosecution had failed to rebut defendant's proof of insanity. The Court explained that the Double Jeopardy Clause foreclosed the prosecution from having another opportunity to supply evidence which it failed to muster in the first proceeding. On the other hand, if a reviewing court reverses a jury conviction because of its disagreement

---

[1] North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969).

[2] Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 163 (1874).

[3] A prosecutor dissatisfied with the punishment imposed upon the first conviction might seek another trial in order to obtain a greater sentence. Cf. Ciucci v. Illinois, 356 U.S. 571 (1958) (under Due Process Clause, Double Jeopardy Clause not then applying to states).

[4] United States v. Ball, 163 U.S. 662 (1896). The English rule precluded a new trial in these circumstances, and circuit Justice Joseph Story adopted that view. United States v. Gilbert, 25 F. Cas. 1287 (No. 15204) (C.C.D.Mass. 1834). The history is briefly surveyed in Justice Felix Frankfurter's dissent in Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 200–05 (1957).

[5] 355 U.S. 184 (1957).

[6] The decision necessarily overruled Trono v. United States, 199 U.S. 521 (1905), although the Court purported to distinguish the decision. Green, 355 U.S. at 194–97 (1957). See also Brantley v. Georgia, 217 U.S. 284 (1910) (no due process violation where defendant is convicted of higher offense on second trial).

[7] See Green, 355 U.S. at 190.

[8] 437 U.S. 1 (1978).

on the weight—as opposed to the sufficiency of the evidence—retrial is permitted.[9] Also, the Burks rule does not bar re-prosecution following a reversal based on erroneous admission of evidence, even if the remaining properly admitted evidence would be insufficient to convict.[10]

Amdt5.3.6 Re-Prosecution After Acquittal

Amdt5.3.6.1 Overview of Re-Prosecution After Acquittal

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

That a defendant may not be retried following an acquittal is "the most fundamental rule in the history of double jeopardy jurisprudence."[1] "[T]he law attaches particular significance to an acquittal. To permit a second trial after an acquittal, however mistaken the acquittal may have been, would present an unacceptably high risk that the Government, with its vastly superior resources, might wear down the defendant so that 'even though innocent he may be found guilty.'"[2] Although, in other areas of double jeopardy doctrine, consideration is given to the public-safety interest in having a criminal trial proceed to an error-free conclusion, no such balancing of interests is permitted with respect to acquittals, "no matter how erroneous," no matter even if they were "egregiously erroneous."[3] Thus, an acquittal resting on the trial judge's misreading of the elements of an offense precludes further prosecution.[4]

The acquittal being final, there is no governmental appeal constitutionally possible from such a judgment. This was firmly established in Kepner v. United States,[5] which arose under a Philippines appeals system in which the appellate court could make an independent review of the record, set aside the trial judge's decision, and enter a judgment of conviction.[6] Previously,

---

[9] Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31 (1982). The decision was 5-4, the dissent arguing that weight and insufficiency determinations should be given identical Double Jeopardy Clause treatment. Id. at 47 (Justices White, Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun).

[10] Lockhart v. Nelson, 488 U.S. 33 (1988) (state may reprosecute under habitual offender statute even though evidence of a prior conviction was improperly admitted; at retrial, state may attempt to establish other prior convictions as to which no proof was offered at prior trial).

[1] United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 571 (1977).

[2] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 91 (1978) (quoting Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 188 (1957)).

[3] Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 16 (1978); Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141, 143 (1962). For evaluation of those interests of the defendant that might support the absolute rule of finality, and rejection of all such interests save the right of the jury to acquit against the evidence and the trial judge's ability to temper legislative rules with leniency, see Peter Westen & Richard Drubel, Toward a General Theory of Double Jeopardy, 1978 Sup. Ct. Rev. 81, 122–37.

[4] Evans v. Michigan, 568 U.S. 313 (2013) (acquittal after judge ruled the prosecution failed to prove that a burned building was not a dwelling, but such proof was not legally required for the arson offense charged).

[5] 195 U.S. 100 (1904). The case interpreted not the constitutional provision but a statutory provision extending double jeopardy protection to the Philippines. The Court has described the case, however, as correctly stating constitutional principles. See, e.g., United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 346 n.15 (1975); United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 113 n.13 (1980).

[6] In dissent, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, joined by three other Justices, propounded a theory of "continuing jeopardy," so that until the case was finally concluded one way or another, through judgment of conviction or acquittal, and final appeal, there was no second jeopardy no matter how many times a defendant was tried. 195 U.S. at 134. The under the Due Process Clause, there was no barrier to state provision for prosecutorial appeals from acquittals.[7] But there are instances in which the trial judge will dismiss the indictment or information without intending to acquit or in circumstances in which retrial would not be barred, and the prosecution, of course, has an interest in seeking on appeal to have errors corrected. Until 1971, however, the law providing for federal appeals was extremely difficult to apply and insulated from review many purportedly erroneous legal rulings,[8] but in that year Congress enacted a new statute permitting appeals in all criminal cases in which indictments are dismissed, except in those cases in which the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits further prosecution.[9] In part because of the new law, the Court has dealt in recent years with a large number of problems in this area.

Amdt5.3.6.2 Acquittal by Jury and Re-Prosecution

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Little or no controversy accompanies the rule that once a jury has acquitted a defendant, government may not, through appeal of the verdict or institution of a new prosecution, place the defendant on trial again.[1] Thus, the Court early held that, when the results of a trial are set aside because the first indictment was invalid or for some reason the trial's results were voidable, a judgment of acquittal must nevertheless remain undisturbed.[2]

Court has numerous times rejected any concept of "continuing jeopardy." E.g., Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 192 (1957); United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 351–53 (1975); Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 533–35 (1975).

[7] Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937). Palko is no longer viable. Cf. Greene v. Massey, 437 U.S. 19 (1978).

[8] The Criminal Appeals Act of 1907, 34 Stat. 1246, was "a failure . . . , a most unruly child that has not improved with age." United States v. Sisson, 399 U.S. 267, 307 (1970). See also United States v. Oppenheimer, 242 U.S. 85 (1916); Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141 (1962).

[9] Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control Act, Pub. L. No. 91-644, 84 Stat. 1890, 18 U.S.C. § 3731. Congress intended to remove all statutory barriers to governmental appeal and to allow appeals whenever the Constitution would permit, so that interpretation of the statute requires constitutional interpretation as well. United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 337 (1975). See Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 69 n.23 (1978), and id. at 78 (Stevens, J., concurring).

[1] What constitutes a jury acquittal may occasionally be uncertain. In Blueford v. Arkansas, 566 U.S. 599 (2012), the defendant was charged with capital murder in an "acquittal-first" jurisdiction, in which the jury must unanimously agree that a defendant is not guilty of a greater offense before it may begin to consider a lesser included offense. After several hours of deliberations, the foreperson of the jury stated in open court that the jury was unanimously against conviction for capital murder and the lesser included offense of first degree murder, but was deadlocked on manslaughter, the next lesser included offense. After further deliberations, the judge declared a mistrial because of a hung jury. Six Justices of the Court subsequently held that the foreperson's statement on capital murder and first degree murder lacked the necessary finality of an acquittal, and found that Double Jeopardy did not bar a subsequent prosecution for those crimes. Three dissenting Justices held that Double Jeopardy required a partial verdict of acquittal on the greater offenses under the circumstances.

In Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222 (1994), the Court ruled that a jury's action in leaving the verdict sheet blank on all but one count did not amount to an acquittal on those counts, and that consequently conviction on the remaining count, alleged to be duplicative of one of the blank counts, could not constitute double jeopardy. In any event, the Court added, no successive prosecution violative of double jeopardy could result from an initial sentencing proceeding in the course of an initial prosecution.

[2] In United States v. Ball, 163 U.S. 662 (1896), three defendants were placed on trial; Ball was acquitted and the other two were convicted, and the two appealed and obtained a reversal on the ground that the indictment had been

Amdt5.3.6.3 Acquittal by Trial Judge and Re-Prosecution

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

When a trial judge acquits a defendant, that action concludes the matter to the same extent that acquittal by jury verdict does.[1] There is no possibility of retrial for the same offense.[2] But it may be difficult at times to determine whether the trial judge's action was in fact an acquittal or whether it was a dismissal or some other action, which the prosecution may be able to appeal or the judge may be able to reconsider.[3] The question is "whether the ruling of the judge, whatever its label, actually represents a resolution, correct or not, of some or all of the factual elements of the offense charged."[4] Thus, an appeal by the government was held barred in a case in which the deadlocked jury had been discharged, and the trial judge had granted the defendant's motion for a judgment of acquittal under the appropriate federal rule, explicitly based on the judgment that the government had not proved facts constituting the offense.[5] Even if, as happened in Sanabria v. United States,[6] the trial judge erroneously excludes evidence and then acquits on the basis that the remaining evidence is insufficient to convict, the judgment of acquittal produced thereby is final and unreviewable.[7]

Some limited exceptions exist with respect to the finality of trial judge acquittal. First, because a primary purpose of the Due Process Clause is the prevention of successive trials and not of prosecution appeals per se, it is apparently the case that, if the trial judge permits the case to go to the jury, which convicts, and the judge thereafter enters a judgment of acquittal, even one founded upon his belief that the evidence does not establish guilt, the prosecution may appeal, because the effect of a reversal would be not a new trial but reinstatement of the defective; all three were again tried and all three were convicted. Ball's conviction was set aside as violating the clause; the trial court's action was not void but only voidable, and Ball had taken no steps to void it while the government could not take such action. Similarly, in Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), the defendant was convicted of burglary but acquitted of larceny; the conviction was set aside on his appeal because the jury had been unconstitutionally chosen. He was again tried and convicted of both burglary and larceny, but the larceny conviction was held to violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. On the doctrine of "constructive acquittals" by conviction of a lesser included offense, see discussion under Amdt5.3.5 Re-Prosecution After Conviction

---

[1] United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 570–72 (1977); Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 63–65 (1978); Finch v. United States, 433 U.S. 676 (1977).

[2] In Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141 (1962), the Court acknowledged that the trial judge's action in acquitting was "based upon an egregiously erroneous foundation," but it was nonetheless final and could not be reviewed. Id. at 143.

[3] As a general rule a state may prescribe that a judge's midtrial determination of the sufficiency of the prosecution's proof may be reconsidered. Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005) (Massachusetts had not done so, however, so the judge's midtrial acquittal on one of three counts became final for double jeopardy purposes when the prosecution rested its case).

[4] United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 571 (1977).

[5] 430 U.S. at 570–76. See also United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 87–92 (1978); Smalis v. Pennsylvania, 476 U.S. 140 (1986) (demurrer sustained on basis of insufficiency of evidence is acquittal).

[6] 437 U.S. 54 (1978).

[7] See also Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005) (acquittal based on erroneous interpretation of precedent).

jury's verdict and the judgment thereon.[8] Second, if the trial judge enters or grants a motion of acquittal, even one based on the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient to convict, then the prosecution may appeal if jeopardy had not yet attached in accordance with the federal standard.[9]

Amdt5.3.6.4 Trial Court Rulings Terminating Trial Before Verdict and Re-Prosecution

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

If, after jeopardy attaches, a trial judge grants a motion for mistrial, ordinarily the defendant is subject to retrial;[1] if, after jeopardy attaches, but before a jury conviction occurs, the trial judge acquits, perhaps on the basis that the prosecution has presented insufficient evidence or that the defendant has proved a requisite defense such as "insanity" or entrapment, the defendant is not subject to retrial.[2] This is so even where the trial court's ruling on the sufficiency of the evidence is based on an erroneous interpretation of the statute defining the elements of the offense.[3] However, it may be that the trial judge will grant a motion to dismiss that is neither a mistrial nor an acquittal, but is instead a termination of the trial in defendant's favor based on some decision not relating to his factual guilt or innocence, such as prejudicial preindictment delay.[4] The prosecution may not simply begin a new trial but must seek first to appeal and overturn the dismissal, a course that was not open to federal prosecutors until enactment of the Omnibus Crime Control Act in 1971.[5] That law has resulted in tentative and uncertain rulings with respect to when such dismissals may be appealed and further proceedings directed. In the first place, it is unclear in many instances whether a judge's ruling is a mistrial, a dismissal, or an acquittal.[6] In the second place, because the [8] In United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975), following a jury verdict to convict, the trial judge granted defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground of prejudicial delay, not a judgment of acquittal; the Court permitted a government appeal because reversal would have resulted in reinstatement of the jury's verdict, not in a retrial. In United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358, 365 (1975), the Court assumed, on the basis of Wilson, that a trial judge's acquittal of a defendant following a jury conviction could be appealed by the government because, again, if the judge's decision were set aside there would be no further proceedings at trial. In overruling Jenkins in United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978), the Court noted the assumption and itself assumed that a judgment of acquittal bars appeal only when a second trial would be necessitated by reversal. Id. at 91 n.7.

---

[9] Serfass v. United States, 420 U.S. 377 (1975) (after request for jury trial but before attachment of jeopardy judge dismissed indictment because of evidentiary insufficiency; appeal allowed); United States v. Sanford, 429 U.S. 14 (1976) (judge granted mistrial after jury deadlock, then four months later dismissed indictment for insufficient evidence; appeal allowed, because granting mistrial had returned case to pretrial status).

[1] See Amdt5.3.4 Re-Prosecution After Mistrial.

[2] See Amdt5.3.4 Re-Prosecution After Mistrial.

[3] See Evans v. Michigan, 568 U.S. 313 (2013).

[4] United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975) (preindictment delay); United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358 (1975) (determination of law based on facts adduced at trial; ambiguous whether judge's action was acquittal or dismissal); United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978) (preindictment delay).

[5] See United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 84–86 (1978); United States v. Sisson, 399 U.S. 267, 291–96 (1970).

[6] Cf. Lee v. United States, 432 U.S. 23 (1977).

Justices have such differing views about the policies underlying the Double Jeopardy Clause, determinations of which dismissals preclude appeals and further proceedings may result from shifting coalitions and from revised perspectives. Thus, the Court first fixed the line between permissible and impermissible appeals at the point at which further proceedings would have had to take place in the trial court if the dismissal were reversed. If the only thing that had to be done was to enter a judgment on a guilty verdict after reversal, appeal was constitutional and permitted under the statute;[7] if further proceedings, such as continuation of the trial or some further factfinding was necessary, appeal was not permitted.[8] Now, but by a close division of the Court, the determining factor is not whether further proceedings must be had but whether the action of the trial judge, whatever its label, correct or not, resolved some or all of the factual elements of the offense charged in defendant's favor, whether, that is, the court made some determination related to the defendant's factual guilt or innocence.[9] Such dismissals relating to guilt or innocence are functional equivalents of acquittals, whereas all other dismissals are functional equivalents of mistrials.

Amdt5.3.7 Multiple Punishments for Same Offense

Amdt5.3.7.1 Legislative Discretion as to Multiple Sentences

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

A single criminal action may violate multiple laws resulting in multiple sentences.[1] The Double Jeopardy Clause does not appear to bar legislatures from splitting criminal actions

[7] United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975) (after jury guilty verdict, trial judge dismissed indictment on grounds of preindictment delay; appeal permissible because upon reversal all trial judge had to do was enter judgment on the jury's verdict).

[8] United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358 (1975) (after presentation of evidence in bench trial, judge dismissed indictment; appeal impermissible because if dismissal was reversed there would have to be further proceedings in the trial court devoted to resolving factual issues going to elements of offense charged and resulting in supplemental findings).

[9] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978) (at close of evidence, court dismissed indictment for preindictment delay; ruling did not go to determination of guilt or innocence, but, like a mistrial, permitted further proceedings that would go to factual resolution of guilt or innocence). The Court thought that double jeopardy policies were resolvable by balancing the defendant's interest in having the trial concluded in one proceeding against the government's right to one complete opportunity to convict those who have violated the law. The defendant chose to move to terminate the proceedings and, having made a voluntary choice, is bound to the consequences, including the obligation to continue in further proceedings. Id. at 95–101. The four dissenters would have followed Jenkins, and accused the Court of having adopted too restrictive a definition of acquittal. Their view is that the rule against retrials after acquittal does not, as the Court believed, "safeguard determination of innocence; rather, it is that a retrial following a final judgment for the accused necessarily threatens intolerable interference with the constitutional policy against multiple trials." Id. at 101, 104 (Justices Brennan, White, Marshall, and Stevens). They would, therefore, treat dismissals as functional equivalents of acquittals, whenever further proceedings would be required after reversals.

[1] Multiple sentences may arise in (1) "double-description" cases in which conduct arising out of a single transaction violates multiple criminal laws (e.g., Gore v. United States, 357 U.S. 386, 392–93 (1958) (one sale of narcotics resulted in three separate counts: (i) sale of drugs not in pursuance of a written order, (ii) sale of drugs not in the original stamped package, and (iii) sale of drugs with knowledge that they had been unlawfully imported)); and (2) "unit-of-prosecution" cases in which the same conduct may violate the same statutory prohibition multiple times. E.g., Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (defendant who transported two women across state lines for an immoral purpose in one trip in same car indicted on two counts of violating Mann Act). See Peter Westen & Richard Drubel, Toward a General Theory of Double Jeopardy, 1978 Sup. Ct. Rev. 81, 111–22.

that occur in a single transaction into separate crimes thereby allowing prosecutors a choice of charges to try and making multiple punishments possible.[2] In Missouri v. Hunter, the Supreme Court stated: "Where . . . a legislature specifically authorizes cumulative punishment under two statutes, regardless of whether those two statutes proscribe the 'same' conduct . . . a court's task of statutory construction is at an end and . . . the trial court or jury may impose cumulative punishment under such statutes in a single trial."[3]

The Court has held that the Double Jeopardy Clause establishes a presumption against multiple punishments for the same criminal transaction unless Congress has "spoken in language that is clear and definite"[4] that multiple punishments are to be imposed. Absent clearly expressed congressional intent, courts use the "same evidence" rule to determine whether Congress intended to punish conduct occurring in the same criminal transaction as separate offenses. Explaining the "same evidence" rule in Blockburger v. United States, the Supreme Court stated: "[W]here the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[5] For example, in Gore v. United States,[6] the Court held that because the defendant's act of selling narcotics violated three distinct criminal statutes, each of which required proof of a fact not required by the others, the government could prosecute the defendant on all three counts in the same proceeding.[7]

The Court has also held that the "same evidence" rule does not upset "established doctrine" that, for double jeopardy purposes, "a conspiracy to commit a crime is a separate offense from the crime itself,"[8] or the related principle that Congress may provide that predicate offenses and "continuing criminal enterprise" are separate offenses.[9] On the other hand, in Whalen v. United States,[10] the Court determined that a defendant could not be punished separately for the crimes of rape and killing in the course of rape when the offenses concerned a single criminal transaction and victim, the statutes required proof of the same facts, and the statutes

---

[2] Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 343–44 (1981) (defendants convicted on separate counts of conspiracy to import marijuana and conspiracy to distribute marijuana for the same marijuana).

[3] Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 368–69 (1983) (separate offenses of "first degree robbery" defined to include robbery under threat of violence and "armed criminal action").

[4] United States v. Universal C.I.T. Corp., 344 U.S. 218, 221–22 (1952).

[5] Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932). Blockburger was not a double jeopardy case, but it derived the rule from Gavieres v. United States, 220 U.S. 338, 342 (1911), which was a double jeopardy case. See also Carter v. McClaughry, 183 U.S. 365 (1902); Morgan v. Devine, 237 U.S. 632 (1915); Albrecht v. United States, 273 U.S. 1 (1927); Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 (1946); Am. Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781 (1946); United States v. Michener, 331 U.S. 789 (1947); Pereira v. United States, 347 U.S. 1 (1954); Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587 (1961).

[6] 357 U.S. 386 (1958).

[7] See also Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333 (1981); Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770 (1975) (defendant convicted on two counts, one of the substantive offense, one of conspiracy to commit the substantive offense; defense raised variation of Blockburger test, Wharton's Rule requiring that one may not be punished for conspiracy to commit a crime when the nature of the crime necessitates participation of two or more persons for its commission; Court recognized Wharton's Rule as a double-jeopardy inspired presumption of legislative intent but held that congressional intent in this case was "clear and unmistakable" that both offenses be punished separately).

[8] United States v. Felix, 503 U.S. 378, 391 (1992). But cf. Rutledge v. United States, 517 U.S. 292 (1996) (21 U.S.C. § 846, prohibiting conspiracy to commit drug offenses, does not require proof of any fact that is not also a part of the continuing criminal enterprise offense under 21 U.S.C. § 848, so there are not two separate offenses).

[9] Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773 (1985) ("continuing criminal enterprise" is a separate offense under the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970).

[10] 445 U.S. 684 (1980).

and legislative history did not indicate that Congress wanted the offenses punished separately.[11] A guilty plea ordinarily precludes collateral attack.[12]

Amdt5.3.7.2 Successive Prosecutions for Same Offense and Double Jeopardy

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Successive prosecutions raise double jeopardy concerns. It is more burdensome for a defendant to face charges in separate proceedings, and if those proceedings occur over a lengthy period, the defendant must live in a continuing state of uncertainty. At the same time, multiple prosecutions allow the state to hone its trial strategies.[1]

In Brown v. Ohio,[2] the Court applied the "same evidence test" to bar successive prosecutions for different statutory offenses involving the same conduct. The defendant had been convicted of "joyriding"—defined as operating a motor vehicle without the owner's consent—and was then prosecuted and convicted of stealing the same automobile. Because the state courts had conceded that joyriding was a lesser included offense of auto theft, the Court overturned the second conviction,[3] observing that each offense required the same proof and for double jeopardy purposes met the "same evidence" test in Blockburger v. United States.[4] The Court later applied the same principles to hold that a conviction for failing to reduce speed to avoid an accident did not preclude a second trial for involuntary manslaughter. In reaching this conclusion, the Court reasoned that failing to reduce speed was not a necessary element of the manslaughter offense.[5]

---

[11] The Court reasoned that a conviction for killing in the course of rape could not be had without providing all of the elements of the offense of rape. See also Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137 (1977) (no indication in legislative history Congress intended defendant to be prosecuted both for conspiring to distribute drugs and for distributing drugs in concert with five or more persons); Simpson v. United States, 435 U.S. 6 (1978) (defendant improperly prosecuted both for committing bank robbery with a firearm and for using a firearm to commit a felony); Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (simultaneous transportation of two women across state lines for immoral purposes one violation of Mann Act rather than two).

[12] United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563 (1989) (defendant who pled guilty to two separate conspiracy counts is barred from collateral attack alleging that in fact there was only one conspiracy and that double jeopardy applied).

[1] For discussion on this dynamic, see Grady v. Corbin, 495 U.S. 508, 518–19 (1990), overruled by United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688 (1993) ("We therefore accept the Government's invitation to overrule Grady, and Counts II, III, IV, and V of Foster's subsequent prosecution are not barred.").

[2] 432 U.S. 161 (1977). Cf. In re Nielsen, 131 U.S. 176 (1889) (prosecution for adultery held impermissible following the defendant's conviction for cohabiting with more than one woman, even though second prosecution required proof of an additional fact—that he was married to another woman).

[3] See also Harris v. Oklahoma, 433 U.S. 682 (1977) (defendant who had been convicted of felony murder for participating in a store robbery with another person who shot a store clerk could not be prosecuted for robbing the store, since store robbery was a lesser-included crime in the offense of felony murder).

[4] 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932). Blockburger was not a double jeopardy case, but it derived the rule from Gavieres v. United States, 220 U.S. 338, 342 (1911), which was a double jeopardy case. See also Carter v. McClaughry, 183 U.S. 365 (1902); Morgan v. Devine, 237 U.S. 632 (1915); Albrecht v. United States, 273 U.S. 1 (1927); Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 (1946); Am. Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781 (1946); United States v. Michener, 331 U.S. 789 (1947); Pereira v. United States, 347 U.S. 1 (1954); Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587 (1961).

[5] Illinois v. Vitale, 447 U.S. 410 (1980).

The Brown Court noted some limitations to its holding[6] and more have emerged subsequently. Principles appropriate in the "classically simple" lesser-included-offense and related situations are not readily transposable to "multilayered conduct" governed by the law of conspiracy and continuing criminal enterprise, and it remains the law that "a substantive crime and a conspiracy to commit that crime are not the 'same offense' for double jeopardy purposes."[7] For double jeopardy purposes, a defendant is "punished . . . only for the offense of which [he] is convicted"; a later prosecution or later punishment is not barred simply because the underlying criminal activity has been considered at sentencing for a different offense.[8] Similarly, recidivism-based sentence enhancement does not constitute multiple punishment for the "same" prior offense, but instead is a stiffened penalty for the later crime.[9]

Amdt5.3.7.3 Collateral Estoppel (Issue Preclusion) and Double Jeopardy

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has also interpreted the Double Jeopardy Clause to incorporate the doctrine of "collateral estoppel" or "issue preclusion"[1] which prohibits re-litigating an issue of fact or law raised and necessarily resolved by a prior judgment.[2] The Court first recognized the Double Jeopardy Clause's issue-preclusion component in Ashe v. Swenson,[3] which involved a robbery of six poker players.[4] After being acquitted of robbing one of the players because of insufficient evidence, the Ashe defendant was tried and convicted of robbing another player.[5] Because the sole issue in dispute in the first trial was whether the defendant was one of the robbers, the Court held that the defendant's acquittal for robbing one player in the first trial

---

[6] The Court suggested that if the legislature had provided that joyriding is a separate offense for each day the vehicle is operated without the owner's consent, so that the two indictments each specifying a different date on which the offense occurred would have required different proof, the result might have been different, but this, of course, met the Blockburger problem. Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 169 n.8 (1977). The Court also suggested that an exception might be permitted where the state is unable to proceed on the more serious charge at the outset because the facts necessary to sustain that charge had not occurred or had not been discovered. Id. at 169 n.7. See also Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137, 150–54 (1977) (plurality opinion) (exception where defendant elects separate trials); Ohio v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 493 (1984) (trial court's acceptance of guilty plea to lesser included offense and dismissal of remaining charges over prosecution's objections does not bar subsequent prosecution on those "remaining" counts).

[7] United States v. Felix, 503 U.S. 378, 389 (1992). The fact that Felix constituted a "large exception" to Grady was one of the reasons the Court cited in overruling Grady. United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 709–10 (1993)

[8] Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389 (1995) (consideration of defendant's alleged cocaine dealings in determining sentence for marijuana offenses does not bar subsequent prosecution on cocaine charges).

[9] Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721, 728 (1998).

[1] See Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 445 (1970). Collateral estoppel and issue preclusion are synonymous terms. See Black's Law Dictionary 312 (10th ed. 2014) (defining "collateral estoppel").

[2] See Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 (Am. Law Inst. 1981).

[3] 397 U.S. at 445. Previously, the Court in Hoag v. New Jersey, concluded that successive trials arising out of a tavern hold-up in which five customers were robbed did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See 356 U.S. 464, 466 (1958).

[4] Ashe, 397 U.S. at 437.

[5] Id. at at 439–40.

precluded the government from subsequently charging him with robbing another player.[6] Explaining that courts must apply issue preclusion in criminal cases with "realism and rationality," the Ashe Court reasoned that the underlying record ust be closely examined to determine what the first jury's verdict of acquittal "actually decided."[7] If a criminal judgment does not depend on a jury's determination of a particular factual issue, re-litigation of that issue can occur.[8]

In United States v. Powell, the Court rejected an argument that issue preclusion barred an "inconsistent" jury verdict that included an acquittal on a drug charge but guilty verdicts on using a telephone to "caus[e] and faciliat[e]" that same drug offense.[9] Reaffirming a precedent from more than a half a century before,[10] the Powell Court held that the "Government's inability to invoke review, the general reluctance to inquire into the workings of the jury, and the possible exercise of lenity" by the jury cautioned against allowing defendants to challenge inconsistent verdicts on issue preclusion grounds.[11]

In 2016, the Court extended the logic of Powell in Bravo-Fernandez v. United States.[12] In Bravo-Fernandez, a jury returned inconsistent verdicts of conviction and acquittal with respect to two criminal defendants, but the convictions were later vacated for legal errors unrelated to the inconsistency.[13] Recognizing Powell's conclusion that inconsistent verdicts do not indicate whether an acquittal resulted from "mistake, compromise, or lenity,"[14] the Court held that the government could re-prosecute on the counts on which a conviction had been initially obtained. According to the Court, because of the "irrationality" of the earlier inconsistent verdicts,[15] the criminal defendants could not demonstrate that the first jury had "actually decided" that they did not commit the crime underlying the second trial.[16] As a result, while the government could not re-prosecute the defendants in Bravo-Fernandez on the charges that had resulted in acquittal,[17] the government could re-prosecute on charges that had previously resulted in guilty verdicts.

---

[6] Id. at 446 (quoting Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 190 (1957)).

[7] Id. at 444.

[8] See Bobby v. Bies, 556 U.S. 825, 834 (2009) (citing Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 cmt. h).

[9] See United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57, 68 (1984).

[10] See Dunn v. United States, 284 U.S. 390, 392 (1932).

[11] 469 U.S. at 68–69.

[12] No. 15-537, slip op. at 15, 20 (U.S. Nov. 29, 2016) ("We therefore bracket this case with Powell. . .").

[13] Id. at 361. Had the convictions been overturned because of lack of evidence, the government would have been prohibited from retrying the defendants, as a court's evaluation of the evidence as insufficient to convict is the equivalent to an acquittal and, accordingly, bars reprosecution for that same offense. See Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 10–11 (1978).

[14] See Bravo-Fernandez, No. 15-537, slip op. at 15.

[15] Id. at 16.

[16] Id. at 15. The Bravo-Fernandez Court distinguished the case from Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110 (2009), where the Court held that Powell did not extend to the situation where a jury returned a verdict of acquittal on one count and hung on another count and prosecutors attempted to retry on the hung count. Id. at 124. Because the jury "speaks only though its verdict," a hung count did not reveal anything about the jury's reasoning and only the acquittal could factor into the issue preclusion analysis. Id. at 122. Unlike in Yeager, the acquittals in Bravo-Fernandez were accompanied with inconsistent guilty verdicts, leading the Court to conclude that the criminal defendants could not demonstrate that the jury had actually decided the underlying issue at the second trial. See Bravo-Fernandez, No. 15-537, slip op. at 15–16.

[17] See Bravo-Fernandez, No. 15-537, slip op. at 16 (noting that the earlier acquittals "remain inviolate").

Amdt5.4 Self-Incrimination

Amdt5.4.1 Historical Background on Self-Incrimination

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The source of the Self-Incrimination Clause was the maxim "nemo tenetur seipsum accusare," that "no man is bound to accuse himself." The maxim is but one aspect of two different systems of law enforcement which competed in England for acceptance; the accusatorial and the inquisitorial. In the accusatorial system, which predated the reign of Henry II but was expanded and extended by him, first the community and then the state by grand and petit juries proceeded against alleged wrongdoers through the examination of others, and in the early years through examination of the defendant as well. The inquisitorial system, which developed in the ecclesiastical courts, compelled the alleged wrongdoer to affirm his culpability through the use of the oath ex officio. Under the oath, an official had the power to make a person before him take an oath to tell the truth to the full extent of his knowledge as to all matters about which he would be questioned; before administration of the oath the person was not advised of the nature of the charges against him, or whether he was accused of crime, and was also not informed of the nature of the questions to be asked.[1]

The use of this oath in Star Chamber proceedings, especially to root out political heresies, combined with opposition to the ecclesiastical oath ex officio, led over a long period of time to general acceptance of the principle that a person could not be required to accuse himself under oath in any proceeding before an official tribunal seeking information looking to a criminal prosecution, or before a magistrate investigating an accusation against him with or without oath, or under oath in a court of equity or a court of common law.[2] The precedents in the colonies are few in number, but following the Revolution six states had embodied the privilege against self-incrimination in their constitutions,[3] and the privilege was one of those recommended by several state ratifying conventions for inclusion in a federal bill of rights.[4] James Madison's version of the Clause read "nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself," but a House amendment inserted "in any criminal case" into the provision.[5]

---

[1] Mary H. Maguire, Attack of the Common Lawyers on the Oath Ex Officio as Administered in the Ecclesiastical Courts in England, in Essays in History and Political Theory in Honor of Charles Howard McIlwain 199 (C. Wittke ed., 1936).

[2] The traditional historical account is 8 J. Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence § 2250 (J. McNaughton rev. 1961), but more recent historical studies have indicated that Dean Wigmore was too grudging of the privilege. Leonard Levy, Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right Against Self-Incrimination (1968); Morgan, The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, 34 Minn. L. Rev. 1 (1949).

[3] 3 F. Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions, reprinted in H. Doc. No. 357, 59th Congress, 2d Sess. 1891 (1909) (Massachusetts); 4 id. at 2455 (New Hampshire); 5 id. at 2787 (North Carolina), 3038 (Pennsylvania); 6 id. at 3741 (Vermont); 7 id. at 3813 (Virginia).

[4] Amendments were recommended by an "Address" of a minority of the Pennsylvania convention after they had been voted down as a part of the ratification action, 2 Bernard Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 628, 658, 664 (1971), and then the ratifying conventions of Massachusetts, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Virginia, and New York formally took this step.

[5] Id. at 753 (August 17, 1789).

Amdt5.4.2 Early Doctrine on Self-Incrimination

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

By the latter part of the eighteenth century, English and early American courts had determined that coerced confessions were potentially excludable from admission at trial because they were untrustworthy.[1] For much of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court invoked unreliability as the basis for excluding such confessions without mentioning the constitutional bar against self-incrimination.[2]

In the 1897 case of Bram v. United States, the Court suggested that the Fifth Amendment imposed separate restrictions on a confession's admissibility. These restrictions focused on the confession's voluntariness as an indicator of its trustworthiness as evidence. The Court wrote that in criminal trials in federal court, "wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, commanding that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.'"[3]

Although the Supreme Court approved this Fifth Amendment interpretation in subsequent cases[4] and reaffirmed Bram itself,[5] the Court held in 1912 that a confession should not be excluded merely because the authorities had not warned a suspect of his right to remain silent.[6] "In other cases, the Court expressed doubts as to whether the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination—rather than a common-law principle that forced confessions were untrustworthy—required exclusion of involuntary confessions from federal criminal trials."[7] Because the Supreme Court had not yet ruled that the Self-Incrimination Clause applies to states through the Fourteenth Amendment, admissibility of confessions in state courts continued to be governed under due process standards developed from common-law principles. It was only in the 1960s, after the Court extended the Self-Incrimination Clause to the states, that a divided Court reaffirmed and extended the 1897 Bram ruling and imposed on both federal and state trial courts new rules for admitting or excluding confessions and other admissions made to police during custodial interrogation.[8]

---

[1] 3 John Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence § 823 (1940); Developments in the Law—Confessions, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 935, 954–59 (1966).

[2] Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, 584–85 (1884). At the time of the Court's decision, Utah was a territory and subject to direct federal judicial supervision.

[3] Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542 (1897).

[4] Ziang Sun Wan v. United States, 266 U.S. 1, 14–15 (1924). This case held that the circumstances of detention and interrogation were relevant on the question of a confession's admissibility. Id.

[5] Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 (1921); Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303, 313 (1912); Shotwell Mfg. Co. v. United States, 371 U.S. 342, 347 (1963).

[6] Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303 (1912).

[7] United States v. Carignan, 342 U.S. 36, 41 (1951). See also McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 346 (1943); Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, 285 (1936); Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 191 n.35 (1953).

[8] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). According to John Wigmore, "there never was any historical connection . . . between the constitutional [self-incrimination] clause and the [common law] confession-doctrine," 3 John Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence § 823, at 250 n.5 (1940); see also 8 id. at § 2266 (1961). The two

Amdt5.4.3 General Protections Against Self-Incrimination Doctrine and Practice

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Court has settled upon the principle that the Clause serves two interrelated interests: the preservation of an accusatorial system of criminal justice, which goes to the integrity of the judicial system, and the preservation of personal privacy from unwarranted governmental intrusion.[1] To protect these interests and to preserve these values, the privilege "is not to be interpreted literally." Rather, the "sole concern [of the privilege] is, as its name indicates, with the danger to a witness forced to give testimony leading to the infliction of penalties affixed to the criminal acts."[2] Furthermore, "[t]he privilege afforded not only extends to answers that would in themselves support a conviction . . . but likewise embraces those which would furnish a link in the chain of evidence needed to prosecute . . ."[3]

The privilege against self-incrimination parries the general obligation to provide testimony under oath when called upon, but it also applies in police interrogations. In all cases, the privilege must be supported by a reasonable fear that a response will be incriminatory. The issue is a matter of law for a court to determine,[4] and therefore, with limited exceptions, one must claim the privilege to benefit from it.[5] Otherwise, silence in the face of questioning may be insufficient to invoke the privilege because it may not afford an adequate opportunity either to test whether information withheld falls within the privilege or to cure a violation through a rules appear to have developed separately. The bar against self-incrimination derived primarily from notions of liberty and fairness, whereas proscriptions against involuntary confessions derived primarily from notions of reliability. However, the rules stemmed from some of the same considerations. Some commentators have considered the confession rule in some respects to be an off-shoot of the privilege against self-incrimination. See Leonard Levy, Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right Against Self-Incrimination 325–32, 495 n.43 (1968). See also Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 581–84, especially 583 n.25 (1961).

---

[1] In Tehan v. United States ex rel. Shott, the Court noted:

> [T]he basic purposes that lie behind the privilege against self-incrimination do not relate to protecting the innocent from conviction, but rather to preserving the integrity of a judicial system in which even the guilty are not to be convicted unless the prosecution shoulders the entire load. . . . The basic purpose of a trial is the determination of truth, and it is self-evident that to deny a lawyer's help through the technical intricacies of a criminal trial or to deny a full opportunity to appeal a conviction because the accused is poor is to impede that purpose and to infect a criminal proceeding with the clear danger of convicting the innocent. . . . By contrast, the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination is not an adjunct to the ascertainment of truth. That privilege, like the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment, stands as a protection of quite different constitutional values—values reflecting the concern of our society for the right of each individual to be let alone.

Tehan v. United States ex rel. Shott, 382 U.S. 406, 415, 416 (1966); see also California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424, 448–58 (1971) (Harlan, J., concurring); Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 760–65 (1966); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 460 (1966). For a critical view of the privilege, see Henry Friendly, The Fifth Amendment Tomorrow: The Case for Constitutional Change, 37 U. Cin. L. Rev. 671 (1968).

[2] Ullmann, 350 U.S. at 438–39.

[3] Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486 (1951); see also Emspak v. United States, 349 U.S. 190 (1955); Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 332 (1951); Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 159 (1950).

[4] E.g., Mason v. United States, 244 U.S. 362 (1917).

[5] The primary exceptions are for a criminal defendant not taking the stand and a suspect being subject to inherently coercive circumstances (e.g., custodial interrogation). See Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178, 183–86 (2013) (plurality opinion).

grant of immunity.[6] A witness who fails to claim the privilege explicitly when an affirmative claim is required is deemed to have waived it, and waiver may be found where the witness has answered some preliminary questions but desires to stop at a certain point.[7] However, an assertion of innocence in conjunction with a claim of the privilege does not obviate the right of witnesses to invoke it, as their responses still may provide the government with evidence it may later seek to use against them.[8]

Although individuals must have reasonable cause to apprehend danger and cannot be the judge of the validity of their claims, a court that would deny a claim of the privilege must be "perfectly clear, from a careful consideration of all the circumstances in the case, that the individual is mistaken, and that the answer[s] cannot possibly have such tendency to incriminate."[9] To reach a determination, furthermore, a trial judge may not require a witness to disclose so much of the danger as to render the privilege nugatory. As the Court observed:

> [I]f the witness, upon interposing his claim, were required to prove the hazard . . . he would be compelled to surrender the very protection which the privilege is designed to guarantee. To sustain the privilege, it need only be evident from the implications of the question, in the setting in which it is asked, that a responsive answer to the question or an explanation of why it cannot be answered might be dangerous because injurious disclosure could result.[10]

The privilege against self-incrimination is a personal one and cannot be used by or on behalf of any organization, such as a corporation. Thus, a corporation cannot object on self-incrimination grounds to a subpoena of its records and books or to the compelled testimony of those corporate agents who have been given personal immunity from criminal prosecution.[11] Nor may a corporate official with custody of corporate documents that incriminate him personally resist their compelled production on the assertion of his personal privilege.[12]

---

[6] In Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178 (2013), the defendant—Salinas—answered all questions during noncustodial questioning about a double murder, other than one about whether his shotgun would match shells recovered at the murder scene. He fell silent on this inquiry, but did not assert the privilege against self-incrimination. At closing argument at Salinas's murder trial, the prosecutor argued that this silence indicated guilt, and a majority of the Court found the comments constitutionally permissible. The Court affirmed the Texas Supreme Court's ruling that Salinas had failed to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights because he did not do so explicitly. Although no opinion drew a majority of Justices, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Anthony Kennedy, Justice Samuel Alito observed that a defendant could choose to remain silent for numerous reasons other than avoiding self-incrimination. Id. at 188–89 (plurality opinion).

[7] Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367 (1951); United States v. Monia, 317 U.S. 424 (1943). The "waiver" concept here has been pronounced "analytically [un]sound," with the Court preferring to reserve the term "waiver" "for the process by which one affirmatively renounces the protection of the privilege." Garner v. United States, 424 U.S. 648, 654 n.9 (1976). Thus, the Court has settled upon the concept of "compulsion" as applied to "cases where disclosures are required in the face of claim of privilege." Id. "[I]n the ordinary case, if a witness under compulsion to testify makes disclosures instead of claiming the privilege, the government has not 'compelled' him to incriminate himself." Id. at 654. Similarly, the Court has enunciated the concept of "voluntariness" to be applied in situations where it is claimed that a particular factor denied the individual a "free choice to admit, to deny, or to refuse to answer." Id. at 654 n.9, 656–65.

[8] Ohio v. Reiner, 532 U.S. 17 (2001).

[9] Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 488 (1951) (quoting Temple v. Commonwealth, 75 Va. 892, 898 (1881)). For an application of these principles, see Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 11–14 (1964), and id. at 33 (White, Stewart JJ., dissenting). Where the government is seeking to enforce an essentially noncriminal statutory scheme through compulsory disclosure, some Justices would apparently relax the Hoffman principles. Cf. California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[10] Hoffman, 341 U.S. at 486–87.

[11] United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694, 701 (1944); Baltimore & Ohio R.R. v. ICC, 221 U.S. 612 (1911); Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 69–70, 74–75 (1906).

[12] United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694, 699–700 (1944); Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, 384–385 (1911). But the government may make no evidentiary use of the act of production in proceeding individually against the corporate

A witness has traditionally been able to claim the privilege in any proceeding whatsoever in which testimony is legally required when his answer might be used against him in that proceeding or in a future criminal proceeding or when it might be exploited to uncover other evidence against him.[13] Incrimination is not complete once guilt has been adjudicated, and hence the privilege may be asserted during the sentencing phase of trial.[14] Conversely, there is no valid claim on the ground that the information sought can be used in proceedings which are not criminal in nature,[15] and there can be no valid claim if there is no criminal prosecution[16] The Court in recent years has also applied the privilege to situations, such as police interrogation of suspects, in which there is no legal compulsion to speak.[17]

What the privilege protects against is compulsion of "testimonial" disclosures. Thus, the clause is not offended by such non-testimonial compulsions as requiring a person in custody to stand or walk in a police lineup, to speak prescribed words, to model particular clothing, or to give samples of handwriting, fingerprints, or blood.[18] A person may be compelled to produce custodian. Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988). Cf. George Campbell Painting Corp. v. Reid, 392 U.S. 286 (1968); United States v. Rylander, 460 U.S. 752 (1983) (witness who had failed to appeal production order and thus had burden in contempt proceeding to show inability to then produce records could not rely on privilege to shift this evidentiary burden).

---

[13] Thus, not only may a defendant or a witness in a criminal trial, including a juvenile proceeding, In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 42–57 (1967), claim the privilege but so may a party or a witness in a civil court proceeding, McCarthy v. Arndstein, 266 U.S. 34 (1924), a potential defendant or any other witness before a grand jury, Reina v. United States, 364 U.S. 507 (1960); Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547, 563 (1892), or a witness before a legislative inquiry, Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 195–96 (1957); Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155 (1955); Emspak v. United States, 349 U.S. 190 (1955), or before an administrative body. In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 333, 336–37, 345–46 (1957); ICC v. Brimson, 154 U.S. 447, 478–80 (1894).

[14] Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 462–63 (1981) ("We can discern no basis to distinguish between the guilt and penalty phases of respondent's capital murder trial so far as the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege is concerned"); Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999) (non-capital sentencing).

[15] Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364 (1986) (declaration that person is "sexually dangerous" under Illinois law is not a criminal proceeding); Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420, 435 n.7 (1984) (revocation of probation is not a criminal proceeding, hence "there can be no valid claim of the privilege on the ground that the information sought can be used in revocation proceedings"). In Murphy, the Court went on to explain that "a State may validly insist on answers to even incriminating questions and hence sensibly administer its probation system, as long as it recognizes that the required answers may not be used in a criminal proceeding and thus eliminates the threat of incrimination. Under such circumstances, a probationer's 'right to immunity as a result of his compelled testimony would not be at stake,' and nothing in the Federal Constitution would prevent a State from revoking probation for a refusal to answer . . . ." Id. (citations omitted).

[16] Chavez v. Martinez, 538 U.S. 760 (2003) (rejecting damages claim brought by suspect interrogated in hospital but not prosecuted).

[17] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

[18] Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 764 (1966); United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 221–23 (1967); Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245, 252 (1910). In California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424 (1971), four Justices believed that requiring any person involved in a traffic accident to stop and give his name and address did not involve testimonial compulsion and therefore the privilege was inapplicable, id. at 431–34 (Chief Justice Burger and Justices Stewart, White, and Blackmun), but Justice Harlan, id. at 434 (concurring), and Justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall, id. at 459, 464 (dissenting), disagreed. In South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. 553 (1983), the Court indicated as well that a state may compel a motorist suspected of drunk driving to submit to a blood alcohol test, and may also give the suspect a choice about whether to submit, but use his refusal to submit to the test as evidence against him. The Court rested its evidentiary ruling on the absence of coercion, preferring not to apply the sometimes difficult distinction between testimonial and physical evidence. In another case, involving roadside videotaping of a drunk driving suspect, the Court found that the slurred nature of the suspect's speech, as well as his answers to routine booking questions as to name, address, weight, height, eye color, date of birth, and current age, were not testimonial in nature. Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582 (1990). On the other hand, the suspect's answer to a request to identify the date of his sixth birthday was considered testimonial. Id. Two Justices challenged the interpretation limiting application to "testimonial" disclosures, claiming that the original understanding of the word "witness" was not limited to someone who gives testimony, but included someone who gives any kind of evidence. United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 49 (2000) (Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, concurring).

specific documents even though they contain incriminating information.[19] If, however, the existence of specific documents is not known to the government, and the act of production informs the government about the existence, custody, or authenticity of the documents, then the privilege is implicated.[20] Application of these principles resulted in a holding that the Independent Counsel could not base a prosecution on incriminating evidence identified and produced as the result of compliance with a broad subpoena for all information relating to the individual's income, employment, and professional relationships.[21]

The protection is against "compulsory" incrimination, and traditionally the Court has treated within the Clause only those compulsions which arise from legally enforceable obligations, culminating in imprisonment for refusal to testify or to produce documents.[22] The compulsion need not be imprisonment, but can also be termination of public employment[23] or disbarment of a lawyer[24] as a legal consequence of a refusal to make incriminating admissions. The degree of coercion may also prove decisive, the Court having ruled that moving a prisoner from a medium security unit to a maximum security unit was insufficient to compel him to incriminate himself in spite of the attendant loss of privileges and the harsher living conditions.[25] However, although it appears that prisoners[26] and probationers[27] have less [19] Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976). Compelling a taxpayer by subpoena to produce documents produced by his accountants from his own papers does not involve testimonial self-incrimination and is not barred by the privilege. "[T]he Fifth Amendment does not independently proscribe the compelled production of every sort of incriminating evidence but applies only when the accused is compelled to make a testimonial communication that is incriminating." Id. at 408 (emphasis by Court). Even further removed from the protection of the privilege is seizure pursuant to a search warrant of business records in the handwriting of the defendant. Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976). A court order compelling a target of a grand jury investigation to sign a consent directive authorizing foreign banks to disclose records of any and all accounts over which he had a right of withdrawal is not testimonial in nature, since the factual assertions are required of the banks and not of the target. Doe v. United States, 487 U.S. 201 (1988).

[20] In United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. 605 (1984), the Court distinguished Fisher, upholding lower courts' findings that the act of producing tax records implicates the privilege because it would compel admission that the records exist, that they were in the taxpayer's possession, and that they are authentic. Similarly, a juvenile court's order to produce a child implicates the privilege, because the act of compliance "would amount to testimony regarding [the subject's] control over and possession of [the child]." Baltimore Dep't of Social Services v. Bouknight, 493 U.S. 549, 555 (1990).

[21] United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27 (2000).

[22] E.g., Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968) (criminal penalties attached to failure to register and make incriminating admissions); Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) (contempt citation on refusal to testify). See also South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. 553 (1983) (no compulsion in introducing evidence of suspect's refusal to submit to blood alcohol test, since state could have forced suspect to take test and need not have offered him a choice); Selective Service System v. Minnesota PIRG, 468 U.S. 841 (1984) (no coercion in requirement that applicants for federal financial assistance for higher education reveal whether they have registered for draft).

[23] Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967); Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968); Uniformed Sanitation Men Ass'n v. Commissioner of Sanitation, 392 U.S. 280 (1968). See also Lefkowitz v. Turley, 414 U.S. 70 (1973), holding unconstitutional state statutes requiring the disqualification for five years of contractors doing business with the state if at any time they refused to waive immunity and answer questions respecting their transactions with the state. The state may require employees or contractors to respond to inquiries, but only if it offers them immunity sufficient to supplant the privilege against self-incrimination. See also Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801 (1977).

[24] Spevack v. Klein, 385 U.S. 511 (1967).

[25] McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24 (2002). The transfer was mandated for refusal to participate in a sexual abuse treatment program that required revelation of sexual history and admission of responsibility. The plurality declared that rehabilitation programs are permissible if the adverse consequences for non-participation are "related to the program objectives and do not constitute atypical and significant hardships in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life." 536 U.S. at 38 (opinion of Justice Anthony Kennedy). Concurring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor stated her belief that the "minor" change in living conditions seemed "very unlikely to actually compel [the prisoner] to [participate]." Id. at 51.

[26] See, in addition to McKune v. Lile, Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976) (adverse inference from inmate's silence at prison disciplinary hearing); and Ohio Adult Parole Auth. v. Woodard, 523 U.S. 272, 286 (1998) (adverse inference from inmate's silence at clemency hearing).

[27] Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984) (the possibility of revocation of probation was not so coercive as to compel a probationer to provide incriminating answers to probation officer's questions).

protection than others do, the Court has not developed a clear doctrinal explanation to identify the differences between permissible and impermissible coercion.[28]

It has long been the rule that a defendant who takes the stand on his own behalf does so voluntarily and cannot then claim the privilege to defeat cross-examination on matters reasonably related to the subject matter of his direct examination,[29] and that such a defendant may be impeached by proof of prior convictions.[30] But, in Griffin v. California,[31] the Court refused to permit prosecutorial or judicial comment to the jury upon a defendant's refusal to take the stand on his own behalf, because such comment was a "penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional privilege" and "[i]t cuts down on the privilege by making its assertion costly."[32] Prosecutors' comments violating the Griffin rule can nonetheless constitute harmless error.[33] Nor may a prosecutor impeach a defendant's trial testimony through use of the fact that upon his arrest and receipt of a Miranda warning he remained silent and did not give the police the exculpatory story he told at trial.[34] But where the defendant took the stand and testified, the Court permitted the impeachment use of his pre-arrest silence when that silence had in no way been officially encouraged, through a Miranda warning or otherwise.[35]

Further, the Court held inadmissible at the subsequent trial a defendant's testimony at a hearing to suppress evidence wrongfully seized, because use of the testimony would put the defendant to an impermissible choice between asserting his right to remain silent and invoking his right to be free of illegal searches and seizures.[36] The Court also proscribed the

---

[28] The Court in McKune v. Lile split 5-4, with no opinion of the Court.

[29] Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 597–98 (1896); Fitzpatrick v. United States, 178 U.S. 304, 314–16 (1900); Brown v. United States, 356 U.S. 148 (1958). See also Ohio Adult Parole Auth. v. Woodard, 523 U.S. 272, 286 (1998) (testimony at a clemency interview is voluntary, and cannot be compelled).

[30] Spencer v. Texas, 385 U.S. 554, 561 (1967); cf. Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948).

[31] 380 U.S. 609, 614 (1965). The result had been achieved in federal court through statutory enactment. 18 U.S.C. § 3481. See Wilson v. United States, 149 U.S. 60 (1893). In Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981), the Court held that the Self-Incrimination Clause required a state, upon defendant's request, to give a cautionary instruction to the jurors that they must disregard defendant's failure to testify and not draw any adverse inferences from it. This result, too, had been accomplished in the federal courts through statutory construction. Bruno v. United States, 308 U.S. 287 (1939). In Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333 (1978), the Court held that a court may give such an instruction, even over defendant's objection. Carter v. Kentucky was applied in James v. Kentucky, 466 U.S. 341 (1983) (request for jury "admonition" sufficient to invoke right to "instruction").

[32] Although the Griffin rule continues to apply when the prosecutor on his own initiative asks the jury to draw an adverse inference from a defendant's silence, it does not apply to a prosecutor's "fair response" to a defense counsel's allegation that the government had denied his client the opportunity to explain his actions. United States v. Robinson, 485 U.S. 25, 32 (1988).

[33] Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18 (1967); United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499 (1983).

[34] Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). Post-arrest silence, the Court stated, is inherently ambiguous, and to permit use of the silence would be unfair since the Miranda warning told the defendant he could be silent. The same result had earlier been achieved under the Court's supervisory power over federal trials in United States v. Hale, 422 U.S. 171 (1975). The same principles apply to bar a prosecutor's use of Miranda silence as evidence of an arrestee's sanity. Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986). In determining whether a state prisoner is entitled to federal habeas corpus relief because the prosecution violated due process by using his post-Miranda silence for impeachment purposes at trial, the proper standard for harmless-error review is that announced in Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 776 (1946)—whether the due process error had substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict—not the stricter "harmless beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24 (1967), applicable on direct review. Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619 (1993). See also Fry v. Pliler, 551 U.S. 112, 114 (2007) (the "substantial and injurious effect" standard is to be applied in federal habeas proceedings even "when the state appellate court failed to recognize the error and did not review it for harmlessness under the 'harmless beyond a reasonable doubt' standard set forth in Chapman v. California").

[35] Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231 (1980). Cf. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976) (prison disciplinary hearing may draw adverse inferences from inmate's assertion of privilege so long as this was not the sole basis of decision against him).

[36] Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968). The rationale of the case was subsequently limited to Fourth Amendment grounds in McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 210–13 (1971).

introduction at a second trial of the defendant's testimony at his first trial, given to rebut a confession which was subsequently held inadmissible, since the testimony was in effect "fruit of the poisonous tree" and had been "coerced" from the defendant through use of the confession.[37] Potentially most far-reaching was a holding that invalidated the penalty structure of a statute under which defendants could escape a possible death sentence by entering a guilty plea; the statute "needlessly encourage[d]" waivers of defendant's Fifth Amendment right to plead not guilty and his Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial.[38]

Although this "needless encouragement" test assessed the nature of the choice required to be made by defendants against the strength of the governmental interest in the system requiring the choice, the Court soon developed another test stressing the voluntariness of the choice. A guilty plea entered by a defendant who correctly understands the consequences of the plea is voluntary unless coerced or obtained under false pretenses; moreover, there is no impermissible coercion where the defendant has the effective assistance of counsel.[39] The Court in an opinion by Justice John Marshall Harlan then formulated still another test in holding that a defendant in a capital case in which the jury in one process decides both guilt and sentence could be put to a choice between remaining silent on guilt or admitting guilt and being able to put on evidence designed to mitigate the possible sentence. The pressure to take the stand in response to the sentencing issue, said the Court, was not so great as to impair the policies underlying the Self-Incrimination Clause, policies described in this instance as proscription of coercion and of cruelty in putting the defendant to an undeniably "hard" choice.[40] Similarly, the Court held that requiring a defendant to give notice to the prosecution before trial of his intention to rely on an alibi defense and to give the names and addresses of witnesses who will support it does not violate the Clause.[41] Nor does it violate a defendant's self-incrimination privilege to create a presumption upon the establishment of certain basic facts from which the jury may infer the defendant's guilt unless he rebuts the presumption.[42]

---

[37] Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968).

[38] Jackson v. United States, 390 U.S. 570, 583 (1968).

[39] Parker v. North Carolina, 397 U.S. 790 (1970); Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970); McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759 (1970). Parker and Brady entered guilty pleas to avoid the death penalty when it became clear that the prosecution had solid evidence of their guilt; Richardson pled guilty because of his fear that an allegedly coerced confession would be introduced into evidence.

[40] McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 210–20 (1971). When the Court subsequently required bifurcated trials in capital cases, it was on the basis of the Eighth Amendment, and represented no withdrawal from the position described here. Cf. Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212 (1978); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978).

[41] Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 80–86 (1970). The compulsion of choice, Justice Byron White argued for the Court, proceeded from the strength of the state's case and not from the disclosure requirement. That is, the rule did not affect whether or not the defendant chose to make an alibi defense and to call witnesses, but merely required him to accelerate the timing. It appears, however, that in Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), the Court used the "needless encouragement" test in striking down a state rule requiring the defendant to testify before any other defense witness or to forfeit the right to testify at all. In the Court's view, this impermissibly burdened the defendant's choice whether to testify or not. Another prosecution discovery effort was approved in United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 233 (1975), in which a defense investigator's notes of interviews with prosecution witnesses were ordered disclosed to the prosecutor for use in cross-examination of the investigator. The Court discerned no compulsion upon defendant to incriminate himself.

[42] "The same situation might present itself if there were no statutory presumption and a prima facie case of concealment with knowledge of unlawful importation were made by the evidence. The necessity of an explanation by the accused would be quite as compelling in that case as in this; but the constraint upon him to give testimony would arise there, as it arises here, simply from the force of circumstances and not from any form of compulsion forbidden by the Constitution." Yee Hem v. United States, 268 U.S. 178, 185 (1925), quoted with approval in Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398, 418 n.35 (1970). Justices Black and Douglas dissented on self-incrimination grounds. Id. at 425. See also United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 71, 74 (1965) (dissenting opinions). For due process limitations on such presumptions, see discussion under the Fourteenth Amendment, Amdt14.S1.5.4.9 Burdens of Proof and Presumptions.

The obligation to testify is not relieved by this Clause, if, regardless of whether incriminating answers are given, a prosecution is precluded,[43] or if the result of the answers is not incrimination but rather harm to reputation or exposure to infamy or disgrace.[44] The Clause does not prevent a public employer from discharging an employee who, in an investigation specifically and narrowly directed at the performance of the employee's official duties, refuses to cooperate and to provide the employer with the desired information on grounds of self-incrimination.[45] But it is unclear under what other circumstances a public employer may discharge an employee who has claimed his privilege before another investigating agency.[46]

Finally, the rules established by the Clause and the judicial interpretations apply against the states to the same degree that they apply against the Federal Government,[47] and neither sovereign can compel discriminatory admissions that would incriminate the person in the other jurisdiction.[48] There is no "cooperative internationalism" that parallels the cooperative federalism and cooperative prosecution on which application against states is premised, and consequently concern with foreign prosecution is beyond the scope of the Self-Incrimination Clause.[49]

---

[43] Prosecution may be precluded by tender of immunity (see next topic for discussion of immunity), or by pardon, Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 598–99 (1896). The effect of a mere tender of pardon by the President remains uncertain. Cf. Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79 (1915) (acceptance necessary, and self-incrimination is possible in absence of acceptance); Biddle v. Perovich, 274 U.S. 480 (1927) (acceptance not necessary to validate commutation of death sentence to life imprisonment).

[44] Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 605–06 (1896); Ullmann v. United States, 350 U.S. 422, 430–31 (1956). Minorities in both cases had contended for a broader rule. Walker, 161 U.S. at 631 (Field, J., dissenting); Ullmann, 350 U.S. at 454 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[45] Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273, 278 (1968). Testimony compelled under such circumstances is, even in the absence of statutory immunity, barred from use in a subsequent criminal trial by force of the Fifth Amendment itself. Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967). However, unlike public employees, persons subject to professional licensing by government appear to be able to assert their privilege and retain their licenses. Cf. Spevack v. Klein, 385 U.S. 511 (1967) (lawyer may not be disbarred solely because he refused on self-incrimination grounds to testify at a disciplinary proceeding), approved in Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. at 277–78. Justices Harlan, Clark, Stewart, and White dissented generally. 385 U.S. 500, 520, 530.

[46] See Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U.S. 551 (1956), limited by Lerner v. Casey, 357 U.S. 468 (1958), and Nelson v. County of Los Angeles, 362 U.S. 1 (1960), which were in turn apparently limited by Garrity and Gardner.

[47] Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) (overruling Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908), and Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)).

[48] Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52 (1964), (overruling United States v. Murdock, 284 U.S. 141 (1931) (Federal Government could compel a witness to give testimony that might incriminate him under state law), Knapp v. Schweitzer, 357 U.S. 371 (1958) (state may compel a witness to give testimony that might incriminate him under federal law), and Feldman v. United States, 322 U.S. 487 (1944) (testimony compelled by a state may be introduced into evidence in the federal courts)). Murphy held that a state could compel testimony under a grant of immunity but that, because the state could not extend the immunity to federal courts, the Supreme Court would not permit the introduction of evidence into federal courts that had been compelled by a state or that had been discovered because of state compelled testimony. The result was apparently a constitutionally compelled one arising from the Fifth Amendment itself, 378 U.S. at 75–80, rather than one taken pursuant to the Court's supervisory power as Justice John Marshall Harlan would have preferred. Id. at 80 (concurring). Congress has power to confer immunity in state courts as well as in federal in order to elicit information, Adams v. Maryland, 347 U.S. 179 (1954), but whether Congress must do so or whether the immunity would be conferred simply through the act of compelling the testimony Murphy did not say.

Whether testimony could be compelled by either the Federal Government or a state that could incriminate a witness in a foreign jurisdiction is unsettled. See Zicarelli v. New Jersey State Comm'n of Investigation, 406 U.S. 472, 480, 481 (1972) (reserving question), but an affirmative answer seems unlikely. Cf. Murphy, 378 U.S. at 58–63, 77.

[49] United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666 (1998).

Amdt5.4.4 Required Records Doctrine

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Although the privilege is applicable to an individual's papers and effects,[1] it does not extend to corporate persons; hence corporate records, as has been noted, are subject to compelled production.[2] In fact, however, the Court has greatly narrowed the protection afforded in this area to natural persons by developing the "required records" doctrine. That is, it has held "that the privilege which exists as to private papers cannot be maintained in relation to 'records required by law to be kept in order that there may be suitable information of transactions which are the appropriate subjects of governmental regulation and the enforcement of restrictions validly established.'"[3] This exception developed out of, as Justice Felix Frankfurter showed in dissent, the rule that documents which are part of the official records of government are wholly outside the scope of the privilege; public records are the property of government and are always accessible to inspection. Because government requires certain records to be kept to facilitate the regulation of the business being conducted, so the reasoning goes, the records become public at least to the degree that government could always scrutinize them without hindrance from the record-keeper. "If records merely because required to be kept by law ipso facto become public records, we are indeed living in glass houses. Virtually every major public law enactment—to say nothing of State and local legislation—has record-keeping provisions. In addition to record-keeping requirements, is the network of provisions for filing reports. Exhaustive efforts would be needed to track down all the statutory authority, let alone the administrative regulations, for record-keeping and reporting requirements. Unquestionably they are enormous in volume."[4]

"It may be assumed at the outset that there are limits which the government cannot constitutionally exceed in requiring the keeping of records which may be inspected by an administrative agency and may be used in prosecuting statutory violations committed by the record-keeper himself."[5] But the only limit that the Court suggested in Shapiro was that there must be "a sufficient relation between the activity sought to be regulated and the public concern so that the Government can constitutionally regulate or forbid the basic activity concerned, and can constitutionally require the keeping of particular records, subject to inspection by the Administrator."[6] That there are limits established by the Self-Incrimination

---

[1] Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886). But see Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976).

[2] See discussion under Amdt4.7.2 Adoption of Exclusionary Rule.

[3] Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1, 33 (1948) (quoting Davis v. United States, 328 U.S. 582, 589–90 (1946), which quoted Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, 380 (1911)). Dicta in Wilson is the source of the required-records doctrine, the holding of the case being the familiar one that a corporate officer cannot claim the privilege against self-incrimination to refuse to surrender corporate records in his custody. Cf. Heike v. United States, 227 U.S. 131 (1913). Davis was a search and seizure case and dealt with gasoline ration coupons which were government property even though in private possession. See Shapiro, 335 U.S. at 36, 56–70 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

[4] 335 U.S. at 51.

[5] 335 U.S. at 32.

[6] 335 U.S. at 32.

Clause itself rather than by a subject matter jurisdiction test is evident in the Court's consideration of reporting and disclosure requirements implicating but not directly involving the required-records doctrine.

Amdt5.4.5 Immunity

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Under the Fifth Amendment, the government cannot compel a person to be "a witness against himself . . . .," although a person may waive the privilege against self-incrimination by declining to assert it, specifically disclaiming it, or testifying on the same matters prior to asserting the privilege.[1] In addition, Congress has passed immunity statutes, which allow "the person presiding over the proceeding" to compel a witness, who has asserted his or her privilege against self-incrimination, to testify, provided that "no testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information) may be used against the witness in any criminal case, except a prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order."[2]

As the Supreme Court has recognized immunity statutes "seek a rational accommodation between the imperatives of the privilege [of self-incrimination] and the legitimate demands of government to compel citizens to testify."[3] Parliament appears to have enacted the first immunity statute in 1710,[4] which, in turn, was widely copied in the colonies. Congress enacted the first federal immunity statute in 1857, providing for immunization of any person who testified before a congressional committee from prosecution for any matter "touching which" he had testified.[5]

The Supreme Court's decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock soon rendered Congress's immunity statute unenforceable.[6] In Counselman, the Court held that an analogous limited-immunity statute was unconstitutional because it did not confer an immunity coextensive with the privilege it replaced. The Court's reasoning in Counselman was ambiguous; it identified two faults in the statute. First, the statute did not proscribe

---

[1] See Amdt5.4.3 General Protections Against Self-Incrimination Doctrine and Practice.

[2] 18 U.S.C. § 6002. See also 18 U.S.C. § 6003 (providing specifically for "any individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a court of the United States or a grand jury of the United States . . . .").

[3] Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 445–46 (1972). The Kastigar Court further noted that "The existence of these [immunity] statutes reflects the importance of testimony, and the fact that many offenses are of such a character that the only persons capable of giving useful testimony are those implicated in the crime." Id. The Supreme Court has held that the Fifth Amendment precludes the use as criminal evidence of compelled admissions, Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967), but this case and dicta in others is unreconciled with the cases that find that one may "waive" though inadvertently the privilege and be required to testify and incriminate oneself. Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367 (1951).

[4] 9 Anne, c. 14, 3–4 (1710). See Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 445 n.13 (1972).

[5] Ch. 19, 11 Stat. 155 (1857). There was an exception for perjury committed while testifying before Congress.

[6] 142 U.S. 547 (1892). The statute struck down was ch. 13, 15 Stat. 37 (1868).

"derivative" evidence.[7] Second, it prohibited only future use of the compelled testimony.[8] The latter language accentuated a division between adherents of "transactional" immunity and of "use" immunity which has continued to the present.[9]

Following Counselman, Congress enacted a statute that required transactional immunity in exchange for compelled testimony.[10] The Court sustained this law in Brown v. Walker.[11] In 1956, the Court broadly reaffirmed Walker.[12] Because the immunity acts passed after Walker were generally transactional immunity statutes,[13] the question of the constitutional sufficiency of use immunity did not arise. The dicta in cases dealing with immunity, the Court continued to assert the necessity of transactional immunity.[14]

The Court's incorporation of the Self-Incrimination Clause against the states in 1964 raised new considerations. In particular, state officials lacked the power to confer immunity from federal prosecution.[15] As a consequence, concerns arose that if states could not compel testimony because that they lacked authority to immunize a witness in a subsequent "foreign" prosecution, their law-enforcement efforts could suffer. To avoid this outcome, the Court emphasized the "use" restriction rationale of Counselman and announced that as a "constitutional rule, a state witness could not be compelled to incriminate himself under

---

[7] Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547, 564 (1892). See also id. at 586.

[8] 142 U.S. at 585–86.

[9] "Transactional" immunity means that once a witness has been compelled to testify about an offense, he may never be prosecuted for that offense, no matter how much independent evidence might come to light; "use" immunity means that no testimony compelled to be given and no evidence derived from or obtained because of the compelled testimony may be used if the person is subsequently prosecuted on independent evidence for the offense.

[10] Ch. 83, 27 Stat. 443 (1893).

[11] Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591 (1896). The majority reasoned that one was excused from testifying only if there could be legal detriment flowing from his act of testifying. If a statute of limitations had run out or if a pardon had been issued with regard to a particular offense, a witness could not claim the privilege and refuse to testify, no matter how much other detriment, such as loss of reputation, would attach to his admissions. Therefore, because the statute acted as a pardon or amnesty and relieved the witness of all legal detriment, he must testify. The four dissenters contended essentially that the privilege protected against being compelled to incriminate oneself regardless of any subsequent prosecutorial effort, id. at 610, and that a witness was protected against infamy and disparagement as much as prosecution. Id. at 628.

[12] "[The] sole concern [of the privilege] is . . . with the danger to a witness forced to give testimony leading to the infliction of 'penalties affixed to the criminal acts'. . . . Immunity displaces the danger. Once the reason for the privilege ceases, the privilege ceases." 350 U.S. at 438–39. The internal quotation is from Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 634 (1886). E.g., Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 67 (1906); United States v. Monia, 317 U.S. 424, 425, 428 (1943); Smith v. United States, 337 U.S. 137, 141, 146 (1949); United States v. Murdock, 284 U.S. 141, 149 (1931); Adams v. Maryland, 347 U.S. 179, 182 (1954). In Ullmann v. United States, 350 U.S. 422, 436–37 (1956), Justice Felix Frankfurter described the holding of Counselman as relating to the absence of a prohibition on the use of derivative evidence.

[13] Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 457–58 (1972); Piccirillo v. New York, 400 U.S. 548, 571 (1971) (Brennan, J., dissenting). The exception was an immunity provision of the bankruptcy laws, 30 Stat. 548 (1898), 11 U.S.C. § 25(a)(10), repealed by 84 Stat. 931 (1970). The right of a bankrupt to insist on his privilege against self-incrimination as against this statute was recognized in McCarthy v. Arndstein, 266 U.S. 34, 42 (1924), "because the present statute fails to afford complete immunity from a prosecution." The statute also failed to prohibit the use of derivative evidence. Arndstein v. McCarthy, 254 U.S. 71 (1920).

[14] E.g., Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 67 (1906); United States v. Monia, 317 U.S. 424, 425, 428 (1943); Smith v. United States, 337 U.S. 137, 141, 146 (1949); United States v. Murdock, 284 U.S. 141, 149 (1931); Adams v. Maryland, 347 U.S. 179, 182 (1954). In Ullmann v. United States, 350 U.S. 422, 436–37 (1956), Justice Frankfurter described the holding of Counselman as relating to the absence of a prohibition on the use of derivative evidence Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52, 77–99 (1964). Concurring, Justices White and Stewart argued at length in support of the constitutional sufficiency of use immunity and the lack of a constitutional requirement of transactional immunity. Id. at 92. See also Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968); Uniformed Sanitation Men Ass'n v. Commissioner of Sanitation, 392 U.S. 280 (1968); Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967), recognizing the propriety of compelling testimony with a use restriction attached.

[15] Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964), extended the clause to the states. That Congress could immunize a federal witness from state prosecution and extend use immunity to state courts was held in Adams v. Maryland, 347 U.S. 179 (1954), and had been recognized in Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591 (1896).

federal law unless federal authorities were precluded from using either his testimony or evidence derived from it."[16] After this decision, Congress enacted a statute replacing all prior immunity statutes and adopting a use-immunity restriction only.[17] The Supreme Court upheld this statute in Kastigar v. United States.[18]

Amdt5.4.6 Withdrawal of Government Benefits

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The line of cases begins with United States v. Sullivan,[1] in which a unanimous Court held that the Fifth Amendment did not privilege a bootlegger in not filing an income tax return because the filing would have disclosed the illegality in which he was engaged. "It would be an extreme if not an extravagant application of the Fifth Amendment to say that it authorized a man to refuse to state the amount of his income because it had been made in crime," Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes stated for the Court.[2] However, "[i]f the form of return provided called for answers that the defendant was privileged from making he could have raised the objection in the return . . . ."[3] Using its taxing power to reach gambling activities over which it might otherwise not have had jurisdiction,[4] Congress enacted a complicated statute imposing an annual occupational tax on gamblers and an excise tax on all their wages, and coupled the tax with an annual registration requirement under which each gambler must file with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) a declaration of his business with identification of his place of business and his employees and agents, filings which were made available to state and local law enforcement agencies. These requirements were upheld by the Court against self-incrimination challenges on the three grounds that (1) the privilege did not excuse a [16] Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52, 77–99 (1964). Concurring, Justices White and Stewart argued at length in support of the constitutional sufficiency of use immunity and the lack of a constitutional requirement of transactional immunity. Id. at 92. See also Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968); Uniformed Sanitation Men Ass'n v. Commissioner of Sanitation, 392 U.S. 280 (1968); Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967), recognizing the propriety of compelling testimony with a use restriction attached.

[17] Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, Pub. L. No. 91-452, § 201(a), 84 Stat. 922, 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002–6003. Justice Department officials have the authority under the Act to decide whether to seek immunity, and courts will not apply "constructive" use immunity absent compliance with the statute's procedures. United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. 605 (1984).

[18] 406 U.S. 441 (1972). A similar state statute was sustained in Zicarelli v. New Jersey State Comm'n of Investigation, 406 U.S. 472 (1972).

[1] 274 U.S. 259, 263, 264 (1927). Sullivan was reaffirmed in Garner v. United States, 424 U.S. 648 (1976), holding that a taxpayer's privilege against self-incrimination was not violated when he failed to claim his privilege on his tax returns, and instead gave incriminating information leading to conviction. One must assert one's privilege to alert the government to the possibility that it is seeking to obtain incriminating material. It is not coercion forbidden by the clause that upon a claim of the privilege the government could seek an indictment for failure to file, since a valid claim of privilege cannot be the basis of a conviction. The taxpayer was not entitled to a judicial ruling on the validity of his claim and an opportunity to reconsider if the ruling went against him, regardless of whether a good-faith erroneous assertion of the privilege could subject him to prosecution, a question not resolved.

[2] 274 U.S. at 263–64.

[3] 274 U.S. at 263.

[4] The expansion of the commerce power would now obviate reliance on the taxing power.

complete failure to file, (2) because the threshold decision to gamble was voluntary, the required disclosures were not compulsory, and (3) because registration required disclosure only of prospective conduct, the privilege, limited to past or present acts, did not apply.[5]

Constitutional limitations appeared, however, in Albertson v. SACB,[6] which struck down under the Self-Incrimination Clause an order pursuant to statute requiring registration by individual members of the Communist Party or associated organizations. "In Sullivan the questions in the income tax return were neutral on their face and directed at the public at large, but here they are directed at a highly selective group inherently suspect of criminal activities. Petitioners' claims are not asserted in an essentially noncriminal and regulatory area of inquiry, but against an inquiry in an area permeated with criminal statutes, where response to any of the form's questions in context might involve the petitioners in the admission of a crucial element of a crime."[7]

The gambling tax reporting scheme was next struck down by the Court.[8] Because of the pervasiveness of state laws prohibiting gambling, said Justice John Marshall Harlan for the Court, "the obligations to register and to pay the occupational tax created for petitioner 'real and appreciable,' and not merely 'imaginary and unsubstantial,' hazards of self-incrimination."[9] Overruling Kahriger and Lewis, the Court rejected its earlier rationales. Registering per se would have exposed a gambler to dangers of state prosecution, so Sullivan did not apply.[10] Any contention that the voluntary engagement in gambling "waived" the self-incrimination claim, because there is "no constitutional right to gamble," would nullify the privilege.[11] And the privilege was not governed by a "rigid chronological distinction" so that it protected only past or present conduct, but also reached future self-incrimination the danger of which is not speculative and insubstantial.[12] Significantly, then, Justice Harlan turned to distinguishing the statutory requirements here from the "required records" doctrine of [5] United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953); Lewis v. United States, 348 U.S. 419 (1955).

[6] 382 U.S. 70 (1965).

[7] 382 U.S. at 79. The decision was unanimous, with Justice Byron White not participating. The same issue had been held not ripe for adjudication in Communist Party v. SACB, 367 U.S. 1, 105–10 (1961).

[8] Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968) (occupational tax); Grosso v. United States, 390 U.S. 62 (1968) (wagering excise tax). In Haynes v. United States, 390 U.S. 85 (1968), the Court struck down a requirement that one register a firearm that it was illegal to possess. The following Term on the same grounds the Court voided a statute prohibiting the possession of marijuana without having paid a transfer tax and registering. Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969); United States v. Covington, 395 U.S. 57 (1969). However, a statute was upheld which prohibited the sale of narcotics to a person who did not have a written order on a prescribed form, since the requirement caused the self-incrimination of the buyer but not the seller, the Court viewing the statute as actually a flat proscription on sale rather than a regulatory measure. Minor v. United States, 396 U.S. 87 (1969). The congressional response was reenactment of the requirements, coupled with use immunity. United States v. Freed, 401 U.S. 601 (1971).

[9] Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39, 48 (1968).

[10] "Every element of these requirements would have served to incriminate petitioners; to have required him to present his claim to Treasury officers would have obliged him 'to prove guilt to avoid admitting it.'" 390 U.S. at 50.

[11] "The question is not whether petitioner holds a 'right' to violate state law, but whether, having done so, he may be compelled to give evidence against himself. The constitutional privilege was intended to shield the guilty and imprudent as well as the innocent and foresighted; if such an inference of antecedent choice were alone enough to abrogate the privilege's protection, it would be excluded from the situations in which it has historically been guaranteed, and withheld from those who most require it." 390 U.S. at 51. But cf. California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424, 434 (1971) (plurality opinion), in which it is suggested that because there is no "right" to leave the scene of an accident a requirement that a person involved in an accident stop and identify himself does not violate the Self-Incrimination Clause.

[12] Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39, 52–54 (1968). "The central standard for the privilege's application has been whether the claimant is confronted by substantial and 'real,' and not merely trifling or imaginary, hazards of incrimination . . . . This principle does not permit the rigid chronological distinctions adopted in Kahriger and Lewis. We see no reason to suppose that the force of the constitutional prohibition is diminished merely because confession of a guilty purpose precedes the act which it is subsequently employed to evidence." Id. at 53–54. Cf. United States v. Freed, 401 U.S. 601, 605–07 (1971).

Shapiro. "First, petitioner . . . was not . . . obliged to keep and preserve records 'of the same kind as he has customarily kept'; he was required simply to provide information, unrelated to any records which he may have maintained, about his wagering activities. This requirement is not significantly different from a demand that he provide oral testimony . . . . Second, whatever 'public aspects' there were to the records at issue in Shapiro, there are none to the information demanded from Marchetti. The Government's anxiety to obtain information known to a private individual does not without more render that information public; if it did, no room would remain for the application of the constitutional privilege. Nor does it stamp information with a public character that the government has formalized its demands in the attire of a statute; if this alone were sufficient, the constitutional privilege could be entirely abrogated by any Act of Congress. Third, the requirements at issue in Shapiro were imposed in 'an essentially non-criminal and regulatory area of inquiry' while those here are directed to a 'selective group inherently suspect of criminal activities.' . . . The United States' principal interest is evidently the collection of revenue, and not the punishment of gamblers, . . . but the characteristics of the activities about which information is sought, and the composition of the groups to which inquiries are made, readily distinguish this situation from that in Shapiro."[13]

Most recent in this line of cases is California v. Byers,[14] which indicates that the Court has yet to settle on an ascertainable standard for judging self-incrimination claims in cases where government is asserting an interest other than criminal law enforcement. Byers sustained the constitutionality of a statute which required the driver of any automobile involved in an accident to stop and give his name and address. The state court had held that a driver who reasonably believed that compliance with the statute would result in self-incrimination could refuse to comply. A plurality of the Court, however, determined that Sullivan and Shapiro applied and not the Albertson-Marchetti line of cases, because the purpose of the statute was to promote the satisfaction of civil liabilities resulting from automobile accidents and not criminal prosecutions, and because the statute was directed to all drivers and not to a group which was either "highly selective" or "inherently suspect of criminal activities." The combination of a noncriminal motive with the general character of the requirement made too slight for reliance the possibility of incrimination.[15] Justice Harlan concurred to make up the majority on the disposition of the case, disagreeing with the plurality's conclusion that the stop and identification requirement did not compel incrimination.[16] However, the Justice thought that, where there is no governmental purpose to enforce a criminal law and instead government is pursuing other legitimate regulatory interests, it is permissible to apply a balancing test between the government's interest and the individual's interest. When he balanced the interests protected by the Amendment—protection of privacy and maintenance of an accusatorial system—with the noncriminal purpose, the necessity for self-reporting as a means of securing information, and the nature of the disclosures required, Justice Harlan

[13] Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39, 57 (1968).

[14] 402 U.S. 424 (1971).

[15] 402 U.S. at 427–31 (Chief Justice Burger and Justices Stewart, White, and Blackmun).

[16] "The California Supreme Court was surely correct in considering that the decisions of this Court have made it clear that invocation of the privilege is not limited to situations where the purpose of the inquiry is to get an incriminating answer. . . . [I]t must be recognized that a reading of our more recent cases . . . suggests the conclusion that the applicability of the privilege depends exclusively on a determination that, from the individual's point of view, there are 'real' and not 'imaginary' risks of self-incrimination in yielding to state compulsion. Thus, Marchetti and Grosso . . . start from an assumption of a non-prosecutorial governmental purpose in the decision to tax gambling revenue; those cases go on to apply what in another context I have called the 'real danger v. imaginary possibility standard' . . . . A judicial tribunal whose position with respect to the elaboration of constitutional doctrine is subordinate to that of this Court certainly cannot be faulted for reading these opinions as indicating that the 'inherently-suspect-class' factor is relevant only as an indicium of genuine incriminating risk as assessed from the individual's point of view." 402 U.S. at 437–38.

voted to sustain the statute.[17] Byers was applied in Baltimore Dep't of Social Services v. Bouknight[18] to uphold a juvenile court's order that the mother of a child under the court's supervision produce the child. Although in this case the mother was suspected of having abused or murdered her child, the order was justified out of concern for the child's safety—a "compelling reason[ ] unrelated to criminal law enforcement."[19] Moreover, because the mother had custody of her previously abused child only as a result of the juvenile court's order, the Court analogized to the required records cases to conclude that the mother had submitted to the requirements of the civil regulatory regime as the child's "custodian."

Amdt5.4.7 Custodial Interrogation

Amdt5.4.7.1 Early Doctrine and Custodial Interrogation

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

By the latter part of the eighteenth century English and early American courts had developed a rule that coerced confessions were potentially excludable from admission at trial because they were testimonially untrustworthy.[1] The Supreme Court at times continued to ground exclusion of involuntary confessions on this common law foundation of unreliability without any mention of the constitutional bar against self-incrimination. Consider this dictum from an 1884 opinion: "[V]oluntary confession of guilt is among the most effectual proofs in the law, . . . [b]ut the presumption upon which weight is given to such evidence, namely, that one who is innocent will not imperil his safety or prejudice his interests by an untrue statement, ceases when the confession appears to have been made either in consequence of inducements of a temporal nature, held out by one in authority, touching the charge preferred, or because of a threat or promise by or in the presence of such person, which, operating upon the fears or hopes of the accused, in reference to the charge, deprives him of that freedom of will or self-control essential to make his confession voluntary within the meaning of the law."[2] Subsequent cases followed essentially the same line of thought.[3]

Then, language in the 1897 case of Bram v. United States opened the door to eventually extending the doctrinal basis for analyzing the admissibility of a confession beyond the [17] 402 U.S. at 448–58. The four dissenters argued that it was unquestionable that Byers would have faced real risks of self-incrimination by compliance with the statute and that this risk was sufficient to invoke the privilege. Id. at 459, 464 (Justices Black, Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall).

[18] 493 U.S. 549 (1990).

[19] 493 U.S. at 561. By the same token, the Court concluded that the targeted group—persons who care for children pursuant to a juvenile court's custody order—is not a group "inherently suspect of criminal activities" in the Albertson-Marchetti sense.

[1] 3 J. Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence § 823 (3d ed. 1940); Developments in the Law—Confessions, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 935, 954–59 (1966).

[2] Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, 584–85 (1884). Utah at this time was a territory and subject to direct federal judicial supervision.

[3] Pierce v. United States, 160 U.S. 335 (1896); Sparf and Hansen v. United States, 156 U.S. 51 (1895). In Wilson v. United States, 162 U.S. 613 (1896), failure to provide counsel or to warn the suspect of his right to remain silent was held to have no effect on the admissibility of a confession but was only to be considered in assessing its credibility.

common-law test that focused on voluntariness as an indicator of the confession's trustworthiness as evidence."In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, commanding that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.'"[4] However, though this approach[5] and the case itself were subsequently approved in several cases,[6] the Court would still hold in 1912 that a confession should not be excluded merely because the authorities had not warned a suspect of his right to remain silent,[7] and more than once later opinions could doubt "whether involuntary confessions are excluded from federal criminal trials on the ground of a violation of the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination, or from a rule that forced confessions are untrustworthy. . . ."[8] One reason for this was that the Self-Incrimination Clause had not yet been made applicable to the states, thereby requiring that the admissibility of confessions in state courts be determined under due process standards developed from common-law principles. It was only after the Court extended the Self-Incrimination Clause to the states that a divided Court reaffirmed and extended the 1897 Bram ruling and imposed on both federal and state trial courts new rules for admitting or excluding confessions and other admissions made to police during custodial interrogation.[9]

Amdt5.4.7.2 Pre-Miranda Self-Incrimination Doctrine (1940s to 1960s)

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

From the 1940s to the 1960s, the Supreme Court decided a series of cases that explained when a confession's admission in a criminal trial violates the Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination doctrine. In its 1943 decision in McNabb v. United States,[1] the Supreme Court held that confessions obtained after an "unnecessary delay" in presenting a suspect for [4] Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542 (1897).

[5] Ziang Sun Wan v. United States, 266 U.S. 1, 14–15 (1924). This case first held that the circumstances of detention and interrogation were relevant and perhaps controlling on the question of admissibility of a confession.

[6] Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 (1921); Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303, 313 (1912); Shotwell Mfg. Co. v. United States, 371 U.S. 342, 347 (1963).

[7] Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303 (1912).

[8] United States v. Carignan, 342 U.S. 36, 41 (1951). See also McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 346 (1943); Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, 285 (1936); Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 191 n.35 (1953).

[9] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). According to Wigmore, "there never was any historical connection . . . between the constitutional [self-incrimination] clause and the [common law] confession-doctrine," 3 J. Wigmore, A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence § 823, at 250 n.5 (3d ed. 1940); see also vol. 8 id. at § 2266 (McNaughton rev. 1961). It appears that while the two rules did develop separately—the bar against self-incrimination deriving primarily from notions of liberty and fairness, proscriptions against involuntary confessions deriving primarily from notions of reliability — they did stem from some of the same considerations, and, in fact, the confession rule may be considered in important respects to be an off-shoot of the privilege against self-incrimination. See L. Levy, Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right against Self-Incrimination 325–32, 495 n.43 (1968). See also Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 581–84, especially 583 n.25 (1961) (Justice Frankfurter announcing judgment of the Court).

[1] 318 U.S. 332 (1943). See also Anderson v. United States, 318 U.S. 350 (1943).

arraignment after arrest could not be admitted in criminal trials.[2] This rule, developed pursuant to the Court's supervisory power over the lower federal courts[3] and hence not applicable to the states,[4] was designed to implement guarantees that the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides to defendants.[5] The rule was informed by concern over incommunicado interrogation and coerced confessions.[6] Although the Court never specified a minimum time after which delay in presenting a suspect for arraignment could invalidate a confession, Congress in 1968 legislated a six-hour period for interrogation following arrest before the suspect must be presented.[7]

Supreme Court cases from this time period addressed when a confession would become inadmissible because it had been obtained through coercive interrogation tactics. Many of the early cases disclosed clear instances of coercion that the Court determined had produced involuntary confessions. For example, the Court had little difficulty concluding that physical torture was coercive.[8] Moreover, in its first confession case arising from a state court proceeding, the Supreme Court set aside a conviction based solely on confessions obtained through repeated whippings of the defendant with ropes and studded belts.[9] However, the Court also condemned other overtly coercive tactics that did not amount to physical torture. For example, in Chambers v. Florida,[10] the Court held that five days of prolonged questioning and incommunicado detention made subsequent confessions involuntary.

Although the Court did not hold that prolonged questioning by itself made a resulting confession involuntary,[11] it increasingly found coercion present even in intermittent questioning over a period of days of incommunicado detention.[12] In Ashcraft v. Tennessee,[13] the

---

[2] In Upshaw v. United States, 335 U.S. 410 (1948), the Court held that a confession obtained after a thirty-hour delay was inadmissible per se. Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), held that any confession obtained during an unnecessary delay in arraignment was inadmissible. A confession obtained during a lawful delay before arraignment was admissible. United States v. Mitchell, 322 U.S. 65 (1944).

[3] McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 340 (1943); Upshaw v. United States, 335 U.S. 410, 414 n.2 (1948). Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137, 145 n.12 (1953), indicated that because the Court had no supervisory power over courts-martial, the rule did not apply in military courts.

[4] Gallegos v. Nebraska, 342 U.S. 55, 60, 63–64, 71–73 (1951); Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 187–88 (1953); Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 599–602 (1961).

[5] Rule 5(a) requiring prompt arraignment was promulgated in 1946, but the Court in McNabb relied on predecessor statutes, some of which required prompt arraignment. Cf. Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 451–54 (1957). Rule 5(b) requires that the magistrate at arraignment must inform the suspect of the charge against him; must warn him that what he says may be used against him; must tell him of his right to counsel and his right to remain silent; and must also provide for the terms of bail.

[6] McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 343 (1943); Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 452–53 (1957).

[7] The provision was part of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 82 Stat. 210, 18 U.S.C. § 3501(c).

[8] Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936).

[9] Id. The Brown Court stated: "[T]he question of the right of the State to withdraw the privilege against self-incrimination is not here involved. The compulsion to which the quoted statements refer is that of the processes of justice by which the accused may be called as a witness and required to testify. Compulsion by torture to a confession is a different matter . . . . It would be difficult to conceive of methods more revolting to the sense of justice than those taken to procure the confessions of these petitioners, and the use of the confessions thus obtained as the basis for conviction and sentence was a clear denial of due process." Id. at 285, 286.

[10] 309 U.S. 227 (1940)

[11] Lisenba v. California, 314 U.S. 219 (1941).

[12] Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49 (1949) (suspect held incommunicado without arraignment for seven days without being advised of his rights in solitary confinement in a cell with no place to sleep but the floor and subject to questioning each day except Sunday by relays of police officers for periods ranging in duration from three to nine-and-one-half hours); Turner v. Pennsylvania, 338 U.S. 62 (1949) (suspect held on suspicion for five days without arraignment and without being advised of his rights and subject to questioning by relays of officers for periods briefer than in Watts during both days and nights); Harris v. South Carolina, 338 U.S. 68 (1949) (suspect in murder case arrested in Tennessee on theft warrant, taken to South Carolina, held incommunicado, and subject to questioning for

Court held that a confession was inadmissible when it was obtained after almost 36 hours of continuous questioning under powerful electric lights by multiple officers, experienced investigators, and highly trained lawyers. Similarly, Ward v. Texas voided a conviction based on a confession obtained after three days of questioning during which the defendant was driven from county to county and told falsely of a danger of lynching.[14] In Stein v. New York,[15] however, the Court affirmed convictions of experienced criminals who had confessed after twelve hours of intermittent questioning over a period of 32 hours of incommunicado detention. The majority stressed that the correct approach was to balance "the circumstances of pressure against the power of resistance of the person confessing. What would be overpowering to the weak of will or mind might be utterly ineffective against an experienced criminal."[16]

In resolving cases involving confessions during interrogation, the Court attempted by considering the "totality of the circumstances" to determine whether a confession was "voluntary" and admissible or "coerced" and inadmissible. The Court attempted to balance law enforcement's need to question suspects against concerns about undue coercion.[17] Although the Court has often focused on the nature of the coercion without regard to the individual characteristics of the suspect,[18] the Court has occasionally determined that some suspects are susceptible to even mild coercion because of their age or intelligence.[19] In some cases, a single factor indicated that the confession was involuntary.[20] However, in other cases, the Court recited a number of contributing factors without ranking any factor above the others, including the defendant's age and intelligence; whether the defendant was held incommunicado, denied requested counsel, or deprived of access to friends; and whether the authorities employed three days for periods as long as 12 hours, not advised of his rights, not told of the murder charge, and denied access to friends and family while being told his mother might be arrested for theft).

[13] 322 U.S. 143 (1944).

[14] 316 U.S. 547 (1942). See also Canty v. Alabama, 309 U.S. 629 (1940); White v. Texas, 310 U.S. 530 (1940); Lomax v. Texas, 313 U.S. 544 (1941); Vernon v. Alabama, 313 U.S. 540 (1941).

[15] 346 U.S. 156 (1953).

[16] Id. at 185.

[17] Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 570–602 (1961).

[18] 373 U.S. at 514. See also Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959). (after eight hours of almost continuous questioning, suspect was induced to confess by rookie policeman who was a childhood friend and who played on the suspect's sympathies by falsely stating that his job as a policeman and the welfare of his family was at stake); Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961) (suspect resisted questioning for six hours but yielded when officers threatened to bring his wife to headquarters). More recent cases include Davis v. North Carolina, 384 U.S. 737 (1966) (escaped convict held incommunicado sixteen days but periods of interrogation each day were about an hour); Greenwald v. Wisconsin, 390 U.S. 519 (1968); Darwin v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 346 (1968).

[19] Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49 (1962); Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960); Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191 (1957); Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958); Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433 (1961); Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961). The suspect in Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959), was a 25-year-old with a history of emotional instability. The fact that the suspect was a woman was apparently significant in Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963), in which officers threatened to have the suspect's children taken from her and to have her taken off the welfare relief rolls. But a suspect's mental state alone—even schizophrenia—is insufficient to establish involuntariness absent some coercive police activity. Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986).

[20] E.g., Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954) (confession obtained by psychiatrist trained in hypnosis from a physically and emotionally exhausted suspect who had already been subjected to three days of interrogation); Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963) (suspect was administered drug with properties of "truth serum" to relieve withdrawal pains of narcotics addiction, although police probably were not aware of drug's side effects).

trickery in obtaining a confession.[21] The Court also held that confessions induced through the exploitation of some illegal action, such as an illegal arrest[22] or an unlawful search and seizure,[23] were inadmissible.

Amdt5.4.7.3 Miranda and Its Aftermath

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

In Miranda v. Arizona, the Supreme Court held that prosecutors may not use statements obtained during a custodial interrogation unless the interrogation was conducted pursuant to certain procedural safeguards. Specifically, the Court concluded that such statements are inadmissible at trial unless the individual subject to interrogation was informed of his or her right to remain silent, that any statements could be used against the subject in subsequent proceedings, and of his or her right to an attorney.[1] The Miranda Court regarded police interrogation as inherently coercive. The Court explained that the relevant "Miranda warnings" were necessary to ensure that suspects were not stripped of their ability to make a free and rational choice between speaking and not speaking.[2] Although the Miranda decision became highly controversial, the Court has continued to adhere to it.[3] However, the Court has created exceptions to the Miranda warnings over the years, and referred to the warnings as "prophylactic"[4] and "not themselves rights protected by the Constitution."[5]

In Dickerson v. United States,[6] the Court addressed a foundational issue, finding that Miranda was a "constitutional decision" that could not be overturned by statute, and consequently that 18 U.S.C. § 3501, which provided for a less strict "voluntariness" standard for the admissibility of confessions, could not be sustained.

Consistent application of Miranda's holding on warnings to state proceedings necessarily implied a constitutional basis for Miranda, the Court explained, because federal courts "hold

[21] E.g., Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719 (1966); Davis v. North Carolina, 384 U.S. 737 (1966); Ashdown v. Utah, 357 U.S. 426 (1958); Thomas v. Arizona, 356 U.S. 390 (1958)

[22] Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963).

[23] Fahy v. Connecticut, 375 U.S. 85 (1963).

[1] 384 U.S. at 444–445.

[2] Justices Tom Clark, John Harlan, Potter Stewart, and Byron White dissented, finding no historical support for the application of the Clause to police interrogation and rejecting the policy considerations for the extension put forward by the majority. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 499, 504, 526 (1966). Justice White argued that while the Court's decision was not compelled or even strongly suggested by the Fifth Amendment, its history, and the judicial precedents, this did not preclude the Court from making new law and new public policy grounded in reason and experience. However, he contended that the change made in Miranda was ill-conceived because it arose from a view of interrogation as inherently coercive and because the decision did not adequately protect society's interest in detecting and punishing criminal behavior. Id. at 531–45.

[3] See, e.g., Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 304 (1980) (Burger, C.J., concurring) ("The meaning of Miranda has become reasonably clear and law enforcement practices have adjusted to its strictures; I would neither overrule Miranda, disparage it, nor extend it at this late date.")

[4] New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 549, 653 (1984).

[5] Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 444 (1974).

[6] 530 U.S. 428 (2000).

no supervisory authority over state judicial proceedings."[7] Moreover, Miranda itself had purported to guide law enforcement agencies and courts.[8] However, even if Miranda is rooted in the Constitution, the Court has indicated that this does not mean a precise articulation of its required warnings is "immutable."[9]

In addition to finding that Miranda had "constitutional underpinnings," the Dickerson Court also rejected a request to overrule Miranda. "Whether or not we would agree with Miranda's reasoning and its resulting rule, were we addressing the issue in the first instance," Chief Justice William Rehnquist wrote for the seven-Justice majority, "the principles of stare decisis weigh heavily against overruling it now." There was no special justification for overruling the decision; subsequent cases had not undermined the decision's doctrinal underpinnings, but rather had "reaffirm[ed]" its "core ruling." Moreover, Miranda warnings had "become so embedded in routine police practice [that they] have become part of our national culture."[10]

As to the viability of Miranda claims in federal habeas corpus cases, the Court suggested in 1974 that most claims could be disallowed[11] but reversed course in 1993. The Court ruled in Withrow v. Williams that Miranda protects a fundamental trial right of the defendant, unlike the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule addressed in Stone v. Powell.[12] Thus, claimed violations of Miranda merited federal habeas corpus review because they related to the correct ascertainment of guilt.[13] The Miranda rule differed from the Mapp v. Ohio[14] exclusionary rule because Mapp's primary purpose was to deter future Fourth Amendment violations, which the Court opined would only be marginally advanced by allowing collateral review.[15] A further consideration was that eliminating review of Miranda claims would not significantly reduce federal habeas review of state convictions, because most Miranda claims could be recast in terms of due process denials resulting from admission of involuntary confessions.[16]

The Court further explored the constitutional nature of Miranda in its 2022 case Vega v. Tekoh.[17] In Vega, the Court reiterated that while Miranda was a constitutional decision that adopted constitutional rules, those rules were set forth by the Court as a way to safeguard

[7] 530 U.S. at 438.

[8] 530 U.S. at 439 (quoting from Miranda, 384 U.S. at 441–42).

[9] See, e.g., Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50, 60, 63–64 (2010).

[10] 530 U.S. at 443.

[11] In Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 439 (1974), the Court suggested a distinction between a constitutional violation and a violation of "the prophylactic rules developed to protect that right." The holding in Tucker, however, turned on the fact that the interrogation had preceded the Miranda decision and that warnings—albeit not full Miranda warnings—had been given.

[12] 428 U.S. 465 (1976)

[13] 507 U.S. 680 (1993). Even though a state prisoner's Miranda claim may be considered in federal habeas review, the scope of federal habeas review is narrow. Under the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), a state court judgment may be set aside on habeas review only if the judgment is found to be contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, clearly established Supreme Court precedent. By contrast, a federal court reviewing a state court judgment on direct review considers federal legal questions de novo and can overturn a state court holding based on its own independent assessment of federal legal issues. This difference in scope of review can be critical. Compare Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004) (habeas petition denied because state court's refusal to take a juvenile's age into account in applying Miranda was not an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent), with J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261 (2011) (on the Court's de novo review of the age issue, a state court's refusal to take a juvenile's age into account in applying Miranda held to be in error, and case remanded).

[14] 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

[15] 507 U.S. at 686–93.

[16] 507 U.S. at 693.

[17] No. 21-499 (U.S. June 23, 2022).

constitutional rights under the Fifth Amendment.[18] Therefore, a Miranda violation does not necessarily constitute a violation of the Constitution.[19] The Court concluded that because a Miranda violation is not a violation of a constitutional right, it is not actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which requires someone suffer the deprivation of [a] right . . . secured by the Constitution.[20]

Amdt5.4.7.4 Custodial Interrogation Standard

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Law enforcement officers must give Miranda warnings prior to "questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way."[1] Such warnings are thus required when a person is (1) taken into custody, and (2) subject to interrogation. The Supreme Court has explained that whether a person is "in custody" depends on the results of a two-part test that considers whether a reasonable person in the suspect's shoes would feel that he could freely exercise his right against self-incrimination and the degree to which the suspect's freedom of action is restricted.

First, whether a person is "in custody" during questioning depends on the degree of coercive pressure imposed on him. The Court applies an objective, context-specific test that considers the degree of intimidation that a reasonable person in the suspect's shoes would feel if he were to freely exercise his right against self-incrimination. A police officer's subjective and undisclosed view that a person being interrogated is a criminal suspect is not relevant for Miranda purposes, nor is the subjective view of the person being questioned.[2] However, age may weigh in favor of requiring Miranda warnings if the detainee is a juvenile.[3]

Second, the Supreme Court has considered whether various restrictions on a person's freedom of action constitute taking that person into custody for purposes of Miranda. The Court has determined that, for example, an ordinary traffic stop does not to amount to Miranda "custody."[4] Moreover, interrogating a prison inmate about previous outside conduct does not necessarily amount to custody, even if the inmate is isolated from the general prison

---

[18] Id. at 11.

[19] Id. at 13.

[20] Id.

[1] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966) (emphasis added).

[2] Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994).

[3] J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261 (2011) (case remanded to evaluate whether a 13-year-old student questioned by a uniformed police officer and school administrators on school grounds was in custody).

[4] Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 440 (1984) (roadside questioning of motorist stopped for traffic violation not custodial interrogation until "freedom of action is curtailed to a 'degree associated with formal arrest'"). Thus, "custody" for self-incrimination purposes under the Fifth Amendment does not necessarily cover all detentions that are "seizures" under the Fourth Amendment. Id.

population for questioning.[5] The fact that a suspect may be present in a police station does not necessarily mean, absent further restrictions, that questioning is custodial.[6] By itself, the fact that the suspect is in his home or other familiar surroundings will not ordinarily lead to a conclusion that the inquiry was custodial.[7] However, questioning a person upon arrest in his home may be custodial.[8] When a person has been subjected to Miranda custody that custody ends when he is free to resume his normal life activities after questioning.[9] Nevertheless, a break in custody may not end all Miranda implications for subsequent custodial interrogations.[10]

In addition to requiring that a person be taken into custody to trigger Miranda warnings, such warnings must precede custodial interrogation. It is not necessary under Miranda that the police ask a question in order to "interrogate" the suspect, as demonstrated in Rhode Island v. Innis.[11] There, police had apprehended the defendant as a murder suspect but had not found the weapon used. While he was being transported to police headquarters in a squad car, the officers did not question the defendant, who after receiving Miranda warnings had wanted to consult a lawyer. However, the officers discussed among themselves that a school for children with disabilities was near the crime scene, and that they hoped to find the weapon before it injured a child. The defendant then took them to the weapon's hiding place.

Unanimously rejecting a contention that only express questioning violates Miranda, the Court said: We conclude that the Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent. That is to say, the term 'interrogation' under Miranda refers not only to express questioning, but also to any

---

[5] Howes v. Fields, 565 U.S. 499 (2012) (taking a prisoner incarcerated for disorderly conduct aside for questioning about an unrelated child molestation incident held, 6-3, not to constitute custodial interrogation under the totality of the circumstances), distinguishing Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968) (questioning state prisoner about unrelated federal tax violation held to be custodial interrogation). While the Howes Court split 6-3 on whether a custodial interrogation had taken place for Fifth Amendment purposes, the case was before it on habeas review, which requires that a clearly established Supreme Court precedent mandates a contrary result. All the Howes Justices agreed that Mathis had not, for purposes of habeas review of a state case, "clearly established" that all private questioning of an inmate about previous, outside conduct was "custodial" per se. Rather, Howes explained that a broader assessment of all relevant factors in each case was necessary to establish coercive pressure amounting to "custody." Cf. Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98 (2010) (extended release of interrogated inmate back into the general prison population broke "custody" for purposes of later questioning); see also Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990) (inmate's conversation with an undercover agent does not create a coercive, police-dominated environment and does not implicate Miranda if the suspect does not know that he is conversing with a government agent).

[6] Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 (1977) (suspect came voluntarily to police station to be questioned, he was not placed under arrest while there, and he was allowed to leave at end of interview, even though he was named by victim as culprit; questioning took place behind closed doors, and he was falsely informed his fingerprints had been found at scene of crime); Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178 (2013) (plurality opinion) (voluntarily accompanying police to station for questioning). Cf. Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994). See also Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984) (required reporting to probationary officer is not custodial situation); Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004) (state court determination that a teenager brought to police station by his parents was not "in custody" was not "unreasonable" for purposes of federal habeas review under the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA)).

[7] Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 (1976) (IRS agents' interview with taxpayer in private residence was not a custodial interrogation, although inquiry had "focused" on him).

[8] Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969) (police entered suspect's bedroom at 4 a.m., told him he was under arrest, and questioned him; four of the eight Justices who took part in the case, including three dissenters, voiced concern about "broadening" Miranda beyond the police station).

[9] This holds even in the case of a convict who is released after interrogation back into the general population. Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98 (2010).

[10] Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981).

[11] 446 U.S. 291 (1980). A similar factual situation was presented in Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977), which the Court decided under the Sixth Amendment. In Brewer, Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), and United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980), the Court had difficulty explaining what constitutes interrogation for Sixth Amendment counsel purposes. The Innis Court indicated that the definitions are not the same for each Amendment. 446 U.S. at 300 n.4.

words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect. The latter portion of this definition focuses primarily upon the perceptions of the suspect, rather than the intent of the police. This focus reflects the fact that the Miranda safeguards were designed to vest a suspect in custody with an added measure of protection against coercive police practices, without regard to objective proof of the underlying intent of the police.[12]

The Court, however, concluded that the officers' conversation was not the functional equivalent of questioning and the evidence was admissible.[13] A later Court applied Innis in Arizona v. Mauro[14] to hold that a suspect who had requested an attorney was not "interrogated" when the police instead brought the suspect's wife, who also was a suspect, to speak with him in the police's presence. The majority emphasized that the suspect's wife had asked to speak with her husband; therefore, the meeting was not a police-initiated ruse designed to elicit a response from the suspect. Furthermore, the meeting could not be characterized as a police attempt to use the coercive nature of confinement to extract a confession that would not have been given in an unrestricted environment.

In Estelle v. Smith,[15] the Court held that a court-ordered jailhouse interview by a psychiatrist seeking to determine the defendant's competency to stand trial constituted "interrogation" with respect to testimony on issues of guilt and punishment. Thus, the psychiatrist's conclusions about the defendant's dangerousness were inadmissible at the capital sentencing phase of the trial because the defendant had not received his Miranda warnings prior to the interview. That a psychiatrist designated to conduct a neutral competency examination had questioned the defendant, rather than a police officer, was "immaterial," the Court concluded, because the psychiatrist's testimony at the penalty phase changed his role from one of neutrality to that of the prosecution's agent.[16]

Amdt5.4.7.5 Miranda Requirements

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Miranda requires that before a suspect in custody is interrogated, he must be given full warnings (or the equivalent) of his rights. Specifically, the suspect must receive express warnings of his right to remain silent; that anything he says may be used as evidence against him; that he has a right to counsel; and that, if he cannot afford counsel, he is entitled to an appointed attorney.[1] In a later decision, the Court held that it is unnecessary for the police to [12] Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300–01 (1980).

---

[13] 446 U.S. at 302–04. See also Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990) (absence of coercive environment makes Miranda inapplicable to jail cell conversation between suspect and police undercover agent).

[14] 481 U.S. 520 (1987).

[15] 451 U.S. 454 (1981).

[16] 451 U.S. 454 (1981).

[1] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966).

give the warnings as a verbatim recital of the words in the Miranda opinion itself, so long as the words used "fully conveyed" to a defendant his rights.[2]

Once a warned suspect asserts his right to silence and requests counsel, the police must scrupulously respect this assertion. The Miranda Court stated that once a warned suspect "indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease." Further, if the suspect requests the assistance of counsel during interrogation, questioning must cease until he has counsel.[3]

Subsequently, the Court has often barred the police from continuing (or reinitiating) interrogation with a suspect requesting counsel until counsel is present, except when the suspect himself initiates further communications. In Edwards v. Arizona,[4] initial questioning ceased as soon as the suspect requested counsel, and the police returned the suspect to his cell. Questioning resumed the following day only after different police officers had confronted the suspect and again warned him of his rights; the suspect agreed to talk and thereafter incriminated himself. Nonetheless, the Court held, "when an accused has invoked his right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation, a valid waiver of that right cannot be established by showing only that he responded to further police-initiated custodial interrogation even if he has been advised of his rights. We further hold that an accused . . . , having expressed his desire to deal with the police only through counsel, is not subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel has been made available to him, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police."[5] The Edwards rule bars police-initiated questioning stemming from a separate investigation as well as questioning relating to the crime for which the suspect was arrested.[6] It also applies to interrogation by officers of a different law enforcement authority.[7]

---

[2] California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355 (1981). Rephrased, the test is whether the warnings "reasonably conveyed" a suspect's rights. The Court added that reviewing courts "need not examine Miranda warnings as if construing a will or defining the terms of an easement." Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 203 (1989) (upholding warning that included possibly misleading statement that a lawyer would be appointed "if and when you go to court"). Even when warnings were not the "clearest possible formulation of Miranda's right-to-counsel advisement," the Court found them acceptable as "sufficiently comprehensive and comprehensible when given a commonsense reading." Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50, 63–64 (2010) (upholding warning of a right to talk to a lawyer before answering any questions, coupled with advice that the right could be invoked at any time during police questioning, as adequate to inform a suspect of his right to have a lawyer present during questioning).

[3] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 472, 473–74 (1966). While a request for a lawyer is a per se invocation of Fifth Amendment rights, a request for another advisor, such as a probation officer or family member, may be taken into account in determining whether a suspect has evidenced an intent to claim his right to remain silent. Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707 (1979) (juvenile who requested to see his probation officer, rather than counsel, found under the totality-of-the-circumstances to have not invoked a right to remain silent).

[4] 451 U.S. 477 (1981).

[5] 451 U.S. at 484–85. The decision was unanimous, but three concurrences objected to a special rule limiting waivers with respect to counsel to suspect-initiated further exchanges. Id. at 487, 488 (Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Lewis Powell and William Rehnquist). In Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039 (1983), the Court held, albeit without a majority of Justices in complete agreement as to rationale, that an accused who had initiated further conversations with police had knowingly and intelligently waived his right to have counsel present. So too, an accused who expressed a willingness to talk to police, but who refused to make a written statement without presence of counsel, was held to have waived his rights with respect to his oral statements. Connecticut v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523 (1987). In Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990), the Court interpreted Edwards to bar interrogation without counsel present of a suspect who had earlier consulted with an attorney on the accusation at issue. "[W]hen counsel is requested, interrogation must cease, and officials may not reinstate interrogation without counsel present, whether or not the accused has consulted with his attorney." Id. at 153. The Court held that Edwards should not be applied retroactively to a conviction that had become final, Solem v. Stumes, 465 U.S. 638 (1984), but that Edwards applied to cases pending on appeal at the time it was decided. Shea v. Louisiana, 470 U.S. 51 (1985).

[6] Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988). By contrast, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is offense-specific, and does not bar questioning about a crime unrelated to the crime for which the suspect has been charged. See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171 (1991).

[7] Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990).

On the other hand, the Edwards rule requiring that a lawyer be provided to a suspect who had requested one in an earlier interrogation does not apply once there has been a meaningful break in custody. The Court in Maryland v. Shatzer[8] characterized the Edwards rule as a judicially prescribed precaution against using the coercive pressure of prolonged custody to badger a suspect who has previously requested counsel into talking without one. However, after a suspect has been released to resume his normal routine for a sufficient period to dissipate the coercive effects of custody, a period set at 14 days by the Shatzer Court, the rationale for solicitous treatment ceases. If the police take the suspect into custody again, the options for questioning him are no longer limited to suspect-initiated talks or providing counsel. Rather, the police may issue new Miranda warnings and proceed accordingly.[9] The Court has not extended the Edwards rule explicitly to other aspects of the Miranda warnings.[10]

Amdt5.4.7.6 Miranda Exceptions

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

A properly warned suspect may waive his Miranda rights and submit to custodial interrogation. Miranda recognized that a suspect may voluntarily and knowingly give up his rights and respond to questioning, but the Court also cautioned that the prosecution bore a "heavy burden" to establish that a valid waiver had occurred.[1] The Court continued: "[a] valid waiver will not be presumed simply from the silence of the accused after warnings are given or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained."[2] Subsequent cases indicated that determining whether a suspect has waived his Miranda rights is a fact-specific inquiry not easily susceptible to per se rules. According to these cases, resolution of the issue of waiver "must be determined on 'the particular facts and circumstances surrounding that case, including the background, experience, and conduct of the accused.'"[3] Under this line of cases, a waiver need not always be express, nor does Miranda impose a formalistic waiver procedure.[4]

---

[8] 559 U.S. 98 (2010).

[9] Id.

[10] For a pre-Edwards case on the right to remain silent, see Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975) (suspect given Miranda warnings at questioning for robbery, requested cessation of interrogation, and police complied; some two hours later, a different policeman interrogated suspect about a murder, gave him a new Miranda warning, and suspect made incriminating admission; since police "scrupulously honored" suspect's request, admission was valid).

[1] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 475 (1966). See also Tague v. Louisiana, 444 U.S. 469 (1980). A knowing and intelligent waiver need not be predicated on complete disclosure by police of the intended line of questioning. Thus, an accused's signed waiver following arrest for one crime is not invalidated by police having failed to inform him of their intent to question him about another crime. Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564 (1987).

[2] Miranda, 384 U.S. at 475.

[3] North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369, 374–75 (1979) (quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938)). In Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298 (1985), the Court held that a confession following a Miranda warning is not necessarily tainted by an earlier confession obtained without a warning, as long as the earlier confession had been voluntary. See Bobby v. Dixon, 565 U.S. 23 (2012). See also Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986) (signed waivers following Miranda warnings not vitiated by police having kept from suspect information that attorney had been retained for him by a

In Berghuis v. Thompkins, citing the societal benefit of requiring an accused to invoke Miranda rights unambiguously, the Court refocused its Miranda waiver analysis on whether a suspect understood his rights.[5] There, a suspect refused to sign a waiver form, remained largely silent during the ensuing 2-hour and 45-minute interrogation, but then made an incriminating statement. The five-Justice majority found that the suspect had failed to invoke his right to remain silent and had also implicitly waived the right. According to the Court, although a statement following silence alone may be inadequate to waive Miranda rights, the prosecution may show an implied waiver by demonstrating that a suspect understood the Miranda warnings given to him and subsequently made an uncoerced statement.[6] Furthermore, once a suspect has knowingly and voluntarily waived his Miranda rights, police officers may continue questioning until and unless the suspect clearly invokes his rights later.[7]

The admissions of an unwarned or improperly warned suspect may not be used directly against him at trial, but the Court has permitted some use for other purposes, such as impeachment. Prosecutors cannot introduce a defendant's confession or other incriminating admissions obtained in violation of Miranda against him at trial to establish guilt[8] or determine the sentence, at least in bifurcated trials in capital cases.[9] On the other hand, the "fruits" of such an unwarned confession or admission may be used in some circumstances if the statement was voluntary.[10]

The Court, in opinions that more narrowly construe Miranda, has broadened the permissible impeachment purposes for which unlawful confessions and admissions may be used.[11] Thus, in Harris v. New York,[12] the Court held that the prosecution could use statements, obtained in violation of Miranda, to impeach the defendant's testimony if he voluntarily took the stand and denied commission of the offense. Subsequently, in Oregon v.

---

relative); Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707 (1979) (juvenile who consented to interrogation after his request to consult with his probation officer was denied found to have waived rights; totality-of-the-circumstances analysis held to apply). Elstad was distinguished in Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 (2004), however, when the authorities' failure to warn the suspect prior to the initial questioning was a deliberate attempt to circumvent Miranda by use of a two-step interrogation technique, and the police, prior to eliciting the statement for the second time, did not alert the suspect that the first statement was likely inadmissible.

[4] North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369 (1979). In Butler, the defendant had refused to sign a waiver but agreed to talk with FBI agents nonetheless. On considering whether the defendant had thereby waived his right to counsel (his right to remain silent aside), the Court held that no express oral or written statement was required. Though the defendant never directly indicated whether he desired counsel, the Court found that a waiver could be inferred from his actions and words.

[5] 560 U.S. 370 (2010).

[6] Id. at 384–85.

[7] Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994) (suspect's statement that "maybe I should talk to a lawyer," uttered after Miranda waiver and after an hour and a half of questioning, did not constitute such a clear request for an attorney when, in response to a direct follow-up question, he said "no, I don't want a lawyer").

[8] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 479 (1966). See also Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968) (rejecting as tainted the prosecution's use at the second trial of defendant's testimony at his first trial rebutting confessions obtained in violation of McNabb-Mallory).

[9] Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981). The Court has yet to consider the applicability of the ruling in a noncapital, nonbifurcated trial case.

[10] United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630 (2004) (allowing introduction of a pistol, described as a "nontestimonial fruit" of an unwarned statement). See also Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433 (1974) (upholding use of a witness revealed by defendant's statement elicited without proper Miranda warning). Note, too, that confessions may be the poisonous fruit of other constitutional violations, such as illegal searches or arrests. E.g., Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687 (1982).

[11] Under Walter v. United States, 347 U.S. 62 (1954), the defendant denied the offense of which he was accused (sale of drugs) and asserted he had never dealt in drugs. The prosecution was permitted to impeach the defendant concerning heroin seized illegally from his home two years before. The Court observed that the defendant could have denied the offense without making the "sweeping" assertions, as to which the government could impeach him.

[12] 401 U.S. 222 (1971). See also United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980) (Fourth Amendment).

Hass,[13] the Court permitted prosecutors to impeach the defendant using a statement the defendant made after police had ignored his request for counsel following his Miranda warning. Such impeachment material, however, must still meet the standard of voluntariness associated with the pre-Miranda tests for the admission of confessions and statements.[14]

The Court has created a "public safety" exception to the Miranda warning requirement for serious offenses. In New York v. Quarles,[15] the Court held admissible a recently apprehended suspect's response in a public supermarket to the arresting officer's demand to know the location of a gun that the officer had reason to believe the suspect had just discarded or hidden in the supermarket. The Court, in an opinion by Justice William Rehnquist,[16] declined to place officers in the "untenable position" of having to make instant decisions as to whether to proceed with Miranda warnings and thereby increase the risk to themselves or to the public or whether to dispense with the warnings and run the risk that resulting evidence will be excluded at trial. While acknowledging that the exception itself would "lessen the desirable clarity of the rule," the Court predicted that confusion would be slight: "[w]e think that police officers can and will distinguish almost instinctively between questions necessary to secure their own safety or the safety of the public and questions designed solely to elicit testimonial evidence from a suspect."[17] However, no such compelling justification was offered for a Miranda exception for lesser offenses, and protecting the rule's "simplicity and clarity" counseled against creating one.[18] The Court stated: "[A] person subjected to custodial interrogation is entitled to the benefit of the procedural safeguards enunciated in Miranda, regardless of the nature or severity of the offense of which he is suspected or for which he was arrested."[19]

Amdt5.5 Due Process

Amdt5.5.1 Overview of Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Fifth Amendment provides that "no person" shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."[1] Generally, "due process" guarantees protect individual

[13] 420 U.S. 714 (1975). By contrast, a defendant may not be impeached by evidence of his silence after police have warned him of his right to remain silent. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976).

[14] E.g., Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978); New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979)

[15] 467 U.S. 649 (1984).

[16] The Court's opinion was joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and by Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, and Lewis Powell. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor would have ruled inadmissible the suspect's response, but not the gun retrieved as a result of the response. Justices Thurgood Marshall, William Brennan, and John Paul Stevens dissented.

[17] 467 U.S. at 658–59.

[18] Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 432 (1984).

[19] 468 U.S. at 434.

[1] U.S. Const. amend. V.

rights by limiting the exercise of government power.[2] The Supreme Court has held that the Fifth Amendment, which applies to federal government action, provides persons with both procedural and substantive due process guarantees. If the federal government seeks to deprive a person of a protected life, liberty, or property interest, the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause requires that the government first provide certain procedural protections.[3] Procedural due process often requires the government to provide a person with notice and an opportunity for a hearing before such a deprivation.[4] In addition, the Supreme Court has interpreted the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause to include substantive due process guarantees that protect certain fundamental constitutional rights from federal government interference, regardless of the procedures that the government follows when enforcing the law.[5] Substantive due process has generally dealt with specific subject areas, such as liberty of contract, marriage, or privacy.

The Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects all persons within U.S. territory, including corporations,[6] aliens,[7] and, presumptively, citizens seeking readmission to the United States.[8] However, the states are not entitled to due process protections against the federal government.[9] The clause is effective in the District of Columbia[10] and in territories that are part of the United States,[11] but it does not apply of its own force to unincorporated territories.[12] Nor does it reach enemy alien belligerents tried by military tribunals outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.[13] The Clause restrains Congress in addition to the Executive and Judicial Branches and "cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process 'due process of law' by enacting legislation to that effect."[14]

Due process cases may arise under both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Both amendments use the same language but have a different history.[15] The Supreme Court has construed the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause to impose the same due process limitations on the states as the Fifth Amendment does on the federal government.[16] Fourteenth Amendment due process case law is therefore relevant to the interpretation of the Fifth Amendment. Except for areas in which the federal government is the actor, much of the Constitution Annotated's discussion of due process appears in the Fourteenth Amendment essays.[17]

---

[2] Due Process, Black's Law Dictionary 610 (10th ed. 2014).

[3] See Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 481 (1972) (citing Cafeteria & Restaurant Workers Union v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961)).

[4] Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78, 110 (1908); Jacob v. Roberts, 223 U.S. 261, 265 (1912).

[5] E.g., Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 386–87 (1978) (citing Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1 (1967)).

[6] Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U.S. 700, 719 (1879).

[7] Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228, 238 (1896).

[8] United States v. Ju Toy, 198 U.S. 253, 263 (1905); cf. Quon Quon Poy v. Johnson, 273 U.S. 352 (1927).

[9] South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 323–24 (1966).

[10] Wight v. Davidson, 181 U.S. 371, 384 (1901).

[11] Lovato v. New Mexico, 242 U.S. 199, 201 (1916).

[12] Public Utility Comm'rs v. Ynchausti & Co., 251 U.S. 401, 406 (1920).

[13] Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950); In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

[14] Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272, 276 (1856). See also Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw's opinion in Jones v. Robbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 329 (1857).

[15] French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 181 U.S. 324, 328 (1901).

[16] Cf. Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974); Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312, 326 (1932) ("The restraint imposed upon legislation by the due process clauses of the two amendments is the same."); Morehead v. New York ex rel. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587, 610 (1936).

[17] See Amdt14.S1.3 Due Process Generally.

Amdt5.5.2 Historical Background on Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The concept of due process developed long before the Framers met in Philadelphia to draft the Constitution. Due process is a "historical product"[1] of the 1215 Magna Carta, in which King John of England promised his barons that "[n]o free man" would be deprived of his life, liberty, or property "except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land."[2] The phrase "due process of law" first appeared in a 1354 statutory rendition of Magna Carta provisions: "No man of what state or condition he be, shall be put out of his lands or tenements nor taken, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without he be brought to answer by due process of law."[3]

Although the Magna Carta resulted from a struggle between the King and his barons,[4] its language influenced the writings of English jurists relied upon by the Constitution's Framers.[5] The Framers' understanding of due process derived in major part from Sir Edward Coke, who in his Second Institutes explained that the term "by law of the land" was equivalent to "due process of law."[6] Coke's writings described aspects of both procedural and substantive due process,[7] which the drafters of colonial charters and declarations of rights relied upon when incorporating due process rights into those instruments, particularly in provisions safeguarding accused persons' rights.[8]

---

[1] Jackman v. Rosenbaum Co., 260 U.S. 22, 31 (1922).

[2] Text and commentary on this chapter may be found in W. McKechnie, Magna Carta: A Commentary on the Great Charter of King John 375–95 (Glasgow, 2d rev. ed. 1914). The chapter became chapter 29 in the Third Reissue of Henry III in 1225. Id. at 504, 139–59. As expanded, it read: "No free man shall be taken or imprisoned or deprived of his freehold or his liberties or free customs, or outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, nor shall we come upon him or send against him, except by a legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." See also J. Holt, Magna Carta 226–29 (1965). The 1225 reissue also added to chapter 29 the language of chapter 40 of the original text: "To no one will we sell, to no one will we deny or delay right or justice." This 1225 reissue became the standard text thereafter.

[3] 28 Edw. III, c. 3. See F. Thompson, Magna Carta: Its Role in the Making of the English Constitution, 1300–1629, 86–97 (1948), recounting several statutory reconfirmations.

[4] W. McKechnie, Magna Carta: A Commentary on the Great Charter of King John (Glasgow, 2d rev. ed. 1914); J. Holt, Magna Carta (1965).

[5] F. Thompson, Magna Carta: Its Role in the Making of the English Constitution, 1300–1629 (1948).

[6] Sir Edward Coke, Institutes of the Laws of England, Part II, 50–51 (1641). For a review of the influence of Magna Carta and Coke on the colonies and the new nation, see, e.g., A. Howard, The Road from Runnymede: Magna Carta and Constitutionalism in America (1968).

[7] See sources cited supra note 23.

[8] The 1776 Constitution of Maryland, for example, in its declaration of rights, used the language of Magna Carta including the "law of the land" phrase in a separate article, 3 F. Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions, H. Doc. No. 357, 59th Congress, 2d Sess. 1688 (1909), whereas Virginia used the clause in a section guaranteeing procedural rights in criminal cases. 7 id. at 3813. New York, in its constitution of 1821, was the first state to incorporate the phrase "due process of law" with inspiration from the United States Constitution. 5 id. at 2648.

Amdt5.6 Procedural Due Process and Federal Government

Amdt5.6.1 Overview of Due Process Procedural Requirements

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

If the federal government seeks to deprive a person of a protected life, liberty, or property interest, the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause requires that the government first provide certain procedural protections.[1] The Supreme Court has construed the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause to impose the same procedural due process limitations on the states as the Fifth Amendment does on the Federal Government.[2] Fourteenth Amendment due process case law is therefore relevant to the interpretation of the Fifth Amendment.[3]

The Court first addressed due process in the 1855 Fifth Amendment case Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Co.[4] In Murray's Lessee, the Court held that it would determine (independently from Congress) whether the government had provided due process by evaluating whether the statutory process conflicted with the Constitution and, if not, whether it comported with "those settled usages and modes of proceedings existing in the common and statute law of England, before the emigration of our ancestors, and which are shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition by having been acted on by them after the settlement of this country."[5]

In the 1884 Fourteenth Amendment case Hurtado v. California, the Court held that a process could be judged based on whether it had attained "the sanction of settled usage both in England and in this country; but it by no means follows that nothing else can be due process of law."[6] To hold that only historical, traditional procedures can constitute due process, the Court said, would render the law "incapable of progress or improvement."[7]

Due process often requires the government to provide a person with notice and an opportunity for a hearing before depriving the person of a protected interest.[8] However, there are some circumstances in which the Court has held those precedural protections are not required. For instance, persons adversely affected by a law cannot challenge the law's validity on the ground that the legislative body that enacted it gave no notice of proposed legislation, held no hearings at which the person could have presented his arguments, and gave no

---

[1] See Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 481 (1972) (citing Cafeteria & Restaurant Workers Union v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961)).

[2] Cf. Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974).

[3] See Amdt14.S1.3 Due Process Generally.

[4] Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272, 276–77, 280 (1856). The Court took a similar approach in Fourteenth Amendment due process interpretation in Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U.S. 97 (1878), and Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113 (1877).

[5] Murray's Lessee, 59 U.S. (18 How.) at 276–77, 280.

[6] Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 528–29 (1884).

[7] 110 U.S. at 529, 532–37. The Court has followed this flexible approach. E.g., Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937); Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97 (1934).

[8] Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78, 110 (1908); Jacob v. Roberts, 223 U.S. 261, 265 (1912).

consideration to particular points of view.[9] Similarly, when an administrative agency engages in a legislative function, for example by drafting regulations of general application, it need not hold a hearing prior to promulgation.[10] On the other hand, if a regulation would affect an identifiable class of persons, the Court employs a multi-factor analysis to determine whether notice and hearing is required and, if so, whether it must precede such action.[11]

The Supreme Court articulated the modern test for what process is required before the government may invade a protected interest in a civil proceeding in the 1976 case Mathews v. Eldridge.[12] Because most of the cases applying Mathews have arisen under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Constitution Annotated discusses Mathews and subsequent cases applying the Mathews test in essays on Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process requirements.[13] Other Fourteenth Amendment essays discuss Supreme Court cases involving key components of procedural due process, including notice, the opportunity for a hearing, and other procedural requirements.[14]

Because the Court has decided relatively few due process cases applying the Fifth Amendment in cases involving criminal procedure, the Fourteenth Amendment essays address the narrower due process inquiry that the Court has often applied in this context.[15] In civil contexts, the Court has applied a broad balancing test that evaluates the government's chosen procedure with respect to the private interest affected, the risk of erroneous deprivation of that interest under the chosen procedure, and the government interest at stake.[16] By contrast, the Court has held that the "appropriate framework" for due process analysis of criminal procedures is a narrow inquiry into whether a procedure is offensive to the concept of fundamental fairness.[17]

Amdt5.6.2 Deportation and Exclusion Proceedings

Amdt5.6.2.1 Exclusion and Removal of Non-U.S. Nationals

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be

[9] Bi-Metallic Investment Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 239 U.S. 441, 445–46 (1915). See also Bragg v. Weaver, 251 U.S. 57, 58 (1919). Cf. Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 432–33 (1982).

[10] United States v. Florida East Coast Ry., 410 U.S. 224 (1973).

[11] 410 U.S. at 245 (distinguishing between rule-making, in which legislative facts are at issue, and adjudication, in which adjudicative facts are at issue, and requiring a hearing in the latter proceedings but not in the former). See Londoner v. City of Denver, 210 U.S. 373 (1908).

[12] 424 U.S. 319, 333 (1976).

[13] See Amdt14.S1.5.4.2 Due Process Test in Mathews v. Eldridge.

[14] See, e.g., Amdt14.S1.5.4.3 Notice of Charge and Due Process and Amdt14.S1.5.4.4 Opportunity for Meaningful Hearing.

[15] Amdt14.S1.5.5.1 Overview of Procedural Due Process in Criminal Cases.

[16] See Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976). In Nelson v. Colorado, the Supreme Court held that the Mathews test controls when evaluating state procedures governing the continuing deprivation of property after a criminal conviction has been reversed or vacated, with no prospect of reprosecution. See No. 15-1256, slip op. at 1, 5 (April 19, 2017).

[17] See Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 443 (1992).

compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has long recognized that Congress has "plenary" power over immigration, giving the legislature almost complete authority to decide whether foreign nationals ("aliens," under governing statutes and case law) may enter or remain in the United States.[1] The Court has predicated this broad power on the government's inherent sovereign authority to control its borders and its relations with foreign nations.[2] In exercising its power over immigration, Congress can make laws concerning aliens that would be unconstitutional if applied to citizens.[3] The Court has interpreted this power to apply with most force to the admission and exclusion of aliens seeking to enter the United States.[4] Accordingly, the Court has held, aliens seeking initial entry into the United States have no due process protections regarding their applications for admission.[5] With regard to aliens physically present in the United States, however, the Court has recognized that due process protections may constrain the government's exercise of its immigration power.[6]

Amdt5.6.2.2 Exclusion of Aliens Seeking Entry into the United States

Fifth Amendment:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be

---

[1] Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 766 (1972) ("The Court without exception has sustained Congress's 'plenary power to make rules for the admission of aliens and to exclude those who possess those characteristics which Congress has forbidden.'") (quoting Boutilier v. INS, 387 U.S. 118, 123 (1967)); Ocean Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320, 343 (1909) (noting the "plenary power of Congress as to the admission of aliens" and the "complete and absolute power of Congress over the subject" of immigration)); see also Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522, 531 (1954) ("Policies pertaining to the entry of aliens and their right to remain here are peculiarly concerned with the political conduct of government . . . . But that the formulation of these policies is entrusted exclusively to Congress has become about as firmly imbedded in the legislative and judicial tissues of our body politic as any aspect of our government."). For additional discussion about Congress's plenary power over immigration, see ArtI.S8.C18.8.1 Overview of Congress's Immigration Powers.

[2] See Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32 (1982) ("[T]he power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative."); United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 542 (1950) ("The exclusion of aliens is a fundamental act of sovereignty. The right to do so stems not alone from legislative power but is inherent in the executive power to control the foreign affairs of the nation.").

[3] Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 522 (2003) ("[T]his Court has firmly and repeatedly endorsed the proposition that Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens.").

[4] See Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693, 695–96 (2001) (noting that the "distinction between an alien who has effected an entry into the United States and one who has never entered runs throughout immigration law" and equating "the political branches' authority to control entry" with "the Nation's armor"); Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977); Jean v. Nelson, 472 U.S. 846, 875 (1985) (Marshall, J., dissenting) (declaring that it is "in the narrow area of entry decisions" that "the Government's interest in protecting our sovereignty is at its strongest and that individual claims to constitutional entitlement are the least compelling").

[5] See Landon, 459 U.S. at 32 ("This Court has long held that an alien seeking initial admission to the United States requests a privilege and has no constitutional rights regarding his application, for the power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative.").

[6] See Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 693 ("It is well established that certain constitutional protections available to persons inside the United States are unavailable to aliens outside of our geographic borders. But once an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all 'persons' within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence here is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent."); Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 77 (1976) ("Even one whose presence in this country is unlawful, involuntary, or transitory is entitled to that constitutional protection.").

compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

According to the Supreme Court, aliens seeking initial entry into the United States have no constitutional rights regarding their applications for admission.[1] The Court has reasoned that the government has the inherent, sovereign authority to admit or exclude aliens, and that aliens standing outside of the geographic boundaries of the United States have no vested right to be admitted into the country.[2]

Thus, in its 1953 decision in Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, the Court held that the government could deny entry to an alien without a hearing, notwithstanding the alien's "temporary harborage" on Ellis Island pending the government's attempts to remove him from the United States.[3] More recently, in Department of Homeland Security v. Thuraissigiam, the Court in 2020 rejected an alien's constitutional challenge to a federal statute that limits judicial review of an expedited order of removal, reasoning that the alien—who was apprehended shortly after entering the United States unlawfully—could be considered to be an applicant for admission at the border.[4] In short, for aliens seeking admission into the United States, the decision to permit or deny entry by an executive or administrative officer, acting within powers expressly conferred by Congress, is due process of law.[5]

---

[1] See Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Thuraissigiam, No. 19-161, slip op. at 36 (U.S. June 25, 2020) (recognizing that an alien seeking initial entry into the United States "has only those rights regarding admission that Congress has provided by statute"); Trump v. Hawaii, No. 17-965, slip op. at 30 (U.S. June 26, 2018) (noting that "foreign nationals seeking admission have no constitutional right to entry" into the United States); Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 762 (1972) ("It is clear that Mandel personally, as an unadmitted and nonresident alien, had no constitutional right of entry to this country as a nonimmigrant or otherwise.") (citations omitted); Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 187 (1958) ("It is important to note at the outset that our immigration laws have long made a distinction between those aliens who have come to our shores seeking admission, such as petitioner, and those who are within the United States after an entry, irrespective of its legality. In the latter instance the Court has recognized additional rights and privileges not extended to those in the former category who are merely 'on the threshold of initial entry.'") (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953)).

[2] See Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32 (1982) (noting that "the power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative"); Mezei, 345 U.S. at 210 ("Courts have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government's political departments largely immune from judicial control."); United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 542 (1950) ("Admission of aliens to the United States is a privilege granted by the sovereign United States Government.").

[3] Mezei, 345 U.S. at 210–12, 215. The Court reasoned that, although the alien was being detained inside the United States during the pendency of his exclusion proceedings, he had not effected an "entry" for purposes of immigration law, and could be "treated as if stopped at the border." Id. at 212–15. See also Knauff, 338 U.S. at 542, 544 (upholding the exclusion of an alien without a hearing, and reasoning that the U.S. government had the "inherent executive power" to deny her admission and that "[w]hatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned"); Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320, 342–43 (1909) (holding that Congress's broad power over the entry of aliens enabled it to pass legislation making it unlawful to bring into the United States any alien who had a contagious disease).

[4] Thuraissigiam, slip op. at 34–35.

[5] See id. at 36 ("[A]n alien in respondent's position [detained shortly after unlawful entry] has only those rights regarding admission that Congress has provided by statute."); United States v. Ju Toy, 198 U.S. 253, 263 (1905) (noting that "the almost necessary result of the power of Congress to pass exclusion laws" was that the decision to exclude an alien "may be intrusted to an executive officer, and that his decision is due process of law"); see also Landon, 459 U.S. at 32; Knauff, 338 U.S. at 544; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U.S. 651, 660 (1892). The Supreme Court, however, has held that Congress's largely unencumbered power over the entry of aliens does not extend to lawful permanent residents returning from trips abroad, who retain the same constitutional rights they had before leaving the United States, including the right to due process. Landon, 459 U.S. at 33; Rosenberg v. Fleuti, 374 U.S. 449, 460 (1963), superseded by statute, Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009–546; Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U.S. 590, 600–02 (1953). See also Kwock Jan Fat v. White, 253 U.S. 454, 458 (1920) (stating that the exclusion of an alien returning to the United States who claimed to be a U.S. citizen could be made only after a hearing based on "adequate support in the evidence").

In certain cases, the exclusion of an alien has been seen to implicate the rights of U.S. citizens. In its 1972 decision in Kleindienst v. Mandel, for example the Supreme Court appeared to recognize that U.S. citizens' First Amendment rights were affected by the denial of a nonimmigrant visa to a Marxist journalist who had been invited to speak in the United States by a group of university professors.[6] In Mandel, however, the Court also recognized that because the "plenary congressional power to make policies and rules for exclusion of aliens has long been firmly established," the Court would uphold, in the face of a constitutional challenge, an alien's exclusion as long as there is "a facially legitimate and bona fide reason" for the decision.[7] Thus, even when reviewing constitutional challenges brought by U.S. citizens, the Court has limited the scope of judicial review and adopted a highly deferential standard for reviewing the decision to exclude an alien.[8]

U.S. citizens have also asserted that the exclusion of an alien has impinged upon their due process rights.[9] In Kerry v. Din, five Justices in 2015 agreed that denying an immigrant visa to the husband of a U.S. citizen on the grounds that he was inadmissible under a provision of federal immigration law (pertaining to "terrorist activities") did not violate the due process rights of the U.S. citizen spouse.[10] These Justices differed in their reasoning, though. A three-Justice plurality held that the U.S. citizen spouse had no protected liberty interest under the Due Process Clause in her husband's ability to come to the United States, and did not decide whether the government had established a facially legitimate and bona fide reason for excluding her husband.[11] A two-Justice concurrence did not reach the question of whether the U.S. citizen wife had asserted a protected liberty interest, but instead concluded that the consular officials' citation of a particular statutory ground for inadmissibility as the basis for denying the visa application satisfied due process under Mandel, which requires only that the government state a "facially legitimate and bona fide reason" for the denial.[12]

In Trump v. Hawaii, the Supreme Court in 2018 reaffirmed that there is limited judicial review of executive decisions to exclude aliens seeking admission from abroad.[13] The Court

---

[6] See 408 U.S. 753, 762 (1972); see also Kerry v. Din, 576 U.S. 86 (2015) (plurality and concurring opinions, taken together, suggesting that at least a majority of the Court accepts that Mandel allows U.S. citizens to challenge visa denials that affect other rights beyond their First Amendment rights); cf. Trump v. Int'l Refugee Assistance Project, Nos. 16-1436, 16-1540, slip op. at 11 (U.S. June 26, 2017) (per curiam) (noting that "foreign nationals abroad who have no connection to the United States at all" can be denied entry as such a denial does not "impose any legally relevant hardship" on the foreign nationals themselves).

[7] Mandel, 408 U.S. at 769–70. Applying this test, the Court upheld the alien's exclusion based on the government's explanation that the alien had abused visas in the past, and refused to "look behind" the government's justification to determine whether it was supported by any evidence. Id.

[8] See also Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792–94, 798–800 (1977) (rejecting U.S. citizens' and lawful permanent residents' (LPR) equal protection challenge to a statute that granted special immigration preferences to the children and parents of U.S. citizens and LPRs, unless the parent-child relationship was that of a father and an illegitimate child, and recognizing "the limited scope of judicial inquiry into immigration legislation" and Congress's "exceptionally broad power to determine which classes of aliens may lawfully enter the country").

[9] See, e.g., Bustamante v. Mukasey, 531 F.3d 1059, 1062 (9th Cir. 2008).

[10] 576 U.S. 86 (2015).

[11] Id. at 100 (Scalia, J., joined by Roberts, C.J. & Thomas, J.) (plurality opinion). According to the plurality, the U.S. citizen spouse's alleged interests had been variously formulated as a "liberty interest in her marriage"; a "right of association with one's spouse"; a "liberty interest in being reunited with certain blood relatives"; and the "liberty interest of a U.S. citizen under the Due Process Clause to be free from arbitrary restrictions on his right to live with his spouse." Id. at 93. The plurality also expressly noted that no fundamental right to marriage, as such, had been infringed, because "the Federal Government has not attempted to forbid a marriage." Id. at 94 (contrasting the case at hand with Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978), and Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), superseded by statute, Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, Pub. L. No. 103-141, 107 Stat. 1488 (codified at 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb)).

[12] Id. at 106 (Kennedy, J., concurring, joined by Alito, J.).

[13] No. 17-965, slip op. at 30 (U.S. June 26, 2018).

rejected an Establishment Clause challenge brought by U.S. citizens and other challengers to a presidential proclamation that provided for the exclusion of specified categories of nonresident aliens from mostly Muslim-majority countries.[14] The Court recognized that decisions concerning the admission or exclusion of aliens generally lie beyond the scope of judicial review, and are subject only to a "highly constrained" judicial inquiry when an exclusion "allegedly burdens the constitutional rights of a U.S. citizen."[15] The Court upheld the proclamation, ruling that it was rationally related to the stated government objective of protecting national security by excluding aliens from countries with deficient information-sharing practices.[16]

Amdt5.6.2.3 Removal of Aliens Who Have Entered the United States

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Despite the government's broad power over immigration, the Supreme Court has recognized that aliens who have physically entered the United States generally come under the protective scope of the Due Process Clause, which applies "to all 'persons' within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence here is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent."[1] Consequently, there are greater due process protections in formal removal proceedings brought against aliens already present within the United States.[2] These due process protections generally include the right to a hearing and a meaningful opportunity to be heard before deprivation of a liberty interest.[3]

---

[14] Id. at 38–39. In Trump v. Hawaii, the Supreme Court had determined that a U.S. citizen's "interest in being united with his relatives," when those relatives were foreign nationals seeking to enter the United States, was "sufficiently concrete and particularized to form the basis of an Article III injury in fact" for purposes of establishing legal standing to challenge the presidential proclamation. Id. at 25.

[15] Id. at 30–32.

[16] Id. at 38–39.

[1] Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693 (2001); see also Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 77 (1976) ("Even one whose presence in this country is unlawful, involuntary, or transitory is entitled to that constitutional protection."); Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953) ("It is true that aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law.") (citations omitted), superseded by statute, Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009–546.

[2] Removal proceedings are civil in nature and are not criminal prosecutions. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 594–95 (1952); Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U.S. 272, 275 (1912). This fact, however, does not mean that a person may be removed from the United States on the basis of a judgment reached under the civil standard of proof, that is, by a preponderance of the evidence. Rather, the Supreme Court has held, an order of removal may be entered only if the government presents clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence that the facts alleged as grounds for deportation are true. Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276, 286 (1966). However, an alien in formal removal proceedings has the burden of proving his or her eligibility for discretionary relief from removal. Kimm v. Rosenberg, 363 U.S. 405, 408 (1960); see also Jay v. Boyd, 351 U.S. 345, 359 (1956) (holding that a special inquiry officer could rely upon undisclosed, confidential information in deciding to deny an alien's application for suspension of deportation as a matter of discretion).

[3] Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 333 (1976); see also Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, 349 U.S. 48, 52 (1955) (holding that an alien had the right to full judicial review of his deportation order and that such review was not limited to habeas corpus proceedings), superseded by statute, 8 U.S.C. § 1105a; Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 50–51

The Supreme Court, however, has suggested that the extent of due process for aliens present in the United States "may vary depending upon [the alien's] status and circumstance."[4] For instance, at times the Court has indicated that at least some of the constitutional protections to which an alien is entitled may turn upon whether the alien has been admitted into the United States or developed substantial ties to this country.[5] Thus, there is some uncertainty regarding the extent to which due process considerations constrain Congress's exercise of its immigration power with respect to aliens within the United States.

The Supreme Court has considered due process challenges raised by aliens within the United States who are detained and subject to removal. In Zadvydas v. Davis the Supreme Court in 2001 construed a statute authorizing the detention of aliens with final orders of removal as having implicit temporal limitations.[6] According to the Court, construing the statute in a manner that would allow the indefinite detention of lawfully admitted aliens who had been ordered removed would raise "serious constitutional concerns."[7] In the Court's view, because aliens within the United States are protected by due process, Congress must give "clear indication" of an intent to authorize the indefinite detention of removable aliens, and the Court indicated there must be some "special justification" for that detention (e.g., to protect the community from "suspected terrorists").[8]

(1950) (holding that deportation proceedings were subject to certain procedural requirements under the Administrative Procedure Act, including the right to a hearing), superseded by statute, Immigration and Nationality Act, ch. 477, § 242, 66 Stat. 163, 208–12 (1952) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1252); United States ex rel. Vajtauer v. Comm'r of Immigr., 273 U.S. 103, 106 (1927) ("Deportation without a fair hearing or on charges unsupported by any evidence is a denial of due process which may be corrected on habeas corpus."); Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 43 (1924) ("There is no authority given to the Secretary [of Labor] to deport, except upon his finding after a hearing that the petitioners were undesirable residents."); Zakonaite, 226 U.S. at 275 (observing that executive officials may decide whether to deport an alien "after a fair though summary hearing"); cf. United States v. Mendoza-Lopez, 481 U.S. 828, 838–39 (1987) (ruling that an alien who is criminally prosecuted for unlawful reentry after removal may collaterally challenge the underlying removal order during the criminal proceedings if the alien had no prior opportunity to seek judicial review of that order), superseded by statute, 8 U.S.C. § 1326(d). Under provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act, aliens apprehended within the interior of the United States are generally subject to formal removal proceedings, and have a number of procedural protections in those proceedings, including the right to seek counsel at no expense to the government, the right to present evidence at a hearing, the ability to apply for any available relief from removal, the right to administratively appeal an adverse decision, and (to the extent permitted by statute) the right to petition for judicial review of a final order of removal. 8 U.S.C. §§ 1229a(a)(1), (b)(1), (b)(4), (c)(1)(A), (c)(4)(A), (c)(5); 1252(a)(1), (b).

[4] Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 694.

[5] See Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Thuraissigiam, No. 19-161, slip op. at 2, 34–36 (U.S. June 25, 2020) (holding that, while "aliens who have established connections in this country have due process rights in deportation proceedings," an alien "at the threshold of initial entry," including a person who is detained shortly after unlawful entry, has only those protections regarding admission that Congress provided by statute); United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 271 (1990) ("These cases, however, establish only that aliens receive constitutional protections when they have come within the territory of the United States and developed substantial connections with this country."); Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32 (1982) ("[O]nce an alien gains admission to our country and begins to develop the ties that go with permanent residence his constitutional status changes accordingly."); Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 770 (1950) ("The alien, to whom the United States has been traditionally hospitable, has been accorded a generous and ascending scale of rights as he increases his identity with our society.").

[6] Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 701.

[7] Id. at 682 ("We deal here with aliens who were admitted to the United States but subsequently ordered removed. Aliens who have not yet gained initial admission to this country would present a very different question. Based on our conclusion that indefinite detention of aliens in the former category would raise serious constitutional concerns, we construe the statute to contain an implicit 'reasonable time' limitation, the application of which is subject to federal-court review."). But see Clark v. Martinez, 543 U.S. 371, 378–79 (2005) (construing the presumptive time limitation established in Zadvydas as also applying to unadmitted aliens who were being detained after their removal orders became final because the statute authorizing post-order of removal detention made no distinction between admitted and nonadmitted aliens, and should have the same meaning for both categories).

[8] Zadvydas, 533 U.S. at 690–92, 697, 701 (construing a statute so as to avoid a "serious constitutional problem," and recognizing a "presumptively reasonable" detention period of six months for aliens subject to final orders of removal).

In Demore v. Kim, however, the Supreme Court in 2003 held that the mandatory detention during the pendency of formal removal proceedings of certain aliens who had committed specified crimes was constitutionally permissible.[9] The Court observed that "Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens," while also citing its "longstanding view that the Government may constitutionally detain deportable aliens during the limited period necessary for their removal proceedings . . . ."[10] While recognizing that, under Zadvydas, "serious constitutional concerns" were raised by the indefinite detention of lawfully admitted aliens who have been ordered removed, the Demore Court reasoned that mandatory detention during the pendency of formal removal proceedings was distinguishable because it served the purpose of preventing criminal aliens from absconding during those proceedings and generally lasted for relatively short periods of time.[11]

Some lower courts construed Demore's holding as applying only to relatively "brief periods" of detention, rather than cases where the alien's detention lasts for extended periods of time.[12] To avoid constitutional concerns, some courts read federal statutes governing the detention of unlawfully present aliens during the pendency of their removal proceedings as containing implicit time limitations and requiring periodic bond hearings.[13] In 2018, the Supreme Court in Jennings v. Rodriguez rejected that interpretation, holding that the statutes were textually clear in mandating or authorizing the detention of certain aliens during their removal proceedings, and that nothing in those provisions limited the length of detention or required periodic bond hearings.[14] The Court held that the government has the statutory authority to detain aliens potentially indefinitely during their removal proceedings, but left open the question of whether such indefinite detention is unconstitutional.[15]

Additionally, in Department of Homeland Security v. Thuraissigiam, the Supreme Court in 2020 held that an alien detained shortly after entering the United States could not constitutionally challenge a federal statute limiting judicial review of his "expedited removal" proceedings (a streamlined removal process applicable to aliens apprehended at or near the

[9] 538 U.S. 510, 513, 531 (2003).

[10] Id. at 522, 526. See also id. at 528 ("[W]hen the Government deals with deportable aliens, the Due Process Clause does not require it to employ the least burdensome means to accomplish its goal."). A closely divided Court had earlier ruled that, in time of war, the deportation of an enemy alien may be ordered summarily by executive action, and that due process of law did not require the courts to determine the sufficiency of any hearing that was provided. Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U.S. 160, 173 (1948). Conversely, three of the four dissenting Justices argued that even an enemy alien could not be deported without a fair hearing. Id. at 186–87 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[11] Demore, 538 U.S. at 527–29. Although the Supreme Court in Demore ruled that mandatory detention during the pendency of formal removal proceedings is not unconstitutional per se, the Court did not address whether there are any constitutional limits to the duration of such detention. See Tijani v. Willis, 430 F.3d 1241, 1252 (9th Cir. 2005) (Callahan, J., dissenting) ("The constitutional limit, if any, to the duration of an alien's detention under § 1226, however, was left open by the Supreme Court in Demore.").

[12] See, e.g., Rodriguez v. Robbins, 804 F.3d 1060, 1079, 1088 (9th Cir. 2015), rev'd sub nom. Jennings v. Rodriguez, No. 15-1204 (U.S. Feb. 27, 2018).

[13] Id. at 1074.

[14] Jennings, slip op. at 12–23. See also Johnson v. Chavez, No. 19-897, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. June 29, 2021) (construing federal statutes as plainly authorizing the detention without bond hearings of aliens whose prior removal orders were reinstated following their unlawful reentry into the United States, and who were placed in proceedings to determine whether they would be subject to persecution in their countries of removal).

[15] Although the Supreme Court has not yet addressed the constitutionality of indefinite detention during the pendency of removal proceedings, the Court has previously suggested in Demore v. Kim that aliens may be "detained for the brief period necessary for their removal proceedings." 538 U.S. at 513; see also id. at 526 (noting the "longstanding view that the Government may constitutionally detain deportable aliens during the limited period necessary for their removal proceedings"). Additionally, in a concurring opinion in Demore, Justice Anthony Kennedy declared that a detained alien "could be entitled to an individualized determination as to his risk of flight and dangerousness if the continued detention became unreasonable or unjustified." Id. at 532 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (citing Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 684–86 (2001)).

border).[16] Although the alien had physically entered the United States, the Court determined that he could be "'treated' for due process purposes 'as if stopped at the border'" because he was encountered only twenty-five yards inside the United States and essentially remained "on the threshold" of entry.[17] According to the Court, the "century-old rule" that aliens seeking initial entry into the United States lack due process rights "would be meaningless if it became inoperative as soon as an arriving alien set foot on U.S. soil."[18] The Court observed, moreover, that only aliens "who have established connections in this country" have due process protections in their removal proceedings.[19]

The Supreme Court's jurisprudence indicates that, although aliens present within the United States generally have due process protections, the extent of those constitutional protections may depend on certain factors, including whether the alien has been lawfully admitted or developed ties to the United States, and whether the alien has engaged in specified criminal activity. Therefore, even with regard to aliens present within the United States, the Court has sometimes deferred to Congress's policy judgments that limit the ability of some classes of aliens to contest their detention or removal.

Amdt5.6.3 Military Proceedings and Procedural Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has considered the extent to which the courts should review proceedings before military tribunals for the purpose of determining compliance with the Due Process Clause. In In re Yamashita,[1] the majority denied a petition for certiorari and petitions for writs of habeas corpus to review the conviction of a Japanese war criminal by a military commission sitting in the Philippine Islands. The Court held that, because the military commission, in admitting evidence to which objection had been made, had not violated any act of Congress, a treaty, or a military command defining its authority, its rulings on evidence and on the mode of conducting the proceedings were not reviewable by the courts. Furthermore, in Johnson v. Eisentrager,[2] the Court overruled a lower court decision that, in reliance upon the dissenting opinion in Yamashita, had held that the Due Process Clause required that the legality of the conviction of enemy alien belligerents by military tribunals should be tested by the writ of habeas corpus.

The Executive Branch's failure to provide any type of proceeding for prisoners alleged to be "enemy combatants," whether in a military tribunal or a federal court, was at issue in Hamdi

---

[16] No. 19-161, slip op. at 1 (U.S. June 25, 2020) (Thomas, J., concurring).

[17] Id. at 35–36 (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212, 215 (1953), superseded by statute, Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009–546).

[18] Id. at 35

[19] Id. at 2.

[1] 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

[2] 339 U.S. 763 (1950).

v. Rumsfeld.[3] During a military action in Afghanistan,[4] a United States citizen, Yaser Hamdi, was taken prisoner. The Executive Branch argued that it had the authority to hold such an "enemy combatant" while providing him with limited recourse to the federal courts. The Court agreed that the President was authorized to detain a United States citizen seized in Afghanistan.[5] However, the Court ruled that the government could not detain the petitioner indefinitely for purposes of interrogation, but must give him the opportunity to offer evidence that he is not an enemy combatant. At a minimum, the petitioner must be given notice of the asserted factual basis for holding him, must be given a fair chance to rebut that evidence before a neutral decision-maker, and must be allowed to consult an attorney.[6]

Without dissent, in Hiatt v. Brown,[7] the Court reversed the judgment of a lower court that had discharged a prisoner serving a sentence imposed by a court-martial because of errors that had deprived the prisoner of due process of law. The Court held that the court below had erred in extending its review, for the purpose of determining compliance with the Due Process Clause, to such matters as the propositions of law set forth in the staff judge advocate's report, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction, the adequacy of the pre-trial investigation, and the competence of the law member and defense counsel. In summary, Justice Tom Clark wrote: "In this case the court-martial had jurisdiction of the person accused and the offense charged, and acted within its lawful powers. The correction of any errors it may have committed is for the military authorities which are alone authorized to review its decision."[8] Similarly, in Burns v. Wilson,[9] the Court denied a petition for the writ to review a conviction by a military tribunal on the Island of Guam in which the petitioners asserted that their imprisonment resulted from proceedings that violated their constitutional rights. Four Justices, with whom Justice Sherman Minton concurred, maintained that judicial review is limited to determining whether the military tribunal, or court-martial, had given fair consideration to each of petitioners' allegations, and does not embrace an opportunity "to prove de novo" what petitioners had "failed to prove in the military courts." According to Justice Minton, however, if the military court had jurisdiction, its action is not reviewable.

---

[3] 542 U.S. 507 (2004).

[4] In response to the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on New York City's World Trade Center and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., Congress passed the "Authorization for Use of Military Force," Pub. L. No. 107-40, which served as the basis for military action against the Taliban government of Afghanistan and the al Qaeda forces that were harbored there.

[5] There was no opinion of the Court in Hamdi. Rather, a plurality opinion, authored by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, Justice Anthony Kennedy, and Justice Stephen Breyer) relied on the "Authorization for Use of Military Force" passed by Congress to support the detention. Justice Clarence Thomas also found that the Executive Branch had the power to detain the petitioner, but he based his conclusion on Article II of the Constitution.

[6] 542 U.S. at 533, 539 (2004). Although only a plurality of the Court voted for both continued detention of the petitioner and for providing these due process rights, four other Justices would have extended due process at least this far. Justice David Souter, joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, while rejecting the argument that Congress had authorized such detention, agreed with the plurality as to the requirement of providing minimal due process. Id. at 553 (concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in judgment). Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Justice John Paul Stevens, denied that such congressional authorization was possible without a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and thus would have required a criminal prosecution of the petitioner. Id. at 554 (dissenting).

[7] 339 U.S. 103 (1950).

[8] 339 U.S. at 111.

[9] 346 U.S. 137 (1953).

Amdt5.7 Substantive Due Process and the Federal Government

Amdt5.7.1 Overview of Substantive Due Process Requirements

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments' Due Process Clauses—which prohibit the government from depriving any person of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law"—to protect certain fundamental constitutional rights from federal government interference, regardless of the procedures that the government follows when enforcing the law.[1] Substantive due process has generally dealt with specific subject areas, such as liberty of contract, marriage, or privacy.

The judicial notion of substantive due process developed early in U.S. history. State court judges attempted to formulate a theory of "natural rights" to limit government interference with private property rights.[2] These "vested rights" jurists found in the "law of the land" and the "due process" clauses of the states' constitutions a restriction upon the substantive content of legislation.[3] Other jurists opposed this "vested rights" theory of property protection, arguing that the state's written constitution was its supreme law, and that judges should not look beyond the constitution to the "unwritten law" of "natural rights" when scrutinizing state legislation.[4] Some opponents of this theory argued that the government's "police power" allowed the state to regulate the use and holding of property in the public interest, subject only to the specific prohibitions of the state's written constitution.[5]

The Supreme Court recognized that the Fifth Amendment guaranteed some form of substantive due process in the years leading up to the Civil War. In its 1857 opinion in Scott v. Sanford, the Court declared that the Missouri Compromise, which prohibited slavery in some U.S. territories, had been an unconstitutional deprivation of slaveholders' property.[6] The Court wrote that an act of Congress that deprived "a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular territory of the United States, and who had committed no offence against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law."[7] After the Civil War and the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, the Supreme Court recognized due process

---

[1] E.g., Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 386–87 (1978) (citing Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1 (1967)).

[2] Compare the remarks of Justices Samuel Chase and James Iredell in Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386, 388–89, 398–99 (1798).

[3] The full account is related in E. Corwin, Liberty Against Government ch. 3 (1948). The pathbreaking decision of the era was Wynhamer v. The People, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856).

[4] See Edward S. Corwin, Basic Doctrine of American Constitutional Law, 12 Mich. L. Rev. 247, 247–48 (1914).

[5] See id.

[6] 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 451–52 (1857), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV.

[7] Scott, 60 U.S. (19 How.) at 450.

guarantees with regard to state legislation.[8] The Court applied a robust notion of substantive due process to strike down economic legislation prior to the Great Depression Era.[9]

Beginning in the twentieth century, the Court developed the doctrine of noneconomic substantive due process under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, beginning with cases in which the Court recognized a constitutional right to privacy.[10] The Court recognized that the Constitution's due process guarantees protected additional fundamental rights from government interference, including the right to use contraceptives, to marry, and to engage in certain adult consensual intimate conduct.[11] However, since the 1980s, the Court has generally declined to invalidate government actions on substantive due process grounds, with a few exceptions.[12] In 2022, the Court further signaled a potential retreat from noneconomic substantive due process when it reversed the position it had held for nearly five decades to hold that the right to abortion is not a constitutionally protected fundamental right.[13]

Amdt5.7.2 Economic Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has sustained several federal laws and regulations addressing economic matters, imposed under powers specifically granted to the Federal Government, over objections based on the Due Process Clause. For example, Congress may require the owner of a vessel entering United States ports, and on which alien seamen are afflicted with specified diseases, to bear the cost of hospitalizing such persons.[1] Congress may prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of filled milk[2] or the importation of convict-made goods into any state where their receipt, possession, or sale is a violation of local law.[3] It may require employers to bargain collectively with representatives of their employees chosen in a manner prescribed by law; to reinstate employees discharged in violation of law; and to permit use of a [8] Amdt14.S1.3 Due Process Generally.

[9] Amdt14.S1.6.2.2 Liberty of Contract and Lochner v. New York.

[10] Warren and Brandeis, The Right of Privacy, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193 (1890). See Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928) (Brandeis, J., dissenting) (arguing against the admissibility in criminal trials of secretly taped telephone conversations). In Olmstead, Justice Louis Brandeis wrote:

> The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. . . . They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

277 U.S. at 478. Amdt14.S1.6.3.2 Historical Background on Noneconomic Substantive Due Process.

[11] Amdt14.S1.6.1 Overview of Substantive Due Process.

[12] See id.

[13] See id.

[1] United States v. New York S.S. Co., 269 U.S. 304 (1925).

[2] United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938); Carolene Products Co. v. United States, 323 U.S. 18 (1944).

[3] Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 299 U.S. 334 (1937).

company-owned hall for union meetings.[4] Subject to First Amendment considerations, Congress may regulate the postal service to deny its facilities to persons who would use them for purposes contrary to public policy.[5]

Amdt5.7.3 Equal Protection

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Unlike the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fifth Amendment "contains no equal protection clause and it provides no guaranty against discriminatory legislation by Congress."[1] Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has held that "[e]qual protection analysis in the Fifth Amendment area is the same as that under the Fourteenth Amendment."[2] Even before the Court reached this position, it had assumed that "discrimination, if gross enough, is equivalent to confiscation and subject under the Fifth Amendment to challenge and annulment."[3] It appears that Chief Justice William Howard Taft first described this theory when he observed that the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses are "associated" and that "[i]t may be that they overlap, that a violation of one may involve at times the violation of the other, but the spheres of the protection they offer are not coterminous. . . . [Due process] tends to secure equality of law in the sense that it makes a required minimum of protection for every one's right of life, liberty and property, which the Congress or the legislature may not withhold. Our whole system of law is predicated on the general, fundamental principle of equality of application of the law."[4]

Thus, in Bolling v. Sharpe,[5] a companion case to Brown v. Board of Education,[6] the Court struck down racial segregation in D.C. public schools as a violation of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, determining that due process guarantees implicitly include a guarantee of equal protection. The Court wrote, "The Fifth Amendment, which is applicable in the District of Columbia, does not contain an equal protection clause as does the Fourteenth Amendment which applies only to the states. But the concepts of equal protection and due process, both

---

[4] E.g., Virginian Ry. v. System Federation No. 40, 300 U.S. 515 (1937); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937); Railway Employes' Dep't v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225 (1956); NLRB v. Stowe Spinning Co., 336 U.S. 226 (1949); NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Tel. Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938).

[5] Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727 (1878); Rowan v. Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728 (1970).

[1] Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U.S. 329, 337 (1943); Helvering v. Lerner Stores Corp., 314 U.S. 463, 468 (1941).

[2] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 93 (1976); Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 638 n.2 (1975); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 214–18 (1995).

[3] Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548, 585 (1937). See also Currin v. Wallace, 306 U.S. 1, 13–14 (1939).

[4] Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312, 331 (1921). See also Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100 (1943).

[5] 347 U.S. 497, 499–500 (1954).

[6] 347 U.S. 483 (1954). With respect to race discrimination, the Court had earlier utilized its supervisory authority over the lower federal courts and its power to construe statutes to reach results that the Court might have grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause if the cases had come from the states. E.g., Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24 (1948); Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R.R., 323 U.S. 192 (1944); Railroad Trainmen v. Howard, 343 U.S. 768 (1952). See also Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co., 328 U.S. 217 (1946).

stemming from our American ideal of fairness, are not mutually exclusive. . . . [A]s this Court has recognized, discrimination may be so unjustifiable as to be violative of due process."[7]

In subsequent cases, the Court has applied its Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence to federal legislation that contained classifications based on sex[8] and whether a person was born to married parents,[9] and that set standards of eligibility for food stamps.[10] However, almost all legislation involves some degree of classification among particular categories of persons, things, or events, and, just as the Equal Protection Clause itself does not outlaw "reasonable" classifications, neither does the Due Process Clause necessarily forbid social and economic legislation that contains arbitrary line-drawing.[11] Thus, for example, the Court has sustained a law imposing greater punishment for an offense involving rights of property of the United States than for a like offense involving a private person's right of privacy.[12] A veterans law that extended certain educational benefits to all veterans who had served "on active duty" and thereby excluded conscientious objectors from eligibility was held to be sustainable. The Court held that Congress could reasonably conclude that the disruption caused by military service was qualitatively and quantitatively different from that caused by alternative service, and that the educational benefits would make military service more attractive.[13]

Although the "federal sovereign, like the States, must govern impartially," there may be "overriding national interests which justify selective federal legislation that would be unacceptable for an individual State."[14] One example is the paramount federal power over immigration and naturalization, which allows the federal government to classify among [7] Bolling, 347 U.S. at 499. See also United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 769–70 (2013) (holding that Section 3 of the Defense of Marriage Act—a provision that restricted federal recognition of same-sex marriages by specifying that, for any federal statute, ruling, regulation, or interpretation by an administrative agency, the word "spouse" would mean a husband or wife of the opposite sex—violated the Fifth Amendment's due process and equal protection components).

[8] Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973); Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977). But see Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981); Califano v. Jobst, 434 U.S. 47 (1977).

[9] Compare Jiminez v. Weinberger, 417 U.S. 628 (1974), with Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495 (1976).

[10] Dep't of Agriculture v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508 (1973). See also Dep't of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528 (1973).

[11] Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78, 81 (1971); FCC v. Beach Commc'ns, 508 U.S. 307 (1993) (exemption from cable TV regulation of facilities that serve only dwelling units under common ownership); Lyng v. Castillo, 477 U.S. 635 (1986) (Food Stamp Act limitation of benefits to households of related persons who prepare meals together). With respect to courts and criminal legislation, see Hurtado v. United States, 410 U.S. 578 (1973); Marshall v. United States, 414 U.S. 417 (1974); United States v. MacCollom, 426 U.S. 317 (1976).

[12] Hill v. United States ex rel. Weiner, 300 U.S. 105, 109 (1937). See also District of Columbia v. Brooke, 214 U.S. 138 (1909); Panama R.R. v. Johnson, 264 U.S. 375 (1924); Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U.S. 329 (1943).

[13] Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361 (1974). See also Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498 (1975) (military law that classified men more adversely than women deemed rational because it had the effect of compensating for prior discrimination against women). Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598 (1985) (selective prosecution of persons who turned themselves in or were reported by others as having failed to register for the draft does not deny equal protection because there was no showing that these men were selected for prosecution because of their protest activities). See also Bowen v. Owens, 476 U.S. 340, 341, 350 (1986) (Social Security Act provision that authorized payment of survivor's benefits to a "widowed spouse who remarried after age 60, but not to a similarly situated divorced widowed spouse" does not deny equal protection); Califano v. Jobst, 434 U.S. 47, 48–52 (1977) (sustaining a Social Security Act provision that revoked "disabled dependents' benefits" of any person who married unless that person married someone who was also entitled to receive disabled dependents' benefits).

[14] Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 100 (1976). See also United States v. Vaello-Madero, No. 20-303, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Apr. 21, 2022) (holding that the Fifth Amendment's equal protection component did not require Congress to extend Supplemental Security Income benefits to residents of Puerto Rico to the same extent as it made those benefits available to residents of the states).

categories of persons upon some grounds—alienage, naturally, but also other suspect and quasi-suspect categories[15]—in ways that states cannot.[16]

Amdt5.7.4 Federal Taxation

Amdt5.7.4.1 Restrictions on Federal Government Taxation

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

In laying taxes, the federal government is less narrowly restricted by the Fifth Amendment than are the states by the Fourteenth.[1] The federal government may tax property belonging to its citizens, even if such property is never situated within the jurisdiction of the United States,[2] and it may tax the income of a citizen resident abroad that is derived from property located at his residence.[3] The difference is explained by the fact that protection of the federal government follows the citizen wherever he goes, whereas the benefits of state government accrue only to persons and property within the state's borders. The Supreme Court has said that, in the absence of an equal protection clause, "a claim of unreasonable classification or inequality in the incidence or application of a tax raises no question under the Fifth Amendment . . . ."[4]

Consistent with this holding, the Supreme Court has sustained, over charges of unfair differentiation between persons: a graduated income tax;[5] a higher tax on oleomargarine than on butter;[6] an excise tax on "puts" but not on "calls";[7] a tax on the income of businesses operated by corporations but not on similar enterprises operated by individuals;[8] an income

---

[15] See, e.g., Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 315 (1993) (upholding regulations generally providing for the release of detained alien juveniles only to parents, close relatives, or legal guardians during pendency of deportation proceedings but not exclusion proceedings against a Fifth Amendment equal protection challenge).

[16] For example, the power to regulate immigration has permitted the federal government to discriminate on the basis of alienage, at least so long as the discrimination satisfies the rational basis standard of review. See Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 79–80, 83 (1976) (holding that federal conditions upon alien eligibility for public assistance were not "wholly irrational," and observing that "[in] the exercise of its broad power over naturalization and immigration, Congress regularly makes rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens . . . The fact that an Act of Congress treats aliens differently from citizens does not in itself imply that such disparate treatment is 'invidious.'"). Nonetheless, with regard to statutes that touch upon immigration-related matters but do not address the entry or exclusion of aliens, the Court has suggested that if such a law discriminates on the basis of suspect factors other than alienage or national origin a more "exacting standard of review" may be required. See Sessions v. Morales-Santana, 137 S. Ct. 1678, 1693–94 (2017); Sessions v. Morales-Santana, No. 15-1191, slip op. at 2 (2017) (distinguishing between immigration and citizenship contexts, and applying heightened scrutiny to hold that a derivative citizenship statute that discriminated by gender violated equal protection principles).

[1] For more information on due process and state taxation, see Amdt14.S1.5.7.1 State Taxes and Due Process Generally to Amdt14.S1.5.7.4 Collection of State Taxes and Due Process.

[2] United States v. Bennett, 232 U.S. 299, 307 (1914).

[3] Cook v. Tait, 265 U.S. 47 (1924).

[4] Helvering v. Lerner Stores Co., 314 U.S. 463, 468 (1941).

[5] Brushaber v. Union Pac. R.R, 240 U.S. 1, 24 (1916).

[6] McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27, 61 (1904).

[7] Treat v. White, 181 U.S. 264 (1901).

[8] Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107 (1911).

tax on foreign corporations, based on their income from sources within the United States, even though domestic corporations were taxed on income from all sources;[9] a tax on foreign-built yachts but not upon domestic yachts;[10] a tax on employers of eight or more persons, with exemptions for agricultural labor and domestic service;[11] a gift tax law embodying a plan of graduations and exemptions under which donors of the same amount might be liable for different sums;[12] an Alaska statute imposing license taxes only on nonresident fishermen;[13] an act that taxed the manufacture of oil and fertilizer from herring at a higher rate than similar processing of other fish or fish offal;[14] an excess profits tax that defined "invested capital" with reference to the original cost of the property rather than to its present value;[15] an undistributed profits tax in the computation of which special credits were allowed to certain taxpayers;[16] an estate tax upon the estate of a deceased spouse in respect of the moiety of the surviving spouse where the effect of the dissolution of the community is to enhance the value of the survivor's moiety;[17] and a tax on nonprofit mutual insurers, even though such insurers organized before a certain date were exempt, as there was a rational basis for the discrimination.[18]

Amdt5.7.4.2 Retroactive Federal Taxes

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Congress has sometimes given retroactive effect to its tax laws by, for example, making them effective from the tax year's beginning or from the date that the bill that became the tax law was introduced.[1] Absent some peculiar circumstance, the Supreme Court has never determined that application of an income tax statute to the entire calendar year in which enactment took place has denied a person due process.[2] The Court has reasoned that a tax is not a penalty or contractual liability but rather "a way of apportioning the cost of government among those who in some measure are privileged to enjoy its benefits and must bear its [9] Nat'l Paper Co. v. Bowers, 266 U.S. 373 (1924).

[10] Billings v. United States, 232 U.S. 261, 282 (1914).

[11] Steward Mach. Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937); Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619 (1937).

[12] Bromley v. McCaughn, 280 U.S. 124 (1929).

[13] Haavik v. Alaska Packers Ass'n, 263 U.S. 510 (1924).

[14] Alaska Fish Co. v. Smith, 255 U.S. 44 (1921).

[15] LaBelle Iron Works v. United States, 256 U.S. 377 (1921).

[16] Helvering v. Nw. Steel Mills, 311 U.S. 46 (1940).

[17] Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340 (1945); cf. Coolidge v. Long, 282 U.S. 582 (1931).

[18] United States v. Maryland Savings-Share Ins. Corp., 400 U.S. 4 (1970) (per curiam).

[1] United States v. Darusmont, 449 U.S. 292, 296–97 (1981).

[2] Stockdale v. Ins. Companies, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 323, 331, 332 (1874); Brushaber v. Union Pac. R.R., 240 U.S. 1, 20 (1916); Cooper v. United States, 280 U.S. 409, 411 (1930); Milliken v. United States, 283 U.S. 15, 21 (1931); Reinecke v. Smith, 289 U.S. 172, 175 (1933); United States v. Hudson, 299 U.S. 498, 500–01 (1937); Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 146, 148–50 (1938); Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340, 355 (1945); United States v. Darusmont, 449 U.S. 292, 297 (1981).

burdens."[3] Because "no citizen enjoys immunity from that burden, its retroactive imposition does not necessarily infringe due process."[4] The Court held valid a special income tax on profits realized from the sale of silver, retroactive for 35 days, which was approximately the period during which the silver purchase bill was before Congress.[5] An income tax law, made retroactive to the beginning of the calendar year in which it was adopted, was found constitutional as applied to the gain from the sale, shortly before its enactment, of property received as a gift during the year.[6] Retroactive assessment of penalties for fraud or negligence,[7] or of an additional tax on the income of a corporation used to avoid a surtax on its shareholder,[8] does not deprive the taxpayer of property without due process of law. Moreover, an additional excise tax imposed upon property still held for sale, after one excise tax had been paid by a previous owner, does not violate the Due Process Clause.[9] The Court similarly upheld a transfer tax measured in part by the value of property held jointly by a husband and wife, including that which came to the joint tenancy as a gift from the decedent spouse.[10] It also upheld the inclusion in a trust settlor's gross income of income accruing to a revocable trust during any period when the settlor had the power to revoke or modify the trust.[11]

Although the Supreme Court during the 1920s struck down gift taxes imposed retroactively upon gifts that were made and completely vested before the enactment of the taxing statute,[12] it later distinguished those decisions and limited their precedential value.[13] In United States v. Carlton, the Court declared that "[t]he due process standard to be applied to tax statutes with retroactive effect . . . is the same as that generally applicable to retroactive economic legislation"—retroactive application of legislation must be shown to be "'justified by a rational legislative purpose.'"[14] Applying that principle, the Court upheld retroactive application of a 1987 amendment limiting application of a federal estate tax deduction originally enacted in 1986. Congress's purpose was "neither illegitimate nor arbitrary," the Court noted, since Congress had acted "to correct what it reasonably viewed as a mistake in the original 1986 provision that would have created a significant and unanticipated revenue loss." Also, "Congress acted promptly and established only a modest period of retroactivity."

---

[3] Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 146–47 (1938).

[4] Id.

[5] United States v. Hudson, 299 U.S. 498 (1937). See also Stockdale v. Ins. Companies, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 323, 331, 341 (1874); Brushaber v. Union Pac. R.R., 240 U.S. 1, 20 (1916); Lynch v. Hornby, d247 U.S. 339, 343 (1918).

[6] Cooper v. United States, 280 U.S. 409 (1930); see also Reinecke v. Smith, 289 U.S. 172 (1933).

[7] Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391 (1938).

[8] Helvering v. Nat'l Grocery Co., 304 U.S. 282 (1938).

[9] Patton v. Brady, 184 U.S. 608 (1902).

[10] Tyler v. United States, 281 U.S. 497 (1930); United States v. Jacobs, 306 U.S. 363 (1939).

[11] Reinecke v. Smith, 289 U.S. 172 (1933).

[12] Untermyer v. Anderson, 276 U.S. 440 (1928); Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142 (1927), modified, 276 U.S. 594 (1928); Nichols v. Coolidge, 274 U.S. 531 (1927). See also Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312 (1932) (invalidating as arbitrary and capricious a conclusive presumption that gifts made within two years of death were made in contemplation of death).

[13] Untermyer was distinguished in United States v. Hemme, 476 U.S. 558, 568 (1986), upholding retroactive application of unified estate and gift taxation to a taxpayer as to whom the overall impact was minimal and not oppressive. All three cases were distinguished in United States v. Carlton, 512 U.S. 26, 30 (1994), as having been "decided during an era characterized by exacting review of economic legislation under an approach that 'has long since been discarded.'" The Court noted further that Untermyer and Blodgett had been limited to situations involving creation of a wholly new tax, and that Nichols had involved a retroactivity period of 12 years. Id.

[14] 512 U.S. 26, 30, 31 (1994) (quoting Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 16–17 (1976)). These principles apply to estate and gift taxes as well as to income taxes, the Court added. 512 U.S. at 34.

The fact that the taxpayer had transferred stock in reliance on the original enactment was not dispositive, since "[t]ax legislation is not a promise, and a taxpayer has no vested right in the Internal Revenue Code."[15]

Amdt5.7.5 Marriage and Substantive Due Process

In a series of Fourteenth Amendment due process and equal protection cases, the Supreme Court has identified the right to marry as a "fundamental" interest that necessitates "critical examination" of governmental restrictions that "interfere directly and substantially" with the right.[1] However, the Court has rejected some Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause challenges to federal laws that regulate the incidents of, or prerequisites for, marriage, determining that such laws were not entitled to rigorous scrutiny.[2] For example, in Califano v. Jobst,[3] a unanimous Court sustained a Social Security Act provision that revoked "disabled dependents' benefits" of any person who married unless that person married someone who was also entitled to receive disabled dependents' benefits.[4] Plaintiff, a recipient of such benefits, married another person with a disability who was not qualified for the benefits, and the plaintiff's benefits were terminated.[5] The plaintiff alleged that distinguishing between classes of "persons who married eligible persons" and "persons who married ineligible persons" infringed upon his right to marry in violation of the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause.[6]

The Court rejected the plaintiff's argument, finding that benefit entitlement was not based upon need but rather upon actual dependency upon the insured wage earner; marriage, Congress could have assumed, generally terminates the dependency upon a parent-wage earner.[7] Therefore, Congress could, as an administrative convenience, designate marriage as the benefits' terminating point, except when both marriage partners were receiving benefits, in order to lessen hardship and recognize that dependency was likely to continue.[8] The marriage rule was therefore not to be strictly scrutinized or invalidated "simply because some persons who might otherwise have married were deterred by the rule or because some who did marry were burdened thereby."[9]

---

[15] 512 U.S. at 33.

[1] E.g., Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 386–87 (1978) (citing Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1 (1967)). See also, e.g., Obergefell v. Hodges, 576 U.S. 644, 664 (2015) (collecting cases).

[2] 434 U.S. at 383–87.

[3] 434 U.S. 47 (1977).

[4] Id. at 48–52.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 53–58. For additional information on the Supreme Court's interpretations of the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, see Amdt5.7.3 Equal Protection.

[7] Califano, 434 U.S. at 53–58.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 54. See also Bowen v. Owens, 476 U.S. 340, 341, 350 (1986) (Social Security Act provision that authorized payment of survivor's benefits to a "widowed spouse who remarried after age 60, but not to a similarly situated divorced widowed spouse" does not deny equal protection); Mathews v. De Castro, 429 U.S. 181 (1976) (Social Security Act provision providing benefits to a married woman under 62 with dependent children in her care whose husband retires or becomes disabled but denying such benefits to a divorced woman under 62 with dependents represents Congress's rational judgment about the likely dependency of married but not divorced women and does not deny equal protection); Califano v. Boles, 443 U.S. 282 (1979) (limitation of certain Social Security benefits to widows and divorced wives of wage earners does not deprive mother of a child born out of wedlock who was never married to wage earner of equal protection).

Amdt5.7.6 Abortion and Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

In 1973, the Supreme Court determined in Roe v. Wade that the U.S. Constitution protects a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.[1] The constitutional basis for the decision rested upon the conclusion that the right of privacy "founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action" encompassed a woman's decision to carry a pregnancy to term.[2] Following Roe, several federal abortion restrictions were challenged as infringing the analogous right guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause.[3] In 2022, a majority of the Court in Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization[4] overruled Roe and a 1992 abortion decision, Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey.[5] In the following cases, which upheld federal abortion restrictions, the overruling of Roe and Casey would probably not affect the restrictions' continued enforcement.

In Harris v. McRae, the Court upheld the Hyde Amendment, an annual appropriations provision that restricts the use of federal funds to pay for abortions provided through the Medicaid program.[6] The Court found that the Hyde Amendment did not violate either the Due Process or Equal Protection Clauses of the Fifth Amendment, and did not violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment.[7] While the Court acknowledged that the liberty guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, in particular, protects a woman's freedom of choice for certain personal decisions, it does not "confer an entitlement to such funds as may be necessary to realize all the advantages of that freedom."[8] In Harris, the Court also recognized the right of a state participating in the Medicaid program to fund only those medically necessary abortions for which it received federal reimbursement.[9]

In 1991, the Court upheld on both statutory and constitutional grounds the Department of Health and Human Services' regulations restricting recipients of federal family planning funding from using federal funds to counsel women about abortion.[10] In Rust v. Sullivan, the

---

[1] 410 U.S. 113 (1973), overruled by Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Org., No. 19-1392 (U.S. June 24, 2022). For further discussion on Roe, see Amdt14.S1.6.4.1 Abortion, Roe v. Wade, and Pre-Dobbs Doctrine.

[2] Roe, 410 U.S. at 152–53.

[3] See, e.g., Gonzales v. Carhart, 550 U.S. 124 (2007) (upholding federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, 18 U.S.C. § 1531).

[4] Dobbs, No. 19-1392.

[5] 505 U.S. 833 (1992), overruled by Dobbs, No. 19-1392.

[6] 448 U.S. 297 (1980). In 1976, Representative Henry J. Hyde first offered the amendment to the Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare Appropriation Act, 1977, that restricted the use of appropriated funds to pay for abortions provided through the Medicaid program. See Act of Sept. 30, 1976, Pub. L. No. 94-439, § 209, 90 Stat. 1418, 1434 ("None of the funds contained in this Act shall be used to perform abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered if the fetus were carried to term.").

[7] Harris, 448 U.S. at 326.

[8] Id. at 318.

[9] Id. at 310.

[10] Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991).

Court determined that a woman's right to an abortion was not burdened by the regulations, which implement Title X of the Public Health Service Act.[11] The Court reasoned that there was no constitutional violation because the government has no duty to subsidize an activity simply because it is constitutionally protected and because a woman is "in no worse position than if Congress had never enacted Title X."[12]

In 2007, the Court applied the "undue burden" standard[13] adopted in Casey to evaluate abortion regulations to the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.[14] In Gonzales v. Carhart, the Court considered whether the federal law was overbroad, prohibiting both the standard dilation and evacuation (D&E) abortion method—the most common method during the second trimester of pregnancy—and the intact D&E method, described by some as "partial-birth" abortion because the fetus is more fully developed at the time the procedure is performed. Relying on the law's plain language, the Court determined that it could not be interpreted to encompass the standard D&E method.[15] The Court noted that the standard D&E method involves the removal of the fetus in pieces.[16] In contrast, the federal law uses the phrase "delivers a living fetus."[17] The Court explained that the standard D&E method "does not involve the delivery of a fetus because it requires the removal of fetal parts that are ripped from the fetus as they are pulled through the cervix."[18] The Court also identified the law's specific requirement of an "overt act" that kills the fetus as evidence of its inapplicability to the standard D&E method, maintaining that the "distinction matters because, unlike intact D&E, standard D&E does not involve a delivery followed by a fatal act."[19] Ultimately, the Court determined that the law did not impose an undue burden on a woman's ability to obtain an abortion because it prohibited only the less frequently performed intact D&E abortion method.

In Gonzales, the Court also concluded that the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act was not unconstitutionally vague because it provides doctors with a reasonable opportunity to know what conduct is prohibited.[20] Unlike the Nebraska partial-birth abortion law invalidated by the Court in Stenberg v. Carhart,[21] which prohibited the delivery of a "substantial portion" of the fetus,[22] the federal law includes "anatomical landmarks" that identify when an abortion procedure will be subject to the act's prohibitions.[23] Thus, the Court observed: "[I]f an abortion procedure does not involve the delivery of a living fetus to one of these 'anatomical landmarks'—where, depending on the presentation, either the fetal head or the fetal trunk past the navel is outside the body of the mother—the prohibitions of the Act do not apply."[24]

---

[11] Id. at 201–02.

[12] Id. at 203.

[13] Planned Parenthood of Se. Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 876–77 (1992). In Casey, a plurality of the Court adopted an "undue burden" standard for examining abortion regulations, maintaining that this standard better recognized the need to reconcile the government's interest in potential life with a woman's right to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy. The plurality indicated that an undue burden exists if the purpose or effect of an abortion regulation is "to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion before the fetus attains viability." Id. at 878.

[14] Gonzales v. Carhart, 550 U.S. 124 (2007).

[15] Id. at 150.

[16] Id. at 152.

[17] 18 U.S.C. § 1531(b)(1)(A).

[18] Gonzales, 550 U.S. at 152.

[19] Id. at 153.

[20] Id. at 149.

[21] 530 U.S. 914 (2000).

[22] Stenberg, 530 U.S. at 922. See also Neb. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 28-326(9) (Supp. 1999).

[23] Gonzales, 550 U.S. at 151. See also 18 U.S.C. § 1531(b)(1)(A).

[24] Gonzales, 550 U.S. at 148.

The Gonzales Court further observed that the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act's inclusion of a scienter or knowledge requirement alleviated any vagueness concerns. Because the law applies only when a doctor "deliberately and intentionally" delivers the fetus to an anatomical landmark, the Court determined that a doctor performing the standard D&E method would not face criminal liability if a fetus were delivered beyond the prohibited points by mistake.[25] According to the Court, the scienter requirement "narrow[s] the scope of the Act's prohibition and limit[s] prosecutorial discretion."[26]

Amdt5.7.7 Informational Privacy and Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

In a few cases, the Supreme Court has upheld federal record keeping or disclosure requirements against objections that they violated a purported Fifth Amendment substantive due process right to informational privacy. In California Bankers Association v. Schultz, the Court determined that the federal Bank Secrecy Act's transaction recordkeeping provisions did not violate the due process rights of banks or their depositors by subjecting them to arbitrary or burdensome requirements.[1] In its 2011 decision in National Aeronautics & Space Administration (NASA) v. Nelson, the Supreme Court unanimously ruled against NASA employees who argued that the extensive background checks required to work at NASA facilities violated their constitutional privacy rights.[2] The Court chose to "assume, without deciding," that the Constitution protects a right to informational privacy.[3] However, it held that such a right would not prevent the government from asking reasonable questions in light of the government's interest as an employer and statutory protections that provide meaningful checks against unwarranted disclosures.[4]

Amdt5.7.8 Right to Travel Abroad and Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be

[25] Id.

[26] Id. at 150.

[1] 416 U.S. 21, 49 (1974).

[2] 562 U.S. 134, 138 (2011).

[3] Id.

[4] Id. See also Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 455–65 (1977) (determining that former President Richard Nixon lacked a significant privacy interest in presidential records that Congress had placed under the custody of an Executive Branch official, in part because of the public interest in the records and the statute's protections against "undue dissemination" of intermingled private materials).

compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects an individual citizen's right to travel abroad from arbitrary and indiscriminate government restrictions.[1] The Court recognized such a right in Kent v. Dulles when it held that the Secretary of State had exceeded his statutory authority by denying passports to citizens solely because they declined to respond to an inquiry about their beliefs and associations.[2] Subsequently, the Court confirmed that the Fifth Amendment protects a right to travel when it struck down Section 6 of the Subversive Activities Act, which made it unlawful for certain members of Communist organizations to apply for, or use, a passport.[3] The Court held that Section 6 "too broadly and indiscriminately restrict[ed] the right to travel and thereby abridge[d] the liberty guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment."[4] However, the Court has acknowledged that the federal government may restrict citizens' travel abroad to particular areas of the world for national security reasons.[5]

Amdt5.7.9 Right of Access to Federal Courts and Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Many of the Supreme Court's cases on due process and the right of access to courts have arisen under the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] The Court has held that, in limited circumstances, litigants have a substantive due process right of access to state courts under the Fourteenth Amendment.[2] For example, due process guarantees prohibit a state from denying welfare assistance recipients access to state courts to dissolve their marriage solely because they cannot afford to pay court fees and costs.[3]

In one case, the Court addressed whether the Fifth Amendment provides a similar right in federal bankruptcy proceedings.[4] In United States v. Kras, the Court rejected an indigent bankruptcy petitioner's constitutional challenge to a requirement that a petitioner pay fees required under the Bankruptcy Act and a federal court order in order to obtain discharge of his

---

[1] E.g., Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 505 (1964). For information on the right to travel between states, see Amdt14.S1.2.1 Privileges or Immunities of Citizens and the Slaughter-House Cases to Amdt14.S1.2.2 Modern Doctrine on Privileges or Immunities Clause and Amdt5.7.3 Equal Protection.

[2] Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 130 (1958).

[3] See Aptheker, 378 U.S. at 501–02.

[4] Id. at 505.

[5] Zemel v. Rusk 381 U.S. 1, 14 (1965).

[1] For more on the Fourteenth Amendment due process right, see Amdt14.S1.8.12.3 Access to Courts, Wealth, and Equal Protection. The Supreme Court has also recognized that the right of access to courts may implicate equal protection guarantees. See Amdt14.S1.8.12.3 Access to Courts, Wealth, and Equal Protection.

[2] Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 374 (1971).

[3] Id.

[4] United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 450 (1973).

debts in a non-asset bankruptcy proceeding.[5] The Court noted that discharge of one's debts in bankruptcy was not a constitutional right and did not constitute the exclusive avenue for relief.[6] It also determined that Congress had a rational basis for enacting the fee requirement.[7]

Amdt5.7.10 Congressional Regulation of Public Utilities and Substantive Due Process

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

When Congress has granted federal agencies jurisdiction over various public utilities, it has typically prescribed standards for fixing utility rates that are substantially identical to the constitutional standards by which the Supreme Court has tested the validity of state action. Consequently, the review of such agencies' orders has seldom turned on constitutional issues. In two cases, however, the Court sustained maximum rates that the Secretary of Agriculture prescribed for stockyard companies only after detailed consideration of numerous items excluded from the rate base or from operating expenses, apparently on the assumption that error with respect to any such item would render the rates confiscatory and void.[1] A few years later, in FPC v. Hope Natural Gas Co.,[2] the Court adopted an entirely different approach. It held that the validity of the Federal Power Commission's order depended upon whether the impact or total effect of the order was just and reasonable, rather than upon the method of computing the rate base. Rates that enable a company to operate successfully, to maintain its financial integrity, to attract capital, and to compensate its investors for the risks assumed cannot be condemned as unjust and unreasonable even though they might produce only a meager return in a rate base computed by the "present fair value" method.

Orders prescribing the form and contents of accounts that public utility companies keep[3]—and statutes requiring a private carrier to furnish the Interstate Commerce Commission with information for valuing its property[4]—have been sustained against the objection that they were arbitrary and invalid. An order of the Secretary of Commerce directing a single common carrier by water to file a summary of its books and records pertaining to its rates was also held not to violate the Fifth Amendment.[5]

---

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 444–49.

[7] Id.

[1] St. Joseph Stock Yards Co. v. United States, 298 U.S. 38 (1936); Denver Union Stock Yards Co. v. United States, 304 U.S. 470 (1938).

[2] 320 U.S. 591 (1944). The result of this case had been foreshadowed by the opinion of Chief Justice Harlan Stone in FPC v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., 315 U.S. 575, 586 (1942), to the effect that the Commission was not bound to use any single formula or combination of formulas when determining rates.

[3] A. T. & T. Co. v. United States, 299 U.S. 232 (1936); United States v. New York Tel. Co., 326 U.S. 638 (1946); Northwestern Co. v. FPC, 321 U.S. 119 (1944).

[4] Valvoline Oil Co. v. United States, 308 U.S. 141 (1939); Champlin Rfg. Co. v. United States, 329 U.S. 29 (1946).

[5] Isbrandtsen-Moller Co. v. United States, 300 U.S. 146 (1937).

Amdt5.8 Void for Vagueness Doctrine

Amdt5.8.1 Overview of Void for Vagueness Doctrine

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Criminal statutes that lack sufficient definiteness or specificity are commonly held "void for vagueness."[1] Such legislation "may run afoul of the Due Process Clause because it fails to give adequate guidance to those who would be law-abiding, to advise defendants of the nature of the offense with which they are charged, or to guide courts in trying those who are accused."[2] The Supreme Court has observed that: "Men of common intelligence cannot be required to guess at the meaning of [an] enactment."[3] In other situations, a statute may be unconstitutionally vague because the statute is worded in a standardless way that invites arbitrary enforcement. In this vein, the Court has invalidated two kinds of laws as "void for vagueness": (1) laws that define criminal offenses; and (2) laws that fix the permissible sentences for criminal offenses.[4] With respect to laws that define criminal offenses, the Court has required that a penal statute define the offense with "sufficient definiteness that ordinary people can understand what conduct is prohibited and in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement."[5] The Court may also apply the void-for-vagueness doctrine to analyze statutes governing civil immigration "removal cases,"[6] "in view of the grave nature of deportation."[7]

---

[1] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308 (1940).

[2] Musser v. Utah, 333 U.S. 95, 97 (1948). The Court stated: "The vagueness may be from uncertainty in regard to persons within the scope of the act . . . or in regard to the applicable tests to ascertain guilt." Id. at 97. In a different case, the Court observed: "Vague laws offend several important values. First, because we assume that man is free to steer between lawful and unlawful conduct, we insist that laws give the person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly. Vague laws may trap the innocent by not providing fair warnings. Second, if arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement is to be prevented, laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. A vague law impermissibly delegates basic policy matters to policemen, judges, and juries for resolution on an ad hoc and subjective basis, with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory applications." Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108–09 (1972), quoted in Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, 455 U.S. 489, 498 (1982).

[3] Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 515–16 (1948). Cf. Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104, 110 (1972). Thus, a state statute imposing severe, cumulative punishments upon contractors with the state who pay their workers less than the "current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed" was held to be "so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application." Connally v. General Const. Co., 269 U.S. 385 (1926). Similarly, a statute that allowed jurors to require an acquitted defendant to pay the costs of the prosecution, elucidated only by the judge's instruction to the jury that the defendant should have to pay the costs only if it thought him guilty of "some misconduct" though innocent of the crime with which he was charged, was found to fall short of the requirements of due process. Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399 (1966).

[4] See United States v. Beckles, 137 S. Ct. 886, 892 (2017).

[5] See Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357 (1983).

[6] Sessions v. Dimaya, 138 S. Ct. 1204, 1213 (2018) (plurality opinion).

[7] Jordan v. De George, 341 U.S. 223, 231 (1951).

Amdt5.8.2 Laws That Define Criminal Offenses and the Requirement of Definiteness

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has held laws unconstitutional when they do not define offenses with enough specificity. For instance, the Court voided for vagueness a criminal statute providing that a person was a "gangster" and subject to fine or imprisonment if he was without lawful employment, had been either convicted at least three times for disorderly conduct or had been convicted of any other crime, and was "known to be a member of a gang of two or more persons." The Court observed that neither common law nor the statute gave the words "gang" or "gangster" definite meaning, that the enforcing agencies and courts were free to construe the terms broadly or narrowly, and that the phrase "known to be a member" was ambiguous. The statute was held void, and the Court refused to allow specification of details in the particular indictment to save it because it was the statute, not the indictment, that prescribed the rules to govern conduct.[1]

A statute may be so vague or threatening to constitutionally protected activity that it can be pronounced wholly unconstitutional; in other words, "unconstitutional on its face."[2] Thus, for instance, a unanimous Court in Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville[3] struck down as invalid on its face a vagrancy ordinance that punished "dissolute persons who go about begging, . . . common night walkers, . . . common railers and brawlers, persons wandering or strolling around from place to place without any lawful purpose or object, habitual loafers, . . . persons neglecting all lawful business and habitually spending their time by frequenting house of ill fame, gaming houses, or places where alcoholic beverages are sold or served, persons able to work but habitually living upon the earnings of their wives or minor children . . . ."[4] The ordinance was found to be facially invalid, according to Justice William Douglas for the Court, because it did not give fair notice, it did not require specific intent to commit an unlawful act, it permitted and encouraged arbitrary and erratic arrests and convictions, it committed too much discretion to policemen, and it criminalized activities that by modern standards are normally innocent.[5]

---

[1] Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939); Edelman v. California, 344 U.S. 357 (1953).

[2] Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972); Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974). Generally, the Court will pronounce wholly void a vague statute that regulates in the area of First Amendment guarantees. Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 509–10 (1948); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940).

[3] 405 U.S. 156 (1972).

[4] 405 U.S. at 156 n.1. Similar concerns regarding vagrancy laws had been expressed previously. See, e.g., Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 540 (1948) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting); Edelman v. California, 344 U.S. 357, 362 (1953) (Black, J., dissenting); Hicks v. District of Columbia, 383 U.S. 252 (1966) (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[5] Similarly, an ordinance making it a criminal offense for three or more persons to assemble on a sidewalk and conduct themselves in a manner annoying to passers-by was found impermissibly vague and void on its face because it encroached on the freedom of assembly. Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971). See Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 382 U.S. 87 (1965) (conviction under statute imposing penalty for failure to "move on" voided); Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964) (conviction on trespass charges arising out of a sit-in at a drugstore lunch counter voided because the trespass statute did not give fair notice that it was a crime to refuse to leave private

In FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc.,[6] the Court held that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) had violated the Fifth Amendment due process rights of Fox Television and ABC, Inc., because the FCC had not given fair notice that broadcasting isolated instances of expletives or brief nudity could lead to punishment. Although 18 U.S.C. § 1464 bans the broadcast of "any obscene, indecent, or profane language," the FCC had a long-standing policy that it would not consider "fleeting" instances of indecency to be actionable, and had confirmed such a policy by issuing industry guidance. The FCC had not announced the new policy until after the instances at issue in the case (isolated utterances of expletives during two live broadcasts aired by Fox Television, and a brief exposure of the nude buttocks of an adult female character by ABC). The Commission policy in place at the time of the broadcasts, therefore, gave the broadcasters no notice that a fleeting instance of indecency could be actionable.

On the other hand, some less vague statutes may be held unconstitutional only in application to the defendant before the Court.[7] For instance, when a statute's terms could be applied both to innocent or protected conduct (such as free speech) and unprotected conduct, but the valuable effects of the law outweigh its potential general harm, such a statute will be held unconstitutional only as applied.[8] Thus, in Palmer v. City of Euclid,[9] an ordinance punishing "suspicious persons" defined as "[a]ny person who wanders about the streets or other public ways or who is found abroad at late or unusual hours in the night without any visible or lawful business and who does not give satisfactory account of himself" was found void only as applied to a particular defendant. In Palmer, the Court found that the defendant, who had dropped off a passenger and begun talking into a two-way radio, was engaging in conduct that could not reasonably be anticipated to fit within the "without any visible or lawful business" portion of the ordinance's definition.

Loitering statutes that are triggered by failure to obey a police dispersal order are suspect, and may be struck down if they leave a police officer absolute discretion to give such orders.[10] Thus, a Chicago ordinance that required police to disperse all persons in the company of "criminal street gang members" while in a public place with "no apparent purpose," failed to meet the "requirement that a legislature establish minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement."[11] The Court noted that the phrase "no apparent purpose" was inherently subjective because its application depended on whether some purpose was "apparent" to the officer, who would presumably have the discretion to ignore such apparent purposes as engaging in idle conversation or enjoying the evening air.[12] On the other hand, when such a statute additionally required a finding that the defendant was intent on causing inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm, it was upheld against facial challenge, at least as applied to a defendant who was interfering with the police's ticketing of a car.[13] premises after being requested to do so); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983) (requirement that person detained in valid Terry stop provide "credible and reliable" identification was facially void as encouraging arbitrary enforcement).

---

[6] 567 U.S. 239, 258 (2012).

[7] When the terms of a vague statute do not threaten a constitutionally protected right, and when the conduct at issue in a particular case is clearly proscribed, then a due process "void for vagueness" challenge is unlikely to be successful. However, when the conduct in question is at the margins of an unclear statute's meaning, it may be struck down as applied. E.g., United States v. National Dairy Corp., 372 U.S. 29 (1963).

[8] Palmer v. City of Euclid, 402 U.S. 544 (1971); Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, 455 U.S. 489, 494–95 (1982).

[9] 402 U.S. 544 (1971).

[10] Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 358 (1983).

[11] City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999).

[12] 527 U.S. at 62.

[13] Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104 (1972).

State statutes with vague standards may nonetheless be upheld if a state court has interpreted the text of the statute with sufficient clarity.[14] Thus, the civil commitment of persons of "such conditions of emotional instability . . . as to render such person irresponsible for his conduct with respect to sexual matters and thereby dangerous to other persons" was upheld by the Supreme Court, based on a state court's construction of the statute as applying only to persons who, by habitual course of misconduct in sexual matters, have evidenced utter lack of power to control their sexual impulses and are likely to inflict injury. The Court viewed the underlying conditions—habitual course of misconduct in sexual matters, lack of power to control impulses, and likelihood of attack on others—as calling for evidence of past conduct pointing to probable future consequences and, therefore, as being as susceptible of proof as many of the criteria consistently applied in criminal proceedings.[15]

Amdt5.8.3 Laws that Define Criminal Offenses and Requirement of Notice

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Conceptually related to the problem of definiteness in criminal statutes is the problem of notice. Ordinarily, ignorance of the law affords no excuse, or, in other instances, the nature of the conduct may sufficiently alert a person that there are laws that he must be observe.[1] On occasion the Court has approved otherwise vague statutes because the statute forbade only "willful" violations, which the Court construed as requiring knowledge of the illegal nature of the proscribed conduct.[2] When conduct is not inherently blameworthy, however, a criminal statute may not impose a legal duty without notice.[3]

The question of notice has also arisen in the context of "judge-made" law. Although the Ex Post Facto Clause forbids retroactive application of state and federal criminal laws, no such explicit restriction applies to the courts. Thus, when a state court abrogated the common law

---

[14] See, e.g., McDonnell v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 2355, 2372–73 (2016) (narrowly interpreting the term "official act" to avoid a construction of the Hobbs Act and federal honest-services fraud statute that would allow public officials to be subject to prosecution without fair notice "for the most prosaic interactions" between officials and their constituents).

[15] Minnesota ex rel. Pearson v. Probate Court, 309 U.S. 270 (1940).

[1] E.g., United States v. Freed, 401 U.S. 601 (1971). Persons may be bound by a novel application of a statute, not supported by Supreme Court or other "fundamentally similar" case precedent, so long as the court can find that, under the circumstance, "unlawfulness . . . is apparent" to the defendant. United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 271–72 (1997).

[2] E.g., Boyce Motor Lines v. United States, 342 U.S. 337 (1952); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 395 (1979). Cf. Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 101–03 (1945) (plurality opinion). The Court has upheld some statutes that did not explicitly include such a mens rea requirement. E.g., Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952).

[3] See, e.g., Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957) (invalidating a municipal code that made it a crime for anyone who had ever been convicted of a felony to remain in the city for more than five days without registering.). In Lambert, the Court emphasized that the act of being in the city was not itself blameworthy, holding that the failure to register was quite "unlike the commission of acts, or the failure to act under circumstances that should alert the doer to the consequences of his deed." "Where a person did not know of the duty to register and where there was no proof of the probability of such knowledge, he may not be convicted consistently with due process. Were it otherwise, the evil would be as great as it is when the law is written in print too fine to read or in a language foreign to the community." Id. at 228, 229–30.

rule that a victim must die within a "year and a day" in order for homicide charges to be brought in Rogers v. Tennessee,[4] the question arose whether such rule could be applied to acts occurring before the court's decision. The dissent argued vigorously that, unlike the traditional common law practice of adapting legal principles to fit new fact situations, the court's decision was an outright reversal of existing law. Under this reasoning, the new "law" could not be applied retrospectively. The majority held, however, that only those holdings which were "unexpected and indefensible by reference to the law which had been express prior to the conduct in issue"[5] could not be applied retroactively. The Court cited the relatively archaic nature of the "year and a day rule," its abandonment by most jurisdictions, and its inapplicability to modern times as reasons that the defendant had fair warning of the possible abrogation of the common law rule.

Amdt5.8.4 Laws That Establish Permissible Criminal Sentences

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

With regard to statutes that fix criminal sentences,[1] the Supreme Court has explained that the law must specify the range of available sentences with "sufficient clarity."[2] For example, in Johnson v. United States, after years of litigation on the meaning and scope of the "residual clause" of the Armed Career Criminal Act of 1984 (ACCA),[3] the Court concluded that the clause in question was void for vagueness.[4] In relevant part, the ACCA imposed an increased prison term upon a felon who was in possession of a firearm, if that felon had previously been convicted for a "violent felony," a term that the statute defined to include "burglary, arson, or extortion, [a crime that] involves use of explosives, or" crimes that fell within the residual clause—that is, crimes that "otherwise involve[ ] conduct that presents a serious potential risk of physical injury to another."[5] In Johnson, prosecutors sought an enhanced sentence for a

[4] 532 U.S. 451 (2001).

[5] Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 354 (1964).

[1] In United States v. Beckles, the Supreme Court concluded that the federal sentencing guidelines "do not fix the permissible range of sentences" and, therefore, are not subject to a vagueness challenge under the Due Process Clause. See 137 S. Ct. 886, 892 (2017). Rather, the sentencing guidelines "merely guide the district courts' discretion." Id. at 894. In so concluding, the Court noted that the sentencing system that predated the use of the guidelines gave nearly unfettered discretion to judges in sentencing, and that discretion was never viewed as raising similar concerns. Id. Thus, the Court reasoned that it was "difficult to see how the present system of guided discretion" could raise vagueness concerns. Id. Moreover, the Beckles Court explained that "the advisory Guidelines . . . do not implicate the twin concerns underlying [the] vagueness doctrine—providing notice and preventing arbitrary enforcement." Id. According to the Court, the only notice that is required regarding criminal sentences is provided to the defendant by the applicable statutory range and the guidelines. Further, the guidelines, which serve to advise courts how to exercise their discretion within the bounds set by Congress, simply do not regulate any conduct that can be arbitrarily enforced against a criminal defendant. Id. at 895.

[2] See United States v. Batchelder, 442 U.S. 114, 123 (1979).

[3] See, e.g., Sykes v. United States, 564 U.S. 1 (2011); Chambers v. United States, 555 U.S. 122 (2009); Begay v. United States, 553 U.S. 137 (2008); James v. United States, 550 U.S. 192 (2007).

[4] See Johnson v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2551 (2015).

[5] See 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B) (2012).

felon found in possession of a firearm, arguing that one of the defendant's previous crimes—unlawful possession of a short-barreled shotgun—qualified as a violent felony because the crime amounted to one that "involve[d] conduct that presents a serious potential risk of physical injury to another."[6] To determine whether a crime fell within the residual clause, the Court had previously endorsed a "categorical approach"—that is, instead of looking to whether the facts of a specific offense presented a serious risk of physical injury to another, the Supreme Court had interpreted the ACCA to require courts to consider whether the underlying crime fell within a category of crime that ordinarily would present a serious risk of physical injury.[7]

The Court in Johnson concluded that the residual clause was unconstitutionally vague because the clause's requirement that courts determine what an "ordinary case" of a crime entails led to "grave uncertainty" about (1) how to estimate the risk posed by the crime, and (2) how much risk was sufficient to qualify as a violent felony.[8] For example, in determining whether attempted burglary ordinarily posed serious risks of physical injury, the Court suggested that reasonable minds could differ as to whether an attempted burglary would typically end in a violent encounter, resulting in the conclusion that the residual clause provided "no reliable way" to determine what crimes fell within its scope.[9] In so holding, the Court relied heavily on the difficulties that federal courts (including the Supreme Court) have had in establishing consistent standards to judge the scope of the residual clause, noting that the failure of "persistent efforts" to establish a standard can provide evidence of vagueness.[10]

In Sessions v. Dimaya, the Court extended Johnson to conclude that a statute allowing the deportation of any alien who committed a "crime of violence" was unconstitutionally vague.[11] Similar to the statute at issue in Johnson, the statute at issue in Dimaya defined the phrase "crime of violence" by reference to a statutory "residual clause" covering felonious conduct that "involve[d] a substantial risk that physical force . . . may be used in the course of committing the offense," and lower courts had again adopted the categorical approach to determine whether any particular offense fell within the ambit of the residual clause.[12] The Court concluded that Johnson had "straightforward application" to the case before it,[13] because in both cases, the statutes required courts to impermissibly speculate about the "ordinary version" of an offense, and about whether that offense involved a sufficient risk of violence to fall within the ambit of the provision. In so doing, the Court rejected purported distinctions between the two residual clauses.[14] The government raised a number of textual differences between the two statutes—the Dimaya statute used the phrase "in the course of," while the Johnson statute did not; the Dimaya statute referenced the risk of "physical force," while the Johnson statute referred to "physical injury"; and the Dimaya statute, unlike the Johnson

---

[6] Johnson, 135 S. Ct. at 2556.

[7] See James, 550 U.S. at 208.

[8] Johnson, 135 S. Ct. at 2557–58.

[9] Id.

[10] See id. at 2558–60 ("Nine years' experience trying to derive meaning from the residual clause convinces us that we have embarked upon a failed enterprise.").

[11] 138 S. Ct. 1204, 1213 (2018). Justice Neil Gorsuch did not join that portion of the Court's opinion detailing how the void-for-vagueness doctrine applies in the context of non-criminal removal cases. See id. at 1212–13. Justice Gorsuch suggested that he believed the Due Process Clause required the same standard in both criminal and civil cases, id. at 1228–30 (Gorsuch, J., concurring), but he ultimately resolved the issue by citing to the relevant statute, noting that Congress had chosen "to extend existing forms of liberty" to certain individuals—and once it had done so, the government could take away that "liberty . . . only after affording due process." Id. at 1230.

[12] Id. at 1211 (majority opinion).

[13] Id. at 1216.

[14] Id. at 1218–19.

statute, did not include an exemplary list of covered crimes.[15] In the eyes of the Court, these were "the proverbial distinction[s] without a difference," because none related "to the pair of features—the ordinary-case inquiry and a hazy risk threshold—that Johnson found to produce impermissible vagueness."[16]

The Court subsequently considered the constitutionality of another residual clause in United States v. Davis, and as in Johnson and Dimaya, held that the clause was unconstitutionally vague.[17] The challenged federal statute created a sentence enhancement for offenders "using or carrying a firearm 'during and in relation to,' or possessing a firearm 'in furtherance of,' any federal 'crime of violence or drug trafficking crime.'"[18] The statutory definition of "crime of violence" included a residual clause stating that a felony offense would be included in the definition if, "by its nature," the offense "involve[d] a substantial risk that physical force . . . may be used in the course of committing the offense."[19] In light of Johnson and Dimaya, the government acknowledged that if this statute also used the categorical approach to determine whether a crime was a "crime of violence," the provision would be unconstitutional.[20] Instead, the government defended the provision by arguing that courts should adopt a "case-specific approach" to interpreting this statute, asking whether a defendant, through his or her "actual conduct," posed a "substantial risk of physical violence."[21] Although the Court acknowledged that this case-specific method would "avoid the vagueness problem" by focusing on the specific defendant's actual conduct, it nonetheless concluded that the statute could not be read to embrace this approach.[22] The Court emphasized that it had already interpreted very similar statutory provisions to require the categorical approach,[23] concluding that the word "offense" is "most naturally" read to "refer to a generic crime"[24] and expressing concerns about an approach that would give different meanings to the phrase "crime of violence" in different parts of the criminal code.[25] Consequently, because the statute employed a categorical approach, the Court held that the provision in Davis, like the ones at issue in Johnson and Dimaya, was "unconstitutionally vague."[26]

Amdt5.9 Takings

Amdt5.9.1 Overview of Takings Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval

[15] Id. at 1218–21.

[16] Id. at 1218. Nor did it matter to the Court that there were fewer lower court and Supreme Court cases wrestling with the proper meaning of the statute than had divided on the proper interpretation of the Johnson statute; the cases interpreting the Dimaya statute still demonstrated divisive problems of application. Id. at 1221–23.

[17] 139 S. Ct. 2319, 2323–24 (2019).

[18] Id. at 2324 (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1)(A)).

[19] Id. at 2324 (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(3)). This provision was almost identical to the residual clause considered in Sessions v. Dimaya, 138 S. Ct. 1204, 1211 (2018).

[20] Davis, 139 S. Ct. at 2327.

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 2327–28.

[23] Id. at 2327–28.

[24] Id. at 2328 (quoting Nijhawan v. Holder, 557 U.S. 29, 33–34 (2009)) (internal quotation mark omitted).

[25] Id. at 2329.

[26] Id. at 2336.

forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Fifth Amendment provision barring the Government from taking private property for public use absent just compensation has its origin in common law. In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story grounded the Takings Clause in "natural equity," describing it as "a principle of universal law" without which "almost all other rights would become utterly worthless."[1] The Supreme Court has recognized the government's ability to take property as inherent to its powers, stating "[t]he Fifth Amendment to the Constitution says 'nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.' This is a tacit recognition of a preexisting power to take private property for public use, rather than a grant of new power."[2]

The Fifth Amendment requirement that just compensation be paid for the taking of private property is intrinsic to the Fifth Amendment's objective of protecting citizens from government power.[3] In its 1898 decision, Backus v. Fort Street Union Depot Co., the Supreme Court stated: "When . . . [the] power [of eminent domain] is exercised it can only be done by giving the party whose property is taken or whose use and enjoyment of such property is interfered with, full and adequate compensation, not excessive or exorbitant, but just compensation."[4] Half a century later, in Armstrong v. United States, the Supreme Court explained the basis for the Fifth Amendment's just compensation guarantee further, stating that the doctrine "was designed to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole."[5]

In the Nation's early years, the federal power of eminent domain lay dormant as to property outside the District of Columbia.[6] It was not until the Supreme Court's 1876 decision, Kohl v. United States,[7] that the Court affirmed the federal government's power of eminent domain as implied by the Fifth Amendment, noting that such authority was as necessary to the National Government as it was to the states. Three years later in Boom Co. v. Patterson, the Court confirmed that the power of eminent domain "appertains to every independent

---

[1] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1784 (1833). See also United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co., 112 U.S. 645 (1884) (federal government must compensate private property owner for loss of property resulting from federal river project).

[2] United States v. Carmack, 329 U.S. 230, 241–42 (1946). The same is true of "just compensation" clauses in state constitutions. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U.S. 403, 406 (1879).

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution § 1784 (1833).

[4] Backus v. Fort St. Union Depot Co., 169 U.S. 557, 573, 575 (1898).

[5] Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 49 (1960). The Supreme Court stated: "The political ethics reflected in the Fifth Amendment reject confiscation as a measure of justice." United States v. Cors, 337 U.S. 325, 332 (1949). There is no constitutional prohibition against confiscating enemy property, but aliens not so denominated are entitled to the protection of this clause. Compare United States v. Chemical Found., 272 U.S. 1, 11 (1926) and Stoehr v. Wallace, 255 U.S. 239 (1921), with Silesian-Am. Corp. v. Clark, 332 U.S. 469 (1947), Russian Volunteer Fleet v. United States, 282 U.S. 481 (1931), and Guessefeldt v. McGrath, 342 U.S. 308, 318 (1952). Takings Clause protections for such aliens may be invoked, however, only "when they have come within the territory of the United States and developed substantial connections with this country." United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 271 (1990).

[6] Prior to this time, the Federal Government pursued condemnation proceedings in state courts and commonly relied on state law. Kohl v. United States, 91 U.S. 367, 373 (1876); United States v. Jones, 109 U.S. 513 (1883). The general statutory authority for federal condemnation proceedings in federal courts was not enacted until 1888. Act of Aug. 1, 1888, ch. 728, 25 Stat. 357. See 1 Nichols on Eminent Domain § 1.24[5] (Julius L. Sackman et al. eds., 2006).

[7] Kohl, 91 U.S. 367.

government. It requires no constitutional recognition; it is an attribute of sovereignty."[8] The federal power of eminent domain is, of course, limited by the grants of power in the Constitution, so that property may only be taken pursuant to a legitimate exercise of Constitutional authority,[9] but the ambit of national powers is broad enough to enable broad objectives.[10] This prerogative of the National Government can neither be enlarged nor diminished by a state.[11]

The Fourteenth Amendment extended the Fifth Amendment constraints on the exercise of the power of eminent domain to state governments[12] Because the Fifth Amendment's Just Compensation Clause did not explicitly apply to states,[13] the Supreme Court at first did not recognize the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as extending to property owners the same protection against the states as the Fifth Amendment provided against the Federal Government.[14] However, by the 1890s, the Court had rejected arguments that local law solely governed the amount of compensation to be awarded in a state eminent domain case. In Chicago, B. & Q. R.R. Co. v. City of Chicago, the Court ruled that, although a state "legislature may prescribe a form of procedure to be observed in the taking of private property for public use . . . it is not due process of law if provision be not made for compensation. . . . The mere form of the proceeding instituted against the owner . . . cannot convert the process used into due process of law, if the necessary result be to deprive him of his property without compensation."[15]

While the Court has recognized the power of eminent domain to be inherent to federal and state government, federal and state governments may exercise such power only through legislation or legislative delegation. Such delegation is usually to another governmental body such as an agency or local government, although it may also be to private corporations such as public utilities, railroad companies, or bridge companies, so long as the delegation is for a valid public purpose.[16] Furthermore, legislation that delegates taking authority or authorizes an agency to take property by eminent domain does not by itself constitute a taking, as "[s]uch legislation may be repealed or modified, or appropriations may fail" before the taking itself is effectuated.[17]

---

[8] 98 U.S. 403, 406 (1879).

[9] United States v. Gettysburg Elec. Ry., 160 U.S. 668, 679 (1896).

[10] E.g., California v. Cent. Pac. R.R., 127 U.S. 1, 39 (1888) (highways); Luxton v. N. River Bridge Co., 153 U.S. 525 (1894) (interstate bridges); Cherokee Nation v. S. Kan. Ry., 135 U.S. 641 (1890) (railroads); Albert Hanson Lumber Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 581 (1923) (canal); Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288 (1936) (hydroelectric power). "Once the object is within the authority of Congress, the right to realize it through the exercise of eminent domain is clear. For the power of eminent domain is merely the means to the end." Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 33 (1954).

[11] Kohl, 91 U.S. at 374.

[12] Green v. Frazier, 253 U.S. 233, 238 (1920) (noting that "[p]rior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment," the power of eminent domain of state governments "was unrestrained by any federal authority").

[13] Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833).

[14] Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U.S. 97 (1878). The Court attached most weight to the fact that both due process and just compensation were guaranteed in the Fifth Amendment while only due process was contained in the Fourteenth, and refused to equate the missing term with the present one.

[15] Chi., B. & Q. R.R. v. City of Chi., 166 U.S. 226, 233, 236–37 (1897). See also Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U.S. 380, 398 (1895).

[16] Noble v. Okla. City, 297 U.S. 481 (1936); Luxton v. N. River Bridge Co., 153 U.S. 525 (1894). One of the earliest examples of such delegation is Curtiss v. Georgetown & Alexandria Turnpike Co., 10 U.S. (6 Cr.) 233 (1810).

[17] Danforth v. United States, 308 U.S. 271 (1939).

Amdt5.9.2 Public Use and Takings Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Just Compensation Clause explicitly requires that the taking of private property be for a public use; the government cannot deprive anyone of their property for any reason other than a public use, even with compensation.[1] The question of whether a particular intended use is a public use is clearly a judicial one,[2] but the Court has always granted a high degree of deference to legislative determinations,[3] stating that "[t]he role of the judiciary in determining whether that power is being exercised for a public use is an extremely narrow one."[4] When state action is challenged under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court also defers to the highest court of the state in resolving such an issue.[5] In its 1908 decision Chicago, B. & Q. R.R. v. City of Chicago, the Court noted that, "[n]o case is recalled where this court has condemned as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment a taking upheld by the state court as a taking for public uses . . . ."[6]

In a 1946 case involving federal eminent domain power, the Court cast doubt upon the power of courts to review the issue of public use, stating "[w]e think that it is the function of Congress to decide what type of taking is for a public use and that the agency authorized to do the taking may do so to the full extent of its statutory authority."[7] While there is some suggestion in United States ex rel. TVA v. Welch that "the scope of the judicial power to determine what is a 'public use'" may differ between Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment cases, with greater power in the latter type of cases than in the former,[8] Welch also cautions great judicial restraint in evaluating "public uses" more broadly.[9] Once it is admitted or determined that the taking is for a public use and is within the granted authority, the necessity or

---

[1] Fallbrook Irrigation Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U.S. 112, 158–59 (1896); Cole v. La Grange, 113 U.S. 1, 6 (1885).

[2] City of Cincinnati v. Vester, 281 U.S. 439, 444 (1930) ("It is well established that in considering the application of the Fourteenth Amendment to cases of expropriation of private property, the question what is a public use is a judicial one.").

[3] Kelo v. City of New London, 545 U.S. 469, 482 (2005). The taking need only be "rationally related to a conceivable public purpose." Id. at 490 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

[4] Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32 (1954) (federal eminent domain power in District of Columbia).

[5] Green v. Frazier, 253 U.S. 233, 240 (1920); Vester, 281 U.S. at 446. See also Haw. Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229 (1984) (appeals court erred in applying more stringent standard to action of state legislature).

[6] Hairston v. Danville & W. Ry., 208 U.S. 598, 607 (1908). An act of condemnation was voided as not for a public use in Mo. Pac. Ry. v. Nebraska, 164 U.S. 403 (1896), but the Court read the state court opinion as acknowledging this fact, thus not bringing it within the literal content of this statement.

[7] United States ex rel. TVA v. Welch, 327 U.S. 546, 551–52 (1946). Justices Stanley Reed and Felix Frankfurter and Chief Justice Harlan Stone disagreed with this view. Id. at 555, 557 (concurring).

[8] Welch, 327 U.S. at 552.

[9] See Berman, 348 U.S. at 32 ("The role of the judiciary in determining whether that power [of eminent domain] is being exercised for a public purpose is an extremely narrow one.").

expediency of the particular taking is exclusively in the legislature, or the body to which the legislature has delegated the decision, and is not subject to judicial review.[10]

At an earlier time, the prevailing judicial view was that the term "public use" was synonymous with "use by the public" and that, if there was no duty upon the taker to permit the public as of right to use or enjoy the property taken, the taking was invalid. But the Court rejected this view.[11] The modern conception of public use equates it with the police power in furtherance of the public interest. No definition of the reach or limits of the power is possible, the Court has said, because such "definition is essentially the product of legislative determinations addressed to the purposes of government, purposes neither abstractly nor historically capable of complete definition. . . . Public safety, public health, morality, peace and quiet, law and order—these are some of the . . . traditional application[s] of the police power . . . ."[12] Because the legislature has authority to effectuate these matters, its power to achieve them by exercising eminent domain is established. As the Supreme Court observed, "For the power of eminent domain is merely the means to the end."[13] Subsequently, the Court added as an indicium of "public use" whether the government purpose could be validly achieved by tax or user fee.[14]

Traditionally, eminent domain has been used to facilitate transportation, the supplying of water, and the like,[15] but its use to establish public parks, to preserve places of historic interest, and to promote beautification has substantial precedent.[16] The Supreme Court has generally approved federal and state governments using the power of eminent domain in conjunction with private companies to facilitate urban renewal, destruction of slums, erection

---

[10] Rindge Co. v. L.A. Cnty., 262 U.S. 700, 709 (1923); Bragg v. Weaver, 251 U.S. 57, 58 (1919); Berman, 348 U.S. at 33. Midkiff, 467 U.S. at 242–43 ("When the legislature's purpose is legitimate and its means are not irrational, our cases make clear that empirical debates over the wisdom of takings . . . are not to be carried out in federal courts.")

[11] Clark v. Nash, 198 U.S. 361 (1905); Mt. Vernon-Woodberry Cotton Duck Co. v. Ala. Interstate Power Co., 240 U.S. 30, 32 (1916).

[12] Berman, 348 U.S. at 32.

[13] Id. at 32–33.

[14] Brown v. Legal Found. of Wash., 538 U.S. 216, 232 (2003). Reasonable user fees are not takings that necessitate just compensation. See United States v. Sperry Corp., 493 U.S. 52 (1989) (holding that a 1% user fee deducted from awards granted by an international tribunal to cover the costs of administering that tribunal did not constitute a taking).

[15] E.g., Kohl v. United States, 91 U.S. 367 (1876) (public buildings); New Orleans Gas Co. v Drainage Comm'n, 197 U.S. 453 (1905) (city drainage system); Chi., M., & St. P. Ry. v. City of Minneapolis, 232 U.S. 430 (1914) (canal); Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U.S. 685 (1897) (condemnation of privately owned water supply system formerly furnishing water to municipality under contract); Mt. Vernon-Woodberry Cotton Duck Co. v. Ala. Interstate Power Co., 240 U.S. 30 (1916) (land, water, and water rights condemned for production of electric power by public utility); Dohany v. Rogers, 281 U.S. 362 (1930) (land taken for purpose of exchange with a railroad company for a portion of its right-of-way required for widening a highway); Del., L. & W. R.R. v. Town of Morristown, 276 U.S. 182 (1928) (establishment by a municipality of a public hack stand upon driveway maintained by railroad upon its own terminal grounds to afford ingress and egress to its patrons); Clark v. Nash, 198 U.S. 361 (1905) (right-of-way across neighbor's land to enlarge irrigation ditch for water without which land would remain valueless); Strickley v. Highland Boy Mining Co., 200 U.S. 527 (1906) (right of way across a placer mining claim for aerial bucket line). In Mo. Pac. Ry. v. Nebraska, 164 U.S. 403 (1896), however, the Court held that it was an invalid use when a state attempted to compel, on payment of compensation, a railroad, which had permitted the erection of two grain elevators by private citizens on its right-of-way, to grant upon like terms a location to another group of farmers to erect a third grain elevator for their own benefit.

[16] E.g., Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U.S. 282 (1893) (establishment of public park in District of Columbia); Rindge Co. v. L.A. Cnty., 262 U.S. 700 (1923) (scenic highway); Brown v. United States, 263 U.S. 78 (1923) (condemnation of property near town flooded by establishment of reservoir in order to locate a new townsite, even though there might be some surplus lots to be sold); United States v. Gettysburg Elec. Ry., 160 U.S. 668 (1896), and Roe v. Kansas ex rel. Smith, 278 U.S. 191 (1929) (historic sites). When time is deemed to be of the essence, Congress may take land directly by statute, authorizing procedures by which owners of appropriated land may obtain just compensation. See, e.g., Pub. L. No. 90- 545, § 3, 82 Stat. 931 (1968), 16 U.S.C. § 79 (c) (taking land for creation of Redwood National Park); Pub. L. No. 93-444, 88 Stat. 1304 (1974) (taking lands for addition to Piscataway Park, Maryland); Pub. L. No. 100-647, § 10002 (1988) (taking lands for addition to Manassas National Battlefield Park).

of low-cost housing in place of deteriorated housing, and promotion of aesthetic values as well as economic ones. In Berman v. Parker,[17] a unanimous Court observed: "The concept of the public welfare is broad and inclusive. The values it represents are spiritual as well as physical, aesthetic as well as monetary. It is within the power of the legislature to determine that the community should be beautiful as well as healthy, spacious as well as clean, well-balanced as well as carefully patrolled."[18] For "public use," then, it may well be that "public interest" or "public welfare" is the more correct phrase.[19] In Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff,[20] the Court applied Berman to uphold the Hawaii Land Reform Act as a "rational" effort to "correct deficiencies in the market determined by the state legislature to be attributable to land oligopoly."[21] Direct transfer of land from lessors to lessees was permissible, the Court held, as there is no requirement "that government possess and use property at some point during a taking."[22] "The 'public use' requirement is . . . coterminous with the scope of a sovereign's police powers," the Court concluded.[23]

The Court's expansive interpretation of public use in eminent domain cases may have reached its outer limit in Kelo v. City of New London.[24] There, a five-Justice majority upheld as a public use the government acquisition of privately owned land to be transferred to another private party for purposes of economic development, pursuant to a redevelopment plan adopted by a municipality to invigorate a depressed economy. The Court saw no principled way to distinguish economic development from the economic purposes endorsed in Berman and Midkiff, and stressed the importance of judicial deference to legislative judgment as to public needs. At the same time, the Court cautioned that condemnations of individual properties that are transferred to another private party, not as part of an "integrated development plan . . . raise a suspicion that a private purpose [is] afoot."[25] A vigorous four-Justice dissent countered that, because localities will always be able to manufacture a plausible public purpose, the majority opinion leaves the vast majority of private parcels subject to condemnation when a locality desires a higher-valued use.[26] Revisiting the Court's past endorsements in Berman and Midkiff of a public use/police power equation, the dissenters referred to the "errant language" of these decisions, which was "unnecessary" to their holdings.[27]

---

[17] 348 U.S. 26, 32–33 (1954) (citations omitted). Rejecting the argument that the project was illegal because it involved the turning over of condemned property to private associations for redevelopment, the Court said:

> Once the object is within the authority of Congress, the means by which it will be attained is also for Congress to determine. Here one of the means chosen is the use of private enterprise for redevelopment of the area. Appellants argue that this makes the project a taking from one businessman for the benefit of another businessman. But the means of executing the project are for Congress and Congress alone to determine, once the public purpose has been established. The public end may be as well or better served through an agency of private enterprise than through a department of government—or so the Congress might conclude.

Id. at 33–34 (citations omitted).

[18] Berman, 348 U.S. at 32–33.

[19] In 2005, the Court equated public use with "public purpose." Kelo v. City of New London, 545 U.S. 469, 480 (2005).

[20] 467 U.S. 229, 243 (1984).

[21] Id..

[22] Id..

[23] Id. at 240. See also Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1014 (1984) (required data disclosure by pesticide registrants, primarily for benefit of later registrants, has a "conceivable public character").

[24] 545 U.S. 469 (2005).

[25] Kelo, 545 U.S. at 487.

[26] Written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, and joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

[27] Kelo, 545 U.S. at 501.

Amdt5.9.3 Property Interests Subject to Takings Clause

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

If real property is condemned, the market value of that property must be paid to the owner. But there are many kinds of property and many uses of property which cause problems in computing just compensation. It is not only the full fee simple interest in land that is compensable "property,"[1] but also such lesser interests as easements[2] and leaseholds. If only a portion of a tract is taken, the owner's compensation includes any element of value arising out of the relation of the part taken to the entire tract.[3] Government action that does not encroach on private property does not result in a taking requiring just compensation, even if the action impairs the use of the private property.[4]

If the taking has in fact benefited the owner in some way, however, the benefit may be set off against the value of the land condemned,[5] although any supposed benefit which the owner may receive in common with all from the public use to which the property is appropriated may not be set off.[6] For example, when certain lands were condemned for park purposes, with resulting benefits set off against the value of the property taken, the Court held that the subsequent erection of a fire station on the property instead did not deprive the owner of any part of his just compensation.[7] The Supreme Court has also held that civil forfeitures do not constitute a taking even if the owner of the property is not alleged to have committed a crime, as property is considered to be the offender in forfeiture actions.[8]

The Court has made clear that the prohibition on taking property without compensation extends to Indian lands held in trust by the United States government.[9] The Court has also held that the government has a "categorical duty to pay just compensation" when it physically takes personal property, just as when it takes real property.[10] For example, in Horne v.

---

[1] United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373 (1945).

[2] United States v. Welch, 217 U.S. 333 (1910).

[3] Bauman v. Ross, 167 U.S. 548 (1897); Sharp v. United States, 191 U.S. 341, 351–52, 354 (1903). Where the taking of a strip of land across a farm closed a private right-of-way, an allowance was properly made for the value of the easement. Welch, 217 U.S. 333.

[4] Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U.S. 635 (1878) (construction of a tunnel by the city that limited access to a particular dock did not amount to a taking).

[5] Bauman, 167 U.S. 548.

[6] Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 326 (1893).

[7] Reichelderfer v. Quinn, 287 U.S. 315, 318 (1932).

[8] Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing, 416 U.S. 663 (1974).

[9] See, e.g., United States v. Creek Nation, 295 U.S. 103 (1935) (government error in surveying that carved out tribal land requires just compensation); Shoshone Tribe v. United States, 299 U.S. 476 (1937) (requiring tribe to share its land with another tribe constitutes taking); Chippewa Indians v. United States, 305 U.S. 479 (1939) (creation of national forest inside land held in trust for tribe is a taking); United States v. Sioux Nation of Indians, 448 U.S. 371 (1980) (statute that abrogated Indian land interest established by treaty constitutes a taking). But see Tee-Hit-Ton Indians v. United States, 348 U.S. 272 (1955) (taking of timber from Indian-occupied lands not a taking, Court found that the tribe's claims of occupancy did not amount to possession of the land and the timber).

[10] See Horne v. Dep't of Agric., 135 S. Ct. 2419, 2426 (2015). In deciding this case, the Court presumably intended to leave intact established exceptions when the government seizes personal property (e.g., confiscation of adulterated

Department of Agriculture, the Court held that a raisin marketing order issued under a Depression-era statute requiring raisin growers to reserve a percentage of their total crop for the federal government to dispose of in its discretion constituted "a clear physical taking" because, even though the scheme was intended to benefit growers by maintaining stable markets for raisins, the "[a]ctual raisins are transferred from the growers to the Government."[11] The Court further held the government could not avoid paying just compensation for this physical taking by providing for the return to the raisin growers of any net proceeds from the government's sale of the reserve raisins.[12] The majority also rejected the government's argument that the reserve requirement was not a physical taking because raisin growers voluntarily participated in the raisin market.[13] In so doing, the Court reasoned that selling produce in interstate commerce is not a "special government benefit that the Government may hold hostage, to be ransomed by the waiver of constitutional protection."[14] In addition, the Court determined that the value of the raisins for takings purposes was their fair market value, with no deduction for the offsetting benefits of the overall statutory scheme, which was intended to maintain stable markets for raisins.[15]

Interests in intangible, as well as tangible property, are subject to protection under the Taking Clause. Thus compensation must be paid for the taking of contract rights,[16] patent rights,[17] and trade secrets.[18] The franchise of a private corporation has also been deemed property that cannot be taken for public use without compensation. For example, on drugs). See, e.g., Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442, 452 (1996) ("Petitioner also claims that the forfeiture in this case was a taking of private property for public use in violation of the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment. But if the forfeiture proceeding here in question did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, the property in the automobile was transferred by virtue of that proceeding from petitioner to the State. The government may not be required to compensate an owner for property which it has already lawfully acquired under the exercise of governmental authority other than the power of eminent domain.").

---

[11] Horne, 135 S. Ct. 2419, 2422 (2015).

[12] Id. at 2428–30.

[13] The government's argument might have carried more weight had the marketing order been viewed as a regulatory taking. Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 321–22 (2002) ("The text of the Fifth Amendment itself provides a basis for drawing a distinction between physical takings and regulatory takings. Its plain language requires the payment of compensation whenever the government acquires private property for a public purpose, whether the acquisition is the result of a condemnation proceeding or a physical appropriation. But the Constitution contains no comparable reference to regulations that prohibit a property owner from making certain uses of her private property."); Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 519 (1944) (rent control cannot be a taking of premises if "[t]here is no requirement that the apartments be used for purposes which bring them under the [rent control] Act").

[14] Horne, 135 S. Ct. at 2430–31. Here, the Court expressly rejected the argument that the raisin growers could avoid the physical taking of their property by growing different crops, or making different uses of their grapes, by quoting its earlier decision in Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 439 n.17 (1982) ("[A] landlord's ability to rent his property may not be conditioned on his forfeiting the right to compensation for a physical occupation."). The Court also distinguished the raisin reserve provisions from the requirement that companies manufacturing pesticides, fungicides, and rodenticides disclose trade secrets in order to sell those products at issue in Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986 (1984). It did so because the manufacturers in Ruckelshaus were seen to have taken part in a "voluntary exchange" of information that included their trade secrets, recognized as property under the Takings Clause, in exchange for a "valuable Government benefit" in the form of a license to sell dangerous chemicals. No such government benefit was seen to be involved with the raisin growers because they were making "basic and familiar uses" of their property.

[15] Horne, 135 S. Ct. at 2431–32.

[16] Omnia Com. Corp. v. United States, 261 U.S. 502, 508 (1923); Brooks-Scanlon Corp. v. United States, 265 U.S. 106 (1924); Lynch v. United States, 292 U.S. 571, 579 (1934).

[17] James v. Campbell, 104 U.S. 356, 358 (1882). See also Hollister v. Benedict Mfg. Co., 113 U.S. 59, 67 (1885).

[18] Ruckelshaus, 467 U.S. 986.

condemning a lock and dam system belonging to a navigation company, the government was required to compensate the company for taking its authority to take tolls as well as for the tangible property.[19]

Takings challenges to requisitions present their own valuation challenges for the government and the courts. The Court has held that frustrating a private contract by requisitioning the entire output of a steel manufacturer is not a taking for which compensation is required,[20] but requisitioning from a power company all the electric power which could be produced by using water diverted through its intake canal and thereby cutting off the supply of a lessee which had a right, amounting to a corporeal hereditament under state law, to draw a portion of that water, entitles the lessee to compensation for the rights taken.[21] When a ship builder defaulted and the government took title to the builder's uncompleted boats pursuant to a contract, the Court found that the builder's suppliers, who had liens under state law, had a compensable interest equal to the value the liens when the government "took" or destroyed them in perfecting its title.[22]

As a general rule, there is no property interest in the continuation of a rule of law.[23] For example, even though state participation in the social security system was originally voluntary, a state had no property interest in its right to withdraw from the program when Congress had expressly reserved the right to amend the law and the agreement with the state.[24] Similarly, there is no right to the continuation of governmental welfare benefits.[25]

Amdt5.9.4 Physical Takings

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

When government institutes condemnation proceedings directed to property, or mistakenly grants privately held property rights to third parties,[1] it "takes" such property and the Fifth Amendment requires just compensation. In contrast, where government action causes physical damage to property, limits activity on property, or otherwise deprives property of value,[2] determining whether such actions constitute "takings" in the Fifth Amendment sense is more complex.

---

[19] Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 345 (1893).

[20] Omnia, 261 U.S. 502.

[21] Int'l Paper Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 399 (1931).

[22] Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 50 (1960).

[23] Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envt. Study Group, 438 U.S. 59, 88 n.32 (1978).

[24] Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41 (1986).

[25] "Congress is not, by virtue of having instituted a social welfare program, bound to continue it at all, much less at the same benefit level." Bowen v. Gilliard, 483 U.S. 587, 604 (1987).

[1] United States v. Creek Nation, 295 U.S. 103 (1935).

[2] There is continuing uncertainty regarding whether the actions of a court may constitute a taking. In Stop the Beach Renourishment, Inc. v. Florida Department of Environmental Protection, Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by three other Justices, recognized that a court could effect a taking through a decision that contravened established property

In early cases, the Supreme Court considered the Fifth Amendment requirement that the government pay just compensation for property taken for public use to refer only to "direct appropriation, and not to consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power."[3] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has held a variety of consequential injuries not to constitute takings, including: damage to abutting property resulting from the authorization of a railroad to erect tracts, sheds, and fences over a street;[4] lessening the circulation of light and air and impairing access to premises, resulting from the erection of an elevated viaduct over a street, or resulting from the changing of a grade in the street;[5] the forced sale of cattle due to loss of grazing land due to government flooding,[6] and a federal irrigation project that resulting in raised groundwater and lake water impacting nearby properties.[7] Nor did the Court hold the government liable for extra expenses property owners incurred addressing the consequences of governmental actions, such as expenses incurred by a railroad in planking an area condemned for a crossing, constructing gates, and posting gatemen,[8] or by a landowner in raising the height of dikes around his land to prevent their partial flooding consequent to private construction of a dam under public licensing.[9]

The Court has decided that the government can "take" land by physical invasion or occupation when it floods land permanently or recurrently, thereby triggering the just compensation requirement.[10] In its 1947 decision United States v. Dickinson, the Court stated that "[p]roperty is taken in the constitutional sense when inroads are made upon an owner's use of it to an extent that, as between private parties, a servitude has been acquired either by agreement or in course of time."[11] The Court thus held in Portsmouth Harbor Land & Hotel Co. v. United States that the government had imposed a servitude for which it must compensate the owner on land adjoining its fort when it repeatedly fired guns at the fort across the land and established a fire control service there.[12] In two cases—United States v. Causby and Griggs v. Allegheny County—the Court held that lessees or operators of airports were required to compensate owners of adjacent land when the noise, glare, and fear of injury occasioned by low law. 560 U.S. 702 (2010). Justice Anthony Kennedy and Justice Stephen Breyer, each joined by one other Justice, wrote concurring opinions finding that the case at hand did not require the Court to determine whether, or when, a judicial decision on the rights of a property owner can violate the Takings Clause. Though all eight participating Justices agreed on the result in Stop the Beach Renourishment, Inc., the viability and dimensions of a judicial takings doctrine remains unresolved.

[3] The Legal Tender Cases, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 457, 551 (1871). The Fifth Amendment "has never been supposed to have any bearing upon, or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals," the Court explained.

[4] Meyer v. City of Richmond, 172 U.S. 82 (1898).

[5] Sauer v. City of N.Y., 206 U.S. 536 (1907).

[6] Bothwell v. United States, 254 U.S. 231 (1920).

[7] John Horstmann Co. v. United States, 257 U.S. 138 (1921).

[8] Chi., B. & Q. R.R. v. City of Chi., 166 U.S. 226 (1897).

[9] Manigault v. Springs, 199 U.S. 473 (1905).

[10] Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 166, 177–78 (1872). Recurrent, temporary floodings are not categorically exempt from Takings Clause liability. Ark. Game & Fish Comm'n v. United States, 568 U.S. 23 (2012) (downstream timber damage caused by changes in seasonal water release rates from government dam). However, the Court has found damages due to flooding caused by government efforts to prevent erosion not to constitute a taking. Bedford v. United States, 192 U.S. 217 (1904). The Court has also held that flooding resulting from the construction of a canal was not a taking unless the overflow was a "direct result of the structure" and constituted an "actual, permanent invasion of the land, amounting to an appropriation of and not merely an injury to the property." Sanguinetti v. United States, 246 U.S. 146, 149 (1924). The Court in Arkansas Game & Fish addressed the seeming inconsistency of its decision with this language in the Sanguinetti decision, noting that to the extent the Court "indeed meant to express a general limitation on the Takings Clause, that limitation has been superseded by subsequent developments in our jurisprudence." Ark. Game & Fish, 568 U.S. at 34.

[11] United States v. Dickinson, 331 U.S. 745, 748 (1947)

[12] Portsmouth Harbor Land & Hotel Co. v. United States, 260 U.S. 327 (1922). Cf. Portsmouth Harbor Land & Hotel Co. v. United States, 250 U.S. 1 (1919); Peabody v. United States, 231 U.S. 530 (1913).

altitude overflights during takeoffs and landings made the land unfit for the use to which the owners had applied it.[13] The Court has also held in Cedar Point Nursery v. Hassid that a law requiring employers to allow union organizers to enter a business property effectuated a physical taking, and thus was unconstitutional in the absence of just compensation.[14] The term "inverse condemnation" is often used to refer to cases where the government has not instituted formal condemnation proceedings, but the property owner has instead sued for just compensation, claiming that governmental action or regulation has "taken" his property.[15]

The Fifth Amendment generally does not prohibit the government from collecting administrative and other fees incidental to conducting government business. For example, in United States v. Sperry Corp., the Court held that a 1% user fee deducted from awards granted by an international tribunal to cover the costs of administering that tribunal did not constitute a taking, but simply a "user fee."[16] The Court further noted that "[t]he amount of a user fee need not be precisely calibrated to the use that a party makes of governmental services."[17] The Court, however, has found other government fees to be excessive enough to constitute a taking for which there must be just compensation.[18]

The Court's repeated holdings that riparian ownership is subject to Congress's power to regulate commerce is an important reservation to the law of liability in the taking area. When government improvements to a river's navigable capacity or to a nonnavigable river designed to affect navigability elsewhere cause damage, the Court has generally not considered such damage to be a taking of property but merely an exercise of a servitude to which the property is always subject.[19] This exception does not apply to lands above the ordinary high-water mark of a stream;[20] hence, it is inapplicable to the damage the government may do to such "fast lands" by causing overflows, by erosion, and otherwise, consequent on erection of dams or other improvements.[21] Furthermore, when previously nonnavigable waters are made navigable by [13] United States v. Causby, 328 U.S. 256 (1946); Griggs v. Allegheny Cnty., 369 U.S. 84 (1962). The Court held a corporation chartered by Congress to construct a tunnel and operate railway trains liable for damages when the plaintiff's property was so injured by smoke and gas forced from the tunnel as to amount to a taking. Richards v. Wash. Terminal Co., 233 U.S. 546 (1914).

---

[14] Cedar Point Nursery v. Hassid, No. 20-107 (U.S. June 23, 2021).

[15] Discussing the term "inverse condemnation," the Supreme Court has noted: "The phrase 'inverse condemnation' generally describes a cause of action against a government defendant in which a landowner may recover just compensation for a 'taking' of his property under the Fifth Amendment, even though formal condemnation proceedings in exercise of the sovereign's power of eminent domain have not been instituted by the government entity." San Diego Gas & Elec. Co. v. City of San Diego, 450 U.S. 621, 638 n.2 (1981) (Brennan, J., dissenting). See also United States v. Clarke, 445 U.S. 253, 257 (1980); Agins v. City of Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255, 258 n.2 (1980).

[16] United States v. Sperry Corp., 493 U.S. 52 (1989).

[17] Id. at 60–62. See also Cal. Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U.S. 306 (1905) (disposal fee and designated disposal site imposed on waste generator did not constitute a taking).

[18] See, e.g., Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 U.S. 155, 160–65 (1980) (interest earned on interpleader fund deposited in the registry of a county court was the property of the parties just like the principal, and the government could not retain it as an administrative fee for managing the fund); Norwood v. Baker, 172 U.S. 269 (1898) (special assessment on certain property owners to pay for road construction are justified if those owners receive special benefits, but assessment exceeding value of benefit amounts to a taking).

[19] Gibson v. United States, 166 U.S. 269 (1897); Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U.S. 141 (1900); Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364 (1907); Lewis Blue Point Oyster Co. v. Briggs, 229 U.S. 82 (1913); United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., 229 U.S. 53 (1913); Greenleaf-Johnson Lumber Co. v. Garrison, 237 U.S. 251 (1915); United States v. Appalachian Power Co., 311 U.S. 377 (1940); United States v. Commodore Park, Inc., 324 U.S. 386 (1945); United States v. Willow River Power Co., 324 U.S. 499 (1945); United States v. Twin City Power Co., 350 U.S. 222 (1956);. United States v. Rands, 389 U.S. 121 (1967).

[20] United States v. Va. Elec. & Power Co., 365 U.S. 624, 628 (1961).

[21] United States v. Lynah, 188 U.S. 445 (1903); United States v. Cress, 243 U.S. 316 (1917); Jacobs v. United States, 290 U.S. 13 (1933); United States v. Dickinson, 331 U.S. 745 (1947); United States v. Kan. City Life Ins. Co., 339 U.S. 799 (1950); Va. Elec. & Power Co., 365 U.S. 624.

private investment, government may not assert a navigation servitude and direct the property owners to afford public access without paying just compensation.[22]

Amdt5.9.5 Early Jurisprudence on Regulatory Takings

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

While government may take private property, with compensation, to promote the public interest, government may also regulate property use pursuant to its police power. For years, regulation designed to secure the common welfare, especially in the area of health and safety, was not considered a "taking." [1]

Regulation, however, may deprive an owner of most or all beneficial use of his property and may destroy the values of the property for the purposes to which it is suited.[2] While early cases denied compensation for this diminution of property values,[3] the Court changed direction in its 1922 decision, Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon. In Mahon, the Court established as a general principle that "if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking."[4] The majority in Mahon held unconstitutional a state statute prohibiting subsurface mining in regions where it presented a danger of subsidence for homeowners. The homeowners had purchased land, the deeds of which reserved to coal companies ownership of subsurface mining rights and held the companies harmless for damage caused by subsurface mining operations. The statute thus enriched the homeowners and deprived the coal companies of the entire value of their subsurface estates. The Court observed that "[f]or practical purposes, the right to coal consists in the right to mine," and that the statute, by making it "commercially impracticable to mine

---

[22] Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164 (1979); Vaughn v. Vermillion Corp., 444 U.S. 206 (1979)

[1] Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 668–69 (1887). See also The Legal Tender Cases, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 457, 551 (1871); Chi., B. & Q. R.R. v. City of Chi., 166 U.S. 226, 255 (1897); Reinman v. Little Rock, 237 U.S. 171 (1915); Omnia Com. Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 502 (1923); Norman v. Balt. & Ohio R.R., 294 U.S. 240 (1935).

[2] E.g., Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U.S. 394 (1915) (ordinance upheld restricting owner of brick factory from continuing his use after residential growth surrounding factory made use noxious, even though value of property was reduced by more than 90%); Miller v. Schoene, 276 U.S. 272 (1928) (no compensation due owner's loss of red cedar trees ordered destroyed because they were infected with rust that threatened contamination of neighboring apple orchards: preferment of public interest in saving cash crop to property interest in ornamental trees was rational).

[3] Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 668–69 (1887) (ban on manufacture of liquor greatly devalued plaintiff's plant and machinery; no taking possible simply because of legislation deeming a use injurious to public health and welfare); Welch v. Swasey, 214 U.S. 91 (1909) (state law limiting maximum height of buildings did not constitute a taking); Corn Refining Products Co. v. Eddy, 249 U.S. 427 (1919) (state law requiring companies to affix labels on product disclosing ingredients was not a taking of plaintiff's proprietary formula, because there is no constitutional right to sell goods without revealing information to purchasers); Hamilton v. Ky. Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U.S. 146 (1919) (federal statute banning domestic liquor sales during wartime was not a taking); Jacob Ruppert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U.S. 264 (1920) (extension of federal ban on liquor to beer sales also did not constitute a taking, despite the ban taking effect immediately); Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U.S. 300 (1920) (state ban on the use of natural gas for purposes other than heating did not constitute a taking even though it forced a plant to close, because the ban was within the state's police power to regulate consumption of natural resources).

[4] Pa. Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 415 (1922). See also Lucas v. S.C. Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992) (a regulation that deprives a property owner of all beneficial use of his property requires compensation, unless the owner's proposed use is one prohibited by background principles of property or nuisance law existing at the time the property was acquired).

certain coal," had essentially "the same effect for constitutional purposes as appropriating or destroying" the subsurface estate.[5] The regulation, therefore, in precluding the companies from exercising any mining rights whatever, went "too far."[6] However, when presented sixty-five years later with a similar restriction on coal mining, the Court upheld it, pointing out that, unlike its predecessor, the newer law identified important public interests, and that the plaintiffs had not sufficiently demonstrated diminution of their property interests.[7]

The Court had long been concerned with the government imposing on one or a few individuals the costs of furthering the public interest.[8] This issue has frequently arisen in disputes over zoning regulations. The Court's first zoning case, Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., involved a real estate company's allegation that a comprehensive municipal zoning ordinance prevented development of its land for industrial purposes and thereby reduced its value from $10,000 an acre to $2,500 an acre.[9] Acknowledging that zoning was of recent origin, the Court, applying substantive due process analysis instead of takings-based analysis, observed that it must be justified by police power and evaluated by the constitutional standards applied to exercises of police power. After considering traditional nuisance law, the Court determined that the public interest was served by segregating incompatible land uses and the ordinance was thus valid on its face. Instead, a zoning regulation that diminished property values would be unconstitutional only if it were "clearly arbitrary and unreasonable, having no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare."[10] A few years later in Nectow v. City of Cambridge, the Court, again relying on due process rather than takings law, invalidated application of a zoning ordinance to a tract of land, finding that the tract would be rendered nearly worthless and that exempting the tract would not impair a substantial municipal interest.[11] The Court gave additional attention to this issue in the 1970s as states and municipalities developed more comprehensive zoning techniques.[12]

As governmental regulation of property has expanded over the years—in terms of zoning and other land use controls, environmental regulations, and the like—the Court has avoided a "set formula to determine where regulation ends and taking begins."[13] The Court has observed that, "[i]n the near century since Mahon, the Court for the most part has refrained from elaborating this principle through definitive rules"[14] and "[t]his area of the law has been characterized by 'ad hoc, factual inquiries, designed to allow careful examination and weighing

[5] Mahon, 260 U.S. at 414–15.

[6] Id. at 415. In dissent, Justice Louis Brandeis argued that a restriction imposed to abridge the owner's exercise of his rights in order to prohibit a noxious use or to protect the public health and safety simply could not be a taking, because the owner retained his interest and his possession. Id. at 416.

[7] Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470 (1987).

[8] Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Walters, 294 U.S. 405 (1935) (government may not require railroad at its own expense to separate the grade of a railroad track from that of an interstate highway). See also Panhandle Co. v. Highway Comm'n, 294 U.S. 613 (1935); Atchison, T. & Santa Fe Ry. v. Pub. Util. Comm'n, 346 U.S. 346 (1953). Compare the Court's two decisions in Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co. v. City of Decatur, 295 U.S. 165 (1935) and 297 U.S. 620 (1936).

[9] Vill. of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926).

[10] Id. at 395. See also Zahn v. Bd. of Pub. Works, 274 U.S. 325 (1927).

[11] Nectow v. City of Cambridge, 277 U.S. 183 (1928).

[12] Initially, the Court's return to the land-use area involved substantive due process, not takings. Vill. of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974) (sustaining single-family zoning as applied to group of college students sharing a house); Moore v. City of E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) (voiding single-family zoning so strictly construed as to bar a grandmother from living with two grandchildren of different children). See also City of Eastlake v. Forest City Enters., 426 U.S. 668 (1976).

[13] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. City of N.Y., 438 U.S. 104, 124 (1978). The phrase appeared first in Goldblatt v. Town of Hempstead, 369 U.S. 590, 594 (1962).

[14] Murr v. Wisconsin, 137 S. Ct. 1933, 1942 (2017) (rejecting the argument of the owners of two adjoining undeveloped lots that a regulatory taking occurred through the enactment of regulations that forbade improvement or separate sale of the lots).

of all the relevant circumstances.'"[15] Nonetheless, the Court has articulated general principles that guide many of its decisions in the area.[16] These principles are often referred to as the "Penn Central" framework.

Amdt5.9.6 Regulatory Takings and Penn Central Framework

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

In its 1978 decision, Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York,[1] the Court, while cautioning that regulatory takings cases require "essentially ad hoc, factual inquiries," nonetheless provided general guidance for determining whether a regulatory taking had occurred. The Court emphasized that the degree to which a government action interfered with a property owner's interest in his property—whether the interference amounted to a "physical invasion" or only reflected an "adjusting of benefits and burdens"—indicated whether a taking had occurred. The Court explained:

> The economic impact of the regulation on the claimant and, particularly, the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations are . . . relevant considerations. So too, is the character of the governmental action. A 'taking' may more readily be found when the interference with property can be characterized as a physical invasion by government than when interference arises from some public program adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good.[2]

Penn Central concerned New York City's landmarks preservation law, pursuant to which the City denied approval to construct a fifty-three-story office building atop Grand Central Terminal. The Court denied Penn Central's takings claim by applying the principles set forth above. Considering the economic impact on Penn Central, the Court noted that the company could still make a "reasonable return" on its investment by continuing to use the facility as a rail terminal with office rentals and concessions, and the City specifically permitted owners of landmark sites to transfer to other sites the right to develop those sites beyond the otherwise permissible zoning restrictions, a valuable right that mitigated the burden otherwise to be

---

[15] Id. (quoting Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency 535 U.S. 302, 322 (2002)).

[16] While observing that the "central dynamic of the Court's regulatory takings jurisprudence . . . is its flexibility," the Court in Murr v. Wisconsin reiterated the "two guidelines . . . for determining when government regulation is so onerous that it constitutes a taking." Id. at 1942. First, with some qualifications, "'a regulation which denies all economically beneficial or productive use of land will require compensation under the Takings Clause.'" Id. (quoting Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 617 (2001)). Second, if "a regulation impedes the use of property without depriving the owner of all economically beneficial use, a taking still may be found based on 'a complex of factors,' including (1) the economic impact of the regulation on the claimant; (2) the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations; and (3) the character of the governmental action." Id. at 1942–43 (quoting Palazzolo, 533 U.S. at 617).

[1] 438 U.S. 104 (1978). Justices William Rehnquist and John Paul Stevens and Chief Justice Warren Burger dissented. Id. at 138.

[2] Id. at 124 (citations omitted).

suffered by the owner. As for the character of the governmental regulation, the Court found the landmarks law to be an economic regulation rather than a governmental appropriation of property, the preservation of historic sites being a permissible goal and one that served the public interest.[3] Penn Central's economic impact standard also left room for Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes's observation in Mahon that "[g]overnment hardly could go on if to some extent values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every . . . change in the general law."[4] Thus, the Court has held that a mere permit requirement does not amount to a taking,[5] nor does a simple recordation requirement.[6]

Several times the Court has relied on the concept of "distinct [or, in later cases, 'reasonable'] investment-backed expectations," which it introduced in Penn Central, to analyze whether a taking had occurred. In Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co.,[7] the Court used this concept to determine whether the government's disclosure of trade secret information submitted with applications for pesticide registrations resulted in a taking. The Court reasoned that disclosing data that had been submitted from 1972 to 1978, a period when the statute guaranteed confidentiality and thus "formed the basis of a distinct investment-backed expectation," would have destroyed the property value of the trade secret and constituted a taking.[8] Following 1978 amendments setting forth conditions of data disclosure, applicants who voluntarily submitted data in exchange for the economic benefits of registration had no reasonable expectation of additional protections of confidentiality.[9]

Rejecting an assertion that reasonable investment backed-expectations had been upset in Connolly v. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.,[10] the Court upheld the government's retroactive imposition of liability for pension plan withdrawals. The Court reasoned that employers had at least constructive notice that Congress might buttress the legislative scheme to accomplish its legislative aim that employees receive promised benefits. However, where a statute imposes severe and "substantially disproportionate" retroactive liability based on conduct several decades earlier, on parties that could not have anticipated the liability, a taking (or violation of due process) may occur. On this rationale, the Court in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel[11] enjoined applying the Coal Miner Retiree Health Benefit Act requirement that companies formerly engaged in mining pay certain miner retiree health benefits to a company that had spun off its mining operation in 1965, before collective bargaining agreements included an express

---

[3] Id. at 124–28, 135–38.

[4] Pa. Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 413 (1922).

[5] United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes, 474 U.S. 121 (1985) (requirement that permit be obtained for filling privately-owned wetlands is not a taking, although permit denial resulting in prevention of economically viable use of land may be).

[6] Texaco v. Short, 454 U.S. 516 (1982) (state statute deeming mineral claims lapsed upon failure of putative owners to take prescribed steps is not a taking); United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84 (1985) (reasonable regulation of recordation of mining claim is not a taking).

[7] 467 U.S. 986 (1984).

[8] Id. at 1011.

[9] Id. at 1006–07. Similarly, disclosure of data submitted before the confidentiality guarantee was placed in the law did not frustrate reasonable expectations, the Trade Secrets Act merely protecting against "unauthorized" disclosure. Id. at 1008–10.

[10] 475 U.S. 211 (1986). Accord Concrete Pipe & Products v. Constr. Laborers Pension Tr., 508 U.S. 602, 645–46 (1993). See also Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 179 (1979) (involving frustration of "expectancies" developed through improvements to private land and governmental approval of permits); PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 84 (1980) (characterizing and distinguishing Kaiser Aetna as involving interference with "reasonable investment backed expectations").

[11] 524 U.S. 498 (1998). Although the plurality opinion announcing the judgment in Eastern Enterprises analyzed the case as a takings issue, five Justices in that case (one supporting the judgment and four dissenters) found substantive due process, not takings law, to provide the analytical framework where, as in Eastern Enterprises, the gravamen of the complaint is the unfairness and irrationality of the statute rather than its economic impact.

promise of lifetime benefits. In 1998, the Court, however, sustained a federal ban on selling artifacts made from eagle feathers as applied to the existing inventory of a commercial dealer in such artifacts, while not directly addressing the ban's interference with investment-backed expectations.[12] The Court merely noted that the ban served a substantial public purpose in protecting the eagle from extinction, that the owner still had viable economic uses for his holdings, such as displaying them in a museum and charging admission, and that he still had the value of possession.[13]

The Court has made plain that, in applying the economic impact and investment-backed expectations factors of Penn Central, courts should compare what the property owner has lost through the challenged government action with what the owner retains. Discharging this mandate requires a court to define the extent of plaintiff's property—the "parcel as a whole"—that sets the scope of analysis.[14] In Murr v. Wisconsin, the Court stated that, "[l]ike the ultimate question whether a regulation has gone too far, the question of the proper parcel in regulatory takings cases cannot be solved by any simple test. Courts must instead define the parcel in a manner that reflects reasonable expectations about the property."[15]

In Murr, the owners of two small adjoining lots, previously owned separately, wished to sell one of their lots and build on the other. The landowners were prevented from doing so by state and local regulations, enacted to implement a federal Act, which effectively merged the lots when they came under common ownership prior to their purchase by the plaintiffs, thereby barring the separate sale or improvement of the lots. The plaintiff landowners therefore sought just compensation, alleging a regulatory taking of their property. In ruling against the landowners, the Supreme Court set forth a flexible multi-factor test for defining "the proper unit of property" to analyze whether a regulatory taking has occurred,[16] whereby the boundaries of the parcel determine the "denominator of the fraction" of value taken from a property by a governmental regulation, which in turn can determine whether the government

[12] Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51 (1979).

[13] The Court in Goldblatt had pointed out that the record contained no indication that the mining prohibition would reduce the value of the property in question. 369 U.S. 590, 594 (1962). Contrast Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704 (1987) (finding insufficient justification for a complete abrogation of the right to pass on to heirs interests in certain fractionated property). Note as well the differing views expressed in Irving as to whether that case limits Andrus v. Allard to its facts. Id. at 718 (Brennan, J., concurring), 719 (Scalia, J., concurring). See also Lucas v. S.C. Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1027–28 (1992) (suggesting that Allard may rest on a distinction between permissible regulation of personal property, on the one hand, and real property, on the other).

[14] The "parcel as a whole" analysis refers to the precept that takings law "does not divide a single parcel into discrete segments and attempt to determine whether rights in a particular segment have been entirely abrogated." Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. City of N.Y., 438 U.S. 104, 130 (1978); see also Concrete Pipe, 508 U.S. at 644; Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 497 (1987). In Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, the Court affirmed the established spatial dimension of the doctrine, under which the court must consider the entire relevant tract, as well as the functional dimension, under which the court must consider plaintiff's full bundle of rights. See 535 U.S. 302, 327 (2002). The spatial dimension is perhaps best illustrated by the analysis in Penn Central, wherein the Court declined to segment Grand Central Terminal from the air rights above it. 438 U.S. at 130. And the functional dimension of the parcel as a whole is demonstrated by the Court's refusal in Andrus v. Allard to segment one "stick" in the plaintiff's "bundle" of property rights in holding that denial of the right to sell Indian artifacts was not a taking in light of rights in the artifacts that were retained. 444 U.S. 51, 65–66 (1979). In Tahoe-Sierra, the Court also added a temporal dimension to the "parcel as a whole" analysis, under which a court considers the entire time span of plaintiff's property interest. Invoking this temporal dimension, the Court held that temporary land-use development moratoria do not effect a total elimination of use because use and value return in the period following the moratorium's expiration. Tahoe-Sierra, 535 U.S. at 327. Thus, such moratoria are to be analyzed under the ad hoc, multifactor Penn Central test, rather than a per se "total takings" approach.

[15] Murr v. Wisconsin, 137 S. Ct. 1933, 1950 (2017) (internal citation omitted) (emphasis added).

[16] Id. at 1943–46. In doing so, the Court rejected arguments for the adoption of "a formalistic rule to guide the parcel inquiry," one that would "tie the definition of the parcel to state law." See id. at 1946.

has "taken" private property.[17] Under this formula, regulators have an interest in a larger denominator—in the Murr case, combining the two adjoining lots—to reduce the likelihood of having to provide compensation, while property owners seeking to show that their property has been taken have an interest in the denominator being as small as possible. The Murr Court instructed that, in determining the parcel at issue in a regulatory takings case, "no single consideration can supply the exclusive test for determining the denominator. Instead, courts must consider a number of factors," including (1) "the treatment of the land under state and local law"[18]; (2) "the physical characteristics of the land"[19]; and (3) "the prospective value of the regulated land."[20]

In Penn Central, the Court rejected the principle that no compensation is required when regulation bans a noxious or harmful effect of land use. The principle, the City contended, followed from several earlier cases, including Goldblatt v. Town of Hempstead.[21] In that case, the town enacted an ordinance that in effect terminated further mining at a site owned by the plaintiff. Declaring that no compensation was owed, the Court stated that "[a] prohibition simply upon the use of property for purposes that are declared, by valid legislation, to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community, cannot, in any just sense, be deemed a taking or an appropriation of property for the public benefit. Such legislation does not disturb the owner in the control or use of his property for lawful purposes, nor restrict his right to dispose of it, but is only a declaration by the State that its use by anyone, for certain forbidden purposes, is prejudicial to the public interests."[22] In Penn Central, however, the Court clarified the test on which prior cases had turned, stating "These cases are better understood as resting not on any supposed 'noxious' quality of the prohibited uses but rather on the ground that the restrictions were reasonably related to the implementation of a policy—not unlike historic preservation—expected to produce a widespread public benefit and applicable to all similarly situated property."[23] In Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council,[24] the Court further explained "noxious use" analysis as merely an early characterization of police power measures that do not require compensation. The Court noted, "[N]oxious use logic cannot serve as a touchstone to distinguish regulatory 'takings'—which require compensation—from regulatory deprivations that do not require compensation."[25]

---

[17] Id. at 1944 ("[B]ecause our test for regulatory taking requires us to compare the value that has been taken from the property with the value that remains in the property, one of the critical questions is determining how to define the unit of property 'whose value is to furnish the denominator of the fraction.' As commentators have noted, the answer to this question may be outcome determinative." (quoting Keystone, 480 U.S. at 497)).

[18] Id. at 1945 ("[C]ourts should give substantial weight to the treatment of the land, in particular how it is bounded or divided, under state and local law.").

[19] Id. ("[C]ourts must look to the physical characteristics of the landowner's property. These include the physical relationship of any distinguishable tracts, the parcel's topography, and the surrounding human and ecological environment. In particular, it may be relevant that the property is located in an area that is subject to, or likely to become subject to, environmental or other regulation.").

[20] Id. at 1945, 1946 ("[C]ourts should assess the value of the property under the challenged regulation, with special attention to the effect of burdened land on the value of other holdings.").

[21] 369 U.S. 590 (1962). Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U.S. 394 (1915), and, perhaps, Miller v. Schoene, 276 U.S. 272 (1928), also fall under this heading, although Schoene may also be assigned to the public peril line of cases.

[22] 369 U.S. at 593 (quoting Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 668–69 (1887)). The Court posited a two-part test. First, the interests of the public required the interference, and, second, the means were reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose and were not unduly oppressive of the individual. Id. at 595. The test was derived from Lawton v. Steele, 152 U.S. 133, 137 (1894), which held that state officers properly destroyed fish nets that were banned by state law in order to preserve certain fisheries from extinction.

[23] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. City of N.Y., 438 U.S. 104, 133–34 n.30 (1978).

[24] 505 U.S. 1003 (1992).

[25] Id. at 1026. The Penn Central majority also rejected the dissent's contention, 438 U.S. at 147–50, that regulation of property use constitutes a taking unless it spreads its distribution of benefits and burdens broadly so

Amdt5.9.7 Per Se Takings and Exactions

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Penn Central is not the only guide to when an inverse condemnation has occurred; other criteria have emerged from other cases before and after Penn Central. The Court has long recognized a per se takings rule for certain physical invasions: when government permanently[1] occupies property (or authorizes someone else to do so), the action constitutes a taking regardless of the public interests served or the extent of damage to the parcel as a whole.[2] One modern case dealt with a law that required landlords to permit a cable television company to install its cable facilities upon their buildings; although the equipment occupied only about one and a half cubic feet of space on the exterior of each building and had only a de minimis economic impact, a divided Court held that the regulation authorized a permanent physical occupation of the property and thus constituted a taking.[3] The Court further sharpened the distinction between regulatory takings and permanent physical occupations by declaring it "inappropriate" to use case law from either realm as controlling precedent in the other.[4]

A second per se taking rule is of more recent vintage. In Agins v. City of Tiburon, the Court stated that land use controls constitute takings if they do not "substantially advance legitimate governmental interests," or if they deny a property owner "economically viable use of his land."[5] The Court later erased the Agins "substantially advances" test, explaining that regulatory takings law concerns the magnitude, character, and distribution of burdens that a that each person burdened has at the same time the enjoyment of the benefit of the restraint upon his neighbors. The Court deemed it immaterial that the landmarks law has a more severe impact on some landowners than on others: "Legislation designed to promote the general welfare commonly burdens some more than others." Id. at 133–34.

---

[1] By contrast, the per se rule is inapplicable to temporary physical occupations of land. Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 428, 434 (1982); PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 84 (1980).

[2] The rule emerged from cases involving flooding of lands and erection of poles for telegraph lines, e.g., Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 166 (1872); City of St. Louis v. W. Union Tel. Co., 148 U.S. 92 (1893); W. Union Tel. Co. v. Pa. R.R., 195 U.S. 540 (1904).

[3] Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419 (1982). The Court distinguished Loretto in FCC v. Florida Power Corp., 480 U.S. 245 (1987), holding that the regulation of the rates that utilities may charge cable companies for pole attachments does not constitute a taking without any requirement that utilities allow attachment and acquiesce in physical occupation of their property. See also Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519 (1992) (no physical occupation was occasioned by regulations in effect preventing mobile home park owners from setting rents or determining who their tenants would be; owners could still determine whether their land would be used for a trailer park and could evict tenants in order to change the use of their land); Cedar Point Nursery v. Hassid, No. 20-107 (U.S. June 23, 2021) (state law requiring agricultural employers to allow union organizers on their business properties for up to three hours per day, 120 days per year, constituted a per se taking requiring just compensation).

[4] Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 323 (2002). Tahoe-Sierra's sharp physical-regulatory dichotomy is hard to reconcile with dicta in Lingle v. Chevron United States Inc., 544 U.S. 528, 539 (2005), to the effect that the Penn Central regulatory takings test, like the physical occupations rule of Loretto, "aims to identify regulatory actions that are functionally equivalent to the classic taking in which government directly appropriates private property or ousts the owner from his domain."

[5] 447 U.S. 255, 260 (1980).

regulation imposes on property rights.[6] The second Agins criterion, however, has persisted as a categorical rule: when the landowner "has been called upon to sacrifice all economically beneficial uses in the name of the common good, that is, to leave his property economically idle, he has suffered a taking."[7] The only exceptions, the Court explained in Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, are for those restrictions that come with the property as title encumbrances or other legally enforceable limitations in place prior to acquisition of the property. Regulations "so severe" as to prohibit all economically beneficial use of land, the Court stated, "cannot be newly legislated or decreed (without compensation), but must inhere in the title itself, in the restrictions that background principles of the State's law of property and nuisance already place upon land ownership. A law or decree with such an effect must, in other words, do no more than duplicate the result that could have been achieved in the courts—by adjacent land owners (or other uniquely affected persons) under the State's law of private nuisance, or by the State under its complementary power to abate [public] nuisances . . . , or otherwise."[8]

The "or otherwise" reference, the Court explained in Lucas,[9] was principally directed to cases holding that in times of great public peril, such as war, spreading municipal fires, and the like, property may be taken and destroyed without necessitating compensation. Thus, in United States v. Caltex, Inc.,[10] the Court held owners of property destroyed by retreating United States armies in Manila during World War II were not entitled to compensation, and in United States v. Central Eureka Mining Co.,[11] the Court held that a federal order suspending the operations of a nonessential gold mine for the duration of the war in order to redistribute the miners, unaccompanied by governmental possession and use or a forced sale of the facility, was not a taking entitling the owner to compensation for loss of profits. Similarly, in Juragua Iron Co. v. United States,[12] the Court found that the destruction of a U.S. company's property within enemy territory, done to prevent the spread of yellow fever, did not constitute a taking. The Court noted that property held by domestic interests in enemy territory is considered enemy property and thus not entitled to the protections of the Constitution.[13] Finally, the Court held that when federal troops occupied several buildings during a riot in order to dislodge rioters and looters who had already invaded the buildings, the action was taken as much for the owners' benefit as for the general public benefit and the owners must bear the costs of damage inflicted on the buildings subsequent to the occupation.[14] [6] Lingle, 544 U.S. at 542 (noting that the first Agins test—whether land use controls "substantially advance legitimate governmental interests"—addresses the means-end efficacy of a regulation more in the nature of a due process inquiry).

---

[7] Lucas v. S.C. Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1019 (1992). The Agins/Lucas total deprivation rule does not create an all-or-nothing situation, since "the landowner whose deprivation is one step short of complete" may still be able to recover through application of the Penn Central economic impact and "distinct [or reasonable] investment-backed expectations" criteria. Id. at 1019 n.8. See also Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 632 (2001).

[8] 505 U.S. at 1029.

[9] Id. at 1029 n.16.

[10] 344 U.S. 149 (1952). In dissent, Justices Hugo Black and William Douglas advocated the applicability of a test formulated by Justice Louis Brandeis in Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway. v. Walters,, 294 U.S. 405, 429 (1935), a regulation case, to the effect that "when particular individuals are singled out to bear the cost of advancing the public convenience, that imposition must bear some reasonable relation to the evils to be eradicated or the advantages to be secured." See also United States v. Pac. R.R., 120 U.S. 227 (1887) (government did not owe property power for damage to property during Civil War, but also could not charge landowners for wartime improvements to property).

[11] 357 U.S. 155 (1958).

[12] 212 U.S. 297 (1909).

[13] Id. at 308.

[14] Nat'l Bd. of YMCA v. United States, 395 U.S. 85 (1969); United States v. Sponenbarger, 308 U.S. 256, 265 (1939) ("An undertaking by the government to reduce the menace from flood damages which were inevitable but for the Government's work does not constitute the Government a taker of all lands not fully and wholly protected. When

With the investment-backed expectations factor of Penn Central, many lower courts employed a "notice rule" under which a taking claim was absolutely barred if it was based on a restriction imposed under a regulatory regime predating plaintiff's acquisition of the property. In Palazzolo v. Rhode Island,[15] the Court forcefully rejected the absolute version of the notice rule. Under such a rule, it said, "[a] State would be allowed, in effect, to put an expiration date on the Takings Clause."[16] Whether any role is left for pre-acquisition regulation in the takings analysis, however, the Court's majority opinion did not say, leaving the issue to dueling concurrences from Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (who argued that prior regulation remains a factor) and Justice Antonin Scalia (who would have held that prior regulation is irrelevant). Less than a year later, Justice O'Connor's concurrence was reflected in the Court's extended dicta in Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency,[17] though the decision failed to elucidate the factors affecting the weighting to be accorded the pre-existing regime.

A third type of inverse condemnation, in addition to regulatory and physical takings, is the exaction taking. An "exaction" is a government-imposed requirement that a project developer provide certain public benefits to offset the impacts of the project on the public. A two-part test has emerged to evaluate alleged exaction takings. The first part debuted in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission[18] and holds that in order not to be a taking, an exaction condition on a development permit approval must substantially advance a purpose related to the underlying permit. There must, in short, be an "essential nexus" between the two; otherwise the condition is "an out-and-out plan of extortion."[19] The second part of the exaction-takings test, announced in Dolan v. City of Tigard,[20] specifies that the condition, to not be a taking, must be related to the proposed development not only in nature, per Nollan, but also in degree. Government must establish a "rough proportionality" between the burden imposed by such conditions on the property owner and the impact of the property owner's proposed development on the community—at least in the context of adjudicated (rather than legislated) conditions. To the argument that nothing is "taken" when a permit is denied for failure to agree to a condition precedent, the Court stated that what is at stake is not whether a taking has occurred, but whether the right not to have property taken without just compensation has been burdened impermissibly.[21]

Nollan and Dolan occasioned considerable debate over the breadth of what became known as the "heightened scrutiny" test. Where heightened scrutiny applies, it lessens the traditional judicial deference to local police power and places the burden of proof as to rough proportionality on the government. In City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes at Monterey, Ltd.,[22] the Court unanimously confined the Dolan rough proportionality test, and, by implication, the Nollan nexus test, to the exaction context that gave rise to those cases. The Court did not resolve in Monterey, however, whether Dolan applies to exactions of a purely monetary nature, undertaking to safeguard a large area from existing flood hazards, the government does not owe compensation under the Fifth Amendment to every landowner which it fails to or cannot protect.").

---

[15] 533 U.S. 606 (2001).

[16] Id. at 627.

[17] Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 335 (2002).

[18] 483 U.S. 825 (1987).

[19] Id. at 837.

[20] 512 U.S. 374 (1994).

[21] Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Mgmt. Dist., 570 U.S. 595, 606–07 (2013).

[22] 526 U.S. 687 (1999).

or only to physically invasive dedication conditions.[23] The Court clarified this uncertainty in Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Management District by holding that monetary exactions imposed under land use permitting were subject to essential nexus/rough proportionality analysis.[24]

The Court's announcement following Penn Central of the per se rules in Loretto (physical occupations), Agins and Lucas (total elimination of economic use), and Nollan and Dolan (exaction conditions) prompted speculation that the Court was replacing its ad hoc Penn Central approach with a more categorical takings jurisprudence. Such speculation was put to rest, however, by three decisions from 2001 to 2005 expressing distaste for categorical regulatory takings analysis. These decisions endorsed Penn Central as the dominant mode of analysis for inverse condemnation claims, confining the Court's per se rules to the "relatively narrow" physical occupation and total loss of value circumstances, and the "special context" of exactions.[25]

Amdt5.9.8 Calculating Just Compensation

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Supreme Court has held that the Fifth Amendment's just compensation requirement provides for "a full and perfect equivalent for the property taken."[1] Just compensation is measured "by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business and wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future, . . . [but] 'mere possible or imaginary uses or the speculative schemes of its proprietor, are to be excluded.'"[2] The general standard thus is the market value of the property, [23] A strong hint that monetary exactions are indeed outside Nollan/Dolan was provided in Lingle v. Chevron United States Inc., 544 U.S. 528, 546 (2005), explaining that these decisions were grounded on the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions as applied to easement conditions that would have been per se physical takings if condemned directly.

---

[24] Koontz, 570 U.S. 595.

[25] Lingle, 544 U.S. at 538. The other decisions are Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606 (2001), and Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302 (2002).

[1] Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 326 (1893). The owner's loss, not the taker's gain, is the measure of such compensation. Brown v. Legal Found. of Wash., 538 U.S. 216, 236 (2003); United States ex rel. TVA v. Powelson, 319 U.S. 266, 281 (1943); United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 375 (1943). The value of the property to the government for its particular use is not a criterion. United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U.S. 53 (1913); United States v. Twin City Power Co., 350 U.S. 222 (1956). Attorneys' fees and expenses are not embraced in the concept. Dohany v. Rogers, 281 U.S. 362 (1930).

Applying the owner's-loss standard, the Court addressed a state program requiring lawyers to deposit client funds that cannot earn net interest in a pooled account generating interest for indigent legal aid. Brown, 538 U.S. at 237. Assuming a taking of the client's interest, his pecuniary loss is nonetheless zero; hence, the just compensation required is likewise. Brown is in tension with the Court's earlier treatment of a similar state program, where it recognized value in the possession, control, and disposition of the interest. Phillips v. Wash. Legal Found., 524 U.S. 156, 170 (1998).

[2] Chi. B. & Q. R.R. v. City of Chi., 166 U.S. 226, 250 (1897); See McGovern v. City of N.Y., 229 U.S. 363, 372 (1913). See also Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U.S. 403 (1879); McCandless v. United States, 298 U.S. 342 (1936).

i.e., what a willing buyer would pay a willing seller.[3] If fair market value does not exist or cannot be calculated, resort must be had to other data which will yield a fair compensation.[4] However, the Court has resisted alternative standards, having repudiated reliance on the cost of substitute facilities.[5] Just compensation is especially difficult to compute in wartime, when enormous disruptions in supply and governmentally imposed price ceilings totally skew market conditions. In an early case concerning a takings case under the Pennsylvania constitution, the Court required that the equivalent be in money, not in kind,[6] but in its 1974 decision, Regional Rail Reorganization Act Cases, the Court provided for greater flexibility in the form of compensation recognized.[7]

In two postwar decisions, the Court held that the rule of market value applies even where value is measured by a government-fixed ceiling price. Thus, owners of cured pork and of black pepper could recover only the ceiling price for their commodities despite findings by the Court of Claims that the products had value in excess of their regulatory price ceilings.[8] However, the Court has also ruled that the government was not obliged to pay the market value of a tug when the present value had been greatly enhanced as a consequence of the government's wartime needs, instead requiring the government only to pay the value prior to the events that necessitated its use.[9]

The difficulties in applying the fair market standard of just compensation are illustrated by two cases decided in the same year by 5-4 votes, one in which compensation was awarded and one in which it was denied. One decision held that a company was entitled to compensation for the value of improvements on leased property for the life of the improvements and not simply for the remainder of the term of the lease that had no renewal option, because the company occupied the land for nearly fifty years and had every expectancy of continued occupancy under a new lease. Just compensation, the Court said, required taking into account the possibility that the lease would be renewed, inasmuch as a willing buyer and a willing seller would certainly have placed a value on the possibility.[10] However, when the Federal Government condemned privately owned grazing land of a rancher who had leased adjacent federally owned grazing land, it was held that the compensation owed need not include the value attributable to the proximity to the federal land. The result would have been different if the adjacent grazing land had been privately owned, but the general rule is that government need not pay for value that it itself creates.[11]

---

[3] Miller, 317 U.S. at 374; Powelson, 319 U.S. at 275. See also United States v. New River Collieries Co., 262 U.S. 341 (1923); Olson v. United States, 292 U.S. 264 (1934); Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1 (1949). Exclusion of the value of improvements made by the government under a lease was held constitutional. Old Dominion Land Co. v. United States, 269 U.S. 55 (1925).

[4] Miller, 317 U.S. at 374.

[5] United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506 (1979) (condemnation of church-run camp); United States v. 50 Acres of Land, 469 U.S. 24 (1984) (condemnation of city-owned landfill). In both cases the Court determined that market value was ascertainable.

[6] Van Horne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 304, 315 (C.C. Pa. 1795) ("No just compensation can be made except in money."); Miller, 317 U.S. at 373 ("Such compensation means the full and perfect equivalent money of the property taken.").

[7] Reg'l Rail Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 150–51 (1974) ("No decision of this Court holds that compensation other than money is an inadequate form of compensation under eminent domain statutes.").

[8] United States v. Felin & Co., 334 U.S. 624 (1948); United States v. Commodities Trading Corp., 339 U.S. 121 (1950). See also Vogelstein & Co. v. United States, 262 U.S. 337 (1923)

[9] United States v. Cors, 337 U.S. 325 (1949). See also United States v. Toronto Navigation Co., 338 U.S. 396 (1949).

[10] Almota Farmers Elevator & Warehouse Co. v. United States, 409 U.S. 470 (1973).

[11] United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488 (1973).

Amdt5.9.9 Consequential Damages

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

The Fifth Amendment requires compensation for the taking of "property;" it does not require payment for losses or expenses incurred by property owners or tenants incidental to or as a consequence of the taking of real property, if those losses or expenses are not reflected in the market value of the property taken.[1] The Court has stated that when the government takes property by eminent domain it must compensate the property owner "for what is taken, not more; and [the property owner] must stand whatever indirect or remote injuries are properly comprehended within the meaning of 'consequential damage' as that conception has been defined in such cases. Even so the consequences often are harsh. For these whatever remedy may exist lies with Congress."[2] The Court held, for example, that business owners may not recoup diminution of the value of their business attributed to a taking,[3] that the government was not required to incorporate the value of an unused right to exercise eminent domain to seize neighboring acreage when taking the underlying property,[4] and that a state law barring utilities from incorporating into their rates certain costs associated with construction of non-operational nuclear power facilities did not constitute a taking.[5]

The Court has on occasion carved out exceptions of sorts to this strict rule. For example, in Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, the government seized a tenant's laundry plant for the duration of the war, which turned out to be less than the full duration of the lease, and, having no other means of serving its customers, the laundry suspended business during the military occupancy. The Court narrowly held that the government must compensate for the loss in value of the business attributable to the destruction of its "trade routes," that is, for the loss of customers, whose patronage the laundry had developed over the years.[6] Another exception to the general rule occurs with a partial taking, in which the government takes less than the entire parcel of land and leaves the owner with a portion of what he had before; in such a case compensation includes any diminished value of the remaining portion ("severance damages") as well as the value of the taken portion.[7]

---

[1] Mitchell v. United States, 267 U.S. 341 (1925); United States ex rel. TVA v. Powelson, 319 U.S. 266 (1943); United States v. Petty Motor Co., 327 U.S. 372 (1946). For consideration of the problem of fair compensation in government-supervised bankruptcy reorganization proceedings, see Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555 (1935): New Haven Inclusion Cases, 399 U.S. 392, 489–95 (1970).

[2] United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 382 (1945).

[3] Mitchell v. United States, 267 U.S. 341 (1925).

[4] United States ex rel. TVA v. Powelson, 319 U.S. 266 (1943).

[5] Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299 (1989).

[6] 338 U.S. 1 (1949). See also United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U.S. 114 (1951) (in temporary seizure, Government must compensate for losses attributable to increased wage payments by the Government).

[7] United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 375–76 (1943). "On the other hand," the Court added, "if the taking has in fact benefited the remainder, the benefit may be set off against the value of the land taken." Id.

Amdt5.9.10 Enforcing Right to Just Compensation

Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Ordinarily, the government takes property under a condemnation suit upon paying a money award, and no interest accrues.[1] If, however, the government takes property before making payment, just compensation includes an increment which, to avoid use of the term "interest," the Court has called "an amount sufficient to produce the full equivalent of that value paid contemporaneously with the taking."[2] If the owner and the government enter into a contract which stipulates the purchase price for lands to be taken, with no provision for interest, the Fifth Amendment is inapplicable and the landowner cannot recover interest even though payment of the purchase price is delayed.[3] Where property of a citizen has been mistakenly seized by the government and converted into money which is invested, the property owner is entitled to recover compensation that incorporates increases to the property value during the period of seizure.[4]

The legislature has discretion over the nature and character of the tribunal to determine compensation and may select a regular court, a special legislative court, a commission, or an administrative body.[5] The Government brings proceedings to condemn land for the benefit of the United States in the federal district court for the district in which the land is located.[6] The Fifth Amendment does not establish a right to a jury to estimate just compensation; a judge, commission, or other body may make such determinations.[7] Federal courts may appoint a commission in condemnation actions to resolve the compensation issue.[8] If a body other than a court is designated to determine just compensation, its decision must be subject to judicial review,[9] although the legislature may limit the scope of review.[10] When a state court's

---

[1] Danforth v. United States, 308 U.S. 271, 284 (1939); Kirby Forest Industries v. United States, 467 U.S. 1 (1984) (no interest due in straight condemnation action for period between filing of notice of lis pendens and date of taking).

[2] United States v. Klamath Indians, 304 U.S. 119, 123 (1938); Jacobs v. United States, 290 U.S. 13, 17 (1933); Kirby Forest Industries, 467 U.S. 1 (substantial delay between valuation and payment necessitates procedure for modifying award to reflect value at time of payment).

[3] Albrecht v. United States, 329 U.S. 599 (1947).

[4] Henkels v. Sutherland, 271 U.S. 298 (1926); see also Phelps v. United States, 274 U.S. 341 (1927).

[5] United States v. Jones, 109 U.S. 513 (1883); Bragg v. Weaver, 251 U.S. 57 (1919).

[6] 28 U.S.C. § 1403. Inverse condemnation actions (claims that the United States has taken property without compensation) are governed by the Tucker Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1491 (a)(1), which vests the Court of Federal Claims (formerly the Claims Court) with jurisdiction over claims against the United States "founded . . . upon the Constitution." See E. Enters. v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498, 520 (1998). Federal district courts may also hear inverse condemnation claims against the United States not in excess of $10,000 under the "Little Tucker Act." 28 U.S.C. § 1346(a)(2).

[7] Bauman v. Ross, 167 U.S. 548 (1897). Even when a jury determines the amount of compensation, it is the rule, at least in federal court, that the trial judge instructs the jury on the criteria, which includes determining "all issues" other than the compensation amount, so that the judge decides those matters underlying the jury's calculation. United States v. Reynolds, 397 U.S. 14 (1970).

[8] Fed. R. Civ. P. 71.1(h). These commissions have the same powers as a court-appointed master.

[9] Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 327 (1893).

[10] Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U.S. 685 (1897).

judgment to the amount of compensation is questioned, the Court's review is restricted. The Court has stated: "All that is essential is that in some appropriate way, before some properly constituted tribunal, inquiry shall be made as to the amount of compensation, and when this has been provided there is that due process of law which is required by the Federal Constitution."[11] The Court has also recognized that "[T]here must be something more than an ordinary honest mistake of law in the proceedings for compensation before a party can make out that the State has deprived him of his property unconstitutionally."[12] Unless, by its rulings of law, the state court prevented a complainant from obtaining substantially any compensation, the Court will not overturn the state court findings as to the amount of damages on appeal, even though, as a consequence of error therein, the property owner received less than he was entitled to.[13]

Following Penn Central, the Court grappled with the appropriate remedy for property owners impacted by land use regulations.[14] Regulations that go "too far" in reducing the value of property or which do not substantially advance a legitimate governmental interest present constitutional issues. Courts may invalidate such regulations as denying due process, or they may require compensation, at least for the period in which the regulation was in effect. In First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles, the Court held that when land use regulation constitutes a taking, compensation is due for the period of implementation prior to the holding.[15] The Court recognized that, even though government may elect in such circumstances to discontinue regulation and thereby avoid compensation for a permanent property deprivation, "no subsequent action by the government can relieve it of the duty to provide compensation for the period during which the taking was effective."[16] Outside the land-use context, however, the Court has recognized a limited number of situations where invalidation, rather than compensation, remains the appropriate takings remedy.[17]

The applicability of the ripeness doctrine to takings claims is an area the Court has developed extensively since Penn Central. In Williamson County Regional Planning Commission v. Hamilton Bank,[18] the Court announced a two-part ripeness test for takings actions brought in federal court, although the Court subsequently overturned the second part of this test in Knick v. Township of Scott.[19] The Williamson County two-part ripeness test provided, first, for an as-applied challenge, the property owner must obtain from the regulating agency a "final, definitive position" regarding how it will apply its regulation to the owner's land[20] and, second, when suing a state or municipality, the owner must exhaust any possibilities for obtaining compensation from the state or its courts before coming to federal

[11] Backus v. Fort St. Union Depot Co., 169 U.S. 557, 569 (1898).

[12] McGovern v. City of N.Y., 229 U.S. 363, 370–71 (1913).

[13] Id. at 371. See also Provo Bench Canal Co. v. Tanner, 239 U.S. 323 (1915); Appleby v. City of Buffalo, 221 U.S. 524 (1911).

[14] See, e.g., Agins v. City of Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255 (1980) (issue not reached because property owners challenging development density restrictions had not submitted a development plan); Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 293–97 (1981), and Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 333–36 (1981) (rejecting facial taking challenges to federal strip mining law).

[15] 482 U.S. 304 (1987).

[16] Id. at 321.

[17] E. Enters. v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498 (1998) (statute imposing generalized monetary liability); Babbitt v. Youpee, 519 U.S. 234 (1997) (amended statutory requirement that small fractional interests in allotted Indian lands escheat to tribe, rather than pass on to heirs); Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704 (1987) (pre-amendment version of escheat statute).

[18] 473 U.S. 172 (1985).

[19] 139 S. Ct. 2162, 2179 (2019).

[20] Williamson Cty., 473 U.S. at 191.

court.[21] Thus, in Williamson County, the Court found the claim unripe because the plaintiff had failed to seek a variance (first prong of the Williamson County test), and had not sought compensation from the state courts in question even though they recognized inverse condemnation claims (second prong of the Williamson County test).[22] Similarly, in MacDonald, Sommer & Frates v. County of Yolo,[23] the Court found a final decision lacking where the landowner was denied approval for one subdivision plan calling for intense development, but the possibility of approval for a scaled-down (though still economic) version remained. In a somewhat different context, the Court considered a taking challenge to a municipal rent control ordinance "premature" in the absence of evidence that a tenant hardship provision had been applied to reduce what would otherwise be considered a reasonable rent increase.[24]

Beginning with Lucas in 1992, however, the Court's ripeness determinations have displayed an impatience with formalistic reliance on the Williamson County "final decision" rule, while nonetheless explicitly reaffirming it. In Palazzolo v. Rhode Island,[25] for example, the Court did not require the landowner to apply for approval of a scaled-down development of his wetland, since the regulations at issue permitted no development of the wetland. The Court stated: "[O]nce it becomes clear that the agency lacks the discretion to permit any development, or the permissible uses of the property are known to a reasonable degree of certainty, a takings claim is likely to have ripened."[26] Facial challenges dispense with the Williamson County "final decision" prerequisite, although unless claimants have pursued administrative remedies, they often lack evidence that a statute has the requisite economic impact on his or her property.[27]

As noted previously, the Supreme Court eliminated the second prong of the Williamson County test, which required litigants to exhaust state remedies before bringing a federal takings claim,[28] because the "exhaustion requirement" had significant consequences for plaintiffs.[29] In San Remo Hotel, L.P. v. City & County of San Francisco, the plaintiffs lost an inverse condemnation claim in state court after a federal court dismissed their earlier attempt to file in federal court, citing Williamson County's exhaustion requirement.[30] When the litigants attempted to return to federal court, the court dismissed their claim, holding that the legal doctrine of issue preclusion prevented the court from relitigating the claim.[31] Under common-law preclusion doctrines, which are "implemented by" the federal full faith and credit statute,[32] federal courts are, in some circumstances, required to abide by state court decisions

[21] Id. at 195.

[22] Id. at 194, 196–97.

[23] 477 U.S. 340 (1986).

[24] Pennell v. City of San Jose, 485 U.S. 1 (1988).

[25] 533 U.S. 606 (2001).

[26] Id. at 620. See also Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725 (1997) (taking claim ripe despite plaintiff's not having applied for sale of her transferrable development rights, because no discretion remains to agency and value of such rights is a simple issue of fact).

[27] See, e.g., Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 295–97 (1981) (facial challenge to surface mining law rejected); United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes, 474 U.S. 121, 127 (1985) (mere permit requirement does not itself take property); Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 493–502 (1987) (facial challenge to anti-subsidence mining law rejected).

[28] Williamson Cty. Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 195 (1985).

[29] Knick v. Twp. of Scott, 139 S. Ct. 2162, 2169 (2019).

[30] 545 U.S. 323, 331–32 (2005).

[31] Id. at 334–35.

[32] 28 U.S.C. § 1738 ("[J]udicial proceedings . . . shall have the same full faith and credit in every court within the United States and its Territories and Possessions as they have by law or usage in the courts of such State, Territory or Possession from which they are taken.").

that have already resolved the issues presently before the federal court.[33] In San Remo, the Supreme Court held that these preclusion doctrines barred the plaintiffs' takings claim, declining to create any special exceptions in the context of the Takings Clause.[34] Thus, as the Court later described this outcome, "[t]he adverse state court decision that . . . gave rise to a ripe federal takings claim simultaneously barred that claim."[35]

The Court overruled Williamson County's exhaustion requirement in Knick v. Township of Scott,[36] holding that property owners have a "Fifth Amendment right to full compensation" and a concomitant right to bring a federal suit at the time the government takes their property, "regardless of post-taking remedies that may be available to the property owner."[37] The Court said its cases had long established that a right to compensation "arises at the time of the taking," and that Williamson County's conclusion otherwise had rested on a misunderstanding of precedent.[38] The Supreme Court concluded that Williamson County was wrongly decided and that stare decisis considerations did not preclude it from overruling the exhaustion aspects of that decision.[39] In its 2021 decision, Pakdel v. City & County of San Francisco, the Court confirmed that property compensation need not exhaust avenues for compensation in state court prior to bringing a claim in federal court.[40]

[33] San Remo, 545 U.S. at 336.

[34] Id. at 338.

[35] Knick v. Twp. of Scott, 139 S. Ct. 2162, 2169 (2019).

[36] Id. at 2179.

[37] Id. at 2170, 2173.

[38] Id. at 2170, 2173–75.

[39] Id. at 2177.

[40] Pakdel v. City & Cnty. of S.F., No. 20-1212 (U.S. June 28, 2021).

SIXTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS

SIXTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

SIXTH AMENDMENT—RIGHTS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS

Amdt6.1 Overview of Sixth Amendment, Rights in Criminal Prosecutions

Like with other provisions of the Bill of Rights, the application of the Sixth Amendment evolved. In considering a bill of rights in August 1789, the House of Representatives adopted a proposal to guarantee a right to a jury trial in state prosecutions,[1] but the Senate rejected the proposal, and the 1869 case of Twitchell v. Commonwealth ended any doubt that the states were beyond the direct reach of the Sixth Amendment.[2] The reach of the Amendment thus being then confined to federal courts, questions arose as to its application in federally established courts not located within a state. The Court found that criminal prosecutions in the District of Columbia[3] and in incorporated territories[4] must conform to the Amendment, but those in the unincorporated territories need not.[5] Under the Consular cases, of which the leading case is In re Ross, the Court at one time held that the Sixth Amendment reached only citizens and others within the United States or brought to the United States for trial, and not to citizens residing or temporarily sojourning abroad.[6] Reid v. Covert made this holding inapplicable to proceedings abroad by United States authorities against American civilians.[7] Further, though not applicable to the states by the Amendment's terms, the Court has come to protect all the rights guaranteed in the Sixth Amendment against state abridgment through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[8]

The Sixth Amendment applies in criminal prosecutions. Only those acts that Congress has forbidden, with penalties for disobedience of its command, are crimes.[9] Actions to recover penalties imposed by act of Congress generally but not invariably have been held not to be criminal prosecutions,[10] nor are deportation proceedings,[11] nor appeals or post-conviction

---

[1] 1 Annals of Congress 755 (August 17, 1789).

[2] 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 321, 325–27 (1869).

[3] Callan v. Wilson, 127 U.S. 540 (1888).

[4] Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. (8 Otto) 145 (1879). See also Lovato v. New Mexico, 242 U.S. 199 (1916).

[5] Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 304–05 (1922); Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138 (1904). These holdings are, of course, merely one element of the doctrine of the Insular Cases, De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 1 (1901); and Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901), concerned with the "Constitution and the Advance of the Flag". Cf. Rassmussen v. United States, 197 U.S. 516 (1905).

[6] In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891) (holding that a United States citizen has no right to a jury in a trial before a United States consul abroad for a crime committed within a foreign nation).

[7] 354 U.S. 1 (1957) (holding that civilian dependents of members of the Armed Forces overseas could not constitutionally be tried by court-martial in time of peace for capital offenses committed abroad). Four Justices, Hugo Black, William Douglas, William Brennan, and Chief Justice Earl Warren, disapproved Ross as "resting . . . on a fundamental misconception" that the Constitution did not limit the actions of the United States Government against United States citizens abroad, id. at 5–6, 10–12, and evinced some doubt with regard to the Insular Cases as well. Id. at 12–14. Justices Felix Frankfurter and John Harlan, concurring, would not accept these strictures, but were content to limit Ross to its particular factual situation and to distinguish the Insular Cases. Id. at 41, 65. Cf. Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25, 33–42 (1976) (declining to decide whether there is a right to counsel in a court-martial, but ruling that the summary court-martial involved in the case was not a "criminal prosecution" within the meaning of the Amendment).

[8] Citation is made in the sections dealing with each provision.

[9] United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32 (1812); United States v. Coolidge, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 415 (1816); United States v. Britton, 108 U.S. 199, 206 (1883); United States v. Eaton, 144 U.S. 677, 687 (1892).

[10] Oceanic Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320 (1909); Hepner v. United States, 213 U.S. 103 (1909); United States v. Regan, 232 U.S. 37 (1914).

[11] United States ex rel. Turner v. Williams, 194 U.S. 279, 289 (1904); Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U.S. 272 (1912).

applications for collateral relief,[12] but contempt proceedings, which at one time were not considered criminal prosecutions, are now considered to be criminal prosecutions for purposes of the Amendment.[13]

Amdt6.2 Right to a Speedy Trial

Amdt6.2.1 Overview of Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Constitution protects against "undue delay" in criminal prosecution through a series of component measures rather than through one overarching requirement of timely prosecution.[1] These serial constitutional protections, in turn, are supplemented by statutory protections.[2] First, the Due Process Clause provides a basic safeguard against extreme government delay in bringing criminal charges against a suspect,[3] although statutes of limitations are generally thought to supply the principal protection against such delays.[4] The Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment is the next component: as interpreted by the Supreme Court, it applies to delay between the initiation of criminal proceedings (as marked by an arrest or formal charge) and conviction (whether by trial or plea).[5] Statutory time limits bolster and, at least in the case of the federal Speedy Trial Act of 1974,[6] largely eclipse, by their greater protections, the constitutional right to a speedy trial.[7] Upon conviction, the constitutional speedy trial right detaches, leaving due process and applicable criminal procedure statutes or rules to guard against unreasonable delay in imposing a sentence.[8]

In its landmark 1972 decision Barker v. Wingo, the Supreme Court called the speedy trial protection a "vague concept," about which "[i]t is impossible to do more than generalize" and [12] Cf. Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985) (right to counsel on criminal appeal a matter determined under due process analysis).

---

[13] Compare In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564 (1895), with Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194 (1968).

[1] See Betterman v. Montana, 578 U.S. 437, 446–48 (2016).

[2] See id. at 440, 446–47.

[3] Id. at 446–47.

[4] United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116, 122 (1966) ("[T]he applicable statute of limitations . . . is usually considered the primary guarantee against bringing overly stale criminal charges.").

[5] Betterman, 578 U.S. at 439 ("We hold that the [speedy trial] guarantee protects the accused from arrest or indictment through trial, but does not apply once a defendant has been found guilty at trial or has pleaded guilty to criminal charges.").

[6] 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161–3174. For a discussion of corresponding state provisions, see 5 Wayne R. LaFave et al., Criminal Procedure § 18.3(c) (4th ed. 2020) ("All but a few states have adopted statutes or rules of court on the subject of speedy trial.").

[7] See Betterman, 578 U.S. at 445 (noting that the Speedy Trial Act directs "that no more than 30 days pass between arrest and indictment, and that no more than 70 days pass between indictment and trial" and explaining that these "'more stringent'" statutory provisions "'have mooted much litigation about the requirements of the [Sixth Amendment] Speedy Trial Clause'") (quoting United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 304 n.1 (1986)) (internal citations omitted); see also id. at 8 & n.7 (citing "numerous state analogs" to the federal Speedy Trial Act which "similarly impose precise time limits for charging and trial").

[8] Id. at 2, 9.

which necessitates a "functional analysis."[9] Under Barker, to determine whether a delay between accusation and conviction violates the speedy trial right, the Supreme Court applies a balancing test that considers the following four factors: (1) the length of the delay; (2) the reason for the delay; (3) whether and to what extent the defendant asserted his speedy trial right; and (4) the prejudice to the defendant caused by the delay.[10] This balancing test requires courts to evaluate speedy trial claims on an ad hoc basis and does not prescribe rigid time limits on the length of criminal proceedings.[11] The Speedy Trial Act, in contrast, sets forth two clear time limits: an information or indictment must follow within 30 days of arrest, and a trial must begin within 70 days of indictment or arraignment.[12] The Act, however, exempts numerous types of delay from these time limits, including continuances that serve the ends of justice and delays resulting from pre-trial motions.[13]

The remedy for a violation of a defendant's Sixth Amendment speedy trial right is dismissal of the charges with prejudice.[14] Courts do not have discretion to fashion less drastic remedies after finding a violation of the Speedy Trial Clause.[15]

Amdt6.2.2 Historical Background on Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Safeguards against delay in criminal prosecution predate the Magna Carta and the abandonment of trial by ordeal in England around 1215.[1] In 1166, the Assize of Clarendon described a procedure for obtaining speedy justice for accused persons arrested in a place not

---

[9] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 521–22 (1972); see also Vermont v. Brillon, 556 U.S. 81, 89 (2009) ("The speedy-trial right is 'amorphous,' 'slippery,' and 'necessarily relative.'") (quoting Barker, 407 U.S. at 522).

[10] Barker, 407 U.S. at 530.

[11] Id. at 523, 530.

[12] See Betterman, 578 U.S. at 445 (citing 18 U.S.C. § 3161).

[13] See United States v. Tinklenberg, 563 U.S. 647, 650 (2011); LaFave, supra note 6, § 18.3(b). Many state laws contain similar provisions about time limits and exemptions. See Betterman, 578 U.S. at 445; LaFave, supra note 6.

[14] Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434, 440 (1973).

[15] Id. at 439 (holding that remedies other than dismissal with prejudice, such as a sentencing reduction equal to the length of the unconstitutional delay, do not fully vindicate the purposes of the speedy trial protection, including protection against the stress and disruption of prolonged accusation and the "prospect of rehabilitation").

[1] Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213, 223 (1967) ("[T]he right to a speedy trial . . . has its roots at the very foundation of our English law heritage. Its first articulation in modern jurisprudence appears to have been made in Magna Carta (1215), wherein it was written, 'We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either justice or right'; but evidence of recognition of the right to speedy justice in even earlier times is found in the Assize of Clarendon (1166).") (footnotes omitted); see Thomas Andrew Green, Verdict According to Conscience 3 (1985) ("Trial by jury, as is well known, replaced trial by ordeal after the Church in 1215 proscribed clerical participation in that 'barbaric' practice."). The ordeal was a trial procedure that sought to procure divine judgment of guilt or innocence through a physical test that, to modern eyes, resembled torture. See John H. Langbein et al., History of the Common Law: The Development of Anglo-American Legal Institutions 43 (2009). Two principal types of ordeal were used in England before 1215: ordeal by hot iron (in which the accused was forced to grip a hot iron and was deemed innocent if the resulting wounds resisted infection) and ordeal by cold water (in which the accused was bound and submerged into cold water on a rope and was deemed innocent if he sank). Id. at 44.

scheduled to receive an imminent judicial visit.[2] Later, Sir Edward Coke listed speed as one of the three essential qualities of justice in his Institutes, a work widely read by lawyers in the American colonies.[3] Thus, the right to a speedy trial appears to have been well-established during the colonial period, and several state constitutions already guaranteed the right at the time of the Sixth Amendment's ratification in 1791.[4]

Amdt6.2.3 When the Right to a Speedy Trial Applies

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Until 1971, the Supreme Court did not clearly delineate the stage of the criminal proceeding to which the speedy trial right applied. In the 1957 case Pollard v. United States,[1] the Court assumed, without deciding, that the right applied to the sentencing phase of a criminal prosecution.[2] In a series of subsequent cases over the ensuing decade, the Court articulated the primary purposes of the speedy trial right,[3] held that the right applied against the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,[4] and determined that the right applied to defendants already serving prison sentences in another jurisdiction.[5] These cases did not, however, determine which events during a criminal prosecution trigger the speedy trial right and which events extinguish it.[6]

The Court resolved the front end of this ambiguity in the 1971 case United States v. Marion, where it held that the speedy trial right does not attach before the initiation of criminal proceedings against the accused through an arrest or formal charge.[7] In Marion, the defendants complained of a three-year delay between the commission of the charged crimes

---

[2] Klopher, 386 U.S. at 223 n.9 (the sheriffs were to send word to the nearest justice for instructions as to where to take the accused for trial) (citing 2 English Historical Documents 408 (1953)).

[3] Id. at 224–25 (quoting Edward Coke, The Second Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England 55 (Brooke ed., 5th ed. 1797)).

[4] Id. at 225–26.

[1] 352 U.S. 354 (1957).

[2] Id. at 361 ("We will assume arguendo that sentence is part of the trial for purposes of the Sixth Amendment."). The Court determined that the two-year delay between conviction and sentencing at issue in the case would not have violated the defendant's right to a speedy trial even if that right applied to sentencing. Id. at 361–62. The Court thus found it unnecessary to decide whether the right encompassed sentencing. Id. at 361.

[3] United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116, 120 (1966) ("This guarantee is an important safeguard to prevent undue and oppressive incarceration prior to trial, to minimize anxiety and concern accompanying public accusation and to limit the possibilities that long delay will impair the ability of an accused to defend himself.").

[4] Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213, 223 (1967) ("We hold here that the right to a speedy trial is as fundamental as any of the rights secured by the Sixth Amendment.").

[5] Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30, 37 (1970) ("[O]n demand a State ha[s] a duty to make a diligent and good-faith effort to secure the presence of the accused from the custodial jurisdiction and afford him a trial."); Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 378 (1969) ("The [ ] demands [of the right to a speedy trial] are both aggravated and compounded in the case of an accused who is imprisoned by another jurisdiction.").

[6] See Dickey, 398 U.S. at 40 (Brennan, J., concurring) (observing that "the Court has as yet given scant attention to . . . questions essential to the definition of the speedy-trial guarantee," including "when during the criminal process the speedy-trial guarantee attaches").

[7] 404 U.S. 307, 313 (1971) ("[T]he Sixth Amendment speedy trial provision has no application until the putative defendant in some way becomes an 'accused' . . . ."); id. at 321 ("Invocation of the speedy trial provision . . . need not await indictment, information, or other formal charge. But we decline to extend th[e] reach of the amendment to the

and the issuance of an indictment against them.[8] The government apparently had knowledge of the criminal conduct during those three years but did not commence the prosecution earlier because of limited resources.[9] Although the Court recognized that pre-charge delays might cause prejudice to the defense, it determined that other considerations compelled the conclusion that the speedy trial right does not protect against such delays.[10] These considerations included the text of the Sixth Amendment itself,[11] the history of the speedy trial right and ensuing legislative interpretations of it,[12] and the right's purpose of holding in check the attendant "evils" of public accusation.[13] The Court also emphasized that other sources of law apart from the Sixth Amendment—namely, statutes of limitations and the Due Process Clause—protect against excessive pre-charge delays.[14]

Then, in the 2016 case Betterman v. Montana, the Court held that the speedy trial right "detaches" (i.e., no longer applies) upon conviction,[15] thereby resolving the question left open sixty years earlier in Pollard.[16] The defendant in Betterman argued that a fourteen-month delay between his conviction by guilty plea and the imposition of his sentence violated his right to a speedy trial.[17] In rejecting the claim, the Court reasoned that the speedy trial right serves primarily to safeguard the presumption of innocence and that this purpose does not comport period prior to arrest.") (footnote omitted). For a discussion of how the attachment rule of Marion applies to peculiar charging scenarios, including prosecutions initiated by sealed indictment, see 5 Wayne R. LaFave et al., Criminal Procedure § 18.1(c) (4th ed. 2020).

---

[8] Marion, 404 U.S. at 313.

[9] Id. at 309 (noting evidence in record, including newspaper articles and a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order, indicating that federal prosecutors had knowledge of the criminal fraud scheme about three years before securing the indictment); id. at 335 (Douglas, J., concurring) ("The justifications offered [for the delay] were that the United States Attorney's office was 'not sufficiently staffed to proceed as expeditiously' as desirable and that priority had been given to other cases.") (citation omitted).

[10] Id. at 321–22 ("Passage of time, whether before or after arrest, may impair memories, cause evidence to be lost, deprive the defendant of witnesses, and otherwise interfere with his ability to defend himself. But this possibility of prejudice at trial is not itself sufficient reason to wrench the Sixth Amendment from its proper context."); see also Dillingham v. United States, 423 U.S. 64, 64–65 (1975) (per curiam) (holding that speedy trial right applies to time after arrest but before indictment).

[11] Marion, 404 U.S. at 313 ("On its face, the protection of the Amendment is activated only when a criminal prosecution has begun and extends only to those persons who have been 'accused' in the course of that prosecution.").

[12] Id. at 313–14 ("Our attention is called to nothing in the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the [Sixth] Amendment indicating that it does not mean what it appears to say . . . ."); id. at 316 ("Legislative efforts to implement federal and state speedy trial provisions also plainly reveal the view that these guarantees are applicable only after a person has been accused of a crime.").

[13] Id. at 320 ("[T]he major evils protected against the speedy trial guarantee exist quite apart from actual or possible prejudice to an accused's defense. . . . Arrest is a public act that may seriously interfere with the defendant's liberty, whether he is free on bail or not, and that may disrupt his employment, drain his financial resources, . . . and create anxiety in him, his family and his friends.").

[14] Id. at 323 ("There is . . . no need to press the Sixth Amendment into service to guard against the mere possibility that pre-accusation delays will prejudice the defense in a criminal case since statutes of limitation already perform that function."); id. at 324 ("[T]he Government concedes that the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment would require dismissal of the indictment if it were shown at trial that the pre-indictment delay in this case caused substantial prejudice to appellees' rights to a fair trial and that the delay was an intentional device to gain tactical advantage over the accused."). Although the Court declined, given the lack of a developed record, to conduct a complete due process analysis as to whether the pre-accusation delays in Marion had caused defendants actual prejudice, id. at 325, the Court has applied due process principles to pre-indictment delays in other cases. See United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 796 (1977) (holding that "to prosecute a defendant following investigative delay does not deprive him of due process, even if his defense might have been somewhat prejudiced by the lapse of time," so long as the government does not delay solely to gain a tactical advantage); see also Fifth Amendment (discussing procedural due process rights on confessions in criminal cases).

[15] Betterman v. Montana, 578 U.S. 437, 440 (2016).

[16] Pollard, 352 U.S. at 361 (assuming arguendo "that sentence is part of the trial for purposes of the Sixth Amendment").

[17] Betterman, 578 U.S. at 440.

with applying the right to post-conviction proceedings such as sentencing.[18] The Court also noted, much as it did in Marion, that other sources of law protect against undue delay at the sentencing stage, including rules of criminal procedure and the constitutional right to due process.[19]

Amdt6.2.4 Early Doctrine on Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Before the 1972 Barker v. Wingo[1] decision, where the Supreme Court established a four-factor balancing test for determining when the speedy trial right is abridged,[2] the Court decided speedy trial cases under more general notions of the bounds of appropriate delay in prosecution. In Pollard v. United States in 1957, the Court held that a two-year delay between conviction and sentencing—resulting from the trial court's failure to impose a sentence in the defendant's presence at the original sentencing hearing—did not violate the Sixth Amendment because the delay was not "purposeful or oppressive."[3] The Court used a similar touchstone in the 1966 decision United States v. Ewell, which concerned a nineteen-month delay between initial arrest and a hearing on a second indictment.[4] The delay was caused largely by the defendants' successful motion to vacate their convictions by guilty plea.[5] The Court rejected the defendants' speedy trial claim due to a lack of "oppressive or culpable government conduct."[6] The Court also reasoned that to hold a delay caused by a successful defense appeal unconstitutional would undermine the general principle that a defendant may be "retried in the normal course" of events following the reversal of a conviction.[7]

Aspects of the reasoning in Pollard and Ewell would carry through the landmark Barker case and into the Supreme Court's modern speedy trial jurisprudence. In both pre-Barker cases, the Court emphasized that speedy trial claims required ad hoc analysis of the particular

---

[18] Id.; Id. at 446 (noting arguments that the "prevalence of guilty pleas and the resulting scarcity of trials in today's justice system" have made sentencing proceedings a more significant forum for criminal dispute resolution, but concluding that this "modern reality . . . does not bear on the presumption-of-innocence protection at the heart of the Speedy Trial Clause").

[19] Id. at 447–48 ("The federal rule [of criminal procedure] on point directs the court to 'impose sentence without unnecessary delay.' Many States have provisions to the same effect. . . . Further, as at the prearrest stage, due process serves as a backstop against exorbitant delay.") (quoting Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(b)(1)). Because the defendant in Betterman did not advance a due process claim, the Court limited its due process analysis to the observation that a defendant's right to liberty after conviction, while "diminished," nonetheless encompasses "an interest in a sentencing proceeding that is fundamentally fair." Id. at 448–49.

[1] 407 U.S. 514 (1972).

[2] Id. at 530.

[3] Pollard v. United States, 352 U.S. 354, 361–62 (1957).

[4] 383 U.S. 116, 118–19 (1966).

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 123.

[7] Id. at 121.

circumstances surrounding a delay in prosecution,[8] a point that Barker would go on to reiterate more emphatically.[9] Perhaps more importantly, the Ewell Court attributed three primary purposes to the Speedy Trial Clause: "to prevent undue and oppressive incarceration prior to trial, to minimize anxiety and concern accompanying public accusation and to limit the possibilities that long delay will impair the ability of an accused to defend himself."[10] In subsequent cases, including Barker, the Court would rely on this passage as the definitive formulation of the Speedy Trial Clause's purposes.[11]

In another line of pre-Barker cases that remains important, the Court rejected the contention that prosecutors could, after charging a defendant, leave the charges dormant for extended periods of time free of the strictures of the Speedy Trial Clause. In Klopfer v. North Carolina in 1967, a state prosecutor invoked a procedure called "nolle prosequi with leave" to defer proceedings on an indictment for criminal trespass until an uncertain future date when the prosecutor might restore the case for trial.[12] The Court held that such "indefinite[ ] prolonging" of criminal prosecution violated the defendant's speedy trial right.[13] Similarly, in two cases from 1969 and 1970, the Court held that the government may not defer proceedings against a charged defendant until his release from incarceration in another jurisdiction;[14] rather, the charging authority must make a "diligent and good-faith effort to secure the presence of the accused from the custodial jurisdiction and afford him a trial" upon his request, notwithstanding the inter-jurisdictional cooperation that such a trial might require.[15] In short, the government may not evade the limitations of the Speedy Trial Clause by deferring already-filed charges until the occurrence of some later event.

Amdt6.2.5 Modern Doctrine on Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the [8] See Pollard, 352 U.S. at 361 ("Whether delay in completing a prosecution . . . amounts to an unconstitutional deprivation of rights depends upon the circumstances."); Ewell, 383 U.S. at 120 ("[T]his Court has consistently been of the view that 'The right of a speedy trial is necessarily relative. It is consistent with delays and depends on circumstances.'") (quoting Beavers v. Haubert, 198 U.S. 77, 87 (1905)).

[9] Barker, 407 U.S. at 530 ("A balancing test necessarily compels courts to approach speedy trial cases on an ad hoc basis. We can do little more than identify some of the factors which courts should assess in determining whether a particular defendant has been deprived of his right.").

[10] Ewell, 383 U.S. at 120.

[11] See, e.g., Betterman v. Montana, 578 U.S. 437, 442 (2016) ("The Speedy Trial Clause implements [the presumption of innocence] by" minimizing the likelihood of lengthy incarceration before trial, lessening the "anxiety and concern accompanying public accusation," and limiting the effect of long delay on the defense.); Barker, 407 U.S. at 532.

[12] 386 U.S. 213, 214, 217 (1967).

[13] Id. at 222.

[14] Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30, 37 (1970); Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 383 (1969).

[15] Dickey, 398 U.S. at 37.

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In Barker v. Wingo, the Supreme Court refined its approach to the Speedy Trial Clause by adopting a balancing test to govern claims of unconstitutional delay in prosecution.[1] Willie Mae Barker, the defendant in the case, was convicted of murder.[2] He contended that a five-year delay between his indictment and the start of his trial violated his speedy trial right.[3] The prosecution's decision to put off Barker's trial until it had obtained a conviction against his co-defendant—a necessary witness in the case against Barker—accounted for most of the delay, as it took six trials over more than four years to convict the co-defendant on all counts.[4] Barker did not object to this prosecution tactic until roughly three-and-a-half years of the eventual five-year delay had elapsed.[5]

In considering Barker's claim, the Supreme Court (in a majority opinion joined by seven justices, with the remaining two concurring and no dissents) began by acknowledging that its prior cases did not establish a clear test for determining when a delay in prosecution violated the Speedy Trial Clause.[6] The Court then rejected two proposed "rigid" approaches to applying the Clause that would have provided bright-line rules for prosecutors and lower courts. First, the Court declined to set out a time period—a "specified number of days or months"—within which a defendant must be offered a trial.[7] To establish such a rule, the Court reasoned, would have required the Court to step improperly beyond its adjudicative function and into the realm of "legislative or rulemaking activity."[8] Second, the Court rejected a so-called "demand-waiver" approach, pursuant to which a defendant's failure to demand a trial would have been construed as a waiver of the speedy trial right.[9] The Court concluded that this approach conflicted with its jurisprudence on the waiver of constitutional rights, under which a finding of waiver requires a showing of the defendant's "intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right" rather than a presumption based on the defendant's mere inaction.[10]

Having rejected these "rigid" approaches, the Court settled upon a "balancing test" that would consider "the conduct of both the prosecution and the defendant."[11] The test that the Court announced consists of four factors: "[l]ength of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant."[12] Importantly, the Court acknowledged that this test provides only loose guidance to lower courts, which must apply and weigh the four factors "on an ad hoc basis" to resolve individual speedy trial claims.[13] The [1] Barker, 407 U.S. at 530 ("The approach we accept is a balancing test, in which the conduct of both the prosecution and the defendant are weighed.").

[2] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 517–18 (1972).

[3] Id.

[4] Id. at 516–17.

[5] Id. at 517.

[6] Id. at 516 ("[I]n none of these [speedy trial] cases have we attempted to set out the criteria by which the speedy trial right is to be judged.").

[7] Id. at 523.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 525 ("The demand-waiver doctrine provides that a defendant waives any consideration of his right to speedy trial for any period prior to which he has not demanded a trial. Under this rigid approach, a prior demand is a necessary condition to the consideration of the speedy trial right.").

[10] Id. at 525–26 (quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938)).

[11] Id. at 530.

[12] Id.

[13] Id.

balancing approach does not, in other words, offer the sort of clear rule of decision that either of the two "rigid" approaches (rejected by the Barker Court) would have supplied.[14]

Applying the four factors in its test to the five-year delay in Barker's case, the Court called the case "close" but held that the delay did not violate the Speedy Trial Clause.[15] The first two factors—the delay's length and the reason for it—favored Barker's claim.[16] Five years was an "extraordinary delay," the Court determined, and, in particular, the prosecution's objective of presenting the co-defendant's testimony at Barker's trial did not justify the four years it took to accomplish.[17] But the other two factors—prejudice and the defendant's assertion of the speedy trial right—went against Barker and outweighed the first two factors.[18] Barker did not claim that the delay significantly impaired his defense at trial, and the Court thus concluded that he suffered little prejudice.[19] Most important, the Court determined that Barker's failure to demand a speedy trial during most of the delay showed that "he definitely did not want to be tried" and that he had made a strategic choice to "gambl[e]" that his co-defendant would be acquitted.[20] This last consideration appeared essentially outcome-determinative: a defendant who did not want a speedy trial, the Court reasoned, would not be deemed to have suffered a deprivation of his speedy trial right absent "extraordinary circumstances," such as the receipt of incompetent legal advice.[21]

Although the Court has generally refrained from reviewing lower court applications of the ad hoc balancing analysis it prescribed in Barker, a group of later opinions, discussed below, clarifies Barker's guidance on how to apply each of the four factors.[22]

Amdt6.2.6 Length of Delay and Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The length of delay factor works as a "triggering mechanism" for the remainder of the balancing test.[1] In Barker, the Court made clear that courts need not reach the other three factors absent a post-accusation delay that is long enough to be "presumptively prejudicial."[2]

---

[14] See Id.

[15] Id. at 533–34.

[16] Id.

[17] Id. at 534.

[18] Id.

[19] Id. ("[P]rejudice was minimal. Of course, Barker was prejudiced to some extent by living for over four years under a cloud of suspicion and anxiety. Moreover, although he was released on bond for most of the period, he did spend 10 months in jail before trial. But there is no claim that any of Barker's witnesses died or otherwise became unavailable owing to the delay.").

[20] Id. at 535–36.

[21] Id.

[22] See Vermont v. Brillon, 556 U.S. 81, 91 (2009) (noting that "the balance arrived at [by lower courts under Barker] in close cases ordinarily would not prompt this Court's review" but deeming it necessary nonetheless to correct a state court's "fundamental error in its application of Barker").

[1] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 530 (1972).

[2] Id.

The Court held that the delay in Barker's case satisfied this standard,[3] but the Court did not set a concrete time frame for presumptively prejudicial delay.[4] Rather, the Court said that the inquiry would depend upon the nature of the criminal charges.[5] The less serious the charges, the less a court should tolerate delay.[6] In later cases from 1986 and 1992, the Supreme Court held presumptively prejudicial a 90-month post-arrest delay in a prosecution for possession of firearms and explosives[7] and an eight and one-half year post-indictment delay in a prosecution for conspiracy to import and distribute cocaine.[8] In the latter case, the Court observed without comment that "the lower courts have generally found postaccusation delay 'presumptively prejudicial' at least as it approaches one year."[9] If a delay is presumptively prejudicial, the court must proceed to weigh its excessive length—that is, "the extent to which [it] stretches beyond the bare minimum needed to trigger" the full Barker analysis—along with the other three factors of the balancing test.[10]

Time that elapses between the formal dismissal and reinstatement of charges does not count toward the length of delay for speedy trial purposes, so long as the defendant is not subject to any restraint on liberty during the interim period.[11] Thus, the Supreme Court held in 1982 that the passage of four years between the dismissal of military charges and a later federal grand jury indictment for the same alleged crimes, during which time the defendant was not subject to restraints, did not support a claim for a violation of the Speedy Trial Clause.[12] Similarly, in a 1986 case where the trial court dismissed an indictment before trial, leaving the defendants free of restraints, the Supreme Court held that the duration of the government's successful appeal of the dismissal did not count towards the defendants' speedy trial claims.[13] In contrast, the duration of an interlocutory appeal[14] that proceeds while an indictment or restraints on liberty (such as bail or incarceration) remain in place does count toward the length of delay factor under Barker.[15]

Amdt6.2.7 Reason for Delay and Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the

[3] Id. at 533–34.

[4] Id. at 530.

[5] Id. at 530–31.

[6] Id.

[7] United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 314 (1986).

[8] Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 652 (1992).

[9] Id. at 652 n.1.

[10] Id. at 652.

[11] United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7 (1982) ("[T]he Speedy Trial Clause has no application after the Government, acting in good faith, formally drops charges.").

[12] Id. at 9–10.

[13] Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 311 ("We find that after the District Court dismissed the indictment against respondents and after respondents were freed without restraint, they were 'in the same position as any other subject of a criminal investigation.'") (quoting MacDonald, 456 U.S. at 8–9).

[14] An interlocutory appeal is an "appeal that occurs before the trial court's final ruling on the entire case," Appeal, Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014), such as an appeal from a pre-trial order suppressing evidence. See Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 306–07, 313.

[15] Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 314 (adopting the Barker test "to determine the extent to which appellate time consumed in the review of pretrial motions should weigh towards a defendant's speedy trial claim").

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Barker Court divided government justifications for delay into three categories and explained how each category should impact the balance of factors.[1] First, "[a] deliberate attempt to delay the trial in order to hamper the defense should be weighted heavily against the government."[2] Second, "[a] more neutral reason such as negligence or overcrowded courts should be weighted less heavily but nevertheless should be considered since the ultimate responsibility for such circumstances must rest with the government . . . ."[3] Third, "a valid reason, such as a missing witness, should serve to justify appropriate delay."[4] The five-year delay at issue in Barker's case (caused primarily by the government's choice to postpone trial until the conclusion of proceedings against the co-defendant) appeared to fall into the second category.[5] Accordingly, the Court seemed to count the reason for delay moderately in Barker's favor, but the factor did not carry enough weight—not even when combined with the "extraordinary" length of delay—to overcome Barker's failure to assert adequately his speedy trial right and the lack of specific prejudice to his defense.[6]

In a 1992 case, the Supreme Court articulated the "reason for delay" inquiry as "whether the government or the criminal defendant is more to blame for th[e] delay."[7] Later cases also clarified the interplay between the reason for delay factor and the other Barker factors and indicated that, in some circumstances, the reason for delay could do much to determine the outcome of the balancing test.[8] Where the government causes delay on purpose to gain a trial advantage, a long delay will generally amount to a constitutional violation.[9] Where the government bears no blame for a long delay—not even in the "more neutral" sense of negligence or crowded dockets—a constitutional violation likely does not exist absent a showing of specific evidentiary prejudice.[10] In contrast, government negligence "falls on the wrong side of the divide between acceptable and unacceptable reasons for delaying a criminal prosecution" and amounts to a constitutional violation, even without a showing of specific evidentiary prejudice, if it causes a delay that "far exceeds the [presumptive prejudice] threshold" and if the defendant did not exacerbate the delay through a failure to assert the

[1] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 531 (1972).

[2] Id.

[3] Id; see also Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434, 436 (1973) ("Unintentional delays caused by overcrowded court dockets or understaffed prosecutors are among the factors to be weighed less heavily than intentional delay, calculated to hamper the defense . . . .").

[4] Barker, 407 U.S. at 531.

[5] Id. at 534 ("[A] good part of [the delay] was attributable to the Commonwealth's failure or inability to try [the co-defendant] under circumstances that comported with due process.").

[6] Id. at 534–35.

[7] Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 651 (1992).

[8] Vermont v. Brillon, 556 U.S. 81, 90–94 (2009); Doggett, 505 U.S. at 656–58.

[9] Doggett, 505 U.S. at 656.

[10] Id.

speedy trial right.[11] Finally, delays caused by defendants or their counsel—regardless of whether counsel is appointed or privately retained—weigh against defendants and generally will not support a speedy trial claim.[12]

Amdt6.2.8 Assertion of Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Supreme Court's most extensive commentary on the third balancing factor came in Barker itself, where the defendant's failure to assert his right to a speedy trial promptly and forcefully appeared to doom his claim in the eyes of the Court.[1] The Court made clear that a defendant's failure to assert the right is not a prerequisite to a speedy trial claim.[2] Put differently, a defendant does not waive the right by failing to assert it.[3] Moreover, the significance of a failure to assert the right depends on circumstance.[4] A failure to object to delay for a compelling reason—such as representation by "incompetent counsel"—might not undermine a speedy trial claim,[5] just as a pro forma objection will weigh less in the defendant's favor than an objection made with "frequency and force."[6] In the final analysis, however, the Barker Court homed in on the defendant's litigation strategy as the fulcrum of the inquiry under the third element: where the record shows that the defendant does not want a speedy trial, the Court reasoned, only on rare occasion will he be deemed to have been denied his right [11] Id. at 657–58 (8.5-year delay caused by government negligence violated defendant's speedy trial right, despite lack of showing of specific prejudice, where defendant did not know of charges against him and therefore could not be blamed for not demanding a speedy trial).

[12] Brillon, 556 U.S. at 94 ("[A] defendant's deliberate attempt to disrupt proceedings [should] be weighted heavily against the defendant)"; id. ("[D]elays caused by defense counsel are properly attributed to the defendant, even where counsel is assigned."). The Court left open the possibility that a delay caused by breakdown in the public defender system could count against the government for speedy trial purposes. Id.

[1] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 534 (1972) ("More important than the absence of serious prejudice, is the fact that Barker did not want a speedy trial.").

[2] Id. at 528.

[3] Id. ("We reject . . . the rule that a defendant who fails to demand a speedy trial forever waives his right.").

[4] Id. at 529 (explaining that, under the balancing test for speedy trial claims, a court may "attach a different weight to a situation in which the defendant knowingly fails to object from a situation in which his attorney acquiesces in long delay" and may also "weigh the frequency and force of the objections as opposed to attaching significant weight to a purely pro forma objection").

[5] Id. at 536 ("We do not hold that there may never be a situation in which an indictment may be dismissed on speedy trial grounds where the defendant has failed to object to continuances. There may be a situation in which the defendant was represented by incompetent counsel, was severely prejudiced, or even cases in which the continuances were granted ex parte.").

[6] Id. at 529.

to a speedy trial.[7] This analytical approach seemed to echo the Court's earlier observation in Ewell that delay in prosecution often benefits the defendant.[8]

In the 1992 case Doggett v. United States, the Court clarified that failure to demand a speedy trial does not count against defendants who are unaware of the charges against them.[9] In that case, the factual record indicated that the defendant did not know that he had been indicted on federal charges of narcotics distribution during the entirety of an eight-and-one-half year delay between the date of the indictment and the date authorities arrested him to face the charges.[10] The Supreme Court reasoned that such ignorance of the proceedings neutralized the third factor in the balancing test;[11] accordingly, the Court proceeded to find a violation of the Speedy Trial Clause based on the interplay of the other three factors alone.[12]

Amdt6.2.9 Prejudice and Right to a Speedy Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Barker instructed courts to consider prejudice in terms of the three primary purposes of the speedy trial guarantee: (1) prevention of "oppressive pretrial incarceration;" (2) minimization of the "anxiety and concern" caused by criminal accusation; and (3) protection against "the possibility that the defense will be impaired" by delay (i.e., evidentiary prejudice).[1] Generally, the Court has emphasized evidentiary prejudice as the most consequential of the three types.[2] In Barker, for example, where the defendant had spent ten months in pre-trial detention and endured 4.5 years under the "cloud" and "anxiety" of pending murder charges (and could therefore establish prejudice of the first two types), the Court counted the prejudice factor against the defendant because he did not show that the delay actually damaged his defense.[3]

---

[7] Id. at 532 ("We emphasize that failure to assert the right will make it difficult for a defendant to prove that he was denied a speedy trial."); id. at 536 ("[B]arring extraordinary circumstances, we would be reluctant . . . to rule that a defendant was denied [the speedy trial] right on a record that strongly indicates . . . that the defendant did not want a speedy trial. We hold, therefore, that Barker was not deprived of his due process right to a speedy trial.")

[8] See id. at 521 ("A . . . difference between the right to speedy trial and the accused's other constitutional rights is that deprivation of the right may work to the accused's advantage. Delay is not an uncommon defense tactic."); United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116, 122–23 (1966) ("[T]he problem of delay is the Government's too, for it still carries the burden of proving the charges beyond a reasonable doubt.").

[9] 505 U.S. 647, 654 (1992).

[10] Id. at 653.

[11] Id. at 654 ("[The defendant] is not to be taxed for invoking his speedy trial right only after his arrest.").

[12] Id. at 656–58 (considering length of delay, reason for delay, and prejudice).

[1] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 532 (1972).

[2] Id. ("[T]he most serious [type of prejudice] is the last, because the inability of a defendant adequately to prepare his case skews the fairness of the entire system."); Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 654 (1992) (quoting Barker for same proposition).

[3] Barker, 407 U.S. at 534.

Amdt6.2.9
Prejudice and Right to a Speedy Trial

Multiple times the Court has said that a showing of evidentiary prejudice is not essential.[4] Yet on one occasion, in the 1994 case Reed v. Farley, the Supreme Court made a statement directly to the contrary, declaring that a showing of evidentiary prejudice "is required" to show a speedy trial violation.[5] That statement did not appear to constitute a binding holding: Reed dealt with the Speedy Trial Clause only in passing because the defendant did not actually press a constitutional speedy trial claim.[6] Nonetheless, even though Reed probably does not establish that a speedy trial claim must include a showing of evidentiary prejudice to succeed, the case does underline the Court's tendency to treat impairment to the defense as the key aspect of the prejudice prong and one of the most impactful considerations in the overall Barker analysis.[7]

The Supreme Court's consistent emphasis on the significance of evidentiary prejudice, however, has, from the outset, included one subtle qualification: the damage that delay causes to the defense does not always lend itself to an affirmative showing.[8] Thus, in Doggett, where government negligence delayed proceedings by at least six years but where the defendant failed to show any specific impairment to his defense, the Court weighed the prejudice factor in the defendant's favor based on the presumption that such a long delay had hurt the defense case in ways that neither side could demonstrate.[9] The Court stressed, however, that the presumption of evidentiary prejudice—as opposed to an affirmative showing of such prejudice—would support a speedy trial violation only in the case of particularly long delays[10] and only where other factors also favored the defendant.[11]

---

[4] Doggett, 505 U.S. at 655 ("[A]ffirmative proof of particularized prejudice is not essential to every speedy trial claim."); Moore v. Arizona, 414 U.S. 25, 26 (1973) (per curiam) (rejecting, based on Barker, the "notion that an affirmative demonstration of prejudice [i]s necessary to prove a denial of the constitutional right to a speedy trial"); Barker, 407 U.S. at 533 ("We regard none of the four factors [in the balancing test] identified above as either a necessary or sufficient condition to the finding of a deprivation of the right of speedy trial.").

[5] 512 U.S. 339, 353 (1994) ("[The defendant] does not suggest that his ability to present a defense was prejudiced by the delay [in his prosecution]. . . . A showing of prejudice is required to establish a violation of the Sixth Amendment Speedy Trial Clause, and that necessary ingredient is entirely missing here.").

[6] Id. at 352 (noting the defendant's concession that "his constitutional right to a speedy trial was in no way violated"). Reed dealt primarily with the scope of collateral review of state court convictions under 28 U.S.C. § 2254. 512 U.S. at 342 ("We hold that a state court's failure to observe the 120-day rule of [the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act] Article IV(c) is not cognizable under § 2254 when the defendant registered no objection to the trial date at the time it was set, and suffered no prejudice attributable to the delayed commencement.").

[7] See Id. at 352; Barker, 407 U.S. at 532.

[8] Barker, 407 U.S. at 532 ("There is . . . prejudice if defense witnesses are unable to recall accurately events of the distant past. Loss of memory, however, is not always reflected in the record because what has been forgotten can rarely be shown."); see Doggett, 505 U.S. at 655 ("We generally have to recognize that excessive delay presumptively compromises the reliability of a trial in way that neither party can prove or, for that matter, identify.").

[9] Doggett, 505 U.S. at 658 ("When the Government's negligence thus causes delay [of six years] . . . and when the presumption of prejudice, albeit unspecified, is neither extenuated, as by the defendant's acquiescence, . . . nor persuasively rebutted, the defendant is entitled to relief.") (footnotes omitted); id at 658 n.4 (emphasizing that the government "ha[d] not, and probably could not have, affirmatively proved that the delay left [defendant's] ability to defend himself unimpaired").

[10] Id. at 657 ("[T]o warrant granting relief, negligence unaccompanied by particularized trial prejudice must have lasted longer than negligence demonstrably causing such prejudice.").

[11] Id. at 656 ("Presumptive prejudice cannot alone carry a Sixth Amendment claim without regard to the other Barker criteria . . . .").

Amdt6.3 Right to a Public Trial

Amdt6.3.1 Overview of Right to a Public Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment guarantees criminal defendants the right to be tried in public.[1] The Supreme Court has interpreted this right to apply to criminal trials and certain important pre-trial proceedings,[2] although the Court has also recognized that the right is subject to limitation where overriding interests require the exclusion of all or some members of the public from the courtroom.[3] The Sixth Amendment public trial right only protects the defendant,[4] but members of the public have the right to attend criminal proceedings under the First Amendment.[5] The Supreme Court has carefully avoided calling the First and Sixth Amendment public trial rights coextensive.[6] The Court has made clear, however, that the Sixth Amendment offers criminal defendants at least as much protection from closed proceedings as the First Amendment offers the public.[7] To a more limited extent, the Court has also determined that due process plays some role in protecting the accused from secret proceedings.[8]

Amdt6.3.2 Historical Background on Right to a Public Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Criminal trials have generally been open to the public since the origins of the Anglo-American legal system.[1] Indeed, the public nature of the criminal trial was one of the

---

[1] Presley v. Georgia, 558 U.S. 209, 212 (2010). As noted elsewhere, the Court held the public trial right applicable against the states in In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 272–73 (1948). See Amdt14.S1.4.1 Overview of Incorporation of the Bill of Rights (discussing the due process clause and incorporation).

[2] Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39, 46–47 (1984).

[3] Id. at 48.

[4] See Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 391 (1979)

[5] Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 580 (1980); see Amdt1.9.1 Overview of Freedom of the Press to Amdt1.10.1 Historical Background on Freedoms of Assembly and Petition (discussing public trial rights).

[6] Presley, 558 U.S. at 212–13.

[7] Id.

[8] See Levine v. United States, 362 U.S. 610, 616 (1960); see also Fifth Amendment (discussing procedural due process rights on confessions in criminal cases).

[1] Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 564–65 (1980) (noting that community participation in criminal trials in England predated the Norman conquest and carried through into the development of the common law) (citing Frederick Pollock, English Law Before the Norman Conquest, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 88, 89 (1907)); In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 266 (1948) ("This nation's accepted practice of guaranteeing a public principal attributes that, historically, distinguished common law "accusatorial" criminal procedure from the "inquisitorial" system that took root in so-called civil law countries (i.e., countries where the dominant legal tradition descends from Roman law)[2] in the sixteenth century under the influence of canonical law.[3] The publicity of the criminal trial has traditionally been regarded as a protection against oppressive use of the judicial power to impose punishment and as a means of safeguarding the right to a fair proceeding.[4] The most commonly-referenced outlier to the tradition of open criminal justice in Anglo-American legal history—the English Court of Star Chamber, abolished in 1641, which followed the inquisitorial practice of deciding criminal cases based on a written record of interrogations of the accused and witnesses,[5] and which may have conducted some interrogations in secret[6]—is generally considered by its infamy to have reaffirmed the paramount importance of public trials.[7] The tradition of holding public criminal trials was apparently well-established in the American colonies before the ratification of the Sixth Amendment.[8] trial to an accused has its roots in our English common law heritage. The exact date of its origin is obscure, but it likely evolved long before the settlement of our land as an accompaniment of the ancient institution of jury trial.").

---

[2] See John Henry Merryman & Rogelio Perez-Perdomo, The Civil Law Tradition: An Introduction to the Legal Systems of Europe and Latin America 2–3 (3d ed. 2007) ("The traditional date of [the civil law tradition's] origin is 450 B.C., the supposed date of publication of the Twelve Tables in Rome. It is today the dominant legal tradition in Europe, all of Latin America, many parts of Asia and Africa, and even a few enclaves in the common law world (Louisiana, Quebec, and Puerto Rico).").

[3] Id. at 128 ("Historically, inquisitorial proceedings have tended to be secret and written rather than public and oral."). One should not confuse the historical and contemporary forms of criminal procedure in civil law countries, many of which have long since incorporated public trials into their criminal law systems. Id. at 131–32 (explaining that the predominant modern form of the criminal trial in civil law countries, though different in nature from the common law trial, is "a public event, which by its very publicity tends to limit the possibility of arbitrary governmental action."). Careful analysis of the differences between the modern accusatorial and inquisitorial systems does not yield simple conclusions about their comparative merit. Id. at 133 ("For those readers who wonder which is the more just system, the answer must be that opinion is divided. . . . The debate is clouded by . . . preconceptions that are difficult to dispel.").

[4] In re Oliver, 333 U.S. at 270 ("[T]he [public trial] guarantee has always been recognized as a safeguard against any attempt to employ our courts as instruments of persecution. The knowledge that every criminal trial is subject to contemporaneous review in the forum of public opinion is an effective restraint on possible abuse of judicial power.").

[5] See John H. Langbein et al., History of the Common Law: The Development of Anglo-American Legal Institutions 570 (2009) ("The cornerstone of European procedural systems, civil and criminal, as well as the . . . Star Chamber, was the ability to examine parties and witnesses under oath, preserving their responses as written evidence for the court."); Merryman & Perez-Perdomo, supra note 2, at 128 ("[T]he Star Chamber . . . was basically an inquisitorial tribunal. The Star Chamber was, however, exceptional in the common law tradition.").

[6] In re Oliver, 333 U.S. at 269 n.22 ("Some authorities have said that trials in the Star Chamber were public, but that witnesses against the accused were examined privately with no opportunity for him to discredit them. Apparently all authorities agreed that the accused himself was grilled in secret, often tortured . . . ."); but see John H. Langbein et al., supra note 5, at 575 (calling "quite false" the claim that the Star Chamber "used torture in its investigations," and suggesting that the tribunal's infamy arose instead from its "afflictive sanctions," such as amputation of the ears).

[7] See Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 387 n.18 (1979) ("After the abolition of the Star Chamber in 1641, defendants in criminal cases began to acquire many of the rights that are presently embodied in the Sixth Amendment. . . . It was during this period that the public trial first became identified as a right of the accused."); In re Oliver, 333 U.S. at 268–69 ("The traditional Anglo-American distrust for secret trials has been variously ascribed to the notorious use of this practice by the Spanish Inquisition, to the excesses of the English Court of Star Chamber, and to the French monarchy's abuse of the lettre de cachet.") (footnotes omitted); Merryman & Perez-Perdomo, supra 2, at 128 (labeling the Star Chamber "[t]he most infamous analogue [to the secret and written criminal trial of the civil law tradition] familiar to us in the common law world").

[8] Richmond Newspapers, Inc., 448 U.S. at 567–68 ("We have found nothing to suggest that the presumptive openness of the trial, which English courts were later to call 'one of the essential qualities of a court of justice,' was not also an attribute of the judicial systems of colonial America.") (quoting Daubney v. Cooper (1829) 109 Eng. Rep. 438, 440); In re Oliver, 333 U.S. at 266–67; see Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Ct., 464 U.S. 501, 508 (1984) ("Public jury selection thus was the common practice in America when the Constitution was adopted."). Congress did not discuss the public trial right in its debates on the Sixth Amendment. Harold Shapiro, Right to a Public Trial, 41 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 782, 783 (1951).

Amdt6.3.3 Right to a Public Trial Doctrine

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Supreme Court precedent establishes that the Sixth Amendment public trial right applies not only to criminal trials themselves,[1] but also to at least two types of pre-trial proceedings: hearings on motions to suppress evidence[2] and voir dire (when potential jurors are questioned during jury selection).[3] Such pre-trial proceedings, the Court has reasoned, can carry an importance commensurate with the trial itself[4] and, in the case of voir dire, were traditionally open to the public at common law.[5] Furthermore, guaranteeing a defendant's right to have such proceedings held openly vindicates the public trial right's object of harnessing the scrutiny of the community as a check against arbitrary, unfair, or irregular proceedings.[6] The Supreme Court has never considered whether the public trial right applies at sentencing.[7]

In two cases, the Court appeared to take contrasting positions as to whether the public trial right applies to one particular type of criminal proceeding: summary prosecutions for criminal contempt of court. Criminal contempt prosecutions are, in some circumstances, held as summary proceedings "to punish certain conduct committed in open court without notice, testimony or hearing."[8] In In re Oliver, decided in 1948, the Court held that it violated an accused's right to a public trial for a court to summarily try, convict, and sentence him in a secret grand jury proceeding (conducted by a state court judge acting as a one-man grand jury, in that case) for committing contempt by providing false and evasive testimony during the proceeding.[9] The Court seemed to ground this holding on the conclusion that the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause incorporated the Sixth Amendment public trial right, making

---

[1] In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 265 (1948).

[2] Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39, 47 (1984) ("[W]e hold that under the Sixth Amendment any closure of a suppression hearing over the objections of the accused must meet the tests [governing the closure of public trials].").

[3] Presley v. Georgia, 558 U.S. 209, 213 (2010) ("[T]he Sixth Amendment right to a public trial extends to the voir dire of prospective jurors."); see also Weaver v. Massachusetts, No. 16-240, slip op. at 3 (U.S. June 22, 2017) ("Presley made it clear that the public-trial right extends to jury selection as well as to other portions of the trial."). Before Presley, "Massachusetts courts would often close courtrooms to the public during jury selection, in particular during murder trials.") (citation omitted).

[4] Waller, 467 U.S. at 46 ("[S]uppression hearings often are as important as the trial itself.").

[5] Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Ct., 464 U.S. 501, 508 (1984).

[6] Id. ("[T]he sure knowledge that anyone is free to attend [a criminal trial] gives assurance that established procedures are being followed and that deviations will become known."); Waller, 467 U.S. at 46 ("The requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused . . . that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triers keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility and to the importance of their functions . . . ") (quoting Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 380 (1979)).

[7] 6 Wayne R. LaFave et al., Criminal Procedure § 24.1(a) (4th ed. 2020) (citing lower court opinions for the proposition that "[a]lthough the Supreme Court has not held whether the right to a public trial extends to sentencing proceedings, there is little doubt that it does").

[8] In re Oliver, 333 U.S. at 274.

[9] Id. at 272–73 ("In view of this nation's historic distrust of secret proceedings, their inherent dangers to freedom, and the universal requirement of our federal and state governments that criminal trials be public, the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee that no one shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law means at least that an accused cannot be thus sentenced to prison.").

it applicable against the states.[10] Nonetheless, twelve years later in Levine v. United States, another case involving a recalcitrant grand jury witness convicted of contempt in a closed proceeding, the Court stated flatly that "[c]riminal contempt proceedings are not within 'all criminal prosecutions' to which th[e Sixth] Amendment applies."[11] Levine—authored by Justice Felix Frankfurter, who had dissented in In re Oliver—held that only the Due Process Clause, and not the Sixth Amendment (either directly or as made applicable to the states via incorporation through the Fourteen Amendment), protected an accused during a criminal contempt proceeding.[12] Further, Levine held that the exclusion of the public from the courtroom during the proceeding did not violate the more flexible due process protection so long as the defendant did not specifically object to the exclusion.[13]

In Bloom v. Illinois, decided eight years after Levine, the Court called Levine into doubt by holding that a different aspect of the Sixth Amendment—the jury trial clause—applies to some criminal contempt prosecutions.[14] Neither Levine nor In re Oliver, however, has been expressly overruled.[15] Whether the public trial right applies to criminal contempt proceedings thus remains unclear.[16]

As mentioned above, the Sixth Amendment public trial right belongs only to the criminal defendant and cannot be asserted by members of the press or public.[17] Members of the public may challenge their exclusion from a criminal trial under the First Amendment, however,[18] and as discussed in the next section, such First Amendment challenges appear to draw the same analysis as challenges to the closure of a criminal trial brought under the Sixth Amendment.[19]

Amdt6.3.4 Scope of Right to a Public Trial

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the [10] See id. (relying upon "the universal requirement of our federal and state governments that criminal trials be public" to support the conclusion that due process prohibits secret trials); Presley, 558 U.S. at 212 ("The Court in In re Oliver . . . made it clear that [the Sixth Amendment public trial] right extends to the States."); but see Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 591 n.16 (1980) (Brennan, J., concurring in judgment) ("Notably, Oliver did not rest upon the simple incorporation of the Sixth Amendment into the Fourteenth, but upon notions intrinsic to due process . . . .").

[11] 362 U.S. 610, 616 (1960).

[12] Id. at 616–17 ("Inasmuch as the petitioner's claim thus derives from the Due Process Clause and not from one of the explicitly defined procedural safeguards of the Constitution, decision must turn on the particular circumstances of the case, and not upon a question-begging because abstract and absolute right to a 'public trial.'").

[13] Id. at 619 ("The continuing exclusion of the public in this case is not . . . deemed contrary to the requirements of the Due Process Clause without a request having been made to the trial judge to open the courtroom . . . .").

[14] See Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 198 (1968) ("Our deliberations have convinced us . . . that serious contempts are so nearly like other serious crimes that they are subject to the jury trial provisions of the Constitution."). Bloom included a "but cf." citation to Levine after stating that "[i]t has . . . been recognized that the defendant in criminal contempt proceedings is entitled to a public trial before an unbiased judge." Id. at 205.

[15] See, e.g., id. at 205 (citing In re Oliver with approval and acknowledging without overruling Levine).

[16] See id.

[17] Gannett, 443 U.S. at 391 ("[M]embers of the public have no constitutional right under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to attend criminal trials.").

[18] Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 at 580 (1980) ("We hold that the right to attend criminal trials is implicit in the guarantees of the First Amendment . . . ") (footnotes omitted).

[19] Amdt6.2.4 Early Doctrine on Right to a Speedy Trial to Amdt6.2.9 Prejudice and Right to a Speedy Trial (discussing scope of the right to a speedy trial).

> nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Supreme Court has determined that the right to a public trial, like most constitutional safeguards, is not absolute but is instead subject to balancing against countervailing governmental or public interests.[1] As the Court summarized in the 2017 case of Weaver v. Massachusetts, "courtroom closure is to be avoided, but . . . there are some circumstances when it is justified. The problems that may be encountered by trial courts in deciding whether some closures are necessary, or even in deciding which members of the public should be admitted when seats are scarce, are difficult ones."[2] Three decades earlier, in Waller v. Georgia, the Court held that the test that governs First Amendment claims against the closure of criminal proceedings also governs public trial claims brought by criminal defendants under the Sixth Amendment.[3] The Waller Court, drawing from the First Amendment case of Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court,[4] articulated this test as follows:

> [T]he party seeking to close the hearing must advance an overriding interest that is likely to be prejudiced, the closure must be no broader than necessary to protect that interest, the trial court must consider reasonable alternatives to closing the proceeding, and it must make findings adequate to support the closure.[5]

In Waller and the 2010 case Presley v. Georgia, the Court clarified aspects of the test. First, "overriding interests" favoring closure probably do not include preventing risks inherent to all open trials (such as the risk that the jury might overhear prejudicial comments from the gallery), absent a "specific threat or incident" that aggravates a risk in a particular case.[6] Second, courts must narrowly tailor any closure of proceedings to the specific subset of the attending public and the specific portion of the proceedings that gives rise to the overriding interest in closure.[7] Thus, in the context of voir dire, an interest in protecting prospective jurors from embarrassment only justifies closure when a prospective juror requests privacy in answering a question.[8] Finally, a trial court must consider reasonable alternatives to closure before excluding the public from proceedings, even if the parties do not propose any such alternatives.[9]

On how to remedy a violation of the public trial right, the Supreme Court has held that a defendant who has suffered such a violation need not show prejudice to obtain relief,[10] so long

---

[1] Presley v. Georgia, 558 U.S. 209, 213 (2010); Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39, 47–48 (1984).

[2] No. 16-240, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 22, 2017).

[3] Waller, 467 U.S. at 47.

[4] 464 U.S. 501, 510 (1984).

[5] Waller, 467 U.S. at 48. The Court reaffirmed this formulation as the controlling test in Presley. 558 U.S. at 214.

[6] Id. at 215.

[7] See Waller, 467 U.S. at 49 (noting that prosecutorial concern for the privacy of individuals mentioned on tapes to be played at suppression hearing would only have justified closure of two and half hours of the seven-day hearing).

[8] Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Ct., 464 U.S. 501, 512 (1984).

[9] Presley, 558 U.S. at 214 ("[T]rial courts are required to consider alternatives to closure even when they are not offered by the parties . . . "); Waller, 467 U.S. at 48.

[10] Waller, 467 U.S. at 49–50; see also United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. 140, 149 (2006) (citing Waller for the proposition that violations of the right to public trial are structural and not subject to harmless error analysis); Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 310 (1991) (same).

as the defendant preserves the issue by objecting and raising it on direct appeal.[11] This rule of automatic relief rests on the notion that the benefits of a public trial, despite carrying enough significance to warrant express protection in the Bill of Rights, are "frequently intangible, difficult to prove, or a matter of chance."[12] Entitlement to relief for a preserved violation of the public trial right, however, does not necessarily entail entitlement to a new trial.[13] "Rather, the remedy should be appropriate to the violation."[14] In Waller, where the violation occurred in the form of a closed pre-trial suppression hearing, and where the defendant was thereafter convicted in an open trial, the Court ordered a new suppression hearing. The Court instructed, however, that a new trial should follow only if the public suppression hearing resulted in a material change to the scope of admissible evidence or the parties' positions.[15]

Amdt6.4 Right to Trial by Jury

Amdt6.4.1 Overview of Right to Trial by Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to trial by jury for criminal defendants charged with non-petty offenses.[1] Article III of the Constitution also provides for jury trials in criminal cases.[2] As such, the Supreme Court has recognized that the Constitution protects the accused's right to trial by jury twice,[3] although the Court has grounded its analysis of the right primarily in the Sixth Amendment.[4] [11] Weaver, slip op. at 9. In contrast, to prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel on the ground that defense counsel incompetently failed to object to a courtroom closure, the defendant must show "either a reasonable probability of a different outcome in his or her case or . . . that the particular public-trial violation was so serious as to render his or her trial fundamentally unfair." Id. at 12.

---

[12] Waller, 467 U.S. at 49 n.9; see also Weaver, slip op. at 9 ("[A] public-trial violation is structural . . . because of the 'difficulty of assessing the effect of the error.'") (quoting Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. at 149 n.4).

[13] Id. at 50.

[14] Id.

[15] Id.

[1] Southern Union Co. v. United States, 567 U.S. 343, 350–51 (2012); see Amdt6.4.3.3 Petty Offense Doctrine and Maximum Sentences Over Six Months.

[2] Art. III, § 2; see ArtIII.S2.C3.1 Jury Trials.

[3] Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Apr. 20, 2020) (explaining that the Constitution guarantees criminal jury trials "twice—not only in the Sixth Amendment, but also in Article III") (emphasis in original); see also Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1, 30 (1999) (Scalia, J., dissenting in part) ("When this Court deals with the content of this [criminal jury trial] guarantee—the only one to appear in both the body of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights—it is operating upon the spinal column of American democracy.").

[4] See, e.g., Ramos, slip op. at 4, 7 (noting that both the Sixth Amendment and Article III provide for jury trials in criminal cases, but proceeding to analyze only the Sixth Amendment in holding that the right to a jury trial requires a unanimous verdict in both state and federal court); Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 149 (1968) (noting the Article III provision but grounding the analysis of whether the jury trial right applies in state court in the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments; "we hold that the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees a right of jury trial in all criminal cases which—were they to be tried in a federal court—would come within the Sixth Amendment's guarantee"); cf. Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 298 (1930) (reasoning that the Sixth Amendment and Article III jury trial provisions "mean substantially the same thing" and the Sixth Amendment "fairly may be regarded as reflecting the meaning of" the Article III provision).

By virtue of its incorporation through the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause, the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury applies in both federal and state court.[5] A criminal defendant may, however, waive the right and agree to a trial before a judge alone.[6] A valid waiver requires the "express and intelligent consent" of the defendant,[7] along with the consent of the court and the prosecution.[8] In a similar vein, a defendant may plead guilty in lieu of trial.[9] A valid guilty plea requires knowing and intelligent waiver of the right to trial by jury,[10] among other constitutional rights.[11]

Amdt6.4.2 Historical Background on Right to Trial by Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The use of juries in criminal cases dates back to medieval England.[1] By the time of the founding, the right to trial by jury was well-recognized as a safeguard against the arbitrary

[5] Ramos, slip op. at 7. But the Supreme Court has yet to hold that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the Sixth Amendment vicinage requirement—i.e., the requirement that the jury be "of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." See Stevenson v. Lewis, 384 F.3d 1069, 1071 (9th Cir. 2004); Amdt6.4.7 Notice of Accusation.

[6] Patton, 281 U.S. at 312.

[7] Id. at 312–13; see also Adams v. United States ex rel. McCann, 317 U.S. 269, 278 (1942) ("There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent an accused from choosing to have his fate tried before a judge without a jury even though, in deciding what is best for himself, he follows the guidance of his own wisdom and not that of a lawyer.").

[8] Patton, 281 U.S. at 312; Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24, 34 (1965) (holding that the waiver of a jury trial in a criminal case "can be conditioned upon the consent of the prosecuting attorney and the trial judge"); see Fed. R. Crim. P. 23(a) (requiring government consent and court approval).

[9] See Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 71 (1977) ("Whatever might be the situation in an ideal world, the fact is that the guilty plea and the often concomitant plea bargain are important components of this country's criminal justice system. Properly administered, they can benefit all concerned.").

[10] Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 748 (1970) ("[T]he [guilty] plea . . . is the defendant's consent that judgment of conviction may be entered without a trial—a waiver of his right to trial before a jury or a judge. Waivers of constitutional rights not only must be voluntary but must be knowing, intelligent acts done with sufficient awareness of the relevant circumstances and likely consequences.").

[11] United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622, 629 (2002) (explaining that a defendant who pleads guilty "forgoes not only a fair trial, but also other accompanying constitutional guarantees" and citing precedent for the proposition that these guarantees include "the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, the Sixth Amendment right to confront one's accusers, and the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury"). Guilty pleas and plea bargaining practices also implicate other questions of constitutional law. See, e.g., Missouri v. Frye, 566 U.S. 134, 145 (2012) ("[A]s a general rule, defense counsel has the duty to communicate formal offers from the prosecution to accept a plea on terms and conditions that may be favorable to the accused."); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 358 (1978) (considering "whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is violated when a state prosecutor carries out a threat made during plea negotiations to reindict the accused on more serious charges if he does not plead guilty to the offense with which he was originally charged," and holding that no due process violation occurred).

[1] John H. Langbein et al., History of the Common Law 59–60 (2009) ("When the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 destroyed the ordeals, a different mode of proof had to be devised. Jury trial was already in use in English criminal procedure in some exceptional situations, as an option available to a defendant who wished to avoid trial by battle or by ordeal. The path of inclination for the English was thus to extend jury procedure to fill the enormous gap left by the abolition of the ordeals."); Paul Marcus et al., Rights of the Accused under the Sixth Amendment 47 (2d ed. 2016) ("In the English common law, the right to a jury trial in criminal cases developed in response to the law's need to abandon the old trials by ordeal."); see Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 151 (1968) ("[B]y the time our Constitution was written, jury trial in criminal cases had been in existence in England for several centuries and carried impressive credentials traced by many to Magna Carta."); Francis H. Heller, The Sixth Amendment 6–7 (1951). The once-widespread notion exercise of power.[2] William Blackstone, in eighteenth century commentary familiar to the Framers, described the right as a bedrock guarantee of English criminal procedure:

> Our law has therefore wisely placed this strong and two-fold barrier, of a presentment and a trial by jury, between the liberties of the people, and the prerogative of the crown. . . . [T]he founders of the English law have, with excellent forecast, contrived, that . . . the truth of every accusation, whether preferred in the shape of indictment, information, or appeal, should afterwards be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve of his equals and neighbours, indifferently chosen and superior to all suspicion.[3]

Most colonial charters protected the right to jury trial by guaranteeing colonists the enjoyment of the "liberties and immunities of Englishmen."[4] The constitutions of each of the original thirteen states also guaranteed the right.[5]

During colonial times, "[r]oyal interference with the jury trial was deeply resented."[6] Such interference took the form of numerous exceptions to the accused's right to trial by jury.[7] Many of the exceptions were for minor offenses, but some "bordered on serious felonies and were punished with appropriate severity."[8] As the Framers debated adding a Bill of Rights to the original Constitution, concerns surfaced that the jury trial provision of Article III offered the accused inadequate protection.[9] Debate focused, in particular, over whether to build out the constitutional guarantee by including, in what eventually became the Sixth Amendment, a vicinage requirement (that is, a requirement that the jury be drawn locally)[10] and language entitling the accused to strike potential jurors.[11] Criminal jury trial procedure took a variety of forms in the colonies,[12] which complicated the debate: representatives of some colonies were wary of procedural mandates that, if too specific, might clash with existing practices at home.[13] The language that was ultimately ratified as the Sixth Amendment jury trial provision that Magna Carta recognized the right to trial by jury in criminal cases has been discredited. Duncan, 391 U.S. at 151 n.16; Felix Frankfurter & Thomas G. Corcoran, Petty Federal Offenses and the Constitutional Guaranty of Trial by Jury, 39 HARV. L. REV. 917, 922 (1926) ("That the modern institution of trial by jury derives from Magna Carta is one of the most revered of legal fables."); cf. HELLER, supra note 1, at 15 ("Considering the almost religious veneration accorded to that document [Magna Carta] by the great majority of the people both in England and in this country, it is more important to recognize the fact that our ancestors associated trial by jury with this renowned mainspring of liberty than to insist that in so doing they were guilty of historical error.").

---

[2] Duncan, 391 U.S. at 151; Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 87 (1970).

[3] 4 W. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 343 (1769); see United States v. Wood, 299 U.S. 123, 138 (1936) ("Undoubtedly, as we have frequently said, the framers of the Constitution were familiar with Blackstone's Commentaries. Many copies of the work had been sold here and it was generally regarded as the most satisfactory exposition of the common law of England.").

[4] Frankfurter & Corcoran, supra note 1 at 934–37; HELLER, supra note 1, at 14.

[5] Duncan, 391 U.S. at 153.

[6] Id. at 152.

[7] Frankfurter & Corcoran, supra note 1 at 933 ("The settled practice in which the founders of the American colonies grew up reserved for the justices innumerable cases in which the balance of social convenience, as expressed in legislation, insisted that proceedings be concluded speedily and inexpensively.").

[8] Id. at 927.

[9] Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 93 (1970); HELLER, supra note 1 at 25.

[10] Williams, 399 U.S. at 93 n.35 ("Technically, 'vicinage' means neighborhood, and 'vicinage of the jury' meant jury of the neighborhood or, in medieval England, jury of the county.").

[11] HELLER, supra note 1 at 25–26.

[12] Id. at 15 ("The jury trial of colonial days is . . . not a rigid copy of its English prototype but rather the result of variegated experiences, experimentation, and adaptation.").

[13] Id. at 15, 27.

represents an apparent compromise between the desire to bolster what was seen as an essential guarantee and the desire to leave the language capacious enough to embrace the range of colonial practices.[14]

Amdt6.4.3 When the Right Applies

Amdt6.4.3.1 Early Jurisprudence on Right to Trial by Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment, by its plain language, extends its guarantees to "all criminal prosecutions." Yet the Supreme Court has long excluded a category of minor offenses—called "petty offenses" in the doctrine, as distinct from "serious offenses"—from the reach of the right to trial by jury.[1] Considerations both historical and practical have served as justifications for this textual departure: as the Supreme Court recognized, "[s]o-called petty offenses were tried without juries both in England and in the Colonies . . . and the possible consequences to defendants from convictions for petty offenses have been thought insufficient to outweigh the benefits to efficient law enforcement and simplified judicial administration resulting from . . . inexpensive nonjury adjudications."[2]

The early doctrine did not trace a neat divide between petty and serious offenses but instead based the distinction on a broad analysis of the nature of each offense.[3] This analysis considered the following factors: (1) whether the offense was triable by jury at common law; (2) whether the proscribed conduct was malum in se (i.e., inherently wrong)[4] or merely malum prohibitum (i.e., prohibited by law but not inherently wrong)[5]; and (3) the maximum statutory penalty.[6] Under this analysis, the Court held that the crime of reckless driving at excessive speed was not petty (and accordingly triggered the jury trial right), even though it carried a maximum penalty of only 30 days in jail, because the crime was indictable at common law and

---

[14] Id. at 33–34; cf. Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 12 (U.S. Apr. 20, 2020) (reasoning that the Senate might have deleted language about the right of challenge and other specific requirements from the original draft of the Sixth Amendment "because all this was so plainly included in the promise of a 'trial by an impartial jury' that Senators considered the language surplusage.")

[1] See Callan v. Wilson, 127 U.S. 540, 552 (1888) ("According to many adjudged cases, arising under constitutions which declare, generally, that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, there are certain minor or petty offenses that may be proceeded against summarily, and without a jury . . . .").

[2] Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 160 (1968). For a criticism of the petty offense doctrine, see Baldwin v. New York, 399 U.S. 66, 75 (1970) (Black, J., concurring in judgment) ("The Constitution guarantees a right of trial by jury in two separate places but in neither does it hint of any difference between 'petty' offenses and 'serious' offenses. . . . Many years ago this Court, without the necessity of an amendment pursuant to Article V, decided that 'all crimes' [for purposes of Article III and the Sixth Amendment] did not mean 'all crimes,' but meant only 'all serious crimes.'").

[3] See Callan, 127 U.S. at 555.

[4] Malum in se, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[5] Malum prohibitum, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[6] District of Columbia v. Clawans, 300 U.S. 617, 624–25 (1937); District of Columbia v. Colts, 282 U.S. 63, 73 (1930); Schick v. United States, 195 U.S. 65, 67 (1904).

covered conduct that the Court considered malum in se.[7] In contrast, the crime of conducting a secondhand sales business without a license, which had a maximum statutory penalty of ninety days' imprisonment, was petty, the Court held, because it was not a crime at common law and amounted only to a breach of regulations (i.e., was malum prohibitum).[8] Even these early cases, however, presaged in dicta the clearer rule that constitutes the Court's current doctrine: crimes punishable by more than six months' imprisonment cannot be deemed petty and are therefore subject to the jury trial right.[9]

The Court's early doctrine on the right to jury trial also made special provision for summary trials for criminal contempt of court. In a long line of cases, the Court held consistently that the right simply did not apply to prosecutions for criminal contempt.[10] These cases reasoned that contempt in England had not been triable by jury since at least the early eighteenth century,[11] and that courts would lose power to enforce their orders effectively and maintain courtroom decorum if required to submit cases of contempt to juries for adjudication.[12] Perhaps the most historically significant of these cases was also one of the most recent. In United States v. Barnett, the Court held that the governor and lieutenant governor of Mississippi did not have a right to a jury trial in a contempt prosecution for obstructing state officials' compliance with federal court orders directing the University of Mississippi to admit an African-American student.[13] But while the Barnett Court reiterated the rule against applying the jury trial right to contempt,[14] the Court also expressed discomfort with the rule's absoluteness.[15] In Cheff v. Schnackenberg, decided two years later, the Court divided over the issue, with a plurality of four justices concluding that contempt did not require a jury trial so long as the actual sentence imposed did not exceed six months,[16] while two concurring justices held to the absolute rule that the Sixth Amendment does not require a jury trial for any contempt offense.[17] Criminal contempt continues to receive unique treatment under the Court's current doctrine on the jury trial right.

---

[7] Colts, 282 U.S. at 73 ("The offense here charged is not merely malum prohibitum, but in its very nature is malum in se. . . . An automobile is, potentially, a dangerous instrumentality, as the appalling number of fatalities brought about every day by its operation bear distressing witness. To drive such an instrumentality through the public streets of a city so recklessly 'as to endanger property and individuals' is an act of such obvious depravity that to characterize it as a petty offense would be to shock the general moral sense.").

[8] Clawans, 300 U.S. at 630.

[9] Id. at 627–28 ("[W]e may doubt whether summary trial with punishment of more than six months' imprisonment, prescribed by some pre-Revolutionary statutes, is admissible, without concluding that a penalty of ninety days is too much.").

[10] Green v. United States, 356 U.S. 165, 183 (1958) ("The statements of this Court in a long and unbroken line of decisions involving contempts ranging from misbehavior in court to disobedience of court orders establish beyond peradventure that criminal contempts are not subject to jury trial as a matter of constitutional right.").

[11] Id. at 185–86.

[12] United States v. Barnett, 376 U.S. 681, 697, 700 (1964); see also Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 196 (1968) (explaining that the Court's early cases construed "the Sixth Amendment as permitting summary trials in contempt cases because at common law contempt was tried without a jury and because the power of courts to punish for contempt without the intervention of any other agency was considered essential to the proper and effective functioning of the courts and to the administration of justice").

[13] Id. at 685–86, 692.

[14] Id. at 692 ("[I]t is urged that those charged with criminal contempt have a constitutional right to a jury trial. This claim has been made and rejected here again and again.").

[15] Id. at 695 n.12 ("Some members of the Court are of the view that, without regard to the seriousness of the offense, punishment by summary trial without a jury would be constitutionally limited to that penalty provided for petty offenses.").

[16] 384 U.S. 373, 380 ("[W]e rule . . . that sentences exceeding six months for criminal contempt may not be imposed by federal courts absent a jury trial or waiver thereof.").

[17] Id. at 381–82 (Harlan, J., concurring in the result).

Amdt6.4.3.2 Right to Trial by Jury Generally

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Supreme Court's current doctrine on the applicability of the Sixth Amendment right to jury trial comprises two major principles: (1) the right applies to prosecutions for any offense with a maximum authorized penalty that exceeds six months' imprisonment, because such offenses are not "petty";[1] and (2) the right applies to the adjudication of all elements of a criminal offense, a category that includes any fact (other than the fact of a prior conviction) that increases the minimum or maximum applicable penalty.[2] As a result of this second principle, a statutory sentencing scheme cannot constitutionally delegate determination of any penalty-increasing fact to the judge at sentencing.[3] Aside from these two major points, the Court has also established that the right to jury trial does not apply in juvenile court proceedings,[4] military cases (e.g., courts martial),[5] or proceedings to determine whether a defendant is intellectually disabled and therefore protected from capital punishment under the Eighth Amendment.[6]

Amdt6.4.3.3 Petty Offense Doctrine and Maximum Sentences Over Six Months

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Under its earlier, multi-factor approach to defining petty offenses, the Supreme Court had given close and arguably preeminent consideration to the maximum statutory penalty.[1] In

---

[1] Blanton v. City of North Las Vegas, 489 U.S. 538, 542 (1989).

[2] Alleyne v. United States, 570 U.S. 99, 111 (2013) ("[A]ny 'facts that increase the prescribed range of penalties to which a criminal defendant is exposed' are elements of the crime . . . [and] the Sixth Amendment provides defendants with the right to have a jury find those facts beyond a reasonable doubt."); id. at 113 n.2 ("Juries must find any facts that increase either the statutory maximum or minimum because the Sixth Amendment applies where a finding of fact both alters the legally prescribed range and does so in a way that aggravates the penalty.").

[3] Id. at 113 n.2.

[4] McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528, 545 (1971) ("[W]e conclude that trial by jury in the juvenile court's adjudicative stage is not a constitutional requirement.").

[5] United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 37 (1955) ("Defendants in cases arising in the armed forces, we think, are not entitled to demand trial by jury, whether the crime was committed on foreign soil or at a place within a State or previously ascertained district."); see Amdt5.2.3 Military Exception to Grand Jury Clause.

[6] Schriro v. Smith, 546 U.S. 6, 7 (2005); see also Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 317 (2002).

[1] See Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 159–60 (1968) ("[T]he penalty authorized for a particular crime is of major relevance in determining whether it is serious or not and may in itself, if severe enough, subject the trial to the mandates of the Sixth Amendment."); District of Columbia v. Clawans, 300 U.S. 617, 624–25 (1937) (construing the question before it as "whether the penalty, which may be imposed for the present offense, of ninety days in a common jail, is sufficient to bring it within the class of major offenses, for the trial of which a jury may be demanded").

Baldwin v. New York, however, the Court fashioned from this criterion a bright line rule, stating: "we have concluded that no offense can be deemed 'petty' for purposes of the right to trial by jury where imprisonment for more than six months is authorized."[2] Robert Baldwin was charged in New York City with a pick-pocketing offense called "jostling," punishable by a maximum of one year in prison.[3] Under a New York City statute, he was not eligible for a jury trial and, over his Sixth Amendment objection, was tried and convicted before a judge instead.[4] The Supreme Court, in pronouncing its bright line rule and holding that the denial of Baldwin's request for a jury trial violated his Sixth Amendment right, relied primarily upon legislative consensus.[5] Apart from New York City, the Court observed, no jurisdiction within the United States denied criminal defendants the right to jury trial for crimes with a maximum penalty exceeding six months' imprisonment.[6] The Court reasoned that this "near-uniform" legislative judgment about when the jury trial right should apply constituted "the only objective criterion by which a line could ever be drawn—on the basis of the possible penalty alone—between offenses that are and that are not regarded as 'serious' for purposes of trial by jury."[7] In the messy business of line-drawing, in other words, legislative consensus provided the best and only mark.[8] The Court also concluded that the six-month rule struck the appropriate balance between the accused's interest in "interpos[ing] between himself and a possible prison term . . . the commonsense judgment of a jury of his peers,"[9] on the one hand, and the government's interest in efficient and inexpensive adjudications, on the other hand.[10]

Although Baldwin established that the right to jury trial applies whenever the maximum sentence for an offense exceeds six months, the case did not address the counter-proposition: whether the right necessarily does not apply when the maximum sentence for the charged offense does not exceed six months' imprisonment.[11]

The Court took up this question in Blanton v. City of North Las Vegas, where it established a "presumption"—but not a rule—that an offense with a maximum sentence of six months or less is petty for Sixth Amendment purposes and thus outside the reach of the jury trial right.[12] A defendant might rebut this presumption in a "rare situation" by demonstrating "that any additional statutory penalties, viewed in conjunction with the maximum authorized period of incarceration, are so severe that they clearly reflect a legislative determination that the [2] 399 U.S. 66, 69 (1970) (plurality opinion). A plurality of only three Justices supported the bright-line rule, but because two additional Justices concurred in the judgment on a much broader ground (that the Sixth Amendment requires a jury trial for all crimes, petty or not), the plurality opinion set the petty offense doctrine. See Blanton v. City of North Las Vegas, 489 U.S. 538, 542 (1989) ("[O]ur decision in Baldwin established that a defendant is entitled to a jury trial whenever the offense for which he is charged carries a maximum authorized prison term of greater than six months.").

[3] Baldwin, 399 U.S. at 67.

[4] Id. at 67–68.

[5] Id. at 70–71.

[6] Id. at 71–72 ("In the entire Nation, New York City alone denies an accused the right to interpose between himself and a possible prison term of over six months, the commonsense judgment of a jury of his peers.").

[7] Id. at 72–73.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 72.

[10] Id. at 73–74 ("Where the accused cannot possibly face more than six months' imprisonment, we have held that the[ ] disadvantages [of criminal conviction without jury trial], onerous though they may be, may be outweighed by the benefits that result from speedy and inexpensive nonjury adjudications.").

[11] Id. at 69 n.6 ("In this case, we decide only that a potential sentence in excess of six months' imprisonment is sufficiently severe by itself to take the offense out of the category of 'petty.'").

[12] 489 U.S. 538, 543 (1989) ("Although we did not hold in Baldwin that an offense carrying a maximum prison term of six months or less automatically qualifies as a 'petty' offense, and decline to do so today, we do find it appropriate to presume for purposes of the Sixth Amendment that society views such an offense as 'petty.'").

offense in question is a 'serious' one."[13] In Blanton, the defendants faced charges for driving under the influence of alcohol (DUI), punishable under Nevada law by a term of imprisonment ranging from two days to six months, a fine ranging from $200 to $1,000, a ninety-day driver's license suspension, and a mandatory course on alcohol abuse.[14] As an alternative to the prison term, the statute authorized the trial court to order offenders to perform forty-eight hours of community service in garb identifying them as DUI offenders.[15] The Court held that these statutory penalties, as a package, were not sufficiently severe to rebut the petty offense presumption arising from the absence of a potential prison term exceeding six months.[16] In particular, the Court concluded that the $1,000 maximum fine fell well within the range of fines typically associated with petty offenses, and that the alternate punishment of two days of community service in DUI-offender clothing did not impose a burden or level of embarrassment commensurate with a prison sentence exceeding six months.[17]

In the wake of Blanton, it remained unclear what kind of alternate penalties might suffice to render an offense punishable by a maximum prison sentence of six months or less (and, accordingly, subject to the presumption of pettiness) "serious" so as to trigger a right to a trial by jury under the Sixth Amendment.[18] The Court reiterated after Blanton, in a case holding the jury trial right inapplicable to a federal DUI offense, that alternate, non-incarceration penalties would trigger the right only in "rare case[s]."[19] On the other side of the ledger, a more recent case acknowledged, without having to decide the issue, that a federal environmental statute providing for a fine of $50,000 for each day of an ongoing violation—and therefore capable of triggering aggregate fines into the tens of millions of dollars—imposed a punishment sufficiently serious to fall within the jury trial right.[20]

The other cases that bear most directly on the issue of when non-incarceration penalties trigger the jury trial right concern the imposition of large fines in criminal contempt prosecutions. Even before Baldwin, the Court had overruled its early doctrine treating contempt as a thing apart when it held that a case of "serious" contempt, like all other serious crimes, was subject to the jury trial right.[21] The test the Court ultimately adopted to distinguish petty and serious cases of contempt, however, turns on the "penalty actually imposed" rather than the maximum statutory penalty.[22] This distinction was necessary

---

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 539–40.

[15] Id. at 539.

[16] Id. at 544–45.

[17] Id. at 544.

[18] See id. at 543 (calling the standard for rebutting the petty offense presumption "somewhat imprecise" but indicating that it "should ensure the availability of a jury trial in the rare situation where a legislature" makes a serious offense punishable by "onerous penalties" other than a prison term exceeding six months).

[19] United States v. Nachtigal, 507 U.S. 1, 5 (1993).

[20] Southern Union Co. v. United States, 567 U.S. 343, 352 (2012) ("The [statute] subjects Southern Union to a maximum fine of $50,000 for each day of violation. The Government does not deny that, in light of the seriousness of that punishment, the company was properly accorded a jury trial.") (citation omitted). The corporate defendant faced a maximum potential fine of $38.1 million for a 762-day violation and was sentenced to pay a total of $18 million, id. at 347, but the Supreme Court held the sentence unconstitutional because a judge rather than a jury determined the duration of the violation. Id. at 352; Amdt6.4.3.7 Other Applications of Apprendi.

[21] Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 208 (1968) ("If the right to jury trial is a fundamental matter in other criminal cases, which we think it is, it must also be extended to criminal contempt cases."); id. at 209 ("[M]any contempts are not serious crimes but petty offenses not within the jury trial provisions of the Constitution. When a serious contempt is at issue, considerations of efficiency must give way . . . .").

[22] Muniz v. Hoffman, 422 U.S. 454, 476 (1975) ("[C]riminal contempt, in and of itself and without regard to the punishment imposed, is not a serious offense absent legislative declaration to the contrary . . . but imprisonment for longer than six months is constitutionally impermissible unless the contemnor has been given the opportunity for a jury trial."); Taylor v. Hayes, 418 U.S. 488, 495 (1974) ("[O]ur cases hold that petty contempt like other petty criminal because varying degrees of contempt often do not have maximum penalties fixed in statute.[23] In Muniz v. Hoffman, the Court held that imposing, against a labor union defendant, a $10,000 fine with no prison sentence did not render a criminal contempt prosecution serious for Sixth Amendment purposes.[24] "Imprisonment and fines are intrinsically different" in terms of the deprivation they impose on a contemnor, the Court reasoned.[25] While the Court refused to rule out the possibility that a fine by itself could trigger the jury trial right in some cases, it held that the $10,000 fine imposed on a union with 13,000 members was not "of such magnitude" as to make the contempt prosecution "serious."[26] In contrast, in International Union, United Mine Workers of America v. Bagwell, also involving labor union defendants, the Court held that the much larger criminal contempt fine of $52 million did trigger the jury trial right.[27] Bagwell and Muniz, although decided under the modified petty offense test that applies to criminal contempt prosecutions, together cast some light on the issue of when non-incarceration penalties cross the threshold of a "serious" offense: enormous fines like the one in Bagwell clearly do cross the threshold,[28] but even substantial fines like the $10,000 sum at issue in Muniz fall beneath the line and constitutionally may be prescribed for offenses tried without a jury.[29]

A defendant charged with multiple counts does not have a right to a jury trial based on the aggregated maximum potential sentence on all counts combined; rather, the maximum statutory penalty for each individual offense controls the analysis.[30] In Lewis v. United States, the defendant faced two counts of obstructing the mail, each punishable by a maximum prison term of six months.[31] The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's argument that the total potential prison term of one year triggered the jury trial right.[32] The Court reasoned that the legislative determination of the seriousness of an offense, as reflected in the maximum offenses may be tried without a jury and that contempt of court is a petty offense when the penalty actually imposed does not exceed six months or a longer penalty has not been expressly authorized by statute.").

---

[23] Frank v. United States, 395 U.S. 147, 149 (1969) ("[I]n prosecutions for criminal contempt where no maximum penalty is authorized, the severity of the penalty actually imposed is the best indication of the seriousness of the particular offense."); Bloom, 391 U.S. at 211.

[24] 422 U.S. 454, 476–77 (1975).

[25] Id. at 477.

[26] Id.

[27] 512 U.S. 821, 837 n.5 ("We need not answer today the difficult question where the line between petty and serious contempt fines should be drawn, since a $52 million fine unquestionably is a serious contempt sanction."). The Bagwell Court also addressed the antecedent question of whether a contempt penalty is civil or criminal in nature. Id. at 836–38 (determining the criminal or civil nature of a contempt order in light of "the character of the entire decree" and holding that the $52 million contempt fine was criminal because the defendants had no opportunity to purge the fine once imposed, the underlying misconduct occurred outside of the court's presence and consisted of "widespread" violations of a "complex injunction" resembling an "entire code of conduct," and because the fine itself was so severe). The Court has most often taken up the question of whether a proceeding is civil or criminal in the due process context. See, e.g., Hicks v. Feiock, 485 U.S. 624, 637 (1988) (considering whether a contempt proceeding was criminal in nature so as to trigger the due process requirement that the government carry the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt).

[28] See Bagwell, 512 U.S. at 837 n.5; see also Southern Union Co. v. United States, 567 U.S. 343, 351 (2012) (stating that "not all fines are insubstantial, and not all offenses punishable by fines are petty" and citing as authority federal court judgments imposing criminal fines of $400 million, $448.5 million, and $1.195 billion).

[29] Muniz, 422 U.S. at 476–77; United States v. Nachtigal, 507 U.S. 1, 5 (1993) (holding that a maximum $5,000 fine and the possibility of certain "discretionary [sentencing] conditions," such as the payment of restitution or obligatory participation in a program at a community correctional facility, did not render a DUI offense with a maximum prison term of six months "serious").

[30] Lewis v. United States, 518 U.S. 322, 330 (1996) ("Where the offenses charged are petty, and the deprivation of liberty exceeds six months only as a result of the aggregation of charges, the jury trial right does not apply.").

[31] Id. at 324.

[32] Id. at 327.

authorized sentence, governs the applicability of the jury trial right.[33] The maximum potential penalty faced by particular defendants based on the circumstances of their individual prosecutions is not relevant to that legislative judgment and thus not relevant to the Sixth Amendment question, the Court determined.[34] In other words, the constitutional issue of whether the jury trial right applies turns on the statutorily-defined offense, not on the case against the defendant.[35] In reaching this holding, the Lewis Court distinguished its earlier opinion in Codispoti v. Pennsylvania—which had held that the jury trial right applied where the total sentence imposed for multiple criminal contempt violations exceeded six months (even though none of the individual violations triggered a sentence over six months)[36]—on the ground that the contempts at issue there did not have a statutory maximum penalty and therefore did not reveal a legislative judgment as to their seriousness.[37]

Amdt6.4.3.4 Increases to Minimum or Maximum Sentences and Apprendi Rule

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Since the landmark case Apprendi v. New Jersey,[1] decided in 2000, Supreme Court jurisprudence on the applicability of the jury trial right has focused on the constitutionality of sentencing laws that delegate to judges rather than juries the determination of certain facts that affect the range of potential sentences for a crime. Before Apprendi, the Court had upheld such laws on the reasoning that although the jury trial right extended to every element of a criminal offense,[2] it did not extend to "sentencing factors."[3] Apprendi changed this doctrine.

---

[33] Id. ("[W]e determine whether an offense is serious by looking to the judgment of the legislature, primarily as expressed in the maximum authorized term of imprisonment.").

[34] Id. ("The fact that the petitioner was charged with two counts of a petty offense does not revise the legislative judgment as to the gravity of that particular offense . . . ."); id. at 328 ("Where we have a judgment by the legislature that an offense is "petty," we do not look to the potential prison term faced by a particular defendant who is charged with more than one such petty offense.") (emphasis in original).

[35] Id. at 328.

[36] 418 U.S. 506, 509, 517 (1974) ("We find unavailing respondent's . . . argument that petitioners' contempts were separate offenses and that, because no more than a six months' sentence was imposed for any single offense, each contempt was necessarily a petty offense triable without a jury.").

[37] Lewis, 518 U.S. at 328 ("In such a situation, where the legislature has not specified a maximum penalty, courts use the severity of the penalty actually imposed as the measure of the character of the particular offense.").

[1] 530 U.S. 466 (2000).

[2] See United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 510 (1995) (holding that the Fifth and Sixth Amendments together "require criminal convictions to rest upon a jury determination that the defendant is guilty of every element of the crime with which he is charged, beyond a reasonable doubt"); id. at 511 ("The Constitution gives a criminal defendant the right to demand that a jury find him guilty of all the elements of the crime with which he is charged; one of the elements in the present case is materiality; respondent therefore had a right to have the jury decide materiality.").

[3] McMillan v. Pennsylvania, 477 U.S. 79, 85–86, 93 (1986) (upholding against due process and Sixth Amendment challenges a statutory sentencing scheme under which a judge's factual determination that the defendant "visibly possessed a firearm" during the commission of certain felonies triggered an otherwise inapplicable five-year mandatory minimum sentence) ("[T]he Pennsylvania Legislature has expressly provided that visible possession of a firearm is not an element of the crimes enumerated in the mandatory sentencing statute, but instead is a sentencing factor that comes into play only after the defendant has been found guilty of one of those crimes beyond a reasonable doubt.") (citation omitted), overruled by Alleyne v. United States, 570 U.S. 99, 103 (2013); see also Walton v. Arizona, 497

The defendant in the case was convicted of a firearms offense punishable by a maximum prison term of ten years.[4] Under a separate sentencing-enhancement statute, however, the maximum penalty increased to twenty years after a trial judge determined by a preponderance of the evidence—at a hearing held after the defendant pleaded guilty—that the defendant committed the offense with the purpose of intimidating a group of individuals due to their race.[5] The trial court sentenced the defendant to twelve years in prison for the offense, two years above the statutory maximum that would have applied absent the judge-found fact.[6]

The Supreme Court held that this sentencing procedure violated the Sixth Amendment.[7] The Court articulated its essential holding as follows: "[o]ther than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."[8] The jury trial right serves as a bulwark against unjust loss of liberty at the hands of government tyranny or oppression, the Court reasoned.[9] Accordingly it does not comport with the Sixth Amendment to take the determination of facts that can lead to increased punishment away from the jury,[10] especially in light of the historic connection between offense and punishment in the Anglo-American legal tradition.[11]

Amdt6.4.3.5 Sentencing Guidelines

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the U.S. 639, 649 (1990) (upholding a statutory scheme that conditioned imposition of the death penalty upon a judge's finding of certain aggravating factors), overruled by Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584, 589 (2002).

[4] Apprendi, 530 U.S. at 468 (noting that the offense was "possession of a firearm for an unlawful purpose," punishable by imprisonment for between five and ten years).

[5] Id. at 468–69, 471.

[6] Id. at 471.

[7] Id. at 490.

[8] Id. A passage in Jones v. United States, decided the year before, anticipated Apprendi's holding, although the Court decided Jones on statutory grounds and did not make a clear constitutional holding. Jones v. United States, 526 U.S. 227, 243 n.6 (1999) ("[U]nder the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the notice and jury trial guarantees of the Sixth Amendment, any fact (other than prior conviction) that increases the maximum penalty for a crime must be charged in an indictment, submitted to a jury, and proven beyond a reasonable doubt. . . . [O]ur prior cases suggest rather than establish this principle."). As for the exception for the fact of a prior conviction, the Court held before Apprendi that judges could constitutionally determine such facts. Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 247 (1998) ("[W]e reject petitioner's constitutional claim that his recidivism must be treated as an element of his offense."). The Court has reaffirmed that holding after Apprendi while carefully delimiting its scope. See Mathis v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 2243, 2252 (2016) ("This Court has held that only a jury, and not a judge, may find facts that increase a maximum penalty, except for the simple fact of a prior conviction. That means a judge cannot go beyond identifying the crime of conviction to explore the manner in which the defendant committed that offense. . . . [The judge] can do no more, consistent with the Sixth Amendment, than determine what crime, with what elements, the defendant was convicted of.").

[9] Id. at 477.

[10] Id. at 484 ("If a defendant faces punishment beyond that provided by statute when an offense is committed under certain circumstances but not others, it is obvious that both the loss of liberty and the stigma attaching to the offense are heightened; it necessarily follows that the defendant should not—at the moment the State is put to proof of those circumstances—be deprived of protections that have, until that point, unquestionably attached.").

[11] Id. at 480 ("Just as the circumstances of the crime and the intent of the defendant at the time of commission were often essential elements to be alleged in the indictment [at common law], so too were the circumstances mandating a particular punishment."); id. at 484 (noting "the historic link between verdict and judgment and the consistent limitation on judges' discretion to operate within the limits of the legal penalties provided [by statute]").

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The rule of Apprendi upended the use of binding sentencing guidelines in state and federal courts. In Blakely v. Washington, decided in 2004, the defendant pleaded guilty to an offense (second degree kidnapping involving domestic violence and use of a firearm) with a statutory maximum sentence of ten years in prison based on the applicable felony class.[1] The state sentencing guidelines restricted the sentence to a "standard range" of forty-nine to fifty-three months, unless the trial judge found the presence of an aggravating factor that justified an "exceptional sentence" above the standard range.[2] The trial judge did find an aggravating factor (deliberate cruelty) and imposed a sentence of ninety months—thirty-seven months above the upper limit of the "standard range" but thirty months below the ten-year maximum linked to the felony class.[3] The Supreme Court held that the imposition of the sentence violated the Sixth Amendment,[4] stating "[t]he statutory maximum for Apprendi purposes is the maximum sentence a judge may impose solely on the basis of the facts reflected in the jury verdict or admitted by the defendant."[5] The ten-year offense maximum did not matter for Sixth Amendment purposes because the binding guidelines directed the judge to impose a sentence within the much lower "standard range" absent an aggravating factor.[6] The "standard range," therefore, constituted the maximum sentence authorized "without any additional findings"; the fact that a judge instead of a jury made the additional finding necessary to permit a sentence above this range violated the right to jury trial.[7]

The year after Blakely, the Supreme Court applied Apprendi to federal sentencing law in the 2005 case United States v. Booker.[8] Since 1987, federal statute had required (with limited exception) federal district courts to impose sentences within narrow ranges calculated under the Sentencing Guidelines of the United States Sentencing Commission.[9] Booker produced two separate majority opinions: one majority struck down a sentence imposed under the mandatory federal guidelines as unconstitutional, but a different majority (which shared only one member, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, with the first majority) set the remedy and path forward.[10] The first majority determined that the federal guidelines, like the state guidelines at issue in Blakely, violated the Sixth Amendment because they premised increases in the [1] 542 U.S. 296, 298–99 (2004). The offense was a "class B felony," which under state law was punishable by a prison term not to exceed ten years. Id. at 299.

[2] Id. at 299.

[3] Id. at 299–300.

[4] Id. at 305.

[5] Id. at 303.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. at 303–04 (emphasis in original).

[8] 543 U.S. 220 (2005).

[9] See Kimbrough v. United States, 552 U.S. 85, 96 n.7 (2007) ("Congress created the Sentencing Commission and charged it with promulgating the Guidelines in the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, but the first version of the Guidelines did not become operative until November 1987.") (citations omitted); Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 367 (1989) (explaining that the Sentencing Reform Act made the "guidelines binding on the courts, although [the Act] preserve[d] for the judge the discretion to depart from the guideline applicable to a particular case if the judge f[ound] an aggravating or mitigating factor present that the Commission did not adequately consider when formulating guidelines."). The Blakely majority avoided comment on the constitutionality of the federal guidelines, 542 U.S. at 305 n.9 ("The Federal Guidelines are not before us, and we express no opinion on them."), but dissenters pointed out that the Court's reasoning almost certainly rendered them unconstitutional. Id. at 325 (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (noting lack of relevant distinction between Washington and federal guidelines).

[10] Booker, 543 U.S. at 226–27.

maximum authorized sentence upon judicial factfinding.[11] One of the defendants in Booker, for instance, saw his sentencing range for a narcotics violation under the federal guidelines increase significantly (from 210–262 months to 360 months' life imprisonment) due to two factual findings made by the trial judge during the sentencing proceedings.[12] The trial court ultimately imposed a sentence of 360 months.[13] Applying Apprendi and Blakely, the first Booker majority held that the "need to preserve Sixth Amendment substance" and the "ancient guarantee" of the jury trial right required invalidation of that sentence.[14]

While the first Booker majority's holding followed ineluctably from Blakely,[15] the second majority's formulation of a remedy broke newer ground. It transformed the federal guidelines from mandatory to advisory in nature by severing and excising two provisions of the federal sentencing statute that required federal courts to follow the guidelines, but leaving the rest of the statute and the guidelines program it created intact.[16] In their advisory form, the guidelines no longer violated the jury trial right because, rather than requiring the court to impose a particular sentence based upon a judge-found fact, they now simply offered recommendations as to how judges should "exercise [their] broad discretion in imposing a sentence within a statutory range."[17] As modified, federal sentencing law would now "require[ ] a sentencing court to consider guidelines [sentencing] ranges, but . . . permit[ ] the court to tailor the sentence in light of other statutory concerns as well . . . ."[18] Further, the sentences imposed by district courts would be subject to appellate review only for "unreasonableness," rather than de novo review for compliance with the guidelines.[19] The second majority reasoned that this remedy effectuated Congress's goal of instilling uniformity in federal sentencing better than the primary alternative remedy, which would have retained the mandatory nature of the guidelines but barred sentencing courts from increasing a sentence based on a judge-found fact.[20]

After Booker, the Court struck down another determinate sentencing scheme in Cunningham v. California because, much like the guidelines schemes at issue in Blakely and Booker, the California sentencing law at issue authorized the trial court to depart upwards from a standard sentencing threshold if the court found one or more "circumstances in aggravation."[21] The defendant's offense in that case triggered a standard sentence or "middle term" of twelve years, but the trial court departed upwards and sentenced the defendant to the

[11] Id. at 223.

[12] Id. at 227, 235. The findings concerned that amount of illegal narcotics that the defendant actually possessed and the defendant's obstruction of justice. Id. at 227.

[13] Id. at 227.

[14] Id. at 237. The first Booker majority reiterated the rule of Apprendi as follows: "Any fact (other than a prior conviction) which is necessary to support a sentence exceeding the maximum authorized by the facts established by a plea of guilty or a jury verdict must be admitted by the defendant or proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. at 244.

[15] Id. at 233.

[16] Id. at 245.

[17] Id. at 233.

[18] Id. (citations omitted).

[19] Id. at 260–61.

[20] Id. at 246, 253 ("Congress's basic goal in passing the Sentencing Act was to move the sentencing system in the direction of increased uniformity.").

[21] Cunningham v. California, 549 U.S. 270, 279 (2007) ("California's DSL [Determinate Sentencing Law], and the Rules governing its application, direct the sentencing court to start with [a] middle term [of imprisonment], and to move from that term only when the court itself finds and places on the record facts—whether related to the offense or the offender—beyond the elements of the charged offense.").

"upper term" of sixteen years after finding the presence of six aggravating factors.[22] The Supreme Court held this sentencing procedure unconstitutional under a straightforward application of Apprendi.[23]

Amdt6.4.3.6 Appellate Review of Federal Sentencing Determinations

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

A series of decisions clarified the "unreasonableness" standard of appellate review that Booker established for federal sentencing determinations under the now-advisory federal guidelines.[1] First, Rita v. United States held that "a court of appeals may apply a presumption of reasonableness to a district court sentence that reflects a proper application of the Sentencing Guidelines."[2] In other words, if a district court calculates the defendant's sentencing range correctly and imposes a sentence within that range, it does not violate the Sixth Amendment for the appellate court to presume the reasonableness of the sentence.[3] While recognizing that such a presumption would have some tendency to encourage district courts to follow the guidelines, the Supreme Court held that the presumption nevertheless does not violate the jury trial right because it does not go so far as to "forbid" deviation from the guidelines ranges absent judicial fact-finding.[4]

Whereas Rita concerned appellate review of sentences within the guidelines ranges, the Court took up the matter of appellate review of sentences that deviate from the guidelines (non-guidelines sentences) in Gall v. United States.[5] There, the Court reaffirmed that the "unreasonableness" standard of review applies to all federal sentences, including

---

[22] Id. at 275–76.

[23] Id. at 288 ("Because circumstances in aggravation are found by the judge, not the jury, and need only be established by a preponderance of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, the DSL violates Apprendi's bright-line rule . . . .") (citation omitted).

[1] One narrow aspect of the post-Booker federal guidelines, concerning modifications to already-imposed sentences following a subsequent reduction in the applicable guidelines range, does remain binding. Dillon v. United States, 560 U.S. 817, 819 (2010) (holding that Booker does not require treating as advisory a guidelines provision that "instructs courts not to reduce a term of imprisonment below the minimum of an amended sentencing range [made retroactively applicable] except to the extent the original term of imprisonment was below the range then applicable"); id. at 828 ("[S]entence-modification proceedings . . . are not constitutionally compelled. We are aware of no constitutional requirement of retroactivity that entitles defendants sentenced to a term of imprisonment to the benefit of subsequent Guidelines amendments. . . . Viewed that way, [sentence-modification] proceedings . . . do not implicate the Sixth Amendment right to have essential facts found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt.").

[2] 551 U.S. 338, 347 (2007).

[3] Id. at 350–51.

[4] Id. at 352–53 ("The Sixth Amendment question . . . is whether the law forbids a judge to increase a defendant's sentence unless the judge finds facts that the jury did not find . . . . A nonbinding appellate presumption that a Guidelines sentence is reasonable does not require the sentencing judge to impose that sentence. Still less does it prohibit the sentencing judge from imposing a sentence higher than the Guidelines provide for the jury-determined facts standing alone.") (emphasis in original).

[5] 552 U.S. 38 (2007).

non-guidelines sentences.[6] "Appellate courts may . . . consider the extent of a deviation from the Guidelines,"[7] but they may not "apply a presumption of unreasonableness" to non-guidelines sentences.[8] Nor may appellate courts apply standards of review that "come too close" to a presumption of unreasonableness, such as a rule that non-guidelines sentences must be supported by "extraordinary circumstances" or a "rigid mathematical formula that uses the percentage of a departure as the standard for determining the strength of the justifications required for a specific sentence."[9] To subject non-guidelines sentences to additional scrutiny of this sort, the Court reasoned, would too nearly resemble a requirement that sentencing judges follow the guidelines—exactly what Booker struck down.[10]

Two cases concerned below-guidelines sentences imposed for crack cocaine offenses. In Kimbrough v. United States[11] and Spears v. United States,[12] the Supreme Court held that district courts have authority to "vary from the crack cocaine Guidelines based on policy disagreement with them, and not simply based on an individualized determination that they yield an excessive sentence in a particular case."[13] Until 2007, the federal guidelines employed a "100-to-1 ratio" that treated every gram of crack cocaine as equal to 100 grams of powder cocaine for purposes of setting sentencing ranges for cocaine offenses.[14] The Supreme Court concluded in both Kimbrough and Spears that the discretion left to district courts under the post-Booker advisory guidelines permits "categorical disagreement" with the crack cocaine provisions by the sentencing court and is subject only to deferential abuse-of-discretion review of the imposition of a particular sentence.[15] Accordingly, in both cases, the Court reversed appellate court decisions that treated non-guidelines sentences based on categorical disagreement with the crack cocaine guidelines as invalid per se.[16] The Supreme Court did not

---

[6] Id. at 41. The Court equated the "unreasonableness" standard with an abuse of discretion standard. Id. ("[C]ourts of appeals must review all sentences—whether inside, just outside, or significantly outside the Guidelines range—under a deferential abuse-of-discretion standard.").

[7] Id. at 47.

[8] Id. at 51.

[9] Id. at 47.

[10] Id. Gall contains perhaps the most comprehensive description of the requirements of appellate review of federal sentences under the post-Booker guidelines: "[The appellate court] must first ensure that the district court committed no significant procedural error, such as failing to calculate (or improperly calculating) the Guidelines range, treating the Guidelines as mandatory, failing to consider the [sentencing statute] factors, selecting a sentence based on clearly erroneous facts, or failing to adequately explain the chosen sentence—including an explanation for any deviation from the Guidelines range. Assuming that the district court's sentencing decision is procedurally sound, the appellate court should then consider the substantive reasonableness of the sentence imposed under an abuse-of-discretion standard. When conducting this review, the court will, of course, take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the extent of any variance from the Guidelines range. If the sentence is within the Guidelines range, the appellate court may, but is not required to, apply a presumption of reasonableness. But if the sentence is outside the Guidelines range, the court may not apply a presumption of unreasonableness. It may consider the extent of the deviation, but must give due deference to the district court's decision that the [sentencing statute] factors, on a whole, justify the extent of the variance. The fact that the appellate court might reasonably have concluded that a different sentence was appropriate is insufficient to justify reversal of the district court." 552 U.S. at 51.

[11] 552 U.S. 85 (2007).

[12] 555 U.S. 261 (2009).

[13] Spears, 555 U.S. at 843; see also Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 110 ("[I]t would not be an abuse of discretion for a district court to conclude when sentencing a particular defendant that the crack/powder disparity yields a sentence 'greater than necessary' to achieve [the federal sentencing statute's] purposes, even in a mine-run case.").

[14] Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 96–97. The federal guidelines drew the 100-to-1 ratio from the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-570, which used the ratio in setting mandatory minimum sentences for cocaine offenses. Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 97.

[15] Spears, 555 U.S. at 264; Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 110.

[16] Spears, 555 U.S. at 263; Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 91.

clarify, however, whether its holding extended beyond the crack cocaine provisions to categorical disagreement with other guidelines provisions.[17]

Amdt6.4.3.7 Other Applications of Apprendi

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Apprendi prompted a major revision of the Court's Sixth Amendment jurisprudence concerning sentencing procedure in death penalty cases. In Ring v. Arizona, the Court struck down an Arizona statute (which the Court had upheld before Apprendi) that conditioned imposing the death penalty upon a judge's factual determinations as to the presence or absence of enumerated aggravating factors.[1] Although the statute imposed a burden on the prosecution to prove the existence of the aggravating factors beyond a reasonable doubt, the Court ruled that, under Apprendi, those findings must be made by a jury rather than a judge.[2] In Hurst v. Florida, the Court extended this holding to invalidate Florida's death penalty statute (also upheld before Apprendi), which used an advisory jury to make a sentencing recommendation but left the ultimate sentencing determination to "the trial judge's independent judgment about the existence of aggravating and mitigating factors."[3] In striking down the statute, the Court reiterated that the jury trial right requires the government "to base [a defendant's] death sentence on a jury's verdict, not a judge's factfinding."[4]

In a different vein, Apprendi applies to the factual predicates for mandatory minimum sentences. The Supreme Court held in Alleyne v. United States that "[a]ny fact that increases the mandatory minimum is an 'element' [of the offense] that must be submitted to the jury."[5] [17] In both cases, the Court mainly limited its statements of holding to the crack cocaine guidelines. Spears, 555 U.S. at 265–66 ("[D]istrict courts are entitled to reject and vary categorically from the crack cocaine guidelines . . . .") (emphasis added); Kimbrough, 552 U.S. at 110 (holding that district courts may disregard the "crack/powder disparity"); but see id. at 91 ("We hold that, under Booker, the cocaine guidelines, like all other Guidelines, are advisory only, and that the Court of Appeals erred in holding the crack/powder disparity effectively mandatory."). The Court also premised its reasoning partly upon considerations unique to the cocaine guidelines. See id. at 109–110 (concluding that the cocaine guidelines "do not exemplify the [Sentencing] Commission's exercise of its characteristic institutional role" because the Commission based those provisions upon the mandatory minimums in the 1986 Anti-Drug Abuse Act and not upon empirical data).

---

[1] 536 U.S. 584, 589 (2002) ("Capital defendants, no less than noncapital defendants . . . are entitled to a jury determination of any fact on which the legislature conditions an increase in their maximum punishment."). Ring overruled an earlier case that had upheld the same Arizona statute. Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 649 (1990) ("[W]e cannot conclude that a State is required to denominate aggravating circumstances 'elements' of the offense or permit only a jury to determine the existence of such circumstances.").

[2] Ring, 536 U.S. at 589, 597.

[3] 136 S. Ct. 616, 620 (2016) (quoting Blackwelder v. State, 851 So.2d 650, 653 (Fla. 2003) (per curiam)). Hurst overruled two earlier Supreme Court cases that upheld the Florida statute. Hildwin v. Florida, 490 U.S. 638 (1989) (per curiam); Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984); see Hurst, 136 S. Ct. at 624 ("Time and subsequent cases have washed away the logic of Spaziano and Hildwin. The decisions are overruled to the extent they allow a sentencing judge to find an aggravating circumstance, independent of a jury's factfinding, that is necessary for imposition of the death penalty.").

[4] Hurst, 136 S. Ct. at 624.

[5] 570 U.S. 99, 103 (2013).

Alleyne overruled one post-Apprendi case[6] and one pre-Apprendi case,[7] both of which upheld statutory schemes that premised increases in the mandatory minimum sentence upon judicial fact-finding.[8] The Alleyne Court rejected attempts to "distinguish facts that raise the maximum from those that increase the minimum" under Apprendi's Sixth Amendment analysis;[9] both types of facts, the Court reasoned, constitute offense elements and therefore fall within the scope of the jury trial right.[10] Accordingly, "[j]uries must find any facts that increase either the statutory maximum or minimum,"[11] except for the fact of a prior conviction.[12]

In United States v. Haymond, a splintered majority of five Justices extended Alleyne to the context of supervised release.[13] Haymond held unconstitutional a federal statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3583(k), that required imposing a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years for any violation of a condition of supervised release through the commission of certain federal crimes, such as the possession of child pornography, by defendants required to register as sex offenders.[14] The statutory scheme required judges to determine violations by a preponderance of the evidence.[15] A plurality of four Justices reasoned that punishments for supervised release violations constitute part of the overall punishment for the initial offense of conviction, and that, as such, any violation found by a judge that triggered a new mandatory minimum prison term violated the jury trial right under Alleyne.[16] A concurring opinion that supplied the decisive fifth vote, however, offered a narrow rationale. That opinion reasoned that supervised release proceedings generally do not implicate the jury trial right, but that the unique nature of Section 3583(k)—essentially, its requirement of a mandatory minimum prison term for enumerated offenses—rendered it "less like ordinary revocation [of supervised release] and more like punishment for a new offense, to which the jury right would typically attach."[17]

Apprendi also applies to the factual predicate for a criminal fine imposed for a non-petty offense.[18] Under the petty offense doctrine, not all criminal fines trigger the jury trial right, but "[w]here a fine is substantial enough to trigger that right, Apprendi applies in full."[19] As a result, it violates the Sixth Amendment for a judge to make a factual finding that increases the maximum potential fine for a serious (non-petty) offense.[20] A judge may not, for example,

[6] Harris v. United States, 536 U.S. 545, 567 (2002) ("[T]he political system may channel judicial discretion—and rely upon judicial expertise—by requiring defendants to serve minimum terms after judges make certain factual findings.").

[7] McMillan v. Pennsylvania, 477 U.S. 79, 93 (1986) ("[T]here is no Sixth Amendment right to jury sentencing, even where the sentence turns on specific findings of fact.").

[8] Harris, 536 U.S. at 567; McMillian, 477 U.S. at 93.

[9] Alleyne, 570 U.S. at 116.

[10] Id. at 114–15 ("As noted, the essential Sixth Amendment inquiry is whether a fact is an element of the crime. When a finding of fact alters the legally prescribed punishment so as to aggravate it, the fact necessarily forms a constituent part of a new offense and must be submitted to the jury.").

[11] Id. at 113 n.2.

[12] Id. at 111 n.1.

[13] No. 17-1672, slip op. at 10–11 (U.S. June 26, 2019) (plurality opinion).

[14] Id. at 3.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 10–11.

[17] United States v. Haymond, No. 17-1672, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 26, 2019) (Breyer, J., concurring).

[18] Southern Union Co. v. United States, 567 U.S. 343, 360 (2012) ("We hold that the rule of Apprendi applies to the imposition of criminal fines.").

[19] Id. at 352.

[20] Id.

determine the duration of ongoing criminal conduct in order to calculate the maximum potential fine under a statute prescribing penalties for each day of violation.[21]

In contrast, beyond the fact of prior conviction, at least one other type of factual determination relevant to sentencing remains unaffected by Apprendi. In Oregon v. Ice, the Supreme Court held that a state legislature may, without running afoul of the jury trial right, assign to a judge factual determinations that govern whether a defendant convicted of multiple offenses should receive consecutive rather than concurrent sentences.[22] The Court noted that juries traditionally did not take part in this decision[23] and that states take a variety of approaches to regulating how judges make the decision.[24] Accordingly, on the basis of "twin considerations—historical practice and respect for state sovereignty," the Court declined to extend Apprendi to the sentencing decision of whether to impose multiple sentences consecutively.[25]

Amdt6.4.4 Scope of the Right

Amdt6.4.4.1 Overview of Scope of Right to Trial by Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The right to a jury trial entails the "right to have a jury make the ultimate determination of guilt."[1] As such, the criminal jury is not a "mere factfinder," but instead an adjudicative body that decides "guilt or innocence on every issue, which includes application of the law to the facts."[2] The trial court may not usurp the jury's function by directing a guilty verdict, "no matter how conclusive the evidence;"[3] nor may the trial court "attempt[ ] to override or interfere with the jurors' independent judgment in a manner contrary to the interests of the accused."[4] In modern doctrine, these foundational principles regarding the scope of the jury function have had perhaps their most significant ramifications in due process jurisprudence, [21] Id. ("This is exactly what Apprendi guards against: judicial factfinding that enlarges the maximum punishment a defendant faces beyond what the jury's verdict or the defendant's admissions allow.").

---

[22] 555 U.S. 160, 163–64 (2009).

[23] Id. at 163.

[24] Id. ("Most States continue the common-law tradition: They entrust to judges' unfettered discretion the decision whether sentences for discrete offenses shall be served consecutively or concurrently. In some States, sentences for multiple offenses are presumed to run consecutively, but sentencing judges may order concurrent sentences upon finding cause therefor. Other States, including Oregon, constrain judges' discretion by requiring them to find certain facts before imposing consecutive, rather than concurrent, sentences.").

[25] Id. at 168.

[1] United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 510 (1995).

[2] Id. at 513–14; see also id. at 514 ("[T]he jury's constitutional responsibility is not merely to determine the facts, but to apply the law to those facts and draw the ultimate conclusion of guilt or innocence.").

[3] United Bhd. of Carpenters & Joiners of Am. v. United States, 330 U.S. 395, 408 (1947); see also Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275, 277 (1993) ("[A]lthough a judge may direct a verdict for the defendant if the evidence is legally insufficient to establish guilt, he may not direct a verdict for the State, no matter how overwhelming the evidence."); Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510, 516 n.5 (1979) ("[V]erdicts may not be directed against defendants in criminal cases.").

[4] United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 573 (1977).

where the Supreme Court has addressed claims that particular types of jury instructions unconstitutionally impinge upon or skew the jury's adjudicative task.[5] The Court's Sixth Amendment doctrine, on the other hand, has taken up three central issues of jury structure and operation: size, unanimity, and juncture (i.e., the stage of the proceedings at which the jury participates).

Amdt6.4.4.2 Size of the Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Under current doctrine, a criminal jury must have at least six members.[1] The Court's early doctrine endorsed the stricter view that the Sixth Amendment required a twelve-member jury in conformity with historical practice.[2] But because the federal criminal system used a twelve-person jury,[3] the Supreme Court did not squarely confront the constitutionality of a state law providing for smaller juries until after it held in Duncan v. Louisiana in 1968 that the jury trial right applied against the states.[4] In the first case after Duncan to address such a law,

---

[5] See Sandstrom, 442 U.S. at 523 (holding that jury instruction that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" violated due process because the "jurors could reasonably have concluded that they were directed to find against defendant on the element of intent" and "[t]he State was thus not forced to prove beyond a reasonable doubt . . . every fact necessary to constitute the crime . . . charged") (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); see also Schad v. Arizona, 501 U.S. 624, 630 (1991) (rejecting under due process analysis the claim that a "conviction under [jury] instructions that did not require the jury to agree on one of the alternative theories of premeditated and felony murder is unconstitutional"); Amdt5.5.1 Overview of Due Process through Amdt5.5.2 Historical Background on Due Process. Although the Court has tended to address them in the due process context, erroneous jury instructions may implicate both the right to due process and the right to jury trial. The Supreme Court has noted that "the Fifth Amendment requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt and the Sixth Amendment requirement of a jury verdict are interrelated," such that a jury instruction that misstates the burden of proof as something less than the reasonable doubt standard violates both constitutional requirements and constitutes a structural error not subject to harmless error analysis. Sullivan, 508 U.S. at 278, 281 ("[T]he jury verdict required by the Sixth Amendment is a jury verdict of guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.").

[1] Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223, 245 (1978) (opinion of Blackmun, J.) ("[T]rial on criminal charges before a five-member jury deprive[s] [a defendant] of the right to trial by jury guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments."); id. at 245–46 (Powell, J., concurring in the judgment, also on the theory that five-member juries violate the right to jury trial).

[2] Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 353 (1898) ("[T]he word 'jury' and the words 'trial by jury' were placed in the constitution of the United States with reference to the meaning affixed to them in the law as it was in this country and in England at the time of the adoption of that instrument . . . [and therefore] require[ ] that [a criminal defendant] should be tried by a jury composed of not less than twelve persons."); see also Ballew, 435 U.S. at 230 n.8 (collecting additional cases decided between 1900 and 1930 that made the "assumption . . . that the 12-member feature was a constitutional requirement"). In Thompson, the Court held that application of a provision of Utah's state constitution providing for an eight-person jury in non-capital cases to prosecutions for crimes committed before Utah became a state, when as a territory it followed the federal practice of twelve-person juries, violated the ex post facto clause of Article I, §10 of the U.S. Constitution. Thompson, 170 U.S. at 355.

[3] See, e.g., Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 23(b) advisory committee's note to 1944 adoption (explaining that the rule restated the "existing practice" of providing for twelve-member jury, absent stipulation by the parties for a smaller jury). In 1983, Rule 23(b) was amended to authorize federal courts "to permit a jury of 11 persons to return a verdict, even without a stipulation by the parties, if the court finds good cause to excuse a juror [after the jury has retired to deliberate]." Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 23(b)(3) advisory committee's note to 1983 amendments.

[4] See Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130, 134 (1979) ("Only in relatively recent years has this Court had to consider the practices of the several States relating to jury size and unanimity. Duncan v. Louisiana marked the beginning of

Williams v. Florida,[5] the Court rejected the traditional, historically-based view that the jury trial right required a twelve-person jury and applied instead a functional analysis to uphold a Florida law providing for a six-person criminal jury.[6] The Supreme Court stated: "[T]he essential feature of a jury obviously lies in the interposition between the accused and his accuser of the commonsense judgment of a group of laymen . . . [b]ut we find little reason to think that these goals are in any meaningful sense less likely to be achieved when the jury numbers six, than when it numbers 12—particularly if the requirement of unanimity is retained."[7]

Eight years later, in Ballew v. Georgia,[8] the Court converted the six-person jury upheld in Williams into the constitutional minimum when it struck down a Georgia law providing for five-person juries in certain cases.[9] Relying on a number of academic studies about problems with small juries released after Williams, the leading opinion in Ballew concluded that "the purpose and functioning of the jury in a criminal trial is seriously impaired, and to a constitutional degree, by a reduction in size to below six members."[10] Ballew did not overturn or disavow Williams; instead, it simply prohibited any "further reduction" in the jury size that Williams upheld.[11]

Amdt6.4.4.3 Unanimity of the Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Under current doctrine, jury verdicts must be unanimous to convict a defendant of a non-petty offense in both federal and state criminal trials.[1] For federal criminal trials, the Supreme Court's recognition of this unanimity requirement is long-standing, dating back at our involvement with such questions.") (citation omitted); Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 90, 103 (1970) (explaining that before Duncan, the Court's decisions had "assumed" that the Constitution required a twelve-person jury).

---

[5] 399 U.S. 78 (1970).

[6] Id. at 86 ("We hold that the 12-man panel is not a necessary ingredient of 'trial by jury,' and that respondent's refusal to impanel more than the six members provided for by Florida law did not violate petitioner's Sixth Amendment rights as applied to the States through the Fourteenth.").

[7] Id. at 100.

[8] 435 U.S. 223 (1978).

[9] Id. at 245 (opinion of Blackmun, J.). Only Justice John Stevens joined Justice Harry Blackmun's opinion, which announced the judgment; four other Justices concurred in the judgment in opinions that also concluded that five-member juries violated the Sixth Amendment. See id. (White, J., concurring in judgment on ground that "a jury of fewer than six persons would fail to represent the sense of the community and hence not satisfy the fair cross-section requirement of the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments"); id. at 245–46 (Powell, J., concurring in judgment on ground that "use of a jury as small as five members, with authority to convict for serious offenses, involves grave questions of fairness . . . and a line has to be drawn somewhere if the substance of jury trial is to be preserved," but disagreeing with plurality's implication that the Fourteenth Amendment fully incorporates the right to jury trial and with plurality's reliance on "numerology derived from statistical studies").

[10] Id. at 239 (opinion of Blackmun, J.).

[11] Id. ("While we adhere to, and reaffirm our holding in Williams v. Florida, the[ ] [academic] studies, most of which have been made since Williams was decided in 1970, lead us to conclude that the . . . [Constitution prohibits] a reduction in [jury] size to below six members.").

[1] Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 7 (U.S. Apr. 20, 2020).

least as far as the late 1800s.[2] But for state criminal trials, it was not until 2020 that the Court held for the first time, in Ramos v. Louisiana, that the Sixth Amendment unanimity requirement applies by incorporation via the Fourteenth Amendment.[3]

Before Ramos, the unanimity requirement did not apply to state criminal trials under the splintered decision in the 1972 case Apodaca v. Oregon.[4] This outcome was significant for the two states—Oregon and Louisiana—that authorized non unanimous verdicts in criminal trials (the other 48 states required unanimity).[5] In Apodaca, the Supreme Court upheld a provision of the Oregon constitution that permitted jury verdicts by votes of 10-2 in all but first-degree murder cases.[6] A plurality of four justices concluded that the Sixth Amendment did not require unanimity. Much like the Williams majority that upheld the six-person Florida jury, these justices preferred functional over historical considerations when interpreting the Sixth Amendment.[7] They reasoned that a jury allowed to convict on a 10-2 vote adequately safeguarded a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment interest in "having the judgment of his peers interposed between himself and the officers of the State who prosecute and judge him . . . ."[8] Justice Lewis Powell's narrower concurrence, however, set the doctrine on unanimity that would endure until 2020. He agreed with four dissenters on the point that "in accord both with history and precedent . . . the Sixth Amendment requires a unanimous jury verdict to convict in a federal criminal trial."[9] He voted to uphold the Oregon constitutional provision, however, on the ground that the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause did not incorporate the unanimity component of the Sixth Amendment jury trial right, even though it incorporated the right to a jury itself.[10] As a result, under Apodaca, federal but not state criminal juries were constitutionally required to render unanimous verdicts.[11]

Until the Supreme Court overruled Apodaca in 2020, state laws that authorized small juries (as opposed to the twelve-member jury at issue in Apodaca) to render non-unanimous verdicts triggered special Sixth Amendment concerns. In Burch v. Louisiana, the Supreme

[2] Id. at 6 ("As early as 1898, the Court said that a defendant enjoys a 'constitutional right to demand that his liberty should not be taken from him except by the joint action of the court and the unanimous verdict of a jury of twelve persons.'") (quoting Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 351 (1898)); Andres v. United States, 333 U.S. 740, 748 (1948) ("Unanimity in jury verdicts is required where the Sixth and Seventh Amendments apply. In criminal cases this requirement of unanimity extends to all issues—character or degree of the crime, guilt and punishment—which are left to the jury."); Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 586 (1900) (stating that the right to jury trial "implies that there shall be an unanimous verdict of twelve jurors in all Federal courts where a jury trial is held"); see also Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 366, 369–70 (1972) (Powell, J., concurring) (citing "an unbroken line of cases reaching back into the late 1800's [in which] the Justices of this Court have recognized, virtually without dissent, that unanimity is one of the indispensable features of federal jury trial").

[3] Ramos, slip op. at 7.

[4] 406 U.S. 404 (1972).

[5] Ramos, slip op. at 1.

[6] 406 U.S. at 406.

[7] Id. at 410 ("[A]s in Williams, our inability to divine 'the intent of the Framers' . . . requires that in determining what is meant by a jury we must turn to other than purely historical considerations.").

[8] Id. at 411.

[9] Johnson, 406 U.S. at 371 (Powell, J., concurring in judgment). Justice Powell's concurring opinion in Apodaca is reported together with his concurring opinion in a companion case, Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), at 406 U.S. at 366.

[10] Johnson, 406 U.S. at 373 (Powell, J., concurring in judgment) (reasoning that incorporation of the unanimity requirement "would give unwarranted and unwise scope to the incorporation doctrine as it applies to the due process right of state criminal defendants to trial by jury."); see Ramos, slip op. at 8 ("Justice Powell doubled down on his belief in 'dual-track' incorporation—the idea that a single right can mean two different things depending on whether it is being invoked against the federal or a state government.").

[11] Timbs v. Indiana, No. 17-109, slip op. at 3 n.1 (U.S. Feb. 20, 2019) (citing Apodaca for the proposition that "the Sixth Amendment requires jury unanimity in federal, but not state, criminal proceedings").

Court held that six-person juries must convict unanimously.[12] The Court struck down, as a violation of the jury trial right, a Louisiana law permitting conviction for nonpetty offenses upon the agreement of five members of a six-person jury.[13] Just as the Apodaca plurality opinion followed the reasoning in Williams in departing from historical understandings of jury structure to afford the states more flexibility in crafting criminal procedure, the Burch decision followed the reasoning in Ballew in putting a limit on the flexibility.[14] The Burch Court conceded its inability to "discern a priori a bright line below which the number of jurors participating in the trial or the verdict"[15] would violate the Sixth Amendment and emphasized that "line-drawing . . . 'cannot be wholly satisfactory.'"[16] The Court concluded, however, that "lines must be drawn somewhere if the substance of the jury trial right is to be preserved" and that "conviction for a nonpetty offense by only five members of a six-person jury presents a . . . threat [to that preservation] and justifies . . . requiring verdicts rendered by six-person juries to be unanimous."[17] The Court "intimated no view" as to the constitutionality of nonunanimous juries with more than six but fewer than twelve members.[18]

In the 2020 Ramos decision, the Supreme Court overruled Apodaca, reaffirmed that the Sixth Amendment requires unanimity, and held that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the Sixth Amendment unanimity requirement against the states.[19] The Court reasoned that "Apodaca was gravely mistaken" and that "Justice Powell refused to follow this Court's incorporation precedents" when he determined that an alternative version of the jury trial right—one without a unanimity requirement—applied in state criminal trials.[20] In 2021, the Court held that Ramos did not apply retroactively to invalidate, on federal collateral review, convictions from non-unanimous verdicts that were already final at the time Ramos was decided.[21]

Amdt6.4.4.4 Two-Tier Trial Court Systems

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the

[12] 441 U.S. 130, 138 (1979).

[13] Id. at 134 ("[C]onviction by a nonunanimous six-member jury in a state criminal trial for a nonpetty offense deprives an accused of his constitutional right to trial by jury.").

[14] Id. at 138 (resting decision on "much the same reasons that led us in Ballew to decide that use of a five-member jury threatened the fairness of the proceeding and the proper role of the jury").

[15] Id. at 137.

[16] Id. at 138 (quoting Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 161 (1968)).

[17] Id.; see also Brown v. Louisiana, 447 U.S. 323, 326–27 (1980) (holding that the rule of Burch applies to convictions still pending on direct review on the date Burch was decided, even where the jury was empaneled before that date).

[18] Burch, 441 U.S. at 138 n.11.

[19] Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 7 (U.S. Apr. 20, 2020) ("There can be no question either that the Sixth Amendment's unanimity requirement applies to state and federal criminal trials equally.").

[20] Id. at 21. The Court also explained that the Louisiana and Oregon laws had "racist origins": both states originally had provided for non-unanimous verdicts to "dilute" the participation of African Americans and other minorities on juries. Id. at 2–3.

[21] Edwards v. Vannoy, No. 19-5807, slip op. at 2 (U.S. May 17, 2021).

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Court held in Ludwig v. Massachusetts that the provision of a jury trial on appeal, instead of at the first level of adjudication, does not violate the right to jury trial so long as the accused does not face any undue burdens in reaching the jury trial stage.[1] Ludwig upheld Massachusetts's "two-tiered" system for trying certain non-petty crimes, which afforded the accused the possibility of a jury trial only after conviction in a non-jury trial at the first tier.[2] A defendant keen on a jury trial could expedite the procedure by "admitting sufficient findings of fact" at the first tier, thereby obviating most of the proceedings before the second-tier jury trial, which was de novo (i.e., not influenced by the outcome of the first tier trial).[3] The Court held that this procedure did not violate what it called the "Fourteenth Amendment right to a jury trial."[4] Because the Massachusetts system undeniably provided the accused with the opportunity for a jury trial, the real question according to the Court was whether the provision of that opportunity only at the second tier "unconstitutionally burden[ed] the exercise of that right."[5] The Massachusetts system did not impose such an unconstitutional burden, the Court concluded, because the procedure for admitting factual findings at the first tier allowed the accused to mitigate the increased financial costs and "psychological and physical hardships" of two trials.[6] The post-Duncan context also appeared to influence the decision: the Ludwig Court, like the Williams and Apodaca Courts, emphasized the need to afford the states flexibility in their manner of administering a jury trial system.[7]

Amdt6.4.5 Right to Impartial Jury

Amdt6.4.5.1 A Jury Selected from a Representative Cross-Section of the Community

Sixth Amendment:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the

[1] 427 U.S. 618, 630 (1976).

[2] Id. at 620 ("Massachusetts is one of several States having a two-tier system of trial courts for criminal cases.").

[3] Id. at 621.

[4] Id. at 626. The Court construed the defendant's claim as being that the Massachusetts system violated his jury trial right and based its decision largely on Sixth Amendment precedent. Id. at 624–26. The Court refrained from expressly tying its holding to the Sixth Amendment right to jury trial, however, presumably to retain Justice Powell's vote in the five-justice majority. See id. at 632 (Powell, J., concurring) ("I join the opinion of the Court, as I understand it to be consistent with my view that the right to a jury trial afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment is not identical to that guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment.").

[5] Id. at 626.

[6] Id. at 626–27, 628–29. The Court also rejected the argument that the "possibility of a harsher sentence at the second tier" unduly burdened exercise of the jury trial right, relying on due process cases for the proposition that the Constitution prohibits only "the vindictive imposition of an increased sentence." Id. at 627.

[7] Ludwig, 427 U.S. at 630 ("The modes of exercising federal constitutional rights have traditionally been left, within limits, to state specification. In this case, Massachusetts absolutely guarantees trial by jury to persons accused of serious crimes, and the manner it has specified for exercising this right is fair and not unduly burdensome.").

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment guarantee of the right to a trial "by an impartial jury" applies in both state and federal court.[1] Other constitutional provisions, including the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, also bear upon impartiality. Before the Court extended the right to a jury trial to state courts in the 1968 case Duncan v. Louisiana,[2] the Court had established that, if a state chose to provide juries, due process required them to be impartial.[3] In the post-Duncan era, the Supreme Court has continued to ground the right to an impartial jury in both the Sixth Amendment and due process.[4] In addition, equal protection prohibits certain forms of discrimination in jury selection.[5]

Impartiality is a two-part requirement: the jury must be selected from a pool that represents a fair cross-section of the community[6] and the jurors must be unbiased.[7] First, "the selection of a petit jury from a representative cross section of the community is an essential component of the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial."[8] This "fair cross-section" requirement applies only to jury panels or venires from which petit juries are chosen, and not to the composition of the petit juries themselves.[9] Describing the test for whether a prima facie violation of the fair-cross-section requirement had occurred, the Supreme Court stated:

---

[1] Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 526–528 (1975); see Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 7 (U.S. Apr. 20, 2020) (reviewing incorporation precedents concerning the Sixth Amendment right to jury trial).

[2] 391 U.S. 145, 149–50 (1968).

[3] Peters v. Kiff, 407 U.S. 493, 501–02 (1972) ("Long before this Court held that the Constitution imposes the requirement of jury trial on the States, it was well established that the Due Process Clause protects a defendant from jurors who are actually incapable of rendering an impartial verdict, based on the evidence and the law."); Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, 471 (1965); Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 722–23 (1961) (overturning conviction on due process principles for lack of impartial jury); see also Gonzales v. Beto, 405 U.S. 1052, 1506 n.4 (1972) (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment) (describing "established case law holding that due process of law requires an impartial jury.").

[4] See Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 377–78 (2010) (noting that the "Sixth Amendment secures to criminal defendants the right to trial by an impartial jury" before declaring that due process requires the trier of fact to judge a case "impartially, unswayed by outside influence"); Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28, 36 n.9 (1986) ("The right to an impartial jury is guaranteed by both the Sixth Amendment, made applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, and by principles of due process."); Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589, 595 n.6 (1976) ("A criminal defendant in a state court is guaranteed an 'impartial jury' by the Sixth Amendment as applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment. Principles of due process also guarantee a defendant an impartial jury."); see also Dietz v. Bouldin, 579 U.S. 40, 48 (2016) ("[T]he guarantee of an impartial jury . . . is vital to the fair administration of justice.").

[5] See, e.g., Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 85 (1986) ("The Equal Protection Clause guarantees the defendant that the State will not exclude members of his race from the jury venire on account of race, or on the false assumption that members of his race as a group are not qualified to serve as jurors.") (citations omitted); Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 494 (1977) ("[I]n order to show that an equal protection violation has occurred in the context of grand jury selection, the defendant must show that the procedure employed resulted in substantial underrepresentation of his race or of the identifiable group to which he belongs."); see Amdt14.S1.8.1.8 Peremptory Challenges.

[6] See Taylor, 419 U.S. at 530 ("Trial by jury presupposes a jury drawn from a pool broadly representative of the community as well as impartial in a specific case. . . .") (quoting Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co., 328 U.S. 217, 227 (1946) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting)).

[7] See id. The requirement that jurors be unbiased is discussed at Amdt6.4.2 Right to a Jury Free From Bias

[8] Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 528 (1975); see Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 86 (1942) (reasoning that officials charged with choosing federal jurors "must not allow the desire for competent jurors to lead them into selections which do not comport with the concept of the jury as a cross-section of the community"); see also Brown v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443, 474 (1953) (discussing fair cross-section concept in analyzing due process challenge to jury lists used in state trial, fifteen years before Duncan made the jury trial right applicable against the states).

[9] Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474, 480–81 (1990); Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 173–74 (1986) ("The limited scope of the fair-cross-section requirement is a direct and inevitable consequence of the practical impossibility of providing each criminal defendant with a truly 'representative' petit jury . . . .").

> In order to establish a prima facie violation of the fair-cross-section requirement, the defendant must show (1) that the group alleged to be excluded is a 'distinctive' group in the community; (2) that the representation of this group in venires from which juries are selected is not fair and reasonable in relation to the number of such persons in the community; and (3) that this underrepresentation is due to systematic exclusion of the group in the jury-selection process.[10]

The defendant may bring a challenge under this test even if he or she does not belong to the excluded group.[11] Once the defendant demonstrates a prima facie violation, the government faces a formidable burden: the jury selection process may be sustained under the Sixth Amendment only if those aspects of the process that result in the disproportionate exclusion of a distinctive group, such as exemption criteria, "manifestly and primarily" advance a "significant state interest."[12] Applying these standards, the Court invalidated a state selection system granting women an automatic exemption from jury service upon request.[13] In an earlier case, it voided a selection system under which no woman would be called for jury duty unless she had previously filed a written declaration of her desire to be subject to service.[14]

Amdt6.4.5.2 Jury Free from Bias

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In addition to requiring that a petit jury be selected from a representative cross section of the community,[1] the Supreme Court has interpreted the Sixth Amendment to require assurance that the jurors chosen are unbiased—that is, the jurors must be willing to decide the [10] Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357, 364 (1979); see also Berghuis v. Smith, 559 U.S. 314, 330–32 (2010) (affirming, on habeas review, state court decision that rejected a fair cross-section claim for failure to prove systematic exclusion with particularity).

---

[11] Taylor, 419 U.S. at 526 (holding that male defendant had standing to challenge exclusion of female jurors); Peters v. Kiff, 407 U.S. 493, 500–05 (1972) (holding that White defendant had standing to bring due process challenge against exclusion of African American jurors and reasoning that "if the Sixth Amendment were applicable here, and petitioner were challenging a post-Duncan petit jury, he would clearly have standing to challenge the systematic exclusion of any identifiable group from jury service").

[12] Duren, 439 U.S. at 367–68.

[13] Id. at 359–60.

[14] Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 526–31 (1975); see also Ballard v. United States, 329 U.S. 187, 193 (1946) ("We conclude that the purposeful and systematic exclusion of women from the [federal jury] panel in this case was a departure from the scheme of jury selection which Congress adopted . . . ."); Thiel v. S. Pac. Co., 328 U.S. 217, 224–25 (1946) (exercising supervisory power over administration of justice in federal courts to grant a new trial in a civil case where day laborers were excluded from the jury lists). Before the Supreme Court held in 1968 that the Sixth Amendment right to jury trial applied against the states, the Court had rejected, in 5-to-4 decisions, Fourteenth Amendment challenges to state use of "blue ribbon" jury lists that tended to exclude women and laborers. See Fay v. New York, 332 U.S. 261, 290–93 (1947) (reasoning that not even systematic or purposeful underrepresentation of women or occupational groups violated the Fourteenth Amendment); Moore v. New York, 333 U.S. 565, 566–68 (1948) (reaffirming Fay but reasoning that the evidence did not show the systematic exclusion of African Americans from the jury lists).

[1] See Amdt6.4.2 A Jury Selected from a Representative Cross Section of the Community case on the basis of the evidence presented.[2] The Court has held that absent a showing of actual bias, a juror's employment by the government that is prosecuting the case does not require disqualification for implicit bias.[3] By extension, absent a showing of actual bias, a federal petit jury may consist entirely of federal government employees without offending the right to an impartial jury.[4] A violation of a defendant's right to an impartial jury does occur, however, when the jury or any of its members is subjected to pressure or influence which could impair freedom of action; the trial judge should conduct a hearing in which the defense participates to determine whether impartiality has been undermined.[5] Exposure of the jury to possibly prejudicial material and disorderly courtroom activities may deny impartiality and require judicial inquiry.[6] Similarly, a trial court should not condone private communications, contact, or tampering with a jury, or the creation of circumstances raising the dangers thereof.[7] When the locality of the trial has been saturated with publicity about a defendant, so that it is unlikely that he can obtain a disinterested jury, he is constitutionally entitled to a change of venue.[8] Subjecting a defendant to trial in an atmosphere of actual or threatened mob domination also violates the right to an impartial jury.[9]

---

[2] Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 378 (2010).

[3] Dennis v. United States, 339 U.S. 162, 171–72 (1950); see generally United States v. Wood, 299 U.S. 123, 133 (1936) ("The bias of a prospective juror may be actual or implied; that is, it may be bias in fact or bias conclusively presumed as matter of law.").

[4] Frazier v. United States, 335 U.S. 497, 509–11 (1948) ("Government employees [are] subject, as are all other persons and in the same manner, to challenge for 'actual bias' and under all ordinary circumstances only to such challenge. In that view, absent any basis for such challenge, we do not see how a right to challenge the panel as a whole can arise from the mere fact that the jury chosen by proper procedures from a properly selected panel turns out to be composed wholly of Government employees or, a fortiori, of persons in private employment."). On common-law grounds, the Court in Crawford v. United States, 212 U.S. 183 (1909), disqualified federal employees, but the Court sustained a statute removing the disqualification because of the increasing difficulty in finding jurors in the District of Columbia in United States v. Wood, 299 U.S. 123 (1936).

[5] Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209, 215 (1982) ("This Court has long held that the remedy for allegations of juror partiality is a hearing in which the defendant has the opportunity to prove actual bias."); Remmer v. United States, 350 U.S. 377, 381–82 (1956) (granting new trial where hearing established that a juror was "disturbed and troubled" after having been offered a bribe and interviewed by the FBI about the incident).

[6] E.g., Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 350–51, 357 (1966); Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 723–24 (1961). Exposure of the jurors to knowledge about the defendant's prior criminal record and activities is not alone sufficient to establish a presumption of reversible prejudice, but on voir dire jurors should be questioned about their ability to judge impartially. Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 799–800 (1975). The Court indicated that under the same circumstances in a federal trial it may have overturned the conviction pursuant to its supervisory power. Id. at 797–98 (citing Marshall v. United States, 360 U.S. 310 (1959)) . Essentially, the defendant must make a showing of prejudice into which the court may then inquire. Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981); Smith, 455 U.S. at 215–18; Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1031–33 (1984).

[7] Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227, 229 (1954); see Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, 473–74 (1965) (placing jury in charge of two deputy sheriffs who were principal prosecution witnesses at defendant's trial denied him his right to an impartial jury); Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363, 363–65 (1966) (influence on jury by prejudiced bailiff).

[8] Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 727–28 (1961) (felony); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, 725–26 (1963) (felony); Groppi v. Wisconsin, 400 U.S. 505, 507–09 (1971) (misdemeanor). Important factors to be considered, however, include the size and characteristics of the community in which the crime occurred; whether the publicity was blatantly prejudicial; the time elapsed between the publicity and the trial; and whether the jurors' verdict supported the theory of prejudice. Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 381–84 (2010).

[9] Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309, 335 (1915) ("We, of course, agree that if a trial is in fact dominated by a mob, so that the jury is intimidated and the trial judge yields, and so that there is an actual interference with the course of justice, there is, in that court, a departure from due process of law in the proper sense of that term."); see also Sheppard, 384 U.S. at 362 (recognizing, in case where media activity inside the courtroom created a "carnival atmosphere at trial," that "[d]ue process requires that the accused receive a trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences"); Irvin, 366 U.S. at 728 ("With his life at stake, it is not requiring too much that petitioner be tried in an atmosphere undisturbed by so huge a wave of public passion and by a jury other than one in which two-thirds of the members admit, before hearing any testimony, to possessing a belief in his guilt.").

There are limits on the extent to which an inquiry can be made into whether a criminal defendant's right to a jury trial has been denied by a biased jury. The federal rules of evidence[10] and the vast majority of the states[11] forbid the "impeachment" or questioning of a verdict by inquiring into the internal deliberations of the jury—a rule of evidence that originated in English common law.[12] This "no impeachment" rule, which aims to promote "full and vigorous discussion" by jurors and to preserve the "stability" of jury verdicts, has limited the ability of criminal defendants to argue in post-conviction proceedings that a jury's internal deliberations demonstrated bias amounting to a deprivation of the right to a jury trial.[13] Indeed, the Court has held that the Sixth Amendment justifies an exception to the no impeachment rule in only the "gravest and most important cases."[14] As a result, the Court has rejected a Sixth Amendment exception to the rule when evidence existed that jurors were under the influence of alcohol and drugs during the trial.[15] In the Court's view, three safeguards—(1) the voir dire (jury selection) process, (2) the ability for the court and counsel to observe the jury during trial, and (3) the potential for jurors to report untoward behavior to the court before rendering a verdict—adequately protect Sixth Amendment interests while preserving the values underlying the no impeachment rule.[16]

In Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado, the Court for the first time recognized a Sixth Amendment exception to the no impeachment rule.[17] In that case, a criminal defendant contended that his conviction by a Colorado jury for harassment and unlawful sexual contact should be overturned on constitutional grounds because evidence from two jurors revealed that a fellow juror had expressed anti-Hispanic bias toward the petitioner and his alibi witness during deliberations.[18] The Court agreed, concluding that where a juror makes a "clear statement" indicating that he relied on "racial stereotypes or animus to convict a criminal defendant, the Sixth Amendment requires that the no-impeachment rule give way . . . ."[19] In so holding, the Court emphasized the "imperative to purge racial prejudice from the administration of justice" that underlies the Fourteenth Amendment, which, in turn, makes the Sixth Amendment applicable to the states.[20] Contrasting the instant case from earlier rulings that involved "anomalous behavior from a single jury—or juror—gone off course,"[21] the Court noted that racial bias in the judicial system was a "familiar and recurring evil"[22] that required the [10] See FED. R. Evid. 606(b)(1) ("During an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify about any statement made or incident that occurred during the jury's deliberations; the effect of anything on that juror's or another juror's vote; or any juror's mental processes concerning the verdict or indictment.").

[11] See Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, No. 15–606, slip op. at 9 (U.S. May 6, 2017) (noting that 42 jurisdictions follow the federal rule).

[12] Id. at 2. The no-impeachment rule does have three central exceptions, allowing a juror to testify about (1) extraneous prejudicial information improperly brought to the jury's attention; (2) outside influences brought to bear on any juror; and (3) a mistake made in entering the verdict on the verdict form. See FED. R. Evid. 606(b)(2); Peña-Rodriguez, slip op. at 7–9.

[13] See Peña-Rodriguez, slip op. at 9.

[14] Id. at 8 (quoting McDonald v. Pless, 238 U.S. 264, 269 (1915)).

[15] See Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107, 127 (1987); see also Warger v. Shauers, 574 U.S. 40, 44–45 (2014) (holding, in a civil case, that the no-impeachment rule barred the introduction of evidence that a juror lied during jury selection about bias against one party).

[16] See Tanner, 483 U.S. at 127. In addition, while the no-impeachment rule, by its very nature, prohibits testimony by jurors, evidence of misconduct other than juror testimony can be used to impeach the verdict. Id.

[17] See Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, No. 15–606, slip op. (U.S. May 6, 2017).

[18] Id at 3.

[19] Id. at 17.

[20] Id. at 13.

[21] Id. at 15.

[22] Id.

judiciary to prevent "systemic injury to the administration of justice."[23] Moreover, the Court emphasized "pragmatic" rationales for its holding, noting that other checks on jury bias would be unlikely to reveal racial bias.[24]

Amdt6.4.5.3 Death Penalty and Requirement of Impartial Jury

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Inquiries into jury bias have arisen in the context of the imposition of the death penalty. In Witherspoon v. Illinois,[1] the Court held that the exclusion in capital cases of jurors conscientiously opposed to capital punishment, without inquiring whether they could consider the imposition of the death penalty in the appropriate case, violated a defendant's constitutional right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court stated: "A man who opposes the death penalty, no less than one who favors it, can make the discretionary judgment entrusted to him by the State and can thus obey the oath he takes as a juror."[2] A jury, the Court further wrote, must "express the conscience of the community on the ultimate question of life or death," and the automatic exclusion of all with generalized objections to the death penalty "stacked the deck" and made of the jury a tribunal "organized to return a verdict of death."[3] The Court has also held that a court may not refuse a defendant's request to examine potential jurors to determine whether they would vote automatically to impose the death penalty; general questions about fairness and willingness to follow the law are inadequate.[4]

In Wainwright v. Witt, the Court held that the proper standard for exclusion is "whether the juror's views would 'prevent or substantially impair the performance of his duties as a juror in accordance with his instructions and his oath.'"[5] Thus, to be excluded, a juror need not indicate that he would "automatic[ally]" vote against the death penalty, nor need his "bias be proved with 'unmistakable clarity.'"[6] Instead, a juror may be excused for cause "where the trial judge is left with the definite impression that a prospective juror would be unable to faithfully

---

[23] Id. at 16.

[24] Id. ("[T]his Court has noted the dilemma faced by trial court judges and counsel in deciding whether to explore potential racial bias at voir dire . . . The stigma that attends racial bias may make it difficult for a juror to report inappropriate statements during the court of juror deliberations.").

[1] 391 U.S. 510 (1968).

[2] Id. at 519.

[3] Id. at 519, 521, 523. The Court thought the problem went only to the issue of the sentence imposed and saw no evidence that a jury from which death-scrupled persons had been excluded was more prone to convict than were juries on which such person sat. Id. at 517–18; cf. Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543, 545 (1968). Witherspoon was given added significance when, in Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976), and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976), the Court held mandatory death sentences unconstitutional and ruled that the jury as a representative of community mores must make the determination as guided by legislative standards. See also Adams v. Texas, 448 U.S. 38 (1980) (holding Witherspoon applicable to bifurcated capital sentencing procedures and voiding a statute permitting exclusion of any juror unable to swear that the existence of the death penalty would not affect his deliberations on any issue of fact).

[4] Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 734–36 (1992).

[5] 469 U.S. 412, 424 (1985) (quoting Adams v. Texas, 448 U.S. 38, 45 (1980)).

[6] 469 U.S. at 424; see also Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168 (1986) (appropriateness of exclusion should be determined by context, such as excluded juror's understanding based on previous questioning of other jurors).

and impartially apply the law."[7] Persons properly excludable under Witherspoon may also be excluded from the guilt/innocence phase of a bifurcated capital trial.[8] It had been argued that to exclude such persons from the guilt/innocence phase would result in a jury somewhat more predisposed to convict, and that this would deny the defendant a jury chosen from a fair cross-section. The Court rejected this argument, concluding that "it is simply not possible to define jury impartiality . . . by reference to some hypothetical mix of individual viewpoints."[9] Moreover, the Court noted, the state has an "entirely proper interest in obtaining a single jury that could impartially decide all of the issues in [a] case," and need not select separate panels and duplicate evidence for the two distinct but interrelated functions.[10] For the same reasons, the Court has held that there is no violation of the right to an impartial jury if a defendant for whom capital charges have been dropped is tried, along with a codefendant still facing capital charges, before a "death qualified" jury.[11]

In Uttecht v. Brown,[12] the Court summed up four principles that it derived from Witherspoon and Witt:

> First a criminal defendant has the right to an impartial jury drawn from a venire that has not been tilted in favor of capital punishment by selective prosecutorial challenges for cause. Second, the State has a strong interest in having jurors who are able to apply capital punishment within the framework state law prescribes. Third, to balance these interests, a juror who is substantially impaired in his or her ability to impose the death penalty under the state-law framework can be excused for cause; but if the juror is not substantially impaired, removal for cause is impermissible. Fourth, in determining whether the removal of a potential juror would vindicate the State's interest without violating the defendant's right, the trial court makes a judgment based in part on the demeanor of the juror, a judgment owed deference by reviewing courts.[13]

Exclusion of one juror qualified under Witherspoon constitutes reversible error, and the exclusion is not subject to harmless error analysis.[14] However, a court's error in refusing to dismiss for cause a prospective juror prejudiced in favor of the death penalty does not deprive a defendant of his right to trial by an impartial jury if he is able to exclude the juror through exercise of a peremptory challenge.[15] The relevant inquiry "must focus . . . on the jurors who ultimately sat," the Court declared, declining to extend the rule from cases concerning the

---

[7] Witt, 469 U.S. at 425–26.

[8] Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 165 (1986).

[9] Id. at 183.

[10] Id. at 180.

[11] Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402, 420 (1987).

[12] 551 U.S. 1 (2007).

[13] Id. at 9 (citations omitted). In Uttecht, the Court reasoned that deference was owed to trial courts because the lower court is in a "superior position to determine the demeanor and qualifications of a potential juror." See id. at 22. In White v. Wheeler, the Court recognized that a trial judge's decision to excuse a prospective juror in a death penalty case was entitled to deference even when the judge does not make the decision to excuse the juror contemporaneously with jury selection (voir dire). See 577 U.S. 73, 78–80 (2015) (per curiam). The Court explained that the deference due under Uttecht to a trial judge's decision was not limited to the judge's evaluation of a juror's demeanor, but extended to a trial judge's consideration of "the substance of a juror's response." See id. at 80. When a trial judge "chooses to reflect and deliberate" over the record regarding whether to excuse a juror for a day following the questioning of the prospective juror, that judge's decision should be "commended" and is entitled to substantial deference. See id.

[14] Gray v. Mississippi, 481 U.S. 648, 668 (1987) ("Because the Witherspoon-Witt standard is rooted in the constitutional right to an impartial jury, and because the impartiality of the adjudicator goes to the very integrity of the legal system, the Chapman harmless-error analysis cannot apply.") (citation omitted).

[15] Ross v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 81, 88 (1987) ("[W]e reject the notion that the loss of a peremptory challenge constitutes a violation of the constitutional right to an impartial jury. . . . So long as the jury that sits is impartial, the erroneous exclusion of jurors opposed to the death penalty that the focus instead should be on "'whether the composition of the jury panel as a whole could have been affected by the trial court's error.'"[16]

Amdt6.4.5.4 Voir Dire and Peremptory Challenges

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

It is the function of voir dire to give the defense and the prosecution the opportunity to inquire into, or have the trial judge inquire into, possible grounds of bias or prejudice that potential jurors may have, and to acquaint the parties with the potential jurors.[1] Not every opinion which a juror may entertain about a case necessarily disqualifies him.[2] The judge must determine "whether the nature and strength of the opinion . . . raise the presumption of partiality."[3] It suffices for the judge to question potential jurors about their ability to put aside what they had heard or read about the case, listen to the evidence with an open mind, and render an impartial verdict; the judge's refusal to go further and question jurors about the contents of news reports to which they had been exposed does not violate the right to an impartial jury.[4]

Under some circumstances, the Constitution may require the trial court to ask jurors whether they harbor racial bias, although the Supreme Court has sometimes grounded this requirement in "the essential fairness required by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment" rather than in the right to an impartial jury specifically.[5] Thus, in a situation in which a Black defendant alleged that he was being prosecuted on false charges because of his civil rights activities, the Court held that due process required the trial court to ask prospective jurors about racial prejudice. A similar rule applies in some capital trials, where the risk of racial prejudice "is especially serious in light of the complete finality of the death sentence."[6] The right to an impartial jury entitles a defendant accused of an interracial capital offense to have prospective jurors informed of the victim's race and questioned as to racial bias.[7] But in circumstances not suggesting a significant likelihood of racial prejudice infecting fact that the defendant had to use a peremptory challenge to achieve that result does not mean the Sixth Amendment was violated."); see also United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 528 U.S. 304, 308 (2000) (applying the same principle in a federal criminal case).

---

[16] 487 U.S. at 86, 87 (quoting and distinguishing Gray, 481 U.S. at 665 (emphasis in original)).

[1] See Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182, 188 (1981); Pointer v. United States, 151 U.S. 396, 408–09 (1894); Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370, 377 (1892).

[2] Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510, 520–21, 522 n.21 (1968).

[3] Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 155 (1879); see Witherspoon, 391 U.S. at 520–21, 522 n.21.

[4] Mu'Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415, 431–32 (1991).

[5] Ham v. South Carolina, 409 U.S. 524, 527 (1973).

[6] Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28, 35 (1986).

[7] Id. at 36–37.

a trial, as when the facts are merely that the defendant is Black and the victim White in a non-capital case, the Constitution is satisfied by a more generalized but thorough inquiry into impartiality.[8]

Although the government is not constitutionally obligated to allow peremptory challenges,[9] criminal trials typically provide for a system of peremptory challenges in which both prosecution and defense may, without stating any reason, excuse a certain number of prospective jurors.[10] Although racially discriminatory use of peremptory challenges violates the Equal Protection Clause under the standard of proof set forth in Batson v. Kentucky,[11] it does not violate the Sixth Amendment, the Court ruled in Holland v. Illinois.[12] The Sixth Amendment "no more forbids the prosecutor to strike jurors on the basis of race than it forbids him to strike them on the basis of innumerable other generalized characteristics."[13] To rule otherwise, the Court reasoned, "would cripple the device of peremptory challenge" and thereby undermine the Amendment's goal of "impartiality with respect to both contestants."[14]

Amdt6.4.6 Right to Local Jury

Amdt6.4.6.1 Historical Background on Local Jury Requirement

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Article III, § 2 requires that federal criminal cases be tried by jury in the state in which the offense was committed,[1] but much criticism arose over the absence of any guarantee in the [8] Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589, 597 (1976); see Turner, 476 U.S. at 33 ("[U]nder Ristaino, the mere fact that petitioner is black and his victim white does not constitute a 'special circumstance' of constitutional proportions. What sets this case apart from Ristaino, however, is that in addition to petitioner's being accused of a crime against a white victim, the crime charged was a capital offense."). In Ristaino, the Court noted that under its supervisory power it would require a federal court faced with the same circumstances to propound appropriate questions to identify racial prejudice if requested by the defendant. Ristaino, 424 U.S. at 597 n.9; see Aldridge v. United States, 283 U.S. 308, 311 (1931). But see Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981), in which the trial judge refused a defense request to inquire about possible bias against Mexicans. A plurality apparently adopted a rule that, all else being equal, the judge should necessarily inquire about racial or ethnic prejudice only in cases of violent crimes in which the defendant and victim are members of different racial or ethnic groups, id. at 192, a rule rejected by two concurring Justices. Id. at 194. Three dissenting Justices thought the judge must always ask when defendant so requested. Id. at 195.

[9] The Supreme Court stated: "This Court has long recognized that peremptory challenges are not of federal constitutional dimension." Rivera v. Illinois, 556 U.S. 148, 151–52 (2009) (internal quotation marks omitted) (state trial court's erroneous denial of a defendant's peremptory challenge does not warrant reversal of conviction if all seated jurors were qualified and unbiased).

[10] United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 528 U.S. 304, 311–12 (2000); cf. Stilson v. United States, 250 U.S. 583, 586 (1919) (holding that it is no violation of the guarantee of jury impartiality to limit the number of peremptory challenges to each defendant in a multi-party trial).

[11] 76 U.S. 79 (1986); see Amdt14.S1.8.1.8 Peremptory Challenges.

[12] 493 U.S. 474 (1990).

[13] Id. at 487.

[14] Id. at 484.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2 ("The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by law have directed.") original Constitution that the jury be drawn from the "vicinage" or neighborhood of the crime.[2] James Madison's efforts to write into the Bill of Rights an express vicinage provision were rebuffed by the Senate, and the present language was adopted as a compromise.[3]

Amdt6.4.6.2 Local Juries and Vicinage Requirement

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

To date, the Supreme Court has applied the Sixth Amendment right to a trial before a jury of "the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law"—known as the vicinage requirement[1]—in federal prosecutions only.[2] The Court has not considered whether the requirement applies to state-level prosecutions via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[3]

Under the vicinage requirement, the "location of the commission of the criminal acts" determines the propriety of the trial venue.[4] The defendant cannot be tried in a federal district if the charged offense was not committed there.[5] Thus, a defendant could not be tried in Missouri for money-laundering when the financial transactions that constituted the charged offenses occurred entirely in Florida.[6] Although the drug trafficking activity that generated the illicit funds occurred in Missouri, the defendant was charged only in connection with the money laundering, and venue was therefore proper only in Florida.[7]

If the charged criminal acts occur in multiple districts, the trial may occur in any one of those districts.[8] In a prosecution for conspiracy, the accused may be tried in the district where

---

[2] Francis H. Heller, The Sixth Amendment 25–26 (1951); see Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 93 n.35 (1970) ("'[V]icinage' means neighborhood, and 'vicinage of the jury' meant jury of the neighborhood or, in medieval England, jury of the county.").

[3] Williams, 399 U.S. at 96 (explaining that, in the final version of the Sixth Amendment, "the 'vicinage' requirement itself had been replaced by wording that reflected a compromise between broad and narrow definitions of that term, and that left Congress the power to determine the actual size of the 'vicinage' by its creation of judicial districts.")

[1] See Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 93 n.35 (1970) ("'[V]icinage' means neighborhood, and 'vicinage of the jury' meant jury of the neighborhood or, in medieval England, jury of the county.").

[2] See, e.g. United States v. Cabrales, 524 U.S. 1, 6 (1998); Johnston v. United States, 351 U.S. 215, 220–21 (1956); see generally 1 Wayne R. LaFave et al., Criminal Procedure § 2.6(b) (4th ed. 2015) (explaining that Supreme Court precedent has not "addressed the incorporation of the Sixth Amendment's vicinage requirements" and reviewing various strains of lower court caselaw on the issue).

[3] See Stevenson v. Lewis, 384 F.3d 1069, 1071 (9th Cir. 2004); LaFave, supra note 2, at § 2.6(b); cf. Nashville, Chicago & St. Louis Ry. v. Alabama, 128 U.S. 96, 101 (1888) (holding that the Article III, § 2 provision requiring that a criminal jury trial "shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed" applies only in federal courts).

[4] United States v. Rodriguez-Moreno, 526 U.S. 275, 279 (1999); Cabrales, 524 U.S. at 6–7; United States v. Cores, 356 U.S. 405, 407 (1958); Johnston v. United States, 351 U.S. 215 (1956).

[5] Salinger v. Loisel, 265 U.S. 224, 232 (1924).

[6] Cabrales, 524 U.S. at 3–4.

[7] Id. at 7.

[8] Rodriguez-Moreno, 526 U.S. at 281–82; United States v. Lombardo, 241 U.S. 73, 77 (1916) ("Undoubtedly where a crime consists of distinct parts which have different localities the whole may be tried where any part can be proved to have been done . . . ."); Palliser v. United States, 136 U.S. 257, 266 (1890) ("Where a crime is committed partly in one the conspiracy was formed[9] or, more broadly, in any district where the accused or a co-conspirator carried out an overt act.[10] The offense of obtaining transportation of property in interstate commerce at less than the carrier's published rates may be tried in any district through which the forbidden transportation is conducted.[11] Similarly, where an offense consists of sending illicit material through the mail, the Sixth Amendment permits the trial to take place in any district through which the material passes, although for policy reasons Congress may limit this range of permissible venues by statute.[12]

The Sixth Amendment does not entitle the accused to a preliminary hearing before being removed for trial to the federal district in which the charged offenses are alleged to have occurred.[13] The assignment of a district judge from one district to another, pursuant to statute, does not violate the vicinage requirement—that is, such assignment does not create a new judicial district whose boundaries are undefined or subject the accused to trial in a district not established when the offense with which he is charged was committed.[14]

For offenses against federal laws not committed within any state, Congress has the sole power to prescribe the place of trial; such an offense is not local and may be tried at such place as Congress may designate.[15] The place of trial may be designated by statute after the offense has been committed.[16]

Amdt6.4.7 Notice of Accusation

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment right to be "informed of the nature and cause of the accusation" guarantees criminal defendants "adequate notice of the charges against [them]."[1] To satisfy district and partly in another it must, in order to prevent an absolute failure of justice, be tried in either district, or in that one which the legislature may designate . . . ."); see also Hagner v. United States, 285 U.S. 427, 429 (1932) (reasoning that offense of scheming to defraud a corporation by mail is committed both in the place where the letter is mailed and, by virtue of a delivery presumption, also in the place to which the letter is addressed).

---

[9] Burton v. United States, 202 U.S. 344, 388–89 (1906).

[10] United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 252–53 (1940); Brown v. Elliott, 225 U.S. 392, 401–02 (1912); Hyde v. United States, 225 U.S. 347, 367 (1912); Haas v. Henkel, 216 U.S. 462, 474 (1910).

[11] Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 209 U.S. 56, 76–77 (1908).

[12] United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 273, 274 (1944) ("Congress may constitutionally make the practices which led to the Federal Denture Act triable in any federal district through which an offending denture is transported.").

[13] United States ex rel. Hughes v. Gault, 271 U.S. 142, 149 (1926); see also Beavers v. Henkel, 194 U.S. 73, 84–85 (1904) (reasoning that the sufficiency of an indictment may be challenged in the trial venue but generally not prior to removal to that venue); cf. Tinsley v. Treat, 205 U.S. 20 (1907) (distinguishing Beavers and holding that the federal removal statute entitled the accused to at least offer evidence as to lack of probable cause).

[14] Lamar v. United States, 241 U.S. 103, 117–118 (1916).

[15] Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 211 (1890); United States v. Dawson, 56 U.S. (15 How.) 467, 488 (1853).

[16] Cook v. United States, 138 U.S. 157, 181–83 (1891) (holding that retroactive designation of the trial venue for a crime committed in federal territory did not violate the Sixth Amendment vicinage requirement, the Article III jury trial provision, or the ex post facto clause).

[1] Lopez v. Smith, 574 U.S. 1, 5–6 (2014). Principles of procedural due process also guarantee the accused's right to notice of the charges. Id. at 4 (referring to the accused's "Sixth Amendment and due process right to notice"); see Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196, 201 (1948) ("No principle of procedural due process is more clearly established than that the Sixth Amendment requirement, the notice that the government provides must be specific enough to enable the defendant to prepare a defense and to protect himself or herself after judgment against a subsequent prosecution on the same charge.[2] Thus, in the prosecution of a witness for the crime of refusing to answer the questions of a congressional subcommittee about a topic that the subcommittee was investigating, the government violated the Sixth Amendment right by failing to identify the topic of the investigation.[3] Because criminal liability could attach only if the questions that the witness refused to answer related to the topic of the congressional investigation, the Court reasoned that the prosecution's failure to identify the topic left the "chief issue undefined" and therefore violated the defendant's right to know "the nature of the accusation against him."[4]

The Court has cautioned, however, that its limited precedents interpreting this constitutional provision "stand for nothing more than the general proposition" that the government must notify the defendant of the nature of the charges.[5] The Court has not established "specific rule[s]" about how this notice requirement applies in practice.[6] For example, it has not resolved whether a prosecutorial decision to switch theories of liability towards the end of trial vitiates otherwise adequate notice provided in the pleadings.[7] Federal and state rules of criminal procedure contain more detailed notice requirements.[8] The Sixth Amendment right to notice of accusation applies to the states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[9]

Amdt6.5 Confrontation Clause

Amdt6.5.1 Early Confrontation Clause Cases

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the notice of the specific charge, and a chance to be heard in a trial of the issues raised by that charge, if desired, are among the constitutional rights of every accused in a criminal proceeding in all courts, state or federal.").

[2] Bartell v. United States, 227 U.S. 427, 431 (1913) ("It is elementary that an indictment, in order to be good under the Federal Constitution and laws, shall advise the accused of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, in order that he may meet the accusation and prepare for his trial, and that, after judgment, he may be able to plead the record and judgment in bar of further prosecution for the same offense."); Burton v. United States, 202 U.S. 344, 372 (1906); United States v. Simmons, 96 U.S. 360, 362 (1878); United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 544, 558 (1876); cf. United States v. Van Duzee, 140 U.S. 169, 173 (reasoning that the Sixth Amendment does not require the government to proactively give a copy of the indictment to the accused, because the accused may always request a copy from the court at government expense and often "the defendant does not desire a copy, or pleads guilty to the indictment upon its being read to him; and in such cases there in no propriety in forcing a copy upon him and charging the government with the expense").

[3] Russell v. United State, 369 U.S. 749, 766 (1962).

[4] Id. at 767–68.

[5] Lopez, 574 U.S. at 5–6.

[6] Id. at 6.

[7] Id.

[8] See Fed. R. Crim. P. 7(c) (governing the "nature and contents" of charging documents in federal criminal cases); 5 Wayne R. LaFave et al., Criminal Procedure § 19.2(c) (4th ed. 2020) (discussing notice requirements imposed by Rule 7 and counterpart state provisions that are more robust than Sixth Amendment requirements).

[9] See Gannett Company, Inc. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 379 (1979) ("The Sixth Amendment, applicable to the States through the Fourteenth, surrounds a criminal trial with guarantees such as the rights to notice, confrontation, and compulsory process that have as their overriding purpose the protection of the accused from prosecutorial and judicial abuses."); Lopez, 574 U.S. at 5–6 (analyzing Sixth Amendment notice claim on collateral review of state court conviction).

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment guarantees a criminal defendant the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him." The Clause's "primary object[ive] . . . was to prevent depositions or ex parte affidavits . . . being used against" the defendant, giving the defendant the opportunity of "testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness."[1] Although the Supreme Court has long recognized this Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses in criminal proceedings as "[o]ne of the fundamental guaranties of life and liberty,"[2] until 1965, the Court construed the right as limited to federal court proceedings.[3] As a result, in its early doctrine, the Court rejected Confrontation Clause challenges to state court proceedings.[4]

The Confrontation Clause's text, which grants the accused a right to confront the "witnesses against" him, generally is addressed to individuals who give formal testimony or its functional equivalent in a criminal proceeding.[5] The Court held that the purpose of the Sixth Amendment was "to continue and preserve" a common-law right of confrontation "having recognized exceptions."[6] For example, the Court in Kirby v. United States described the operation of the Clause as mandating that "a fact which can be primarily established only by witnesses" must allow the defendant to confront those witnesses "at the trial, upon whom he can look while being tried, whom he is entitled to cross-examine, and whose testimony he may impeach in every mode authorized by the established rules governing the trial or conduct of criminal cases."[7] Similarly, in 1911, the Court interpreted the Confrontation Clause as intended "to secure the accused the right to be tried, so far as facts provable by witnesses are concerned, by only such witnesses as meet him face to face at the trial, who give their testimony in his presence, and give to the accused an opportunity of cross-examination."[8]

In a number of early cases, the Court examined the reach and limits of the Confrontation Clause in challenges to federal court proceedings. For example, in Delaney v. United States,[9] the Court considered the relationship between the Confrontation Clause and the rule against hearsay evidence[10] out-of-court statements offered at trial in support of the matter they

---

[1] Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 242 (1895).

[2] Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55 (1899).

[3] See Stein v. People of State of New York, 346 U.S. 156, 195 (1953), overruled in part by Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964) (rejecting argument that right to confront witnesses is incorporated against the states via the Fourteenth Amendment); West v. State of Louisiana, 194 U.S. 258, 261–62 (1904), overruled in part by Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965) ("As to the Federal Constitution, it will be observed that there is no specific provision therein which makes it necessary in a state court that the defendant should be confronted with the witnesses against him in criminal trials. The 6th Amendment does not apply to proceedings in state courts."). In 1965, the Supreme Court overturned this rule and held that the Confrontation Clause also applies in the context of state criminal proceedings (as discussed later). Pointer, 380 U.S. at 403.

[4] E.g., Stein, 346 U.S. at 195; West, 194 U.S. at 261–62.

[5] See, e.g., Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1016 (1988) ("We have never doubted . . . that the Confrontation Clause guarantees the defendant a face-to-face meeting with witnesses appearing before the trier of fact.").

[6] Salinger v. United States, 272 U.S. 542, 548 (1926).

[7] Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55 (1899).

[8] Dowdell v. United States, 221 U.S. 325, 330 (1911)

[9] 263 U.S. 586 (1924).

[10] Id. at 590. In its early doctrine, the Court sometimes examined the admissibility of out of court statements without expressly deciding whether they amounted to "hearsay." S. Ry. v. Gray, 241 U.S. 333, 337 (1916) (evaluating admissibility of prior contradictory statements); Hickory v. United States, 151 U.S. 303, 309 (1894) (similar).

assert.[11] The Delaney Court concluded that the co-conspirator exception to the hearsay ban-which permits the admission of the acts or statement of one conspirator against a codefendant if made "during and in furtherance of the conspiracy"[12]-was consistent with the Confrontation Clause and allowed for the admission of a dead co-conspirator's out-of-court statement.[13]

The Court recognized a number of other exceptions to the Confrontation Clause in its early doctrine. For instance, the Court concluded that the right to confront witnesses does not bar the admission of dying declarations[14]-out-of-court statements by a declarant "made under a sense of impending death."[15] In addition, the Court held that an accused forfeits the right to confront witnesses who are "absent by his own wrongful procurement" and "which he has kept away."[16] However, according to the Court, if the witness was absent due "to the negligence of the prosecution," then the Confrontation Clause prohibited the admission of "the deposition or statement of" that "absent witness."[17]

Other early cases involved the extent to which the Confrontation Clause barred the use of information from one proceeding in a separate proceeding. For instance, in an 1899 opinion, the Court concluded that the Confrontation Clause bars the admission of the conviction of a defendant in one proceeding against a different defendant in a separate proceeding when used to establish material facts.[18]

---

[11] See Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 442–43 (1949) (describing as hearsay "an unsworn, out-of-court declaration of petitioner's guilt"); Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 153–54 (1945) (holding that out-of-court statements offered as substantive evidence were hearsay and therefore inadmissible); accord Hearsay, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) ("In federal law, a statement (either a verbal assertion or nonverbal assertive conduct), other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.").

[12] Coconspirators Exception, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[13] Delaney, 263 U.S. at 590. In subsequent cases, the Court further outlined the co-conspirator exception. See Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604, 617–18 (1953) (concluding that co-conspirator hearsay exception does not apply to statements made after conspiracy concludes); Krulewitch, 336 U.S. at 442–43 (determining that "hearsay declaration attributed to the alleged co-conspirator was not admissible on the theory that it was made in furtherance of the alleged criminal transportation undertaking" where conspiracy had ended when statement was made). These subsequent cases generally arose not as Confrontation Clause questions, but rather evidentiary determinations regarding hearsay. See Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. at 617–18; Krulewitch, 336 U.S. at 442–43; see also Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 82 (1970) (plurality opinion) (explaining how the federal hearsay exception for coconspirator statements derived from the Court's "exercise of its rule-making power in the area of the federal law of evidence").

[14] Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 61 (1899); Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243–44 (1895); see also Snyder v. Com. of Mass., 291 U.S. 97, 107 (1934) ("[T]he privilege of confrontation [has not] at any time been without recognized exceptions, as, for instance, dying declarations."); Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 282 (1897) ("[T]he provision that an accused person shall be confronted with the witnesses against him [does not] prevent the admission of dying declarations, or the depositions of witnesses who have died since the former trial.").

[15] Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140, 151 (1892).

[16] Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 158 (1878). Elsewhere, the Court noted that the right to confrontation does not prohibit the admission of "the notes of testimony of [a] deceased witness," at least where "the accused has had the right of cross-examination in a former trial." Dowdell v. United States, 221 U.S. 325, 330 (1911). According to the Court, "[t]o say that a criminal, after having once been convicted by the testimony of a certain witness, should go scot free simply because death has closed the mouth of that witness, would be carrying his constitutional protection to an unwarrantable extent." Mattox, 156 U.S. at 243.

[17] Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458, 474 (1900).

[18] Kirby, 174 U.S. at 55. However, early Confrontation Clause doctrine suggested that the admission of information from one proceeding in a separate proceeding will not always violate the right to confront witnesses. See Dowdell, 221 U.S. at 330–31 (considering the right to confront witnesses under the Constitution of the Philippines and concluding that an appellate court did not infringe on that right by requiring lower courts to certify "certain facts regarding the course" of the underlying trial when that certification is not testimony concerning the defendant's culpability).

Amdt6.5.2 Confrontation Clause Cases During the 1960s through 1990s

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In 1965, the Supreme Court broke from its early doctrine limiting Confrontation Clause protections to federal court proceedings and held that the right to confrontation is "fundamental" and "made obligatory on the States by the Fourteenth Amendment."[1] Alongside that pronouncement, and in the years immediately following, the Court's opinions further discussed the relationship between the confrontation right and the bar on hearsay evidence.[2] The Court seemingly associated the two concepts, concluding that a key purpose of the right to confrontation is to give criminal defendants "an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses against him," absent an applicable hearsay exception.[3] In Pointer v. Texas,[4] the Court rejected the admission of testimony from a prior preliminary hearing on confrontation grounds, because no exception to the hearsay rule applied, and the testimony was taken in circumstances insufficient to secure "an adequate opportunity to cross-examine" the witness through counsel.[5] The Court further emphasized the importance of cross examination in satisfying the confrontation right in Douglas v. Alabama,[6] concluding that the Confrontation Clause barred the admission of the confession of an alleged accomplice who invoked his Fifth Amendment right to avoid self-incrimination, leaving the defendant unable to "cross-examine [the witness] as to the alleged confession."[7] Three years later, cross-examination was again

---

[1] Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 403 (1965).

[2] Hearsay is "a statement (either a verbal assertion or nonverbal assertive conduct), other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted." Hearsay, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019)

[3] See Pointer, 380 U.S. at 406–07 (explaining that although the confrontation right generally requires cross-examination, there are recognized exceptions such as dying declarations and "testimony of a deceased witness who has testified at a former trial").

[4] 380 U.S. 400, 403 (1965).

[5] Id. at 407.

[6] 380 U.S. 415 (1965).

[7] Id. at 419–20; see also Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 52 (1987) (plurality opinion) ("The opinions of this Court show that the right to confrontation is a trial right, designed to prevent improper restrictions on the types of questions that defense counsel may ask during cross-examination."); Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719, 725 (1968) ("The right to confrontation is basically a trial right. It includes both the opportunity to cross-examine and the occasion for the jury to weigh the demeanor of the witness."). The Court has given weight to the importance of cross-examination for confrontation purposes in a number of other opinions. See Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679 (1986) ("By thus cutting off all questioning about an event that the State conceded had taken place and that a jury might reasonably have found furnished the witness a motive for favoring the prosecution in his testimony, the court's ruling violated respondent's rights secured by the Confrontation Clause."); Mancusi v. Stubbs, 408 U.S. 204, 216 (1972) ("Since there was an adequate opportunity to cross-examine [the witness] at the first trial, and counsel . . . availed himself of that opportunity, the transcript of [the witness'] testimony in the first trial bore sufficient 'indicia of reliability' and afforded 'the trier of fact a satisfactory basis for evaluating the truth of the prior statement.'" (quoting Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 89 (1970) (plurality opinion)); Smith v. State of Illinois, 390 U.S. 129, 131 (1968) (concluding that trial court's refusal to permit defendant to cross-examine the "principal prosecution witness" on "either his name or where he lived" was "effectively to emasculate the right of cross-examination itself"). Notably, the Supreme Court has also observed the importance of cross-examination in the context of Constitutional due process rights. See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973) (holding that a defendant's due process rights had been integral to the Court's Confrontation Clause analysis in Bruton v. United States.[8] In Bruton, the Court concluded that the Confrontation Clause barred the admission of the confession of a non-testifying co-defendant in a joint jury trial, where that confession implicated another defendant.[9] According to the Court, introduction of that confession added "substantial, perhaps even critical, weight to the Government's case in a form not subject to cross-examination."[10]

In 1970, the Court again reexamined the relationship between the Confrontation Clause and the hearsay rule, holding that they "are generally designed to protect similar values," but that the "overlap is [not] complete" and that the Confrontation Clause is more "than a codification of the rules of hearsay and their exceptions as they existed historically at common law."[11] According to the Court, the Confrontation Clause may be violated even when the hearsay rule is not and, conversely, "evidence . . . admitted in violation of a long-established hearsay rule does not lead to the automatic conclusion that confrontation rights have been denied."[12] Thus, in California v. Green,[13] the Court held that the admission of prior statements made by a witness while in custody and in a preliminary hearing did not violate a defendant's confrontation rights, even though the statements would have been hearsay in some jurisdictions.[14] The Court reasoned that the witness was available for "full cross-examination violated where his ability to cross-examine witnesses on key points had been barred by state hearsay and common-law trial rules); In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 259 (1948); Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687, 691 (1931) ("Cross-examination of a witness is a matter of right.").

---

[8] 391 U.S. 123 (1968).

[9] Id. In a subsequent opinion, the Court held that Bruton applies retroactively. Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293, 293 (1968) (per curiam). Depending on the details, the Court has reached different outcomes on the extent to which redacted codefendant confessions violate Bruton. Compare Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200, 211 (1987) ("We hold that the Confrontation Clause is not violated by the admission of a nontestifying codefendant's confession with a proper limiting instruction when, as here, the confession is redacted to eliminate not only the defendant's name, but any reference to his or her existence."), with Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185, 188 (1998) (holding that "Bruton's protective rule" applied where the prosecution "redacted the codefendant's confession by substituting for the defendant's name in the confession a blank space or the word 'deleted.'").

[10] Bruton, 391 U.S. at 128 (emphasis added); see also Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186, 193 (1987), abrogating Parker v. Randolph, 442 U.S. 62 (1979)("We hold that, where a nontestifying codefendant's confession incriminating the defendant is not directly admissible against the defendant" the "Confrontation Clause bars its admission at their joint trial, even if the jury is instructed not to consider it against the defendant, and even if the defendant's own confession is admitted against him"); Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 539 (1986) (concluding that "confession of an accomplice" "was presumptively unreliable and . . . did not bear sufficient independent 'indicia of reliability' to overcome that presumption"); but see Tennessee v. Street, 471 U.S. 409, 410 (1985) (holding that admission of accomplice confession was permissible for "the nonhearsay purpose of rebutting respondent's testimony that his own confession was coercively derived from the accomplice's statement"); Nelson v. O'Neil, 402 U.S. 622, 629–30 (1971) ("We conclude that where a codefendant takes the stand in his own defense, denies making an alleged out-of-court statement implicating the defendant, and proceeds to testify favorably to the defendant concerning the underlying facts, the defendant has been denied no rights protected by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments."). In some cases, the Court concluded that Bruton violations amounted to harmless error where other evidence of guilt was overwhelming. See Schneble v. Fla., 405 U.S. 427, 432 (1972); Harrington v. California, 395 U.S. 250, 254 (1969). Under current doctrine, the confession of a non-testifying co-defendant "in a jury trial" may still be inadmissible on confrontation grounds in federal courts "if it implicates the defendant." United States v. King, 910 F.3d 320, 328 (7th Cir. 2018). However, pursuant to subsequent Supreme Court doctrine, as a threshold matter the confession must be testimonial in nature before its admission implicates the Confrontation Clause. Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 51 (2004); accord United States v. Dale, 614 F.3d 942, 956 (8th Cir. 2010) (holding that the "out-of-court statement of a co-defendant made unknowingly to a government agent is not 'testimonial'" and therefore not barred by the Confrontation Clause); United States v. Smalls, 605 F.3d 765, 768 n.2 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[T]he Bruton rule, like the Confrontation Clause upon which it is premised, does not apply to nontestimonial hearsay statements.").

[11] California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 155 (1970); see also Dutton, 400 U.S. at 80 ("It is not argued, nor could it be, that the constitutional right to confrontation requires that no hearsay evidence can ever be introduced. That the two evidentiary rules are not identical must be readily conceded.").

[12] Green, 399 U.S. at 156.

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 164.

at trial," including for questioning into inconsistencies between his prior statement and "his present version of the events in question."[15] Similarly, in Dutton v. Evans,[16] a plurality of four Justices held that the admission of an out-of-court statement pursuant to Georgia's coconspirator hearsay exception did not violate the Confrontation Clause, even though the same statement would have been inadmissible hearsay under the federal rules of evidence.[17] The Court reasoned that the "limited contours" of the federal hearsay exception in conspiracy trials are not "required by the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause" but rather a product of the Court's "rule-making power in the area of the federal law of evidence."[18]

Then, in its 1980 opinion Ohio v. Roberts, the Supreme Court again revisited the "relationship between the Confrontation Clause and the hearsay rule with its many exceptions."[19] In Roberts, the Court explained that the Confrontation Clause "operates in two separate ways to restrict the range of admissible hearsay."[20] First, "when a hearsay declarant is not present for cross-examination at trial, the Confrontation Clause normally requires a showing that he is unavailable."[21] Second, if unavailable, "his statement is admissible only if it bears adequate 'indicia of reliability.'"[22] Indicia of reliability, according to the Court, could "be inferred . . . in a case where the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception."[23] Otherwise, reliability would require "a showing of particularized guarantees of trustworthiness."[24] The Court's focus in Roberts on reliability or trustworthiness became the primary lens through which the Court examined Confrontation Clause challenges involving extrajudicial statements until 2004, when the Court again changed course.[25]

Amdt6.5.3 Modern Doctrine

Amdt6.5.3.1 Admissibility of Testimonial Statements

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the [15] Id. at 164. The Court also observed that the witnesses' preliminary hearing testimony would have been admissible on confrontation grounds even without "opportunity for confrontation at the subsequent trial." Id. at 165. According to the Court, at the preliminary hearing the witness "was under oath" and the defendant "was represented by counsel-the same counsel in fact who later represented him at the trial." Id. Thus, the Court noted that "respondent had every opportunity to cross-examine [witness] as to his statement; and the proceedings were conducted before a judicial tribunal, equipped to provide a judicial record of the hearings." Id.

[16] 400 U.S. at 74.

[17] Id. at 81. The statement was made during the concealment stage of the conspiracy, which would place it beyond the co-conspirator exception in federal courts. Id. at 78–79, 81.

[18] Id. at 82.

[19] Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 62 (1980), abrogated by Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004).

[20] Id. at 65.

[21] Id. at 66; but see United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 394 (1986) ("Roberts cannot fairly be read to stand for the radical proposition that no out-of-court statement can be introduced by the government without a showing that the declarant is unavailable.").

[22] Id.

[23] Roberts, 448 U.S. at 66; see also Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 183 (1987) ("We think that the co-conspirator exception to the hearsay rule is firmly enough rooted in our jurisprudence that, under this Court's holding in Roberts, a court need not independently inquire into the reliability of such statements.").

[24] Roberts, 448 U.S. at 66.

[25] Amdt6.5.3.1 Admissibility of Testimonial Statements.

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In the years following Ohio v. Roberts,[1] the Supreme Court applied, revisited, and narrowed the Confrontation Clause standard that Roberts had set forth,[2] which generally permitted the admission of out-of-court statements only if the declarant was unavailable and the statement was sufficiently reliable.[3] In 2004 the Court in Crawford v. Washington[4] overruled Roberts and introduced a new standard for determining whether an out-of-court statement implicates the Confrontation Clause.[5]

Under Crawford, the key to whether evidence implicates the Confrontation Clause is not its reliability, but rather whether it is testimonial.[6] Pursuant to Crawford, non-testimonial evidence does not implicate the Confrontation Clause.[7] In contrast, testimonial evidence may only be admitted consistently with the Confrontation Clause in limited circumstances.[8] Testimonial evidence may be admitted if the declarant: is available at trial for cross examination,[9] or is unavailable but the defendant previously had opportunity to cross-examine the declarant about the statement.[10] The Court in Crawford also recognized the existence of two common law Confrontation Clause exceptions that historically permitted the admission of testimonial statements[11]—but it did not expressly approve or disapprove of either.[12]

The Crawford Court expressly declined to provide a "comprehensive definition" of "testimonial."[13] However, drawing from a variety of sources, the Court offered several possible formulations of "core" testimonial statements, including "ex parte in-court testimony or its

---

[1] 448 U.S. 56 (1980), abrogated by Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004).

[2] See Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 133 (1999) ("[O]ur cases consistently have viewed an accomplice's statements that shift or spread the blame to a criminal defendant as falling outside the realm of" reliable hearsay exceptions); White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 354 (1992) (holding that unavailability "is a necessary part of the Confrontation Clause inquiry only when the challenged out-of-court statements were made in the course of a prior judicial proceeding"); Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 827 (1990) (determining that the out-of-court statements of a child to an examining pediatrician were insufficiently reliable under Roberts when admitted under a state's residual hearsay exception); United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 394, 400 (1986) (affirming "the validity of the use of co-conspirator statements" and rejecting a broad reading of Roberts that would prohibit introduction by the government of any such "out-of-court statement[s]" absent "a showing that the declarant is unavailable"); Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 546 (1986) (concluding that a codefendant confession was insufficiently reliable "to overcome the weighty presumption against the admission of such uncross-examined evidence," although its content largely "interlocked" or overlapped with the defendant's own confession).

[3] Roberts, 448 U.S. at 66.

[4] 541 U.S. 36 (2004).

[5] Id. at 54, 60. In a subsequent opinion, the Court held that Crawford is not "retroactive to cases already final on direct review." Whorton v. Bockting, 549 U.S. 406, 409 (2007).

[6] Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51; see also Hemphill v. New York, No. 20-637, slip op. at 10–11 (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022) (explaining that if "Crawford stands for anything, it is that the history, text, and purpose of the Confrontation Clause bar judges from substituting their own determinations of reliability for the method the Constitution guarantees"-cross-examination).

[7] Crawford, 541 U.S. at 68.

[8] Id. at 68–69.

[9] Id.

[10] Id. Further, Crawford "does not bar the use of testimonial statements for purposes other than establishing the truth of the matter asserted." Id. at 59 n.9.

[11] The two potential exceptions—dying declarations and forfeiture by wrongdoing—are discussed in Amdt6.5.3.3 Dying Declarations and Forfeiture by Wrongdoing.

[12] Crawford, 541 U.S. at 56, n.6, 62 (recognizing the dying declarations and forfeiture by wrongdoing exceptions to the Confrontation Clause but declining to expressly adopt either).

[13] See id. at 68 ("We leave for another day any effort to spell out a comprehensive definition of 'testimonial.'").

functional equivalent" such as "affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially."[14] As additional possible formulations of "testimonial," the Court listed "extrajudicial statements . . . contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," and "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial."[15] Regardless of the exact formulation of "testimonial" the Court in Crawford specified that at a minimum, "testimonial" includes police interrogations and "prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial."[16]

In subsequent opinions, the Court has further examined what it means for evidence to be "testimonial" for Confrontation Clause purposes-particularly in the context of forensic laboratory reports and analysis. For example, in Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts[17] the Court held that the admission of forensic lab analysts' affidavits—reporting that material seized from the defendant was cocaine-violated the Confrontation Clause because affidavits were testimonial and the "analysts were 'witnesses' for purposes of the Sixth Amendment."[18] In Bullcoming v. New Mexico[19] the Court clarified that when the government seeks to introduce laboratory reports containing testimonial certifications "made for the purpose of proving a particular fact," the "accused's right is to be confronted with the analyst who made the certification, unless that analyst is unavailable at trial, and the accused had an opportunity, pretrial, to cross-examine that particular scientist."[20] Testimony by a surrogate witness who is familiar with general laboratory procedures, but otherwise uninvolved in the relevant certification, is insufficient to satisfy a defendant's constitutional right.[21]

In its 2012 opinion Williams v. Illinois,[22] the Court again revisited the relationship between the Confrontation Clause and laboratory analysis.[23] In Williams, an expert witness testified at trial regarding conclusions she drew by comparing DNA profiles, including one from an outside-laboratory that she had not participated in creating and therefore lacked personal knowledge about.[24] In her testimony and on cross-examination, the expert witness identified the source material for that outside-laboratory's DNA profile.[25] The defendant argued that by allowing the substance of a testimonial forensic laboratory report through the trial testimony of an expert witness (who took no part in the reported forensic analysis), the prosecution violated the Confrontation Clause.[26] A plurality of four Justices disagreed, and rejected the argument that because the expert was not involved in performing, observing, or certifying the creation of the outside-laboratory's DNA profile, the testimony regarding the [14] Id. at 51 (citations omitted), cited with approval in Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305, 310 (2009).

[15] Id. at 52 (citations omitted), cited with approval in Melendez-Diaz, 557 U.S. at 310.

[16] Id. at 68.

[17] 557 U.S. 305 (2009).

[18] Id. at 308, 311.

[19] 564 U.S. 647 (2011).

[20] Id. at 652.

[21] Id.

[22] 567 U.S. 50 (2012) (plurality opinion).

[23] Id. at 56–58.

[24] Id. at 62.

[25] Id. at 61–62.

[26] Id. at 56–57.

source material for that profile ran afoul of Melendez-Diaz and Bullcoming.[27] According to the plurality, the Confrontation Clause "has no application to out-of-court statements that are not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted."[28] The plurality concluded that the underlying DNA results were "[o]ut-of-court statements . . . related by the expert solely for the purpose of explaining" her underlying assumptions, rather than statements "offered for their truth."[29] As a result, the testimony regarding the source material of the outside-laboratory's DNA profile fell "outside the scope of the Confrontation Clause."[30]

Amdt6.5.3.2 Ongoing Emergencies and Confrontation Clause

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Statements made to police during interrogation are nontestimonial—and therefore outside the scope of the Confrontation Clause—when made "under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency."[1] In contrast, "[t]hey are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution."[2] One relevant factor in determining whether a statement occurred during an ongoing emergency is whether the statements are made "about events as they [are] actually happening," and necessary to resolve a "present emergency, rather than simply to learn . . . what had happened in the past."[3] In Davis v. Washington,[4] the Court concluded that out of court statements made by the victim of domestic violence to a 911 operator were nontestimonial as they were "plainly a call for help against [a] bona fide physical threat" by someone "facing an ongoing emergency."[5] The statements' lack of formality also influenced the Court in Davis, as the Court emphasized that the statements were "frantic" and "provided over

---

[27] Id. at 79–80.

[28] Id. at 57–58.

[29] Id. at 58.

[30] Id. The plurality in Williams also appeared to give weight to the fact that the underlying proceedings involved a bench trial, rather than a jury trial, and "assumed that the trial judge understood" the admissibility limits of the expert witness' testimony. Id. at 72–73. Further, according to the plurality, "even if the report produced by [the outside laboratory] had been admitted into evidence, there would have been no Confrontation Clause violation" because it was "produced before any suspect was identified," sought "not for the purpose of obtaining evidence to be used against petitioner . . . but for the purpose of finding a rapist who was on the loose," and was not "inherently inculpatory." Id. at 58.

[1] Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813, 822 (2006).

[2] Id. (emphasis added).

[3] Id. at 827 (emphasis omitted).

[4] 547 U.S. 813 (2006).

[5] Id. at 827; see id. at 822 (holding that "[s]tatements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimoninal when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution").

the phone," in an unsafe, turbulent environment.[6] However, based on similar considerations, the Davis Court concluded that statements made to responding officers during a separate domestic violence incident were testimonial.[7] The difference, according to the Court, was that the testimonial statements were made with "no emergency in progress" and "no immediate threat" to the defendant, and were instead "part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct."[8]

In Michigan v. Bryant,[9] the Court held that the ongoing emergency exception encompassed the statements of a mortally wounded man to police, identifying the eventual defendant as the person who shot him.[10] According to the Court, to determine whether an interrogation fits within the ongoing emergency exception, a court should objectively evaluate the circumstances "and the statements and actions of the parties."[11] In Bryant, factors considered by the Court in making this assessment included the dangerousness of the weapon involved (a gun), and the possibility of additional shootings—both of which weighed in favor of there being an ongoing emergency.[12] In addition, the Court emphasized the "informality of the situation and the interrogation," noting the "fluid and somewhat confused" nature of the questioning, which indicated that the "interrogators' primary purpose was simply to address what they perceived to be an ongoing emergency."[13]

In Ohio v. Clark,[14] the Court examined the contours of the ongoing emergency exception outside of the context of police interrogations.[15] Clark involved statements made by a child abuse victim to teachers, in which he identified the defendant as his abuser.[16] The Court held that the admission of these statements without opportunity for cross-examination did not violate the Sixth Amendment as "neither the child nor his teachers had the primary purpose of assisting in [the defendant's] prosecution."[17] According to the Court, the "statements occurred in the context of an ongoing emergency involving suspected child abuse."[18] In addition, the Court noted that the statements were made by a child, and that "[s]tatements by very young children will rarely, if ever, implicate the Confrontation Clause."[19] Further, the Court seemingly gave weight to the fact that the statements were made to teachers as opposed to police, although the Court declined to "adopt a rule that statements to individuals who are not law enforcement officers are categorically outside the Sixth Amendment."[20]

[6] Id.
[7] Id. at 829–30.
[8] Id. at 829.
[9] Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. 344 (2011).
[10] Id. at 349–50.
[11] Id. at 359.
[12] Id. at 372–77.
[13] Id. at 377.
[14] 576 U.S. 237 (2015).
[15] Id. at 240.
[16] Id. at 240–42.
[17] Id. at 240.
[18] Id. at 246.
[19] Id. at 247–48.
[20] Id. at 249.

Amdt6.5.3.3 Dying Declarations and Forfeiture by Wrongdoing

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Conceptually, the ongoing emergency exception (discussed above) places qualifying statements outside the Confrontation Clause, because they are not testimonial.[1] With respect to testimonial statements, the Court has stated that the only exceptions to Confrontation Clause requirements are those "established at the time of the founding,"[2] and "acknowledged" two such exceptions.[3] The first Confrontation Clause exception encompasses dying declarations—"declarations made by a speaker who was both on the brink of death and aware that he was dying."[4] The second exception involves statements subject to "forfeiture by wrongdoing."[5] It permits "the introduction of statements of a witness who was 'detained' or 'kept away' by the 'means or procurement' of the defendant."[6] The forfeiture by wrongdoing exception applies only to "deliberate witness tampering" where "the defendant engaged in conduct designed to prevent the witness from testifying."[7] In Giles v. California,[8] the Court examined the limits of this exception, and rejected its applicability to statements made by a victim to police three weeks before she was killed by the defendant (who claimed self-defense at trial).[9] The Court concluded that the defendant did not forfeit his right to confront the witness's statements even though she was "unavailable to testify" as a result of her "murder for which [the defendant] was on trial," absent evidence that the defendant "intended to prevent [her] from testifying."[10]

Amdt6.5.3.4 Right to Confront Witnesses Face-to-Face

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the

---

[1] Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813, 822 (2006).

[2] Giles v. California, 554 U.S. 353, 358 (2008) (quoting Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 54 (2004)).

[3] Id. In Hemphill v. New York, the Supreme Court rejected a New York state evidentiary rule that permitted admission of evidence otherwise barred by the Confrontation Clause in order to correct a misleading impression created by the defendant, where the state conceded that its evidentiary rule was not "an exception to the right to confrontation at common law." No. 20-637, slip op. at 9 (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022).

[4] Giles, 554 U.S. at 358.

[5] Id. at 359.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. at 359, 366.

[8] 554 U.S. 353 (2008).

[9] Id. at 356, 377.

[10] Id. at 357, 361.

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Although much of the Court's Confrontation Clause doctrine has focused on the admissibility of extra-judicial evidence such as out-of-court statements or lab results,[1] in several opinions the Court has examined the extent to which the Sixth Amendment affords a right to confront witnesses in person or face-to-face. In one case, the Court considered whether the Confrontation Clause gave the defendant a right to be present for the competency hearing of two child witnesses.[2] The Court seemingly construed the issue not as one of the defendant's right to confront witnesses face-to-face, but rather to obtain effective cross-examination.[3] According to the Court, the Sixth Amendment did not require the defendant's presence in the competency hearing, because "[a]fter the trial court determined that the two children were competent to testify, they appeared and testified in open court" where they were "subject to full and complete cross-examination."[4] The next year, in Coy v. Iowa,[5] the Court emphasized that "the Confrontation Clause guarantees the defendant a face-to-face meeting with witnesses appearing before the trier of fact."[6] Therefore, the Court held that the Confrontation Clause barred the use of a "specifically designed" screen that blocked the defendant from the complaining witness's view as it was "difficult to imagine a more obvious or damaging violation of the defendant's right to a face-to-face encounter."[7] However, two years later, the Court held that the Confrontation Clause permitted the testimony, examination, and cross-examination of a child witness by "one-way closed circuit television" from a separate room.[8] Although, the child witness could not see the defendant, the Court noted the "important state interest" in protecting the child witness and observed that the closed-circuit testimony "preserve[d] all of the other elements of the confrontation right" such as "contemporaneous cross-examination" and the ability of the "judge, jury, and defendant" to view and assess the "witness as he or she testifies."[9] In addition, the Court emphasized that the judge made "individualized findings" that testifying face-to-face would cause the child witness serious emotional distress.[10]

Amdt6.5.3.5 Confrontation of Witnesses Lacking Memory

Sixth Amendment:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed,

[1] Supra Amdt6.5.3.1 Admissibility of Testimonial Statements.

[2] Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 732 (1987).

[3] See id. at 740 ("Instead of attempting to characterize a competency hearing as a trial or pretrial proceeding, it is more useful to consider whether excluding the defendant from the hearing interferes with his opportunity for effective cross-examination.").

[4] Id.

[5] 487 U.S. 1012 (1988).

[6] Id. at 1016. A face-to-face encounter with the witness, in and of itself, may not be fully sufficient to satisfy a defendant's right to confrontation, however, if the defendant is deprived adequate cross-examination. See Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 309, 315, 317 (1974) (concluding that trial court infringed on defendant's confrontation rights where it restricted cross examination regarding the juvenile criminal record of a witness pursuant to a protective order issued under state law, where that criminal record was relevant to the defense theory of bias on the part of the witness). The right to confront witnesses face-to-face does not shield the defendant from having his presence-and his resulting availability to "fabricate" his testimony in light of preceding witnesses-noted by the prosecution. See Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61, 65 (2000).

[7] Coy, 487 U.S. at 1020.

[8] Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 851, 852 (1990).

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 840–42.

which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In one vein of cases, the Court has examined the degree to which lack of memory on the part of a testifying witness implicates the Confrontation Clause.[1] For instance, in Delaware v. Fensterer,[2] the Court disagreed that a defendant's confrontation rights had been violated when an expert witnesses testified but could not remember the basis of his theory, which the defendant argued deprived him of an adequate opportunity for cross-examination.[3] The Court explained that in general, "the Confrontation Clause guarantees an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish."[4] The Court noted that the defendant had an opportunity to effectively cross-examine the expert witness, including into his lack of recollection.[5] In addition, according to the Court, the Confrontation Clause "includes no guarantee that every witness called by the prosecution will refrain from giving testimony that is marred by forgetfulness, confusion, or evasion."[6] The Court reached a similar conclusion three years later when it rejected a Confrontation Clause challenge to testimony of a complaining witness concerning his prior identification of the defendant—the details of which he could not remember due to memory loss.[7] Citing to Fensterer, the Court explained that "[i]t is sufficient that the defendant has the opportunity to bring out such matters as the witness' bias, his lack of care and attentiveness, his poor eyesight, and even . . . the very fact that he has a bad memory."[8]

Amdt6.5.3.6 Evidence Introduced by Defendant

Sixth Amendment:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Court's Sixth Amendment jurisprudence illustrates that the right to confront witnesses does not amount to a right to confront witnesses with all available evidence.[1] For instance, a defendant did not have a right to confront a rape victim with evidence of a prior sexual relationship where the defendant failed to comply with a state law conditioning

[1] In California v. Green, however, the Court expressly declined to consider whether the Confrontation Clause barred the introduction of prior out-of-court statements by a witness concerning events "that he could not remember" at trial. 399 U.S. at 168–69.

[2] 474 U.S. 15 (1985).

[3] Id. at 20–22.

[4] Id. at 20.

[5] Id. at 20.

[6] Id. at 21–22.

[7] United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 564 (1988).

[8] Id. at 559 (citation omitted).

[1] See Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 151 (1991) ("We have indicated that probative evidence may, in certain circumstances, be precluded when a criminal defendant fails to comply with a valid discovery rule.").

admission of such evidence on notice and hearing requirements.[2] The Court concluded that "[t]he notice-and-hearing requirement serves legitimate state interests in protecting against surprise, harassment, and undue delay."[3]

Amdt6.5.4 Right to Compulsory Process

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment guarantees a criminal defendant the right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor."[1] Two early nineteenth century cases illustrate the initial conceptions of the Compulsory Process Clause. Although neither is a Supreme Court case, both are notable in that they feature the analyses of then-Supreme Court Justices sitting on lower federal courts. In the first case, Justice Samuel Chase stated in the 1800 case United States v. Cooper that the "constitution gives to every man, charged with an offence, the benefit, of compulsory process, to secure the attendance of his witnesses."[2] In the second case, Chief Justice John Marshall "presided as trial judge" over the "treason and misdemeanor trials of Aaron Burr."[3] In an 1807 opinion subsequently described by the Supreme Court as the "first and most celebrated analysis" of compulsory process, Marshall "ruled that Burr's compulsory process rights entitled him to serve a subpoena on President Jefferson, requesting the production of allegedly incriminating evidence."[4] In addition to these two cases, another early insight into the Compulsory Process Clause may be gleaned from an 1833 treatise that suggests an apparent purpose of the provision was to make inapplicable in federal trials the common-law rule that in cases of treason or felony the accused was not allowed to introduce witnesses in his defense.[5]

The Supreme Court has since characterized the Compulsory Process Clause as one of several constitutional provisions guaranteeing defendants "a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense."[6] There is little Supreme Court precedent examining the contours

---

[2] Id. at 152–53.

[3] Id.

[1] U.S. Const. amend. VI.

[2] U.S. v. Cooper, 4 U.S. 341 (C.C.D. Pa. 1800).

[3] Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 55 (1987); U.S. v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30 (C.C.D. Va. 1807).

[4] Ritchie, 480 U.S. at 55 (discussing Burr, 25 F. Cas. at 35; see also Burr, 25 F. Cas. at 34 (holding that the right to the accused "to the compulsory process of the court" contains "no exception whatever").

[5] 3 J. Story, Commentaries On The Constitution Of The United States 1786 (1833). In the 1851 case United States v. Reid, the Supreme Court concluded that a defendant was not entitled to a new trial after his witness had been barred from testifying under state law on the grounds that the witness had been tried separately for the same crime as the defendant. 53 U.S. 361, 366 (1851). In the 1918 case Rosen v. United States, the Court overruled Reid. 245 U.S. 467, 472 (1918). Although Rosen "rested on nonconstitutional grounds," the Court subsequently explained that "its reasoning was required by the Sixth Amendment." Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 22 (1967). "In light of the common-law history, and in view of the recognition in the Reid case that the Sixth Amendment was designed in part to make the testimony of a defendant's witnesses admissible on his behalf in court, it could hardly be argued that a State would not violate the clause if it made all defense testimony inadmissible as a matter of procedural law." Id.

[6] See Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319, 324 (2006) ("Whether rooted directly in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or in the Compulsory Process or Confrontation Clauses of the Sixth Amendment, the Constitution guarantees criminal defendants 'a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense.'" (quoting Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986)); accord Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 818 (1975) ("The rights to of the Compulsory Process Clause,[7] because the Court has generally analyzed issues involving a defendant's right to "obtain[ ] witnesses in his favor"[8] through a Due Process framework.[9] For instance, in the 1987 case Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, the Court indicated that requests to compel the government to reveal the identity of witnesses or produce exculpatory evidence should be evaluated under due process rather than compulsory process analysis, adding that "compulsory process provides no greater protections in this area than due process."[10] Thus, compulsory process rights such as the right to testify are also secured by the Due Process Clause.[11]

Despite the limited precedent, there are a few Supreme Court cases that offer insights into the Compulsory Process Clause.[12] In the 1967 case Washington v. Texas, the Court observed that the "right of an accused to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor stands on no lesser footing than the other Sixth Amendment rights" and that the right amounts "in plain terms the right to present a defense, the right to present the defendant's version of the facts as well as the prosecution's to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies. Just as an accused has the right to confront the prosecution's witnesses for the purpose of challenging their testimony, he has the right to present his own witnesses to establish a defense."[13] The Court in Washington further held that "[t]his right is a fundamental element of due process of law," applicable to states by way of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the right is violated by a state law that provides that co-participants in the same crime could not testify for one another.[14] As the Court explained, it is a violation of the Compulsory Process Clause if the state "arbitrarily denied [a defendant] the right to put on the stand a witness who was notice, confrontation, and compulsory process, when taken together, guarantee that a criminal charge may be answered in a manner now considered fundamental to the fair administration of American justice—through the calling and interrogation of favorable witnesses, the cross-examination of adverse witnesses, and the orderly introduction of evidence. In short, the Amendment constitutionalizes the right in an adversary criminal trial to make a defense as we know it."); Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973) ("Few rights are more fundamental than that of an accused to present witnesses in his own defense.").

---

[7] See Ritchie, 480 U.S. at 55 ("This Court has had little occasion to discuss the contours of the Compulsory Process Clause.").

[8] U.S. CONST. amend. VI. One Supreme Court case suggests that the Compulsory Process Clause may also "require the production of evidence." See Ritchie, 480 U.S. at 56 (discussing United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 709 (1974)).

[9] See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 294 (1973) ("The rights to confront and cross-examine witnesses and to call witnesses in one's own behalf have long been recognized as essential to due process."); Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95, 98 (1972) ("In the circumstances of this case, we conclude that the judge's threatening remarks, directed only at the single witness for the defense, effectively drove that witness off the stand, and thus deprived the petitioner of due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment."); In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 275 (1948) ("Except for a narrowly limited category of contempts, due process of law . . . requires that one charged with contempt of court be advised of the charges against him, have a reasonable opportunity to meet them by way of defense or explanation, have the right to be represented by counsel, and have a chance to testify and call other witnesses in his behalf, either by way of defense or explanation.").

[10] 480 U.S. at 56 (explaining that "the right to discover the identity of witnesses, or to require the government to produce exculpatory evidence" had traditionally been evaluated under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that it need not decide "whether and how the guarantees of the Compulsory Process Clause differ from those of the Fourteenth Amendment").

[11] See Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 51–53 (1987) (explaining that the right to testify is grounded in the Compulsory Process Clause and the Due Process Clause, and is also a "a necessary corollary to the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against compelled testimony"); see generally Amdt14.S1.4.1 Overview of Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[12] Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 55 (1987) ("Despite the implications of the Burr decision for federal criminal procedure, the Compulsory Process Clause rarely was a factor in this Court's decisions during the next 160 years."). The Court has identified a number of "pre-1967 cases that mention compulsory process" but that "do not provide an extensive analysis of the Clause." Id. at 55 n.12 (citing Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 378, n. 1 (1966); Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421, 442 (1932); United States v. Van Duzee, 140 U.S. 169, 173 (1891); Ex parte Harding, 120 U.S. 782, 7 S.Ct. 780 (1887)),

[13] 388 U.S. 14, 18–19 (1967).

[14] Id. at 17–19, 23.

physically and mentally capable of testifying to events that he had personally observed, and whose testimony would have been relevant and material to the defense."[15] The Court has also held that under the Compulsory Process Clause is "the accused's right . . . to testify himself, should he decide it is in his favor to do so."[16] The right to present witnesses is not absolute, however; a court may refuse to allow a defense witness to testify when the court finds that defendant's counsel willfully failed to identify the witness in a pretrial discovery request and thereby attempted to gain a tactical advantage.[17] In addition, a defendant "cannot establish a violation of his constitutional right to compulsory process merely by showing that deportation" of potential witnesses "deprived him of their testimony"; rather "[h]e must at least make some plausible showing of how their testimony would have been both material and favorable to his defense."[18]

Amdt6.6 Right to Counsel

Amdt6.6.1 Historical Background on Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The records of neither the Congress that proposed what became the Sixth Amendment nor the state ratifying conventions elucidate the language on assistance of counsel. The development of the common-law principle in England had denied to anyone charged with a felony the right to retain counsel, while the right was afforded in misdemeanor cases. This rule was ameliorated in practice, however, by the judicial practice of allowing counsel to argue points of law and then generously interpreting the limits of "legal questions." Colonial and early state practice varied, ranging from the existent English practice to appointment of counsel in a few states where needed counsel could not be retained.[1] Contemporaneously with the proposal and ratification of the Sixth Amendment, Congress enacted two statutory provisions that seemed to indicate an understanding that the Sixth Amendment guarantee extended only to retained counsel by a defendant wishing and able to afford assistance.[2]

---

[15] Id. at 23.

[16] Rock, 483 U.S. at 52.

[17] Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 415 (1988); see also Melendez-Diaz v. Mass., 557 U.S. 305, 327 (2009) ("It is common to require a defendant to exercise his rights under the Compulsory Process Clause in advance of trial, announcing his intent to present certain witnesses."); United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 241 (1975) ("The Sixth Amendment does not confer the right to present testimony free from the legitimate demands of the adversarial system; one cannot invoke the Sixth Amendment as a justification for presenting what might have been a half-truth."). There also appear to be limits on the extent to which a party has a right to introduce other types of evidence under the Compulsory Process Clause. See United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 315 (1998) ("Rock v. Arkansas, Washington v. Texas, and Chambers v. Mississippi, do not support a right to introduce polygraph evidence, even in very narrow circumstances.").

[18] United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 867 (1982).

[1] W. Beaney, The Right to Counsel in American Courts 8–26 (1955).

[2] Section 35 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20, 1 Stat. 73, provided that parties in federal courts could manage and plead their own causes personally or by the assistance of counsel as provided by the rules of court. The Act of April 30, 1790, ch. 9, 1 Stat. 118, provided: "Every person who is indicted of treason or other capital crime, shall be allowed

Amdt6.6.2 Right to Have Counsel Appointed

Amdt6.6.2.1 Early Doctrine on Right to Have Counsel Appointed

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Court began to develop its doctrine on the right to have counsel in Powell v. Alabama,[1] a 1932 opinion in which the Court set aside the convictions of eight Black youths sentenced to death in a hastily carried-out trial without benefit of counsel.[2] The failure to afford the defendants an opportunity to retain counsel violated due process, but the Court acknowledged that as indigents the youths could not have retained counsel.[3] Noting circumstances including the "ignorance," "illiteracy," and youth of the defendants; their lack of access to friends and family; the consequences they faced; and the "public hostility" surrounding the trial, the Court concluded that the trial court's failure to make an effective appointment of counsel was "a denial of due process within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment."[4]

The holding in Powell was narrow. The Court stated that in a case in which the defendant faces the death penalty; does not have a lawyer; and is unable to mount his own defense because of intellectual disability, illiteracy, or a similar condition, "it is the duty of the court, whether requested or not, to assign counsel for him as a necessary requisite of due process of law."[5] Despite this narrow scope, the Court in Powell made some more general statements about the importance of the right to counsel. Due process, the Court said, always requires observance of certain fundamental personal rights associated with a hearing, and "the right to the aid of counsel is of this fundamental character."[6] In addition, noting the limited legal skill and training of even "the intelligent and educated layman," the Court observed that "[t]he right to be heard would be, in many cases, of little avail if it did not comprehend the right to be heard by counsel."[7] Without the "guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him," the Court noted, even an innocent defendant "faces the danger of conviction because he does not know how to establish his innocence."[8] to make his full defense by counsel learned in the law; and the court before which he is tried, or some judge thereof, shall immediately, upon his request, assign to him such counsel not exceeding two, as he may desire, and they shall have free access to him at all reasonable hours."

---

[1] See Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 159 (1988) (explaining that "while the right to select and be represented by one's preferred attorney is comprehended by the Sixth Amendment," the "Sixth Amendment right to choose one's own counsel is circumscribed in several important respects").

[2] 486 U.S. 153 (1988).

[3] Id. at 159.

[4] Id.

[5] Id.

[6] 491 U.S. 617, 619, 626 (1989).

[7] 21 U.S.C. §§ 848, 853.

[8] Caplin & Drysdale, 491 U.S. at 626.

Amdt6.6.2.1
Early Doctrine on Right to Have Counsel Appointed

In 1938, the Court expanded its jurisprudence on the right to have counsel appointed in Johnson v. Zerbst.[9] In Zerbst, the Court announced an absolute rule requiring appointment of counsel for federal criminal defendants who could not afford to retain a lawyer.[10] According to the Zerbst Court, the right to assistance of counsel, "is necessary to insure fundamental human rights of life and liberty."[11] Without distinguishing between the right to retain counsel and the right to have counsel provided if the defendant cannot afford to hire one, the Court quoted Powell's invocation of the necessity of legal counsel for even the intelligent and educated layman. The Court stated: "The Sixth Amendment withholds from federal courts, in all criminal proceedings, the power and authority to deprive an accused of his life or liberty unless he has or waives the assistance of counsel."[12] Any waiver, the Court ruled, must be by the intelligent choice of the defendant, will not be presumed from a silent record, and must be determined by the trial court before proceeding in the absence of counsel.[13]

In the 1942 case Betts v. Brady, the Supreme Court rebuffed an effort to obtain the same rule in the state courts in all criminal proceedings.[14] The Court observed that the Sixth Amendment applied only to trials in federal courts.[15] In state courts, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment "formulates a concept less rigid and more fluid" than those guarantees embodied in the Bill of Rights, although a state denial of a right protected in one of [9] The statute was interpreted in United States v. Monsanto, 491 U.S. 600, 602, 607 (1989), as requiring forfeiture of all assets derived from the covered offenses, and as making no exception for assets the defendant intends to use for his defense.

[10] See Caplin & Drysdale, 491 U.S. at 628 ("There is no constitutional principle that gives one person the right to give another's property to a third party, even where the person seeking to complete the exchange wishes to do so in order to exercise a constitutionally protected right.").

[11] Monsanto, 491 U.S. at 615 ("Indeed, it would be odd to conclude that the Government may not restrain property, such as the home and apartment in respondent's possession, based on a finding of probable cause, when we have held that . . . the Government may restrain persons where there is a finding of probable cause to believe that the accused has committed a serious offense."). A subsequent case held that where a grand jury had returned an indictment based on probable cause, that conclusion was binding on a court during forfeiture proceedings and the defendants do not have a right to have such a conclusion re-examined in a separate judicial hearing in order to unfreeze the assets to pay for their counsel.

[12] 578 U.S. 5, 8–9, 12–13 (2016) (plurality opinion). The Court in Luis split as to the reasoning for holding that a pretrial freeze of untainted assets violates a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice. Four Justices employed a balancing test, weighing the government's contingent future interest in the untainted assets against the interests in preserving the right to counsel—a right at the "heart of a fair, effective criminal justice system" —in concluding that the defendant had the right to use innocent property to pay a reasonable fee for assistance of counsel. See id. at 16–23 (Justice Stephen Breyer, joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg & Sonia Sotomayor). Justice Clarence Thomas, in providing the fifth and deciding vote, concurred in judgment only, contending that "textual understanding and history" alone suffice to "establish that the Sixth Amendment prevents the Government from freezing untainted assets in order to secure a potential forfeiture." See id. at 25 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also id. at 33 ("I cannot go further and endorse the plurality's atextual balancing analysis.").

[13] United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. 140, 144–45 (2006).

[14] Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. at 148–50 (citing Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 282 (1991)).

[15] 422 U.S. 806, 807, 817 (1975). Although the Court acknowledged some concern by judges that Faretta leads to unfair trials for defendants, in Indiana v. Edwards the Court declined to overrule Faretta. 554 U.S. 164, 178 (2008). Even if the defendant exercises his right to his detriment, the Constitution ordinarily guarantees him the opportunity to do so. See Faretta, 422 U.S. at 834 (explaining that "[i]t is the defendant, therefore, who must be free personally to decide whether in his particular case counsel is to his advantage," and that "although he may conduct his own defense ultimately to his own detriment, his choice must be honored"). A defendant who represents himself cannot thereafter complain that the quality of his defense denied him effective assistance of counsel. Id. at 834–35 n.46. The Court, however, has not addressed what state aid, such as access to a law library, might need to be made available to a defendant representing himself. Kane v. Garcia Espitia, 546 U.S. 9, 10 (2005) (per curiam). Related to the right of self-representation is the right to testify in one's own defense. See Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 52, 62 (1987) (holding that per se rule excluding all hypnotically refreshed testimony violates right).

the first eight Amendments might "in certain circumstances" be a violation of due process.[16] The relevant question according to the Court was whether the Sixth Amendment right to appointment of counsel in federal courts "expresses a rule so fundamental and essential to a fair trial, and so, to due process of law, that it is made obligatory upon the States by the Fourteenth Amendment."[17] Examining the common-law rules, the English practice, and the state constitutions, laws and practices, the Court concluded that it was the "considered judgment of the people, their representatives and their courts that appointment of counsel is not a fundamental right, essential to a fair trial."[18] Want of counsel in a particular case might result in a conviction lacking in fundamental fairness and so necessitate the interposition of constitutional restriction upon state practice, but this was not the general rule.[19]

Amdt6.6.2.2 Modern Doctrine on Right to Have Counsel Appointed

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Starting in 1938, the Supreme Court recognized that in federal courts the Sixth Amendment requires the provision of counsel absent waiver.[1] For state proceedings, however, the Court instead determined that the scope of the right to have counsel appointed stemmed from the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,[2] and the applicability of the right depended on the circumstances facing the accused in a given case.[3] The purpose behind examining the circumstances facing the accused was to afford some certainty in the determination of when failure to appoint counsel would result in a trial lacking in [16] See, e.g., Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 396 (1993) (explaining that a criminal defendant "may not waive his right to counsel or plead guilty unless he does so 'competently and intelligently'" (quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 468 (1938)).

---

[17] The fact that a defendant is mentally competent to stand trial does not preclude a court from finding him not mentally competent to represent himself at trial. Edwards, 554 U.S. at 177–78. Mental competence to stand trial, however, is sufficient to ensure the right to waive the right to counsel in order to plead guilty. Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 398–99 (1993).

[18] Faretta, 422 U.S. at 834 n.46.

[19] Martinez v. Court of App. of Cal., Fourth App. Dist., 528 U.S. 152, 154 (2000). The Sixth Amendment itself "does not include any right to appeal." Id. at 160.

[1] Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 463 (1938) ("The Sixth Amendment withholds from federal courts, in all criminal proceedings, the power and authority to deprive an accused of his life or liberty unless he has or waives the assistance of counsel." (footnote omitted)); see Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 339–40 (1963) ("We have construed [the Sixth Amendment] to mean that in federal courts counsel must be provided for defendants unable to employ counsel unless the right is competently and intelligently waived."); see also Johnson v. United States, 352 U.S. 565, 566 (1957) (holding that a federal Court of Appeals "must, under Johnson v. Zerbst, afford one who challenges [the appeal certification] the aid of counsel unless he insist on being his own."); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 356 (1963) (holding that a state must provide counsel to defendant granted a right of first appeal from a criminal conviction); but see Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 619 (1974) (holding that defendants had no constitutional right to an appointment of counsel for discretionary appellate review); Murray v. Giarratano, 492 U.S. 1, 9–13 (1989) (holding that inmates sentenced to death do not have a constitutional right to counsel to seek postconviction relief). .

[2] Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455, 461–62 (1942), overruled by Gideon, 372 U.S. at 342.

[3] This circumstance-dependent approach is typified by Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 71 (1932); see also Hawk v. Olson, 326 U.S. 271, 278 (1945) (reviewing underlying circumstances and holding that "denial of opportunity to consult with counsel on any material step after indictment or similar charge and arraignment violates the Fourteenth Amendment"); Tomkins v. State of Missouri, 323 U.S. 485, 488 (1945) (citing Powell and reviewing underlying

"fundamental fairness."[4] Over time, the Court developed three often-overlapping categories of circumstances that required the furnishing of assistance of counsel to satisfy due process: (1) where the personal characteristics of the defendant made it unlikely he could obtain an adequate defense of his own,[5] (2) where the charges or possible defenses to the charges were technically complex,[6] and (3) where events occurring at trial raised problems of prejudice.[7] The last characteristic especially had been used by the Court to set aside convictions occurring in the absence of counsel,[8] and the last case rejecting a claim of denial of assistance of counsel had been decided by 1950.[9]

In 1961, the Court held that in a capital case a defendant need not establish a particularized need or prejudice resulting from absence of counsel.[10] Rather, the Court concluded that assistance of counsel was a constitutional requisite in capital cases, although the Court did not expressly articulate whether its holding was based on the Sixth Amendment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[11] Two years later, the Court expanded the right to counsel in non-capital cases as well, holding unanimously in Gideon v. Wainwright[12] "that in our adversary system of criminal justice, any person hauled into court, who is too poor to hire a lawyer, cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for circumstances of prosecution to determine if accused's deprivation of counsel violated Fourteenth Amendment); Williams v. Kaiser, 323 U.S. 471, 473–76 (1945) (same). For additional discussion of Powell, see Amdt6.5.1 Early Confrontation Clause Cases.

[4] See Betts, 316 U.S. at 462 ("Asserted denial is to be tested by an appraisal of the totality of facts in a given case. That which may, in one setting, constitute a denial of fundamental fairness, shocking to the universal sense of justice, may, in other circumstances, and in the light of other considerations, fall short of such denial.").

[5] Commonly cited characteristics of the defendant demonstrating the necessity for assistance of counsel included youth and immaturity (Moore v. Michigan, 355 U.S. 155, 164 (1957); Pennsylvania ex rel. Herman v. Claudy, 350 U.S. 116, 120–21 (1956); Uveges v. Pennsylvania, 335 U.S. 437, 442 (1948); Wade v. Mayo, 334 U.S. 672, 683–84 (1948); Marino v. Ragen, 332 U.S. 561, 562 (1947) (per curiam); De Meerleer v. Michigan, 329 U.S. 663, 665 (1947) (per curiam), limited education (Moore, 355 U.S. at 164), inexperience (Uveges, 335 U.S. at 442), and mental illness (Massey v. Moore, 348 U.S. 105, 108 (1954); Palmer v. Ashe, 342 U.S. 134, 136–37 (1951).

[6] E.g., McNeal v. Culver, 365 U.S. 109, 114–16 (1961); Moore, 355 U.S. at 160; Claudy, 350 U.S. at 122; Williams v. Kaiser, 323 U.S. 471, 474–75 (1945); Rice v. Olson, 324 U.S. 786, 789 (1945).

[7] Commonly cited examples included the deliberate or careless overreaching by the court or the prosecutor (Palmer, 342 U.S. at 137; Gibbs v. Burke, 337 U.S. 773, 776–78 (1949); Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736, 739–741 (1948); White v. Ragen, 324 U.S. 760, 764 (1945) (per curiam), prejudicial developments during the trial (Cash v. Culver, 358 U.S. 633, 637–38 (1959); Gibbs, 337 U.S. at 776–78), and questionable proceedings at sentencing (Townsend, 334 U.S. at 739–741).

[8] In the 1960 case Hudson v. North Carolina the Court held that an unrepresented defendant had been prejudiced when his co-defendant's counsel plead his client guilty in the presence of the jury, the applicable state rules to avoid prejudice in such situation were unclear, and the defendant in any event had taken no steps to protect himself. 363 U.S. 697, 702–03 (1960). The Hudson Court explained that a "layman would hardly be aware of the fact that he was entitled to any protection from the prejudicial effect of a codefendant's plea of guilt" and would not "know the proper course to follow in order to invoke such protection." Id. at 1318. According to the Court, the "very uncertainty of the North Carolina law in this respect serves to underline the petitioner's need for counsel to advise him." Id. Two years after Hudson, the Court reversed a conviction because the unrepresented defendant failed to follow various advantageous procedures that a lawyer might have utilized. Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 508–512 (1962). The same year, the Court found that a lawyer might have developed several defenses and adopted several tactics to defeat a charge under a state recidivist statute, and that therefore the unrepresented defendant had been prejudiced. Chewning v. Cunningham, 368 U.S. 443, 445–47 (1962).

[9] Quicksal v. Michigan, 339 U.S. 660, 666 (1950); see also Canizio v. New York, 327 U.S. 82, 86–7 (1946); Foster v. Illinois, 332 U.S. 134, 138–39 (1947); Gayes v. New York, 332 U.S. 145, 148–49 (1947) (plurality opinion); Bute v. Illinois, 333 U.S. 640, 675–76 (1948); Gryger v. Burke, 334 U.S. 728, 730–31 (1948); Cf. White, 324 U.S. at 764, 767 (1945) (acknowledging prima facie showing of constitutional violation stemming from lack of counsel but ultimately dismissing certiorari on other grounds).

[10] See Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, 55 (1961) ("When one pleads to a capital charge without benefit of counsel, we do not stop to determine whether prejudice resulted.").

[11] Id.

[12] 372 U.S. 335 (1963).

him."[13] In a rejection of earlier precedent,[14] the Court held that the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel is "fundamental" and constitutionally required by the Fourteenth Amendment in state courts.[15] Gideon stemmed from a felony charge, and the Court's opinion in the case did not expressly decide whether the right to assistance of counsel could be claimed by defendants charged with misdemeanors or serious misdemeanors as well as by those charged with felonies.[16] Later, however, the Court held that the right applies to any misdemeanor case in which imprisonment is imposed-indeed, no person may be sentenced to jail who was convicted in the absence of counsel, unless he validly waived his right.[17] The Court subsequently extended the right to cases where a suspended sentence or probationary period is imposed, on the theory that any future incarceration that occurred would be based on the original uncounseled conviction.[18]

The absence of counsel when a defendant is convicted or pleads guilty goes to the fairness of the proceedings and undermines the presumption of reliability that attaches to a judgment of a court. Consequently the Court has held that Gideon is fully retroactive, so that convictions obtained in the absence of counsel without a valid waiver are not only voidable,[19] but also may not be used subsequently either to support guilt in a new trial or to enhance punishment upon a valid conviction.[20]

---

[13] Id. at 344.

[14] Gideon overruled Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942). Gideon, 372 U.S. at 339. For a discussion of Betts, see supra Amdt6.5.1 Early Confrontation Clause Cases.

[15] 372 U.S. at 342–43, 344.

[16] Id. at 336, 344.

[17] In its 1979 opinion in Scott v. Illinois, the Court held that "the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution require only that no indigent criminal defendant be sentenced to a term of imprisonment unless the State has afforded him the right to assistance of appointed counsel in his defense." 440 U.S. 367, 373–74 (1979). In other words, the right to counsel hinges not on the possibility of imprisonment as authorized by the charging statute, but on the actual punishment imposed on the defendant. Id. Thus, Scott modified Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25, 32–33, 37 (1972), which had held counsel required if imprisonment were possible. The Court has also extended the right of assistance of counsel to juvenile proceedings. See In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 36–37 (1967) ("[T]he assistance of counsel is . . . equally essential for the determination of delinquency, carrying with it the awesome prospect of incarceration in a state institution until the juvenile reaches the age of 21.").

[18] Alabama v. Shelton, 535 U.S. 654, 662 (2002).

[19] Kitchens v. Smith, 401 U.S. 847, 847, 849 (1971) (per curiam); Burgett v. Texas, 389 U.S. 109, 114 (1967); accord Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 628 n.13 (1965) ("The rule in [Gideon], that counsel must be appointed to represent an indigent charged with a felony, was actually applied retrospectively in that case since Gideon had collaterally attacked the prior judgment by post-conviction remedies.").

[20] Burgett v. Texas, 389 U.S. 109, 115 (1967); see also Loper v. Beto, 405 U.S. 473, 474, 483 (1972) (plurality opinion) (concluding that trial court should not have permitted impeachment of counseled defendant's credibility in 1947 trial by introduction of prior uncounseled convictions in the 1930s); United States v. Tucker, 404 U.S. 443, 448–49 (1972) (holding that sentencing judge improperly relied on two previous convictions stemming from proceedings where defendant was without counsel); but see United States v. Bryant, 579 U.S. 140, 154–55 (2016) (holding that the use of prior, uncounseled tribal-court domestic abuse convictions as the predicates for a sentence enhancement in a subsequent conviction did not violate the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, as repeat offender laws like the one at issue penalize only the last offense committed by the defendant and because the Sixth Amendment right to counsel did not apply to the underlying tribal-court convictions); Nichols v. United States, 511 U.S. 738 (1994) (holding that "an uncounseled conviction valid under [Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979)] may be relied upon to enhance the sentence for a subsequent offense, even though that sentence entails imprisonment"); Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55, 67 (1980) ("Use of an uncounseled felony conviction as the basis for imposing a civil firearms disability, enforceable by a criminal sanction, is not inconsistent with [Court precedent].").

Amdt6.6.3 When the Right to Counsel Applies

Amdt6.6.3.1 Overview of When the Right to Counsel Applies

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

As a result of Gideon v. Wainwright,[1] the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies at criminal trials, regardless of whether a given trial is federal or state, or whether the counsel is retained or appointed.[2] As the Court in Gideon explained, the "right of one charged with crime to counsel" is "fundamental and essential."[3] A more complicated question is the extent to which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies in contexts beyond the trial itself, such as preliminary criminal proceedings. As a general matter, the Court has explained that the "the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is triggered 'at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated . . . 'whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment.' "[4] In other words, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel does not begin until "the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings."[5] Even once adversary judicial criminal proceedings begin, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies only to critical stages of criminal prosecutions.[6] In a number of cases, the Court has examined the [1] 372 U.S. 335 (1963). For further discussion of Gideon, see Amdt6.6.2.2 Modern Doctrine on Right to Have Counsel Appointed.

[2] See, e.g., Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 158 (1988) ("[W]e have held that the Sixth Amendment secures the right to the assistance of counsel, by appointment if necessary, in a trial for any serious crime.").

[3] Gideon, 372 U.S. at 344.

[4] Fellers v. United States, 540 U.S. 519, 523 (2004) (quoting Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 398 (1977)).

[5] Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682, 689 (1972) (plurality opinion).

[6] See, e.g., Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, 54 (1961) (determining whether right to counsel applied in arraignment by examining whether it amounts to a "critical stage in a criminal proceeding").

extent to which the Sixth Amendment[7] right to counsel applies in contexts including pretrial judicial proceedings,[8] custodial interrogations,[9] and lineups and other identification situations,[10] among others.[11]

Amdt6.6.3.2 Pretrial Judicial Proceedings and Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

While the Supreme Court has established a right to counsel,[1] it has recognized some limitations to that right. In Rothgery v. Gillespie County, the Court noted that the "Sixth Amendment right of the 'accused' to assistance of counsel in 'all criminal prosecutions' is limited by its terms: 'it does not attach until a prosecution is commenced.'"[2] Pretrial judicial proceedings may amount to the commencement of prosecution, and in the 2008 case Rothgery,[3] the Court clarified that even a preliminary hearing where no government prosecutor is present can trigger the right to counsel. In determining whether the right to counsel applies to a particular pretrial judicial proceeding, the Court generally has considered whether the proceeding amounts to a "critical stage" in a criminal prosecution.[4] This inquiry may be traced back to dicta in Powell v. Alabama,[5] noting that "during perhaps the most critical period of the proceedings . . . that is to say, from the time of their arraignment until the beginning of their [7] The Court's pre-Gideon cases often spoke expansively of the right to retain counsel, but as a matter of due process rather than of the Sixth Amendment. Thus, in Chandler v. Fretag, when a defendant appearing in court to plead guilty to house-breaking was advised for the first time that, because of three prior convictions, he could be sentenced to life imprisonment as a habitual offender, the court's denial of his request for a continuance to consult an attorney was a violation of his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. 348 U.S. 3, 5, 10 (1954). "Regardless of whether petitioner would have been entitled to the appointment of counsel, his right to be heard through his own counsel was unqualified. A necessary corollary is that a defendant must be given a reasonable opportunity to employ and consult with counsel; otherwise, the right to be heard by counsel would be of little worth." Id. at 9, 10; see also Reynolds v. Cochran, 365 U.S. 525, 530 (1961) ("[W]e think it clear that this case must be reversed for a hearing in order to afford petitioner an opportunity to prove his allegations with regard to another constitutional claim-that he was deprived of due process by the refusal of the trial judge to grant his motion for a continuance in order that he might have the assistance of the counsel he had retained in the proceeding against him."); House v. Mayo, 324 U.S. 42, 46 (1945) (per curiam) (concluding that trial court had deprived defendant of "constitutional right to a fair trial" by "forc[ing] him to plead to the information without the aid and advice of his counsel, whose presence he requested"); Hawk v. Olson, 326 U.S. 271, 278 (1945) (determining that defendant had potentially "set out a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment" in claiming that in murder trial he (1) "had no advice of counsel prior to the calling of the jury" and (2) lacked assistance of counsel in moving "for continuance to examine the charge and consult counsel").

---

[8] Amdt6.6.3.2 Pretrial Judicial Proceedings and Right to Counsel.

[9] Amdt6.6.3.3 Custodial Interrogation and Right to Counsel.

[10] Amdt6.6.3.4 Lineups and Other Identification Situations and Right to Counsel.

[11] Amdt6.6.3.6 Noncriminal and Investigatory Proceedings and Right to Counsel.

[1] Amdt6.6.3.1 Overview of When the Right to Counsel Applies.

[2] Rothgery v. Gillespie Cnty., Tex., 554 U.S. 191, 198 (2008) (quoting McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175, (1991)).

[3] 554 U.S. at 194–95, 198 (right to appointed counsel attaches even if no public prosecutor, as distinct from a police officer, is aware of that initial proceeding or involved in its conduct).

[4] See, e.g., Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, 54 (1961) (determining whether right to counsel applied in arraignment by examining whether it amounts to a "critical stage in a criminal proceeding").

[5] 287 U.S. 45, 57 (1932).

trial, when consultation, thorough-going investigation and preparation [are] vitally important, the defendants . . . [are] as much entitled to such aid [of counsel] during that period as at the trial itself."

The Court expanded on this language in Hamilton v. Alabama,[6] where the Court noted that arraignment under Alabama state law was a "critical stage." The Court reached that conclusion because in Alabama arraignment was the stage where certain defenses, pleas, and motions had to be made.[7] In White v. Maryland,[8] the Court set aside a conviction obtained at a trial at which the defendant's plea of guilty, entered at a preliminary hearing at which he was without counsel, was introduced as evidence against him at trial. Citing to Hamilton, the Court explained that "[w]hatever may be the normal function of the 'preliminary hearing' under Maryland law, it was in this case as 'critical' a state as arraignment under Alabama law" because the defendant "entered a plea before the magistrate and that plea was taken at a time when he had no counsel."[9]

Subsequently, in Coleman v. Alabama,[10] the Court identified a preliminary hearing as a "critical stage" necessitating counsel even though the only functions of the hearing were to determine probable cause to warrant presenting the case to a grand jury and to fix bail, and although no defense was required to be presented at that point and nothing occurring at the hearing could be used against the defendant at trial. The Court emphasized the practical difference a lawyer could have made at the preliminary hearing.[11] In particular, the Court hypothesized that a lawyer might, by skilled examination and cross-examination, expose weaknesses in the prosecution's case and thereby save the defendant from being required to face trial.[12] Further, the Court speculated that a lawyer could preserve testimony he elicited at the hearing for use in cross-examination at trial and impeachment purposes; better prepare for trial by discovering as much as possible of the prosecution's case against defendant; and influence the court in such matters as bail and psychiatric examination.[13]

Amdt6.6.3.3 Custodial Interrogation and Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed,

[6] 368 U.S. at 53, 54.

[7] Id. (listing the defense of insanity, pleas in abatement, and motions to quash, as examples of actions tied to the arraignment stage under Alabama law).

[8] 373 U.S. 59, 59–60 (1963) (per curiam).

[9] Id. at 60.

[10] 399 U.S. 1, 8 (1970) (plurality opinion). Inasmuch as the role of counsel at the preliminary hearing stage does not necessarily have the same effect upon the integrity of the fact-finding process as the role of counsel at trial, Coleman was subsequently denied retroactive effect. Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278, 285 (1972) (plurality opinion). Hamilton and White, however, were held to be retroactive. Arsenault v. Massachusetts, 393 U.S. 5 (1968) (per curiam).

[11] In doing so, Coleman appears to track the logic of several pre-Gideon cases in which a defendant was entitled to counsel if a lawyer might have made a difference. See Chewning v. Cunningham, 368 U.S. 443, 447 (1962) (concluding that counsel was necessary given the complexity of issues raised in underlying prosecution and the significant "potential prejudice resulting from the absence of counsel"); Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 507, 512–13 (1962) (observing that "[t]he assistance of counsel might well have materially aided the petitioner in coping with several aspects of the case" and therefore holding that "petitioner's case was one in which the assistance of counsel, unless intelligently and understandingly waived by him, was a right guaranteed him by the Fourteenth Amendment"); Hudson v. North Carolina, 363 U.S. 697, 703 (1960) (explaining the need for counsel in circumstances of underlying prosecution and finding that lack of counsel amounted to deprivation of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment).

[12] Coleman, 399 U.S. at 9.

[13] Id.

which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In the context of custodial interrogations—such as police questioning of a suspect[1]—the Court's doctrine on the extent of the right to counsel has evolved to be closely related to its doctrine on the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination.[2] At first, the Court evaluated the constitutionality of custodial interrogations against a rule of "fundamental fairness," assessing whether under all the circumstances a defendant was so prejudiced by the denial of access to counsel at custodial interrogation that his subsequent trial was tainted.[3] In 1959, the Court in Spano v. New York[4] declined to consider whether, as a blanket rule, a "confession obtained in the absence of counsel can be used without violating the Fourteenth Amendment." Instead, the Court in Spano concluded that use of the confession at issue violated the Fourteenth Amendment based on the surrounding circumstances—including the defendant's limited education, the numerous denials of request for counsel, and the hours of interrogation undertaken by various officers (one of whom was a friend of the defendant).[5]

Five years later, in Massiah v. United States,[6] the Court began to move away from this circumstance—dependent approach rooted in the Fourteenth Amendment, holding that post—indictment interrogation in the absence of defendant's lawyer was a denial of the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel.[7] The same year as Massiah, the Court in Escobedo v. Illinois[8] held that preindictment custodial interrogation violates the Sixth Amendment when "the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer." In 1966, the Court in Miranda v. Arizona[9] reaffirmed Escobedo, but switched from reliance on the Sixth Amendment to reliance on the Fifth Amendment's Self-Incrimination Clause in cases of pre-indictment custodial interrogation. That said,

---

[1] See, e.g., Interrogation, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) ("Police questioning of a detained person about the crime that he or she is suspected of having committed.").

[2] For further discussion of the Fifth Amendment and self-incrimination, see supra Amdt5.4.3 General Protections Against Self-Incrimination Doctrine and Practice.

[3] Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, 439 (1958); see also Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, 510 (1958) ("[T]his Court, in judging whether state prosecutions meet the requirements of due process, has sought to achieve a proper accommodation by considering a defendant's lack of counsel one pertinent element in determining from all the circumstances whether a conviction was attended by fundamental unfairness.").

[4] 360 U.S. 315, 320 (1959).

[5] Id. at 317–320.

[6] 377 U.S. 201, 205–06 (1964); See also McLeod v. Ohio, 381 U.S. 356 (1965) (per curiam) (citing Massiah and reversing State v. McLeod, 1 Ohio St. 2d 60 (Ohio 1964)—a state prosecution where an already-indicted defendant voluntarily made an oral confession to police); Cf. Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966) (declining to extend Massiah to require assistance of counsel for any questioning after the moment when the suspect could have been arrested, even if he or she was not); Milton v. Wainwright, 407 U.S. 371, 372 (1972) (passing on question of whether post-indictment questioning of suspect by officer posing as cellmate violated Sixth Amendment right to counsel pursuant to Massiah, because "any error in its admission was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt"). In Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586, 592 (2009), the Court "conclude[d] that the Massiah right is a right to be free of uncounseled interrogation, and is infringed at the time of the interrogation," not merely if and when the defendant's statement is admitted into evidence.

[7] In Massiah, federal officers used an informer to elicit incriminating admissions from the defendant—who had already been indicted and was represented by a lawyer—which they surreptitiously listened to through a broadcasting unit. Massiah, 377 U.S. at 201–03.

[8] 378 U.S. 478, 485, 490–91 (1964). Subsequently, the Court limited its holding in Escobedo to prospective application. See Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719, 721 (1966), abrogated by United States v. Johnson, 457 U.S. 537 (1982) ("We hold that Escobedo affects only those cases in which the trial began after June 22, 1964, the date of that decision.").

[9] 384 U.S. 436, 441, 467 (1966).

Miranda still placed great emphasis upon police warnings of the right to counsel and foreclosed interrogation in the absence of counsel without a valid waiver by defendant.[10] However, in subsequent opinions, the Court clarified that neither Miranda nor Escobedo support the assertion that "the Sixth Amendment right, in any of its manifestations, applies prior to the initiation of adversary judicial proceedings."[11]

Despite Miranda's general reliance on the Fifth Amendment, and the Court's limitation on the scope of Escobedo, it has reaffirmed and in some respects expanded Massiah. First, in Brewer v. Williams,[12] the Court held that police had violated the right to counsel by eliciting from the defendant incriminating admissions not through formal questioning but rather through a series of conversational openings designed to play on the defendant's known weakness. The police conduct occurred in the post-arraignment period in the absence of defense counsel and despite assurances to defense counsel that the defendant would not be questioned in his absence.[13] Then, in United States v. Henry,[14] the Court held that government agents violated the Sixth Amendment right to counsel when they contacted the cellmate of an indicted defendant and promised him payment under a contingent fee arrangement if he would "pay attention" to incriminating remarks initiated by the defendant and others. The Court concluded that, even if the government agents did not intend the informant to take affirmative steps to elicit incriminating statements from the defendant in the absence of counsel, the agents must have known that that result would follow.[15]

Another issue in the custodial interrogation context involves waiver of the right to counsel where the suspect makes incriminating statements during police questioning following a request for counsel. In Michigan v. Jackson, the Court held that, "if police initiate interrogation after a defendant's assertion, at an arraignment or similar proceeding, of his right to counsel, any waiver of the defendant's right to counsel for that police-initiated interrogation is invalid."[16] The Court concluded that "the reasons for prohibiting the interrogation of an uncounseled prisoner who has asked for the help of a lawyer are even stronger after he has been formally charged with an offense than before."[17] However, in Montejo v. Louisiana,[18] the [10] Id. at 471–75. The different issues in Fifth and Sixth Amendment cases were summarized in Fellers v. United States, 540 U.S. 519, 524–25 (2004), which held that absence of an interrogation is irrelevant in a Massiah-based Sixth Amendment inquiry.

---

[11] Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 429 (1986) (emphasis added); see also Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292, 299 (1990) ("In the instant case no charges had been filed on the subject of the interrogation, and our Sixth Amendment precedents are not applicable."). For a discussion of intervening precedent, which developed the concept of initiation of adversary proceedings, see Amdt6.6.3.4 Lineups and Other Identification Situations and Right to Counsel.

[12] 430 U.S. 387, 391–93 (1977). The Court later decided another similar case (involving incriminating statements made to police officers during a pre-indictment conversation in a patrol car) on self-incrimination grounds. Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 294–95, 302 (1980).

[13] Brewer, 430 U.S. at 391.

[14] 447 U.S. 264, 265–66, 270, 274–75 (1980); but see Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586, 589, 594 (2009) (concluding that law enforcement had violated defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel by soliciting incriminating statements through an informant planted in defendant's cell, but holding that statements were nevertheless admissible for purposes of impeaching the defendant's "inconsistent testimony at trial"); Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 550–51 (1977) (rejecting a per se rule that, regardless of the circumstances, "if an undercover agent meets with a criminal defendant who is awaiting trial and with his attorney and if the forthcoming trial is discussed without the agent's revealing his identity, a violation of the defendant's constitutional rights has occurred . . . ").

[15] Henry, 447 U.S. at 271.

[16] Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625, 636 (1986), overruled by Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778 (2009). .

[17] Id. at 631. The Court stated: "If an accused knowingly and intelligently" waives his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, there is "no reason why the uncounseled statements he then makes must be excluded at his trial." Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285, 291 (1988) (internal quotation marks omitted). Moreover, although the Court "require[s] a more searching or formal inquiry before permitting an accused to waive his right to counsel at trial than [it] require[s] for a Sixth Amendment waiver during postindictment questioning," it has clarified that "whatever standards suffice for Miranda's purposes will also be sufficient [for waiver of Sixth Amendment rights] in the context of postindictment

Court overruled Jackson, finding that the prophylactic Fifth Amendment protections created by Miranda and its progeny constitute sufficient protection of the right to counsel. The Court in Montejo was faced with the question of whether Jackson also barred waivers of the right where an attorney had been appointed in the absence of such an assertion.[19] In deciding to overrule Jackson, the Court in Montejo noted that "[n]o reason exists to assume that a defendant . . . who has done nothing at all to express his intentions with respect to his Sixth Amendment rights, would not be perfectly amenable to speaking with the police without having counsel present."[20] Moreover, the Court found, Jackson achieves little by way of preventing unconstitutional conduct.[21]

Statements obtained during custodial interrogation in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel are ordinarily inadmissible at trial (a remedy known as the exclusionary rule).[22] In light of the Sixth Amendment basis for the exclusionary rule—to protect the right to a fair trial—exceptions to that rule exist where that basis is not served. For example, in Nix v. Williams,[23] the Court held the "inevitable discovery" exception applied to defeat exclusion of evidence obtained as a result of an interrogation violating the accused's Sixth Amendment rights. The Court in Nix reasoned that "[e]xclusion of physical evidence that would inevitably have been discovered adds nothing to either the integrity or fairness of a criminal trial."[24] An exception to the Sixth Amendment exclusionary rule has also been recognized for the purpose of impeaching the defendant's trial testimony.[25] questioning." Id. at 298–99. In McNeil v. Wisconsin, the Court reasoned that the Sixth Amendment right is "offense-specific," and so also is "its Michigan v. Jackson effect of invalidating subsequent waivers in police-initiated interviews." 501 U.S. 171, 175, 177 (1991). The reason that the right is "offense-specific" is that "it does not attach until a prosecution is commenced." Id. Therefore, a defendant who has invoked his Sixth Amendment right to counsel with respect to the offense for which he is being prosecuted may maintain that right, but still potentially waive his Miranda -based right not to be interrogated about unrelated and uncharged offenses. The Court declined to recognize an exception to the offense-specific limitation for crimes that are closely related factually to a charged offense. Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162, 168 (2001). The Court instead borrowed from double-jeopardy law: if the same transaction constitutes a violation of two separate statutory provisions, the test is "whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not." Id. at 173 (quoting Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932)). Thus, where a defendant had been charged with burglary, but not murder, in connection with a fatal home invasion, the Court concluded that "the Sixth Amendment right to counsel did not bar police from interrogating [the defendant] regarding the murders, and [the defendant's] confession was therefore admissible," because "burglary and capital murder are not the same offense" under the relevant test. Id. at 173.

---

[18] 556 U.S. 778, 794 (2009).

[19] Id. at 782–83.

[20] Id. at 789.

[21] The Court reasoned that without Jackson, there would be "few if any" instances in which "fruits of interrogations made possible by badgering-induced involuntary waivers are ever erroneously admitted at trial" given Miranda and its progeny, which guarantee that "a defendant who does not want to speak to the police without counsel present need only say as much when he is first approached and given the Miranda warnings. At that point, not only must the immediate contact end, but 'badgering' by later requests is prohibited." Id. at 794–95.

[22] See Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 180 (1985) ("Consequently, incriminating statements pertaining to pending charges are inadmissible at the trial of those charges, notwithstanding the fact that the police were also investigating other crimes, if, in obtaining this evidence, the State violated the Sixth Amendment by knowingly circumventing the accused's right to the assistance of counsel."); Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 205–06 (1964) ("We hold that the petitioner was denied the basic protections of [the Sixth Amendment] when there was used against him at his trial evidence of his own incriminating words, which federal agents had deliberately elicited from him after he had been indicted and in the absence of his counsel."); but see Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 345–46 (1990) (holding that the "prosecution may use a statement taken [post-arraignment] in violation of the [Sixth Amendment] . . . to impeach a defendant's false or inconsistent testimony").

[23] 467 U.S. 431, 446 (1984).

[24] Id.

[25] See Harvey, 494 U.S. at 345–46 (post-arraignment statement taken in violation of Sixth Amendment is admissible to impeach defendant's inconsistent trial testimony); Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586, 589, 593 (2009)

Amdt6.6.3.4 Lineups and Other Identification Situations and Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Whether the right to counsel applies to identification situations depends in part on the extent to which they represent a critical stage in a criminal proceeding. United States v. Wade,[1] in conjunction with Gilbert v. California,[2] held that lineups are of critical importance and in-court identification of defendants based on out-of-court lineups or show-ups without the presence of defendant's counsel is inadmissible. In reaching that conclusion, the Court observed that "today's law enforcement machinery involves critical confrontations of the accused by the prosecution at pretrial proceedings where the results might well settle the accused's fate and reduce the trial itself to a mere formality."[3] Summarizing its Sixth Amendment doctrine in light of this context, the Court noted that "our cases have construed the Sixth Amendment guarantee to apply to 'critical' stages of the proceedings . . . The plain wording of this guarantee thus encompasses counsel's assistance whenever necessary to assure a meaningful 'defence.'"[4]

The Court reasoned that the presence of counsel at a lineup is constitutionally necessary because the lineup stage is filled with numerous possibilities for errors, both inadvertent and intentional, which cannot adequately be discovered and remedied at trial.[5] However, the Court concluded that there was less certainty and frequency of possible injustice stemming from lack of counsel in lineups than at trial, and the Court held that Wade and Gilbert were to be given prospective effect only; more egregious instances, where identification had been based upon lineups conducted in a manner that was unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification, could be invalidated under the Due Process Clause.[6] The Wade-Gilbert rule is inapplicable to other methods of obtaining identification and other evidentiary material relating to the defendant, such as blood samples, handwriting exemplars, and the like, because there is minimal risk that the absence of counsel might derogate from the defendant's right to a fair trial.[7]

In United States v. Ash,[8] the Court redefined and modified its "critical stage" analysis. According to the Court, the "core purpose" of the guarantee of counsel is to assure assistance at (statement made to informant planted in defendant's holding cell admissible for impeachment purposes because "[t]he interests safeguarded by exclusion are 'outweighed by the need to prevent perjury and to assure the integrity of the trial process'").

[1] 388 U.S. 218, 236–37 (1967) ("Since it appears that there is grave potential for prejudice, intentional or not, in the pretrial lineup, which may not be capable of reconstruction at trial, and since presence of counsel itself can often avert prejudice and assure a meaningful confrontation at trial, there can be little doubt that for [the defendant] the postindictment lineup was a critical stage of the prosecution at which he was 'as much entitled to such aid (of counsel). . . as at the trial itself.'" (quoting Powell v. State of Ala., 287 U.S. 45, 57 (1932)).

[2] 388 U.S. 263, 271–72 (1967).

[3] Wade, 388 U.S. at 224.

[4] Id. at 224–25.

[5] Id. at 227–39.

[6] Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 299–300 (1967).

[7] Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 265–67 (1967) (handwriting exemplars); Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 765–66 (1966) (blood samples).

[8] 413 U.S. 300, 311–13 (1973).

trial "when the accused was confronted with both the intricacies of the law and the advocacy of the public prosecutor."[9] Given developments in criminal investigation and procedure, assistance would be "less than meaningful if it were limited to the formal trial itself;" therefore, counsel is compelled at "pretrial events that might appropriately be considered to be parts of the trial itself."[10] The court explained that at these "newly emerging and significant events, the accused was confronted, just as at trial, by the procedural system, or by his expert adversary, or by both."[11] Therefore, unless the pretrial stage involves the physical presence of the accused at a trial-like confrontation at which the accused requires the guiding hand of counsel, the Sixth Amendment does not guarantee the assistance of counsel.[12] Because the defendant in Ash was not present when witnesses to the crime viewed photographs of possible guilty parties, the Court therefore concluded that there was no trial-like confrontation.[13] Further, because the possibilities of abuse in a photographic display are discoverable and reconstructable at trial by examining witnesses, the Court in Ash concluded that an indicted defendant is not entitled to have his counsel present at such a display.[14]

Another issue involves whether the right to counsel applies to lineups or identification procedures occurring before indictment. The defendants in Wade and Gilbert had already been indicted and counsel had been appointed to represent them when their lineups were conducted.[15] Subsequently in Kirby v. Illinois,[16] the Court held that no right to counsel exists for lineups that precede some formal act of charging a suspect. In a plurality opinion, the Court explained that the Sixth Amendment does not become operative until "the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment."[17] Such a step is significant, the Court observed, because, "it is the starting point of our whole system of adversary criminal justice" and it is only "then that the government has committed itself to prosecute, and only then that

[9] Id. at 309.

[10] Id. at 310.

[11] Id. Examination of defendant by court-appointed psychiatrist to determine his competency to stand trial, after his indictment, was a "critical" stage, and he was entitled to the assistance of counsel before submitting to it. Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 469–71 (1981). Constructive notice is insufficient to alert counsel to psychiatric examination to assess future dangerousness of an indicted client, Satterwhite v. Texas, 486 U.S. 249, 255 (1987); see also Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. 680, 686 (1989) (per curiam) (requiring under Sixth Amendment, notice to counsel of psychiatric examination for future dangerousness); Cf. Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402, 425, (1987) (finding no Sixth Amendment violation where "counsel was certainly on notice that if, as appears to be the case, he intended to put on a 'mental status' defense for petitioner, he would have to anticipate the use of psychological evidence by the prosecution in rebuttal"). Violations of the right to counsel at post-indictment psychiatric examinations of defendants are subject to harmless error analysis. Satterwhite, 486 U.S. at 258.

[12] Ash, 413 U.S. at 313.

[13] Id. at 317.

[14] 413 U.S. at 317–21.

[15] United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 219, 237 (1967); Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 269, 272 (1967); accord Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 382–83 (1968) ("The rationale of [Wade and Gilbert] . . . was that an accused is entitled to counsel at any 'critical stage of the prosecution,' and that a post-indictment lineup is such a 'critical stage.'").

[16] 406 U.S. 682, 689–90 (1972) (plurality opinion); see also Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 5 (1970) (concluding under totality of the circumstances that "[i]t cannot be said on this record that the trial court erred in finding that . . . in-court identification of the petitioners did not stem from an identification procedure at the lineup 'so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification'" (quoting Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. (1968)); Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440, 443 (1969) (holding that a police lineup—where defendant was taller than other participants and "was wearing a leather jacket similar to that worn by the robber"—"so undermined the reliability of the eyewitness identification as to violate due process"); Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 295, 302 (1967) (determining that although "practice of showing suspects singly to persons for the purpose of identification, and not as part of a lineup, has been widely condemned," it was not a due process violation to do so in the hospital room of a stabbing victim who was "hospitalized for major surgery to save her life").

[17] Kirby, 406 U.S. at 689.

the adverse positions of Government and defendant have solidified."[18] Further, the Court noted, "[i]t is then that a defendant finds himself faced with the prosecutorial forces of organized society, and immersed in the intricacies of substantive and procedural criminal law."[19] Therefore, the Court stated that the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings "marks the commencement of the 'criminal prosecutions' to which alone the explicit guarantees of the Sixth Amendment are applicable."[20] Kirby appears to limit opinions such as Escobedo v. Illinois,[21] which had held that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies to pre-indictment custodial interrogation,[22] at least to the extent Escobedo suggested that the right to counsel could apply before the initiation of adversary proceedings.[23]

Amdt6.6.3.5 Post-Conviction Proceedings and Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

With respect to post-conviction proceedings, the Court has held that the right to counsel applies at the sentencing stage,[1] and where sentencing was deferred after conviction and the defendant was placed on probation, he must be afforded counsel at a hearing on revocation of probation and imposition of the deferred sentence.[2] In other contexts such as state criminal appeals and prison disciplinary hearings the Court has eschewed Sixth Amendment analysis, instead delimiting the right to counsel under due process and equal protection principles.[3]

---

[18] Id.

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 689–90. Indictment, Kirby indicates, is not a necessary precondition. Any initiation of judicial proceedings suffices. E.g., Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 399 (1977) (explaining that there was "no doubt in the present case that judicial proceedings had been initiated" where a "warrant had been issued for [the defendant's] arrest, [the defendant] had been arraigned on that warrant before a judge in a Davenport courtroom, and [the defendant] had been committed by the court to confinement in jail"); see also United States v. Gouveia, 467 U.S. 180, 192 (1984) (holding that placing prison inmates placed under administrative segregation during a lengthy investigation of their participation in prison crimes does not amount to an initiation of judicial proceedings for Sixth Amendment purposes).

[21] 378 U.S. 478, 490–91 (1964).

[22] Amdt6.6.3.3 Custodial Interrogation and Right to Counsel.

[23] See Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 429 (1986) (Citing to Kirby and explaining that "[a]t the outset, subsequent decisions foreclose any reliance on Escobedo . . . for the proposition that the Sixth Amendment right, in any of its manifestations, applies prior to the initiation of adversary judicial proceedings.").

[1] The seminal precedent on the applicability of the right to counsel at sentencing is the Court's 1948 opinion Townsend v. Burke, which concluded that the defendant was entitled to counsel at sentencing as a matter of due process under the circumstances of that particular case. 334 U.S. 736, 741 (1948). However, in a later opinion, the Court seemed to indicate Townsend indicates a right to counsel at sentencing as a byproduct of the Sixth Amendment, noting that the opinion "might well be considered to support by itself a holding that the right to counsel applies at sentencing." Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128, 134 (1967).

[2] Mempa, 389 U.S. at 137 (applied retroactively in McConnell v. Rhay, 393 U.S. 2, 3 (1968) (per curiam)); but see Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 781, 790 (1973) (concluding that due process does not require appointment of counsel in every post-sentencing parole revocation proceeding, and instead "decision as to the need for counsel must be made on a case-by-case basis in the exercise of a sound discretion by the state authority charged with responsibility for administering the probation and parole system" (citing Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972)).

[3] For example, the Court has not invoked the Sixth Amendment when determining applicability of the right to counsel to state criminal appeals. See Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 356 (1963) (concluding that defendant was

Amdt6.6.3.6 Noncriminal and Investigatory Proceedings and Right to Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Court has construed the applicability of the right to counsel, or lack thereof, in various noncriminal and investigatory proceedings as a matter of the Due Process Clause rather than the Sixth Amendment. For example, commitment proceedings that lead to the imposition of essentially criminal punishment are subject to the Due Process Clause and require the assistance of counsel.[1] However, a state administrative investigation by a fire marshal inquiring into the causes of a fire was held not to be a criminal proceeding and hence, despite the fact that the petitioners had been committed to jail for noncooperation, not the type of hearing at which counsel was requisite as a matter of Due Process.[2] In another decision, the Court refused to extend the Due Process-based right to counsel to a non-prosecutorial, fact-finding inquiry akin to a grand jury proceeding, even though the defendants in the case were subsequently prosecuted and sentenced for contempt in refusing to testify at the inquiry on the ground that their counsel were required to remain outside the hearing room.[3]

Amdt6.6.4 Right to Choose Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Under the Sixth Amendment, there is a presumption that a defendant may retain counsel of choice, but the right to choose a particular attorney is not absolute.[1] For instance, in Wheat v. United States, a district court had denied a defendant's proffered waiver of conflict of interest and refused to allow representation by an attorney who represented the defendant's entitled to counsel in appealing conviction as a matter of equal protection); see also Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 612 (1974) ("In this case we do not believe that the Equal Protection Clause, when interpreted in the context of these cases, requires North Carolina to provide free counsel for indigent defendants seeking to take discretionary appeals to the North Carolina Supreme Court, or to file petitions for certiorari in this Court."). In addition, using due process analysis, the Court found no constitutional right to counsel in prison disciplinary proceedings. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 560–63, 570 (1974); see also Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 314–15 (1976) (rejecting assertion that Miranda requires appointment of counsel in prison disciplinary hearings and declining to alter holding in Wolff, 418 U.S. at 560–53, 580).

---

[1] Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605, 608, 610 (1967).

[2] In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 332, 334–35 (1957).

[3] Anonymous v. Baker, 360 U.S. 287, 289, 290–91, 295 (1959); see also United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 49 (1992) ("We have twice suggested, though not held, that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel does not attach when an individual is summoned to appear before a grand jury, even if he is the subject of the investigation.") (citing In re Groban, 352 U.S. at 333 and United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 581 (1976)).

[1] See Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 159 (1988) (explaining that "while the right to select and be represented by one's preferred attorney is comprehended by the Sixth Amendment," the "Sixth Amendment right to choose one's own counsel is circumscribed in several important respects").

co-conspirators in an illegal drug enterprise.[2] Upholding the district court's discretion to disallow representation in instances of actual conflict of interests or serious potential for conflict, the Court mentioned other situations in which a defendant's choice may not be honored.[3] A defendant, for example, is not entitled to an advocate who is not a member of the bar, nor may a defendant insist on representation by an attorney who denies counsel for financial reasons or otherwise, nor may a defendant demand the services of a lawyer who may be compromised by past or ongoing relationships with the Government.[4]

The right to retain counsel of choice generally does not bar operation of asset forfeiture provisions, even if the forfeiture serves to deny to a defendant the wherewithal to employ counsel. In Caplin & Drysdale v. United States,[5] the Court upheld a federal statute requiring forfeiture to the government of property and proceeds derived from drug-related crimes constituting a "continuing criminal enterprise,"[6] even though a portion of the forfeited assets had been used to retain defense counsel. Although a defendant may spend his own money to employ counsel, the Court declared, "[a] defendant has no Sixth Amendment right to spend another person's money for services rendered by an attorney, even if those funds are the only way that [the] defendant will be able to retain the attorney of his choice."[7] Because the statute vests title to the forfeitable assets in the United States at the time of the criminal act,[8] the defendant has no right to give them to a "third party" even if the purpose is to exercise a constitutionally protected right.[9] Moreover, on the same day Caplin & Drysdale was decided, the Court, in United States v. Monsanto, held that the government may, prior to trial, freeze assets that a defendant needs to hire an attorney if probable cause exists to "believe that the property will ultimately be proved forfeitable."[10] Nonetheless, in Luis v. United States the Court limited the holdings from Caplin & Drysdale and Monsanto, deciding that the Sixth Amendment provides criminal defendants the right to preserve legitimate, untainted assets unrelated to the underlying crime in order to retain counsel of their choice.[11]

---

[2] 486 U.S. 153 (1988).

[3] Id. at 159.

[4] Id.

[5] 491 U.S. 617, 619, 626 (1989).

[6] 21 U.S.C. §§ 848, 853.

[7] Caplin & Drysdale, 491 U.S. at 626.

[8] The statute was interpreted in United States v. Monsanto, 491 U.S. 600, 602, 607 (1989), as requiring forfeiture of all assets derived from the covered offenses, and as making no exception for assets the defendant intends to use for his defense.

[9] See Caplin & Drysdale, 491 U.S. at 628 ("There is no constitutional principle that gives one person the right to give another's property to a third party, even where the person seeking to complete the exchange wishes to do so in order to exercise a constitutionally protected right.").

[10] Monsanto, 491 U.S. at 615 ("Indeed, it would be odd to conclude that the Government may not restrain property, such as the home and apartment in respondent's possession, based on a finding of probable cause, when we have held that . . . the Government may restrain persons where there is a finding of probable cause to believe that the accused has committed a serious offense."). A subsequent case held that where a grand jury had returned an indictment based on probable cause, that conclusion was binding on a court during forfeiture proceedings and the defendants do not have a right to have such a conclusion re-examined in a separate judicial hearing in order to unfreeze the assets to pay for their counsel.

[11] 578 U.S. 5, 8–9, 12–13 (2016) (plurality opinion). The Court in Luis split as to the reasoning for holding that a pretrial freeze of untainted assets violates a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice. Four Justices employed a balancing test, weighing the government's contingent future interest in the untainted assets against the interests in preserving the right to counsel—a right at the "heart of a fair, effective criminal justice system"—in concluding that the defendant had the right to use innocent property to pay a reasonable fee for assistance of counsel. See id. at 16–23 (Justice Stephen Breyer, joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg & Sonia Sotomayor). Justice Clarence Thomas, in providing the fifth and deciding vote, concurred in judgment only, contending that "textual understanding and history" alone suffice to "establish that the Sixth

Where the right to be assisted by counsel of one's choice is wrongly denied, a Sixth Amendment violation occurs regardless of whether the alternate counsel retained was effective, or whether the denial caused prejudice to the defendant.[12] Further, because such a denial is not a "trial error" (a constitutional error that occurs during presentation of a case to the jury) but a "structural defect" (a constitutional error that affects the framework of the trial), the Court held that the decision is not subject to a "harmless error" analysis.[13]

In Faretta v. California, the Court held that the Sixth Amendment, in addition to guaranteeing the right to retained or appointed counsel, also guarantees a defendant the right to represent himself.[14] It is a right the defendant must adopt knowingly and intelligently;[15] under some circumstances the trial judge may deny the authority to exercise it, as when the defendant simply lacks the competence to make a knowing or intelligent waiver of counsel[16] or when his self-representation is so disruptive of orderly procedures that the judge may curtail it.[17] The right applies only at trial; there is no constitutional right to self-representation on direct appeal from a criminal conviction.[18] The Court spelled out the essential elements of self-representation in McKaskle v. Wiggins,[19] a case involving the self-represented defendant's rights vis-a-vis "standby counsel" appointed by the trial court. The "core of the Faretta right" is that the defendant "is entitled to preserve actual control over the case he chooses to present to the jury," and consequently, standby counsel's participation "should not be allowed to destroy the jury's perception that the defendant is representing himself."[20] But participation of standby counsel even in the jury's presence and over the defendant's objection does not violate the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights when serving the basic purpose of aiding the defendant in complying with routine courtroom procedures and protocols and thereby relieving the trial judge of these tasks.[21]

Amendment prevents the Government from freezing untainted assets in order to secure a potential forfeiture." See id. at 25 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also id. at 33 ("I cannot go further and endorse the plurality's atextual balancing analysis.").

[12] United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. 140, 144–45 (2006).

[13] Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. at 148–50 (citing Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 282 (1991)).

[14] 422 U.S. 806, 807, 817 (1975). Although the Court acknowledged some concern by judges that Faretta leads to unfair trials for defendants, in Indiana v. Edwards the Court declined to overrule Faretta. 554 U.S. 164, 178 (2008). Even if the defendant exercises his right to his detriment, the Constitution ordinarily guarantees him the opportunity to do so. See Faretta, 422 U.S. at 834 (explaining that "[i]t is the defendant, therefore, who must be free personally to decide whether in his particular case counsel is to his advantage," and that "although he may conduct his own defense ultimately to his own detriment, his choice must be honored"). A defendant who represents himself cannot thereafter complain that the quality of his defense denied him effective assistance of counsel. Id. at 834–35 n.46. The Court, however, has not addressed what state aid, such as access to a law library, might need to be made available to a defendant representing himself. Kane v. Garcia Espitia, 546 U.S. 9, 10 (2005) (per curiam). Related to the right of self-representation is the right to testify in one's own defense. See Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 52, 62 (1987) (holding that per se rule excluding all hypnotically refreshed testimony violates right).

[15] See, e.g., Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 396 (1993) (explaining that a criminal defendant "may not waive his right to counsel or plead guilty unless he does so 'competently and intelligently'" (quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 468 (1938)).

[16] The fact that a defendant is mentally competent to stand trial does not preclude a court from finding him not mentally competent to represent himself at trial. Edwards, 554 U.S. at 177–78. Mental competence to stand trial, however, is sufficient to ensure the right to waive the right to counsel in order to plead guilty. Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 398–99 (1993).

[17] Faretta, 422 U.S. at 834 n.46.

[18] Martinez v. Court of App. of Cal., Fourth App. Dist., 528 U.S. 152, 154 (2000). The Sixth Amendment itself "does not include any right to appeal." Id. at 160.

[19] 465 U.S. 168, 170 (1984).

[20] Id. at 178.

[21] Id. at 184.

Amdt6.6.5 Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel

Amdt6.6.5.1 Overview of the Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In McMann v. Richardson, the Court held that "the right to counsel is the right to the effective assistance of counsel."[1] This right to effective assistance may be implicated in at least three ways.[2] First, a court's action may interfere with counsel's effectiveness if the court restricts a defense counsel in exercising his or her representational duties and prerogatives attendant to the adversarial system of justice of the United States.[3] Second, the Sixth Amendment is implicated when a court appoints a defendant's attorney to represent his co-defendant as well, where the co-defendants are known to have potentially conflicting interests.[4] Third, defense counsel may deprive a defendant of effective assistance by failing to provide competent representation that is adequate to ensure a fair trial,[5] or, more broadly, a just outcome.[6] The right to effective assistance may be implicated as early as the process for appointment of counsel.[7]

Amdt6.6.5.2 Deprivation of Effective Assistance of Counsel by Court Interference

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the

---

[1] McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 771 n.14 (1970). The Court stated: "[I]f the right to counsel guaranteed by the Constitution is to serve its purpose, defendants cannot be left to the mercies of incompetent counsel . . . ." Id. at 771. As a corollary, there is no Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance where there is no Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Wainwright v. Torna, 455 U.S. 586, 587–88 (1982) (per curiam) (holding that defendant may not raise ineffective assistance claim in context of proceeding in which he had no constitutional right to counsel).

[2] An additional issue is the extent to which the actions of government investigators may interfere with the effective assistance of counsel. See United States v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361, 362, 364, 366 (1981) (assuming without deciding that investigators who met with defendant on another matter without knowledge or permission of counsel and who disparaged counsel and suggested she could do better without him, interfered with counsel, but holding that in absence of showing of adverse consequences to representation, dismissal of indictment was inappropriate remedy).

[3] E.g., Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80, 91 (1976) (holding "that an order preventing [defendant] from consulting his counsel 'about anything' during a seventeen hour overnight recess between his direct and cross-examination impinged upon his right to the assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment"); Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 864–65 (1975) (concluding that trial court denied defendant effective assistance of counsel through application of state statute to bar defense counsel from making final summation).

[4] E.g., Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 75–76 (1942) (holding that court deprived defendant of effective assistance of counsel by appointing the same counsel to represent defendant and a codefendant despite danger of divided attention and conflicts).

[5] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 686 (1984).

[6] See, e.g., Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156, 162–63 (2012) (defense counsel deprived defendant of effective assistance of counsel through erroneous advice during plea bargaining).

[7] Glasser, 315 U.S. at 70 (stating that "the 'Assistance of Counsel' guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment contemplates that such assistance be untrammeled and unimpaired by a court order requiring that one lawyer shall simultaneously represent conflicting interests"); see also Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 71–72 (1932) (holding that as a matter of due process, the assignment of defense counsel in a capital case must be timely and made in a manner that affords "effective aid in the preparation and trial of the case").

nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Restrictions on representation imposed during trial have been stricken as impermissible interference with defense counsel. For example, the Court invalidated application of a statute that empowered a judge to deny final summations before judgment in a nonjury trial; explaining that "the right to the assistance of counsel . . . ensures to the defense in a criminal trial the opportunity to participate fully and fairly in the adversary factfinding process."[1] In Geders v. United States,[2] the Court held that a trial judge's order preventing a defendant from consulting his counsel during a 17-hour overnight recess between his direct and cross-examination, to prevent tailoring of testimony or "coaching," deprived the defendant of his right to assistance of counsel and was invalid.[3] The Court has treated other direct and indirect restraints upon counsel as violations of the Fourteenth Amendment right to due process.[4]

Amdt6.6.5.3 Deprivation of Effective Assistance of Counsel in Joint Representation

Sixth Amendment:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

In cases of joint representation of codefendants, deprivation of effective assistance of counsel may result from a lack of fidelity by the attorney to the client. For instance, in Glasser v. United States, the Court held a trial judge erred in appointing one defendant's attorney to also represent a codefendant in a conspiracy case, where the judge knew of potential conflicts of interest in the case, and the original defendant had earlier expressed a desire for sole representation.[1] In another case, counsel for codefendants made a timely assertion to the trial judge that continuing joint representation could pose a conflict of interest, and the Court held that the trial judge erred in not examining the assertion closely and by not permitting or appointing separate counsel, absent a finding that the risk of conflict was remote.[2] Joint [1] Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 858, 864–65 (1975)."[T]he right to the assistance to counsel has been understood to mean that there can be no restrictions upon the function of counsel in defending a criminal prosecution in accord with the traditions of the adversary factfinding process that has been constitutionalized in the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments." Id. at 857.

---

[2] 425 U.S. 80, 91 (1976).

[3] The Court distinguished Geders in Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272, 283–85 (1989), which upheld a trial court's order that the defendant and his counsel not consult during a fifteen-minute recess between the defendant's direct testimony and his cross-examination; see also Chandler v. Fretag, 348 U.S. 3, 10 (1954) (holding that denial of request for continuance "to employ and consult with counsel" deprived defendant of due process of law).

[4] E.g., Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 612–13 (1972) (alternative holding) (statute requiring defendant to testify prior to any other witness for defense or to forfeit the right to testify denied him due process by depriving him of the tactical advice of counsel on whether to testify and when); Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 596 (1961) (concluding under the Fourteenth Amendment where Georgia statute, uniquely, barred sworn testimony by defendants, a defendant was entitled to the assistance of counsel in presenting the unsworn statement allowed him under Georgia law).

[1] 315 U.S. 60, 75–76 (1942).

[2] Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475, 484 (1978). Counsel had been appointed by the court. Id. at 477.

representation does not deny effective assistance per se, however.[3] Judges are not automatically required to initiate an inquiry into the propriety of multiple representation, and are able to assume in the absence of "special circumstances" that no conflict exists.[4] On the other hand, a defendant who objects to joint representation must be given an opportunity to make the case that potential conflicts exists.[5] Absent an objection, a defendant must later show the existence of an "actual conflict of interest [that] adversely affected his lawyer's performance."[6] Once it is established that a conflict did actively affect the lawyer's joint representation, however, a defendant need not additionally prove that the lawyer's representation was prejudicial to the outcome of the case.[7]

Amdt6.6.5.4 Deprivation of Effective Assistance of Counsel by Defense Counsel

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The Sixth Amendment's guarantee of effective assistance of counsel is not satisfied by the mere appointment of counsel regardless of the competence or fidelity of their services; indeed, the "right to counsel prevents the States from conducting trials at which persons who face incarceration must defend themselves without adequate legal assistance."[1] Further, the Sixth Amendment's right to effective assistance applies to counsel regardless of whether counsel is appointed or privately retained or whether the government in any way brought about the defective representation.[2] As the Court has explained, "[t]he vital guarantee of the Sixth Amendment would stand for little if the often uninformed decision to retain a particular lawyer could reduce or forfeit the defendant's entitlement to constitutional protection."[3] [3] See Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 348 (1980) ("[M]ultiple representation does not violate the Sixth Amendment unless it gives rise to a conflict of interest." (citing Holloway, 435 U.S. at 482)).

---

[4] See id. at 346–47 ("Absent special circumstances, therefore, trial courts may assume either that multiple representation entails no conflict or that the lawyer and his clients knowingly accept such risk of conflict as may exist.").

[5] Id. at 348.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. at 348–50; see also Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 162 (1988) ("[W]here a court justifiably finds an actual conflict of interest, there can be no doubt that it may decline a proffer of waiver, and insist that defendants be separately represented."); Wood v. Georgia, 450 U.S. 261, 272–73 (1981) (concluding on due process grounds that where counsel retained by defendants' employer potentially had conflict between defendants' interests and employer's, and facts indicating potential conflict were known to trial judge, the trial judge should have inquired further). Where an alleged conflict is not premised on joint representation, but rather on a prior representation of a different client, for example, a defendant may be required to show actual prejudice in addition to a potential conflict. Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162, 166–67, 173–74 (2002). For earlier cases presenting more direct violations of defendant's rights, see generally Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60 (1942); United States v. Hayman, 342 U.S. 205 (1952); and Ellis v. United States, 356 U.S. 674 (1958).

[1] Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980)

[2] See id. ("A proper respect for the Sixth Amendment disarms petitioner's contention that defendants who retain their own lawyers are entitled to less protection than defendants for whom the State appoints counsel.").

[3] Id.

The seminal test for adequate representation stems from the Court's 1984 opinion Strickland v. Washington.[4] There are two components to the Strickland test: (1) deficient representation and (2) resulting prejudice to the defense so serious as to bring the outcome of the proceeding into question.[5]

Amdt6.6.5.5 Deficient Representation Under Strickland

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

The gauge of deficient representation is an objective standard of reasonableness "under prevailing professional norms" that takes into account "all the circumstances" and evaluates conduct "from counsel's perspective at the time."[1] Providing effective assistance is not limited to a single path. No detailed rules or guidelines for adequate representation are appropriate, as "[a]ny such set of rules would interfere with the constitutionally protected independence of counsel and restrict the wide latitude counsel must have in making tactical decisions."[2]

---

[4] 466 U.S. 668 (1984). In an earlier case, the Court had observed that whether defense counsel provided adequate representation, in advising a guilty plea, depended not on whether a court would retrospectively consider his advice right or wrong "but on whether that advice was within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases." McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 768–71 (1970); see also United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 102 n.5 (1976) ("We think it clear, however, that counsel's failure to obtain . . . prior criminal record does not demonstrate ineffectiveness."); Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258, 266 (1973) ("If a prisoner pleads guilty on the advice of counsel, he must demonstrate that the advice was not 'within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases.'" (quoting McMann, 397 U.S. at 771)).

[5] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 687. The Court has emphasized that an "ineffective-assistance claim can function as a way to escape rules of waiver and forfeiture and raise issues not presented at trial, and so the Strickland standard must be applied with scrupulous care, lest 'intrusive post-trial inquiry' threaten the integrity of the very adversary process the right to counsel is meant to serve." Harrington v. Richter, 562 U.S. 86, 105 (2011) (quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689–90). Furthermore, ineffective assistance of counsel claims frequently are asserted in federal court to support petitions for writs of habeas corpus filed by state prisoners. E.g., Richter, 562 U.S. at 96–97; Kimmelman v. Morrison, 477 U.S. 365 (1986). Making a successful Strickland claim in a habeas context, as opposed to direct review, was further complicated by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA). Pub. L. No. 104–132, § 104, 110 Stat. 1218–1219, amending 28 U.S.C. § 2254. See generally, e.g., Shinn v. Martinez Ramirez, No. 20–1009, at 2, 6–22 (U.S. May 23, 2022) (reviewing and applying AEDPA to foreclose evidentiary hearing where "prisoner's state postconviction counsel negligently failed to develop the state-court record" of ineffective assistance of trial counsel). After the passage of AEDPA, one must go beyond showing that a state court applied federal law incorrectly to also show that the court misapplied established Supreme Court precedent in a manner that no fair-minded jurist could find to be reasonable. E.g., Richter, 562 U.S. at 100–05, 106 (reviewing and applying AEDPA standards to habeas claim premised on ineffective assistance of counsel, and holding that counsel's decision to forgo inquiry into blood evidence was at least arguably reasonable); see also Burt v. Titlow, 571 U.S. 12, 15 (2013) (reversing Sixth Circuit decision based on "doubly deferential" standard of review for habeas claims under AEDPA and Strickland that does not "permit federal judges to . . . casually second-guess the decisions of their state-court colleagues or defense attorneys"); Cullen v. Pinholster, 563 U.S. 170, 187 (2011) (evaluating federal habeas claim premised on ineffective assistance of counsel and concluding that standard required by AEDPA had not been met).

[1] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 688, 689; see also Maryland v. Kulbicki, 577 U.S. 1, 4 (2015) (per curiam) (reversing an opinion by Maryland's highest state court, which found that counsel was ineffective because the defendant's attorneys did not question the methodology used by the state in analyzing bullet fragments, on the grounds that this methodology "was widely accepted" at the time of trial, and courts "regularly admitted [such] evidence").

[2] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689. The Court in Strickland observed that "American Bar Association standards and the like" may reflect prevailing norms of practice, "but they are only guides." Id. at 688. Subsequent cases also cite ABA standards as touchstones of prevailing norms of practice. E.g., Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, 387 (2005); Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 524 (2003). But in Bobby v. Van Hook, the Court held that the Sixth Circuit had erred in assessing

Because even the most highly competent attorneys might choose to defend a client differently, "[j]udicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential."[3] Counsel's obligation is a general one: to act within the wide range of legitimate, lawful, and reasonable conduct.[4] The Court has advised that "strategic choices made after thorough investigation of [relevant] law and facts . . . are virtually unchallengeable,"[5] and the same is true of reasonable decisions that "make[ ] particular investigations unnecessary,"[6] or reasonable decisions in selecting which issues to raise on appeal.[7] In Strickland itself, the allegation of ineffective assistance failed; the Court held that the defense attorney's decision to forgo character and psychological evidence in a capital sentencing proceeding to avoid rebuttal evidence of the defendant's criminal history was "the result of reasonable professional judgment."[8]

On the other hand, defense counsel does have a general duty to investigate a defendant's background, and a decision to limit investigation and presentation of mitigating evidence must be supported by reasonable efforts and judgment.[9] Also, even though deference to counsel's choices may seem particularly apt in the unstructured, often style-driven arena of plea an attorney's conduct in the 1980s under 2003 ABA guidelines, and also noted that its holding "should not be regarded as accepting the legitimacy of a less categorical use of the [2003] Guidelines to evaluate post-2003 representation." 558 U.S. 4, 7, 8 n.1 (2009) (per curiam).

---

[3] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689. The purpose is "not to improve the quality of legal representation, . . . [but] simply to ensure that criminal defendants receive a fair trial." Id.

[4] There is no obligation to assist the defendant in presenting perjured testimony, Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 171, 175 (1986), and a defendant has no right to require his counsel to use peremptory challenges to exclude jurors on the basis of race. Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 57 (1992). Also, "effective" assistance of counsel does not guarantee the accused a "meaningful relationship" of "rapport" with his attorney such that he is entitled to a continuance in order to change attorneys during a trial. Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1, 13–14 (1983).

[5] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690; see also Burt, 571 U.S. at 23–24 (rejecting conclusion that a lack of evidence indicating that counsel gave "constitutionally adequate advice on whether to withdraw [a] guilty plea" justified finding counsel ineffective on Sixth Amendment grounds); Yarborough v. Gentry, 540 U.S. 1, 4–6 (2003) (per curiam) (applying deference to attorney's choice of tactics for closing argument and reversing federal appellate decision finding that counsel had deprived defendant of effective assistance of counsel).

[6] Strickland, 466 U.S. at 691; see also Schriro v. Landrigan, 550 U.S. 465, 475–77 (2007) (determining that federal district court was within its discretion to conclude that attorney's failure to present mitigating evidence made no difference in sentencing); Woodford v. Visciotti, 537 U.S. 19, 26–27 (2002) (per curiam) (determining that state courts could reasonably have concluded that failure to present mitigating evidence was outweighed by "severe" aggravating factors).

[7] There is no obligation to present on appeal all nonfrivolous issues requested by the defendant. Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 750–51, 754 (1983) (concluding that appointed counsel may exercise his professional judgment in determining which issues are best raised on appeal).

[8] 466 U.S. at 699; see also Wong v. Belmontes, 558 U.S. 15, 20, 28 (2009) (per curiam) (rejecting ineffective assistance of counsel claim based on decision not to present additional mitigating evidence); Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168, 184–87 (1986) (similar).

[9] See Andrus v. Texas, No. 18–9674, slip op. at 1–2, 8 (U.S. Jun. 15, 2020) (per curiam) (concluding the defendant's counsel provided constitutionally ineffective assistance by inadequately investigating mitigating evidence, providing evidence that bolstered the state's case, and failing to scrutinize the state's aggravating evidence); Buck v. Davis, No. 15–8049, slip op. at 17 (U.S. Feb. 22, 2017) (concluding that "[n]o competent defense attorney would introduce" evidence that his client was a future danger because of his race); see also Hinton v. Alabama, 571 U.S. 263, 274 (2014) (per curiam) (holding an attorney's hiring of a questionably competent expert witness because of a mistaken belief in the legal limit on the amount of funds payable on behalf of an indigent defendant constitutes ineffective assistance); Sears v. Upton, 561 U.S. 945, 951–52, 956 (2010) (per curiam) (concluding that the "cursory nature" of a defense counsel's investigation into mitigation evidence was constitutionally ineffective); Porter v. McCollum, 558 U.S. 30, 39–40 (2009) (per curiam) (holding an attorney's failure to interview witnesses or search records in preparation for penalty phase of capital murder trial constituted ineffective assistance of counsel); Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, 385 (2005) (concluding that a defendant's attorneys' failure to consult trial transcripts from a prior conviction that the attorneys knew the prosecution would rely on in arguing for the death penalty was inadequate); Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 526–28 (2003) (holding an attorney's failure to investigate defendant's personal history and present important mitigating evidence at capital sentencing was objectively unreasonable).

bargaining,[10] an accused, in considering a plea, is clearly entitled to advice of counsel on the prospect of conviction at trial and the extent of punishment that might be imposed. Thus, in Lafler v. Cooper the government conceded that the deficient representation part of the Strickland test was met when an attorney erroneously advised the defendant during plea negotiations that the facts in his case would not support a conviction for attempted murder.[11] In Missouri v. Frye,[12] the Court held that failure to communicate a plea offer to a defendant also may amount to deficient representation.

Moreover, in Padilla v. Kentucky the Court held that defense counsel's Sixth Amendment duty to a client considering a plea goes beyond advice on issues directly before the criminal court to reach advice on deportation.[13] Because of its severity, historical association with the criminal justice system, and increasing certainty following conviction and imprisonment, the Court found deportation to be of a "unique nature."[14] Further, the Court held that defense counsel failed to meet prevailing professional norms in representing to the defendant that he did not have to worry about deportation because of the length of his legal residency in the United States.[15] The Court emphasized that this conclusion was not based on the attorney's mistaken advice, but rather on a broader obligation to inform a noncitizen client whether a plea carries a risk of deportation.[16]

Amdt6.6.5.6 Prejudice Resulting from Deficient Representation Under Strickland

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

For deficient representation to constitute a constitutional violation, the Court established in Strickland v. Washington that there must be (1) deficient representation and (2) resulting prejudice to the defense so serious as to bring the outcome of the proceeding into question.[1] Meeting the second requirement of Strickland—whether the deficient representation resulted in prejudice—can be challenging The touchstone of "prejudice" under Strickland is that the defendant "must show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's [10] See, e.g., Premo v. Moore, 562 U.S. 115, 123–26 (2011) (reviewing considerations when evaluating ineffective assistance claim at plea bargaining stage and noting that "[p]lea bargains are the result of complex negotiations suffused with uncertainty, and defense attorneys must make careful strategic choices in balancing opportunities and risks").

---

[11] 566 U.S. 156, 161, 166 (2012).

[12] 566 U.S. 134, 145 (2012) ("[A]s a general rule, defense counsel has the duty to communicate formal offers from the prosecution to accept a plea on terms and conditions that may be favorable to the accused.").

[13] Padilla v. Kentucky, 559 U.S. 356, 368–69 (2010).

[14] Id. at 365–66. The Court did not address whether distinguishing between direct and collateral consequences of conviction was appropriate in bounding defense counsel's constitutional duty in a criminal case. Id. at 365.

[15] Id. at 359, 367–69.

[16] Id. at 369–74 (2010). On the issue of prejudice to the defendant from ineffective assistance, the Court sent the case back to lower courts for further findings. Id. at 369. In Chaidez v. United States, the Court held that Padilla announced a "new rule" of criminal procedure that did not apply "retroactively" during collateral review of convictions then already final. 568 U.S. 342, 358 (2013).

[1] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687 (1984).

unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A reasonable probability is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome."[2] Defendants frequently fall short on the prejudice requirement.[3]

Beyond Strickland's "reasonable probability of a different result" test for determining prejudice, there are issues of when an "outcome determinative" test alone suffices, what exceptions exist, and whether the general rule should be modified. In Lockhart v. Fretwell, the Court appeared to refine the Strickland test when it stated that an "analysis focusing solely on mere outcome determination" is "defective" unless attention is also given to whether the result was "fundamentally unfair or unreliable."[4] However, the Court subsequently characterized Lockhart as limited to a class of exceptions to the "outcome determinative" test and not supplanting it.[5] According to Williams v. Taylor, it would disserve justice in some circumstances to find prejudice premised on a likelihood of a different outcome.[6] For example, fundamental fairness precluded finding prejudice where defense counsel had failed to object to the use sentencing of an aggravating factor barred by a recent appellate case, but where that case was subsequently overturned.[7] According to the Court, finding prejudice based on defense counsel's failure to object in the narrow window where it would have been permissible based on the shifting precedent would have been nothing more than a fortuitous windfall for the [2] See Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 694 (1984). This standard does not require that a defendant show "that counsel's deficient conduct more likely than not altered the outcome in the case." See Id. at 693. At the same time, the Court has concluded that the "prejudice inquiry under See Strickland" applies to cases beyond those in which there was only "little or no mitigation evidence" presented. Sears v. Upton, 561 U.S. 945, 954 (2010) (per curiam); Porter v. McCollum, 558 U.S. 30, 40–42 (2009) (per curiam) (evaluating the totality of mitigating evidence to conclude that there was "a reasonable probability that the advisory jury—and the sentencing judge—would have struck a different balance'" but for the counsel's deficiencies (Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 537 (2003))). For an example of a criminal defendant who succeeded on the prejudice prong of the Strickland test, see Buck v. Davis, No. 15–8049, slip op. at 18–20 (U.S. Feb. 22, 2017) (holding that, in a case where the focus of a capital sentencing proceeding was on the defendant's likelihood of recidivism, defense counsel had been ineffective by introducing racially charged testimony about the defendant's future dangerousness, and "[r]easonable jurors might well have valued [the testimony] concerning the central question before them"). Where a defendant alleges that ineffective assistance of counsel resulted in an increased term of imprisonment, it is not necessary that the increased prison term be of significant duration. See Glover v. United States, 531 U.S. 198, 203 (2001) ("Authority does not suggest that a minimal amount of additional time in prison cannot constitute prejudice. Quite to the contrary, our jurisprudence suggests that any amount of actual jail time has Sixth Amendment significance.").

[3] E.g., Smith v. Spisak, 558 U.S. 139, 154–56 (2010). In Hill v. Lockhart, the Court applied the Strickland test to attorney decisions to accept a plea bargain, holding that a defendant must show a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, the defendant would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial. 474 U.S. 52, 59 (1985). As a result, the prejudice question with respect to when a counsel's deficient performance leads the defendant to accept a guilty plea rather than go to trial is not whether the trial would have resulted in a not guilty verdict. See Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 482–83 (2000). Instead, the issue is whether the defendant was prejudiced by the "denial of the entire judicial proceeding . . . to which he had a right." Id. at 483. As a result, prejudice may be very difficult to prove if the defendant's decision about going to trial turns on his prospects of success and those chances are affected by an attorney's error. See Premo v. Moore, 562 U.S. 115, 118, 123–24 (2011). However, when a defendant's choice to accept a plea bargain has nothing to do with his chances of success at trial, such as if the defendant is primarily concerned with the respective consequences of a conviction after trial or by plea, a defendant can show prejudice by providing evidence contemporaneous with the acceptance of the plea that he would have rejected the plea if not for the erroneous advice of counsel. See Lee v. United States, No. 16–327, slip op. at 7–10 (U.S. Mar. 28, 2017) (holding that a defendant whose fear of deportation was the determinative factor in whether to accept a plea agreement could show prejudice resulting from his attorney's erroneous advice that a felony charge would not lead to deportation even when a different result at trial was remote).

[4] 506 U.S. 364, 368–70 (1993).

[5] See Glover, 531 U.S. at 203 ("The Court explained last Term that our holding in Lockhart does not supplant the Strickland analysis."); Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 391 (2000) ("The Virginia Supreme Court erred in holding that our decision in [Lockhart] . . . modified or in some way supplanted the rule set down in Strickland.") (internal citation omitted).

[6] 529 U.S. at 391–92.

[7] Id. at 392–93.

defendant.[8] As another example, the Court has said it would be unjust to find legitimate prejudice in a defense attorney's interference with a defendant's perjured testimony, even if that testimony could have altered a trial's outcome.[9]

A second category of recognized exceptions to the application of the "outcome determinative" prejudice test includes the relatively limited number of cases in which prejudice is presumed. This presumption occurs when there are "circumstances that are so likely to prejudice the accused that the cost of litigating their effect in a particular case is unjustified."[10] These situations, the Court explained in United States v. Cronic involve some kind of "breakdown of the adversarial process," and include actual or constructive denial of counsel, denial of such basics as the right to effective cross-examination, or failure of counsel to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing.[11] Moreover, prejudice is presumed "when counsel's constitutionally deficient performance deprives a defendant of an appeal that he otherwise would have taken."[12] "Apart from circumstances of that magnitude, however, there is generally no basis for finding a Sixth Amendment violation unless the accused can show [prejudice],"[13] and consequently most claims of inadequate representation continue to be measured by the Strickland standard.[14]

Amdt6.6.5.7 Limits on Role of Attorney

Sixth Amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

While the Sixth Amendment guarantees the right of assistance of counsel, that right does not require the defendant to surrender control entirely to his representative.[1] Defense counsel's central province is in trial management, providing assistance in deciding what arguments to make, what evidentiary objections to raise, and what evidence should be

[8] Id.

[9] Id. (citing and discussing Nix. v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 175–76 (1986)).

[10] United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 658 (1984).

[11] Id. at 657–59.

[12] Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 484 (2000). In Garza v. Idaho, the Court clarified that the presumption of prejudice that applies when counsel's deficient performance forfeits an appeal that a defendant otherwise would have taken remains even when the defendant has signed an appeal waiver, because issues may remain as to the scope or validity of the waiver and the presumption-of-prejudice rule does not depend upon the prospects of the defendant's appeal. No. 17–1026, slip op. at 3–6, 9 (U.S. Feb. 27, 2019).

[13] Cronic, 466 U.S. at 659 n.26.

[14] See, e.g., Weaver v. Massachusetts, No. 16–240, slip op. at 12 (U.S. June 22, 2017) (holding that "when a defendant raises a public-trial violation via an ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim, Strickland prejudice is not shown automatically"); Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 189–90 (2004) (holding that a concession-of-guilt strategy in a capital trial does not automatically rank as prejudicial ineffective assistance of counsel); Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685, 697–98 (2002) (concluding that Cronic's rule that prejudice can be presumed when counsel "entirely fails" to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing does not extend to situations where counsel's failings were limited to specific points in the trial); Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162, 173–74 (2002) (holding that, to demonstrate a Sixth Amendment violation where the trial court fails to inquire into a potential conflict of interest, the defendant must establish that the conflict adversely affected his counsel's performance).

[1] See Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 819–20 (1975) (noting that counsel, by providing "assistance," no matter how expert, is "still an assistant").

submitted.[2] At the same time, the accused has the "ultimate authority to make certain fundamental decisions regarding the case," including "whether to plead guilty, waive a jury, testify in his or her own behalf, or take an appeal."[3] Such decisions are for the criminal defendant to make notwithstanding the defendant's own inexperience or lack of professional qualifications.[4] Allowing counsel to usurp such decisions from the accused violates the Sixth Amendment's right to counsel, amounting to a structural error that obviates any need to inquire into whether the criminal defendant was prejudiced in any way.[5]

In this vein, the Court held in McCoy v. Louisiana that a criminal defendant's choice to maintain his innocence at the guilt phase of a capital trial was not a strategic choice for counsel to make, notwithstanding counsel's view that confessing guilt offered the best chance to avoid the death penalty.[6] Instead, the Court concluded that such a decision amounts to a fundamental choice about the client's objectives for the criminal proceeding.[7] More specifically, while acknowledging that counsel "may reasonably assess a concession of guilt as best suited to avoiding the death penalty," the Court noted that a criminal defendant may not share the objective of avoiding such a punishment and instead may wish, above all else, to avoid admitting guilt or living the rest of his life in prison.[8] Because the Sixth Amendment requires the assistance of counsel, the McCoy Court concluded that a lawyer cannot concede his client's guilt and must instead assist in achieving his client's express objective to maintain his innocence of the charged criminal acts.[9]

[2] See Gonzalez v. United States, 553 U.S. 242, 248 (2008).

[3] See Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751 (1983).

[4] See McCoy v. Louisiana, No. 16–8255, slip op. at 6 (U.S. May 14, 2018).

[5] See id. at 11 ("Because a client's autonomy, not counsel's competence, is in issue, we do not apply our ineffective-assistance-of-counsel jurisprudence.").

[6] Id. at 1–2, 6–7.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 7.

[9] Id. at 5–8.

SEVENTH AMENDMENT
CIVIL TRIAL RIGHTS

SEVENTH AMENDMENT
CIVIL TRIAL RIGHTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

SEVENTH AMENDMENT—CIVIL TRIAL RIGHTS

Amdt7.1 Overview of Seventh Amendment, Civil Trial Rights

The Seventh Amendment guarantees a jury trial in civil cases at law in federal court and limits the circumstances under which courts may overturn a jury's findings of fact.[1] Although this right is rooted in English common law and was important during the colonial era, it was initially omitted from the Constitution. The First Congress, however, ultimately adopted the right as one of the Bill of Rights, which became effective in 1791.[2] Since then, the Supreme Court has interpreted the phrase "Suits at common law" under the Amendment as preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases as it "existed under the English common law when the amendment was adopted."[3] This means that the Amendment does not guarantee trial by jury in cases under admiralty and maritime law and in other proceedings historically tried by a court instead of a jury, nor does it reach statutory proceedings unknown to the common law concerning the enforcement of statutory "public rights" created by Congress.[4]

The following essays in this section address in more detail the historical background of the right to jury trials in civil cases and the types of civil cases and claims requiring a jury trial. In addition, the essays also address other aspects of this right, including the circumstances under which courts may make gatekeeping juridical determinations that prevent submission of claims to a jury, the composition and functions of a jury in civil cases, and the circumstances under which courts may order the entry of a judgment contrary to a jury's verdict.[5]

Amdt7.2 Right to a Trial by a Jury in Civil Cases

Amdt7.2.1 Historical Background of Jury Trials in Civil Cases

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

The Seventh Amendment guarantees a jury trial in civil cases at law in federal court.[1] The Amendment traces its roots to English common law; some historians trace the origin of the English jury as far back as Ancient Greece.[2] Sir William Blackstone, in his influential treatise on English common law, called the right "the glory of the English law" and necessary for "[t]he

---

[1] U.S. Const. amend. VII. The Supreme Court has not held that the Seventh Amendment's guarantee of the right to a civil trial by jury applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. See Curtis v. Leother, 415 U.S. 189, 192 n.6 (1974); Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U.S. 211 (1916). Most state constitutions, however, include this right. See 2 William J. Rich, Modern Constitutional Law § 22:13 (3rd ed. 2011).

[2] See Amdt7.2.1 Historical Background of Jury Trials in Civil Cases.

[3] Balt. & Carolina Line v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 657 (1935); Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 433, 446–48 (1830).

[4] See Amdt7.2.2 Identifying Civil Cases Requiring a Jury Trial and Amdt7.2.3 Cases Combining Law and Equity.

[5] See Amdt7.2.4 Restrictions on the Role of the Judge through Amdt7.3.2 Appeals from State Courts to the Supreme Court.

[1] U.S. Const. amend. VII. The Supreme Court has not held that the Seventh Amendment's guarantee of the right to a civil trial by jury applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. See Curtis v. Leother, 415 U.S. 189, 192 n.6 (1974); Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U.S. 211 (1916). Most state constitutions, however, include this right. See William J. Rich, 2 Modern Constitutional L. § 22:13 (3rd ed.).

[2] See Richard S. Arnold, Trial by Jury: the Constitutional Right to a Jury of Twelve in Civil Trials, 22 Hofstra L. Rev. 1, 5–7 (1993).

impartial administration of justice," which, if "entirely entrusted to the magistracy, a select body of men," would be subject "frequently [to] an involuntary bias towards those of their own rank and dignity."[3]

From England, the colonists brought the right to a jury trial across the Atlantic. The civil jury played an important role during the colonial era.[4] The colonies stoutly resisted the King of England's efforts to diminish this right, and the Declaration of Independence identified the denial of "the benefits of trial by jury" as one of the grievances that led to the American Revolution.[5] Despite this right's prominence in Colonial America, however, a right to a civil jury trial was not included in the original draft of the Constitution.[6]

Records of the Philadelphia Convention show that the delegates twice raised the issue of whether the Constitution should include a right to a jury trial. On September 12, 1787, toward the end of the Convention, Hugh Williamson of North Carolina "observed to the House that no provision was yet made for juries in Civil cases and suggested the necessity of it."[7] Some delegates expressed support for such a provision but observed that the diversity of state courts' practices in civil trials made it impossible to draft a suitable provision.[8] This latter concern appears to have served as the basis for defeating a motion, brought by another delegate on September 15, 1787, to insert a clause in Article III, § 2, to guarantee that "a trial by jury shall be preserved as usual in civil cases."[9]

After the Convention, many opponents of the Constitution's ratification cited the omission of a right to a jury trial with such "urgency and zeal" that they almost prevented the states from ratifying the Constitution.[10] Some opponents of the Constitution claimed that the absence of a provision requiring civil jury trials in a Constitution that mandated jury trials in criminal cases[11] implied that the use of a jury was abolished in civil cases.[12] In the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton refuted this assertion, expressing the view that the Constitution's silence on civil jury trials merely meant "that the institution [would] remain precisely in the same situation in which it is placed by the State constitutions."[13]

In ratifying the Constitution, several states urged Congress to provide a right to a jury in civil cases as one of the amendments.[14] The right was included in the list of amendments James Madison proposed to the First Congress, which adopted the right as one of the Bill of

---

[3] Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 379 (1765–1769).

[4] See Arnold, supra note 2, at 13–14.

[5] See id. at 14.

[6] See id.

[7] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 587 (Max Farrand ed., 1937).

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 628.

[10] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1757 (1833). Justice Story observed: "[I]t is a most important and valuable amendment; and places upon the high ground of constitutional right the inestimable privilege of a trial by jury in civil cases, a privilege scarcely inferior to that in criminal cases, which is conceded by all to be essential to political and civil liberty." Id. § 1762.

[11] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2.

[12] The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton).

[13] See id.

[14] Jonathan Elliott, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 326 (1836) (New Hampshire); 2 id. at 399–414 (New York); 3 id. at 658 (Virginia).

Rights.[15] It does not appear that the proposed amendment's text or meaning was debated during its passage.[16] The Seventh Amendment became effective as part of the Bill of Rights in 1791.

Amdt7.2.2 Identifying Civil Cases Requiring a Jury Trial

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

The Seventh Amendment grants a right to a jury trial in "Suits at common law," which the Supreme Court has long interpreted as "limited to rights and remedies peculiarly legal in their nature, and such as it was proper to assert in courts of law and by the appropriate modes and proceedings of courts of law."[1] The drafters of the Seventh Amendment used the term "common law" to clarify that the Amendment does not provide a right to a jury in civil suits involving the types of equitable rights and remedies that courts enforced at the time of the Amendment's framing.[2]

Two unanimous decisions, in which the Supreme Court held that civil juries were required, illustrate the Court's treatment of this distinction. In the first suit, a landlord sought to recover, based on District of Columbia statutes, possession of real property from a tenant allegedly behind on rent. The Court reasoned that whether "a close equivalent to [the statute in question] existed in England in 1791 [was] irrelevant for Seventh Amendment purposes."[3] Instead, the Court stated that its Seventh Amendment precedents "require[d] trial by jury in actions unheard of at common law, provided that the action involves rights and remedies of the sort traditionally enforced in an action at law, rather than in an action at equity or admiralty."[4] The statutory cause of action, the Court found, had several analogs in the common law, all of which involved a right to trial by jury.[5]

In a second case, the plaintiff sought damages for alleged racial discrimination in the rental of housing in violation of federal law, arguing that the Seventh Amendment was inapplicable to new causes of action Congress created. The Court disagreed: "The Seventh

---

[15] 1 Annals of Cong. 436 (1789). "In suits at common law, between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate." Id.

[16] The Annals of Congress note that on August 18, 1787, the House "considered and adopted" the committee version: "In suits at common law, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." 1 Annals of Cong. 760 (1789). On September 7, the Senate Journal states that this provision was adopted after insertion of "where the consideration exceeds twenty dollars." 2 Bernard Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 1150 (1971).

[1] Shields v. Thomas, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 253, 262 (1856).

[2] Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 433, 447 (1830); Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126, 133 (1881). Formerly, the Amendment did not apply to cases where recovery of money damages was incidental to equitable relief even though damages might have been recovered in an action at law. Clark v. Wooster, 119 U.S. 322, 325 (1886); Pease v. Rathbun-Jones Eng'g Co., 243 U.S. 273, 279 (1917). But see Dairy Queen v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469 (1962) (legal claims must be tried before equitable ones).

[3] Pernell v. Southall Realty Co., 416 U.S. 363, 375 (1974).

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 375–76.

Amendment does apply to actions enforcing statutory rights, and requires a jury trial upon demand, if the statute creates legal rights and remedies, enforceable in an action for damages in the ordinary courts of law."[6]

In contrast, the Court has upheld the lack of a jury provision in certain actions on the ground that the suit in question was not a suit at common law within the meaning of the Amendment, or that the issues raised were not particularly legal in nature.[7] When there is no direct historical antecedent dating to the Amendment's adoption, the court may also consider whether existing precedent and the sound administration of justice favor resolution by judges or juries.[8]

The Seventh Amendment does not apply to cases in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in which the court conducts a trial without a jury.[9] Nor does it reach statutory proceedings unknown to the common law, such as an application to a court of equity to enforce an administrative body's order.[10] For example, Congress, under the Occupational Safety and Health Act, authorized an administrative agency to make findings of a workplace safety violation and to assess civil penalties related to such a violation. Under the statute, an employer that has been assessed a penalty may obtain judicial review of the administrative proceeding in a federal court of appeal.[11] The Supreme Court, in Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission, unanimously rejected the argument that the law violated the Seventh Amendment because it authorized penalties to be collected from an employer without a jury trial:

---

[6] Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 194–95 (1974) (reasoning that "[a] damage action under the statute sounds basically in tort-the statute merely defines a new legal duty and authorizes the court to compensate a plaintiff for the injury caused by the defendants' wrongful breach" such that "this cause of action is analogous to a number of tort actions recognized at common law." See also Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers Loc. 391 v. Terry, 494 U.S. 558 (1990) (suit against union for back pay for breach of duty of fair representation is a suit for compensatory damages, hence plaintiff is entitled to a jury trial); Wooddell v. Int'l Bhd. of Elec. Workers Loc. 71, 502 U.S. 93 (1991) (similar suit against union for money damages entitles union member to jury trial; a claim for injunctive relief was incidental to the damages claim); Feltner v. Columbia Pictures Television, 523 U.S. 340 (1998) (jury trial required for copyright action with close analog at common law, even though the relief sought is not actual damages but statutory damages based on what is "just").

[7] Such actions or issues include, for example: (1) enforcement of claims against the United States, McElrath v. United States, 102 U.S. 426, 440 (1880); see also Galloway v. United States, 319 U.S. 372, 388 (1943); (2) suit under a territorial statute authorizing a special nonjury tribunal to hear claims against a municipality having no legal obligation, but based on moral obligation only, Guthrie Nat'l Bank v. Guthrie, 173 U.S. 528, 534 (1899); see also United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427, 439 (1896); New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U.S. 644, 653 (1877); (3) cancellation of a naturalization certificate for fraud, Luria v. United States, 231 U.S. 9, 27 (1913); (4) reversal of an order to deport an alien, Gee Wah Lee v. United States, 25 F.2d 107 (5th Cir. 1928), cert. denied, 277 U.S. 608 (1928); (5) damages for patent infringement, Filer & Stowell Co. v. Diamond Iron Works, 270 F. 489 (2d Cir. 1921), cert. denied, 256 U.S. 691 (1921); (6) reversal of an award under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 45 (1932); (7) reversal of a decision of customs appraisers on the value of imports, Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310, 329 (1890); (8) a summary disposition by referee in bankruptcy of issues regarding voidable preferences as asserted and proved by the trustee, Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323 (1966); (9) a determination by a judge in calculating just compensation in a federal eminent domain proceeding of the issue as to whether the condemned lands were originally within the scope of the government's project or were adjacent lands later added to the plan, United States v. Reynolds, 397 U.S. 14 (1970); and (10) fair use determinations in copyright cases, Google v. Oracle, No. 18-956, slip op. at 20–21 (U.S. Apr. 2021).

[8] See Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 517 U.S. 370, 389–90 (1996) (holding that patent construction is exclusively within the court's province, taking into account, among other considerations, whether "as a matter of the sound administration of justice, one judicial actor is better positioned than another to decide the issue in question").

[9] Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 433 (1830); Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 460 (1847); Romero v. Int'l Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354 (1959). But see Fitzgerald v. U.S. Lines Co., 374 U.S. 16 (1963).

[10] NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 48 (1937). See also ICC v. Brimson, 154 U.S. 447, 488 (1894); Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 447 (1944).

[11] See Atlas Roofing Co. v. OSHRC, 430 U.S. 442, 445–46 (1977).

> At least in cases in which "public rights" are being litigated—e.g., cases in which the government sues in its sovereign capacity to enforce public rights created by statutes within the power of Congress to enact—the Seventh Amendment does not prohibit Congress from assigning the factfinding function and initial adjudication to an administrative forum with which the jury would be incompatible.[12]

On the other hand, if Congress assigns such cases to Article III courts, a jury may be required. In Tull v. United States,[13] the Court ruled that the Seventh Amendment requires a jury to determine whether an entity is liable for civil penalties under the Clean Water Act, which authorizes the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to initiate a civil action in a federal district court to enforce the Act. In the Court's view, the penal nature of the Clean Water Act's civil penalty remedy distinguishes it from restitution-based remedies available in equity courts.[14] Consequently, it is a type of remedy that only courts of law could impose.[15] However, a jury trial is not required to assess the amount of the penalty. Because the Court viewed assessment of the amount of penalty as involving neither the "substance" nor a "fundamental element" of a common-law right to trial by jury, it held permissible the Act's assignment of that task to the trial judge.

Later, the Court relied on a broadened concept of "public rights" to define the limits of congressional power to assign causes of action to tribunals in which jury trials are unavailable. As a general matter, "public rights" involve "'the relationship between the government and persons subject to its authority,'" whereas "private rights" relate to "'the liability of one individual to another.'"[16] In Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg,[17] the Court held that Congress "lacks the power to strip parties contesting matters of private right of their constitutional right to a trial by jury." The Seventh Amendment test, the Court indicated, is the same as the Article III test for whether Congress may assign adjudication of a claim to a non-Article III tribunal.[18] Although finding room for "some debate," the Court determined that a bankruptcy trustee's

---

[12] Id. at 450.

[13] 481 U.S. 412 (1987).

[14] Id. at 422–25.

[15] The statute specified only a maximum amount for the penalty; the Court derived its "punitive" characterization from indications in the legislative history that Congress desired consideration of the need for retribution and deterrence in addition to the need for restitution. Id. at 422–23.

[16] Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33, 51 n.8 (1989) (quoting Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 50, 51 (1932)). Granfinanciera qualified certain statements in Atlas Roofing and in the process refined its definition of "public rights." There are some "public rights" cases, the Court explained, in which "the Federal Government is not a party in its sovereign capacity," but which involve "statutory rights that are integral parts of a public regulatory scheme." Id. at 55 n.10. The Court further noted that, in cases of this nature, Congress may "dispense with juries as factfinders through its choice of an adjudicative forum." Id. However, Congress may not assign "initial factfinding in all cases involving controversies entirely between private parties to administrative tribunals or other tribunals not involving juries" even "if they are established as adjuncts to Article III courts." Id. (emphasis added).

[17] Id. at 33, 51–52.

[18] The Granfinanciera Court stated: "[I]f a statutory cause of action . . . is not a 'public right' for Article III purposes, then Congress may not assign its adjudication to a specialized non-Article III court lacking 'the essential attributes of the judicial power.' If the action must be tried under the auspices of an Article III court, then the Seventh Amendment affords the parties the right to a jury trial whenever the cause of action is legal in nature. Conversely, if Congress may assign the adjudication of a statutory cause of action to a non-Article III tribunal, then the Seventh Amendment poses no independent bar to the adjudication of that action by a nonjury factfinder." Id. at 53–54 (citation omitted). See also Oil States Energy Servs., LLC v. Greene's Energy Grp., LLC, 138 S. Ct. 1365, 1379 (2018) ("This Court's precedents establish that, when Congress properly assigns a matter to adjudication in a non-Article III tribunal, 'the Seventh Amendment poses no independent bar to the adjudication of that action by a nonjury factfinder.'" (quoting Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 53–54)).

right to recover for a fraudulent conveyance "is more accurately characterized as a private rather than a public right," at least when the defendant had not submitted a claim against the bankruptcy estate.[19]

Amdt7.2.3 Cases Combining Law and Equity

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

The Seventh Amendment uses the term "common law" to refer to cases in which the right to jury trial was preserved. This term's use reflected the division of the English and United States legal systems into separate law and equity jurisdictions, in which actions subject to the former but not the latter were triable to a jury. In the early federal court system, courts had jurisdiction over both suits in law and equity, but the suits occupied separate sides of a federal court's civil docket and were subject to distinct law and equity procedures, including the use or nonuse of the jury.[1]

Adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938 merged law and equity into a single civil jurisdiction and established uniform rules of procedure.[2] Legal and equitable claims that previously were brought as separate causes of action on different "sides" of the court could now be joined in a single action, and in some cases, such as those with compulsory counterclaims, had to be joined in one action.[3] However, the courts retained the traditional distinction between law and equity for purposes of determining when there was a constitutional right to trial by jury, which led to some difficulty.[4]

---

[19] Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 55. The Court later held, however, that a creditor who submits a claim against the bankruptcy estate subjects himself to the bankruptcy court's equitable power, and is not entitled to a jury trial when subsequently sued by the bankruptcy trustee to recover preferential monetary transfers. Langenkamp v. Culp, 498 U.S. 42 (1990).

[1] See Kristin A. Collins, "A Considerable Surgical Operation": Article III, Equity, and Judge-Made Law in the Federal Courts, 60 Duke L.J. 249, 253 (2010).

[2] See Ross v. Bernhard, 396 U.S. 531, 539 (1970).

[3] See 8 Moore's Federal Practice - Civil § 38.12 (2022).

[4] Under the old equity rules, an absolute right to a trial of the facts by a jury could not be impaired by any blending with a claim, properly cognizable at law, of a demand for equitable relief in aid of the legal action or during its pendency. Hipp v. Babin, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 271, 278 (1857). The Supreme Court interpreted the Seventh Amendment to prohibit the trial of equitable and legal issues in the same suit, so that aid in the federal courts had to be sought in separate proceedings. Scott v. Neely, 140 U.S. 106, 109 (1891); Bennett v. Butterworth, 52 U.S. (11 How.) 669 (1850); Lewis v. Cocks, 90 U.S. (23 Wall.) 466, 470 (1874); Killian v. Ebbinghaus, 110 U.S. 568, 573 (1884); Buzard v. Houston, 119 U.S. 347, 351 (1886). If an action at law evoked an equitable counterclaim, the trial judge would order the legal issues to be separately tried after the disposition of the equity issues. In this procedure, however, res judicata and collateral estoppel could operate so as to curtail the litigant's right to a jury finding on factual issues common to both claims. However, priority of scheduling was considered to be a matter of discretion. Federal statutes prohibiting courts of the United States from sustaining suits in equity if the remedy was complete at law served to guard the right of trial by jury and were liberally construed. Schoenthal v. Irving Trust Co., 287 U.S. 92, 94 (1932). Nor was the distinction between law and equity to be obliterated by state legislation. See Thompson v. Railroad Cos., 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 134 (1868). If state law, in advance of judgment, treated the whole proceeding upon a simple contract, including determination of validity and of amount due, as an equitable proceeding, it brought the case within the federal equity jurisdiction upon removal. However, the Supreme Court determined that when an action at law in state court furnished an adequate and complete remedy, the existence of a potential cause of action in courts of equity pursuant to a separate state statute could not enlarge the federal courts' equity jurisdiction. This jurisdictional rule applies even if, under state law, the equity court could summon a jury on occasion. Whitehead v. Shattuck, 138 U.S. 146 (1891); Buzard, 119 U.S. 347; Greeley v. Lowe, 155 U.S. 58, 75 (1894). Furthermore, when state law provides an equitable remedy, such as to quiet title to land, the federal courts enforce it, if it does not obstruct the rights of the parties as to trial by jury.

The Supreme Court resolved the difficulty by stressing the fundamental nature of the jury trial right and protecting it against diminution through resort to equitable principles. In Beacon Theatres v. Westover, a plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment and an injunction barring the defendant from instituting an antitrust action against it; the defendant filed a counterclaim alleging violation of the antitrust laws and asking for treble damages.[5] The Supreme Court held that the district court erred in denying the defendant a jury trial on all issues in the antitrust controversy because the complaint for declaratory relief "presented basically equitable issues."[6] The trial court's error, in the Court's view, would compel the defendant to split its antitrust case in two, trying part to a judge and part to a jury, impermissibly delaying and subordinating its counterclaim that it was required by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to bring within the same action.[7] Long-standing equity principles, according to the Court, dictated that "only under the most imperative circumstances which in view of the flexible procedures of the Federal Rules we cannot now anticipate, can the right to a jury trial of legal issues be lost through prior determination of equitable claims."[8]

Later, in Dairy Queen v.Wood, the Supreme Court reversed a district court's order striking a plaintiff's demand for jury trial.[9] There, the plaintiff-trademark owner sought several types of relief against the defendant-licensee for the licensee's alleged breach of a licensing contract, including an injunction and an accounting for money damages.[10] The Court held that, even though the claim for legal relief was characterized by the district court as "incidental" to the equitable relief sought, the Seventh Amendment required that the factual issues pertaining to Clark v. Smith, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 195 (1839); Holland v. Challen, 110 U.S. 15 (1884); Reynolds v. Crawfordsville Bank, 112 U.S. 405 (1884); Chapman v. Brewer, 114 U.S. 158 (1885); Cummings v. Nat'l Bank, 101 U.S. 153, 157 (1879); United States v. Landram, 118 U.S. 81 (1886); More v. Steinbach, 127 U.S. 70 (1888). Cf. Ex parte Simons, 247 U.S. 321 (1918). The transfer of cases to the other side of the court was made possible through the inclusion in the Law and Equity Act of 1915 of § 274(b) of the Judicial Code, 38 Stat. 956. The new procedure permitted legal questions arising in an equity action to be determined without sending the case to the law side. This section also permitted equitable defenses to be interposed in an action at law. The same order was preserved as under the system of separate courts. The equitable issues were disposed of first; if a legal issue remained, it was triable by a jury. Enelow v. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 293 U.S. 379 (1935). See also Liberty Oil Co. v. Condon Bank, 260 U.S. 235 (1922). There was no provision for legal counterclaims in an equitable action because Equity Rule 30 required the answer to a bill in equity to state any counterclaim arising out of the same transaction, which was not intended to change the line between law and equity and was construed as referring to equitable counterclaims only. Am. Mills Co. v. Am. Sur. Co., 260 U.S. 360, 364 (1922); Stamey v. United States, 37 F.2d 188 (W.D. Wash. 1929). Equitable jurisdiction existing at the time of a bill's filing was not disturbed by the subsequent availability of legal remedies, and the scheduling was discretionary. Am. Life Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 300 U.S. 203 (1937).

---

[5] 359 U.S. 500, 501–04 (1959).

[6] Id. at 504–07.

[7] Id. at 509. The Supreme Court later observed, in Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322, 334 (1979), that Beacon Theatres reflected the Court's concern that when legal and equitable claims are joined in the same action, res judicata or collateral estoppel may foreclose relitigation of an issue common to both sets of claims before a jury if such an issue was first determined by a judge. The Court explained, however, that this concern merely reflected a general prudential rule that a trial judge "has limited discretion in determining the sequence of trial and that discretion must, wherever possible, be exercised to preserve jury trial." Parklane, 439 U.S. at 334 (internal quotations omitted). Thus, in Parklane, the Court held that the plaintiff stockholders' use of offensive collateral estoppel in that case—which precluded the defendants from relitigating certain issues that had resolved adversely against them in a prior governmental enforcement action—did not violate the defendants' Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. Id. at 336–37.

[8] Beacon Theatres, 359 U.S. at 510–11.

[9] 369 U.S. 469, 479–80 (1962).

[10] Id. at 475.

whether there had been a breach of contract to be tried before a jury.[11] Thus, the rule emerged that legal claims must be tried before equitable ones, and before a jury if the litigant so wished.[12]

In Ross v. Bernhard, the Court further held that the right to a jury trial depends on the nature of the issue to be tried, rather than the procedural framework in which it is raised.[13] The case involved a stockholder derivative action, which had always been considered to be a suit in equity.[14] The Court agreed that the action was equitable, but concluded that it involved two separable claims. The first, the stockholder's standing to sue for a corporation, was an equitable issue; the second, the corporation's claim asserted by the stockholder, may be either equitable or legal.[15] Because the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure merged law and equity in the federal courts, there was no longer any procedural obstacle to transferring jurisdiction to the law side once the equitable issue of standing was decided. Thus, the Court continued, if the corporation's claim that the stockholder asserted was legal in nature, it should be heard on the law side and before a jury.[16]

Amdt7.2.4 Restrictions on the Role of the Judge

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

One of the primary purposes of the Seventh Amendment was to preserve the historic line separating the province of the jury from that of the judge, without preventing procedural innovations that respect this boundary. In defining this line, the Supreme Court has concluded that it is constitutional for a federal judge, in the course of trial, to: (1) express his opinion upon the facts, provided that all questions of fact are ultimately submitted to the jury;[1] (2) call the

---

[11] Id. at 479–80.

[12] If legal and equitable claims are joined, and the court erroneously dismissed the legal claims and decides common issues in the equitable action, the plaintiff cannot be collaterally estopped from relitigating those common issues in a jury trial. Lytle v. Household Mfg., Inc., 494 U.S. 545 (1990).

[13] 396 U.S. 531 (1970).

[14] The stockholders' derivative action is a creation of equity made necessary by the traditional concept of the "corporate entity" or the "concept of separate personality." That is, the corporation is an entity distinct and separate from its shareholders. Thus, while shareholders were relieved from unlimited liability for corporate liabilities, the complementary result was that harm to the corporation did not confer any right of action upon a shareholder to sue to right that harm. However, if the harm were caused by the abuse of those who managed and controlled the corporation, the corporation naturally would not proceed against them, and the common law courts would not allow the shareholders to bring an action running to the "separate personality" of the corporation. Accordingly, equity permitted a derivative action in which the shareholder was permitted to set in motion the adjudication of a cause of action belonging to the corporation. Bert S. Prunty, The Shareholders' Derivative Suit: Notes on Its Derivation, 32 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 980 (1957).

[15] Ross, 396 U.S. at 538.

[16] Id. at 539–41. Justices Potter Stewart and John Marshall Harlan and Chief Justice Warren Burger dissented, arguing that the Seventh Amendment did not expand the right to a jury trial, that the Rules simply preserved the right as it had existed, and that it was error to think that the two could somehow "magically interact" to enlarge the right in a way that neither did alone. Id. at 543 (Stewart, J., dissenting).

[1] Vicksburg & Meridian R.R. v. Putnam, 118 U.S. 545, 553 (1886); United States v. Phila. & Reading R.R., 123 U.S. 113, 114 (1887). But see Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466, 700 (1933) (holding that the trial judge exceeded "the bounds of fair comment" when he told the jury, referring to the defendant, that "'wiping' one's hands while testifying was 'almost always an indication of lying'"; in doing so, the trial judge impermissibly added to the evidence and "put his own experience, with all the weight that could be attached to it, in the scale against the accused").

jury's attention to parts of the evidence that he or she deems of special importance,[2] being careful to distinguish between matters of law and matters of opinion;[3] (3) inform the jury, when there is insufficient evidence to justify a verdict;[4] (4) require a jury to answer specific interrogatories in addition to rendering a general verdict;[5] (5) direct the jury, after the plaintiff's case is complete, to return a verdict for the defendant on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence;[6] (6) set aside a verdict that is against the law or the evidence and order a new trial;[7] and (7) refuse the defendant a new trial on the condition, accepted by plaintiff, that the plaintiff remit a portion of the damages awarded him.[8]

In International Terminal Operating Co. v. N.V. Nederl. Amerik Stoomv. Maats., however, the Supreme Court held that an appellate court erred in reversing a jury's finding on the issue of the reasonableness of a stevedoring company's conduct in failing to avert an injury to one of its employees.[9] The Court of Appeals found that the stevedore acted unreasonably as a matter of law, but the Supreme Court held that, "[u]nder the Seventh Amendment, that issue should have been left to the jury's determination."[10]

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has noted: "In numerous contexts, gatekeeping judicial determinations prevent submission of claims to a jury's judgment without violating the Seventh Amendment."[11] For example, in order to screen out frivolous complaints or defenses, Congress "has power to prescribe what must be pleaded to state the claim, just as it has the power to determine what must be proved to prevail on the merits."[12] It is, the Supreme Court observed, "the federal lawmaker's prerogative . . . to allow, disallow, or shape the contours of-including the pleading and proof requirements for-[ ] private actions."[13]

---

[2] Vicksburg & Meridian R.R., 118 U.S. 545 (citing Carver v. Jackson, 29 U.S. (4 Pet.) 1, 80 (1830); Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 348, 390 (1833); Mitchell v. Harmony, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 115, 131 (1852); Transp. Line v. Hope, 95 U.S. 297, 302 (1877)).

[3] Games v. Dunn, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 322, 327 (1840).

[4] Sparf & Hansen v. United States, 156 U.S. 51, 99–100 (1895); Pleasants v. Fant, 89 U.S. (22 Wall.) 116, 121 (1875); Randall v. Balt. & Ohio R.R., 109 U.S. 478, 482 (1883); Meehan v. Valentine, 145 U.S. 611, 625 (1892); Coughran v. Bigelow, 164 U.S. 301 (1896).

[5] Walker v. N.M. So. Pac. R.R., 165 U.S. 593, 598 (1897).

[6] Treat Mfg. Co. v. Standard Steel & Iron Co., 157 U.S. 674 (1895); Randall, 109 U.S. at 482.

[7] Cap. Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U.S. 1, 13 (1899).

[8] Ark. Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U.S. 69, 74 (1889). A federal judge, however, may not deny the plaintiff a new trial on the condition that the defendant consent to an increase of the damage award. Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 476–78 (1935).

[9] 393 U.S. 74, 75 (1968) (per curiam).

[10] Id. But see Neely v. Martin K. Eby Constr. Co., 386 U.S. 317, 322 (1967) (holding held that the Seventh Amendment does not bar an appellate court from granting a judgment notwithstanding the verdict insofar as "there is no greater restriction on the province of the jury when an appellate court enters judgment [notwithstanding the verdict] than when a trial court does." A federal appellate court may also review a district court's denial of a motion to set aside an award as excessive under an abuse of discretion standard. Gasperini v. Ctr. for Humanities, Inc., 518 U.S. 415 (1996) (holding that a New York law that requires appellate courts to order a new trial when a jury award "deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation" may be applied by a federal district court exercising diversity jurisdiction, "with appellate control of the trial court's ruling limited to review for 'abuse of discretion'").

[11] Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 327 n.8 (2007).

[12] Id. at 327.

[13] Id. at 327–28 (explaining that a "heightened pleading rule simply 'prescribes the means of making an issue,' and . . . when '[t]he issue [is] made as prescribed, the right of trial by jury accrues.'" (quoting Fid. & Deposit Co. of Md. v. United States, 187 U.S. 315, 320 (1902))).

Amdt7.2.5 Composition and Functions of a Jury in Civil Cases

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Traditionally, the Supreme Court has treated the Seventh Amendment as preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases as it "existed under the English common law when the amendment was adopted."[1] This right included "a trial by a jury of twelve men, in the presence and under the superintendence of a judge empowered to instruct them on the law and to advise them on the facts and (except in acquittal of a criminal charge) to set aside their verdict if in his opinion it is against the law or the evidence."[2] Decisions of the jury must be unanimous.[3]

In Colgrove v. Battin,[4] however, the Court held by a 5-4 vote that rules adopted in a federal district court authorizing civil juries composed of six persons were permissible under the Seventh Amendment and federal statutory law. The Amendment's reference to the "common law," in the Court's view, suggested "the Framers of the Seventh Amendment were concerned with preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases where it existed at common law, rather than the various incidents of trial by jury."[5]

As discussed, one of the Seventh Amendment's primary purposes is to preserve "the common law distinction between the province of the court and that of the jury, whereby, in the absence of express or implied consent to the contrary, issues of law are resolved by the court and issues of fact are to be determined by the jury under appropriate instructions by the court."[6] The Amendment, however, "does not require the retention of old forms of procedure"; nor does it "prohibit the introduction of new methods of ascertaining what facts are in issue" or new rules of evidence.[7] According to the Court, matters that were tried by a jury in England in 1791 are to be so tried today.[8] Conversely, matters that fall under equity and admiralty and maritime jurisprudence, which were tried by the judge in England in 1791, are to be so tried today. When new rights and remedies are created, "the right of action should be analogized to

---

[1] Balt. & Carolina Line v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 657 (1935); Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 433, 446–48 (1830).

[2] Cap. Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U.S. 1, 13 (1899).

[3] Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581 (1900); Am. Publ'g Co. v. Fisher, 166 U.S. 464 (1897); Springville v. Thomas, 166 U.S. 707 (1897).

[4] 413 U.S. 149 (1973). Justices Marshall and Stewart dissented on constitutional and statutory grounds, id. at 166, while Justices Douglas and Powell relied only on statutory grounds without reaching the constitutional issue. Id. at 165, 188.

[5] Id. at 155–56. The Court did not consider what number less than six, if any, would fail to satisfy the Amendment's requirements. "What is required for a 'jury' is a number large enough to facilitate group deliberation combined with a likelihood of obtaining a representative cross section of the community. . . . It is undoubtedly true that at some point the number becomes too small to accomplish these goals . . . ." Id. at 160 n.16. Application of similar reasoning has led the Court to uphold elimination of the unanimity as well as the twelve-person requirement for criminal trials. See Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970) (jury size); Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972) (plurality opinion) (unanimity); and Sixth Amendment discussion, Amdt6.4.3.2 Right to Trial by Jury Generally.

[6] Balt. & Carolina Line v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 657 (1935); Walker v. N.M. & So. Pac. R.R., 165 U.S. 593, 596 (1897); Gasoline Prods. Co. v. Champlin Ref. Co., 283 U.S. 494, 497–99 (1931); Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 476, 485–86 (1935).

[7] Gasoline Prods. Co., 283 U.S. at 498; Ex parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300, 309 (1920).

[8] Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 433, 446–47 (1830); Slocum v. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 228 U.S. 364, 377–78 (1935); Balt. & Carolina Line, 295 U.S. at 657; Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 476 (1935).

its historical counterpart, at law or in equity, for the purpose of determining whether there is a right of jury trial," unless Congress has expressly prescribed the mode of trial.[9]

Amdt7.3 Reexamination Clause

Amdt7.3.1 Review of Evidentiary Record

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

The Seventh Amendment's Reexamination Clause prohibits reexamination in any federal court of a "fact tried by a jury" other "than according to the rules of the common law."[1] In 1913, in Slocum v. New York Life Insurance Co.,[2] the Supreme Court held that a federal appeals court lacked authority to order the entry of a judgment contrary to a trial court's verdict. Even though the Court agreed that the trial court should have directed a verdict for the defendant before the case was submitted to the jury, the Court reasoned that, once the trial court declined to do so and the jury found for the plaintiff contrary to the evidence, the only course open to either court was to order a new trial.[3] Although plainly in accordance with the common law as it stood in 1791, the 5-4 decision was subjected to significant criticism.[4] Slocum, however, was then limited, if not completely undermined, by subsequent holdings.[5]

In the first of these cases, the Court in Baltimore & Carolina Line v. Redman[6] held that a trial court had the right to enter a judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict of the jury after having reserved decision on the defendant's motion for directed verdict. The Court distinguished Slocum, noting its ruling qualified some of its assertions in Slocum.[7]

In Lyon v. Mutual Benefit Ass'n,[8] the Court sustained a district court in rejecting the defendant's motion for dismissal and in peremptorily directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The Supreme Court held that there was ample evidence to support the verdict and that the trial court, in following Arkansas's procedure in the diversity action, acted consistently with the Federal Conformity Act.[9]

In Galloway v. United States,[10] which involved an action against the government for benefits under a lapsed war risk insurance policy, the trial court directed a verdict for the

---

[9] Luria v. United States, 231 U.S. 9, 27–28 (1913).

[1] U.S. Const. amend. VII.

[2] 228 U.S. 364 (1913).

[3] Id. at 399.

[4] See, e.g., Fleming James, Civil Procedure 332–33 & n.8 (1965); Austin W. Scott, The Progress of the Law, 1918–1919 Civil Procedure, 33 Harv. L. Rev., 236, 246 (1919).

[5] But see Hetzel v. Prince William Cnty., 523 U.S. 208 (1998) (when an appeals court affirms liability, but orders the level of damages to be reconsidered, the plaintiff has a Seventh Amendment right either to accept the reduced award or to have a new trial).

[6] 295 U.S. 654 (1935).

[7] Id. at 661. Justice Willis Van Devanter authored the Court's opinions in Redman and Slocum.

[8] 305 U.S. 484 (1939).

[9] Ch. 255, § 5, 17 Stat. 197 (1872), now superseded by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[10] 319 U.S. 372, 389 (1943). The Galloway Court wrote: "the practice has been approved explicitly in the promulgation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure" (citing Berry v. United States, 312 U.S. 450 (1941)). In Berry, the Court remarked that the new rule has given "district judges, under certain circumstances, . . . the right (but not the mandatory duty) to enter a judgment contrary to the jury's verdict without granting a new trial. But that rule has not government on the ground of insufficiency of evidence. Both the appeals court and the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's order.[11] Justice Hugo Black, joined by Justices William Douglas and Frank Murphy asserted in dissent: "Today's decision marks a continuation of the gradual process of judicial erosion which in one-hundred-fifty years has slowly worn away a major portion of the essential guarantee of the Seventh Amendment."[12] Perhaps unsurprisingly, the Court has occasionally experienced difficulty in harmonizing the historic common law covering the relations of judge and jury with the notion of a developing common law.[13]

Amdt7.3.2 Appeals from State Courts to the Supreme Court

Seventh Amendment:

> In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

The Seventh Amendment clause prohibiting re-examination of any fact found by a jury is not restricted in its application to suits at common law tried before juries in federal courts. It applies equally to cases tried before a jury in a state court and brought to the Supreme Court on appeal.[1] However, the Supreme Court has indicated that, in cases involving a claim of a denial of constitutional rights, it is free to examine and review the evidence upon which the lower court based its conclusions, a position that under some circumstances could conflict with the principle of jury autonomy.[2] taken away from juries and given to judges any part of the exclusive power of juries to weigh evidence and determine contested issues of facts—a jury being the constitutional tribunal provided for trying facts in courts of law." Id. at 452–53.

---

[11] See id. at 373.

[12] Id. at 397 (Black, J., dissenting). Because the case involved a claim against the United States, it did not need to be tried by a jury except for to the extent that Congress had allowed.

[13] See, e.g., Neely v. Martin K. Eby Construction Co., Inc., 386 U.S. 317 (1967) (interpreting Rules 50(b), 50(c)(2) and 50(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as well as the Seventh Amendment).

[1] The Justices v. Murray, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 274, 278 (1870); Chi., B. & Q. R.R. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 242–46 (1897).

[2] See Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279, 284–92 (1971).

EIGHTH AMENDMENT
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

EIGHTH AMENDMENT
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

TABLE OF CONTENTS

EIGHTH AMENDMENT—CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

Amdt8.1 Overview of Eighth Amendment, Cruel and Unusual Punishment

The Eighth Amendment prohibits certain types of punishment: excessive bail, excessive fines, and cruel and unusual punishments.[1] As discussed in more detail in the following essays, these prohibitions were intended to protect persons convicted of crimes from government abuses of power.[2] Viewed broadly, the Eighth Amendment responded to these historically grounded concerns about disproportionate or cruel punishments by attempting to ensure that punishment is "proportioned to both the offender and the offense."[3] What is excessive is also determined by reference to modern standards; the Supreme Court has suggested proportionality may evolve over time.[4] Out of the Eighth Amendment's three clauses, the bar on cruel and unusual punishment has been most frequently interpreted by the Supreme Court, likely in part due to inherent ambiguities in determining what qualifies as cruel or unusual.[5]

The Eighth Amendment generally applies in criminal proceedings, as the most common locus of government punishment, but the Supreme Court has held the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on excessive fines can apply in civil forfeiture proceedings, noting that the text of the amendment is not limited to "criminal" cases.[6] Instead, the Court said the relevant constitutional test is whether the government is imposing "punishment," focusing on the purpose of a sanction.[7] In addition, although the Eighth Amendment (like the rest of the Bill of Rights) was understood originally to apply only to the federal government, the Supreme Court has held its prohibitions were incorporated in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, making them applicable to states.[8]

---

[1] Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 609 (1993) ("The purpose of the Eighth Amendment, putting the Bail Clause to one side, was to limit the government's power to punish."); Timbs v. Indiana, No. 17-1091, slip op. at 2 (U.S. Feb. 20, 2019) ("Like the Eighth Amendment's proscriptions of 'cruel and unusual punishment' and '[e]xcessive bail,' the protection against excessive fines guards against abuses of government's punitive or criminal-law-enforcement authority.").

[2] See, e.g., Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 666 (1977); Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 372–73 (1910).

[3] Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460, 469 (2012) (quoting Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551, 560 (2005)) (internal quotation marks omitted). See also, e.g., Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 311 (2002) ("The Eighth Amendment succinctly prohibits 'excessive' sanctions.").

[4] Atkins, 536 U.S. at 311–12.

[5] For example, one defender of the Constitution, responding to the claim that the initial document should have included a prohibition on cruel and unusual punishments, argued that the term "'cruel and unusual' surely would have been too vague to have been of any consequence, since [it] admit[s] of no clear and precise signification." James Iredell, Marcus, Answers to Mr. Mason's Objections to the New Constitution (1788), reprinted in 5 The Founders' Constitution 376 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987).

[6] Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 607–08 (1993).

[7] Id. at 610.

[8] Timbs v. Indiana, No. 17-1091, slip op. at 2–3 (U.S. Feb. 20, 2019) (noting this history and holding the prohibition against excessive fines incorporated); Schilb v. Kuebel, 404 U.S. 357, 365 (1971) (recognizing assumed incorporation of prohibition against excessive bail); Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 667 (1962) (recognizing application of prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment to states).

Amdt8.2 Excessive Bail

Amdt8.2.1 Historical Background on Excessive Bail

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

"This traditional right to freedom before conviction permits the unhampered preparation of a defense, and serves to prevent the infliction of punishment prior to conviction. . . . Unless this right to bail before trial is preserved, the presumption of innocence, secured only after centuries of struggle, would lose its meaning."[1] "The bail clause was lifted with slight changes from the English Bill of Rights Act. In England that clause has never been thought to accord a right to bail in all cases, but merely to provide that bail shall not be excessive in those cases where it is proper to grant bail. When this clause was carried over into our Bill of Rights, nothing was said that indicated any different concept."[2] These two contrasting views of the "excessive bail" provision, expressed by the Court in the same Term, reflect the ambiguity inherent in the phrase and the absence of evidence regarding the intent of those who drafted and who ratified the Eighth Amendment.[3]

The history of the bail controversy in England is crucial to understanding why the ambiguity exists.[4] The Statute of Westminster the First of 1275[5] set forth a detailed enumeration of those offenses that were bailable and those that were not, and, though supplemented by later statutes, it served for something like five and a half centuries as the basic authority.[6] Darnel's Case,[7] in which the judges permitted the continued imprisonment of persons without bail merely upon the order of the King, was one of the moving factors in the enactment of the Petition of Right in 1628.[8] The Petition cited the Magna Carta as proscribing the kind of detention that was permitted in Darnel's Case. The right to bail was again subverted a half-century later by various technical subterfuges by which petitions for habeas corpus could not be presented,[9] and Parliament reacted by enacting the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679,[10] which established procedures for effectuating release from imprisonment and provided penalties for judges who did not comply with the Act. That avenue closed, the judges then set

---

[1] Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1, 4 (1951). Note that, in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 533 (1979), the Court enunciated a narrower view of the presumption of innocence, describing it as "a doctrine that allocates the burden of proof in criminal trials," and denying that it has any "application to a determination of the rights of a pretrial detainee during confinement before his trial has even begun."

[2] Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 545 (1952). Justice Hugo Black in dissent accused the Court of reducing the provision "below the level of a pious admonition" by saying in effect that "the Amendment does no more than protect a right to bail which Congress can grant and which Congress can take away." Id. at 556.

[3] The only recorded comment of a Member of Congress during debate on adoption of the "excessive bail" provision was that of Mr. Samuel Livermore. "The clause seems to express a great deal of humanity, on which account I have no objection to it; but as it seems to have no meaning in it, I do not think it necessary. What is meant by the terms excessive bail? Who are to be judges?" 1 Annals of Congress 754 (1789).

[4] Still the best and most comprehensive treatment is Caleb Foote, The Coming Constitutional Crisis in Bail: I, 113 U. Pa. L. Rev. 959, 965–89 (1965), reprinted in Caleb Foote, Studies on Bail 181, 187–211 (1966).

[5] 3 Edw. 1, ch. 12.

[6] 1 J. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England 233–43 (1833). The statute is summarized at pages 234–35.

[7] 3 How. St. Tr. 1 (1627).

[8] 3 Charles 1, ch. 1. Debate on the Petition, as precipitated by Darnel's Case, is reported in 3 How. St. Tr. 59 (1628). Coke especially tied the requirement that imprisonment be pursuant to a lawful cause reportable on habeas corpus to effectuation of the right to bail. Id. at 69.

[9] Jenkes' Case, 6 How. St. Tr. 1189, 36 Eng. Rep. 518 (1676).

[10] 31 Charles 2, ch. 2. The text is in 2 Documents on Fundamental Human Rights 327–340 (Z. Chafee ed., 1951).

bail so high that it could not be met, and Parliament responded by including in the Bill of Rights of 1689[11] a provision "[t]hat excessive bail ought not to be required." This language, along with essentially the rest of the present Eighth Amendment, was included within the Virginia Declaration of Rights,[12] was picked up in the Virginia recommendations for inclusion in a federal bill of rights by the state ratifying convention,[13] and was introduced verbatim by James Madison in the House of Representatives.[14]

Thus, in England, the right to bail generally was conferred by the basic 1275 statute, as supplemented; the procedure for assuring access to the right was conferred by the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679; and protection against abridgement through the fixing of excessive bail was conferred by the Bill of Rights of 1689. In the United States, the Constitution protected habeas corpus in Article 1, Section 9, but did not confer a right to bail. The question is, therefore, whether the First Congress in proposing the Bill of Rights knowingly sought to curtail excessive bail without guaranteeing a right to bail, or whether the phrase "excessive bail" was meant to be a shorthand expression of both rights.

Compounding the ambiguity is a distinctive trend in the United States that had its origin in a provision of the Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641:[15] guaranteeing bail to every accused person except those charged with a capital crime or contempt in open court. Copied in several state constitutions,[16] this guarantee was contained in the Northwest Ordinance in 1787,[17] along with a guarantee of moderate fines and against cruel and unusual punishments, and was inserted in the Judiciary Act of 1789,[18] enacted contemporaneously with the passage through Congress of the Bill of Rights. It appears, therefore, that Congress was aware in 1789 that certain language conveyed a right to bail and that certain other language merely protected against one means by which a pre-existing right to bail could be abridged.

---

[11] I W. & M. 2, ch. 2, clause 10.

[12] 7 F. Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions, H. R. Doc. No. 357, 59th Cong., 2d Sess. 3813 (1909). "Sec. 9. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

[13] 3 J. Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Constitution 658 (2d ed. 1836).

[14] 1 Annals of Congress 438 (1789).

[15] "No mans person shall be restrained or imprisoned by any Authority what so ever, before the law hath sentenced him thereto, If he can put in sufficient securtie, bayle, or mainprise, for his appearance, and good behavior in the meane time, unlesse it be in Crimes Capitall, and Contempts in open Court, and in such cases where some expresse act of Court doth allow it." Reprinted in I Documents on Fundamental Human Rights 79, 82 (Z. Chafee, ed., 1951).

[16] "That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offences, where the proof is evident, or the presumption great." 5 F. Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions, H. Doc. No. 357, 59th Congress, 2d Sess. 3061 (1909) (Pennsylvania, 1682). The 1776 Pennsylvania Constitution contained the same clause in section 28, and in section 29 was a clause guaranteeing against excessive bail. Id. at 3089.

[17] "All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offences, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted." Art. II, 32 Journals of the Continental Congress 334 (1787), reprinted in 1 Stat. 52 n.

[18] "And upon all arrests in criminal cases, bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death, in which case it shall not be admitted but by the supreme or a circuit court, or by a justice of the supreme court, or a judge of a district court, who shall exercise their discretion herein . . . ." 1 Stat. 91 § 33 (1789).

Amdt8.2.2 Modern Doctrine on Bail

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Bail, which is "basic to our system of law,"[1] is "excessive" in violation of the Eighth Amendment when it is set at a figure higher than an amount reasonably calculated to ensure the asserted governmental interest.[2] The issue of bail is only implicated when there is "a direct government restraint on personal liberty, be it in a criminal case or a civil deportation proceeding."[3] In Stack v. Boyle, the Supreme Court found a $50,000 bail to be excessive, given the defendants' limited financial resources and the lack of evidence that they were a flight risk.[4] The Court determined that "the fixing of bail for any individual defendant must be based upon standards relevant to the purpose of assuring the presence of that defendant," and "[u]nless this right to bail before trial is preserved, the presumption of innocence . . . would lose its meaning."[5]

In United States v. Salerno, the Court upheld the Bail Reform Act of 1984 provisions regarding preventative detention against facial challenge under the Eighth Amendment. The function of bail, the Court explained, is limited neither to preventing flight of the defendant prior to trial nor to safeguarding a court's role in adjudicating guilt or innocence.[6] The Court held that Congress did not violate the Excessive Bail Clause by restricting bail eligibility for "compelling interests" such as public safety, and observed that the Clause "says nothing about whether bail shall be available at all" in a particular situation.[7] The Court rejected "the proposition that the Eighth Amendment categorically prohibits the government from pursuing other admittedly compelling interests through regulation of pretrial release."[8] The Court explained that "[t]he only arguable substantive limitation of the Bail Clause is that the government's proposed conditions of release or detention not be 'excessive' in light of the perceived evil."[9] The Court determined that "detention prior to trial of arrestees charged with serious felonies who are found after an adversary hearing to pose a threat to the safety of individuals or to the community which no condition of release can dispel" satisfies this requirement.[10]

The Court further explained in Salerno that if the only asserted interest is to guarantee that the accused will stand trial and submit to sentence if found guilty, then "bail must be set by a court at a sum designed to ensure that goal, and no more."[11] To challenge bail as excessive,

---

[1] Schilb v. Kuebel, 404 U.S. 357, 484 (1971).

[2] Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1, 5 (1951). The Court explained that "the fixing of bail for any individual defendant must be based upon standards relevant to the purpose of assuring the presence of that defendant." Id.

[3] Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vermont, Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 263 n.3 (1989) (explaining that the Bail Clause guards against the potential for governmental abuse).

[4] Id. at 6–7.

[5] Id. at 4–5.

[6] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 754–55 (1987).

[7] Id. at 752–53.

[8] 481 U.S. at 753.

[9] 481 U.S. at 754.

[10] 481 U.S. at 755. The Court also ruled that there was no violation of due process, the governmental objective being legitimate and there being a number of procedural safeguards (detention applies only to serious crimes, the arrestee is entitled to a prompt hearing, the length of detention is limited, and detainees must be housed apart from criminals). Id.

[11] Salerno, 481 U.S. at 754.

the Court held that an individual must move for a reduction, and, if that motion is denied, appeal to the Court of Appeals, and, if unsuccessful, appeal to the Supreme Court Justice sitting for that circuit.[12] The Amendment is apparently inapplicable to postconviction release pending appeal, but the practice has apparently been to grant such releases.[13]

There is, however, no absolute right to bail in all cases.[14] In a civil case, the Court held that the prohibition against excessive bail does not compel the allowance of bail in deportation cases and that "the very language of the Amendment fails to say all arrests must be bailable."[15] Moreover, although the Court has not explicitly stated such, the Court has "assumed" that "the Eight Amendment's proscription of excessive bail . . . [applies] to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment."[16]

Amdt8.3 Excessive Fines

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

For years the Supreme Court had little to say about excessive fines. In an early case, it held that it had no appellate jurisdiction to revise the sentence of an inferior court, even though the excessiveness of the fines was apparent on the face of the record.[1] Justice Lewis Brandeis once contended in dissent that the denial of second-class mailing privileges to a newspaper on the basis of its past conduct, because it imposed additional mailing costs which grew day by day, amounted to an unlimited fine that was an "unusual" and "unprecedented" punishment proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.[2] The Court has elected to deal with the issue of fines levied upon indigents, resulting in imprisonment upon inability to pay, in terms of the Equal Protection Clause,[3] thus obviating any necessity to develop the meaning of "excessive fines" in relation to ability to pay. The Court has held the clause inapplicable to civil jury awards of punitive damages in cases between private parties, "when the government neither has prosecuted the action nor has any right to receive a share of the damages awarded."[4] The Court based this conclusion on a review of the history and purposes of the Excessive Fines Clause. At the time the Eighth Amendment was adopted, the Court noted, "the word 'fine' was understood to mean a payment to a sovereign as punishment for some offense."[5] The Eighth Amendment itself, as were antecedents of the clause in the Virginia Declaration of Rights and in the [12] Boyle, 342 U.S. at 6–7.

[13] Hudson v. Parker, 156 U.S. 277 (1895).

[14] Id. at 753.

[15] Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 544–46 (1952) (explaining that the "Eighth Amendment has not prevented Congress from defining the classes of cases in which bail shall be allowed in this country" and "in criminal cases bail is not compulsory where the punishment may be death").

[16] Schilb v. Kuebel, 404 U.S. 357, 484 (1971); see Hall v. Florida, 572 U.S. 701, 707 (2014) ("The Eighth Amendment provides that 'excessive bail shall be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.' The Fourteenth Amendment applies those restrictions to the States."); Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407, 419 (2008) ("The Eighth Amendment, applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, provides that '[e]xcessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.'"); see also Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984) (upholding under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment a state statute providing for preventive detention of juveniles).

[1] Ex parte Watkins, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 568, 574 (1833).

[2] Milwaukee Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407, 435 (1921).

[3] Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971); Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970).

[4] Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989).

[5] Id. at 265.

English Bill of Rights of 1689, "clearly was adopted with the particular intent of placing limits on the powers of the new government."[6] Therefore, while leaving open the issues of whether the clause has any applicability to civil penalties or to qui tam actions, the Court determined that "the Excessive Fines Clause was intended to limit only those fines directly imposed by, and payable to, the government."[7] The Court has held, however, that the Excessive Fines Clause can be applied in civil forfeiture cases.[8]

In 1998, however, the Court injected vitality into the strictures of the clause. "The touchstone of the constitutional inquiry under the Excessive Fines Clause is the principle of proportionality: The amount of the forfeiture must bear some relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to punish."[9] In United States v. Bajakajian,[10] the government sought to require that a criminal defendant charged with violating federal reporting requirements regarding the transportation of more than $10,000 in currency out of the country forfeit the currency involved, which totaled $357,144. The Court held that the forfeiture[11] in this particular case violated the Excessive Fines Cause because the amount forfeited was "grossly disproportionate to the gravity of defendant's offense."[12] In determining proportionality, the Court did not limit itself to a comparison of the fine amount to the proven offense, but it also considered the particular facts of the case, the character of the defendant, and the harm caused by the offense.[13]

Amdt8.4 Punishment

Amdt8.4.1 Historical Background on Cruel and Unusual Punishment

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

During congressional consideration of the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause one Member objected to "the import of [the words] being too indefinite" and another Member said: "No cruel and unusual punishment is to be inflicted; it is sometimes necessary to hang a man, villains often deserve whipping, and perhaps having their ears cut off; but are we in the future to be prevented from inflicting these punishments because they are cruel? If a more lenient

[6] Id. at 266.

[7] Id. at 268.

[8] In Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602 (1993), the Court noted that the application of the Excessive Fines Clause to civil forfeiture did not depend on whether it was a civil or criminal procedure, but rather on whether the forfeiture could be seen as punishment. The Court was apparently willing to consider any number of factors in making this evaluation; civil forfeiture was found to be at least partially intended as punishment, and thus limited by the Clause, based on its common law roots, its focus on culpability, and various indications in the legislative histories of its more recent incarnations.

[9] United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 334 (1998).

[10] Id..

[11] The Court held that a criminal forfeiture, which is imposed at the time of sentencing, should be considered a fine, because it serves as a punishment for the underlying crime. Id. at 328. The Court distinguished this from civil forfeiture, which, as an in rem proceeding against property, would generally not function as a punishment of the criminal defendant. Id. at 330–32.

[12] Id. at 334.

[13] In Bajakajian, the lower court found that the currency in question was not derived from illegal activities, and that the defendant, who had grown up a member of the Armenian minority in Syria, had failed to report the currency out of distrust of the government. Id. at 325–26. The Court found it relevant that the defendant did not appear to be among the class of persons for whom the statute was designed; i.e., a money launderer or tax evader, and that the harm to the government from the defendant's failure to report the currency was minimal. Id. at 338.

mode of correcting vice and deterring others from the commission of it would be invented, it would be very prudent in the Legislature to adopt it; but until we have some security that this will be done, we ought not to be restrained from making necessary laws by any declaration of this kind."[1] It is clear from some of the complaints about the absence of a bill of rights including a guarantee against cruel and unusual punishments in the ratifying conventions that tortures and barbarous punishments were much on the minds of the complainants,[2] but the English history which led to the inclusion of a predecessor provision in the Bill of Rights of 1689 indicates additional concern with arbitrary and disproportionate punishments.[3] Though few in number, the decisions of the Supreme Court interpreting this guarantee have applied it in both senses.

Amdt8.4.2 Evolving or Fixed Standard of Cruel and Unusual Punishment

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

At the end of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court began to consider whether the standard for "cruel and unusual punishments" was fixed at the time of the framing of the Constitution or whether it was an evolving standard. In the 1878 case Wilkerson v. Utah and the 1890 case In re Kemmler, the Supreme Court weighed whether a punishment was "cruel and unusual" by examining whether the Framers would have considered the punishment or a sufficiently similar variant "cruel and unusual" in 1789.[1] In Wilkerson, however, the Court appeared to suggest that this standard necessarily reflected current norms, noting that while "[d]ifficulty would attend the effort to define with exactness the extent of the constitutional provision which provides that cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted," it was "safe to affirm that punishments of torture," such as drawing and quartering, disemboweling alive, beheading, public dissection, and burning alive, are "forbidden by . . . [the] Constitution."[2]

In the twentieth century, the Court began to consider the "cruel and unusual" standard more flexibly, focusing on societal standards, especially as they implicated the "wanton infliction of pain."[3] In 1910, in Weems v. United States,[4] the Court reasoned that the Framers had not merely intended to bar reinstituting procedures and techniques deemed unacceptable in 1789, but had intended to prevent "a coercive cruelty being exercised through other forms of

---

[1] 1 Annals of Congress 754 (1789).

[2] E.g., 2 J. Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Constitution 111 (2d ed. 1836); 3 id. at 447–52.

[3] See Granucci, "Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted": The Original Meaning, 57 Calif. L. Rev. 839 (1969). Disproportionality, in any event, was used by the Court in Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910). It is not clear what, if anything, the word "unusual" adds to the concept of "cruelty" (but see Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 276 n.20 (1972) (Brennan, J., concurring)), although it may have figured in Weems, 217 U.S. at 377, and in Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 100 n.32 (1958) (plurality opinion), and it did figure in Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 994–95 (1991) ("severe, mandatory penalties may be cruel, but they are not unusual in the constitutional sense, having been employed in various forms throughout our Nation's history").

[1] Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130 (1878); In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436 (1890); cf. Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 368–72 (1910). Chief Justice William Rehnquist subscribed to this view (see, e.g., Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 208 (1976) (dissenting)), and the views of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas appear to be similar. See, e.g., Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 966–90 (1991) (Justice Antonin Scalia announcing judgment of Court) (relying on original understanding of Amendment and of English practice to argue that there is no proportionality principle in non-capital cases); and Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 28 (1992) (Thomas, J., dissenting) (objecting to Court's extension of the Amendment "beyond all bounds of history and precedent" in holding that "significant injury" need not be established for sadistic and malicious beating of shackled prisoner to constitute cruel and unusual punishment).

[2] See Wilkerson, 99 U.S. at 135–36.

[3] See Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173 (1976) (joint opinion); see also Bucklew v. Precythe, No. 17-8151, slip op. at 11–12 (U.S. Apr. 1, 2019).

punishment." The Weems Court viewed the Eighth Amendment to be of an "expansive and vital character."[5] In the words of the plurality opinion in the 1958 decision, Trop v. Dulles, this meant that the amendment "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society."[6]

In the context of capital punishment, the Court has generally viewed the Eighth Amendment to prohibit punishments that "involve the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."[7] The Court has applied this standard to uphold the use of a firing squad[8] and electrocution.[9] In other cases, the Supreme Court held that various lethal injection protocols withstood scrutiny under the Eighth Amendment, finding that none of the challenged protocols presented a "substantial risk of serious harm" or an "objectively intolerable risk of harm."[10]

Amdt8.4.3 Proportionality in Sentencing

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Supreme Court has also held that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against "cruel and unusual punishments" applies to punishments that are disproportionate to the offense.[1] In 1892, Justice Stephen Field argued in dissent in O'Neil v. Vermont,[2] that, in addition to prohibiting punishments deemed barbarous and inhumane, the Eighth Amendment also condemned "all punishments which by their excessive length or severity are greatly disproportionate to the offenses charged." In 1910, the Court appeared to adopt Justice Stephen Field's view in Weems v. United States,[3] striking down a sentence imposed in the Philippine Islands for the offense of falsifying public documents that included fifteen years' incarceration at hard labor with chains on the ankles, loss of all civil rights, and perpetual surveillance. Comparing the sentence with those meted out for other offenses, the Court

[4] 217 U.S. 349 (1910).

[5] Id. at 376–77.

[6] Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 100–01 (1958) (plurality opinion). This oft-quoted passage was later repeated, with the Court adding that cruel and unusual punishment "is judged not by the standards that prevailed in 1685 . . . or when the Bill of Rights was adopted, but rather by those that currently prevail." Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 311–12 (2002).

[7] See Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173 (1976) (joint opinion); see also Bucklew, No. 17-8151, slip op. at 11–12 (declaring that "the Eighth Amendment was understood to forbid . . . forms of punishment that intensified the sentence of death" by superadding "terror, pain, or disgrace") (internal citations and quotations omitted).

[8] Wilkerson, 99 U.S. at 137–38.

[9] See In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 447 (1890) ("Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel, within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution. It implies there something inhuman and barbarous, something more than the mere extinguishment of life."); see also Louisiana ex. rel. Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459 (1947).

[10] See Baze v. Rees, 553 U.S. 35, 50 (2008) (plurality opinion) (upholding Kentucky's use of a three-drug cocktail consisting of an anesthetic (sodium thiopental), a muscle relaxant, and an agent that induced cardiac arrest); see also Bucklew, No. 17-8151, slip op. at 22–25 (U.S. Apr. 1, 2019) (in an as-applied challenged, concluding that the petitioner's claims that the State of Missouri's execution protocol would result in severe pain rested on "speculation unsupported, if not affirmatively contradicted, by the evidence" before the lower court); Glossip v. Gross, 576 U.S. 863, 893 (2015) (upholding Oklahoma's use of a three-drug cocktail that utilized a sedative called midazolam in lieu of sodium thiopental).

[1] See, e.g., Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 284 (1983).

[2] 144 U.S. 323, 339–40 (1892).See also Howard v. Fleming, 191 U.S. 126, 135–36 (1903).

[3] 217 U.S. 349 (1910). The Court was here applying not the Eighth Amendment but a statutory bill of rights applying to the Philippines, which it interpreted as having the same meaning. Id. at 367.

concluded: "This contrast shows more than different exercises of legislative judgment. It is greater than that. It condemns the sentence in this case as cruel and unusual. It exhibits a difference between unrestrained power and that which is exercised under the spirit of constitutional limitations formed to establish justice."[4]

The Court has distinguished death penalty cases from length of sentence cases, providing greater deference to state determinations in the latter. In Rummel v. Estelle,[5] the Court upheld a mandatory life sentence under a recidivist statute following a third felony conviction, even though the defendant's three nonviolent felonies had netted him a total of less than $230. In its ruling, the Court reasoned that the unique quality of the death penalty rendered capital cases of limited value to cases concerning the length of a sentence.[6] The Court further distinguished Weems on the ground that the prison conditions and post-release denial of significant rights imposed under the particular Philippine penal code were of considerably greater concern than the length of the sentence. In order to avoid improper judicial interference with state penal systems, the Court reasoned that objective factors must inform Eighth Amendment judgments to the maximum extent possible.[7] But when a punishment is challenged based on its length rather than the seriousness of the offense, the choice is necessarily subjective. Therefore, the Rummel rule appears to be that states may punish any behavior properly classified as a felony with any length of imprisonment purely as a matter legislative discretion.[8] In dismissing the defendant's arguments to the contrary, the Court first noted that the nonviolent nature of the offense was not necessarily relevant to the crime's seriousness, and that determining what is a "small" amount of money, being subjective, was a legislative task. In any event, the Court opined that the state could focus on recidivism not the specific acts. Second, the Court ruled that comparing punishments imposed for the same offenses across jurisdictions was not helpful—differences and similarities being more subtle than gross—and, in any case, in a federal system, one jurisdiction would always be more severe than the rest. Third, the Court noted that comparing punishments imposed for other offenses in the same state ignored the recidivism aspect.[9]

The Court's deference to state determinations is not inviolate, however. The Court distinguished Rummel in Solem v. Helm,[10] stating unequivocally that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause "prohibits not only barbaric punishments, but also sentences that are disproportionate to the crime committed," and that "[t]here is no basis for the State's assertion that the general principle of proportionality does not apply to felony prison sentences."[11] Helm, like Rummel, had been sentenced under a recidivist statute following conviction for a nonviolent felony involving a small amount of money.[12] The Court, however, viewed Helm's sentence of life imprisonment without possibility of parole to be "far more severe than the life

[4] 217 U.S. at 381.

[5] 445 U.S. 263 (1980).

[6] Id. at 272.

[7] Id. at 272–75.

[8] In Hutto v. Davis, 454 U.S. 370 (1982), on the authority of Rummel, the Court summarily reversed a decision holding disproportionate a prison term of forty years and a fine of $20,000 for defendant's possession and distribution of approximately nine ounces of marijuana said to have a street value of about $200.

[9] Rummel, 445 U.S. at 275–82. The dissent deemed these three factors to be sufficiently objective to apply and thought they demonstrated the invalidity of the sentence imposed. Id. at 285, 295–303.

[10] 463 U.S. 277 (1983). The case, like Rummel, was decided by a 5-4 vote.

[11] Id. at 284, 288.

[12] The final conviction was for uttering a no-account check in the amount of $100; previous felony convictions were also for nonviolent crimes described by the Court as "relatively minor." Id. at 296–97.

sentence we considered in Rummel v. Estelle."[13] Rummel, the Court pointed out, "was likely to have been eligible for parole within twelve years of his initial confinement," whereas Helm had only the possibility of executive clemency, characterized by the Court as "nothing more than a hope for 'an ad hoc exercise of clemency.'"[14] The Solem Court also identified "objective criteria" by which proportionality issues should be judged: "(i) the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty; (ii) the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction; and (iii) the sentences imposed for commission of the same crime in other jurisdictions."[15] Measured by these criteria, the Court concluded that Helm's sentence was cruel and unusual. His crime was relatively minor, yet life imprisonment without possibility for parole was the harshest penalty possible in South Dakota, reserved for such other offenses as murder, manslaughter, kidnaping, and arson. In only one other state could Helm have received so harsh a sentence, and in no other state was it mandated.[16]

Harmelin v. Michigan [17] saw a closely divided Court hold that a mandatory term of life imprisonment without possibility of parole was not cruel and unusual as applied to the crime of possession of more than 650 grams of cocaine. The Court limited its opinion to the mandatory nature of the penalty, rejecting an argument that sentencers in non-capital cases must be allowed to hear mitigating evidence.[18] As to the length of sentence, three majority Justices—Anthony Kennedy, Sandra Day O'Connor, and David Souter—recognized a narrow proportionality principle, but considered Harmelin's crime severe and by no means grossly disproportionate to the penalty imposed.[19]

Twelve years after Harmelin, in Ewing v. California,[20] the Court did not reach a consensus on a rationale for rejecting a proportionality challenge to California's "three-strikes" law, as applied to a sentence of twenty-five years to life in prison for a repeat offender who had stolen three golf clubs valued at $399 apiece. A plurality of three Justices (Sandra Day O'Connor, Anthony Kennedy, and Chief Justice William Rehnquist) determined that the sentence was "justified by the State's public safety interest in incapacitating and deterring recidivist felons, and amply supported by [the petitioner's] long, serious criminal record," and hence was not the [13] Id. at 297.

[14] Id. at 297, 303.

[15] Id. at 292.

[16] For a suggestion that Eighth Amendment proportionality analysis may limit the severity of punishment possible for prohibited private and consensual homosexual conduct, see Justice Lewis Powell's concurring opinion in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186, 197 (1986).

[17] 501 U.S. 957 (1991).

[18] "Severe, mandatory penalties may be cruel, but they are not unusual in the constitutional sense." 501 U.S. at 994. The Court's opinion, written by Justice Antonin Scalia, then elaborated an understanding of "unusual"—set forth elsewhere in a part of his opinion subscribed to only by Chief Justice William Rehnquist—that denies the possibility of proportionality review altogether. Mandatory penalties are not unusual in the constitutional sense because they have "been employed in various form throughout our Nation's history." This is an application of Justice Antonin Scalia's belief that cruelty and unusualness are to be determined solely by reference to the punishment at issue and without reference to the crime for which it is imposed.See id. at 975–78 (not opinion of Court—only Chief Justice Rehnquist joined this portion of the opinion). Because a majority of other Justices indicated in the same case that they do recognize at least a narrow proportionality principle (see id. at 996 (Kennedy, O'Connor, and Souter, JJ., concurring); id. at 1009 (White, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., dissenting); id. at 1027 (Marshall, J., dissenting)), the fact that three of those Justices (Anthony Kennedy, Sandra Day O'Connor, and David Souter) joined Justice Antonin Scalia's opinion on mandatory penalties should probably not be read as representing agreement with Justice Antonin Scalia's general approach to proportionality.

[19] Because of the "serious nature" of the crime, the three-Justice plurality asserted that there was no need to apply the other Solem factors comparing the sentence to sentences imposed for other crimes in Michigan, and to sentences imposed for the same crime in other jurisdictions. Harmelin, 501 U.S. at 1004. Dissenting Justice White, joined by Justices Blackmun and Stevens (Justice Thurgood Marshall also expressed agreement on this and most other points, id. at 1027), asserted that Justice Kennedy's approach would "eviscerate" Solem. Id. at 1018.

[20] 538 U.S. 11 (2003).

"rare case" of "gross disproportional[ity]."[21] The other two Justices voting in the majority were Justice Antonin Scalia, who objected that the proportionality principle cannot be intelligently applied when the penological goal is incapacitation rather than retribution,[22] and Justice Clarence Thomas, who asserted that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause "contains no proportionality principle."[23] The Court also rejected a habeas corpus challenge to California's "three-strikes" law for failure to clear the statutory hurdle of establishing that the sentencing was contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, "clearly established federal law."[24] Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's opinion for a five-Justice majority explained, in understatement, that the Court's precedents in the area "have not been a model of clarity . . . that have established a clear or consistent path for courts to follow."[25]

Amdt8.4.4 Proportionality and Juvenile Offenders

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Court has distinguished the treatment of juvenile offenders in considering proportionality under the "cruel and unusual punishment" standard. In Graham v. Florida,[1] Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for a five-Justice majority, declared that "[t]he concept of proportionality is central to the Eighth Amendment," in holding that "[t]he Constitution prohibits the imposition of a life without parole sentence on a juvenile offender who did not commit homicide."[2] Justice Anthony Kennedy characterized proportionality cases as falling within two general types. The first type comprises challenges to the length of actual sentences imposed as being grossly disproportionate, and such challenges are resolved under approaches taken in Solem, Harmelin, and similar cases. The second type comprises challenges to particular sentencing practices as being categorically impermissible, but categorical restrictions had theretofore been limited to imposing the death penalty on those with diminished capacity. In Graham, Justice Anthony Kennedy broke new ground and recognized a categorical restriction on life without parole for nonhomicide offenses by juveniles, citing considerations and applying analysis similar to those used in his juvenile capital punishment opinion in Roper v. Simmons.[3] In considering objective indicia of a national consensus on the sentence, the Graham opinion looked beyond statutory authorization—thirty-seven states and the District of Columbia permitted life without parole for some juvenile nonhomicide offenders—to actual imposition, which was rare outside Florida. Justice Anthony Kennedy also found support "in the fact that, in continuing to impose life without parole sentences on

---

[21] Id. at 29–30.

[22] Id. at 31.

[23] Id. at 32. The four dissenting Justices thought that the sentence was invalid under the Harmelin test used by the plurality, although they suggested that the Solem v. Helm test would have been more appropriate for a recidivism case. See Ewing, 538 U.S. at 32, n.1 (opinion of Justice Stevens).

[24] Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003). The three-strikes law had been used to impose two consecutive twnty-five-year-to-life sentences on a thirty-seven-year-old convicted of two petty thefts with a prior conviction.

[25] Id. at 72.

[1] 560 U.S. 48 (2010).

[2] Id. at 82. The opinion distinguished life without parole from a life sentence. An offender need not be guaranteed eventual release under the Graham holding, just a realistic opportunity for release based on conduct during confinement.

[3] See 543 U.S. 551 (2005). Concurring in the judgement in Graham, Chief Justice John Roberts resolved the case under a proportionality test, finding the majority's categorical restriction to be unwise and unnecessary in Graham's circumstances. 560 U.S. 48 (2010) (Roberts, C.J., concurring).

juveniles who did not commit homicide, the United States adhere[d] to a sentencing practice rejected the world over."[4] After finding that a consensus had developed against the sentencing practice at issue, Justice Anthony Kennedy expressed an independent judgment that imposing life without parole on juveniles for nonhomicide offenses failed to serve legitimate penological goals adequately.[5] Factors in reaching this conclusion included the severity of the sentence, the relative culpability of juveniles, and the prospect for their rehabilitation.[6]

The concept of proportionality also drove Justice Elena Kagan's majority opinion in Miller v. Alabama, in which the Court held that the Eighth Amendment forbids any sentencing scheme that mandates life without parole for juveniles convicted of homicide.[7] The Miller Court's analysis began by recounting the factors, stated in Roper and Graham, that mark children as constitutionally different from adults for purposes of sentencing: Children have diminished capacities and greater prospects for reform.[8] In the Court's view, a process that mandates life imprisonment without parole for juvenile offenders is constitutionally flawed because it forecloses any consideration of the hallmark attributes of youth in meting out society's severest penalties.[9] Nevertheless, the majority concluded that those factors, even when coupled with the severity of a life without parole sentence, did not require a categorical bar on life without parole for juveniles in homicide cases.[10] Rather, the Court held that sentencers who consider an offender's youth and attendant characteristics may impose discretionary juvenile life without parole sentences in homicide cases.[11] Building on Miller, in Montgomery v. Louisiana, the Court held that Miller's prohibition on mandatory life without parole sentences for juvenile offenders applied retroactively to convictions that were final before Miller was decided.[12] Justice Anthony Kennedy, joined by five other Justices, explained that Miller had prohibited life without parole "for all but the rarest of juvenile offenders, those whose crimes reflect permanent incorrigibility."[13]

After the foregoing decisions expanded Eighth Amendment protections for juvenile offenders, the Supreme Court declined to further extend those protections in Jones v. Mississippi.[14] In that case, a man convicted of murder as a juvenile argued that the Eighth Amendment, as interpreted in Miller and Montgomery, prohibits sentencing juvenile homicide offenders to life without parole unless they are found to be "permanently incorrigible."[15] Justice Brett Kavanaugh's majority opinion rejected that argument, holding that "a separate factual finding of permanent incorrigibility is not required" before a juvenile may be sentenced to life without parole.[16] Rather, a state sentencing scheme that gives the sentencer discretion

[4] Graham, 560 U.S. at 80.

[5] For a parallel discussion in Roper, see 543 U.S. 551, 568–75 (2005).

[6] In dissent, Justice Clarence Thomas, joined by Justice Antonin Scalia and, in part, by Justice Samuel Alito, questioned both the basis and the reach of the majority opinion. In addition to strongly objecting to adopting any categorical rule in a nonhomicide context, Justice Clarence Thomas pointedly criticized the conclusion that the legislative and judicial records established a consensus against imposing life without parole on juvenile offenders in nonhomicide cases. He also disparaged the majority's independent judgment on the morality and justice of the sentence as wrongfully pre-empting the political process. Graham, 560 U.S. 48 (Thomas, J., dissenting).

[7] 567 U.S. 460, 465 (2012).

[8] Id. at 471.

[9] Id. at 477.

[10] Id. at 479.

[11] Id. at 479–80.

[12] 577 U.S. 190, 205 (2016).

[13] Id. at 208–09.

[14] No. 18-1259, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. Apr. 22, 2021).

[15] Id. at 1.

[16] Id. at 5.

whether to impose a life without parole sentence for a juvenile homicide offender "is both constitutionally necessary and constitutionally sufficient."[17]

Amdt8.4.5 Limitation to Criminal Punishments

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Eighth Amendment deals only with criminal punishment, and has no application to civil processes. In holding the Amendment inapplicable to the infliction of corporal punishment upon schoolchildren for disciplinary purposes, the Court in Ingraham v. Wright explained that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause "circumscribes the criminal process in three ways: First, it limits the kinds of punishment that government can impose on those convicted of crimes; second, it proscribes punishment grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime; and third, it imposes substantive limits on what can be made criminal and punished as such."[1] These limitations, the Court thought, should not be extended outside the criminal process.[2]

Amdt8.4.6 Drug and Alcohol Dependency

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

In Robinson v. California[1] the Court set aside a conviction under a law making it a crime to "be addicted to the use of narcotics." The statute was unconstitutional because it punished the "mere status" of being an addict without any requirement of a showing that a defendant had ever used narcotics within the jurisdiction of the state or had committed any act at all within the state's power to proscribe, and because addiction is an illness that—however it is acquired—physiologically compels the victim to continue using drugs. The case could stand for the principle, therefore, that one may not be punished for a status in the absence of some act,[2] or it could stand for the broader principle that it is cruel and unusual to punish someone for conduct that he is unable to control, which would make it a holding of far-reaching importance.[3] In Powell v. Texas,[4] a majority of the Justices took the latter view of Robinson, but the result, because of one Justice's view of the facts, was a refusal to invalidate a conviction of

---

[17] Id.

[1] Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 667 (1977) (citations omitted). Constitutional restraint on school discipline, the Court ruled, is to be found in the Due Process Clause, if at all.

[2] Id. at 667–69.

[1] 370 U.S. 660 (1962).

[2] A different approach to essentially the same problem was taken in Thompson v. Louisville, 362 U.S. 199, 206 (1960), which set aside a conviction for loitering and disorderly conduct as being supported by "no evidence whatever." Cf. Johnson v. Florida, 391 U.S. 596 (1968) (no evidence that the defendant was "wandering or strolling around" in violation of vagrancy law).

[3] Fully applied, the principle would raise to constitutional status the concept of mens rea, and it would thereby constitutionalize some form of insanity defense as well as other capacity defenses. For a somewhat different approach, see Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957) (due process denial for city to apply felon registration requirement to someone present in city but lacking knowledge of requirement). More recently, this controversy has become a due process matter, with the holding that the Due Process Clause requires the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the facts necessary to constitute the crime charged, Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975), raising the issue of the insanity defense and other such questions. See Rivera v. Delaware, 429 U.S. 877 (1976); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 202–05 (1977). In Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 297 n.22 (1983), an Eighth Amendment proportionality case, an alcoholic for public drunkenness. Whether either the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clauses will govern the requirement of the recognition of capacity defenses to criminal charges remains to be decided.

Amdt8.4.7 Conditions of Confinement

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Supreme Court stated in Rhodes v. Chapman, "It is unquestioned that '[c]onfinement in a prison . . . is a form of punishment subject to scrutiny under the Eighth Amendment standards.'"[1] The Court explained that "[c]onditions [in prison] must not involve the wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain, nor may they be grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime warranting imprisonment." According to the Rhodes Court, prison conditions, "alone or in combination, may deprive inmates of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities" and thus violate the Eighth Amendment. However "conditions that cannot be said to be cruel and unusual under contemporary standards are not unconstitutional. To the extent that such conditions are restrictive and even harsh, they are part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society."[2] These general principles apply both to the treatment of individuals[3] and to the creation or maintenance of prison conditions that are inhumane to inmates generally.[4]

Ordinarily, the question of whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual involves both a subjective and an objective inquiry.[5] When conditions of confinement are not formally meted out as punishment by the statute or sentencing judge, such conditions cannot qualify as "cruel and unusual punishment" unless the prison officials who impose them the Court suggested in dictum that life imprisonment without possibility of parole of a recidivist who was an alcoholic, and all of whose crimes had been influenced by his alcohol use, was "unlikely to advance the goals of our criminal justice system in any substantial way."

---

[4] 392 U.S. 514 (1968). The plurality opinion by Justice Thurgood Marshall, joined by Justices Hugo Black and John Marshall Harlan and Chief Justice Earl Warren, interpreted Robinson as proscribing only punishment of "status," and not punishment for "acts," and expressed a fear that a contrary holding would impel the Court into constitutional definitions of such matters as actus reus, mens rea, insanity, mistake, justification, and duress. Id. at 532–37. Justice Byron White concurred, but only because the record did not show that the defendant was unable to stay out of public; like the dissent, Justice Byron White was willing to hold that if addiction as a status may not be punished neither can the yielding to the compulsion of that addiction, whether to narcotics or to alcohol. Id. at 548. Dissenting Justices Abe Fortas, William O. Douglas, William Brennan, and Potter Stewart wished to adopt a rule that "[c]riminal penalties may not be inflicted upon a person for being in a condition he is powerless to change." That is, one under an irresistible compulsion to drink or to take narcotics may not be punished for those acts. Id. at 554, 567.

[1] Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 345 (1981) (quoting Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 685 (1978)).

[2] 452 U.S. at 347. See also Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 137 (2003) (rejecting a challenge to a two-year withdrawal of visitation as punishment for prisoners who commit multiple substance abuse violations, characterizing the practice as "not a dramatic departure from accepted standards for conditions of confinement," but indicating that a permanent ban "would present different considerations").

[3] E.g., Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976) (deliberate medical neglect of a prisoner violates Eighth Amendment); Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25 (1993) (prisoner who alleged exposure to secondhand "environmental" tobacco smoke stated a cause of action under the Eighth Amendment); Taylor v. Riojas, No. 19-1261, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Nov. 2, 2020) (per curiam) (four days' confinement in a cell "covered, nearly floor to ceiling, in massive amounts of feces" followed by two days in a "frigidly cold cell" where prisoner "was left to sleep naked in sewage" violated the Eighth Amendment) (internal quotes omitted). In Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007) (per curiam), the Court overturned a lower court's dismissal, on procedural grounds, of a prisoner's claim of having been denied medical treatment, with life-threatening consequences.

[4] E.g., Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978).

[5] E.g., Rhodes, 452 U.S.at 346–47.

possess a culpable, "wanton" state of mind.[6] In the context of general prison conditions, this culpable state of mind is "deliberate indifference";[7] in the context of emergency actions, such as actions required to suppress a disturbance by inmates, only a malicious and sadistic state of mind suffices to violate the Eighth Amendment.[8] When excessive force is alleged, the objective standard varies depending upon whether that force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or whether it was applied maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. In the good-faith context, there must be proof of significant injury. When, however, prison officials "maliciously and sadistically use force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency are always violated," and there is no need to prove that "significant injury" resulted.[9]

Beginning in 1970, federal courts found prisons or entire prison systems to violate the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause and imposed broad remedial orders to improve prison conditions and ameliorate prison life in more than two dozen states.[10] The Supreme Court upheld challenged portions of one of those decisions in Hutto v. Finney.[11] The issues before the Supreme Court in Hutto were limited to the appropriateness of the remedy; however, the Court expressed approval of the district court's Eighth Amendment analysis.[12] By contrast, in two subsequent cases, the Court rejected Eighth Amendment challenges to the practice of housing two inmates in the same cell.[13] Although the Court in each case reaffirmed the duty of the federal courts to protect prisoners' constitutional rights, it cautioned the courts to proceed with deference to the decisions of state legislatures and prison administrators.[14] Thus, concerns of federalism and judicial restraint apparently motivated the Court to limit federal remedies where the prevailing circumstances, given the resources states choose to devote to them, [6] Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294 (1991).

[7] 501 U.S. at 303. Deliberate indifference in this context means something more than disregarding an unjustifiably high risk of harm that should have been known, as might apply in the civil context. Rather, it requires the court to find that the responsible person acted in reckless disregard of a risk of which he or she was aware, as would generally be required for a criminal charge of recklessness. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994). In upholding capital punishment by a three-drug lethal injection protocol, despite the risk that the protocol will not be properly followed and consequently result in severe pain, a Court plurality found that, although "subjecting individuals to a risk of future harm—not simply actually inflicting pain—can qualify as cruel and unusual punishment . . . , the conditions presenting the risk must be 'sure or very likely to cause serious illness and needless suffering,' and give rise to 'sufficiently imminent dangers.' . . . [T]o prevail on such a claim there must be a 'substantial risk of serious harm,' an 'objectively intolerable risk of harm' that prevents prison officials from pleading that they were 'subjectively blameless for purposes of the Eighth Amendment.'" Baze v. Rees, 553 U.S. 35, 48–50 (2008) (emphasis added by the Court). This case is also discussed under Amdt8.4.9.10 Execution Methods.

[8] Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986) (arguably excessive force in suppressing prison uprising did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment).

[9] Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 9 (1992) (beating of a shackled prisoner resulted in bruises, swelling, loosened teeth, and a cracked dental plate). Accord Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010) (per curiam).

[10] Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 353–54 n.1 (1981) (Brennan, J., concurring) (collecting cases). See Note, Complex Enforcement: Unconstitutional Prison Conditions, 94 HARV. L. REV. 626 (1981).

[11] 437 U.S. 678 (1978).

[12] Id. at 685–86 ("Read in its entirety, the District Court's opinion makes it abundantly clear that the length of isolation sentences was not considered in a vacuum. In the court's words, punitive isolation 'is not necessarily unconstitutional, but it may be, depending on the duration of the confinement and the conditions thereof.'") (quoting Finney v. Hutto, 410 F. Supp. 251, 275 (E.D. Ark. 1976)).

[13] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 530–36 (1979); Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347–50 (1981).

[14] Bell, 441 U.S. at 562 ("The deplorable conditions and Draconian restrictions of some of our Nation's prisons are too well known to require recounting here, and the federal courts rightly have condemned these sordid aspects of our prison systems. But many of these same courts have, in the name of the Constitution, become increasingly enmeshed in the minutiae of prison operations. . . . This does not mean that constitutional rights are not to be scrupulously observed. It does mean, however, that the inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the Constitution or, in the case of a federal prison, a statute."); see also Rhodes, 452 U.S. at 351–52.

"cannot be said to be cruel and unusual under contemporary standards."[15] Subsequent cases indicate that such concerns are relevant to Eighth Amendment analysis but are not dispositive.[16]

Congress initially authorized litigation over prison conditions in 1980 in the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act,[17] but then in 1996 added restrictions through the Prison Litigation Reform Act.[18] The Court upheld the latter law's provision for an automatic stay of prospective relief upon the filing of a motion to modify or terminate that relief, ruling that the automatic stay provision did not violate separation of powers principles.[19]

Amdt8.4.8 Divestiture of Citizenship

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Court has looked unfavorably on divestiture of citizenship as a punishment. In Trop v. Dulles, the Court held divestiture of the citizenship of a natural born citizen to be cruel and unusual punishment.[1] The Court viewed divestiture of citizenship as a penalty "more primitive than torture," because it entailed statelessness or "the total destruction of the individual's status in organized society."[2] The Court commented that: "The question is whether [a] penalty subjects the individual to a fate forbidden by the principle of civilized treatment guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment."[3] The Court further reasoned that a punishment must be examined "in light of the basic prohibition against inhuman treatment," and that the Eighth Amendment was intended to preserve the "basic concept . . . [of] the dignity of man" by assuring that the power to impose punishment is "exercised within the limits of civilized standards."[4]

---

[15] Rhodes, 452 U.S. at 351–52; See also Rufo v. Inmates of Suffolk County Jail, 502 U.S. 367 (1991) (allowing modification, based on a significant change in law or facts, of a 1979 consent decree that had ordered construction of a new jail with single-occupancy cells; modification was to depend upon whether the upsurge in jail population was anticipated when the decree was entered, and whether the decree was premised on the mistaken belief that single-celling is constitutionally mandated).

[16] E.g., Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 35–37 (1993) (Holding that "[w]e cannot rule at this juncture that it will be impossible . . . to prove an Eighth Amendment violation based on exposure to ETS [environmental tobacco smoke]," and inquiry into whether prison authorities were deliberately indifferent to dangers posed by exposure to ETS "would be an appropriate vehicle to consider arguments regarding the realities of prison administration.").

[17] Pub. L. No. 96-247, 94 Stat. 349, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1997 et seq.

[18] Pub. L. No. 104-134, title VIII, 110 Stat. 1321-66–1321-77.

[19] Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327 (2000). See also Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516 (2002) (applying the Act's requirement that prisoners exhaust administrative remedies).

[1] 356 U.S. 86 (1958). Again the Court was divided. Four Justices joined the plurality opinion while Justice William Brennan concurred on the ground that the requisite relation between the severity of the penalty and legitimate purpose under the war power was not apparent. Id. at 114. Four Justices dissented, denying that denationalization was a punishment and arguing that instead it was merely a means by which Congress regulated discipline in the armed forces. Id. at 121, 124–27.

[2] Id. at 101.

[3] Id. at 99.

[4] Id. at 100, 101 n.32. The action of prison guards in handcuffing a prisoner to a hitching post for long periods of time violated basic human dignity and constituted "gratuitous infliction of 'wanton and unnecessary pain'" prohibited by the clause. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738 (2002).

Amdt8.4.9 Death Penalty

Amdt8.4.9.1 Overview of Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Supreme Court's 1972 decision in Furman v. Georgia,[1] finding constitutional deficiencies in the manner in which the death penalty was applied, but not holding the death penalty unconstitutional per se, was a watershed in capital punishment jurisprudence. The ruling effectively constitutionalized capital sentencing law and involved federal courts in extensive review of capital sentences.[2]

Prior to 1972, constitutional law governing capital punishment was relatively simple and straightforward. Capital punishment was constitutional, and there were few grounds for constitutional review.[3] In Furman and the five 1976 cases that followed, in which the Court reviewed laws[4] that states had revised in response to Furman, the Court reaffirmed the constitutionality of capital punishment per se, but also opened up several avenues for constitutional review.

Since 1976, the Court has issued many decisions on applying and reconciling the principles it has identified for applying the death penalty. In particular, the Court has held that sentencing discretion must be limited to preventing courts from arbitrarily imposing the death penalty. Accordingly, the Court has established that courts should follow guidelines that narrow and define the category of death-eligible defendants. Jury discretion, however, must be preserved in order for jurors to weigh the mitigating circumstances of individual defendants who fall within the death-eligible class.

Amdt8.4.9.2 Early Doctrine on Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

In Trop v. Dulles, the majority refused to consider "the death penalty as an index of the constitutional limit on punishment. Whatever the arguments may be against capital punishment . . . the death penalty has been employed throughout our history, and, in a day when it is still widely accepted, it cannot be said to violate the constitutional concept of cruelty."[1] But a coalition of civil rights and civil liberties organizations mounted a campaign against the death penalty in the 1960s, and the Court eventually confronted the issues involved. The answers were not, it is fair to say, consistent.

---

[1] 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

[2] See Carol S. Steiker and Jordan M. Steiker, Sober Second Thoughts: Reflections on Two Decades of Constitutional Regulation of Capital Punishment, 109 HARV. L. REV. 355 (1995).

[3] See McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 207 (1971) ("[W]e find it quite impossible to say that committing to the untrammeled discretion of the jury the power to pronounce life or death in capital cases is offensive to anything in the Constitution."). Justice William O. Douglas in his opinion in support of the Furman per curiam decision, observed, "We are now imprisoned in the McGautha holding . . . [that] [j]uries . . . have practically untrammeled [unguided] discretion to let an accused live or insist that he die." Furman, 408 U.S. at 248.

[4] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Proffitt v, Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976); Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976).

[1] 356 U.S. 86, 99 (1958).

Amdt8.4.9.2
Early Doctrine on Death Penalty

A series of cases testing the means by which the death penalty was imposed[2] culminated in what appeared to be a decisive rejection of the attack in McGautha v. California.[3]

The Court added a fourth major guideline in 2002, holding that the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury comprehends the right to have a jury make factual determinations on which a sentencing increase is based.[4] This means that capital sentencing schemes are unconstitutional if judges are allowed to make factual findings as to the existence of aggravating circumstances that are prerequisites for imposition of a death sentence.

Amdt8.4.9.3 Furman and Moratorium on Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

In Furman v. Georgia,[1] the Supreme Court held that the death penalty, at least as administered, violated the Eighth Amendment. There was no unifying opinion of the Court in Furman; the five Justices in the majority each approached the matter from a different angle in separate concurring opinions. Two Justices concluded that the death penalty was "cruel and unusual" per se because the imposition of capital punishment "does not comport with human dignity"[2] or because it is "morally unacceptable" and "excessive."[3] One Justice concluded that because death is a penalty inflicted on the poor and hapless defendant but not the affluent and socially better situated defendant, it violates the implicit requirement of equality of treatment found within the Eighth Amendment.[4] Two Justices concluded that capital punishment was both "cruel" and "unusual" because it was applied in an arbitrary, "wanton," and "freakish" manner[5] and so infrequently that it served no justifying end.[6]

---

[2] In Rudolph v. Alabama, 375 U.S. 889 (1963), Justices Arthur Goldberg, William O. Douglas, and William Brennan, dissenting from a denial of certiorari, argued that the Court should have heard the case to consider whether the Constitution permitted the imposition of death "on a convicted rapist who has neither taken nor endangered human life," and presented a line of argument questioning the general validity of the death penalty under the Eighth Amendment. The Court addressed exclusion of death-scrupled jurors in Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510 (1968). Witherspoon and subsequent cases explicating it are discussed under Amdt6.4.5.1 A Jury Selected from a Representative Cross-Section of the Community.

[3] 402 U.S. 183 (1971). McGautha was decided in the same opinion with Crampton v. Ohio. McGautha raised the question whether provision for imposition of the death penalty without legislative guidance to the sentencing authority in the form of standards violated the Due Process Clause; Crampton raised the question whether due process was violated when both the issue of guilt or innocence and the issue of whether to impose the death penalty were determined in a unitary proceeding. Justice Harlan for the Court held that standards were not required because, ultimately, it was impossible to define with any degree of specificity which defendant should live and which die; although bifurcated proceedings might be desirable, they were not required by due process.

[4] Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002). See also Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616, 619–20 (2016).

[1] 408 U.S. 238 (1972). The change in the Court's approach was occasioned by the shift of Justices Potter Stewart and Byron White, who had voted with the majority in McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971).

[2] Furman, 408 U.S. at 257 (Brennan, J.).

[3] Id. at 314 (Marshall, J.).

[4] Id. at 240 (Douglas, J.).

[5] Id. at 306 (Stewart, J.).

[6] Id. at 310 (White, J.). The four dissenters, in four separate opinions, argued with different emphases that the Constitution itself recognized capital punishment in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, that the death penalty was not "cruel and unusual" when the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were proposed and ratified, that the Court was engaging in a legislative act to strike it down now, and that even under modern standards it could not be considered "cruel and unusual." Id. at 375 (Burger, C.J.), 405 (Blackmun, J.), 414 (Powell, J.), 465 (Rehnquist, C.J.). Each of the dissenters joined each of the opinions of the others.

Amdt8.4.9.4 Gregg v. Georgia and Limits on Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Because only two of the Justices in Furman thought the death penalty to be invalid in all circumstances, those who wished to reinstate the penalty concentrated upon drafting statutes that would correct the faults identified in the other three majority opinions.[1] Enactment of death penalty statutes by thirty-five states following Furman led to renewed litigation, but not to the elucidation one might expect from a series of opinions.[2] Instead, although the Court seemed firmly on the path to the conclusion that only criminal acts that result in the deliberate taking of human life may be punished by the state's taking of human life,[3] it chose several different paths in attempting to delineate the acceptable procedural devices that must be instituted in order that death may be constitutionally pronounced and carried out. To summarize, the Court determined that the penalty of death for deliberate murder is not per se cruel and unusual, but that mandatory death statutes leaving the jury or trial judge no discretion to consider the individual defendant and his crime are cruel and unusual, and that standards and procedures may be established for the imposition of death that would remove or mitigate the arbitrariness and irrationality found so significant in Furman.[4] Divisions among the Justices, however, made it difficult to ascertain the form that permissible statutory schemes may take.[5]

---

[1] Collectors of judicial "put downs" of colleagues should note Justice William Rehnquist's characterization of the many expressions of faults in the system and their correction as "glossolalial." Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 317 (1976) (dissenting).

[2] Justice Felix Frankfurter once wrote of the development of the law through "the process of litigating elucidation." International Ass'n of Machinists v. Gonzales, 356 U.S. 617, 619 (1958). The Justices are firm in declaring that the series of death penalty cases failed to conform to this concept. See, e.g., Chief Justice Warren Burger, Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 602 (1978) (plurality opinion) ("The signals from this Court have not . . . always been easy to decipher"); Justice Byron White, id. at 622 ("The Court has now completed its about-face since Furman") (concurring in result); and Justice Rehnquist, id. at 629 (dissenting) ("the Court has gone from pillar to post, with the result that the sort of reasonable predictability upon which legislatures, trial courts, and appellate courts must of necessity rely has been all but completely sacrificed"), and id. at 632 ("I am frank to say that I am uncertain whether today's opinion represents the seminal case in the exposition by this Court of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments as they apply to capital punishment, or whether instead it represents the third false start in this direction within the past six years").

[3] On crimes not involving the taking of life or the actual commission of the killing by a defendant, see Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977) (rape of an adult woman); Kennedy v. Louisiana, 128 S. Ct. 2461 (2008) (rape of an eight-year-old child); Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982) (felony murder where defendant aided and abetted a robbery during which a murder was committed but did not himself kill, attempt to kill, or intend that a killing would take place). Compare Enmund with Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137 (1987) (death sentence upheld where defendants did not kill but their involvement in the events leading up to the murders was active, recklessly indifferent, and substantial). Those cases in which a large threat, though uneventuated, to the lives of many may have been present, as in airplane hijackings, may constitute an exception to the Court's narrowing of the crimes for which capital punishment may be imposed. The federal hijacking statute, 49 U.S.C. § 46502, imposes the death penalty only when a death occurs during commission of the hijacking. By contrast, the treason statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2381, permits the death penalty in the absence of a death, and represents a situation in which great and fatal danger might be present. But the treason statute also constitutes a crime against the state, which may be significant. In Kennedy v. Louisiana, 128 S. Ct. 2641, 2659 (2008), in overturning a death sentence imposed for the rape of a child, the Court wrote, "Our concern here is limited to crimes against individual persons. We do not address, for example, crimes defining and punishing treason, espionage, terrorism, and drug kingpin activity, which are offenses against the State."

[4] Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall adhered to the view that the death penalty is per se unconstitutional. E.g., Coker, 433 U.S. at 600; Lockett, 438 U.S. at 619; Enmund, 458 U.S. at 801.

[5] A comprehensive evaluation of the multiple approaches followed in Furman-era cases may be found in Radin, The Jurisprudence of Death: Evolving Standards for the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, 126 U. PA. L. REV. 989 (1978).

Because the three Justices in the majority in Furman who did not altogether reject the death penalty thought the problems with the system revolved about discriminatory and arbitrary imposition,[6] legislatures turned to enactment of statutes that purported to do away with these difficulties. One approach was to provide for automatic imposition of the death penalty upon conviction for certain forms of murder. More commonly, states established special procedures to follow in capital cases, and specified aggravating and mitigating factors that the sentencing authority must consider in imposing sentence. In five cases in 1976, the Court rejected automatic sentencing but approved other statutes specifying factors for jury consideration.[7]

First, the Court concluded that the death penalty as a punishment for murder does not itself constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Although there were differences of degree among the seven Justices in the majority on this point, they all seemed to concur that reenactment of capital punishment statutes by thirty-five states precluded the Court from concluding that this form of penalty was no longer acceptable to a majority of the American people. Rather, they concluded, a large proportion of American society continued to regard it as an appropriate and necessary criminal sanction. Neither is it possible, the Court continued, to rule that the death penalty does not comport with the basic concept of human dignity at the core of the Eighth Amendment. Courts are not free to substitute their own judgments for the people and their elected representatives. A death penalty statute, just as all other statutes, comes before the courts bearing a presumption of validity that can be overcome only upon a strong showing by those who attack its constitutionality. Whether in fact the death penalty validly serves the permissible functions of retribution and deterrence, the judgments of the state legislatures are that it does, and those judgments are entitled to deference. Therefore, the infliction of death as a punishment for murder is not without justification and is not unconstitutionally severe. Nor is the punishment of death disproportionate to the crime being punished, murder.[8]

Second, however, a different majority concluded that statutes mandating the imposition of death for crimes classified as first degree murder violate the Eighth Amendment. A review of history, traditional usage, legislative enactments, and jury determinations led the plurality to conclude that mandatory death sentences had been rejected by contemporary standards. Moreover, mandatory sentencing precludes the individualized "consideration of the character

---

[6] Thus, Justice William O. Douglas thought the penalty had been applied discriminatorily, Furman, 408 U.S. 238, Justice Potter Stewart thought it "wantonly and . . . freakishly imposed," id. at 310, and Justice Byron White thought it had been applied so infrequently that it served no justifying end. Id. at 313.

[7] The principal opinion was in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976) (upholding statute providing for a bifurcated proceeding separating the guilt and sentencing phases, requiring the jury to find at least one of ten statutory aggravating factors before imposing death, and providing for review of death sentences by the Georgia Supreme Court). Statutes of two other states were similarly sustained, Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976) (statute generally similar to Georgia's, with the exception that the trial judge, rather than jury, was directed to weigh statutory aggravating factors against statutory mitigating factors), and Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976) (statute construed as narrowing death-eligible class, and lumping mitigating factors into consideration of future dangerousness), while those of two other states were invalidated, Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976), and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976) (both mandating death penalty for first-degree murder).

[8] Gregg, 428 U.S. at 168–87 (Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.); Roberts, 428 U.S. at 350–56 (White, Blackmun, Rehnquist, JJ., and Burger, C.J.). The views summarized in the text are those in the Stewart opinion in Gregg. Justice Byron White's opinion basically agrees with this opinion in concluding that contemporary community sentiment accepts capital punishment, but did not endorse the proportionality analysis. Justice Byron White's Furman dissent and those of Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice Blackmun show a rejection of proportionality analysis. Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall dissented, reiterating their Furman views. Gregg, 428 U.S. at 227, 231.

and record of the . . . offender and the circumstances of the particular offense" that "the fundamental respect for humanity underlying the Eighth Amendment" requires in capital cases.[9]

A third principle established by the 1976 cases was that the procedure by which a death sentence is imposed must be structured so as to reduce arbitrariness and capriciousness as much as possible.[10] What emerged from the prevailing plurality opinion in these cases are requirements (1) that the sentencing authority, jury or judge,[11] be given standards to govern its exercise of discretion and be given the opportunity to evaluate both the circumstances of the offense and the character and propensities of the accused;[12] (2) that to prevent jury prejudice on the issue of guilt there be a separate proceeding after conviction at which evidence relevant to the sentence, mitigating and aggravating, be presented;[13] (3) that special forms of appellate review be provided not only of the conviction but also of the sentence, to ascertain that the sentence was fairly imposed both in light of the facts of the individual case and by comparison with the penalties imposed in similar cases.[14] The Court later ruled, however, that proportionality review is not constitutionally required.[15] Gregg, Proffitt, and Jurek did not

[9] Woodson, 428 U.S. 280; Roberts, 428 U.S. 325. Justices Stewart, Lewis Powell, and John Paul Stevens composed the plurality, and Justices William Brennan and Thurgod Marshall concurred on the basis of their own views of the death penalty. Id. at 305, 306, 336.

[10] Here adopted is the constitutional analysis of the Stewart plurality of three. "[T]he holding of the Court may be viewed as the position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds," Gregg, 428 U.S. at 169 n.15 (1976), a comment directed to the Furman opinions but equally applicable to these cases and to Lockett. See Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 192–94 (1977).

[11] The Stewart plurality noted its belief that jury sentencing in capital cases performs an important social function in maintaining the link between contemporary community values and the penal system, but agreed that sentencing may constitutionally be vested in the trial judge. Gregg, 428 U.S. at 190. Subsequently, however, the Court issued several opinions holding that the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial is violated if a judge makes factual findings (for example, as to the existence of aggravating circumstances) upon which a death sentence is based. Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616, 619–20 (2016); Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002). Notably, one Justice in both cases would have found that the Eighth Amendment—not the Sixth Amendment—requires that "a jury, not a judge, make the decision to sentence a defendant to death." Ring, 536 U.S. at 614 (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment). See also Hurst, 136 S. Ct. at 619 (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment).

[12] Gregg, 428 U.S. at 188–95. Justice Byron White seemed close to the plurality on the question of standards, id. at 207 (concurring), but while Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice William Rehnquist joined the Byron White opinion "agreeing" that the system under review "comports" with Furman, Justice Rehnquist denied the constitutional requirement of standards in any event. Woodson, 428 U.S. at 319–21 (dissenting). In McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 207–08 (1971), the Court had rejected the argument that the absence of standards violated the Due Process Clause. On the vitiation of McGautha, see Gregg, 428 U.S. at 195 n.47, and Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 598–99 (1978). In assessing the character and record of the defendant, the jury may be required to make a judgment about the possibility of future dangerousness of the defendant, from psychiatric and other evidence. Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262, 275–76 (1976). Moreover, testimony of psychiatrists need not be based on examination of the defendant; general responses to hypothetical questions may also be admitted. Barefoot v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983). But cf. Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) (holding Self-Incrimination and Counsel Clauses applicable to psychiatric examination, at least when a doctor testifies about his conclusions with respect to future dangerousness).

[13] Gregg, 428 U.S. at 163, 190–92, 195 (plurality opinion). McGautha, 402 U.S. 183, had rejected a due process requirement of bifurcated trials, and the Gregg plurality did not expressly require it under the Eighth Amendment. But the plurality's emphasis upon avoidance of arbitrary and capricious sentencing by juries seems to look inevitably toward bifurcation. The dissenters in Roberts, 428 U.S. at 358, rejected bifurcation and viewed the plurality as requiring it. All states with post-Furman capital sentencing statutes took the cue by adopting bifurcated capital sentencing procedures, and the Court has not been faced with the issue again. See Raymond J. Pascucci, et al., Special Project, Capital Punishment in 1984: Abandoning the Pursuit of Fairness and Consistency, 69 Cornell L. Rev. 1129, 1224–25 (1984).

[14] Gregg, 428 U.S. at 195, 198 (plurality); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242, 250–51, 253 (1976) (plurality); Jurek, 428 U.S. at 276 (plurality).

[15] Pulley v. Harris, 465 U.S. 37 (1984).

require such comparative proportionality review, the Court noted, but merely suggested that proportionality review is one means by which a state may "safeguard against arbitrarily imposed death sentences."[16]

Amdt8.4.9.5 Applying the Death Penalty Fairly

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

One of the principal objections to imposition of the death penalty, voiced by Justice William O. Douglas in his concurring opinion in Furman, was that it was not being administered fairly—that the capital sentencing laws vesting "practically untrammeled discretion" in juries were being used as vehicles for racial discrimination, and that "discrimination is an ingredient not compatible with the idea of equal protection of the laws that is implicit in the ban on 'cruel and unusual' punishments."[1] This argument has not carried the day. Although the Court has acknowledged the possibility that the death penalty may be administered in a racially discriminatory manner, it has made proof of such discrimination quite difficult.

A measure of protection against jury bias was provided by the Court's holding that "a capital defendant accused of an interracial crime is entitled to have prospective jurors informed of the race of the victim and questioned on the issue of racial bias."[2]

Proof of prosecution bias is another matter. The Court ruled in McCleskey v. Kemp[3] that a strong statistical showing of racial disparity in capital sentencing cases is insufficient to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. Statistics alone do not establish racial discrimination in any particular case, the Court concluded, but "at most show only a likelihood that a particular factor entered into some decisions."[4] Just as important to the outcome, however, was the Court's application of the two overarching principles of prior capital punishment cases: that a state's system must narrow a sentencer's discretion to impose the death penalty (for example, by carefully defining "aggravating" circumstances), but must not constrain a sentencer's discretion to consider mitigating factors relating to the character of the defendant. Although the dissenters saw the need to narrow discretion in order to reduce the chance that racial discrimination underlies jury decisions to impose the death penalty,[5] the majority emphasized the need to preserve jury discretion not to impose capital punishment. Reliance on statistics to establish a prima facie case of discrimination, the Court feared, could undermine the requirement that capital sentencing jurors "focus their collective judgment on the unique characteristics of a particular criminal defendant"—a focus that can result in "final and unreviewable" leniency.[6]

---

[16] Id. at 50.

[1] 408 U.S. at 248, 257.

[2] Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28, 36–37 (1986).

[3] 481 U.S. 279 (1987) (5-4 decision).

[4] Id. at 308.

[5] Id. at 339–40 (Brennan, J.), 345 (Blackmun, J.), 366 (Stevens, J.).

[6] Id. at 311. Concern for protecting "the fundamental role of discretion in our criminal justice system" also underlay the Court's rejection of an equal protection challenge in McCleskey. See also United States v. Bass, 536 U.S. 862 (2002) (per curiam), requiring a threshold evidentiary showing before a defendant claiming selective prosecution on the basis of race is entitled to a discovery order that the government provide information on its decisions to seek the death penalty.

Amdt8.4.9.6 Role of Jury and Consideration of Evidence

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

In response to the Supreme Court's 1976 decisions on the death penalty,[1] most states narrowed sentencing authority discretion to impose the death penalty by enacting statutes spelling out "aggravating" circumstances and requiring that at least one such aggravating circumstance be found before the death penalty is imposed. The Court has required that the standards be relatively precise and instructive so as to minimize the risk of arbitrary and capricious action by the sentencer. Thus, in Godfrey v. Georgia, the Court invalidated a capital sentence based upon a jury finding that the murder was "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible, and inhuman," reasoning that "a person of ordinary sensibility could fairly [so] characterize almost every murder."[2] Similarly, in Maynard v. Cartwright, the Court held an "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" aggravating circumstance to be unconstitutionally vague.[3] The "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" standard is cured, however, by a narrowing interpretation requiring a finding of infliction of mental anguish or physical abuse before the victim's death.[4]

The proscription against a mandatory death penalty has also received elaboration. The Court invalidated statutes making death the mandatory sentence for persons convicted of first degree murder of a police officer,[5] and for prison inmates convicted of murder while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole.[6] Flaws related to those attributed to mandatory sentencing statutes were found in a state's structuring of its capital system to deny the jury the option of convicting on a lesser included offense, when doing so would be justified by the evidence.[7] Because the jury had to choose between conviction or acquittal, the statute created

---

[1] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976) (upholding a statute providing for a bifurcated proceeding separating guilt and sentencing phases, requiring the jury to find at least one of ten statutory aggravating factors before imposing death, and providing for review of death sentences by the Georgia Supreme Court); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976) (a statute generally similar to Georgia's, with the exception that the trial judge, rather than the jury, was directed to weigh statutory aggravating factors against statutory mitigating factors); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976) (a statute construed as narrowing the death-eligible class of cases, and lumping mitigating factors into consideration of dangerousness); Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976) (both mandating the death penalty for first degree murder).

[2] Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420, 428–29 (1980) (plurality opinion).

[3] Maynard v. Cartwright, 486 U.S. 356, 363–64 (1988). But see Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967 (1994) (holding that permitting capital juries to consider the circumstances of the crime, the defendant's prior criminal activity, and the age of the defendant, without further guidance, is not unconstitutionally vague).

[4] Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990). Accord, Lewis v. Jeffers, 497 U.S. 764 (1990). See also Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 201 (1976) (upholding full statutory circumstance of "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman in that it involved torture, depravity of mind, or an aggravated battery to the victim"); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242, 255 (1976) (upholding "especially heinous, atrocious or cruel" aggravating circumstance as interpreted to include only "the conscienceless or pitiless crime which is unnecessarily torturous to the victim"); Sochor v. Florida, 504 U.S. 527 (1992) (impermissible vagueness of "heinousness" factor cured by narrowing interpretation including strangulation of a conscious victim); Arave v. Creech, 507 U.S. 463 (1993) (consistent application of narrowing construction of phrase "exhibited utter disregard for human life" to require that the defendant be a "cold-blooded, pitiless slayer" cures vagueness); Bell v. Cone, 543 U.S. 447 (2005) (presumption that state supreme court applied a narrowing construction because it had done so numerous times).

[5] Roberts v. Louisiana, 431 U.S. 633 (1977) (per curiam) (involving a different defendant from the first Roberts v. Louisiana case, 428 U.S. 325 (1976).

[6] Sumner v. Shuman, 483 U.S. 66 (1987).

[7] Beck v. Alabama, 447 U.S. 625 (1980). The statute made the guilt determination "depend . . . on the jury's feelings as to whether or not the defendant deserves the death penalty, without giving the jury any standards to guide its decision on this issue." Id. at 640. Cf. Hopper v. Evans, 456 U.S. 605 (1982). No such constitutional infirmity is present, however, if failure to instruct on lesser included offenses is due to the defendant's refusal to waive the statute the risk that the jury would convict because it felt the defendant deserved to be punished or acquit because it believed death was too severe for the particular crime, when at that stage the jury should concentrate on determining whether the prosecution had proved defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.[8]

The overarching principle of Furman v. Georgia[9] and of the Gregg v. Georgia series of cases[10] was that the jury should not be "without guidance or direction" in deciding whether a convicted defendant should live or die. The jury's attention was statutorily "directed to the specific circumstances of the crime . . . and on the characteristics of the person who committed the crime."[11] As such, discretion was channeled and rationalized. But, in Lockett v. Ohio,[12] a Court plurality determined that a state law was invalid because it prevented the sentencer from giving weight to any mitigating factors other than those specified in the law. In other words, the jury's discretion was curbed too much. The Lockett Court stated:

> [W]e conclude that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require that the sentencer, in all but the rarest kind of capital case, not be precluded from considering as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death.[13] of limitations for those lesser offenses. Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984). See Hopkins v. Reeves, 524 U.S. 88 (1998) (defendant charged with felony murder did not have right to instruction as to second degree murder or manslaughter, where Nebraska traditionally did not consider these lesser included offenses). See also Schad v. Arizona, 501 U.S. 624 (1991) (first degree murder defendant, who received instruction on lesser included offense of second degree murder, was not entitled to a jury instruction on the lesser included offense of robbery). In Schad the Court also upheld Arizona's characterization of first degree murder as a single crime encompassing two alternatives, premeditated murder and felony murder, and not requiring jury agreement on which alternative had occurred.

---

[8] Also impermissible as distorting a jury's role are prosecutor's comments or jury instructions that mislead a jury as to its primary responsibility for deciding whether to impose the death penalty. Compare Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985) (jury's responsibility is undermined by court-sanctioned remarks by prosecutor that jury's decision is not final, but is subject to appellate review) with California v. Ramos, 463 U.S. 992 (1983) (jury responsibility not undermined by instruction that governor has power to reduce sentence of life imprisonment without parole). See also Lowenfield v. Phelps, 484 U.S. 231 (1988) (poll of jury and supplemental jury instruction on obligation to consult and attempt to reach a verdict was not unduly coercive on death sentence issue, even though consequence of failing to reach a verdict was automatic imposition of life sentence without parole); Romano v. Oklahoma, 512 U.S. 1 (1994) (imposition of death penalty after introduction of evidence that defendant had been sentenced to death previously did not diminish the jury's sense of responsibility so as to violate the Eighth Amendment); Jones v. United States, 527 U.S. 373 (1999) (court's refusal to instruct the jury on the consequences of deadlock did not violate Eighth Amendment, even though court's actual instruction was misleading as to range of possible sentences).

[9] 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

[10] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976) (upholding a statute providing for a bifurcated proceeding separating guilt and sentencing phases, requiring the jury to find at least one of ten statutory aggravating factors before imposing death, and providing for review of death sentences by the Georgia Supreme Court); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976) (a statute generally similar to Georgia's, with the exception that the trial judge, rather than the jury, was directed to weigh statutory aggravating factors against statutory mitigating factors); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976) (a statute construed as narrowing the death-eligible class of cases, and lumping mitigating factors into consideration of dangerousness); Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976) (both mandating the death penalty for first degree murder).

[11] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 197–98 (1976) (plurality).

[12] 438 U.S. 586 (1978). The plurality opinion by Chief Justice Warren Burger was joined by Justices Potter Stewart, Lewis Powell, and John Paul Stevens. Justices Harry Blackmun, Thurgood Marshall, and Byron White concurred in the result on separate and conflicting grounds. Id. at 613, 619, 621. Justice William Rehnquist dissented. Id. at 628.

[13] 438 U.S. at 604. Although, under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, the state must bear the burden "to prove the existence of aggravating circumstances, a defendant's constitutional rights are not violated by placing on him the burden of proving mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency." Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 650 (1990) (plurality). A fortiori, a statute "may direct imposition of the death penalty when the State has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that mitigators do not outweigh aggravators, including where the aggravating circumstances and mitigating circumstances are in equipoise." Kansas v. Marsh, 548 U.S. 163, 173 (2006).

Similarly, in Woodson v. North Carolina, a three-Justice plurality viewed North Carolina's mandatory death sentence for persons convicted of first degree murder as invalid because it failed "to allow the particularized consideration of relevant aspects of the character and record of each convicted defendant."[14] Lockett and Woodson have since been endorsed by a Court majority.[15] Thus, a great measure of discretion was again accorded the sentencing authority, be it judge or jury, subject only to the consideration that the legislature must prescribe aggravating factors.[16]

The Court has explained this apparent contradiction as recognizing that "individual culpability is not always measured by the category of crime committed,"[17] and an attempt to pursue the "twin objectives" of "measured, consistent application" of the death penalty and "fairness to the accused."[18] The requirement that aggravating circumstances be spelled out by statute serves a narrowing purpose that helps consistency of application; absence of restrictions on mitigating evidence helps promote fairness to the accused through an "individualized" consideration of the defendant's circumstances. In the Court's words, statutory aggravating circumstances "play a constitutionally necessary function at the stage of legislative definition [by] circumscribing the class of persons eligible for the death penalty,"[19] while consideration of all mitigating evidence requires focus on "the character and record of the individual offender and the circumstances of the particular offense" consistent with "the fundamental respect for humanity underlying the Eighth Amendment."[20] As long as the [14] Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 303 (1976) (opinion of Stewart, J., joined by Powell and Stevens, JJ.). Accord, Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976) (statute mandating death penalty for five categories of homicide constituting first degree murder).

---

[15] Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 110 (1982) (adopting Lockett); Sumner v. Shuman, 483 U.S. 66 (1987) (adopting Woodson). The majority in Eddings was composed of Justices Lewis Powell, William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, John Paul Stevens, and Sandra Day O'Connor; Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, and William Rehnquist dissented. The Shuman majority was composed of Justices Harry Blackmun, William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, Lewis Powell, John Paul Stevens, and Sandra Day O'Connor; dissenting were Justices Byron White and Antonin Scalia and Chief Justice William Rehnquist. Woodson and the first Roberts v. Louisiana had earlier been followed in the second Roberts v. Louisiana, 431 U.S. 633 (1977), a per curiam opinion from which Chief Justice Warren Burger, and Justices Harry Blackmun, Byron White, and William Rehnquist dissented.

[16] Justice Byron White, dissenting in Lockett from the Court's holding on consideration of mitigating factors, wrote that he "greatly fear[ed] that the effect of the Court's decision today will be to compel constitutionally a restoration of the state of affairs at the time Furman was decided, where the death penalty is imposed so erratically and the threat of execution is so attenuated for even the most atrocious murders that 'its imposition would then be the pointless and needless extinction of life with only marginal contributions to any discernible social or public purposes.'" 438 U.S. at 623. More recently, Justice Antonin Scalia voiced similar misgivings. "Shortly after introducing our doctrine requiring constraints on the sentencer's discretion to 'impose' the death penalty, the Court began developing a doctrine forbidding constraints on the sentencer's discretion to 'decline to impose' it. This second doctrine—counterdoctrine would be a better word—has completely exploded whatever coherence the notion of 'guided discretion' once had. . . . In short, the practice which in Furman had been described as the discretion to sentence to death and pronounced constitutionally prohibited, was in Woodson and Lockett renamed the discretion not to sentence to death and pronounced constitutionally required." Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 661, 662 (1990) (concurring in the judgment). For a critique of these criticisms of Lockett, see Scott E. Sundby, The Lockett Paradox: Reconciling Guided Discretion and Unguided Mitigation in Capital Sentencing, 38 UCLA L. Rev. 1147 (1991).

[17] Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325, 333 (1976) (plurality opinion of Justices Potter Stewart, Lewis Powell, and John Paul Stevens) (quoting Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 402 (1972) (Burger, C.J., dissenting)).

[18] Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 110–11 (1982).

[19] Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 878 (1983). This narrowing function may be served at the sentencing phase or at the guilt phase; the fact that an aggravating circumstance justifying capital punishment duplicates an element of the offense of first degree murder does not render the procedure invalid. Lowenfield v. Phelps, 484 U.S. 231 (1988).

[20] Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 112 (1982) (quoting Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 304 (1976) (plurality opinion)).

defendant's crime falls within the statutorily narrowed class, the jury may then conduct "an individualized determination on the basis of the character of the individual and the circumstances of the crime."[21]

The Court has given states greater leeway in fashioning procedural rules that have the effect of controlling how juries may use mitigating evidence that must be admitted and considered.[22] States may also cure some constitutional errors on appeal through operation of "harmless error" rules and reweighing of evidence by the appellate court.[23] Also, the Court has constrained the use of federal habeas corpus to review state court judgments. As a result, the Court recognized a significant degree of state autonomy in capital sentencing in spite of its rulings on substantive Eighth Amendment law.[24]

While maintaining the Lockett requirement that sentencers be allowed to consider all mitigating evidence,[25] the Court has upheld state statutes that control the relative weight that the sentencer may accord to aggravating and mitigating evidence.[26] In Blystone v. Pennsylvania, the Court stated: "The requirement of individualized sentencing in capital cases is satisfied by allowing the jury to consider all relevant mitigating evidence"[27]; there is no additional requirement that the jury be allowed to weigh the severity of an aggravating circumstance in the absence of any mitigating factor.[28] The legislature may specify the consequences of the jury's finding an aggravating circumstance; it may mandate that a death sentence be imposed if the jury unanimously finds at least one aggravating circumstance and [21] Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 879 (1983).

---

[22] See, e.g., Johnson v. Texas, 509 U.S. 350 (1993) (consideration of youth as a mitigating factor may be limited to jury estimation of probability that defendant would commit future acts of violence).

[23] Richmond v. Lewis, 506 U.S. 40 (1992) (no cure of trial court's use of invalid aggravating factor where appellate court fails to reweigh mitigating and aggravating factors).

[24] As such, the Court has opined that it is not the role of the Eighth Amendment to establish a special "federal code of evidence" governing "the admissibility of evidence at capital sentencing proceedings." See Romano v. Oklahoma, 512 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1994). Instead, the test for a constitutional violation attributable to evidence improperly admitted at a capital sentencing proceeding is whether the evidence "so infected the sentencing proceeding with unfairness as to render the jury's imposition of the death penalty a denial of due process." Id. at 12. As a consequence, the Court found nothing constitutionally impermissible with a state having joint sentencing proceedings for two defendants whose underlying conviction arose from the same single chain of events. See Kansas v. Carr, 577 U.S. 108, 123 (2016) (rejecting the argument that joinder of two defendants was fundamentally unfair because evidence that one defendant unduly influenced another defendant's conduct may have "infected" the jury's decision making). Indeed, the Court approvingly noted that joint proceedings before a single jury for defendants that commit the same crimes are "not only permissible but are often preferable" in order to avoid the "wanto[n] and freakis[h]" imposition of the death sentence. See id. at 646 (citing Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 206–07 (1976) (joint opinion of Stewart, Powell, & Stevens, JJ.)).

[25] See, e.g., Hitchcock v. Dugger, 481 U.S. 393 (1987) (instruction limiting jury to consideration of mitigating factors specifically enumerated in statute is invalid); Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989) (holding that a sentencing jury must be permitted to consider the defendant's mitigating evidence concerning his intellectual disability and history of childhood abuse separately from its findings on the defendant's personal culpability, future dangerousness, and the reasonableness of the defendant's response to a victim's provocation.); Skipper v. South Carolina, 476 U.S. 1 (1986) (exclusion of evidence of defendant's good conduct in jail denied defendant his Lockett right to introduce all mitigating evidence); Abdul-Kabir v. Quarterman, 550 U.S. 233 (2007) (holding that a sentencing jury must be permitted to consider the defendant's mitigating evidence concerning his intellectual disability and history of childhood abuse separately from its findings on the defendant's personal culpability, future dangerousness, and the reasonableness of the defendant's response to a victim's provocation); Brewer v. Quarterman, 550 U.S. 286 (2007) (same). But cf. Franklin v. Lynaugh, 487 U.S. 164 (1988) (consideration of defendant's character as revealed by jail behavior may be limited to context of assessment of future dangerousness).

[26] "Neither [Lockett nor Eddings] establishes the weight which must be given to any particular mitigating evidence, or the manner in which it must be considered; they simply condemn any procedure in which such evidence has no weight at all." Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939, 961 n.2 (1983) (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment).

[27] Blystone v. Pennsylvania, 494 U.S. 299, 307 (1990).

[28] Id.

no mitigating circumstance,[29] or if the jury finds that aggravating circumstances outweigh mitigating circumstances.[30] And a court may instruct that the jury "must not be swayed by mere sentiment, conjecture, sympathy, passion, prejudice, public opinion, or public feeling," because in essence the instruction merely cautions the jury not to base its decision "on factors not presented at the trial."[31] However, a jury instruction that can be interpreted as requiring jury unanimity on the existence of each mitigating factor before that factor may be weighed against aggravating factors is invalid as it allows one juror to veto consideration of any and all mitigating factors. Instead, each juror must be allowed to give effect to what he or she believes to be established mitigating evidence.[32] Due process is also a consideration; if the state argues for the death penalty based on the defendant's future dangerousness, due process requires that the jury be informed if the alternative to a death sentence is a life sentence without possibility of parole.[33]

One issue the Court had to consider was how a death sentence is impacted if an "eligibility factor" (a factor making the defendant eligible for the death penalty) or an "aggravating factor" (a factor to be weighed against mitigating factors in determining whether a defendant who is eligible for the death penalty should receive it) is found invalid. In Brown v. Sanders, the Court announced "An invalidated sentencing factor (whether an eligibility factor or not) will render the sentence unconstitutional by reason of its adding an improper element to the aggravation scale in the weighing process unless one of the other sentencing factors enables the sentencer to give aggravating weight to the same facts and circumstances."[34]

Appellate review under a harmless error standard can preserve a death sentence based in part on a jury's consideration of an aggravating factor later found to be invalid,[35] or on a trial

---

[29] Id.

[30] Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370 (1990). A court is not required to give a jury instruction expressly directing the jury to consider mitigating circumstance, as long as the instruction actually given affords the jury the discretion to take such evidence into consideration. Buchanan v. Angelone, 522 U.S. 269 (1998). In this vein, the Court has held that capital sentencing courts are not obliged to inform the jury affirmatively that mitigating circumstances lack the need for proof beyond a reasonable doubt. See Kansas v. Carr, 136 S. Ct. 633, 642–43 (2016) (noting that ambiguity in capital sentencing instructions gives rise to constitutional error only if there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury has applied the challenged instruction in a way that prevents consideration of constitutionally relevant evidence). By the same token, a court did not offend the Constitution by directing the jury's attention to a specific paragraph of a constitutionally sufficient instruction in response to the jury's question about proper construction of mitigating circumstances. Weeks v. Angelone, 528 U.S. 225 (2000). Nor did a court offend the Constitution by instructing the jury to consider "[a]ny other circumstance of the crime which extenuates the gravity of the crime," without specifying that such circumstance need not be a circumstance of the crime, but could include "some likelihood of future good conduct." Ayers v. Belmontes, 549 U.S. 7, 10, 15 (2006). This was because the jurors had heard "extensive forward-looking evidence," and it was improbable that they would believe themselves barred from considering it. Id. at 16.

[31] California v. Brown, 479 U.S. 538, 543 (1987).

[32] Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988); McKoy v. North Carolina, 494 U.S. 433 (1990). Compare Smith v. Spisak, 558 U.S. 139, 143–49 (2010) (distinguishing jury instructions in Mills from instructions directing each juror to independently assess any mitigating factors before jury as a whole balanced the weight of mitigating evidence against each aggravating factor, with unanimity required before balance in favor of an aggravating factor may be found).

[33] Simmons v. South Carolina, 512 U.S. 154 (1994). See also Lynch v. Arizona, 136 S. Ct. 1818, 1820 (2016) (holding that the possibility of clemency and the potential for future "legislative reform" does not justify a departure from the rule of Simmons); Kelly v. South Carolina, 534 U.S. 246, 252 (2002) (concluding that a prosecutor need not express an intent to rely on future dangerousness; logical inferences may be drawn); Shafer v. South Carolina, 532 U.S. 36, 40 (2001) (holding that an amended South Carolina law still runs afoul of Simmons).

[34] 546 U.S. 212, 220 (2006). In some states, "the only aggravating factors permitted to be considered by the sentencer [are] the specified eligibility factors." Id. at 217. These are known as weighing states; non-weighing states, by contrast, are those that permit "the sentencer to consider aggravating factors different from, or in addition to, the eligibility factors." Id. Prior to Brown v. Sanders, in weighing states, the Court deemed "the sentencer's consideration of an invalid eligibility factor" to require "reversal of the sentence (unless a state appellate court determined the error was harmless or reweighed the mitigating evidence against the valid aggravating factors)." Id.

[35] Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862 (1983).

judge's consideration of improper aggravating circumstances.[36] In each case, the sentencing authority had found other aggravating circumstances justifying imposing capital punishment. For instance, in Zant, evidence relating to the invalid factor was nonetheless admissible on another basis.[37] Even in states that require the jury to weigh statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances (and even in the absence of written findings by the jury), the appellate court may preserve a death penalty through harmless error review or through reweighing the aggravating and mitigating evidence.[38] By contrast, where there is a possibility that the jury's reliance on a "totally irrelevant" factor (defendant had served time pursuant to an invalid conviction subsequently vacated) may have been decisive in balancing aggravating and mitigating factors, a death sentence may not stand notwithstanding the presence of other aggravating factors.[39]

In Oregon v. Guzek, the Court could "find nothing in the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments that provides a capital defendant a right to introduce," at sentencing, new evidence, available to him at the time of trial, "that shows he was not present at the scene of the crime."[40] The Guzek Court observed that although "the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require that the sentencer . . . not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death," such evidence is a traditional concern of sentencing because it tends to show "how, not whether," the defendant committed the crime.[41] Alibi evidence, by contrast, concerns "whether the defendant committed the basic crime," and "thereby attacks a previously determined matter in a proceeding [i.e., sentencing] at which, in principle, that matter is not at issue."[42]

The Court's focus on the character and culpability of the defendant led the Court, initially, to hold that the Eighth Amendment "prohibits a capital sentencing jury from considering victim impact evidence" that does not "relate directly to the circumstances of the crime."[43] Four years later, the Court largely overruled[44] these decisions, however, holding that the Eighth Amendment does allow the jury to consider "'victim impact' evidence relating to the personal characteristics of the victim and the emotional impact of the crimes on the victim's family."[45] The Court reasoned that the admissibility of victim impact evidence was necessary to restore

---

[36] Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939 (1983).

[37] In Eighth Amendment cases as in other contexts involving harmless constitutional error, the court must find that error was "'harmless beyond a reasonable doubt in that it did not contribute to the [sentence] obtained.'" Sochor v. Florida, 504 U.S. 527, 540 (quoting Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24 (1967)). Thus, where psychiatric testimony was introduced regarding an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance, and where the defendant was not provided the assistance of an independent psychiatrist in order to develop rebuttal testimony, the lack of rebuttal testimony might have affected how the jury evaluated another aggravating factor. Consequently, the reviewing court erred in reinstating a death sentence based on this other valid aggravating factor. Tuggle v. Netherland, 516 U.S. 10 (1995).

[38] See Clemons v. Mississippi, 494 U.S. 738, 741 (1990) (authorizing appellate reassessment of a death sentence on an improper aggravating circumstance); see also McKinney v. Arizona, 140 S. Ct. 702, 706–07 (2020) (extending Clemons review so that a reassessment could occur when a trial court improperly ignored a mitigating circumstance).

[39] Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988).

[40] 546 U.S. 517, 523 (2006).

[41] 546 U.S. at 524, 526 (Court's emphasis deleted in part).

[42] 546 U.S. at 526.

[43] See Booth v. Maryland, 482 U.S. 496, 501–02 (1987); see also South Carolina v. Gathers, 490 U.S. 805, 811 (1989) (concluding that Booth extended to a prosecutor's statements about a victim's personal qualities).

[44] The Court has refrained from overturning Booth's holding that the admission of a victim's family members' characterizations and opinions about the "underlying crime, the defendant, and the appropriate sentence" violate the Eighth Amendment. See Bosse v. Oklahoma, 137 S. Ct. 1, 1 (2016) (per curiam). Instead, the Court has overruled Booth's central holding that "evidence and argument relating to the victim and the impact of the victim's death on the victim's family are inadmissible at a capital sentencing hearing." See Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 830 n.2 (1991).

[45] See Payne, 501 U.S. at 817.

balance to capital sentencing. In the Court's view, exclusion of such evidence "unfairly weighted the scales in a capital trial" because there are no corresponding limits on "relevant mitigating evidence a capital defendant may introduce concerning his own circumstances."[46]

Amdt8.4.9.7 Cognitively Disabled and Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Supreme Court has grappled with several cases involving application of the death penalty to persons of diminished capacity. The first such case involved a defendant whose competency at the time of his offense, at trial, and at sentencing had not been questioned, but who subsequently developed a mental disorder. The Court held in Ford v. Wainwright[1] that the Eighth Amendment prohibits the state from carrying out the death penalty on an individual who has a severe mental illness and that properly raised issues of the individual's mental health at the time of execution must be determined in a proceeding satisfying the minimum requirements of due process.[2] The Ford Court noted that execution of persons with severe mental illness had been considered cruel and unusual at common law and at the time of adoption of the Bill of Rights, and continued to be so viewed.[3] And, although no states purported to permit the execution of persons with severe mental illness, Florida and some others left the determination to the Governor. Florida's procedures, the Ford Court held, violated due process because the decision was vested in the Governor without the defendant's having the opportunity to be heard, the Governor's decision being based on reports of three state-appointed psychiatrists.[4]

The Court in Panetti v. Quarterman clarified when a prisoner's current mental state can bar his execution under the Ford rule.[5] Relying on the understanding that the execution of a prisoner who cannot comprehend the reasons for his punishment offends both moral values and serves "no retributive purpose," the Court concluded that the operative test was whether a prisoner can "reach a rational understanding for the reason for his execution."[6] Under Panetti, if a prisoner's mental state is so distorted by mental illness that he cannot grasp the execution's "meaning and purpose" or the "link between [his] crime and its punishment," he

---

[46] Id. at 822.

[1] 477 U.S. 399 (1986).

[2] There was an opinion of the Court only on the first issue: that the Eighth Amendment creates a right not to be executed while suffering severe mental illness. The Court's opinion did not attempt to define the mental illnesses that make a person ineligible for the death penalty. Justice Lewis Powell's concurring opinion would have held the prohibition applicable only for "those who are unaware of the punishment they are about to suffer and why they are to suffer it." 477 U.S. at 422.

[3] Id. at 406–408.

[4] The Court had no opinion on the issue of procedural requirements. Justice Thurgood Marshall, joined by Justices William Brennan, Harry Blackmun, and John Paul Stevens, would hold that "the ascertainment of a prisoner's sanity . . . calls for no less stringent standards than those demanded in any other aspect of a capital proceeding." 477 U.S. at 411–12. Concurring Justice Lewis Powell thought that due process might be met by a proceeding "far less formal than a trial," that the state "should provide an impartial officer or board that can receive evidence and argument from the prisoner's counsel." Id. at 427. Concurring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Justice Byron White, emphasized Florida's denial of the opportunity to be heard, and did not express an opinion on whether the state could designate the governor as decisionmaker. Thus Justice Powell's opinion, requiring the opportunity to be heard before an impartial officer or board, set forth the Court's holding.

[5] 551 U.S. 930 (2007).

[6] Id. at 957–58.

cannot be executed.[7] Furthermore, once a death row inmate has made "a substantial showing that his current mental state would bar his execution" due process entitles him to a hearing at which he may present "evidence and argument from the prisoner's counsel, including expert psychiatric evidence" in his support of his claim of incompetence and in rebuttal of any state-offered evidence.[8]

Twelve years after Panetti, the Court further clarified two aspects of the Ford-Panetti inquiry in Madison v. Alabama.[9] First, Ford-Panetti stands for the proposition, the Court declared, that a prisoner cannot be executed for a capital offense if his "'concept of reality' is 'so impair[ed]' that he cannot grasp the execution's 'meaning or purpose' or the link between [his] crime and its punishment.'"[10] The Court explained that a prisoner challenging his execution on the ground of a mental disability cannot prevail "merely because he cannot remember committing his crime."[11] Instead, a prisoner's memory loss may be a factor in determining whether the prisoner has a rational understanding of the reason for his execution.[12] Second, the Madison Court concluded that while Ford and Panetti pertained to prisoners suffering from psychotic delusions, the logic of those opinions extended to a prisoner who suffered from dementia.[13]

In 1989, when first confronted with the issue of whether execution of the persons with intellectual disabilities is constitutional, the Court found "insufficient evidence of a national consensus" against executing such people.[14] In 2002, however, the Court determined in Atkins v. Virginia[15] that "much ha[d] changed" since 1989, that the practice had become "truly unusual," and that it was "fair to say" that a "national consensus" had developed against it.[16] In 1989, only two states and the Federal Government prohibited execution of persons with intellectual disabilities while allowing executions generally.[17] By 2002, an additional sixteen states had prohibited execution of persons with intellectual disabilities, and no states had reinstated the power.[18] But the important element of consensus, the Court explained, was "not so much the number" of states that had acted, but instead "the consistency of the direction of change."[19] The Court's own evaluation of the issue reinforced the consensus. Neither of the two generally recognized justifications for the death penalty—retribution and deterrence—applies

[7] Id. at 957.

[8] Id. at 950.

[9] 139 S. Ct. 718 (2019).

[10] Id. at 723 (quoting Panetti, 551 U.S. at 958).

[11] Id. at 726–27.

[12] Id. at 727. In so holding, The Court noted that evidence that a prisoner has difficulty preserving any memories may contribute to a finding that the prisoner may not rationally understand the reasons doe his death sentence.

[13] Panetti's "standard focuses on whether a mental disorder has had a particular effect: an inability to rationally understand why the State is seeking execution. Conversely, that standard has no interest in establish any precise cause: Psychosis or dementia, delusions or overall cognitive decline are all the same under Panetti, so long as they produce the requisite lack of comprehension." Id. at 728.

[14] Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 335 (1989). Although unwilling to conclude that execution of a person with an intellectual disability is "categorically prohibited by the Eighth Amendment," id. at 335, the Court noted that, because of the requirement of individualized consideration of culpability, a defendant with such a disability is entitled to an instruction that the jury may consider and give mitigating effect to evidence of intellectual disability or a background of abuse. Id. at 328. See also Tennard v. Dretke, 542 U.S. 274 (2004) (evidence of low intelligence should be admissible for mitigating purposes without being screened on basis of severity of disability).

[15] 536 U.S. 304 (2002).

[16] 536 U.S. at 314, 316.

[17] 536 U.S. at 314.

[18] Id.

[19] 536 U.S. at 315.

with full force to offenders with intellectual disabilities.[20] "With respect to retribution—the interest in seeing that the offender gets his 'just desserts'—necessarily depends on the culpability of the offender."[21] Yet reduced intellectual capacity reduces culpability. Deterrence is premised on the ability of offenders to control their behavior. Yet reduced intellectual capacity makes it less likely that an offender will associate his conduct with prospect of the death penalty.[22]

Once again, the Court left to the states "the task of developing appropriate ways to enforce the constitutional restriction upon [their] execution of sentences."[23] In Schriro v. Smith, the Court again quoted this language, determining that the Ninth Circuit exceeded its authority in holding that Arizona courts were required to conduct a jury trial to resolve a defendant's claim that he was ineligible for the death penalty because of intellectual disability.[24] States, the Court added, are entitled to "adopt[ ] their own measures" for adjudicating claims of intellectual disability though "those measures might, in their application, be subject to constitutional challenge."[25]

In Hall v. Florida,[26] however, the Court limited the states' ability to define intellectual disability by invalidating Florida's "bright line" cutoff based on Intelligence Quotient (IQ) test scores. A Florida statute stated that anyone with an IQ above 70 was prohibited from offering additional evidence of mental disability and was thus subject to capital punishment.[27] The Court invalidated this rigid standard, observing that "[i]ntellectual disability is a condition, not a number."[28] The majority found that, although IQ scores are helpful in determining mental capabilities, they are imprecise in nature and may only be used as a factor of analysis in death penalty cases.[29] This reasoning was buttressed by a consensus of mental health professionals who concluded that an IQ test score should be read not as a single fixed number, but as a range.[30]

Building on Hall, in Moore v. Texas the Supreme Court rejected the standards used by Texas state courts to evaluate whether a death row inmate was intellectually disabled, concluding that the standards created an "unacceptable risk that persons with intellectual disability will be executed."[31] First, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, on behalf of the Court, held that a Texas court's conclusion that a prisoner with an IQ score of 74 could be executed was "irreconcilable with Hall" because the state court had failed to consider standard errors that are inherent in assessing intellectual disability.[32] Second, the Moore I Court determined that Texas deviated from prevailing clinical standards respecting the assessment of a death row inmate's intellectual capabilities by (1) emphasizing the petitioner's perceived adaptive

---

[20] 536 U.S. at 318.

[21] 536 U.S. at 319.

[22] 536 U.S. at 319–20. The Court also noted that reduced capacity both increases the risk of false confessions and reduces a defendant's ability to assist counsel in making a persuasive showing of mitigation.

[23] 536 U.S. at 317 (citation omitted) (quoting Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399, 416–17 (1986)).

[24] 546 U.S. 6, 7 (2005) (per curiam).

[25] 546 U.S. at 7.

[26] 572 U.S. 701 (2014).

[27] Cherry v. State, 959 So.2d 702, 712–13 (Fla. 2007) (per curiam) (construing Fla. Stat. § 921.137 (2013)).

[28] Hall, 572 U.S. at 701, 703

[29] Id.

[30] This range, referred to as a "standard error or measurement" or "SEM," is used by many states in evaluating the existence of intellectual disability. Hall, 572 U.S. 701, 723 (2014)

[31] 137 S. Ct. 1039, 1044 (2017) [hereinafter Moore I].

[32] Id. at 1049.

strengths and his behavior in prison;[33] (2) dismissing several traumatic experiences from the petitioner's past;[34] and (3) requiring the petitioner to show that his adaptive deficits were not due to a personality disorder or a mental health issue.[35] Third, the Moore I Court criticized the prevailing standard used in Texas courts for assessing intellectual disability in death penalty cases, which had favored the "'consensus of Texas citizens' on who 'should be exempted from the death penalty,'" with regard to those with "mild" intellectual disabilities in the state's capital system, concluding that those with even "mild" levels of intellectual disability could not be executed under Atkins.[36] Finally, Moore rejected the Texas courts' skepticism of professional standards for assessing intellectual disability, standards that the state courts had viewed as being "exceedingly subjective."[37] The Supreme Court instead held that "lay stereotypes" (and not established professional standards) on an individual's intellectual capabilities should "spark skepticism."[38] As a result, following Hall and Moore, while the states retain "some flexibility" in enforcing Atkins, the medical community's prevailing standards appear to "supply" a key constraint on the states in capital cases.[39]

Amdt8.4.9.8 Minors and Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Court's conclusion that execution of juveniles constitutes cruel and unusual punishment evolved in much the same manner. Initially, a closely divided Court invalidated one statutory scheme that permitted capital punishment to be imposed for crimes committed before age sixteen, but upheld other statutes authorizing capital punishment for crimes committed by sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds. Important to resolution of the first case was the fact that Oklahoma set no minimum age for capital punishment, but by separate provision allowed juveniles to be treated as adults for some purposes.[1] Although four Justices favored a flat ruling that the Eighth Amendment barred the execution of anyone younger than sixteen at [33] Id. at 1050 ("[T]he medical community focuses the adaptive-functioning inquiry on adaptive deficits."); see also id. at 1050 ("Clinicians, however, caution against reliance on adaptive strengths developed in a controlled setting, as prison surely is.") (internal citations and quotations omitted).

---

[34] Id. at 1051 ("Clinicians rely on such factors as cause to explore the prospect of intellectual disability further, not to counter the case for a disability determination.").

[35] Id. ("The existence of a personality disorder or mental-health issue, in short, is not evidence that a person does not also have intellectual disability.") (internal citations and quotations omitted).

[36] Id.. In so concluding, the Court noted that "[m]ild levels of intellectual disability . . . nevertheless remain intellectual disabilities," and "States may not execute anyone in the entire category of intellectually disabled offenders." Id. (internal citations and quotations omitted).

[37] See Ex parte Briseno, 135 S.W.3d 1, 8 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

[38] See Moore I, 137 S. Ct. at 1052.

[39] Id. at 1052–53. Two years after Moore I, the case returned to the High Court, where, in a per curiam opinion, the Court again reversed the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. See Moore v. Texas, 139 S. Ct. 666, 667 (2019) (per curiam) [hereinafter Moore II]. That court had concluded that the prisoner did not have an intellectual disability and was, therefore, eligible for the death penalty. Id. Finding that the lower court's opinion "repeat[ed] the analysis" the Supreme Court "previously found wanting" in its 2017 opinion, Moore II criticized the Texas court's (1) reliance on the petitioner's adaptive strengths in lieu of his adaptive deficits; (2) emphasis on the petitioner's adaptive improvements made in prison; (3) tendency to consider the petitioner's social behavior to be caused by "emotional problems," instead of his general mental abilities; and (4) continued reliance on the Briseno case the Court had previously criticized in Moore I. Id. at 670–72. Ultimately, the Court concluded that the record from the trial court demonstrated that the petitioner was "a person with intellectual disability," reversing the lower court's judgment and remanding the case. Id. at 672.

[1] Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988).

the time of his offense, concurring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor found Oklahoma's scheme defective as not having necessarily resulted from the special care and deliberation that must attend decisions to impose the death penalty. The following year Justice Sandra Day O'Connor again provided the decisive vote when the Court in Stanford v. Kentucky held that the Eighth Amendment does not categorically prohibit imposition of the death penalty for individuals who commit crimes at age sixteen or seventeen. Like Oklahoma, neither Kentucky nor Missouri[2] directly specified a minimum age for the death penalty. To Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, however, the critical difference was that there clearly was no national consensus forbidding imposition of capital punishment on sixteen- or seventeen-year-old murderers, whereas there was such a consensus against execution of fifteen-year-olds.[3]

Although the Court in Atkins v. Virginia contrasted the national consensus said to have developed against executing persons with intellectual disabilities with what it saw as a lack of consensus regarding execution of juvenile offenders over age fifteen,[4] less than three years later the Court held that such a consensus had developed. The Court's decision in Roper v. Simmons[5] drew parallels with Atkins. A consensus had developed, the Court held, against the execution of juveniles who were age sixteen or seventeen when they committed their crimes. Since Stanford, five states had eliminated authority for executing juveniles, and no states that formerly prohibited it had reinstated the authority. In all, thirty states prohibited execution of juveniles: twelve that prohibited the death penalty altogether, and eighteen that excluded juveniles from its reach. This meant that twenty states did not prohibit execution of juveniles, but the Court noted that only five of these states had actually executed juveniles since Stanford, and only three had done so in the ten years immediately preceding Roper. Although the pace of change was slower than had been the case with execution of persons with intellectual disabilities, the consistent direction of change toward abolition was deemed more important.[6]

As in Atkins, the Court in Roper relied on its "own independent judgment" in addition to its finding of consensus among the states.[7] Three general differences between juveniles and adults make juveniles less morally culpable for their actions. Because juveniles lack maturity and have an underdeveloped sense of responsibility, they often engage in "impetuous and

---

[2] Wilkins v. Missouri was decided along with Stanford.

[3] Compare Thompson, 487 U.S. at 849 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (two-thirds of all state legislatures had concluded that no one should be executed for a crime committed at age fifteen, and no state had "unequivocally endorsed" a lower age limit) with Stanford, 492 U.S. at 370 (fifteen of thirty-seven states permitting capital punishment decline to impose it on sixteen-year-old offenders; twelve decline to impose it on seventeen-year-old offenders).

[4] 536 U.S. at 314, n.18.

[5] 543 U.S. 551 (2005). The case was decided by 5-4 vote. Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote the Court's opinion, and was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who had joined the Court's 6-3 majority in Atkins, wrote a dissenting opinion, as did Justice Antonin Scalia, who was joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justice Clarence Thomas.

[6] Dissenting in Roper, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor disputed the consistency of the trend, pointing out that since Stanford two states had passed laws reaffirming the permissibility of executing sixteen- and seventeen-year-old offenders. 543 U.S. at 596.

[7] 543 U.S. at 564. The Stanford Court had been split over the appropriate scope of inquiry in cruel and unusual punishment cases. Justice Antonin Scalia's plurality would have focused almost exclusively on an assessment of what the state legislatures and Congress have done in setting an age limit for application of capital punishment. 492 U.S. at 377 ("A revised national consensus so broad, so clear and so enduring as to justify a permanent prohibition upon all units of democratic government must appear in the operative acts (laws and the application of laws) that the people have approved."). The Stanford dissenters would have broadened this inquiry with a proportionality review that considers the defendant's culpability as one aspect of the gravity of the offense, that considers age as one indicator of culpability, and that looks to other statutory age classifications to arrive at a conclusion about the level of maturity and responsibility that society expects of juveniles. 492 U.S. at 394–96. The Atkins majority adopted the approach of the Stanford dissenters, conducting a proportionality review that brought their own "evaluation" into play along with their analysis of consensus on the issue of executing persons with intellectual disabilities.

ill-considered actions and decisions." Juveniles are also more susceptible than adults to "negative influences" and peer pressure. Finally, the character of juveniles is not as well formed, and their personality traits are "more transitory, less fixed."[8] For these reasons, irresponsible conduct by juveniles is "not as morally reprehensible," they have "a greater claim than adults to be forgiven," and "a greater possibility exists that a minor's character deficiencies will be reformed."[9] Because of the diminished culpability of juveniles, the penological objectives of retribution and deterrence do not provide adequate justification for imposition of the death penalty. The majority preferred a categorical rule over individualized assessment of each offender's maturity, explaining that "[t]he differences between juvenile and adult offenders are too marked and well understood to risk allowing a youthful person to receive the death penalty despite insufficient culpability."[10]

The Roper Court found confirmation for its holding in "the overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty."[11] Although "not controlling," the rejection of the juvenile death penalty by other nations and by international authorities was "instructive," as it had been in earlier cases, for Eighth Amendment interpretation.[12]

Amdt8.4.9.9 Non-Homicide Offenses and Death Penalty

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Supreme Court has considered whether, based on the nature of the underlying offense, imposing capital punishment may be inappropriate. In Kennedy v. Louisiana, the Court stated:

> [T]he Eighth Amendment's protection against excessive or cruel and unusual punishments flows from the basic 'precept of justice that punishment for [a] crime should be graduated and proportioned to [the] offense.' Whether this requirement has been fulfilled is determined not by the standards that prevailed when the Eighth Amendment was adopted in 1791 but by the norms that 'currently prevail.' The Amendment 'draw[s] its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society.'[1]

However, in a dissenting opinion, Justice Samuel Alito opined that the "Court has . . . made it clear that '[t]he Eighth Amendment is not a ratchet, whereby a temporary consensus on leniency for a particular crime fixes a permanent constitutional maximum, disabling States from giving effect to altered beliefs and responding to changed social conditions.'"[2]

---

[8] 543 U.S. at 569, 570.

[9] 543 U.S. at 570.

[10] 543 U.S. at 572–573. Strongly disagreeing, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote that "an especially depraved juvenile offender may . . . be just as culpable as many adult offenders considered bad enough to deserve the death penalty. . . . [E]specially for 17-year-olds . . . the relevant differences between 'adults' and 'juveniles' appear to be a matter of degree, rather than of kind." Id. at 600.

[11] 543 U.S. at 578 (noting "the stark reality that the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty," id. at 575).

[12] 543 U.S. at 577, 578. Citing as precedent Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 102–03 (1958) (plurality opinion); Atkins, 536 U.S. at 317 n.21; Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782, 796–97, n.22 (1982), Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815, 830–31 & n.31 (1988) (plurality opinion); and Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584, 596 n.10 (1977) (plurality opinion).

[1] Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407, 419 (2008) (quoting Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101 (1958) (plurality opinion)).

[2] 554 U.S. at 406 (Alito, J., dissenting) (quoting Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 990 (1991)).

In Coker v. Georgia,[3] the Court held that the state may not impose a death sentence upon a rapist who did not take a human life. In Kennedy v. Louisiana,[4] the Court held that this was true even when the rape victim was a child.[5] In Coker, the Court announced that the standard under the Eighth Amendment was that punishments are barred when they "are 'excessive' in relation to the crime committed."[6] The Court stated:

> Under Gregg v. Georgia, a punishment is 'excessive' and unconstitutional if it (1) makes no measurable contribution to acceptable goals of punishment and hence is nothing more than the purposeless and needless imposition of pain and suffering; or (2) is grossly out of proportion to the severity of the crime. A punishment might fail the test on either ground. Furthermore, these Eighth Amendment judgments should not be, or appear to be, merely the subjective views of individual Justices; judgment should be informed by objective factors to the maximum possible extent. To this end, attention must be given to public attitudes concerning a particular sentence—history and precedent, legislative attitudes, and the response of juries reflected in their sentencing decisions are to be consulted.[7]

Although the Coker Court thought that the death penalty for rape passed the first test ("it may measurably serve the legitimate ends of punishment"),[8] it found that it failed the second test (proportionality).[9] Georgia was the sole state providing for death for the rape of an adult woman, and juries in at least nine out of ten cases refused to impose death for rape. Aside from this view of public perception, the Court independently concluded that death is an excessive penalty for an offender who rapes but does not kill; rape cannot compare with murder "in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public."[10]

In Kennedy v. Louisiana, the Court concluded on the basis of the "teaching of [its] precedents" and the "evolving standards of decency," evidenced by legislative activity on the issue and the want of related executions, that the Eighth Amendment precludes the death penalty for a person who rapes a child.[11]

---

[3] 433 U.S. 584 (1977). Justice Byron White's opinion was joined only by Justices Potter Stewart, Harry Blackmun, and John Paul Stevens. Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall concurred on their view that the death penalty is per se invalid, id. at 600, and Justice Lewis Powell concurred on a more limited basis than Justice White's opinion. Id. at 601. Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice William Rehnquist dissented. Id. at 604.

[4] 554 U.S. 407. Justice Anthony Kennedy's opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer. Justice Samuel Alito filed a dissenting opinion, in which Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas joined.

[5] The Court noted, however, that "[o]ur concern here is limited to crimes against individual persons [where a victim's life is not taken]. We do not address, for example, crimes defining and punishing treason, espionage, terrorism, and drug kingpin activity, which are offenses against the State." 554 U.S. at 437.

[6] Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584, 592 (1976).

[7] Id.

[8] 433 U.S. at 593 n.4.

[9] Id. at 597.

[10] Id. at 598.

[11] 554 U.S. 407, 438 (2008). The Court noted that since Gregg, it had "spent more than 32 years articulating limiting factors that channel the jury's discretion to avoid the death penalty's arbitrary imposition in the case of murder. Though that practice remains sound, beginning the same process for crimes for which no one has been executed in more than 40 years would require experimentation in an area where a failed experiment would result in the execution of individuals undeserving of the death penalty. Evolving standards of decency are difficult to reconcile with a regime that seeks to expand the death penalty to an area where standards to confine its use are indefinite and obscure." Id. at 440–41.

Amdt8.4.9.10 Execution Methods

Eighth Amendment:

> Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Throughout the history of the United States, various methods of execution have been deployed by the states in carrying out the death penalty. In the early history of the Nation, hanging was the "nearly universal form of execution."[1] In the late nineteenth century and continuing into the twentieth century, the states began adopting electrocution as a substitute for hanging based on the "well-grounded belief that electrocution is less painful and more humane than hanging."[2] And by the late 1970s, following Gregg, states began adopting statutes allowing for execution by lethal injection, perceiving lethal injection to be a more humane alternative to electrocution or other popular pre-Gregg means of carrying out the death penalty, such as firing squads or gas chambers.[3] Today the overwhelming majority of the states that allow for the death penalty use lethal injection as the "exclusive or primary method of execution."[4]

Despite a national evolution over the past two hundred years with respect to the methods deployed in carrying out the death penalty, the choice to adopt arguably more humane means of capital punishment has not been the direct result of a decision from the Supreme Court. Citing public understandings from the time of the Framing, the Court has articulated some limits to the methods that can be employed in carrying out death sentences, such as those that "superadd" terror, pain, or disgrace to the penalty of death,[5] for example by torturing someone to death.[6]

Nonetheless, the Supreme Court has "never invalidated a State's chosen procedure" for carrying out the death penalty as a violation of the Eighth Amendment.[7] In 1878, the Court, relying on a long history of using firing squads in carrying out executions in military tribunals, held that the "punishment of shooting as a mode of executing the death penalty" did not constitute a cruel and unusual punishment.[8] Twelve years later, the Court upheld the use of the newly created electric chair, deferring to the judgment of the New York state legislature and finding that it was "plainly right" that electrocution was not "inhuman and barbarous."[9] Fifty-seven years later, a plurality of the Court concluded that it would not be "cruel and unusual" to execute a prisoner whose first execution failed due to a mechanical malfunction, as an "unforeseeable accident" did not amount to the "wanton infliction of pain" barred by the Eighth Amendment.[10]

---

[1] Baze v. Rees, 553 U.S. 35, 41 (2008) (quoting Campbell v. Wood, 511 U.S. 1119, 1119 (1994) (Blackmun, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari)).

[2] See Malloy v. South Carolina, 237 U.S. 180, 185 (1915).

[3] See Baze, 553 U.S. at 42.

[4] Id.

[5] See Bucklew v. Precythe, No. 17–8151, slip op. at 9–10 (U.S. Apr. 1, 2019) (citing 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 370 (1769)).

[6] See Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130, 135–36 (1879) (noting in dicta that certain forms of torture, such as drawing and quartering, disemboweling alive, beheading, public dissection, and burning alive, are "forbidden by . . . [the] Constitution"); see also Bucklew, slip op. at 9–10 (similar).

[7] See Baze, 553 U.S. at 48 (plurality opinion).

[8] See Wilkerson, 99 U.S. at 134–35.

[9] See In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 447 (1890).

[10] See Louisiana ex. rel. Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459, 464 (1947) (plurality opinion). Justice Felix Frankfurter concurred in judgment, providing the fifth vote for the Court's judgment. Id. at 466 (Frankfurter, J.,

The declaration in Trop v. Dulles that the Eighth Amendment "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society"[11] and the continued reliance on that declaration by a majority of the Court in several key Eighth Amendment cases[12] set the stage for potential "method of execution" challenges to the newest mode for the death penalty: lethal injection. Following several decisions clarifying the proper procedural mechanism to raise challenges to methods of execution,[13] the Court, in Baze v. Rees, rejected a method of execution challenge to Kentucky's lethal injection protocol, a three-drug protocol consisting of (1) an anesthetic that would render a prisoner unconscious; (2) a muscle relaxant; and (3) an agent that would induce cardiac arrest.[14] A plurality opinion, written by Chief Justice John Roberts and joined by Justices Anthony Kennedy and Samuel Alito, concluded that to constitute cruel and unusual punishment, a particular method for carrying out the death penalty must present a "substantial" or "objectively intolerable" risk of harm.[15] In so concluding, the plurality opinion rejected the view that a prisoner could succeed on an Eighth Amendment method of execution challenge by merely demonstrating that a "marginally" safer alternative existed, because such a standard would "embroil" the courts in ongoing scientific inquiries and force courts to second guess the informed choices of state legislatures respecting capital punishment.[16] As a result, the plurality reasoned that to address a "substantial risk of serious harm" effectively, the prisoner must propose an alternative method of execution that is feasible, can be readily implemented, and can significantly reduce a substantial risk of severe pain.[17] Given the "heavy burden" that the plurality placed on those pursuing an Eighth Amendment method of execution claim, the plurality upheld Kentucky's protocol in light of (1) the consensus of state lethal injection procedures; (2) the safeguards Kentucky put in place to protect against any risks of harm; and (3) the lack of any feasible, safer alternative to the three-drug protocol.[18] Four other Justices, for varying reasons, concurred in the judgment of the Court.[19]

Seven years later, in a seeming reprise of the Baze litigation, a majority of the Court in Glossip v. Gross formally adopted the Baze plurality's reasoning with respect to Eighth Amendment claims involving methods of execution, resulting in the rejection of a challenge to Oklahoma's three-drug lethal injection protocol.[20] Following Baze, anti-death penalty concurring). He grounded his decision on whether the Eighth Amendment had been incorporated against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, ultimately concluding that Louisiana's choice of execution cannot be said to be "repugnant to the conscience of mankind." Id. at 471.

---

[11] See Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101 (1958) (plurality opinion).

[12] See, e.g., Kennedy v. Louisiana, 554 U.S. 407, 419 (2008); Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8 (1992); Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 346 (1981); Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173 (1976) (joint opinion).

[13] See, e.g., Hill v. McDonough, 547 U.S. 573 (2006) (ruling that a challenge to the constitutionality of an execution method could be brought as a civil rights claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, rather than under the anti-delay provisions governing a habeas corpus petition).

[14] 553 U.S. 35, 44 (2008).

[15] Id. at 50.

[16] Id. at 51.

[17] Id. at 52.

[18] Id. at 53–61.

[19] Justice John Paul Stevens, while announcing his skepticism regarding the constitutionality of the death penalty as a whole, concluded that, based on existing precedent, the petitioners' evidence failed to prove a violation of the Eighth Amendment. Id. at 71–87 (Stevens, J., concurring). Justice Clarence Thomas, on behalf of himself and Justice Antonin Scalia, rejected the idea that the Court had the capacity to adjudicate claims involving methods of execution properly and instead argued that an execution method violates the Eighth Amendment only if it is deliberately designed to inflict pain. Id. at 94–107 (Thomas, J., concurring). Justice Stephen Breyer concluded that insufficient evidence in either the record or in available medical literature demonstrated that Kentucky's lethal injection method created significant risk of unnecessary suffering. Id. at 107–13 (Breyer, J., concurring).

[20] See 576 U.S. 863 (2015).

advocates successfully persuaded pharmaceutical companies to stop providing states with the anesthetic that constituted the first of the three drugs used in the protocol challenged in the 2008 case, resulting in several states, including Oklahoma, substituting a sedative called midazolam in the protocol.[21] In Glossip, the Court held that Oklahoma's use of midazolam in its execution protocol did not violate the Eighth Amendment, because the challengers had failed to present a known and available alternative to midazolam and did not adequately demonstrate that the drug was ineffective in rendering a prisoner insensate to pain.[22]

Four years after Glossip, the Court further clarified its method-of-execution jurisprudence in Bucklew v. Precythe.[23] In that case, a death row inmate challenged the State of Missouri's use of the drug pentobarbital in executions because, regardless of its effect on other inmates, the drug would result in him experiencing "severe pain" due to his "unusual medical condition."[24] The Court, in an opinion by Justice Neil Gorsuch, began by framing the Baze-Glossip test as fundamentally asking whether a state's chosen method of execution is one that "cruelly superadds pain to the death sentence" relative to an alternative method of execution.[25] With this framework in mind, the Court first rejected the petitioner's argument that Baze and Glossip, which involved facial challenges, did not govern his as-applied challenge.[26] Justice Neil Gorsuch reasoned that determining whether the state is cruelly "superadding" pain to a punishment necessarily requires comparing that method with a viable alternative, an inquiry that simply does not hinge on whether a death row inmate's challenge rests on facts unique to his particular medical condition.[27] In so concluding, the Court clarified that an inmate seeking to identify an alternative method of execution is not limited to choosing a method that the state currently authorizes and can instead point, for example, to a well-established protocol in another state.[28]

Applying the Baze-Glossip framework, the Court then rejected the petitioner's proposed alternative of using the lethal gas, nitrogen hypoxia, because (1) the proposal was insufficiently detailed to permit a finding that the state could carry out the execution easily

[21] Id. at 869–71.

[22] Id. at 881–93.

[23] 139 S. Ct. 1112 (2019).

[24] Id. at 1120. Specifically, the petitioner argued that the state's protocol would cause him severe pain because he suffered from a disease that causes vascular tumors, which could rupture upon being injected with the drug that Missouri used in its death penalty protocol. Id.

[25] Id. at 1125 (observing that Baze and Glossip "teach[ ]" that a prisoner must show a "feasible and readily implemented alternative method of execution that would significantly reduce a substantial risk of severe pain and that the State has refused to adopt without a legitimate penological reason.").

[26] Id. at 1126.

[27] Id. (concluding that the argument that the Constitution categorically forbids some particular methods of execution was foreclosed by Baze and Glossip, as well as the "original and historical understanding" of the Eighth Amendment, which rejected ancient and barbaric methods of execution only because, in comparison to alternatives available at the Founding, they went far beyond what was necessary to carry out a death sentence). In so concluding, the Court rejected the argument that the comparator in an as-applied challenge should be a typical execution. Id. at 1127. For the Court, this argument rested on the assumption that executions must be carried out painlessly, a standard the Court "has rejected time and time again." Id. Instead, to determine whether the state is cruelly "superadding" pain, Bucklew concluded that a death row inmate must show that the state had some other "feasible and readily available method" to carry out the execution that would have "significantly reduced a substantial risk of pain."Id. Justice Neil Gorsuch also saw other problems with the petitioner's distinction between an as-applied challenge and a facial challenge. Viewing this distinction as simply a question of the breadth of the remedy afforded the petitioner, the Court concluded that the meaning of the Constitution should not hinge on the particular remedy being sought. Id. at 1128. Moreover, the Court raised the concern that creating a distinction based on the nature of the petitioner's preferred remedy would result in "pleading games" over the labels a petitioner assigned to his complaint. Id.

[28] Id. at 1128.

and quickly;[29] (2) the proposed alternative was an "untried and untested" method of execution;[30] and (3) the underlying record showed that any risks created by pentobarbital and mitigated by nitrogen hypoxia were speculative in nature.[31]

As a result of Baze, Glossip, and Bucklew, it appears that only those modes of the death penalty that demonstrably result in substantial risks of harm for the prisoner relative to viable alternatives can be challenged as unconstitutional.[32] This standard appears to result in the political process (as opposed to the judicial process) being the primary means of making wholesale changes to a particular method of execution.[33]

[29] Id. at 1129.

[30] Id. at 1130.

[31] Id. at 1131–33 (noting (1) evidence in the record that the state was making accommodations to further reduce any risks to the petitioner and (2) insufficient evidence indicating that pentobarbital would create risks of severe pain and that nitrogen hypoxia would not carry the same risks).

[32] Id. at 1130.

[33] Id. at 1134 ("Under our Constitution, the question of capital punishment belongs to the people and their representatives, not the courts, to resolve. The proper role of courts is to ensure that method-of-execution challenges to lawfully issued sentences are resolved fairly and expeditiously."); see also Barr v. Lee, 140 S. Ct. 2590, 2590–94 (2020) (per curiam) (relying on Bucklew's views on the proper role of the judiciary with respect to method-of-execution challenges to reject a challenge raised "hours before" execution concerning the safety of using pentobarbital to carry out the death penalty).

NINTH AMENDMENT
UNENUMERATED RIGHTS

NINTH AMENDMENT
UNENUMERATED RIGHTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

NINTH AMENDMENT—UNENUMERATED RIGHTS

Amdt9.1 Overview of Ninth Amendment, Unenumerated Rights

The Ninth Amendment provides that the enumeration of certain rights in the Constitution should not be construed to mean that the Constitution does not protect rights that are not enumerated. The Amendment was included in the Bill of Rights to address fears that expressly protecting certain rights might be misinterpreted implicitly to sanction the infringement of others.[1]

Few Supreme Court cases offer significant analysis of the Ninth Amendment. Prior to 1965, litigants occasionally invoked the Amendment, often along with the Tenth Amendment or other provisions of the Bill of Rights, to challenge the constitutionality of government actions, but the Court consistently rejected those claims.[2] In 1965, in Griswold v. Connecticut, a majority of the Court cited the Ninth Amendment, along with the substantive rights protected by the First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments, and held that the Constitution protects "penumbral rights of 'privacy and repose'" that bar a state from prohibiting the use of contraception by married couples.[3] By contrast, in the 1973 case Roe v. Wade, the Court grounded a constitutional right to abortion in the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Ninth.[4]

Overall, the Court has generally treated the Ninth Amendment as a rule of construction for the Constitution rather than a freestanding guarantee of any substantive rights. Thus, in Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, a plurality of the Court referred to the Amendment as a "sort of constitutional 'saving clause,' which, among other things, would serve to foreclose application to the Bill of Rights of the maxim that the affirmation of particular rights implies a negation of those not expressly defined."[5]

Amdt9.2 Historical Background on Ninth Amendment

Ninth Amendment:

> The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The Ninth Amendment is a part of the Bill of Rights, and its purpose is best understood in the context of the debate around the express enumeration of protected rights at and soon after the Founding. As originally drafted and ratified, the Constitution did not include a bill of rights. A proposal to include a bill of rights was rejected late in the Constitutional Convention.[1] The Federalists argued that because the national government had limited and enumerated powers, there was no need to protect individual rights expressly. As Alexander Hamilton wrote

---

[1] See Amdt9.2 Historical Background on Ninth Amendment The Tenth Amendment responded to related concerns that including a list of rights in the Constitution might be misunderstood to imply that the national government had powers beyond those enumerated. U.S. CONST. amend. X; see also Tenth Amendment.

[2] See generally Amdt9.3 Ninth Amendment Doctrine.

[3] 381 U.S. 479, 481–85 (1965).

[4] 410 U.S. 113 (1973), overruled by Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization, No. 19-1392, slip op. (U.S. June 2022).

[5] 448 U.S. 555, 579–80 & n.15 (1980); cf. Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 91 (2000) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (The Ninth Amendment's "refusal to 'deny or disparage' other rights is far removed from affirming any one of them, and even further removed from authorizing judges to identify what they might be, and to enforce the judges' list against laws duly enacted by the people.").

[1] 2 MAX FARRAND, RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 341–42, 587–88, 617–618 (1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records].

in the Federalist Papers, "Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given [in the Constitution] by which restrictions may be imposed?"[2] The Federalists contended that including a list of rights in the Constitution could be "dangerous" because it might be misunderstood to imply that the national government had powers beyond those enumerated, or that rights not expressly identified for protection were not in fact protected.[3]

In contrast to the prevailing delegates to the Convention, many state conventions considering whether to ratify the Constitution preferred to include a bill of rights. Several states ratified the Constitution on the understanding that a bill of rights would be added.[4] The first Congress accordingly proposed twelve constitutional amendments, ten of which were ratified by the requisite number of states and became the Bill of Rights.[5]

In contrast to the first eight amendments to the Constitution, which protect substantive rights, the Ninth Amendment sought to address Federalist fears that expressly protecting certain rights might implicitly sanction the infringement of other rights.[6] James Madison responded to that argument in presenting his proposed amendments to the House of Representatives:

> It has been objected also against a bill of rights, that, by enumerating particular exceptions to the grant of power, it would disparage those rights which were not placed in that enumeration; and it might follow by implication, that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the General Government, and were consequently insecure. This is one of the most plausible arguments I have ever heard against the admission of a bill of rights into this system.[7]

Madison suggested, however, that that concern "may be guarded against" by the text that became the Ninth Amendment.[8]

Madison's statement and the text of the Ninth Amendment both indicate that the Amendment itself does not guarantee any substantive rights.[9] Instead, it states a rule of construction, making clear that the Bill of Rights may not be construed to limit rights in areas not enumerated. As Justice Joseph Story explained, the "clause was manifestly introduced to

---

[2] See The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

[3] Id. For the Antifederalists, the absence of a bill of rights was a reason to oppose ratification of the Constitution. See, e.g., George Mason, Objections to this Constitution of Government (1787), reprinted in 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 637–38 ("There is no Declaration of Rights.").

[4] See generally Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528, 568–70 (1985) (Powell, J., dissenting) (reviewing this history and noting that "eight States voted for the Constitution only after proposing amendments to be adopted after ratification").

[5] See Intro.3.2 Bill of Rights (First Through Tenth Amendments).

[6] The Tenth Amendment responded to related concerns that including a list of rights in the Constitution might be misunderstood to imply that the national government had powers beyond those enumerated. U.S. Const. amend. X; see also Tenth Amendment.

[7] 1 Annals of Congress 439 (1789). See also 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 1898 (1833).

[8] Id.

[9] But compare Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 491 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring) ("[A] judicial construction that this fundamental right is not protected by the Constitution because it is not mentioned in explicit terms by one of the first eight amendments or elsewhere in the Constitution would violate the Ninth Amendment.") with Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 91 (2000) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (The Ninth Amendment's "refusal to 'deny or disparage' other rights is far removed from affirming any one of them, and even further removed from authorizing judges to identify what they might be, and to enforce the judges' list against laws duly enacted by the people.").

prevent any perverse, or ingenious misapplication of the well known maxim, that an affirmation in particular cases implies a negation in all others."[10]

Amdt9.3 Ninth Amendment Doctrine

Ninth Amendment:

> The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Supreme Court cases from before 1965 contain little analysis of the Ninth Amendment. Litigants in earlier cases occasionally invoked the Amendment, often along with the Tenth Amendment or other provisions of the Bill of Rights, to challenge the constitutionality of various government actions. The Court dismissed those claims, usually with limited discussion.[1] For example, in the 1947 case United Public Workers v. Mitchell, the Court rejected Ninth and Tenth Amendment challenges to the Hatch Political Activity Act.[2] The Court explained,

> The powers granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government are subtracted from the totality of sovereignty originally in the states and the people. Therefore, when objection is made that the exercise of a federal power infringes upon rights reserved by the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, the inquiry must be directed toward the granted power under which the action of the Union was taken. If granted power is found, necessarily the objection of invasion of those rights, reserved by the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, must fail.[3]

Concluding that Congress had the authority to enact the Hatch Act and the Act did not violate any of the prohibitions in the Bill of Rights, the Court upheld the statute.[4]

Several members of the Court examined the Ninth Amendment in greater depth in the 1965 case Griswold v. Connecticut.[5] In Griswold, the Court held that a statute prohibiting use of contraceptives unconstitutionally infringed on the right of marital privacy. Justice William O. Douglas, writing for the Court, asserted that the "specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance."[6] The majority cited the Ninth Amendment along with the substantive rights protected by the First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments while discussing the "penumbral rights of 'privacy and repose.'"[7] Although a right to privacy is not expressly mentioned in the Constitution, the Court concluded that banning contraceptive use by married couples impermissibly intruded on "a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees."[8]

Justice Arthur Goldberg, concurring, devoted several pages to the Ninth Amendment. He opined,

---

[10] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1893 (1833).

[1] See Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 330–31 (1936); Tennessee Electric Power Co. v. TVA, 306 U.S. 118, 143–44 (1939); Roth v. United States 354 U.S. 476, 492–93 (1957); Singer v. United States 380 U.S. 24, 26 (1965).

[2] 330 U.S. 75 (1947).

[3] Id. at 95–96.

[4] Id. at 96–104.

[5] 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

[6] Id. at 484.

[7] Id. at 481–85.

[8] Id. at 485.

Amdt9.3
Ninth Amendment Doctrine

> The language and history of the Ninth Amendment reveal that the Framers of the Constitution believed that there are additional fundamental rights, protected from governmental infringement, which exist alongside those fundamental rights specifically mentioned in the first eight constitutional amendments. . . . [A] judicial construction that this fundamental right is not protected by the Constitution because it is not mentioned in explicit terms by one of the first eight amendments or elsewhere in the Constitution would violate the Ninth Amendment.[9]

Justice Goldberg disclaimed any belief "that the Ninth Amendment constitutes an independent source of right protected from infringement by either the states or the Federal Government." Rather, he explained, the Amendment "shows a belief of the Constitution's authors that fundamental rights exist that are not expressly enumerated in the first eight amendments and an intent that the list of rights included there not be deemed exhaustive."[10]

In the 1973 case Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court held that the Constitution limited the ability of the states to prohibit abortion before fetal viability.[11] The district court in Roe held that the Ninth Amendment protected the right to abortion. On appeal, the Supreme Court instead held that the right was "founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action," but cited both the majority opinion in Griswold and Justice Goldberg's concurrence among opinions that "recognized that a right of personal privacy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the Constitution."[12] In the 2022 case Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization, the Court overruled Roe but emphasized that its decision should not cast doubt on precedents not involving abortion, including Griswold.[13]

[9] Id. at 487–91 (Goldberg, J., concurring).

[10] Id. at 492. Justices Hugo Black and Potter Stewart dissented. Justice Black wrote, "I cannot rely on the Due Process Clause or the Ninth Amendment or any mysterious and uncertain natural law concept as a reason for striking down this state law." Id. at 522 (Black, J., dissenting). Justice Stewart contended, "The Ninth Amendment, like its companion the Tenth, . . . 'states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered.'" Id. at 529 (quoting United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941)).

[11] 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

[12] Id. at 152–53.

[13] No. 19-1392, slip op. (U.S. June 2022).

TENTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS RESERVED TO THE STATES AND THE PEOPLE

TENTH AMENDMENT
RIGHTS RESERVED TO THE STATES AND THE PEOPLE

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TENTH AMENDMENT—RIGHTS RESERVED TO THE STATES AND THE PEOPLE

Amdt10.1 Overview of Tenth Amendment, Rights Reserved to the States and the People

Because the Tenth Amendment concerns the relationship between the federal government's powers and those powers reserved to the states, it is sometimes invoked—implicitly or explicitly—in cases exploring the limits of Congress's various enumerated powers.[1] These decisions are primarily addressed elsewhere in the Constitution Annotated under the particular enumerated federal power at issue.[2]

The key issue in Tenth Amendment doctrine, as such, is whether the Amendment imposes affirmative limitations on federal power beyond the limits inherent in the various enumerated powers themselves. In other words, assuming that an enumerated power supports congressional action in a particular area, may the Tenth Amendment (or the federalism principles it confirms[3]) nonetheless render the legislation beyond federal power? And, if so, what are the contours of the limitations that the Tenth Amendment imposes?

The Supreme Court's jurisprudence on these questions has not followed a straight line.[4] At times, the Court has stated that the Tenth Amendment lacks substantive constitutional content and "does not operate as a limitation upon the powers, express or implied, delegated to the national government."[5] At other times, the Court has found affirmative federalism limitations in the Amendment, invalidating federal statutes "not because Congress lacked legislative authority over the subject matter, but because those statutes violated the principles of federalism contained in the Tenth Amendment."[6]

The Supreme Court's Tenth Amendment jurisprudence has gone through several cycles over its history. In the nineteenth century, Chief Justice John Marshall's landmark opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland rejected the notion that the Tenth Amendment denied implied or incidental powers to the federal government, adopting an approach to assessing congressional power focused not on the Tenth Amendment itself, but the larger constitutional context.[7]

In the early twentieth century, the Court relied on the Tenth Amendment to strike down various economic regulations as invasive of the police power reserved to the states by the Amendment.[8] Beginning in the late 1930s, many of these decisions were overruled or limited

---

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 618 (2000) ("[W]e can think of no better example of the police power, which the Founders denied the National Government and reposed in the States, than the suppression of violent crime and vindication of its victims.").

[2] See, e.g., ArtI.S8.C1.1.1 Overview of Taxing Clause; ArtI.S8.C1.2.1 Overview of Spending Clause; ArtI.S8.C3.6.1 United States v. Lopez and Interstate Commerce Clause.

[3] See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 156 (1992) (finding that the Tenth Amendment "restrains the power of Congress . . . but this limit is not derived from the text of the Tenth Amendment itself").

[4] Id. at 160 ("The Court's [Tenth Amendment jurisprudence] has traveled an unsteady path."); Morrison, 529 U.S. at 645 (Souter, J., dissenting) ("[H]istory seems to be recycling, for the theory of traditional state concern as grounding a limiting principle [based on the Tenth Amendment] has been rejected previously, and more than once.").

[5] Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340, 362 (1945); accord United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941).

[6] Reno v. Condon, 528 U.S. 141, 149 (2000); accord New York, 505 U.S. at 157, 166 ("[E]ven where Congress has the authority under the Constitution to pass laws requiring or prohibiting certain acts, it lacks the power directly to compel the States to require or prohibit those acts.").

[7] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 406 (1819) ("[The Tenth Amendment] thus leav[es] the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest, has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole [Constitution].").

[8] See, e.g., Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 274 (1918) (invalidating federal prohibition on interstate trafficking in goods produced by child labor as invading "the local power always existing and carefully reserved to the

as the Court embraced a broader conception of Congress's Commerce Clause power, along with the view that the Tenth Amendment does not bar federal action that is necessary and proper to the exercise of federal power.[9]

Tenth Amendment doctrine then laid largely dormant until the mid-1970s. In National League of Cities v Usery, the Court relied on the Amendment to hold that Congress may not use its commerce power to "directly displace the States' freedom to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions."[10] Less than a decade later in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, however, the Court overruled National League of Cities as "unworkable" and "inconsistent with established principles of federalism,"[11] while implying that the Tenth Amendment lacked any judicially enforceable protections for state sovereignty.[12]

In the 1990s, the Court changed course again, holding in New York v. United States that the Tenth Amendment prohibits Congress from "commandeering" the states—that is, directly compelling them to enact or enforce a federal regulatory program.[13] The resulting "anti-commandeering" doctrine has been the subject of a line of Supreme Court cases continuing to the present.[14]

Amdt10.2 Historical Background on Tenth Amendment

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The Tenth Amendment confirms "the understanding of the people at the time the Constitution was adopted"[1] that the powers not delegated to the federal government by the Constitution are "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."[2] In this sense, the Amendment is merely declaratory—a "truism" that "all is retained which has not been surrendered."[3] Justice Joseph Story characterizes it as a "mere affirmation" of "a necessary rule of interpreting" the Constitution:

> Being an instrument of limited and enumerated powers, it follows irresistibly, that what is not conferred, is withheld, and belongs to the state authorities, if invested by their constitutions of government respectively in them; and if not so in vested, it is retained BY THE PEOPLE, as a part of their residuary sovereignty.[4] states in the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution."), overruled by Darby, 312 U.S. at 117; United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 68 (1936) (relying on Tenth Amendment to hold tax provision in Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional because it "invades the reserved rights of the states").

---

[9] See, e.g., Darby, 312 U.S. at 124 ("From the beginning and for many years the [Tenth] amendment has been construed as not depriving the national government of authority to resort to all means for the exercise of a granted power which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the permitted end.") (citing McCulloch, 17 U.S. at 405–06).

[10] Nat'l League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 852 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[11] Garcia, 469 U.S. at 531.

[12] Id. at 549–52.

[13] 505 U.S. 144, 161 (1992) (quoting Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 288 (1981)).

[14] See, e.g., Murphy v. NCAA, No. 16-476 (U.S. May 14, 2018); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[1] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 733 (1931).

[2] U.S. Const. amend. X.

[3] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 156 (1992) (quoting United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941)).

[4] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1900 (1833).

The Tenth Amendment's purpose should be understood in the context of the Bill of Rights, of which it is a part. As originally drafted, the Constitution did not include a bill of rights, which was rejected when proposed late in the Constitutional Convention.[5] The Federalists argued that because the national government had limited and enumerated powers, there was no need to protect individual rights expressly: "Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given [in the Constitution] by which restrictions may be imposed?"[6] On this view, including a list of rights in the Constitution could be "dangerous" because it might be misunderstood to imply that the national government had powers beyond those enumerated.[7]

The argument against including a bill of rights did not persuade many state ratifying conventions, however, and several states assented to the Constitution on the understanding and expectation that a bill of rights would quickly be added.[8] The first Congress accordingly proposed twelve amendments, ten of which were ratified by the requisite number of states and became the Bill of Rights.[9]

The last of these first ten amendments addressed the Federalists' concern that a list of rights might imply the federal government had powers beyond those enumerated. The Tenth Amendment thus served to "allay fears that the new national government might seek to exercise powers not granted, and that the states might not be able to exercise fully their reserved powers."[10]

Unlike the analogous provision in the Articles of Confederation,[11] both houses of Congress refused to insert the word "expressly" before the word "delegated" in the Tenth Amendment.[12] James Madison's remarks during the congressional debate on the Amendment are also notable: "Interference with the power of the States was no constitutional criterion of the power of Congress. If the power was not given, Congress could not exercise it; if given, they might exercise it, although it should interfere with the laws, or even the Constitutions of the States."[13]

---

[5] 2 Max Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 341–42, 587–88, 617–618 (1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records].

[6] See The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

[7] Id. For the Antifederalists, of course, the absence of a bill of rights was a primary reason to oppose ratification of the Constitution. See, e.g., George Mason, Objections to this Constitution of Government (1787), reprinted in 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 5, at 637–38 ("There is no Declaration of Rights . . . .").

[8] See generally Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528, 568–70 (1985) (Powell, J., dissenting) (reviewing this history and noting that "eight States voted for the Constitution only after proposing amendments to be adopted after ratification").

[9] See Intro.3.2 Bill of Rights (First Through Tenth Amendments).

[10] United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941).

[11] Articles of Confederation, art. II ("Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled.").

[12] Annals of Cong. 767–68 (1789) (defeated in House 17 to 32); 2 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 1150–51 (1971) (defeated in Senate by unrecorded vote).

[13] 2 Annals of Cong. 1897 (1791).

Amdt10.3 Development of Doctrine

Amdt10.3.1 Early Tenth Amendment Jurisprudence

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In McCulloch v. Maryland,[1] Chief Justice John Marshall famously adopted a broad interpretation of the Necessary and Proper Clause[2] to counter the argument that the federal government lacked power to establish a national bank. The opinion also rejected a Tenth Amendment argument, urged by Luther Martin as counsel for the State of Maryland, that the power to create corporations was reserved by that Amendment to the states.[3] Martin noted that the Amendment was added to assuage concerns, expressed by opponents of the Constitution's ratification, that the document would invade states' rights.[4]

Stressing the fact that the Tenth Amendment, unlike the Articles of Confederation, omitted the word "expressly" as a qualification of granted powers, McCulloch concluded that nothing in the Constitution "excludes incidental or implied powers."[5] The effect of the Tenth Amendment, rather, was to leave the question "whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend upon a fair construction of the whole instrument."[6]

Apart from some tax immunity decisions,[7] and a notable mention in the Civil Rights Cases,[8] the Tenth Amendment was infrequently invoked by the Court until the early twentieth century.[9]

---

[1] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

[2] See ArtI.S8.C18.3 Necessary and Proper Clause Early Doctrine and McCulloch v. Maryland.

[3] McCulloch, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 372–74 (argument of counsel).

[4] Id. at 372.

[5] Id. at 406 (opinion of Marshall, C.J.).

[6] Id. The Court later relied on this passage of McCulloch to state that "[f]rom the beginning . . . the amendment has been construed as not depriving the national government of authority to resort to all means for the exercise of a granted power which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the permitted end." United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941).

[7] See infra Amdt10.2.5 Federal Power to Tax and the Tenth Amendment (discussing Collector v. Day, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 113 (1871), overruled by Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 486 (1939), and related intergovernmental tax immunity cases).

[8] Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 14–15 (1883) (arguing that allowing federal regulation of racial discrimination by private actors via the Fourteenth Amendment "steps into the domain of local jurisprudence" and would be "repugnant to the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution"). The discussion of state sovereignty in Lane County v. Oregon also indirectly refers to the Tenth Amendment:

> [I]n many articles of the Constitution the necessary existence of the States, and, within their proper spheres, the independent authority of the States, is distinctly recognized. To them nearly the whole charge of interior regulation is committed or left; to them and to the people all powers not expressly delegated to the national government are reserved.

Lane Cnty. v. Oregon, 74 U.S. 71, 76 (1868) (Salmon, C.J.); accord Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36, 62–63 (1872); Mayor of City of New York v. Miln, 36 U.S. 102, 139 (1837).

[9] There are a handful of invocations of the Tenth Amendment in nineteenth century Supreme Court cases not involving taxation. These are usually in dissent or in passing reference. See, e.g., Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U.S. 548, 595 (1900) (Harlan, J., dissenting); Legal Tender Cases, 110 U.S. 421, 466 (1884) (Field, J., dissenting); Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 358 (1879) (Field, J., dissenting); Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 758 (1893) (Field, J., dissenting); Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100, 127 (1890) (Gray, J. dissenting); Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U.S. 533, 550 (1869) (Nelson, J., dissenting); Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U.S. 519, 606 (1839) (McKinley, J. dissenting); Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 198 (1824); Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 46 U.S. 504, 587 (1847) (opinion of McLean, J.), overruled by Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100 (1890).

Amdt10.3.2 State Police Power and Tenth Amendment Jurisprudence

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In the first few decades of the twentieth century, the Supreme Court relied on the Tenth Amendment—alongside a narrow (by modern standards) understanding of the Interstate Commerce Clause[1]—to invalidate a variety of federal laws regulating economic activity because they invaded the states' reserved police powers to regulate public welfare and morality. Exemplary of this line of cases is Hammer v. Dagenhart,[2] which invalidated a federal law that prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of goods produced through child labor.[3] Invoking the Tenth Amendment, the Court concluded that the Child Labor Law was an unwarranted invasion of the states' reserved powers,[4] reasoning:

> In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the nation is made up of states to which are entrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the national government are reserved. . . . To sustain this statute would not be in our judgment a recognition of the lawful exertion of congressional authority over interstate commerce, but would sanction an invasion by the federal power of the control of a matter purely local in its character . . . .[5]

Following similar logic, the Court in the 1920s and 1930s invoked the Tenth Amendment to invalidate a series of congressional economic regulations as invasive of state police powers, including: taxes on the sale of grain futures in markets that violated federal regulations;[6] taxes on the profits of factories in which child labor was used;[7] regulations and taxes on the production and manufacture of coal;[8] regulations of state building and loan associations;[9] and regulations and taxes on agricultural production.[10] In A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States,[11] the Court, after holding that the commerce power did not extend to intrastate sales of poultry, relied on the Tenth Amendment to rebut the argument that the existence of an economic emergency (the Great Depression) could justify the legislation.[12]

Even during this period, however, not all federal statutes relating to objectives that could be characterized as traditional state responsibilities were held invalid. For example, in

---

[1] See ArtI.S8.C3.6.1 United States v. Lopez and Interstate Commerce Clause.

[2] 247 U.S. 251 (1918), overruled by United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941).

[3] Id. at 268 n.1.

[4] Id. at 274.

[5] Id. at 275–76 (citations omitted).

[6] Hill v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44 (1922); see also Trusler v. Crooks, 269 U.S. 475 (1926).

[7] Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20, 26, 38 (1922).

[8] Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 294 (1936).

[9] Hopkins Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Cleary, 296 U.S. 315, 337 (1935).

[10] United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 68 (1936) ("The act invades the reserved rights of the states. It is a statutory plan to regulate and control agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the federal government.")

[11] 295 U.S. 495 (1935).

[12] Id. at 528–29 ("Extraordinary conditions do not create or enlarge constitutional power . . . . Such assertions of extraconstitutional authority were anticipated and precluded by the explicit terms of the Tenth Amendment.").

Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries Co.,[13] a unanimous Court upheld a wartime prohibition on distilled spirits with reasoning reminiscent of McCulloch:

> That the United States lacks the police power, and that this was reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, is true. But it is nonetheless true that when the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise by a State of its police power.[14]

In a series of cases in apparent tension with Hammer v. Dagenhart, the Court in this period sustained federal laws penalizing the interstate transportation of lottery tickets;[15] of women for immoral purposes;[16] of stolen automobiles;[17] and of tick-infected cattle.[18] In a case upholding a federal law that prohibited the killing or selling of migratory birds, enacted as implementing legislation for a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes rejected the notion that "invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment" invalidated the statute.[19]

Amdt10.3.3 Tenth Amendment and Darby

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Beginning in 1937, in its decisions sustaining the Social Security Act[1] and the National Labor Relations Act,[2] the Supreme Court retreated from the conception of the Tenth Amendment embraced in Hammer v. Dagenhart. Following this so-called "switch in time that saved nine,"[3] the Court generally upheld federal economic regulation as supported by the Commerce Clause, without regard to whether the object of the legislation might be said to intrude upon traditional state authority.

United States v. Darby,[4] which overruled Hammer v. Dagenhart, is perhaps the clearest expression of this view of the Tenth Amendment. In upholding Congress's power to enact the Fair Labor Standards Act, Chief Justice Harlan Stone wrote for a unanimous court:

> It is no objection to the assertion of the power to regulate interstate commerce that its exercise is attended by the same incidents which attended the exercise of the police power of the states. . . . Our conclusion is unaffected by the Tenth Amendment which . . . states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered. There is

---

[13] 251 U.S. 146 (1919).

[14] Id. at 156 (citations omitted) (Brandeis, J.).

[15] Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S. 321 (1903); see also United States v. Ferger, 250 U.S. 199 (1919) (upholding law punishing the forgery of bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce).

[16] Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 308 (1913).

[17] Brooks v. United States, 267 U.S. 432 (1925).

[18] Thornton v. United States, 271 U.S. 414 (1926).

[19] Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 434 (1920).

[1] Steward Mach. Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937); Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619 (1937).

[2] NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937); see ArtI.S8.C3.5.8 National Labor Relations Act of 1935.

[3] See John R. Vile, Truism, Tautology or Vital Principle? The Tenth Amendment Since United States v. Darby, 27 Cumb. L. Rev. 445, 457–58 (1997) (reviewing this history with respect to the Tenth Amendment).

[4] 312 U.S. 100 (1941); accord United States v. Carolene Prods. Co., 304 U.S. 144, 147 (1938).

> nothing in the history of its adoption to suggest that it was more than declaratory of the relationship between the national and state governments as it had been established by the Constitution.[5]

A few years after Darby, the Court stated directly that "the Tenth Amendment 'does not operate as a limitation upon the powers, express or implied, delegated to the national government.'"[6] From the 1940s through the 1970s, the Court followed Darby and its progeny to summarily dismiss Tenth Amendment challenges based on the argument that otherwise valid federal laws intruded upon state police power over local matters reserved to the states through the Tenth Amendment.[7]

Amdt10.3.4 State Sovereignty and Tenth Amendment

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Beginning in the mid-1970s, the Supreme Court relied on the Tenth Amendment to analyze congressional enactments alleged to intrude not upon state police power, but upon state sovereignty—such as whether Congress may apply general economic regulations to states and state instrumentalities.

In 1976, the Court revived the Tenth Amendment as an independent constitutional constraint in National League of Cities v. Usery.[1] The Court conceded that the legislation at issue—the Fair Labor Standards Act's minimum wages and maximum hours requirements (the same law upheld in Darby, but applied to state and local governmental employees)—was "undoubtedly within the scope of the Commerce Clause."[2] But the Court found that "there are attributes of sovereignty attaching to every state government which may not be impaired by Congress, not because Congress may lack an affirmative grant of legislative authority to reach the matter, but because the Constitution prohibits it from exercising the authority in that manner."[3] The Court concluded that the "power to determine the wages which shall be paid to those whom [states] employ in order to carry out their governmental functions" was such an area of inviolable state sovereignty.[4] As a result, as applied to certain state employees, the law was "not within the authority granted Congress."[5] National League of Cities implied that the [5] Darby, 312 U.S. at 114, 123–24. For cases anticipating Darby's holding, see Wright v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 304 U.S. 502, 516–17 (1938); Tenn. Elec. Power Co. v. TVA, 306 U.S. 118, 143–44 (1939); United States v. Appalachian Elec. Power Co., 311 U.S. 377 (1940) ("So long as the things done within the states by the United States are valid under [Commerce Clause power], there can be no interference with the sovereignty of the state.").

---

[6] Case v. Bowles, 327 U.S. 92, 102 (1946) (quoting Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340, 362 (1945)).

[7] See, e.g., Oklahoma ex rel. Phillips v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., 313 U.S. 508, 534 (1941); Nw. Elec. Co. v. Fed. Power Comm'n, 321 U.S. 119, 125 (1944); Oklahoma v. U.S. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 330 U.S. 127, 143 (1947); United Pub. Workers of Am. (C.I.O.) v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 95–96 (1947); Granville-Smith v. Granville-Smith, 349 U.S. 1, 27 (1955); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 492–93 (1957); Reina v. United States, 364 U.S. 507, 511 (1960); United States v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 643, 649 (1961); Sperry v. Florida ex rel. Fla. Bar, 373 U.S. 379, 403 (1963); Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 151 (1971); Fry v. United States, 421 U.S. 542, 547 n.7 (1975).

[1] 426 U.S. 833 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[2] Id. at 841.

[3] Id. at 845.

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 832.

Tenth Amendment was the source of its protections for state sovereignty,[6] distinguishing Darby's dismissal of the Tenth Amendment as a "truism."[7]

Following National League of Cities (itself a 5-4 decision), the Court applied the doctrine in a series of opinions, many closely divided, over roughly a decade.[8] Although much of this law does not survive the subsequent overturning of National League of Cities, some of the Court's holdings in these cases may have continuing application. In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, for instance, the Court clarified that Tenth Amendment protections apply only when Congress regulates "States as States," and not merely the activities of private individuals or business.[9] In Bell v. New Jersey, the Court held that state sovereignty protections under the Tenth Amendment did not apply to "obligations voluntarily assumed as a condition of federal funding."[10] Several decisions also held that National League of Cities did not apply to congressional power under the Reconstruction Amendments.[11]

In 1985, the Court overruled National League of Cities in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority.[12] Justice Harry Blackmun's opinion for the Court concluded that National League of Cities' test, focusing on state authority over its "traditional governmental functions," had proven "both impractical and doctrinally barren."[13] With only passing reference to the Tenth Amendment, the Court in effect reverted to the Madisonian view of the Amendment reflected in United States v. Darby.[14]

Under Garcia, states retain their sovereign authority "only to the extent that the Constitution has not divested them of their original powers and transferred those powers to the Federal Government."[15] Garcia therefore held that application of the Fair Labor Standards Act's minimum wage and overtime provisions to state employees was within Congress's power under the Commerce Clause.

Taking a restrained view of judicial authority to invalidate federal laws, Garcia stated that the principal limits on congressional exercise of the commerce power against states are not judicial, but instead found in the federal government's structure and the political process.[16] [6] Id. at 843 ("The [Tenth] Amendment expressly declares the constitutional policy that Congress may not exercise power in a fashion that impairs the States' integrity or their ability to function effectively in a federal system." (quoting Fry v. United States, 421 U.S. 542, 547 n. 7 (1975)).

---

Although National League of Cities is not entirely clear that the Tenth Amendment is the basis for its doctrine, the dissent in that case, as well as subsequent Court decisions, treat the opinion as based on the Tenth Amendment. Id. at 862 (Justice William Brennan, dissenting); FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 776 (1982) (Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, dissenting); EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226, 235 (1983) (referring to "the doctrine of Tenth Amendment immunity articulated in National League of Cities v. Usery").

[7] Nat'l League of Cities, 426 at 842–43 ("[The Tenth Amendment] is not without significance." (quoting Fry, 421 U.S. at 547 n.7)).

[8] See, e.g., FERC, 456 U.S. 742; EEOC, 460 U.S. 226; see also United Transp. Union v. LIRR, 455 U.S. 678 (1982).

[9] 452 U.S. 264, 287 (1981); accord Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 330 (1981).

[10] 461 U.S. 773, 790 (1983). Cf. Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519, 577–82 (2012) (plurality opinion).

[11] Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 452–56 (1976); Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 291 (1977); Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of N.Y., 436 U.S. 658, 690 n.54 (1978); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 178–79 (1980); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 476–78 (1980) (plurality opinion of Burger, C.J.). Cf. Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 543–45 (2013).

[12] 469 U.S. 528 (1985). The issue was again decided by a 5-4 vote, with Justice Harry Blackmun's qualified acceptance of the National League of Cities approach having changed to a rejection.

[13] Id. at 557.

[14] 312 U.S. 100, 124 (1941); see Amdt10.3.3 Tenth Amendment and Darby. Madison's views were quoted by the Court in Garcia, 469 U.S. at 549.

[15] 469 U.S. at 549.

[16] Id. at 550–51.

Garcia did allow that there might be some "affirmative limits the constitutional structure might impose on federal action affecting the States," but concluded that "[t]hese cases do not require us to identify or define" them.[17]

Amdt10.3.5 Federal Power to Tax and Tenth Amendment

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In a distinct line of cases beginning in the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court relied on the Tenth Amendment to find that states (and related parties) were immune from certain federal taxes.[1] For example, in Collector v. Day, the Court held that an otherwise valid income tax could not, consistent with the Tenth Amendment, be levied upon the official salaries of state officers.[2]

In the twentieth century, the Supreme Court overturned Collector v Day[3] and limited much of this doctrine, although it may retain some vitality as to federal taxes directly imposed on states.[4] (The doctrine of intergovernmental tax immunity is explained within the Constitution Annotated's discussion of Congress's taxing power.[5])

Amdt10.4 Modern Doctrine

Amdt10.4.1 Modern Tenth Amendment Jurisprudence Generally

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

After reaching an ebb in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority,[1] the Tenth Amendment reemerged as a source of constitutional limits on congressional power in the 1990s. These modern cases rely less on the Amendment's text than on the constitutional system of federalism it embodies and confirms.[2] [17] Id. at 556. Beginning in the 1990s, the Court began to identify and define these affirmative limitations. See Amdt10.4.2 Anti-Commandeering Doctrine.

---

[1] This "intergovernmental tax immunity" doctrine traces its origin to the holding in McCulloch v. Maryland that the Supremacy Clause barred Maryland from taxing the Second Bank of the United States. See 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 436 (1819); see also Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444, 454 (1978).

[2] 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 113, 124 (1871), overruled by Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 486 (1939); see also, e.g., Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Tr. Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895), overruled by South Carolina v. Baker, 485 U.S. 505 (1988); New York v. United States, 326 U.S. 572 (1946).

[3] Graves, 306 U.S. at 486.

[4] See generally Baker, 485 U.S. at 523–24 (summarizing modern doctrine).

[5] See ArtI.S8.C1.1.5 Intergovernmental Tax Immunity Doctrine.

[1] 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[2] See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 157–58 (1992) (finding protection for state sovereignty against commandeering was "not derived from the text of the Tenth Amendment itself" but in how it "confirms that the power of the Federal Government is subject to limits"); accord Murphy v. NCAA, No. 16-476, slip op. at 15–16 (U.S. May 14, 2018). At times, the Court has described its anti-commandeering doctrine as an interpretation of the word "proper" under the Necessary and Proper Clause. See Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 923–24 (1997); Murphy, slip op. at 2 (Thomas, J., concurring); see generally ArtI.S8.C18.6 Meaning of Proper.

Amdt10.4.1
Modern Tenth Amendment Jurisprudence Generally

The following essays review three lines of case law. The first concerns the "anti-commandeering" principle of New York v. United States.[3] Under that doctrine, the federal government may not directly compel states "to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program."[4] Second, the Court has relied on the "fundamental principle of equal sovereignty" in recent voting rights cases.[5] Although the precise textual basis for the doctrine is unclear, the equal sovereignty doctrine is at least arguably founded on Tenth Amendment principles.[6] Finally, although the Court's modern Commerce Clause doctrine is primarily discussed elsewhere in Constitution Annotated,[7] this section briefly discusses those cases' invocations of the Tenth Amendment.

Amdt10.4.2 Anti-Commandeering Doctrine

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority,[1] the Supreme Court adopted a narrow conception of states' reserved powers under the Tenth Amendment. Following Garcia, the Court adopted a "clear statement" rule requiring an unambiguous statement of congressional intent to displace state authority, a rule first articulated in Gregory v. Ashcroft.[2] After noting the serious constitutional issues that would be raised by interpreting the Age Discrimination in Employment Act to apply to appointed state judges, Gregory explained that, because Garcia "constrained" consideration of "the limits that the state-federal balance places on Congress's powers," a plain statement rule was all the more necessary.[3] The Court stated: "[I]nasmuch as this Court in Garcia has left primarily to the political process the protection of the States against intrusive exercises of Congress's Commerce Clause powers, we must be absolutely certain that Congress intended such an exercise."[4]

The Court's 1992 decision in New York v. United States[5] signaled a continuing retreat from the narrow conception of state power adopted in Garcia and the genesis of the Supreme Court's "anti-commandeering" doctrine. The New York holding that Congress may not "commandeer" state regulatory processes by ordering states to enact or administer a federal regulatory program limited congressional power previously recognized in dictum.[6]

---

[3] 505 U.S. 144 (1992).

[4] Id. at 170 (quoting Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 288 (1981)).

[5] Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 544 (2013).

[6] See Leah M. Litman, Inventing Equal Sovereignty, 114 Mich. L. Rev. 1207, 1232 (2016).

[7] See ArtI.S8.C3.6.1 United States v. Lopez and Interstate Commerce Clause.

[1] 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[2] 501 U.S. 452 (1991).

[3] The Court left no doubt that it considered the constitutional issue to be serious: "[T]he authority of the people of the States to determine the qualifications of their most important government officials . . . is an authority that lies at 'the heart of representative government' [and] is a power reserved to the States under the Tenth Amendment and guaranteed them by [the Guarantee Clause]." Id. at 463. In the latter context, the Court's opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor cited Deborah Jones Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1988) and Michael W. McConnell, Federalism: Evaluating the Founders' Design, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1484 (1987) (also cited by the Court); and Van Alystyne, The Second Death of Federalism, 83 Mich. L. Rev. 1709 (1985).

[4] 501 U.S. at 464.

[5] 505 U.S. 144 (1992).

[6] See, e.g., Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 288 (1981); FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 765 (1982); South Carolina v. Baker, 485 U.S. 505, 513–15 (1988).

Language in New York seems more reminiscent of National League of Cities v. Usery[7] than of the Court's later Garcia decision. First, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's opinion declared that it makes no difference whether federalism constraints derive from the Tenth Amendment, or instead from a lack of power delegated to Congress under Article I: "the Tenth Amendment . . . directs us to determine . . . whether an incident of state sovereignty is protected by a limitation on an Article I power."[8] Second, the Court, without reference to Garcia, thoroughly repudiated Garcia's "structural" approach requiring states to look primarily to the political processes for protection. In rejecting arguments that New York's sovereignty could not have been infringed because its representatives participated in developing the compromise legislation and consented to its enactment, the Court declared: "The Constitution does not protect the sovereignty of States for the benefit of the States or State governments, [but instead] for the protection of individuals." Consequently, the Court reasoned, "State officials cannot consent to the enlargement of the powers of Congress beyond those enumerated in the Constitution."[9] The Court thus appeared to contemplate relaxation of Garcia's obstacles to federalism-based challenges.

Extending the principle applied in New York, the Court in Printz v. United States[10] held that Congress may not "circumvent" the prohibition on commandeering a state's regulatory processes "by conscripting the State's officers directly."[11] Printz struck down interim provisions of the Brady Handgun Violence Protection Act that required state and local law enforcement officers to conduct background checks on prospective handgun purchasers. In Printz, the Court noted:

> The Federal Government may neither issue directives requiring the States to address particular problems, nor command the States' officers . . . to administer or enforce a federal regulatory program. It matters not whether policymaking is involved, and no case-by-case weighing of the burdens or benefits is necessary; such commands are fundamentally incompatible with our constitutional system of dual sovereignty.[12]

In Reno v. Condon,[13] the Court distinguished New York and Printz in upholding the Driver's Privacy Protection Act of 1994 (DPPA), a federal law that restricted the disclosure and resale of personal information contained in the records of state motor vehicles departments. The Court returned to a principle articulated in South Carolina v. Baker that distinguished between laws that improperly seek to control the manner in which states regulate private parties, and those that merely regulate state activities directly.[14]

In Condon, the Court found that the DPPA did "not require the States in their sovereign capacities to regulate their own citizens," but rather "regulate[d] the States as the owners of

---

[7] 426 U.S. 833 (1976).

[8] 505 U.S. at 157. "If a power is delegated to Congress in the Constitution, the Tenth Amendment expressly disclaims any reservation of that power to the States . . . ." Id. at 156 (quoted with approval in Watters v. Wachovia Bank, N.A., 550 U.S. 1, 22 (2007) (holding a national bank's state-chartered subsidiary real estate lending business is subject to federal, not state, law)).

[9] 505 U.S. at 181, 182.

[10] 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[11] Id. at 935.

[12] Id.

[13] 528 U.S. 141 (2000).

[14] 485 U.S. 505, 514–15 (1988).

databases."[15] The Court saw no need to decide whether a federal law may regulate the states exclusively, because the DPPA was a law of general applicability that regulated private resellers of information as well as states.[16]

The Supreme Court's anti-commandeering cases have recognized parallels—as well as distinctions—between commandeering state legislatures and requiring states to implement policies as a condition of federal funding.[17] In both New York and Printz, the Court observed that Congress may attach conditions to federal funds disbursed under its Spending Clause power and thereby avoid anti-commandeering problems.[18] The Court's decision in National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius (NFIB) explored the limits of this power, holding that a federal spending condition unconstitutionally "coerced" state legislatures to adopt a federal regulatory program.[19]

In NFIB, which involved constitutional challenges to the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA),[20] several states challenged a provision that would have terminated a state's Medicaid funding if the state failed to expand Medicaid coverage as directed by the Act.[21] The Court held that the ACA's Medicaid expansion was an unconstitutional exercise of Congress's spending power.[22] Though his opinion analyzed the ACA's Medicaid expansion under the Spending Clause, Chief Justice John Roberts made repeated reference to the commandeering issues raised in New York and Printz.[23] While those two decisions both recognized the government's power to attach conditions to funds, Chief Justice Roberts averred that the distinction between permissible conditions and impermissible commandeering collapses "when the state has no choice" in whether to accept the conditions.[24] The states argued—and the Court agreed—that the Medicaid expansion's condition on noncompliance did not offer the states a true choice and was therefore akin to the types of coercion forbidden in New York and Printz.[25]

NFIB was not the first Supreme Court case to scrutinize federal spending conditions,[26] but the case was the only instance in which the Supreme Court has invalidated an exercise of Congress's Spending Clause power. Several factors played a role in Chief Justice Roberts's analysis. First, as both the Chief Justice and the dissenters observed, states faced losing a substantial part of their budgets.[27] Second, the Chief Justice concluded that the ACA's Medicaid expansion represented "a shift in kind, not merely degree" that states could not have

---

[15] Condon, 528 U.S. at 151.

[16] Id.

[17] See ArtI.S8.C1.2.1 Overview of Spending Clause.

[18] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 167 (1992); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 917 (1997).

[19] 567 U.S. 519, 580 (2012) (plurality opinion of Roberts, C.J.).

[20] Pub. L. No. 111–148, 124 Stat. 119 (2010).

[21] See 46 U.S.C. §§ 1396a (setting forth Medicaid requirements), 1396c (permitting the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to withhold Medicaid payments).

[22] NFIB, 567 U.S. at 580 (plurality opinion). Chief Justice Roberts's opinion with respect to the Medicaid expansion was joined by only three members of the Court, though four other Justices agreed that the ACA's Medicaid expansion was unconstitutionally coercive. See id. at 681 (Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito, JJ., dissenting).

[23] Id. at 577 (plurality opinion of Roberts, C.J.).

[24] Id. at 578.

[25] Id. at 579–80.

[26] See, e.g., South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203 (1987); Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1 (1981).

[27] NFIB, 567 U.S. at 581–82 (plurality opinion of Roberts, C.J.); id. at 682 (Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito, JJ., dissenting).

anticipated when they agreed to participate in Medicaid initially, despite Congress's express reservation of "the right to alter, amend, or repeal"[28] any aspect of Medicaid.[29]

Though NFIB explored the limits of Congress's power under the Spending Clause, the decision may be relevant to the development of anti-commandeering doctrine because it identifies a potential limit on what New York and Printz recognized as a constitutional alternative to commandeering.[30] Reframing an otherwise impermissible act of commandeering as a spending condition may be subject to challenge as unconstitutionally coercive, following the reasoning of Chief Justice Roberts and the four dissenting Justices.

The Supreme Court's most recent consideration of the anti-commandeering principle occurred in 2018 in Murphy v. NCAA.[31] In Murphy, Justice Samuel Alito, writing on behalf of the Court, invalidated on anti-commandeering grounds a provision in the Professional and Amateur Sports Protection Act (PASPA) that prohibited states from authorizing sports gambling schemes.[32] Noting the rule from New York and Printz that Congress lacks "the power to issue orders directly to the States,"[33] the Court concluded that PASPA's prohibition of state authorization of sports gambling violated the anti-commandeering rule by putting state legislatures under the "direct control of Congress."[34] In so concluding, Justice Alito rejected the argument that the anti-commandeering doctrine only applies to "affirmative" congressional commands, as opposed to when Congress prohibits certain state action.[35] Finding the distinction between affirmative requirements and prohibitions "empty," the Court held that both types of commands equally intrude on state sovereign interests.[36]

In holding that Congress cannot command a state legislature to refrain from enacting a law, the Murphy Court reconciled its holding with two related doctrines.[37] First, the Court noted that while cases like Garcia, Baker, and Condon establish that the anti-commandeering doctrine "does not apply when Congress evenhandedly regulates activity in which both States and private actors engage,"[38] PASPA's anti-authorization provision was, in contrast, solely directed at the activities of state legislatures.[39] Second, the Court rejected the argument that PASPA constituted a "valid preemption provision" under the Supremacy Clause.[40] While acknowledging that the "language used by Congress and this Court" with respect to preemption is sometimes imprecise,[41] Justice Alito viewed "every form of preemption" to be

[28] 42 U.S.C. § 1304.

[29] NFIB, 567 U.S. at 583 (plurality opinion of Roberts, C.J.).

[30] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 167 (1992); Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 917 (1997).

[31] Murphy v. NCAA, No. 16-476, slip op. at 17–24 (U.S. May 14, 2018).

[32] See Pub. L. No. 102–559, § 2(a), 106 Stat. 4227, 4228 (1992) (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 3702).

[33] See Murphy, No.16-476, slip op. at 17–18. Murphy offered three justifications for the anti-commandeering rule: (1) to protect liberty by ensuring a "healthy balance of power" between the states and the federal government; (2) to promote political accountability by the United States avoiding the blurring of which government is to credit or blame for a particular policy; (3) to prevent Congress from shifting the costs of regulation to the states. Id. at 17–18.

[34] Id. at 18.

[35] Id.

[36] Id.

[37] Id. at 17–18.

[38] Id. at 18.

[39] Id. at 18–19. The Court also distinguished two other cases, Hodel v. Va. Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264 (1981), and FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742 (1982), in which the Court rejected anti-commandeering challenges to federal statutes. See Murphy, No. 16-476, slip op. at 17–19.

[40] See Murphy, No. 16-476, slip op. Murphy identified two requirements for a preemption provision to be deemed valid: (1) the provision must represent an exercise of power conferred on Congress by the Constitution; (2) the provision must regulate private actors and not the states. Id.

[41] Id. at 1480–81.

based on a federal law that regulates the conduct of private actors—either by directly regulating private entities or by conferring a federal right to be free from state regulation.[42] In contrast, PASPA's anti-authorization provision did not "confer any federal rights on private actors interested in conducting sports gambling operations" or "impose any federal restrictions on private actors."[43] As a result, the Murphy Court viewed the challenged provision to be a direct command to the states in violation of the anti-commandeering rule.[44]

Amdt10.4.3 Equal Sovereignty Doctrine

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In two recent voting rights cases, the Supreme Court has invoked "the fundamental principle of equal sovereignty" as a limitation on congressional power.[1] Because the United States "was and is a union of states, equal in power, dignity and authority,"[2] the equal sovereignty principle limits Congress's ability to enact legislation that subjects different states to unequal burdens, at least without a sufficient justification.[3]

Whether the equal sovereignty principle is based on the Tenth Amendment, or some other constitutional provision, is unclear from the Court's cases. Although the Constitution explicitly mandates equal treatment of states in some particular contexts,[4] no provision of the Constitution explicitly requires Congress to treat states equally as a general matter.[5] In cases involving the admission of new states, the Supreme Court in the nineteenth century developed the "equal footing" doctrine,[6] which generally requires that Congress admit new states on equal terms with the original states.[7] It thus forbids Congress from imposing "restrictions upon a new state which deprive it of equality with other members of the Union."[8] Until recently, the applicability of that doctrine outside the state admission context was

[42] Id. at 1481.

[43] Id. (noting that if a private actor started a sports gambling operation, either with or without state authorization, PASPA's anti-authorization provision would not be violated).

[44] Id. The Court ultimately invalidated PASPA in its entirety, holding that other provisions of the law that regulated private conduct were inseverable from the anti-authorization provision and therefore could not exist independently from the unconstitutional provision. See id. at 1481–84.

[1] Nw. Austin Mun. Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U.S. 193, 203 (2009); Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 544 (2013).

[2] Shelby Cnty., 570 U.S. at 544 (citing Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 567 (1911)).

[3] Id. at 542 ("[A] departure from the fundamental principle of equal sovereignty requires a showing that a statute's disparate geographic coverage is sufficiently related to the problem that it targets." (quoting Nw. Austin, 557 U.S. at 203)).

[4] See, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 1 ("The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State . . . ."); U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (requiring "Duties, Imposts, and Excises" to be "uniform throughout the United States"); U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4 (requiring "an uniform Rule of Naturalization" and "uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States"); U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 6 ("No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another.").

[5] See generally Leah M. Litman, Inventing Equal Sovereignty, 114 Mich. L. Rev. 1207, 1230–32 (2016); Thomas Colby, In Defense of the Equal Sovereignty Principle, 65 Duke L.J. 1087, 1099 (2016).

[6] See ArtIV.S3.C1.1 Overview of Admissions (New States) Clause.

[7] Lessee of Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212, 223 (1845).

[8] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 567 (1911).

questionable, as South Carolina v. Katzenbach observed that "[t]he doctrine of the equality of States . . . applies only to the terms upon which States are admitted to the Union."[9]

In Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District Number One v. Holder[10] and Shelby County v. Holder,[11] however, the Court applied the equal sovereignty principle more broadly. Both cases concerned the constitutionality of Sections 4 and 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). To remedy the racial discrimination in voting endemic during the Jim Crow era, Section 4 of the VRA contained a "coverage formula" identifying jurisdictions with a history of racial discrimination against voters, while Section 5 required those jurisdictions to obtain "preclearance" from the Department of Justice or a federal court before changing their voting procedures.[12] As a result, jurisdictions covered by Section 4 were subject to more stringent requirements when seeking to change their voting laws, compared to other states.

Although the Court upheld the constitutionality of this arrangement in Katzenbach,[13] Northwest Austin observed that the VRA's preclearance requirements and coverage formula impose "substantial federalism costs"[14] that have become tougher to justify given improved conditions since 1965.[15] The Court observed that the coverage formula, by differentiating between the states, departs from "the fundamental principle of equal sovereignty," and raises "serious constitutional questions."[16] Ultimately, however, the Court resolved Northwest Austin on statutory grounds.[17]

Four years later, Shelby County resolved the constitutional question left open in Northwest Austin, relying on the equal sovereignty principle to strike down the VRA's coverage formula as unconstitutional.[18] Under the test used in Shelby County, "a departure from the fundamental principle of equal sovereignty requires a showing that a statute's disparate geographic coverage is sufficiently related to the problem that it targets."[19] The Court observed that in the nearly fifty years since the VRA was first upheld in Katzenbach, "things have changed dramatically," pointing to increases in African-American voter registration rates and turnout in covered jurisdictions.[20] As a result, and in contrast to the "exceptional conditions" present in Katzenbach, current conditions did not justify applying the preclearance formula to only certain states and counties.[21]

As the Court has not decided an equal sovereignty challenge since Shelby County, it remains unclear whether and how the doctrine will apply outside of the voting rights context.

---

[9] South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 328–29 (1966) (citing Coyle, 221 U.S. 559).

[10] 557 U.S. 193, 203 (2009).

[11] 570 U.S. 529, 544 (2013).

[12] Id. at 537–38.

[13] 383 U.S. at 328–83; accord Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526 (1973); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156 (1980); Lopez v. Monterey Cnty., 525 U.S. 266 (1999).

[14] Nw. Austin, 557 U.S. at 202 (quoting Lopez, 525 U.S. at 282).

[15] Id. at 202 ("Things have changed in the South."), 203 ("[T]he statute's coverage formula is based on data that is now more than 35 years old, and there is considerable evidence that it fails to account for current political conditions.").

[16] Id. at 203–04.

[17] Id. at 206–11.

[18] Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 557 (2013).

[19] Id. at 542 (quoting Nw. Austin, 557 U.S. at 203).

[20] Id. at 547–48.

[21] Id. at 557.

Amdt10.4.4 Commerce Clause and Tenth Amendment

Tenth Amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In 1995, the Court in United States v. Lopez[1] struck down a federal statute prohibiting possession of a gun at or near a school, rejecting an argument that possession of firearms in school zones can be punished under the Commerce Clause because of its economic effects.[2] Accepting that rationale, the Court said, would eliminate the "distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local," would convert Congress's commerce power into a general police power of the sort retained by the states, and would undermine the first principle that the federal government is one of enumerated and limited powers.[3]

Application of the same principle led five years later to the Court's decision in United States v. Morrison[4] invalidating a provision of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) that created a federal cause of action for victims of gender-motivated violence. The Court concluded that Congress may not regulate "noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce."[5] "[W]e can think of no better example of the police power, which the Founders denied the National Government and reposed in the States, than the suppression of violent crime and vindication of its victims."[6]

In contrast to Lopez and Morrison, the Court in Gonzales v. Raich upheld Congress's authority under the Commerce Clause to prohibit the intrastate cultivation and use of medical marijuana, based on its aggregate effect on interstate commerce.[7] Raich distinguished Lopez and Morrison as regulations of noneconomic activity,[8] relying mainly on older Commerce Clause precedents.[9] The majority in Raich referenced the Tenth Amendment only obliquely through a citation to United States v. Darby,[10] while the dissenters did so more directly, arguing this application of federal law unconstitutionally encroached on state police powers.[11]

In the 2012 case National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, the Court held that Congress's Commerce Clause power could not be used to compel individuals to engage in commercial activity.[12] As a result, the "individual mandate" of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, which required most uninsured individuals to buy health insurance or pay a penalty,[13] was beyond Congress's Commerce Clause power.[14] On route to this holding, the

---

[1] 514 U.S. 549 (1995).

[2] Id. at 564–65.

[3] Id. at 552, 567–68.

[4] 529 U.S. 598 (2000).

[5] Id. at 617.

[6] Id. at 618.

[7] 545 U.S. 1, 22 (2005).

[8] Id. at 25.

[9] Id. at 17–21 (discussing Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942)).

[10] Id. at 29 ("[S]tate action cannot circumscribe Congress's plenary commerce power." (citing United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 114 (1941))).

[11] Id. at 50 (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("It will not do to say that Congress may regulate noncommercial activity simply because it may have an effect on the demand for commercial goods . . . . We have already rejected the result that would follow—a federal police power." (citing Lopez, 514 U.S. at 564)); id. at 66 (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("Here, Congress has encroached on States' traditional police powers to define the criminal law and to protect the health, safety, and welfare of their citizens.").

[12] Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519, 552 (2012) (plurality opinion of Roberts, C.J.).

[13] Id. at 539.

Court noted that Congress's enumerated powers "must be read carefully to avoid creating a general federal authority akin to the police power," invoking the Tenth Amendment and related federalism principles.[15]

[14] Id. at 558. The Court ultimately upheld the individual mandate under Congress's taxing power. Id. at 561–63.

[15] Id. at 535–36.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT SUITS AGAINST STATES

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT
SUITS AGAINST STATES

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT—SUITS AGAINST STATES

Amdt11.1 Overview of Eleventh Amendment, Suits Against States

The Eleventh Amendment is a vital element of federal jurisdiction that "go[es] to the very heart of [the] federal system and affect[s] the allocation of power between the United States and the several states."[1] It prevents federal courts from construing their judicial power to allow states to be sued by citizens of another state or by foreign states or their citizens or subjects. The Eleventh Amendment was adopted in response to the Supreme Court's 1793 decision in Chisholm v. Georgia[2] in which the court allowed a suit by a citizen of South Carolina to proceed against the State of Georgia. The Eleventh Amendment resolved uncertainty over the reach of federal judicial power, which had arisen during the Constitution's ratification.

Amdt11.2 Historical Background on Eleventh Amendment

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

During the ratification debates, opponents of the proposed Constitution expressed concern that Article III, Section 2, Clause 1—"The judicial Power shall extend . . . to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens, or Subjects"[1]—could subject a state to suits in federal courts without the state's consent. These concerns were met with conflicting responses—some agreeing and others stating that the provision only applied when a state was the plaintiff.[2]

In 1789, Congress, enacted the Judiciary Act, providing the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over suits between states and citizens of other states.[3] Alexander Chisholm, a citizen of South Carolina, sued the state of Georgia under the Act to recover under a contract for supplies executed with Georgia during the Revolution. In the Supreme Court's 1793 decision, Chisholm v. Georgia,[4] four of the five Justices agreed that a state could be sued under the Article III jurisdictional provision and that the Supreme Court properly had original

---

[1] C. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts § 48 at 286 (4th ed. 1983).

[2] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793).

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] The Convention adopted this provision largely as it came from the Committee on Detail, without recorded debate. 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 423–25 (Max Farrand ed., 1937). In the Virginia ratifying convention, George Mason, who had refused to sign the proposed Constitution, objected to making states subject to suit, 3 Jonathan Elliot, Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 526–27 (1836), but both James Madison and John Marshall (the latter had not been a delegate at Philadelphia) denied states could be made party defendants, id. at 533, 555–56, while Edmund Randolph (who had been a delegate, as well as a member of the Committee of Detail) granted that states could be and ought to be subject to suit. Id. at 573. James Wilson, a delegate and member of the Committee on Detail, seemed to say in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention that states would be subject to suit. 2 id. at 491. Hamilton, in The Federalist No. 81 (Alexander Hamilton), also denied state suability.

[3] Ch. 20, § 13, 1 Stat. 80 (1789). For a thorough consideration of passage of the Act itself, see Julius Goebel, History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801, at 457–508 (1971).

[4] Chishom v.Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793).

jurisdiction of the case pursuant to section 13 of the Judiciary Act.[5] The fifth, Justice James Iredell, reasoned that, as the common law barred suits against a sovereign, this principle applied to the states in their capacity as sovereigns and, consequently, states could not be subject to suit without their consent.[6]

By construing the Constitution to provide for a state to be sued by a citizen of another state in Chisholm,[7] the Supreme Court led Georgia and the other states to amend the Constitution. As a result, at the first meeting of Congress following the decision, the Eleventh Amendment was proposed by an overwhelming vote of both Houses and ratified with "vehement speed."[8] As proposed by Congress and ratified by the states, the Eleventh Amendment was directed at overturning the result in Chisholm and preventing suits against states by citizens of other states or by citizens or subjects of foreign jurisdictions.[9] It did not, as other possible versions of the Amendment might have done, altogether bar suits against states in the federal courts.[10] That is, the Eleventh Amendment barred suits against states with reference to their status as a plaintiff but did not address suits potentially based on subject matter.[11]

Amdt11.3 Early Jurisprudence on Eleventh Amendment

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Early Supreme Court decisions examined the Eleventh Amendment, although oftentimes in dictum.[1] In Cohens v. Virginia,[2] Chief Justice John Marshall, writing for the Court, ruled that prosecution of a writ of error to review a state court judgment alleged to violate the Constitution or laws of the United States did not commence or prosecute a suit against the

---

[5] Goebel, supra note 3, at 726–34.

[6] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 435 (1793) (Iredell, J.) ("No other part of the common law of England, it appears to me, can have any reference to this subject, but that part of it which prescribes remedies against the crown. Every State in the Union in every instance where its sovereignty has not been delegated to the United States, I consider to be completely sovereign, as the United States are in respect to the power surrendered."). Justice James Iredell noted that the only circumstance under which the common law allowed such suits to proceed was when the sovereign consented to the suit. He said: "Thus, it appears, that in England even in case of a private debt contracted by the King, in his own person, there is no remedy but by petition, which must receive his express sanction, otherwise, there can be no proceeding upon it." Id. at 445.

[7] Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793).

[8] The phrase is Justice Felix Frankfurter's, from Larson v. Domestic & Foreign Commerce Corp., 337 U.S. 682, 708 (1949) (dissenting), a federal sovereign immunity case. The amendment was proposed on March 4, 1794, when it passed the House and it was ratified on February 7, 1795, when the twelfth state acted, there then being fifteen states in the Union.

[9] Hollingsworth, et al. v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798) ("[T]he [Eleventh] amendment being constitutionally adopted, there could not be exercised in any jurisdiction, in any case, past or future, in which a State was sued by the citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.").

[10] Goebel, supra note 3, at 736.

[11] Party status is one part of the Article III grant of jurisdiction, as in diversity of citizenship of the parties; subject matter jurisdiction is the other part, as in federal question or admiralty jurisdiction.

[1] Justice Bushrod Washington, on Circuit, held in United States v. Bright, 24 F. Cas. 1232 (No. 14647) (C.C.D. Pa. 1809), that the Eleventh Amendment's reference to "any suit in law or equity" excluded admiralty cases, so that states were subject to suits in admiralty. During this period, the Court did not rule on this understanding, see Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 110, 124 (1828); 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 560–61 (1833); United States v. Peters, 9 U.S. 115 (1809); Ex parte Madrazo, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 627 (1833). In 1921, the Court held it to be in error in Ex parte New York (No. 1), 256 U.S. 490 (1921).

[2] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821).

state. Instead, it merely continued a suit that the state had commenced, and thus could be brought in federal court under section 25 of the Judiciary Act.[3] In his Cohens opinion, the Chief Justice attributed the Eleventh Amendment's adoption to concerns about creditors being able to sue states in federal courts for payment rather than general objections about states being subject to suit without their consent.[4] He further stated his view that the Eleventh Amendment did not bar suits against states under federal question jurisdiction[5] or reach suits against a state by its own citizens.[6]

Marshall further developed his Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence in Osborn v. Bank of the United States.[7] Osborn concerned whether a state had authority to tax the Bank of the United States and whether federal courts could hear a suit against state officers seeking to collect a state tax from the bank notwithstanding the Eleventh Amendment.[8] In resolving the dispute in favor of the bank, Marshall distinguished between suits against states and suits against state officers, ruling that the Eleventh Amendment barred suits where the state was the party of record rather than suits where the state merely had an interest in the result.[9] Marshall further reasoned that a state officer cannot violate the Constitution under the cover of carrying out a state function.[10] Consequently, Marshall's Osborn ruling embodied two [3] 1 Stat. 73, 85.

[4] Cohens, 19 U.S. at 406. Justice Marshall stated: "It is a part of our history that, at the adoption of the constitution, all the states were greatly indebted; and the apprehension that these debts might be prosecuted in the federal courts, formed a very serious objection to that instrument. Suits were instituted; and the court maintained its jurisdiction. . . . That its motive was not to maintain the sovereignty of a state from the degradation supposed to attend a compulsory appearance before the tribunal of the nation, may be inferred from the terms of the amendment. It does not comprehend controversies between two or more states, or between a state and a foreign state. The jurisdiction of the court still extends to these cases: and in these, a state may still be sued. . . . Those who were inhibited from commencing a suit against a state, or from prosecuting one which might be commenced before the adoption of the amendment, were persons who might probably be its creditors. There was not much reason to fear that foreign or sister states would be creditors to any considerable amount, and there was reason to retain the jurisdiction of the court in those cases, because it might be essential to the preservation of peace. The amendment, therefore, extended to suits commenced or prosecuted by individuals, but not to those brought by states." 19 U.S. at 406–07.

[5] Id. Justice John Marshall stated: "The powers of the Union, on the great subjects of war, peace and commerce, and on many others, are in themselves limitations of the sovereignty of the states; but in addition to these, the sovereignty of the states is surrendered, in many instances, where the surrender can only operate to the benefit of the people, and where, perhaps, no other power is conferred on Congress than a conservative power to maintain the principles established in the constitution . . . .[A]re we at liberty to insert in this general grant, an exception of those cases in which a state may be a party? Will the spirit of the constitution justify this attempt to control its words? We think it will not. We think a case arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, is cognizable in the courts of the Union, whoever may be the parties to that case." 19 U.S. at 382–83.

[6] Justice John Marshall stated: "If this writ of error be a suit, in the sense of the eleventh amendment, it is not a suit commenced or prosecuted 'by a citizen of another state, or by a citizen or subject of any foreign state.' It is not, then, within the amendment, but is governed entirely by the constitution as originally framed, and we have already seen, that in its origin, the judicial power was extended to all cases arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, without respect to parties." 19 U.S. at 412 (citations omitted).

[7] 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824)

[8] The Bank of the United States was initially treated as if it were a private citizen, rather than as the United States itself, and hence a suit by it was a diversity suit by a corporation, as if it were a suit by the individual shareholders. Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, 9 U.S. (5 Cr.) 61 (1809).

[9] Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. 738, 857 (1824) ("[T]he eleventh amendment, which restrains the jurisdiction granted by the constitution over suits against States, is, of necessity, limited to those suits in which a State is a party of record.").

[10] Id. at 868. For cases following Osborn, see Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall 203, 220 (1872) ("In deciding who are parties to the suit the court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the State a party, although her law may have prompted his action and the State may stand behind him as the real party in interest."); McComb v. Board of Liquidation, 92 U.S. 531 540, (1875) ("A State, without its consent, cannot be sued by an individual; and a court cannot substitute its own discretion for that of executive officers in matters belonging to the proper jurisdiction of the latter. But it has been well settled, that, when a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance; and when such duty is threatened to be violated by some positive principles, one of which the Court soon abandoned and one of which has survived. The former holding was that a suit is not against a state unless the state is a named party of record.[11] The latter holding provides that a state official possesses no official capacity when acting illegally and consequently can derive no protection from suit when acting under an unconstitutional state statute.[12]

Amdt11.4 Postbellum Jurisprudence on Eleventh Amendment

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Following the Civil War, the Supreme Court refined Chief Justice John Marshall's understanding of the scope of the Eleventh Amendment articulated in Osborn. In 1875, Congress effectively gave federal courts general federal question jurisdiction,[1] at a time when a large number of states in the South were defaulting on their revenue bonds in violation of the Contract Clause of the Constitution.[2] As bondholders sought relief in federal courts, the Supreme Court further developed its Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence in a series of cases, finding that the Eleventh Amendment precluded states from being sued by citizens of other states or by citizens or subjects of foreign states even if the case had arisen under the Constitution or laws of the United States.[3] The Court further found that the Eleventh Amendment barred suits that were filed against state officers, rather than the state itself, if the state was indispensable to the suit.

While Chief Justice John Marshall's 1821 Osborn decision had permitted the Bank of the United States to sue the officers of the state rather than the state itself and thereby avoided official act, any person who will sustain personal injury thereby, for which adequate compensation cannot be had at law, may have an injunction to prevent it. . . . In either case, if the officer plead the authority of an unconstitutional law for the non-performance or violation of his duty, it will not prevent the issuing of the writ. An unconstitutional law will be treated by the courts as null and void.").

---

[11] 22 U.S. at 850–58. For a reassertion of the Chief Justice's view of the limited effect of the Amendment, see id. at 857–58. But compare id. at 849. The holding was repudiated in Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, wherein Marshall conceded that the suit had been brought against the governor solely in his official capacity and with the design of forcing him to exercise his official powers. Georgia v. Madrazo, 26 U.S. 110, 124 (1828) ("[W]here the chief magistrate of a State is sued, not by his name, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, we think the State itself may be considered as a party on the record."). In determining whether a suit is prosecuted against a state "the Court will look behind and through the nominal parties on the record to ascertain who are the real parties to the suit." In re Ayers, 123 U.S. 443, 487 (1887). See also Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U.S. 270, 287 (1885) ("[T]he question whether a suit is within the prohibition of the eleventh Amendment is not always determined by reference to the nominal parties on the record.").

[12] 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824).

[1] Act of March 3, 1875, ch. 137, § 1, 18 Stat. 470 ("That the Circuit Courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states; of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority."). Article III, Section 2, Clause 1, of the Constitution provides "the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in Law and Equity arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made under their Authority," federal courts have jurisdiction over cases concerning the Constitution or federal law. See discussion under "Development of Federal Question Jurisdiction," supra.

[2] See, e.g., J.V. Orth, The Eleventh Amendment and the North Carolina State Debt, 59 N.C. L. Rev. 747 (1981); J.V. Orth, The Fair Fame and Name of Louisiana: The Eleventh Amendment and the End of Reconstruction, 2 Tul. Law. 2 (1980); J. V. Orth, The Virginia State Debt and the Judicial Power of the United States, in Ambivalent Legacy: a Legal History of the South 106 (D. Bodenhamer & J. Ely eds., 1983).

[3] U.S. Const. Art. III Sec. 2, Clause 1 "(The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority . . . .").

the Eleventh Amendment proscription, the postbellum Court adopted a more nuanced approach to the problem. In Louisiana v Jumel,[4] and Hagood v. Southern,[5] the Court held that plaintiffs could not seek relief from a state's bond default by suing the state's officers in federal court. In these cases, the Court reasoned that the party was, to all extents and purposes, the state and not the officers who acted on its behalf. In Hans v. Louisiana, the Court summarized its findings in these cases, stating "This court held that the suits were virtually against the States themselves and were consequently violative of the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution and could not be maintained. It was not denied that they presented cases arising under the Constitution, but, notwithstanding that, they were held to be prohibited by the amendment referred to."[6] The Jumel Court noted, however, that the outcome would have been different had the state agreed to the federal court's jurisdiction.[7] Similarly, in Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick Railroad, the Court found that if a state was an indispensable party to a suit, the Court could not take the case even if the state itself was not sued.[8]

In In re Ayres, a federal court cited the Attorney General of Virginia for contempt when he disobeyed a federal court's restraining order barring him from complying with a state law to pursue judgment against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which had sought to pay its state taxes with possibly spurious state-issued coupons. The Court granted a writ of habeas corpus filed by the Attorney General and concluded that the proceeding, which had resulted in his imprisonment, was effectively a suit against the State and thus a federal court did not have jurisdiction to entertain it.[9] In dicta, however, the Court clarified that suits could be pursued against officers of a state when their action violated the Constitution or federal law. The Court stated:

> Nor need it be apprehended that the construction of the eleventh Amendment, applied in this case, will in anywise embarrass or obstruct the execution of the laws of the United States in cases where officers of a State are guilty of acting in violation of them under color of its authority . . . .Nothing can be interposed between the individual and the obligation he owes to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, which can shield or defend him from their just authority . . . . If therefore, an individual acting under the assumed authority of a State, as one of its officers, and under color of its [4] 107 U.S. 711, 721 (1882) ("The question, then, is whether the contract can be enforced, notwithstanding the Constitution, by coercing the agents and officers of the State, whose authority has been withdraw in violation of the contract, without the State itself in its political capacity being a party to the proceedings.") .

[5] 117 U.S. 52, 67 (1886) ("Though not nominally a party to the record, it is the real and only party in interest, the nominal defendants being the officers and agents of the State, having no personal interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and defending only as representing the State . . . . The State is not only the real party to the controversy, but the real party against which relief is sought by the suit, and the suit is, therefore, substantially within the prohibition of the eleventh amendment . . . .")

[6] Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1, 10 (1890).

[7] Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U.S. 711, 728 (1882) ("When a State submits itself, without reservation, to the jurisdiction of a court in a particular case, that jurisdiction may be used to give full effect to what the State has by its act of submission allowed to be done; . . . But this is very far from authorizing the courts, when a State cannot be sued, to set up its jurisdiction over the officers in charge of the public moneys, so as to control them as against the political power in their administration of the finances of the State.").

[8] Cunningham v. Macon and Brunswick R.R. 109 U.S. 446, 451 (1883) ("[W]henever it can be clearly seen that the State is an indispensable party to enable the court, according to the rules which govern its procedure, to grant the relief sought, it will refuse to take jurisdiction.")

[9] 123 U.S. 443, 505 (1887) ("[B]y virtue of the eleventh Amendment to the Constitution, there being no remedy by a suit against the State, the contract is substantially without sanction, except that which arises out of the honor and good faith of the State itself, and these are not subject to coercion.").

laws, comes into conflict with the superior authority of a valid law of the United States, he is stripped of his representative character, and subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct.[10]

Amdt11.5 Modern Doctrine

Amdt11.5.1 General Scope of State Sovereign Immunity

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

In its 1890 decision, Hans v. Louisiana, the Supreme Court adopted Justice James Iredell's position in Chisholm v. Georgia, that the states, as sovereigns, were immune from suit by their citizens under long-standing principles grounded in the common law.[1] In Hans v. Louisiana,[2] a resident of Louisiana brought a suit against that state in federal court under federal question jurisdiction, alleging a violation of the Contract Clause in the state's repudiation of its obligation to pay interest on certain bonds. Admitting that the Amendment on its face prohibited only entertaining a suit against a state by citizens of another state, or citizens or subjects of a foreign state, the Court reasoned that the scope of the Eleventh Amendment was informed by the scope of Article III, Section 2, Clause 1, which provided federal courts jurisdiction over suits between a state and citizens of another state and foreign States, citizens or subjects. The court noted that the Eleventh Amendment was a result of the "shock of surprise throughout the country" at the Chisholm decision, which contravened long-established common law precedent that a sovereign cannot be sued absent its consent, and reflected the general consensus that the decision was wrong, and that federal jurisdiction did not extend to making defendants of unwilling states in lawsuits brought by individuals.[3]

In the Hans Court's view, the Eleventh Amendment reversed an erroneous decision and restored the proper interpretation of the Constitution. Delivering the Court's opinion, Justice Joseph Bradley stated: "The truth is, that the cognizance of suits and actions unknown to the law, and forbidden by the law, was not contemplated by the Constitution when establishing the judicial power of the United States. The suability of a State without its consent was a thing unknown to the law."[4] The Court reasoned that the Eleventh Amendment's silence on whether a citizen of a state could sue that state should not be construed as permitting such suits. Instead "the manner in which [Chisholm] was received by the country, the adoption of the Eleventh Amendment, the light of history and the reason of the thing,"[5] led the Court unanimously to hold that states could not be sued by their own citizens on grounds arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

---

[10] Ex parte Ayers, 123 U.S. 443, 507 (1887).

[1] 134 U.S. 1 (1890).

[2] Id. at 11.

[3] Id. at 13–14.

[4] Id. at 15, 16.

[5] 134 U.S. at 18. The Court acknowledged that Chief Justice John Marshall's opinion in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 382–83, 406–07, 410–12 (1821), was to the contrary, but observed that the language was unnecessary to the decision and thus dictum, "and though made by one who seldom used words without due reflection, ought not to outweigh the important considerations referred to which lead to a different conclusion." 134 U.S. at 20.

In line with Hans, the Court held, in Ex parte New York (No. 1),[6] that, absent its consent, a state was immune to suit in admiralty, the Eleventh Amendment's reference to "any suit in law or equity" notwithstanding. Writing for the Court, Justice Mahlon Pitney stated: "That a State may not be sued without its consent is a fundamental rule of jurisprudence . . . of which the Amendment is but an exemplification . . . . It is true the Amendment speaks only of suits in law or equity; but this is because the Amendment was the outcome of a purpose to set aside the effect of the decision of this court in Chisholm v. Georgia from which it naturally came to pass that the language of the Amendment was particularly phrased so as to reverse the construction adopted in that case."[7] Just as Hans v. Louisiana had demonstrated the "impropriety of construing the Amendment" so as to permit federal question suits against a state, Justice Mahlon Pitney reasoned, "it seems to us equally clear that it cannot with propriety be construed to leave open a suit against a State in the admiralty jurisdiction by individuals, whether its own citizens or not."[8]

The Court has continued to rely on Hans[9] although support for it has not been universal.[10] In 1996, the Court further solidified Hans in Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida,[11] holding that Congress lacks power under Article I to abrogate state immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. And, in 1999, the Court ruled in Alden v. Maine[12] that the broad principle of sovereign immunity reflected in the Eleventh Amendment bars suits against states in state courts as well as federal.

Having previously reserved the question of whether federal statutory rights could be enforced in state courts,[13] the Court in Alden v. Maine[14] held that states could also assert Eleventh Amendment "sovereign immunity" in their own courts. Recognizing that the application of the Eleventh Amendment, which limits only the federal courts, was a "misnomer"[15] as applied to state courts, the Court nonetheless concluded that the principles of common law sovereign immunity applied absent "compelling evidence" that the states had surrendered such by ratifying the Constitution. Although this immunity is subject to the same limitations as apply in federal courts, the Court's decision effectively limited applying

---

[6] 256 U.S. 490 (1921).

[7] Id. at 497–98.

[8] Id. at 498. See also Florida Dep't of State v. Treasure Salvors, 458 U.S. 670 (1982); Welch v. Texas Dep't of Highways and Transp., 483 U.S. 468 (1987).

[9] E.g., Pennhurst State School & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 97–103 (1984) (opinion of the Court by Justice Lewis Powell); Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 237–40, 243–44 n.3 (1985) (opinion of the Court by Justice Lewis Powell); Welch v. Texas Dep't of Highways & Pub. Transp., 483 U.S. 468, 472–74, 478–95 (1987) (plurality opinion of Justice Lewis Powell); Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1, 29 (1989) (Justice Antonin Scalia concurring in part and dissenting in part); Dellmuth v. Muth, 491 U.S. 223, 227–32 (1989) (opinion of the Court by Justice Anthony Kennedy); Hoffman v. Connecticut Dep't of Income Maintenance, 492 U.S. 96, 101 (1989) (plurality opinion of Justice Byron White); id. at 105 (concurring opinions of Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Antonin Scalia); Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corp. v. Feeney, 495 U.S. 299, 305 (1990) (opinion of the Court by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor).

[10] E.g., Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 246 (1985) (dissenting); Welch v. Texas Dep't of Highways & Pub. Transp., 483 U.S. 468, 496 (1987) (dissenting); Dellmuth v. Muth, 491 U.S. 223, 233 (1989) (dissenting); Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corp. v. Feeney, 495 U.S. 299, 309 (1990) (concurring). Joining Justice William Brennan were Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun, and John Stevens. See also Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1, 23 (1989) (Justice Stevens concurring).

[11] 517 U.S. 44 (1996).

[12] 527 U.S. 706 (1999).

[13] Employees of the Dep't of Public Health and Welfare v. Department of Public Health and Welfare, 411 U.S. 279, 287 (1973). 16. 527 U.S. 706 (1999).

[14] 527 U.S. 706 (1999).

[15] 527 U.S. at 713.

significant portions of federal law to state governments.[16] Both Seminole Tribe and Alden were 5-4 decisions with four dissenting Justices maintaining that Hans was wrongly decided.

This split continued with Federal Maritime Commission v. South Carolina State Ports Authority,[17] which held that state sovereign immunity also applies to quasi-judicial proceedings in federal agencies. In this case, the operator of a cruise ship devoted to gambling had been denied entry to the Port of Charleston, and subsequently filed a complaint with the Federal Maritime Commission, alleging a violation of the Shipping Act of 1984.[18] Justice Stephen Breyer, writing for the four dissenting Justices, emphasized the executive (as opposed to judicial) nature of such agency adjudications, noting that the ultimate enforcement of such proceedings in federal court was exercised by a federal agency (as is allowed under the doctrine of sovereign immunity). The majority, however, while admitting to a "relatively barren historical record," presumed that when a proceeding was "unheard of" at the time of the founding of the Constitution, it could not subsequently be applied in derogation of a "State's dignity" within our system of federalism.[19]

Amdt11.5.2 Nature of States' Immunity

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Hans v. Louisiana and Ex parte New York note that Chisholm was erroneously decided and that the Amendment's intent was to restore the "original understanding" that a state could not be sued without its consent, and that nothing in the Constitution, including Article III's grants of federal court jurisdiction, was intended to provide otherwise. In Edelman v. Jordan,[1] the Court held that a state could properly raise its Eleventh Amendment defense on appeal after having defended and lost on the merits in the trial court. The Court stated: "[I]t has been well settled . . . that the Eleventh Amendment defense sufficiently partakes of the nature of a jurisdictional bar so that it need not be raised in the trial court."[2] But that the bar is not wholly jurisdictional seems established as well.[3]

Moreover, if under Article III there is no jurisdiction of suits against states, the settled principle that states may consent to suit[4] becomes conceptually difficult, as jurisdiction may [16] Note, however, that at least one subsequent decision has seemingly enhanced the applicability of federal law to the states themselves. In PennEast Pipeline Co. v New Jersey (595 U.S. —), the Court held that a private company that was granted authority to exercise eminent domain by the federal government could exercise that authority to take possession of property interests owned by a state.

---

[17] 535 U.S. 743 (2002). Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion describes a need for "continued dissent" from the majority's sovereign immunity holdings. 535 U.S. at 788.

[18] 46 U.S.C. §§ 40101 et seq.

[19] 535 U.S. at 755, 760.

[1] 415 U.S. 651 (1974).

[2] 415 U.S. at 678. The Court relied on Ford Motor Co. v. Department of Treasury of Indiana, 323 U.S. 459 (1945), where the issue was whether state officials who had voluntarily appeared in federal court had authority under state law to waive the state's immunity. Edelman has been followed in Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 396 n.2 (1975); Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 278 (1977), with respect to the Court's responsibility to raise the Eleventh Amendment jurisdictional issue on its own motion.

[3] See Patsy v. Florida Board of Regents, 457 U.S. 496, 515–16 n.19 (1982), in which the Court bypassed the Eleventh Amendment issue, which had been brought to its attention, because of the interest of the parties in having the question resolved on the merits. See id. at 520 (Justice Lewis Powell dissenting).

[4] Clark v. Barnard, 108 U.S. 436 (1883).

not be conferred if the state refuses its consent.[5] And Article III jurisdiction exists for some suits against states, such as those brought by the United States or by other states.[6] Furthermore, Congress is able, in some instances, to legislate away state immunity,[7] although it may not enlarge Article III jurisdiction.[8] The Court has declared that "the principle of sovereign immunity [reflected in the Eleventh Amendment] is a constitutional limitation on the federal judicial power established in Art. III," while acknowledging that "[a] sovereign's immunity may be waived."[9]

Another explanation of the Eleventh Amendment is that it merely recognized the continued vitality of the doctrine of sovereign immunity as established prior to the Constitution: a state was not subject to suit without its consent.[10] Modern case law supports this view. In the 1999 Alden v. Maine decision, the Court stated: "the States' immunity from suit is a fundamental aspect of the sovereignty which the States enjoyed before the ratification of the Constitution, and which they retain today"[11] The Court, in dealing with questions of governmental immunity from suit, has traditionally treated precedents dealing with state immunity and those dealing with Federal Governmental immunity interchangeably.[12] Viewing the Amendment and Article III this way explains consent to suit as a waiver.[13] The limited effect of the doctrine in federal courts arises from the fact that traditional sovereign immunity arose in a unitary state, barring unconsented suit against a sovereign in its own courts or the courts of another sovereign. But upon entering the Union the states surrendered their sovereignty to some undetermined and changing degree to the national government, a sovereign that does not have plenary power over them but that is more than their coequal.[14]

Within the area of federal court jurisdiction, the issue becomes the extent to which the states, upon entering the Union, ceded their immunity to suit in federal court. Chisholm held—and the Eleventh Amendment reversed —that the states had given up their immunity to suit in diversity cases based on common law or state law causes of action; Hans v. Louisiana and subsequent cases held that the Amendment, in effect, recognized state immunity to suits based on federal causes of action.[15] Other cases have held that states ceded their immunity to suits by the United States or by other states.[16]

---

[5] E.g., People's Band v. Calhoun, 102 U.S. 256, 260–61 (1880). See Justice Lewis Powell's explanation in Patsy v. Florida Board of Regents, 457 U.S. 496, 528 n.13 (1982) (dissenting) (no jurisdiction under Article III of suits against unconsenting states).

[6] See, e.g., the Court's express rejection of the Eleventh Amendment defense in these cases. United States v. Texas, 143 U.S. 621 (1892); South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U.S. 286 (1904).

[7] E.g., Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 (1976); Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1 (1989).

[8] The principal citation is Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803).

[9] Pennhurst State School & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 98, 99 (1984).

[10] As Justice Oliver Holmes explained, the doctrine is based "on the logical and practical ground that there can be no legal right as against the authority that makes the law on which the right depends." Kawananakoa v. Polyblank, 205 U.S. 349, 353 (1907). Of course, when a state is sued in federal court pursuant to federal law, the Federal Government, not the defendant state, is "the authority that makes the law" creating the right of action. See Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 154 (1996) (Souter, J., dissenting). For the history and jurisprudence, see Lewis J. Jaffe, Suits Against Governments and Officers: Sovereign Immunity, 77 HARV. L. REV. 1 (1963).

[11] Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 713 (1999).

[12] See, e.g., United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196, 210–14 (1882); Belknap v. Schild, 161 U.S. 10, 18 (1896); Hopkins v. Clemson Agricultural College, 221 U.S. 636, 642–43, 645 (1911).

[13] A sovereign may consent to suit. E.g., United States v. Sherwood, 312 U.S. 584, 586 (1941); United States v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 309 U.S. 506, 514 (1940).

[14] See Fletcher, supra.

[15] For a while only Justice William Brennan advocated this view, Parden v. Terminal Ry., 377 U.S. 184 (1964); Emps. of the Dep't of Pub. Health and Welfare v. Dep't of Pub. Health and Welfare, 411 U.S. 279, 298 (1973)

Still another view of the Eleventh Amendment is that it embodies a state sovereignty principle limiting the Federal Government's power.[17] In this respect, the federal courts may not act without congressional guidance in subjecting states to suit, and Congress, which can act to the extent of its granted powers, is constrained by judicially created doctrines requiring it to be explicit when it legislates against state immunity.[18]

Questions regarding the constitutional dimensions of sovereign immunity have arisen in the context of interstate sovereign immunity when a private party institutes an action against a state in another state's court. In the now-overturned 1979 decision of Nevada v. Hall, the Court held that while states are free as a matter of comity "to accord each other immunity or to respect any established limits on liability," the Constitution does not compel a state to grant another state immunity in its courts.[19] In Hall, California residents who were severely injured in a car crash with a Nevada state university employee on official business sued the university and the State of Nevada in California court.[20] After considering the scope of sovereign immunity as it existed prior to and "in the early days of independence," the doctrine's effect on "the framing of the Constitution," and specific "aspects of the Constitution that qualify the sovereignty of the several States," such as the Full Faith and Credit Clause,[21] the Court concluded that "[n]othing in the Federal Constitution authorizes or obligates this Court to frustrate" California's policy of "full compensation in its courts for injuries on its highways resulting from the negligence" of state or non-state actors "out of enforced respect for the sovereignty of Nevada."[22]

Forty years later, the Court overruled Hall in Franchise Tax Board of California v. Hyatt (Franchise Tax Board III), holding that "States retain their sovereign immunity from private suits brought in the courts of other States."[23] Franchise Tax Board III involved a tort action by a private party against a California state agency in Nevada's courts.[24] The "sole question" before the Court was whether to overrule Nevada v. Hall, a question over which the Court divided in 2016.[25] As the majority in Franchise Tax Board III read the historical record, although interstate sovereign immunity may have existed as a voluntary practice of comity at (dissenting), but in time he was joined by three others. See, e.g., Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 247 (1985) (Justice William Brennan, joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun, and John Stevens, dissenting).

[16] E.g., United States v. Texas, 143 U.S. 621 (1892); South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U.S. 286 (1904). See Kansas v. Colorado, 533 U.S. 1 (2001) (state may seek damages from another state, including damages to its citizens, provided it shows that the state has an independent interest in the proceeding).

[17] E.g., Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 456 (1976); Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 337 (1979).

[18] See Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978), in which the various opinions differ among themselves as to the degree of explicitness required. See also Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 343–45 (1979). As noted in the previous section, later cases stiffened the rule of construction. The parallelism of congressional power to regulate and to legislate away immunity is not exact. Thus, in Employees of the Dep't of Pub. Health and Welfare v. Department of Pub. Health and Welfare, 411 U.S. 279 (1973), the Court strictly construed congressional provision of suits as not reaching states, while in Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 (1968), it had sustained the constitutionality of the substantive law.

[19] 440 U.S. 410, 426 (1979), overruled by Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 139 S. Ct. 1485, 1492 (2019) [hereinafter Franchise Tax Bd. III.] 40. Id. at 411–12.

[20] Id. at 411–12.

[21] Id. at 414–18.

[22] Id. at 426. In the Court's view, for a federal court to infer "from the structure of our Constitution and nothing else, that California is not free in this case to enforce its policy of full compensation, that holding would constitute the real intrusion on the sovereignty of the States—and the power of the people—in our Union." Id. at 426–27.

[23] Franchise Tax Bd. III, 139 S. Ct. 1485, 1492 (2019).

[24] Id. at 1490–91.

[25] Id. at 1491; see also Franchise Tax Bd. of Cal. v. Hyatt, 136 S. Ct. 1277, 1279 (2016) ("The Court is equally divided on this question, and we consequently affirm the Nevada courts' exercise of jurisdiction over California."); Franchise Tax Bd. III, 139 S. Ct. at 1490–91 (explaining that the two prior Franchise Tax Board decisions centered on interpretations of the Full Faith and Credit Clause of Article IV of the Constitution).

the time of the Founding, the Constitution "fundamentally adjust[ed] the States' relationship with each other and curtail[ed] their ability, as sovereigns, to decline to recognize each other's immunity."[26] The Court reiterated the view embraced in several of its decisions since Hall that in proposing the Eleventh Amendment in response to Chisholm v. Georgia, "Congress acted not to change but to restore the original constitutional design."[27] Accordingly, the Court explained, the "sovereign immunity of the States . . . neither derives from, nor is limited by, the terms of the Eleventh Amendment."[28] Moreover, the Court reasoned, "[n]umerous provisions" in the Constitution support the view that interstate sovereign immunity is "embe[dded] . . . within the constitutional design."[29] Among other provisions, the Court cited Article I insofar as it "divests the States of the traditional diplomatic and military tools that foreign sovereigns possess" and Article IV's Full Faith and Credit Clause, which requires that "state-court judgments be accorded full effect in other States and preclude[s] States from 'adopt[ing] any policy of hostility to the public Acts' of other States."[30] Accordingly, because sovereign immunity was inherent in the constitutional design, the Court concluded that the State of California could not be sued in Nevada absent the former state's consent.[31]

Amdt11.5.3 Suits Against States

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Despite the apparent limitations of the Eleventh Amendment, individuals may, under certain circumstances, bring constitutional and statutory cases against states. In some of these cases, the state's sovereign immunity has either been waived by the state (either explicitly or implicitly as a product of their consent to the plan of the Constitutional Convention) or abrogated by Congress. In other cases, the Eleventh Amendment does not apply because the procedural posture is such that the Court does not view them as being against a state. As discussed below, this latter doctrine is most often seen in suits to enjoin state officials. However, it has also been invoked in bankruptcy and admiralty cases, where the res, or property in dispute, is in fact the legal target of a dispute.[1]

The application of this last exception to the bankruptcy area has become less relevant, because even when a bankruptcy case is not focused on a particular res, the Court has held that a state's sovereign immunity is not infringed by being subject to an order of a bankruptcy court. In Central Virginia Community College v. Katz, the Court noted that "[t]he history of the Bankruptcy Clause, the reasons it was inserted in the Constitution, and the legislation both [26] Franchise Tax Bd. III, 139 S. Ct. at 1493, 1497.

[27] Id. at 1496 (quoting Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 722 (1999)).

[28] Id. (quoting Alden, 527 U.S. at 713). 49. Id. at 1497.

[29] Id. at 1497.

[30] Id. (citation omitted).

[31] Id. at 1499. The Court reasoned that stare decisis did not compel it to follow Hall even though "some plaintiffs, such as Hyatt" relied on that decision in litigation against states. Id. at1499. In the Court's view, Hall "failed to account for the historical understanding of state sovereign immunity" and stood "as an outlier in [the Court's] sovereign immunity jurisprudence." Id.

[1] See Tennessee Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 440, 446–48 (2004) (exercise of bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction over a debtor's estate to discharge a debt owed to a state does not infringe the state's sovereignty); California v. Deep Sea Research, Inc., 523 U.S. 491, 507–08 (1998) (despite state claims over shipwrecked vessel, the Eleventh Amendment does not bar federal court in rem admiralty jurisdiction where the res is not in the possession of the sovereign).

proposed and enacted under its auspices immediately following ratification of the Constitution demonstrate that it was intended not just as a grant of legislative authority to Congress, but also to authorize limited subordination of state sovereign immunity in the bankruptcy arena."[2] Thus, where a federal law authorized a bankruptcy trustee to recover "preferential transfers" made to state educational institutions,[3] the court held that the state's sovereign immunity was not infringed despite the fact that the issue was "ancillary" to a bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction.[4]

Because Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity inheres in states and not their subdivision or establishments, a state agency that wishes to claim state sovereign immunity must establish that it is acting as an arm of the state. In Lake County Estates v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, the Court stated: "[A]gencies exercising state power have been permitted to invoke the [Eleventh] Amendment in order to protect the state treasury from liability that would have had essentially the same practical consequences as a judgment against the State itself."[5] In evaluating such a claim, courts will examine state law to determine the nature of the entity and whether to treat it as an arm of the state.[6] The Supreme Court has consistently refused to extend Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity to counties, cities, or towns,[7] even though such political subdivisions exercise a "slice of state power."[8] Even when such entities enjoy immunity from suit under state law, they do not have Eleventh Amendment immunity in federal court and states may not confer it.[9] Similarly, entities created pursuant to interstate compacts (and subject to congressional approval) are not immune from suit, absent a showing that the entity was structured so as to take advantage of the state's constitutional protections.[10]

---

[2] Central Virginia Community College v. Katz, 546 U.S. 356, 362–63 (2006). The Court has cautioned, however, that Katz's analysis is limited to the context of the Bankruptcy Clause. Specifically, the Court has described the Clause as "sui generis" or "unique" among Article I's grants of authority, and, unlike other such grants, the Bankruptcy Clause itself abrogated state sovereign immunity in bankruptcy proceedings. See Allen v. Cooper, 140 S.Ct. 994, 1002–03 (2020) (observing that Katz "points to a good-for-one-clause-only holding" and does not cast further doubt on Seminole Tribe's "general rule that Article I cannot justify haling a State into federal court").

[3] A "preferential transfer" was defined as the transfer of a property interest from an insolvent debtor to a creditor, which occurred on or within ninety days before the filing of a bankruptcy petition, and which exceeds what the creditor would have been entitled to receive under such bankruptcy filing. 11 U.S.C. § 547(b). 55. 546 U.S. at 373.

[4] 546 U.S. at 373.

[5] Lake County Estates v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 440 U.S. 391, 400–01 (1979), citing Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651 (1974), and Ford Motor Co. v. Department of Treasury, 323 U.S. 459 (1945). The fact that a state agency can be indemnified for the costs of litigation does not divest the agency of its Eleventh Amendment immunity. Regents of the University of California v. Doe, 519 U.S. 425 (1997).

[6] See, e.g., Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 280 (1977) (local school district not an arm of the state based on (1) its designation in state law as a political subdivision, (2) the degree of supervision by the state board of education, (3) the level of funding received from the state, and (4) the districts' empowerment to generate their own revenue through the issuance of bonds or levying taxes.

[7] Northern Insurance Company of New York v. Chatham County, 547 U.S. 189, 193 (2006) (counties have neither Eleventh Amendment immunity nor residual common law immunity). See Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977); Moor v. County of Alameda, 411 U.S. 693 (1973); Workman v. City of New York, 179 U.S. 552 (1900); Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U.S. 529 (1890). In contrast to their treatment under the Eleventh Amendment, the Court has found that state immunity from federal regulation under the Tenth Amendment extends to political subdivisions as well. See Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[8] Lake County Estates v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 440 U.S. 391, 400–01 (1979) (quoting earlier cases).

[9] Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U.S. 529 (1893).

[10] Lake County Estates v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 440 U.S. 391 (1979); Petty v. Tennessee-Missouri Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275 (1959).

Amdt11.6 Exceptions

Amdt11.6.1 Waiver of State Sovereign Immunity

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

The immunity of a state from suit is a privilege which it may waive at its pleasure. Historically, the conclusion that a state has consented or waived its immunity has not been lightly inferred; the Court strictly construes statutes alleged to consent to suit. Thus, a state may waive its immunity in its own courts without consenting to suit in federal court,[1] and a general authorization "to sue and be sued" is ordinarily insufficient to constitute consent.[2] A statutory waiver of state Eleventh Amendment immunity is effective "only where stated in the most express language or by such overwhelming implication from the text as [will] leave no room for any other reasonable construction."[3]

Thus, in Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corp. v. Feeney,[4] an expansive consent "to suits, actions, or proceedings of any form or nature at law, in equity or otherwise" was deemed too "ambiguous and general" to waive immunity in federal court, because it might be interpreted to reflect only a state's consent to suit in its own courts. But, when combined with language specifying that consent was conditioned on venue being laid "within a county or judicial district, established by one of said States or by the United States, and situated wholly or partially within the Port of New York District," waiver was effective.[5]

There are, however, a few cases in which the Court has found a waiver by implication. For example, in Parden v. Terminal Railway,[6] the Court ruled that employees of a state-owned railroad could sue the state for damages under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA). One of the two primary grounds for finding lack of immunity was that by taking control of a railroad which was subject to the FELA, enacted some twenty years previously, the state had effectively accepted the imposition of the Act and consented to suit.[7] Distinguishing Parden as involving a proprietary activity,[8] the Court later refused to find any implied consent to suit by states participating in federal spending programs; participation was insufficient, and only

---

[1] Smith v. Reeves, 178 U.S. 436 (1900); Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co., 213 U.S. 151, 172 (1909); Graves v. Texas Co., 298 U.S. 393, 403–04 (1936); Great Northern Life Ins. Co. v. Read, 322 U.S. 47 (1944).

[2] Great Northern Life Ins. Co. v. Read, 322 U.S. 47, 54 (1944); Ford Motor Co. v. Department of Treasury, 323 U.S. 459 (1945); Kennecott Copper Corp. v. State Tax Comm'n, 327 U.S. 573 (1946); Petty v. Tennessee-Missouri Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275 (1959); Florida Dep't of Health v. Florida Nursing Home Ass'n, 450 U.S. 147 (1981). Compare Patsy v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 457 U.S. 496, 519 n.* (1982) (Justice White concurring), with id. at 522 and n.5 (Justice Lewis Powell dissenting).

[3] Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corp. v. Feeney, 495 U.S. 299, 305–06 (1990) (internal citations omitted; emphasis in original). 5. 495 U.S. 299 (1990).

[4] 495 U.S. 299 (1990).

[5] 495 U.S. at 306–07. But see Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 241 (1985).

[6] 377 U.S. 184 (1964). The alternative but interwoven ground had to do with Congress's power to withdraw immunity. See also Petty v. Tennessee- Missouri Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275 (1959).

[7] The implied waiver issue aside, Parden subsequently was overruled, a plurality of the Court emphasizing that Congress had failed to abrogate state immunity unmistakably. Welch v. Texas Dep't of Highways and Pub. Transp., 483 U.S. 468 (1987). Justice Lewis Powell's plurality opinion was joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist and by Justices Byron White and Sandra Day O'Connor. Justice Antonin Scalia, concurring, thought Parden should be overruled because it must be assumed that Congress enacted the FELA and other statutes with the understanding that Hans v. Louisiana shielded states from immunity. Id. at 495.

[8] Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 671–72 (1974). For the same distinction in the Tenth Amendment context, see National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 854 n.18 (1976).

when waiver has been "stated by the most express language or by such overwhelming implications from the text as [will] leave no room for any other reasonable construction," will it be found.[9] Further, even if a state becomes amenable to suit under a statutory condition on accepting federal funds, remedies, especially monetary damages, may be limited, absent express language to the contrary.[10]

Another form of waiver by implication is the waiver by consent to the plan of the Constitutional Convention; that is, that states waived sovereign immunity to litigation on certain matters when they ratified the Constitution. A recent decision seems to have expanded the scope of these sort of implicit waivers. In PennEast Pipeline Co. v. New Jersey,[11] the Court heard an appeal related to an interstate pipeline approved by the federal government. Under the Natural Gas Act (NGA), parties who receive certificates to construct and operate interstate natural gas pipelines are authorized to exercise eminent domain in order to obtain the necessary rights-of-way to construct and operate the pipeline along the approved route.[12] In this instance, the approved route included lands owned by the State of New Jersey. The certificate holders brought an action in federal district court seeking to condemn those state-owned parcels, and the state responded by asserting its sovereign immunity under the eleventh Amendment. The lower courts sided with the state, rejecting the argument that the federal government had delegated its authority to sue states in the NGA and the certificate proceeding, but the Supreme Court disagreed. Writing for the 5-4 majority, Chief Justice John Roberts noted that "[t]he 'plan of the Convention' includes certain waivers of sovereign immunity to which all States implicitly consented at the founding."[13] The Court concluded that it would be "untenable" to find that this waiver did not extend to private parties authorized by the federal government to exercise eminent domain authority.[14] In addition, because the waiver of sovereign immunity was based on the states' implicit consent via the "plan of the Convention" rather than abrogation or explicit waiver, there was no need to find that the NGA clearly authorized such suits.[15] The Court's decision in PennEast is one of the only Supreme Court decisions relying on the "plan of convention" as a basis for consent or waiver, so its impact outside of federal legislation delegating eminent domain power remains to be seen.

A state may also waive its immunity by initiating or participating in litigation. In Clark v. Barnard,[16] the state had filed a claim for disputed money deposited in a federal court, and the Court held that the state could not thereafter complain when the court awarded the money to another claimant. However, the Court is loath to find a waiver simply because an official or an attorney representing the state decided to litigate the merits of a suit, so that a state may at any point in litigation raise a claim of immunity based on whether that official has the authority under state law to make a valid waiver.[17] However, this argument is only available when the state is brought into federal court involuntarily. If a state voluntarily agrees to [9] Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651 (1974) (quoting id. at 673, Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co., 213 U.S. 151, 171 (1909)); Florida Dep't of Health v. Florida Nursing Home Ass'n, 450 U.S. 147 (1981). Of the four Edelman dissenters, Justices Thurgood Marshall and Harry Blackmun found waiver through knowing participation, 415 U.S. at 688. In Florida Dep't, Justice John Stevens noted he would have agreed with them had he been on the Court at the time but that he would now adhere to Edelman. Id. at 151.

[10] Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S. Ct. 1651 (2011).

[11] No. 19-1039 (U.S. June 29, 2021).

[12] 15 U.S.C. § 717f(h).

[13] Alden, 527 U.S. at 755–56.

[14] Id.

[15] Id.

[16] 108 U.S. 436 (1883).

[17] Ford Motor Co. v. Department of Treasury, 323 U.S. 459, 466–467 (1945); Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 677–678 (1974).

removal of a state action to federal court, the Court has held it may not then invoke a defense of sovereign immunity and thereby gain an unfair tactical advantage.[18]

Amdt11.6.2 Abrogation of State Sovereign Immunity

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

The Constitution grants Congress power to regulate state action by legislation. In some instances when Congress does so, it may subject states to suit by individuals to implement the legislation. The clearest example arises from the Civil War Amendments, which directly restrict state powers and expressly authorize Congress to enforce these restrictions through appropriate legislation.[1] Thus, in Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, the Court stated: "the Eleventh Amendment and the principle of state sovereignty which it embodies . . . are necessarily limited, by the enforcement provisions of § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment."[2] The power to enforce the Civil War Amendments is substantive, however, not being limited to remedying judicially cognizable violations of the amendments, but extending as well to measures that in Congress's judgment will promote compliance.[3] The principal judicial brake on this power to abrogate state immunity in legislation enforcing the Civil War Amendments is the rule requiring that congressional intent to subject states to suit be clearly stated.[4]

In the 1989 case of Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co.,[5] the Court—temporarily at least—ended years of uncertainty by holding expressly that Congress acting pursuant to its [18] Lapides v. Board of Regents, 535 U.S. 613 (2002).

[1] Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 (1976); Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156 (1980). More recent cases affirming Congress's Section 5 powers include Pennhurst State School & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 99 (1984); Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 238 (1985); and Dellmuth v. Muth, 491 U.S. 223, 227 (1989).

[2] Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 456 (1976) (under the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress may "provide for private suits against States or state officials which are constitutionally impermissible in other contexts.").

[3] In Maher v. Gagne, 448 U.S. 122 (1980), the Court found that Congress could validly authorize imposition of attorneys' fees on the state following settlement of a suit based on both constitutional and statutory grounds, even though settlement had prevented determination that there had been a constitutional violation. Maine v. Thiboutot, 448 U.S. 1 (1980), held that § 1983 suits could be premised on federal statutory as well as constitutional grounds. Other cases in which attorneys' fees were awarded against states are Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978); and New York Gaslight Club v. Carey, 447 U.S. 54 (1980). See also Frew v. Hawkins, 540 U.S. 431 (2004) (upholding enforcement of consent decree).

[4] Even prior to the tightening of the clear statement rule over the past several decades to require express legislative language (see note and accompanying text, infra), application of the rule curbed congressional enforcement. Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 451–53 (1976); Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 693–98 (1978). Because of its rule of clear statement, the Court in Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332 (1979), held that in enacting 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Congress had not intended to include states within the term "person" for the purpose of subjecting them to suit. The question arose after Monell v. N.Y. City Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978), reinterpreted "person" to include municipal corporations. Cf. Alabama v. Pugh, 438 U.S. 781 (1978). The Court has reserved the question of whether the Fourteenth Amendment itself, without congressional action, modifies the Eleventh Amendment to permit suits against states, Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 290 n.23 (1977), but the result in Milliken, holding that the Governor could be enjoined to pay half the cost of providing compensatory education for certain schools, which would come from the state treasury, and in Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232 (1974), permitting imposition of damages upon the governor, which would come from the state treasury, is suggestive. But see Rabinovitch v. Nyquist, 433 U.S. 901 (1977). The Court declined in Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 150 (1908), to view the Eleventh Amendment as modified by the Fourteenth.

[5] 491 U.S. 1 (1989). The Justice William Brennan wrote the Court's plurality opinion and was joined by the three other Justices who believed Hans was incorrectly decided. See id. at 23 (Justice Stevens concurring). Justice Byron White provided the fifth vote id. at 45, 55–56 (Justice Byron White concurring), although he believed Hans was correctly decided and ought to be maintained although he did not believe Congress had acted with sufficient clarity in the statutes before the Court to abrogate immunity. Justice Antonin Scalia thought the statutes were express enough Article I powers (as opposed to its Fourteenth Amendment powers) may abrogate the Eleventh Amendment immunity of the states, so long as it does so with sufficient clarity. Twenty-five years earlier the Court had stated that same principle,[6] but only as an alternative holding, and a later case had set forth a more restrictive rule.[7] The premises of Union Gas were that by consenting to ratification of the Constitution, with its Commerce Clause and other clauses empowering Congress and limiting the states, the states had implicitly authorized Congress to divest them of immunity, that the Eleventh Amendment was a restraint upon the courts and not similarly upon Congress, and that the exercises of Congress's powers under the Commerce Clause and other clauses would be incomplete without the ability to authorize damage actions against the states to enforce congressional enactments. The dissenters disputed each of these strands of the argument, and, while recognizing the Fourteenth Amendment abrogation power, took the position that no such power existed under Article I.

Pennsylvania v. Union Gas lasted less than seven years before the Court overruled it in Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida.[8] Chief Justice William Rehnquist, writing for a 5-4 majority, concluded that Union Gas had deviated from a line of cases, tracing back to Hans v. Louisiana,[9] which viewed the Eleventh Amendment as implementing the "fundamental principle of sovereign immunity [that] limits the grant of judicial authority in Article III."[10] Because "the Eleventh Amendment restricts the judicial power under Article III, . . . Article I cannot be used to circumvent the constitutional limitations placed upon federal jurisdiction."[11] Subsequent cases have upheld this interpretation.[12]

Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, of course, is another matter. Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer,[13] which held, in part, that the Fourteenth Amendment "operated to alter the pre-existing balance between state and federal power achieved by Article III and the Eleventh Amendment," remains good law.[14] This ruling led to a number of cases that examined whether a statute that might be applied against non-state actors under an Article I power could also, under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, be applied against the states.[15] but that Congress simply lacked the power. Id. at 29. Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy joined relevant portions of both opinions finding lack of power and lack of clarity.

---

[6] Parden v. Terminal Railway, 377 U.S. 184, 190–92 (1964). See also Employees of the Dep't of Pub. Health and Welfare v. Department of Pub. Health and Welfare, 411 U.S. 279, 283, 284, 285–86 (1973).

[7] Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 672 (1974).

[8] 517 U.S. 44 (1996) (invalidating a provision of the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act authorizing an Indian tribe to sue a state in federal court to compel performance of a duty to negotiate in good faith toward the formation of a compact).

[9] 134 U.S. 1 (1890).

[10] 517 U.S. at 64 (quoting Pennhurst State School & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 97–98 (1984).

[11] 517 U.S. at 72–73. Justice David Souter's dissent undertook a lengthy refutation of the majority's analysis, asserting that the Eleventh Amendment is best understood, in keeping with its express language, as barring only suits based on diversity of citizenship, and as having no application to federal question litigation. Moreover, Justice Souter contended, the state sovereign immunity that the Court mistakenly recognized in Hans v. Louisiana was a common law concept that "had no constitutional status and was subject to congressional abrogation." 517 U.S. at 117. The Constitution made no provision for wholesale adoption of the common law, but, on the contrary, was premised on the view that common law rules would always be subject to legislative alteration. This "imperative of legislative control grew directly out of the Framers' revolutionary idea of popular sovereignty." Id. at 160.

[12] Coll. Sav. Bank v. Fla. Prepaid Postsecondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666 (1999) (the Trademark Remedy Clarification Act, an amendment to the Lanham Act, did not validly abrogate state immunity); Fla. Prepaid Postsecondary Educ. Expense Bd. v. Coll. Sav. Bank, 527 U.S. 627 (1999) (amendment to patent laws abrogating state immunity from infringement suits is invalid); Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000) (abrogation of state immunity in the Age Discrimination in Employment Act is invalid); Allen v. Cooper, 140 S. Ct. 994 (2020) (the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act of 1990 did not validly abrogate state sovereign immunity).

[13] 427 U.S. 445 (1976).

[14] Seminole Tribe, 517 U.S. at 65–66.

[15] See Fourteenth Amendment, Congressional Definition of Fourteenth Amendment Rights, infra.

In another line of cases, a different majority of the Court focused on language Congress used to overcome immunity rather than the authority underlying the action. Henceforth, the Court held in a 1985 decision, and even with respect to statutes that were enacted prior to promulgation of this judicial rule of construction, "Congress may abrogate the States' constitutionally secured immunity from suit in federal court only by making its intention unmistakably clear in the language of the statute" itself.[16]

At one time, a plurality of the Court appeared to take the position that Congress had to refer specifically to state sovereign immunity and the Eleventh Amendment for its language to be unmistakably clear.[17] Thus in 1985 the Court held in Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon that general language subjecting to suit in federal court by "any recipient of Federal assistance" under the Rehabilitation Act was insufficient to satisfy this test, not because of any question about whether states are "recipients" within the meaning of the provision but because "given their constitutional role, the states are not like any other class of recipients of federal aid."[18] As a result of these rulings, Congress began to use words the Court had identified.[19] Since then, however, the Court has accepted less precise language,[20] and in at least one context, has eliminated the requirement of specific abrogation language altogether.[21]

Even before the Alden v. Maine decision,[22] when the Court believed that Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity did not apply to suits in state courts, the Court applied its rule of strict construction to require "unmistakable clarity" by Congress in order to subject states to suit.[23] Although the Court was willing to recognize exceptions to the clear statement rule when the issue involved subjection of states to suit in state courts, the Court also suggested the need for "symmetry" so that states' liability or immunity would be the same in both state and federal courts.[24]

---

[16] Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 242 (1985) (emphasis added).

[17] Justice Anthony Kennedy for the Court in Dellmuth, 491 U.S. at 231, expressly noted that the statute before the Court did not demonstrate abrogation with unmistakable clarity because, inter alia, it "makes no reference whatsoever to either the Eleventh Amendment or the States' sovereign immunity." Justice Antonin Scalia, one of four concurring Justices, expressed an "understanding" that the Court's reasoning would allow for clearly expressed abrogation of immunity "without explicit reference to state sovereign immunity or the Eleventh Amendment." Id. at 233.

[18] Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 246 (1985). See also Dellmuth v. Muth, 491 U.S. 223 (1989).

[19] In 1986, following Atascadero, Congress provided that states were not to be immune under the Eleventh Amendment from suits under several laws barring discrimination by recipients of federal financial assistance. Pub. L. No. 99-506, § 1003, 100 Stat. 1845 (1986), 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-7. Following Dellmuth, Congress amended the statute to insert the explicit language. Pub. L. No. 101-476, § 103, 104 Stat. 1106 (1990), 20 U.S.C. § 1403. See also the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act, Pub. L. 101-553, § 2, 104 Stat. 2749 (1990), 17 U.S.C. § 511 (making states and state officials liable in damages for copyright violations).

[20] Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 74–78 (2000). In Kimel, statutory language authorized age discrimination suits "against any employer (including a public agency)," and a "public agency" was defined to include "the government of a State or political subdivision thereof." The Court found this language to be sufficiently clear evidence of intent to abrogate state sovereign immunity. The relevant portion of the opinion was written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, and joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justices John Stevens, Antonin Scalia, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer and John Stevens. But see Raygor v. Regents of the University of Minnesota, 534 U.S. 533 (2002) (federal supplemental jurisdiction statute which tolls limitations period for state claims during pendency of federal case not applicable to claim dismissed on the basis of Eleventh Amendment immunity).

[21] Central Virginia Community College v. Katz, 546 U.S. 356, 363 (2006) (abrogation of state sovereign immunity under the Bankruptcy Clause was effectuated by the Constitution, so it need not additionally be done by statute); id. at 383 (Justice Clarence Thomas dissenting).

[22] 527 U.S. 706 (1999).

[23] Will v. Michigan Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58 (1989) (holding that states and state officials sued in their official capacity could not be made defendants in § 1983 actions in state courts).

[24] Hilton v. South Carolina Pub. Rys. Comm'n, 502 U.S. 197, 206 (1991) (interest in "symmetry" is outweighed by stare decisis, the FELA action being controlled by Parden v. Terminal Ry.).

Amdt11.6.3 Officer Suits and State Sovereign Immunity

Eleventh Amendment:

> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Courts may provide relief from government wrongs under the doctrine that sovereign immunity does not prevent suits to restrain individual government officials.[1] The doctrine is built upon a double fiction: that for purposes of the sovereign's immunity, a suit against an official is not a suit against the government, but for the purpose of finding state action to which the Constitution applies, the official's conduct is that of the state.[2] The doctrine is often associated with the decision in Ex parte Young.[3]

Young arose when a state legislature passed a law reducing railroad rates and providing severe penalties for any railroad that failed to comply with the law. Plaintiffs brought a federal action to enjoin Young, the state attorney general, from enforcing the law, alleging that it was unconstitutional and that they would suffer irreparable harm if he were not prevented from acting. An injunction was granted forbidding Young from acting on the law, an injunction he violated by bringing an action in state court against noncomplying railroads; for this action he was adjudged in contempt.

In deciding Young, the Court faced inconsistent lines of cases, including numerous precedents for permitting suits against state officers. Chief Justice John Marshall had begun the process in Osborn by holding that suit was barred only when the state was formally named a party.[4] He modified his position to preclude suit when an official, the governor of a state, was sued in his official capacity,[5] but relying on Osborn and reading Madrazo narrowly, the Court later held in a series of cases that an official of a state could be sued to prevent him from executing a state law in conflict with the Constitution or a law of the United States, and the fact that the officer may be acting on behalf of the state or in response to a state statutory obligation did not make the suit one against the state.[6] Subsequently the Court developed another more functional, less formalistic concept of the Eleventh Amendment and sovereign

---

[1] See, e.g. Larson v. Domestic and Foreign Corp., 337 U.S. 682 (1949). It should be noted, however, that as a threshold issue in lawsuits against state employees or entities, courts must look to whether the sovereign is the real party in interest to determine whether state sovereign immunity bars the suit. See Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21, 25 (1991). Court must determine "whether the remedy sought is truly against the sovereign," and if an "action is in essence against a State even if the State is not a named party, then the State is the real party in interest and is entitled to invoke the Eleventh Amendment's protections." See Lewis v. Clarke, 137 S. Ct. 1285, 1290–91 (2017). As a result, arms of the state, such as a state university, enjoy sovereign immunity. Id. at 6. Likewise, lawsuits brought against employees in their official capacity "may also be barred by sovereign immunity." Id.

[2] C. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts § 48 (4th ed. 1983). 3. 209 U.S. 123 (1908).

[3] 209 U.S. 23 (1908).

[4] Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824).

[5] Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 110 (1828).

[6] Davis v. Gray, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 203 (1872); Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U.S. 531 (1876); Allen v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R., 114 U.S. 311 (1885); Rolston v. Missouri Fund Comm'rs, 120 U.S. 390 (1887); Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U.S. 1 (1891); Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 154 U.S. 362 (1894); Smyth v. Ames, 169 U.S. 466 (1898); Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U.S. 141 (1900).

immunity, which evidenced an increasing wariness toward affirmatively ordering states to relinquish state-controlled property[7] and culminated in the broad reading of Eleventh Amendment immunity in Hans v. Louisiana.[8]

Two of the leading cases concerned suits to prevent Southern states from defaulting on bonds.[9] In Louisiana v. Jumel,[10] a Louisiana citizen sought to compel the state treasurer to apply a sinking fund that had been created under the earlier constitution for the payment of the bonds after a subsequent constitution had abolished this provision for retiring the bonds. The proceeding was held to be a suit against the state.[11] Then, In re Ayers[12] purported to supply a rationale for cases on the issuance of mandamus or injunctive relief against state officers that would have severely curtailed federal judicial power. Suit against a state officer was not barred when his action, aside from any official authority claimed as its justification, was a wrong simply as an individual act, such as a trespass, but if the act of the officer did not constitute an individual wrong and was something that only a state, through its officers, could do, the suit was in actuality a suit against the state and was barred.[13] That is, the unconstitutional nature of the state statute under which the officer acted did not itself constitute a private cause of action. For that, one must be able to point to an independent violation of a common law right.[14]

Although Ayers was in all relevant points on all fours with Young,[15] the Young Court held that the court had properly issued the injunction against the state attorney general, even though the state was in effect restrained as well. The Court stated that "[t]he act to be enforced is alleged to be unconstitutional, and, if it be so, the use of the name of the State to enforce an

---

[7] Judicial reluctance to confront government officials over government-held property did not extend in like manner in a federal context, as was evident in United States v. Lee, the first case in which the sovereign immunity of the United States was claimed and rejected. United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196 (1882). See Article III, "Suits Against United States Officials." However, the Court sustained the suit against the federal officers by only a 5-4 vote, and the dissent presented the arguments that were soon to inform Eleventh Amendment cases.

[8] 134 U.S. 1 (1890).

[9] See J. J. Gibbons, The Eleventh Amendment and State Sovereign Immunity: A Reinterpretation, 83 COLUM. L. REV. 1889, 1968–2003 (1983); J. V. Orth, The Interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment, 1798–1908: A Case Study of Judicial Power, 1983 U. ILL. L. REV. 423.

[10] 107 U.S. 711 (1882).

[11] "The relief asked will require the officers against whom the process is issued to act contrary to the positive orders of the supreme political power of the State, whose creatures they are, and to which they are ultimately responsible in law for what they do. They must use the public money in the treasury and under their official control in one way, when the supreme power has directed them to use it in another, and they must raise more money by taxation when the same power has declared that it shall not be done." 107 U.S. at 721. See also Christian v. Atlantic & N.C. R.R., 133 U.S. 233 (1890).

[12] 123 U.S. 443 (1887).

[13] 123 U.S. at 500–01, 502.

[14] Ayers sought to enjoin state officials from bringing suit under an allegedly unconstitutional statute purporting to overturn a contract between the state and the bondholders to receive the bond coupons for tax payments. The Court asserted that the state's contracts impliedly contained the state's immunity from suit, so that express withdrawal of a supposed consent to be sued was not a violation of the contract; but, in any event, because any violation of the assumed contract was an act of the state, to which the officials were not parties, their actions as individuals in bringing suit did not breach the contract. 123 U.S. at 503, 505–06. The rationale had been asserted by a four-Justice concurrence in Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U.S. 769, 783 (1883). See also Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R.R., 109 U.S. 446 (1883); Hagood v. Southern, 117 U.S. 52 (1886); North Carolina v. Temple, 134 U.S. 22 (1890); In re Tyler, 149 U.S. 164 (1893); Baltzer v. North Carolina, 161 U.S. 240 (1896); Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U.S. 516 (1899); Smith v. Reeves, 178 U.S. 436 (1900).

[15] Ayers "would seem to be decisive of the Young litigation." C. WRITE, THE LAW OF FEDERAL COURTS § 48 at 288 (4th ed. 1983). The Young Court purported to distinguish and to preserve Ayers but on grounds that either were irrelevant to Ayers or that had been rejected in the earlier case. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 151, 167 (1908). Similarly, in a later case, the Court continued to distinguish Ayers but on grounds that did not in fact distinguish it from the case before the Court, in which it permitted a suit against a state revenue commissioner to enjoin him from collecting allegedly unconstitutional taxes. Georgia R.R. & Banking Co. v. Redwine, 342 U.S. 299 (1952).

unconstitutional act to the injury of the complainants is a proceeding without the authority of and one which does not affect the State in its sovereign or governmental capacity."[16] Rather, the Court noted, "[i]t is simply an illegal act upon the part of a state official in attempting by the use of the name of the State to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional. If the act which the state Attorney General seeks to enforce be a violation of the Federal Constitution, the officer in proceeding under such enactment comes into conflict with the superior authority of that Constitution, and he is in that case stripped of his official or representative character and is subject in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct."[17] Justice John Harlan was the only dissenter, arguing that in law and fact the suit was one only against the state and that the suit against the individual was a mere "fiction."[18]

Justice John Harlan's "fiction" remains a mainstay of Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence.[19] It accounts for much of the litigation brought by individuals to challenge the execution of state policies. Suits against state officers alleging that they are acting pursuant to an unconstitutional statute are the standard device by which the validity of state legislation in federal courts is tested prior to enforcement and thus interpretation by state courts.[20] Similarly, suits to restrain state officials from contravening federal statutes[21] or to compel undertaking affirmative obligations imposed by the Constitution or federal laws[22] are common.

For years, the accepted rule was that the Eleventh Amendment did not preclude suits prosecuted against state officers in federal courts upon grounds that they are acting in excess of state statutory authority[23] or that they are not doing something required by state law.[24]

---

[16] Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 159–60 (1908). The opinion did not address the issue of how an officer "stripped of his official . . . character" could violate the Constitution, in that the Constitution restricts only "state action," but the double fiction has been expounded numerous times since. Thus, for example, it is well settled that an action unauthorized by state law is state action for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. Home Tel. & Tel. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 227 U.S. 278 (1913). The contrary premise of Barney v. City of New York, 193 U.S. 430 (1904), though eviscerated by Home Tel. & Tel. was not expressly disavowed until United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 25–26 (1960).

[17] Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 159–60 (1908).

[18] Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 173–74 (1908) (Harlan, J., dissenting). In the process of limiting application of Young, a Court majority referred to "the Young fiction." Idaho v. Coeur d'Alene Tribe, 521 U.S. 261, 281 (1997).

[19] E.g., Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 156 n.6 (1978) (rejecting request of state officials being sued to restrain enforcement of state statute as preempted by federal law that Young be overruled); Florida Dep't of State v. Treasure Salvors, 458 U.S. 670, 685 (1982).

[20] See, e.g., Home Tel. & Tel. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 227 U.S. 278 (1913); Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915); Cavanaugh v. Looney, 248 U.S. 453 (1919); Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197 (1923); Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, 266 U.S. 497 (1925); Massachusetts State Grange v. Benton, 272 U.S. 525 (1926); Hawks v. Hamill, 288 U.S. 52 (1933). See also Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365 (1971) (enjoining state welfare officials from denying welfare benefits to otherwise qualified recipients because they were aliens); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970) (enjoining city welfare officials from following state procedures for termination of benefits); Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267 (1977) (imposing half the costs of mandated compensatory education programs upon state through order directed to governor and other officials). On injunctions against governors, see Continental Baking Co. v. Woodring, 286 U.S. 352 (1932); Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378 (1932). Applicable to suits under this doctrine are principles of judicial restraint—constitutional, statutory, and prudential—discussed under Article III.

[21] E.g., Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 664–68 (1974); Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151 (1978).

[22] E.g., Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson, No. 21-463 (2021) (citing Ex Parte Young in refusing to enjoin state court clerks and judges from enforcement of a state law); Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267 (1977); Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 664–68 (1974); Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 346–49 (1979).

[23] E.g., Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U.S. 1 (1891); Scully v. Bird, 209 U.S. 481 (1908); Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. v. O'Connor, 223 U.S. 280 (1912); Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R.R., 244 U.S. 499 (1917); Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Greene, 244 U.S. 522 (1917). Property held by state officials on behalf of the state under claimed state authority may be recovered in suits against the officials, although the court may not conclusively resolve the state's claims against it in such a suit. South Carolina v. Wesley, 155 U.S. 542 (1895); Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U.S. 204 (1897); Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U.S. 636 (1911). See also Florida Dep't of State v. Treasure Salvors, 458 U.S. 670 (1982), in which the eight Justices who agreed that the Eleventh Amendment applied divided 4-4 over the proper interpretation.

However, in Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman,[25] the Court held that Young did not permit suits in federal courts against state officers alleging violations of state law. In the Court's view, Young was necessary to promote the supremacy of federal law, a basis that disappears if the violation alleged is of state law. The Court also still adheres to the doctrine, first pronounced in Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo,[26] that some suits against officers are actually suits against the state[27] and are barred by the state's immunity, such as when the suit involves state property or asks for relief which clearly calls for the exercise of official authority.[28]

