[12] Id. at 34–35 (citing Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32 (1982); Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953); United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 544 (1950); Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U.S. 651, 659–60 (1892)).

[13] Thuraissigiam, slip op. at 34–36 (quoting Mezei, 345 U.S. at 212, 215).

[14] Id. at 35–36 (quoting Plasencia, 459 U.S. at 32). The Court indicated that aliens who "established connections" to the United States would have greater due process protections in the event that the government sought to remove them, but the Court did not go further to assess the nature of those "established connections." Id. at 2–4. Nevertheless, in describing the limited constitutional protections for aliens seeking entry into the United States, the Court cited its statement in Nishimura Ekiu that it is not within the province of the judiciary to order that "foreigners who have never been naturalized, nor acquired any domicile or residence within the United States, nor even been admitted into the country pursuant to law," shall be permitted to enter, in opposition to the constitutional and lawful measures of the Legislative and Executive Branches of the National Government. Id. at 34–36; see also Nishimura Ekiu, 142 U.S. at 660. The Court's reference to this language suggests that the extent to which an alien establishes connections may turn, at least in part, on whether the alien has been lawfully admitted to the country. On the other hand, the language could suggest that an alien who entered the country unlawfully, but had "acquired . . . domicile or residence" within the country, could establish connections to be accorded due process protections in removal proceedings.

[1] Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 374–80 (1971).

[2] Id. at 374–75.

[3] Id. at 376–78; see also Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 646 (1973) (holding that New York statute excluding aliens from permanent positions in the competitive class of the state civil service violated equal protection).

States, and a school district policy that denied enrollment to such children.[4] The Court noted that aliens present within the United States, even unlawfully, "have long been recognized as 'persons' guaranteed due process of law by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments."[5] Thus, the Court held, the plaintiffs challenging the state law and school district policy that denied them a basic education were entitled to equal protection.[6] The Court concluded that, because the state failed to show that its school enrollment policies advanced a substantial state interest, those policies could not survive constitutional scrutiny.[7] Further, the Court observed that Congress uniquely had the power to create "a complex scheme governing admission to our Nation and status within our borders," and that the state's policy of restricting access to education for aliens "d[id] not operate harmoniously within the federal program."[8] But the Court suggested that the state's policy would have been permissible if it had advanced an "identifiable congressional policy" to limit access to education for unlawfully present aliens.[9]

Although the Federal Government has the exclusive power to regulate immigration, not every state law that pertains to aliens is necessarily a regulation of immigration that is "per se preempted" by that federal power.[10] But state laws that conflict with or pose an obstacle to the federal regulatory scheme are preempted.[11] For example, in Arizona v. United States, the Supreme Court in 2012 held that Arizona laws that made it a misdemeanor to fail to comply with federal alien-registration requirements, that made it a misdemeanor for an unlawfully present alien to seek or engage in employment in the state, and that authorized police officers to arrest aliens on the grounds that they were potentially removable were preempted by federal law.[12] Citing the Federal Government's "broad, undoubted power over the subject of immigration and the status of aliens," the Court determined that the Arizona provisions intruded into areas that Congress already regulated, and conflicted with Congress's existing statutory framework governing aliens.[13]

The Supreme Court's greater scrutiny of state laws reveals an important "distinction between the constitutional limits on state power and the constitutional grant of power to the Federal Government" with respect to immigration.[14] The Court's jurisprudence suggests that the Court is willing to give more deference to Congress's policy choices in the immigration context because "it is the business of the political branches of the Federal Government, rather [4] Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 226–30 (1982).

[5] Id. at 210 (citing Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953); Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228, 238 (1896); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 369 (1886)).

[6] Id. at 215.

[7] Id. at 227–30.

[8] Id. at 225–26.

[9] Id. at 225.

[10] DeCanas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 355 (1976), superseded by statute, Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-603, 100 Stat. 3359, as recognized in Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 404–05 (2012).

[11] See Arizona, 567 U.S. at 399 (recognizing that "the States are precluded from regulating conduct in a field that Congress, acting within its proper authority, has determined must be regulated by its exclusive governance," and that, additionally, "state laws are preempted when they conflict with federal law"); Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 66–67 (1941) ("And where the federal government, in the exercise of its superior authority in this field, has enacted a complete scheme of regulation and has therein provided a standard for the registration of aliens, states cannot, inconsistently with the purpose of Congress, conflict or interfere with, curtail or complement, the federal law, or enforce additional or auxiliary regulations.").

[12] Arizona, 567 U.S. at 404–07.

[13] Id. at 394, 400–10; but see Kansas v. Garcia, No. 17-834, slip op. 14–19 (U.S. Mar. 3, 2020) (holding that federal laws setting forth the terms and conditions in which aliens may work in the United States did not preempt state laws that allowed criminal prosecutions against aliens who provided false Social Security numbers on their tax withholding forms when they obtained employment, because the state laws only regulated the fraudulent use of tax forms and did not purport to regulate the employment of aliens in the United States).

[14] Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 85 (1976).

than that of either the States or the Federal Judiciary, to regulate the conditions of entry and residence of aliens."[15] Conversely, the Court is willing to exercise less judicial restraint when the constitutional challenge in question involves the relationship between aliens and states rather than aliens and the Federal Government, especially if the state's policy encroaches upon the Federal Government's authority.[16]

Section 9—Powers Denied Congress

Clause 1—Migration or Importation

ArtI.S9.C1.1 Restrictions on the Slave Trade

Article I, Section 9, Clause 1:

> The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

This sanction for the importation of slaves by the states for twenty years after the adoption of the Constitution, when considered with the section requiring escaped slaves to be returned to their masters, Article IV, Section 1, Clause 3, was held by Chief Justice Roger Taney in Scott v. Sandford[1] to show conclusively that such persons and their descendants were not embraced within the term "citizen" as used in the Constitution. Today this ruling is interesting only as a historical curiosity.

Clause 2—Habeas Corpus

ArtI.S9.C2.1 Suspension Clause and Writ of Habeas Corpus

Article I, Section 9, Clause 2:

> The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

This Clause is the only place in the Constitution in which the Great Writ is mentioned, a strange fact in the context of the regard with which the right was held at the time the Constitution was written[1] and stranger in the context of the role the right has come to play in the Supreme Court's efforts to constitutionalize federal and state criminal procedure.[2]

Only the Federal Government and not the states, it has been held obliquely, is limited by the Clause.[3] The issue that has always excited critical attention is the authority in which the Clause places the power to determine whether the circumstances warrant suspension of the [15] Id. at 84. In Mathews, the Supreme Court explained that the Federal Government is uniquely entrusted with the responsibility of "regulating the relationship between the United States and our alien visitors," and that because the Federal Government's role in that respect implicates foreign relations and "changing political and economic circumstances," the Federal Government's immigration decisions are "frequently of a character more appropriate to either the Legislature or the Executive than to the Judiciary." Id. at 81.

---

[16] Id. at 84–85.

[1] 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 411 (1857).

[1] R. Walker, The American Reception of the Writ of Liberty (1961).

[2] See ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

[3] Gasquet v. Lapeyre, 242 U.S. 367, 369 (1917).

privilege of the Writ.[4] The Clause itself does not specify, and although most of the clauses of Section 9 are directed at Congress not all of them are.[5] At the Convention, the first proposal of a suspending authority expressly vested "in the legislature" the suspending power,[6] but the author of this proposal did not retain this language when the matter was taken up,[7] the present language then being adopted.[8] Nevertheless, Congress's power to suspend was assumed in early commentary[9] and stated in dictum by the Court.[10] President Abraham Lincoln suspended the privilege on his own motion in the early Civil War period,[11] but this met with such opposition[12] that he sought and received congressional authorization.[13] Three other suspensions were subsequently ordered on the basis of more or less express authorizations from Congress.[14]

When suspension operates, what is suspended? In Ex parte Milligan,[15] the Court asserted that the Writ is not suspended but only the privilege, so that the Writ would issue and the issuing court on its return would determine whether the person applying can proceed, thereby passing on the constitutionality of the suspension and whether the petitioner is within the terms of the suspension.

Restrictions on habeas corpus placed in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA) and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRIRA) have provided occasion for further analysis of the scope of the Suspension Clause. AEDPA's restrictions on successive petitions from state prisoners are "well within the compass" of an evolving body of principles restraining "abuse of the writ," and hence do not amount to a suspension of the Writ within the meaning of the Clause.[16] Interpreting IIRIRA so as to avoid what it viewed as a serious constitutional problem, the Court in another case held that Congress had not evidenced clear intent to eliminate federal court habeas corpus jurisdiction to determine whether the Attorney General retained discretionary authority to [4] In form, of course, Clause 2 is a limitation of power, not a grant of power, and is in addition placed in a section of limitations. It might be argued, therefore, that the power to suspend lies elsewhere and that this Clause limits that authority. This argument is opposed by the little authority there is on the subject. 3 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 213 (Max Farrand ed., 1937); Ex parte Merryman, 17 F. Cas. 144, 148 (No. 9487) (C.C.D. Md. 1861); but cf. 3 J. Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 464 (Edmund Randolph, 2d ed. 1836). At the Convention, Gouverneur Morris proposed the language of the present Clause: the first section of the Clause, down to "unless" was adopted unanimously, but the second part, qualifying the prohibition on suspension was adopted over the opposition of three states. 2 Farrand, supra, at 438. It would hardly have been meaningful for those states opposing any power to suspend to vote against this language if the power to suspend were conferred elsewhere.

---

[5] Cf. Clauses 7, 8.

[6] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 341 (Max Farrand ed., 1937).

[7] Id. at 438.

[8] Id.

[9] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 1336 (1833).

[10] Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75, 101 (1807).

[11] Cf. J. Randall, Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln 118–39 (rev. ed. 1951).

[12] Including a finding by Chief Justice Roger Taney on circuit that the President's action was invalid. Ex parte Merryman, 17 F. Cas. 144 (No. 9487) (C.C.D. Md. 1861).

[13] Act of March 3, 1863, 1, 12 Stat. 755. See George Sellery, Lincoln's Suspension of Habeas Corpus as Viewed by Congress, 1 U. Wis. History Bull. 213 (1907).

[14] The privilege of the Writ was suspended in nine counties in South Carolina in order to combat the Ku Klux Klan, pursuant to Act of April 20, 1871, 4, 17 Stat. 14. It was suspended in the Philippines in 1905, pursuant to the Act of July 1, 1902, 5, 32 Stat. 692. Cf. Fisher v. Baker, 203 U.S. 174 (1906). Finally, it was suspended in Hawaii during World War II, pursuant to a section of the Hawaiian Organic Act, 67, 31 Stat. 153 (1900). Cf. Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946). For the problem of de facto suspension through manipulation of the jurisdiction of the federal courts, see discussion under Article III, ArtIII.S1.5.1 Overview of Congressional Control Over Judicial Power.

[15] 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2, 130–131 (1866).

[16] Felker v. Turpin, 518 U.S. 651 (1996).

waive deportation for a limited category of resident aliens who had entered guilty pleas before IIRIRA repealed the waiver authority.[17] "[At] the absolute minimum," the Court wrote, "the Suspension Clause protects the writ as it existed in 1789. At its historical core, the writ of habeas corpus has served as a means of reviewing the legality of Executive detention, and it is in that context that its protections have been strongest."[18]

Building on its statement concerning the "minimum" reach of the Suspension Clause, the Court, in Department of Homeland Security v. Thuraissigiam, explored what the habeas writ protected, as it existed in 1789.[19] Thuraissigiam involved a Suspension Clause challenge to a provision in IIRIRA limiting when an asylum seeker could seek habeas review to challenge a removal decision and stay in the United States.[20] Proceeding on the assumption that the Suspension Clause only prohibited limitations on the common-law habeas writ,[21] the Court concluded that the Writ at the time of the Founding "simply provided a means of contesting the lawfulness of restraint and securing release."[22] The asylum seeker in Thuraissigiam did not ask to be released from United States custody, but instead sought vacatur of his removal order and a new opportunity to apply for asylum, which if granted would enable him to remain in the United States.[23] The Court concluded that such relief fell outside the scope of the common-law habeas writ.[24] As a consequence, the Court held that, at least with respect to the relief sought by the respondent, Congress did not violate the Suspension Clause by limiting habeas relief for asylum seekers in IIRIRA.[25]

The question remains as to what aspects of habeas are aspects of this broader habeas are protected against suspension. Noting that the statutory writ of habeas corpus has been expanded dramatically since the First Congress, the Court has written that it "assume[s] . . . that the Suspension Clause of the Constitution refers to the writ as it exists today, rather than

---

[17] INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289 (2001).

[18] 533 U.S. at 301 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[19] 140 S. Ct. 1959, 1968–69 (2020).

[20] In relevant part, IIRIRA limited the review that an alien in expedited removal proceedings could obtain through a habeas petition by allowing habeas review of three matters: (1) whether the petitioner was an alien; (2) whether the petitioner was "ordered removed"; and (3) whether the petitioner had already been granted entry as a lawful permanent resident, refugee, or asylee. See 8 U.S.C. § 1252(e)(2)(A)–(C). The asylum seeker in Thuraissigiam challenged these jurisdictional limits, arguing they precluded review of a determination that he lacked a credible fear of persecution in his home country, of which an affirmative finding would enable him to enter the United States. Thuraissigiam, 140 S. Ct. at 1966–68.

[21] The respondent in Thuraissigiam stated "there is no reason" for the Court to consider anything beyond whether the writ of habeas corpus, as it existed in 1789, encompassed the relief sought. Thuraissigiam, 140 S. Ct. at 1969 & n.12.

[22] Id. at 1969 (discussing the views of William Blackstone and Justice Joseph Story, among others).

[23] Id. at 1969–71.

[24] In so concluding, the Court rejected the argument that three bodies of case law—(1) "British and American cases decided prior to or around the time of the adoption of the Constitution;" (2) decisions from the Court during the so-called "finality era" from the late nineteenth to the mid-twentieth century; and (3) two more recent cases—suggested that the Suspension Clause "guarantees a broader habeas right" than the right to contest the lawfulness of restraint and seek release. Id. at 1971–82. With regard to the early British and American cases, the Thuraissigiam Court viewed those cases to suggest that the habeas writ could only be used to secure a "simple release" from government custody. Id. at 1971–76. With respect to the finality-era case law, the Court viewed those cases, including Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U.S. 651 (1892), as simply interpreting the scope of the then-existing habeas statute and not what limitations the Suspension Clause imposes on Congress. Thuraissigiam, 140 S. Ct. at 1976–81. Finally, the Court distinguished two more recent cases, Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008) and INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289 (2001), holding that the former case did not pertain to immigration and that the latter case involved using habeas as a vehicle to seek the release of aliens who were in custody pending deportation proceedings. Thuraissigiam, 140 S. Ct. at 1981–82.

[25] Thuraissigiam, 140 S. Ct. at 1963–64.

as it existed in 1789."[26] This statement, however, appears to be in tension with the theory of congressionally defined habeas found in Bollman, unless one assumes that a habeas right, once created, cannot be diminished. The Court, however, in reviewing provisions of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act[27] that limited habeas, passed up an opportunity to delineate Congress's permissive authority over habeas, finding that none of the limitations to the writ in that statute raised questions of constitutional import.[28]

In Boumediene v. Bush,[29] in which the Court held that Congress's attempt to eliminate all federal habeas jurisdiction over "enemy combatant" detainees held at Guantanamo Bay[30] violated the Suspension Clause. Although the Court did not explicitly identify whether the underlying right to habeas that was at issue arose from statute, common law, or the Constitution itself, it did decline to infer "too much" from the lack of historical examples of habeas being extended to enemy aliens held overseas.[31] In Boumediene, the Court instead emphasized a "functional" approach that considered the citizenship and status of the detainee, the adequacy of the process through which the status determination was made, the nature of the sites where apprehension and detention took place, and any practical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner's entitlement to the writ.[32]

In further determining that the procedures afforded to the detainees to challenge their detention in court were not adequate substitutes for habeas, the Court noted the heightened due process concerns when a detention is based principally on Executive Branch proceedings—here, Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs)—rather than proceedings before a court of law.[33] The Court also expressed concern that the detentions had, in some cases, lasted as long as six years without significant judicial oversight.[34] The Court further noted the limitations at the CSRT stage on a detainee's ability to find and present evidence to challenge the government's case, the unavailability of assistance of counsel, the inability of a detainee to access certain classified government records which could contain critical allegations against him, and the admission of hearsay evidence. While reserving judgment as to whether the CSRT process itself comports with due process, the Court found that the

[26] Felker v. Turpin, 518 U.S. 651, 663–64 (1996). See INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 300–01 (2001) (leaving open the question of whether post-1789 legal developments are protected); Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372 (1977) (finding "no occasion" to define the contours of constitutional limits on congressional modification of the writ).

[27] Pub. L. No. 104-132, §§ 101–08, 110 Stat. 1214, 1217–26, amending, inter alia, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2244, 2253, 2254, 2255, and Fed. R. App. P. 22.

[28] Felker v. Turpin, 518 U.S. 651 (1996).

[29] 128 S. Ct. 2229 (2008).

[30] In Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), the Court found that 28 U.S.C. § 2241, the federal habeas statute, applied to these detainees. Congress then removed all court jurisdiction over these detainees under the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-148, § 1005(e)(1) (providing that "no court . . . shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider . . . an application for . . . habeas corpus filed by . . . an alien detained . . . at Guantanamo Bay)." After the Court decided in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006), that the Detainee Treatment Act did not apply to detainees whose cases were pending at the time of enactment, it was amended by the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Pub. L. No. 109-366, to also apply to pending cases where a detainee had been determined to be an enemy combatant.

[31] 128 S. Ct. at 2251.

[32] 128 S. Ct. at 2258, 2259.

[33] Under the Detainee Treatment Act, Pub. L. No. 109-148, Title X, Congress granted only a limited appeal right to determination made by the Executive Branch as to "(I) whether the status determination of [a] Combatant Status Review Tribunal . . . was consistent with the standards and procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense . . . and (ii) to the extent the Constitution and laws of the United States are applicable, whether the use of such standards and procedures to make the determination is consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States." § 1005(e)(2)(C).

[34] 128 S. Ct. at 2263, 2275.

appeals process for these decisions, assigned to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, did not contain the means necessary to correct errors occurring in the CSRT process.[35]

Clause 3—Nullification

ArtI.S9.C3.1 Historical Background on Bills of Attainder

Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

A bill of attainder is legislation that imposes punishment on a specific person or group of people without a judicial trial.[1] The term has its roots in English law before the Founding. As the Supreme Court has explained:

> The bill of attainder, a parliamentary act sentencing to death one or more specific persons, was a device often resorted to in sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century England for dealing with persons who had attempted, or threatened to attempt, to overthrow the government.[2]

A related sanction, known as a "bill of pains and penalties," historically referred to legislation imposing extrajudicial punishments less severe than death, such as banishment or deprivation of political rights.[3] Bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties were legal in England at the time of the Founding, and state legislatures in the United States also enacted bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties during the Revolution.[4] However, two separate clauses of the Constitution, Article I, Sections 9 and 10, respectively banned enactment of bills of attainder by the Federal Government and the states.[5]

The Framers adopted the constitutional prohibitions on bills of attainder unanimously and without debate.[6] However, sources from around the time of the Founding outline key concerns underlying the Bill of Attainder Clauses. In the Federalist No. 44, James Madison noted that

---

[35] The Court focused in particular on the inability of the reviewing court to admit and consider relevant exculpatory evidence that was not introduced in the prior proceeding. The Court also listed other potential constitutional infirmities in the review process, including the absence of provisions empowering the D.C. Circuit to order release from detention, and not permitting petitioners to challenge the President's authority to detain them indefinitely.

[1] See, e.g., Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 468 (1977). In construing an analogous constitutional provision prohibiting the States from enacting bills of attainder, U.S. Const. art. I § 10 cl. 1, the Supreme Court has held that the clause "is directed against legislative action only, and does not reach erroneous or inconsistent decisions by the courts." Frank v. Magnum, 237 U.S. 309, 344 (1915). Accord Ross v. Oregon, 227 U.S. 150, 161 (1913).

[2] United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 441 (1965). A bill of attainder also resulted in forfeiture of the target's property, including the right of the person's heirs to inherit it. Id. ("In addition to the death sentence, attainder generally carried with it a 'corruption of blood,' which meant that the attainted party's heirs could not inherit his property.").

[3] Id. at 441–42.

[4] Id. at 442. As one notable example, in 1778, Thomas Jefferson drafted, and the Virginia House of Delegates enacted, a bill of attainder targeting a man accused of offenses including treason, murder, and arson. 2 The Papers of Thomas Jefferson 189 (J. Boyd ed., 2018).

[5] For the prohibition on state bills of attainder, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. See also ArtI.S10.C1.4 State Bills of Attainder. The Supreme Court appears to have interpreted the federal and state prohibitions as having the same scope. See, e.g., Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333, 377–78 (1866) ("In [Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277 (1866)] we have had occasion to consider [the state Bill of Attainder Clause] . . . A like prohibition is contained in the Constitution against enactments of this kind by Congress; and the argument presented in that case against certain clauses of the constitution of Missouri is equally applicable to the act of Congress under consideration in this case."); Nixon, 433 U.S. at 468–76 (citing Cummings in case applying federal Bill of Attainder Clause).

[6] Brown, 381 U.S. at 441.

many states had enacted constitutional provisions banning bills of attainder.[7] Observing that bills of attainder "are contrary to the first principles of the social compact, and to every principle of sound legislation," he opined that it was appropriate for the Framers also to ban the practice in the federal constitution, "add[ing] this constitutional bulwark in favor of personal security and private rights."[8] Joseph Story's Commentaries explained that bills of attainder undermine both separation of powers and the individual right to a judicial trial.[9]

ArtI.S9.C3.2 Bills of Attainder Doctrine

Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Supreme Court cases have given "broad and generous meaning to the constitutional protection against bills of attainder" by interpreting it to ban not only legislation imposing a death sentence, as the term was used at English common law, but also legislation that imposes other forms of punishment on specific persons without trial.[1] However, the Court has emphasized that legislation does not violate the Bill of Attainder Clause simply because it places legal burdens on a specific individual or group.[2] Rather, as discussed in more detail below, a bill of attainder must also inflict punishment.[3] Another key feature of a bill of attainder is that it applies retroactively: the Supreme Court has held that the Bill of Attainder Clause does not apply to legislation that "is intended to prevent future action rather than to punish past action."[4] The Court has also held that the prohibition on bills of attainder does not safeguard the states against allegedly punitive federal legislation[5] and does not protect U.S. citizens who commit crimes abroad and face trial in other jurisdictions.[6] Overall, the Supreme Court's decisions suggest that the Court has applied the Bill of Attainder Clause to prevent legislatures from circumventing the courts by punishing people without due process of law.

---

[7] The Federalist No. 44 (James Madison).

[8] Id.

[9] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1338 (1833) (In bill of attainder cases, "the legislature assumes judicial magistracy, pronouncing upon the guilt of the party without any of the common forms and guards of trial, and satisfying itself with proofs, when such proofs are within its reach, whether they are conformable to the rules of evidence, or not. In short, in all such cases, the legislature exercises the highest power of sovereignty, and what may be properly deemed an irresponsible despotic discretion, being governed solely by what it deems political necessity or expediency, and too often under the influence of unreasonable fears, or unfounded suspicions.").

[1] Nixon, 433 U.S. at 469; see also Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87, 138 (1810) ("A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.").

[2] Id. at 470–71.

[3] Id. at 472–73; see also Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 95–96 (1958) ("Each time a statute has been challenged as being in conflict with the constitutional prohibitions against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, it has been necessary to determine whether a penal law was involved, because these provisions apply only to statutes imposing penalties." (footnotes omitted)).

[4] American Communications Ass'n, C.I.O., v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 414 (1950). The Bill of Attainder Clause is one of several constitutional provisions that limit the ability of the Federal Government and the states to legislate retroactively. See Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 266 (1994).

[5] South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 324 (1966) ("[C]ourts have consistently regarded the Bill of Attainder Clause of Article I and the principle of the separation of powers only as protections for individual persons and private groups, those who are peculiarly vulnerable to non-judicial determinations of guilt. . . . Nor does a State have standing as the parent of its citizens to invoke these constitutional provisions against the Federal Government, the ultimate parens patriae of every American citizen." (internal citations omitted)).

[6] Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109, 122 (1901) (holding that constitutional provisions including the Bill of Attainder Clause "have no relation to crimes committed without the jurisdiction of the United States against the laws of a foreign country").

The Supreme Court applied the constitutional prohibitions on bills of attainder in a pair of Reconstruction-era cases, Ex parte Garland[7] and Cummings v. Missouri.[8] Garland concerned a federal statute, while Cummings involved a post-Civil War amendment to the Missouri constitution, but both of the challenged provisions required persons engaged in certain professions to swear an oath that they had never been disloyal to the United States.[9] In both cases, the Court held that the effect of the challenged provisions was to punish a group of individuals who had been disloyal to the United States, and the punishment they faced was effective exclusion from the covered professions.[10]

Based on that holding, the Supreme Court invalidated the provisions as unconstitutional bills of attainder.[11] In Cummings, the Court noted that the challenged state constitutional provisions did not expressly "define any crimes, or declare that any punishment shall be inflicted, but they produce[d] the same result upon the parties, against whom they are directed, as though the crimes were defined and the punishment was declared."[12] The provisions "aimed at past acts, and not future acts," and were "intended to operate by depriving such persons of the right to hold certain offices and trusts, and to pursue their ordinary and regular avoications."[13] The Court held that this deprivation constituted a punishment, and that the purported option to avoid the restriction by swearing a loyalty oath did not make it less so:

> The framers of the constitution of Missouri knew at the time that whole classes of individuals would be unable to take the oath prescribed. To them . . . the deprivation was intended to be, and is, absolute and perpetual. To make the enjoyment of a right dependent upon an impossible condition is equivalent to an absolute denial of the right under any condition, and such denial, enforced for a past act, is nothing less than punishment imposed for that act.[14]

In Garland, the Court applied its reasoning in Cummings to strike down the similar federal law.[15]

In the 1946 case United States v. Lovett, the Supreme Court struck down as a bill of attainder an appropriations bill cutting off the pay of certain named federal employees accused of being "subversives."[16] The Court explained that the challenged legislation effectively declared specific persons guilty of the crime of subversive activities "without the safeguards of

---

[7] 71 U.S. 333 (1866).

[8] 71 U.S. 277 (1866).

[9] See Garland, 71 U.S. at 334–35 (federal statute required attorneys practicing in federal court to swear an oath that they had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States or "given . . . aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto"); Cummings, 71 U.S. at 280 (state constitutional provision required members of the clergy and others to swear, "I have always been truly and loyally on the side of the United States against all enemies thereof, foreign and domestic").

[10] See Garland, 71 U.S. at 377 ("The statute is directed against parties who have offended in any of the particulars embraced by these clauses [related to past disloyalty]. And its object is to exclude them from the profession of the law, or at least from its practice in the courts of the United States."); Cummings, 71 U.S. at 320 (The oath requirement "was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment, and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties, who had committed them, of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen.").

[11] Cummings, 71 U.S. at 325–29; Garland, 71 U.S. at 380.

[12] Cummings, 71 U.S. at 327.

[13] Id.

[14] Id.

[15] Garland, 71 U.S. at 377–78.

[16] 328 U.S. 303, 315 (1946).

a judicial trial."[17] The legislation further permanently barred those persons from government service, which qualified as "punishment . . . of a most severe type."[18] Similarly, in the 1965 case United States v. Brown, the Court held that a federal statute making it a crime for a member of the Communist Party to serve as an officer of a labor union was a bill of attainder.[19] The Brown Court eschewed a rigid historical view of the Bill of Attainder Clause, explaining that the clause > was intended not as a narrow, technical (and therefore soon to be outmoded) prohibition, but rather as an implementation of the separation of powers, a general safeguard against legislative exercise of the judicial function, or more simply-trial by legislature.[20]

The Court concluded that Congress had "exceeded the authority granted it by the Constitution" in enacting the challenged statute because, rather than creating generally applicable rules for courts to apply, the statute "designate[d] in no uncertain terms the persons who possess . . . feared characteristics and therefore cannot hold union office without incurring criminal liability—members of the Communist Party."[21] By contrast, in roughly contemporaneous cases, the Supreme Court rejected bill of attainder challenges to a decision of the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare terminating old-age insurance benefits of an individual who had been deported[22] and an order of the Subversive Activities Control Board requiring the Communist Party of the United States to register as a "Communist-action organization."[23]

The Supreme Court articulated the current test for whether a law is a bill of attainder in the 1977 case Nixon v. Administrator of General Services.[24] In that case, former President Richard M. Nixon challenged provisions of a federal statute that directed the Administrator of General Services to take custody of and preserve his presidential papers and tape recordings.[25] The Court held that a statute constitutes a bill of attainder only if it both applies with specificity and imposes punishment without trial.[26] With respect to the legislation before it, the Supreme Court acknowledged "the Act's specificity—the fact that it refer[red] to [President Nixon] by name."[27] However, the Court rejected the proposition that an individual or defined group is subject to a bill of attainder "whenever he or it is compelled to bear burdens which the individual or group dislikes."[28] Instead, the Court explained, Congress may in some [17] Id. at 317. See also Bigelow v. Forrest, 76 U.S. 339, 345 (1869) ("[The] limitation upon bills of attainder does not apply to proceedings in courts, in individual cases, where there are regular trials and formal proceedings in which the individual has full opportunity to defend.").

---

[18] Id. at 313, 316.

[19] 381 U.S. 437, 440 (1965).

[20] Id. at 442.

[21] Id. at 450.

[22] Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 617 (1960) (holding that "the mere denial of a noncontractual governmental benefit" was not sufficently punitive to constitute a bill of attainder).

[23] Communist Party of U.S. v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 86 (1961) (registration requirement was not a bill of attainder because "[i]t attache[d] not to specified organizations but to described activities in which an organization may or may not engage," the registration requirement applied only "after full administrative hearing, subject to judicial review," and the law was not retroactive since parties subject to it could "escape regulation merely by altering the course of their own present activities").

[24] 433 U.S. 425 (1977).

[25] Id. at 429.

[26] Id. at 471–73.

[27] Id. at 471–72.

[28] Id. at 470.

circumstances regulate "a legitimate class of one."[29] If such a law applies with specificity but does not impose punishment, it will not be struck down as a bill of attainder.[30]

The Nixon Court then proceeded to lay out three tests for assessing whether a law imposes punishment: (1) historical, (2) functional, and (3) motivational. The historical test looks to "[t]he infamous history of bills of attainder" to determine whether the law was one of a limited set of legislative actions that were deemed to be bills of attainder before the Founding and in prior Supreme Court cases.[31] Those historical punishments included pre-Founding legislation imposing death sentences, imprisonment, and banishment, as well as the employment bans that were struck down in Cummings, Lovett, and Brown.[32] The functional test considers "whether the law under challenge, viewed in terms of the type and severity of burdens imposed, reasonably can be said to further nonpunitive legislative purposes."[33] The motivational test looks to legislative history to determine "whether the legislative record evinces a congressional intent to punish."[34] Finding that none of the three tests were satisfied in Nixon, the Supreme Court concluded that the law requiring the transfer and preservation of the presidential records did not qualify as a punishment under any of these three tests.[35]

The Court has continued to apply the Nixon framework in its rare Bill of Attainder cases since 1977. In Selective Service System v. Minnesota Public Interest Research Group, the Supreme Court rejected a bill of attainder challenge to a federal statute that denied student financial assistance to male students who failed to register for the draft.[36] After holding that the statute did not single out a specific group based on past actions because "those failing to register timely can qualify for aid by registering late," the Court concluded that none of the Nixon tests suggested that the law was punitive.[37]

ArtI.S9.C3.3 Ex Post Facto Laws

ArtI.S9.C3.3.1 Overview of Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Separate provisions of the Constitution ban enactment of ex post facto laws by the Federal Government and the states, respectively.[1] The Supreme Court has cited cases interpreting the [29] Id. at 472.

[30] Id.

[31] Id. at 473.

[32] Id. at 474–75.

[33] Id. at 475–76. See also Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 96 (1958) ("If [a] statute imposes a disability for the purposes of punishment—that is, to reprimand the wrongdoer, to deter others, etc., it has been considered penal. But a statute has been considered nonpenal if it imposes a disability, not to punish, but to accomplish some other legitimate governmental purpose.").

[34] Id. at 478. "[O]nly the clearest proof could suffice to establish the unconstitutionality of a statute" based on punitive intent. Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 617 (1960).

[35] Id. at 484. In Local 28 of Sheet Metal Workers' Int'l Ass'n v. Equal Employment Opportunity Com'n, the Supreme Court rejected as without merit the argument that a construction of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 allowing a court to impose an affirmative action plan on an entity that violated Title VII had "the effect of making the Civil Rights Act an unconstitutional bill of attainder, visiting upon white persons the sins of past discrimination by others." 478 U.S. 421, 481 n.50 (1986).

[36] 468 U.S. 841, 856 (1984).

[37] Id. at 850–56.

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3; art. I, § 10, cl. 1. While there are two Ex Post Facto Clauses, only one of the two can apply to any given piece of legislation. Courts and commentators at times distinguish between the federal Ex Post

ArtI.S9.C3.3.1
Overview of Ex Post Facto Laws

federal Ex Post Facto Clause in challenges under the state clause, and vice versa, implying that the two clauses have the same scope.[2] The Court has construed both clauses to ban legislatures from enacting laws that impose criminal liability or increase criminal punishment retroactively.[3] The constitutional prohibitions of ex post facto laws are closely related to the prohibitions of bills of attainder—legislative actions that determine guilt or impose criminal punishment on specific persons or groups without a judicial trial.[4] In some cases, the Court has held that a single legislative action may violate both the ex post facto and bill of attainder prohibitions.[5]

Some ex post facto cases involve facial challenges—claims that the challenged laws are invalid in all circumstances.[6] Many, however, involve claims that the Ex Post Facto Clauses bar applying laws to specific offenses that were committed before the laws' enactment.[7] The Supreme Court has denied ex post facto claims when it has found that a law is not ex post facto as applied to the challenger, even when the law might be ex post facto as applied to others not before the Court.[8]

The Supreme Court has held that the constitutional prohibitions on ex post facto laws do not apply to crimes committed outside the jurisdiction of the United States against the laws of a foreign country.[9]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.2 Historical Background on Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

An ex post facto law, named using the Latin phrase for "after the fact," is a law that imposes criminal liability or increases criminal punishment retroactively.[1] Two separate clauses of the Constitution, Article I, Sections 9 and 10, respectively ban enactment of ex post facto laws by the Federal Government and the states.[2]

Facto Clause and the state Ex Post Facto Clause, but also sometimes use the singular "Ex Post Facto Clause" without explicitly distinguishing between the two. E.g., Dorsey v. United. States 567 U.S. 260, 275 (2012) ("Although the Constitution's Ex Post Facto Clause, Art. I, § 9, cl. 3, prohibits applying a new Act's higher penalties to pre-Act conduct, it does not prohibit applying lower penalties.").

[2] See, e.g., Peugh v. United States, 569 U.S. 530, 532–33 (2013) (case construing federal clause citing case construing state clause); Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U.S. 505, 510 (1903) (case construing state clause citing case construing federal clause).

[3] See, e.g., Calder, 3 U.S. at 389; Peugh, 569 U.S. at 532–33; Baltimore and Susquehanna R.R. v. Nesbit, 51 U.S. 395, 401 (1850) (a state can enact a retroactive law that is not punitive and does not impair the obligation of contracts). See also Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87, 138 (1810) ("An ex post facto law is one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed."); Locke v. New Orleans, 71 U.S. 172, 173 (1867); Orr v. Gilman, 183 U.S. 278, 285 (1902).

[4] E.g., Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 537–38 (1977).

[5] E.g., Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277 (1866); Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333 (1866).

[6] See, e.g., Garland, 71 U.S. at 382; cf. Jaehne v. New York, 128 U.S. 189, 194 (1888) (challenger argued that a law was facially invalid because it could be ex post facto in some cases).

[7] See, e.g., Lindsey v. Washington, 301 U.S. 397, 398 (1937); Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 28–33 (1981).

[8] Jaehne, 128 U.S. at 194 (law that might be void as applied to pre-enactment offenses was not void as applied to post-enactment offenses); Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 608–09 (1913).

[9] Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109, 123 (1901).

[1] E.g., Locke v. New Orleans, 71 U.S. 172, 173 (1867).

[2] For the prohibition on state ex post facto laws, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. See also ArtI.S10.C1.5 State Ex Post Facto Laws.

In the Federalist No. 44, James Madison asserted that ex post facto laws "are contrary to the first principles of the social compact, and to every principle of sound legislation."[3] In the Federalist No. 84, Alexander Hamilton further justified prohibitions on ex post facto laws by arguing:

> The creation of crimes after the commission of the fact, or . . . punishment for things which, when they were done, were breaches of no law, and the practice of arbitrary imprisonments, have been, in all ages, the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny.[4]

The prohibition on ex post facto laws seeks "to assure that legislative Acts give fair warning of their effect and permit individuals to rely on their meaning until explicitly changed" and "restricts governmental power by restraining arbitrary and potentially vindictive legislation."[5] The Supreme Court has further stated that the prohibition is based on > the notion that laws . . . which purport to make innocent acts criminal after the event, or to aggravate an offense, are harsh and oppressive, and that the criminal quality attributable to an act . . . should not be altered by legislative enactment, after the fact, to the disadvantage of the accused.[6]

At the Constitutional Convention, multiple delegates expressed disapproval of ex post facto laws. However, some believed that an explicit constitutional prohibition of ex post facto laws was unnecessary because such laws were clearly invalid. One delegate "contended that there was no lawyer, no civilian who would not say that ex post facto laws were void of themselves."[7] Others asserted that including the prohibition could do harm by "proclaim[ing] that we are ignorant of the first principles of Legislation, or are constituting a Government which will be so" or "implying an improper suspicion of the National Legislature."[8] Other delegates responded that an express prohibition was necessary because some state legislatures had previously passed ex post facto laws, and state constitutional bans of such laws had been invoked to oppose them.[9]

There was also discussion at the Convention as to whether the prohibition on ex post facto laws applied only to retroactive criminal laws or also forbade retroactive civil laws.[10] The delegates rejected a suggestion that would have altered the federal Ex Post Facto Clause to state expressly that it applied to civil laws, but they did not clearly resolve the question.[11] Soon after ratification, in the 1798 case Calder v. Bull, the Supreme Court construed the constitutional prohibition on ex post facto laws to prohibit only retroactive criminal laws.[12]

---

[3] The Federalist No. 44, at 278–79 (James Madison). Madison further noted that several state constitutions expressly banned ex post facto laws and that in any case such laws were "prohibited by the spirit and scope of these fundamental charters." Id.

[4] The Federalist No. 84, at 511 (Alexander Hamilton).

[5] Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 28–29 (1981).

[6] Beazell v. Ohio, 269 U.S. 167, 170 (1925). By contrast, the Supreme Court has held that retroactive criminal statutes that do not disadvantage criminal defendants are not ex post facto laws. See ArtI.S9.C3.3.5 Increasing Punishment and Ex Post Facto Laws.

[7] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 376 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[8] Id.

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 448–49, 617.

[11] Id. at 617. See also id. at 440 (considering amendment to the state Ex Post Facto Clause that would instead have prohibited enactment of "retrospective laws").

[12] 3 U.S. 386, 389 (1798). See also 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1339 (1833).

ArtI.S9.C3.3.3 Retroactivity of Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

As the phrase "ex post facto" ("after the fact") suggests, the Ex Post Facto Clauses apply only to legislation that imposes or increases a punishment retroactively.[1] The Ex Post Facto Clauses are related to other constitutional provisions that limit retroactive government action, including the federal and state Bill of Attainder Clauses, the Contract Clause, and the Due Process Clauses.[2]

In ex post facto cases, the relevant point in time for determining whether a law applies retroactively is the time the offense was committed: the Supreme Court has explained that people must have notice of the possible criminal penalties for their actions at the time they act.[3]

A key consideration in ex post facto cases is whether the specific individuals challenging the law had notice of all the legal consequences of their actions at the time they committed their offenses. The Supreme Court has rejected ex post facto challenges to laws that might apply retroactively in some circumstances but applied only prospectively to the challengers before the Court.[4] The Court has also held that statutes are not retroactive if they apply to past conduct that was also prohibited under a prior statute. For instance, in Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, the Court considered ex post facto claims from several resident aliens who had been ordered deported under a 1940 statute based on their pre-1940 membership in the Communist Party.[5] The Court stated that "[a]n impression of retroactivity results from reading as a new and isolated enactment what is actually a continuation of prior legislation."[6] However, the Court noted that membership in organizations such as the Communist Party had been grounds for deportation since 1920. Thus, the challengers "were not caught unawares by a change of law. There can be no contention that they were not adequately forewarned both that their conduct was prohibited and of its consequences."[7]

The Supreme Court has denied ex post facto challenges to laws that impose legal consequences based not solely on past conduct but rather on an ongoing condition that began in the past. In a late nineteenth century case, Murphy v. Ramsey, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a law that disenfranchised bigamists and polygamists, holding that the law did not retroactively impose a penalty for a crime.[8] Although bigamy and polygamy were criminal offenses, the Court observed that the criminal offense was the unlawful marriage itself and was subject to a three-year statute of limitations following the marriage, so that a person subject to disenfranchisement might be "a bigamist or a polygamist, and yet guilty of no criminal offense."[9]

---

[1] See, e.g., Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 391 (1798).

[2] See, e.g., Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87, 138–39 (1810).

[3] See, e.g., Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 30 (1981) ("Critical to relief under the Ex Post Facto Clause is . . . the lack of fair notice and governmental restraint when the legislature increases punishment beyond what was prescribed when the crime was consummated.").

[4] Jaehne v. New York, 128 U.S. 189, 194 (1888) (law that might be void as applied to pre-enactment offenses was not void as applied to post-enactment offenses); Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 608–09 (1913).

[5] 342 U.S. 580, 581–82 (1952).

[6] Id. at 593.

[7] Id.

[8] 114 U.S. 15, 36 (1885).

[9] Id. at 43.

In United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to the application of an 1890 antitrust law to an agreement begun in 1889.[10] The Court explained that the law did not apply to past conduct but rather to an ongoing violation: even if the agreement was lawful when entered into, "the continuation of the agreement, after it has been declared to be illegal, becomes a violation of the act. . . . There is nothing of an ex post facto character about the act."[11] Similarly, in Samuels v. McCurdy, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a law that prohibited the possession of liquor that was legal when purchased.[12] The Court held that the law did not "provide a punishment for a past offense" by penalizing the owner "for having become possessed of the liquor," but instead imposed a penalty for "continuing to possess the liquor after the enactment of the law."[13]

The Supreme Court has rejected multiple ex post facto challenges to repeat offender statutes on the ground that such statutes do not penalize past conduct.[14] In McDonald v. Massachusetts, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a "habitual criminal" statute that imposed an increased penalty for post-enactment offenses based on the defendant's previous, pre-enactment criminal convictions.[15] While the defendant argued that the law amounted to an additional punishment for his prior offenses, the Court concluded that the "statute, imposing a punishment on none but future crimes, is not ex post facto."[16] The Court likewise approved the consideration of pre-enactment offenses under a repeat offender statute in Gryger v. Burke.[17] The Court explained that the sentence for a habitual criminal "is not to be viewed as . . . additional penalty for the earlier crimes. It is a stiffened penalty for the latest crime, which is considered to be an aggravated offense because a repetitive one."[18]

In Johnson v. United States, the Court denied an ex post facto challenge to a statute authorizing courts to impose an additional term of supervised release following the reimprisonment of persons who violate the conditions of an initial term of supervised release.[19] The Court declined to construe the statute to apply retroactively and therefore concluded that "the ex post facto question does not arise."[20]

In Kansas v. Hendricks, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a statute allowing for civil commitment of "sexually violent predators," in part because the statue was not retroactive.[21] The Court held that the law allowed for involuntary confinement "based upon a determination that the person currently both suffers from a 'mental abnormality' or

---

[10] 166 U.S. 290, 342 (1897).

[11] Id. See also Chicago & Alton R.R. v. Tranbarger, 238 U.S. 67, 73 (1915) ("[P]laintiff in error is subjected to a penalty not because of the manner in which it originally constructed its railroad embankment, nor for anything else done or omitted before the passage of the act . . ., but because after that time it maintained the embankment in a manner prohibited by that act.").

[12] 267 U.S. 188, 191 (1925).

[13] Id. at 193.

[14] Cf. Graham v. West Virginia, 224 U.S. 616, 623 (1912) (upholding repeat offender law against non-ex post facto challenges, holding: "The propriety of inflicting severer punishment upon old offenders has long been recognized in this country and in England. They are not punished the second time for the earlier offense, but the repetition of criminal conduct aggravates their guilt and justifies heavier penalties when they are again convicted.").

[15] 180 U.S. 311, 311 (1901).

[16] Id. at 313.

[17] 334 U.S. 728, 729 (1948).

[18] Id. at 732.

[19] 529 U.S. 694, 696 (2000).

[20] Id. at 702.

[21] 521 U.S. 346, 371 (1997). The Court also held that the statute was not punitive. See ArtI.S9.C3.3.5 Increasing Punishment and Ex Post Facto Laws.

'personality disorder' and is likely to pose a future danger to the public."[22] The Court explained that, under the statute, past behavior was permissably used "solely for evidentiary purposes."[23]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.4 Ex Post Facto Law Prohibition Limited to Penal Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Since the 1798 case Calder v. Bull, the Supreme Court has interpreted the Ex Post Facto Clauses to apply only to laws that are criminal or penal in nature, not to civil laws.[1] The Court has explained, however, that "the ex post facto effect of a law cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to that which is essentially criminal."[2] In Calder, the Court enumerated four ways in which a legislature may violate the Ex Post Facto Clauses' prohibition on imposing retroactive criminal liability: (1) making criminal an action taken before enactment of the law that was lawful when it was done; (2) increasing the severity of an offense after it was committed; (3) increasing the punishment for a crime after it was committed; and (4) altering the rules of evidence after an offense was committed so that it is easier to convict an offender.[3]

Supreme Court decisions from the nineteenth century suggested that a legislature might violate the Ex Post Facto Clauses in ways that do not fit within any of the four categories recognized in Calder.[4] However, in the 1990 case Collins v. Youngblood, the Court rejected that reasoning and held that the scope of the prohibition on ex post facto laws is "defined by the Calder categories."[5]

[22] Id.

[23] Id.

[1] Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 389 (1798); see also, e.g., Watson v. Mercer, 33 U.S. 88, 110 (1834) ("The constitution of the United States does not prohibit the states from passing retrospective laws generally; but only ex post facto laws. Now it has been solemnly settled by this court, that the phrase, ex post facto laws, is not applicable to civil laws, but to penal and criminal laws."). For additional discussion of certain categories of laws that have generally been held to be non-penal in nature, see ArtI.S9.C3.3.10 Retroactive Taxes and Ex Post Facto Laws and ArtI.S9.C3.3.12 Ex Post Facto Laws, Deportation, and Related Issues. For discussion of other constitutional provisions that apply exclusively to penal laws, see ArtI.S9.C3.1 Historical Background on Bills of Attainder, ArtI.S10.C1.4 State Bills of Attainder, and Amdt5.3.1 Overview of Double Jeopardy Clause.

[2] Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U.S. 381, 385 (1878); see also Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277, 278 (1866).

[3] Calder, 3 U.S. at 390. Cf. Trop v. Dulles 356 U.S. 86, 95 (1958) ("In deciding whether or not a law is penal, this Court has generally based its determination upon the purpose of the statute. If the statute imposes a disability for the purposes of punishment—that is, to reprimand the wrongdoer, to deter others, etc., it has been considered penal. But a statute has been considered nonpenal if it imposes a disability, not to punish, but to accomplish some other legitimate governmental purpose. The Court has recognized that any statute decreeing some adversity as a consequence of certain conduct may have both a penal and a nonpenal effect.") (footnotes omitted).

[4] Kring v. Missouri, 107 U.S. 221, 228 (1883), overruled by Collins v. Youngblood, 497 U.S. 37 (1990); cf. Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343, 352 (1898) (same).

[5] 497 U.S. 37, 47 (1990).

ArtI.S9.C3.3.5 Increasing Punishment and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

The Supreme Court has denied ex post facto challenges to changes to trial procedures and sentences that do not disadvantage criminal defendants.[1] For instance, in Dobbert v. Florida, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a state law that changed the role of the jury in capital cases.[2] The sentencing regime in place at the time the challenger committed his offenses provided for a death sentence upon conviction of a capital felony, unless a majority of the jury chose to depart from the presumption and instead recommended a life sentence. The revised procedure allowed the jury to render a non-binding advisory opinion on whether a death sentence was warranted; the judge then considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances and determined whether to impose a death sentence. A death sentence had to be supported by written findings by the judge and was subject to expedited appellate review.[3] The Supreme Court held that the new regime was not ex post facto, in part because it was "on the whole ameliorative," providing increased procedural protections for defendants.[4]

In Malloy v. South Carolina, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a statute that changed the method of execution from hanging to electrocution for persons previously sentenced to death.[5] The change was based on a determination that electrocution was more humane.[6] The Court explained that the law did not change the applicable death sentence, "but only the mode of producing this, together with certain nonessential details in respect of surroundings. The punishment was not increased, and some of the odious features incident to the old method were abated."[7] Similarly, in Holden v. Minnesota, the Court held that a statute changing the time of executions and limiting who could attend executions was not ex post facto.[8]

By contrast, the Supreme Court has held that statues that retroactively increase the severity of a criminal sentence are ex post facto laws. Another provision of the statute at issue in Holden mandated solitary confinement pending execution.[9] The Court held that such a provision "may be deemed ex post facto, if applied to offenses committed before its passage."[10]

---

[1] See, e.g., Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 294 (1977) ("It is axiomatic that for a law to be ex post facto it must be more onerous than the prior law.").

[2] Id. at 284.

[3] Id. at 290.

[4] Id. at 292. The Court explained, "The Florida Legislature enacted the new procedure specifically to provide the constitutional procedural protections required by [Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)], thus providing capital defendants with more, rather than less, judicial protection." Id. at 294–95. Other aspects of the Dobbert decision are discussed later in this section and in the section Procedural Changes.

[5] 237 U.S. 180, 183 (1915).

[6] Id. at 185.

[7] Id. See also Rooney v. North Dakota, 196 U.S. 319, 326–27 (1905) (statute increasing the term of imprisonment prior to execution "did not alter the situation to the material disadvantage of the criminal, and, therefore, was not ex post facto when applied to his case in the particulars mentioned"); Dorsey v. United States, 567 U.S. 260, 275 (2012) ("Although the Constitution's Ex Post Facto Clause . . . prohibits applying a new Act's higher penalties to pre-Act conduct, it does not prohibit applying lower penalties.").

[8] 137 U.S. 483, 491 (1890).

[9] Id. at 491.

[10] Id. The Court ultimately denied the ex post facto claim because it concluded there was no evidence that the prisoner challenging the law was actually being held in solitary confinement. Id. at 491–92.

In In re Medley, the Court held that a statute that required a previously convicted death row inmate to be held in solitary confinement until execution and not informed of his execution date was ex post facto.[11]

In considering ex post facto challenges to the length of prison sentences, the Court has held that a law may be impermissible if it increases the sentencing range for a past offense, even if it is not certain that the defendant received a higher sentence than he would have under the previous regime. In Lindsey v. Washington, criminal defendants challenged as ex post facto a statute that imposed a mandatory minimum sentence equal to what had been the maximum sentence at the time they committed their offense.[12] The Supreme Court held that the law was ex post facto as applied to pre-enactment offenses. The Court observed that "[t]he effect of the new statute is to make mandatory what was before only the maximum sentence."[13] While acknowledging that the challengers might have received the new mandatory minimum sentence under the prior regime, the Court emphasized that "the ex post facto clause looks to the standard of punishment prescribed by a statute, rather than to the sentence actually imposed."[14] Thus, in Miller v. Florida, the Court held that new state sentencing guidelines could not be applied retroactively to offenses that had been commited when a lower presumptive sentencing range was in place.[15] Similarly, in Peugh v. United States, the Court held that it violated the federal Ex Post Facto Clause when a defendant was sentenced under a new version of the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines promulgated after he committed his offense that provided a higher sentencing range—even though the Guidelines were only advisory and courts were free to impose sentences outside the range.[16]

The Supreme Court has held that statutes that canceled or reduced release credits earned by prisoners were ex post facto laws. In Weaver v. Graham, the Court held that a statute reducing credits for good behavior that counted towards early release was ex post facto as applied to a prisoner whose offense occurred before the statue was enacted.[17] In another case, Lynce v. Mathis, the Court heard an ex post facto challenge from a prisoner whose early release credits were canceled after he had been released, causing him to be rearrested and returned to prison.[18] The Court held that the retroactive cancellation of credits increased punishment because "it made ineligible for early release a class of prisoners who were previously eligible—including some, like petitioner, who had actually been released."[19]

On the other hand, statutes decreasing the frequency of parole hearings do not necessarily violate the Ex Post Facto Clauses. In California Department of Corrections v. Morales, the Supreme Court held that a state law that changed the frequency of parole hearings for certain offenders from annual to every three years did not violate the state Ex Post Facto Clause as applied to prisoners who committed their offenses before its enactment.[20] In Garner v. Jones, the Court considered a state parole board rule that increased the time between parole hearings

[11] 134 U.S. 160, 167–73 (1890).

[12] 301 U.S. 397, 398 (1937).

[13] Id. at 400.

[14] Id. at 401.

[15] 482 U.S. 423, 435–36 (1987). The Miller Court explained that "one is not barred from challenging a change in the penal code on ex post facto grounds simply because the sentence he received under the new law was not more onerous than that which he might have received under the old." Id. at 432 (quoting Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 300 (1977)).

[16] 569 U.S. 530, 533 (2013).

[17] 450 U.S. 24, 28–33 (1981).

[18] 519 U.S. 433, 446–47 (1997).

[19] Id. at 447.

[20] 514 U.S. 499, 501–02 (1995).

from three years to as much as eight years.[21] The Court emphasized that the parole board had broad discretion over whether a prisoner was released, and opined that procedural changes within a system that had always allowed such discretion might not undermine the interest in "actual or constructive notice to the criminal before commission of the offense of the penalty for the transgression."[22] The Court explained that the key question in its ex post facto analysis was whether the amended rule "creates a significant risk of prolonging [the challenger's] incarceration."[23] On the record before it, the Court could not conclude the change lengthened his actual time of imprisonment.[24]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.6 Imposing Criminal Liability and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Congress and state legislatures sometimes enact temporary statutes that apply until a fixed expiration date. In United States v. Powers, the Supreme Court held that a legislature may extend a temporary criminal statute before it expires, and that, following the extension, the government may prosecute pre-extension conduct—that is, conduct that occurred while the temporary law was in effect and expected to expire as initially planned—without violating the Ex Post Facto Clause.[1] The Court explained that, due to the extension at issue in that case, "the Act has never ceased to be in effect. No new law was created; no old one was repealed. Without hiatus of any kind, the original Act was given extended life."[2]

In Dobbert v. Florida, a prisoner sentenced to death raised a claim that "there was no 'valid' death penalty in effect in Florida as of the date of his actions" because the state had made subsequent changes to sentencing procedures to satisfy newly articulated constitutional requirements.[3] The prisoner committed two murders between December 1971 and April 1972. In July 1972, the Florida Supreme Court found that the state's death penalty statute was inconsistent with the requirements laid out Furman v. Georgia.[4] Florida enacted new death penalty procedures in late 1972, and the challenger was convicted and sentenced under the new regime. The prisoner argued that the death penalty statute in effect at the time of his crimes had been struck down, and that applying the new statute to his conduct was ex post facto. The Supreme Court rejected that claim, holding that despite its procedural flaws, the old statute had "clearly indicated Florida's view of the severity of murder and of the degree of punishment" appropriate to that crime.[5]

By contrast, the Supreme Court has held that a legislature may not retroactively reimpose criminal liability after it has lapsed. Many criminal laws contain statutes of limitations that bar prosecution once a certain amount of time passes after an offense is committed. In Stogner v. California, the Court held that "a law enacted after expiration of a previously applicable limitations period violates the Ex Post Facto Clause when it is applied to revive a previously

---

[21] 529 U.S. 244, 247 (2000).

[22] Id. at 253.

[23] Id. at 251.

[24] Id. at 256. The Court remanded the case to the lower federal courts for further consideration of that question. Id. at 257.

[1] 307 U.S. 214, 216 (1939).

[2] Id. at 217.

[3] 432 U.S. 282, 297 (1977).

[4] 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

[5] Dobbert, 432 U.S. at 297.

time-barred prosecution."[6] The Court explained that a law extending a statute of limitations after it had lapsed falls within the second category of ex post facto laws laid out in Calder, a "law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed," because it "inflict[s] punishments, where the party was not, by law, liable to any punishment."[7]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.7 Civil Commitment, Sex Offender Registration, and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

The Supreme Court has rejected ex post facto challenges to sex offender registration laws and laws imposing civil commitment for "sexually violent predators," holding that such laws are not penal in nature. For instance, in Kansas v. Hendricks, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a statute allowing for civil commitment of "sexually violent predators," in part because the statue was not punitive.[1] The Court held that the civil commitment statute did "not implicate either of the two primary objectives of criminal punishment: retribution or deterrence." On the contrary, the Court stated, "measures to restrict the freedom of the dangerously mentally ill" constituted "a legitimate nonpunitive governmental objective" and a "classic example of nonpunitive detention."[2] In Seling v. Young, the Court rejected a claim that a civil commitment statute was punitive and thus ex post facto as applied to a particular individual.[3] In Smith v. Doe, the Court denied an ex post facto challenge to the Alaska Sex Offender Registration Act.[4] The Court relied in part on Hendricks to analyze whether the challenged law was punitive, concluding that the registration statute was civil and non-punitive in both purpose and effect.[5]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.8 Procedural Changes and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

The Supreme Court has often, but not universally, denied ex post facto challenges to laws changing procedures in criminal trials. At times, the Court has suggested that the application of the Ex Post Facto Clauses depends on whether a challenged law is substantive or procedural, and that a procedural change cannot be ex post facto.[1] More recently, however, the Court has rejected a rigid distinction between substance and procedure and instead focused on whether a law falls within the four categories identified in Calder v. Bull.[2] Thus, in Collins v.

---

[6] 539 U.S. 607, 632–33 (2003).

[7] Id. at 614–615.

[1] 521 U.S. 346, 360–61 (1997). The Court also held that the statute was not retroactive. See ArtI.S9.C3.3.3 Retroactivity of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[2] Id. at 361–63.

[3] 531 U.S. 250, 263 (2001).

[4] 538 U.S. 84, 95–106 (2003).

[5] Id.

[1] See, e.g., Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 293 (1977) ("Even though it may work to the disadvantage of a defendant, a procedural change is not ex post facto."); cf. Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U.S. 380, 388 (1898) ("[T]he statute is to be regarded as one merely regulating procedure, and may be applied to crimes committed prior to its passage without impairing the substantial guaranties of life and liberty that are secured to an accused by the supreme law of the land.").

[2] 3 U.S. 386, 390 (1798).

Youngblood, the Court held that "by simply labeling a law 'procedural,' a legislature does not thereby immunize it from scrutiny under the Ex Post Facto Clause."[3]

The Supreme Court has explained, "[t]he inhibition upon the passage of ex post facto laws does not give a criminal a right to be tried, in all respects, by the law in force when the crime charged was committed."[4] Rather, the legislature retains full authority to establish trial procedures, "subject only to the condition that [it] may not, under the guise of establishing modes of procedure and prescribing remedies, violate the accepted principles that protect an accused person against ex post facto enactments."[5] Thus, several Supreme Court cases have allowed the application of laws enacted after an offense that changed the place or mode of trial for that offense. For instance, in Gut v. Minnesota, the Court held that "[a]n ex post facto law does not involve, in any of its definitions, a change of the place of trial of an alleged offence after its commission."[6] In Beazell v. Ohio, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a statute providing for criminal defendants jointly indicted for a felony to be tried jointly rather than separately.[7] In Gibson v. Mississippi, the Court rejected a challenge to a post-offense statute implementing new jury selection procedures.[8] In Mallett v. North Carolina, the Court denied an ex post facto challenge to a post-offense statute providing the state a right of appeal when a criminal defendant was granted a new trial.[9]

Under the fourth category identified in Calder v. Bull, a statute that alters the rules of evidence after an offense was committed so it is easier to convict an offender is ex post facto.[10] However, not every change to evidentiary procedures in criminal cases violates the Ex Post Facto Clauses. In Thompson v. Missouri, the Supreme Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a post-offense statute that allowed prosecutors to introduce certain evidence related to the authenticity of a disputed letter in a murder trial.[11] The Thompson Court held that the statute did not fit within any of the Calder categories and was not "so unreasonable as materially to affect the substantial rights of one put on trial for crime."[12] In Splawn v. California, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a post-offense statute that altered jury instructions related to the consideration of evidence in an obscenity trial.[13] The Court emphasized that the substantive criminal law governing the challenger's conduct "was in full force and effect at all times relevant to [the] conduct."[14] By contrast, the newly enacted statute did "not create any new substantive offense, but merely declare[d] what type of evidence may be received and

[3] 497 U.S. 37, 46 (1990).

[4] Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U.S. 565, 590 (1896).

[5] Id.

[6] 76 U.S. 35, 38 (1870). See also Cook v. United States, 138 U.S. 157, 183 (1891); cf. Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U.S. 377, 382–83 (1894) (rejecting ex post facto challenge to state constitutional amendment separating the state supreme court into divisions and assigning certain cases to one division of the court).

[7] 269 U.S. 167, 169–70 (1925).

[8] 162 U.S. at 588–89.

[9] 181 U.S. 589, 593 (1901).

[10] 3 U.S. 386, 390 (1798).

[11] 171 U.S. 380, 381 (1898).

[12] Id. at 387. See also id. at 388 ("We cannot adjudge that the accused had any vested right in the rule of evidence which obtained prior to the passage of the Missouri statute, nor that the . . . statute entrenched upon any of the essential rights belonging to one put on trial for a public offense.").

[13] 431 U.S. 595, 599–600 (1977).

[14] Id. at 600.

considered."[15] Accepting a state court's conclusion that the new statute did not allow admission of previously inadmissible evidence, the Court held that the law was not ex post facto.[16]

Two cases about witness testimony illustrate the difference between laws that merely change trial procedures and those that alter the legal standards for conviction. In Hopt v. Utah, the Supreme Court denied an ex post facto challenge to a post-offense statute that allowed convicted felons to testify as witnesses in murder trials.[17] The Court held that the amendment did not fall within any of the Calder categories and that changes in the law that "only remove[ ] existing restrictions upon the competency of certain classes of persons as witnesses, relate to modes of procedure only, in which no one can be said to have a vested right."[18] The Court later distinguished Hopt in the 2000 case Carmell v. Texas.[19] In Carmell, the Court accepted an ex post facto challenge to a post-offense law that removed a requirement for corroborating evidence and authorized conviction of certain sexual offenses based on the victim's testimony alone.[20] Unlike in Hopt, the Carmell Court held that the challenged statute did not simply determine who was competent to testify but was instead "a sufficiency of the evidence rule" that lowered the burden to convict and thus fell within the fourth category of prohibited laws identified in Calder.[21]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.9 Employment Qualifications and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

The Supreme Court has heard multiple ex post facto challenges to laws that limit the ability of the challengers to engage in certain professions. The Court has struck down laws it deemed to impose employment bans as punishment for past conduct. For instance, in Cummings v. Missouri, the Court considered a challenge to a post-Civil War amendment to the Missouri Constitution that required persons engaged in certain professions to swear an oath that they had never been disloyal to the United States.[1] The Court held that the purpose and effect of the challenged amendment was to punish a group of individuals who had been disloyal to the United States, and the punishment they faced was effective exclusion from the covered professions.[2] The Court noted that some of the covered acts of disloyalty were crimes when they were committed, while some were not. The amendment violated the Ex Post Facto Clause in either case, whether by retroactively increasing the punishment for an existing offense or by imposing punishment for acts that were not offenses at the time they were committed.[3] The Court also held that the challenged provisions improperly "subvert[ed] the presumptions of innocence, and alter[ed] the rules of evidence" by "assum[ing] that the parties are guilty" and

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 601.

[17] 110 U.S. 574, 589 (1884).

[18] Id. at 590.

[19] 529 U.S. 513, 531–53 (2000).

[20] Id. at 516.

[21] Id. at 545.

[1] 71 U.S. 277, 280–81 (1866).

[2] Id. at 320 (determining that the oath requirement "was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment, and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties, who had committed them, of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen").

[3] Id. at 327–28.

requiring them to "establish their innocence."[4] In Ex parte Garland, the Court relied on its reasoning in Cummings to strike down a similar federal law.[5]

By contrast, the Court has rejected ex post facto challenges to laws that it found imposed legitimate, non-punitive employment qualifications. In Hawker v. New York, the Court denied a challenge to a state statute that barred any person convicted of a felony from practicing medicine.[6] The Court concluded that the prohibition "is not to be regarded as a mere imposition of additional penalty, but as prescribing the qualifications for the duties to be discharged and the position to be filled."[7] The Court further explained that a state "may require both qualifications of learning and of good character" of those engaged in the practice of medicine, may determine "that one who has violated the criminal laws of the state is not possessed of sufficient good character," and "may make the record of a conviction conclusive evidence of the fact of the violation of the criminal law, and of the absence of the requisite good character."[8] For similar reasons, the Court in Reetz v. Michigan rejected an ex post facto challenge to a state law that imposed new professional registration requirements for doctors and prohibited the practice of medicine by unregistered persons.[9]

In Garner v. Board of Public Works, the Supreme Court considered ex post facto challenges to a provision of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles barring from public employment any person who within the last five years had been affiliated with a group that advocated the forceful overthrow of the government, and a city ordinance requiring public employees to state whether they had ever been members of the Communist Party.[10] The Court construed the challenged provisions to apply only after adoption of the Charter to "bar[ ] from the city's public service persons who . . . advise, advocate, or teach the violent overthrow of the Government or who are or become affiliated with any group doing so."[11] The Court held that "[t]he provisions operating thus prospectively were a reasonable regulation to protect the municipal service by establishing an employment qualification of loyalty to the State and the United States."[12] It further held that the provisions were not ex post facto because, assuming that being fired for failure to satisfy the requirements constituted punishment, the conduct covered by the oath had been unlawful for years prior to imposition of the oath requirement, so the provisions did not operate to "impose[ ] punishment for past conduct lawful at the time it was engaged in."[13]

[4] Id. at 328.

[5] 71 U.S. 333, 377–78 (1867). Cf. Pierce v. Carskadon, 83 U.S. 234, 237–39 (1873) (striking down a law making access to certain court proceedings contingent on an affidavit that, among other things, "such defendant never voluntarily bore arms against the United States, the reorganized government of Virginia, or the State of West Virginia").

[6] 170 U.S. 189, 190–193 (1898). See also De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 160 (1960) (plurality opinion) (rejecting an ex post facto challenge to a state law that prevented any person who had been convicted of a felony and had not been pardoned from serving as an officer or agent for certain labor organizations).

[7] Hawker, 170 U.S. at 200.

[8] Id. at 191.

[9] 188 U.S. 505, 510 (1903).

[10] 341 U.S. 716, 718–19 (1951).

[11] Id. at 720.

[12] Id. at 720–21.

[13] Id. at 721.

ArtI.S9.C3.3.10 Retroactive Taxes and Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

The Supreme Court has generally rejected ex post facto challenges to laws imposing retroactive tax liability.[1] In Kentucky Union Co. v. Kentucky, the Court emphasized that not all retroactive laws are ex post facto, as the prohibition on ex post facto laws applies only to retroactive criminal laws.[2] The majority further opined: "Laws of a retroactive nature, imposing taxes or providing remedies for their assessment and collection, and not impairing vested rights, are not forbidden by the Federal Constitution."[3]

The Court has made clear, however, that the question of whether a law is a non-penal tax, and thus outside the scope of the Ex Post Facto Clauses, depends on how the statute functions rather than its formal classification by the legislature. In Burgess v. Salmon, the Court held that the retroactive application of a tax law that was enforceable through a fine and imprisonment was invalid on ex post facto grounds.[4] The Court cautioned that "the ex post facto effect of a law cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to that which is essentially criminal."[5]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.11 Ex Post Facto Prohibition and Judicial Decisions

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Multiple Supreme Court decisions have held that the Ex Post Facto Clauses apply only to federal and state legislation (including state constitutional amendments), not to judicial decisions.[1] In Ross v. Oregon, the Court declined to apply the prohibition on ex post facto laws to a court decision that interpreted a statute that had been in place at the time of the offense to the disadvantage of the defendant.[2] In Frank v. Mangum, the Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a judicial decision that allegedly departed from precedent.[3] The Court explained that the state Ex Post Facto Clause "is directed against legislative action only, and does not reach erroneous or inconsistent decisions by the courts."[4] Similarly, in Marks v. United States, the Court held that the federal Ex Post Facto Clause "is a limitation upon the powers of the Legislature . . . and does not of its own force apply to the Judicial Branch of government."[5]

Although the Judicial Branch is not bound by the Ex Post Facto Clauses, the Court has held that the Due Process Clause might similarly prevent a defendant from being convicted for

---

[1] See, e.g., Carpenter v. Pennsylvania, 58 U.S. 456, 463 (1855) (law retroactively imposing a tax on certain devises in a will was not ex post facto); Bankers Trust Co. v. Blodgett, 260 U.S. 647, 652 (1923) (upholding a state statute retroactively imposing an estate tax and imposing a 2% penalty for non-payment, holding that the penalty "was not in punishment of a crime, and it is only to such that the constitutional prohibition applies"). In Locke v. City of New Orleans, the Supreme Court denied an ex post facto challenge to a tax law, holding both that the law was not retroactive and that the Ex Post Facto Clause did not apply to the non-penal tax at issue. 71 U.S. 172, 173 (1866).

[2] 219 U.S. 140, 152 (1911).

[3] Id. at 152–53.

[4] 97 U.S. 381, 381, 385 (1878).

[5] Id.

[1] See generally Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277 (1866).

[2] 227 U.S. 150, 161 (1913).

[3] 237 U.S. 309, 344–45 (1914).

[4] Id. at 344.

[5] 430 U.S. 188, 191 (1977) (citation omitted).

conduct that would not have been criminal but for an intervening court decision.[6] In Bouie v. City of Columbia, the Supreme Court held that "an unforeseeable judicial enlargement of a criminal statute, applied retroactively, operates precisely like an ex post facto law" and "[i]f a state legislature is barred by the Ex Post Facto Clause from passing such a law, it must follow that a State Supreme Court is barred by the Due Process Clause from achieving precisely the same result by judicial construction."[7] In Rogers v. Tennessee, the Court reiterated that while the Ex Post Facto Clause does not apply to the judiciary, "limitations on ex post facto judicial decisionmaking are inherent in the notion of due process."[8] However, the Rogers Court also held that the due process limitation on courts is not identical to the ex post facto prohibition that applies to legislation. The Court explained:

> The Ex Post Facto Clause, by its own terms, does not apply to courts. Extending the Clause to courts through the rubric of due process thus would circumvent the clear constitutional text. It also would evince too little regard for the important institutional and contextual differences between legislating, on the one hand, and common law decisionmaking, on the other.[9]

ArtI.S9.C3.3.12 Ex Post Facto Laws, Deportation, and Related Issues

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3:

> No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

Multiple Supreme Court cases have held that deportation proceedings are civil, not penal, in nature, and therefore are not subject to the federal Ex Post Facto Clause.[1] As one example, in Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, the Court considered ex post facto claims from several resident aliens who had been ordered deported based on their past membership in the Communist Party. The Court rejected the claims, holding in part:

> Deportation, however severe its consequences, has been consistently classified as a civil rather than a criminal procedure. . . . 'Congress has power to order the deportation of aliens whose presence in the country it deems hurtful. The determination by facts that might constitute a crime under local law is not a conviction of crime, nor is the deportation a punishment; it is simply a refusal by the government to harbor persons whom it does not want.'[2]

In Galvan v. Press, the Court considered another ex post facto claim by a former Communist Party member challenging his deportation.[3] The Court acknowledged the severe

---

[6] See, e.g., United States v. Marcus, 560 U.S. 258, 263 (2010) (holding that if a criminal defendant was erroneously convicted based on noncriminal conduct that preceded enactment of the relevant law, he would have a due process claim rather than an ex post facto claim).

[7] 378 U.S. 347, 353–354, (1964). See also Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 195–96 (1977) (applying Bouie); but see Splawn v. California, 431 U.S. 595 (1977) (rejecting application of Bouie where there was no "change in the interpretation of the elements of the substantive offense").

[8] 532 U.S. 451, 456 (2000).

[9] Id. at 460.

[1] Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 609 (1913); Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 39 (1924); Marcello v. Bonds, 349 U.S. 302, 314 (1955).

[2] 342 U.S. 580, 594 (1952) (quoting Bugajewitz, 228 U.S. at 591). The Court also held that the challenged statute did not apply retroactively. See id. at 593; see ArtI.S9.C3.3.3 Retroactivity of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[3] 347 U.S. 522, 523 (1954).

consequences of deportation—even likening its "intrinsic consequences" to punishment for a crime—but ultimately chose to follow "the unbroken rule of this Court that [the Ex Post Facto Clause] has no application to deportation."[4]

In Flemming v. Nestor, the Supreme Court rejected an ex post facto challenge to a statute terminating federal old-age, survivor, and disability insurance benefits for individuals deported on certain grounds.[5] The Court deemed the challenged sanction to be "the mere denial of a noncontractual governmental benefit" and held that Congress could have reasonable, non-punitive reasons for "the disqualification of certain deportees from receipt of Social Security benefits while they are not lawfully in this country."[6] While the challenger argued that Congress was actually motivated by a punitive purpose, the Court stated that "only the clearest proof could suffice to establish the unconstitutionality of a statute on such a ground," and found no such proof with respect to the challenged statute.[7]

In Johannessen v. United States, the Supreme Court held that a statute providing for cancellation of United States citizenship obtained by fraud was not an ex post facto law.[8] The Court held that the "act imposes no punishment upon an alien who has previously procured a certificate of citizenship by fraud or other illegal conduct. It simply deprives him of his ill-gotten privileges."[9]

Clause 4—Direct Taxes

ArtI.S9.C4.1 Overview of Direct Taxes

Article I, Section 9, Clause 4:

> No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

Under Article I, Section 9, Clause 4 and Article I, Section 2, Clause 3[1] of the Constitution, direct taxes are subject to the rule of apportionment.[2] Though the Supreme Court has not clearly distinguished direct taxes from indirect taxes,[3] the Court has identified capitation taxes—a tax "paid by every person, 'without regard to property, profession, or any other

[4] Id. at 531.

[5] 363 U.S. 603, 604–05 (1960).

[6] Id. at 617.

[7] Id.

[8] 225 U.S. 227, 242–43 (1912).

[9] Id. at 242.

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 3 ("Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons."). The Fourteenth Amendment subsequently modified apportionment of Representatives. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 2 ("Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.").

[2] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 4 ("No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken."); Id. art. I, § 2, cl. 3 ("Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers . . . .").

[3] Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 of the U.S. Constitution subjects duties, imposts, and excise taxes—collectively referred to as indirect taxes—to the rule of uniformity. U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1. The rule of uniformity requires an indirect tax to operate in the same manner throughout the United States.

circumstance'"[4]—and taxes on real and personal property as direct taxes.[5] Under the rule of apportionment, Congress sets the total amount to be raised by a direct tax, then divides that amount among the states according to each state's population.[6] Thus, a state with one-twentieth of the Nation's population would be responsible for one-twentieth of the total amount of direct tax, without regard to that state's income or wealth levels.[7]

An 1861 federal tax on real property illustrates how the rule of apportionment operates.[8] Congress enacted a direct tax of $20 million.[9] After apportioning the direct tax among the states, territories, and the District of Columbia, the State of New York was liable for the largest portion of the tax, $2,603,918.67,[10] and the Territory of Dakota was liable for the least, $3,241.33.[11] The act called for the President to assign collection districts to states, territories, and the District of Columbia to apportion "to each county and State district its proper quota of direct tax"[12] and determine the amounts taxpayers in each collection district would be required to pay.[13]

The lack of clarity surrounding the meaning of a direct tax[14] and the Federal Government's desire for additional revenues ultimately contributed to the adoption in 1913 of the Sixteenth Amendment, which authorizes Congress to impose taxes on income without regard to the rule of apportionment.[15]

---

[4] Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519, 571 (2012) [hereinafter NFIB] (emphasis omitted) (citing Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. 171, 175 (1796) (opinion of Chase, J.)).

[5] Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895); Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. 171 (1796); see also NFIB, 567 U.S. at 571 (holding that the individual mandate provision in the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act was not a direct tax because it did "not fall within" any of the "recognized categor[ies]" of direct taxes, capitation taxes and taxes on real or personal property).

[6] See, e.g., Act of Aug. 5, 1861, ch. 45, 12 Stat. 292; Act of Jan. 9, 1815, ch. 21, 3 Stat. 164.

[7] Erik M. Jensen, The Taxing Power, the Sixteenth Amendment, and the Meaning of "Incomes," 33 Ariz. St. L.J. 1057, 1067 (2001). See also Hylton, 3 U.S. at 174.

[8] Act of Aug. 5, 1861, ch. 45, 12 Stat. 292, 294; see also Act of Jan. 9, 1815, ch. 21, 3 Stat. 164.

[9] Act of Aug. 5, 1861, ch. 45, 12 Stat. 292, 294.

[10] Id. at 295 ("To the State of New York, two million six hundred and three thousand nine hundred and eighteen and two-third dollars.").

[11] Id. at 296 ("To the Territory of Dakota, three thousand two hundred and forty-one and one-third dollars.").

[12] Id. at 301.

[13] Id. at 296 ("That, for the purpose of assessing the above tax and collecting the same, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, to divide, respectively, the States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia into convenient collection districts, and to nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint an assessor and a collector for each such district, who shall be freeholders and resident within the same."); id. at 302 ("[T]he said assessors, respectively, shall make out lists containing the sums payable according to the provisions of this act upon every object of taxation in and for each collection district; which lists shall contain the name of each person residing within the said district, owning or having the care or superintendence of property lying within the said district which is liable to the said tax.").

[14] In National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, the Court noted that "[e]ven when the Direct Tax Clause was written it was unclear what else, other than a capitation (also known as a "head tax" or a "poll tax"), might be a direct tax." Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519 (2012). See also 2 Records of the Federal Convention 350 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) ("Mr. King asked what was the precise meaning of direct taxation? No one answered.")

[15] U.S. Const. amend. XIV. See Amdt14.1 Overview of Fourteenth Amendment, Equal Protection and Rights of Citizens.

ArtI.S9.C4.2 Historical Background on Direct Taxes

Article I, Section 9, Clause 4:

> No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

The Framers' principal motivation for granting Congress the power to tax in the Constitution was to provide the National Government with a mechanism to raise a "regular and adequate supply"[1] of revenue and pay its debts.[2] Under the predecessor Articles of Confederation, the National Government had no power to tax and could not compel states to raise revenue for national expenditures.[3] The National Government could requisition funds from states to place in the common treasury, but, under the Articles of Confederation, state requisitions were "mandatory in theory" only.[4] State governments resisted these calls for funds.[5] As a result, the National Government raised "very little" revenue through state requisitions,[6] inhibiting its ability to resolve immediate fiscal problems, such as repaying its Revolutionary War debts.[7]

By contrast, the Constitution provides Congress with broad authority to lay and collect taxes. Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 of the Constitution—commonly known as the Taxing and Spending Clause[8]—empowers Congress "To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Impost and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States;

---

[1] The Federalist No. 30 (Alexander Hamilton).

[2] Gillian E. Metzger, To Tax, To Spend, To Regulate, 126 Harv. L. Rev. 83, 89 (2012); see Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U.S. 533, 540 (1869) ("The [National Government] had been reduced to the verge of impotency by the necessity of relying for revenue upon requisitions on the States, and it was a leading object in the adoption of the Constitution to relieve the government, to be organized under it, from this necessity, and confer upon it ample power to provide revenue by the taxation of persons and property."); Bruce Ackerman, Taxation and the Constitution, 99 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 6 (1999) ("The [Federalists] would never have launched their campaign against America's first Constitution, the Articles of Confederation, had it not been for its failure to provide adequate fiscal powers for the national government."); see generally The Federalist No. 30 (Alexander Hamilton) (advocating for a "General Power of Taxation").

[3] See Articles of Confederation of 1777, arts. II, VIII; Ackerman, supra 2, at 6 ("The Articles of Confederation stated that the 'common treasury . . . shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State,' Articles of Confederation art. VIII (1781), but did not explicitly authorize the Continental Congress to impose any sanctions when a state failed to comply. This silence was especially eloquent in light of the second Article's pronouncement: 'Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by the confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled.'").

[4] Calvin H. Johnson, Righteous Anger at the Wicked States: The Meaning of the Founders' Constitution, 15 (2005); see Articles of Confederation of 1777, art. VIII.

[5] Johnson, supra note 4, at 16 ("Some states simply ignored the requisitions. Some sent them back to Congress for amendment, more to the states' liking. New Jersey said it had paid enough tax by paying the tariffs or 'imposts' on goods imported through New York or Philadelphia and it repudiated the requisition in full.").

[6] Robert D. Cooter & Neil S. Siegel, Not the Power to Destroy: An Effects Theory of the Tax Power, 98 VA. L. REV. 1195, 1202 (2012); see, e.g., Johnson, supra note 4, at 15 ("In the requisition of 1786—the last before the Constitution—Congress mandated that states pay $3,800,000, but it collected only $663."); see Metzger, supra note 2, at 89 ("Under the Articles of Confederation, states had failed to meet congressional requisitions on a massive scale and Congress was bankrupt.").

[7] Johnson, supra note 4, at 16–17 ("Congress's Board of Treasury had concluded in June 1786 that there was 'no reasonable hope' that the requisitions would yield enough to allow Congress to make payments on the foreign debts, even assuming that nothing would be paid on the domestic war debt. . . . Almost all of the money called for by the 1786 requisition would have gone to payments on the Revolutionary War debt. French and Dutch creditors were due payments of $1.7 million, including interest and some payment on the principal. Domestic creditors were due to be paid $1.6 million for interest only. Express advocacy of repudiation of the federal debt was rare, but with the failure of requisitions, payment was not possible. . . . Beyond the repayment of war debts, the federal goals were quite modest. The operating budget was only about $450,000 . . . . Without money, however, the handful of troops on the frontier would have to be disbanded and the Congress's offices shut."); see Cooter & Siegel, supra note 6, at 1204.

[8] See, e.g., United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 169–70 (1974).

but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."[9] The U.S. Supreme Court has described Congress's power to tax as "very extensive."[10] Supreme Court Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase famously described the taxing power in the License Tax Cases:

> It is given in the Constitution, with only one exception and only two qualifications. Congress cannot tax exports, and it must impose direct taxes by the rule of apportionment, and indirect taxes by the rule of uniformity. Thus limited, and thus only, it reaches every subject, and may be exercised at discretion.[11]

By proscribing direct taxes "unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein" under Article I, Section 9, Clause 4, the Framers apportioned direct taxes consistent with how they apportioned representation in the House.[12] As James Madison noted in the Federalist Papers, linking tax liability to representation ensured that any advantage a state may have in enhancing its reported population size to increase its representation would be offset by its increased tax liability. Madison stated:

> As the accuracy of the census to be obtained by the Congress will necessarily depend, in a considerable degree on the disposition, if not the co-operation of the States, it is of great importance that the States should feel as little bias as possible, to swell or to reduce the amount of their numbers. Were their share of representation alone to be governed by this rule, they would have an interest in exaggerating their inhabitants. Were the rule to decide their share of taxation alone, a contrary temptation would prevail. By extending the rule to both objects, the States will have opposite interests, which will control and balance each other, and produce the requisite impartiality.[13]

ArtI.S9.C4.3 Early Jurisprudence on Direct Taxes

Article I, Section 9, Clause 4:

> No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

The Supreme Court first interpreted the Constitution's "direct tax" language shortly after the Nation's founding in Hylton v. United States.[1] Hylton presented the question of whether an [9] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1; see also id. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 ("To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.").

[10] License Tax Cases, 72 U.S. 462, 471 (1866); see also United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22, 28 (1953) ("It is axiomatic that the power of Congress to tax is extensive and sometimes falls with crushing effect . . . . As is well known, the constitutional restraints on taxing are few."); Brushaber v. Union Pac. R. Co., 240 U.S. 1, 12 (1916) ("That the authority conferred upon Congress by § 8 of article 1 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises' is exhaustive and embraces every conceivable power of taxation has never been questioned or, if it has, has been so often authoritatively declared as to render it necessary only to state the doctrine."); Austin v. Aldermen, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 694, 699 (1869) ("The right of taxation, where it exists, is necessarily unlimited in its nature. It carries with it inherently the power to embarrass and destroy."); see generally Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U.S. 533, 540 (1869) (explaining "[N]othing is clearer, from the discussions in the [Constitutional] Convention and the discussions which preceded final ratification [of the Constitution] by the necessary number of States, than the purpose to give this power to Congress, as to the taxation of everything except exports, in its fullest extent.").

[11] License Tax Cases, 72 U.S. at 471.

[12] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, Cl. 3 ("Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers . . . .").

[13] The Federalist No. 54 (James Madison).

[1] Hylton, 3 U.S. 171.

ArtI.S9.C4.3
Early Jurisprudence on Direct Taxes

unapportioned tax on carriages was a "direct tax," and therefore unconstitutional.[2] In three separate opinions, the deciding justices[3] each held that the tax was not "direct" within the meaning of the Constitution and suggested that the term "direct taxes" applied only to a narrow class of taxes that includes (1) capitation taxes[4] and (2) taxes on "land."[5]

In Hylton, the Supreme Court adopted a functional approach to determine whether a tax is direct, focusing on whether the tax at issue can be apportioned and, if so, whether apportionment would produce significant inequities among taxpayers.[6] As Justice Samuel Chase stated in his opinion, "If [a tax] is proposed to tax any specific article by the rule of apportionment, and it would evidently create great inequality and injustice, it is unreasonable to say, that the Constitution intended such tax should be laid by that rule."[7] As the Court recently explained its holding in Hylton, the "Court upheld the tax, in part reasoning that apportioning such a tax would make little sense, because it would have required taxing carriage owners at dramatically different rates depending on how many carriages were in their home State."[8] The Court in Hylton did not, however, offer a comprehensive definition of the types of taxes that are "direct."[9]

The result of Hylton was not challenged until after the Civil War. A number of taxes imposed to meet the demands of that war were challenged as direct taxes. The Supreme Court, however, sustained successively as "excises" or "duties," a tax on an insurance company's receipts for premiums and assessments,[10] a tax on the circulating notes of state banks,[11] an inheritance tax on real estate,[12] and a general tax on incomes.[13] In the last case, Springer v. United States, the Court noted that it regarded the term "direct taxes" as meaning capitation taxes and taxes on land.[14] The Court stated: "Our conclusions are, that direct taxes, within the

---

[2] Id. at 172. The tax at issue in Hylton imposed a specific yearly sum on carriages. Act of June 5, 1794, ch. 45, 1 Stat. 373, 374 (1794). The amount varied between one and ten dollars, depending on the type of carriage. Id. The tax exempted carriages used in husbandry or for the transportation of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or commodities. Id.

[3] Only four of the six Justices who comprised the Supreme Court at the time participated in the Hylton argument—Associate Justices Samuel Chase, William Paterson, James Iredell, and James Wilson. Consistent with the Court's practice during that period, Justices Chase, Paterson, and Iredell each wrote a separate, or "seriatim," opinion holding the tax to be constitutional. See Hylton, 3 U.S. at 172–83; M. Todd Henderson, From Seriatim to Consensus and Back Again: A Theory of Dissent, 2007 Sup. Ct. Rev. 283, 303–11 (2007). Justice Wilson abstained from voting on the case because he had previously expressed an opinion on the issue while serving as a circuit court judge and because the unanimity of the remaining three participating Justices made his opinion unnecessary. See Hylton, 3 U.S. at 183–84.

[4] See Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519, 571 (2012) [hereinafter NFIB] (citing Hylton, 3 U.S. at 175 (opinion of Chase, J.)).

[5] Hylton, 3 U.S. at 174–75 (opinion of Chase, J.); Id. at 176–77 (opinion of Paterson, J.); Id. at 183 (opinion of Iredell, J.).

[6] Id. at 174 (opinion of Chase, J.); Id. at 179–80 (opinion of Paterson, J.); Id. at 181–83 (opinion of Iredell, J.).

[7] Id.

[8] NFIB, 567 U.S. at 570; see Hylton, 3 U.S. at 179 (opinion of Paterson, J.) ("A tax on carriages, if apportioned, would be oppressive and pernicious. How would it work? In some states there are many carriages, and in others but few. Shall the whole sum fall on one or two individuals in a state, who may happen to own and possess carriages? The thing would be absurd, and inequitable.").

[9] Contra Springer v. United States, 102 U.S. 586, 602 (1880) ("Our conclusions are, that direct taxes, within the meaning of the Constitution, are only capitation taxes, as expressed in that instrument, and taxes on real estate." (emphasis added)); but see Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895) (holding taxes on personal property are also direct taxes).

[10] Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 433 (1869).

[11] Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 533 (1869).

[12] Scholey v. Rew, 90 U.S. (23 Wall.) 331 (1875).

[13] Springer v. United States, 102 U.S. 586 (1881).

[14] Id. at 602.

meaning of the Constitution, are only capitation taxes, as expressed in that instrument, and taxes on real estate, and that the tax of which the plaintiff in error complains is within the category of an excise or duty."[15]

ArtI.S9.C4.4 Direct Taxes and the Sixteenth Amendment

Article I, Section 9, Clause 4:

> No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

In 1895, the Supreme Court expanded its interpretation of the meaning of direct taxes in its two decisions in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co.,[1] holding that taxes on real and personal property, and income derived from them, were direct taxes.[2] These decisions significantly altered the Court's direct tax jurisprudence. Considering whether an 1894 act that imposed unapportioned taxes on income derived from both real and personal property were direct taxes,[3] the Court adopted two primary holdings on the scope of the Constitution's "direct tax" clause. First, the Court held that taxes on real estate and personal property are direct taxes.[4] Second, the Court held that a tax on income derived from real or personal property—as opposed to income derived from employment or some other source[5]—is, in effect, a tax imposed directly on the property itself and is also a direct tax.[6] Applying these holdings, the Court held that the provisions before it were unconstitutional because they were unapportioned taxes on income derived from real and personal property.[7]

The Pollock Court concluded that its holding did not conflict with the Court's prior decisions interpreting the direct tax language.[8] The Court reasoned that each of those decisions had sustained unapportioned taxes as either "excises" or "duties" imposed on a particular use of, or privilege associated with, the property in question, not as a tax on the property itself.[9] As to Hylton specifically, the Court determined that it had upheld the unapportioned carriage tax as an "excise" on the "expense" or "consumption" of carriages, rather than as a tax on carriage ownership.[10]

After the Pollock decision, taxpayers challenged numerous taxes that Congress had treated as excises subject to the rule of uniformity as unconstitutional direct taxes. The Court,

---

[15] Id. (emphasis retained).

[1] 158 U.S. 601 (1895) [hereinafter Pollock II]; 157 U.S. 429 [hereinafter Pollock I]. Pollock came to the Court twice. In Pollock I, the Court invalidated the tax at issue insofar as it was a tax upon income derived from real property, but the Court was equally divided on whether income derived from personal property was a direct tax. 157 U.S. at 583, 586. In Pollock II, on petitions for rehearing, the Court held that a tax on income derived from personal property was also a direct tax. 158 U.S. at 637. For simplicity, this essay refers to the two decisions collectively as the "Pollock" decision.

[2] Pollock II, 158 U.S. 601; Pollock I, 157 U.S. 429.

[3] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 618; Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 558; see Act of Aug. 27, 1894, ch. 349, 28 Stat. 509.

[4] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 628; Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 580–81.

[5] The Court stated that its holding did not extend to income or other gains derived from "business, privileges, or employments." Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 635.

[6] Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 581 ("An annual tax upon the annual value or annual user of real estate appears to us the same in substance as an annual tax on the real estate, which would be paid out of the rent or income."); Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 628 (applying "the same reasoning . . . to capital in personalty held for the purpose of income, or ordinarily yielding income, and to the income therefrom").

[7] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 637; Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 583.

[8] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 626–27; Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 574–80.

[9] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 626–27; Pollock I, 157 U.S. at 574–80.

[10] Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 627 ("What was decided in the Hylton Case was, then, that a tax on carriages was an excise, and therefore an indirect tax.").

however, distinguished taxes levied "because of ownership" or "upon property as such" from those laid upon "privileges."[11] The Court sustained as "excises" a tax on sales of business exchanges,[12] a succession tax construed to fall on the recipients of the property transmitted rather than on the estate of the decedent,[13] and a tax on manufactured tobacco in the hands of a dealer, after an excise tax had been paid by the manufacturer.[14] In Thomas v. United States,[15] the Court sustained a stamp tax on sales of stock certificates based on the definition of "duties, imposts and excises."[16] The Court explained that these terms "were used comprehensively to cover customers and excise duties imposed on importation, consumption, manufacture and sale of certain commodities, privileges, particular business transactions, vocations, occupations and the like."[17] On the same day, the Court ruled in Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain[18] that an exaction on the business of refining sugar and measured by gross receipts was an excise and properly levied under the rule of uniformity. Likewise, in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co.,[19] the Court held a tax on a corporation that was measured by income, including investment income, to be a tax on the privilege of doing business as a corporation rather than an income tax. Similarly, in Stanton v. Baltic Mining Co.[20], the Court held a tax on the annual production of mines "is not a tax upon property as such because of its ownership, but a true excise levied on the results of the business of carrying on mining operations."[21]

Pollock's holding and rationale were further limited in several respects.[22] Most prominently, Congress passed and the states ratified the Sixteenth Amendment in 1913 in direct response to Pollock's prohibition on the unapportioned taxation of income derived from real or personal property.[23] The Sixteenth Amendment authorized Congress "to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several states."[24] Further, while the Court in Pollock held that a tax on income derived from property was indistinguishable from a tax on the property itself, the Court later rejected that reasoning in Stanton v. Baltic Mining Company, upholding an unapportioned tax on a mine's income as being "not a tax upon property as such . . . , but a true excise levied on the results of the business of carrying on mining operations."[25] The Court opined:

> [T]he Sixteenth Amendment conferred no new power of taxation but simply prohibited the previous complete and plenary power of income taxation possessed by Congress from the beginning from being taken out of the category of indirect taxation to which it inherently belonged and being placed in the category of direct taxation subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the income was derived,

---

[11] Stanton v. Baltic Mining Co., 240 U.S. 103 (1916); Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 80 (1900).

[12] Nicol v. Ames, 173 U.S. 509 (1899).

[13] Knowlton, 178 U.S. at 41.

[14] Patton v. Brady, 184 U.S. 608 (1902).

[15] 192 U.S. 363 (1904).

[16] Id. at 369.

[17] Id. at 370.

[18] 192 U.S. 397 (1904)

[19] 220 U.S. 107 (1911).

[20] 240 U.S. 103 (1916).

[21] Stanton, 240 U.S. at 114 (citing Stratton's Independence v. Howbert, 231 U.S. 399 (1913)).

[22] Erik M. Jensen, The Taxing Power, the Sixteenth Amendment, and the Meaning of "Incomes," 33 Ariz. St. L.J. 1057, 1073 (2001).

[23] Id.; Boris I. Bittker, Constitutional Limits on the Taxing Power of the Federal Government, 41 Tax Law. 3 (1987).

[24] U.S. Const. amend. XVI (emphasis added).

[25] 240 U.S. 103, 112–14 (1916).

> that is by testing the tax not by what it was—a tax on income, but by a mistaken theory deduced from the origin or source of the income taxed.[26]

Despite these developments, the Supreme Court has not expressly overruled Pollock's central holding that a tax on real or personal property solely because of its ownership is a direct tax.[27] In 1920, the Court relied on Pollock in Eisner v. Macomber to hold an unapportioned tax on shares issued as stock dividends unconstitutional.[28] There, the Court addressed whether a corporation's issuance of additional shares to a stockholder as stock dividends was "income" under the Sixteenth Amendment and, if not, whether a tax on those unrealized gains was a direct tax.[29] After concluding that the stock dividends were not "income,"[30] the Court relied on Pollock to conclude that the tax was a direct tax.[31]

The Eisner Court determined that the limitation on Congress's taxing power identified in Pollock "still has an appropriate and important function . . . not to be overridden by Congress or disregarded by the courts."[32] The Court observed that the Sixteenth Amendment must be "construed in connection with the taxing clauses of the original Constitution and the effect attributed to them," including Pollock's holding that "taxes upon property, real and personal," are direct taxes.[33] Applying that limitation, the Court held that the tax before it was unconstitutional because it was an unapportioned tax on personal property.[34]

In the Supreme Court's 2012 decision, National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, the Supreme Court upheld the Affordable Care Act individual mandate, known as a "shared responsibility payment," as a tax under Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 of the Constitution.[35] In its ruling, the Court explained that the individual mandate was not a direct tax subject to the rule of apportionment. The Court stated:

> A tax on going without health insurance does not fall within any recognized category of direct tax. It is not a capitation. Capitations are taxes paid by every person "without regard to property, profession or any other circumstance." The whole point of the shared responsibility payment is that it is triggered by specific circumstances—earning a certain amount of income but not obtaining health insurance. The payment is also

---

[26] Id. at 112–13 (citing Brushaber v. Union Pac. R.R., 240 U.S. 1 (1916)).

[27] See Union Elec. Co. v. United States, 363 F.3d 1292, 1299 (Fed. Cir. 2004) ("We agree that Pollock has never been overruled, though its reasoning appears to have been discredited."); see also NFIB, 567 U.S. at 571 ("In 1895, [in Pollock II,] we expanded our interpretation [of direct taxes] to include taxes on personal property and income from personal property, in the course of striking down aspects of the federal income tax. That result was overturned by the Sixteenth Amendment, although we continued to consider taxes on personal property to be direct taxes" (citations omitted)).

[28] Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 219 (1920).

[29] Id. at 201–19.

[30] Id. at 201–17. Eisner defined "income" as "the gain derived from capital, labor, or from both combined." Id. at 207 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[31] 252 U.S. at 218–19.

[32] Id. at 206.

[33] Id. at 205–06; id. at 218–19.

[34] Id. at 219. In 1921, the Court sustained an estate tax as an excise in New York Trust Co. v. Eisner, 256 U.S. 345, 349 (1921). The Court further held that including certain property in computing an estate tax does not constitute a direct tax on the following such property: (1) property held as joint tenants or as tenants by the entirety; or (2) the entire value of community property owned by a husband and wife; or (3) life insurance proceeds. Philips v. Dime Trust & S.D. Co., 284 U.S. 345, 349 (1921) (joint tenants); Tyler v. United States, 281 U.S. 497 (1930) (tenants by the entirety); Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340 (1945) (community property); Chase Nat'l Bank v. United States, 278 U.S. 327 (1929) (insurance proceeds); United States v. Manufacturers Nat'l Bank, 363 U.S. 194, 198–201 (1960) (insurance proceeds). Similarly, the Court upheld a graduated tax on gifts as an excise, saying that it was "a tax laid only upon the exercise of a single one of those powers incident to ownership, the power to give the property owned to another." Bromley v. McCaughn, 280 U.S. 124, 136 (1929). See also Helvering v. Bullard, 303 U.S. 297 (1938).

[35] Nat'l Fed'n of Indep. Bus. v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519 (2012).

plainly not a tax on the ownership of land or personal property. The shared responsibility payment is thus not a direct tax that must be apportioned among the several States.[36]

The Supreme Court further explained that direct taxes are capitation taxes, real estate taxes, and personal property taxes.[37] While income taxes are also direct taxes under Pollock, adoption of the Sixteenth Amendment,[38] as discussed above, amended the Constitution to permit the federal government to tax income.

Clause 5—Exports

ArtI.S9.C5.1 Export Clause and Taxes

Article I, Section 9, Clause 5:

No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

Article 1, Section 9, Clause 5 of the U.S. Constitution prohibits Congress from laying taxes and duties on articles exported from any state.[1] Known as the Export Clause,[2] it applies to taxes and duties, not user fees.[3] The Supreme Court has interpreted the Export Clause to address shipments only to foreign countries, not shipments to unincorporated territories, such as Puerto Rico and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.[4] The Court has also [38] See Amdt16.1 Overview of Sixteenth Amendment, Income Tax.

[36] Id. at 571.

[37] Id.

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1; see, e.g., United States v. U.S. Shoe Corp., 523 U.S. 360 (1998) (holding an ad valorem tax directly imposed on the value of cargo loaded at U.S. ports for export violated the Export Clause).

[2] See, e.g., U.S. Shoe, 523 U.S. at 362.

[3] Id. at 363 ("The [Export] Clause, however, does not rule out a 'user fee,' provided that the fee lacks the attributes of a generally applicable tax or duty and is, instead, a charge designed as compensation for government-supplied services, facilities, or benefits." (citing Pace v. Burgess, 92 U.S. 372 (1876))). In general, a user fee is a charge imposed on the user of a government service with the primary purpose of offsetting the costs of that government service. See, e.g., Pace v. Burgess, 92 U.S. 372, 375–76 (1876) ("The stamp [tax] was intended for no other purpose than to separate and identify the tobacco which the manufacturer desired to export, and thereby, instead of taxing it, to relieve it from the taxation to which other tobacco was subjected. It was a means devised to prevent fraud, and secure the faithful carrying out of the declared intent with regard to the tobacco so marked. The payment of twenty-five cents or of ten cents for the stamp used was no more a tax on the export than was the fee for clearing the vessel in which it was transported, or for making out and certifying the manifest of the cargo. It bore no proportion whatever to the quantity or value of the package on which it was affixed. These were unlimited, except by the discretion of the exporter or the convenience of handling. . . . We know how next to impossible it is to prevent fraudulent practices wherever the internal revenue is concerned . . . . The proper fees accruing in the due administration of the laws and regulations necessary to be observed to protect the government from imposition and fraud likely to be committed under pretence of exportation are in no sense a duty on exportation. They are simply the compensation given for services properly rendered. . . . [W]e cannot say that the charge imposed is excessive, or that it amounts to an infringement of the [Export Clause]. We cannot say that it is a tax or duty instead of what it purports to be, a fee or charge, for the employment of that instrumentality which the circumstances of the case render necessary for the protection of the government.").

[4] Dooley v. United States, 183 U.S. 151, 153–54 (1901); see also Swan & Finch Co. v. United States, 190 U.S. 143, 144–45 (1903) (explaining "'export' as used in the Constitution and laws of the United States, generally means the transportation of goods from this to a foreign country"); see generally Christina Duffy Burnett, United States: American Expansion and Territorial Deannexation, 72 U. Chi. L. Rev. 797, 800 (2005) (explaining the U.S. Supreme Court's doctrine of territorial incorporation "divided domestic territory . . . into two categories: those places 'incorporated' into the United States and forming an integral part thereof (including the states, the District of Columbia, and the 'incorporated territories'); and those places not incorporated into the United States, but merely 'belonging' to it (which came to be known as the 'unincorporated territories')").

construed the Export Clause as requiring "not simply an omission of a tax upon the articles exported, but also a freedom from any tax which directly burdens" the process of exporting.[5]

For example, in United States v. IBM, the Supreme Court held that an excise tax[6] on insurance premiums paid to foreign insurers for policies insuring exported goods was unconstitutional under the Export Clause.[7] In IBM, the parties agreed that the facts and issue before the Court were largely indistinguishable from an earlier case, Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v United States,[8] in which the Court held that a tax on insuring exports was "functionally the same" as a tax on exports.[9] Applying stare decisis principles, the Court declined to overrule Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance absent additional briefing from the parties on whether the insurance policies subject to the excise tax were "so closely connected to the goods that the tax is, in essence, a tax on exports."[10]

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Export Clause's restriction on Congress's taxing power does not extend to several taxes, such as a tax on all property alike, including property intended for export but not in the "course of exportation"[11]; a nondiscriminatory tax on an exporter's income;[12] and a stamp tax to identify goods intended for export.[13] The Court,

---

[5] Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283, 293 (1901). See William E. Peck & Co. v. Lowe, 247 U.S. 165, 173 (1918) ("And the court has indicated that where the tax is not laid on the articles themselves while in course of exportation the true test of its validity is whether it 'so directly and closely' bears on the 'process of exporting' as to be in substance a tax on the exportation." (quoting Thames & Mersey Marine Ins. Co. v. United States, 237 U.S. 19, 25 (1915))). See also A.G. Spaulding & Bros. v. Edwards, 262 U.S. 66, 69–70 (1923).

[6] Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340, 352 (1945) (an excise tax is a tax laid "upon particular use or enjoyment of property or the shifting from one to another of any power or privilege incidental to the ownership or enjoyment of property").

[7] United States v. IBM, 517 U.S. 843, 854–56 (1996).

[8] 237 U.S. 19, 27 (1915) (holding "proper insurance during the voyage is one of the necessities of exportation" and that "the taxation of policies insuring cargoes during their transit to foreign ports is as much a burden on exporting as if it were laid on the charter parties, the bills of lading, or the goods themselves").

[9] IBM, 517 U.S. at 850, 854. See also id. at 846 ("We have had few occasions to interpret the language of the Export Clause, but our cases have broadly exempted from federal taxation not only export goods, but also services and activities closely related to the export process. At the same time, we have attempted to limit the term 'Articles exported' to permit federal taxation of pre-export goods and services.").

[10] Id. at 855–56; see id. at 855 ("[T]he marine insurance policies in Thames & Mersey arguably 'had a value apart from the value of the goods.' Nevertheless, the Government apparently has chosen not to challenge that aspect of Thames & Mersey in this case. When questioned on that implicit concession at oral argument, the Government admitted that it 'chose not to' argue that [the excise tax] does not impose a tax on the goods themselves.") (citations omitted).

[11] Turpin v. Burgess, 117 U.S. 504, 507 (1886) ("But a general tax, laid on all property alike, and not levied on goods in course of exportation, nor because of their intended exportation, is not within the constitutional prohibition. . . . In the present case, the tax (if it was a tax) was laid upon the goods before they had left the factory. They were not in course of exportation; they might never be exported; whether they would be or not would depend altogether on the will of the manufacturer."). See also Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U.S. 418, 427 (1904) ("The true construction of the constitutional provision is that no burden by way of tax or duty can be cast upon the exportation of articles, and does not mean that articles exported are relieved from the prior ordinary burdens of taxation which rest upon all property similarly situated.").

[12] William E. Peck & Co. v. Lowe, 247 U.S. 165, 174–75 (1918) (holding the Export Clause did not shield an exporter from an income tax laid generally on net incomes because the tax was laid on the exporter's income from exportation).

[13] Pace v. Burgess, 92 U.S. 372, 376 (1876) (finding the "stamp was intended for no other purpose than to separate and identify the tobacco which the manufacturer desired to export, and thereby, instead of taxing it, to relieve it from the taxation to which other tobacco was subjected" and that "[a] stamp may be used, and, in the case before us, we think it is used, for quite a different purpose from that of imposing a tax or duty: indeed, it is used for the very contrary purpose,—that of securing exemption from a tax or duty"). See also Turpin v. Burgess, 117 U.S. 504, 505 (1886) ("[T]he tax (if it was a tax) was laid upon the goods before they had left the factory. They were not in course of exportation, they might never be exported, whether they would be or not would depend altogether on the will of the manufacturer. Had the same excise which was laid upon all other tobacco manufactured by the plaintiffs been laid on the tobacco in question, they could not have complained. But it was not. A special indulgence was granted to them (in common with the others), in reference to the particular tobacco which they declared it to be their intention to export. With regard to however, has held that stamp taxes imposed on foreign bills of lading;[14] charter parties, which "were exclusively for the carriage of cargo from state ports to foreign ports";[15] or marine insurance policies[16] were in effect taxes or duties upon exports, and so void.

The Supreme Court has also held that refunds for taxes collected in violation of the Export Clause are subject to the the general tax refund scheme adopted by Congress.[17] The Court stated: "We therefore hold that the plain language of 26 U.S.C. §§ 7422(a) and 6511 requires a taxpayer seeking a refund for a tax assessed in violation of the Export Clause, just as for any other unlawfully assessed tax, to file a timely administrative refund claim before bringing suit against the Government."[18] The Court reasoned that this was necessary so that "allegations of taxes unlawfully assessed—whether the asserted illegality is based upon the Export Clause or any other provision of law—are processed in an orderly and timely manner, and that costly litigation is avoided when possible."[19]

Clause 6—Ports

ArtI.S9.C6.1 No-Preference Clause for Ports

Article I, Section 9, Clause 6:

> No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another: nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another.

The No-Preference Clause was designed to prevent preferences between ports because of their location in different states. Discriminations between individual ports are not prohibited. Acting under the Commerce Clause, Congress may do many things that benefit particular ports and that incidentally result to the disadvantage of other ports in the same or neighboring states. It may establish ports of entry, erect and operate lighthouses, improve rivers and harbors, and provide structures for the convenient and economical handling of traffic.[1] A rate order of the Interstate Commerce Commission that allowed an additional charge to be made for ferrying traffic across the Mississippi to cities on the east bank of the river was sustained over the objection that it gave an unconstitutional preference to ports in Texas.[2] Although there were a few early intimations that this Clause was applicable to the states as well as to Congress,[3] the Supreme Court declared emphatically in 1886 that state legislation was that, in order to identify it, and to protect the government from fraudulent practices, all that was required of the plaintiffs was to affix a 25 cent stamp of a peculiar design to each package, no matter how much it might contain, and enter into bond either to export it according to the declared intention, or to pay the regular tax, if it should not be exported.").

---

[14] Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283 (1901).

[15] United States v. Hvoslef, 237 U.S. 1, 13 (1915). The Court stated that "[a] tax on these charter parties was in substance a tax on the exportation; and a tax on the exportation is a tax on the exports." Id. at 17.

[16] Thames & Mersey Inc. v. United States, 237 U.S. 19 (1915).

[17] United States v. Clintwood Elkhorn Mining Co., 553 U.S. 1 (2008).

[18] Id. at 23.

[19] Id. at 19.

[1] Louisiana PSC v. Texas & N.O. R.R., 284 U.S. 125, 131 (1931); Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 421, 433 (1856); South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U.S. 4 (1876). In Williams v. United States, 255 U.S. 336 (1921), the argument that an act of Congress which prohibited interstate transportation of liquor into states whose laws prohibited manufacture or sale of liquor for beverage purposes was repugnant to this Clause was rejected.

[2] Louisiana PSC v. Texas & N.O. R.R., 284 U.S. 125, 132 (1931).

[3] Passenger Cases (Smith v. Turner), 48 U.S. (7 How.) 283, 414 (1849) (opinion of Justice Wayne); cf. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 299, 314 (1851).

unaffected by it.[4] After more than a century, the Court confirmed, over the objection that this Clause was offended, the power that the First Congress had exercised[5] in sanctioning the continued supervision and regulation of pilots by the states.[6]

Clause 7—Appropriations

ArtI.S9.C7.1 Overview of Appropriations Clause

Article I, Section 9, Clause 7:

> No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

The Appropriations Clause establishes a rule of law to govern money contained in "the Treasury," which is a term that describes a place where public revenue is deposited and kept and from which payments are made to cover public expenses.[1] As the Supreme Court has explained, that rule of law directs "that no money can be paid out of the Treasury unless it has been appropriated by an act of Congress."[2] The Clause has roots in the practice of English parliaments, dating from at least the 1690s, of legislating both the means of raising public revenue and also dedicating, or appropriating, newly raised sums to particular purposes. State constitutions adopted after Independence continued this practice, in most instances expressly identifying an appropriation as a necessity for drawing funds from a state treasury. The proposition that a legislature should control the disbursement of public funds appears to have become so firmly rooted by the late 1780s that the Appropriations Clause itself attracted relatively little debate either in the Constitutional Convention where it was drafted or in the state conventions where it was ratified.[3]

Strictly speaking, the Appropriations Clause does not confer a distinct legislative power upon Congress, on the order of those powers enumerated in Article I, Section 8. Instead, the Clause is phrased as a limitation on government action.[4] Thus, the Supreme Court's cases explain that any exercise of a power granted by the Constitution to the Judiciary or to the Executive is "limited by a valid reservation of congressional control over funds in the Treasury."[5] For instance, the Court has held federal courts may not enter, and Executive Branch officials may not pay, money judgments against the United States for which there is no appropriation. However, the Court's cases also explain that Congress may not dictate that

---

[4] Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U.S. 455, 467 (1886). See also Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 135 (1877); Johnson v. Chicago & Pacific Elevator Co., 119 U.S. 388, 400 (1886).

[5] 1 Stat. 53, 54, § 4 (1789).

[6] Thompson v. Darden, 198 U.S. 310 (1905).

[1] See Treasury, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019); see also Samuel Johnson, Treasury, A Dictionary of the English Language (10th ed. 1792) ("A place in which riches are accumulated."); see also United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 40 U.S. 377, 403 (1841) (describing the "Treasury of the United States" as the place "where its money is directed by law to be kept").

[2] Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U.S. 308, 321 (1937).

[3] See ArtI.S9.C7.2 Historical Background on Appropriations Clause.

[4] Compare, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 ("The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."), with id art. I, § 9, cl. 7 ("No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law.").

[5] Off. of Pers. Mgmt. v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414, 425 (1990).

funds are available subject to a limitation that is itself unconstitutional. The Court has thus disregarded a funding limitation enacted by Congress because the limitation constituted, for example, a Bill of Attainder.[6]

ArtI.S9.C7.2 Historical Background on Appropriations Clause

Article I, Section 9, Clause 7:

> No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

The Appropriations Clause makes part of American constitutional law a regular practice of British Parliaments dating from at least the Glorious Revolution of the late seventeenth century. Parliament's function of granting its consent to raise revenue as a supplement to the Monarch's ordinary revenue sources had by then been an established and powerful tool.[1] However, prior to the Glorious Revolution, Parliament does not seem to have regularly directed its attention to decisions of how voted sums would be used.[2] The view of King Charles II's chief ministers in the decades prior to the Glorious Revolution, for example, was that the Monarch was the "master of his own money" and that his ministers had discretion to apply voted sums "to defray any casual expenses, of any nature" whatsoever.[3] The ministers viewed a 1665 supply bill passed by the House of Commons, for example, as "not fit for [a] monarchy" because it included a clause of appropriation, that is, legislative language stating that sums the bill raised could be used only for the costs of war against the Dutch Republic.[4] However, when King William III and Queen Mary II jointly assumed the throne in 1689, they recognized Parliament's power to legislate supply and expenditure.[5] Thereafter, clauses of appropriations became common features of parliamentary legislation.[6]

When the American states framed new systems of government after Independence, most state constitutions made legislative authorization a prerequisite for drawing any funds from a

---

[6] See ArtI.S9.C7.3 Appropriations Clause Generally.

[1] See 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries *271, *296–97 (distinguishing between the Monarch's ordinary revenue, meaning revenue sources that belonged to the Monarch by long-standing custom, and extraordinary revenues, defined as the "aids, subsidies, and supplies" periodically granted by Parliament to supplement ordinary revenues).

[2] See, e.g., 3 John Hatsell, Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons 203 (1818) (dating regular use of clauses of appropriation to 1688). However, members of Parliament maintained that they had the authority to legislate expenditure decisions even before the practice became more common. See 3 Anchitell Grey, Debates of the House of Commons 446–47 (1763) (statement of William Sacheverell, M.P.) (asserting, during 1675 debate in the Grand Committee of Supply, precedent for clauses of appropriation in supply bills dating from the 13th century).

[3] 3 Edward Hyde,The Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon 17 (1827).

[4] Id. at 10–11, 13. The clause passed the House of Commons, on Lord High Chancellor Clarendon's telling, because to that point King Charles II had lent it his support, relying on the faulty advice of its proponents. Id. at 11. After the House of Lords received the bill, near when Parliament was to be prorogued, the King heard debate over its merits. Id. at 14–22. The King left the debate "unsatisfied" but gave the bill his assent because there was not enough time left in the session to correct the allegedly troublesome clause. See id. at 22; see also 17 Car. II, c. 1 (1665), reprinted in 5 Statutes of the Realm 573 (John Raithby ed., 1819) (reciting that "noe moneyes leavyable by this Act be issued out of the Exchequer dureing this Warr but by such Order or Warrant mentioning that the moneyes payable by such Order or Warrant are for the service of Your Majestie in the said Warr respectively").

[5] See Bill of Rights of 1689, 1 W. & M., 2d sess., c.2 (1688) (dated under the Old Style calendar), reprinted in 6 Statutes of the Realm 143 (John Raithby ed., 1819) (listing among Parliament's ancient rights and liberties the rule that "levying Money for or to the Use of the Crowne" by pretense "of Prerogative without Grant of Parlyament for longer time or in other manner then the same is or shall be granted is Illegall").

[6] See 3 Hatsell, supra note note 2 at 202–05 (stating that between 1689 and the early 1800s Parliament's general practice was to specify "the particular sums which they thought necessary to be applied to the different services they had voted in the course of the session").

state treasury.[7] No state constitution in effect in 1787 expressly allowed a person to draw money from the state treasury without legislative authorization.[8] The states framed the Articles of Confederation to include a similar appropriating function for the Confederation Congress,[9] albeit one that drew from a common treasury supplied by taxes laid and levied by states rather than by the Confederation Congress itself.[10]

Perhaps owing to the pedigree then enjoyed by the view that a legislature should be solely endowed with the authority to identify the purposes for which public money may be spent, the Appropriations Clause itself attracted little debate at the Constitutional Convention of 1787. The Framers debated only whether the Senate—then conceived as a body whose members the states would elect—would have the power to originate or amend, among others, appropriations bills.[11] The first proposal in the Convention that mentioned Congress's appropriations function stated that "all Bills for raising or appropriating money" shall "originate in the first Branch of the Legislature, and shall not be altered or amended by the second Branch. . . ."[12] This first proposal continued: "and that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated in the first Branch."[13] The delegates ultimately removed limitations on Senate origination and amendment of appropriations bills in the Constitution before submitting the Constitution to the states for ratification.[14]

The Appropriations Clause occasionally figured in arguments advanced on either side of ratification. Those favoring ratification cited the Clause as a way to ensure that expenditure decisions would be made by legislators, the officials who under the new Constitution would be most accountable to the people.[15] Proponents also argued that the Clause would check

[7] See Del. Const. of 1776, art. VII (providing for the appointment of a "chief magistrate" empowered to "draw for such sums of money as shall be appropriated by the general assembly, and be held accountable to them for the same"); Md. Const. or Form of Gov't of 1776, at X – XI (specifying that the House of Delegates would originate all "money bills," a term defined to include all bills "appropriating money in the treasury" or otherwise providing supplies "for the support of the government"); Mass. Const. of 1780, ch. 2, § 1, art. XI ("No moneys shall be issued out of the treasury of this Commonwealth, and disposed of . . . but by warrant, under the hand of the Governour for the time being, with the advice and consent of the council, for the necessary defence and support of the Commonwealth; and for the protection and preservation the inhabitants thereof, agreeably to the act and resolves of the general court."); N.H. Const. of 1783, pt. 2, reprinted in The Perpetual Laws of the State of New-Hampshire 16 (John Melcher ed., 1789) (substantially similar language to that of Massachusetts Constitution of 1780); N.C. Const. of 1776, § 19 ("That the governor for the time being, shall have the power to draw for and apply such sums of money as shall be voted by the general assembly for the contingencies of government, and be accountable to them for the same"); Pa. Const. of 1776, § 20 (providing that the president and the president's council "may draw upon the treasury for such sums as shall be appropriated by the house"); S.C. Const. of 1778, art. XVI (directing that no "money be drawn out of the public treasury but by the legislative authority of the state").

[8] The constitutions of Georgia, New Jersey, New York, and Virginia, in effect in 1787, did not expressly refer to the making of appropriations. See Ga. Const. of 1777; NJ. Const. of 1776; N.Y. Const. of 1777; Va. Const. of 1776. Rhode Island and Connecticut "retained their colonial charters with only minor modifications as their fundamental law into the nineteenth century." G. Alan Tarr, Understanding States Constitutions 60 (1998).

[9] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. IX, para. 5 (granting the Confederation Congress the power to "ascertain the necessary sums of Money to be raised for the service of the united states, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses").

[10] Id. art. VIII.

[11] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 544–45 (Max Farrand ed. 1911).

[12] Id. at 524.

[13] Id.

[14] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 545, 552 (Max Farrand ed. 1911).

[15] See, e.g., 2 The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution: Pennsylvania 417 (Merrill Jensen ed., 1976) (Nov. 28, 1787 convention statement of Thomas McKean) (contending that because the Appropriations Clause would settle responsibility for disbursements on Congress and the Statements and Accounts Clause would require disclosure of disbursements, the people could "judge of the conduct of their rulers and, if they see cause to object to the use or the excess of the sums raised, they may express their wishes or disapprobation to the legislature in petitions or remonstrances"); 6 The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution: Massachusetts 1322 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 2000) (similar argument in January 23, 1788 convention statement of James Bowdoin); see also

Executive power[16] and guard against waste of public funds.[17] Those opposing ratification of the Constitution as proposed drew unfavorable comparisons between the original text of the Appropriations Clause, which would have barred the Senate from amending or originating bills making appropriations, and the version submitted to the states for ratification, which made the Senate an equal partner to the House of Representatives in authorizing expenditures.[18]

ArtI.S9.C7.3 Appropriations Clause Generally

Article I, Section 9, Clause 7:

> No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

The Supreme Court has construed the Appropriations Clause in relatively few cases, concluding that the requirement for an "appropriation made by law" to prohibit conduct that would result in disbursements of public funds for which an appropriation was lacking. The Court has explained in cases involving the claims of private parties, for example, that a judgment requiring payment to a person asserting a claim against the United States could not be entered in that person's favor without an appropriation to pay the judgment.[1] In Knote v. United States, the Court decided that an appropriation would likewise be needed for a court to order the return of the proceeds of seized property that had been paid into the Treasury.[2] Prior to entry of judgment, the Appropriations Clause also shapes the legal doctrines that courts

---

Brutus, Virginia J. (Dec. 6, 1787), reprinted in 8 The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution: Virginia 215 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1988) (excerpted response to George Mason's objections to the Constitution) (pointing to the Appropriations Clause as requiring that "any evils which may arise from an improper application of the public money must either originate with, or have the assent of the immediate Representatives of the people").

[16] See An Impartial Citizen, in Petersburg Virginia Gazette (Jan. 10, 1788), reprinted in 8 The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution: Virginia 295 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1988) (arguing that because, among other things, the President could not "appropriate the public money to any use, but what is expressly provided by law," the President's constitutional powers would leave "dignity enough for the execution" of the office "without the possibility of making a bad use of it").

[17] See A Native of Virginia, Observations upon the Proposed Plan of Federal Government (Apr. 2, 1788), reprinted in 9 The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution: Virginia 676 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1990) ("As all appropriations of money are to be made by law, and regular statements thereof published, no money can be applied but to the use of the United States.").

[18] See, e.g., George Mason, Objections to the Proposed Federal Constitution (1787), reprinted in Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States Published During Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, at 329 (Paul Leicester Ford ed., 1888) [hereinafter Pamphlets on the Constitution] (pointing to the Senate's composition powers, including its ability to alter money bills and originate appropriations, to argue that the Senate would "destroy any balance in the government"); but see James Iredell, Answers to Mr. Mason's Objections to the New Constitution, Recommended by the Late Convention (1788), reprinted in Pamphlets on the Constitution, at 340–41 (arguing that the Senate should have a role in offering and amending appropriations because the House of Representatives might overlook a needed appropriation and the House would be able to check the Senate's power by withholding its assent to appropriations proposed in the upper chamber).

[1] Reeside v. Walker, 52 U.S. (11 How.) 272, 291 (1851) ("[N]o mandamus or other remedy lies against any officer of the Treasury Department, in a case situated like this, where no appropriation to pay it has been made.").

[2] See 95 U.S. 149, 154 (1877) (explaining that "if the proceeds" of condemned and sold property "have been paid into the treasury, the right to them has so far become vested in the United States that they can only be secured to the former owner of the property through an act of Congress"); see also Republic Nat. Bank v. United States, 506 U.S. 80, 94–96 (1992) (Rehnquist, C.J., opinion of the Court) (reading Knote as standing for "the principle that once funds are deposited into the Treasury, they become public money," and "thus may only be paid out pursuant to a statutory appropriation," even if the Government's ownership of the funds is disputed, but concluding that there was an appropriation that authorized payment of the funds sought by the petitioner).

may apply to adjudicate money claims against the United States.[3] Congress may even direct that no funds are available to pay what might otherwise be a valid debt.[4] If there is no appropriation to pay an alleged debt, either because no such appropriation had been made or Congress has validly prohibited the use of otherwise available funds, the only way that the purported creditor may seek relief is by petitioning Congress.[5]

The Appropriations Clause's limitation on drawing funds from the Treasury is not confined to the types of relief available in judicial proceedings against the United States.[6] As the Court explained in 1850 in Reeside v. Walker, if there is no appropriation available, the President and Executive Branch officers and employees lack the authority to pay the "debts of the United States generally, when presented to them"[7] or to incur obligations on behalf of the United States in anticipation of Congress later making an appropriation to support the obligation.[8] Even the President's constitutionally vested powers may not, on their own, authorize or require disbursements from the Treasury.[9] For example, though a presidential pardon removes all disabilities resulting from a pardoned offense, a pardon cannot require return of property seized, sold, and paid into the Treasury as a consequence of the offense.[10]

However, the Court has also identified circumstances in which the Appropriations Clause is not a relevant limitation on government action. The Clause governs the conduct of federal officers or employees, but it does not constrain Congress in its ability to incur obligations—binding commitments to pay federal funds—by statute[11] or to otherwise dispose of public funds.[12] Similarly, the Clause is not implicated where there is an appropriation

---

[3] See Off. of Pers. Mgmt. v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414, 426 (1990) ("[J]udicial use of the equitable doctrine of estoppel cannot grant respondent a money remedy that Congress has not authorized.").

[4] See Hart v. United States, 118 U.S. 62, 65, 67 (1886) ("It was entirely within the competency of congress to declare" that no debt that accrued prior to the outbreak of the Civil War could be paid in favor of a claimant who had "promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained" rebellion "till the further order of congress.").

[5] See Bradley v. United States, 98 U.S. 104, 117 (1878) (stating that where the Federal Government contracted to lease real property owned by a third party, subject to Congress making appropriations in the future to pay the agreed annual rental amounts, the lessor had to "rely upon the justice of Congress" to recover the difference between the agreed rental value for the third year of the lease, $4,200, and the lesser amount actually appropriated for that year's rental payments, $1,800); Reeside, 52 U.S. (11 How.) at 291 ("Hence, the petitioner should have presented her claim on the United States to Congress, and prayed for an appropriation to pay it."); cf. R.R. v. Alabama, 101 U.S. 832, 835 (1879) (drawing an analogy between the Appropriations Clause and a similar provision in the Alabama Constitution to explain that in the absence of an appropriation "the party who gets a judgment must wait until Congress makes an appropriation before his money can be had").

[6] Richmond, 496 U.S. at 425.

[7] Reeside, 52 U.S. at 291 ("No officer, however high, not even the President, much less a Secretary of the Treasury or Treasurer, is empowered to pay debts of the United States generally, when presented to them . . . . However much money may be in the Treasury at any one time, not a dollar of it can be used in the payment of any thing not thus previously sanctioned.").

[8] See Bradley, 98 U.S. at 114 ("Argument to show that money cannot be drawn from the treasury before it is appropriated is unnecessary, as the Constitution provides that 'no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of an appropriation made by law. . . .'" (quoting U.S. CONST. art. I, § 9, cl. 7)).

[9] See Richmond, 496 U.S. at 425 ("Any exercise of a power granted by the Constitution to one of the other branches of Government is limited by a valid reservation of congressional control over funds in the Treasury.").

[10] Knote v. United States, 95 U.S. 149, 154 (1877) (holding that however large the President's pardon power may be, that power, like "all" of the President's powers, "cannot touch moneys in the treasury of the United States, except expressly authorized by act of Congress").

[11] See Me. Cmty. Health Options v. United States, No. 18-1023, slip op. at 10, 13 (U.S. Apr. 27, 2020) (explaining that the Appropriations Clause constrains "how federal employees and officers may make or authorize payments without appropriations" but does not address "whether Congress itself can create or incur an obligation directly by statute").

[12] See Cincinnati Soap Co. v. United States, 301 U.S. 308, 321 – 22 (1937) (concluding that the Appropriations Clause was "intended as a restriction upon the disbursing authority of the Executive department" and thus was "without significance" in a case challenging Congress's decision to pay the proceeds of a tax on coconut oil to the treasury of the Philippine Islands and further rejecting the argument that the terms of the appropriation were so available to make a payment, because in that event payments made pursuant to the appropriation would comply with the Clause.[13]

While the Appropriations Clause does not itself constrain Congress's ability to dictate the terms upon which it makes funds available, other provisions of the Constitution may. The Court held in United States v. Lovett that a limitation in an appropriations act that barred payment of compensation to three named federal employees was an unconstitutional bill of attainder because it inflicted punishment without judicial trial.[14] The Court also disregarded a limitation placed on an appropriation for the payment of Court of Claims judgments in United States v. Klein, explaining that the limitation impermissibly sought to change the legal effect of a presidential pardon.[15]

In short, the Court's case law has considered the Appropriations Clause and its effects in roughly three contexts. The Court has articulated how, from Congress's perspective, the Clause it not a relevant limitation on congressional action. The Clause requires an appropriation "made by law" before funds may leave the Treasury, and Congress is the branch empowered to authorize such disbursements. From the perspective of the other branches, the Clause conditions any exercise of a constitutional or statutory power, so that such powers cannot result in disbursements of Treasury funds absent an appropriation. Finally, the Court has considered appropriations made by Congress for their consistency with provisions or features of the Constitution other than the Appropriations Clause. If Congress imposes a limitation on funds that is itself unconstitutional, the limitation cannot be enforced.

Clause 8—Titles of Nobility and Foreign Emoluments

ArtI.S9.C8.1 Overview of Titles of Nobility and Foreign Emoluments Clauses

Article I, Section 9, Clause 8:

> No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

This provision encompasses two distinct commands. The first half, sometimes called the federal "Title of Nobility Clause,"[1] limits the power of the United States by prohibiting it from general that it constituted an impermissible delegation of legislative power to the Executive Branch); cf. United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427, 444 (1896) (stating that Congress's decision to recognize a claim "founded upon equitable and moral considerations, and grounded upon principles of right and justice" and "appropriating money for its payment, can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the Judicial Branch of the government").

---

[13] See Salazar v. Ramah Navajo Chapter, 567 U.S. 182, 198 n.9 (2012) (reading Richmond as having "indicated that the Appropriations Clause is no bar to recovery in a case like this one, in which 'the express terms of a specific statute' establish 'a substantive right to compensation' from" an appropriation (quoting Richmond, 496 U.S. at 432)). Congress may appropriate funds in terms that leave disbursing officials no discretion to deny a claimant the funds owed. See United States v. Price, 116 U.S. 43, 44 (1885) ("fully" concurring with the conclusion of the Court of Claims that "congress undertook, as it had the right to do, to determine, not only what particular citizens of Tennessee, by name, should have relief, but also the exact amount which should be paid to each of them" (internal quotation marks omitted)); United States v. Jordan, 113 U.S. 418, 422 (1885) (same).

[14] See 328 U.S. 303, 313, 316–18 (1946) (holding that though Congress phrased the limitation as compensation prohibition it served as a permanent bar on federal employment, a consequence that case law held to be punishment within the meaning of the Bill of Attainder Clause).

[15] See United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128, 147 – 48 (1871) (explaining that the "legislature cannot change the effect of" a "pardon any more than the executive can change a law").

[1] See, e.g., Mark R. Killenbeck, The Physics of Federalism, 51 U. Kan. L. Rev. 1, 7 (2002) (using the term "Title of Nobility Clause" to refer to this provision). More often, the collective terms "Title of Nobility Clauses" or "Nobility Clauses" are used to refer to both this provision and the parallel prohibition on state-granted titles of nobility in the following section. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1 ("No state shall . . . grant any Title of Nobility."); see, e.g., Akhil Reed granting any "title of Nobility." The second half, often referred to as the "Foreign Emoluments Clause,"[2] limits the actions of certain federal officers by prohibiting them from accepting "any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever" from a foreign state, without the consent of Congress.

For most of their history, neither the Title of Nobility Clause nor the Foreign Emoluments Clause have been much discussed or substantively examined by the courts.[3] The meaning and scope of the Foreign Emoluments Clause have been examined in opinions from the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel and the Comptroller General of the United States concerning the obligations of federal officers with respect to gifts, salaries, awards, and other potential emoluments from foreign sources.[4] During the administration of President Donald Trump, the lower federal courts for the first time issued substantive—but often conflicting—decisions interpreting the Foreign Emoluments Clause.[5]

ArtI.S9.C8.2 Historical Background on Foreign Emoluments Clause

Article I, Section 9, Clause 8:

> No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

The Foreign Emoluments Clause's basic purpose is to prevent corruption and limit foreign influence on federal officers. At the Constitutional Convention, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina introduced the language that became the Foreign Emoluments Clause based on "the necessity of preserving foreign Ministers & other officers of the U.S. independent of external influence."[1] The Convention approved the Clause unanimously without noted debate.[2] During the ratification debates, Edmund Randolph of Virginia, a key figure at the Convention,

---

Amar, Foreword: The Document and the Doctrine, 114 Harv. L. Rev. 26, 131 (2000) (using the term "Title of Nobility Clauses" to refer to these two prohibitions); J.M. Balkin, The Constitution of Status, 106 Yale L.J. 2313, 2349 (1997) (same).

[2] See, e.g., Deborah Samuel Sills, The Foreign Emoluments Clause: Protecting Our National Security Interests, 26 J.L. & Pol'y 63 (2018); Amandeep S. Grewal, The Foreign Emoluments Clause and the Chief Executive, 102 Minn. L. Rev. 639 (2017); Seth Barrett Tillman, The Original Public Meaning of the Foreign Emoluments Clause: A Reply to Professor Zephyr Teachout, 107 Nw. U.L. Rev. Colloquy 180 (2013). The usage "Foreign Emoluments Clause" distinguishes Article I, Section 9, Clause 8 from another clause governing the emoluments that the President in particular may receive, sometimes called the "Domestic Emoluments Clause." See ArtII.S1.C7.1 Emoluments Clause and Presidential Compensation.

[3] See generally Michael A. Foster & Kevin J. Hickey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45992, The Emoluments Clauses and the Presidency: Background and Recent Developments 1 (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45992 ("For most of their history, the Foreign and Domestic Emoluments Clauses . . . were little discussed and largely unexamined by the courts."); Manley W. Roberts, The Nobility Clauses: Rediscovering the Cornerstone, 1 J. Attenuated Subtleties 20, 21 (1982), reprinted in 9 J.L.: Periodical Lab'y of Leg. Scholarship 102, 103 (2019) ("For two centuries the courts . . . said nothing about the [Title of] Nobility Clauses.").

[4] See, e.g., Applicability of the Emoluments Clause and the Foreign Gifts and Decorations Act to the President's Receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize, 33 Op. O.L.C. 1 (2009); Proposal that the President Accept Honorary Irish Citizenship, 1 Op. O.L.C. Supp. 278 (1963); In re Retired Uniformed Service Members Receiving Compensation from Foreign Governments, 58 Comp. Gen. 487 (1979).

[5] See ArtI.S9.C8.3 Foreign Emoluments Clause Generally.

[1] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 389 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Madison's notes).

[2] Id.

explained that the Foreign Emoluments Clause was intended to "prevent corruption" by "prohibit[ing] any one in office from receiving or holding any emoluments from foreign states."[3]

The Foreign Emoluments Clause reflected the Framers' experience with the then-customary European practice of giving gifts to foreign diplomats.[4] Following the example of the Dutch Republic, which prohibited its ministers from receiving foreign gifts in 1651,[5] the Articles of Confederation provided: "any person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them" shall not "accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state."[6] The Foreign Emoluments Clause largely tracks this language from the Articles, although there are some differences.[7]

During the Articles period, American diplomats struggled with how to balance their legal obligations and desire to avoid the appearance of corruption, against prevailing European norms and the diplomats' wish to not offend their host country.[8] A well-known example from this period, which appears to have influenced the Framers of the Emoluments Clause,[9] involved the King of France's gift of an opulent snuff box to Benjamin Franklin.[10] Concerned that receipt of this gift would be perceived as corrupting and violate the Articles of Confederation, Franklin sought (and received) congressional approval to keep the gift.[11] Following this precedent, the Foreign Emoluments Clause prohibits federal officers from accepting foreign presents, offices, titles, or emoluments, unless Congress consents.[12]

The Foreign Emoluments Clause thus provides a role for Congress in determining the propriety of foreign emoluments. Under this authority, Congress has in the past provided consent to the receipt of particular presents, emoluments, and decorations through public or

---

[3] See 3 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 327; accord Joseph Story, 3 Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 215–16 (1st ed. 1833) ("[The Foreign Emoluments Clause] is founded in a just jealousy of foreign influence of every sort.").

[4] See generally Deborah Samuel Sills, The Foreign Emoluments Clause: Protecting Our National Security Interests, 26 J.L. & Pol'y 63, 69–72 (2018); Robert G. Natelson, The Original Meaning of "Emoluments" in the Constitution, 52 Ga. L. Rev. 1, 37, 43–45 (2017); Zephyr Teachout, Gifts, Offices, and Corruption, 107 Nw. U.L. Rev. Colloquy 30, 33–35 (2012).

[5] See Zephyr Teachout, Corruption in America: From Benjamin Franklin's Snuff Box to Citizens United 20–21 (2014) (citing 4 John Bassett Moore, A Digest of International Law 579 (1906)).

[6] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, ¶ 1.

[7] Two differences are notable. First, unlike the corresponding provision in the Articles, the Foreign Emoluments Clause expressly provides that Congress may consent to a federal official's receipt of emoluments. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8. Second, the Articles expressly reached state officeholders as well as federal ones, while the Foreign Emoluments Clause does not. Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, ¶ 1; see also Natelson, supra note 4, at 37–38 (discussing these differences); Seth Barrett Tillman, Citizens United and the Scope of Professor Teachout's Anti-Corruption Principle, 107 Nw. U. L. Rev. Colloquy 1, 5 (2012) (same).

[8] See generally Teachout, supra note 5, at 20–26; Natelson, supra note 4, at 43–45.

[9] As Edmund Randolph recounted to the Virginia ratifying convention:

> An accident which actually happened, operated in producing the [Foreign Emoluments Clause]. A box was presented to our ambassador by the king of [France]. It was thought proper, in order to exclude corruption and foreign influence, to prohibit any one in office from receiving or holding any emoluments from foreign states. . . . [I]f at that moment, when we were in harmony with the king of France, we had supposed that he was corrupting our ambassador, it might have disturbed that confidence . . . .

3 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 327. It is unclear whether Randolph was referring to the snuff box gifted to Franklin, or a similar gift made to Arthur Lee, an American envoy to France during this same period. See Teachout, supra note 5, at 35.

[10] See Teachout, supra note 5, at 25–26.

[11] See id.; Applicability of Emoluments Clause to Employment of Government Employees by Foreign Public Universities, 18 Op. O.L.C. 13, 16 n.4 (1994).

[12] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8.

private bills,[13] or by enacting general rules governing the receipt of gifts by federal officers from foreign governments.[14] For example, in 1966, Congress enacted the Foreign Gifts and Decorations Act, which provided general congressional consent for foreign gifts of minimal value, as well as conditional authorization for acceptance of gifts on behalf of the United States in some cases.[15]

Several Presidents in the nineteenth century—such as Andrew Jackson,[16] Martin Van Buren,[17] John Tyler,[18] and Benjamin Harrison[19]—notified Congress of foreign presents they received, and either placed the gifts at Congress's disposal or obtained consent for their acceptance. Other nineteenth century Presidents treated presents they received as "gifts to the United States, rather than as personal gifts."[20] Thus, in one instance, President Lincoln accepted a foreign gift on behalf of the United States and then deposited it with the Department of State.[21] In the twentieth century, some Presidents sought the advice of the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel on whether acceptance of particular honors or benefits would violate the Emoluments Clauses.[22]

[13] See generally S. Rep. No. 89-1160, at 1–2 (1966) ("In the past, the approval of Congress, as required by [the Foreign Emoluments Clause], has taken the form of public or private bills, authorizing an individual or group of individuals to accept decorations or gifts.").

[14] See, e.g., Act of Jan. 31, 1881, ch. 32, § 3, 21 Stat. 603, 603–04 (1881) (authorizing certain named persons to accept presents from foreign governments, and requiring that "hereafter, any presents, decoration, or other thing, which shall be conferred or presented by any foreign government to any officer of the United States . . . shall be tendered through the Department of State").

[15] See Pub. L. No. 89-673, 80 Stat. 952 (1966) (codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. § 7342).

[16] A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents 1789–1902, at 466–67 (James Richardson, ed., 1907) (January 19, 1830 letter from President Jackson to the Senate and House of Representatives stating that the Constitution prohibited his acceptance of a medal from Simon Bolivar, and therefore placing the medal "at disposal of Congress").

[17] S.J. Res. 4, 26th Cong., 5 Stat. 409 (1840) (joint resolution of Congress authorizing President Van Buren to dispose of presents given to him by the Imam of Muscat and deposit the proceeds in the Treasury).

[18] S. Journal, 28th Cong., 2d Session 254 (1844) (authorizing sale of two horses presented to the United States by the Imam of Muscat); see also Teachout, supra note 5, at 42 (discussing the Van Buren and Tyler precedents); Seth Barrett Tillman, The Original Public Meaning of the Foreign Emoluments Clause: A Reply to Professor Zephyr Teachout, 107 Nw. L. Rev. Colloquy 180, 190 (2013) (same).

[19] Pub. Res. 54-39, 29 Stat. 759 (1896) (congressional resolution authorizing delivery of Brazilian and Spanish medals to former President Benjamin Harrison).

[20] See Proposal that the President Accept Honorary Irish Citizenship, 1 Op. O.L.C. Supp. 278, 281 (1963).

[21] Id.

[22] See Applicability of the Emoluments Clause and the Foreign Gifts and Decorations Act to the President's Receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize, 33 Op. O.L.C. 1, 4, 7–9 (2009) (concluding that acceptance of the Nobel Peace Prize does not violate the Foreign Emoluments Clause because it is awarded by a private organization, not a foreign government); President Reagan's Ability to Receive Retirement Benefits from the State of California, Op. O.L.C. 187, 189–92 (1981) (concluding that retirement benefits are not "emoluments" under the Domestic Emoluments Clause because they "are neither gifts nor compensation for services" and would not subject the President to improper influence); Honorary Irish Citizenship, 1 Op. O.L.C. Supp. at 278 (concluding that President's acceptance of even "honorary" Irish citizenship would violate "the spirit, if not the letter" of the Foreign Emoluments Clause).

ArtI.S9.C8.3 Foreign Emoluments Clause Generally

Article I, Section 9, Clause 8:

> No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

For most of its history, courts have rarely substantively analyzed or interpreted the Foreign Emoluments Clause.[1] During the administration of President Donald Trump, however, a number of private parties, state attorneys general, and Members of Congress sued the President based on alleged violations of both the Foreign Emoluments Clause and the Domestic Emoluments Clause[2] (collectively, the Emoluments Clauses). Three major federal lawsuits concerning the Emoluments Clauses were filed against President Trump.[3] Over nearly four years, these cases progressed through the lower federal courts, resulting in the first significant judicial decisions on the Emoluments Clauses.

In late 2020, the Supreme Court denied review in one of these cases,[4] and—after the end of President Trump's term in January 2021—instructed two federal appellate courts to vacate their judgments and dismiss the other two cases as moot.[5] As a result, most of the lower court decisions on the Emoluments Clauses have been vacated.[6] In the absence of definitive precedent from the Supreme Court, this section reviews these lower court holdings regarding the meaning and scope of the Emoluments Clauses, although they generally retain at most persuasive, and not precedential, value.[7]

In the three cases, plaintiffs alleged that President Trump's retention of certain business and financial interests during his Presidency violated the Emoluments Clauses. For example, because President Trump retained an ownership interest in the Trump International Hotel, plaintiffs alleged he received constitutionally forbidden "emoluments" when foreign or state governments paid for their officials to stay at the Hotel.[8] In a series of rulings, the lower courts addressed three main issues: (1) who has standing to assert Emoluments Clause violations; (2)

---

[1] See Michael A. Foster & Kevin J. Hickey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45992, The Emoluments Clauses and the Presidency: Background and Recent Developments 1 (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45992. Like the Title of Nobility Clause, the Foreign Emoluments Clause is occasionally cited by the Supreme Court in passing to make a rhetorical point. See, e.g., Citizens United v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 558 U.S. 310, 424 n.51 (2010) (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Foreign Emoluments Clause to argue that the "notion that Congress might lack the authority to distinguish foreigners from citizens in the regulation of electioneering would certainly have surprised the Framers"); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 157 (1973) (noting that the Emoluments Clause, along with a number of other constitutional provisions, uses the term "Person" without "pre-natal application").

[2] See ArtII.S1.C7.1 Emoluments Clause and Presidential Compensation.

[3] See Complaint, Citizens for Resp. & Ethics in Washington (CREW) v. Trump, No. 1:17-cv-00458-RA (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2017); Complaint, Blumenthal v. Trump, No. 1:17-cv-01154-EGS (D.D.C. June 14, 2017); Complaint, District of Columbia v. Trump, No. 8:17-cv-01596-PJM (D. Md. June 12, 2017).

[4] Blumenthal v. Trump, 949 F.3d 14 (D.C. Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 553 (U.S. 2020).

[5] See CREW v. Trump, 953 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2019), cert. granted, judgment vacated, No. 20-330, 2021 WL 231541 (U.S. Jan. 25, 2021); In re Trump, 958 F.3d 274 (4th Cir. 2020) (en banc), cert. granted, judgment vacated sub nom., Trump v. District of Columbia, No. 20-331, 2021 WL 231542 (U.S. Jan. 25, 2021).

[6] An exception is the District of Columbia Circuit's opinion on legislative standing, which remains good law. See Blumenthal, 949 F.3d 14.

[7] See Persuasive Authority, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) ("Authority that carries some weight but is not binding on a court . . . .").

[8] See, e.g., CREW v. Trump, 276 F. Supp. 3d 174, 182 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) (reviewing plaintiffs' allegations), vacated and remanded, 953 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2019), judgment vacated, No. 20-330, 2021 WL 231541 (U.S. Jan. 25, 2021).

whether the President and other elected officials are subject to the Foreign Emoluments Clause; and (3) the meaning and scope of the term "emolument."[9]

On the standing-to-sue issue, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that individual Members of Congress lacked standing to sue based on alleged injuries to the legislature as a whole (namely, the deprivation of an opportunity to vote on whether to consent to the acceptance of foreign emoluments).[10] As to the standing of private individuals, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that hospitality-industry plaintiffs had standing based on a theory of competitive harm resulting from the allegedly unlawful acceptance of emoluments.[11] However, a number of judges on the Second Circuit dissented from this holding[12] and the Supreme Court subsequently vacated the decision as moot.[13]

On the second issue, commentators have debated whether federal elected officials hold an "Office of Profit or Trust" under the United States are thus subject to the Foreign Emoluments Clause.[14] The Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC), which has developed a body of opinions on the Emoluments Clauses, has opined that the President "surely" holds an office of profit and trust under the Constitution.[15] In litigation, President Trump conceded that he was subject to the Foreign Emoluments Clause,[16] and the only lower court to directly reach the issue agreed with the OLC's view.[17] However, that holding was subsequently vacated.[18]

The final litigated issue was the meaning and scope of the term "emolument" as used in the Emoluments Clauses—particularly, whether it includes private, arm's-length market transactions. In the litigation, President Trump argued that "emoluments" included only benefits received by an officeholder in return for official action or through his office or employment.[19] Plaintiffs urged that "emoluments" be defined more broadly to apply to any "profit, gain, or advantage" received by the President from a foreign or domestic government.[20] The two district courts that reached the issue adopted the plaintiffs' broader definition of "emolument,"[21] although the appellate courts subsequently vacated those decisions.[22]

---

[9] For a fuller examination of these decisions, see Foster & Hickey, supra note 1, at 5–18.

[10] Blumenthal, 949 F.3d at 19–20.

[11] CREW v. Trump, 953 F.3d 178, 189–200 (2d Cir. 2019), cert. granted, judgment vacated, No. 20-330, 2021 WL 231541 (U.S. Jan. 25, 2021). A district court in Maryland adopted a similar view of competitor standing with respect to state-government plaintiffs. See District of Columbia v. Trump, 291 F. Supp. 3d 725, 740–49 (D. Md. 2018), vacated, 838 F. App'x 789, 790 (4th Cir. 2021).

[12] See CREW v. Trump, 971 F.3d 102, 102 (2d Cir. 2020) (noted dissents from five judges from the denial of rehearing en banc).

[13] CREW v. Trump, No. 20-330, 2021 WL 231541 (U.S. Jan. 25, 2021).

[14] Compare Seth Barrett Tillman, The Original Public Meaning of the Foreign Emoluments Clause: A Reply to Professor Zephyr Teachout, 107 Nw. L. Rev. Colloquy 180, 185–95 (arguing that the Foreign Emoluments Clause does not apply to elected federal officials), with Zephyr Teachout, Gifts, Offices, and Corruption, 107 Nw. L. Rev. Colloquy 30, 39–48 (2012) (disputing this view).

[15] Applicability of the Emoluments Clause and the Foreign Gifts and Decorations Act to the President's Receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize, 33 Op. O.L.C. 1, 4 (2009); see also Proposal that the President Accept Honorary Irish Citizenship, 1 Op. O.L.C. Supp. 278, 278 (1963) (assuming that the Foreign Emoluments Clause applies to the President).

[16] See, e.g., Blumenthal v. Trump, 373 F. Supp. 3d 191, 196 n.3 (D.D.C. 2019) ("The parties do not dispute that the [Foreign Emoluments] Clause applies to the President."), rev'd on other grounds, Blumenthal v. Trump, 949 F.3d 14 (D.C. Cir. 2020).

[17] See District of Columbia v. Trump, 315 F. Supp. 3d 875, 882–86 (D. Md. 2018), vacated, 838 F. App'x 789, 790 (4th Cir. 2021).

[18] District of Columbia v. Trump. 838 F. App'x 789, 790 (4th Cir. 2021).

[19] See, e.g., Blumenthal, 373 F. Supp. 3d at 196–98.

[20] See, e.g., id. at 197–98.

[21] See id. at 199–208; D.C. v. Trump, 315 F. Supp. 3d at 886–904.

ArtI.S9.C8.4 Titles of Nobility and the Constitution

Article I, Section 9, Clause 8:

> No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

The Constitution's prohibition on titles of nobility reflects both "the American aversion to aristocracy"[1] and the republican character of the government established by the Constitution.[2] The Clause thus complements other constitutional provisions—most notably the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments—that prohibit invidious governmental distinctions between classes of American citizens.[3]

The Articles of Confederation[4] and many Revolutionary-era state constitutions contained prohibitions of titles of nobility and other systems of hereditary privilege.[5] The federal Title of Nobility Clause substantially follows the Articles' prohibition and was not a subject of significant debate at the Constitutional Convention.[6] As James Madison observed in the Federalist No. 44: "The prohibition with respect to titles of nobility is copied from the articles of Confederation and needs no comment."[7] Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist No. 84, was only slightly more loquacious:

---

[22] District of Columbia v. Trump, 838 F. App'x 789, 790 (4th Cir. 2021); Blumenthal v. Trump, 949 F.3d 14, 21 (D.C. Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 553 (2020).

[1] Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 70 n.3 (1982) (Brennan, J., concurring); see also Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 239 (1995) (Scalia, J., concurring) (characterizing Title of Nobility Clauses as reflecting the Constitution's "rejection of dispositions . . . based on blood").

[2] See The Federalist No. 39 (James Madison); The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton).

[3] See Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 533–55 (1980) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (discussing Title of Nobility Clauses as "one aspect of our commitment to the proposition that the sovereign has a fundamental duty to govern impartially"); J. M. Balkin, The Constitution of Status, 106 Yale L.J. 2313, 2349–52 (1997) (characterizing the Title of Nobility Clauses as among "status-dismantling" constitutional provisions intended "to ensure that nothing like a hereditary monarchy or a hereditary nobility would ever rise up in the United States").

[4] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, ¶ 1 ("[N]or shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.").

[5] See, e.g., Md. Const. of 1776, art. XL ("[N]o title of nobility, or hereditary honours, ought to be granted in this State."); N.C. Const. of 1776, art. XXII ("[N]o hereditary emoluments, privileges or honors ought to be granted or conferred in this State."); Ga. Const. of 1777, art. XI ("[N]or shall any person who holds any title of nobility be entitled to a vote, or be capable of serving as a representative, or hold any post of honor, profit, or trust in this State, whilst such person claims his title of nobility."); Mass. Const. of 1780, art. VI ("No man, or corporation, or association of men, have any other title to obtain advantages, or particular and exclusive privileges, distinct from those of the community, than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public . . . ."); Pa. Const. of 1790, art. IX, § 24 ("[T]he legislature shall not grant any title of nobility or hereditary distinction . . . .").

[6] See Carlton F.W. Larson, Titles of Nobility, Hereditary Privilege, and the Unconstitutionality of Legacy Preferences in Public School Admissions, 84 Wash. U.L. Rev. 1375, 1401–02 (2006) ("The Nobility Clauses occasioned little debate in the Constitutional Convention itself; indeed, as carry-overs from the Articles of Confederation they were unlikely to be the subject of much comment."); Eugenic Artificial Insemination: A Cure for Mediocrity?, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1850, 1859 (1981) ("Taken from the Articles of Confederation, the titles of nobility clause was enacted virtually without debate in the Constitutional Convention.").

[7] The Federalist No. 34 (James Madison).

> Nothing need be said to illustrate the importance of the prohibition of titles of nobility. This may truly be denominated the corner-stone of republican government; for so long as they are excluded, there can never be serious danger that the government will be any other than that of the people.[8]

Very few courts have had occasion to interpret the meaning of the federal Title of Nobility Clause.[9] The Supreme Court has only discussed the Title of Nobility Clause in passing, as when Justices cite the Clause to make a rhetorical point in a concurring or dissenting opinion.[10]

How broadly to understand the Title of Nobility Clause's prohibition thus remains an open, if perhaps academic, question. On a narrow reading, the Clause merely prohibits a federal system of hereditary privilege along the lines of the British aristocratic system.[11] More broadly understood, the Clause could preclude other governmental grants of enduring favor or disfavor to particular classes based on birth or other non-merit-based criteria.[12] Some commentators

---

[8] The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton); accord The Federalist No. 39 (James Madison) ("Could any further proof be required of the republican complexion of this system, the most decisive one might be found in its absolute prohibition of titles of nobility . . . ").

[9] There are only a handful of lower court decisions that can be characterized as substantive interpretations of the Clause. See, e.g., State v. Larson, 419 N.W.2d 897, 898 (N.D. 1988) (holding that state issuance of driver's licenses did not confer a title of nobility); United States v. Thomason, 444 F.2d 1094, 1095 (9th Cir. 1971) (holding that military rank system does not constitute a title of nobility); In re Jama, 272 N.Y.S.2d 677, 678 (N.Y. Civ. Ct. 1966) (rejecting application for surname change to "von Jama" based on "spirit and intent" of federal Title of Nobility Clause); see generally Jol A. Silversmith, The "Missing Thirteenth Amendment": Constitutional Nonsense and Titles of Nobility, 8 S. Cal. Interdisc. L.J. 577, 606 n.178 (1999) (collecting cases). A substantial number of these lower-court cases raise the oft-rejected claim that attorneys' or public officials' use of the term "Esquire" violates the Title of Nobility Clause. See, e.g., State v. Casteel, 634 N.W.2d 338, 343 n.6 (Wis. Ct. App. 2001); Williams v. Florida., No. 218CV389FTM29UAM, 2019 WL 858024, at *2 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 22, 2019); Bassoff v. Treanor, Pope & Hughes P.A., No. CV RDB-14-3753, 2015 WL 8757651, at *4 (D. Md. Dec. 15, 2015); see generally Silversmith, supra note 9, at 602–07 (addressing this argument).

[10] See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 239 (1995) (Scalia, J., concurring) (observing that the Title of Nobility Clause reflects the Constitution's "rejection of dispositions . . . based on blood"); Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 70 n.3 (1982) (Brennan, J., concurring) (noting that both the Title of Nobility Clause and the Fourteenth Amendment forbid "degrees of citizenship"); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 533–55 (1980) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (discussing the Title of Nobility Clauses as "one aspect of our commitment to the proposition that the sovereign has a fundamental duty to govern impartially"); Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495, 521 n.3 (1976) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (arguing that the Title of Nobility Clause "would prohibit the United States from attaching any badge of ignobility to a citizen at birth").

As in the Federalist Papers, early mentions of the Clause in Supreme Court opinions treat its meaning as self-explanatory. See, e.g., Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky, 36 U.S. 257, 350 (1837) (noting that "title of nobility" is "a term which defines itself"); Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. 122, 153 (1819) (characterizing the state Title of Nobility Clause as a "plain prohibition" that is "clearly understood"); accord 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 215 (1833) ("[The Title of Nobility] clause seems scarcely to require even a passing notice. As a perfect equality is the basis of all our institutions, state and national, the prohibition against the creation of any titles of nobility seems proper, if not indispensable . . . .").

[11] See, e.g., Nobility, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) (defining "nobility" with respect to the English peerage system of "dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons, and their female counterparts," usually associated with land grants and hereditary descent of title and privilege); but see Larson, supra note 6, at 1380–82 (arguing the Title of Nobility Clauses' scope extends "beyond the narrow meaning of nobility under English law").

[12] See Mathews, 427 U.S. at 521 n.3 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (arguing the Title of Nobility Clause would prohibit "any badge of ignobility" imposed by the government to "a citizen at birth"); Richard Delgado, Inequality "From the Top": Applying an Ancient Prohibition to an Emerging Problem of Distributive Justice, 32 UCLA L. Rev. 100, 115–17 (1984) (arguing the Title of Nobility Clauses prohibit state action that confers the "indices of nobility," such an enduring grant of advantage or wealth to a closed class of individuals).

This broader reading of the Title of Nobility Clause is in tension, as a matter of original meaning, with the system of chattel slavery prevailing in the American South when the Constitution was ratified. See Akhil Reed Amar, Foreword: The Document and the Doctrine, 114 Harv. L. Rev. 26, 62 (2000) ("In the antebellum South, there were indeed lords and serfs notwithstanding the Nobility Clauses."). This discord between the Constitution's literal textual guarantees and the reality of American slavery at the Founding is not unique to the Title of Nobility Clause. See Amar, supra note 12, at 60–63 (examining this issue and noting "[s]lavery seemed to contradict a huge part of the Constitution if read have suggested, for example, that the Title of Nobility Clause might forbid admission preferences for legacy students at state universities or certain benefits that accompany receipt of the Medal of Honor.[13] After the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, challenges to governmental favoritism based on class, race, or other bases have usually relied on the Equal Protection Clause.[14]

Section 10—Powers Denied States

Clause 1—Proscribed Powers

ArtI.S10.C1.1 Foreign Policy by States

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

At the time of the Civil War, the Court relied on the prohibition on treaties, alliances, or confederations in holding that the Confederation formed by the seceding states could not be recognized as having any legal existence.[1] Today, the prohibition's practical significance lies in the limitations that it implies upon the power of the states to deal with matters having a bearing upon international relations.

In the early case of Holmes v. Jennison,[2] Chief Justice Roger Taney invoked it as a reason for holding that a state had no power to deliver up a fugitive from justice to a foreign state. More recently, the kindred idea that the responsibility for the conduct of foreign relations rests exclusively with the Federal Government prompted the Court to hold that, because the oil under the three-mile marginal belt along the California coast might well become the subject of international dispute, and because the ocean, including this three-mile belt, is of vital consequence to the Nation in its desire to engage in commerce and to live in peace with the world, the Federal Government has paramount rights in and power over that belt, including full dominion over the resources of the soil under the water area.[3] In Skiriotes v. Florida,[4] the Court, on the other hand, ruled that this clause did not disable Florida from regulating the manner in which its own citizens may engage in sponge fishing outside its territorial waters. Speaking for a unanimous Court, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes declared, "When its action does not conflict with federal legislation, the sovereign authority of the State over the blithely"); Frederick Douglass, The Constitution of the United States: Is it Pro-Slavery or Anti-Slavery? (1860), in Frederick Douglass: Selected Speeches and Writings 338 (Philip S. Foner & Yuval Taylor eds., 2000) ("The Constitution forbids the passing of a bill of attainder . . . a law entailing upon the child the disabilities and hardships imposed upon the parent. Every slave law in America might be repealed on this very ground. The slave is made a slave because his mother is a slave.").

---

[13] See, e.g., Larson, supra note 6, at 1375, 1425; Manley W. Roberts, The Nobility Clauses: Rediscovering the Cornerstone, 1 J. Attenuated Subtleties 20, 22–23 (1982), reprinted in 9 J.L.: Periodical Lab'y of Leg. Scholarship 102, 104–05 (2019).

[14] See Amdt14.S1.8.1.1 Overview of Race-Based Classifications; Amdt14.S1.8.7.1 Overview of Non-Race Based Classifications.

[1] Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U.S. 176, 183 (1878).

[2] 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540 (1840).

[3] United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19 (1947).

[4] 313 U.S. 69 (1941).

conduct of its citizens upon the high seas is analogous to the sovereign authority of the United States over its citizens in like circumstances."[5]

ArtI.S10.C1.2 Coining Money by States

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

Within the sense of the Constitution, bills of credit signify a paper medium of exchange, intended to circulate between individuals, and between the government and individuals, for the ordinary purposes of society. It is immaterial whether the quality of legal tender is imparted to such paper. Interest-bearing certificates, in denominations not exceeding ten dollars, that were issued by loan offices established by the state of Missouri and made receivable in payment of taxes or other moneys due to the state, and in payment of the fees and salaries of state officers, were held to be bills of credit whose issuance was banned by this section.[1] The states are not forbidden, however, to issue coupons receivable for taxes,[2] nor to execute instruments binding themselves to pay money at a future day for services rendered or money borrowed.[3] Bills issued by state banks are not bills of credit;[4] it is immaterial that the state is the sole stockholder of the bank,[5] that the officers of the bank were elected by the state legislature,[6] or that the capital of the bank was raised by the sale of state bonds.[7]

ArtI.S10.C1.3 Legal Tender Issued by States

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

Relying on this clause, which applies only to the states and not to the Federal Government[1], the Supreme Court has held that, where the marshal of a state court received state bank notes in payment and discharge of an execution, the creditor was entitled to demand payment in gold or silver.[2] Because, however, there is nothing in the Constitution prohibiting a bank depositor from consenting when he draws a check that payment may be

---

[5] 313 U.S. at 78–79.

[1] Craig v. Missouri, 29 U.S. (4 Pet.) 410, 425 (1830); Byrne v. Missouri, 33 U.S. (8 Pet.) 40 (1834).

[2] Virginia Coupon Cases (Poindexter v. Greenhow), 114 U.S. 270 (1885); Chaffin v. Taylor, 116 U.S. 567 (1886).

[3] Houston & Texas Central R.R. v. Texas, 177 U.S. 66 (1900).

[4] Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 257 (1837).

[5] Darrington v. Bank of Alabama, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 12, 15 (1851); Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U.S. (15 How.) 304, 317 (1853).

[6] Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 257 (1837).

[7] Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U.S. (10 How.) 190, 205 (1851).

[1] Juilliard v. Greenman, 110 U.S. 421, 446 (1884).

[2] Gwin v. Breedlove, 43 U.S. (2 How.) 29, 38 (1844). See also Griffin v. Thompson, 43 U.S. (2 How.) 244 (1844).

made by draft, a state law providing that checks drawn on local banks should, at the option of the bank, be payable in exchange drafts, was held valid.[3]

ArtI.S10.C1.4 State Bills of Attainder

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

A bill of attainder is legislation that imposes punishment on a specific person or group of people without a judicial trial.[1] The Constitution includes two separate clauses respectively banning enactment of bills of attainder by the federal government and the states.[2] The Supreme Court has interpreted the federal and state bill of attainder prohibitions as having the same scope.[3]

The Supreme Court applied the constitutional prohibition on state bills of attainder in a Reconstruction-era case, Cummings v. Missouri.[4] That case involved a post-Civil War amendment to the Missouri constitution that required persons engaged in certain professions to swear an oath that they had never been disloyal to the United States.[5] The Court held that the purpose and effect of the challenged provision was to punish a group of individuals who had been disloyal to the United States by effectively permanently excluding them from the covered professions.[6] Based on that holding, the Supreme Court invalidated the provision as an unconstitutional bill of attainder.[7]

In Drehman v. Stifle, the Supreme Court rejected a bill of attainder challenge to another provision of the Missouri constitution that barred civil suits against individuals for actions

---

[3] Farmers & Merchants Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank, 262 U.S. 649, 659 (1923).

[1] See, e.g., Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 468 (1977).

[2] For the prohibition on federal bills of attainder, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3. For discussion of the prohibition on federal bills of attainder and further information on the historical roots of the federal and state Bill of Attainder Clauses, see ArtI.S9.C3.1 Historical Background on Bills of Attainder.

[3] See, e.g., Nixon, 433 U.S. at 468–76. In Nixon, the Court cited Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277 (1866), a case involving the state Bill of Attainder Clause, to support its application of the federal Bill of Attainder Clause.

[4] 71 U.S. 277 (1866). In an earlier case, the Supreme Court considered a challenge to a Georgia statute enacted before the federal Constitution was ratified that punished treason through banishment and confiscation of property without a judicial trial. Cooper v. Telfair, 4 U.S. 14, 14–15 (1800). A former resident of Georgia living abroad who had allegedly supported the British during the Revolutionary War argued that the statute violated the Georgia state constitution, which did not expressly bar enactment of bills of attainder. Id. at 16–17. The Court declined to strike down the law. Id. at 19. Justice William Paterson opined, "the power of confiscation and banishment does not belong to the judicial authority, whose process could not reach the offenders: and yet, it is a power, that grows out of the very nature of the social compact, which must reside somewhere, and which is so inherent in the legislature, that it cannot be divested, or transferred, without an express provision of the constitution." Id. (opinion of Paterson, J.).

[5] Id. at 280.

[6] See id. at 320 (The oath requirement "was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment, and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties, who had committed them, of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen.").

[7] Id. at 325–29. In a related case, Ex parte Garland, the Court applied its reasoning in Cummings to strike down a similar federal law. 71 U.S. 333, 377–78 (1866). For additional discussion of Cummings and Garland, see ArtI.S9.C3.1 Historical Background on Bills of Attainder. See also Pierce v. Carskadon, 83 U.S. 234, 239 (1873); cf. Klinger v. Missouri, 80 U.S. 257, 262 (1872) (holding, in a challenge to a loyalty oath for jurors, that it would have raised constitutional concerns if a juror was excluded solely for past conduct, "simply because he had sympathized with or aided the rebellion during the war," but that it was permissible to exclude a juror who "also refused to take [the oath] because he was still a more bitter rebel than ever, [because] the avowal of such a feeling was inconsistent with the upright and loyal discharge of his duties").

taken under federal or state military authority during the Civil War.[8] The Court concluded that the law did not impose punishment on those who might want to file such suits: "If not the opposite of penal, there is certainly nothing punitive in its character. It simply exempts from suits . . . those who might otherwise be harassed by litigation and made liable in damages."[9]

The Supreme Court has also rejected bill of attainder challenges to state and local rules imposing employment qualifications, as long as those employment qualifications were not punitive. For instance, in Garner v. Board of Public Works, the Supreme Court considered bill of attainder challenges to a provision of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles barring from public employment any person who within the last five years had been affiliated with a group that advocated the forceful overthrow of the government, and a city ordinance requiring public employees to state whether they had ever been members of the Communist Party.[10] The Court upheld both provisions, holding that a bill of attainder must inflict punishment, and the Court was "unable to conclude that punishment is imposed by a general regulation which merely provides standards of qualification and eligibility for employment."[11] Similarly, in De Veau v. Braisted, the Supreme Court rejected a bill of attainder challenge to a state law that prevented any person who had been convicted of a felony and had not been pardoned from serving as an officer or agent for certain labor organizations.[12] A plurality of the Court held that the law "embodies no further implications of appellant's guilt than are contained in his . . . judicial conviction; and so it manifestly is not a bill of attainder."[13]

The state Bill of Attainder Clause is part of a single sentence of the Constitution that provides, "No State shall . . . pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts."[14] In Fletcher v. Peck, Chief Justice John Marshall stated that those restrictions on state legislative power "may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state."[15] The Supreme Court has held that the state Ex Post Facto Clause[16] and the Contract Clause,[17] also located in Article I, Section 10, Clause 1, apply only to legislative action and do not apply to judicial decisions.[18] The Court has not expressly considered whether the state Bill

[8] 75 U.S. 595, 598 (1869).

[9] Id. at 601.

[10] 341 U.S. 716, 718–19 (1951).

[11] Id. at 722. See also Hawker v. People of New York 170 U.S. 189, 198–200 (1898); Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36, 47 n.9 (1961). Loyalty oaths in public employment, particularly those premised on political affiliation, have sometimes also been challenged under the First Amendment. See Garner, 341 U.S. at 719–21 (noting that "Congress may reasonably restrict the political activity of federal civil service employees" to protect the integrity and competency of the service, and holding that "a State is not without power to do as much"); see also, e.g., Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 606 (1967) (holding that university professors could not be dismissed based on their refusal to swear that they had never been members of the Communist party, as mere "membership without a specific intent to further the unlawful aims of an organization is not a constitutionally adequate basis for exclusion from such positions").

[12] 363 U.S. 144, 160 (1960) (plurality opinion). Justice William Brennan concurred, stating in part that the challenged provision "does not deny due process or otherwise violate the Federal Constitution." Id. at 161 (Brennan, J., concurring).

[13] Id. at 160 (plurality opinion).

[14] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

[15] 10 U.S. 87, 138 (1810).

[16] See ArtI.S10.C1.5 State Ex Post Facto Laws.

[17] See ArtI.S10.C1.5 State Ex Post Facto Laws.

[18] E.g., Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309, 344 (1914) ("the constitutional prohibition: "No state shall . . . pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts" . . . is directed against legislative action only, and does not reach erroneous or inconsistent decisions by the courts"); see also Ross v. Oregon 227 U.S. 150, 161 (1913); Moore-Mansfield Constr. Co. v. Elec. Installation Co., 234 U.S. 619, 624 (1914).

of Attainder Clause similarly excludes judicial action, but because it is located in the same provision barring states from "pass[ing]" prohibited laws, it is likely the Court would interpret this clause in the same way.

ArtI.S10.C1.5 State Ex Post Facto Laws

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

An ex post facto law is a law that imposes criminal liability or increases criminal punishment retroactively.[1] Two separate clauses of the Constitution, Article I, Sections 9 and 10, ban enactment of ex post facto laws by the Federal Government and the states, respectively.[2] The Supreme Court has cited cases interpreting the federal Ex Post Facto Clause in challenges under the state clause, and vice versa, treating the two clauses as having the same scope.[3] The Court's decisions interpreting both clauses are therefore discussed collectively in greater detail in the Article I, Section 9 essays on the federal Ex Post Facto Clause.[4] In particular, those essays on federal and state ex post facto laws discuss Supreme Court jurisprudence addressing imposing or increasing punishments, procedural changes, employment qualifications, retroactive taxes, inapplicability to judicial decisions, and deportation and related issues.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the Ex Post Facto Clauses to limit only legislation that is criminal or penal in nature,[5] though the Court has also made clear that "the ex post facto effect of a law cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to that which is essentially criminal."[6] In addition, the Court has uniformly applied the prohibition on ex post facto legislation only to laws that operate retroactively.[7] In the 1798 case Calder v. Bull, the Court enumerated four ways in which a legislature may violate the Ex Post Facto Clauses' prohibition on imposing retroactive criminal liability: (1) making criminal an action taken before enactment of the law that was lawful when it was done; (2) increasing the severity of an offense after it was committed; (3) increasing the punishment for a crime after it was committed; and (4) altering the rules of evidence after an offense was committed so that it is easier to convict an offender.[8] The Ex Post Facto Clauses are related to other constitutional provisions that limit retroactive government action, including the federal and state Bill of Attainder Clauses, the Contract Clause, and the Due Process Clauses.[9]

---

[1] See, e.g., Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 391 (1798); Locke v. New Orleans, 71 U.S. 172, 173 (1867).

[2] For the prohibition on federal ex post facto laws, see U.S. CONST. art. I, § 10, cl. 1; see also ArtI.S9.C3.3.1 Overview of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[3] See, e.g., Peugh v. United States, 569 U.S. 530, 532–33 (2013) (case construing federal clause citing case construing state clause); Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U.S. 505, 510 (1903) (case construing state clause citing case construing federal clause).

[4] See ArtI.S9.C3.3.1 Overview of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[5] E.g., Calder, 3 U.S. at 389; Watson v. Mercer, 33 U.S. 88, 110 (1834); see also ArtI.S9.C3.3.4 Ex Post Facto Law Prohibition Limited to Penal Laws.

[6] Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U.S. 381, 385 (1878).

[7] E.g., Calder, 3 U.S. at 389; see also ArtI.S9.C3.3.3 Retroactivity of Ex Post Facto Laws.

[8] Calder, 3 U.S. at 390.

[9] See, e.g., Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. 87, 138–39 (1810); cf. Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 267 (1994) (the restrictions that the Constitution places on retroactive legislation "are of limited scope" and "[a]bsent a violation of one

Multiple Supreme Court decisions have held that the Ex Post Facto Clauses apply only to federal and state legislation, not to judicial decisions.[10] The state Ex Post Facto Clause also applies to state constitutional amendments. In Cummings v. Missouri, the Court considered a challenge to a post-Civil War amendment to the Missouri Constitution that required persons engaged in certain professions to swear an oath that they had never been disloyal to the United States.[11] In holding that the amendment violated the state Ex Post Facto Clause, the Court looked to the Clause's language providing that "'no State'—not no legislature of a State, but that 'no State'—should pass any ex post facto law," and concluded that "[i]t can make no difference, therefore, whether such legislation is found in a constitution or in a law of a State; if it be within the prohibition it is void."[12]

ArtI.S10.C1.6 Contracts

ArtI.S10.C1.6.1 Overview of Contract Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

In addition to prohibiting states from enacting bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, the Constitution seeks to protect private rights from state interference by limiting the states' power to enact legislation that alters existing contract rights.[1] The Constitution's Contract Clause provides: "No State shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts."[2] Although this language could be read as completely prohibiting a state's of those specific provisions," when a new law makes clear that it is retroactive, the arguable "unfairness of retroactive civil legislation is not a sufficient reason for a court to fail to give [that law] its intended scope").

---

[10] E.g., Frank v. Magnum, 237 U.S. 309, 344–45 (1914); cf. Rogers v. Tennessee, 532 U.S. 451, 456–60 (2000) (holding that "limitations on ex post facto judicial decisionmaking are inherent in the notion of due process," but the due process limitation on courts is not identical to the ex post facto prohibition that applies to legislation); see also ArtI.S9.C3.3.11 Ex Post Facto Prohibition and Judicial Decisions.

[11] 71 U.S. 277, 280–81 (1866).

[12] Id. at 307–08. For additional discussion of Cummings, see ArtI.S9.C3.3.9 Employment Qualifications and Ex Post Facto Laws.

[1] See Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 213, 266–67 (1827) ("If it were proper to prohibit a State legislature to pass a retrospective law, which should take from the pocket of one of its own citizens a single dollar, as a punishment for an act which was innocent at the time it was committed; how much more proper was it to prohibit laws of the same character precisely, which might deprive the citizens of other States, and foreigners, as well as citizens of the same State, of thousands, to which, by their contracts, they were justly entitled, and which they might possibly have realized but for such State interference?"); see also Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 431 (1934) ("The obligations of a contract are impaired by a law which renders them invalid, or releases or extinguishes them[,] and impairment, as above noted, has been predicated on laws which without destroying contracts derogate from substantial contractual rights.") (citations omitted).

[2] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. The Supreme Court has long considered contractual "obligations" to encompass both the express terms of an agreement and the underlying state law regarding interpreting and enforcing contracts upon which the parties relied when they made the contract. See U.S. Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 19–20 & n.17 (1977) ("The obligations of a contract long have been regarded as including not only the express terms but also the contemporaneous state law pertaining to interpretation and enforcement."). Such underlying state law may include the law of the place in which the contract was made and the place where it will be performed. Id. Thus, the "obligation" of a contract refers to laws that affect its "validity, construction, discharge and enforcement." Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 429–30 (quoting Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 535, 550 (1866)). States have long regulated the formation, interpretation, enforcement, and performance of contracts. Ogden, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) at 286 ("But to assign to contracts, universally, a literal purport, and to exact for them a rigid literal fulfilment, could not have been the intent of the constitution. It is repelled by a hundred examples. Societies exercise a positive control as well over the inception, construction, and fulfilment of contracts, as over the form and measure of the remedy to enforce them.").

legislative impairment of contracts, the Supreme Court has interpreted the clause to limit a state's power to enact legislation that: (1) breaches or modifies its own contracts; or (2) regulates contracts between private parties.[3]

The Supreme Court has held that the Contract Clause does not generally prevent states from enacting laws to protect the welfare of their citizens.[4] Thus, states retain some authority to enact laws with retroactive effect that alter contractual or other legal relations among individuals and entities.[5] However, a state's regulation of contracts, whether involving public or private parties, must generally be reasonably designed and appropriately tailored to achieve a legitimate public purpose.[6]

Prior to the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment and the subsequent development of the Supreme Court's Due Process jurisprudence in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Contract Clause was one of the few constitutional clauses that expressly limited the power of the states.[7] As Chief Justice John Marshall explained in an early opinion

[3] U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 17. Notably, the Clause does not apply to acts of the Federal Government. Sinking-Funds Cases, 99 U.S. 700, 718–19 (1878) (acknowledging that the Federal Government is "prohibited from depriving persons or corporations of property without due process of law" but is "not included within the constitutional prohibition which prevents States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts"); see also Samuel R. Olken, Charles Evans Hughes and the Blaisdell Decision: A Historical Study of the Contract Clause, 72 Or. L. Rev. 513, 519 (1993) (discussing how the Contract Clause "differed from the Northwest Ordinance in that it barred only state impairment of contract obligations").

[4] Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 434–35 (observing that a state "continues to possess authority to safeguard the vital interests of its people[;] . . . [t]his principle of harmonizing the constitutional prohibition with the necessary residuum of state power has had progressive recognition in the decisions of this Court"); see also W.B. Worthen Co. v. Thomas, 292 U.S. 426, 433 (1934) ("[L]iteralism in the construction of the contract clause . . . would make it destructive of the public interest by depriving the State of its prerogative of self-protection.").

[5] See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 428 ("[T]he prohibition is not an absolute one and is not to be read with literal exactness like a mathematical formula."); U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 17 ("[T]he Contract Clause does not prohibit the States from repealing or amending statutes generally, or from enacting legislation with retroactive effects."); El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 506–09 (1965) ("[I]t is not every modification of a contractual promise that impairs the obligation of contract under federal law . . . . The State has the 'sovereign right . . . to protect the . . . general welfare of its people . . . . Once we are in this domain of the reserve power of a State we must respect the wide discretion on the part of the legislature in determining what is and what is not necessary.'") (quoting E. N.Y. Sav. Bank v. Hahn, 326 U.S. 230, 232–33 (1945)); Trs. of Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 628–30 (1819) ("Taken in its broad unlimited sense, the [Contract Clause] would be an unprofitable and vexatious interference with the internal concerns of a State . . . . [T]he framers of the constitution could never have intended to insert in that instrument a provision so unnecessary, so mischievous, and so repugnant to its general spirit."). Notably, other constitutional provisions may limit a state's power to enact retroactive legislation that, for example, imposes a punishment (e.g., a bill of attainder or ex post facto law). See U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 17 n.13. For example, the Contract Clause generally does not prevent a state from altering laws governing state offices or civil institutions, or from enacting laws on the subject of divorce. Trs. of Dartmouth Coll., 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 627–30 ("That the framers of the constitution did not intend to retrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions, adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us, is not to be so construed, may be admitted. The provision of the constitution never has been understood to embrace other contracts, than those which respect property, or some object of value, and confer rights which may be asserted in a court of justice. It never has been understood to restrict the general right of the legislature to legislate on the subject of divorces."). The Court has cautioned, however, that the clause should not be interpreted to imply that parties may contract to obtain immunity from state regulation. U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 22 ("The States must possess broad power to adopt general regulatory measures without being concerned that private contracts will be impaired, or even destroyed, as a result. Otherwise, one would be able to obtain immunity from state regulation by making private contractual arrangements."); see also Hudson Cnty. Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U.S. 349, 357 (1908) ("One whose rights, such as they are, are subject to state restriction, cannot remove them from the power of the State by making a contract about them.").

[6] U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 22 ("Legislation adjusting the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties must be upon reasonable conditions and of a character appropriate to the public purpose justifying its adoption."). A court's evaluation of the reasonableness of state legislation that affects private contract rights may include consideration of the background circumstances that motivated the state law's adoption and the measure's duration, among other factors. See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 444–47. Courts accord legislatures some deference in determining necessity and reasonableness of such legislation. U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 22–23.

[7] See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 241 (1978) (characterizing the Contract Clause as "perhaps the strongest single constitutional check on state legislation during our early years as a Nation"); U.S. Trust

interpreting the Contract Clause, the Framers' intent in including such language in the Constitution was to prohibit states from enacting legislation intended to assist debtors by abrogating or modifying the terms of existing contracts, as many colonies and states had done during the Colonial Era and under the Articles of Confederation.[8] Many of the Framers believed that such laws discouraged commerce and the extension of credit, undermining the stability of contractual relations and damaging the national economy.[9] Although limited evidence exists to clarify the Contract Clause's original meaning, James Madison argued during debates over ratification of the Constitution that the Clause would prevent shifting state legislative majorities from retroactively impairing private rights.[10] And Alexander Hamilton suggested that the Contract Clause would avoid a breakdown in commercial relations among the states, noting that state laws abrogating private contract rights could serve as a source of hostility among them.[11]

The Supreme Court's views on the level of protection that the Contract Clause provides for contract rights have shifted over time. During the 1800s, and in particular prior to the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the Supreme Court often relied on the Contract Clause to strike down state legislation as unconstitutional when it interfered with existing contract rights.[12] The Court interpreted the Clause to protect a variety of property interests, such as an executed grant of land[13] and the state-granted charter of a private Co., 431 U.S. at 15 ("Over the last century, however, the Fourteenth Amendment has assumed a far larger place in constitutional adjudication concerning the States [than the Contract Clause]."). As noted in McDonald v. Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010), during the 1960s, the Court "shed any reluctance to hold that rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights met the requirements for protection under the Due Process Clause. The Court eventually incorporated almost all of the provisions of the Bill of Rights. Only a handful of the Bill of Rights protections remain unincorporated." Id. at 764–65; see e.g., Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 161–62 (1968) (holding that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause incorporates the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury and makes it applicable to the states). For a discussion of the limitations that the Due Process Clause imposes on states with respect to retroactive deprivations of a life, liberty, or property interest, see Amdt14.S1.5.1 Overview of Procedural Due Process. In addition, the Dormant Commerce Clause doctrine, although not specifically directed at protecting contract rights, limits state power by restraining state authority to regulate interstate commerce. For more, see ArtI.S8.C3.7.1 Overview of Dormant Commerce Clause.

[8] Cf. Trs. of Dartmouth Coll., 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 628–30 ("That anterior to the formation of the constitution, a course of legislation had prevailed in many, if not in all, of the States, which weakened the confidence of man in man, and embarrassed all transactions between individuals, by dispensing with a faithful performance of engagements."); Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 199, 203 (1819) ("[T]he prevailing evil of the times, which produced this clause in the constitution, was the practice of emitting paper money, of making property which was useless to the creditor a discharge of his debt, and of changing the time of payment by authorizing distant instalments.").

[9] Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 427–28.

[10] The Federalist No. 44 (James Madison).

[11] The Federalist No. 7 (Alexander Hamilton) ("Laws in violation of private contracts, as they amount to aggressions on the rights of those States whose citizens are injured by them, may be considered as another probable source of hostility [among the states].").

[12] See, e.g., Trs. of Dartmouth Coll., 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 627, 654 (striking down as unconstitutional a state law that interfered with a private corporate charter established under state law); Sturges, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 208 (holding a bankruptcy law that allowed insolvent debtors to obtain the discharge of their debts by surrendering their property violated the Contract Clause); Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87, 127, 135–39 (1810) (interpreting the Contract Clause to prohibit a state from breaching its own contracts by rescinding a land grant); see also James W. Ely, Jr., The Contract Clause: A Constitutional History 1 (2016) ("Under the leadership of John Marshall, the Supreme Court construed the provision expansively, and it rapidly became the primary vehicle for federal judicial review of state legislation before the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. Indeed, the contract clause was one of the most litigated provisions of the Constitution throughout the nineteenth century . . . .").

[13] Fletcher, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) at 137.

corporation.[14] But even during the early years of the Republic, the Court recognized that the states retained some power to regulate contracts in order to further the public interest.[15]

During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Supreme Court decided cases that gradually weakened the Contract Clause's protections.[16] The Court's view of the Contract Clause underwent a major change during the New Deal Era when the Court decided Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell.[17] In that case, the Court declined to enforce strictly the Contract Clause's prohibition on state legislation that alters private contracts.[18] During the depths of the Great Depression, the Court upheld the Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Law, which allowed courts to extend temporarily the period of time during which a mortgagor (e.g., a homeowner) could redeem a home after the bank foreclosed on the property.[19] The Supreme Court's decision in Blaisdell marked a turning point in its Contract Clause jurisprudence, signaling that the Court would thereafter be more solicitous of states' use of their police powers to regulate contracts to "protect the lives, health, morals, comfort and general welfare of the people," even when the exercise of such powers would substantially impact contract rights.[20]

Since Blaisdell, the Court has permitted state legislatures to modify contract rights to serve the public interest in several cases.[21] Nonetheless, since the 1970s, the Court has decided a few cases indicating that the Contract Clause still provides some protection for contracts, at least when the state lacks a legitimate public purpose for substantially interfering with contract rights and has not regulated such rights in a reasonable or necessary way.[22] For example, the Contract Clause continues to prohibit states from unreasonably and unnecessarily breaching certain legislative covenants with private bondholders,[23] and from [14] See Trs. of Dartmouth Coll., 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 644, 652–54. As the Court noted in Blaisdell, the Clause has been held not to encompass a marriage contract as it pertains to divorce laws, a judgment rendered upon a contract, or a state's waiver of sovereign immunity in general legislation. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 429 n.8.

---

[15] See, e.g., W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 507, 535–36 (1848) (upholding a state's authority to use the power of eminent domain to take a company's toll bridge franchise in order to construct a public highway as not violative of the Contract Clause).

[16] Ely, supra note 12, at 1 ("Over time . . . courts carved out several malleable exceptions to the constitutional protection of contracts . . . thereby weakening the protection of the contract clause and enhancing state regulatory authority.").

[17] 290 U.S. 398 (1934).

[18] Id. at 444–48.

[19] Id. at 415–16, 424. The law prevented the mortgagee from obtaining possession during that time. Id. This right ran contrary to existing contracts, which granted the lender the right to foreclose. Id. at 424–25.

[20] Allied Structural Steel Co v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 241 (1978) (quoting Manigault v. Springs, 199 U.S. 473, 480 (1905)).

[21] See, e.g., Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 474–78, 502, 506 (1987) (upholding a Pennsylvania safety and environmental law—which prohibited mining that would damage existing structures, such as public buildings and homes, by eliminating underground support—against a Contract Clause challenge where the challengers argued the law nullified the surface owner's contractual waiver of liability for damage to the surface estate from coal mining); Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176, 178–79, 196 (1983) (upholding an Alabama law that increased the severance tax on oil and gas extracted from wells located in the state—which the state imposed on producers at the time of severance and which exempted the owners of royalty interests but forbid producers from passing the tax increase on to purchasers or consumers—against a Contract Clause challenge alleging the law impaired the obligations of oil and gas producers' contracts with royalty owners and consumers).

[22] Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 242, 250 ("If the Contract Clause is to retain any meaning at all, . . . it must be understood to impose some limits upon the power of a State to abridge existing contractual relationships, even in the exercise of its otherwise legitimate police power.").

[23] U.S. Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 26, 32 (1977) ("If a State could reduce its financial obligations [by breaching a legislative covenant to protect private bondholders] whenever it wanted to spend the money for what it regarded as an important public purpose, the Contract Clause would provide no protection at all.").

enacting legislation that regulates private pension contracts by imposing a substantial new and retroactive payment obligation on a narrow class of companies.[24]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.2 Historical Background on Contract Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

After the American Revolution, many citizens of the newly created United States had difficulty repaying their debts, motivating state legislatures to enact a number of laws to relieve them of their financial obligations.[1] During the peak of this financial crisis, and under the Articles of Confederation, states enacted laws that assisted debtors by, for example, (1) permitting a debtor to tender worthless property or nearly valueless commodities in payment of debts; (2) extending the time for repaying a debt beyond the time period provided for in a contract; and (3) permitting the payment of overdue obligations in installments rather than a lump sum.[2]

Historical sources from the time of the Founding do not shed much light on the Contract Clause's original meaning.[3] Certainly, the Framers knew the states had enacted various laws that disrupted private contracts, and they wanted to protect private property rights.[4] At least some of the delegates who attended the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in Philadelphia were aware that the Confederation Congress, the country's governing body under the Articles of Confederation, had recently passed an ordinance governing the Northwest Territory that specifically protected private contract rights from legislative interference.[5] Article 2 of the Northwest Ordinance provided that "in the just preservation of rights and property it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever interfere with, or affect private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud previously formed."[6]

During deliberations over the Constitution, delegate Rufus King of Massachusetts proposed to insert the Northwest Ordinance's broad language into the Constitution.[7] Delegates Gouverneur Morris and George Mason opposed the addition of this language,

---

[24] Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 247–50.

[1] Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 427 (1934) ("The widespread distress following the revolutionary period, and the plight of debtors, had called forth in the States an ignoble array of legislative schemes for the defeat of creditors and the invasion of contractual obligations."); see also Sveen v. Melin, No. 16-1432, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 11, 2018) ("The origins of the Clause lie in legislation enacted after the Revolutionary War to relieve debtors of their obligations to creditors.").

[2] See Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. 122, 199, 204–05 (1819).

[3] See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 427.

[4] See James W. Ely Jr., The Contracts Clause: A Constitutional History 11 (2016) ("Historians generally agree that the establishment of safeguards for private property was one of the principal objectives of the constitutional convention of 1787."); see also Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 459–60 (Sutherland, J., dissenting) (indicating that at least some of the Framers were aware of state laws that disrupted private contracts).

[5] See Ely, supra note 4, at 11 ("Passed by the Confederation Congress while the constitutional convention was meeting in Philadelphia, the Northwest Ordinance established a framework for territorial governance in the Old Northwest.").

[6] An ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States, North-west of the river Ohio, Library of Congress, https://www.loc.gov/resource/bdsdcc.22501/?st=gallery.

[7] See 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 439–40 (Max Farrand ed., rev. ed. 1966).

arguing that state legislatures would occasionally need to modify contract rights in order to protect their citizens.[8] On the other hand, James Madison "admitted that inconvenience might arise from such a prohibition but thought on the whole it would be overbalanced by the utility of it."[9] However, Madison suggested that the Constitution's prohibition on ex post facto laws would prevent states from impairing the obligation of contracts retroactively, and the delegates approved language in Article I, Section 10 of the draft Constitution without the proposed Contract Clause.[10]

The next day, however, delegate John Dickinson of Delaware stated that, after further research, he had determined the term ex post facto "related to criminal cases only; that [the language prohibiting such laws] would not, consequently, restrain the states from retrospective laws in civil cases; and that some further provision for this purpose would be requisite."[11] Nonetheless, the delegates did not approve the Contract Clause's addition to the Constitution during these deliberations; rather, the Committee of Style and Arrangement, which produced the final version of the Constitution, added a modified version of the Contract Clause to the document without significant comment.[12]

The debates over the Constitution's ratification briefly addressed the Contract Clause. Federalists, who generally supported a strong central government, argued the clause would (1) protect private contract rights from state debtor relief legislation; and (2) improve commercial relations among the states. Writing in the Federalist No. 44, James Madison briefly discussed the importance of the Contract Clause along with the Ex Post Facto Clause and the Constitution's prohibition on bills of attainder.[13] Madison argued these clauses would prevent shifting state legislative majorities from retroactively impairing private rights.[14] The Framers may also have added the Contract Clause to prevent a breakdown in commercial relations among the states. In the Federalist No. 7, Alexander Hamilton noted that state laws abrogating private contract rights could serve as a source of hostility among the states.[15] And several other speakers at state ratifying conventions argued that the Contract Clause would protect interstate contracts from impairment.[16] Perhaps surprisingly, the Anti-Federalists, who

[8] See id.

[9] Id. at 440.

[10] See id.

[11] Jonathan Elliot, 5 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 488 (2d ed. 1836) (statement of John Dickinson).

[12] See 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 596–97, 610 (Max Farrand ed., rev. ed. 1966) (McHenry's notes, September 10–12, 1787) (Report of Committee of Style); Ely, supra note 4, at 13 (noting the Committee of Style "placed a differently worded contract clause into Article I, section 10, that contained various restrictions on state power"). An attempt to apply the Contract Clause to the Federal Government failed. Elliot, supra note 11, at 546 (motion of Elbridge Gerry).

[13] The Federalist No. 44 (James Madison).

[14] See id.; see also Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87, 137–38 (1810) ("[I]t is not to be disguised that the framers of the constitution viewed, with some apprehension, the violent acts which might grow out of the feelings of the moment; and that the people of the United States, in adopting that instrument, have manifested a determination to shield themselves and their property from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed. The restrictions on the legislative power of the states are obviously founded in this sentiment.").

[15] See The Federalist No. 7 (Alexander Hamilton) ("Laws in violation of private contracts, as they amount to aggressions on the rights of those States whose citizens are injured by them, may be considered as another probable source of hostility [among the States].").

[16] Ely, supra note 4, at 15 (collecting statements).

generally opposed a strong central government, supported the Contract Clause.[17] However, they believed that state courts rather than federal courts should enforce it.[18]

Although most commentators involved in debates over the proposed Constitution agreed that the document should include the Contract Clause, one delegate to the Federal Convention, Maryland Attorney General Luther Martin, opposed the Clause.[19] In a letter to the Maryland House of Delegates that foreshadowed the development of the Supreme Court's jurisprudence, Martin argued that the Contract Clause would tie states' hands and prevent them from modifying contracts to address national crises.[20]

As Justice John Marshall explained in an early opinion interpreting the Contract Clause, the Framers' intent in including such language in the Constitution was to prohibit states from enacting legislation intended to assist debtors by abrogating or modifying the terms of existing contracts,[21] as many colonies and states had done during the Colonial Era and under the Articles of Confederation.[22] The Founders believed these laws injured creditors and undermined contractual relationships.[23] The Constitution's Framers therefore sought to preserve faith in contractual relationships—and facilitate interstate and foreign commerce—by adding a constitutional restraint on state power to impair contractual obligations.[24] This restraint reflected the Framers' preference for private ordering; that is, the notion that private parties could enter into and rely upon binding contracts to "order their personal and business affairs."[25]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.3 Evolution of Contract Clause's Use

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a

---

[17] Ely, supra note 4, at 16–17.

[18] Ely, supra note 4, at 16–17 ("Anti-Federalists rarely focused on the clause in urging rejection of the proposed new government. . . . [Instead, at least one writer] insisted that state, not federal, courts should be trusted with deciding cases arising under [the Contract Clause].").

[19] Elliot, supra note 11, at 376–77 (letter of Luther Martin to the Maryland House of Delegates) ("I considered, sir, that there might be times of such great public calamities and distress, and of such extreme scarcity of specie, as should render it the duty of a government, for the preservation of even the most valuable part of its citizens, in some measure to interfere in their favor, by passing laws totally or partially stopping courts of justice; or authorizing the debtor to pay by instalments, or by delivering up his property to his creditors at a reasonable and honest valuation.").

[20] See Elliot, supra note 11, at 376–77.

[21] See Trs. of Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 628–30 (1819) ("That anterior to the formation of the constitution, a course of legislation had prevailed in many, if not in all, of the States, which weakened the confidence of man in man, and embarrassed all transactions between individuals, by dispensing with a faithful performance of engagements."); see also Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 199 (1819) ("[T]he prevailing evil of the times, which produced this clause in the constitution, was the practice of emitting paper money, of making property which was useless to the creditor a discharge of his debt, and of changing the time of payment by authorizing distant instalments.").

[22] Sturges, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 203.

[23] See id. at 204; see also Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 427 (1934) ("Legislative interferences had been so numerous and extreme that the confidence essential to prosperous trade had been undermined and the utter destruction of credit was threatened.").

[24] See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 427–28; see also Sveen v. Melin, No. 16-1432, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 11, 2018) (Gorsuch, J., dissenting) ("[The Framers] took the view that treating existing contracts as 'inviolable' would benefit society by ensuring that all persons could count on the ability to enforce promises lawfully made to them—even if they or their agreements later prove unpopular with some passing majority." (quoting Sturges, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 206).

[25] Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 245 (1978) ("Contracts enable individuals to order their personal and business affairs according to their particular needs and interests. Once arranged, those rights and obligations are binding under the law, and the parties are entitled to rely on them.").

Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

During the 1800s, the Supreme Court often relied on the Contract Clause to strike down as unconstitutional state legislation that interfered with existing contract rights. In fact, the Court relied on the Contract Clause in one of the earliest cases in which it determined that a state law violated the Constitution: its 1810 decision in Fletcher v. Peck.[1] In that case, the Court interpreted the Contract Clause to protect public contracts (i.e., those involving a state as a party to an agreement with one or more private entities) in addition to private agreements.[2] The Court determined that a state could not breach its own contracts with private parties by revoking a grant of real estate.[3] Almost a decade later, the Court held in Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward that the Contract Clause barred a state from enacting legislation that substantially interfered with a private corporate charter established under state law.[4] And with respect to contracts between private parties, in the 1819 decision, Sturges v. Crowninshield, the Court held that a bankruptcy law allowing insolvent debtors to obtain the discharge of their debts by surrendering their property violated the Contract Clause.[5] But even during the early years of the Republic, the Court recognized that states retained some power to regulate contracts in order to further the public interest.[6]

The Supreme Court's view of the Contract Clause changed significantly during the New Deal Era when the Court decided Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, a case in which the Court declined to enforce strictly the Contract Clause's prohibition on state legislation that altered private contracts.[7] During the depths of the Great Depression, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Law, which allowed courts to extend temporarily the period of time during which a mortgagor (e.g., a homeowner) could redeem a home after the bank foreclosed on the property.[8] Although the Minnesota law prevented the mortgagee from obtaining actual possession, the Court upheld the law as necessary and reasonable to address the economic crisis because it was appropriately tailored to address the

[1] 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87, 127 (1810).

[2] Id. at 139.

[3] Id.

[4] Trs. of Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 627, 644–45 (1819).

[5] Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 197, 208, 212 (1819). The Supreme Court's early interpretations of the Contract Clause often drew a distinction between permissible state legislation that retroactively altered private contractual remedies and often forbidden state legislation that modified contractual obligations. See U.S. Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 19 n.17 (1977) (discussing early cases). For example, a state law that prohibited the imprisonment of debtors did not contravene the Contract Clause because it removed a remedy rather than modifying a contract's terms. Id.; see also Sturges, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 200 ("Without impairing the obligation of the contract, the remedy may certainly be modified as the wisdom of the nation shall direct."). However, the Court later rejected this distinction between contractual remedies and obligations, determining that even altering a contract's obligations retroactively may not contravene the Contract Clause in some circumstances. See Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U.S. 311, 317 (1843) ("It is difficult, perhaps, to draw a line that would be applicable in all cases between legitimate alterations of the remedy and provisions which, in the form of remedy, impair the right. But it is manifest that the obligation of the contract, and the rights of a party under it, may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether; or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing."); see also U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 19 n.17 ("More recent decisions have not relied on the remedy/obligation distinction, primarily because it is now recognized that obligations as well as remedies may be modified without necessarily violating the Contract Clause.").

[6] See W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 507, 535 (1848) (discussing a state's exercise of its eminent domain power).

[7] See 290 U.S. 398, 442–43, 444–48 (1934).

[8] See id. at 415–18, 447. This right ran contrary to existing contracts, which granted the lender the right to foreclose. See id. at 424–25.

emergency and was limited in duration.[9] The Court determined that a state had the power to regulate existing contracts to "safeguard the vital interests of its people"[10] as an exercise of its sovereignty.[11]

The Supreme Court's decision in Blaisdell marked a turning point in its Contract Clause jurisprudence, signaling that the Court would thereafter be more solicitous of states' use of their police powers to regulate contracts to "protect the lives, health, morals, comfort and general welfare of the people,"[12] even when the exercise of such powers would substantially impact contract rights. Since Blaisdell, the Court has permitted states to alter contract rights legislatively to serve a legitimate public interest.[13] But the Court has indicated that the Contract Clause still provides some protection for contracts.[14] For example, in a 1978 case, the Court closely scrutinized state legislation affecting public contracts and held that the Contract Clause prohibited a state from breaching a legislative covenant it made with private bondholders.[15] In the context of private contracts, although the Court continues to defer to the judgment of a state's legislature when weighing the impairment of private contracts against the public purposes that allegedly motivated the challenged legislation's enactment, the Court has held that the Clause prohibits a state from enacting legislation that regulates private contracts by imposing a substantial new and retroactive payment obligation on a narrow class of companies.[16]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.4 State Contracts

ArtI.S10.C1.6.4.1 Early Cases on State Modifications to State Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

Early in the nation's history, the Supreme Court established that, in addition to barring a state from substantially interfering with contracts of private individuals, the Constitution's Contract Clause may prohibit a state from breaching or modifying its own contracts. In fact, one of the first cases in which the Supreme Court struck down a state law as unconstitutional arose under the Contract Clause, and involved contracts between the State of Georgia and private parties.[1] In Fletcher v. Peck, Robert Fletcher sued John Peck, arguing, among other

[9] See id. at 424–25, 444–48.

[10] Id. at 434–35.

[11] See id. ("Not only are existing laws read into contracts in order to fix obligations as between the parties, but the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts as a postulate of the legal order.").

[12] Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 241 (1978) (quoting Manigault v. Springs, 199 U.S. 473, 480 (1905)).

[13] See, e.g., Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 474–78, 506 (1987); Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176, 178–79, 196 (1983).

[14] See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 242 (1978) ("If the Contract Clause is to retain any meaning at all, however, it must be understood to impose some limits upon the power of a State to abridge existing contractual relationships, even in the exercise of its otherwise legitimate police power.").

[15] See U.S. Trust Co., 431 U.S. at 23–28, 32 ("If a State could reduce its financial obligations [by breaching a legislative covenant to protect private bondholders] whenever it wanted to spend the money for what it regarded as an important public purpose, the Contract Clause would provide no protection at all.").

[16] See Spannaus, 438 U.S. at 247–50.

[1] See Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87, 127 (1810).

things, that Peck lacked clear title to a tract of land he had conveyed to Fletcher.[2] The State of Georgia sold the tract to private parties in 1795 by an act of its legislature.[3] However, a subsequent legislature, determining that corruption tainted the sale, passed a law purporting to rescind the earlier grant.[4] This raised the question of whether Peck had title to the land he purported to convey to Fletcher.

Chief Justice John Marshall, writing for the Court, characterized Georgia's original sale of land as a contract between Georgia and private parties that fell within the scope of the Contract Clause.[5] Although the contract had already been executed, the grant of real estate continued to impose obligations on Georgia not to reassert title to the land.[6] The Court interpreted the Contract Clause to prohibit a state from breaching its own contracts as well as impairing those between private individuals.[7] Drawing a comparison between the act rescinding the land grant and an unconstitutional ex post facto state law that punished an individual for an act that was not a crime at the time it was committed, the Court determined that the Contract Clause prohibited the Georgia legislature from nullifying its earlier grant of land.[8] The Court stated that subsequent purchasers of the land bought it without notice of the corrupt intent of the legislature that initially conveyed it, and, therefore, "the state of Georgia was restrained, either by general principles which are common to our free institutions, or by the particular provisions of the constitution of the United States, from passing a law whereby the estate of the plaintiff in the premises so purchased could be constitutionally and legally impaired and rendered null and void."[9] The Court's decision in Fletcher was an early indication that the Justices would closely scrutinize a state's breach of its own contracts with private parties, and that grants of real estate could constitute contract rights protected by the Contract Clause.

Nine years later, in a seminal corporate law decision, the Supreme Court further extended its interpretation of the types of contracts and property interests protected by the Contract Clause, determining the Clause may prohibit states from revoking or substantially interfering with private corporate charters established under state law. In Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, the New Hampshire state legislature enacted a law amending the corporate charter of Dartmouth College, which King George III of Great Britain established in a 1769 grant.[10] New Hampshire altered the charter to vest control of the College in the state's governor and other state officials.[11] The majority of the college's trustees objected to this

[2] See id. at 127–28.

[3] Id. at 127.

[4] Id. at 130–32. For more on the history of the so-called "Yazoo Land Fraud," see Allen Pusey, The Yazoo Land Fraud Becomes Law, 104 A.B.A. J. 72 (2018).

[5] See Fletcher, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) at 135, 137 ("A grant, in its own nature, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right. A party is, therefore, always estopped by his own grant.").

[6] See id. at 136–37; cf. Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 518, 531 (1982) (upholding, against a Contract Clause challenge, an Indiana law that automatically extinguished severed mineral interests if they were not used for twenty years unless the mineral owner filed a statement of claim with the local county recorder because the mineral owners in the case had not executed mineral leases until after their mineral rights had lapsed, and thus there was no existing contract to be impaired).

[7] See Fletcher, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) at 137.

[8] Id. at 136–39.

[9] Id. at 139.

[10] See 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 624–26 (1819). After the Revolution, the State of New Hampshire succeeded to the duties and powers of government previously held by the Crown, including obligations to Dartmouth College created by the charter. See id. at 651.

[11] Id. at 626.

transfer of control of the College to the state and sued the secretary of the new board of trustees to recover corporate property transferred to the new secretary.[12]

The Court determined that Dartmouth's corporate charter was a contract subject to the Contract Clause even though the Constitution's Framers may not have contemplated the Clause would protect rights granted under a corporate charter.[13] In support of this view, the Court focused on the law's effects on the corporation's property, noting the charter had been made for the "security and disposition of property" and that "real and personal estate ha[d] been conveyed to the corporation" to accomplish its mission of education.[14] Donors gifted the College with money and property upon the expectation that its mission would be fulfilled by the trustees without interference by the state legislature.[15]

Having determined the trustees' rights under the corporate charter were protected by the Contract Clause, the Court further decided that the New Hampshire law impaired these rights because, contrary to the will of the College's donors, the legislation transferred the power of governing the College from the trustees appointed in the founder's will to the New Hampshire governor and placed donor funds under the state government's control.[16] The College's founders donated funds with the expectation that the charter would protect the objectives and governance structure of Dartmouth College for posterity.[17] Furthermore, Dartmouth College was a private institution that held property for nongovernmental purposes; its professors and trustees were not public officers; and it was funded by private donors.[18]

Thus, even though the College was formed under state law, the Court determined it was not a civil institution, and thus the government had no right to change its governance structure and mission substantially without its consent.[19] Moreover, the legislature had not reserved a right to amend the charter.[20] Dartmouth College was a key decision with ramifications beyond the higher education context. The decision established constitutional limits on a state's power to alter a corporation's charter without its consent, at least when the state had not reserved a right to amend the charter.

ArtI.S10.C1.6.4.2 State Sovereign Powers and Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a

[12] Id. at 626–27.

[13] Id. at 627, 644–45.

[14] Id. at 643–44.

[15] See Id. at 647 ("It is probable, that no man ever was, and that no man ever will be, the founder of a college, believing at the time, that an act of incorporation constitutes no security for the institution; believing, that it is immediately to be deemed a public institution, whose funds are to be governed and applied, not by the will of the donor, but by the will of the legislature.").

[16] Id. at 652.

[17] Id. at 652–54 ("They contracted for a system, which should, as far as human foresight can provide, retain forever the government of the literary institution they had formed, in the hands of persons approved by themselves.").

[18] See id. at 629–36.

[19] See id. at 637–38 ("There can be no reason for implying in a charter, given for a valuable consideration, a power which is not only not expressed, but is in direct contradiction to its express stipulations.").

[20] See id. at 674–75, 680 (Story, J., concurring).

ArtI.S10.C1.6.4.2
State Sovereign Powers and Contracts

Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

During the 1800s, the Supreme Court often interpreted the Contract Clause as providing robust protection for public and private contracts. However, the Court decided some cases that were more solicitous of the states' power to regulate contracts in the public interest. Under Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, the Court held that states could not contract away their sovereign powers, including their powers of eminent domain and police powers.[1]

An early example of a case in which the Supreme Court recognized the Contract Clause allows states some leeway to adopt legislation that would interfere with existing contracts in order to protect the public interest involved the Vermont legislature's exercise of the power of eminent domain to "take" contractual rights of private parties.[2] In West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, the Vermont legislature enacted a law granting an exclusive 100-year franchise to operate a toll bridge over the West River to the West River Bridge Company.[3] However, several decades later, the legislature passed a statute that permitted certain public officials to "take" such franchises using the power of eminent domain to construct public highways—a power the state sought to use against the West River Bridge Company's toll bridge franchise.[4] In an attempt to avoid the taking of its franchise, the company sued, arguing the state's eminent domain law impaired the obligation of the franchise contract between Vermont and itself by depriving the company of its franchise without its consent.[5]

The Supreme Court disagreed that the subsequently enacted Vermont law violated the Contract Clause.[6] Acknowledging the legislature's grant of a corporate charter to the company was a contract, the Court nevertheless determined that taking the corporation's franchise for public use upon payment of compensation was a proper exercise of the state's inherent and long-standing sovereign power of eminent domain over subordinate private property rights.[7] The Court noted the state's power of eminent domain constituted part of the background law and conditions under which parties entered into private contracts, and thus the state's exercise of that power could not impair the franchise contract.[8] However, the state would have to compensate the bridge company adequately for the taking.[9] West River Bridge Co. represents the Court's early recognition that the Contract Clause was not absolute, and that states retained some leeway to exercise their sovereign powers to protect the public interest, which they could not contract away, regardless of interference with contractual relationships.

During this era, the Supreme Court decided other important cases that recognized that a state could functionally abrogate the terms of a corporate charter to serve the public interest

---

[1] James W. Ely, Jr., The Contract Clause: A Constitutional History 4 (2016) ("[Chief Justice] Taney both limited and strengthened the security of contractual obligations under the contract clause."). "On the other hand, . . . [the Taney Court] vigorously invoked the [Contract Clause] to safeguard the rights of parties under private agreements and to uphold clearly expressed tax exemptions." Id.

[2] See W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 507, 530–31 (1848).

[3] Id. at 530.

[4] Id. at 530–31.

[5] See id. at 531, 533–34.

[6] Id. at 536.

[7] See id. at 530–36.

[8] See W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U.S. 507, 532–33 (1848) ("[I]nto all contracts, whether made between States and individuals or between individuals only, there enter conditions which arise not out of the literal terms of the contract itself, they are superinduced by the preexisting and higher authority of the laws of nature, of nations, or of the community to which the parties belong, they are always presumed, and must be presumed, to be known and recognized by all, are binding upon all, and need never, therefore, be carried into express stipulation, for this could add nothing to their force.").

[9] Cf. id. at 535.

through the exercise of its police powers. In Proprietors of Charles River Bridge v. Proprietors of Warren Bridge,[10] Chief Justice Taney, writing for the Court, held that a state could functionally abrogate the terms of a corporate charter to benefit its economy when the charter had not specifically preserved an exclusive toll franchise for a bridge company.[11] As one scholar has noted, the Taney Court "established the principle that corporate charters should be strictly construed and that privileges such as monopoly status . . . could never be implied."[12] Later in the nineteenth century, the Court carved out additional exceptions for state police powers. For example, the Court held that a state could use its police powers to revoke, on public moral grounds, a previously granted charter to a company to operate a lottery.[13]

From the late nineteenth to early twentieth centuries, the Contract Clause gradually took on a lesser role in the Court's jurisprudence. Although the Court's Contract Clause jurisprudence protected state tax exemptions in corporate charters and the rights of state bondholders from subsequent legislative impairment,[14] the Clause diminished in importance with the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[15] Specifically, the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause offered a new avenue for the protection of private property interests, including contract rights, against unreasonable state interference.[16]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.4.3 Modern Doctrine on State Changes to State Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

The Court revived the Contract Clause in the context of public contracts in the late twentieth century. A major case from this time period, in which the Supreme Court confirmed it would thoroughly scrutinize state legislation that modified the state's own contracts, is United States Trust Co. v. New Jersey.[1] In that case, holders of bonds issued by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey challenged a New Jersey statute as violative of the Contract Clause.[2] The law, along with a parallel New York enactment, repealed a prior

[10] 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 420 (1837).

[11] Id. at 448–53.

[12] Ely, supra note 1, at 4.

[13] See Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814, 821 (1879) ("Any one, therefore, who accepts a lottery charter does so with the implied understanding that the people, in their sovereign capacity, and through their properly constituted agencies, may resume [a prohibition on lotteries] at any time when the public good shall require, whether [the charter] be paid for or not. All that one can get by such a charter is a suspension of certain governmental rights in his favor, subject to withdrawal at will.").

[14] See, e.g., Wilmington R.R. v. Reid, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 264, 266–68 (1871) (holding the North Carolina General Assembly violated the Contract Clause by taxing the property of a railroad corporation after agreeing not to tax the property in the company's charter); Home of the Friendless v. Rouse, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 430, 438–39 (1869) ("Without pursuing the subject further, we are of the opinion that the State of Missouri did make a contract on sufficient consideration with the Home of the Friendless, to exempt the property of the corporation from taxation, and that the attempt made on behalf of the State through its authorized agent, notwithstanding this agreement, to compel it to pay taxes, is an indirect mode of impairing the obligation of the contract, and cannot be allowed.").

[15] Ely, supra note 1, at 5 ("Although both federal and state courts heard a steady stream of contract clause cases [during the late nineteenth century], they increasingly relied on other constitutional provisions, notably the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, to protect economic rights.").

[16] Ely, supra note 1, at 5.

[1] 431 U.S. 1 (1977).

[2] See id. at 3.

statutory covenant that limited the Port Authority's discretion to use revenue and reserve funds pledged as security for the bonds in order to subsidize passenger rail transportation.[3] The bondholders argued that in repealing the covenant, which sought to promote investors' confidence in the bonds, the state impaired a contractual obligation in violation of the Contract Clause.[4]

The Supreme Court agreed with the New Jersey trial court that the state legislature's statutory covenant was a contract among New Jersey, New York, and the bondholders that fell within the Contract Clause's protection.[5] The Court further determined that repeal of the covenant impaired the obligation of the states' contract with the bondholders because the covenant had limited the Port Authority's deficits, which in turn protected bondholders from depletion of the Authority's general reserve fund, and the state had not replaced it with a comparable provision.[6] Moreover, the impairment violated the Contract Clause because it modified the express terms of the parties' agreement by repealing the covenant retroactively without being justified by a legitimate public purpose.[7] The state legislature's interests in protecting its citizens' welfare by financing new mass transit projects, conserving energy, and protecting the environment could not justify the repeal,[8] and the Court refused to defer to the state legislature's judgment when balancing the alleged benefits that would result from impairment of the covenant against the private financial loss that the private bondholders would incur from impairment of the covenant.[9] Instead, the Court considered whether the impairment was reasonable and necessary to serve the public purposes for which the State had accomplished it.[10]

In this vein, the Supreme Court determined that "a less drastic modification" of the covenant would have achieved the state's purposes, such as amending the covenant to exclude new revenues from the limitation in order to subsidize mass transit.[11] The repeal was also unreasonable because the original covenant had been made with full knowledge that the public might demand increased options for mass transit in the future.[12] In other words, the Court was not reviewing a case in which a contract had been made a long time ago and circumstances had changed significantly.

---

[3] Id. "In general, a statute is itself treated as a contract when the language and circumstances evince a legislative intent to create private rights of a contractual nature enforceable against the State." Id. at 17 n.14. State law addressing interpretation and enforcement of contracts may be deemed a part of the obligation of the contract as well. See id.

[4] Id. at 17.

[5] See 431 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1977).

[6] Id. at 19.

[7] See id. at 19–32.

[8] Id. at 21–32. The Supreme Court also examined whether the state could properly enter into the covenant without giving up an essential element of its sovereign powers. Id. at 23 & n.20, 28–29 (discussing the example of a state's revocation of a twenty-five-year charter to operate a lottery as an illustration of the Contract Clause's limits on a state's power to bind itself not to exercise its police powers in the future). However, the Court determined the states could properly bind themselves to financial restrictions regarding use of revenues and reserves securing bonds to finance passenger railroads through the exercise of their spending (and, perhaps, taxing) powers, and thus the states could not argue that the 1962 covenant was invalid when it was adopted. Id. at 24–26. The Court listed a few examples of state powers that could not be contracted away, including its power of eminent domain and its police power. Id. at 24 n.21.

[9] See id. at 21–32.

[10] Id. at 29 ("[A] State cannot refuse to meets its legitimate financial obligations simply because it would prefer to spend the money to promote the public good rather than the private welfare of its creditors. We can only sustain the repeal of the 1962 covenant if that impairment was both reasonable and necessary to serve the admittedly important purposes claimed by the State.").

[11] Id. at 29–31 & 30 n.28.

[12] Id. at 31–32.

Notably, in United States Trust Co., the Court declined to defer to the state's characterization of the public interests affected by the challenged state legislation and refused to weigh these public interests against private contract rights.[13] Consequently, the Court established a heightened standard of review for state laws that modify a state's own obligations as opposed to laws that simply interfere with contracts between private parties.[14] The Court justified this "dual standard of review" on the grounds that the state was a self-interested party.[15]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.5 Private Contracts

ArtI.S10.C1.6.5.1 Early Cases on State Changes to Private Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

The Supreme Court has long held that the Contract Clause limits a state's power to regulate contracts between private parties. In the 1819 case Sturges v. Crowninshield, the Court examined a New York bankruptcy law that allowed insolvent debtors to obtain the discharge of their debts by surrendering their property.[1] Notably, the law applied retroactively to debt contracts parties had entered into prior to its enactment, raising the question of whether it interfered with existing contracts in violation of the Contract Clause.[2]

The Supreme Court began its analysis by defining a "contract" for purposes of the Clause as "an agreement in which a party undertakes to do, or not to do, a particular thing."[3] In the Court's view, the "obligation" of the contract in Sturges was the underlying state law binding the defendant-debtor to pay the plaintiff-creditor money on or before a certain date in accordance with a promissory note's terms.[4] When New York enacted a law allowing debtors to obtain the discharge of their entire debts upon surrender of their property, the state impaired the obligation of the debt contracts by potentially limiting a debtor's liability to an amount less than provided for in the original contract.[5]

Having determined the New York law impaired the obligation of contracts, the Court turned next to an analysis of whether that impairment violated the Contract Clause.[6] The Court adopted a broad reading of the Clause that arguably extended beyond the Framers'

[13] See id. at 25–28.

[14] See id.

[15] Id. at 26 & n.25 ("As with laws impairing the obligations of private contracts, an impairment may be constitutional if it is reasonable and necessary to serve an important public purpose. In applying this standard, however, complete deference to a legislative assessment of reasonableness and necessity is not appropriate because the State's self-interest is at stake.").

[1] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 197, 208 (1819).

[2] See id. at 197. The Court determined that Article I, Section 10 of the Constitution did not necessarily prohibit states from passing bankruptcy laws so long as those laws did not conflict with federal law. Id. at 196–97.

[3] Id. at 197.

[4] Id.

[5] See id. at 197–98.

[6] See id. at 204.

original understanding of its scope to encompass state bankruptcy laws.[7] To the extent the New York law operated retroactively, the Court found, it impaired the obligation of contracts in violation of the Constitution.[8]

Nearly a decade after its decision in Sturges, the Court addressed a question left unanswered in that case—that is, whether a state bankruptcy law that permits a debtor to obtain a discharge from liability under a contract entered into after the passage of the law impairs the obligations of that contract in violation of the Contract Clause.[9] In Ogden v. Saunders, a citizen of New York contracted a debt in that state and claimed to have been discharged from that debt under a bankruptcy law in force at the time he entered into the contract.[10]

As in Sturges, the Supreme Court began its analysis by defining the obligation of contracts as the state law that binds parties to contracts to perform their duties thereunder or, alternatively, to pay compensation.[11] Unless the parties agreed otherwise, such law became part of the contract and governed enforcement of parties' obligations before any tribunal, as well as the contract's validity, construction, and discharge.[12] As a result, a bankruptcy law that discharged a party from a contract made under the law of that state was part of the contract's terms and conditions and discharged the obligation in all other tribunals.[13] Such a law could not be said to impair that contract, the Court held, so long as it applied to future contracts rather than existing contracts.[14] The Ogden decision thus drew a distinction between state laws that impaired obligations of contracts already in existence at the time of enactment and laws that affected future contracts, deeming the former to be more problematic from a constitutional standpoint.

Following its decision in Ogden, the Supreme Court decided cases in the 1800s that often adopted a broad view of the Contract Clause's protections for both public and private contracts.[15] But, as noted, by the end of the nineteenth century, the Contract Clause diminished in importance with the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment and the imposition of limits on state power in the Amendment's Due Process Clause.[16] And during the [7] See id. at 204–05 ("It seems scarcely possible to suppose that the framers of the constitution, if intending to prohibit only laws authorizing the payment of debts by instalment, would have expressed that intention by saying 'no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.'").

[8] Id. at 208.

[9] Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 213, 254 (1827).

[10] Id. at 255–56.

[11] Id. at 257–59. The Court distinguished between a law that impairs a contract and a law that impairs a contractual obligation. Id. at 256–57. A law that impairs the contract itself "enlarges, abridges, or in any manner changes" the intention of the contracting parties by modifying the contract's validity or "the construction, the duration, the mode of discharge, or the evidence of the agreement." Id.

[12] Id. at 257–59.

[13] Id. at 260.

[14] Id. at 262–64 ("[A] bankrupt law, which operates prospectively, or in so far as it does so operate, does not violate the constitution of the United States.").

[15] See, e.g., Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 535, 550–55 (1867); Cook v. Moffat, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 295, 308–09 (1847); Green v. Biddle, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 1, 84, 91–93 (1823). But see Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. (11 Otto) 814, 819–21 (1880).

[16] James W. Ely, Jr., The Contract Clause: A Constitutional History 5 (2016) ("Although both federal and state courts heard a steady stream of contract clause cases [during the late nineteenth century], they increasingly relied on other constitutional provisions, notably the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, to protect economic rights.").

early twentieth century, the Court further reduced the Contract Clause's protections, specifically holding that "private agreements as well as public contracts were subject to the police power."[17]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.5.2 Blaisdell Case and State Modifications to Private Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

Although the Supreme Court had long recognized that states retained at least some sovereign power to regulate contracts to protect the public welfare[1]—and increasingly permitted states to modify private contract rights to respond to changes in the economy during the early twentieth century[2]—a major shift in Contract Clause doctrine resulted from the Court's decision in Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell in 1934.[3] Prior to the 1930s, the Court often adopted a robust interpretation of the Contract Clause when evaluating state legislation, applying it stringently to strike down state laws deemed to interfere with contract and property interests.[4] However, during the depths of the Great Depression, the Court significantly weakened the constraints that the Contract Clause imposes on state government regulation of private contracts.[5]

In Blaisdell, the State of Minnesota enacted the Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Law, which allowed courts to extend temporarily the period of time during which a mortgagor (e.g., a homeowner) could redeem a home after the bank foreclosed on the property, preventing the mortgagee from obtaining possession during that time.[6] This right ran contrary to existing contracts, which granted the lender the right to foreclose.[7] In order to take advantage of this option, the mortgagor had to pay a "reasonable value of the income on" or "reasonable rental value of" the property to the mortgagee.[8]

Although the Minnesota law prevented the mortgagee from obtaining actual possession, the Supreme Court upheld the law as necessary and reasonable to address the economic crisis because it was appropriately tailored to address the emergency and was limited in duration.[9] The Court noted that a state had the power to regulate existing contracts in order to

---

[17] Id. at 5–6.

[1] See, e.g., W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 507, 532–33 (1848).

[2] As one commentator noted, during the early twentieth century and before Blaisdell, the Supreme Court "expanded the basis upon which states could modify contract rights and advanced an interpretation of the Contract Clause that stressed judicial deference to local legislation enacted for the protection of the economic and social interests of all segments of society." Samuel R. Olken, Charles Evans Hughes and the Blaisdell Decision: A Historical Study of the Contract Clause, 72 Or. L. Rev. 548 (1993). Such legislation included laws that permitted tenants "to remain in possession of rental apartments upon the expiration of their leases." Id. at 547–51, 601 (citing Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, 258 U.S. 242 (1922)).

[3] 290 U.S. 398 (1934).

[4] See id. at 431–32 (collecting cases).

[5] See James W. Ely, Jr., The Contract Clause: A Constitutional History 1 (2016).

[6] Id. at 415–16, 424–25.

[7] See id.

[8] Id. at 416–18.

[9] Id. at 425, 444–48; see also El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 516–17 (1965) (holding a Texas law that limited the time in which a purchaser of land could exercise their reinstatement rights to five years following forfeiture to the state for non-payment of interest did not contravene the Contract Clause).

"safeguard the vital interests of its people"[10] as an exercise of its sovereignty.[11] The Court cited several examples of cases in which it upheld state regulation aimed at protecting citizen welfare despite interference with existing contracts. For example, a state could amend its constitution to forbid lotteries that it previously authorized[12] or regulate intoxicating liquors[13] without violating existing contracts. It could regulate to protect the public from nuisances[14] or regulate to further public safety more generally, even when such regulations disrupted existing contractual relationships.[15] The Court also cited cases in which a state exercised its sovereign powers to protect its own economic interests, despite interference with existing contracts, including cases in which the Court upheld a state's regulation of rates charged by public services corporations or laws that imposed various legal requirements on businesses.[16]

In addition to signaling that the Court would more often defer to state regulation of private contracts in the public interest, Blaisdell is also notable because the Court set forth a test for when such state regulation impairs private contractual obligations in violation of the Contract Clause. The Court adopted a balancing test, justifying a pragmatic approach on the grounds that contract rights were meaningful only if the state exercised its powers to "safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends."[17] It held that a state may regulate existing private contractual relationships, consistent with the Contract Clause, if the law serves a legitimate public purpose and the "measures taken are reasonable and appropriate to that end."[18] This standard, which is more deferential to the state than the standard applicable to public contracts,[19] leaves judges with room to balance the states' reserved powers to regulate to protect the public welfare against the Contract Clause's limitation on state power, which aims to safeguard the sanctity of contractual relationships.[20]

ArtI.S10.C1.6.5.3 State Laws Creating New Contractual Obligations

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

Although the Supreme Court has not had occasion to consider many Contract Clause challenges in the modern era, it has refined the test for private contracts it developed in the [10] Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 434 (1934).

[11] Id. at 435 ("Not only are existing laws read into contracts in order to fix obligations as between the parties, but the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts as a postulate of the legal order.").

[12] Id. at 436 (citing Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814, 819 (1880)).

[13] Id. (citing Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U.S. 25, 32–33 (1878)).

[14] Id. (citing Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U.S. 659, 667 (1878)).

[15] Id. (citing Chi., Burlington & Quincy R.R. v. Nebraska, 170 U.S. 57, 70, 74 (1898)).

[16] Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 437–38 (collecting cases).

[17] Id. at 442–44 ("If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means to-day, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. . . . With a growing recognition of public needs and the relation of individual right to public security, the court has sought to prevent the perversion of the clause through its use as an instrument to throttle the capacity of the States to protect their fundamental interests.").

[18] Id. at 438.

[19] See U.S. Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 25–28 (1977).

[20] See Blaisdell, 290 U.S. at 439 ("The reserved power cannot be construed so as to destroy the limitation, nor is the limitation to be construed to destroy the reserved power in its essential aspects.").

1934 case Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, focusing on whether the challenged state legislation is broadly applicable, was foreseeable, and has a legitimate purpose. For example, in the 1978 case Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, the Court determined a state law that regulated private pension contracts violated the Contract Clause because it sought to address a limited societal problem through the imposition of a substantial new and retroactive payment obligation on a narrow class of companies.[1]

In Allied Structural Steel Co., the Minnesota legislature enacted the Private Pension Benefits Protection Act, requiring certain companies having offices in the state and offering pension plans to employees to pay a fee to cover full pensions for employees who worked at least ten years if the employer terminated its pension plan or closed a Minnesota office.[2] The Court considered whether it would violate the Contract Clause to apply the law to the appellant, an Illinois steel corporation that closed a Minnesota office.[3] Minnesota charged the company $185,000 under the Act to cover the cost of pensions for eligible discharged employees.[4] In response, the company maintained the fee "unconstitutionally impaired its contractual obligations to its employees under its pension agreement."[5]

The Supreme Court held the Act impaired the company's employment contracts because it substantially increased the company's obligation to fund pensions beyond the terms of the existing contracts it had entered into with its employees.[6] However, the Court noted it had to further examine whether such an impairment violated the Contract Clause.[7] Although noting the Contract Clause does not "obliterate" the states' police powers,[8] the Court determined the Minnesota law amounted to a significant impairment that could not be justified for public policy reasons.[9]

First, the employer relied on the payment terms of the existing pension plan when determining how to allocate its resources, and the Act retroactively required the company to pay more to its employees than the company had foreseen because the company closed its office.[10] There was no indication in the record that the state targeted an issue of pressing social need by enacting sweeping legislation covering a variety of employers and circumstances.[11] Rather, the Act targeted for the first time a narrow societal problem by imposing on a specific class of companies a substantial retroactive and permanent payment obligation unforeseen at the time of the pension plans' creation and contrary to the company's employment agreements.[12] These factors, the Court held, amounted to a violation of the Contract Clause.[13] Allied Structural Steel Co. stands for the notion that a state law may impair the obligation of

[1] See 438 U.S. 234, 247–50 (1978).

[2] Id. at 238.

[3] See id. at 236, 239.

[4] Id. at 239.

[5] Id. at 239–40.

[6] See id.

[7] See id.

[8] Id. at 241.

[9] See id. at 246–50.

[10] See id. at 247 ("[T]he statute in question here nullifies express terms of the company's contractual obligations and imposes a completely unexpected liability in potentially disabling amounts.").

[11] See id. at 247–48.

[12] Id. at 249–50; cf. Gen. Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 183–88 (1992) (rejecting a Contract Clause challenge to a 1987 Michigan law that essentially required automobile companies to repay workers' compensation benefits withheld in reliance on a 1981 law, because the collective bargaining agreements entered into before the 1981 law did not address workers' compensation terms specifically and such terms could not be deemed to have been incorporated by law into the contracts, and thus there was no relevant contractual interest to impair).

[13] See Allied Structural Steel Co., 428 U.S. at 250.

contracts not only when it abrogates contractual obligations, but also when it imposes substantial new and retroactive legal obligations on a specific subset of entities.

ArtI.S10.C1.6.5.4 Public Interest and State Modifications to Private Contracts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 1:

> No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

In the 1980s, the Supreme Court upheld generally applicable state laws regulating private contracts, which it determined were intended to serve a broad public interest, against Contract Clause challenges. For example, in Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, the Court considered the constitutionality of an Alabama law that increased the severance tax on oil and gas extracted from wells located in the state, which the state imposed on producers at the time of severance.[1] The law, which amended a statute that imposed a tax on oil and gas extracted from Alabama wells, exempted the owners of royalty interests from the tax increase and forbid producers from passing the tax increase on to purchasers or consumers.[2] Oil and gas producers argued the law impaired the obligations of their contracts with royalty owners and consumers in violation of the Contract Clause.[3]

The Supreme Court determined the royalty owner exemption did not violate the Contract Clause because it did not impair contractual obligations benefiting the producers.[4] The Alabama law merely provided that the royalty owners were not legally responsible for paying the tax to the state, and did not prevent the producers from shifting the burden of the tax to the royalty owners through contractual stipulations.[5]

With regard to the state law's prohibition on passing through the severance tax to consumers, the Supreme Court confronted a more difficult question.[6] The Court determined the prohibition interfered with producers' existing contracts that required consumers to absorb increases in severance taxes.[7] However, the Court noted the Contract Clause leaves some room for state regulation to protect the public welfare, even when such regulation would interfere with existing contracts.[8] The Court deemed the pass-through prohibition to be similar to state laws setting rates in heavily regulated industries, like the electricity industry or oil transportation sector, which were consistent with the Contract Clause despite their incidental effect on existing contracts.[9] Comparing the pass-through prohibition to a rate-setting scheme that displaced contractual rates, the Court determined the prohibition applied broadly, had a legitimate public interest justification (i.e., safeguarding consumers

[1] 462 U.S. 176, 178 (1983).

[2] Id. at 178–79.

[3] Cf. id. at 178–80. The producers were parties to contracts that allocated the tax among themselves, royalty owners, and nonworking interests "in proportion to each party's share of the sale proceeds." Id. at 180. They also were party to sales contracts that made purchasers responsible for reimbursing them for the severance tax on products sold. Id.

[4] Id. at 187–88.

[5] Id. at 188–89.

[6] See id. at 189.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 190–91.

[9] See id. at 192–94. In a separate section of its opinion, the Court determined that federal law preempted the pass-through prohibition as applied to sales of natural gas in interstate commerce. Id. at 187.

from high prices), and was not targeted specifically at contracts of oil and gas producers.[10] Thus, there was no violation of the Contract Clause.[11]

Another case in which the Supreme Court determined that a state's sovereign power to protect public interests justified the impairment of private contracts is Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis.[12] In that case, the Pennsylvania legislature, concerned about public safety, land conservation, and other issues, enacted a law prohibiting mining that would damage existing structures, such as public buildings and homes, by eliminating underground support.[13] Petitioners, including a coal industry association and companies that controlled subsurface coal reserves, sued to enjoin a state environmental agency from enforcing the act and regulations promulgated thereunder.[14] One of the petitioners' challenges was that the Act on its face violated the Contract Clause by nullifying the surface owner's contractual waiver of liability for damage to the surface estate from coal mining.[15] The Court agreed with the lower courts that "the Commonwealth's strong public interests in the legislation [were] more than adequate to justify the impact of the statute on petitioners' contractual agreements."[16]

The Court determined that a contract right had been impaired because the coal companies secured waivers of liability from property owners for damages from mining to surface structures and much of the land affected by the Subsidence Act.[17] The Act impaired this right by nullifying the surface owners' contractual waiver obligations.[18] However, the Court found that Pennsylvania's interest in preventing environmental damage and hazards to people and property outweighed this contract right.[19] Because the state was not a party to the contracts at issue, the court deferred to the state's judgment that the legislation was appropriately tailored to the public purpose justifying it.[20]

In a subsequent case, Sveen v. Melin, the Supreme Court examined state regulation of private contracts in the context of a life insurance policy.[21] In that case, the Court upheld against a Contract Clause challenge a Minnesota law that revoked any revocable beneficiary designation an individual made to his or her spouse (e.g., in a life insurance policy) if their marriage was dissolved or annulled.[22] The law operated on the theory that the policyholder would have supported the revocation, and it allowed the policyholder to redesignate the ex-spouse as the beneficiary at any time.[23]

---

[10] See id. at 191–94 ("If a party that has entered into a contract to transport oil is not immune from subsequently enacted state regulation of the rates that may be charged for such transportation, parties that have entered into contracts to sell oil and gas likewise are not immune from state regulation of the prices that may be charged for those commodities.").

[11] Id. at 196.

[12] 480 U.S. 470 (1987).

[13] Id. at 474, 476.

[14] Id. at 478.

[15] Id. at 502.

[16] Id.

[17] Id. at 504.

[18] Id.

[19] Id. at 505 ("[T]he Commonwealth has a strong public interest in preventing this type of harm, the environmental effect of which transcends any private agreement between contracting parties.").

[20] Id. at 505–06.

[21] No. 16-1432, slip op. at 1 (U.S. June 11, 2018).

[22] Id. at 1.

[23] Id.

In Sveen, the life insurance policyholder designated his wife as the primary beneficiary prior to the state's passage of the law, which operated retroactively.[24] The policyholder and his wife subsequently divorced, and the divorce decree did not mention the insurance policy.[25] After the policyholder passed away, his wife, who would have been the primary beneficiary under the policy if the legislature had not enacted the law, and his children, who were the contingent beneficiaries, claimed a right to the insurance proceeds.[26] The Court examined whether retroactive application of the revocation-on-divorce law to the policyholder's designation violated the Contract Clause.[27]

The Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Justice Elena Kagan, rejected the Contract Clause challenge to the Minnesota statute.[28] Although the Court determined that a life insurance policy was a contract subject to the Contract Clause,[29] its holding recognized that not all laws that retroactively alter contracts in existence at the time of their passage violate the Contract Clause.[30] Rather, a violation occurs only when (1) the law substantially impairs a contractual relationship (e.g., by undermining the agreement, interfering with a party's reasonable expectations, or preventing a party from safeguarding or reinstating its rights); and (2) the law was not a reasonable and appropriate means of furthering a "significant and legitimate public purpose."[31]

In Sveen, the Court determined the Minnesota law did not substantially impair the life insurance contract for three reasons.[32] First, the law supported the general objectives of life insurance contracts by attempting "to reflect a policyholder's intent."[33] Second, the law would not undermine the policyholder's expectations regarding his or her beneficiary designation because the policyholder could not significantly rely upon that designation; a divorce court could revoke the beneficiary designation.[34] Finally, the law provided a default rule the policyholder could modify simply by submitting paperwork.[35]

Clause 2—Import-Export

ArtI.S10.C2.1 Overview of Import-Export Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

> No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the

[24] Id. at 5–6.
[25] Id. at 5.
[26] Id. at 5–6.
[27] Id. at 6.
[28] Id. at 1.
[29] Id. at 7.
[30] Id.
[31] Id.
[32] Id. at 7–8.
[33] Id.
[34] See id. at 8–10.
[35] Id.

net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

In conjunction with several other provisions, particularly the Commerce Clause,[1] the Import-Export Clause was designed to limit the states' ability to interfere with commerce. To achieve this objective, the Clause generally prohibits States from imposing "imposts" or "duties" on imports and exports, absent congressional consent, except for purposes of covering charges associated with their inspection laws. The Clause further discourages States from imposing such duties by barring the States from using the funds collected from any such duties, instead requiring all funds to be deposited with the U.S. Treasury, and authorizing Congress to revise any State laws that impose duties.

ArtI.S10.C2.2 Historical Background on Import-Export Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

Prior to the Constitution's adoption, the colonies, and later states, imposed tariffs on goods from foreign countries and from other colonies, often in response to adverse economic conditions that the governments believed were due to trade imbalances, and to protect or promote domestic industries. For example, in 1788, New Hampshire adopted the first law expressly imposing import duties to improve its economic conditions in response to what it considered an unreasonable trade imbalance that favored foreign countries, primarily Great Britain. This rationale subsequently informed the adoption or amendment of other colonial tariff legislation.[1] Similarly, Massachusetts imposed two types of import duties ("double duties") on vessels from foreign powers and other colonies, as well as additional duties on all commodities from the colonies directly surrounding it.[2] These measures were described as offering "the best protection" for the colonial shipping industry in the early to mid-1700s, resulting in Massachusetts having "the most shipping," and by 1789, "nearly all the shipping in the trade of Massachusetts was American."[3]

In response to the states' fragmented approach to controlling interstate and foreign commerce, the Continental Congress asked the states in 1786 to grant the Congress authority to control or prohibit trade with foreign powers for fifteen years. Although some states agreed to the request, others did not or did so with conditions on such power, which ultimately led to no federal action and a continuance of separate state actions and regulations.[4]

The question of state power to impose import and export duties inspired significant debate during the Constitutional Convention. The delegates considered and proposed multiple drafts that reflected different views about whether states should ever be permitted to impose import

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[1] William W. Bates, American Navigation 35–36 (1902).

[2] Id. at 33.

[3] Id. at 33, 38.

[4] Id. at 41–42.

and export duties, as well as what conditions should apply to any such duties that states could legally impose. This debate ultimately led to a relatively detailed constitutional provision that reflected these concerns.

An early draft of the Import-Export Clause applied only to duties on imports and was included within a larger list of actions that states generally could not undertake unless Congress authorized them to do so.[5] On August 28, 1787, however, the delegates voted 6-5 to add export duties to the general prohibition.[6] James Madison proposed moving the provision from the list of actions that states could not take without congressional consent to a different part of the Constitution that listed absolute prohibitions, thereby prohibiting states from imposing import and export duties in all circumstances. Colonel George Mason argued against such a blanket prohibition, asserting that states may wish to impose duties to assist the industries in which they had competitive advantages. Madison countered that allowing states to protect their industries through duties on foreign countries and other states would only continue the problems associated with lacking a unified, national power to regulate commerce.[7] The Convention rejected Madison's proposal by a vote of 4-7.[8]

In September 1787, the delegates continued debating amendments to the provision. On September 12, the Convention agreed to reconsider the version of the Import-Export Clause debated in August to add a qualifying phrase. This phrase stated that the Clause should not be interpreted to prevent the states from adopting export duties to cover the costs of inspection, packaging, and storage fees, as well as indemnifying the losses incurred while the goods were held by public officers.[9] Colonel Mason formally proposed the amendment on September 13 as follows:

> Provided that no State shall be restrained from imposing the usual duties on produce exported from such State, for the sole purpose of defraying the charges of inspecting, packing, storing, and indemnifying the losses on such produce, while in the custody of public officers: but all such regulations shall in case of abuse, be subject to the revision and controul of Congress.[10]

The delegates adopted this amendment by a vote of 7-3, agreeing to compare and reconcile that version with the proposed provision from the Committee on Style.[11] The Committee's version of the provision separated the issue of import and export duties from all other limits on state power, stating as follows: "No state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay imposts or duties on imports or exports, nor with such consent, but to the use of the treasury of the United States."[12]

On September 15, 1787, the delegates sought to reconcile these drafts. They chose to adopt the Committee of Style's decision to make the prohibition on import and export duties a standalone provision, rather than include the prohibition within a longer list of limits on state power. This allowed the delegates to incorporate the amendments adopted on September 13 into the version reflected in the Constitution.[13] Indicative of how divisive the provision

[5] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 187 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[6] Id. at 435.

[7] Id. at 441.

[8] Id. at 435, 441.

[9] Id. at 583.

[10] Id. at 605.

[11] Id.

[12] Id. at 597.

[13] Id. at 624.

remained, however, a final motion was made to strike the Clause subjecting all state laws imposing import and export duties "to the Revision and Controul of the Congress." This motion failed, and the final text was adopted with ten delegates in favor, and Virginia the only vote in opposition.[14]

ArtI.S10.C2.3 Import-Export Clause Generally

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

> No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

Supreme Court jurisprudence on the Import-Export Clause can be divided into two periods: the first lasting from 1827 to 1976, and the second beginning thereafter. During the first phase, the Court construed the Clause broadly to give effect to the constitutional prohibition on state interference with foreign commerce, even holding that the Twenty-First Amendment, which allowed states to prohibit the sale of alcohol, did not alter the Import-Export Clause's general prohibition on such interference.[1] The Court's jurisprudence focused on determining whether the items subject to state charges qualified as imports or exports, and did not seek to define precisely what types of charges fell within the Clause's scope.

By contrast, during the second phase of jurisprudence, the Court clarified that the Clause's prohibition on state interference applied only to the extent the charges imposed qualified as "imposts" or "duties." In other words, not all state taxation on imports or exports fall within the constitutional prohibition; therefore, a court must assess whether the relevant charge is an "impost" or "duty." The Supreme Court has not overruled its jurisprudence from the first period insofar as it addresses whether items qualify as exports or imports. However, this jurisprudence's continued relevance to Import-Export cases remains unclear.

ArtI.S10.C2.4 Whether a Good Qualifies as an Import or Export

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

> No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

The first phase of Supreme Court doctrine on the Import-Export Clause focused on determining whether the challenged measures applied to goods that qualified as imports or exports. In a series of cases, the Court sought to clarify the Clause's scope by focusing on when products qualify as "imports" or "exports."

In the 1827 case of Brown v. Maryland, the Court established the primary contours of the doctrine applicable to the Import-Export Clause until the late 1970s. In Brown, the Court considered whether a state law requiring sellers of foreign goods to obtain and pay for a license before being permitted to sell any such goods violated the Import-Export Clause.[1] Interpreting the Clause, the Court held that it applied not only to duties on the item imported, but also to "dut[ies] levied after it has entered the country," explaining that taking a more restrictive view would potentially allow states to prevent the importation of goods.[2] The Court further held that, at some point after entering the United States, goods no longer qualify as imports and may thereafter be subject to state charges. As identifying a single point in time or fact would not address sufficiently all circumstances, the Court indicated instead that a reviewing court must consider whether the "importer has so acted upon the thing imported, that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country."[3] However, while the item remained the importer's property, "in his warehouse, in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax" on the item clearly fell within the constitutional prohibition.[4] The Court then held that the state law in question was effectively a tax on importation because it taxed only the occupation of importers and therefore violated the Import-Export Clause.[5]

[14] Id.

[1] Dep't of Revenue v. James B. Beam Distilling Co., 377 U.S. 341, 346 (1964).

In dicta, the Brown Court also addressed the Clause's territorial scope, suggesting that "import" and "export" covered goods transported in foreign as well as interstate commerce.[6] However, in Woodruff v. Parham, the Court held that the Import-Export Clause applied only to goods from or to foreign countries, and did not apply to measures affecting goods traveling only in interstate commerce.[7] Subsequent cases have consistently followed this holding.[8] The Court also extended the Clause's application to the Philippines, during the time it was a U.S. possession, on the ground that it remained outside of and therefore foreign to the United States for purposes of the Clause.[9]

Following Brown, the Court sought to clarify when a good no longer qualifies as an import or export. First, the Court maintained and applied the "original package" rule in a number of cases, holding that charges on imported goods kept in their original form within warehouses violated the Import-Export Clause. Such charges included ad valorem property taxes;[10] taxes on foreign goods sold at auction;[11] and franchise taxes on the landing, storage, or sale of imported goods.[12] By contrast, the Court held that once boxes with imported items were opened for sale or delivery, or once the goods were manipulated for use or sale, they no longer qualifed as imports.[13]

Second, the Court held that imports lose their character as imports once the goods fall within the purchaser's ownership or possession rather than the importer's,[14] or importation is

[1] 25 U.S. 419 (1827).

[2] Id. at 437–38.

[3] Id. at 441–42.

[4] Id. at 442.

[5] Id. at 444.

[6] Id. at 419.

[7] 75 U.S. 123, 133 (1868).

[8] Pervear v. Commonwealth of Mass., 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 475 (1866); In re State Tax on Ry. Gross Receipts, 82 U.S. (15 Wall.) 284, 296–97 (1872); Pittsburgh & S. Coal Co. v. Louisiana, 156 U.S. 590, 600 (1895); Am. Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U.S. 500, 519–20 (1904); New Mexico ex rel. E.J. McLean Co. v. Denver & Rio Grande R.R., 203 U.S. 38, 50 (1906); Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 394 (1948).

[9] Hooven & Allison Co. v. Evatt, 324 U.S. 652, 679 (1945), rev'd on other grounds, 466 U.S. 353 (1984).

[10] Low v. Austin, 80 U.S. 29, 32 (1871).

[11] Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U.S. 566, 573 (1878).

[12] Anglo-Chilean Nitrate Sales Corp. v. Alabama, 288 U.S. 218, 225 (1933).

[13] May v. New Orleans, 178 U.S. 496, 508–09 (1900); Gulf Fisheries Co. v. MacInerney, 276 U.S. 124, 126 (1928); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 534, 542 (1959).

[14] Waring v. Mayor, 75 U.S. 110, 116 (1868); Hooven & Allison Co., 324 U.S. at 658.

otherwise complete (e.g., the goods reach their final resting place).[15] The Court also held that charges imposed on actions more remote from loading or unloading goods, such as transit through U.S. states, do not affect the import process and therefore do not fall within the Import-Export Clause's scope.[16]

The Court also extended Brown to exports expressly, holding that state taxes on the sale of goods abroad and on the ability to export qualify as unconstitutional charges on exports.[17] Further, consistent with other cases involving imports, the Court held that states may tax goods intended for export "until they have been shipped, or entered with a common carrier for transportation, to another state, or have been started upon such transportation in a continuous route or journey."[18]

A separate line of cases also clarifies that the terms "import" and "export" do not include natural persons. In several early cases, it was suggested that the Constitutional Convention's discussion of slaves in conjunction with the term "import" indicated that the Import-Export Clause extended to persons. However, in dicta in the Passenger Cases and in later cases' holdings, the Court decided that the Clause did not apply to natural persons.[19]

ArtI.S10.C2.5 Whether a Charge Qualifies as an Impost or Duty

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

> No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

The Import-Export Clause does not define what qualifies as an "impost" or "duty" that falls within its scope. Beginning with Brown v. Maryland, the Supreme Court interpreted these terms broadly, stressing that the form or name of the charge did not determine whether it falls within the Clause's scope. Rather, the focus of the inquiry was the substance or operation of the challenged measure.[1] Thus, for example, a duty on an importer, despite not being on the product itself, was effectively equivalent to a duty on imports and thereby prohibited.[2]

Following Brown, the Supreme Court applied the Import-Export Clause to a variety of state taxes and other charges.[3] As the Court later noted, the Court generally treated the Clause as potentially applicable to all forms of state taxation on imports or exports,[4] although

---

[15] Pittsburgh & S. Coal Co. v. Bates, 156 U.S. 577, 598–99 (1895); New York v. Wells, 208 U.S. 14 (1908).

[16] Canton R.R. v. Rogan, 340 U.S. 511, 515 (1951); W. Md. Ry. v. Rogan, 340 U.S. 520, 521 (1951).

[17] Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U.S. 292, 295–96 (1917); Richfield Oil Corp. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 329 U.S. 69, 85–86 (1946).

[18] Empresa Siderurgica v. Cnty. of Merced, 337 U.S. 154, 156–57 (1949); Joy Oil Co. v. State Tax Comm'n of Mich., 337 U.S. 286, 288–89 (1949); Kosydar v. Nat'l Cash Reg. Co., 417 U.S. 62, 69 (1974).

[19] Passenger Cases, 48 U.S. 283 (1849); Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. 35, 41 (1868); New York v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 107 U.S. 59, 61–62 (1883).

[1] Brown v. Maryland, 25 U.S. 419, 444–45 (1827); Selliger v. Kentucky, 213 U.S. 200, 209 (1909).

[2] Brown, 25 U.S. at 444–45.

[3] See, e.g., Almy v. California, 65 U.S. 169 (1860) (stamp tax on bills of lading for gold and silver exports); Crew Levick & Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U.S. 292 (1917) (state tax on the business of selling goods in foreign commerce, as measured by gross receipts from merchandise shipped abroad); Anglo-Chilean Nitrate Sales Corp. v. Alabama, 288 U.S. 218 (1933) (franchise tax).

[4] Limbach v. Hooven & Allison Co., 466 U.S. 353, 360 (1984).

the Court also ruled that pilotage fees fell outside the Clause's scope, and that the measures must have some connection to importation or exportation to fall within the Clause.[5]

In 1976, the Court adopted a new approach to assessing whether a state measure violates the Import-Export Clause, cabining the Clause's scope by holding that the terms "impost" and "duty" do not encompass all taxes or charges. In Michelin Tire Corp. v. Wages, the Court considered the history and meaning of these terms to conclude that the Import-Export Clause did not reach non-discriminatory ad valorem property taxes. The Court also overruled Low v. Austin to the extent that case was inconsistent with the Court's new emphasis on defining "impost" and "duty."[6]

Under this new approach, to determine whether a charge may qualify as an impermissble impost or duty, a court must consider three factors: (1) whether it interferes with the Federal Government's ability to speak with one voice in commercial relations with foreign governments; (2) whether it diverts import revenues from the federal to state government; and (3) whether it may jeopardize harmony between the states.[7]

The Court reiterated its "different approach" to the Import-Export Clause in 1978, concluding in Department of Revenue of the State of Washington v. Ass'n of Washington Stevedors, that an occupution tax on stevedores did not fall within the Clause's scope.[8] Not until the 1984 case of Limbach v. Hooven & Allison Co., however, did the Court expressly acknowledge that, in Michelin, it "adopted a fundamentally different approach to cases claiming the protection of the Import-Export Clause" and that therefore some of its prior cases, in addition to Low, were overruled.[9] Applying this new approach, the Court has held other state taxes, including ad valorem property taxes and sales taxes, to fall outside the Clause's scope.[10]

ArtI.S10.C2.6 State Inspection Charges

Article I, Section 10, Clause 2:

> No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the Import-Export Clause's final phrase—"except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws"—relatively rarely. However, the Court has upheld the constitutionality of charges for inspecting tobacco when the charges incurred were for services rendered, and when the challenged law's objective was to ensure the product's quality.[1] The Court has also suggested in dicta that whether an inspection charge is excessive "might be for congress to determine, and not the courts."[2] [5] Mager v. Grima, 49 U.S. 490, 494 (1850); Cooley v. Bd. of Wardens, 53 U.S. 299 (1851).

---

[6] 423 U.S. 276, 279–83 (1976).

[7] Id. at 285–86.

[8] 435 U.S. 734, 752–54 (1976).

[9] 466 U.S. at 359–61 (overruling Hooven & Allison Co. v. Evatt, 324 U.S. 652, 658 (1945)).

[10] R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v. Durham Cnty., 479 U.S. 130, 153 (1986); Itel Containers Int'l Corp. v. Huddleston, 507 U.S. 60, 77 (1993).

[1] Turner v. Maryland, 107 U.S. 38, 54 (1883).

[2] Patapsco Guano Co. v. Bd. of Agric., 171 U.S. 345, 350–51 (1898).

Clause 3—Acts Requiring Consent of Congress

ArtI.S10.C3.1 Duties of Tonnage

ArtI.S10.C3.1.1 Overview of Duties of Tonnage

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3, prohibits states from interfering with interstate and foreign commerce by imposing duties of tonnage—charges to access a port based on a vessel's capacity (i.e., its tonnage)—without congressional consent. States may impose other types of taxes or charges on vessels provided they do not constitute duties of tonnage or otherwise violate the Constitution.

ArtI.S10.C3.1.2 Historical Background on Duties of Tonnage

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

Prior to the Constitution's enactment, many colonies, and later states, imposed duties of tonnage. While such duties most commonly applied to foreign vessels entering state ports,[1] some duties also applied to vessels from other colonies.[2] Colonies generally framed these duties as revenue-raising measures to provide for the public defense.[3] Because colonies considered these duties to be a potential way to protect and grow their own shipping industries, they often exempted their own ships from the tonnage duties.[4] Colonies also used duties of tonnage to retaliate economically when another colony imposed duties, offering to remove the retaliatory duties on a reciprocal basis. For example, Virginia adopted duties of tonnage in retaliation for Maryland's decision to impose such duties. While Virginia described the duty as "unneighborly," it insisted that "Maryland vessels must [also be subject to a duty] until [Maryland's] laws are repealed."[5]

During the Constitutional Convention, the delegates did not consider the question of duties of tonnage until August 1787. The committee considering whether to regulate state authority to impose these duties tabled a report that proposed prohibiting states from requiring vessels to pay duties to access their ports. The Committee concluded that tonnage duties should be "uniform throughout the United States."[6]

When the Constitutional Convention considered the committee's proposal in September 1787, the delegates debated whether such a clause was necessary and would appropriately balance the powers of the federal and state governments. Some delegates, including James

[1] William W. Bates, American Navigation 32 (1902).

[2] Id. at 33.

[3] Id. at 34.

[4] Id.

[5] Id.

[6] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 434 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

Madison, thought the power to impose duties of tonnage qualified as regulation of trade and therefore fell exclusively within Congress's general authority to regulate commerce.[7] Other delegates, who viewed the Commerce Clause's language as too vague to determine whether duties of tonnage fell within its scope, argued that the Constitution should expressly allow states to impose such duties in order to pay certain expenses, such as cleaning harbours and constructing lighthouses. Maryland delegates, James McHenry and Daniel Carroll, proposed that "no State shall be restrained from laying duties of tonnage for the purpose of clearing harbours and erecting light-houses."[8] Another delegate, Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, thought Congress's power to regulate commerce did not extend to duties of tonnage.[9] The Clause's final text addressed the conflict over the Commerce Clause's scope and state needs for revenue from duties of tonnage by generally prohibiting states from imposing duties of tonnage unless permitted by Congress. This text was narrowly adopted with six delegations in favour, four against, and one divided.[10]

ArtI.S10.C3.1.3 Determining Whether a Measure Qualifies as a Duty of Tonnage

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

The Supreme Court first considered the Duty of Tonnage Clause in Cooley v. Board of Wardens of the Port of Philadelphia in 1851, and established what remain essential features of its jurisprudence. First, the Court concluded the term "duty of tonnage" was "well understood when the Constitution was formed" and thus should be interpreted as prohibiting states from imposing only such measures as would have been considered duties of tonnage at that time.[1] Second, by implication, states may impose other fees and charges that do not qualify as duties of tonnage, including pilot fees, wharfage, towage, and penalties imposed to enforce certain laws.[2] Thus, courts must determine whether or not a challenged measure constitutes a duty of tonnage. To make this determination, "it is the thing, and not the name, which is to be considered."[3] In other words, courts must consider the contents, substance, and effect of the measure to determine whether it qualifies as a duty of tonnage.

In subsequent cases, the Supreme Court expanded on these principles. First, in keeping with its broad reading of the Clause, the Court clarified in In re State Tonnage Tax Cases that the prohibition on imposing duties of tonnage covers all vessels, whether traveling in interstate or intrastate commerce, reasoning that the Framers would have made any exception express.[4] Second, in Clyde Mallory Lines v. Alabama, the Court stated expressly that the Duty of Tonnage Clause applies to "all taxes and duties regardless of their name or form, and even

[7] Id. at 625.
[8] Id.
[9] Id.
[10] Id. at 625–26.
[1] Cooley v. Bd. of Wardens, 53 U.S. 299, 314 (1851).
[2] Id.
[3] Id.
[4] In re State Tonnage Tax Cases, 79 U.S. 204, 226 (1870).

though not measured by the tonnage of the vessel, which operate to impose a charge for the privilege of entering, trading in, or lying in a port."[5]

Although the Court has consistently interpreted the Clause broadly, its precise mode of determining whether a measure qualifies as a duty of tonnage has evolved in several respects. One line of cases involves measures qualifying as taxes, while another involves other fees or charges. In a series of cases decided between 1865 and 1876, the Court indicated that any tax measure that uses the tonnage of a ship to calculate the amount to charge to a vessel is a duty of tonnage.[6] By contrast, as the Court clarified in Transportation Co. v. Wheeling, taxes that treat vessels as personal property and assessed in the "same manner as other personal property" do not violate the duty of tonnage clause, although taxes not taxed in the "same manner" may violate the clause.[7]

In 1877, the Court clarified in Packet Co. v. Keokuk that using tonnage to calculate the amount to charge a vessel is not determinative in cases not involving taxes. Rather, the court must also consider the nature of the charge in dispute.[8] Following Keokuk, the Court has applied this more holistic approach to determine whether contested charges qualify as duties of tonnage. Thus, the Court has considered not only whether the state is using a vessel's tonnage to assess fees, but also whether the state is imposing the fees to compensate for costs incurred by the state or municipality in providing and maintaining ports or as another means to charge vessels to access a port. Applying this method of analysis, the Court has upheld the constitutionality of fees to cover services for the safety and upkeep of wharves and locks;[9] fees to cover quarantine services;[10] annual license fees;[11] and fees imposed to cover the costs of providing harbor police services.[12]

ArtI.S10.C3.1.4 Personal Property Taxes and Duties of Tonnage

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

While the Court's duties of tonnage jurisprudence has been consistent,[1] questions remain about how to evaluate disputed charges. In particular, the Court appears divided on how the Duty of Tonnage Clause interacts with state or municipal authority to impose personal property taxes. In the 2009 case, Polar Tankers v. City of Valdez, the Court considered a tax

---

[5] Clyde Mallory Lines v. Alabama, 296 U.S. 261, 265–66 (1935).

[6] Steamship Co. v. Portwardens, 71 U.S. 31 (1867); In re State Tonnage Tax Cases, 79 U.S. 204; Peete v. Morgan, 86 U.S. 581 (1870); Cannon v. New Orleans, 87 U.S. 577 (1874); Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U.S. 238 (1876).

[7] Transp. Co. v. Wheeling, 99 U.S. 273, 284 (1878).

[8] Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U.S. 80 (1877); see also Wiggins Ferry Co. v. City of E. St. Louis, 107 U.S. 365, 376 (1883) (noting that whether a rate is imposed based on tonnage is "not a conclusive circumstance . . . [but] is one of the tests applied to determine whether a tax is a tax on tonnage or not").

[9] Keokuk, 95 U.S. at 87–88; Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U.S. 430, 432–33 (1879); Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U.S. 423, 429 (1879); Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U.S. 559, 561–62 (1881); Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U.S. 691, 706–07 (1883); Huse v. Glover, 119 U.S. 543, 550 (1886); Ouachita Packet Co. v. Aiken, 121 U.S. 444, 448 (1887).

[10] Morgan's S.S. Co. v. La. Bd. of Health, 118 U.S. 455, 463 (1886).

[11] Wiggins Ferry Co., 107 U.S. at 376.

[12] Clyde Mallory Lines, 296 U.S. at 264.

[1] Polar Tankers, Inc. v. City of Valdez, 557 U.S. 1, 6 (2009) ("The Court over the course of many years has consistently interpreted the language of the Clause in light of its purpose.").

ordinance imposed by the City of Valdez, Alaska. The Court identified four ways the ordinance might be constitutional as a personal property tax, although the Court ultimately held the tax at issue unconstitutional on other grounds.[2]

Polar Tankers involved an ordinance imposing a personal property tax on "boats and vessels of at least 95 feet in length that regularly travel to the City, are kept or used within the City, or which annually take on at least $1 million worth of cargo or engage in other business transactions of comparable value in the City."[3] A majority of seven Justices held the ordinance violated the Duty of Tonnage Clause[4] based on their findings that the ordinance applied in practice only to certain large vessels, the amount owed was effectively based on vessel capacity (i.e., tonnage), and a single entry into Valdez's port made the vessel liable to pay the tax. Further, the City did not impose the tax to compensate for a service provided. Thus, the ordinance's actual operation rendered it a duty of tonnage, not a personal property tax.[5]

Despite the 7-2 holding of Polar Tankers, the Justices diverged on how to approach determining whether the ordinance might qualify as a personal property tax, debating the principles and implications of the State Tonnage Tax Cases and Wheeling. Justice Stephen Breyer, writing for a plurality of four Justices, concluded that personal property taxes may be constitutional and not violate the general prohibition on duties of tonnage if vessels are taxed in the same manner as other property, as held in Wheeling. More precisely, this plurality interpreted the "same manner" requirement of Wheeling to require a state to impose similar taxes upon other businesses, effectively reading "same manner" as a non-discrimination requirement.[6] Justice Breyer concluded that the Valdez ordinance failed this requirement, as it applied in practice almost exclusively to large vessels.[7]

By contrast, Justice John Paul Stevens, joined in dissent by Justice David Souter, argued that the "same manner" criterion, as set out in Wheeling and the State Tonnage Tax Cases, required only that a property tax on vessels be calculated based on property valuation, instead on tonnage.[8] Chief Justice John Roberts, joined by Justice Clarence Thomas, wrote separately, contending that personal property taxes may be imposed only on a state's citizens, not on visiting vessels.[9] Justice Samuel Alito, in a concurrence, stated he disagreed with Justice Breyer's view regarding taxation, but offered no further comment.[10]

Finally, the Constitution permits states to impose duties of tonnage with congressional consent. However, as noted in dicta by the Supreme Court, the Constitution does not specify when or how such consent must be given.[11] To date, the Supreme Court has not had occasion to decide when or how congressional consent would be granted.

[2] Id.

[3] Id. at 5.

[4] Id. at 9–11; id. at 17 (Roberts, C.J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

[5] Id. at 9–11; id. at 17.

[6] Id. at 12.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 22–23 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

[9] Id. at 18 (Roberts, C.J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

[10] Id. at 19–20 (Alito, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

[11] Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 521 (1893).

ArtI.S10.C3.2 States and Military Affairs

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

The Supreme Court has stated that this provision contemplates the use of the state's military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by civil authority,[1] and held that the organization and maintenance of an active state militia is not a keeping of troops in time of peace within the prohibition of this clause.[2] The Supreme Court has also held that the divestments of state power in this Clause, together with Congress's express authority to build and maintain the Armed Forces under Article 1, Section 8, Clauses 12 and 13, reflect "a complete delegation of authority to the Federal Government to provide for the common defense" and show that the states renounced their right to interfere with national policy in this area in the plan of the Convention.[3]

ArtI.S10.C3.3 Compact Clause

ArtI.S10.C3.3.1 Overview of Compact Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

The Compact Clause prohibits states from entering into "any Agreement or Compact with another State" or with a foreign government without the consent of Congress.[1] Whereas other provisions in Article I, Section 10 categorically deny states certain powers,[2] the Compact Clause allows states to retain what the Supreme Court has described as the sovereign right to make agreements and compacts, provided Congress consents.[3]

According to the Supreme Court, there is little difference between "agreements" and "compacts" in this clause.[4] Both terms refer to contracts between governments—although a compact may reflect a more "formal and serious engagement" than an agreement.[5] Once

---

[1] Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 45 (1849).

[2] Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252 (1886).

[3] Torres v. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety, No. 20-603, slip op. 6 (U.S. June 29, 2022) (holding that the states waived their sovereign immunity under Congress's Article I power pursuant to the plan of the Convention, such that Congress may enforce certain federal reemployment protections by authorizing private litigation against noncompliant state employers that do not wish to consent to suit).

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cls. 1–2.

[2] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cls. 1–2 (prohibiting states from, among other things, entering into treaties, coining money, impairing contracts, granting titles of nobility, and regulating most imports and exports). See also ArtI.S10.C1.1 Foreign Policy by States to ArtI.S10.C3.3.6 Legal Effect and Interpretation of Compacts.

[3] See, e.g., Poole v. Fleeger's Lessee, 36 U.S. 185, 208–09 (1837) (explaining that the Constitution requres consent for a compact between states and that, in this instance, such consent had "been expressly given").

[4] See, e.g., Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 520, 537 (1893); Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. 657, 725 (1838).

[5] Virginia, 148 U.S. at 520. See Texas v. New Mexico, 482 U.S. 124, 128 (1987) (noting that a "Compact is, after all, a contract" between sovereigns) (quoting Petty v. Tennessee-Missouri Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275, 285 (1959) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting)); Virginia v. West Virginia, 78 U.S. 39, 59 (1870) ("[A]greement means the mutual consent approved by Congress, agreements and compacts have the force of federal law.[6] As a result, agreement and compacts have dual functions: they operate as contracts between governments and, if approved by Congress, part of the law of the United States.[7]

The ability to form compacts with other governments is a defining characteristic of sovereignty.[8] In the Compact Clause, the Constitution adapts the sovereign's traditional compact-making power to the American constitutional system in which both the Federal Government and the states have sovereign authority.[9] The clause safeguards national interests by giving Congress control over matters that reach beyond state lines but are not suitable for direct federal regulation.[10] It also protects states' interests by limiting an individual state's power to form compacts that might disadvantage other states or regional interests.[11]

A literal reading of the Compact Clause would require congressional approval for any agreement or compact.[12] In the context of interstate compacts, however, the Supreme Court has adopted a functional interpretation in which only compacts that increase the political power of the states while undermining federal sovereignty require congressional consent.[13] The Supreme Court has not said whether the same interpretation applies to states' compacts with foreign governments, but the proliferation of states' pacts[14] with foreign officials suggests Congress's approval is not required in many cases.[15] of the parties to a given proposition . . . ."); see also Compact, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) (defining "compact" as "[a]n agreement or covenant between two or more parties, esp. between governments or states"). Because the distinctions between "Agreement" and "Compact," are minor, this essay uses the terms interchangeably.

---

[6] See ArtI.S10.C3.3.6 Legal Effect and Interpretation of Compacts.

[7] For background on the Supremacy Clause, see ArtVI.C2.1 Overview of Supremacy Clause.

[8] See, e.g., Poole, 36 U.S. at 209; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. 657, 725 (1838); ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power (discussing the importance of international agreement-making to the concept of sovereignty).

[9] See Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co., 304 U.S. 92, 104 (1938). For discussion of the dual sovereignty doctrine, see Amdt5.3.3 Dual Sovereignty Doctrine.

[10] See Petty v. Tennessee-Missouri Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275, 282 n.7 (1959). See also Texas v. New Mexico, No. 141, Orig., slip op. at 4 (U.S. Mar. 5, 2018) (noting that the Compact Clause "ensures that the Legislature can 'check any infringement of the rights of the national government.'") (quoting 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1397 (1833)); Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433, 440 (1981) ("[T]he Framers sought to ensure that Congress would maintain ultimate supervisory power over cooperative state action that might otherwise interfere with the full and free exercise of federal authority."); West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22, 27–28 (1951) (describing compacts as a "supple device" for addressing regional problems while protecting national interests).

[11] See Florida v. Georgia, 58 U.S. 478, 494 (1854).

[12] See U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Comm'n, 434 U.S. 452, 459 (1978).

[13] See, e.g., Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433, 440 (1981); U.S. Steel Corp., 434 U.S. at 468; New Hampshire v. Maine, 426 U.S. 363, 369–370 (1976); Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 519 (1893). For background on functionalism as a method of constitutional interpretation, see Intro.8.8 Structuralism and Constitutional Interpretation.

[14] This set of essays uses "pact" as a generic term for any international commitment to which a state is a party, regardless of its form, title, and whether it is legally binding.

[15] See ArtI.S10.C3.3.5 Requirement of Congressional Consent to Compacts. For discussion of the effect of historical practice on constitutional interpretation, see Intro.8.9 Historical Practices and Constitutional Interpretation.

ArtI.S10.C3.3.2 Historical Background on Compact Clause

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

The roots of the Compact Clause can be traced to interstate boundary disputes during the colonial period in American history.[1] As population in North America expanded and moved westward, some colonies sought control over greater shares of territory.[2] At the same time, land grants in the colonies' royal charters were often vague and indefinite, which led to disagreements about colonial borders.[3] The British legal system provided two methods for the colonies to resolve these disputes: a litigation-like process before the British Royal Commission or private negotiations between the colonies followed by settlements that were approved by the Crown.[4] Both processes were precursors to provisions in the Constitution. The litigation-like process continued in Article III, Section 2, which gives the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over disputes between states.[5] The private settlement process carried over into the Compact Clause.

In the period after the Revolutionary War but before the Constitution was adopted, the Articles of Confederation shifted the British system of compact-making slightly. The Articles of Confederation allowed the states to negotiate independently and form compacts, but they required approval from the newly created Congress rather than the Crown.[6] Despite the requirement for congressional consent, several states entered into interstate compacts without seeking approval during the Articles of Confederation period.[7]

At the Constitutional Convention, James Madison cited states' unapproved compacts as one reason to strengthen the National Government's general power over the states in a new system of government.[8] Later in the convention, the Committee of Detail included what would become the Compact Clause in its drafts of the Constitution,[9] and the Committee of Style

---

[1] See Felix Frankfurter & James M. Landis, The Compact Clause of the Constitution—A Study in Interstate Adjustments, 34 Yale L. J. 685, 692 (1925).

[2] See id.

[3] See, e.g., Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. 657, 724 (1838); Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 504–07 (1893).

[4] See Frankfurter & Landis, supra note 1, at 693–95. See also Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. at 739–44 (discussing boundary settlement processes in Great Britain).

[5] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction. The Supreme Court regularly encourages states to resolve their disputes through compacts rather than litigation. See, e.g., Vermont v. New York, 417 U.S. 270, 277–78 (1974).

[6] Article VI of the Articles of Confederation states: "No State, without the Consent of the united States, in congress assembled, shall . . . enter into any confer[ ]ence, agreement, alliance, or treaty, with any King prince or state . . . . No two or more states shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the united states, in congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue." Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, paras. 1, 3.

[7] See Frankfurter & Landis, supra note 1, at 732.

[8] See 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 316 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] ("[N]o two or more States can form among themselves any treaties . . . without the consent of Cong[ress] yet Virgi[ni]a & Mary[lan]d in one instance—Pen[nsylvania] & N[ew] Jersey in another, have entered into compacts, without previous application or subsequent apology.").

[9] The Committee of Detail's first draft provided: "No State shall enter into any . . . Treaty, Alliance (or) Confederation (with any foreign Power nor with[out] Cons[ent] of U.S. into any agreem[ent] or compact w[ith] (any other) another State or Power . . . ." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 8, at 169. The Committee of Detail's later draft, which was submitted to the Constitutional Convention, stated: "No State, without the consent of the Legislature of the revised the clause into its final form.[10] Minor elements of the Compact Clause differ from the Articles of Confederation,[11] but the clause retained its basic structure in which states can form agreements and compacts with one another and with foreign governments, provided Congress consents.[12]

Apart from Madison's remark about unapproved compacts, the Framers said little about the Compact Clause during the Constitutional Convention and state ratification debates.[13] In the Federalist No. 44, Madison wrote that the "particulars" of the Compact Clause "are either so obvious, or have been so fully developed, that they may be passed over without remark."[14] Despite Madison's confidence that the clause is self-explanatory, compact-making practice has evolved, and disagreements have required courts to interpret the Compact Clause's scope and requirements.[15]

ArtI.S10.C3.3.3 Subject Matter of Compacts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

As instruments based on the combined powers of Congress and the states, compacts have a broad base of authority that can be leveraged for many governmental endeavors.[1] For many years after the Constitution was adopted, boundary disputes were the predominate subject of all compacts and agreements.[2] After the turn of the twentieth century, states began to use

---

United states, shall . . . enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with any foreign power . . . ." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 8, at 187. Earlier in the Convention, Alexander Hamilton had proposed a draft constitution that included a similar clause. See 3 Farrand's Records, supra note 8, at 630 ("No State shall enter into a Treaty, alliance, or contract with another, or with a foreign power without the consent of the United States.").

[10] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 8, at 597 (revisions by Committee of Style); See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 8, at 657 (final version of the Compact Clause in the Constitution).

[11] The Compact Clause conditionally allows "any Agreement or Compact" when Congress consents, but Clause 1 of Article I, Section 10 forbids the states from entering into three types of pacts—treaties, alliances, and confederations—even if Congress approves. See U.S. Const., art. I, § 10, cls. 1, 3. By contrast, the Articles of Confederation did not create a second category of pacts that were forbidden no matter if Congress consents. See Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, paras. 1, 3. The Framers' writings suggest each category of pact mentioned in these provisions had a distinct and commonly understood meaning when the Constitution was drafted. See U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Comm'n, 434 U.S. 452, 460–62 (1978). According to the Supreme Court, however, the meaning of these terms of art were lost within a generation, leaving later jurists and scholars to debate different theories of distinction. See U.S. Steel Corp., 434 U.S. at 463.

[12] Compare Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. VI, paras. 1, 3, with U.S. Const., art. I, § 10, cl. 3.

[13] See U.S. Steel Corp., 434 U.S. at 460–62 ("The records of the Constitutional Convention . . . are barren of any clue as to the precise contours of the agreements and compacts governed by the Compact Clause. . . . The records of the state ratification conventions also shed no light.").

[14] The Federalist No. 44 (James Madison).

[15] See ArtI.S10.C3.3.3 Subject Matter of Compacts and ArtI.S10.C3.3.6 Legal Effect and Interpretation of Compacts.

[1] See Felix Frankfurter & James M. Landis, The Compact Clause of the Constitution—A Study in Interstate Adjustments, 34 Yale L. J. 685, 688 (1925). The Supreme Court has stated in dicta that compacts may not be used to alter the Constitutional structure of government. See Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 59 U.S. 421, 433 (1855) (stating that Congress cannot not lose its power to regulate interstate commerce through a compact); Wilson v. Mason, 5 U.S. 45, 61, 2 L. Ed. 29 (1801) (declining to adopt a construction of an compact that would "annul the [C]onstitution" by depriving federal courts of constitutionally provided jurisdiction).

[2] See, e.g., Frankfurter & Landis, supra note 1, at 735–48; Richard H. Leach, The Federal Government and Interstate Compacts, 29 Fordham L. Rev. 421, 421–22 (1961). The first compact approved under the Constitution was an interstate compacts more often as a tool for solving complex regional problems.[3] States made compacts to apportion interstate water bodies, particularly rivers in the Western United States,[4] and to manage interstate resources and properties, such as oil and gas,[5] fisheries,[6] and parks.[7] States also began to use compacts for major public undertakings and infrastructure projects, such as the Port of New York and New Jersey.[8]

During this time, Congress began to pass legislation that provided advance consent to whole classes of compacts on some subjects. In one notable example, Congress passed legislation consenting to any interstate compact for the prevention of crime.[9] This law led to several widely adopted compacts addressing probationers' and parolees' travel between states and other law enforcement matters.[10]

Interstate compact usage eventually evolved to address an even wider range of issues. Congress authorized compacts addressing subjects as varied as education,[11] urban planning,[12] tourism and historic preservation,[13] tax,[14] emergency aid,[15] fire prevention,[16] transportation,[17] sewage disposal,[18] and radioactive waste management.[19] agreement between Virginia and the delegates of the then-district of Kentucky to set boundaries between Virginia the newly formed State of Kentucky. See 1 Stat. 189 (1791). See also De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 154 (1960) (discussing history of congressional approval of state compacts).

---

[3] See Leach, supra note 2, at 421–22; Duncan B. Hollis, The Elusive Foreign Compact, 73 Mo. L. Rev. 1071, 1074–75 (2008). See also West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22, 27 (1951) ("The growing interdependence of regional interests, calling for regional adjustments, has brought extensive use of interstate compacts.").

[4] See, e.g., La Plata River Compact, Pub. L. No. 68-346, 43 Stat. 796 (1925); South Platte River Compact, Pub. L. No. 69-37, 44 Stat. 195 (1926); Colorado River Compact, Pub. L. No. 70-642, § 13, 45 Stat. 1057 (1928); Rio Grande Compact of 1938, Pub. L. No. 76-96, 53 Stat. 785 (1939); Republican River Compact, Pub. L. No. 78-60, 57 Stat. 86 (1943).

[5] See, e.g., Interstate Compact to Preserve Oil and Gas, Pub. Res. No. 74-64, 49 Stat. 939 (1935).

[6] See, e.g., Columbia River Compact, Pub. L. No. 65-123, 40 Stat. 515 (1918); Pacific Marine Fisheries Compact, Pub. L. No. 80-232, 61 Stat. 419 (1947).

[7] See, e.g., Palisades Interstate Park Compact, Pub. Res. No. 75-65, 50 Stat. 719 (1937); Breaks Interstate Park Compact, Pub. L. No. 83-543, 68 Stat. 571 (1954).

[8] See Joint Resolution Granting Consent of Congress to an Agreement or Compact for the Creation of the Port of New York District and the Establishment of the Port of New York Authority, Pub. Res. No. 67-17, 42 Stat. 174 (1921).

[9] See An Act Granting Consent of Congress to Any Two or More States to Enter into Agreements or Compacts for Cooperative Effort and Mutual Assistance in the Prevention of Crime, Pub. L. No. 73-292, 48 Stat. 909 (1934) (codified at 4 U.S.C. § 112).

[10] See, e.g., Interstate Compact for Juveniles, codified in Va. Code Ann. § 16.1-323; Interstate Corrections Compact, codified in Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 196.610; Agreement on Detainers, codified in Ala. Code § 15-9-81; New England Corrections Compact, codified in Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 18–102; New England Police Compact, codified in 42 R.I. Gen. Laws Ann. § 42-37-1; Western Corrections Compact, codified in Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 7-3-401.

[11] See, e.g., Western Regional Education Compact, Pub. L. No. 83–226, 67 Stat. 490 (1953); New Hampshire-Vermont Interstate School Compact, Pub. L. No. 91-21, 83 Stat. 14 (1969).

[12] See, e.g., Delaware Valley Urban Area Compact, codified in N.J. Stat. Ann. §§ 32:27-1–32:27-27 (advance congressional consent provided by the Housing Act of 1961, Pub. L. No. 87-70, § 310, 75 Stat. 170 (1961) (previously codified in 40 U.S.C. § 461, repealed by Pub. L. No. 97-35, § 313, 95 Stat. 398 (1981))).

[13] See, e.g., Historic Chattahoochee Compact, Pub. L. No. 95-462, 92 Stat 1271 (1978); Cumbres and Toltec Scenic Railroad Compact, Pub. L. No. 93-467, 88 Stat. 1421 (1974).

[14] See Compact on Taxation of Motor Fuels Consumed by Interstate Buses, Pub. L. No. 89-11, 79 Stat. 58 (1965).

[15] See Interstate Compact for Mutual Military Aid in an Emergency, Pub. L. No. 82-434, 66 Stat. 315 (1952) (amended by Pub. L. No. 84-564, 70 Stat. 247 (1956); Emergency Management Assistance Compact; Pub. L. No. 104-321, 110 Stat. 3877 (1996).

[16] See, e.g., South Central Forest Fire Protection Compact, Pub. L. No. 83-642, 68 Stat. 783 (1954); Middle Atlantic Interstate Forest Fire Protection Compact, Pub. L. No. 84-790, 70 Stat. 636 (1956); Northwest Fire Protection Agreement, Pub. L. No. 105-377, 112 Stat. 33391 (1998).

[17] See, e.g., Joint Resolution Granting the Consent of Congress to the Several States to Negotiate and Enter into Compacts for the Purpose of Promoting Highway Safety, Pub. L. No. 85-684, 72 Stat. 635 (1957).

Some compacts create administrative bodies empowered to implement the compact's requirements.[20] For example, in West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, the Supreme Court addressed the Ohio River Valley Sanitation Compact, which authorized an interstate commission to issue orders requiring compliance with sewage disposal restrictions in interstate waterbodies.[21] A West Virginia state court deemed the compact invalid under the theory that it unlawfully delegated the state's sovereign power to a body outside the state.[22] The Supreme Court, however, reasoned that the "Framers left the [s]tates free to settle regional controversies in diverse ways[,]" including by delegating a state's traditional sovereign authority to an interstate compact commission.[23]

Unlike interstate compacts, Congress has given consent to a much smaller set of agreements between states and foreign governments.[24] The nature of states' pacts with foreign governments can be "elusive," as one Compact Clause scholar described it,[25] because states often make international pacts without seeking congressional approval.[26] Congress has approved state agreements with foreign governments on some distinct subjects, such as agreements for transnational highway infrastructure and bridges[27] and compacts with Canadian providences and territories for cross-border fire prevention[28] and emergency management.[29]

In a unique case, Congress authorized the Great Lakes Basin Compact—which included several states, Ontario, and Quebec—but declined to allow the Canadian provinces to join.[30]

---

[18] See New Hampshire-Vermont Interstate Sewage Waste Disposal Facilities Compact, Pub. L. No. 94-403, 90 Stat. 1221 (1976).

[19] See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 2021d; 42 U.S.C. § 2021d note.

[20] See Ne. Bancorp, Inc. v. Bd. of Governors of Fed. Rsrv. Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 164 (1985) (describing the creation of a joint organization or body as one "classic indicia of a compact").

[21] See 341 U.S. 22, 24–25 (1951).

[22] See West Virginia ex rel. Dyer, 341 U.S. at 26–30.

[23] See id. at 26–31.

[24] See Hollis, supra note 3, at 1075.

[25] See generally Hollis, supra note 3.

[26] For discussion of the state's increase use of pacts with foreign governments that do not receive congressional approval, see ArtI.S10.C3.3.5 Requirement of Congressional Consent to Compacts.

[27] See Act to Authorize the Construction and Maintenance of a Bridge Across the Niagara River, 16 Stat. 173 (1870); Joint Resolution Granting Consent to New York to Enter into an Agreement or Compact with Canada for the Establishment of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, Pub. L. No. 824, 70 Stat. 701 (1956), repealed by Pub. L. No. 85–145, 71 Stat. 367 (1957); 33 U.S.C. § 535a (granting consent to construction of international bridges to Canada and Mexico). In 1958, Congress authorized a compact between Minnesota and Manitoba, Canada for a highway construction project, but construction was never went forward. See Act of Sept. 2, 1958, Pub. L. No. 85–877, § 1, 72 Stat. 1701.

[28] See Act Granting the Consent and Approval of Congress to an Interstate Forest Fire Protection Compact, 63 Stat. 271 (1949); Act Granting the Consent and Approval of Congress to the Participation of certain Provinces of the Dominion of Canada in the Northeastern Interstate Forest Fire Protection Compact, Pub. L. No. 340, § 1, 66 Stat. 71 (1952), repealed by Act of June 30, 1978, Pub. L. No. 95–307, § 8, 92 Stat. 353 (agreements formed under the repealed authorization remain in effect under 16 U.S.C. § 1647(b)); Act Granting Consent and Approval of Congress to an Interstate Forest Fire Protection Compact, Pub. L. No. 105–377, 112 Stat. 3391 (1998).

[29] See International Emergency Management Assistance Memorandum of Understanding, Pub. L. No. 110–171, 121 Stat. 2467 (2007); Pacific Northwest Emergency Management Arrangement, Pub. L. No. 105–381, 112 Stat. 3402 (1998).

[30] See Act Granting Consent of Congress to a Great Lakes Basin Compact, Pub. L. No. 90–419 § 2, 82 Stat. 414 (1968).

Executive Branch officials believed Canadian participation would conflict with an existing treaty between the United States and Canada and interfere with the Federal Government's powers over foreign affairs.[31]

ArtI.S10.C3.3.4 Congressional Consent to Compacts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

The Constitution does not dictate the timing or manner in which Congress must consent to a compact. The Supreme Court has interpreted the Constitution's silence to mean that Congress may use its wisdom and discretion to choose how and when it gives consent.[1] In an 1893 case, the Supreme Court stated that Congress ordinarily should provide authorization before the states join and carry out a compact, but Congress may consent later if the compact addresses an issue that is best considered after its "nature is fully developed[.]"[2] The Court has further explained that Congress can consent to a compact either in advance or by giving approval after the states already negotiated and joined the compact.[3]

As the number of compacts has increased over time, Congress has developed different ways of providing consent. Congress frequently approves specific compacts,[4] but it also has given approval in advance to broad classes of compacts.[5] Congress has, at times, given consent for an indefinite period;[6] other times it has put an end date on its authorization.[7] When approving a compact, Congress can consent to the participating states' later adoption of legislation that implements the compact.[8] Congress also can impose conditions on its consent, provided the conditions are "appropriate to the subject" and do not exceed a constitutional limitation.[9]

Congress's consent to a compact can be inferred from the circumstances and need not be expressly stated.[10] For example, when a compact sets up a formal procedure for resolving an

---

[31] See The Great Lakes Basin: Hearings before the Subcomm. on the Great Lakes Basin, S. Comm. Foreign Relations, 84TH CONG. 6–9 (1956) (written statements of Robert C. Hill, Assistant Sec'y of State, and William P. Rogers, Deputy Att'y Gen.).

[1] See Green v. Biddle, 21 U.S. 1, 85–83 (1823) ("[T]he constitution makes no provision respecting the mode or form in which the consent of Congress is to be signified, very properly leaving that matter to the wisdom of that body . . . .").

[2] Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 521 (1893).

[3] Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433, 440–41 (1981). Although not required under the Constitution, Congress often presents compacts which it has authorized to the President for approval. See Duncan B. Hollis, The Elusive Foreign Compact, 73 MO. L. REV. 1071, 1103 n.30 (2008).

[4] See e.g., Columbia River Compact, Pub. L. No. 65–123, 40 Stat. 515 (1918).

[5] See, e.g., 4 U.S.C. § 112; 42 U.S.C. § 2021d(2); 33 U.S.C. § 567a.

[6] See supra note 5.

[7] See, e.g., 7 U.S.C. § 7256(3).

[8] See De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 150–51 (1960).

[9] James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134, 148 (1937). See also, e.g., Arizona v. California, 292 U.S. 341, 351–52 (1934) (discussing conditions on the Colorado River Compact imposed by the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928); 7 U.S.C. § 7256(2) (limiting the Northeast Interstate Diary Compact).

[10] See, e.g., Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. at 522; Virginia v. West Virginia, 78 U.S. 39, 60 (1870).

interstate problem, such as arbitration, the Supreme Court has held that consent can be inferred if Congress expressed approval of the proceedings' results.[11]

ArtI.S10.C3.3.5 Requirement of Congressional Consent to Compacts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

One of the most common questions to arise in Compact Clause cases is whether congressional consent is required for a particular state commitment.[1] The plain language of the Compact Clause suggests congressional approval is mandatory for "any" compact with another state or foreign government,[2] but the Supreme Court has not adopted a literal interpretation of the clause in all cases. In the context of interstate compacts, the Supreme Court has held that only compacts that increase states' power and diminish federal supremacy need Congress's consent.[3] The Court has not said whether the same interpretation applies to states' compacts with foreign governments, but the frequency with which states make international pacts suggests congressional approval often is unnecessary.[4]

The closest the Supreme Court has come to invalidating a compact for lack of congressional approval came in a non-controlling 1840 opinion about a state's agreement with a foreign official.[5] In Holmes v. Jennison, the Governor of Vermont ordered a resident of Quebec (then part of Great Britain) arrested and returned to Quebec to stand trial for murder even though the United States did not have an extradition treaty with Britain at the time.[6] A crucial legal issue—whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction—turned on the whether the Governor of Vermont had arrested the fugitive under an informal "agreement" with Canadian authorities within the meaning of the Compact Clause.[7] The case ultimately ended with an equally divided court on the jurisdiction issue,[8] with four Justices determining that the governor made an agreement that should have been submitted to Congress for consent.[9] This four-Justice

---

[11] See, e.g., Wharton v. Wise, 153 U.S. 155, 172–73 (1894); Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. at 537; Green v. Biddle, 21 U.S. 1, 86–87 (1823).

[1] See e.g., Ne. Bancorp, Inc. v. Bd. of Governors of Fed. Rsrv. Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 175 (1985); U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Comm'n, 434 U.S. 452, 469–70 (1978); New Hampshire v. Maine, 426 U.S. 363, 370 (1976); Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 518–19 (1893).

[2] See U.S. Steel Corp, 434 U.S. at 459 ("Read literally, the Compact Clause would require the States to obtain congressional approval before entering into any agreement among themselves, irrespective of form, subject, duration, or interest to the United States.").

[3] See Ne. Bancorp, Inc., 472 U.S. at 175; U.S. Steel Corp., 434 U.S. at 469–70; New Hampshire v. Maine, 426 U.S. at 370; Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. at 518–19. See also St. Louis & S.F. Ry. v. James, 161 U.S. 545, 562 (1896) (holding that state legislation authorizing a railroad organized under the laws of one state to extend services into a second state, subject to the second state's regulations, did not require congressional approval).

[4] See infra note 12.

[5] Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540 (1840) (affirmed by an equally divided court).

[6] See id. at 561 (Taney, C.J.).

[7] The Supreme Court had jurisdiction if the lower court's decision was final and implicated a question of whether Vermont's actions were "repugnant to the constitution[.]" An Act to Establish the Judicial Courts United States, 1 Stat. 73, 85 (1789). The constitutional repugnancy element hinged on whether the Governor of Vermont made an "agreement" under the Compact Clause. See Holmes, 39 U.S. at 562–86 (Taney, C.J.).

[8] When the Supreme Court is made up of an even number of justices and is equally divided on the merits of a case, the lower court's decision is affirmed. See Durant v. Essex Co., 74 U.S. 107 (1868).

[9] See Holmes, 39 U.S. at 573–74 (Taney, C.J.).

opinion, written by Chief Justice Roger Taney, was based on a literal interpretation of the Compact Clause that viewed congressional approval as necessary for "every agreement, written or verbal, formal or informal, positive or implied, by the mutual understanding of the parties."[10]

Chief Justice Taney's opinion has been influential, and the Supreme Court later cited it positively,[11] but the view that all pacts between states and foreign governments require Congress's consent has not been supported in practice.[12] To the contrary, states often conclude pacts with foreign officials without congressional approval, and the Supreme Court eventually developed a new line of cases that more narrowly interprets the congressional consent requirement in the context of interstate compacts.[13]

In 1893, the Supreme Court expressed doubt in Virginia v. Tennessee that Congress must approve every interstate compact regardless of its relevance to the Federal Government.[14] The Virginia Court saw no reason congressional approval would be necessary for compacts "to which the United States can have no possible objection" or desire to interfere.[15] The Court gave several examples of hypothetical agreements that would not concern the United States, such as two states contracting to send exhibits to the Chicago World's Fair via the Erie Canal.[16] Rather than require congressional approval in every case, the Virginia Court reasoned that interstate compacts only need Congress's consent if they have the potential to "increase of political power in the states, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States."[17]

In later cases, the Supreme Court repeated Virginia's test for determining when congressional consent is necessary and clarified how it applies to modern interstate compacts.[18] In U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Commission, for example, the Supreme Court held that a compact creating uniform rules for state taxation of multistate corporations did not require congressional consent even though it increased the states' bargaining power in relation to the taxed companies.[19] Virginia's test does not focus on whether the compact makes

[10] Id. at 572.

[11] See United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 414 (1886) ("[T]here can be little doubt of the soundness of the opinion of Chief Justice [Taney], that the power exercised by the governor of Vermont is a part of the foreign intercourse of this country, which has undoubtedly been conferred upon the federal government[.]"); U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Comm'n, 434 U.S. 452, 465 n. 15 (1978) (discussing the consistency of Chief Justice Taney's opinion with later Compact Clause jurisprudence). The Supreme Court of Vermont relied, in part, on Chief Justice Taney's opinion in later proceedings when it concluded that the governor lacked the constitutional authority to transfer the fugitive to Canadian officials. See Ex parte Holmes, 12 Vt. 631, 635–42 (1840).

[12] See Memorandum from William H. Taft, IV, Legal Adviser, Dep't of State, to Senator Byron L. Dorgan (Nov. 20, 2001) [Taft Memorandum], in Digest of United States Practice in International Law 2001, at 182 (Sally J. Cummins & David P. Stewart eds., 2001) [2001 Digest] ("In general, the notion articulated by Chief Justice Taney that all U.S. state agreements constitute compacts that require congressional consent has not been widely supported."); Duncan B. Hollis, Unpacking the Compact Clause, 88 Tex. L. Rev. 741, 747–60 (2010) (cataloging and describing state agreements with foreign governments that did not receive congressional approval); Ryan M. Scoville, The International Commitments of the Fifty States, UCLA L. Rev. (forthcoming 2022) (updating research on the proliferation of states' agreements with foreign governments).

[13] See supra notes 1 & 12.

[14] See 148 U.S. 503, 518–19 (1893).

[15] See id. at 518.

[16] See id.

[17] See id. at 519.

[18] See Ne. Bancorp, Inc. v. Bd. of Governors of Fed. Rsrv. Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 175 (1985); U.S. Steel Corp. v. Multistate Tax Comm'n, 434 U.S. 452, 469–70 (1978); New Hampshire v. Maine, 426 U.S. 363, 370 (1976).

[19] See U.S. Steel Corp., 434 U.S. at 472–73.

the states more influential in general, the U.S. Steel Corp. Court explained, but whether it could enhance the states' power in relation to the Federal Government.[20]

The Supreme Court has also suggested that some engagements between states do not qualify as agreements or compacts at all.[21] In Northeast Bancorp, Inc. v. Board of Governors of Federal Reserve System,[22] Supreme Court rejected a Compact Clause challenge on the rationale that a system for reciprocal state legislation[23] lacked four "classic indicia of a compact" in the constitutional sense.[24] According to Court, those indicia are: (1) the creation of a joint organization or body; (2) conditioning one state's action on the actions of other states; (3) restrictions on states' ability to modify or repeal their laws unilaterally; and (4) a requirement for reciprocal constraints among all states.[25] The Northeast Bancorp, Inc. Court also held that, even if it assumed a compact existed, the scheme was authorized under existing federal banking law,[26] and therefore could infringe federal supremacy under the Virginia standard for congressional consent.[27]

After Northeast Bancorp, Inc., the Supreme Court's interstate compact jurisprudence appears to establish a two-part inquiry for determining whether congressional consent is necessary: is the arrangement at issue a "compact or agreement" for constitutional purposes, and, if so, does it belong in that class of compacts described in Virginia that require congressional approval because it affects federal supremacy?[28] Unless the answer to both questions is "yes," consent is not mandatory.

While the Supreme Court's interstate compact cases are the most well-developed jurisprudence on the congressional consent issue, the Court has never held that these cases apply to states' international pacts with foreign governments.[29] Some scholars argue that two types of compacts present different concerns and should not share the same standard.[30] The greater weight of authority adopted in lower courts and Executive Branch statements, however, suggests Virginia applies in both scenarios.[31]

[20] See id. at 473.

[21] See Ne. Bancorp, Inc., 472 U.S. at 175.

[22] 472 U.S. 159.

[23] Northeast Bancorp, Inc. concerned a system of reciprocal state legislation in which Massachusetts and Connecticut passed state laws that only allowed banks in their states to be acquired by New England-based holding companies. See id. at 164.

[24] See id.

[25] See id.

[26] See Bank Holding Company Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1841–52.

[27] Ne. Bancorp, Inc., 472 U.S. at 176.

[28] Accord, e.g., Taft Memorandum, supra note 12, in 2001 Digest, supra note 12, at 185; Hollis, supra note 12, at 765.

[29] See, e.g., Taft Memorandum, supra note 12, in 2001 Digest, supra note 12, at 184 ("[I]t is not a settled question that the Virginia standard applies to state compacts with foreign powers[.]").

[30] See, e.g., Edward T. Swaine, Does Federalism Constrain the Treaty Power?, 103 Colum. L. Rev. 403, 506 (2003); Hollis, supra note 12, at 769–804.

[31] See, e.g., United States v. California, 444 F. Supp. 3d 1181, 1196 n.13 (E.D. Cal. 2020); McHenry Cnty. v. Brady, 37 N.D. 59, 59 (1917); In re Manuel P., 215 Cal. App. 3d 48, 68–69 (Ct. App. 1989); Taft Memorandum, supra note 12, in 2001 Digest, supra note 12, at 184–85; Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States §302 cmt. f (1987); Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 152 (2d ed. 1997).

ArtI.S10.C3.3.6 Legal Effect and Interpretation of Compacts

Article I, Section 10, Clause 3:

> No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

Once Congress consents to a compact, the compact "transforms" from a contract between governments into a law of the United States.[1] As federal law, a congressionally approved compact preempts inconsistent state law,[2] and no court may order relief inconsistent with its terms.[3] The Supreme Court has held that boundaries established by congressionally approved interstate compacts bind the states' citizens and are conclusive as to their rights.[4] The Court also has held that compacts that equitably apportion interstate waterbodies can affect private property rights.[5]

The Supreme Court has final authority to decide a compact's meaning and validity.[6] The Court need not defer to state courts' views on whether a compact complies with the law of the states that joined it. Thus, in West Virginia ex rel. Dyer, the Supreme Court declined to adopt the highest state court in West Virginia's interpretation of whether an interstate compact complied with the West Virginia state constitution[7] even though the Court ordinarily defers to state courts' interpretation of their own state law.[8]

The Supreme Court often hears interstate compact cases through the Constitution's grant of original jurisdiction to hear disputes between states.[9] This means that interstate compact cases with only states as parties go directly to the Supreme Court without proceedings in lower courts. The Supreme Court views its role in these cases as different from its more standard disputes on appellate jurisdiction.[10] It approaches original jurisdiction cases in an "untechnical spirit" that allows the Court to mold the process in a way that best promotes the ends of justice.[11]

When private litigants are parties to cases involving compacts, the suits do not fall under the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, but they can still be heard in federal courts because

---

[1] See Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433, 440 (1981). See also Texas v. New Mexico, No. 141, Orig., slip op. at 4 (U.S. Mar. 5, 2018); Kansas v. Nebraska, 574 U.S. 445, 456 n.5 (2015); Tarrant Reg'l Water Dist. v. Herrmann, 569 U.S. 614, 628 n.8 (2013); Alabama v. North Carolina, 560 U.S. 330, 351 (2010); Texas v. New Mexico, 482 U.S. 124, 128 (1987); Wedding v. Meyler, 192 U.S. 573, 582 (1904); Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 54 U.S. 518, 566 (1851).

[2] See, e.g., Tarrant Reg'l Water Dist., 569 U.S. at 627–28 (analyzing whether the Red River Compact preempted Oklahoma state water allocation statutes).

[3] See, e.g., New Jersey v. New York, 523 U.S. 767, 811 (1999); Culyer, 449 U.S. at 438; Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 565–66 (1963); Washington v. Oregon, 211 U.S. 127, 135 (1908).

[4] See, e.g., Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U.S. 503, 525 (1893); Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. 657, 725 (1838); Poole v. Fleeger, 36 U.S. 185, 209–10 (1837).

[5] See Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co., 304 U.S. 92, 104–06 (1938).

[6] See, e.g., Nebraska v. Iowa, 406 U.S. 117, 118 n.1 (1972); Petty v. Tenn.-Mo. Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275, 278 (1959); West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22, 28 (1951).

[7] See West Virginia ex rel. Dyer, 341 U.S. at 28–32.

[8] See, e.g., Cunningham v. California, 549 U.S. 270, 306 n.8 (2007); Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684, 691 (1975).

[9] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2. For background on the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction and authority to hear suits between states, see ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[10] See, e.g., Florida v. Georgia, No. 142, Orig., slip op. at 10 (U.S. Apr. 1, 2018); Kansas v. Nebraska, No. 126, Orig., slip op. at 6 (U.S. Feb. 24, 2015); Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 98 (1861).

[11] Florida, No. 142, Orig., slip op. at 10 (quoting Virginia v. West Virginia, 220 U.S. 1, 27 (1911)).

they require interpretation of compacts in their status as federal law.[12] A compact that permits a state entity to "sue and be sued" waives the state's sovereign immunity provided under the Eleventh Amendment and can permit a private party to sue a state entity.[13]

Along with being federal law, compacts are contracts between states or between states and foreign governments.[14] As a result, the Supreme Court has, at times, used contract law remedies and principles in compact cases.[15] In Green v. Biddle, the Court held that interstate compacts fall under the protection of the Contract Clause,[16] which prohibits states from passing laws that impair contract rights.[17] At the same time, there are limits on how far the Supreme Court will treat compacts as ordinary contracts. In Alabama v. North Carolina, the Court declined to read an implied duty of good faith and fair dealing into an interstate compact even though the Court acknowledged every contract imposes that duty.[18]

[12] See, e.g., Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433, 439 (1981).

[13] See Petty v. Tenn.-Mo. Bridge Comm'n, 359 U.S. 275, 278–82 (1959). For discussion of the state sovereign immunity and the Eleventh Amendment, see Amdt11.5.1 General Scope of State Sovereign Immunity.

[14] See, e.g., Texas v. New Mexico, 482 U.S. 124, 128 (1987).

[15] See, e.g., Tarrant Reg'l Water Dist. v. Herrmann, 569 U.S. 614, 628 (2013); Texas v. New Mexico, 482 U.S. at 128; Kentucky v. Indiana, 281 U.S. 163, 177–78 (1930) (discussing the Court's ability to order specific performance in interstate compact cases between states).

[16] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 10, cl. 1 ("No State shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts . . . .)." See also supra ArtI.S10.C1.6.1 Overview of Contract Clause.

[17] See Green v. Biddle, 21 U.S. 1, 92 (1823) ("[A] State has no more power to impair an obligation into which she herself has entered, than she can the contracts of individuals."). See also Olin v. Kitzmiller, 259 U.S. 260, 262–63 (1922) (analyzing whether an Oregon fishing license law violated the Contract Clause by impairing the Columbia River Compact).

[18] See Alabama v. North Carolina, 560 U.S. 330, 351–52 (2010).

ARTICLE II
EXECUTIVE BRANCH

ARTICLE II
EXECUTIVE BRANCH

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Sec. 2, Cl. 2—Powers, Advice and Consent continued

Sec. 3—Duties continued

ARTICLE II—EXECUTIVE BRANCH

ArtII.1 Overview of Article II, Executive Branch

Article II of the U.S. Constitution establishes the Executive Branch of the federal government. The Executive Vesting Clause, in Section 1, Clause 1, provides that the federal executive power is vested in the President. Section 3 of Article II further requires the President to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed."[1] The executive power thus consists of the authority to enforce laws and to "appoint the agents charged with the duty of such enforcement."[2] The President also has distinct authority over foreign affairs, and "alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation."[3] As a general matter, the Supreme Court has recognized that the Constitution vests the President not only with the authorities expressly delineated therein, but also with certain implied authorities,[4] such as the ability to supervise (and generally to remove) executive officials[5] and the power to recognize foreign governments.[6] At the same time, the Court has said that by granting the President the power of faithfully executing the laws, the Constitution "refutes the idea" that the President was intended "to be a lawmaker."[7] Nonetheless, the Court has recognized that officials appointed by the President—even those located within the Executive Branch—may exercise regulatory or adjudicative powers that are quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial.[8] Broadly, the Court has recognized that Executive Officers exercise authority to enforce and administer the laws, including rulemaking, administrative determinations, and the filing of lawsuits.[9]

The remaining provisions of Article II's Section 1 primarily outline the election of the President, including the establishment of the electoral college. Relatedly, Section 1 sets out the qualifications of the President, the oath of office, and compensation. Section 1 also creates succession provisions in the event of a President's removal or other inability to act, although the relatively sparse language in Clause 6 was later supplemented by the Twenty-Fifth Amendment and the Presidential Succession Act.[10]

Sections 2 and 3 define specific presidential powers and duties. Section 2, Clause 1 describes exclusive presidential powers: namely, the Commander in Chief authority, the power to require written opinions from the heads of executive departments, and the pardon power. Clause 2 defines the powers that the President shares with Congress, outlining the treaty-making power and the appointment power. Clause 3 expands on appointments by granting the President the power to unilaterally make temporary appointments during Senate recess. Section 3 requires the President to give Congress information on the state of the union. It also authorizes the President to recommend legislative measures and in extraordinary circumstances convene or adjourn Congress. Section 3 further grants the President the power

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[2] Springer v. Government of Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 202 (1928).

[3] United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936).

[4] See generally ArtII.S1.C1.1 Overview of Executive Vesting Clause.

[5] Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Fin. Prot. Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. at 22 (U.S. June 29, 2020).

[6] Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 US. 1, 17 (2015). Cf., e.g., United States ex rel. Knauff v. Snaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950) (stating that the right to exclude aliens "is inherent in the executive power to control the foreign affairs of the nation," and when Congress legislates in this area, it "is implementing an inherent executive power").

[7] Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587 (1952).

[8] See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 132–33 (1976).

[9] See id. at 138–41.

[10] U.S. Const. amend. XXV; 3 U.S.C. § 19.

to receive ambassadors and other public ministers. And as previously mentioned, Section 3 contains the Take Care Clause, requiring the President to ensure that the laws are faithfully executed.

Section 4 provides that the President—and all other "civil Officers of the United States"—may be removed from office if impeached and convicted on charges of "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."[11] Article I contains further provisions bearing on impeachment procedures and judgments.[12]

As discussed elsewhere, Article I also contains some provisions bearing on presidential authority, perhaps most notably the President's authority to approve or veto legislation.[13]

Section 1—Function and Selection

Clause 1—President's Role

ArtII.S1.C1.1 Overview of Executive Vesting Clause

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

Under Article II, Section 1, Clause 1, the executive power is vested in a single person—the President of the United States. The nature and extent of the executive power is less clear.[1] Article II identifies exclusive powers of the President, including the President's authority as Commander in Chief and the power to pardon;[2] powers the President shares with the Senate, including the appointments and treaty-making powers;[3] and the President's duties, the most important of which is the duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed."[4] Moreover, the Supreme Court has recognized that "[b]ecause no single person could fulfill that responsibility," the Take Care Clause implicitly provides the President with authority to supervise subordinate officers assisting with this responsibility.[5] Likewise, Article I provides the President a role in the legislative process, including authority to veto legislation, subject to potential override by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress.[6]

It is less clear from the text of the Constitution whether the executive powers expressly identified in the Constituion are exclusive or illustrative. Whereas the Article I Legislative Vesting Clause provides that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress,"[7] thereby distinguishing the powers granted by states from those they retained, the

---

[11] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[12] Id. art. I, § 2, cl. 5; id. art. I, § 3, cls. 6–7.

[13] See ArtI.S7.C2.1 Overview of Presidential Approval or Veto of Bills; ArtI.S7.C3.1 Presentation of Senate or House Resolutions.

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 1.

[2] Id. art. II, § 2, cl. 1. See ArtII.S2.C1.1.1 Historical Background on Commander in Chief Clause.

[3] Id. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. See ArtII.S2.C1.3.1 Overview of Pardon Power.

[4] Id. art. II, § 3. See ArtII.S3.3.1 Overview of Take Care Clause.

[5] Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Board, No. 19-7, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 29, 2020). See also Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 492–93 (2010).

[6] U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 2. See ArtI.S7.C2.1 Overview of Presidential Approval or Veto of Bills.

[7] Id. art. I, § 1, cl. 1 (emphasis added). See ArtI.S1.1 Overview of Legislative Vesting Clause.

Article II Executive Vesting Clause does not limit the "executive Power" in any way.[8] Consequently, since the earliest days of the Republic, the parameters of the executive power and, in particular, what implicit or residual powers such executive power encompasses have been the subject of debate.

ArtII.S1.C1.2 Historical Background on Executive Vesting Clause

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

The nature of the presidency ranked among the most important issues the Framers considered at the Constitutional Convention.[1] Reacting to how royal governors had exercised their powers, the framers of the state constitutions had generally created weak executives and strong legislatures. Likewise, the Articles of Confederation vested the national government's powers in a unicameral congress.[2] Experience during the period during which the Articles of Confederation had been in effect, however, had demonstrated to the delegates that an unfettered legislature, like an uncurbed executive, posed disadvantages, and that a legislature could not confer many of the advantages of a reasonably strong executive.[3] The Framers considered several ways to organize the Executive Branch, including plural executives, selection of the executive or executives by Congress, and whether the executive should be advised by a council.

The constitution of the State of New York, which provided for a Governor who was largely independent of the state legislature, offered one possible template for the Framers. Under New York's constitution, the Governor was directly elected by the people for three-year terms and eligible for re-election indefinitely. Because the state legislature did not select the Governor, the Governor was less beholden to it. Except with regard to appointments and vetoes, the Governor's decisions were unencumbered by a council. The Governor was also in charge of the militia, possessed the power to pardon, and was responsible for ensuring that the laws were faithfully executed.[4]

The Virginia Plan offered an alternative structure to that of the New York constitution. Under the Virginia Plan, the legislature would select the executive but would not be able to change the executive's salary during the executive's term in office. In addition, the executive would be ineligible for re-election, thereby reducing any incentive the executive might have to be overly deferential to the legislature. The Virginia Plan also provided for a council of revision, which included the executive, that could negate national and state legislation. The Virginia Plan provided that the executive power was the power to "execute the national laws" and to

---

[8] Id. art. II, § 1, cl. 1.

[1] The background and the action of the Convention is comprehensively examined in Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency 1775–1789 (1923). See also John Hart, The American Presidency in Action 1789 (1948).

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1407 (1833) ("Under the confederation there was no national executive. The whole powers of the national government were vested in a congress, consisting of a single body; and that body was authorized to appoint a committee of the states, composed of one delegate from every state, to sit in the recess, and to delegate to them such of their own powers, not requiring the consent of nine states, as nine states should consent to. This want of a national executive was deemed a fatal defect of the confederation.").

[3] Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency 1775–1789, at 1–64 (Amagi Books 2007) (1923).

[4] Alexander Hamilton observed the similarities and differences between the President and the New York Governor. The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton). See New York Constitution of 1777, Articles XVII–XIX, reprinted in 5 Francis Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions (1909).

"enjoy the Executive rights vested in Congress by the Confederation," but it left open whether the executive would be a single or plural position.[5]

When the executive portion of the Virginia Plan was considered on June 1, 1787, James Wilson of Pennsylvania moved that the executive should consist of a single person.[6] In the course of his remarks, Wilson argued for a strong executive, directly elected by the people so that the executive would not be dependent on Congress or state legislatures. Wilson further proposed that the executive be eligible for reelection and granted power to negate legislation with the concurrence of a council of revision.[7] The vote on Wilson's motion was postponed until the method of selection, term, and mode of removal of, and powers to be conferred on the executive had been considered and subsequently approved.[8]

Ultimately, the Framers decided on a single executive and did not provide for an executive council, which would have participated in exercising the executive's veto, appointments, and treaty-making powers.[9] Instead, the Framers granted the Senate power to "advise and consent" on appointments and treaties[10] and gave the President power to require the "principal Officer in each of the executive Departments" to provide their "Opinion, in writing" on "any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices."[11]

The Committee of Detail reported draft language providing that the executive be designated the "President of the United States,"[12] which the Convention accepted without discussion.[13] The same clause also provided that the President's title be "His Excellency,"[14] and, while this language was also accepted without discussion,[15] the Committee of Style and Arrangement subsequently omitted it from the final text without providing any reason.[16]

ArtII.S1.C1.3 Early Perspectives on Executive Power

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

While the Article I Legislative Vesting Clause provides that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress,"[1] thereby distinguishing the legislative powers that the states had granted to the National Government from those the states retained, the Article II Executive Vesting Clause refers only to a general "executive Power," which is vested in a single [5] For discussion of the plans offered at the Constitutional Convention and the resulting debate, see Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency 1775–1789, at 65–91 (Amagi Books 2007) (1923). For the Virginia Plan, see 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 20–23 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[6] 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 65 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[7] Id. at 65–73.

[8] Id. at 93.

[9] The last proposal for a council was voted down on September 7, 1787. 2 id. at 542.

[10] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.1 Overview of President's Treaty-Making Power; ArtII.S2.C2.3.1 Overview of Appointments Clause.

[11] See ArtII.S2.C1.2 Executive Departments.

[12] 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 185 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[13] Id. at 401.

[14] Id. at 185.

[15] Id. at 401.

[16] Id. at 597.

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1, cl. 1 (emphasis added).

person—the President.[2] While the Constitution expressly identifies specific powers and duties that belong to the President—for example, the power to pardon and the duty to take care that the laws be faithfully enforced—the Founders differed on whether those powers were exclusive or illustrative.

The First Congress considered the parameters of the executive power and, in particular, the President's power to remove Executive Branch officers absent the consent of the Senate, the acquiescence of which is necessary for such Executive Branch officers' appointment.[3] Known as the Debate of 1789, the First Congress considered the President's removal power while it was establishing the Department of State.[4] As one commentator has noted: "Congress tacitly recognized the existence of an unrestrained presidential removal power from 1789 to 1867, and it developed into one of [the President's] most effective instruments for control of the executive branch."[5] While Congress subsequently passed laws limiting the President's ability to remove Executive Branch officers,[6] the Supreme Court did not address such a law until 1926 in Myers v. United States.[7]

Similar questions arose with respect to the President's authority over foreign affairs.[8] After President George Washington issued a proclamation declaring the United States neutral when France and Great Britain went to war in 1793, Alexander Hamilton and James Madison took competing positions on whether President Washington had exceeded his constitutional authority. Arguing that Article II does not enumerate all executive powers,[9] Hamilton wrote:

---

[2] Id. art. II, § 1, cl. 1.

[3] See David P. Currie, the Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801, at 36–41 (1997) (discussing James Madison's proposal for a department of foreign affairs). In the Federalist No. 77, Alexander Hamilton commented that the Senate's consent was necessary for the President to remove an Executive Officer, stating: "The consent of [the Senate] would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint. . . . Where a man in any station had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that a discountenance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt and bring some degree of discredit upon himself." The Federalist No. 77 (Alexander Hamilton). While Congress expressly referred to the President's removal power in some legislation, e.g., Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20, § 27, 1 Stat. 87; Act of May 15, 1820, ch. 102, 3 Stat. 582, the Supreme Court in Myers v. United States observed that Congress adopted these provisions "to show conformity to the legislative decision of 1789." Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 146 (1926).

[4] For discussion on the Debate of 1789, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.2 Decision of 1789 and Removals in Early Republic. See also Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency 1775–1789, at 124–49 (Amagi Books 2007) (1923).

[5] C. Herman Pritchett, Constitutional Law of the Federal System 293 (1984). See also Act of May 15, 1820 (providing for removal of officers "at pleasure" of the President).

[6] Tenure of Office Act of 1867, ch. 154, 14 Stat. 430 (Mar. 2, 1867) (requiring, among other things, for the President to have the Senate's consent to remove the Secretary of War and certain other department heads); Act of July 12, 1876, ch. 179, 19 State. 80, 81 (providing that "Postmasters of the first, second and third classes shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall hold their officers for four years unless sooner removed or suspended according to law."). See also United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483 (1886). In Perkins, the Court addressed whether the Secretary of the Navy could discharge a naval cadet-engineer at will notwithstanding that the Act of August 5, 1882 provided that naval officers could not be discharged except pursuant to a court-martial. Ruling for the naval cadet-engineer, the Court stated: "The head of a Department has no constitutional prerogative of appointments to offices independently of the legislation of Congress, and by such legislation he must be governed, not only in making appointments but in all that is incident thereto." Id. at 485. The Court, however, noted that it was not addressing a situation where an officer was appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Id. ("Whether or not Congress can restrict the power of removal incident to the power of appointment of those officers who are appointed by the President by and with the advice of the Senate under the authority of the Constitution (article 2, section 2) does not arise in this case and need not be considered.").

[7] The Court discussed the President's removal power in dicta in Ex parte Hennen, 38 U.S. (39 Pet.) 230 (1839) (recognizing authority of a District Judge to remove a clerk of the court). For further discussion of the removal power, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.1 Overview of Removal of Executive Branch Officers .

[8] See David P. Currie, the Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801, at 174–82 (1997).

[9] Id. See also Charles Thomas, American Neutrality in 1793: A Study in Cabinet Government (1931).

> The enumeration [of executive powers in the Constitution] ought therefore to be considered, as intended merely to specify the principal articles implied in the definition of executive power; leaving the rest to flow from the general grant of that power, interpreted in conformity with other parts of the Constitution, and with the principles of free government.[10]

Hamilton continued: "The general doctrine of our Constitution then is, that the executive power of the nation is vested in the President; subject only to the exceptions and qualifications, which are expressed in the instrument."[11] Rejecting Hamilton's view that the Constitution granted the President such broad powers, James Madison argued that, if executive powers were unfettered, "no citizen could any longer guess at the character of the government under which he lives; the most penetrating jurist would be unable to scan the extent of constructive prerogative."[12]

Unsurprisingly, Presidents have tended to interpret the Executive Vesting Clause's provision of executive power expansively. For example, President Thomas Jefferson justified the Louisiana Purchase based on implied executive power.[13]

ArtII.S1.C1.4 The President's Powers, Myers, and Seila

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

In 1926, Chief Justice and former President William Taft addressed the President's removal power in Myers v. United States, holding that the executive power includes the power to remove Executive Branch officers.[1] Myers concerned a law that required the Senate's advice and consent for the President to remove a Postmaster from office. In a 6-3 decision for the President, Chief Justice Taft reasoned that the removal power was necessary for the President to fulfill his constitutional duty to enforce the laws.[2] Absent power to hold subordinate Executive Branch officers accountable by removing them if necessary, the President would not be able to fulfill his obligation to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed."[3] Holding the removal power to be constitutionally vested in the President,[4] the Myers Court observed that powers vested in Congress must be strictly construed in favor of powers retained by the President.[5]

---

[10] 7 Works of Alexander Hamilton 76, 80–81 (J. C. Hamilton ed., 1851).

[11] Id. (emphasis added).

[12] 1 Letters and Other Writings of James Madison 621 (J.B. Lippincott & Co., 1865).

[13] For discussion of the constitutionality of the Louisiana Purchase, see Everett Brown, The Constitutional History of the Louisiana Purchase, 1803–1812 (1920). For discussion of how the Jeffersonians and Federalists approached executive powers, see Leonard White, The Jeffersonians: A Study in Administrative History 1801–1829 (1951); Leonard White, The Federalists: A Study in Administrative History (1948).

[1] 272 U.S. 52 (1926). See Edward Corwin, The President's Removal Power under the Constitution, in 4 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law 1467 (1938).

[2] Id. art. II, § 3. See ArtII.S3.3.1 Overview of Take Care Clause.

[3] Id. art. II, § 3. See ArtII.S3.3.1 Overview of Take Care Clause.

[4] Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency, 1775–1789, at 92–123 (Amagi Books 2007) (1923).

[5] Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 163–64 (1926).

In the 1935 decision Humphrey's Executor v. United States[6] and the 1988 decision Morrison v. Olson, the Supreme Court[7] upheld limits on the President's removal power. However, the Court subsequently emphasized that those cases were limited to specific circumstances.[8] In Humphrey's Executor, the Court held that Congress could constitutionally provide that commissioners on the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) could only be removed for cause. The Court reasoned that "good-cause tenure" was permissible for the principal officers of independent agencies that performed a "quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial" role because "Congress could require [an agency] 'to act . . . independently of executive control.'"[9]

In Morrison, the Court examined the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, which provided for independent counsels to investigate and prosecute certain high-ranking government officials.[10] Under the independent counsel statute, the Attorney General notifies a special Article III court if he believes there are sufficient grounds to investigate a senior government official and the special court appoints a special counsel to investigate and, if warranted, prosecute. The Attorney General can only remove the special counsel for cause as prescribed in the statute.[11] Consequently, the independent counsel is generally free from Executive Branch supervision. After assessing how the law impacted executive power and whether Congress had attempted to aggrandize itself or enlarge judicial power at the executive's expense, the Court upheld for-cause removal for independent counsels.[12]

Notwithstanding Humphrey's Executor and Morrison, the Court later clarified that "the President's removal power is the rule rather than the exception."[13] In its 2010 decision, Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Accounting Oversight Board, the Court held unconstitutional a statute that structured a government office to restrict the President's ability to remove a principal officer and also restrict the principal officer's ability to remove an inferior officer who "determines the policy and enforces the laws of the United States."[14] The Court explained: "The President cannot 'take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed' if he cannot oversee the faithfulness of the officers who execute them. Here the President cannot remove an officer who enjoys more than one level of good-cause protection, even if the President determines that the officer is neglecting his duties or discharging them improperly."[15]

In its 2020 decision in Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Board (CFPB), the Court rejected the proposition that Humphrey's Executor[16] and Morrison[17] "establish a general

---

[6] 295 U.S. 602 (1935). See also Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349 (1958).

[7] 487 U.S. 654, 685–93 (1988). Morrison concerned the Title VI of the Ethics of Government Act of 1978, which provided for the appointment of independent counsels who the Attorney General could only remove for "good cause." See also United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483 (1886).

[8] Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 29, 2020).

[9] Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 493 (2010) (quoting Humphrey's Executor, 295 U.S. 602, 627–29 (1935).

[10] See 28 U.S.C. §§ 591–599.

[11] Pub. L. No. 95-521, title VI, 92 Stat. 1867, as amended by Pub. L. No. 97-409, 96 Stat. 2039, and Pub. L. No. 100-191, 101 Stat. 1293, 28 U.S.C. §§ 49, 591 et seq.

[12] Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. at 693–96.

[13] Seila Law LLC v. CFPB, No. 19-7, slip op. at 27 (U.S. June 29, 2020). For discussion, on the President's removal authority in the twenty-first century, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.7 Twenty-First Century Cases on Removal.

[14] Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 484 (2010).

[15] Id.

[16] 295 U.S. 602 (1935).

[17] 487 U.S. 654 (1988). While acknowledging that the independent counsel statute restricted a constitutionally delegated function (law enforcement), the Morrison Court upheld the statute, using a flexible analysis that rule that Congress may impose 'modest' restrictions on the President's removal power."[18] Examining the CFPB, the Court noted that it had a single Director, who was insulated from the President's removal power and "accountable to no one."[19] Describing the President's role in the constitutional structure as the link that makes the administrative state answerable to the people, Chief Justice John Roberts, writing for the majority, stated:

> The resulting constitutional strategy is straightforward: divide power everywhere except for the Presidency, and render the President directly accountable to the people through regular elections. In that scheme, individual executive officials will still wield significant authority, but that authority remains subject to the ongoing supervison and control of the elected President. Through the President's oversight, "the chain of dependence [is] preserved," so that "the lowest officers, the middle grade, and the highest" all "depend, as they ought, on the President, and the President on the community."[20]

Finding the CFPB Director's protection from removal to be unconstitutional, the Court stated: "In our constitutional system, the executive power belongs to the President, and that power generally includes the ability to supervise and remove the agents who wield executive power in his stead."[21]

ArtII.S1.C1.5 The President's Powers and Youngstown Framework

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

In Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, the Supreme Court considered the relationship between the President's powers and the powers Congress can exercise.[1] In a concurring opinion, Justice Robert Jackson set forth a framework that the Court has subsequently adopted to assess claims of presidential power.

Youngstown concerned an executive order that President Harry S. Truman issued on April 8, 1952, directing the Secretary of Commerce to seize and operate the Nation's steel industry in order to avert a nationwide strike that he believed would jeopardize national defense during the Korean War.[2] In the executive order, President Truman cited no specific statutory authorization but invoked generally the powers vested in the President by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Secretary issued the order to steel executives and the President reported his action to Congress, conceding Congress's power to supersede the order, emphasized that neither the Legislative nor the Judicial Branch had aggrandized its power and that the statute, while infringing on executive power, did not impermissibly interfere with the President's constitutionally assigned functions. Id.

---

[18] Seila Law LLC v. CFPB, No. 19-7, slip op. at 26 (U.S. June 29, 2020).

[19] Id. at 23.

[20] Id. (quoting 1 Annals of Cong. 499) (James Madison).

[21] Id.

[1] 343 U.S. 579 (1952). For additional discussion on Youngstown, see Maeva Marcus, Truman and the Steel Seizure Case: The Limits of Presidential Power (1977).

[2] E.O. 10340, 17 Fed. Reg. 3139 (1952).

which Congress did not do.[3] The steel companies sued, a federal district court enjoined the seizure,[4] and the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case prior to a decision by the court of appeals.[5]

By a 6-3 vote, the Court held the seizure unconstitutional. In the controlling opinion, Justice Hugo Black rejected the Solicitor General's argument that the President's action was justified as an exercise of his executive power under Article II, Section 1; by his duty to enforce the laws; and by his power as Commander in Chief.[6] Instead, Justice Black observed that not only was there no statute that expressly or impliedly authorized the President to take possession of the property, but also Congress had refused to authorize seizures of property to prevent work stoppages and settle labor disputes when it considered the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947.[7] Because neither the aggregate of the President's Article II executive powers nor his powers as Commander in Chief supported the action, Justice Black reasoned that the President had sought to exercise a lawmaking power, which the Constitution vests solely in Congress:[8] Even if other Presidents had taken possession of private business enterprises without congressional authority to settle labor disputes, Congress retained its exclusive constitutional authority to make laws necessary and proper to carry out the powers vested in it by the Constitution.[9] Consequently, while Congress could have directed the President to seize the steel mills, the President could not seize them absent congressional authorization, even if he believed that such an action "was necessary to avert a national catastrophe."[10]

In his concurring opinion, Justice Jackson outlined a framework for assessing the President's powers depending on its "disjunction or conjunction with those of Congress."[11] Justice Jackson divided presidential actions into three categories that looked at the extent to which the President was acting in concert with Congress. With regard to the first category, he stated:

> When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. In these circumstances and in these only, may he be said . . . to personify the federal sovereignty. If his act is held unconstitutional under thise circumstancies it usually means that the Federal Government as an undivided whole lacks power.[12]

Describing the second category, Justice Jackson stated:

> When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of [3] H. Doc. No. 422, 82d Congress, 2d sess. (1952), 98 Cong. Rec. 3912 (1952); H. Doc. No. 496, 82d Congress, 2d sess. (1952), 98 Cong. Rec. 6929 (1952).

[4] 103 F. Supp. 569 (D.D.C. 1952).

[5] The court of appeals stayed the district court's injunction pending appeal. 197 F.2d 582 (D.C. Cir. 1952). The Supreme Court decision bringing the action up is at 343 U.S. 937 (1952).

[6] Youngstown, 343 U.S. at 587–88.

[7] Id. at 586.

[8] Id. at 588.

[9] Id. 585–89.

[10] Id. at 585–86.

[11] Id. at 635 (Jackson, J., concurring). See also Trump v Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-715, slip op. at (U.S. July 9, 2020) ("Congress and the President—the two political branches established by the Constitution—have an ongoing relationship that the Framers intended to feature both rivalry and reprocity."). Justice Jackson's concurrence has been described as having "canonical status." Georgia v. Public Resource Org, Inc., No. 18-1150, slip op. at 48, n.10 (U.S. Apr. 27, 2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting).

[12] Youngstown, 343 U.S. at 635–37 (Jackson, J., concurring).

> twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measure on independent responsibility. In this area, any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.[13]

The third category addressed situations where the President's actions were contrary to will of Congress. Justice Jackson observed:

> When the President takes measures incompatible with the express or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Courts can sustain exclusive presidential control in such a case only by disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject. Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.[14]

Justice Jackson viewed the steel seizure as falling into the third category because Congress had adopted statutory policies inconsistent with President Truman's steel seizure. Accordingly, under Justice Jackson's framework, the President's action could only be sustained if the power to seize strike-bound industries was within the President's domain and beyond Congress's control.[15]

Since the decision in Youngstown, the Court has used Justice Jackson's framework when assessing assertions of presidential power.[16] For example in Zivotofsky v. Kerry, the Court applied Justice Jackson's "tripartite framework" to find that because the challenged presidential action "falls into Justice Jackson's third category, his claim must be 'scrutinized with caution,' and he may rely solely on powers the Constitution grants to him alone."[17]

ArtII.S1.C1.6 Separation of Powers and Executive Branch Functions

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story noted the importance of an independent executive department to the separation of powers. He observed: "All America have at length concurred in the propriety of establishing a distinct executive department. The principle is embraced in every state constitution; and it seems now

[13] Id. at 637.

[14] Id. at 637–38 (footnotes omitted).

[15] Id at 639, 640. Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936). In Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 659–62, 668–69 (1981), the Court turned to Youngstown as embodying "much relevant analysis" on an issue of presidential power. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557, 593 n.23 (2006), the Court cited Youngstown with approval, as did Justice Anthony Kennedy, in a concurring opinion joined by three other Justices, id. at 638.

[16] See Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1, 10 (2015).

[17] Id.

to be assumed among us, as a fundamental maxim of government, that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments are to be separate, and the powers of one ought not to be exercised by either of the others."[1]

The Supreme Court has referred to principles of separation of powers when examining congressional actions that may infringe the President's exercise of executive power. For instance, in 1983, the Court in INS v. Chadha[2] struck down the congressional veto as circumventing Article I's bicameralism and presentment requirements to exercise legislative power. In Chadha, the Court suggested that Congress, by providing itself with the ability to veto the Attorney General's decision to suspend deportation of an alien, had enabled itself to participate impermissibly in executing the laws.[3] Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Warren Burger observed that "the powers delegated to the three Branches are functionally identifiable."[4] Under Chadha, when Congress exercises legislative power rather than delegates it, it must follow the prescribed bicameralism and presentment procedures.

In Bowsher v. Synar three years later,[5] the Court held that Congress had unconstitutionally vested executive functions in a Legislative Branch official through the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Deficit Control Act. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Deficit Control Act set maximum deficit amounts for federal spending and directed across-the-board cuts in spending when projected deficits would exceed the target deficits.[6] Each fiscal year, the Comptroller General, who only Congress could remove, had to prepare a report identifying the reductions necessary to meet the deficit target, which the President had to implement. The Court stated: "Interpreting a law enacted by Congress to implement the legislative mandate is the very essence of 'execution' of the law."[7] Because Congress could remove the Comptroller General from office, it could not delegate executive powers to him. The Court stated: "By placing the responsibility for execution of the [Act] in the hands of an officer who is subject to removal only by itself, Congress in effect has retained control over the execution of the Act and has intruded into the executive function."[8]

In Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, the Court held that Congress could not legislate to grant citizens not suffering particularized injuries standing to sue the federal government to compel its compliance with congressional mandates. Such a law, the Court reasoned, would allow Congress to transfer the President's Take Care Clause duty to the Judiciary.[9]

The Court emphasized the importance of the separation of powers in Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Board (CFPB) in which the Court held that Congress encroached on Executive Branch powers when it limited the President's ability to remove the head of an independent agency to "for cause" removal.[10] In Seila, the Court noted that Congress had "vest[ed] significant governmental power in the hands of a single individual

---

[1] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1410 (1833).

[2] 462 U.S. 919 (1983).

[3] The Court stated: "Disagreement with the Attorney General's decision on Chadha's deportation . . . involves determinations of policy that Congress can implement in only one way Congress must abide by its delegation of authority until that delegation is legislatively altered or revoked." 462 U.S. at 954–55. See also Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth. v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, 501 U.S. 252 (1991).

[4] Chadha, 462 U.S. at 951.

[5] 478 U.S. 714 (1986)

[6] The Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Pub. L. No. 99-177, 99 Stat. 1038.

[7] 478 U.S. at 732–33.

[8] Id. at 734.

[9] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 576–78 (1992).

[10] Seila Law LLC v. CFPB, No. 19-7, slip op. at 26 (U.S. June 29, 2020).

accountable to no one"[11] thereby violating the separation of powers.[12] Similarly, in Collins v. Yellen, the Court ruled that Congress could not restrict the President's authority to remove the director of the Federal Housing Finance Agency, which had a structure similar to the CFPB.[13]

ArtII.S1.C1.7 Major Questions Doctrine and Administrative Agencies

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

In several twenty-first century decisions with significant implications for the administrative state, the Court held that under the "major questions doctrine," the Executive Branch cannot interpret ambiguous legislation to effectuate sweeping changes of national consequence. Instead, Congress must, at a minimum, provide clear authorization that it intends to grant the Executive Branch such far-reaching powers.

In its 2014 decision in Utility Air Regulatory Group v. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), the Court found that EPA could not construe the Clean Air Act (CAA) to enable it to regulate millions of small sources of air pollution, including hotels and office buildings, when Congress had not sought to regulate these entities under the CAA in the past.[1] Although the Court did not explicitly refer to the major questions doctrine, it held that an agency exceeds its regulatory authority when (1) the agency's action involves an issue of "vast 'economic and political significance,'" and (2) Congress has not clearly granted the agency authority over the issue.[2] The Court noted that Congress must "speak clearly if it wishes to assign to an agency decisions of vast economic and political significance."[3]

The Court's concern about the Executive Branch establishing law that exceeded the authority Congress had delegated was also evident during the coronavirus disease 2019 (COVID-19) pandemic. For example, in August 2021, the Court vacated a lower court's stay, effectively halting an eviction moratorium issued by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC).[4] The Court noted that the CDC had no legal authority to mandate an eviction moratorium and that Congress itself had declined to extend the eviction moratorium.[5] Likewise, in National Federation of Independent Business v. Department of Labor, the Court stayed the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's (OSHA) COVID-19 vaccine mandate on the grounds that the plaintiffs were likely to succeed on the merits of their claim that OSHA did not have authority to require that "84 million Americans . . . either obtain a COVID-19 vaccine or undergo weekly medical testing at their own expense."[6] By comparison, on the same day, the Court vacated a stay of a a more limited vaccine mandate from the Secretary of Health and Human Services requiring that facilities receiving Medicare and Medicaid funding "ensure that their staff—unless exempt for medical or religious

[11] Id. at 23.

[12] Id. at 27.

[13] Collins v. Yellen, No. 19-422, slip op. (U.S. June 23, 2021).

[1] Util. Air Regul. Grp. v. EPA, 573 U.S. 302 (2014).

[2] Id. at 324.

[3] Id.

[4] Alabama Ass'n of Realtors v. Dep't of Health and Human Servs., No. 21A23, slip op. at 3 (U.S. Aug. 26, 2021) (per curiam).

[5] Id. at 6–8.

[6] Nos. 21A244 and 21A247, slip op. at 8 (U.S. Jan. 13, 2022) (per curiam).

reasons—are vaccinated against COVID-19."[7] In reaching this decision, the Court agreed that "the Secretary's rule falls within the authorities that Congress has conferred upon him."[8]

In its 2022 decision West Virginia v. EPA, the Court held that EPA exceeded its CAA Section 111(d) authority[9] in the 2015 Clean Power Plan (CPP) by requiring "generation shifting" whereby coal-fired power plants would "reduce their own production of electricity or subsidize increased generation by natural gas, wind, or solar sources."[10] Stating that "[i]t is not plausible that Congress gave EPA the authority to adopt on its own such a regulatory scheme,"[11] the Court observed: "A decision of such magnitude and consequence rests with Congress itself, or an agency acting pursuant to a clear delegation from that representative body."[12] Examining EPA's assertion that Section 111(d) provided EPA authority to require generation shifting, the Court noted that Section 111(d) was a little-used statutory "gap-filler" that allowed EPA to regulate emissions not covered by the CAA National Ambient Air Quality Standards (NAAQS)[13] or Hazardous Air Pollutants (HAP) programs.[14] In light of this, the Court held, Section 111(d) could not be read as granting EPA power to transform the national economy by adopting a "regulatory program that Congress had conspicuously and repeatedly declined to enact itself."[15]

ArtII.S1.C1.8 The President's Foreign Affairs Power, Curtiss-Wright, and Zivotofsky

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

The extent of the President's foreign affairs power has been subject to debate since the earliest days of the Republic.[1] The Constitution provides that the President "shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers."[2] In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story noted, "If the executive receives an ambassador, or other minister, as the representative of a new nation . . . it is an acknowledgment of the sovereign authority de facto of such new nation or party."[3] In addition, Article II provides that the

[7] Biden v. Missouri, Nos. 21A240 and 21A241, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Jan. 13, 2022) (per curiam).

[8] Id. at 4.

[9] Clean Air Act, 84 Stat. 1683, 42 U.S.C. § 7411(d)

[10] West Virginia v. EPA, No. 20-1530, slip op. (U.S. June 30, 2022). Through the CPP, EPA sought to reduce carbon dioxide emissions that were contributing to global warming by shifting the Nation's energy from coal-fired generation to natural gas and renewables. Id. at 10. According to EPA estimates at the time it issued the rule, such changes "would entail billions of dollars in compliance costs (to be paid in the form of higher energy prices), require the retirement of dozens of coal-fired plants, and eliminate tens of thousands of jobs across various sectors." Id.

[11] Id. at 31.

[12] Id.

[13] 42 U.S.C. §§ 7408-7410 (requiring states to adopt plans to comply with EPA standards for specified air pollutants).

[14] Id. § 7412 (requiring EPA to set standards to achieve "the maximum degree of reduction of emissions" for new and existing major sources of non-NAAQS hazardous air pollution that can be achieved using the "best existing technologies and methods").

[15] West Virginia v. EPA, No. 20-1530, slip op. at 20 (U.S. June 30, 2022).

[1] See ArtII.S1.C1.2 Historical Background on Executive Vesting Clause.

[2] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3, cl. 2. See ArtII.S3.2.1 Early Doctrine on Receiving Ambassadors and Public Ministers.

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1560 (1833).

President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall "make Treaties" and "shall appoint Ambassadors" and "other public Ministers and consuls."[4]

Writing for the Court in the 1936 United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. decision,[5] Justice George Sutherland reasoned that the the President "has the sole power to negotiate treaties,"[6] although the President requires the Senate's advice and consent to complete them.[7] In Curtiss-Wright, the Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. challenged an embargo President Franklin D. Roosevelt had imposed pursuant to a congressional delegation. Indicted for violating the embargo, Curtiss-Wright argued that Congress had impermissibly delegated a legislative power to the President when it granted the President power to impose the embargo. Writing for a 7-1 majority in favor of the government, Justice Sutherland posited that the National Government's power in foreign relations is inherent. Consequently, the limits on Congress's ability to delegate power relating to domestic areas, Justice Sutherland reasoned, did not apply in the area of foreign affairs. Justice Sutherland stated:

> The broad statement that the Federal Government can exercise no powers except those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, is categorically true only in respect of our internal affairs. . . . As a result of the separation from Great Britain . . . . the powers of external sovereignty passed from the Crown . . . to the colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States of America . . . . The powers to declare and wage war, to conclude peace, to make treaties, to maintain diplomatic relations with other sovereignties, if they had never been mentioned in the Constitution, would have been vested in the Federal Government as necessary concomitants of nationality. . . . In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation.[8]

Notwithstanding Curtiss-Wright, the Court has recognized that the President may be subject to the delegated powers doctrine in matters implicating foreign relations.[9] For instance, in Kent v. Dulles,[10] the Court held that the standards that apply to congressional delegations to the President of domestic authorities likewise applied to a congressional delegation to the President of authority to issue passports.[11]

---

[4] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. See ArtII.S2.C2.1.1 Overview of President's Treaty-Making Power.

[5] 299 U.S. 304 (1936).

[6] Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1, 13 (2014).

[7] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.1 Overview of President's Treaty-Making Power.

[8] 299 U.S. at 315–16, 318, 319.

[9] E.g., Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 25 (1942) (Chief Justice Harlan Stone); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 5–6 (1957) (plurality opinion, per Justice Black).

[10] 357 U.S. 116, 129 (1958).

[11] Id. See also Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981). For Haig's reliance on Curtiss-Wright, see id. at 291, 293–94 & n.24, 307–08. But see Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 659–62 (1981). Compare Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592 (1988) (construing National Security Act as not precluding judicial review of constitutional challenges to CIA Director's dismissal of employee), with Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988) (denying Merit Systems Protection Board authority to review the substance of an underlying security-clearance determination in reviewing an adverse action and noticing favorably President's inherent power to protect information without any explicit legislative grant). In Loving v. United States, 517 U.S. 748 (1996), the Court found that, although Congress had delegated authority over the death penalty provisions of military law to the President absent standards to guide the President's exercise of the authority, standards were not required because the President, as Commander in Chief had responsibility to superintend the military and Congress and the President had interlinked authorities with respect to the military. Where the entity exercising delegated authority possesses independent authority over the subject matter, the Court noted, familiar limitations on delegation do not apply. Id. at 771–74.

The Supreme Court's decision in Zivotofsky v. Kerry appears to be the first instance in which the Court held that an act of Congress unconstitutionally infringed upon a foreign affairs power of the President.[12] The case concerned a legislative enactment requiring the Secretary of State to identity a Jerusalem-born U.S. citizen's place of birth as "Israel" on his passport if requested by the citizen or his legal guardian.[13] The State Department had declined to follow this statutory command, citing long-standing executive policy of declining to recognize any country's sovereignty over the city of Jerusalem.[14] It argued the statute impermissibly intruded upon the President's constitutional authority over the recognition of foreign nations and their territorial bounds, and attempted to compel "the President to contradict his recognition position regarding Jerusalem in official communications with foreign sovereigns."[15]

The Zivotofsky Court evaluated the State Department's non-adherence to a statutory command using the framework established by Justice Robert Jackson's concurring opinion in Youngstown, under which executive action taken in contravention of a legislative enactment will only be sustained if the President's asserted power is both "exclusive" and "conclusive" on the matter.[16] The Constitution does not specifically identify the recognition of foreign governments among either Congress's or the President's enumerated powers. But in an opinion that employed multiple modes of constitutional interpretation, the Court concluded that the Constitution not only conferred recognition power to the President, but also that this power was not shared with Congress.

In its analysis, the Court first examined "the text and structure of the Constitution," which it construed as reflecting the Founders' understanding that the President exercises the recognition power.[17] In particular, the Court focused on the President's responsibility under the Reception Clause to "receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers."[18] At the time of the founding, the Court reasoned, receiving ambassadors of a foreign government was tantamount to recognizing the foreign entity's sovereign claims, and it was logical to infer "a Clause directing the President alone to receive ambassadors" as "being understood to acknowledge his power to recognize other nations."[19] In addition to the Reception Clause, Zivotofsky identified additional Article II provisions as providing support for the inference that the President

---

[12] Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1 (2015). It appears that in every prior instance where the Supreme Court considered executive action in the field of foreign affairs that conflicted with the requirements of a federal statute, the Court had ruled the executive action invalid. See id. at 62 (Roberts, C.J., dissenting) ("For our first 225 years, no President prevailed when contradicting a statute in the field of foreign affairs."); Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008) (President could not direct state courts to reconsider cases barred from further review by state and federal procedural rules in order to implement requirements flowing from a ratified U.S. treaty that was not self-executing, as legislative authorization from Congress was required); Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006) (military tribunals convened by presidential order did not comply with the Uniform Code of Military Justice); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952); Little v. Barreme, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 170 (1804) (upholding damage award to owners of U.S. merchant ship seized during quasi-war with France, when Congress had not authorized such seizures).

[13] Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 2003, Pub L. No. 107-228, § 214(d), 116 Stat. 1350, 1366 (2002).

[14] Zivotofsky, at 6–7. The State Department's Foreign Affairs Manual generally provides that in issuing passports to U.S. citizens born abroad, the passport shall identify the country presently exercising sovereignty over the citizen's birth location. 7 Foreign Affairs Manual § 1330 Appendix D (2008). The Manual provides that employees should "write JERUSALEM as the place of birth in the passport. Do not write Israel, Jordan or West Bank for a person born within the current municipal borders of Jerusalem." Id. at § 1360 Appendix D.

[15] Zivotofsky, 576 U.S. at 11–12 (quoting Brief from Respondent at 48).

[16] Id. at 10 (quoting Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., 343 U.S. at 637–38 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring)).

[17] Id. at 10–13

[18] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3. Zivotofsky, 576 U.S. at 12.

[19] Zivotofsky, 576 U.S. at 12–13. The Court observed that records of the Constitutional Convention were largely silent on the recognition power, but that contemporary writings by prominent international legal scholars identified the act of receiving ambassadors as the virtual equivalent of recognizing the sovereignty of the sending state. Id. at 12.

retains the recognition power,[20] including the President's power to "make Treaties" with the advice and consent of the Senate,[21] and to appoint ambassadors and other ministers and consuls with Senate approval.[22]

The Zivotofsky Court emphasized "functional considerations" supporting the Executive's claims of exclusive authority over recognition,[23] stating that recognition is a matter on which the United States must "speak with . . . one voice,"[24] and the Executive Branch is better suited than Congress to exercise this power for several reasons, including its "characteristic of unity at all times," as well as its ability to engage in "delicate and often secret diplomatic contacts that may lead to a decision on recognition" and "take the decisive, unequivocal action necessary to recognize other states at international law."[25]

The Court also concluded that historical practice and prior jurisprudence gave credence to the President's unilateral exercise of the recognition power. The Court acknowledged that the historical record did not provide unequivocal support for this view, but characterized "the weight" of historical evidence as reflecting an understanding that the President's power over recognition is exclusive.[26] Although the Executive had consistently claimed unilateral recognition authority from the Washington Administration onward, and Congress had generally acquiesced to the President's exercise of such authority, there were instances in which Congress also played a role in matters of recognition. But the Zivotofsky Court observed that in all earlier instances, congressional action was consistent with, and deferential to, the President's recognition policy, and the Court characterized prior congressional involvement as indicating "no more than that some Presidents have chosen to cooperate with Congress, not that Congress itself has exercised the recognition power."[27] The Court also stated that a "fair reading" of its prior jurisprudence demonstrated a long-standing understanding of the recognition power as an executive function, notwithstanding "some isolated statements" in those cases that might have suggested a congressional role.[28]

Having determined that the Constitution assigns the President exclusive authority over recognition of foreign sovereigns, the Zivotofsky Court ruled that the statutory directive that the State Department honor requests of Jerusalem-born U.S. citizens to have their passports list their birthplace as "Israel" was an impermissible intrusion on the President's recognition

---

[20] Justice Clarence Thomas, writing separately and concurring in part with the majority's judgment, would have located the primary source of the President's recognition power as the Vesting Clause. Id. at 31–32 (Thomas, J., concurring and dissenting in part with the Court's judgment). The controlling five-Justice opinion declined to reach the issue of whether the Vesting Clause provided such support. Id. at 13–14 (majority opinion).

[21] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[22] Id.

[23] Zivotofsky, 576 U.S. at 13.

[24] Id. at 14 (quoting Am. Ins. Ass'n v. Garamendi, 539 U.S. 396, 424 (2003) and Crosby v. Nat'l Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 381 (2000)).

[25] Id.

[26] Id. at 22–23.

[27] Id. The Court observed that in no prior instance had Congress enacted a statute "contrary to the President's formal and considered statement concerning recognition." Id. at 24 (citing Zivotofsky v. Secretary of State, 725 F.3d 197, 203, 221 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Tatel, J., concurring)).

[28] See id. at 17. The Court observed that earlier rulings touching on the recognition power had dealt with the division of power between the judicial and political branches of the federal government, or between the federal government and the states. Id. at 17–18 (citing Banco Nacional De Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 410 (1964) (involving the application of the act of state doctrine to the government of Cuba and stating that "[p]olitical recognition is exclusively a function of the Executive"); United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203 (1942) (concerning effect of executive agreement involving the recognition of the Soviet Union and settlement of claims disputes upon state law); United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. 324 (1937) (similar to Pink); Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 415 (1839) (ruling that an executive determination concerning foreign sovereign claims to the Falkland Islands was conclusive upon the judiciary)).

authority. According to the Court, Congress's authority to regulate the issuance of passports, though wide in scope, may not be exercised in a manner intended to compel the Executive "to contradict an earlier recognition determination in an official document of the Executive Branch" that is addressed to foreign powers.[29]

While the Zivotofsky decision establishes that the recognition power belongs exclusively to the President, its relevance to other foreign affairs issues remains unclear. The opinion applied a functionalist approach in assessing the exclusivity of executive power on the issue of recognition but did not opine on whether this approach was appropriate for resolving other inter-branch disputes concerning the allocation of constitutional authority in the field of foreign affairs. The Zivotofsky Court also declined to endorse the Executive's broader claim of exclusive or preeminent presidential authority over foreign relations, and it appeared to minimize the reach of some of the Court's earlier statements in Curtiss-Wright[30] regarding the expansive scope of the President's foreign affairs power.[31] The Court also repeatedly noted Congress's ample power to legislate on foreign affairs, including on matters that precede and follow from the President's act of foreign recognition and in ways that could render recognition a "hollow act."[32] For example, Congress could institute a trade embargo, declare war upon a foreign government that the President had recognized, or decline to appropriate funds for an embassy in that country. While all of these actions could potentially be employed by the Legislative Branch to express opposition to executive policy, they would not impermissibly interfere with the President's recognition power.[33]

ArtII.S1.C1.9 Term of the President

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1:

> The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows.

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1, provides for the President and Vice President to serve four-year terms. The Framers generally appear to have contemplated that, under the Constitution, the President, like Representatives and Senators, would not be subject to term limits but could run for office "as often as the people of the United States shall think him worthy of their confidence."[1] However, there was much debate and concern that the Constitution might grant the President too much power and that, as Thomas Jefferson observed, "the perpetual re-eligibility of the President" could produce "cruel distress to our country even in your day and mine."[2] Following precedent established by George Washington, the idea that no President would hold office for more than two terms was generally regarded as a fixed tradition until President Franklin Delano Roosevelt sought and won reelection for a [29] See id. at 31. The Court approvingly cited its description in Urtetiqui v. D'Arcy, 34 U.S. (9 Pet.) 692 (1835), of a passport as being, "from its nature and object . . . addressed to foreign powers." See Zivotofsky, at 30.

[30] See United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Co., 299 U.S. 304 (1936). For further discussion of this case, see ArtII.S1.C1.4 The President's Powers, Myers, and Seila, and Youngstown.

[31] The majority opinion observed that Curtiss-Wright had considered the constitutionality of a congressional delegation of power to the President, and that its description of the Executive as the sole organ of foreign affairs was not essential to its holding in the case. Zivotofsky, at 20–21.

[32] Id. at 15–16.

[33] Id. at 15–16.

[1] The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton).

[2] Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Alexander Donald (Feb. 7, 1788), reprinted in 3 The Founders' Constitution 505 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 2000).

third and fourth term in 1940 and 1944, respectively. In 1951, the states ratified the Twenty-Second Amendment limiting the President to two terms in office.[3]

When considering the term of the President during the Constitutional Convention, the Framers weighed how the President would be selected, whether a President should serve multiple times, and how to mitigate the danger that the Presidency might evolve into a "hereditary Monarchy"[4] or become the "mere creature" of Congress.[5] On June 1, 1787, James Wilson of Pennsylvania proposed to the Committee of the Whole that the term of the President be three years, "on the supposition that a re-eligibility would be provided for,"[6] while Charles Pinckney of South Carolina proposed a term of seven years.[7] George Mason of Virginia urged a term of "seven years at least, and for prohibiting a re-eligibility as the best expedient both for preventing the effect of a false complaisance on the side of the Legislature towards unfit characters; and a temptation on the side of the Executive to intrigue with the Legislature for a re-appointment."[8]

Although the Committee of the Whole voted for a seven-year term,[9] debate continued over how to select the President and whether he should be eligible for reelection. Efforts to offset the longer seven-year term with a bar on re-eligibility were met by concerns that prohibiting reelection would, among other things, "destroy the great motive to good behavior, the hope of being rewarded by a re-appointment."[10] Revisiting the appropriate term of office for the President in conjunction with whether the President should be eligible for reelection,[11] the Convention considered proposals for, among other things, fifteen-year, eleven-year, eight-year, six-year, and three-year terms,[12] as well as an indefinite term during Good Behavior.[13] In late August 1787, the Convention referred the matter to the Committee of Eleven, which, in turn, proposed a term of four years without a bar to reelection.[14]

While the four-year term was shorter than the originally contemplated seven-year term, critics of the Constitution maintained that it would still allow the President to establish a [3] U.S. Const. amend XXII. The Twenty-Second Amendment was adopted largely in response to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt seeking and winning reelection for an unprecedented third and fourth terms in 1940 and 1944, respectively. The Twenty-Second Amendment became a part of the Constitution on February 27, 1951, after it was adopted by Minnesota, which provided the thirty-sixth state that was necessary for adoption of the Amendment. 2 Grossman, Constitutional Amendments 758–759 (2012). For additional discussion on the Twenty-Second Amendment, see Amdt22.1 Overview of Twenty-Second Amendment, Presidential Term Limits.

[4] 2 The Records of the Federal Constitution 35 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) (statement of George Mason of Virginia).

[5] Id. at 103 (statement of Gouveneur Morris of Pennsylvania); see also Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution 117–118 (1913).

[6] 1 The Records of the Federal Constitution 68 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911)

[7] Id.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 69.

[10] 2 The Records of the Federal Constitution 33 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) (statement of Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania in support of motion made by William Churchill Houston of New Jersey on July 17, 1787, to strike the bar to reelection).

[11] See id.

[12] See, e.g., 1 The Records of the Federal Constitution 68 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911); 2 The Records of the Federal Constitution 102 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) (Rufus King of Massachusetts also suggested a twenty-year term. However, given that King's proposal was "twenty years . . . [which is] the medium life of princes ", Max Farrand, the editor of the Records of the Constitution, observes that this was likely meant to be ironic, stating, "This might possibly be meant as a caricature of the previous motions in order to defeat the object of them."). See also id. at 100, 112, dangerous influence over the United States.[15] Responding to such concerns in the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton explained the advantages of a four-year term as striking a balance between the "personal firmness of the executive magistrate, in the employment of his constitutional powers; and to the stability of the system of administration which may have been adopted under his auspices."[16] He stated:

[13] Id. at 33–35.

[14] Id. at 497.

> Between the commencement and termination of such a [four-year] period, there would always be a considerable interval, in which the prospect of annihilation would be sufficiently remote, not to have an improper effect upon the conduct of a man endued with a tolerable portion of fortitude. . . . [A] duration of four years will contribute to the firmness of the Executive in a sufficient degree to render it a very valuable ingredient in the composition; so, on the other, it is not enough to justify any alarm for the public liberty.[17]

Hamilton also cited the three-year New York gubernatorial term to support that the President would be unlikely to acquire undue power across the entirety of the United States over four years when the Governor of New York had not done so over the much smaller state of New York over three years.[18]

In his Commentaries of the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story observed that the four-year term the Framers adopted for the President is "intermediate between the term of office of the senate, and that of the house of representatives" and, as a result, "[i]n the course of one presidential term, the house is, or may be twice recomposed; and two-thirds of the senate changed, or re-elected."[19] Because the President's four-year term is between the two- and six-year terms of the House and Senate, the President is subject to pressures that drive the House's need to respond to the people's immediate demands, even though such demands may be short-lived, and those that facilitate the Senate's greater focus on long-term objectives because its six-year term provides some insulation from political winds.[20]

Clause 2—Electors

ArtII.S1.C2.1 Overview of Electors Appointment Clause

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2:

> Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State

[15] See, e.g., The Anti-Federalist Papers, No. 67 (Cato/George Clinton), reprinted in The Complete Federalist and Anti-Federalist Papers 709 (2014) ("It is remarked by Montesquieu, in treating of republics, that in all magistracies, the greatness of the power must be compensated by the brevity of the duration, and that a longer time than a year would be dangerous. The deposit of vast trusts in the hands of a single magistrate enables him in their exercise to create a numerous train of dependents. This tempts his ambition, which in a republican magistrate is also remarked to be pernicious, and the duration of his office for any considerable time favors his views, gives him the means and time to perfect and execute his designs; he therefore fancies that he may be great and glorious by oppressing his fellow citizens, and raising himself to permanent grandeur on the ruins of his country.").

[16] The Federalist No. 71 (Alexander Hamilton).

[17] Id.

[18] The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton). See also The Federalist No. 72 (Alexander Hamilton) (describing five "ill effect[s]" of excluding the President either temporarily or permanently from subsequent terms of office).

[19] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §1432 (1833).

[20] See generally id.

may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2, also known as the Electors Appointment Clause, provides for states to select electors to vote for the President and establishes that the number of each state's electors will equal the number of its Senators and Representatives.[1] The Framers adopted the Electors Appointment Clause as a compromise between the direct election of the President and his selection by Congress. Among the Framers' objectives was to provide for the President's selection by persons whose "sole purpose" would be choosing the best candidate for the President rather than by persons "selected for the general purposes of legislation."[2] Notwithstanding this electoral system, divorcing selection of the President from partisan politics proved elusive.[3]

ArtII.S1.C2.2 Historical Background on Electors Appointments Clause

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2:

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

One of the key compromises of the Constitutional Convention was the appointment of electors to elect the President and Vice President. The delegates adopted the plan late in the Convention, having voted on four previous occasions for Congress to select the Executive and twice defeating proposals for direct election by the people.[1] As such, the Electors Appointment clause effected a compromise between selecting the President pursuant to a popular election or leaving Congress to determine the President. In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story explained that the Framers viewed having an electoral college select the President rather than Congress would commit the decision "to persons, selected for that sole purpose . . . instead of persons, selected for the general purposes of legislation"[2] and would avoid "those intrigues and cabals, which would be promoted in the legislative body by artful and designing men, long before the period of the choice, with a view to accomplish their own selfish purposes."[3]

While Justice Story noted that the Framers had viewed the electoral college as preserving the President from becoming "the mere tool of the dominant part in congress,"[4] the development of political parties during the early years of the Republic and their role in nominating presidential candidates and designating electors meant that electors, as a practical matter, were subject to partisan politics.[5] In 1826, Senator Thomas Hart Benton

---

[1] See McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 35 (1892) (holding that this clause confers "plenary power to the state legislatures in the matter of the appointment of electors"); see also Fitzgerald v. Green, 134 U.S. 377, 379 (1890) ("By the constitution of the United States, the electors for president and vice president in each state are appointed by the state in such manner as its legislature may direct.").

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1450 (1833).

[3] See ArtII.S1.C2.2 Historical Background on Electors Appointments Clause.

[1] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 21, 68–69, 80–81, 175–76, 230, 244 (Max Farrand ed., 1911); 2 id. at 29–32, 57–59, 63–64, 95, 99–106, 108–15, 118–21, 196–97, 401–04, 497, 499–502, 511–15, 522–29. See also 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1449 (1833).

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1450 (1833).

[3] Id.

[4] Id.

[5] See James Ceaser, Presidential Selection: Theory and Development (1979); Neal Pierce, The Peoples President: The Electoral College in American History and the Direct-Vote Alternative (1968).

observed that, while the Framers had intended electors to be men of "superior discernment, virtue, and information," who would select the President free from partisan influence, "this invention has failed of its objective in every election . . . ." Senator Benton further explained: "That it ought to have failed is equally uncontestable; for such independence in the electors was wholly incompatible with the safety of the people. [It] was, in fact, a chimerical and impractical idea in any community."[6]

By 1832, almost all states had adopted popular presidential elections, and "[b]y the early 20th century, citizens in most States voted for the presidential candidate himself; ballots increasingly did not even list the electors."[7] Instead, parties chose slates of electors, and states then appointed the electors proposed by the party whose presidential nominee won the popular vote statewide.[8]

ArtII.S1.C2.3 State Discretion Over Selection of Electors

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2:

> Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Supreme Court has reasoned that the word "appoint" in Article II, Section 1, Clause 2, confers on state legislatures "the broadest power of determination."[1] In McPherson v. Blacker, the Supreme Court upheld a state law providing for electors to be selected by popular vote from districts rather than statewide.[2] Noting that states could choose from among a variety of permissible methods in selecting electors, the Supreme Court stated:

> [V]arious modes of choosing the electors were pursued, as, by the legislature itself on joint ballot; by the legislature through a concurrent vote of the two houses; by vote of the people for a general ticket; by vote of the people in districts; by choice partly by the people voting in districts and partly by the legislature; by choice by the legislature from candidates voted for by the people in districts; and in other ways . . . .[3]

Although the Electoral College Clause seemingly vests complete discretion over how electors are appointed, the Court has recognized a federal interest in protecting the integrity of the electoral college process. Thus, in Ex parte Yarbrough, the Court upheld Congress's power to protect the right of all citizens as to the selection of any legally qualified person as a presidential elector.[4] In Yarbrough, the Court stated: "If this government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the general government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption. If it has not this power it is helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics, open violence and insidious

---

[6] S. Rep. No. 22, 19th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1826).

[7] Chiafalo v. Washington, No. 19-465, slip op. at 4 (U.S. July 6, 2020).

[8] Id.

[1] McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 27 (1892).

[2] Id.

[3] Id. at 28–29.

[4] Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884).

corruption."[5] In Burroughs & Cannon v. United States, the Supreme Court sustained Congress's power to protect the choice of electors from fraud or corruption.[6]

The Court and Congress have imposed limits on state discretion in appointing electors. In Williams v. Rhodes,[7] the Court struck down a complex state system that effectively limited access to the ballot to the electors of the two major parties. In the Court's view, the system violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it favored certain individuals and burdened the right of individuals to associate together to advance political beliefs and the right of qualified voters to cast ballots for electors of their choice. The Court denied that the Electoral College Clause immunized such state practices from judicial scrutiny.[8]

Whether state enactments implementing the authority to appoint electors are subject to the ordinary processes of judicial review within a state, or whether placement of the appointment authority in state legislatures somehow limits the role of state judicial review, became an issue during the controversy over the Florida recount and the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. The Supreme Court did not resolve this issue, but in a remand to the Florida Supreme Court, suggested that the role of state courts in applying state constitutions may be constrained under Article II, Section 1, Clause 2.[9] Three Justices elaborated on this view in Bush v. Gore,[10] but the Court ended the litigation—and the recount—on the basis of an equal protection interpretation, without ruling on the Article II argument.

ArtII.S1.C2.4 Legal Status of Electors

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2:

> Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

Electors are not "officers" by the usual tests of office.[1] In 1890, the Supreme Court addressed the constitutional status of electors, stating:

---

[5] Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651, 657–58 (1884) (quoted in Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U.S. 534, 546 (1934)).

[6] Burroughs & Cannon v. United States, 290 U.S. 534 (1934).

[7] 393 U.S. 23 (1968).

[8] The Court stated: "There, of course, can be no question but that this section does grant extensive power to the States to pass laws regulating the selection of electors. But the Constitution is filled with provisions that grant Congress or the States specific power to legislate in certain areas; these granted powers are always subject to the limitation that they may not be exercised in a way that violates other specific provisions of the Constitution . . . . [It cannot be] thought that the power to select electors could be exercised in such a way as to violate express constitutional commands that specifically bar States from passing certain kinds of laws . . . . Obviously we must reject the notion that Art. II, § 1, gives the States power to impose burdens on the right to vote, where such burdens are expressly prohibited in other constitutional provisions." 393 U.S. at 29.

[9] Bush v. Palm Beach County Canvassing Bd., 531 U.S. 70, 78 (2000) (per curiam) (remanding for clarification as to whether the Florida Supreme Court "saw the Florida Constitution as circumscribing the legislature's authority under Art. II, § 1, cl. 2").

[10] Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 111 (2000) (opinion of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas). Relying in part on dictum in McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 27 (1892), the three Justices reasoned that, because Article II confers the authority on a particular branch of state government (the legislature) rather than on a state generally, the customary rule requiring deference to state court interpretations of state law is not fully operative, and the Supreme Court "must ensure that postelection state-court actions do not frustrate" the legislature's policy as expressed in the applicable statute. 531 U.S. at 113.

[1] United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393 (1868).

> The sole function of the presidential electors is to cast, certify and transmit the vote of the State for President and Vice President of the nation. Although the electors are appointed and act under and pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, they are no more officers or agents of the United States than are the members of the state legislatures when acting as electors of federal senators, or the people of the States when acting as electors of representatives in Congress.[2]

Electors have neither tenure nor salary and having performed their single function they cease to exist as electors. This function is, moreover, "a federal function,"[3] because electors' capacity to perform results from no power which was originally resident in the states, but instead springs directly from the Constitution of the United States.[4]

In the face of the proposition that electors are state officers, the Court has upheld the power of Congress to act to protect the integrity of the process by which they are chosen.[5] But, in Ray v. Blair, the Court clarified that although electors "exercise a federal function[,] . . . they are not federal officers or agents."[6] Instead, the Constitution provides that they act under state authority.[7]

ArtII.S1.C2.5 Discretion of Electors to Choose a President

Article II, Section 1, Clause 2:

> Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Constitution does not prohibit electors from casting their ballots as they wish and occasionally electors have done so.[1] In 1968, for example, a Republican elector in North Carolina chose to cast his vote for George Wallace, the independent candidate who had won the second greatest number of votes rather than for Richard M. Nixon, who had won a plurality in the state. Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate objected to counting that vote for Mr. Wallace, insisting that it should be counted for Mr. Nixon, but both bodies decided to count the vote as cast.[2] More recently, the 2016 election saw a historic number of faithless electors, with seven electors recorded voting for someone other than their party's nominee.[3]

To prevent so-called "faithless electors" from departing from the preferences expressed by voters, most states require electors to pledge to support their parties' nominees.[4] In Ray v. Blair, the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to a party rule requiring elector candidates to pledge that they would support the nominees elected in the primary in the

---

[2] In re Green, 134 U.S. 377, 379–80 (1890).

[3] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

[4] Burroughs & Cannon v. United States, 290 U.S. 534, 535 (1934).

[5] Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884); Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, 290 U.S. 534 (1934).

[6] 343 U.S. 214, 224 (1952).

[7] Id. at 224–25.

[1] See Neal Pierce, The Peoples President: The Electoral College in American History and the Direct-Vote Alternative 122–24 (1968).

[2] 115 Cong. Rec. 9–11, 145–71, 197–246 (1969).

[3] See, e.g., Alexander Gouzoules, The "Faithless Elector" and 2016: Constitutional Uncertainty after the Election of Donald Trump, 28 U. Fla. J.L.& Pus. Pol'y 215, 217 (2017).

[4] Chiafalo v. Washington, No. 19-465, slip op. (U.S. July 6, 2020).

general election.[5] The Court first concluded that excluding electors who refuse to pledge their support for the party's nominees was "an exercise of the state's right to appoint electors in such manner, subject to possible constitutional limitations, as it may choose."[6]

The Court also concluded that the pledge requirement did not violate the Twelfth Amendment, rejecting the argument that "the Twelfth Amendment demands absolute freedom for the elector to vote his own choice, uninhibited by a pledge."[7] Noting the long-standing practice supporting the expectation that electors will support party nominees, the Court said that "even if such promises of candidates for the electoral college are legally unenforceable because violative of an assumed constitutional freedom of the elector under the Constitution, Article II, Section 1, to vote as he may choose in the electoral college, it would not follow that the requirement of a pledge in the primary is unconstitutional."[8]

Ray left open the question of whether states could enforce these pledge requirements through sanctions—a question later considered in Chiafalo v. Washington.[9] In Chiafalo, the Court considered a Washington law that provided that electors who failed to comply with a pledge to vote for their party nominees would face a civil fine.[10] Three electors who were fined after breaking their pledge in the 2016 presidential election challenged the law.[11] The Supreme Court confirmed that a state's power to appoint an elector includes the "power to condition his appointment,"[12] and further clarified that as long as no other constitutional provision prohibits it, the state's appointment power also "enables the enforcement of a pledge" through a law such as Washington's.[13] The Court emphasized that the "barebones" text of Article II and the Twelfth Amendment provide only for "[a]ppointments and procedures" and do not "expressly prohibit[ ] States from taking away presidential electors' voting discretion."[14] Finally, the Court recognized that historical practice supported Washington's law, as electors "have only rarely exercised discretion in casting their ballots for President" and "[s]tate election laws evolved to reinforce" this practice.[15]

Clause 3—Electoral College Count

ArtII.S1.C3.1 Electoral College Count Generally

Article II, Section 1, Clause 3:

> The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they

[5] Ray v. Blair, 343 U.S. 214, 222, 231 (1952). The party rule was adopted under the authority of an Alabama law authorizing parties to determine the qualifications of primary candidates and voters. Id. at 222.

[6] Id. at 227.

[7] Id. at 228.

[8] Id. at 230.

[9] Chiafalo v. Washington, No. 19-465, slip op. (U.S. July 6, 2020). In a companion case, the Supreme Court summarily reversed a Tenth Circuit decision ruling a Colorado faithless-elector law unconstitutional. Colo. Dep't of State v. Baca, No. 19-518, slip op. (U.S. July 6, 2020) (per curiam). The penalties in the Colorado case were different from a fine: after failing to honor his pledge, an elector's vote was vacated and he was removed as an elector. Baca v. Colo. Dep't of State, 935 F.3d 887, 904 (10th Cir. 2019).

[10] Chiafalo, slip op.

[11] Id.

[12] See id. at 9. See also id. at 9 n.4 ("A State, for example, cannot select its electors in a way that violates the Equal Protection Clause. And if a State adopts a condition on its appointments that effectively imposes new requirements on presidential candidates, the condition may conflict with the Presidential Qualifications Clause, see U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5.").

[13] Id. at 10.

[14] Id.

[15] Id. at 13, 16.

shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

Article II, Section 1, Clause 3 outlined the process for selecting the President and Vice President. The provision is no longer operative because the Twelfth Amendment, ratified in 1804, superseded it. This essay discusses the history of Article II, Section 1, Clause 3 from its drafting until the adoption of the Twelfth Amendment.

The procedure for electing the President was a topic of considerable interest at the Constitutional Convention. Both the Virginia and New Jersey Plans for the Constitution contemplated that Congress would select the President.[1] In this, they were consistent with current practices where state legislatures generally selected the Governor.[2] During the Convention, however, it became apparent that how the President was selected would shape his role and relationship with the Legislative Branch. Urging that Congress select the President, Roger Sherman of Connecticut stated that the Executive was "nothing more than an institution for carrying the will of the Legislature into effect, that the person or persons ought to be appointed by and accountable to the Legislature only, which was the depositary of the supreme will of Society."[3] However, other delegates argued that the President should not be beholden to Congress for his office and that the separation of powers could only be ensured if the people elected the President.[4] Taking this position, James Madison stated:

---

[1] The Virginia Plan, § 7, reprinted in Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution 226–227 (1913) ("Resolved that a National Executive be instituted; to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of ____ years . . . and to be ineligible a second time; and that besides a general authority to execute the National Laws, it ought to enjoy the Executive rights vested in Congress by the Confederation."); The New Jersey Plan, § 4, reprinted in id. at 230–231 ("Resolved that the United States in Congress be authorized to elect a federal Executive to consist of ____ persons, to continue in office for the term of ____ years, . . . to be incapable of holding any other office or appointment during their time of service and for ____ years thereafter; to be ineligible a second time, and removable by Congress on application by a majority of the Executives of the several States; that the Executives besides their general authority to execute the federal acts ought to appoint all federal officers not otherwise provided for, and to direct all military operations; provided that none of the persons composing the federal Executive shall on any occasion take command of any troops, so as personally to conduct any enterprise as General, or in other capacity.").

[2] Lolabel House, A Study of the Twelfth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States 7 (1901). At the time of the Convention only Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, New York, and Massachusetts selected their governors by a popular election; in all the other states, the state legislature selected the governor. Id.

[3] 1 The Records of the Federal Constitution 65 (Max Farrand ed., 1911). John Rutledge of South Carolina proposed that the Senate alone should elect the President. Id. at 69.

[4] Id. at 69 ("Mr. Wilson renewed his declarations in favor of an appointment by the people."); 2 The Records of the Federal Constitution 29 (Max Farrand ed. 1911) (noting that Gouverneur Morris believed that the President "ought to be elected by the people at large, by the freeholders of the Country").

ArtII.S1.C3.1
Electoral College Count Generally

> If it be a fundamental principle of free Govt. that the Legislative, Executive & Judiciary powers should be separately exercised; it is equally so that they be independently exercised. There is the same & perhaps greater reason why the Executive shd. be independent of the Legislature, than why the Judiciary should . . . . It is essential then that the appointment of the Executive should either be drawn from some source, or held by some tenure, that will give him a free agency with regard to the Legislature. . . . The people at large was in his opinion the fittest in itself.[5]

Debate over how the President should be selected also focused on which method would best ensure that the President represented the people's interests.[6] On July 19, 1787, Rufus King of Massachusetts proposed that the President be appointed "by electors chosen by the people for the purpose."[7] Madison, William Patterson of New Jersey, Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, and Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut quickly voiced support for electors choosing the President, with Madison noting that using electors would account for differences among the states as to whom they granted suffrage.[8] On September 4, 1797, the Committee of Eleven submitted a report a that included a proposal on how to select the President which, after further debate and modification, the Convention ultimately adopted.[9]

The Framers' process for choosing the President blended federal and national aspects of the U.S. system of government. Reflecting that the United States was a federation of states, the election of the President was to be conducted on a state-by-state basis, and state legislatures would determine how their electors would be selected.[10] Reflecting that the United States was a single nation, the states were allocated electoral votes based on their total number of representatives and senators, with the result that the number of each state's electoral votes was based on its relative population.[11] Combining both federal and national aspects, in the event of a tie or if no candidate received a majority of votes, the House of Representatives would select the President.

Under Article II, Section 1, Clause 3, each state's electors would meet in their state and vote for two persons to be President, one of whom could not be from their state. The electors would then send a list of the persons for whom they had voted and the number of votes each had received to the President of the Senate. In the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate would then count the votes. The candidate with the greatest number of votes would become President, provided he had received a majority of the votes. In the event of a tie, provided the tying candidates had each received a majority of the votes, the House of Representatives would select the President by vote, but each state would have only one vote. If no person had received a majority of the votes, the House would select the President by vote from the five candidates who had received the greatest number of votes. Each state would have only one vote, notwithstanding how many representatives they had, and the candidate with the greatest number of votes would have to receive a majority of

---

[5] 2 The Records of the Federal Constitution 56 (Max Farrand ed., 1911)

[6] E.g., id. at 29 (Roger Sherman of Connecticut stating that "the Nation would be better expressed by the Legislature, than by the people at large."); id. at 31 (Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania stating, "If the Executive be chosen by the Natl. Legislature, he will not be independent on it; and if not independent, usurpation & tyranny on the part of the Legislature will be the consequence.").

[7] Id. at 56.

[8] Id. at 56–58. Supporters of electors disagreed on how states would select the electors. While Rufus King of Massachusetts and James Madison supported popular election of electors, Oliver Ellsworth proposed that state legislatures appoint the electors and Elbridge Gerry proposed that state governors choose the electors. Id.

[9] Id. at 497–498, 517–531.

[10] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 2.

[11] Id. See also Farrand, supra note 1, at 166–67.

the votes to win. Article II, Section 1, Clause 3 further provided that a quorum consisting of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States would be necessary for a vote and a majority of all the States had to vote for the winner. Once the President was elected, the person with the second highest number of electoral votes would be the Vice President. In the event of a tie, the Senate would select the Vice President by vote.

The Article II, Section 1, Clause 3 process for choosing the President had unanticipated and unwelcome results. George Washington's overwhelming popularity minimized the problems with the provision during the elections of 1788 and 1792.[12] In 1796, Federalist John Adams won the Presidency while Republican Thomas Jefferson became the Vice President. This proved unworkable as Jefferson was the leader of the opposition to Adams.[13] In 1800, the Federalist candidates were John Adams and Thomas Pinckney, while the Republican-Democrat candidates were Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. The Republican-Democrat electors gave both their votes to Jefferson and Burr, resulting in a tie between the two for the most votes.[14] Consequently, the election went to the House of Representatives where the Federalists were in the majority. As Jefferson was the leader of the opponents to the Federalists, the Federalists were not inclined to vote for him.[15] The result was a deadlock, which required thirty-six ballots to resolve.[16] After seven days of voting, the House of Representatives elected Jefferson President and Burr Vice President.[17]

To address problems that arose during the 1796 and 1800 elections, the states ratified the Twelfth Amendment on June 15, 1804.[18]

Clause 4—Electoral Votes

ArtII.S1.C4.1 Timing of Electoral Votes Generally

Article II, Section 1, Clause 4:

> The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

In order to reduce the risk that cabals would manipulate selection of the President, the Framers provided for Congress to select a single day on which the electors would vote for the President.[1] Discussing the benefits of this provision at the Constitutional Convention, Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania stated: "As the Electors would vote at the same time throughout the U.S. and at so great a distance from each other, the great evil of cabal was avoided. It would be impossible to corrupt them."[2] In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story further explained the reasoning behind this provision, stating:

> Such a measure is calculated to repress political intrigues and speculations, by rendering a combination among the electoral colleges, as to their votes, if not utterly [12] House, supra note 2, at 23–26.

[13] Id. at 39.

[14] Alan P. Grimes, Democracy and the Amendments to the Constitution 21 (1987).

[15] House, supra note 2, at 33.

[16] Grimes, Democracy and the Amendments to the Constitution 21 (1987).

[17] Id.

[18] 1 Mark Grossman, Constitutional Amendments 111 (2012). For discussion on the Twelfth Amendment, see Amdt12.1 Overview of Twelfth Amendment, Election of President.

[1] See, e.g., 2 Records of the Federal Convention 500 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[2] Id.

> impracticable, at least very difficult; and thus secures the people against those ready expedients, which corruption never fails to employ to accomplish its designs. The arts of ambition are thus in some degree checked, and the independence of the electors against eternal influence in some degree secured.[3]

Supporters of the provision also noted that holding the vote on a single day would facilitate the election of the most highly respected and well-known persons, as only such persons would likely be familiar to an untainted pool of electors. For instance, during North Carolina's debates on ratification, future Supreme Court Justice James Iredell noted that requiring the electors to vote on the same day would increase the likelihood that "the man who is the object of the choice of thirteen different states, the electors in each voting unconnectedly with the rest, must be a person who possesses in a high degree the confidence and respect of his country."[4]

Clause 5—Qualifications

ArtII.S1.C5.1 Qualifications for the Presidency

Article II, Section 1, Clause 5:

> No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

The Qualifications Clause set forth in Article II, Section 1, Clause 5 requires the President to be a natural-born citizen, at least thirty-five years of age, and a resident of the United States for at least fourteen years.[1]

Like the age requirements for membership in the House of Representatives[2] and the Senate,[3] the age requirement for the presidency set forth at Article II, Section 1, Clause 5 ensures that persons holding the office of President will have the necessary maturity for the position as well as sufficient time in a public role for the electorate to be able to assess the merits of a presidential candidate.[4] In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story stated: "Considering the nature of the duties, the extent of the information, and the solid wisdom and experience required in the executive department, no one can reasonably doubt the propriety of some qualification of age."[5]

The Framers appear to have adopted the requirement that citizens be natural born citizens to ensure that the President's loyalties would lie strictly with the United States. By barring naturalized citizens from the presidency, the requirement of being a natural born citizen, as Justice Story explained, protects the United States from "ambitious foreigners, who might otherwise be intriguing for the office; and interposes a barrier against those corrupt interferences of foreign governments in executive elections, which have inflicted the most

---

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1469 (1833).

[4] 3 The Debates, Resolutions, and other Proceedings, in Convention, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 101 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1830).

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5.

[2] See ArtI.S2.C2.1 Overview of House Qualifications Clause.

[3] See ArtI.S3.C3.1 Overview of Senate Qualifications Clause.

[4] The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay) (describing the age requirement as limiting presidential and senatorial candidates to "those who best understand our national interests . . . who are best able to promote those interests, and whose reputation for integrity inspires and merits confidence").

[5] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1472 (1833).

serious evils upon the elected monarchies of Europe."[6] Article II, however, provided an exception for foreign-born persons who had immigrated to the colonies prior to the adoption of the Constitution.[7] Justice Story explained that this was done "out of respect to those distinguished revolutionary patriots, who were born in a foreign land, and yet had entitled themselves to high honors in their adopted country."[8]

While the Constitution does not define "natural born Citizen," commentators have opined that the Framers would have understood the term to mean "someone who was a U.S. citizen at birth with no need to go through a naturalization proceeding at some later time."[9] British statutes from 1709 and 1731 expressly described children of British subjects who were born outside of Great Britain as natural born citizens and provided that they enjoyed the same rights to inheritance as children born in Great Britain.[10] In addition, in the Naturalization Act of 1790, the First Congress provided that "children of citizens of the United States, that may be born beyond the sea, . . . shall be considered as natural born citizens . . . ."[11] Consequently, under the principle that "British common law and enactments of the First Congress" are "two particularly useful sources in understanding constitutional terms,"[12] it would appear likely that the Framers would have understood natural born citizen to encompass the children of United States citizens born overseas.[13] Such an interpretation is further supported by the presidential candidacies of Senator John McCain of Arizona, who was born in the Panama Canal Zone; Governor George Romney of Massachusetts, who was born in Mexico, and Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona, who was born in Arizona before it became a state.[14]

The Framers appear to have adopted the fourteen-year residency requirement to ensure that "the people may have a full opportunity to know [the candidate's] character and merits, and that he may have mingled in the duties, and felt the interests, and understood the principles, and nourished the attachments, belonging to every citizen in a republican government."[15] Justice Story further explained that the fourteen-year residence requirement is "not an absolute inhabitancy within the United States during the whole period; but such an inhabitancy as includes a permanent domicil in the United States."[16]

---

[6] Id. § 1473.

[7] U.S. Const. art II, § 1, cl. 5 ("No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution . . . .") (emphasis added).

[8] Id. Justice Story continued: "A positive exclusion of them from the office would have been unjust to their merits, and painful to their sensibilities." Id.

[9] Neal Katyal & Paul Clement, On the Meaning of "Natural Born Citizen," 128 Harv. L. Rev. F. 161, 161 (2015). See also C. Herman Pritchett, Constitutional Law of the Federal System 262 (1984) ("[P]ersons born abroad to American citizen parents are considered natural-born American citizens"); Edward S. Corwin's The Constitution and What It Means Today (Harold W. Chase & Craig R. Ducat, eds., 1973) (noting that, "[a]lthough the courts have never been called upon to decide the question [of whether a child born abroad of American parents is 'a natural-born citizen' in the sense of the Qualifications Clause], there is a substantial body of authoritative opinion supporting the position that they are").

[10] 7 Anne, ch. 5, § 3 (1709); 4 Geo. 2, ch. 21 (1731).

[11] Act of March 26, 1790, 1 Stat. 103, 104 (emphasis supplied). For additional discussion, see Weedin v. Chin Bow, 274 U.S. 657, 661–66 (1927) and United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 672–75 (1898). With minor variations, the "natural born citizen" language remained law in subsequent reenactments of the Naturalization Act until the 1802 Act, which omitted the italicized words. See Act of Feb. 10, 1855, 10 Stat. 604 (enacting same provision, for offspring of American-citizen fathers, but omitting the italicized phrase).

[12] Katyal & Clement, supra note 9, at 161 (citing Smith v. Alabama, 124 U.S. 465, 478 (1888) and Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U.S. 265, 297 (1888)).

[13] Id.

[14] See Katyal & Clement, supra note 9, at 164.

[15] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1473 (1833).

[16] Id. Justice Story notes that a stricter construction would have barred U.S. citizens serving in the Nation's foreign embassies or military or civil officers "who should have been in Canada during the late war." Id.

Clause 6—Succession

ArtII.S1.C6.1 Succession Clause for the Presidency

Article II, Section 1, Clause 6:

> In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The ratification of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment[1] in 1967 superseded Article I, Section 1, Clause 6. Article I, Section 1, Clause 6 provides for the "Powers and Duties" of the President to "devolve" upon the Vice President if the President is no longer able "to discharge" them due to his removal from office, death, resignation, or inability.[2] Although it was unclear in the republic's early years whether the Vice President became President or merely acted as President until a new presidential election was held, ratification of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment established incontrovertibly that the Vice President becomes President upon the President's removal from office, death, resignation, or inability to perform the powers and duties of the office.[3] In addition, Article I, Section 1, Clause 6 authorizes Congress to establish the line of succession to the presidency if both the President and Vice President are unable to discharge the "Powers and Duties" of the Presidency.[4]

Although the Twenty-Fifth Amendment was ratified in 1967, the succession of the Vice President to the office of President upon the President's death or resignation has been the practice of the Republic since its earliest days. On April 4, 1841, President William Henry Harrison became the first president to die in office.[5] His Vice President John Tyler, after initial hesitation, took the position that he had become the President automatically rather than "the Vice-President, now exercising the office of President,"[6] and thereby established a precedent which was subsequently followed until the Twenty-Fifth Amendment conclusively established that the Vice-President succeeds to the Presidency under the Constitution.[7]

In 1792, the Second Congress used its authority under Article II, Section 1, Clause 6 to provide for the succession to the Presidency in the event neither the President nor Vice President were able to perform the duties and powers of the office. Under the Succession Act of 1792,[8] the succession to the Presidency passed to the President Pro Tempore of the Senate and then to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1886, Congress changed the presidential succession to the heads of the cabinet departments in the order in which the departments had been established.[9] In 1947, Congress adopted the Presidential Succession

---

[1] See Amdt25.1 Overview of Twenty-Fifth Amendment, Presidential Vacancy.

[2] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1, cl. 6.

[3] U.S. Const. amend. XXV, § 1 ("In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President."). See also U.S. Const. amend. XX, § 3 ("If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice-President elect shall become President").

[4] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1, cl. 6.

[5] C. Herman Prittchett, Constitutional Law of the Federal System 274–75 (1984).

[6] Id.

[7] Amdt25.1 Overview of Twenty-Fifth Amendment, Presidential Vacancy.

[8] Act of Mar. 1, 1792, ch. 8, § 9, 1 Stat. 239, 240 (Succession Act of 1792).

[9] Act of Jan. 19, 1886, ch. 4, Pub. L. No. 49-4, 24 Stat. 1 (Succession Act of 1886).

Act,[10] which provided for the Speaker of the House to "act as President"[11] followed by the President Pro Tempore of the Senate, and then by the department heads in the order in which each department had been established.

Clause 7—Compensation and Emoluments

ArtII.S1.C7.1 Emoluments Clause and Presidential Compensation

Article II, Section 1, Clause 7:

> The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

To preserve the President's independence from Congress and state governments, Article II, Section 1, Clause 7 provides that Congress may not increase or decrease the President's compensation during his term in office and further bars the President from receiving "any other Emolument [beyond a fixed salary] from the United States, or any of them."[1] Consequently, Congress cannot use its control over the President's salary to influence him; the provision accordingly reinforces the separation of powers. As Justice Joseph Story observed in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, "[a] control over a man's living is in most cases a control over his actions."[2] The Domestic Emoluments Clause—unlike the Foreign Emoluments Clause[3]—does not allow Congress to assent to the President receiving otherwise prohibited emoluments from the state or federal governments.

Modeled after similar provisions in state constitutions,[4] the Domestic Emoluments Clause received little attention at the Constitutional Convention.[5] In the Federalist No. 73, however, Alexander Hamilton explained that the Domestic Emoluments Clause was intended to isolate the President from potentially corrupting congressional influence. Because the President's salary is fixed "once for all" each term, Hamilton commented, Congress "can neither weaken his fortitude by operating on his necessities, nor corrupt his integrity by appealing to his avarice."[6] Similarly, Hamilton explained that because "[n]either the Union, nor any of its members, will be at liberty to give . . . any other emolument," the President will "have no

[10] Presidential Succession Act of 1947, Pub. L. No. 80-199, 61 Stat. 380, codified as amended at 3 U.S.C. § 19.

[11] Id. § 19(1).

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 7.

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1480 (1833).

[3] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8; see ArtI.S9.C8.1 Overview of Titles of Nobility and Foreign Emoluments Clauses.

[4] See, e.g., Mass Const. of 1780, pt. II, ch. II, § 1, art. XIII ("As the public good requires that the governor should not be under the undue influence . . . it is necessary that he should have an honorable stated salary, of a fixed and permanent value . . . ."); Md. Const. of 1776, art. XXXII ("That no person ought to hold, at the same time, more shall one office of profit, nor ought any person in public trust, to receive any present from any foreign prince or state, or from the United States, or any of them, without the approbation of this State.").

[5] Early in the Constitutional Convention, Benjamin Franklin proposed that the President should receive no compensation at all; this motion was politely postponed "with great respect, but rather for the author of it than from any apparent conviction of its expediency or practicability." 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 81–85 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (Madison's notes). The Convention unanimously agreed to the fixed salary provision for the President on July 20, 1787. 2 id. at 69. On September 15, 1787, Franklin and John Rutledge moved to bar the President from receiving "any other emolument" from the federal or state governments, which the Convention approved by a 7-4 vote without noted debate. 2 id. at 626.

[6] The Federalist No. 73 (Alexander Hamilton).

pecuniary inducement to renounce or desert the independence intended for him by the Constitution."[7] Other Framers echoed this sentiment during the ratification debates.[8]

The Domestic Emoluments Clause has been rarely analyzed or interpreted by courts during its history.[9] During the administration of President Donald Trump, several litigants alleged that President Trump's retention of certain business and financial interests violated the Foreign and Domestic Emoluments Clauses, but the Supreme Court ultimately found these cases moot without addressing their merits.[10]

Clause 8—Presidential Oath of Office

ArtII.S1.C8.1 Oath of Office for the Presidency

Article II, Section 1, Clause 8:

> Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:–"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

What is the time relationship between a President's assumption of office and his taking the oath? Apparently, the former comes first, this answer appearing to be the assumption of the language of the clause. The Second Congress assumed that President George Washington took office on March 4, 1789,[1] although he did not take the oath until the following April 30.

That the oath the President is required to take might be considered to add anything to the powers of the President, because of his obligation to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution," might appear to be rather a fanciful idea. But in President Andrew Jackson's message announcing his veto of the act renewing the Bank of the United States there is language which suggests that the President has the right to refuse to enforce both statutes and judicial decisions based on his own independent decision that they were unwarranted by the Constitution.[2] The idea next turned up in a message by President Abraham Lincoln justifying his suspension of the writ of habeas corpus without obtaining congressional authorization.[3] And counsel to President Andrew Johnson during his impeachment trial adverted to the theory, but only in passing.[4] Beyond these isolated instances, it does not appear to be seriously contended that the oath adds anything to the President's powers.

---

[7] Id.

[8] See, e.g., 2 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 446 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1836) (statement of James Wilson) ("[The Domestic Emoluments Clause was designed] to secure the President from any dependence upon the legislature as to his salary.").

[9] See generally Michael A. Foster & Kevin J. Hickey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45992, The Emoluments Clauses and the Presidency: Background and Recent Developments (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45992. The few judicial or executive decisions on the Domestic Emoluments Clause include Griffin v. United States, 935 F. Supp. 1, 3–6 (D.D.C. 1995), Nixon v. Sampson, 389 F. Supp. 107, 136–37 (D.D.C. 1975), and President Reagan's Ability to Receive Retirement Benefits from the State of California, 5 Op. O.L.C. 187 (1981).

[10] For an overview of that litigation, see ArtI.S9.C8.3 Foreign Emoluments Clause Generally.

[1] Act of March 1, 1792, 1 Stat. 239, § 12.

[2] 2 J. Richardson, supra, at 576. Chief Justice Roger Taney, who as a member of Jackson's Cabinet had drafted the message, later repudiated this possible reading of the message. 2 C. Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 223–224 (1926).

[3] 6 J. Richardson, supra, at 25.

[4] 2 Trial of Andrew Johnson 200, 293, 296 (1868).

Section 2—Powers

Clause 1—Military, Administrative, and Clemency

ArtII.S2.C1.1 Commander in Chief

ArtII.S2.C1.1.1 Historical Background on Commander in Chief Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Surprisingly little discussion of the Commander in Chief Clause occurred in the Constitutional Convention or in the ratifying debates. From the evidence available, it appears that the Framers vested the duty in the President because experience in the Continental Congress had disclosed the expediency of vesting command in a single official[1] and because the lesson of English history was that danger lurked in vesting command in a person separate from the responsible political leaders.[2]

Early cases and commentary emphasized the purely military aspects of the Commander in Chiefship. Alexander Hamilton said the office "would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the Military and naval forces, as first general and admiral of the confederacy."[3] In his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story wrote of the debates accompanying the ratification of the Constitution, stating: "The propriety of admitting the president to be commander in chief, so far as to give orders, and have a general superintendency, was admitted."[4] Justice Story took note of the debate regarding the propriety of the President taking command of the armed forces in person, explaining the apparent consensus. He stated: "Though the president might, there was no necessity that he should, take the command in person; and there was no probability that he would do so, except in extraordinary emergencies, and when he was possessed of superior military talents."[5]

The Supreme Court did not think it apparent that the Commander in Chief Power necessarily entailed all of the attributes available to a sovereign under the laws and usages of

---

[1] Earnest R. May, The President Shall Be Commander in Chief, in The Ultimate Decision: The President as Commander In Chief 3, 6–7 (E. May ed., 1960). During the North Carolina Ratifying Convention, James Iredell said: "From the nature of the thing, the command of armies ought to be delegated to one person only. The secrecy, dispatch, and decision, which are necessary in military operations can only be expected from one person." 4 Jonathan Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 107 (2d ed.1836).

[2] May, supra note 1, at 18. In the Virginia ratifying convention, Madison, replying to Patrick Henry's objection that danger lurked in giving the President control of the military, said: "Would the honorable member say that the sword ought to be put in the hands of the representatives of the people, or in other hands independent of the government altogether?" 3 Elliot, supra note 1, at 393.

[3] The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton).

[4] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution Of The United States § 1492 (1833).

[5] Id.

war, even in cases of war declared by Congress.[6] The Court held that a declaration of war, by itself, did not empower the President to confiscate enemy property.[7]

Chief Justice John Marshall, while suggesting that the President might, during the limited war authorized against France, have the authority as Commander in Chief to issue orders pertaining to the capture of certain vessels in the absence of legislation, denied the validity of such an order where Congress had enacted a contradictory staute.[8] A U.S. commander had captured, pursuant to presidential instructions, what he believed was a U.S. merchant ship bound from a French port, allegedly carrying contraband material.[9] Congress had, however, enacted the Non-Intercourse Act, which only provided for the seizure of such vessels bound to French ports.[10] The Court held that the President's instructions exceeded the authority granted by Congress and were not to be given the force of law, and the captain could be held liable for damages.[11]

In 1850, Chief Justice Roger Taney, writing for the Supreme Court, explained the President's power during wartime:

> His duty and his power are purely military. As Commander in Chief, he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command, and to employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy. He may invade the hostile country, and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States. But his conquests do not enlarge the boundaries of this Union, nor extend the operation of our institutions and laws beyond the limits before assigned to them by the legislative power.[12]

Justice Taney continued and distinguished the role of the Commander in Chief and that of the British King:

> But in the distribution of political power between the great departments of government, there is such a wide difference between the power conferred on the President of the United States, and the authority and sovereignty which belong to the English crown, that it would be altogether unsafe to reason from any supposed resemblance between them, either as regards conquest in war, or any other subject where the rights and powers of the executive arm of the government are brought into question.[13]

---

[6] See, e.g., The Thomas Gibbons, 12 U.S. (8 Cranch) 421, 427–28 (1814) ("As to the authority of the president, we do not think it necessary to consider how far he would be entitled, in his character of commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States, independent of any statute provision, to issue instructions for the government and direction of privateers. That question would deserve grave consideration; and we should not be disposed to entertain the discussion of it, unless it become unavoidable.").

[7] Brown v. United States, 12 U.S. (8 Cranch) 110, 128–29 (1814) ("It appears to the Court, that the power of confiscating enemy property is in the legislature, and that the legislature has not yet declared its will to confiscate property which was within our territory at the declaration of war.").

[8] Little v. Barreme, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 170, 177–78 (1804).

[9] Id. at 177 (with reference to the Law of February 9, 1799, 1 Stat. 613).

[10] Id.

[11] Id. at 179. See also Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 1, (1801) ("The whole powers of war being by the constitution of the United States, vested in congress, the acts of that body can alone be restored to as our guides in this enquiry.").

[12] Fleming v. Page, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 603, 615 (1850). The Court explained that acquisition of foreign territory could be accomplished "only by the treaty-making power or the legislative authority, and [it] is not a part of the power conferred upon the President by the declaration of war." Id. Congress had declared war against Mexico in 1846. Act of May 13, 1846, ch. 16, 9 Stat. 9.

[13] Fleming, 50 U.S. (9 How.) at 618.

Even after the Civil War, a powerful minority of the Court, led by Chief Justice Salmon Chase, described the role of President as Commander in Chief simply as "the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns."[14]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.2 Prize Cases and Commander in Chief Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The basis for a broader conception of the role of Commander in Chief was laid in certain early acts of Congress authorizing the President to employ military force in the execution of the laws.[1] In his famous message to Congress on July 4, 1861,[2] Abraham Lincoln advanced the claim that the "war power" was his for the purpose of suppressing rebellion, and in the Prize Cases[3] of 1863 a divided Court sustained this theory. The immediate issue was the validity of the blockade of the Southern ports that the President had established following the attack on Fort Sumter.[4] The argument was advanced that, in order for a blockade to be valid, it must be established during an incident of a "public war" validly declared, and that only Congress could, by virtue of its power "to declare war," constitutionally impart to a military situation this character and scope.[5] Speaking for the majority of the Court, Justice Robert Grier answered:

> If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorized but bound to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority. And whether the hostile party be a foreign invader, or States organized in rebellion, it is none the less a war, although the declaration of it be 'unilateral.'[6]

To support this principle with historical precedent, Justice Grier explained that the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma had been fought before the enactment of the Act of Congress of May 13, 1846, "which recognized 'a state of war as existing by the act of the

---

[14] Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2, 139 (1866).

[1] 1 Stat. 424 (1795); 2 Stat. 443 (1807) (codified at 10 U.S.C. §§ 251–254). See also Martin v. Mott, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 19, 32–33 (1827) (asserting the finality of the President's judgment of the existence of a state of facts requiring his exercise of the powers conferred by the act of 1795).

[2] 7 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 3221, 3224 (1897) ("So viewing the issue, no choice was left but to call out the war power of the Government and so to resist force employed for its destruction by force for its preservation."). Later in the address, President Lincoln submitted: "Recurring to the action of the Government, it may be stated that at first a call was made for 75,000 militia, and rapidly following this a proclamation was issued for closing the ports of the insurrectionary districts by proceedings in the nature of blockade. So far all was believed to be strictly legal. At this point the insurrectionists announced their purpose to enter upon the practice of privateering."

"Other calls were made for volunteers to serve three years unless sooner discharged, and also for large additions to the Regular Army and Navy. These measures, whether strictly legal or not, were ventured upon under what appeared to be a popular demand and a public necessity, trusting then, as now, that Congress would readily ratify them. It is believed that nothing has been done beyond the constitutional competency of Congress." Id. at 3225.

[3] 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863).

[4] Id. at 665.

[5] Id. at 644–45 (argument).

[6] Id. at 668–70.

Republic of Mexico.'"[7] Justice Grier stated, "This act not only provided for the future prosecution of the war, but was itself a vindication and ratification of the Act of the President in accepting the challenge without a previous formal declaration of war by Congress."[8]

The Court might have rested its opinion wholly on the President's authorities under statute to suppress insurrections and repel invasions,[9] coupled with Congress's ratification of the President's actions,[10] but it instead emphasized Executive power and duty:

> The President was bound to meet it in the shape it presented itself, without waiting for Congress to baptize it with a name; and no name given to it by him or them could change the fact . . . .
>
> Whether the President in fulfilling his duties, as Commander in-chief, in suppressing an insurrection, has met with such armed hostile resistance, and a civil war of such alarming proportions as will compel him to accord to them the character of belligerents, is a question to be decided by him, and this Court must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department of the government to which this power was entrusted. 'He must determine what degree of force the crisis demands.' The proclamation of blockade is itself official and conclusive evidence to the Court that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized a recourse to such a measure, under the circumstances peculiar to the case.[11]

In brief, the powers that may be claimed for the President under the Commander in Chief Clause at a time of widespread insurrection were equated with his powers under the clause at a time when the United States is engaged in a formally declared foreign war.[12] No attention was given the fact that Lincoln had asked Congress to ratify and confirm his acts, which Congress promptly had,[13] with the exception of his suspension of habeas corpus, a power that many attributed to the President in the situation then existing, by virtue of his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.[14] On the other hand, where Lincoln's proclamation suspending habeas corpus varied from legislation later enacted to ratify it, the Court looked to the statute[15] rather than to the proclamation[16] to determine the breadth of its application in the case of Ex parte Milligan.[17]

In a partial concurrence to the majority's decision in Milligan, Chief Justice Chase described the allocation of war powers as follows:

> The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes

[7] Id. at 668.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 668.

[10] 67 U.S. (2 Black) at 670–71 (taking note of various statutes and stating, "Without admitting that such an act was necessary under the circumstances, it is plain that if the President had in any manner assumed powers which it was necessary should have the authority or sanction of Congress, . . . this ratification has operated to perfectly cure the defect.").

[11] Id. at 669–70.

[12] See generally, Edward Corwin, Total War and the Constitution (1946).

[13] 12 Stat. 326 (1861).

[14] J. G. Randall, Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln 118–139 (rev. ed. 1951).

[15] Act of Mar. 3, 1863, 12 Stat. 755 (authorizing the suspension of habeas corpus, but with limitations in Union states to those held as prisoners of war; all others were to be indicted or freed.)

[16] Proclamation of Sept. 15, 1863, 13 Stat. 734 (suspending habeas corpus with respect to those in federal custody as military offenders or "as prisoners of war, spies, or aiders and abettors of the enemy").

[17] Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2, 115–16 (1866).

> all authorities essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President . . . .[18]

The Chief Justice described the Commander in Chief Power as entailing "the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns,"[19] but nevertheless agreed that military trials of civilians accused of violating the law of war in Union states were invalid without congressional approval, despite the government's assertion that the "[Commander in Chief's] power to make an effectual use of his forces [must include the] power to arrest and punish one who arms men to join the enemy in the field against him."[20]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.3 Wartime Powers of President in World War II

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In his message to Congress of September 7, 1942, in which he demanded that Congress repeal certain provisions of the Emergency Price Control Act,[1] President Franklin Roosevelt formulated his conception of his powers as President in wartime to act inconsistently with congressional statute:

> I ask the Congress to take this action by the first of October. Inaction on your part by that date will leave me with an inescapable responsibility to the people of this country to see to it that the war effort is no longer imperiled by threat of economic chaos.
>
> In the event that the Congress should fail to act, and act adequately, I shall accept the responsibility, and I will act.
>
> At the same time that farm prices are stabilized, wages can and will be stabilized also. This I will do.
>
> The President has the powers, under the Constitution and under Congressional acts, to take measures necessary to avert a disaster which would interfere with the winning of the war.
>
> I have given the most thoughtful consideration to meeting this issue without further reference to the Congress. I have determined, however, on this vital matter to consult with the Congress . . . .
>
> The American people can be sure that I will use my powers with a full sense of my responsibility to the Constitution and to my country. The American people can also be [18] Id. at 139 (Chase, C.J., concurring and dissenting in part).

[19] Id. at 139–40 ("Congress cannot direct the conduct of campaigns, nor can the President, or any commander under him, without the sanction of Congress, institute tribunals for the trial and punishment of offences, either of soldiers or civilians, unless in cases of a controlling necessity . . . ").

[20] Id. at 17 (government argument).

[1] 56 Stat. 23 (1942).

> sure that I shall not hesitate to use every power vested in me to accomplish the defeat of our enemies in any part of the world where our own safety demands such defeat.
>
> When the war is won, the powers under which I act automatically revert to the people—to whom they belong.[2]

While congressional compliance with the President's demand rendered unnecessary an effort on his part to amend the Price Control Act, there were other matters as to which he repeatedly took action within the normal field of congressional powers, not only during the war, but in some instances prior to it. In exercising both the powers which he claimed as Commander in Chief and those which Congress conferred upon him to meet the emergency, President Roosevelt employed new emergency agencies, created by himself and responsible directly to him, rather than the established departments or existing independent regulatory agencies.[3]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.4 Evacuation of the West Coast Japanese

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

On February 19, 1942, President Roosevelt issued an Executive Order, "by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy," providing, as a safeguard against subversion and sabotage, power for his military commanders to designate areas from which "any person" could be excluded or removed and to set up facilities for such persons elsewhere.[1] Pursuant to this order, approximately 112,000 residents of the Western states, all of Japanese descent and more than two out of every three of whom were natural-born citizens, were removed from their homes and shipped to temporary camps and later into "relocation centers" in several states.[2]

It was apparently the Administration's original intention to rely on the general principle of military necessity and the power of the Commander in Chief in wartime as authority for the relocations.[3] Before any action was taken under the order, Congress ratified and adopted it by the Act of March 21, 1942,[4] by which it was made a misdemeanor to knowingly enter, remain in, or leave prescribed military areas contrary to the orders of the Secretary of War or of the commanding officer of the area. The cases which subsequently arose in consequence of the

---

[2] 88 Cong. Rec. 7044 (1942). Congress promptly complied, 56 Stat. 765 (1942), so that the President was not required to act on his own. But see Edward Corwin, Total War and the Constitution 65–66 (1946) (listing examples to demonstrate an implied claim to "dispense with statutes").

[3] For a listing of the agencies and an account of their creation to the close of 1942, see Arthur T. Vanderbilt, War Powers and Their Administration, 1942 Ann. Surv. Am. L. 106–113 (1942).

[1] Exec. Order No. 9066, 7 Fed. Reg. 1407 (Feb. 25, 1942).

[2] War Relocation Authority, The Evacuated People: A Quantitative Description 67 (1946).

[3] Exec. Order 9066 stated that "the successful prosecution of the war requires every possible protection against espionage and against sabotage" and cited as authority that vested "in the President of the United States, and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy," but did not claim statutory authority. Exec. Order No. 9066, 7 Fed. Reg. 1407 (Feb. 25, 1942).

[4] 56 Stat. 173 (1942).

order were decided under the order plus the Act. The question at issue, said Chief Justice Harlan Stone for the Court, "is not one of Congressional power to delegate to the President the promulgation of the Executive Order, but whether, acting in cooperation, Congress and the Executive have constitutional . . . [power] to impose the curfew restriction here complained of."[5] This question was answered in the affirmative, as was the similar question later raised by an exclusion order.[6] These two opinions, however, skirted the question of internment in relocation centers. On that question, the Court granted habeas relief to an "admittedly loyal citizen" of Japanese descent on the basis that internment was unsupported by the Executive Order or by statute.[7] Ultimately, the Court abrogated the Korematsu decision, holding that "[t]he forcible relocation of U.S. citizens to concentration camps, solely and explicitly on the basis of race, is objectively unlawful and outside the scope of Presidential authority."[8]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.5 The President and Labor Relations in World War II

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The most important segment of the home front regulated by what were in effect presidential edicts was the field of labor relations. Exactly six months before Pearl Harbor, on June 7, 1941, President Franklin Roosevelt, citing his proclamation thirteen days earlier of an unlimited national emergency, issued an Executive Order seizing the North American Aviation Plant at Inglewood, California, where, on account of a strike, production was at a standstill.[1] Attorney General Robert Jackson justified the seizure as growing out of the "duty constitutionally and inherently rested upon the President to exert his civil and military as well as his moral authority to keep the defense efforts of the United States a going concern," as well as "to obtain supplies for which Congress has appropriated the money, and which it has directed the President to obtain."[2] Other seizures followed, and on January 12, 1942, President Roosevelt, by Executive Order 9017, created the National War Labor Board. The order declared in part, "by reason of the state of war declared to exist by joint resolutions of Congress, . . . the

[5] Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 91–92 (1943).

[6] Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944). Long afterward, in 1984, a federal court granted a writ of coram nobis and overturned Korematsu's conviction, Korematsu v. United States, 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984), and in 1986, a federal court vacated Hirabayashi's conviction for failing to register for evacuation but let stand the conviction for curfew violations. Hirabayashi v. United States, 627 F. Supp. 1445 (W.D. Wash. 1986). Other cases were pending, but Congress then implemented the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians by acknowledging "the fundamental injustice of the evacuation, relocation and internment," and apologizing on behalf of the people of the United States. Pub. L. 100–383, 102 Stat. 903 (1988), 50 U.S.C. §§ 4201–4251. Reparations were approved, and each living survivor of the internment was to be compensated in an amount roughly approximating $20,000.

[7] Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283, 302 (1944).

[8] Trump v. Hawaii, No. 17–965, slip op. at 38 (U.S. June 26, 2018).

[1] Exec. Order No. 8773, 6 Fed. Reg. 2777 (1941).

[2] Edward Corwin, Total War and the Constitution 47–48 (1946). As Supreme Court Justice, Jackson would later deny that the President as Commander in Chief had authority to seize steel manufacturing plants affected by labor strife. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 646 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring) ("What the power of command may include I do not try to envision, but I think it is not a military prerogative, without support of law, to seize persons or property because they are important or even essential for the military and naval establishment.").

national interest demands that there shall be no interruption of any work which contributes to the effective prosecution of the war; and . . . as a result of a conference of representatives of labor and industry which met at the call of the President on December 17, 1941, it has been agreed that for the duration of the war there shall be no strikes or lockouts, and that all labor disputes shall be settled by peaceful means, and that a National War Labor Board be established for a peaceful adjustment of such disputes."[3] In this field, too, Congress intervened by means of the War Labor Disputes Act of June 25, 1943,[4] which authorized plant seizures in support of war efforts but which, however, still left ample basis for presidential activity of a legislative character.[5]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.6 Presidential Directives and Sanctions in World War II

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

To implement his directives as Commander in Chief in wartime, and especially those which he issued in governing labor disputes, President Franklin Roosevelt often resorted to "sanctions," which may be described as penalties lacking statutory authorization. Ultimately, the President sought to put sanctions by the National War Labor Board on a systematic basis.[1] The order empowered the Director of Economic Stabilization, on receiving a report from the Board that someone was not complying with its orders, to issue "directives" to the appropriate department or agency requiring that privileges, benefits, rights, or preferences enjoyed by the noncomplying party be withdrawn.[2]

Sanctions were also occasionally employed by statutory agencies, such as the Office of Price Administration (OPA), to supplement the penal provisions of the Emergency Price Control Act of January 30, 1942.[3] In Steuart & Bro. v. Bowles,[4] the Supreme Court had the opportunity to regularize this type of executive emergency legislation. Here, a retail dealer in fuel oil was charged with having violated a rationing order of OPA by obtaining large quantities of oil from its supplier without surrendering ration coupons, by delivering many thousands of gallons of fuel oil without requiring ration coupons, and so on, and was prohibited by the agency from receiving oil for resale or transfer for the ensuing year. The offender conceded the validity of the rationing order in support of which the suspension order was issued but challenged the validity of the latter as imposing a penalty that Congress had not enacted and asked the district court to enjoin it.

---

[3] 7 Fed. Reg. 237 (1942).

[4] 57 Stat. 163 (1943).

[5] See Arthur T. Vanderbilt, War Powers and Their Administration, 1942 Ann. Surv. Am. L. 271–273 (1942) (listing various Executive Orders, proclamations, and orders of the National War Labor Board).

[1] Exec. Order No. 9370, 8 Fed. Reg. 11,463 (1943).

[2] Id.

[3] 56 Stat. 23 (1942).

[4] 322 U.S. 398 (1944).

The court refused to do so[5] and was sustained by the Supreme Court in its position. Justice William Douglas wrote for the Court:

> "[W]ithout rationing, the fuel tanks of a few would be full; the fuel tanks of many would be empty. Some localities would have plenty; communities less favorably situated would suffer. Allocation or rationing is designed to eliminate such inequalities and to treat all alike who are similarly situated. But middlemen—wholesalers and retailers—bent on defying the rationing system could raise havoc with it. These middlemen are the chief if not the only conduits between the source of limited supplies and the consumers. From the viewpoint of a rationing system a middleman who distributes the product in violation and disregard of the prescribed quotas is an inefficient and wasteful conduit. Certainly we could not say that the President would lack the power under this Act to take away from a wasteful factory and route to an efficient one a precious supply of material needed for the manufacture of articles of war. From the point of view of the factory owner from whom the materials were diverted the action would be harsh . . . . But in times of war the national interest cannot wait on individual claims to preference. Yet if the President has the power to channel raw materials into the most efficient industrial units and thus save scarce materials from wastage it is difficult to see why the same principle is not applicable to the distribution of fuel oil."[6]

Sanctions not expressly supported by statue were, therefore, constitutional when the deprivations they wrought were a reasonably implied amplification of the substantive power which they supported and were directly conservative of the interests which this power was created to protect and advance. It is certain, however, that sanctions not uncommonly exceeded this pattern.[7]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.7 Treatment of Enemy Combatants and Nazi Saboteurs

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In 1942 eight youths, seven Germans and one American, all of whom had received training in sabotage in Berlin, were brought to this country aboard two German submarines and put ashore, one group on the Florida coast, the other on Long Island, with the idea that they would proceed forthwith to practice their art on American factories, military equipment, and installations. Making their way inland, the saboteurs were soon picked up by the FBI, some in New York, others in Chicago, and turned over to the Provost Marshal of the District of Columbia. On July 2, the President appointed a military commission to try them for violation of the laws of war, to wit: for not wearing fixed emblems to indicate their combatant status.[1] In the midst of the trial, the accused petitioned the Supreme Court and the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for leave to bring habeas corpus proceedings. Their argument embraced the contentions: (1) that the offense charged against them was not known to the laws of the United States; (2) that it was not one arising in the land and naval forces; and (3) that the tribunal trying them had not been constituted in accordance with the requirements of the Articles of War.

[5] L.P. Steuart & Bro. v. Bowles, 55 F. Supp. 336, 337 (D.D.C, 1944) ("I see no reason why the O.P.A. should not revoke the allocation to and the authority of the agency. If it can do this, it can do the lesser. If it can put an end to the allocation it can suspend it.").

[6] 322 U.S at 405–06.

[7] Edward Corwin, The President, Office and Powers 284–85 (1984).

The first argument the Court met as follows: The act of Congress in providing for the trial before military tribunals of offenses against the law of war is sufficiently definite, although Congress has not undertaken to codify or mark the precise boundaries of the law of war, or to enumerate or define by statute all the acts which that law condemns. ". . . [T]hose who during time of war pass surreptitiously from enemy territory into . . . [that of the United States], discarding their uniforms upon entry, for the commission of hostile acts involving destruction of life or property, have the status of unlawful combatants punishable as such by military commission."[2] The second argument it disposed of by showing that petitioners' case was of a kind that was never deemed to be within the terms of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments, citing in confirmation of this position the trial of Major Andre.[3] The third contention the Court overruled by declining to draw the line between the powers of Congress and the President in the premises,[4] thereby, in effect, attributing to the President the right to amend the Articles of War in a case of the kind before the Court ad libitum.[5]

The Court also rejected the jurisdictional challenge by one of the saboteurs on the basis of his claim to U.S. citizenship, finding U.S. citizenship wholly irrelevant to the determination of whether a wartime captive is an "enemy belligerent" within the meaning of the law of war.[6]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.8 World War II War Crimes Tribunals

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive

[1] Military Order of July 2, 1942, 7 Fed. Reg. 5103 (July 3, 1942). President Roosevelt by Proclamation established that "subjects, citizens or residents of any nation at war with the United States or who give obedience to or act under the direction of any such nation, and who during time of war enter or attempt to enter the United States or any territory or possession thereof, through coastal or boundary defenses, and are charged with committing or attempting or preparing to commit sabotage, espionage, hostile or warlike acts, or violations of the law of war, shall be subject to the law of war and to the jurisdiction of military tribunals; and that such persons shall not be privileged to seek any remedy or maintain any proceeding directly or indirectly, or to have any such remedy or proceeding sought on their behalf, in the courts of the United States." Proclamation No. 2561, of July 2, 1942, 7 Fed. Reg. 5101, 56 Stat. 1964. The Supreme Court disregarded the President's effort to deny the accused access to the court, stating "there is certainly nothing in the Proclamation to preclude access to the courts for determining its applicability to the particular case." Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 25 (1942). Moreover, the Court observed, "neither the Proclamation nor the fact that they are enemy aliens forecloses consideration by the courts of petitioners' contentions that the Constitution and laws of the United States constitutionally enacted forbid their trial by military commission." Id.

[2] Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. at 29–30, 35.

[3] Id. at 41–42.

[4] Id. at 28–29.

[5] The Court would later take more seriously Congress's role in cabining the President's authority to establish military commissions. See ArtII.S2.C1.1.18 Detention Authority.

[6] Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 37–38 (1942) ("Citizens who associate themselves with the military arm of the enemy government, and with its aid, guidance and direction enter this country bent on hostile acts, are enemy belligerents within the meaning of the Hague Convention and the law of war."). See also Colepaugh v. Looney, 235 F.2d 429, 432 (10th Cir. 1956), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 1014 (1957) ("[T]he petitioner's citizenship in the United States does not . . . confer upon him any constitutional rights not accorded any other belligerent under the laws of war.").

Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

As a matter of fact, in General Tomoyuki Yamashita's case,[1] which was brought after the termination of hostilities for alleged "war crimes," the Court abandoned its restrictive conception altogether. In the words of Justice John Rutledge's dissenting opinion in this case:

> The difference between the Court's view of this proceeding and my own comes down in the end to the view, on the one hand, that there is no law restrictive upon these proceedings other than whatever rules and regulations may be prescribed for their government by the executive authority or the military and, on the other hand, that the provisions of the Articles of War, of the Geneva Convention and the Fifth Amendment apply.[2]

And the adherence of the United States to the Charter of London in August 1945, under which the Nazi leaders were brought to trial, is explicable by the same theory. These individuals were charged with the crime of instigating aggressive war, which at the time of its commission was not a crime either under international law or under the laws of the prosecuting governments. It must be presumed that the President is not in his capacity as Supreme Commander bound by the prohibition in the Constitution of ex post facto laws, nor did international law clearly forbid ex post facto laws.[3]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.9 Postwar Period and Commander in Chief Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The end of active hostilities did not terminate either the emergency or the Federal Government's response to it. President Harry Truman proclaimed the termination of hostilities on December 31, 1946,[1] and, in July 1947, Congress enacted a joint resolution that repealed a great variety of wartime statutes and set termination dates for others.[2] Signing the resolution, the President said that the emergencies declared in 1939 and 1940 continued to exist and that it was "not possible at this time to provide for terminating all war and emergency powers."[3] The hot war was giving way to the Cold War.

The postwar period was a time of reaction against the wartime exercise of power by President Franklin Roosevelt, and President Truman was not permitted the same liberties.

---

[1] In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

[2] 327 U.S. at 81.

[3] See Leo Gross, The Criminality of Aggressive War, 41 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 205 (1947).

[1] Proc. 2714, 12 Fed. Reg. 1 (1947).

[2] S.J. Res. 123, 61 Stat. 449 (1947).

[3] Woods v. Cloyd W. Miller Co., 333 U.S. 138, 140 n.3 (1948).

The Supreme Court signaled this reaction when it struck down the President's action in seizing the steel industry while it was struck during the Korean War.[4]

Nonetheless, the long period of the Cold War and of active hostilities in Korea and Indochina, in addition to the issue of the use of troops in the absence of congressional authorization, further created conditions for consolidation of powers in the President. In particular, a string of declarations of national emergencies, most, in whole or part, under the Trading with the Enemy Act,[5] undergirded the exercise of much presidential power. In the storm of response to the Vietnamese conflict, here, too, Congress reasserted legislative power to curtail what it viewed as excessive executive power, limiting the Trading with the Enemy Act to wartime and enacting the International Emergency Economic Powers Act,[6] which delegated most of the same range of powers to the President, but which changed the scope of the power delegated to declare national emergencies.[7] Congress also passed the National Emergencies Act,[8] prescribing procedures for the declaration of national emergencies, for their termination, and for presidential reporting to Congress in connection with national emergencies. To end the practice of declaring national emergencies for an indefinite duration, Congress provided that any emergency not otherwise terminated would expire one year after its declaration unless the President published in the Federal Register and transmitted to Congress a notice that the emergency would continue in effect.[9]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.10 Use of Troops Overseas and Congressional Authorization

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In 1912, the Department of State published a memorandum prepared by its Solicitor which set out to justify the Right to Protect Citizens in Foreign Countries by Landing Forces.[1] In addition to the justification, the memorandum summarized forty-seven instances in which force had been used, in most of them without any congressional authorization.[2] Twice revised and reissued, the memorandum was joined by a 1928 independent study and a 1945 work by a former government official in supporting conclusions that drifted away from the original [4] Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). The majority stated, "Even though 'theater of war' be an expanding concept, we cannot with faithfulness to our constitutional system hold that the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces has the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production." Id. at 587.

---

[5] First War Powers Act § 301(1), 55 Stat. 838, 839–840 (1941) (amending § 5 of the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917, 40 Stat. 411, now codified at 50 U.S.C. § 4305).

[6] Pub. L. No. 95-223, 91 Stat. 1626, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701–1706 (1977).

[7] Congress authorized the declaration of a national emergency based only on "any unusual and extraordinary threat, which has its source in whole or substantial part outside the United States, to the national security, foreign policy, or the economy of the United States." 50 U.S.C. § 1701.

[8] Pub. L. No. 94-412, 90 Stat. 1255, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1601–1651 (1976).

[9] 50 U.S.C. § 1622.

[1] J. Clark, Memorandum by the Solicitor for the Department of State, Right to Protect Citizens in Foreign Countries by Landing Forces (1912).

[2] Id. appendix.

justification of the use of United States forces abroad to the use of such forces at the discretion of the President and free from control by Congress.[3]

New lists and revised arguments were published to support the actions of President Harry Truman in sending troops to Korea and of Presidents John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson in sending troops first to Vietnam and then to Indochina generally,[4] and new lists have since been propounded.[5] The great majority of the instances cited involved fights with pirates, landings of small naval contingents on barbarous or semibarbarous coasts to protect commerce, the dispatch of small bodies of troops to chase bandits across the Mexican border, and the like, and some incidents supposedly without authorization from Congress did in fact have underlying statutory or other legislative authorization.[6] Some instances, e.g., President James Polk's use of troops to precipitate war with Mexico in 1846, President Ulysses Grant's attempt to annex the Dominican Republic, President William McKinley's dispatch of troops into China during the Boxer Rebellion, involved considerable exercises of presidential power, but in general purposes were limited and congressional authority was sought for the use of troops against a sovereign state or in such a way as to constitute war. The early years of the twentieth century saw the expansion in the Caribbean and Latin America both of the use of troops for the furthering of what was perceived to be our national interests and of the power of the President to deploy the military force of the United States without congressional authorization.[7]

The pre-war actions of Presidents Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt advanced in substantial degrees the fact of presidential initiative, although the theory did not begin to catch up with the fact until the "Great Debate" over the commitment of troops by the United States to Europe under the Atlantic Pact. While congressional authorization was obtained, that debate, the debate over the United Nations charter, and the debate over Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949, declaring that "armed attack" against one signatory was to be

---

[3] Id. Milton Offutt, The Protection of Citizens Abroad by the Armed Forces of the United States (1928); James Grafton Rogers, World Policing and the Constitution app. (1945). The last volume examined whether the President was empowered to participate in United Nations peacekeeping actions absent congressional authorization.

[4] E.g., H. Rep. No. 127, 82d Congress, 1st Sess. (1951), 55–62; Edward Corwin, Who Has the Power to Make War?, New York Times Magazine 11 (July 31, 1949); Authority of the President to Repel the Attack in Korea, 23 Dept. State Bull. 173 (1950); Dept. of State, Historical Studies Div., Armed Actions Taken by the United States Without a Declaration of War, 1789–1967 (1967). One commentator stated:

"There has never, I believe, been any serious doubt—in the sense of non-politically inspired doubt—of the President's constitutional authority to do what he did. The basis for this conclusion in legal theory and historical precedent was fully set out in the State Department's memorandum of July 3, 1950, extensively published. But the wisdom of the decision not to ask for congressional approval has been doubted."

After discussing several reasons establishing the wisdom of the decision, the Secretary continued:

"The President agreed, moved also, I think, by another passionately held conviction. His great office was to him a sacred and temporary trust, which he was determined to pass on unimpaired by the slightest loss of power or prestige. This attitude would incline him strongly against any attempt to divert criticism from himself by action that might establish a precedent in derogation of presidential power to send our forces into battle. The memorandum that we prepared listed eighty-seven instances in the past century in which his predecessors had done this. And thus yet another decision was made."

Dean Acheson, Present at the Creation 414, 415 (1969).

[5] War Powers Legislation: Hearings Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 92d Congress, 1st Sess. (1971), 347, 354–355, 359–379 (Sen. Barry Goldwater); J. Terry Emerson, War Powers Legislation, 74 W. Va. L. Rev. 53 (1972). United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 273 (1990) (citing Instances of Use of United States Armed Forces Abroad, 1798–1989, Cong. Rsch. Serv. (1989). For an effort to reconstruct the development and continuation of the listings, see Francis D. Wormuth & Edwin B. Firmage, To Chain the Dog of War 142–145 (1989).

[6] See, e.g., Act of Mar. 3, 1819, ch. 77, §1, 3 Stat. 510; extended by Act of Jan. 30, 1823, ch. 7, 3 Stat. 721 (authorizing public armed vessels of the United States to suppress piracy), codified at 33 U.S.C. § 381.

[7] Considerable debate continues with respect to the meaning of the historical record. For reflections of the narrow reading, see Nat'l Commitments Resolution, Rep. of the Sen. Committee on Foreign Relations, S. Rep. No. 91-129, 1st Sess. (1969); John Hart Ely, War And Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons Of Vietnam And Its Aftermath (1993). See Abraham D. Sofaer, War, Foreign Affairs and Constitutional Power: The Origins (1976); J. Terry Emerson, Making War Without a Declaration, 17 J. Legis. 23 (1990).

considered as "an attack" against all signatories, provided the occasion for the formulation of a theory of independent presidential power to use the armed forces in the national interest at his discretion.[8] Thus, Secretary of State Dean Acheson told Congress: "Not only has the President the authority to use the armed forces in carrying out the broad foreign policy of the United States implementing treaties, but it is equally clear that this authority may not be interfered with by the Congress in the exercise of powers which it has under the Constitution."[9]

President Truman did not seek congressional authorization before sending troops to Korea, and subsequent Presidents similarly acted on their own in putting troops into many foreign countries, including the Dominican Republic, Lebanon, and most notably Indochina.[10] Eventually, public opposition precipitated another constitutional debate whether the President had the authority to commit troops to foreign combat without the approval of Congress, culminating in the enactment of the War Powers Resolution.[11] The Resolution did little to inhibit Presidents from sending troops abroad without prior congressional authorization, and the Supreme Court has not squarely addressed the issue.[12]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.11 Presidential Power and Commander in Chief Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive

[8] For some popular defenses of presidential power during the "Great Debate," see Edward Corwin, Who Has the Power to Make War? New York Times Magazine 11 (July 31, 1949); Henry Commager, Presidential Power: The Issue Analyzed, New York Times Magazine 11 (January 14, 1951). Cf. Douglas, The Constitutional and Legal Basis for the President's Action in Using Armed Forces to Repel the Invasion of South Korea, 96 Cong. Rec. 9647–49 (1950). President Truman and Secretary Acheson used the argument from the U.N. Charter in defending the United States' actions in Korea. See, e.g., Jane Stromseth, Rethinking War Powers: Congress, the President, and the United Nations, 81 Geo. L. J. 597 (1993).

[9] Assignment of Ground Forces of the United States to Duty in the European Area: Hearings Before the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees, 82 Cong., 1st Sess. (1951), 92.

[10] See the discussion in National Commitments Resolution, Report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, S. Rep. No. 91–129, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969); U.S. Commitments to Foreign Powers: Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 16–19 (1967) (Professor Bartlett).

[11] Pub. L. No. 93-148, 87 Stat. 555, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1541–1548.

[12] Lower courts have largely avoided resolving challenges to presidential authority to insert U.S. forces into hostile situations without congressional authorization on grounds of non-justiciability, mootness, ripeness, or standing. See, e.g., Kucinich v. Obama, 821 F. Supp. 2d 110, 125 (D.D.C. 2011) (finding that Members of the House of Representatives and group of taxpayers lacked standing to challenge military operations in Libya); Doe v. Bush, 323 F.3d 133, 139 (1st Cir. 2003) (holding challenge to planned military action under the Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution of 2002 Pub L. No. 107–243, 116 1498 not ripe for adjudication); Campbell v. Clinton, 52 F. Supp.2d 34 (D.D.C. 1999) (dismissing challenge to military air campaign in Kosovo for lack of standing), aff'd, 203 F.2d 19 (D.C. Cir.), cert. den., 531 U.S. 815 (2000); Dellums v . Bush, 752 F.Supp. 1141 (D.D.C. 1990) (dismissing suit to enjoin military intervention in Iraq on ripeness grounds); Lowry v. Reagan, 676 F. Supp. 333 (D.D.C. 1987) (dismissing lawsuit to require reporting of reflagging of Kuwaiti vessels on grounds of equitable discretion and political question doctrines), aff'd, No. 87–5426 (D.C. Cir. 1988); Conyers v. Reagan, 578 F. Supp. 324 (D.D.C. 1984), aff'd, 765 F.2d 1124 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (dismissing challenge by Members of Congress to military intervention in Grenada on the basis of the doctrine of equitable/remedial discretion); Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 568 F. Supp. 596 (D.D.C. 1983), aff'd, 770 F.2d 202 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (dismissing challenge to military support to paramilitary operations designed to overthrow the government of Nicaragua as a nonjusticiable political question); dismissing House Members' challenge to military aid supplied to the government of El Salvador, including sending U.S. military advisers, on political question grounds); Holtzman v. Schlesinger, 484 F.2d 1307, 1309–11 (2d Cir. 1973) (rejecting challenge to hostilities in Cambodia as political question).

Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The President's power with regard to the armed forces has long been debated. In defense of executive action in Indochina, the Legal Adviser of the State Department, in a widely circulated document, contended:

> Under the Constitution, the President, in addition to being Chief Executive, is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He holds the prime responsibility for the conduct of United States foreign relations. These duties carry very broad powers, including the power to deploy American forces abroad and commit them to military operations when the President deems such action necessary to maintain the security and defense of the United States.
>
> In 1787 the world was a far larger place, and the framers probably had in mind attacks upon the United States. In the 20th century, the world has grown much smaller. An attack on a country far from our shores can impinge directly on the Nation's security. In the SEATO treaty, for example, it is formally declared that an armed attack against Viet Nam would endanger the peace and security of the United States.
>
> Under our Constitution it is the President who must decide when an armed attack has occurred. He has also the constitutional responsibility for determining what measures of defense are required when the peace and safety of the United States are endangered. If he considers that deployment of U.S. forces to South Viet Nam is required, and that military measures against the source of Communist aggression in North Viet Nam are necessary, he is constitutionally empowered to take those measures.[1]

Opponents of such expanded presidential powers have contended, however, that the authority to initiate war was not divided between the Executive and Congress but was vested exclusively in Congress. The President had the duty and the power to repeal sudden attacks and act in other emergencies, and in his role as Commander in Chief he was empowered to direct the armed forces for any purpose specified by Congress.[2] Though Congress asserted itself in some respects, it never really managed to confront the President's power with any sort of effective limitation, until the 1970s.

ArtII.S2.C1.1.12 Congressional Control Over President's Discretion

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States;

---

[1] Leonard C. Meeker, The Legality of United States Participation in the Defense of Viet Nam, 54 Dep't State Bull. 474, 484–485 (1966). See also John N. Moore, The National Executive and the Use of the Armed Forces Abroad, 21 Naval War College Rev. 28 (1969); Quincy Wright, The Power of the Executive to Use Military Forces Abroad, 10 Va. J. Int. L. 43 (1969); Documents Relating to the War Powers of Congress, The President's Authority as Commander in Chief and the War in Indochina, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 91st Congress, 2d sess. (1970), 1 (Under Secretary of State Katzenbach), 90 (J. Stevenson, Legal Adviser, Department of State), 120 (Professor Moore), 175 (Assistant Attorney General Rehnquist).

[2] E.g., F. Wormuth & E. Firmage, To Chain the Dog of War (1989), F.J. Ely, War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of the Vietnam War and its Aftermath (1993); U.S. Commitments to Foreign Powers: Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 90th Cong., 1st sess. 9 (1967) (Bartlett); War Powers Legislation: Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 92d Cong., 1st sess. 7 (1971).

he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Over the President's veto, Congress enacted in 1973 the War Powers Resolution,[1] designed to redistribute the war powers between the President and Congress. Although ambiguous in some respects, the Resolution appears to define restrictively the President's powers, to require him to report fully to Congress upon the introduction of troops into foreign areas, to specify a maximum time limitation on the engagement of hostilities absent affirmative congressional action, and to provide a means for Congress to require cessation of hostilities in advance of the time set.

The Resolution states that the President's power to commit United States troops into hostilities, or into situations of imminent involvement in hostilities, is limited to instances of (1) a declaration of war, (2) a specific statutory authorization, or (3) a national emergency created by an attack on the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces.[2] In the absence of a declaration of war, a President must within 48 hours report to Congress whenever he introduces troops (1) into hostilities or situations of imminent hostilities, (2) into a foreign nation while equipped for combat, except in certain nonhostile situations, or (3) in numbers which substantially enlarge United States troops equipped for combat already located in a foreign nation.[3] If the President introduces troops in the first of these three situations, then he must terminate the use of troops within 60 days after his report was submitted or was required to be submitted to Congress, unless Congress (1) has declared war, (2) has extended the period, or (3) is unable to meet as a result of an attack on the United States, but the period can be extended another 30 days by the President's certification to Congress of unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of the troops.[4] Congress may through the passage of a concurrent resolution require the President to remove the troops sooner.[5] The Resolution further states that no legislation, whether enacted prior to or subsequent to passage of the Resolution will be taken to empower the President to use troops abroad unless the legislation specifically does so and that no treaty may so empower the President unless it is supplemented by implementing legislation specifically addressed to the issue.[6]

Aside from its use as a rhetorical device, the War Powers Resolution has been of little worth in reordering presidential-congressional relations in the years since its enactment. In general, Presidents operating under it have expressly or implicitly considered it to be at least in part an

---

[1] Pub. L. No. 93-148, 87 Stat. 555 (1973), codified at 50 U.S.C. §§ 1541–1548. For congressional intent and explanation, see H. Rep. No. 93-287, S. Rep. No. 9-220, and H. Rep. No. 93-547 (Conference Report), 93d Cong., 1st sess. (1973). The President's veto message is H. Doc. No. 93-171, 93d Cong. 1st Sess. (1973); The War Powers Resolution: Relevant Documents, Reports, Correspondence, House Committee on Foreign Affairs, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 1–46 (1994) (Comm. Print). For an account of passage and assessment of the disputed compliance from the congressional point of view, see The War Powers Resolution, A Special Study of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (Comm. Print) (1982).

[2] 87 Stat. 554, § 2(c), 50 U.S.C. § 1541.

[3] 50 U.S.C. § 1543(a).

[4] 50 U.S.C. § 1544(b).

[5] Id. at § 1544(c). Following INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), Congress subsequently enacted expedited procedures for considering joint resolutions or bills to require removing U.S. Armed Forces from situations of hostilities. Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985, Pub. L. No. 98–164 § 1013, 97 Stat. 1062 (1983), codified at 50 U.S.C. § 1546(a).

[6] 50 U.S.C. § 1547(a).

unconstitutional infringement on presidential powers,[7] and on each occasion of use abroad of United States troops the President in reporting to Congress has done so "consistent[ly] with" the reporting section but not pursuant to the provision.[8] Upon the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi troops in 1990, President George H.W. Bush sought not congressional authorization but a United Nations Security Council resolution authorizing the use of force by member Nations. Only at the last moment did the President seek authorization from Congress, he and his officials contending that he had the power to act unilaterally.[9] After intensive debate, Congress voted, 250 to 183 in the House of Representatives and 53 to 46 in the Senate, to authorize the President to use United States troops pursuant to the U.N. resolution and purporting to bring the act within the context of the War Powers Resolution.[10]

Presidents have continued to claim independent authority to commit U.S. Armed Forces to involvements abroad absent any congressional participation other than consultation and after-the-fact financing. In 1994, for example, President Bill Clinton based his authority to order the participation of U.S. forces in NATO actions in Bosnia-Herzegovina on his "constitutional authority to conduct U.S. foreign relations" and as his role as Commander in Chief,[11] and protested efforts to restrict the use of military forces there and elsewhere as an improper and possibly unconstitutional limitation on his "command and control" of U.S. forces.[12] In March 2011, President Barack Obama ordered U.S. military forces to take action as part of an international coalition to enforce U.N. Security Council Resolution 1973, which authorized U.N. Member States to take all necessary measures (other than through military occupation) to protect civilians from attacks by the Libyan government and to establish a no-fly zone over the country. Although these operations had not been authorized by legislation, the Executive Branch submitted a report to Congress which claimed that the President has the "constitutional authority, as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive and pursuant to his foreign affairs powers, to direct such limited military operations abroad."[13]

By contrast, President George W. Bush sought a resolution from Congress in 2002 to approve the eventual invasion of Iraq before seeking a U.N. Security Council resolution, all the

---

[7] See generally Dept. of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Authority of the President under Domestic and International Law to Use Military Force against Iraq, 26 Op. O.L.C. 1, 39–45 (2002) (discussing presidential views and Dept. of Justice opinions concerning the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution).

[8] See The War Powers Resolution: Relevant Documents, Reports, Correspondence, footnote 91 at 47 (Pres. Ford on transport of refugees from Danang), 55 (Pres. Jimmy Carter on attempted rescue of Iranian hostages), 73 (Pres. Ronald Reagan on use of troops in Lebanon), 113 (Pres. Ronald Reagan on Grenada), 144 (Pres. George H.W. Bush on Panama), 147, 149 (Pres. George H.W. Bush on Persian Gulf), 189 (Pres. George H.W. Bush on Somalia), 262 (Pres. William J. Clinton on Haiti).

[9] See Crisis in the Persian Gulf Region: U.S. Policy Options and Implications: Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Armed Services, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 701 (1990) (Secretary Cheney) (President did not require "any additional authorization from the Congress" before attacking Iraq). On the day following his request for supporting legislation from Congress, President George H.W. Bush answered a question about the requested action, stating: "I don't think I need it. I feel that I have the authority to fully implement the United Nations resolutions." 27 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 25 (Jan. 8, 1991).

[10] Pub. L. No. 102-1, 105 Stat. 3 (1991).

[11] 30 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 406 (March 2, 1994).

[12] See Interview with Radio Reporters, 1993 Pub. Papers 1763–64.

[13] Report to the House of Representatives on United States Activities in Libya, submitted June 15, 2011. The Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel issued a legal opinion which claimed that the President possessed independent constitutional authority to commence U.S. military operations in Libya without prior congressional authorization because these operations would be "limited" in scope and the President could "reasonably determine that such use of force was in the national interest." Dept. of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Authority to Use Military Force in Libya (2011). The opinion stated that "prolonged and substantial military engagements, typically involving exposure of U.S. military personnel to significant risk over a substantial period" may generally require prior congressional authorization, but claimed that "historical practice of presidential military action without congressional approval precludes any suggestion that Congress's authority to declare war covers every military engagement, however limited, that the President initiates." Id. at 8.

while denying that express authorization from Congress, or for that matter, the U.N. Security Council, was necessary to renew hostilities in Iraq. Prior to adjourning for its midterm elections, Congress passed the Authorization for Use of Military Force against Iraq Resolution of 2002,[14] which it styled as "specific statutory authorization within the meaning of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution." On signing the measure, the President noted that he had sought "an additional resolution of support" from Congress, and expressed appreciation for receiving that support, but stated, "my request for it did not, and my signing this resolution does not, constitute any change in the long-standing positions of the executive branch on either the President's constitutional authority to use force to deter, prevent, or respond to aggression or other threats to U.S. interests or on the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution."[15] In the Bush administration's view, the primary benefit of receiving authorization from Congress seems to have been the message of political unity it conveyed to the rest of the world rather than the fulfillment of any constitutional requirements.

Although there is recurrent talk within Congress and without as to amending the War Powers Resolution to strengthen it, no consensus has emerged, and there is little evidence that there exists within Congress the resolve to exercise the responsibility concomitant with strengthening it.[16]

ArtII.S2.C1.1.13 President as Commander of Armed Forces

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

While the President customarily delegates supreme command of the forces in active service, there is no constitutional reason why he should do so, and he has been known to resolve personally important questions of military policy. President Abraham Lincoln early in 1862 issued orders for a general advance in the hopes of stimulating General George McClellan to action; President Woodrow Wilson in 1918 settled the question of an independent American command on the Western Front; President Harry Truman in 1945 ordered that the bomb be dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.[1] As against an enemy in the field, the President possesses all the powers which are accorded by international law to any supreme commander. "He may invade the hostile country, and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States."[2] In the absence of attempts by Congress to limit his or her power, the President may establish and prescribe the jurisdiction and procedure of military commissions, and of tribunals in the nature of such commissions, in territory occupied by Armed Forces of the [14] Pub. L. No. 107-243; 116 Stat. 1498 (2002). The House approved the resolution by a vote of 296-133. The Senate passed the House version of H.J. Res. 114 by a vote of 77-23.

[15] See President's Statement on Signing H.J. Res. 114, Oct. 16, 2002, by Gerhard Peters and John T. Woolley, The American Presidency Project.

[16] See, on proposals to amend and on congressional responsibility, John Hart Ely, War And Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons Of Vietnam And Its Aftermath 115–138 (1993).

[1] For a review of how several wartime Presidents have operated in this sphere, see The Ultimate Decision: The President As Commander In Chief (1960).

[2] Fleming v. Page, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 603, 615 (1850).

United States, and his or her authority to do this sometimes survives cessation of hostilities.[3] The President may employ secret agents to enter the enemy's lines and obtain information as to its strength, resources, and movements.[4] He or she may, at least with the assent of Congress, authorize commercial intercourse with the enemy.[5] The President may also requisition property and compel services from American citizens and friendly aliens who are situated within the theater of military operations when necessity requires, thereby incurring for the United States the obligation to render "just compensation."[6] By the same warrant, a President may bring hostilities to a conclusion by arranging an armistice, stipulating conditions that may determine to a great extent the ensuing peace.[7] The President may not, however, effect a permanent acquisition of territory,[8] though he or she may govern recently acquired territory until Congress sets up a more permanent regime.[9]

The President is the ultimate tribunal for the enforcement of the rules and regulations that Congress adopts for the government of the forces, and that are enforced through courts-martial.[10] Indeed, until 1830, courts-martial were convened solely on the President's authority as Commander in Chief.[11] Such rules and regulations are, moreover, it seems, subject in wartime to his or her amendment at discretion.[12] Similarly, the power of Congress to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" (Art. I, § 8, cl. 14) did not prevent President Lincoln from promulgating, in April 1863, a code of rules to govern the conduct in the field of the armies of the United States, which was prepared at his instance by a commission headed by Francis Lieber and which later became the basis of all similar codifications both here and abroad.[13] One important power that the President lacks is that of choosing his or her subordinates, whose grades and qualifications are determined by Congress and whose appointment is ordinarily made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, though undoubtedly Congress could if it wished vest their appointment in "the President alone."[14] Also, the President's power to dismiss an officer from the service, once unlimited, is today confined by statute in time of peace to dismissal pursuant to a sentence of a general court-martial or in commutation of a sentence of a court-martial.[15] But the provision is not regarded by the Court as preventing the President from displacing an officer of the Army or Navy by appointing with the advice and consent of the Senate another person in his or her place.[16] Congress has not limited the President's power of dismissal in time of war.

---

[3] Madsen v. Kinsella, 343 U.S. 341, 348 (1952). See also Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 789 (1950).

[4] Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1876).

[5] Hamilton v. Dillin, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 73 (1875); Haver v. Yaker, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 32 (1869).

[6] Mitchell v. Harmony, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 115 (1852); United States v. Russell, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 623 (1871); Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1876); 40 Ops. Atty. Gen. 250, 253 (1942).

[7] Cf. the Protocol of August 12, 1898, which largely foreshadowed the Peace of Paris, 30 Stat. 1742 and President Wilson's Fourteen Points, which were incorporated in the Armistice of November 11, 1918.

[8] Fleming v. Page, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 603, 615 (1850).

[9] Santiago v. Nogueras, 214 U.S. 260 (1909). As to temporarily occupied territory, see Dooley v. United States, 182 U.S. 222, 230–31 (1901).

[10] 15 Ops. Atty. Gen. 297, n; cf. 1 Ops. Atty. Gen. 233, 234 (Attorney General Wirt stating the contrary view).

[11] Swaim v. United States, 165 U.S. 553 (1897); and cases there reviewed. See also Givens v. Zerbst, 255 U.S. 11 (1921).

[12] Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 28–29 (1942).

[13] 3 General Orders, No. 100, Official Records, War Rebellion (Apr. 24, 1863) (ser. III).

[14] See, e.g., Mimmack v. United States, 97 U.S. 426, 437 (1878); United States v. Corson, 114 U.S. 619 (1885).

[15] 10 U.S.C. § 1161. See also 10 U.S.C. § 804 (permitting officer dismissed by presidential order to demand court-martial).

[16] Mullan v. United States, 140 U.S. 240 (1891); Wallace v. United States, 257 U.S. 541 (1922).

ArtII.S2.C1.1.14 Martial Law Generally

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Martial law can be validly and constitutionally established by supreme political authority in wartime as held in Luther v. Borden.[1] In Luther, the Court held that state declarations of martial law were conclusive and therefore not subject to judicial review.[2] In this case, the Court found that the Rhode Island legislature had been within its rights in resorting to the rights and usages of war in combating insurrection in that state.[3] The decision in the Prize Cases,[4] although not dealing directly with the subject of martial law, gave national scope to the same general principle in 1863.

After the Civil War, a divided Court, in Ex parte Milligan,[5] pronounced President Abraham Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in September 1863 void. The salient passage of the Court's opinion bearing on this point is the following:

> "If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theater of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority, thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the army and society; and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for, if this government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open, and in proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war."[6]

Four Justices, speaking by Chief Justice Salmon Chase, while holding Milligan's trial to have been void because it violated the Act of March 3, 1863, governing the custody and trial of persons who had been deprived of the habeas corpus privilege, declared their belief that Congress could have authorized Milligan's military trial. The Chief Justice wrote:

> Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. Both [1] 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849). See also Martin v. Mott, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 19, 32–33 (1827) ("When the President exercises an authority confided to him by law, the presumption is, that it is exercised in pursuance of law.").

[2] 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 45.

[3] Id.

[4] 67 U.S. (2 Bl.) 635 (1863).

[5] Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1866).

[6] Id. at 127.

> these powers are derived from the Constitution, but neither is defined by that instrument. Their extent must be determined by their nature, and by the principles of our institutions . . . .
>
> We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists.
>
> Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is, that when the nation is involved in war, and some portions of the country are invaded, and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine in what states or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offences against the discipline or security of the army or against the public safety.[7]

In short, only Congress can authorize the substitution of military tribunals for civil tribunals for the trial of offenses; and Congress can do so only in wartime.

Early in the twentieth century, however, the Court appeared to retreat from its stand in Milligan insofar as it held in Moyer v. Peabody[8] that:

> "[T]he Governor's declaration that a state of insurrection existed is conclusive of that fact. . . . [T]he plaintiff's position is that he has been deprived of his liberty without due process of law. But it is familiar that what is due process of law depends on circumstances. . . . So long as such arrests are made in good faith and in honest belief that they are needed in order to head the insurrection off, the Governor is the final judge and cannot be subjected to an action after he is out of office on the ground that he had not reasonable ground for his belief."[9]

The "good faith" test of Moyer, however, was superseded by the "direct relation" test of Sterling v. Constantin,[10] where the Court made it very clear that "[i]t does not follow that every sort of action the Governor may take, no matter how justified by the exigency or subversive of private right and the jurisdiction of the courts, otherwise available, is conclusively supported by mere executive fiat. What are the allowable limits of military discretion, and whether or not they have been overstepped in a particular case, are judicial questions."[11]

---

[7] Id. at 139–40 (Chase, C.J., concurring). In Ex parte Vallandigham, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 243 (1864), the Court had held, while war was still flagrant, that it had no power to review by certiorari the proceedings of a military commission ordered by a general officer of the Army, commanding a military department.

[8] 212 U.S. 78 (1909).

[9] 212 U.S. at 83–85.

[10] 287 U.S. 378, 400 (1932) (distinguishing Moyer because "[i]n that case it appeared that the action of the Governor had direct relation to the subduing of the insurrection by the temporary detention of one believed to be a participant, and the general language of the opinion must be taken in connection with the point actually decided"). The Court stated: "The nature of the power also necessarily implies that there is a permitted range of honest judgment as to the measures to be taken in meeting force with force, in suppressing violence and restoring order, for without such liberty to make immediate decision, the power itself would be useless. Such measures, conceived in good faith, in the face of the emergency and directly related to the quelling of the disorder or the prevention of its continuance, fall within the discretion of the Executive in the exercise of his authority to maintain peace." Id. at 399–400.

[11] Id. at 400–401. State governors have ignored this holding on numerous occasions. E.g., Allen v. Oklahoma City, 175 Okla. 421, 52 P.2d 1054 (1935) ("[T] he martial law decree afforded no justification whatever for the enactment of the [segregation] ordinance, nor did this instrument impart any validity to the ordinance."); Hearon v. Calus, 178 S.C. 381, 183 S.E. 13, 21 (1935) ("In the case now before this court [involving the governor's takeover of the state highway commission] there is no particle of evidence, nor even suggestion, that there existed a state of war, or anything approaching disorder"); and Joyner v. Browning, 30 F. Supp. 512 (W.D. Tenn. 1939) (enjoining governor from employing martial law to disenfranchise voters on the basis of sex and race).

ArtII.S2.C1.1.15 Martial Law in Hawaii

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The question of the constitutional status of martial law was raised again in World War II by the proclamation of Governor Joseph Poindexter of Hawaii, on December 7, 1941, suspending the writ of habeas corpus and conferring on the local commanding General of the Army all his own powers as governor and also "all of the powers normally exercised by the judicial officers of this territory during the present emergency and until the danger of invasion is removed." Two days later the Governor's action was approved by President Franklin Roosevelt. The regime which the proclamation set up continued with certain abatements until October 24, 1944.

By section 67 of the Organic Act of April 30, 1900,[1] the Territorial Governor was authorized "in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it, [to] suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or place the Territory, or any part thereof, under martial law until communication can be had with the President and his decision thereon made known." By section 5 of the Organic Act, "the Constitution shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States."[2] In a brace of cases which reached it in February 1945, but which it contrived to postpone deciding until February 1946,[3] the Court, speaking by Justice Hugo Black, held that the term "martial law" as employed in the Organic Act, "while intended to authorize the military to act vigorously for the maintenance of an orderly civil government and for the defense of the Islands against actual or threatened rebellion or invasion, was not intended to authorize the supplanting of courts by military tribunals."[4]

The Court relied on the majority opinion in Ex parte Milligan. Chief Justice Harlan Stone concurred in the result. "I assume also," he said, "that there could be circumstances in which the public safety requires, and the Constitution permits, substitution of trials by military tribunals for trials in the civil courts,"[5] but added that the military authorities themselves had failed to show justifying facts in this instance.[6] Justice Harold Burton, speaking for himself and Justice Felix Frankfurter, dissented. He stressed the importance of Hawaii as a military outpost and its constant exposure to the danger of fresh invasion.[7] He warned that "courts must guard themselves with special care against judging past military action too closely by the inapplicable standards of judicial, or even military, hindsight."[8]

---

[1] 31 Stat. 141, 153 (1900).

[2] 31 Stat. at 141–142.

[3] Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946).

[4] Id. at 324.

[5] Id. at 336 (Stone, C.J., concurring in the result).

[6] Id. at 337.

[7] Id. at 344 (Burton, J., dissenting).

[8] Id. at 343.

ArtII.S2.C1.1.16 Martial Law and Domestic Disorder

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

President Washington himself took command of state militia called into federal service to quell the Whiskey Rebellion, but there were not too many occasions subsequently in which federal troops or state militia called into federal service were required.[1] Since World War II, however, the President, by virtue of his own powers and the authority vested in him by Congress,[2] has used federal troops on a number of occasions, five of them involving resistance to desegregation decrees in the South.[3] In 1957, Governor Orval Faubus employed the Arkansas National Guard to resist court-ordered desegregation in Little Rock, and President Dwight Eisenhower dispatched federal soldiers and brought the Guard under federal authority.[4] In 1962, President John Kennedy dispatched federal troops to Oxford, Mississippi, when federal marshals were unable to control rioting that broke out upon the admission of an African American student to the University of Mississippi.[5] In June and September of 1964, President Lyndon Johnson sent troops into Alabama to enforce court decrees opening schools to Black students.[6] And, in 1965, the President used federal troops and federalized local Guardsmen to protect participants in a civil rights march. The President justified his action on the ground that there was a substantial likelihood of domestic violence because state authorities were refusing to protect the marchers.[7] [1] United States Adjutant-General, Federal Aid in Domestic Disturbances 1787–1903, S. Doc. No. 209, 57th Congress, 2d sess. (1903); D.H. Pollitt, Presidential Use of Troops to Enforce Federal Laws: A Brief History, 36 N.C. L. Rev. 117 (1958). United States Marshals were also used on approximately thirty occasions. United States Commission on Civil Rights, Law Enforcement: A Report on Equal Protection in the South 155–159 (1965).

---

[2] 10 U.S.C. §§ 251–255, 12406, deriving from laws of 1795, 1 Stat. 424; 1861, 12 Stat. 281; and 1871, 17 Stat. 14.

[3] The other instances were in domestic disturbances at the request of state governors.

[4] Proc. No. 3204, 22 Fed. Reg. 7628 (1957); Exec. Order 10730, 22 Fed. Reg. 7628. See 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 313 (1957); see also Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 12 (1958) (reporting that federalized National Guard troops replaced regular troops to protect Black students from November 27, 1957, through the balance of the school year); Aaron v. McKinley, 173 F. Supp. 944 (E.D. Ark. 1959) (state law authorizing the governor to close schools to prevent desegregation held unconstitutional)), aff'd sub nom Faubus v. Aaron, 361 U.S. 197 (1959); Faubus v. United States, 254 F.2d 797, 806 (8th Cir.) ("We think there is no merit in the appellants' argument that the discretion of the Governor in using the National Guard in derogation of the judgment and orders of the federal District Court and in violation of the constitutional rights of the eligible Negro students could not be questioned."), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 829 (1958).

[5] Proc. No. 3497, 27 Fed. Reg. 9681 (1962); Exec. Order No. 11053, 27 Fed. Reg. 9693 (1962). See United States v. Barnett, 346 F.2d 99, 109 (5th Cir. 1965) (Wisdom, C.J., dissenting) (objecting to dismissal of civil contempt charges against the state governor and lieutenant governor for their role in preventing execution of federal court order and in the ensuing riot, commenting, "To win this battle, the United States Army had more soldiers under arms at Oxford, Mississippi, or held close by in reserve, than George Washington in the Revolutionary War ever commanded at one time").

[6] Proc. 3542, 28 Fed. Reg. 5707 (1963); Exec. Order No. 11111, 28 Fed. Reg. 5709 (1963); Proc. No. 3554, 28 Fed. Reg. 9861; Exec. Order No. 11118, 28 Fed. Reg. 9863 (1963). See Alabama v. United States, 373 U.S. 545 (1963) (per curiam) (denying Governor's motion to file complaint on the basis that "[s]uch purely preparatory measures [of alerting and stationing military personnel in the Birmingham area] and their alleged adverse general effects upon the plaintiffs afford no basis for the granting of any relief").

[7] Proc. No. 3645, 30 Fed. Reg. 3739 (1965); Exec.Order No. 11207, 30 Fed. Reg. 2743 (1965).

ArtII.S2.C1.1.17 Response to Terrorist Attacks of September 11, 2001

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In response to the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York City's World Trade Center and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., Congress passed the "Authorization for Use of Military Force,"[1] which provided that the President may use "all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks [or] harbored such organizations or persons." President George W. Bush issued a military authorizing the Department of Defense to detain and prosecute by military commission any non-U.S. citizen the President deemed to be a member of Al Qaeda or otherwise engaged in international terrorism.[2] The military order also purported to deny individuals subject to it access to U.S. courts or international tribunals.[3] Judicial inquiry has mainly involved the President's authority to detain those deemed "enemy combatants" and to prosecute them for war crimes by military commission.

ArtII.S2.C1.1.18 Detention Authority

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

During a military action in Afghanistan pursuant to the congressional authorization for the use of force, a United States citizen, Yaser Hamdi, was taken prisoner. The Executive Branch argued that it had plenary authority under Article II to hold such an "enemy combatant" for the duration of hostilities, and to deny him meaningful recourse to the federal courts. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the Court agreed that the President was authorized to detain a United States citizen seized in Afghanistan, although a majority of the Court appeared to reject the notion that such power was inherent in the Presidency, relying instead on statutory grounds.[1] However, the Court did find that the government may not detain the petitioner indefinitely for purposes of interrogation,[2] and must afford him the opportunity to offer evidence that he is not an enemy combatant.[3]

[1] Pub. L. No. 107-40, 115 Stat. 224 (2001).

[2] Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, 66 Fed. Reg. 57831 (Nov. 13, 2001) (citing as authority the President's powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the Authorization for Use of Military Force and 10 U.S.C. §§ 821 & 836).

[3] Id. § 7(b)(2). The language denying those subject to the order access to judicial relief was strikingly similar to that in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's 1942 proclamation to the same effect with respect to Nazi saboteurs. See Enemies Denied Access to United States Courts, Proc. No. 2561, 7 Fed. Reg. 5101 (July 2, 1942). Roosevelt's proclamation was ineffective in persuading the Supreme Court to refuse to consider petitions for writs of habeas corpus. Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 25 (1942) ("But there is certainly nothing in the Proclamation to preclude access to the courts for determining its applicability to the particular case.").

In Rasul v. Bush,[4] the Court rejected an Executive Branch argument that foreign prisoners being held at Guantanamo Bay were outside of federal court jurisdiction. The Court distinguished earlier case law arising during World War II that denied habeas corpus petitions from German citizens who had been captured and tried overseas by United States military tribunals.[5] In Rasul, the Court noted that the Guantanamo petitioners were not citizens of a country at war with the United States,[6] had not been afforded any form of tribunal, and were being held in a territory over which the United States exercised exclusive jurisdiction and control.[7] In addition, the Court found that statutory grounds existed for the extension of habeas corpus to these prisoners.[8]

In response to Rasul, Congress amended the habeas statute to eliminate all federal habeas jurisdiction over detainees, whether its basis was statutory or constitutional.[9] This amendment was challenged in Boumediene v. Bush,[10] as a violation of the Suspension

[1] 542 U.S. 507 (2004). There was no opinion of the Court. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, Justice Anthony Kennedy and Justice Stephen Breyer, avoided ruling on the Executive Branch argument that such detentions could be authorized by its Article II powers alone, and relied instead on the "Authorization for Use of Military Force" passed by Congress. Justice Clarence Thomas also found that the Executive Branch had the power to detain the petitioner, although his dissenting opinion found that such detentions were authorized by Article II in addition to the authorization statute. Id. at 579, 587 (Thomas, J. dissenting). Justice David Souter, joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, rejected the argument that the Congress had authorized such detention of American citizens in light of the requirement for express statutory authority found in the Non-Detention Act and the fact that the government was not treating the petitioner as a prisoner of war. Id. at 548–551 (Souter, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (referring to Pub. L. No. 92–128 (1971), 85 Stat. 347 (codified at 18 U.S.C. § 4001(a)) and Article 4 of the Third Geneva Convention, 6 U. S. T. 3316, 3320, T. I. A. S. No. 3364 (1949)). Justice Antonin Scalia, joined with Justice John Paul Stevens, denied that such congressional authorization was possible without a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Id. at 553 (Scalia, J. dissenting).

[2] Id. at 521.

[3] At a minimum, the petitioner must be given notice of the asserted factual basis for holding him, must be given a fair chance to rebut that evidence before a neutral decisionmaker, and must be allowed to consult an attorney. 542 U.S. at 533, 539. Justices Souter and Ginsburg, concurring in the result, agreed the case should be remanded for due process reasons. Id. at 553.

[4] 542 U.S. 466 (2004).

[5] Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 789 (1950).

[6] The petitioners were Australians and Kuwaitis.

[7] Rasul, 542 U.S. at 467.

[8] The Court found that 28 U.S.C. § 2241—which had previously been construed to require the presence of a petitioner in a district court's jurisdiction—was now satisfied by the presence of a jailor-custodian. See Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court, 410 U.S. 484 (1973). Another "enemy combatant" case, this one involving an American citizen arrested on American soil, was remanded after the Court found that a federal court's habeas jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 was limited to jurisdiction over the immediate custodian of a petitioner. Rumsfeld v. Padilla, 542 U.S. 426 (2004) (federal court's jurisdiction over Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld not sufficient to satisfy presence requirement under 28 U.S.C. § 2241). In Munaf v. Geren, 553 U.S. 674 (2008), the Court held that the federal habeas statute—28 U.S.C. § 2241—applied to American citizens held by the Multinational Force—Iraq, an international coalition force operating in Iraq and composed of twenty-six different nations, including the United States. The Court concluded that the habeas statute extends to American citizens held overseas by American forces operating subject to an American chain of command, even when those forces are acting as part of a multinational coalition.

[9] Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-148, § 1005(e)(1) (providing that "no court . . . shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider . . . an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by . . . an alien detained . . . at Guantanamo Bay"). After the Court decided, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006), that this language of the Detainee Treatment Act did not apply to detainees whose cases were pending at the time of enactment, the language was amended by the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Pub. L. No. 109–366, to also apply to pending cases where a detainee had been determined to be an enemy combatant.

[10] 553 U.S. 723 (2008).

Clause.[11] Although the historical record did not contain significant common-law applications of the writ to foreign nationals who were apprehended and detained overseas, the Court did not find this conclusive in evaluating whether habeas applied in this case.[12] Emphasizing a "functional" approach to the issue,[13] the Court considered (1) the citizenship and status of the detainee and the adequacy of the process through which the status determination was made; (2) the nature of the sites where apprehension and detention took place; and (3) any practical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner's entitlement to the writ. As in Rasul, the Court distinguished previous case law, noting that the instant detainees disputed their enemy status, that their ability to dispute their status had been limited, that they were held in a location (Guantanamo Bay, Cuba) under the de facto jurisdiction of the United States, and that complying with the demands of habeas petitions would not interfere with the government's military mission. Thus, the Court concluded that the Suspension Clause was in full effect regarding these detainees.

ArtII.S2.C1.1.19 Military Commissions

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld,[1] the Supreme Court reviewed the validity of military tribunals established pursuant to President George W. Bush's military order[2] to try suspected terrorists for violations of the law of war. The petitioner Hamdan was charged with conspiracy to commit a violation of the law of war. The Supreme Court declined the government's invitation to invoke the doctrine established in Schlesinger v. Councilman[3] to abstain from reviewing the merits of the case until the military commission had issued a verdict.[4] The Court found the military commissions unlawful, holding that the tribunals as convened did not comply with the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ)[5] or the law of war, as incorporated in the UCMJ and embodied in the 1949 Geneva Conventions, which, despite a presidential determination to the [11] U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 2 provides: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." In Boumediene, the government argued only that the Suspension Clause did not apply to the detainees; it did not argue that Congress had acted to suspend habeas.

[12] "[G]iven the unique status of Guantanamo Bay and the particular dangers of terrorism in the modern age, the common-law courts simply may not have confronted cases with close parallels to this one. We decline, therefore, to infer too much, one way or the other, from the lack of historical evidence on this point." 553 U.S. at 752.

[13] 553 U.S. at 764. "[Q]uestions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism." Id.

[1] Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006).

[2] Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, 66 Fed. Reg. 57831 (Nov. 13, 2001).

[3] Schlesinger v. Councilman, 420 U.S. 738, 740 (1975), ("[T]he balance of factors governing exercise of equitable jurisdiction by federal courts normally weighs against intervention, by injunction or otherwise, in pending court-martial proceedings.").

[4] Hamdan, 548 U.S. at 587 (holding that comity considerations weighed against abstention where concerns about military discipline do not apply and the petitioner did not have the opportunity to appeal any verdict the military commission may render to an independent appellate body).

[5] 10 U.S.C. §§ 801–946a.

contrary,[6] the Court held applicable to the armed conflict with Al Qaeda. The Court concluded that, at a minimum, Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applies to persons captured in the conflict with Al Qaeda, according to them a minimum baseline of protections, including protection from the "passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."[7] The Court held that military commissions were not "regularly constituted" because they deviated too far from the rules that apply to courts-martial, without a satisfactory explanation of the need for departing from such rules.[8] In particular, the Court noted that the commission rules allowing the exclusion of the defendant from attending portions of his trial or hearing some of the evidence against him deviated substantially from court-martial procedures.[9]

A four-Justice plurality of the Court also recognized that for an act to be triable under the common law of war, the precedent for it being treated as an offense must be "plain and unambiguous."[10] After examining the history of military commission practice in the United States and internationally, the plurality further concluded that conspiracy to violate the law of war was not in itself a crime under the common law of war or the UCMJ.

ArtII.S2.C1.2 Executive Departments

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1 authorizes the President to require the department heads of the Executive Branch to advise the President in writing on matters relating to their duties. The Framers adopted this provision when proposals to establish a Council of State to advise the President failed to win the necessary support at the Constitutional Convention.[1] In the Federalist No. 74, Alexander Hamilton credited Article II, Section 2, Clause 1 with little importance, stating that he considered the provision to be a "mere redundancy" because "the right for which it provides would result of itself from the office."[2] Discussing the provision in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story opined that while the President's right to require such opinion "would result from the very nature of the office," the provision serves a purpose by "impos[ing] a more strict responsibility, and recognizes a public duty of high importance and value in critical times."[3] [6] White House Memorandum, Humane Treatment of Taliban and al Qaeda Detainees ¶ 2 (Feb. 7, 2002), available at https://www.pegc.us/archive/White_House/bush_memo_20020207_ed.pdf.

---

[7] Hamdan, 548 U.S. at 629.

[8] Id. at 632.

[9] Id. at 634.

[10] Id. at 602 (2006) (Stevens, J., plurality opinion, joined by Souter, J., Ginsburg, J., and Breyer, J.).

[1] 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 70, 97, 110 (Max Farrand ed., 1911); 2 id. at 285, 328, 335–37, 367, 537–42. Debate on the issue in the Convention is discussed in Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency 1775–1789 105–110, 116 (Amagi Books 2007) (1923).

[2] The Federalist No. 74 (Alexander Hamilton).

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1487 (1837).

President George Washington established the practice of the Executive Branch department heads meeting collectively to advise the President as a Cabinet.[4] Consequently, Cabinet meetings are not required under the Constitution.[5]

ArtII.S2.C1.3 Pardons

ArtII.S2.C1.3.1 Overview of Pardon Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The Constitution establishes the President's authority to grant clemency, encompassing not only pardons of individuals but several other forms of relief from criminal punishment as well.[1] The power, which has historical roots in early English law,[2] has been recognized by the Supreme Court as quite broad. In the 1886 case Ex parte Garland, the Court referred to the President's authority to pardon as "unlimited" except in cases of impeachment, extending to "every offence known to the law" and able to be exercised "either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment."[3] Much later, the Court wrote that the "broad power conferred" in the Constitution gives the President "plenary authority" to "'forgive' [a] convicted person in part or entirely, to reduce a penalty in terms of a specified number of years, or to alter it" with certain conditions.[4]

Despite the breadth of the President's authority under the Pardon Clause, the Constitution's text provides for at least two limits on the power: first, clemency may only be granted for "Offenses against the United States,"[5] meaning that state criminal offenses and federal or state civil claims are not covered.[6] Second, the President's clemency authority cannot be used "in Cases of impeachment."[7]

Beyond textual limits, certain external constitutional and legal considerations may act as constraints on the power. For instance, the Court has indicated that the power may be

---

[4] Leonard White, The Federalists: A Study in Administrative History ch. 4 (1948).

[5] Edward S. Corwin, Presidential Power and the Constitution 89 (Richard Loss, ed., 1976)

[1] See Clemency, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) (defining clemency, in part, as "the power of the President . . . to pardon a criminal or commute a criminal sentence").

[2] 1 Benjamin Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England 46 (1840) (reflecting law "of fighting" in the Laws of King Ine: "If any one fight in the king's house, let him be liable in all his property, and be it in the king's doom whether he shall or shall not have life").

[3] 71 U.S. 333, 380 (1866); see also United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128, 147 (1871) ("To the executive alone is intrusted the power of pardon; and it is granted without limit.").

[4] Schick v. Reed, 419 U.S. 256, 266 (1974).

[5] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[6] Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 111, 115, 122 (1925) (acknowledging that phrase was included "presumably to make clear that the pardon of the President was to operate upon offenses against the United States as distinguished from offenses against the states" and distinguishing between civil and criminal contempt for purposes of pardon authority).

[7] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1; see Garland, 71 U.S. at 373 (acknowledging that the President's authority to grant pardons is subject to the exception of "cases of impeachment" and that "[w]ith that exception the power is unlimited").

exercised "at any time after [an offense's] commission,"[8] reflecting that the President may not preemptively immunize future criminal conduct. In Schick v. Reed, the Court recognized that an exercise of clemency may include "any condition which does not otherwise offend the Constitution,"[9] suggesting that the President may not make clemency subject to a condition that is prohibited by another constitutional provision.[10] Other apparent limitations include not affecting vested rights of third parties, such as where forfeited property is sold,[11] or proceeds "paid into the treasury," which "can only be secured to the former owner . . . through an act of [C]ongress."[12] The Court in The Laura also alluded to an exception for "fines . . . imposed by a co-ordinate department of the government for contempt of its authority,"[13] though a later case recognized that the President may pardon one who is subject to criminal punishment for contempt of court.[14]

Assuming the recognized limitations are not transgressed, a full pardon granted by the President and accepted by its subject[15] prevents or removes "any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction . . . ."[16] In several nineteenth-century cases, the Supreme Court suggested that a pardon broadly obviates all legal guilt of the offender, effectively erasing the crime from existence.[17] Subsequent cases appear to have backed away from this understanding,[18] suggesting instead that, although a full pardon precludes punishment for the offense in question, a prior and pardoned offense may still be considered in subsequent proceedings.[19]

---

[8] Garland, 71 U.S. at 380.

[9] 419 U.S. at 267.

[10] See Id. ("Of course, the President may not aggravate punishment.").

[11] Knote v. United States, 95 U.S. 149, 154 (1877) ("Neither does the pardon affect any rights which have vested in others directly by the execution of the judgment for the offence, or which have been acquired by others whilst that judgment was in force.").

[12] Ill. C.R. Co. v. Bosworth, 133 U.S. 92, 104–05 (1890); see also Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333, 381 (1866) (explaining that pardons do not "restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment"); Semmes v. United States, 91 U.S. 21, 27 (1875) (holding that a pardon did not interfere with the right of a purchaser of forfeited property).

[13] 114 U.S. 411, 413 (1885).

[14] Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 122 (1925). Other possible limitations—for instance, whether the President may issue a self-pardon or pardon contempt of Congress—have been the subject of debate but have not been addressed by the Supreme Court. E.g., Paul F. Eckstein & Mikaela Colby, Presidential Pardon Power: Are There Limits and, If Not, Should There Be?, 51 Ariz. St. L.J. 71, 97–100 (2019) (surveying arguments regarding authority to self-pardon); Charles D. Berger, The Effect of Presidential Pardons on Disclosure of Information: Is Our Cynicism Justified?, 52 Okla. L. Rev. 163, 181 (1999) (describing pardon of Dr. Francis Townsend for contempt of Congress, without court challenge, during the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt).

[15] See Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79, 94 (1915) ("Granting, then, that the pardon was legally issued and was sufficient for immunity, it was Burdick's right to refuse it[.]"); but cf. Biddle v. Perovich, 274 U.S. 480, 486–87 (1927) (indicating that consent is not required in the context of commutation or remission, and that "the public welfare, not [the individual's] consent, determines what shall be done").

[16] Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333, 381 (1866).

[17] See Id. at 381–82 ("A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full, it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt[.]"); Carlisle v. United States, 83 U.S. 147, 151 (1872) (reflecting understanding that pardon "not merely releases the offender from the punishment prescribed for the offence, but . . . obliterates in legal contemplation the offence itself").

[18] See Burdick, 236 U.S. at 94 ("[A pardon] carries an imputation of guilt; acceptance a confession of it").

[19] See Carlesi v. New York, 233 U.S. 51, 59 (1914) (determining that pardoned offense could still be considered "as a circumstance of aggravation" under a state habitual-offender law); Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 232 (1993) (stating in dicta that a pardon "is in no sense an overturning of a judgment of conviction by some other tribunal; it is '[a]n executive action that mitigates or sets aside punishment for a crime'"); see also Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry., 151 U.S. 1, 19 (1894) ("An executive may pardon and thus relieve a wrongdoer from the punishment the public exacts for the wrong, but neither executive nor legislature can pardon a private wrong, or relieve the wrongdoer from civil liability to the individual he has wronged.").

ArtII.S2.C1.3.1
Overview of Pardon Power

Congress generally cannot substantively constrain the President's pardon authority through legislation, as the Court has held that the "power of the President is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restrictions."[20] Nevertheless, there is historical precedent for legislation facilitating the exercise of the pardon power through funding of Executive Branch positions to review clemency petitions.[21] Congress also has other constitutional tools that it may use in relation to the President's pardon authority, provided the legal conditions associated with those tools are met, such as oversight,[22] impeachment,[23] and constitutional amendment.[24]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.2 Historical Background on Pardon Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The presidential power to "grant [r]eprieves and [p]ardons" is, at its core, the authority to grant relief from the consequences of a criminal act.[1] The President's authority under Article II, Section 2 encompasses several distinct forms of relief that may be temporary or permanent, partial or wholesale, and may be granted at any time after alleged commission of a federal crime.[2]

The broad concept of governmental authority to provide relief from criminal punishment has deep historical roots.[3] The power vested in the President by the Constitution traces its origins to authority held by the English Crown,[4] leading the Supreme Court to look to legal

---

[20] Garland, 71 U.S. at 380; see also Schick v. Reed, 419 U.S. 256, 266 (1974) ("[T]he power [of clemency] flows from the Constitution alone, not from any legislative enactments, and . . . it cannot be modified, abridged, or diminished by the Congress.").

[21] E.g., An Act Amendatory of the Acts Relative to the Attorney-General's Office, and to Fix the Compensation of his Assistant and Clerks, ch. 98, 13 Stat. 516 (1865) (authorizing Attorney General to employ and provide salary for "pardon clerk," among others). Some early Supreme Court language also suggested Congress can itself grant pardons or amnesties through legislation, see Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 601 (1896) (noting that pardon power of President "has never been held to take from congress the power to pass acts of general amnesty"), though the continued vitality of this ostensible authority is unclear.

[22] E.g., Pardon of Richard M. Nixon, and Related Matters: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93D CONG. 90–151 (1974) (testimony of President Gerald Ford).

[23] See Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 121 (1925) (indicating that hypothetical effort by President to "deprive a court of power to enforce its orders" through successive pardons "would suggest a resort to impeachment").

[24] E.g., S.J.Res. 241, 93rd Cong. (1974) (proposing constitutional amendment to provide mechanism for congressional disapproval of pardons).

[1] See, e.g., Biddle v. Perovich, 274 U.S. 480, 486 (1927) (stating that a pardon "is the determination of the ultimate authority that the public welfare will be better served by inflicting less than what the judgment fixed").

[2] See ArtII.S2.C1.3.5 Scope of Pardon Power.

[3] See 3 Dep't of Just., The Attorney General's Survey of Release Procedures 2–13 (1939) (discussing pardon principles under Mosaic, Greek, and Roman law).

[4] Schick v. Reed, 419 U.S. 256, 260 (1974) (recognizing that the Framers "were well acquainted with the English Crown authority to alter and reduce punishments as it existed in 1787").

principles underlying the latter in interpreting the scope of the former.[5] A "prerogative of mercy" held by the King appeared during the reign of King Ine of Wessex (688–725 A.D.)[6] and by 1535 had been declared by Parliament, during the reign of King Henry VIII (1509–1547 A.D.), as a right exclusive to the Crown.[7] Though broad in application, the power as it existed through the colonial period did have legal limits, which grew in number in response to perceived abuses of the King's authority.[8] For instance, a pardon could not impair certain rights of third parties[9] and, by act of Parliament in 1701, pardons could not be pleaded to bar impeachment (though a pardon following sentence was still available).[10]

Prior to the American Revolution, the King's pardon authority applied in the American colonies through delegation to colonial authorities.[11] The English legal tradition of pardon then directly influenced the framers of the U.S. Constitution following independence.[12] The two major plans offered at the Constitutional Convention—the Virginia and New Jersey Plans—did not address pardons.[13] In suggested amendments to the Virginia Plan, however, Alexander Hamilton included a pardon power vested in an "Executive authority" that could be exercised over "all offences except Treason," with a pardon for treason requiring Senate approval.[14] The first report of the Committee of Detail included a proposed provision giving the President power to grant reprieves and pardons, with the only exception being that a pardon would "not be pleadable in bar of an impeachment."[15]

There was little debate at the Constitutional Convention of the pardon power,[16] though several exceptions and limitations were proposed. Edmund Randolph proposed reincorporating an exception for cases of treason, arguing that extending pardon authority to such cases "was too great a trust," that the President "may himself be guilty," and that the "Traytors may be his own instruments."[17] George Mason likewise argued that treason should be excepted for fear that the President could otherwise "frequently pardon crimes which were advised by himself" to "stop inquiry and prevent detection," eventually "establish[ing] a [5] United States v. Wilson, 32 U.S. 150, 160 (1833) ("As this power has been exercised, from time immemorial, by the executive of that nation whose language is our language, and to whose judicial institutions ours bear a close resemblance; we adopt their principles respecting the operation and effect of a pardon, and look into their books for the rules prescribing the manner in which it is to be used by the person who would avail himself of it.").

[6] 1 Benjamin Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England 46 (1840) (reflecting law "of fighting" in the Laws of King Ine: "If any one fight in the king's house, let him be liable in all his property, and be it in the king's doom whether he shall or shall not have life").

[7] 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 397 (1765) (recognizing declaration in statute during reign of King Henry VIII that "the king hath the whole and sole" power to pardon).

[8] Schick, 419 U.S. at 260–61 (referring to "gradual contraction" or English pardon power through "specifically defined" legal limits "as potential or actual abuses were perceived").

[9] E.g., 4 Blackstone, supra note 7, at 398 ("Neither . . . can the king pardon an offence against a popular or penal statute after information brought; for thereby the informer hath acquired a private property in his part of the penalty.").

[10] Id. at 399–400.

[11] See, e.g., 7 Francis Newton Thorpe, American Charters, Constitutions and Organic Laws 3800–01 (1909) (granting, in Second Charter of Virginia from 1609, "full and absolute Power and Authority to correct, punish, pardon, govern, and rule all" subjects).

[12] E.g., 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1496 (1833) (noting that exception for impeachment "was probably borrowed" from England).

[13] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 20–23 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Virginia Plan, in Madison's notes); Id. at 242–45 (New Jersey Plan, in Madison's notes).

[14] Id. at 292.

[15] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 185.

[16] Schick v. Reed, 419 U.S. 256, 262 (1974).

[17] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 626 (Madison's notes).

monarchy, and destroy[ing] the republic."[18] James Wilson responded to such arguments by pointing out that if the President were himself involved in treasonous conduct, he could be impeached.[19] Randolph's motion was defeated by an 8-2 vote, with one divided.[20] Another proposal would have made reprieves and pardons available only after conviction.[21] However, when James Wilson pointed out that pre-conviction pardons might be needed to secure accomplice testimony, the motion to add the language was withdrawn.[22]

Additional proposals and discussion at the Constitutional Convention centered on what role, if any, the legislature should play in the pardon power's exercise. For instance, during debate of Edmund Randolph's proposal to except treason, James Madison expressed a preference for Senate consultation in such cases.[23] Others, however, conveyed unease at the prospect of giving the legislature a role in the pardon process, arguing that a body "governed too much by the passions of the moment" was "utterly unfit for the purpose" and that such a role would be inconsistent with the constitutional separation of powers.[24] Separately, Roger Sherman proposed making reprieves applicable only until the ensuing Senate session and requiring Senate consent for all pardons.[25] Sherman's motion was defeated by a vote of 8-1.[26]

During the same session, the final language of the impeachment exception—"except in cases of impeachment"—was added without noted discussion, supplanting proposed language more closely mirroring the English limitation that a pardon should "not be pleadable in bar."[27] It appears to have been understood that, in its final form, the impeachment exception did not permit pardon following conclusion of impeachment proceedings (as had been the case under English law)—in a pamphlet published during the ratification debates, James Iredell noted that the king "may pardon after conviction, even on an impeachment; which is an authority not given to our President, who in case of impeachments has no power either of pardoning or reprieving."[28]

In the Federalist No. 74, Alexander Hamilton maintained that the broad, Executive-held pardon power encompassed in the Constitution was desirable, arguing such a power "should be as little as possible fettered or embarrassed" to ensure "easy access to exceptions in favour of unfortunate guilt."[29] Hamilton also averred that locating the power solely with the President would lead to its most beneficial exercise, as a single person would be "a more eligible dispenser of the mercy of the government than a body of men" who "might often encourage each other in an act of obduracy, and might be less sensible to the apprehension of suspicion or censure for an injudicious or affected clemency."[30] With respect to concerns that cases of treason should not be pardonable or should be dependent on legislative assent, Hamilton raised several points in response, including (1) treason might often be connected with sedition involving a broader portion of the community, in which case "the representation of the people [18] 3 The Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, As Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, at 497 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1836).

[19] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 626 (Madison's notes).

[20] Id. at 627.

[21] Id. at 426.

[22] Id.

[23] Id.

[24] Id. at 626.

[25] Id. at 419.

[26] Id.

[27] Id.

[28] Pamphlets on The Constitution of the United States 351 n.* (P. Ford ed., 1888).

[29] The Federalist No. 74 (Alexander Hamilton).

[30] Id.

[might be] tainted with the same spirit which had given birth to the offence"[31]; (2) during an insurrection or rebellion, a "well-timed" offer of pardon to insurgents might be necessary but could be stymied if it were necessary to convene the legislature and obtain its sanction;[32] and (3) the exception for impeachment was sufficient to protect against abuses of the pardon power related to potentially treasonous conduct in which the President himself was implicated, as he "could shelter no offender, in any degree, from the effects of impeachment and conviction."[33]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.3 Pardon Power and Forms of Clemency Generally

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution gives the President power to "grant Reprieves and Pardons."[1] Encompassed in this provision is the authority to provide relief from the punishment that would otherwise follow from commission of an "Offence[ ] against the United States," i.e., a federal crime.[2] The President's power in this respect encompasses several related forms of relief, including not only a full, individual pardon and time-limited reprieve but also amnesty for groups of offenders, commutation of a criminal sentence, and remission of fines or penalties.[3]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.4 Types

ArtII.S2.C1.3.4.1 Pardons Generally

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

A full or absolute pardon obviates any punishment for the crime at issue and restores the offender's civil rights, if applicable.[1] In the 1866 case Ex parte Garland, the Supreme Court recognized that a pardon granted before conviction "prevents any of the penalities and

---

[31] Id.

[32] Id.

[33] The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton).

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128, 147 (1871) (stating that a pardon "blots out the offence pardoned and removes all its penal consequences").

[3] See Ex parte Wells, 59 U.S. 307, 309–10, 314 (1855) (indicating that the pardon power extends "to all kinds of pardons known in the law as such, whatever may be their denomination," including not only "absolute pardon[s]" but also more limited forms of release, remission, and repreive); Klein, 80 U.S. at 147 ("Pardon includes amnesty.").

[1] The Supreme Court's view of the legal effect of a pardon has changed somewhat over time and is discussed in more detail at ArtII.S2.C1.3.7 Legal Effect of a Pardon.

disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching," and "if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights . . . ."[2]

A pardon may be made subject to conditions. In Ex parte Wells, the Court directly addressed the question of whether the pardon power included the power to pardon conditionally and concluded, in reliance on English precedent, that it does.[3] Yet the scope of the President's power to grant pardons has limits. With respect to conditions, the Court in the 1974 case Schick v. Reed stated that "considerations of public policy and humanitarian impulses support an interpretation of [the] power so as to permit the attachment of any condition which does not otherwise offend the Constitution,"[4] though the Court has not addressed the scope of this limitation on conditional pardons in any subsequent case. Regardless, a pardon may only be granted after the commission of the eligible offense,[5] though the clemency may precede any institution of formal proceedings.[6] A pardon is also waivable. In United States v. Wilson, the defendant pled guilty to a federal offense and, upon inquiry by the lower court as to the effect of a pardon known to have been granted to him, "waived and declined any advantage or protection which might be supposed to arise from the pardon referred to."[7] The Supreme Court gave effect to the defendant's wish, concluding that because the pardon was not "brought judicially before the court, by plea, motion or otherwise, ought not to be noticed by the judges, or in any manner to affect the judgment of the law."[8] As a corollary, a pardon must be accepted to be effective,[9] though this principle appears to differ as between pardons on the one hand and commutation and remission on the other.[10]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.4.2 Amnesties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Amnesty is essentially identical to pardon in ultimate effect, with the principal distinction between the two being that amnesty typically "is extended to whole classes or communities,

[2] 71 U.S. 333, 380 (1866).

[3] 59 U.S. at 315 (explaining that the "power to pardon conditionally is not one of inference at all, but one conferred in terms"); see also Klein, 80 U.S. at 147 (recognizing that pardon "may be granted on conditions"). Though referred to in places as a conditional pardon, the act of clemency in Wells was in practice a commutation, that is, substitution of a less severe punishment in place of a more severe one, which is discussed in more detail infra.

[4] 419 U.S. 256, 266 (1974). The Court in Schick addressed a conditional commutation, and Justice Thurgood Marshall, writing in dissent and joined by Justices William O. Douglas and William Brennan, argued that the condition at issue could not be constitutionally imposed. See id. at 274 (Marshall, J., dissenting).

[5] Garland, 71 U.S. at 380 (stating that a pardon "may be exercised at any time after [an offense's] commission").

[6] Id. (recognizing that pardon may be granted "either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment"). For instance, President Gerald Ford pardoned former President Richard Nixon for any federal crimes he may have committed in relation to the Watergate scandal, before any charges could be brought. See Pardon of Richard M. Nixon and Related Matters: Hearings Before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, 93d Cong. (1974).

[7] United States v. Wilson, 32 U.S. 150, 158 (1833).

[8] Id. at 163.

[9] Id. at 161; Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79, 94 (1915) (holding that "it was Burdick's right to refuse [the pardon]" and his refusal allowed him to maintain "his right under the Constitution to decline to testify").

[10] See ArtII.S2.C1.3.6 Rejection of a Pardon.

instead of individuals[.]"[1] As with other forms of clemency, amnesty may be partial or conditional.[2] Among others, prominent examples of amnesty ocurred during and after the Civil War and the Vietnam War. For instance, Presidents Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson issued a series of proclamations offering and ultimately granting amnesty to those who participated in the Civil War on the side of the Confederacy,[3] and the Supreme Court decided several cases addressing the implications of such amnesty for property seized by statute.[4] Beyond the Civil War, a more recent historical example of amnesty came in the 1970s, when President Jimmy Carter granted amnesty to many who violated the Selective Service Act by evading the draft during the Vietnam War.[5]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.4.3 Commutations, Remissions, and Reprieves

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Rather than obviating punishment in its entirety, as pardon and amnesty may do, commutation substitutes the punishment imposed by a federal court for a less severe punishment, such as by reducing a sentence of imprisonment.[1] Similarly, remission operates to reduce or discharge criminal "fines, penalties, and forfeitures of every description arising

---

[1] Knote v. United States, 95 U.S. 149, 153 (1877); see id. (indicating that distinction between the two terms "is one rather of philological interest than of legal importance"); Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 601–02 (1896) (dismissing any "distinction between amnesty and pardon" as "of no practical importance" and describing amnesty as "a general pardon for a past offense" that "is rarely, if ever, exercised in favor of single individuals, and is usually exerted in behalf of certain classes ofp ersons, who are subject to trial, but have not yet been convicted"). In Burdick v. United States, the Court suggested that there are other "incidental differences of importance" between pardon and amnesty, including that amnesty "overlooks offense" rather than "remit[ting] punishment" and is "usually addressed to crimes against the sovereignty of the state, to political offenses, deemed more expedient for the public welfare than prosecution and punishment." 236 U.S. at 95.

[2] See Semmes v. United States, 91 U.S. 21, 26 (1875) (describing proclamation of amnesty with certain exceptions and recognizing that property at issue fell "within [an] exception contained in that proclamation; which is all that need be said upon that subject").

[3] See United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128, 139–41 (1871) (tracing series of proclamations and ultimate grant of amnesty).

[4] See United States v. Padelford 76 U.S. 531, 543 (1869) (holding that amnesty covering offenses connected with the rebellion operated as "a complete substitute for proof that [the recipient] gave no aid or comfort" to the same and that "he was purged of whatever offence against the laws of the United States he had committed . . . and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred"); see also Armstrong v. United States, 80 U.S. 154, 155–56 (1871) (ruling amnesty for participation in rebellion entitled claimant to proceeds of property under Abandoned and Captured Property Act); Pargoud v. United States, 80 U.S. 156, 157 (1871) (same); but cf. Knote, 95 U.S. at 154 (holding that amnesty for participation on the side of the Confederacy did not entitle a recipient to claim monies from property seized and paid into the Treasury, as pardons and amnesties "cannot touch moneys in the treasury of the United States, except expressly authorized by act of Congress"); Hart v. United States, 118 U.S. 62, 67 (1886) ("[N]o pardon could have had the effect to authorize the payment out of a general appropriation of a debt which a law of congress had said should not be paid out of it."). For the Court's treatment of Congress's subsequent effort to prevent pardon recipients from taking advantage of the restoration procedures under the Act, in Klein, see ArtII.S2.C1.3.8 Congress's Role in Pardons.

[5] See Exec. Order No. 11967, 42 Fed. Reg. 4393 (Jan. 21, 1977).

[1] See Biddle v. Perovich, 274 U.S. 480, 486–87 (1927) (approving commutation of death sentence to life imprisonment, writing, "No one doubts that a reduction of the term of an imprisonment or the amount of a fine would limit the sentence effectively on the one side and on the other would leave the reduced term or fine valid and to be enforced"); Ex parte Wells, 59 U.S. 307, 315 (1855) (affirming President's power to conditionally pardon where clemency under the laws of [C]ongress."[2] As discussed elsewhere, however, money paid into the treasury or property in which the rights of a third party have vested are beyond the reach of the President's authority.[3]

As with other forms of clemency, commutation or remission may be conditional. In Schick v. Reed, the Court addressed a challenge to the validity of a condition attached to a commutation of the petitioner's death sentence to life imprisonment that prohibited the petitioner from ever being eligible for parole.[4] The petitioner argued that the condition exceeded the President's authority because it was not authorized by statute and, had the commutation not been granted, the petitioner's death sentence would have been set aside by an intervening Supreme Court decision regardless.[5] The Court rejected these arguments, holding that the conditional commutation "was lawful," as "the pardoning power was intended to include the power to commute sentences on conditions which do not in themselves offend the Constitution, but which are not specifically provided for by statute."[6]

Despite the explicit inclusion of reprieve in the constitutional text, Supreme Court discussion of its contours is scant. In Ex parte Wells, the Court described reprieve in dicta as "delay [of] a judicial sentence when the President shall think the merits of the case, or some cause connected with the offender, may require it," as well as cases of legal necessity (with the two examples given being pregnancy and the onset of "insan[ity]").[7] Historical practice has been consistent with the understanding that the President's power includes authority to temporarily delay execution of a criminal sentence. For example, President Bill Clinton issued reprieves delaying twice the execution date of Juan Raul Garza, who had been convicted of capital homicide offenses, so that the Department of Justice could conduct a study of certain disparities in imposition of the federal death penalty.[8]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.5 Scope of Pardon Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive granted was, in practice, a commutation of death sentence to life imprisonment, substituting "a lesser punishment than the law has imposed upon him"). For a discussion of Biddle in the context of acceptance of commutation or remission, see ArtII.S2.C1.3.6 Rejection of a Pardon.

---

[2] The Laura, 114 U.S. 411, 413–14 (1885); see Osborn v. United States, 91 U.S. 474, 478 (1875) ("[T]he constitutional grant to the President of the power to pardon offences must be held to carry with it, as an incident, the power to release penalties and forfeitures which accrue from the offences.").

[3] Knote, 95 U.S. at 154 ("Neither does the pardon affect any rights which have vested in others . . . . If, for example, by the judgment a sale of the offender's property has been had, the purchaser will hold the property notwithstanding the subsequent pardon. . . . So, also, if the proceeds have been paid into the treasury, the right to them has so far become vested in the United States that they can only be secured to the former owner of the property through an act of Congress."); Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Bosworth, 133 U.S. 92, 103 (1890) (quoting extensively from Knote and recognizing that "a pardon does not affect vested interests").

[4] 419 U.S. 256, 257 (1974).

[5] Id. at 259–60.

[6] Id. at 264, 268.

[7] 59 U.S. 307, 314 (1855).

[8] See Commutations Granted by President William J. Clinton (1993–2001), U.S. Dep't of Justice: Off. of the Pardon Att'y, https://www.justice.gov/pardon/commutations-granted-president-william-j-clinton-1993–2001 (last updated Apr. 28, 2021).

Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Regardless of the type of clemency at issue, the President's power extends only to "offences against the United States," meaning federal crimes but not state or civil wrongs.[1] One question the Supreme Court has addressed concerns the extent to which the pardon power reaches contempt of another branch's authority; specifically, contempt of court. In the 1885 case The Laura, the Court recognized that the pardon power includes the power to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures but noted an exception for "fines . . . imposed by a co-ordinate department of the government for contempt of its authority."[2] Forty years later, the Court in Ex parte Grossman held that the President may pardon criminal (but not civil) contempts of a federal court.[3] The Court explained that the independence of each branch of the federal government was "qualified" by "co-ordinating checks and balances of the Constitution" and thus did not "constitute a broadly positive injunction or a necessarily controlling rule of construction" on the question of the scope of the President's pardon authority.[4]

Whether the Court's ruling in Grossman extends to contempt of Congress is an open question.[5] Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story, in his famous 1833 treatise Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, asserted that contempt of Congress is excluded from the scope of the pardon power "by implication," as presidential authority to pardon congressional contemnors would result in Congress being "wholly dependent upon his good will and pleasure for the exercise of their own powers."[6] Nevertheless, in Grossman, the Court suggested that the remedy of impeachment would be sufficient to counter abuse of the pardon power.[7] It appears that there is at least one historical example of a pardon of contempt of Congress, granted by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, which apparently went unchallenged in court.[8]

The textual exception to the pardon power, "in Cases of Impeachment," likewise has not been the subject of sustained Supreme Court analysis. Historically, a similar exception under English law prevented a pardon from being pleaded to bar impeachment but still permitted pardon following conviction.[9] The exception in the U.S. Constitution appears to have been

---

[1] Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 113 (1925) (stating that phrase was included "presumably to make clear that the pardon of the President was to operate upon offenses against the United States as distinguished from offenses against the states" and recognizing that criminal, but not civil, contempt is pardonable); Young v. United States, 97 U.S. 39, 66 (1877) ("But if there is no offence against the laws of the United States, there can be no pardon by the President.").

[2] 114 U.S. 411, 413 (1885).

[3] 267 U.S. at 122.

[4] Id. at 120, 122. Although the Court in Grossman did not find that separation of powers concerns warranted an exclusion of contempt of court from clemency's reach, the Court had previously suggested that permanent judicial suspension of a required and legally valid final sentence "based upon considerations extraneous to the legality of the conviction or the duty to enforce the sentence" is an incursion on the President's pardon authority. Ex parte United States, 242 U.S. 27, 37(1916); see id. at 42 (referring to "disregard of the Constitution which would result" from contrary ruling, as, among other things, "the right to relieve from the punishment fixed by law and ascertained according to the methods by it provided, belongs to the executive department."); but cf. United States v. Benz, 282 U.S. 304, 311 (1931) (concluding that judicial amendment of sentence during same court term to reduce length of imprisonment was judicial act "readily distinguishable" from act of clemency that "abridges the enforcement of the judgment").

[5] See Grossman, 267 U.S. at 118 (acknowledging view of former Attorney General that "the pardoning power did not include impeachments or contempts" but noting that "the author's exception of contempts had reference only to contempts of a House of Congress").

[6] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 353 (1833).

[7] Grossman, 267 U.S. at 121.

[8] See Townsend Freed, Feels 'Vindicated,' N.Y. Times (Apr. 19, 1938), [9] 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 399–400 (1765).

understood to reach more broadly, however, with James Iredell remarking during the ratification debates that such "authority [is] not given to our President."[10] And in Ex parte Wells, the Supreme Court noted in passing the English provision and referred to the impeachment exception in the Constitution as "an improvement upon the same."[11]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.6 Rejection of a Pardon

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

In the 1833 case United States v. Wilson, Chief Justice John Marshall wrote for the Court that a pardon is a private "act of grace," a "deed, to the validity of which, delivery is essential, and delivery is not complete, without acceptance. It may then be rejected by the person to whom it is tendered; and if it be rejected, we have discovered no power in a court to force it on him."[1] Though the Court in Wilson doubted that a "being condemned to death would reject a pardon," it recognized that a pardon might be rejected regardless of the gravity of the punishment, as, for instance, if the pardon were conditional "the condition may be more objectionable than the punishment inflicted by the judgment."[2]

Almost a century later, in Burdick v. United States, the Court confirmed that a pardon may be refused, at least where other constitutional rights are at stake.[3] Burdick involved a pardon issued by President Woodrow Wilson to George Burdick, an editor at the New York Tribune, for any federal offenses he "may have committed" in connection with the publication of an article regarding alleged customs fraud, despite the fact that Burdick had not been charged with any crime at the time of the pardon.[4] The apparent motivation for the pardon was that Burdick had refused to testify before a grand jury investigating the involvement of Treasury Department officials in leaks concerning the wrongdoing, asserting his Fifth Amendment right not to provide testimony that would tend to incriminate him.[5] Despite President Wilson's issuance of the pardon, Burdick "refused to accept" it and continued to refuse to answer certain questions put to him before the grand jury.[6] The Supreme Court in Burdick assumed that the pardon was within the President's power to issue and concluded that "it was Burdick's right to refuse it" and stand on his Fifth Amendment objection.[7] [10] Pamphlets on The Constitution of the United States 351 n.* (P. Ford ed., 1888); see also 3 Story, supra note 6, at 352 (stating that the President "possesses no such power in any case of impeachment").

---

[11] 59 U.S. 307, 312 (1855); see also Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 232 (1993) ("The exception from the President's pardon authority of cases of impeachment was a separate determination by the Framers that executive clemency should not be available in such cases."); ArtII.S2.C1.3.2 Historical Background on Pardon Power.

[1] 32 U.S. 150, 160–61 (1833).

[2] Id.

[3] 236 U.S. 79, 94 (1915).

[4] Id. at 85–86.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 87.

[7] Id. at 94. The Court relied on Burdick to decide a separate case the same day on "almost identical" facts. Curtin v. United States, 236 U.S. 96, 97 (1915).

Burdick notwithstanding, if a pardon is accepted, it obviates a Fifth Amendment objection to providing testimony.[8] Additionally, it appears that the Wilson/Burdick rule does not extend to commutations and remissions. In the later case Biddle v. Perovich, the Court considered a commutation of a death sentence to life imprisonment that the recipient argued was "without his consent and without legal authority."[9] The Biddle Court disagreed with this assessment, stating, contrary to the language of Wilson, that a pardon "is not a private act of grace" but is rather a determination of what the public welfare requires.[10] As such, in the Biddle Court's view, "the public welfare, not [a recipient's] consent determines what shall be done."[11] On this basis, the Court in Biddle concluded that Burdick should not "be extended to the present case," indicating that no one doubted "a reduction of the term of an imprisonment or the amount of a fine would limit the sentence effectively on the one side and on the other would leave the reduced term or fine valid and to be enforced" with "the convict's consent . . . not required."[12]

ArtII.S2.C1.3.7 Legal Effect of a Pardon

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The legal significance of a pardon has been a subject of shifting judicial views over time. In the 1866 case Ex parte Garland, the Court took a broad view of the nature and consquence of a pardon:

> A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full, it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offence. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching; if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all civil rights; it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity.[1]

Subsequent cases of the era maintained this view that pardon "blots out" both guilt and punishment—for instance, in Carlisle v. United States, the Court wrote that a pardon "not merely releases the offender from the punishment prescribed for the offence, but . . . obliterates in legal contemplation the offence itself."[2] As such, the Court in Carlisle determined that a pardon entitled its recipient to obtain the proceeds of property previously abandoned or [8] Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 599 (1896) ("[I]f the witness has already received a pardon, he cannot longer set up his privilege, since he stands, with respect to such offense, as if it had never been committed.").

---

[9] 274 U.S. 480, 485 (1927).

[10] Id. at 486.

[11] Id.

[12] Id. at 486–88. In the much earlier case Ex parte Wells, the Court appeared to assume that a pardon of a convict sentenced to death, conditioned on his imprisonment for life—effectively a commutation similar to the one at issue in Biddle—was based on consent of the recipient. 59 U.S. 307, 315 (1855) (rejecting argument that conditional pardon was not "voluntarily accepted," as recipient was legally imprisoned).

[1] Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333, 380–81 (1866).

[2] 83 U.S. 147, 151 (1872).

captured without having to establish loyalty to the Union during the Civil War as would otherwise have been required by statute.[3] More broadly, the Court ruled in several cases during this period that pardons entitled their recipients to recover property forfeited or seized on the basis of the underlying offenses, so long as vested third-party rights would not be affected and money had not already been paid into the Treasury (except as authorized by statute).[4] In Boyd v. United States, the Court addressed one of the "disabilities" referred to in Garland that a pardon removes, recognizing that the ability of a man convicted of larceny to act as a witness in court was restored by President Benjamin Harrison's pardon.[5] According to the Court, because the "disability to testify" was "a consequence, according to the principles of the common law, of the judgment of conviction, the pardon obliterated that effect. The competency as a witness of the person so pardoned was therefore completely restored."[6]

Cases following Garland and Carlisle also began to note limits to the Court's broad framing of the effect of a pardon, however; in Knote, the Court wrote that although a pardon "blots out the offence" in a legal sense, "it does not make amends for the past. . . . The offence being established by judicial proceedings, that which has been done or suffered while they were in force is presumed to have been rightfully done and justly suffered, and no satisfaction for it can be required."[7] Later cases underscored the limits of the Court's previous sweeping language. First, contrary to the suggestion of Garland that a pardon "blots out of existence the guilt" associated with the offense,[8] the Court in Burdick stated that a pardon "carries an imputation of guilt; acceptance a confession of it."[9] Then, in Carlesi v. New York, the Court determined that a pardoned offense could still be considered "as a circumstance of aggravation" under a state habitual-offender law,[10] reflecting that although a pardon may obviate the punishment for a federal crime, it does not erase the facts associated with the crime or preclude all collateral effects arising from those facts.[11]

---

[3] Id. at 153; see also Armstrong v. United States, 80 U.S. 154, 155–56 (1871) (stating that pardon "blots out the offence," and "the person so pardoned is entitled to the restoration of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, if suit be brought within 'two years after the suppression of the rebellion'").

[4] See Osborn v. United States, 91 U.S. 474, 477 (1875) ("But, unless rights of others in the property condemned have accrued, the penalty of forfeiture annexed to the commission of the offence must fall with the pardon of the offence itself, provided the full operation of the pardon be not restrained by the conditions upon which it is granted."); Knote v. United States, 95 U.S. 149, 154 (1877) ("Where, however, property condemned, or its proceeds, have not thus vested, but remain under control of the Executive, or of officers subject to his orders, or are in the custody of the judicial tribunals, the property will be restored or its proceeds delivered to the original owner, upon his full pardon. The property and the proceeds are not considered as so absolutely vesting in third parties or in the United States as to be unaffected by the pardon until they have passed out of the jurisdiction of the officer or tribunal. The proceeds have thus passed when paid over to the individual entitled to them, in the one case, or are covered into the treasury, in the other."); see also In re Armstrong's Foundry, 73 U.S. 766, 769 (1867) ("The general pardon of Armstrong, therefore, relieved him of so much of the penalty as accrued to the United States."); Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Bosworth, 133 U.S. 92, 103–05 (1890) (pardon restored property rights but subject to interest of third party acquired in interim); Jenkins v. Collard, 145 U.S. 546, 560–61 (1892) (same).

[5] 142 U.S. 450, 453–54 (1892).

[6] Id. at 454.

[7] Knote, 95 U.S. at 153–54.

[8] Garland, 71 U.S. at 380.

[9] Burdick v. United States, 236 U.S. 79, 94 (1915).

[10] 233 U.S. 51, 59 (1914).

[11] See Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 232 (1993) ("[T]he granting of a pardon is in no sense an overturning of a judgment of conviction by some other tribunal; it is an executive action that mitigates or sets aside punishment for a crime." (citation, internal quotation marks, and alteration omitted)).

ArtII.S2.C1.3.8 Congress's Role in Pardons

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

The Supreme Court has recognized that Congress cannot substantively limit the effect of a pardon through legislation. In Ex parte Garland, the Court held that the power of the President to pardon "is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restrictions."[1] In United States v. Klein, the Court voided a law that sought to bar the use of a pardon or amnesty as a substitute for proof of loyalty necessary to recover property abandoned and sold by the government during the Civil War.[2] The Klein Court held that the provision was an impermissible attempt to change the effect of pardons by requiring courts to "treat them as null and void," i.e., to "disregard pardons . . . and to deny them their legal effect."[3] Over a century after Klein, in rejecting the proposition that a condition attached to clemency must be authorized by statute, the Court in Schick v. Reed reaffirmed that "the power [of clemency] flows from the Constitution alone, not from any legislative enactments, and . . . it cannot be modified, abridged, or diminished by the Congress."[4]

Despite the Supreme Court's rigid view of the limits of legislative authority over pardons, Congress may have a role to play in exercise of the pardon power through other legal and constitutional processes. For instance, there is historical precedent for Congress facilitating exercise of the power by funding positions in the Department of Justice to assist in considering clemency petitions.[5] The Court in The Laura also upheld a statute vesting in a subordinate officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, the authority to remit fines or penalties provided for in laws related to steam-vessels, with exceptions, rejecting the argument that the law encroached on the President's power to pardon based on precedent for the practice going back to England.[6]

---

[1] 71 U.S. 333, 380 (1866); see also Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 120 (1925) ("The executive can reprieve or pardon all offenses after their commission, either before trial, during trial or after trial, by individuals, or by classes, conditionally or absolutely, and this without modification or regulation by Congress.").

[2] 80 U.S. 128, 143 (1871).

[3] Id. at 148.

[4] 419 U.S. 256, 266 (1974).

[5] E.g., An Act Amendatory of the Acts Relative to the Attorney-General's Office, and to Fix the Compensation of his Assistant and Clerks, ch. 98, 13 Stat. 516 (1865) (authorizing Attorney General to employ and provide salary for "pardon clerk," among others). In a concurring opinion in an otherwise-unrelated 1990 Supreme Court decision, Justice Byron White noted that statutory appropriations restrictions may fall if "they encroach on the powers reserved to another branch of the Federal Government," using as an example a hypothetical effort by Congress to "impair the President's pardon power by denying him appropriations for pen and paper." Office of Pers. Mgmt. v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414, 435 (1990) (White, J., concurring).

[6] 114 U.S. 411, 412–414 (1885). In the later case of Brown v. Walker, the Court upheld what was essentially an immunity statute for testimony given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but in doing so suggested that Congress has "the power to pass acts of general amnesty[.]" 161 U.S. 591, 601 (1896). The Court has not revisited its suggestion that Congress has some degree of clemency authority parallel to the President's, though the validity of the suggestion has been disputed in other quarters. See id. at 609 (Field, J., dissenting) ("Congress cannot grant a pardon. That is an act of grace which can only be performed by the president."); Legislative Proposal to Nullify Criminal Convictions Obtained Under the Ethics in Government Act, 10 Op. O.L.C. 93, 94 (1986) ("[T]he Constitution gives Congress no authority to legislate a pardon for any particular individual or class of individuals[.]").

Beyond legislation, Congress has invoked its Article I authority to conduct oversight as a more indirect constraint on use of the pardon power,[7] and the Supreme Court has alluded to the possibility of impeachment as a check on misuse of the power.[8] Congress can also seek to amend the Constitution to clarify or constrain the President's clemency authority.[9] These constitutional processes are subject to constraints, which are discussed in more detail in their respective annotations.[10]

Clause 2—Advice and Consent

ArtII.S2.C2.1 Treaty-Making Power

ArtII.S2.C2.1.1 Overview of President's Treaty-Making Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

In the Treaty Clause, the Constitution returns to the realm of foreign affairs and vests the power to make treaties in the national government. Earlier in the Constitution, Article I prohibits the states from concluding treaties and limits the states' role in other forms of international relations.[1] Article I also assigns several foreign affairs-related powers to the Legislative Branch, including powers to regulate commerce with foreign nations, define and punish offenses against the Law of Nations and on the high seas, and regulate many aspects of the military.[2] In Article II's Treaty Clause, the Constitution, for the first time, addresses international affairs from the vantage of the President's powers. The clause vests the President, acting with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the authority to make treaties for the United States.

Treaties—which the Supreme Court traditionally defines as pacts among sovereign countries[3]—have been tools of international relations since antiquity.[4] After the United States

---

[7] See, e.g., Pardon of Richard M. Nixon, and Related Matters: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 90–151 (1974) (testimony of President Gerald Ford). The Department of Justice has, in the past, taken the position that instances of Executive Branch compliance with congressional requests for information regarding pardon decisions have been purely voluntary and are not indicative of congressional authority to review clemency decisions. See Letter from Janet Reno, Att'y Gen., to President Bill Clinton (Sept. 16, 1999) (quoted in H.R. Rep. No. 106-488, at 119–20 (1999)).

[8] Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87, 121 (1925) (indicating that if the President ever sought to "deprive a court of power to enforce its orders" by issuing "successive pardons of constantly recurring contempts in particular litigation," such an "improbable" situation "would suggest a resort to impeachment, rather than a narrow and strained construction of the general powers of the President").

[9] U.S. Const. art. V.

[10] See ArtI.S2.C5.3 Impeachment Doctrine; ArtV.3.2 Congressional Proposals of Amendments.

[1] See ArtI.S10.C1.1 Foreign Policy by States.

[2] Id.

[3] See, e.g., Lozano v. Montoya Alvarez, 572 U.S. 1, 11, (2014) ("[T]reaties . . . are primarily 'compact[s] between independent nations[.]'") (first set of brackets in original) (quoting Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 505 (2008)); Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U.S. 583, 600 (1912) ("Generally, a treaty is defined as 'a compact made between two or more independent nations, with a view to the public welfare.'") (citation omitted)); Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194 (1888) ("A treaty is primarily a contract between two or more independent nations, and is so regarded by writers on won its independence from Great Britain, many Americans viewed the Articles of Confederation as a form of a treaty among the individual states of the union.[5] But the Framers criticized how the Articles of Confederation addressed the new union's treaty obligations to foreign countries.[6] The Articles lacked a mechanism to ensure individual states complied with the United States' international obligations, particularly its obligations to England under the 1783 Treaty of Peace that ended the Revolutionary War.[7] When drafting the Constitution, the Framers sought to remedy this problem by including treaties among the sources of the "supreme Law of the Land" in the Supremacy Clause.[8] Because of this change, treaties occupy a unique place in the constitutional system: they can operate simultaneously as domestic law of the United States and as tools of foreign policy in the form of pacts between nations.[9]

Elements of the treaty-making process may vary depending on the treaty, but the standard process generally operates as follows:[10] a member of the Executive Branch negotiates the terms of a treaty, and the President or another Executive Branch official signs the completed draft when negotiations conclude.[11] Next, the President submits the treaty to the Senate.[12] If "two thirds of the Senators present" pass a resolution of advice and consent, the process shifts public law."); Head Money Cases (Edye v. Robertson), 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884) ("A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations."). Although sovereign nations are the primary subject of treaties, in modern practice, other entities, such as international organizations, occasionally have joined treaties. See generally James Crawford, Brownlie's Principles of Public International Law 115–16 (8th ed. 2012) [hereinafter Brownlie's Principles].

[4] See generally Arthur Nussbaum, A Concise History of the Law of Nations (1954).

[5] See Intro.6.1 Continental Congress and Adoption of the Articles of Confederation. See also David Golove, The New Confederalism: Treaty Delegations of Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Authority, 55 Stan. L. Rev. 1697, 1706–10 (2003) (discussing historical evidence for the conclusion that the predominant, but not universal, view at the time of the Framing was that the Articles of Confederation formed a treaty-based body); Richard Beeman, Plain, Honest Men: The Making of The American Constitution 8 (2009) ("The Articles of Confederation, America's first 'constitution,' was not really a proper constitution, but rather a peace treaty among thirteen separate and sovereign states."); John C. Yoo, The Continuation of Politics by Other Means: The Original Understanding of War Powers, 84 Cal. L. Rev. 167, 237 (1996) ("[T]he [Confederation] Congress had judicial, legislative, and executive functions more typical of a treaty organization than a sovereign government.").

[6] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties.

[7] See id.

[8] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. For discussion of the relationship between treaties and the Supremacy Clause, see ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties, and for broader analysis of the Supremacy Clause, see ArtVI.C2.1 Overview of Supremacy Clause.

[9] See Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314 (1829) ("A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, not a legislative act. . . . In the United States a different principle is established. Our constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision."); The Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. at 598 ("A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. . . . But a treaty may also . . . partake of the nature of municipal law[.]"); Validity of Congressional-Executive Agreements That Substantially Modify the United States' Obligations Under an Existing Treaty, 20 Op. O.L.C. 389, 390 (1996) (discussing the "dual nature of treaties, as instruments of both domestic and international law").

[10] For analysis of the U.S. treaty-making process, see Cong. Research Serv., Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rep. No. 106-71, at 107–56 (2001) [hereinafter Treaties and Other International Agreements].

[11] Id. at 96–97. See also Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1, 13 (2015) [hereinafter Zivotofsky II] ("The President has the sole power to negotiate treaties[.]"); United States v. Curtiss–Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936) ("[T]he President . . . makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates."); Procedures for Exchanging Instruments of Ratification for Bilateral Law Enforcement Treaties, 8 Op. O.L.C. 157, 157 (1984) (discussing the "President's negotiating authority with respect to bilateral treaties"). Although the Executive Branch generally is responsible for treaty negotiations, Congress occasionally plays a role by, among other things, enacting legislation encouraging the Executive Branch to pursue certain objectives in its international negotiations. See Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 10, at 100–02.

[12] Id. at 118 ("All treaties are transmitted to the Senate in the President's name").

back to the Executive Branch.[13] At this stage, the President decides whether to make the final decision to enter the treaty on behalf of the United States.[14] It is thus the President, and not the Senate, who has final responsibility for completing the treaty-making process.[15] However, the President has no obligation to ratify a Senate-approved treaty, and, in some cases, the President has declined to do so.[16]

Although many important events in U.S. foreign relations have culminated in treaties,[17] the United States does not conclude all agreements with foreign nations through the process outlined in the Treaty Clause. The President regularly enters into executive agreements, which do not receive the Senate's advice and consent, and "political commitments" and other nonlegal pacts that are not intended to be binding.[18] Since the turn of the twentieth century, Presidents have increasingly used alternatives to treaties,[19] which are examined in the discussion of the President's inherent power over foreign affairs.[20] The following essay focuses [13] See Zivotofsky II, 576 U.S. at 13 ("[T]he Senate may not conclude or ratify a treaty without Presidential action."); Procedures for Exchanging Instruments of Ratification for Bilateral Law Enforcement Treaties, 8 Op. O.L.C. 157, 158 (1984) ("Once the Senate gives its advice and consent, the treaty is returned to the President, who must ratify it by signing the instrument of ratification.").

[14] See supra note 13. See also Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 303(3) (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement] ("After the Senate provides its advice and consent, the President determines whether to ratify or otherwise make the treaty on behalf of the United States."). While the Restatement of Foreign Relations Law of the United States is nonbinding and prepared by a private organization, the Supreme Court has cited it on several occasions, e.g., United States v. Stuart, 489 U.S. 353, 375 (1989) (citing Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law § 314 (1987)); Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243, 259 (1984) (citing Restatement (Second) of the Foreign Relations Law § 147(1)(f) (1965)), and commentators often describe it as authoritative, e.g., Anthony S. Winer et al., International Law Legal Research 242–43 (2013).

[15] See, e.g., Samuel B. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement 81 (2d ed. 1916) ("[T]he approval, whether qualified or unqualified, of the treaty by the Senate is not to be confused with the act of ratification. The latter is performed by the President[.]"); Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 303 reporters' n.5 ("Properly speaking, the Senate does not ratify a treaty; the Senate gives its advice and consent to ratification. It is the President who then 'ratifies,' or makes, the treaty by signing an instrument of ratification and then arranging for the deposit or exchange of the instrument, as indicated by the treaty's terms."). Although the President is the final actor in expressing the United States' assent to be bound to a treaty, additional action by Congress may be necessary to implement the treaty into domestic law. See ArtII.S2.C2.1.5 Congressional Implementation of Treaties. Once the parties to the treaty complete the processes necessary to express their final assent to be bound—often through an exchange of instruments of ratification—the President may "proclaim" the treaty, and declare it to be in force by Executive Order. See Procedures for Exchanging Instruments of Ratification for Bilateral Law Enforcement Treaties, 8 Op. O.L.C. 157, 158 (1984).

[16] For examples when the President declined to ratify treaties that received the Senate's advice and consent, see Crandall, supra note 15, at 97–99 and Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 303 reporters' n.5.

[17] See, e.g., Treaty of Peace, U.S.-Gr. Brit., Sept. 3, 1783, 8 Stat. 80 (peace treaty with Great Britain following the Revolutionary War); Cessation of Louisiana: A Financial Arrangement—Convention Between the United States and the French Republic, U.S.-Fr., Apr. 30, 1803, 8 Stat. 206 (treaty defining the terms of the Louisiana Purchase); Peace, Friendship, Limits, and Settlement (Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo), U.S.-Mex., Feb. 2, 1848, 9 Stat. 922 (Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo ending the Mexican-American War and giving the United States control over what would become several southwestern U.S. states).

[18] For discussion of international pacts that are not concluded through the process defined in the Treaty Clause, see ArtII.S2.C2.2.2 Legal Basis for Executive Agreements.

[19] See Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 10, at 38–41; Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Presidential Control Over International Law, 131 Harv. L. Rev. 1201, 1209–12 (2018).

[20] See ArtII.S2.C2.2.1 Overview of Alternatives to Treaties; ArtII.S2.C2.2.2 Legal Basis for Executive Agreements; ArtII.S2.C2.2.3 Legal Effect of Executive Agreements; ArtII.S2.C2.2.5 Congressional Executive Agreements.

on treaties in the constitutional sense, meaning international agreements[21] that the President concludes after receiving the Senate's advice and consent through the process defined in the Treaty Clause.[22]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Jurists, courts, and legal analysts have long viewed a country's capacity to enter into international pacts as an essential element of national sovereignty.[1] Under the British system of treaty-making, the power to conclude and ratify treaties falls within the prerogative of the Crown.[2] After the United States achieved its independence from Great Britain, the treaty-making power was transferred to the newly established Congress under the Articles of Confederation.[3] But the United States soon faced practical difficulties in attempting to negotiate treaties through a large legislative body.[4] And even when the national government [21] As used in this essay, the term "international agreements" refers to agreements between two or more countries (or between one or more countries and an entity, such as a public international organization, with capacity to conclude an international agreement) that is intended to be legally binding and is governed by international law. See Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 302 cmt. a.

---

[22] The meaning of the term "treaty" differs in its constitutional usage when compared to international law. Under international law, the term "treaty" refers to an international agreement that is binding and governed by international law regardless of how the agreement is brought into force. See Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 31–32 (1982); Validity of Congressional-Executive Agreements That Substantially Modify the United States' Obligations Under an Existing Treaty, supra note 9, at 389 n.2. Under U.S. law, "treaty" generally refers to a narrower subset of international agreements that receive senatorial advice and consent under the process defined in the Treaty Clause. See Weinberger, 456 U.S. at 30; Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 302 cmt. a. But courts occasionally have interpreted the term "treaty" in U.S. statutes to encompass executive agreements. See Weinberger, 456 U.S. at 31–32 (interpreting statute barring discrimination except where permitted by "treaty" to refer to both treaties and executive agreements); B. Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U.S. 583, 601 (1912) (construing "treaty," as used in statute conferring appellate jurisdiction, to also refer to executive agreements).

[1] See, e.g., Emer De Vattel, The Law of Nations, or Principles of the Law of Nations, Applied to the Conduct and Affairs of Nations and Sovereigns 67 (Liberty Fund ed., 2008) (originally published 1758) (defining "what is meant by a nation or state" and including the ability to be "susceptible of obligations and rights"). See also S.S. Wimbledon (U.K., Fr., Italy, Japan v. Germany), Judgment, 1923 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 1, at 25 (Aug. 17) ("[T]he right of entering into international engagements is an attribute of State sovereignty."); Anne Peters, Treaty-Making Power, in 10 The Max Planck Encyclopedia of Public International Law 57 (Rudiger Wolfrum ed., 2012) ("Treaty-making power is often considered as a corollary, or as a fundamental attribute, of the international legal personality understood as the ability to have rights and obligations under international law."); Rosalyn Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations 13 (1963) (describing the "capacity to enter into international relations with other states" as one of the traditional criteria necessary for independent statehood).

[2] See James Crawford, Brownlie's Principles of Public International Law 63 (8th ed. 2012). See also 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 257 (Lippincott ed., 1859) ("It is also the king's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign states and princes."). In modern usage, "the Crown" generally refers to the Executive Branch of the British government rather than an individual monarch. See Arthur Bestor, Respective Roles of Senate and President in the Making and Abrogation of Treaties—The Original Intent of the Framers of the Constitution Historically Examined, 55 Wash. L. Rev. 1, 75 & n.290 (1979) [hereinafter Bestor, Respective Roles].

[3] Articles of Confederation of 1781 art. IX, para. 1.

[4] See Bestor, Respective Roles, supra note 2, at 49–72.

was able to conclude treaties, the new nation often found itself unable to perform its treaty obligations without the cooperation of the state governments.[5]

By the time of the Constitutional Convention, the delegates had largely come to agree that the national government required a stronger power to enforce treaties throughout the United States, but there were many differences of opinion as to where the newly enhanced treaty power should reside.[6] In August 1787, the Committee of Detail proposed an early draft of the Constitution that would have provided the Senate alone with the power to make treaties.[7] But the delegates raised widespread objections to the provision.[8] Some delegates proposed that treaty-making include a role for the President or be granted to the President exclusively.[9] Others argued that both chambers of Congress should be included in the process.[10] Ultimately, the delegates decided that the Executive Branch was best equipped to act with the confidentiality and efficiency necessary for treaty negotiations.[11] In the Federalist No. 64, John Jay expanded on this rationale, arguing that individuals with useful information in treaty negotiations would "rely on the secrecy of the President, but . . . would not confide in that of the Senate, and still less in that of a large popular Assembly."[12]

While the delegates to the Constitutional Convention concluded that the President should play a role in treaty-making, they also decided that no single component of the government should have the power to bind the United States to a treaty.[13] Because of treaties' dual nature as tools of foreign policy and part of the law of the land, the Federalist Papers describe treaty-making as a "peculiar" combination of two functions that did not fit neatly into the founding era understanding of separation of powers.[14] In the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton and John Jay argued that treaty-making contains elements of executive power

[5] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties.

[6] See, e.g., 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 297, 392–93, 495, 498–99, 438, 540–41, 538–50, 638 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (debate over treaty-making power during the Constitutional Convention); 4 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 263–65 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1836) [hereinafter Debates in the Several State Conventions] (discussion of treaty-making power during the South Carolina ratifying convention); id. at 306 (statements concerning the treaty-making power by Alexander Hamilton to the New York ratifying convention); 2 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 563 (Merrill Jensen et al., eds.) (arguments concerning the Treaty Clause to the Pennsylvania ratifying convention).

[7] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 176, 183.

[8] Id. at 393 ("Mr. [Edmund] Randolph observing that almost every Speaker had made objections to the clause as it stood, moved in order to a further consideration of the subject[.]"). See also Bestor, Respective Roles, supra note 2, at 93–96 (discussing objections to the Senate the exclusive treaty-making authority).

[9] For example, John Mercer of Maryland argued that the "Senate ought not to have the power of treaties" at all, contending that the power should reside in the Executive alone. 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 297. And James Madison argued that "the President should be an agent in Treaties" because "the Senate represented the States alone" rather than the federal government. Id. at 392–93.

[10] See id. at 538 (motion by James Wilson of Pennsylvania to require the advice and consent of both chambers of Congress before conclusion of a treaty).

[11] See id. at 499 (proposal by the Committee of Postponed Parts to allow presidential participation in treaty-making). See also The Federalist No. 75 (Alexander Hamilton) (explaining the rationale for the "union of the Executive with the Senate" in treaty-making); The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay) ("[W]e see that the Constitution provides that our negotiations for treaties shall have every advantage which can be derived from [the Senate's] talents, information, integrity, and deliberate investigations, on the one hand, and from [the President's] secrecy and despatch on the other.").

[12] The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay).

[13] See, e.g., 2 Debates in the Several State Conventions, supra note 6, at 507 (statement of James Wilson) ("Neither the President nor the Senate, solely, can complete a treaty; they are checks upon each other, and are so balanced as to produce security to the people.").

[14] See The Federalist No. 75 (Alexander Hamilton) ("[T]he particular nature of the power of making treaties indicates a peculiar propriety in that union" of the Executive with the Senate in making treaties.).

because it involves diplomacy and the management of foreign relations.[15] Hamilton and Jay also believed treaty-making invokes the legislative power because treaties can have the force of domestic law.[16] As Hamilton summarized in the Federalist No. 75, the power to make treaties belongs "neither to the legislative nor to the executive."[17] For that reason, the delegates to the Constitutional Convention saw fit to divide this dual natured power between dual branches.[18]

The delegates chose to include the Senate in the treaty-making process rather than the House of Representatives because they believed the House would be too large and that its membership would change too often to act with the secrecy and speed necessary for treaty-making.[19] The delegates also believed the Senate would represent and protect the interests of the states,[20] which the Constitution denies the power to make treaties.[21]

The delegates viewed the requirement that a supermajority of two thirds of Senators present provide their advice and consent as a method to prevent the federal government from making treaties that would promote regional interests or discriminate against a minority of states.[22] In particular, the Southern states were concerned that the federal government would give Spain navigation rights on the Mississippi River, which were essential to the Southern economy, in exchange for trade concessions that would benefit the Northern economy.[23] And

---

[15] Id. ("The qualities elsewhere detailed as indispensable in the management of foreign negotiations, point out the Executive as the most fit agent in those transactions[.] . . . [T]he ministerial servant of the Senate could not be expected to enjoy the confidence and respect of foreign powers in the same degree with the constitutional representatives of the nation[.]"); The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay) (discussing the benefits of authorizing the President to negotiate treaties).

[16] See The Federalist No. 75 (Alexander Hamilton) ("[T]he vast importance of the trust, and the operation of treaties as laws, plead strongly for the participation of the whole or a portion of the legislative body in the office of making them.").

[17] Id.

[18] Id. See also supra notes 6, 8.

[19] See at 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 534 (vote 475) (voting, ten states to one, against the motion to include the House of Representatives in the treaty-making process); Id. at 538 ("[Roger Sherman of Connecticut] thought . . . that the necessity of secrecy in the case of treaties forbade a reference of them to the whole Legislature."); The Federalist No. 75 (Alexander Hamilton) ("The fluctuating and, taking its future increase into the account, the multitudinous composition of [the House of Representatives], forbid us to expect in it those qualities which are essential to the proper execution of such a trust [necessary to conclude a treaty]."); The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay) ("They who wish to commit the [treaty] power under consideration to a popular assembly, composed of members constantly coming and going in quick succession, seem not to recollect that such a body must necessarily be inadequate to the attainment of those great objects[.]").

[20] See 3 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 348 (statement of William Davie to the North Carolina Ratifying Convention) ("[T]he extreme jealousy of the little states, and between the commercial states and the non-importing states, produced the necessity of giving an equality of suffrage to the Senate. The same causes made it indispensable to give to the senators, as representatives of states, the power of making, or rather ratifying, treaties. Although it militates against every idea of just proportion that the little state of Rhode Island should have the same suffrage with Virginia, or the great commonwealth of Massachusetts, yet the small states would not consent to confederate without an equal voice in the formation of treaties. . . . It therefore became necessary to give them an absolute equality in making treaties."); 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 392 (James Madison advocating for the President to play a role in treaty-making because "the Senate represents the States alone.").

[21] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 10, cl. 1. See also ArtI.S10.C1.1 Foreign Policy by States.

[22] See infra notes 23–24; Oona A. Hathaway, Treaties' End: The Past, Present, and Future of International Lawmaking in the United States 117 Yale L.J. 1236, 1282 (2008) [hereinafter Hathaway, Treaties' End] (stating that the focus of the supermajority requirement in the Senate "was not the result of general or theoretical concerns. It was, instead, formed in direct response to a recent controversy over treaty negotiations with Spain" implicating regional interests); Bestor, Respective Roles, supra note 2, at 100 (discussing the role of sectional interests in the crafting of the treaty power at the constitutional convention); Jack N. Rakove, Solving a Constitutional Puzzle: The Treatymaking Clause as a Case Study, in 1 Perspectives in American History 272–74 (1984) (analyzing historical events influencing the two-thirds requirement in the Treaty Cause).

[23] For analysis of the impact of negotiations with Spain over navigation rights to the Mississippi, see Charles Warren, The Mississippi River and the Treaty Clause of the Constitution, 2 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 271, 274 (1934).

the Northern states feared they could lose access to fisheries in Newfoundland through a treaty.[24] The Treaty Clause's supermajority requirement—one of several in the Constitution[25]—was designed to alleviate these concerns by allowing a minority of states, through their representatives in the Senate, to block treaties that could disproportionately disadvantage segments of the nation.[26]

The exact number of Senators required to approve a treaty under the Treaty Clause differs from its predecessor provision in the Articles of Confederation. Whereas the Articles of Confederation required nine of thirteen states to approve all treaties, the Framers deliberately changed the advice and consent threshold to "two thirds of the Senators present[.]"[27] Hamilton explained in the Federalist No. 75 that the change from a fixed number to a percentage would account for the possibility that new states would join the union.[28] Hamilton also argued that it would limit individual Senators' ability to block a treaty simply by declining to appear in the Senate for a vote.[29] And whereas each state voted as a unit under the Articles, the Treaty Clause permits Senators to vote individually, creating the possibility that one state's Senator could vote for a treaty and the other against it.[30]

Many scholars have concluded that the Framers intended "advice" and "consent" to be separate aspects of the treaty-making process, although there is still some debate on the issue.[31] According to the prevailing interpretation, the "advice" element required the President

---

[24] See, e.g., 3 Debates in the Several State Conventions, supra note 6, at 604 (statement of George Mason) ("The Newfoundland fisheries will require that kind of security which we are now in want of. The Eastern States therefore agreed, at length, that treaties should require the consent of two thirds of the members present in the Senate."); R. Earl McClendon, Origin of the Two-Thirds Rule in Senate Action Upon Treaties, 36 Am. Hist. Rev. 768, 768–69 (1931) (providing a historical analysis of the importance of Newfoundland fisheries and their role in leading to the two-thirds requirement in the Treaty Clause).

[25] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 6 (convictions on impeachment); Id. § 5, cl. 2 (expulsion of a Member of Congress); Id. § 7, cl. 2 (overriding presidential veto); Id. art. V (proposing a constitutional amendment in Congress); Id. amend. XIV, § 3 (restoring the ability of those who "engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the [United States], or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof" to serve in public office); Id. amend. XXV, § 4 (congressional approval of removal of the President for inability to discharge powers and duties of the office after the Vice President and the Cabinet approve such removal and after the President contests removal).

[26] See supra notes 22–24.

[27] Compare Articles of Confederation of 1781 art. IX, with U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[28] See The Federalist No. 75 (Alexander Hamilton) (discussing the "probable augmentation of the Senate, by the erection of new States").

[29] Id. ("[M]aking a determinate number at all times requisite to a resolution, diminishes the motives to punctual attendance. . . . [M]aking the capacity of the body to depend on a PROPORTION which may be varied by the absence or presence of a single member, has the contrary effect.")

[30] For example, in voting on the first treaty that was to be ratified by the United States after the adoption of the Constitution—dubbed the Jay Treaty because it was negotiated by the first Chief Supreme Court Justice of the United States, John Jay, who was appointed a special envoy to Great Britain despite his role in the Judicial Branch—Senators from six states split their votes. See Amity, Commerce, and Navigation (Jay Treaty): Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation, between His Britannick Majesty;—and The United States of America, by Their President, with the Advice and Consent of Their Senate, Nov. 19, 1794, U.S.-Gr. Brit., 8 Stat. 116; 4 Annals of Cong. 862 (1795).

[31] Compare, e.g., Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 177 (2d ed. 1996) ("As originally conceived, no doubt, the Senate was to be a kind of Presidential council, affording him advice throughout the treaty-making process and on all aspects of it[.]"); Arthur Bestor, "Advice" from the Very Beginning, "Consent" When the End Is Achieved, 83 Am. J. Int'l L. 718, 726 (1989) ("[T]he use of the phrase 'advice and consent' to describe the relationship between the two partners clearly indicated that the Framers' conception was of a council-like body in direct and continuous consultation with the Executive on matters of foreign policy."); Rakove, supra note 22, at 249 ("Advice . . . was to be given at every stage of diplomacy, from the framing of policy and instructions [to treaty negotiators] to the final bestowal of consent."); Ralston Hayden, The Senate and Treaties, 1789–1817, at 6 (1920) ("[T]he [Senate] really was a council of advice upon treaties and appointments—a council which expected to discuss these matters directly with the other branch of the government."); Hathaway, Treaties' End, supra note 22, at 1278–81 (discussing the Senate's role as a "Council of Advice" to the President), with Michael D. Ramsey, The Constitution's Text in Foreign Affairs 139 (2007) ("'[A]dvice and consent' . . . seems capable of . . . meaning[ ] an after-the-fact review of the President's proposal, coupled with 'advice' that the President process or adopt an alternate course.").

to consult with the Senate during treaty negotiations before seeking the Senate's final "consent."[32] President George Washington appears to have understood that the Senate had such a consultative role,[33] but he and other early Presidents soon declined to seek the Senate's input during the negotiation process.[34] In modern treaty-making practice, the Executive Branch generally is responsible for negotiations, and the Supreme Court stated in dicta that the President's power over treaty negotiations is exclusive.[35]

Although Presidents since Washington have not formally consulted with the Senate as a body, the Senate maintains an aspect of its "advice" function through its conditional consent authority.[36] In considering when to provide its advice and consent to a treaty, the Senate may condition its approval on reservations,[37] declarations,[38] understandings,[39] and provisos[40] concerning the treaty's application.[41] Under established U.S. practice, the President cannot

---

[32] See, e.g., Henkin, supra note 31, at 177; Bestor, supra note 31, at 726; Rakove, supra note 22, at 249; Hathaway, Treaties' End, supra note 22, at 1278–81; Hayden, supra note 31, at 6.

[33] On an occasion that has been described as the first and last time the President personally visited the Senate chamber to receive the Senate's advice on a treaty, President Washington went to the Senate in August 1789 to consult about proposed treaties with the Southern Indians. See 1 Annals of Cong. 65–71 (1789). But observers reported that he was so frustrated with the experience that he vowed never to appear in person to discuss a treaty again. See, e.g., William Maclay, Sketches of Debate in the First Senate of the United States 122–24 (George W. Harris ed., 1880) (record of the President's visit by Senator William Maclay of Pennsylvania); Hayden, supra note 31, at 21–26 (providing a historical account of Washington's visit to the Senate).

[34] See VI Memoirs of John Quincy Adams 427 (Charles Francis Adams ed., 1875) ("[E]ver since [President Washington's first visit to the Senate to seek its advice], treaties have been negotiated by the Executive before submitting them to the consideration of the Senate.").

[35] See Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1, 13 (2015) ("The President has the sole power to negotiate treaties, . . . and the Senate may not conclude or ratify a treaty without Presidential action."); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936) ("[T]he President . . . makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates.").

[36] See Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Treaties, Human Rights, and Conditional Consent, 149 U. Pa. L. Rev. 399, 405 (2000) ("The exercise of the conditional consent power has been in part a response by the Senate to its loss of any substantial 'advice' role in the treaty process."); Samuel B. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement 81 (2d ed. 1916) ("Not usually consulted as to the conduct of negotiations, the Senate has freely exercised its co-ordinate power in treaty making by means of amendments."). Not all legal scholars view the Senate's conditional consent authority as an effective substitute for the role as a council of advice. See Bruce Ackerman & David Golove, Is NAFTA Constitutional?, 108 Harv. L. Rev. 799, 905 (1995) (describing the Senate's assertion of conditional consent power as a "dysfunctional" and counterproductive system generated after "the Senate lost its effective capacity to give advice").

[37] As a general matter, "[r]eservations change U.S. obligations without necessarily changing the text, and they require the acceptance of the other party." See Cong. Research Serv., Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rep. No. 106-71, at 11 (2001) [hereinafter Treaties and Other International Agreements]. See also Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 305 reporters' n.2 (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement] ("Although the Senate has not been entirely consistent in its use of the labels, in general the label . . . 'reservation' [has been used] when seeking to limit the effect of the existing text for the United States[.]").

[38] Declarations are "statements expressing the Senate's position or opinion on matters relating to issues raised by the treaty rather than to specific provisions." Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 37, at 11. See also Fourth Restatement, supra note 37, § 305 reporters' n.2 (describing declarations as the Senate's "policy statements about a treaty" or statements concerning the treaty's domestic status).

[39] Understandings are "interpretive statements that clarify or elaborate provisions but do not alter them." Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 37, at 11. See also Fourth Restatement, supra note 37, § 305 reporters' n.2 ("[I]n general [the Senate uses] the label . . . 'understanding' when seeking to set forth the U.S. interpretation of a treaty provision[.]").

[40] Provisos concern "issues of U.S. law or procedure and are not intended to be included in the instruments of ratification to be deposited or exchanged with other countries." Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 37, at 11. See also Fourth Restatement, supra note 37, § 305 reporters' n.2 (stating that the Senate uses the term "proviso" when "setting forth a condition relating to the process by which the President makes the treaty or the process by which it is implemented within the United States, or to impose reporting or other obligations on the President").

[41] Haver v. Yaker, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 32, 35 (1869) (stating that "the Senate are not required to adopt or reject [a treaty] as a whole, but may modify or amend it, as was done with the treaty under consideration"); The Diamond Rings, 183 U.S. 176, 183 (1901) (Brown, J., concurring) (noting that the Senate may "make . . . ratification conditional upon ratify a treaty unless the President accepts the Senate's conditions.[42] If accepted by the President, these conditions may modify or define U.S. rights and obligations under the treaty.[43] The Senate also may propose to amend the text of the treaty itself, after which other nations that are parties to the treaty must consent to the changes for them to take effect.[44]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.3 Scope of Treaty-Making Power

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Articles of Confederation limited the scope of the treaty power by carving out two acts that the United States could not take in a treaty: limiting the states' power to impose "imposts on duties on foreigners" and "prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever[.]"[1] The Constitution's Treaty Clause, by contrast, contains no such restrictions.[2] During the Constitutional Convention and the ratification debates, some delegates expressed concern that the treaty power was too broad and subject to abuse.[3] But James Madison and others defended the structure of the treaty power, arguing that it was not possible to enumerate all circumstances in which the government could misuse the treaty the adoption of amendments to the treaty"); Fourth Restatement, supra note 37, § 305 reporters' n.3 (collecting lower court cases giving effect to the Senate's conditions when interpreting or applying a treaty).

---

[42] See United States v. Stuart, 489 U.S. 353, 374–75 (1989) (Scalia, J., concurring) ("[The Senate] may, in the form of a resolution, give its consent on the basis of conditions. If these are agreed to by the President and accepted by the other contracting parties, they become part of the treaty and of the law of the United States[.]"); Relevance of Senate Ratification History to Treaty Interpretation, 11 Op. O.L.C. 28, 32–33 (1987) ("[S]uch understandings or other conditions expressly imposed by the Senate are generally included by the President with the treaty documents deposited for ratification or communicated to the other parties at the same time the treaty is deposited for ratification. Because such conditions are considered to be part of the United States's position in ratifying the treaty, they are generally binding on the President, both internationally and domestically, in his subsequent interpretation of the treaty.") (citations and footnotes omitted).

[43] For discussion of historical examples of conditions attached by the Senate to treaties, see Fourth Restatement, supra note 37, § 305 reporters' n.5.

[44] For example, in giving its advice and consent to the Jay Treaty, the Senate insisted on suspending an article allowing Great Britain to restrict U.S. trade in the British West Indies. See Amity, Commerce, and Navigation (Jay Treaty): Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation, between His Britannick Majesty;—and The United States of American, by Their President, with the Advice and Consent of Their Senate, Nov. 19, 1794, U.S.-Gr. Brit., 8 Stat. 116; S. Exec. Journal, 4th Cong., 10th Sess. 186 (1795). Great Britain ratified the Jay Treaty without objection to the Senate's changes. See Hayden, supra note 31, at 86–88.

[1] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. IX, para. 1.

[2] See U.S. Const. art II, § 2, cl. 2.

[3] See, e.g., 3 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 509 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1836) [hereinafter Debates in the Several State Conventions] (George Mason arguing for more stringent limits on the treaty power, stating "[t]he President and Senate can make any treaty whatsoever. We wish . . . to guard, this power[.]"); id. at 504 (Patrick Henry calling the treaty power so broad as to be "dangerous and destructive."); 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 393 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (statement of James Wilson) ("Under the clause, without the amendment, the Senate alone can make a Treaty, requiring all the Rice of S. Carolina to be sent to some one particular port.").

power,[4] and that other checks and balances would provide appropriate limitations.[5] In the end, the Framers did not include express limitations in the Treaty Clause on the types of subjects that may be addressed in a treaty.[6]

Despite the absence of subject matter limitations in the Treaty Clause's text, there have been suggestions since the founding era that the treaty-making power is implicitly limited to matters that traditionally have been the subject of intercourse between sovereign nations.[7] The status and scope of such a limitation, however, remains unclear. In several cases from the turn of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court stated that the treaty power is not limited to a set of enumerated subjects in the way that Congress's legislative powers are so constrained.[8] Yet, in those same cases, the Court suggested that the treaty power might only extend to topics that "properly pertain" to foreign relations[9] or are the "proper subjects"[10] of negotiations between the United States and foreign nations.

Some jurists and commentators assert that the only proper subjects for treaties under the Constitution are "matters of international concern."[11] Under this view, treaties must relate to "external concerns," as distinguished from "purely internal" subjects.[12] In 2014, three Supreme Court Justices joined a concurring opinion arguing that the treaty power "can be used to [4] See, e.g., 3 Debates in the Several State Conventions, supra note 3, at 514–15 (James Madison arguing that an attempt to "enumerate all the cases" in which treaty power should be restrained "might, and probably would be defective"); id. at 504 (statement of Edmund Randolph: "It is said there is no limitation of treaties. I defy the wisdom . . . to show how they ought to be limited.").

[5] See, e.g., id. at 516 (James Madison arguing that impeachment, criminal convictions, and regular elections in the Senate were checks on abuse of the treaty power.).

[6] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. See also Alexander Hamilton, The Defence No. XXXVI (Jan. 2, 1796), reprinted in 20 Papers of Alexander Hamilton 6 (Harold C. Syrett ed., 1974) ("A power 'to make treaties,' granted in these indefinite terms, extends to all kinds of treaties and with all the latitude which such a power under any form of Government can possess.").

[7] See, e.g., 2 Debates in the Several State Conventions, supra note 3, at 378 (statement of James Madison: "The object of treaties is the regulation of intercourse with foreign nations, and is external."); Thomas Jefferson, A Manual of Parliamentary Practice 310 (Samuel Harrison Smith ed., 1801) ("[T]he Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaty, and cannot otherwise be regulated.").

[8] See infra note 10.

[9] See Santovincenzo v. Egan, 284 U.S. 30, 40 (1931) ("There can be no question as to the power of the government of the United States to make the treaty with Persia or the Consular Convention with Italy. The treatymaking power is broad enough to cover all subjects that properly pertain to our foreign relations[.]").

[10] See Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924) ("The treaty-making power of the United States is not limited by any express provision of the Constitution, and, . . . it does extend to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and other nations."); Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. (17 Wall.) 211, 243 (1872) ("[T]he [treaty] power is given, in general terms, without any description of the objects intended to be embraced within its scope, it must be assumed that the framers of the Constitution intended that it should extend to all those objects which in the intercourse of nations had usually been regarded as the proper subjects of negotiation and treaty."). See also De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890) ("[I]t is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."); Ross v. McIntyre, 140 U.S. 453, 463 (1891) ("The treaty-making power vested in our government extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign governments."); Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540, 569 (1840) (Taney, C.J.) ("The power to make treaties is given by the Constitution in general terms, without any description of the objects intended to be embraced by it; and, consequently, it was designed to include all those subjects, which in the ordinary intercourse of nations had usually been made subjects of negotiation and treaty.") (affirmed by equally divided court).

[11] The "international concern" requirement is most often associated with remarks by Charles Evans Hughes shortly before Hughes became Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and after he served as an Associate Justice and as Secretary of State. See Statement of Charles Evans Hughes, 1929 Am. Soc. Int'l. L. Proc. 194, 194–96 (1929). See also infra notes 12–14, 20.

[12] See, e.g., Power Auth. of N.Y. v. Fed. Power Comm'n, 247 F.2d 538, 542–43 (D.C. Cir.1957) ("No court has ever said . . . that the treaty power can be exercised without limit to affect matters which are of purely domestic concern and do not pertain to our relations with other nations."), vacated as moot, 355 U.S. 64, 78 (1957) (per curiam); Hughes, supra note 11, at 194 ("[The treaty power] is not a power intended to be exercised . . . with respect to matters that have no relation to international concerns."); Treaties and Executive Agreements: Hearing on S.J. Res. 1 Before the arrange intercourse with other nations, but not to regulate purely domestic affairs."[13] But the Court has not ruled on the issue, and there is no consensus on whether the Constitution contains such a limitation.[14] Nor has the Supreme Court defined what, if any, matters are insufficiently international in nature to be an improper subject for a treaty.

To the extent there once was a common understanding of the line between internal and external matters, changes in international treaty practice have complicated this distinction.[15] Early U.S. treaties often were bilateral and addressed matters such as relations with Indian tribes,[16] military alliances, international trade, and military neutrality.[17] But treaties have expanded greatly in number and in the scope of their subject matter since World War II.[18] Treaties often now take the form of multilateral instruments that address matters that were not common subjects of international intercourse during the founding era, such as environmental protection and human rights.[19] Scholars actively debate whether the Constitution limits the scope of modern treaties and multilateral instruments to "international" matters.[20]

Subcomm. of the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 84th Cong. 183 (1955) (statement of John Foster Dulles, Sec'y of State) (stating that a treaty cannot regulate issues that "do not essentially affect the actions of nations in relation to international affairs, but are purely internal").

[13] See Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 884 (2014) (Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment joined by Scalia & Alito, JJ.).

[14] For example, the authors of the Restatement of Foreign Relations Law changed their view of the "international concern" requirement in each iteration of the Restatement. See Restatement (Second) of Foreign Relations Law § 117(1) (1965) ("The United States has the power under the Constitution to make an international agreement if . . . the matter is of international concern[.]"); Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations § 302 cmt. c (1987) ("Contrary to what was once suggested, the Constitution does not require that an international agreement deal only with 'matters of international concern.'"); Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 312 reporters' n.8 (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement] ("Unlike in the prior two Restatements, this Section does not take a position on whether there is some sort of subject-matter limitation on the treaty power. . . . The Reporters for the present Restatement concluded that the issue had not been sufficiently addressed in judicial decisions and other relevant legal materials to warrant taking a definitive position.").

[15] Some scholars have argued that the divide between internal and external affairs was not well-defined even in the Founding era. See, e.g., David M. Golove & Daniel J. Hulsebosch, A Civilized Nation: The Early American Constitution, the Law of Nations, and the Pursuit of International Recognition, 85 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 954, 989 (2010). Others contend the Framers had a clearer conception of the distinction. See, e.g., Duncan B. Hollis, An Intersubjective Treaty Power, 90 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1415, 1420–25 (2015); Curtis A. Bradley, The Treaty Power and American Federalism, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 390, 411–17 (1998) [hereinafter Bradley, American Federalism Part I].

[16] For the first eighty years after the adoption of the Constitution, it was the United States' practice to negotiate and conclude treaties with Indian tribes through the process outlined in the Treaty Clause. See 2 C. Butler, The Treaty Making Power of the United States § 404, at 198–99 (1902). That practice ended when Congress passed the Indian Appropriations Act of March 3, 1871, which affirmed the continued validity of prior Indian treaties, but also declared that hereafter "[n]o Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty." Act of Mar. 3, 1871, ch. 120, § 1, 16 Stat. 566, codified at 25 U.S.C. § 71. See also ArtI.S8.C3.9.1 Scope of Commerce Clause Authority and Indian Tribes (analyzing Congress's power to regulate commerce with Indian tribes).

[17] See, e.g., Ralston Hayden, The Senate and Treaties, 1789–1817, at 1–168 (1920) (analyzing the development of the treaty-making power in the Washington, Adams, and Jefferson Administrations); William Rawle, A View of the Constitution of the United States 578–88 (1825) (stating that the treaty power was appropriate for those subjects "which properly arise from intercourse with foreign nations" and listing as subjects "peace, alliance, commerce, neutrality, and others of a similar nature"). See also The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay) ("The power of making treaties is an important one, especially as it relates to war, peace, and commerce[.]").

[18] See, e.g., David M. Golove, Treaty-Making and the Nation: The Historical Foundations of the Nationalist Conception of the Treaty Power, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 1075, 1304 (2000) ("[I]nternational treaty practice has greatly expanded in the past half century and promises to expand further in the decades ahead as globalization proceeds."); Bradley, American Federalism Part I, supra note 15, at 396 ("[A]t one time in American history . . . treaties were generally bilateral and regulated matters such as diplomatic immunity, military neutrality, and removal of trade barriers. The nature of treaty-making, however, has undergone a radical transformation, especially in the years since World War II.").

[19] See, e.g., United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change art. 25, May 9, 1992, 1771 U.N.T.S. 107; United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or

ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, Article VI, Clause 2, states that treaties concluded in accordance with constitutional requirements have the status of the "supreme Law of the Land[.]"[1] The Founders included treaties in the Supremacy Clause in direct response to one of the major weaknesses of the Articles of Confederation: the national government's inability to enforce the United States' treaty obligations.[2] Although the Articles of Confederation gave exclusive treaty-making power to Congress,[3] the United States depended on state legislatures to enact laws necessary to ensure compliance with the Nation's treaty commitments.[4] When states ignored or violated the United States' obligations—most famously, by refusing to permit British citizens' to collect pre-Revolutionary War debts[5]—some Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, 23 I.L.M. 1027, 1465 U.N.T.S. 85. Scholars debate the extent to which modern treaties are more likely to address matters that historically were regulated by domestic governments. Compare, e.g., Bradley, American Federalism Part I, supra note 15, at 396–97 ("While many treaties continue to concern matters traditionally viewed as inter-national in nature, numerous others concern matters that in the past countries would have addressed wholly domestically."), with Golove, supra note 18, at 1101 ("[F]rom the beginning, treaties have invaded the most sensitive spheres of state autonomy[.]").

---

[20] See, e.g., Nicholas Quinn Rosenkranz, Executing the Treaty Power, 118 Harv. L. Rev. 1867, 1876 (2005) (describing the issue of whether the Constitution limits the subject matter of treaties as one of the "great academic debates about the treaty power"); Hollis, supra note 15, at 1415–34 (contending that the Constitution requires modern treaties to address matters of international concern, but suggesting a revision of the traditional understanding of the international concern requirement); Louis Henkin, "International Concern" and the Treaty Power of the United States, 63 Am. J. Int'l L. 272, 273 (1969) ("[T]he 'international concern' limitation may not in fact exist; . . . if there is some such limitation, it has been unduly and needlessly elevated to independent doctrine and its scope exaggerated[.]"). Much of the recent debate over the scope of the treaty power concerns whether the Constitution's federalism limitations apply to treaty-making, which is discussed ArtII.S2.C2.1.5 Congressional Implementation of Treaties.

[1] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. For analysis of the Supremacy Clause, see ArtVI.C2.1 Overview of Supremacy Clause.

[2] See Arthur Bestor, Respective Roles of Senate and President in the Making and Abrogation of Treaties—The Original Intent of the Framers of the Constitution Historically Examined, 55 Wash. L. Rev. 1, 49–72 (1979); Sarah H. Cleveland & William S. Dodge, Defining and Punishing Offenses Under Treaties, 124 Yale L. J. 2202, 2204 (2015) ("One of the principal aims of the U.S. Constitution was to give the federal government authority to comply with the United States's international legal commitments."); David M. Golove, Treaty-Making and the Nation: The Historical Foundations of the Nationalist Conception of the Treaty Power, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 1075, 1102 (2000) ("It was famously the difficulty of obtaining state compliance with treaties that was among the foremost reasons impelling the movement toward Philadelphia, and that experience left an unmistakable imprint on the text adopted.").

[3] Articles of Confederation of 1781, arts. VI, IX.

[4] See infra notes 5–7. See also Frederick W. Marks III, Independence on Trial: Foreign Affairs and the Making of the Constitution 3 (1973) ("Among the most important defensive powers which the United States lacked in 1783 was the power to enforce treaties."); David M. Golove & Daniel J. Hulsebosch, A Civilized Nation: The Early American Constitution, the Law of Nations, and the Pursuit of International Recognition, 85 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 932, 989–90 (2010) ("Because the foreign affairs powers were, for the most part, already nominally in the Confederation under the Articles, the main goal [of the Constitution] was to make those powers effective by eliminating the national government's dependence on the states for carrying its powers into effect and by enabling it to discipline state obstructionism.").

[5] See Report of Secretary of Foreign Affairs, John Jay (Oct. 13, 1786), reprinted in Secret Journals of the Congress of the Confederation 185–287 (Boston, Thomas B. Wait 1820) (report of John Jay, then-Secretary of Foreign Affairs under the Articles of Confederation, regarding state laws that violated the United States' treaty obligations to Great Britain); Letter from John Jay to John Adams (Nov. 1, 1786) in 2 The Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States foreign nations considered the United States an unreliable treaty partner[6] or cited U.S. noncompliance as grounds to disregard their own treaty commitments.[7] The Framers sought to remedy this problem by making treaties part of the "supreme Law of the Land" to which "the Judges in every State shall be bound[.]"[8] The Supremacy Clause marked a shift from the British system under which treaties generally have domestic effect only after being implemented by Parliament.[9]

Despite the Supremacy Clause's seeming simplicity, not all treaties have the status of domestic law that is enforceable in U.S. courts.[10] Some treaties or (provisions within treaties[11]) are "self-executing," meaning domestic courts can enforce them directly.[12] Other treaty provisions are "non-self-executing" and occupy a more complex status in the U.S. legal system.[13] Non-self-executing treaty provisions are not directly enforceable in U.S. courts, and Congress generally must pass legislation implementing the provision in a domestic statute to make it judicially enforceable.[14] from the Signing of the Definitive Treaty of Peace, 10th September 1783, to the Adoption of the Constitution, March 4, 1789, at 674 (Washington, D.C., Blair & Rives 1837) ("[T]here has not been a single day, since [the 1783 Treaty of Peace] took effect, on which it has not been violated in America, by one or other of the States.").

---

[6] See, e.g., 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 316 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records (records of James Madison) ("The files of [Congress under the Articles of Confederation] contain complaints already, from almost every nation with which treaties have been formed."); The Federalist No. 22 (Alexander Hamilton) (suggesting that, under the Articles of Confederation, foreign nations could not "respect or confide" in the United States because U.S. treaties were "liable to the infractions" by state governments).

[7] For example, Great Britain cited U.S. state laws impeding British citizens' debt-collection abilities as grounds for not complying with Britain's treaty-based obligations to withdraw its forces from military forts in the northwestern United States. See Marks, supra note 4, at 3–51.

[8] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. Early in the Constitutional Convention, the Framers considered giving Congress the power to "negative" (i.e., veto) state law that contravened any treaty, 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 47, 54, but they later adopted language originating in the New Jersey plan making treaties part of the "supreme law" that is binding upon state courts, id. at 245; 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 27–29, 182–83, 389–90, 603.

[9] See James Crawford, Brownlie's Principles of Public International Law 63 (8th ed. 2012) (quoting Thomas v. Baptiste [2000] 2 AC 1 PC, 23 (Lord Millett)).

[10] See, e.g., Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 850–51 (2014) (recognizing that the Convention on Chemical Weapons "creates obligations only for State Parties and 'does not by itself give rise to domestically enforceable federal law'") (quoting Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 505 n.2 (2008)); Cameron Septic Tank Co. v. City of Knoxville, 227 U.S. 39, 50 (1913) (holding that a provision in an industrial property convention regulating patents was not self-executing and did not govern the date of expiration of a challenged patent).

[11] See, e.g., United States v. Postal, 589 F.2d 862, 884 n.35 (5th Cir. 1979) ("A treaty need not be wholly self-executing . . . . [A] self-executing interpretation of [one article] would not necessarily call for a similar interpretation of [a different article in the same treaty]."), cert. denied, 44 U.S. 832 (1979); Authority of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to Override International Law in Extraterritorial Law Enforcement Activities, 13 Op. O.L.C. 163, 179 n.28 (1989) ("[T]he question should be whether individual provisions of the treaty are self-executing.").

[12] See, e.g., Medellín, 552 U.S. at 505 n.2 ("What we mean by 'self-executing' is that the treaty has automatic domestic effect as federal law upon ratification."); Cook v. United States, 288 U.S. 102, 119 (1933) ("For in a strict sense the [t]reaty was self-executing, in that no legislation was necessary to authorize executive action pursuant to its provisions."); Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194 (1888) ("When the [treaty] stipulations are not self-executing, they can only be enforced pursuant to legislation to carry them into effect.").

[13] See, e.g., Medellín, 552 U.S. at 516 ("The point of a non-self-executing treaty is that it 'addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court.'") (quoting Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 254 (1829), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 51 (1833)).

[14] See Medellín, 552 U.S. at 525–26 ("The responsibility for transforming an international obligation arising from a non-self-executing treaty into domestic law falls to Congress."); id. at 526 ("[T]he terms of a non-self-executing treaty can become domestic law only in the same way as any other law—through passage of legislation by both Houses of Congress, combined with either the President's signature or a congressional override of a Presidential veto."). Apart from implementing legislation, compliance with non-self-executing treaty provisions may be achieved through other avenues, including by judicial enforcement of legislation that pre-dates the treaty or through other executive or administrative action outside the judicial system. See Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 310(1) (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement]; Jean Galbraith, Making Treaty Implementation More Like Statutory Implementation, 115 Mich. L. Rev. 1309, 1333–63 (2017).

The Supreme Court first recognized the self-execution dichotomy in an 1829 decision, Foster v. Neilson.[15] In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice John Marshall explained: "[o]ur [C]onstitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature[.]"[16] But Chief Justice Marshall then immediately qualified this explanation, stating that a treaty is only the equivalent of a legislative act when the treaty "operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision."[17] When the terms of treaty "import a contract" or suggest that some future legislative act is necessary, Marshall explained, "the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court."[18] Using this test, the Foster Court held that the treaty provision at issue—which stated that certain land grants from the King of Spain "shall be ratified and confirmed"—was non-self-executing because it suggested that Congress would ratify the land grants through a future legislative act.[19]

The Supreme Court revisited the self-execution doctrine in a 2008 decision, Medellín v. Texas.[20] In that case, the United Nation's principal judicial body, the International Court of Justice (ICJ), had entered a judgment directing the United States to reconsider the criminal convictions and sentences of a group of Mexican nationals.[21] The ICJ concluded that U.S. state and local authorities had not afforded the foreign nationals their rights to communicate with Mexican consular officials as required by the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.[22] One of the foreign nationals, Ernesto Medellín, argued that the ICJ's judgment was directly enforceable in U.S. courts because of a provision in another treaty, Article 94 of the Charter of the United Nations. That article provides that the United States (and any member nation of the United Nations) "undertakes to comply with the decision of the [ICJ] in any case to which it is a party."[23] Medellín argued that Article 94 required Texas state authorities to reevaluate his conviction and stay his upcoming execution, but the Supreme Court disagreed.[24] The Court held that Article 94 of the Charter of the United Nations was not self-executing, in part, because Article 94 states that a party to the Charter "undertakes to comply" with ICJ decisions, rather than stating that a country "shall" or "must" comply.[25] Article 94 was not

---

[15] See Foster, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) at 273–74. The Court's Percheman decision is discussed infra note 19. While Foster first articulated the concept that some treaties require implementing legislation to be made judicially enforceable, the Supreme Court did not use the term "self-executing" when discussing treaties until 1887. See Bartram v. Robertson, 122 U.S. 116, 120 (1887). See also Galbraith, supra note 14, at 1341–42 (discussing development and usage of the term "self-executing" in the context of treaties, statutes, and constitutional law).

[16] Foster, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) at 314.

[17] Id.

[18] Id.

[19] Id. at 315. Four years after Foster, the Supreme Court reviewed the Spanish language version of the same treaty, which was translated to state that the land grants "shall remain ratified and confirmed." Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) at 69 (emphasis added). Using the Spanish language version, the Court concluded that the same obligation was self-executing, explaining that the subtle difference in translations led to a different result in its holding: The difference between declaring that these grants shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, . . . and saying that all concessions of land shall remain confirmed and acknowledged to the persons in possession . . . is sufficiently obvious and important; the sense is materially different. The English side of the treaty leaves the ratification of the grants executory—they shall be ratified; the Spanish, executed. Id.

[20] 552 U.S. 491.

[21] Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex. v. U.S.), Judgment, 2004 I.C.J. Rep. 12, ¶ 64 (Mar. 31).

[22] Id. ¶ 128. See also Vienna Convention on Consular Relations art. 36, Apr. 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77, 596 U.N.T.S. 261 [hereinafter Consular Convention].

[23] Charter of the United Nations art. 94(1), 59 Stat. 1051 (June 26, 1945).

[24] See Medellín, 552 U.S. at 508–09.

[25] Id.

self-executing because it was not "a directive to domestic courts" and could not be judicially enforced in the face of contrary state law, the Supreme Court concluded.[26]

Determining whether a treaty provision is self-executing is not always a straightforward task.[27] In some cases, a treaty may specify whether it is intended to be given immediate domestic legal effect without further action.[28] However, the Medellín Court disapproved of the notion that certain special words or phrases are necessary to make a treaty self-executing.[29] Medellín also rejected a multi-factor analysis, advanced by three Justices in a dissent, which would look outside the treaty's text and analyze a variety of "practical, context-specific criteria"[30] to determine self-execution.[31] Instead, the Medellín Court explained that the primary question is whether the President and Senate intended the treaty to be self-executing.[32] The Supreme Court has deemed a treaty non-self-executing when the text manifested an intent that the treaty would not be directly enforceable in U.S. courts,[33] or when the Senate conditioned its advice and consent on the understanding that the treaty was non-self-executing.[34] Other relevant factors include whether the treaty provisions are suitably precise or obligatory to be capable of judicial enforcement and whether the provision contemplates that implementing legislation or other legal measures, such as administrative action, will follow the treaty's ratification.[35]

Many courts and commentators agree that treaty provisions that would require the United States to exercise authority that the Constitution assigns to Congress exclusively must be deemed non-self-executing.[36] Although the Supreme Court has not addressed these constitutional limitations, lower courts have concluded that, because Congress controls the power of the purse,[37] a treaty provision that requires expenditure of funds must be treated as non-self-executing.[38] Other lower courts have suggested that treaty provisions that purport to create criminal liability[39] or raise revenue[40] must be non-self-executing because those powers are the exclusive prerogative of Congress.

---

[26] Id.

[27] See, e.g., Postal, 589 F.2d at 876 ("The self-execution question is perhaps one of the most confounding in treaty law."); Oona A. Hathaway et al., International Law at Home: Enforcing Treaties in U.S. Courts, 37 Yale J. Int'l L. 51, 51–52 (2012) (describing the self-execution doctrine as "[o]ne of the great challenges for scholars, judges, and practitioners alike"); Carlos Manuel Vazquez, The Four Doctrines of Self-Executing Treaties, 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 695, 722 (1995) ("The distinction between self-executing and non-self-executing treaties has particularly confounded the lower courts, whose decisions on the issue have produced a body of law that can only be described as being in a state of disarray.").

[28] See, e.g., Trademark and Commercial Protection; Registration of Trademarks (Inter-American): General Inter-American Convention for Trade Mark and Commercial Protection art. 35, Feb. 20, 1929, 46 Stat. 2907 ("The provisions of this Convention shall have the force of law in those States in which international treaties possess that character, as soon as they are ratified by their constitutional organs.").

[29] See Medellín, 552 U.S. at 521 ("[N]either our approach nor our cases require that a treaty provide for self-execution in so many talismanic words.").

[30] Id. at 549 (Breyer, J., dissenting joined by Souter & Ginsberg, JJ.).

[31] Id. at 514–16.

[32] See id. at 509, 523.

[33] See supra note 10.

[34] See, e.g., Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 735 (2004) ("[T]he United States ratified the [International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights] on the express understanding that it was not self-executing and so did not itself create obligations enforceable in the federal courts.").

[35] See Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 310(2) & reporters' nn.5, 6.

[36] See, e.g., id. § 310(3) & reporters' n.11. See also infra notes 37–38.

[37] For discussion of the Appropriations Clause and Congress's power of the purse, see ArtI.S9.C7.1 Overview of Appropriations Clause.

[38] See Edwards v. Carter, 580 F.2d 1055, 1058 (D.C. Cir. 1978) (per curiam) ("[E]xpenditure of funds by the United States cannot be accomplished by self-executing treaty; implementing legislation appropriating such funds is

The doctrine of non-self-execution appears to be in some tension with the Supremacy Clause's declaration that "all treaties" are part of the supreme law of the land.[41] The Supreme Court has never fully explained the relationship between non-self-executing treaties and the Supremacy Clause.[42] Opinions from some lower courts and the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) in the Department of Justice[43] suggest non-self-executing treaties lack any domestic legal status.[44] However, other courts and scholars contend that, although non-self-executing treaties may not be enforced in courts, they may still form part of the supreme law of the land that is carried out and enforced outside the judicial system.[45] indispensable."), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 907 (1978); The Over the Top (Schroeder v. Bissell), 5 F.2d 838, 845 (D. Conn. 1925) ("All treaties requiring payments of money have been followed by acts of Congress appropriating the amount. The treaties were the supreme law of the land, but they were ineffective to draw a dollar from the treasury."); Turner v. Am. Baptist Missionary Union, 24 F. Cas. 344, 345 (C.C.D. Mich. 1852) (No. 14251) ("[M]oney cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our government.").

---

[39] See Hopson v. Kreps, 622 F.2d 1375, 1380 (9th Cir. 1980) ("Treaty regulations that penalize individuals . . . require domestic legislation before they are given any effect."); Postal, 589 F.2d at 877 (noting that constitutional restrictions on the use of a self-executing treaty to withdraw money from the treasury would also "be the case with respect to criminal sanctions"), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 832 (1979).

[40] See Edwards, 580 F.2d at 1058 ("[T]he constitutional mandate that 'all Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives,' . . . appears, by reason of the restrictive language used, to prohibit the use of the treaty power to impose taxes.") (quoting U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 1); Swearingen v. United States, 565 F. Supp. 1019, 1022 (D. Colo. 1983) ("[A] treaty which created an exemption from the taxation of income of United States citizens . . . would be in contravention of the exclusive constitutional authority of the House of Representatives to originate all bills for raising revenues."). For analysis of the Origination Clause and Congress's power to raise revenue, see discussion supra ArtI.S7.C1.1 Origination Clause and Revenue Bills.

[41] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[42] See, e.g., Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 310 reporters' n.12. Some passages of Medellín suggest non-self-executing treaties have no status in domestic law. See, e.g., Medellín, 552 U.S. at 504 ("This Court has long recognized the distinction between treaties that automatically have effect as domestic law, and those that—while they constitute international law commitments—do not by themselves function as binding federal law."); id. at 526 ("[A] non-self-executing treaty can become domestic law only in the same way as any other law—through passage of legislation by both Houses of Congress, combined with either the President's signature or a congressional override of a Presidential veto."). Other passages suggest self-execution addresses whether the treaty is enforceable in U.S. courts rather than whether the treaty constitutes "law" in the constitutional sense. See, e.g., id. at 519 ("[W]hether the treaties underlying a judgment are self-executing so that the judgment is directly enforceable as domestic law in our courts is, of course, a matter for this Court to decide."); id. at 523 ("[T]he [ICJ's] judgment is not a rule of domestic law binding in state and federal courts.").

[43] OLC has stated that its opinions are "controlling" on questions of law within the Executive Branch, subject to the ultimate authority of the President. See Memorandum from David J. Barron, Acting Asst. Att'y Gen., Office of Legal Counsel to Att'ys of the Office, Re: Best Practices for OLC Legal Advice and Written Opinions 1 (July 16, 2010) ("OLC's core function . . . is to provide controlling advice to Executive Branch officials on questions of law."), https://www.justice.gov/olc/pdf/olc-legal-advice-opinions.pdf; Memorandum from Steven G. Bradbury, Principal Deputy Asst. Att'y Gen., Office of Legal Counsel to Att'ys of the Office, Re: Best Practices for OLC Opinions 1 (May 16, 2005) ("[S]ubject to the President's authority under the Constitution, OLC opinions are controlling on questions of law within the Executive Branch."), https://fas.org/irp/agency/doj/olc/best-practices.pdf. See also Trevor W. Morrison, Stare Decisis in the Office of Legal Counsel, 110 Colum. L. Rev. 1448, 1525 n.31 (2010) (collecting statements from OLC and its officials on the status of OLC opinions). However, OLC's opinions are not "law" that is binding outside of the Executive Branch. See, e.g., McElroy v. United States ex rel. Guagliardo, 361 U.S. 281, 285–86 (1960) (declining to follow an Attorney General opinion and noting that such opinions are "entitled to some weight," but "do not have the force of judicial decisions").

[44] See ITC Ltd. v. Punchgini, Inc., 482 F.3d 135, 162 n.21 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Non-self-executing treaties do not become effective as domestic law until implementing legislation is enacted."), certified question answered, 880 N.E.2d 852 (2007); Renkel v. United States, 456 F.3d 640, 643 (6th Cir. 2006) ("'[N]on-self-executing' treaties do require domestic legislation to have the force of law."); Authority of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to Override International Law in Extraterritorial Law Enforcement Activities, supra note 11, at 178–79 ("[T]he decision whether to act consistently with an unexecuted treaty is a political issue rather than a legal one, and unexecuted treaties . . . are not legally binding on the political branches.") (footnote omitted).

[45] See, e.g., The Over the Top, 5 F.2d at 845 ("The treaties were the supreme law of the land, but they were ineffective to draw a dollar from the treasury."); Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 310 reporters' n.12 ("[T]here is no

Despite the importance of the self-execution doctrine in U.S. domestic law, self-execution does not impact treaties' status under international law.[46] Under international law, treaties create rights and obligations that nations owe to one another that are independent of each nation's domestic law.[47] International law generally allows each country to decide how to implement its treaty commitments into its own domestic legal system.[48] The self-execution doctrine concerns domestic enforcement of treaties, but it does not affect the United States' obligation to comply with the provision under international law.[49] Thus, even if courts cannot enforce a treaty provision in domestic courts because it is non-self-executing, that provision may still be binding under international law, and the United States may still have an international legal obligation to comply.

ArtII.S2.C2.1.5 Congressional Implementation of Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

When a treaty provision requires implementing legislation or appropriation of funds to carry out the United States' obligations, the task of providing that legislation falls to Congress.[1] In the early years of constitutional practice, debate arose over whether Congress was obligated—rather than simply empowered—to enact legislation implementing non-self-executing treaty provisions into domestic law.[2] But the issue has not been resolved in any definitive way.[3] clear reason at present to conclude that non-self-executing provisions are, as a general matter, less than supreme law."); Curtis Bradley, International Law in the U.S. Legal System 44 (2d ed. 2015) (summarizing the debate of the domestic status of non-self-executing treaties).

---

[46] See, e.g., Medellín, 552 U.S. at 504–06 (discussing the distinction between the binding effect of treaties under international law versus domestic law).

[47] See id.; Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 301(3) & cmt. d. See also Validity of Congressional-Executive Agreements That Substantially Modify the United States' Obligations Under an Existing Treaty, 20 Op. O.L.C. 389, 391 (1996) ("A 'treaty,' . . . has two aspects: insofar as it is self-executing, it prescribes a rule of domestic or municipal law; and, as a compact or contract between nations, it gives rise to binding obligations in international law.") (footnote omitted).

[48] See, e.g., Head Money Cases (Edye v. Robertson), 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884) ("[A treaty] depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it."); Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 310 cmt. c ("It is ordinarily up to each nation to decide how to implement domestically its international obligations.").

[49] See Medellín, 552 U.S. at 522–23 (explaining that, although the ICJ's judgment was non-self-executing and did "not of its own force constitute binding federal law[,]" the judgment "create[d] an international law obligation" for the United States); Fourth Restatement, supra note 14, § 310(1) ("Whether a treaty provision is self-executing concerns how the provision is implemented domestically and does not affect the obligation of the United States to comply with it under international law.").

[1] See Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 525–26 (2008). See also ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties (discussing Congress's role in implementing non-self-executing treaties).

[2] Whereas Alexander Hamilton argued that the House of Representatives was obligated to appropriate funds for the Jay Treaty, James Madison, then a Member of the House, and others disagreed. Compare Enclosure to Letter from Alexander Hamilton to George Washington (Mar. 29, 1796), in 20 Papers of Alexander Hamilton 98 (Harold C. Syrett ed., 1974) ("[T]he [H]ouse of [R]epresentatives have no moral power to refuse the execution of a treaty, which is not contrary to the [C]onstitution, because it pledges the public faith, and have no legal power to refuse its execution

By contrast, the Supreme Court did address the scope of Congress's power to enact legislation implementing a treaty in a 1920 case. In Missouri v. Holland,[4] the Supreme Court considered a constitutional challenge to a federal statute that implemented a treaty prohibiting the killing, capturing, or selling of certain birds that traveled between the United States and Canada.[5] In the preceding decade, two federal district courts had held that similar statutes enacted prior to the treaty violated the Tenth Amendment because they infringed on the reserved powers of the states to control natural resources within their borders.[6] But the Holland Court determined that, even if those district court decisions were correct, their reasoning no longer applied once the United States concluded a valid migratory bird treaty.[7] In an opinion authored by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Holland Court concluded that the federal government can use the treaty power to regulate matters that the Tenth Amendment otherwise might reserve to the states.[8] And if the treaty itself is constitutional, the Holland Court held, Congress has the power under the Necessary and Proper Clause[9] to enact legislation implementing the treaty into domestic law of the United States without restraint by the Tenth Amendment.[10]

Some legal commentators and jurists have questioned aspects of the Justice Holmes's reasoning in Holland.[11] Some of Holland's critics contend that the decision gives the federal government too broad a power to legislate in areas reserved to the states, especially when because it is a law—until at least it ceases to be a law by a regular act of revocation of the competent authority."), with 5 Annals of Cong. 493–94 (1796) (statement of Rep. Madison) ("[T]his House, in its Legislative capacity, must exercise its reason; it must deliberate; for deliberation is implied in legislation. If it must carry all Treaties into effect, . . . it would be the mere instrument of the will of another department, and would have no will of its own."); 5 Annals of Cong. 771 (1796) (proposed resolution of Rep. William Blount) ("[W]hen a Treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend, for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such Treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.").

---

[3] See Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 205 (2d ed. 1996).

[4] 252 U.S. 416 (1920).

[5] See Migratory Bird Treaty Act, ch. 128, 40 Stat. 755 (1918); Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds art. VIII, Aug. 16, 1916, U.S.-Gr. Brit., 39 Stat. 1702.

[6] United States v. McCullagh, 221 F. 288, 295–96 (D. Kan. 1915); United States v. Shauver, 214 F. 154, 160 (E.D. Ark. 1914).

[7] See Holland, 252 U.S. at 433.

[8] See id at 433–34 (concluding that the "treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution" and is not "forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment").

[9] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8. See also ArtI.S8.C18.1 Overview of Necessary and Proper Clause (analyzing the Necessary and Proper Clause).

[10] See Holland, 252 U.S. at 432 ("If the treaty is valid there can be no dispute about the validity of the statute under Article 1, Section 8, as a necessary and proper means to execute the powers of the Government."). Accord Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109, 121 (1901) ("The power of Congress to make all laws necessary and proper . . . includes the power to enact such legislation as is appropriate to give efficacy to any stipulations which it is competent for the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to insert in a treaty with a foreign power.").

[11] See Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 873 (2014) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment joined by Thomas, J.) (describing Holland's interpretation of the Necessary and Proper Clause as consisting of an "unreasoned and citation-less sentence" that is unsupported by the Constitution's text or structure); Nicholas Quinn Rosenkranz, Executing the Treaty Power, 118 Harv. L. Rev. 1867, 1868 (2005) (arguing that Holland's interpretation of the Necessary and Proper Clause "is wrong and the case should be overruled"). See also ArtII.S2.C2.1.9 Effect of Treaties on the Constitution, at n.1 (discussing subsequent Supreme Court decisions responding to questions raised in Holland concerning the Supremacy Clause). In the 1950s, there was an effort, led by Senator John Bricker of Ohio, to limit the scope of the treaty power as described in Holland through a constitutional amendment. One version of the proposed amendment, which became known as the "Bricker Amendment," would have provided that a "treaty shall become effective as internal law in the United States only through legislation which would be valid in the absence of a treaty." See S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 83d Cong., Proposals to Amend the Treaty-Making Provisions of the Constitution: Views of Deans and Professors of Law 3 (Comm. Print 1953). No version of the Bricker Amendment was ever adopted.

coupled with twentieth century changes in international lawmaking that have expanded the types of issues addressed in treaties.[12] Others argue that a combined reading of the Necessary and Proper Clause and the Treaty Clause only permits Congress to pass laws necessary to make treaties, not to implement them, as Justice Holmes reasoned.[13] Under this view, Congress could use the Necessary and Proper Clause to, for example, appropriate funds for U.S. diplomats to engage in overseas treaty negotiations, but Congress must rely on its other Article I powers to implement treaties that have been signed and ratified.[14] Other legal scholars respond to these critiques by contending that the power to make treaties is hollow without the power to implement them,[15] that political and structural checks safeguard federalism,[16] and that Holland comports with the Constitution's text and historical practice.[17]

As the academic debate continues, the Supreme Court has not overturned Holland's holding related to Congress's power to implement treaties.[18] Rather, the Court has sometimes discussed it favorably.[19] Nevertheless, principles of federalism embodied in the Tenth Amendment continue to influence constitutional challenges to U.S. treaties and their implementing statutes, including in the 2014 Supreme Court decision, Bond v. United States.[20]

Bond concerned a criminal prosecution arising from a case of "romantic jealousy" when a jilted spouse spread toxic chemicals on the mailbox of a woman with whom her husband had an affair.[21] Although the victim only suffered a minor thumb burn, the United States brought criminal charges under the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998—a

---

[12] See, e.g., Curtis A. Bradley, The Treaty Power and American Federalism, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 390, 433 (1998); Curtis A. Bradley, The Treaty Power and American Federalism, Part II, 99 Mich. L. Rev. 98, 98–99 (2000); John C. Eastman, Will Mrs. Bond Topple Missouri v. Holland?, Cato Sup. Ct. Rev. 185, 202 (2010–2011). For discussion of changes in international treaty practice, see ArtII.S2.C2.1.3 Scope of Treaty-Making Power.

[13] See, e.g., Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 874–76 (2014) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment joined by Thomas, J.) ("[A] power to help the President make treaties is not a power to implement treaties already made."); Rosenkranz, supra note 11, at 1882 ("The power granted to Congress is emphatically not the power to make laws for carrying into execution 'the treaty power,' let alone the power to make laws for carrying into execution 'all treaties.' Rather, on the face of the conjoined text, Congress has power 'To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution . . . [the] Power . . . to make Treaties.'") (alterations in original).

[14] See Bond, 572 U.S. at 876 (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment joined by Thomas, J.) ("Once a treaty has been made, Congress's power to do what is 'necessary and proper' to assist the making of treaties drops out of the picture. To legislate compliance with the United States' treaty obligations, Congress must rely upon its independent (though quite robust) Article I, § 8, powers."); Rosenkranz, supra note 11, at 1882–85 (discussing the scope of legislation Congress could pass under a more restrictive view of the Necessary and Proper Clause and its relationship to the Treaty Clause).

[15] See, e.g., Edward T. Swaine, Putting Missouri v. Holland on the Map, 73 Mo. L. Rev. 1007, 1012–18 (2008) (critiquing the view that Congress has the power to pass legislation necessary to make treaties but not to enforce or implement them); Michael D. Ramsey, Congress's Limited Power to Enforce Treaties, 90 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1539, 1542–43 (2015) (contending that the power to make treaties includes the power to enforce them "because absent reliable methods of enforcement, the power to make treaties as a practical matter would be greatly impaired").

[16] See, e.g., David Sloss, International Agreements and the Political Safeguards of Federalism, 55 Stan. L. Rev. 1963, 1964 (2003); Oona A. Hathaway et al., The Treaty Power: Its History, Scope, and Limits, 98 Cornell L. Rev. 239, 324–26 (2013).

[17] See, e.g., David M. Golove, Treaty-Making and the Nation: The Historical Foundations of the Nationalist Conception of the Treaty Power, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 1075, 1313–15 (2000).

[18] See Bond, 572 U.S. at 855–56 (declining to revisit Holland or decide that a prosecution under legislation implementing a treaty was not "a necessary and proper means of executing the National Government's power to make treaties").

[19] See United States v. Lara, 541 U.S. 193, 201 (2004) ("[A]s Justice Holmes pointed out, treaties made pursuant to [the treaty] power can authorize Congress to deal with 'matters' with which otherwise 'Congress could not deal.'") (quoting Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433 (1920)); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 18 (1957) (plurality opinion) ("To the extent that the United States can validly make treaties, the people and the States have delegated their power to the National Government and the Tenth Amendment is no barrier.").

[20] 572 U.S. 844.

[21] See Id. at 861.

federal statute that implemented a multilateral treaty prohibiting the use of chemical weapons.[22] The accused asserted that the Tenth Amendment reserved the power to prosecute her "purely local" crime to the states, and she asked the Court to overturn or limit Holland's holding on the relationship between treaties and the Tenth Amendment.[23]

A majority in Bond declined to revisit Holland's interpretation of the Tenth Amendment,[24] but the Bond Court ruled in the accused's favor based on principles of statutory interpretation.[25] When construing a statute interpreting a treaty, Bond explained, "it is appropriate to refer to basic principles of federalism embodied in the Constitution to resolve ambiguity in a federal statute"[26] Applying these principles through a presumption that Congress did not intend to intrude on areas of traditional state authority, the Bond Court held that the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act did not apply to the jilted spouse's actions.[27] In other words, the majority in Bond did not disturb Holland's conclusion that the Tenth Amendment does not limit Congress's power to enact legislation implementing treaties, but Bond did hold that principles of federalism reflected in the Tenth Amendment may dictate how courts interpret such implementing statutes.[28]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.6 Interpreting Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

All three branches of government play a part in treaty interpretation. When analyzing a treaty for purposes of applying it as domestic law of the United States, U.S. courts have final authority to interpret the treaty's meaning.[1] The Supreme Court has stated that its goal in interpreting a treaty is to discern the intent of the nations that are parties to the treaty.[2] The interpretation process begins by examining "the text of the treaty and the context in which the [22] Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105-277, div. I, tit. II, § 201(a), 112 Stat. 2681–856, 2681–866 (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 6701 et seq.); Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling, and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction art. 1, Jan. 13, 1993, S. Treaty Doc. No. 103-21, 1974 U.N.T.S. 317.

---

[23] Bond, 572 U.S. at 848.

[24] See id. at 855–66. Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas criticized Holland and argued that the Supreme Court should depart from its interpretation of congressional power to enact legislation that is necessary and proper to implement treaties. See Id. at 873–81 (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment joined by Thomas, J.).

[25] See id. at 859.

[26] Id. at 855–60.

[27] See id.

[28] Accord William S. Dodge, Bond v. United States and Congress's Role in Implementing Treaties, 108 AJIL Unbound 86, 87 (2014) ("The central holding of Bond is that statutes implementing treaties are not exceptions to the rules of statutory interpretation that the Supreme Court has developed to protect federalism.").

[1] See Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, 548 U.S. 331, 353–54 (2006) ("If treaties are to be given effect as federal law under our legal system, determining their meaning as a matter of federal law 'is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department.'") (quoting Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177 (1803)).

[2] See, e.g., BG Grp., PLC v. Republic of Argentina, 572 U.S. 25, 37 (2014); Lozano v. Montoya Alvarez, 572 U.S. 1, 11 (2014); Sumitomo Shoji Am., Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 183 (1982); Wright v. Henkel, 190 U.S. 40, 57 (1903).

written words are used."[3] When a treaty provides that it is to be concluded in multiple languages, the Supreme Court has analyzed foreign language versions to help understand the treaty's terms.[4] The Court also considers the broader "object and purpose" of a treaty.[5] In some cases, the Supreme Court examines extratextual materials, such as drafting history,[6] the views of other state parties,[7] and the post-ratification practices of other nations.[8] But the Court has cautioned that consulting sources outside the text may not be appropriate when the treaty is unambiguous.[9]

The Executive Branch also plays a role in interpreting treaties, especially outside the context of domestic litigation and when operating in the realm of international affairs. The Executive Branch generally is responsible for carrying out treaties' requirements and determining whether other countries fulfill their obligations to the United States.[10] In performing this role, the Executive Branch often must interpret treaties' provisions and mandates.[11] In addition, some questions of treaty interpretation may involve presidential discretion or otherwise may present "political questions" that are more appropriately resolved in the political branches than in the courts.[12]

Within the Executive Branch, the Department of Justice participates in treaty interpretation as part of its statutory responsibilities to provide legal opinions within the Executive Branch[13] and represent the United States in litigation.[14] The Department of State, which oversees treaty negotiations,[15] often is able to provide authoritative interpretations

[3] See, e.g., Monasky v. Taglieri, No. 18-935, slip. op. 1, 7 (U.S. Feb. 25, 2020) (quoting Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392, 397 (1985)); Water Splash, Inc. v. Menon, No. 16-254, slip. op. 1, 4 (U.S. May 22, 2017) (quoting Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Schlunk, 486 U.S. 694, 699 (1988)); Société Nationale Industrielle Aérospatiale v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for S. Dist. of Iowa, 482 U.S. 522, 534 (1987).

[4] See, e.g., Water Splash, No. 18-935, slip. op. at 7–8; Schlunk, 486 U.S. at 699. In one case, the Supreme Court changed its conclusion about the self-executing effect of a provision in an 1819 treaty with Spain after analyzing an authenticated Spanish-language version of the text. See supra ArtII.S2.C2.1.9 Effect of Treaties on the Constitution, at n.19.

[5] See, e.g., Abbott v. Abbott, 560 U.S. 1, 20 (2010); Sanchez-Llamas, 548 U.S. at 347; Société Nationale Industrielle Aérospatiale, 482 U.S. at 530; E. Airlines, Inc. v. Floyd, 499 U.S. 530, 552 (1991).

[6] See, e.g., Monasky, No. 18-935, slip. op. at 8–9; Water Splash, No. 18-935, slip. op. at 7–8; Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 507 (2008); Air France, 470 U.S. at 400; Schlunk, 486 U.S. at 700.

[7] See, e.g., Water Splash, No. 18-935, slip. op. at 7–9; Abbott, 560 U.S. at 16; Lozano, 572 U.S. at 12; Air France, 470 U.S. at 404.

[8] See, e.g., Medellín, 552 U.S. at 507; Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243, 259 (1984).

[9] See Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 490 U.S. 122, 134 (1989) ("We must thus be governed by the text—solemnly adopted by the governments of many separate nations—whatever conclusions might be drawn from the intricate drafting history that petitioners and the United States have brought to our attention. The latter may of course be consulted to elucidate a text that is ambiguous . . . . But where the text is clear, as it is here, we have no power to insert an amendment.").

[10] See Cong. Research Serv., Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rep. No. 106-71, at 12–13 (2001) [hereinafter Treaties and Other International Agreements] ("The executive branch has the primary responsibility for carrying out treaties and ascertaining that other parties fulfill their obligations after treaties and other international agreements enter into force . . . . The executive branch interprets the requirements of an agreement as it carries out its provisions."); Constitutionality of Legislative Provision Regarding ABM Treaty, 20 Op. O.L.C. 246, 248–49 (1996) (discussing the Executive Branch's view on the President's power over treaty interpretation and execution); Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law §306 cmt. g (2018) ("Execution of a treaty requires interpretation, and the President often determines what a treaty means in the first instance.").

[11] See supra note 10.

[12] In Charlton v. Kelly, for example, the Supreme Court declined to decide whether Italy violated its extradition treaty with the United States, reasoning that, even if a violation occurred, the President "elected to waive any right" to respond to the breach by voiding the treaty. See 229 U.S. 447, 475 (1913). For discussion of Charlton and the political question doctrine, see ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine.

[13] See 28 U.S.C. § 512 ("The head of an executive department may require the opinion of the Attorney General on questions of law arising in the administration of his department."). For background on the Department of Justice's advice-giving function, see ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties, at n.43.

based on its access to information about negotiating history and the views of treaty partners.[16] Because the Executive Branch may have special insight into a treaty's meaning, the Supreme Court has stated that the Executive Branch's views are entitled to "great weight."[17] But the Court has not adopted the Executive Branch's interpretation in every case.[18] And interbranch disputes may arise if the Executive Branch changes its interpretation and departs from the shared understanding of the executive and the Senate at the time of ratification.[19]

The Legislative Branch also influences treaty interpretation. The Senate may directly shape interpretation during the advice-and-consent process by making its consent to ratification conditioned upon a particular understanding of a treaty's terms.[20] The President may not ratify a treaty unless he accepts the Senate's interpretation or the Senate agrees to withdraw it.[21] After the advice-and-consent process, however, the Senate's ability to influence treaty interpretation is more restrained. According to a 1901 Supreme Court decision, Senate resolutions that purport to interpret a treaty after ratification are "without legal significance" because the "meaning of the treaty cannot be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of [14] See 28 U.S.C. § 516 ("Except as otherwise authorized by law, the conduct of litigation in which the United States, an agency, or officer thereof is a party, or is interested, and securing evidence therefor, is reserved to officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General.").

---

[15] See U.S. Dep't of State, 11 Foreign Affairs Manual § 724.1 (2006), https://fam.state.gov/fam/11fam/11fam0720.html ("Negotiations of treaties . . . are not to be undertaken, nor any exploratory discussions undertaken with representatives of another government or international organization, until authorized in writing by the Secretary [of State] or an officer specifically authorized by the Secretary for that purpose.").

[16] See, e.g., Lozano, 572 U.S. at 21–22 (accepting the State Department's interpretation of the Hague International Child Abduction Convention); Sumitomo Shoji Am., 457 U.S. at 184–85 (adopting the State Department's interpretation of a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between Japan and the United States); Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187, 194–95 (1961) (examining the State Department's diplomatic notes and correspondence in examining an 1881 Treaty between the United States and Serbia for Developing Commercial Relations).

[17] See Water Splash, No. 18-935, slip. op. at 7–8 (quoting Abbott, 560 U.S. at 15); Medellín, 552 U.S. at 513; Sumitomo Shoji Am., 457 U.S. at 184–85; Kolovrat, 366 U.S. at 194.

[18] See BG Grp., 572 U.S. at 37 (construing a dispute resolution provision in an investment treaty between the United Kingdom and Argentina and concluding "[w]e do not accept the Solicitor General's view as applied to the treaty before us"); Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557, 629–30 (2006) (declining to adopt the Executive Branch's interpretation of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions).

[19] For example, the Reagan Administration proposed to advance a new interpretation of the 1972 Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems (AMB Treaty) with the Soviet Union that would have allowed the U.S. to test a space-based missile defense system. See generally ABM Treaty Interpretation Dispute: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Arms Control, Int'l Sec. & Sci. of the H. Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 99th Cong. (1985); Strategic Defense Initiative: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Strategic & Theater Nuclear Forces of the S. Comm. on Armed Servs., 99th Cong. (1985); ABM Treaty and the Constitution: Joint Hearings Before the S. Comm. on Foreign Relations & the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 100th Cong. 81–105 (1987); Abraham D. Sofaer, The ABM Treaty and the Strategic Defense Initiative, 99 Harv. L. Rev. 1972 (1986). Some in Congress argued that the new interpretation contradicted the shared understanding of the Executive Branch and the Senate when the ABM Treaty was ratified, and the Reagan Administration ultimately decided not to rely on its new interpretation. See Treaties and Other International Agreements, supra note 10, at 128–29; John Yoo, Politics As Law?: The Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, the Separation of Powers, and Treaty Interpretation, 89 Cal. L. Rev. 851, 860 (2001). Since this controversy, the Senate at times has conditioned its advice and consent to treaties on what has become known as the "Biden Condition," which provides that "the United States shall interpret the Treaty in accordance with the common understanding of the Treaty shared by the President and the Senate at the time the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification." See, e.g., 134 Cong. Rec. 12849 (1988).

[20] See, e.g., 164 Cong. Rec. S8052 (daily ed. Jan. 2, 2019) (providing the Senate's advice and consent to ratification of the U.N. Convention on Assignment of Receivables in International Trade conditioned on, among other things, the understanding that the treaty would not regulate securities); 143 Cong. Rec. 22795 (1997) (resolution of advice and consent to the Constitution and Convention of the International Telecommunications Union conditioned on, among other things, the understanding that the treaty's reference to "geographical situation of particular countries" would not "imply a recognition of claim to any preferential rights to the geostationary-satellite orbit"). For discussion of the Senate's conditional consent authority and its ability to issue reservations, understandings, and declarations, see ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power those who may have voted to ratify it."[22] That said, the Legislative Branch may still play a role in treaty interpretation when it passes implementing legislation or other treaty-related laws.[23] For example, when treaties require countries to ensure certain actions are criminalized in domestic law, Congress might interpret the treaty during the legislative process when it defines the prohibited actions in U.S. law; determines appropriate punishments; and decides whether domestic law already prohibits the conduct.[24]

[21] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power.

ArtII.S2.C2.1.7 Legal Effect of Treaties on Prior Acts of Congress

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Constitution provides that both federal statutes and treaties are part of the supreme law of the land, but it does not define the relationship between federal legislation and treaties.[1] As a result, disputes have arisen over which law governs when there are differences between a self-executing treaty and a federal statute. The Supreme Court has resolved this issue through what has become known as the "last-in-time" or "later-in-time" rule: when there is a conflict between a self-executing treaty and a federal statute, U.S. courts must apply whichever of the two reflects the "latest expression of the sovereign will" of the United States.[2]

The Supreme Court has frequently applied the last-in-time rule to give effect to a statute that conflicts with an earlier ratified treaty.[3] Although the situation has arisen less often, the Supreme Court has also held that a treaty can override an earlier-in-time federal statute.[4] The last-in-time rule, however, only applies when the treaty at issue is self-executing.[5] Because a

---

[22] See The Diamond Rings, 183 U.S. 176, 180 (1901).

[23] Accord Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 206 (2d ed. 1996) ("Congress . . . has occasion to interpret a treaty when it considers enacting implementing legislation, or other legislation to which the treaty might be relevant.").

[24] For example, the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Torture Convention) requires countries to make torture and other defined offenses punishable by "appropriate" penalties in domestic law. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment art. 4, Dec. 10, 1984, 23 I.L.M. 1027, 1465 U.N.T.S. 85 [hereinafter Torture Convention] ("Each State Party shall make these offences punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature."). The legislation implementing the Torture Convention appears to interpret this provision by making torture resulting in death a capital offense and torture that does not result in death punishable by imprisonment up to 20 years. 18 U.S.C. § 2340A(a).

[1] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2] Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 195 (1888). See also Chinese Exclusion Case (Ping v. United States), 130 U.S. 581, 600 (1889) ("[T]he last expression of the sovereign will must control.").

[3] See, e.g., Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371, 376 (1998) (per curiam on denial of certiorari); Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. at 600–01; Whitney, 124 U.S. at 194–95; Head Money Cases (Edye v. Robertson), 112 U.S. 580, 596–99 (1884).

[4] See Cook v. United States, 288 U.S. 102, 118–19 (1933) (holding that a 1924 treaty between the United States and Great Britain superseded the terms of the Tariff Act of 1922 and limited the authority of the Coast Guard to board a British vessel outside U.S. territorial waters). See also The Cherokee Tobacco, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 616, 621 (1870) ("A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress, and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty.") (footnote omitted).

[5] Whitney, 124 U.S. at 194 ("[I]f the [treaty and statute] are inconsistent, the one last in date will control the other: provided, always, the stipulation of the treaty on the subject is self-executing."). See also Medellín v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 505–06 (2008) ("Only '[i]f the treaty contains stipulations which are self-executing, that is, require no legislation non-self-executing treaty is not judicially enforceable,[6] courts will apply a federal statute over a non-self-executing treaty regardless of the timing of the statute's enactment.[7]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.8 Preemptive Effect of Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

One of the Framers' primary objectives in including treaties in the Supremacy Clause was to ensure that the United States' treaty obligations would prevail over inconsistent state legislation.[1] During the pre-constitutional period, some states resisted complying with the 1783 Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, which prohibited the United States from placing "legal impediments" on British citizens' attempts to collect pre-Revolutionary War debts.[2] Soon after the states adopted the Constitution, the Supreme Court addressed whether this treaty obligation would prevail over a state statute that allowed Virginians to satisfy debts to British creditors by making payment to a state loan office rather than to the creditors themselves.[3] In Ware v. Hylton—the first Supreme Court case to address the legal effect of treaties—the Court struck down the Virginia law on the ground that it conflicted with the Treaty of Peace.[4] "A treaty cannot be the Supreme law of the land, that is of all the United States, if any act of a State Legislature can stand in its way[,]" Justice Samuel Chase explained.[5]

Since Ware, the Supreme Court has held that treaty provisions preempt contrary state or local laws on many occasions.[6] But just as only self-executing treaty provisions can prevail over earlier-in-time federal statutes, a treaty provision must be self-executing to preempt inconsistent state law.[7] Before the mid-twentieth century, courts routinely held that treaties displaced state or local law without examining closely whether the treaty provision was to make them operative, [will] they have the force and effect of a legislative enactment.'") (quoting Whitney, 124 U.S. at 194); Apparatus for Radio Communication on Steam Vessels, 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 84, 86 (1913) ("[U]nless a treaty is self-executing, it will not necessarily repeal a prior and inconsistent statute on the same subject.").

---

[6] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties.

[7] See supra note 5. See also Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 109 cmt. c (2018); David M. Golove, Treaty-Making and the Nation: The Historical Foundations of the Nationalist Conception of the Treaty Power, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 1075, 1100–04 (2000).

[1] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties.

[2] Treaty of Peace art. 4, Sept. 3, 1783, U.S.-Gr. Brit., 8 Stat. 80.

[3] See Act for Sequestering British Property, in 9 The Statutes at Large; Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia in the Year 1619, at 379 (William Waller Hening ed., 1821) (passed Oct. 20, 1777).

[4] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 199 (1796).

[5] Id. at 236–37 (Chase, J.).

[6] See Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 108 reporters' n.1 (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement] (collecting Supreme Court cases).

[7] See Medellín, 552 U.S. at 513. See also Buell v. Mitchell, 274 F.3d 337, 372 (6th Cir. 2001) (concluding that certain human rights treaties to which the United States is a party did not prevail over an Ohio death penalty statute because, inter alia, the treaties were non-self-executing).

self-executing.[8] But in more recent cases, courts have closely considered whether a treaty provision is self-executing before applying it to preempt state law.[9]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.9 Effect of Treaties on the Constitution

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

While treaties may preempt contradictory state law and supplant earlier-in-time federal legislation, the treaty power is not so broad as to override the Constitution.[1] The Supreme Court stated in dicta in several cases that treaties may not alter the Constitution or authorize acts that the Constitution expressly prohibits.[2] Although the Court has never invalidated a treaty itself on constitutional grounds,[3] it has held that courts may not give treaties domestic effect in a way that interferes with individual rights guaranteed in the Constitution.[4] In Boos v. Berry, the Supreme Court held that a treaty-based obligation to protect foreign embassies did not authorize Congress to enact legislation that infringed on individuals' First Amendment

[8] See, e.g., Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924); Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U.S. 483, 490 (1879). See also David Sloss, The Death of Treaty Supremacy 85–95 (2016) (finding no cases between 1800 and 1945 in which state or local law prevailed over an inconsistent treaty because the treaty was deemed non-self-executing); Fourth Restatement, supra note 6, § 308 cmt. b ("Before the mid-20th century, courts routinely enforced treaty obligations to displace contrary State or local law, often without focusing on the question of self-execution. . . . In more recent cases, once courts have identified a conflict between a treaty and State or local law, they tend to consider whether a treaty provision is self-executing before applying it to preempt State or local law.").

[9] See supra note 7.

[1] In Missouri v. Holland, the Supreme Court noted that, whereas the Supremacy Clause gives acts of Congress the status of supreme law of the land only when "made in pursuance" of the Constitution, treaties are deemed supreme law of the land when made "under the authority of the United States." See 252 U.S. 416, 432 (1920) (discussing U.S. Const. art VI, cl. 2). Holland described it as "an open question" whether the "authority" underlying the treaty power could extend beyond what the Constitution permits. Id. But the Court clarified in subsequent decisions that the treaty power is subject to certain constitutional restraints, and the variation in language in the Supremacy Clause was intended to ensure that treaties made under the Articles of Confederation would remain in effect under the Constitution. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 16–17 (1957) (plurality opinion). See also infra notes 4–7.

[2] See Doe v. Braden, 57 U.S. (16 How.) 635, 657 (1853) ("The treaty is . . . a law made by the proper authority, and the courts of justice have no right to annul or disregard any of its provisions, unless they violate the Constitution of the United States."); The Cherokee Tobacco, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 616, 620 (1870) ("It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument."); De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890) ("It would not be contended that [the treaty power] extends so far as to authorize what the constitution forbids."); Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924) ("The treaty-making power of the United States . . . does not extend 'so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids.'") (quoting De Geofroy, 133 U.S. at 267). See also Reid, 354 U.S. at 16 ("This Court has regularly and uniformly recognized the supremacy of the Constitution over a treaty.").

[3] See Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 185 (2d ed. 1996); Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations § 307 cmt. a (2018).

[4] See Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 324 (1988) ("It is well established that 'no agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or on any other branch of Government, which is free from the restraints of the Constitution.'") (quoting Reid, 354 U.S. at 16 (plurality opinion)). See also Am. Ins. Ass'n v. Garamendi, 539 U.S. 396, 416–17 & n.9 (2003) (stating that the power of a treaty to preempt state law is "[s]ubject . . . to the Constitution's guarantees of individual rights").

right to freedom of speech.[5] Similarly, in Reid v. Covert, a plurality of the Court determined that the United States could not rely on international agreements as authority to conduct criminal proceedings that did not comply with the grand-jury and jury-trial guarantees in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments.[6] The Supreme Court has since cited the Reid plurality opinion and described its conclusions related to the constitutional constraints on the treaty power as "well established."[7]

ArtII.S2.C2.1.10 Breach and Termination of Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Constitution sets forth a definite procedure by which the President has the power to make treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate, but it is silent on who has the power to terminate them and how this power should be exercised.[1] The United States terminated a treaty under the Constitution for the first time in 1798. On the eve of possible hostilities with France, Congress passed, and President John Adams signed, legislation stating that four U.S. treaties with France "shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the government or citizens of the United States."[2] When he was Vice-President, Thomas Jefferson referred to the episode as support for the notion that only an "act of the legislature" can terminate a treaty.[3] But commentators have since come to view the 1798 statute as a historical anomaly because it is the only instance in which Congress purported to terminate a treaty directly through legislation without relying on the President to provide a notice of termination to the [5] See Boos, 484 U.S. at 324, 334. Although the Supreme Court has not addressed the issue, several lower courts and commentators have concluded that the United States cannot exercise powers that the Constitution assigns exclusively to Congress, such as the appropriations of funds, through a treaty. See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties.

---

[6] The plurality in Reid rejected the argument that an executive agreement between the United States and Great Britain and the North American Treaty Organization Status of Forces Agreement permitted military courts to try the dependents of U.S. military personnel living at overseas posts when the criminal process did not comport with constitutional guarantees of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. See Reid, 354 U.S. at 15–19 & n.29. See also Amdt5.2.1 Historical Background on Grand Jury Clause and Amdt6.4.2 Historical Background on Right to Trial by Jury (discussing the constitutional guarantees of a grand jury and trial by jury). While only four Justices joined the Reid plurality opinion, none of the separately concurring or dissenting Justices questioned the plurality's analysis of the treaty power. See Reid, 354 U.S. at 41–64 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring in the judgment); Id. at 65–78 (Harlan, J., concurring in the judgment); Id. at 78–90 (Clark, J., dissenting joined by Burton, J.).

[7] Boos, 484 U.S. at 324. See also Garamendi, 539 U.S. at 417 n.9 (citing plurality opinion in Reid).

[1] See, e.g., Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996, 1003 (1979) (plurality opinion) ("[W]hile the Constitution is express as to the manner in which the Senate shall participate in the ratification of a treaty, it is silent as to that body's participation in the abrogation of a treaty.").

[2] Act of July 7, 1798, ch. 67, 1 Stat. 578 (An Act To Declare the Treaties Heretofore Concluded with France, No Longer Obligatory on the United States).

[3] See Thomas Jefferson, A Manual of Parliamentary Practice 52 (Samuel Harrison Smith ed., 1801) ("Treaties being declared, equally with the laws of the U[nited] States, to be the supreme law of the land, it is understood that an act of the legislature alone can declare them infringed and rescinded. This was accordingly the process adopted in the case of France in 1798.").

foreign government.[4] Moreover, because the 1798 statute was part of a series of congressional measures authorizing limited hostilities against the French Republic, some view the statute as an exercise of Congress's war powers rather than precedent for a permanent congressional power to terminate treaties.[5]

During the nineteenth century, government practice treated the power to terminate treaties as shared between the Legislative and Executive Branches.[6] Congress often authorized[7] or instructed[8] the President to provide notice of treaty termination to foreign governments during this time. On rare occasions, the Senate alone passed a resolution authorizing the President to terminate a treaty.[9] Presidents often complied with the Legislative Branch's authorization or direction,[10] although they sometimes resisted attempts to compel termination of specific articles in treaties when the treaties did not authorize partial termination.[11] On other occasions, Congress or the Senate approved the President's termination after-the-fact, when the Executive Branch had already provided notice of termination to the foreign government.[12]

At the turn of the twentieth century, a new form of treaty termination emerged: unilateral termination by the President without approval by the Legislative Branch. This method first [4] See, e.g., Curtis A. Bradley, Treaty Termination and Historical Gloss, 92 Tex. L. Rev. 773, 789 (2014) [hereinafter Bradley, Historical Gloss]; Restatement (Fourth) of Foreign Relations Law § 313, reporters' n.2 (2018) [hereinafter Fourth Restatement]; Cong. Research Serv., Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rep. No. 106-71, at 207 (2001).

[5] See S. Rep. No. 34-97, at 5 (1856) (Senate Foreign Relations Committee describing the 1798 treaty abrogation statute as a "rightful exercise of the war power, without viewing it in any manner as a precedent establishing in Congress alone, and under any circumstances, the power to annul a treaty."). Cf. Bas v. Tingy, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 37, 40 (1800) (opinion of Washington, J.) (treating the 1798 statute as one in a bundle of congressional acts declaring a limited "public war" on the French Republic).

[6] For analysis of nineteenth century understanding and practice related to treaty termination, see Bradley, Historical Gloss, supra note 4, at 788–801; Samuel B. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement 423–66 (2d ed. 1916).

[7] See, e.g., Joint Resolution of April 27, 1846 Concerning the Oregon Territory, 9 Stat. 109 (providing that the President "is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to give to the government of Great Britain the notice required by" a convention allowing for joint occupancy of parts of the Oregon Territory); Joint Resolution of June 17, 1874, 18 Stat. 287 (authorizing the President to give notice of termination of a Treaty of Commerce with Belgium).

[8] See, e.g., Joint Resolution of January 18, 1865, 13 Stat. 566 ("Resolved . . . That notice be given of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty . . . and the President of the United States is hereby charged with the communication of such notice to the government of the United Kingdom."); Joint Resolution of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. 641 ("[T]he President . . . hereby is directed to give notice to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the provisions of each and every of the articles aforesaid will terminate . . . on the expiration of two years next after the time of giving such notice.").

[9] In 1855, the Senate authorized President Franklin Pierce to terminate a Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation Treaty with Denmark, and the President subsequently relied on the Senate's action in carrying out the termination. Franklin Pierce, Third Annual Message (Dec. 31, 1855) in 7 A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents 2860, 2867 (James D. Richardson ed., 1897) ("In pursuance of the authority conferred by a resolution of the Senate of the United States passed on the 3d of March last, notice was given to Denmark" that the United States would "terminate the [treaty] at the expiration of one year from the date of notice for that purpose.").

[10] For example, after Congress enacted a joint resolution calling for the termination of the Oregon Territory Treaty, supra note 7, the Secretary of State informed the U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain that "Congress have spoken their will upon the subject, in their joint resolution; and to this it is his (the President's) and your duty to conform." S. Doc. No. 29-489, at 15 (1846). As required by the Joint Resolution of January 18, 1865, see supra note 8, the Andrew Johnson Administration terminated an 1854 treaty with Great Britain concerning trade with Canada. Letter from William H. Seward, U.S. Sec'y of State to Charles Francis Adams, Minister to the U.K. (Jan. 18, 1865) in Papers Relating to Foreign Affairs, pt. 1, at 93 (1866).

[11] See, e.g., Rutherford B. Hayes, Veto of the Chinese Immigration Bill, H.R. Exec. Doc. No. 45-102, at 5 (1879) (disputing that Congress can direct the abrogation of specific articles in a treaty, but accepting that the "authority of Congress to terminate a treaty with a foreign power, by expressing the will of the nation no longer to adhere to it, is . . . free from controversy under our Constitution ").

[12] See, e.g., Joint Resolution to Terminate the Treaty of 1817 Regulating the Naval Force on the Lakes, 13 Stat. 568 (1865) ("[T]he notice given by the President of the United States to [the] government of Great Britain and Ireland to occurred in 1899, when the McKinley Administration terminated certain articles in a commercial treaty with Switzerland,[13] and then again in 1927, when the Coolidge Administration withdrew the United States from a convention to prevent smuggling with Mexico.[14] During the Franklin Roosevelt Administration and World War II, unilateral presidential termination increased markedly.[15] Although Congress at times enacted legislation authorizing or instructing the President to terminate treaties during the twentieth century,[16] unilateral presidential termination became the norm.[17]

Some scholars and Members of Congress have challenged the President's assertion of unilateral authority to terminate treaties under the rationale that treaty termination is analogous to the termination of federal statutes.[18] Because domestic statutes may be terminated only through the same process in which they were enacted[19]—i.e., through a majority vote in both houses and with the signature of the President or a veto override—these observers contend that treaties likewise must be terminated through a procedure that resembles their making and that includes the Legislative Branch.[20] On the other hand, treaties do not share every feature of federal statutes. Whereas statutes can be enacted over the President's veto, treaties can never be concluded without the President's final act of ratification.[21] Moreover, some argue that, just as the President has some unilateral authority to remove Executive Officers who were appointed with senatorial consent,[22] the President may unilaterally terminate treaties made with the Senate's advice and consent.[23]

The President's exercise of treaty termination authority has not generated opposition from the Legislative Branch in most cases, but there have been occasions in which Members of Congress sought to block unilateral presidential action. In 1978, a group of Members filed suit in Goldwater v. Carter[24] seeking to prevent President Jimmy Carter from terminating a terminate the treaty . . . is hereby adopted and ratified as if the same had been authorized by Congress."); Joint Resolution of Dec. 21, 1911, 37 Stat. 627 (1911) (stating that President Taft's notice of termination of a treaty with Russia was "adopted and ratified").

---

[13] See Letter from John Hay, U.S. Sec'y of State to Ambassador Leishman (Mar. 8, 1899) in Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States 753–54 (1901).

[14] See Letter from Frank B. Kellogg, U.S. Sec'y of State to Ambassador Sheffield (Mar. 21, 1927) in 3 Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, 1927, at 230, 230–31 (1942).

[15] See Bradley, Historical Gloss, supra note 4, at 807–09; Authority to Withdraw from the North American Free Trade Agreement, 42 Op. O.L.C. slip op. at 11 (Oct. 17, 2018), https://www.justice.gov/olc/opinion/authority-withdraw-north-american-free-trade-agreement; Fourth Restatement, supra note 4, § 303 reporters' n.3.

[16] See, e.g., Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-440, § 313, 100 Stat. 1086, 1104 (mandating that "[t]he Secretary of State shall terminate immediately" a tax treaty and protocol with South Africa), repealed by South African Democratic Transition Support Act of 1993, Pub. L. No. 103-149, § 4, 107 Stat. 1503, 1505; Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, Pub. L. No. 94-265, § 202(b), 90 Stat. 331, 340–41 (authorizing the Secretary of State to renegotiate certain fishing treaties and expressing the "sense of Congress that the United States shall withdraw from any such treaty, in accordance with its provisions, if such treaty is not so renegotiated within a reasonable period of time after such date of enactment").

[17] See Bradley, Historical Gloss, supra note 4, at 807–15.

[18] See, e.g., Barry M. Goldwater, Treaty Termination is a Shared Power, 65 A.B.A. J. 198, 199–200 (1979).

[19] See, e.g., Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417, 438 (1998) ("There is no provision in the Constitution that authorizes the President to enact, to amend, or to repeal statutes."); INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 954 (1983) ("[R]epeal of statutes, no less than enactment, must conform with Art. I.").

[20] See, e.g., David Gray Adler, The Constitution and the Termination of Treaties 89–110 (1986).

[21] For discussion of the federal law-making process, see ArtI.S7.C2.1 Overview of Presidential Approval or Veto of Bills.

[22] For further discussion of the presidential power to remove officers, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.1 Overview of Removal of Executive Branch Officers.

[23] See, e.g., Adler, supra note 21, at 94; Kristen E. Eichensehr, Treaty Termination and the Separation of Powers, 53 Va. J. Int'l L. 247, 269 (2013).

[24] 444 U.S. 996.

mutual defense treaty with the government of Taiwan[25] as part of the United States' recognition of the government of mainland China.[26] A divided Supreme Court ultimately ruled that the litigation should be dismissed, but it did so without reaching the merits of the constitutional question and with no majority opinion.[27] Citing a lack of clear guidance in the Constitution's text and a reluctance "to settle a dispute between coequal branches of our Government each of which has resources available to protect and assert its interests[,]" four Justices concluded that the case presented a nonjusticiable political question.[28] This four-Justice opinion, written by Justice William Rehnquist, has proven influential since Goldwater, and federal district courts have invoked the political question doctrine as a basis to dismiss challenges to unilateral treaty terminations by President Ronald Reagan[29] and President George W. Bush.[30]

Regardless of whether constitutional disputes over treaty termination are resolved in federal courts or through the political process, the power of treaty termination may depend on the specific features of the treaty at issue.[31] For example, if termination of a particular treaty implicates the exercise of independent executive powers—such as the power to recognize foreign governments[32]—the President perhaps may have a stronger claim to unilateral authority.[33] On the other hand, if the Senate were to condition its advice and consent to a treaty on a requirement that termination only occur with the approval of the Legislative Branch, some commentators argue that the President would be bound by that condition.[34] Finally, when Congress has passed legislation implementing a treaty into domestic law of the [25] Mutual Defense Treaty Between the United States of America and the Republic of China, Dec. 2, 1954, 6 U.S.T. 433.

[26] For background on Goldwater, see Victoria Marie Kraft, The U.S. Constitution and Foreign Policy: Terminating the Taiwan Treaty 1–52 (1991).

[27] See Goldwater, 444 U.S. at 996 (vacating with instructions to dismiss with no majority opinion).

[28] See id. at 1002–05 (Rehnquist, J., concurring joined by Stewart & Stevens, JJ. & Burger, C.J.). Justice Lewis Powell also voted for dismissal, but did so based on the ground that the case was not ripe for judicial review until the Senate passed a resolution disapproving of the President's termination. See id. at 998 (Powell, J., concurring). Justice William Brennan would have held that President Carter possessed the power to terminate the Mutual Defense Treaty with Taiwan, but his opinion centered on the President's power over recognition of foreign governments, and not because he believed the President possessed a general, constitutional power to terminate treaties. See id. at 1006–07 (Brennan, J., dissenting). For discussion of Goldwater in the context of the political question doctrine, see ArtIII.S2.C1.9.6 Foreign Affairs as a Political Question.

[29] In 1986, a federal district court dismissed a group of private plaintiffs' suit seeking to prevent President Reagan from unilaterally terminating a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation with Nicaragua. See Beacon Prods. Corp. v. Reagan, 633 F. Supp. 1191, 1198–99 (D. Mass. 1986), aff'd on other grounds, 814 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1987).

[30] In 2002, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia dismissed as nonjusticable a challenge brought by 32 Members of Congress to President George W. Bush's termination of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with Russia. See Kucinich v. Bush, 236 F. Supp. 2d 1, 14–17 (D.D.C. 2002).

[31] See, e.g., Goldwater, 444 U.S. at 1003 ("[D]ifferent termination procedures may be appropriate for different treaties."); Curtis Bradley, International Law in the U.S. Legal System 71 (2d ed. 2015) [hereinafter Bradley, U.S. Legal System] ("It is possible that the President has the authority to terminate treaties in some situations but not others.").

[32] See ArtII.S3.2.3 Modern Doctrine on Receiving Ambassadors and Public Ministers.

[33] Compare, e.g., Bradley, U.S. Legal System, supra note 31, at 71 ("[E]ven if the President does not have the authority to terminate treaties in all instances, the president may be able to terminate a treaty when the termination is related to the exercise of some other presidential power, such as the recognition of a foreign government."), with Goldwater, supra note 18, at 199 (arguing that separation of powers principles call for joint termination of treaties).

[34] See Fourth Restatement, supra note 4, § 313, reporters' n.6 ("If treaty termination is a concurrent, rather than exclusive, power, it is possible that it could be limited by the Senate in its advice and consent to a particular treaty, and possibly also by Congress through statute."); Michael J. Glennon, Constitutional Diplomacy 156 (1990) ("Where the Senate specifies a procedure for termination, the President is compelled constitutionally to adhere to that procedure."). But see Congressionally Mandated Notice Period for Withdrawing from the Open Skies Treaty, 44 Op. O.L.C. slip op. at 10 (Sept. 22, 2020) (contending that treaty withdrawal is an exclusive presidential power that cannot be regulated by the Legislative Branch), https://www.justice.gov/olc/opinion/congressionally-mandated-notice-period-withdrawing-open-skies-treaty.

United States, the President likely lacks the authority to terminate the domestic effect of that legislation without going through the full legislative process for repeal of the statute.[35]

A party's breach of treaty obligations also can affect termination and withdrawal. Under international law, a party may suspend or terminate a treaty if another party materially breaches its obligations.[36] The Supreme Court has appeared to recognize that, at least in the absence of direction from Congress, the President has the power to deem a treaty that has been breached by a foreign nation void and therefore no longer binding.[37] The Court also has stated that Congress possesses the power to breach and abrogate a treaty by passing later-in-time legislation that conflicts with U.S. treaty obligations.[38]

When considering all elements of the treaty-making process, the treaty power remains an area in which all three branches of government shape constitutional practice and influence foreign relations. The Judicial Branch determines treaties' effect on domestic law and enforces self-executing treaty provisions in U.S. courts.[39] Presidents claim authority to negotiate with foreign countries, ratify treaties approved by the Senate, interpret treaties' terms outside the context of domestic litigation, and terminate the United States' treaty commitments.[40] The Senate maintains its authority to provide (or withhold) consent to treaties proposed by the President, and it shapes treaties' scope and meaning through its power to condition consent on reservations, understandings, and declarations.[41] Congress also plays a role when it enacts legislation implementing treaties' requirements into U.S. statutes.[42] While unresolved questions about the treaty power have persisted since the Constitution was written, treaty-making remains a unique and dynamic part of American constitutional law and practice.

ArtII.S2.C2.2 Alternatives to Treaties

ArtII.S2.C2.2.1 Overview of Alternatives to Treaties

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with [35] See Julian Ku & John Yoo, Bond, The Treaty Power, and the Overlooked Value of Non-Self-Executing Treaties, 90 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1607, 1628 (2015) ("A President's termination of a treaty will dissolve the formal legal obligation, but the policy of the United States will still continue because he cannot repeal the implementing legislation."); John Setear, The President's Rational Choice of a Treaty's Preratification Pathway: Article II, Congressional-Executive Agreement, or Executive Agreement?, 31 J. Legal Stud. S5, S15 n.20 (2002) ("If only legislation can repeal legislation, then the formal status of implementing legislation does not change merely because the president takes some action, namely, terminating the treaty that the legislation implements.").

[36] Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties art. 2, Apr. 24, 1970, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331. Although the United States has not ratified the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, U.S. officials have stated that its provisions concerning treaty termination and withdrawal reflect customary international law. See Fourth Restatement, supra note 4, § 303 reporters' n.1 (collecting statements).

[37] See Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 473–76 (1913) (concluding that, because the "Executive Department . . . elected to waive any right to free itself" from its obligations under an extradition treaty, the Supreme Court must enforce the treaty even if had been breached and made voidable.).

[38] See, e.g., La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U.S. 423, 460 (1899) ("It has been adjudged that Congress by legislation, and so far as the people and authorities of the United States are concerned, could abrogate a treaty made between this country and another country which had been negotiated by the President and approved by the Senate."). See also ArtII.S2.C2.1.7 Legal Effect of Treaties on Prior Acts of Congress (discussing the last-in-time rule).

[39] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.4 Self-Executing and Non-Self-Executing Treaties–ArtII.S2.C2.1.6 Interpreting Treaties.

[40] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power–ArtII.S2.C2.1.6 Interpreting Treaties.

[41] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.2 Historical Background on Treaty-Making Power–ArtII.S2.C2.1.6 Interpreting Treaties.

[42] See ArtII.S2.C2.1.5 Congressional Implementation of Treaties.

ArtII.S2.C2.2.1
Overview of Alternatives to Treaties

the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The capacity of the United States to enter into agreements with other nations is not exhausted in the treaty-making power. The Constitution recognizes a distinction between "treaties" and "agreements" or "compacts" but does not indicate what the difference is.[1] The differences, which once may have been clearer, have been seriously blurred in practice within recent decades. Once a stepchild in the family in which treaties were the preferred offspring, the executive agreement has surpassed in number and perhaps in international influence the treaty formally signed, submitted for ratification to the Senate, and proclaimed upon ratification.

During the first half-century of its independence, the United States was party to sixty treaties but to only twenty-seven published executive agreements. By the beginning of World War II, there had been concluded approximately 800 treaties and 1,200 executive agreements. In the period 1940–1989, the Nation entered into 759 treaties and into 13,016 published executive agreements. Cumulatively, in 1989, the United States was a party to 890 treaties and 5,117 executive agreements. To phrase it comparatively, in the first 50 years of its history, the United States concluded twice as many treaties as executive agreements. In the 50-year period from 1839 to 1889, a few more executive agreements than treaties were entered into. From 1889 to 1939, almost twice as many executive agreements as treaties were concluded. Between 1939 and 1993, executive agreements comprised more than 90% of the international agreements concluded.[2]

One must, of course, interpret the raw figures carefully. Only a very small minority of all the executive agreements entered into were based solely on the powers of the President as Commander in Chief and organ of foreign relations; the remainder were authorized in advance by Congress by statute or by treaty provisions ratified by the Senate.[3] Thus, consideration of the constitutional significance of executive agreements must begin with a differentiation among the kinds of agreements which are classed under this single heading.[4]

---

[1] Compare Article II, § 2, cl. 2, and Article VI, cl. 2, with Article I, 10, cls. 1 and 3. Cf. Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540, 570–72 (1840). And note the discussion in Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 28–32 (1982).

[2] CRS Study, xxxiv–xxxv, supra, 13–16. Not all such agreements, of course, are published, either because of national-security/secrecy considerations or because the subject matter is trivial. In a 1953 hearing exchange, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles estimated that about 10,000 executive agreements had been entered into in connection with the NATO treaty. "Every time we open a new privy, we have to have an executive agreement." Hearing on S.J. Res. 1 and S.J. Res. 43: Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, 83d Congress, 1st Sess. (1953), 877.

[3] One authority concluded that of the executive agreements entered into between 1938 and 1957, only 5.9% were based exclusively on the President's constitutional authority. C.H. McLaughlin, The Scope of the Treaty Power in the United States—II, 43 Minn. L. Rev. 651, 721 (1959). Another, somewhat overlapping study found that in the period 1946–1972, 88.3% of executive agreements were based at least in part on statutory authority; 6.2% were based on treaties, and 5.5% were based solely on executive authority. International Agreements: An Analysis of Executive Regulations and Practices, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (Comm. Print) (1977), 22 (prepared by CRS).

[4] "[T]he distinction between so-called 'executive agreements' and 'treaties' is purely a constitutional one and has no international significance." Harvard Research in International Law, Draft Convention on the Law of Treaties, 29 Amer. J. Int. L. 697 (Supp.) (1935). See E. Byrd, supra at 148–51. Many scholars have aggressively promoted the use of executive agreements, in contrast to treaties, as a means of enhancing the role of the United States, especially the role of the President, in the international system. See Myers McDougal & Asher Lans, Treaties and Congressional-Executive or Presidential Agreements: Interchangeable Instruments of National Policy (Pts. I & II), 54 Yale L. J. 181, 534 (1945).

ArtII.S2.C2.2.2 Legal Basis for Executive Agreements

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Many types of executive agreements comprise the ordinary daily grist of the diplomatic mill. Among these are such as apply to minor territorial adjustments, boundary rectifications, the policing of boundaries, the regulation of fishing rights, private pecuniary claims against another government or its nationals, in Justice Joseph Story's words, "the mere private rights of sovereignty."[1] Crandall lists scores of such agreements entered into with other governments by the authorization of the President.[2] Such agreements were ordinarily directed to particular and comparatively trivial disputes and by the settlement they effect of these cease ipso facto to be operative. Also, there are such time-honored diplomatic devices as the "protocol" which marks a stage in the negotiation of a treaty, and the modus vivendi, which is designed to serve as a temporary substitute for one. Executive agreements become of constitutional significance when they constitute a determinative factor of future foreign policy and hence of the country's destiny. In consequence particularly of our participation in World War II and our immersion in the conditions of international tension which prevailed both before and after the war, Presidents have entered into agreements—some of which have approximated temporary alliances—with other governments. It cannot be justly said, however, that in so doing they have acted without considerable support from precedent.

An early instance of executive treaty-making was the agreement by which President James Monroe in 1817 defined the limits of armaments on the Great Lakes. The arrangement was effected by an exchange of notes, which nearly a year later were laid before the Senate with a query as to whether it was within the President's power, or whether advice and consent of the Senate was required. The Senate approved the agreement by the required two-thirds vote, and it was forthwith proclaimed by the President without there having been a formal exchange of ratifications.[3] Commenting on a treaty with Russia providing that U.S. authorities would assist in arresting and returning Russian deserters, the Court remarked, a bit uncertainly: "While no act of Congress authorizes the executive department to permit the introduction of foreign troops, the power to give such permission without legislative assent was probably assumed to exist from the authority of the President as commander in chief of the military and naval forces of the United States. It may be doubted, however, whether such power could be extended to the apprehension of deserters [from foreign vessels] in the absence of positive legislation to that effect."[4] Justice Horace Gray and three other Justices believed that such action by the President must rest upon express treaty or statute.[5]

Notable expansion of presidential power in this field first became manifest in the administration of President William McKinley. At the outset of war with Spain, the President

---

[1] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 1397 (1833).

[2] S. Crandall, supra, ch. 8; see also W. McClure, supra, chs. 1, 2.

[3] Id. at 49–50.

[4] Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U.S. 424, 435 (1902).

[5] Id. at 467. The first of these conventions, signed July 29, 1882, had asserted its constitutionality in very positive terms. Q. Wright, supra at 239 (quoting Watts v. United States, 1 Wash. Terr. 288, 294 (1870)).

proclaimed that the United States would consider itself bound for the duration by the last three principles of the Declaration of Paris, a course which, as Professor Wright observes, "would doubtless go far toward establishing these three principles as international law obligatory upon the United States in future wars."[6] Hostilities with Spain were brought to an end in August, 1898, by an armistice the conditions of which largely determined the succeeding treaty of peace,[7] just as did the Armistice of November 11, 1918, determine in great measure the conditions of the final peace with Germany in 1918. It was also President McKinley who in 1900, relying on his own sole authority as Commander in Chief, contributed a land force of 5,000 men and a naval force to cooperate with similar contingents from other Powers to rescue the legations in Peking from the Boxers; a year later, again without consulting either Congress or the Senate, he accepted for the United States the Boxer Indemnity Protocol between China and the intervening Powers.[8] Commenting on the Peking protocol, Willoughby quotes with approval the following remark: "This case is interesting, because it shows how the force of circumstances compelled us to adopt the European practice with reference to an international agreement, which, aside from the indemnity question, was almost entirely political in character . . . purely political treaties are, under constitutional practice in Europe, usually made by the executive alone. The situation in China, however, abundantly justified President McKinley in not submitting the protocol to the Senate. The remoteness of Peking, the jealousies between the allies, and the shifting evasive tactics of the Chinese Government, would have made impossible anything but an agreement on the spot."[9]

It was also during this period that John Hay, as McKinley's Secretary of State, initiated his "Open Door" policy, by notes to Great Britain, Germany, and Russia, which were soon followed by similar notes to France, Italy, and Japan. These in substance asked the recipients to declare formally that they would not seek to enlarge their respective interests in China at the expense of any of the others; and all responded favorably.[10] Then, in 1905, the first Roosevelt, seeking to arrive at a diplomatic understanding with Japan, instigated an exchange of opinions between Secretary of War William Howard Taft, then in the Far East, and Count Katsura, amounting to a secret treaty, by which the Roosevelt administration assented to the establishment by Japan of a military protectorate in Korea.[11] Three years later, Secretary of State Elihu Root and the Japanese ambassador at Washington entered into the Root-Takahira Agreement to uphold the status quo in the Pacific and maintain the principle of equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.[12] Meantime, in 1907, by a "Gentleman's Agreement," the Mikado's government had agreed to curb the emigration of Japanese subjects to the United States, thereby relieving the Washington government from the necessity of taking action that would have cost Japan loss of face. The final result of this series of executive agreements touching American relations in and with the Far East was the product of President Woodrow Wilson's diplomacy. This was the Lansing-Ishii Agreement, embodied in an exchange of letters dated November 2, 1917, by which the United States recognized Japan's "special interests" in China, and Japan assented to the principle of the Open Door in that country.[13]

The executive agreement attained its modern development as an instrument of foreign policy under President Franklin D. Roosevelt, at times threatening to replace the

[6] Id. at 245.

[7] S. Crandall, supra at 103–04.

[8] Id. at 104.

[9] 1 W. Willoughby, supra at 539.

[10] W. McClure, supra at 98.

[11] Id. at 96–97.

[12] Id. at 98–99.

[13] Id. at 99–100.

treaty-making power, not formally but in effect, as a determinative element in the field of foreign policy. The President's first important utilization of the executive agreement device took the form of an exchange of notes on November 16, 1933, with Maxim M. Litvinov, the USSR Commissar for Foreign Affairs, whereby American recognition was extended to the Soviet Union and certain pledges made by each official.[14]

With the fall of France in June, 1940, President Roosevelt entered into two executive agreements the total effect of which was to transform the role of the United States from one of strict neutrality toward the European war to one of semi-belligerency. The first agreement was with Canada and provided for the creation of a Permanent Joint Board on Defense which would "consider in the broad sense the defense of the north half of the Western Hemisphere."[15] Second, and more important than the first, was the Hull-Lothian Agreement of September 2, 1940, under which, in return for the lease for ninety-nine years of certain sites for naval bases in the British West Atlantic, the United States handed over to the British Government fifty over-age destroyers which had been reconditioned and recommissioned.[16] And on April 9, 1941, the State Department, in consideration of the just-completed German occupation of Denmark, entered into an executive agreement with the Danish minister in Washington, whereby the United States acquired the right to occupy Greenland for purposes of defense.[17]

Post-war diplomacy of the United States was greatly influenced by the executive agreements entered into at Cairo, Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam.[18] For a period, the formal treaty—the signing of the United Nations Charter and the entry into the multinational defense pacts, like NATO, SEATO, CENTRO, and the like—re-established itself, but soon the executive agreement, as an adjunct of treaty arrangement or solely through presidential initiative, again became the principal instrument of United States foreign policy, so that it became apparent in the 1960s that the Nation was committed in one way or another to assisting over half the countries of the world protect themselves.[19] Congressional disquietude did not result in anything more substantial than passage of a "sense of the Senate" resolution expressing a desire that "national commitments" be made more solemnly in the future than in the past.[20]

ArtII.S2.C2.2.3 Legal Effect of Executive Agreements

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers

[14] Id. at 140–44.

[15] Id. at 391.

[16] Id. at 391–93. Attorney General Robert Jackson's defense of the presidential power to enter into the arrangement placed great reliance on the President's "inherent" powers under the Commander in Chief Clause and as sole organ of foreign relations but ultimately found adequate statutory authority to take the steps deemed desirable. 39 Ops. Atty. Gen. 484 (1940).

[17] 4 Dept. State Bull. 443 (1941).

[18] See A Decade of American Foreign Policy, Basic Documents 1941–1949, S. Doc. No. 123, 81st Congress, 1st Sess. (1950), pt. 1.

[19] For a congressional attempt to evaluate the extent of such commitments, see United States Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad: Hearings Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 91st Congress, 1st Sess. (1969), 10 pts.; see also U.S. Commitments to Foreign Powers: Hearings on S. Res. 151 Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 90th Congress, 1st Sess. (1967).

[20] The "National Commitments Resolution," S. Res. 85, 91st Congress, 1st Sess., passed by the Senate June 25, 1969. See also S. Rep. No. 797, 90th Congress, 1st sess. (1967). See the discussion of these years in CRS Study, supra at 169–202.

and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

When the President enters into an executive agreement, what sort of obligation does it impose on the United States? That it may impose international obligations of potentially serious consequences is obvious and that such obligations may linger for long periods of time is equally obvious.[1] Not so obvious is the nature of the domestic obligations imposed by executive agreements. Do treaties and executive agreements have the same domestic effect?[2] Treaties preempt state law through operation of the Supremacy Clause. Although it may be that executive agreements entered into pursuant to congressional authorization or treaty obligation also derive preemptive force from the Supremacy Clause, that textual basis for preemption is arguably lacking for executive agreements resting solely on the President's constitutional powers.

Initially, it was the view of most judges and scholars that executive agreements based solely on presidential power did not become the "law of the land" pursuant to the Supremacy Clause because such agreements are not "treaties" ratified by the Senate.[3] The Supreme Court, however, found another basis for holding state laws to be preempted by executive agreements, ultimately relying on the Constitution's vesting of foreign relations power in the national government.

A different view seemed to underlie the Supreme Court decision in United States v. Belmont,[4] giving domestic effect to the Litvinov Assignment. The Court's opinion by Justice George Sutherland built on his Curtiss-Wright[5] opinion. A lower court had erred, the Court ruled, in dismissing an action by the United States, as assignee of the Soviet Union, for certain moneys which had once been the property of a Russian metal corporation the assets of which had been appropriated by the Soviet government. The President's act in recognizing the Soviet government, and the accompanying agreements, constituted, said the Justice, an international compact which the President, "as the sole organ" of international relations for the United States, was authorized to enter upon without consulting the Senate. Nor did state laws and policies make any difference in such a situation; while the supremacy of treaties is established by the Constitution in express terms, the same rule holds "in the case of all international compacts and agreements from the very fact that complete power over international affairs is in the National Government and is not and cannot be subject to any curtailment or interference on the part of the several States."[6]

The Court elaborated on these principles five years later in United States v. Pink,[7] another case involving the Litvinov Assignment and recognition of the Soviet Government. The

---

[1] In 1918, Secretary of State Robert Lansing assured the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the Lansing-Ishii Agreement had no binding force on the United States, that it was simply a declaration of American policy so long as the President and State Department might choose to continue it. 1 W. Willoughby, supra at 547. In fact, it took the Washington Conference of 1921, two formal treaties, and an exchange of notes to eradicate it, while the "Gentlemen's Agreement" was finally ended after 17 years only by an act of Congress. W. McClure, supra at 97, 100.

[2] See E. Byrd, supra at 151–57.

[3] E.g., United States v. One Bag of Paradise Feathers, 256 F. 301, 306 (2d Cir. 1919); 1 W. Willoughby, supra at 589. The State Department held the same view. G. Hackworth, 5 Digest of International Law 426 (1944).

[4] 301 U.S. 324 (1937). In B. Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U.S. 583 (1912), the Court had recognized that a jurisdictional statute's reference to a "treaty" encompassed an executive agreement.

[5] United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936).

[6] 301 U.S. at 330–31.

[7] 315 U.S. 203 (1942).

question presented was whether the United States was entitled to recover the assets of the New York branch of a Russian insurance company. The company argued that the Soviet Government's decrees of confiscation did not apply to its property in New York and could not apply consistently with the Constitution of the United States and that of New York. The Court, speaking by Justice William O. Douglas, brushed these arguments aside. An official declaration of the Russian government itself settled the question of the extraterritorial operation of the Russian decree of nationalization and was binding on American courts. The power to remove such obstacles to full recognition as settlement of claims of our nationals was "a modest implied power of the President who is the 'sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations'. . . . It was the judgment of the political department that full recognition of the Soviet Government required the settlement of outstanding problems including the claims of our nationals. . . . We would usurp the executive function if we held that the decision was not final and conclusive on the courts. . . ."

"It is, of course, true that even treaties with foreign nations will be carefully construed so as not to derogate from the authority and jurisdiction of the States of this nation unless clearly necessary to effectuate the national policy. . . . But state law must yield when it is inconsistent with, or impairs the policy or provisions of, a treaty or of an international compact or agreement. . . . Then, the power of a State to refuse enforcement of rights based on foreign law which runs counter to the public policy of the forum . . . must give way before the superior Federal policy evidenced by a treaty or international compact or agreement. . . ."

"The action of New York in this case amounts in substance to a rejection of a part of the policy underlying recognition by this nation of Soviet Russia. Such power is not accorded a State in our constitutional system. To permit it would be to sanction a dangerous invasion of Federal authority. For it would 'imperil the amicable relations between governments and vex the peace of nations.' . . . It would tend to disturb that equilibrium in our foreign relations which the political departments of our national government has diligently endeavored to establish. . . ."

"No State can rewrite our foreign policy to conform to its own domestic policies. Power over external affairs is not shared by the States; it is vested in the national government exclusively. It need not be so exercised as to conform to state laws or state policies, whether they be expressed in constitutions, statutes, or judicial decrees. And the policies of the States become wholly irrelevant to judicial inquiry when the United States, acting within its constitutional sphere, seeks enforcement of its foreign policy in the courts."[8]

This recognition of the preemptive reach of executive agreements was an element in the movement for a constitutional amendment in the 1950s to limit the President's powers in this field, but that movement failed.[9]

Belmont and Pink were reinforced in American Ins. Ass'n v. Garamendi.[10] In holding that California's Holocaust Victim Insurance Relief Act was preempted as interfering with the Federal Government's conduct of foreign relations, as expressed in executive agreements, the

[8] 315 U.S. at 229–31, 233–34.

[9] There were numerous variations in language for the Bricker Amendment, but typical was § 3 of S.J. Res. 1, as reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee, 83d Congress, 1st Sess. (1953), which provided: "Congress shall have power to regulate all executive and other agreements with any foreign power or international organization. All such agreements shall be subject to the limitations imposed on treaties by this article." The limitation relevant on this point was in § 2, which provided: "A treaty shall become effective as internal law in the United States only through legislation which would be valid in the absence of treaty."

[10] 539 U.S. 396 (2003). The Court's opinion in Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981), was rich in learning on many topics involving executive agreements, but the preemptive force of agreements resting solely on presidential power was not at issue, the Court concluding that Congress had either authorized various presidential actions or had long acquiesced in others.

Court reiterated that "valid executive agreements are fit to preempt state law, just as treaties are."[11] The preemptive reach of executive agreements stems from "the Constitution's allocation of the foreign relations power to the National Government."[12] Because there was a "clear conflict" between the California law and policies adopted through the valid exercise of federal executive authority (settlement of Holocaust-era insurance claims being "well within the Executive's responsibility for foreign affairs"), the state law was preempted.[13]

ArtII.S2.C2.2.4 State Laws Affecting Foreign Relations

If the foreign relations power is truly an exclusive federal power, with no role for the states, a logical consequence, the Supreme Court has held, is that some state laws impinging on foreign relations are invalid even in the absence of a relevant federal policy. There is, in effect, a "dormant" foreign relations power. The scope of this power remains undefined, however, and its constitutional basis is debated by scholars.

The exclusive nature of the federal foreign relations power has long been asserted by the Supreme Court. In 1840, for example, the Court declared that "it was one of the main objects of the constitution to make us, so far as regarded our foreign relations, one people, and one nation; and to cut off all communications between foreign governments, and the several state authorities."[1] A hundred years later the Court remained emphatic about federal exclusivity. "No State can rewrite our foreign policy to conform to its own domestic policies. Power over external affairs is not shared by the States; it is vested in the national government exclusively. It need not be so exercised as to conform to state laws or state policies, whether they be expressed in constitutions, statutes, or judicial decrees. And the policies of the States become wholly irrelevant to judicial inquiry when the United States, acting within its constitutional sphere, seeks enforcement of its foreign policy in the courts."[2]

It was not until 1968, however, that the Court applied the general principle to invalidate a state law for impinging on the Nation's foreign policy interests in the absence of an established federal policy. In Zschernig v. Miller[3] the Court invalidated an Oregon escheat law that operated to prevent inheritance by citizens of Communist countries. The law conditioned inheritance by nonresident aliens on a showing that U.S. citizens would be allowed to inherit estates in the alien's country, and that the alien heir would be allowed to receive payments from the Oregon estate "without confiscation."[4] Although a Justice Department amicus brief asserted that application of the Oregon law in this one case would not cause any "undu[e] interfer[ence] with the United States' conduct of foreign relations," the Court saw a "persistent and subtle" effect on international relations stemming from the "notorious" practice of state

[11] 539 U.S. at 416.

[12] 539 U.S. at 413.

[13] 539 U.S. at 420.

[1] Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540, 575–76 (1840). See also United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. 324, 331 (1937) ("The external powers of the United States are to be exercised without regard to state laws or policies. . . . [I]n respect of our foreign relations generally, state lines disappear"); The Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. 581, 606 (1889) ("For local interests the several States of the Union exist; but for national purposes, embracing our relations with foreign nations, we are but one people, one nation, one power"); Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 63 (1941) ("Our system of government . . . requires that federal power in the field affecting foreign relations be left entirely free from local interference").

[2] United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 233–34 (1942). Chief Justice Harlan Stone and Justice Owen Roberts dissented.

[3] 389 U.S. 429 (1968).

[4] In Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503 (1947), the Court had upheld a simple reciprocity requirement that did not have the additional requirement relating to confiscation.

probate courts in denying payments to persons from Communist countries.[5] Regulation of descent and distribution of estates is an area traditionally regulated by states, but such "state regulations must give way if they impair the effective exercise of the Nation's foreign policy." If there are to be travel, probate, or other restraints on citizens of Communist countries, the Court concluded, such restraints "must be provided by the Federal Government."[6]

Zschernig lay dormant for some time, and, although it has been addressed recently by the Court, it remains the only holding in which the Court has applied a dormant foreign relations power to strike down state law. There was renewed academic interest in Zschernig in the 1990s, as some state and local governments sought ways to express dissatisfaction with human rights policies of foreign governments or to curtail trade with out-of-favor countries.[7] In 1999, the Court struck down Massachusetts's Burma sanctions law on the basis of statutory preemption, and declined to address the appeals court's alternative holding applying Zschernig.[8] Similarly, in 2003, the Court held that California's Holocaust Victim Insurance Relief Act was preempted as interfering with federal foreign policy reflected in executive agreements, and, although the Court discussed Zschernig at some length, it saw no need to resolve issues relating to its scope.[9]

Dictum in Garamendi recognizes some of the questions that can be raised about Zschernig. The Zschernig Court did not identify what language in the Constitution mandates preemption, and commentators have observed that a respectable argument can be made that the Constitution does not require a general foreign affairs preemption not tied to the Supremacy Clause, and broader than and independent of the Constitution's specific prohibitions[10] and grants of power.[11] The Garamendi Court raised "a fair question whether respect for the executive foreign relations power requires a categorical choice between the contrasting theories of field and conflict preemption evident in the Zschernig opinions." Instead, Justice David Souter suggested for the Court, field preemption may be appropriate if a state legislates "simply to take a position on a matter of foreign policy with no serious claim to be addressing a traditional state responsibility," and conflict preemption may be appropriate if a state legislates within an area of traditional responsibility, "but in a way that affects foreign relations."[12] We must await further litigation to see whether the Court employs this distinction.[13]

---

[5] 389 U.S. at 440.

[6] 389 U.S. at 440, 441.

[7] See, e.g., Michael D. Ramsey, The Power of the States in Foreign Affairs: The Original Understanding of Foreign Policy Federalism, 75 Notre Dame L. Rev. 341 (1999); Carlos Manuel Vazquez, Whither Zschernig?, 46 Vill. L. Rev. 1259 (2001); Jack L. Goldsmith, Federal Courts, Foreign Affairs, and Federalism, 83 Va. L. Rev. 1617 (1997); Peter J. Spiro, Foreign Relations Federalism, 70 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1223 (1999). See also Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 149–69 (2d ed. 1996).

[8] Crosby v. National Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 374 n.8 (2000). For the appeals court's application of Zschernig, see National Foreign Trade Council v. Natsios, 181 F.3d 38, 49–61 (1st Cir. 1999).

[9] American Ins. Ass'n v. Garamendi, 539 U.S. at 419 & n.11 (2003).

[10] It is contended, for example, that Article I, § 10's specific prohibitions against states engaging in war, making treaties, keeping troops in peacetime, and issuing letters of marque and reprisal would have been unnecessary if a more general, dormant foreign relations power had been intended. Similarly, there would have been no need to declare treaties to be the supreme law of the land if a more generalized foreign affairs preemptive power existed outside of the Supremacy Clause. See Ramsey, supra.

[11] Arguably, part of the "executive power" vested in the President by Art. II, § 1 is a power to conduct foreign relations.

[12] 539 U.S. at 419 n.11.

[13] Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's dissent in Garamendi, joined by the other three Justices, suggested limiting Zschernig in a manner generally consistent with Justice David Souter's distinction. Zschernig preemption, Justice Ginsburg asserted, "resonates most audibly when a state action 'reflects a state policy critical of foreign governments and involve[s] sitting in judgment on them.'" 539 U.S. at 439 (quoting Henkin, supra, at 164). But Justice Ginsburg also

ArtII.S2.C2.2.5 Congressional Executive Agreements

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Congress early authorized officers of the Executive Branch to enter into negotiations and to conclude agreements with foreign governments, authorizing the borrowing of money from foreign countries[1] and appropriating money to pay off the government of Algiers to prevent pirate attacks on United States shipping.[2] Perhaps the first formal authorization in advance of an executive agreement was enactment of a statute that permitted the Postmaster General to "make arrangements with the Postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets, through the post offices."[3] Congress has also approved, usually by resolution, other executive agreements, such as the annexing of Texas and Hawaii and the acquisition of Samoa.[4] A prolific source of executive agreements has been the authorization of reciprocal arrangements between the United States and other countries for the securing of protection for patents, copyrights, and trademarks.[5]

The most copious source of executive agreements has been legislation which provided authority for entering into reciprocal trade agreements with other nations.[6] Such agreements in the form of treaties providing for the reciprocal reduction of duties subject to implementation by Congress were frequently entered into,[7] but beginning with the Tariff Act of 1890,[8] Congress began to insert provisions authorizing the Executive to bargain over reciprocity with no necessity of subsequent legislative action. The authority was widened in successive acts.[9] Then, in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934,[10] Congress authorized the President to enter into agreements with other nations for reductions of tariffs and other impediments to international trade and to put the reductions into effect through proclamation.[11] voiced more general misgivings about judges' becoming "the expositors of the Nation's foreign policy." Id. at 442. In this context, see Goldsmith, supra, at 1631, describing Zschernig preemption as "a form of the federal common law of foreign relations."

---

[1] 1 Stat. 138 (1790). See E. Byrd, supra at 53 n.146.

[2] W. McClure, International Executive Agreements 41 (1941).

[3] Id. at 38–40. The statute was 1 Stat. 232, 239, 26 (1792).

[4] McClure, supra note 2, at 62–70.

[5] Id. at 78–81; S. Crandall, supra at 127–31; see CRS Study, supra at 52–55.

[6] Id. at 121–27; McClure, supra note 2, at 83–92, 173–89.

[7] Id. at 8, 59–60.

[8] § 3, 26 Stat. 567, 612.

[9] Tariff Act of 1897, § 3, 30 Stat. 15, 203; Tariff Act of 1909, 36 Stat. 11, 82.

[10] 48 Stat. 943, § 350(a), 19 U.S.C. §§ 1351–1354.

[11] See the continued expansion of the authority. Trade Expansion Act of 1962, 76 Stat. 872, § 201, 19 U.S.C. § 1821; Trade Act of 1974, 88 Stat. 1982, as amended, 19 U.S.C. §§ 2111, 2115, 2131(b), 2435. Congress has, with respect to the authorization to the President to negotiate multilateral trade agreements under the auspices of GATT, constrained itself in considering implementing legislation, creating a "fast-track" procedure under which legislation is brought up under a tight timetable and without the possibility of amendment. 19 U.S.C. §§ 2191–2194.

In Field v. Clark,[12] legislation conferring authority on the President to conclude trade agreements was sustained against the objection that it attempted an unconstitutional delegation "of both legislative and treaty-making powers." The Court met the first objection with an extensive review of similar legislation from the inauguration of government under the Constitution. The second objection it met with a curt rejection: "What has been said is equally applicable to the objection that the third section of the act invests the President with treaty-making power. The Court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President."[13] Although two Justices disagreed, the question has never been revived. However, in B. Altman & Co. v. United States,[14] decided twenty years later, a collateral question was passed upon. This was whether an act of Congress that gave the federal circuit courts of appeal jurisdiction of cases in which "the validity or construction of any treaty . . . was drawn in question" embraced a case involving a trade agreement which had been made under the sanction of the Tariff Act of 1897. The Court answered: "While it may be true that this commercial agreement, made under authority of the Tariff Act of 1897, § 3, was not a treaty possessing the dignity of one requiring ratification by the Senate of the United States, it was an international compact, negotiated between the representatives of two sovereign nations and made in the name and on behalf of the contracting countries, and dealing with important commercial relations between the two countries, and was proclaimed by the President. If not technically a treaty requiring ratification, nevertheless, it was a compact authorized by the Congress of the United States, negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of its President. We think such a compact is a treaty under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, and, where its construction is directly involved, as it is here, there is a right of review by direct appeal to this court."[15]

The most extensive delegation of authority ever made by Congress to the President to enter into executive agreements occurred within the field of the cognate powers of the two departments, the field of foreign relations, and took place at a time when war appeared to be in the offing and was in fact only a few months away. The legislation referred to is the Lend-Lease Act of March 11, 1941,[16] by which the President was empowered for over two years—and subsequently for additional periods whenever he deemed it in the interest of the national defense to do so—to authorize "the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or the head of any other department or agency of the Government," to manufacture in the government arsenals, factories, and shipyards, or "otherwise procure," to the extent that available funds made possible, "defense articles"—later amended to include foodstuffs and industrial products—and "sell, transfer title to, exchange, lease, lend, or otherwise dispose of," the same to the "government of any country whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States," and on any terms that he "deems satisfactory." Under this authorization the United States entered into Mutual Aid Agreements under which the government furnished its allies in World War II with 40 billion dollars' worth of munitions of war and other supplies.

---

[12] 143 U.S. 649 (1892).

[13] 143 U.S. at 694. See also Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981), in which the Court sustained a series of implementing actions by the President pursuant to executive agreements with Iran in order to settle the hostage crisis. The Court found that Congress had delegated to the President certain economic powers underlying the agreements and that his suspension of claims powers had been implicitly ratified over time by Congress's failure to set aside the asserted power. See also Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 29–30 n.6 (1982).

[14] 224 U.S. 583 (1912).

[15] 224 U.S. at 601.

[16] 55 Stat. 31.

Overlapping of the treaty-making power through congressional-executive cooperation in international agreements is also demonstrated by the use of resolutions approving the United States joining of international organizations[17] and participating in international conventions.[18]

ArtII.S2.C2.3 Appointments

ArtII.S2.C2.3.1 Overview of Appointments Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Appointments Clause requires that "Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States" be appointed by the President subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, although Congress may vest the appointment of "inferior" officers "in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments."[1] The Supreme Court has interpreted these requirements as distinguishing between two types of officers: (1) "principal" officers who must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to their position, and (2) "inferior" officers, whose appointment Congress may place with the President, judiciary, or department heads.[2] These constitutional provisions are instrumental in ensuring the separation of powers, as the Framers of the Constitution deliberately separated Congress's power to create offices in the federal government from the President's authority to nominate officers to fill those positions.[3] At the same time, placing the power to appoint principal officers with the President alone ensures a measure of accountability for his choices in staffing important government positions.[4]

While the Constitution specifies that certain persons, such as Supreme Court Justices, qualify as "Officers of the United States," the Appointments Clause does not specify all persons who fall under its purview. Thus, the Appointments Clause's reach and scope has been disputed. In the 1976 case of Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court explained that whether an individual wields "significant authority" informs the assessment of whether that person is an officer, but the Court has not significantly elaborated on this test since that decision.[5] Likewise, determining the difference between "principal" and "inferior" officers has generated

---

[17] E.g., 48 Stat. 1182 (1934), authorizing the President to accept membership for the United States in the International Labor Organization.

[18] See Edward Corwin, supra at 216.

[1] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 132 (1976) (per curiam) ("Principal officers are selected by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Inferior officers Congress may allow to be appointed by the President alone, by the heads of departments, or by the Judiciary."), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81.

[3] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.2 Historical Background on Appointments Clause.

[4] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.2 Historical Background on Appointments Clause.

[5] Buckley, 424 U.S. at 126.

controversy. Examining the history of the appointment power in the United States and the treatment of the Appointments Clause by the Supreme Court can shed light on the structural makeup of the federal government and the balancing of power between the branches.

ArtII.S2.C2.3.2 Historical Background on Appointments Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The deliberations at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, major writings of the prominent supporters of ratification,[1] and the words and records of the state ratifiers of the federal Constitution reveal careful consideration about the proper method of appointment for federal offices. The delegates to the Constitutional Convention, in designing a system of appointments for federal government offices, drew on "their experiences with two flawed methods of appointment."[2]

First, the colonists who lived during the American Revolution resented the often unilateral power of the English Crown and the royal governors in the colonies to create and fill government offices.[3] The "manipulation of official appointments"—generally achieved by creating and filling the key offices of government with political favorites, who were in turn dependent on the entity who appointed them—was "one of the American revolutionary generation's greatest grievances against executive power."[4]

Second, many early state constitutions, adopted after the Declaration of Independence was written, reacted to the perceived abuses of the appointment power by the Crown and royal governors by lodging the power to appoint officials with the state legislature alone.[5] But placing the appointment power with state representative assemblies also caused considerable turmoil.[6] Those legislatures were seen as consolidating all governmental power—executive, judicial, and legislative—for themselves.[7] This consolidation of power "had become the principal source of division and faction in the states."[8] At least in the views of many delegates to the Constitutional Convention, the failure to give governors a stronger role in the appointment process was damaging to many state governments whose legislatures "had fallen

---

[1] See The Federalist Papers.

[2] Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 184 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring).

[3] See Gordon Wood, The Creation of The American Republic, 1776–1787, at 143–48 (1969); Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 883–84 (1991); Edward Corwin, The President: Office and Powers 1787–1957, at 69–70 (4th ed. 1957); Saikrishna B. Prakash, Imperial From the Beginning 171 (2015).

[4] Freytag, 501 U.S. at 883 (quoting Wood, supra note 3, at 79).

[5] Wood, supra note 3, at 143–50; Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Appointments Process 16–20 (2003). See, e.g., Va. Const. (1776). Some state constitutions provided that the appointment power was shared between the governor and state assembly. Wood, supra note 3, at 148–50; Gerhardt, supra, at 17–20.

[6] See Wood, supra note 3, at 407; Freytag, 501 U.S. at 903–07 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment); Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 184 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring).

[7] Wood, supra note 3, at 407.

[8] Wood, supra note 3, at 407.

easy prey to demagogues, provincialism, and factions" in their exercise of appointments.[9] Likewise, the Articles of Confederation—which provided the governing framework for the young Republic before the adoption of the federal Constitution—authorized the Continental Congress to appoint officers.[10]

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia were aware of the weaknesses of these models of appointment, and thus chose instead to separate "the power to create federal offices . . . from the power to fill them."[11] They chose to vest Congress with the legislative power, including the authority to create federal offices, while the power "to appoint the most important officers" was placed with the single-person President, subject to confirmation by the Senate.[12] Separating the power to create offices from the authority to appoint officers would, in the words of James Madison, provide "[o]ne of the best securities against the creation of unnecessary offices or tyrannical powers."[13]

At the Constitutional Convention, an early general consensus emerged among the delegates that the chief executive should play a more prominent role in the appointment of officers whose method of appointment was "not otherwise provided for" specifically in the Constitution.[14] The delegates also debated where the power of appointment should be vested for a number of federal offices, including ambassadors, judges (including judges on the Supreme Court), as well as a treasurer.[15] Some argued that placing the appointment power with the legislature would result in factional disputes and partisanship; others that granting such authority to the Executive would tend too much towards a monarchical system of government.[16] The compromise that was eventually reached authorized the President to appoint high-level officers in the federal government, including certain postions named explicitly, as well as "all other officers" not mentioned, subject to Senate confirmation.[17] This arrangement avoided the potential weaknesses of a legislative body making appointments, but preserved a check on the excesses of the Executive by preventing the President from making appointments unilaterally.[18] Congress was also permitted to place the appointment of "inferior" officers with "the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the Heads of Departments."[19]

---

[9] See Gerhardt, supra note 5, at 18.

[10] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. IX, para. 5 ("The united states in congress assembled shall have authority . . . to appoint such . . . civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the united states under their direction . . . .").

[11] Weiss, 510 U.S. at 184 (Souter, J., concurring); see Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 111 (1926).

[12] Weiss, 510 U.S. at 184 (Souter, J., concurring).

[13] Madison's Observations on Jefferson's Draft of a Constitution for Virginia (1788), reprinted in 6 Papers of Thomas Jefferson 308, 311 (J. Boyd ed., 1952).

[14] 1 The Records Of The Federal Convention Of 1787, at 67 (Max Farrand ed., 1966). See Joseph P. Harris, The Advice and Consent of the Senate 18 (1953). During the proceedings, the Convention adopted a motion to authorize judges to be appointed by the Senate, but ultimately rejected this framework in favor of Presidential appointment of all principal officers. Id. at 19.

[15] See Harris, supra note 14, at 19–24; Gerhardt, supra note 5, at 16–23.

[16] Gerhardt, supra note 5, at 16–23.

[17] See Weiss, 510 U.S. at 184 (Souter, J., concurring) ("With error and overcorrection behind them, the Framers came to appreciate the necessity of separating at least to some degree the power to create federal offices (a power they assumed would belong to Congress) from the power to fill them, and they came to see good reason for placing the initiative to appoint the most important federal officers in the single-person presidency, not the multimember Legislature."); see ArtII.S2.C2.3.6 Creation of Federal Offices to ArtII.S2.C2.3.9 Restrictions on Congress's Authority.

[18] See Weiss, 510 U.S. at 184–85 (Souter, J., concurring). See The Federalist No. 76 (Alexander Hamilton); 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §§ 1522–1525 (1833).

[19] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

The Framers' decision to place the power to appoint principal officers with the President ensures accountability for his choices.[20] Placing the power of nomination with the President alone guarantees that the public knows who to blame for poor (or corrupt) choices.[21] Alexander Hamilton's arguments in the Federalist Papers, which "contain the most thorough contemporary justification for the method of appointing principals officers that the Framers adopted,"[22] stressed that placing the appointment power with a single individual, rather than a multi-member body, ensured a measure of accountability for those appointments.[23] Although the public can reasonably hold a single individual accountable for his appointment choices, doing so for a multi-member body is much more difficult as the individual ultimately responsible for an appointment is "impenetrable to the public eye."[24] Granting the appointment power to a single President was preferable to "a body of men" because a single individual would have a "livelier sense of duty and a more exact regard to reputation" in making appointments. A single President would have "fewer personal attachments to gratify[ ] than a body of men," and "cannot be distracted and warped by that diversity of views, feelings, and interests, which frequently distract and warp the resolutions of a collective body."[25] Rather than selecting the best candidate for an office on the merits, a collective body could simply trade votes in order to select their personal favorites based on "friendship and of affection."[26] On the other hand, requiring Senate concurrence with regard to major appointments served as "an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President, and would tend greatly to prevent the appointment of unfit characters."[27]

The Framers of the Constitution thus placed the power of appointment for principal officers with a single individual—the President—because a single actor would more likely be held accountable for his choices.[28] This principle of accountability extended to the Framers' provision that inferior officers may be appointed by the heads of executive departments, as the latter "possess a reputational stake in the quality of the individuals they appoint [and] are directly answerable to the President, who is responsible to his constituency."[29] Further, at the Constitutional Convention, the delegates were also careful to prevent the "diffusion" of the [20] See 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 70 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (Mr. Wilson: "If appointments of Officers are made by a sing. Ex he is responsible for the propriety of the same. [N]ot so where the Executive is numerous."); Id. at 42 ("As the Executive will be responsible in point of character at least, . . . he will be careful to look through all the States for proper characters.") (statement of Mr. Ghorum); Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 884 (1991) ("The Framers understood, however, that by limiting the appointment power, they could ensure that those who wielded it were accountable to political force and the will of the people."); see Jennifer L. Mascott, Who Are "Officers of the United States"?, 70 Stan. L. Rev. 443, 456 (2018).

[21] See Mascott, supra note 20, at 456.

[22] See Weiss, 510 U.S. at 185 n.1 (Souter, J., concurring).

[23] See The Federalist No. 76 (Alexander Hamilton) ("I proceed to lay it down as a rule, that one man of discernment is better fitted to analyze and estimate the peculiar qualities adapted to particular offices, than a body of men of equal or perhaps even of superior discernment.").

[24] Id. See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 884 (majority opinion); id. at 903–07 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). See also 1 Works of James Wilson 359–360 (J. Andrews ed., 1896) (arguing that placing the appointment power in a multi-member executive would inhibit holding that body accountable for its appointments).

[25] See The Federalist No. 76 (Alexander Hamilton).

[26] Id.

[27] Id.

[28] See, e.g., 2 The Records Of The Federal Convention Of 1787, at 42 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) ("As the Executive will be responsible in point of character at least, . . . he will be careful to look through all the States for proper characters.") (statement of Mr. Ghorum). See Mascott, supra note 20, at 456.

[29] See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 907 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). Inferior officers may also sometimes be appointed by the President alone or the courts of law. U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. The appointment of Judicial Branch officials might raise distinct issues from the accountability demanded for Executive Branch officers. See ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause to ArtIII.S1.10.2.3 Good Behavior Clause Doctrine; The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

appointment power by strictly limiting who can make appointments.[30] The Framers' careful "husbanding [of] the appointment power to limit its diffusion . . . ensure[d] that those who wielded it were accountable to political force and the will of the people."[31] The importance of accountability for federal appointments and the crucial check the Appointments Clause provides between the branches of government are principles that have informed subsequent Supreme Court jurisprudence concerning the appointment of federal officials.

ArtII.S2.C2.3.3 Process of Appointment for Principal Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The appointment of principal officers of the United States consists of three steps.[1] First, the President nominates an individual to an office; second, the Senate decides whether to confirm that person to the office; [2] and third, the President commissions the officer to the post.[3] The Supreme Court has made clear that compliance with the procedures established in the Constitution for the appointment of officers, both principal and inferior, is not a mere formality. Indeed, the Court has sometimes invalidated actions taken by individuals whose selection conflicts with the requirements of the Appointments Clause and has severed provisions of statutes that violate those constraints.[4]

As an initial matter, Senate confirmation of an individual nominated to an office is insufficient to vest an individual with an appointment to that office absent a final act of [30] See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 883 (majority opinion).

[31] See id. at 883–84 (majority opinion); Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 188 n.3 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring) ("And if Congress, with the President's approval, authorizes a lower level Executive Branch official to appoint a principal officer, it again has adopted a more diffuse and less accountable mode of appointment than the Constitution requires; this time it has violated the bar on abdication."); see, e.g., Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 179 (1995) (holding invalid the affirmance of a conviction by a military court whose members, though appointed by Executive Branch officials, were not appointed in accordance with the Appointments Clause).

[1] United States v. Le Baron, 60 U.S. 73, 78 (1856) ("When a person has been nominated to an office by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and his commission has been signed by the President, and the seal of the United States affixed thereto, his appointment to that office is complete."). The appointment of inferior officers, by contrast, may be vested in the President alone, the courts of law, or the heads of departments. U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. See also United States v. Smith, 286 U.S. 6, 30–49 (1932) (concluding that the Senate's rules did not authorize that body to revoke a previously-given confirmation).

[3] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3. See Quackenbush v. United States, 177 U.S. 20, 27 (1900) ("The appointment and the commission are distinct acts . . . ."); Appointment of a Senate-Confirmed Nominee, 23 Op. O.L.C. 232, 232 (1999).

[4] See Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 182–83 (1995) ("We think that one who makes a timely challenge to the constitutional validity of the appointment of an officer who adjudicates his case is entitled to a decision on the merits of the question and whatever relief may be appropriate if a violation indeed occurred."); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 140 (1976) (per curiam) (invalidating sections of the Federal Election Campaign Act that violated the Appointments Clause), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81. But see United States v. Arthrex, Inc., No. 19-1434, slip op. at 23 (U.S. June 21, 2021) (plurality opinion) ("Because the source of the constitutional violation is the restraint on the review authority of the Director, rather than the appointment of APJs by the Secretary, Arthrex is not entitled to a hearing before a new panel of APJs.").

appointment by the President.[5] In other words, the President retains discretion not to appoint an individual even after Senate confirmation.[6] In the seminal Supreme Court case of Marbury v. Madison, the Supreme Court held that the relevant final act of appointment for principal officers is the signing of a commission by the President, which is expressly required by Article II, Section 3 of the Constitution.[7]

The controversy in Marbury arose when President Thomas Jefferson ordered his Secretary of State, James Madison, not to deliver a commission to William Marbury, even though his predecessor, President John Adams, had already signed the commission.[8] Marbury filed suit seeking a writ of mandamus to compel Madison to deliver the commission.[9] The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice John Marshall, ultimately held that it lacked jurisdiction to issue mandamus because the statute authorizing the Court to do so violated Article III by improperly expanding the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.[10] Before reaching this conclusion, however, the Court ruled that Marbury did have a right to the commission because it had been signed by the President, thereby becoming "conclusive evidence" of Marbury's appointment.[11] Justice John Marshall reasoned that an appointment is complete once the "last act" required of the appointing authority is completed.[12] Because the last act required of the President, as the relevant appointing authority, was the signing of the commission, Marbury's appointment was completed when the President signed the commission.[13]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.4 Ambassadors, Ministers, and Consuls Appointments

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The appointment of foreign diplomats stands in some contrast to the appointment of most domestic officers. Given the lack of Supreme Court precedent on the appointment of foreign diplomats, it appears that the appointment of such positions is primarily informed by the [5] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 157 (1803) ("The last act to be done by the President, is the signature of the commission. He has then acted on the advice and consent of the senate to his own nomination. The time for deliberation has then passed. He has decided. His judgment, on the advice and consent of the senate concurring with his nomination, has been made, and the officer is appointed."); D'Arco v. United States, 441 F.2d 1173, 1175 (Ct. Cl. 1971) ("Chief Justice Marshall's reasoning teaches that, even if the office had been for a term of years, like Marbury's, the executive could still refuse to complete the appointment, after Senate confirmation, by failing to prepare or sign the commission."); Appointment of a Senate-Confirmed Nominee, 23 Op. O.L.C. 232, 232–34 (1999).

---

[6] D'Arco, 441 F.2d at 1175; Appointment of a Senate-Confirmed Nominee, 23 Op. O.L.C. 232, 232–34 (1999).

[7] Marbury, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) at 162. See also U.S. Const. art. II, § 3 (stating that the President "shall Commission all the Officers of the United States").

[8] See Marbury, 5 U.S (1 Cranch) at 153–55.

[9] Id. at 153–54.

[10] Id. at 176–80.

[11] Id. at 158, 162.

[12] Id. at 157.

[13] See United States v. Le Baron, 60 U.S. 73, 78 (1856) ("The transmission of the commission to the officer is not essential to his investiture of the office. If, by any inadvertence or accident, it should fail to reach him, his possession of the office is as lawful as if it were in his custody.").

historical practice of the political branches. As discussed later, while positions in the federal government occupied by "officers of the United States" are typically established through statute by Congress or via authority delegated by Congress,[1] the Executive Branch has generally taken the view that the President enjoys an independent, inherent authority to create diplomatic offices.[2] The Executive Branch has espoused this view for most of the Republic's history,[3] and it appears to find support in the earliest governmental practices.[4] The first Congresses appropriated money for conducting foreign relations but did not create any diplomatic posts; instead, Presidents simply appointed diplomats, subject to Senate confirmation.[5] Generally speaking, it seems that Congress has acceded to this practice.[6] In other words, the President has often appointed ambassadors to foreign countries even though no congressional statute explicitly created a particular diplomatic office to fill. At the same time, Congress has exercised some control over the creation and operation of foreign diplomatic posts, including by appropriating specific sums of money for salaries, creating particular offices which are then filled by the President, and imposing requirements for the selection of foreign officers via statute.[7]

Notwithstanding the practice of presidential appointment of diplomats to posts not necessarily created by statute, those diplomatic offices are generally considered to possess "the delegated sovereign authority to speak and act on behalf of the United States" and their selection must comply with the requirements of the Appointments Clause.[8] Writing in the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton noted that ambassadors and other public ministers are

---

[1] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.6 Creation of Federal Offices to ArtII.S2.C2.3.9 Restrictions on Congress's Authority.

[2] See Nomination of Sitting Member of Cong. to Be Ambassador to Vietnam, 20 Op. O.L.C. 284, 286 (1996).

[3] See Ambassadors and Other Pub. Ministers, 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 186, 189, 193 (1855) ("Hence, the President has power by the Constitution to appoint diplomatic agents of the United States of any rank, at any place, and at any time, in his discretion, subject always to the constitutional conditions of relation to the Senate. The power to make such appointments is not derived from, and cannot be limited by, any act of Congress, except in so far as appropriations of money are necessary to provide means for defraying the expense of this as of any other business of the Government.").

[4] See 1 A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents 58 (James D. Richardson ed., 1896) (letter from President George Washington to the Senate (June 15, 1789)); see Saikrishna B. Prakash & Michael D. Ramsey, The Executive Power over Foreign Affairs, 111 Yale L.J. 231, 304–10 (2001) ("Washington went beyond merely instructing and firing diplomats, however. He also effectively created them."); Saikrishna B. Prakash, Imperial From the Beginning 172–73 (2015).

[5] See Byers v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl. 59, 63–64 (1887) ("During the whole of the administration of President Jefferson, and part of the terms of other early Presidents, Congress annually appropriated a sum in gross 'for the expenses of intercourse with foreign nations,' leaving it to the Executive to fix the salaries of its several appointees. In some cases appropriations have been made for particular officers not to exceed the sums named, still leaving to the Executive a discretion to determine the amounts to be paid.") (quoting 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 186 (1855); David Currie, The Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801, at 44 (1997); Ambassadors and Other Pub. Ministers, 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 186, 189, 193 (1855); Nomination of Sitting Member of Cong. to Be Ambassador to Vietnam, 20 Op. O.L.C. 284, 286–92 (1996).

[6] See Francis v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl. 403, 405 (1887) ("In the diplomatic service, Congress seems to have practically conceded, whether on constitutional grounds rightly or wrongly taken or otherwise, the duty, power, or right of the Executive to appoint diplomatic agents, of any rank or title, at any time and at any place, subject to such compensation, or none at all, as the legislative branch of the Government should in its wisdom see fit to provide . . . ."); Byers, 22 Ct. Cl. at 63–64.

[7] See Byers, 22 Ct. Cl. at 63–67 ("The Executive, again conforming to the wishes of Congress, duly appointed a secretary of legation to Italy and a consul-general at Rome, superseding the combined office, which thereupon ceased to exist."); Foreign Service Act of 1980, 22 U.S.C. § 3942. Congress has sometimes asserted authority in the past to control the creation of diplomatic offices. See Act of Mar. 2, 1909, ch. 235, 35 Stat. 672 ("[H]ereafter no new ambassadorship shall be created unless the same shall be provided for by an Act of Congress.") (repealed 1946). But the Executive Branch has not complied. Graham H. Stuart, American Diplomatic and Consular Practice 137 (1952). Nomination of Sitting Member of Cong. to Be Ambassador to Vietnam, 20 Op. O.L.C. 284, 286 (1996).

[8] See Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 91–93 (2007); Nomination of Sitting Member of Cong. to Be Ambassador to Vietnam, 20 Op. O.L.C. 284, 286 (1996); Ambassadors and Other Pub. Ministers of the United States, 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 186, 190 (1855).

"the immediate representatives of their sovereigns" and consuls are the "public agents" of the nation.[9] The view that such foreign diplomats constitute officers whose appointment must comply with the Appointments Clause is confirmed by the earliest historical practices of the Republic. For instance, President George Washington nominated William Short to be "chargé d'affaires"[10] for France in 1789, and nominated ministers to London, Paris, and the Hague in 1791.[11] All were confirmed by the Senate.[12] The Executive Branch has consistently expressed its view that ambassadors, ministers, and consuls constitute officers of the United States whose appointments must conform to the Appointments Clause.[13]

In contrast, Presidents have routinely dispatched envoys, emissaries, and secret (sometimes known as special) agents on limited diplomatic missions without nominating them to the Senate.[14] In one of his first acts as President, George Washington unilaterally appointed Gouverneur Morris as a "special agent" to England to consider the possibility of a commercial treaty.[15] Additionally, President Thomas Jefferson unilaterally appointed Senator Daniel Smith to negotiate treaties with the Cherokee Indians.[16] The justification for this historical practice appears to be that such agents are not officers of the United States under the Appointments Clause because their duties are limited in duration and exist only for a temporary purpose.[17]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.5 Appointments of Justices to the Supreme Court

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers

---

[9] See The Federalist No. 81 (Alexander Hamilton). See Appointment of Consuls, 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 242, 248 (1855) ("We may conveniently regard the word of the Constitution, 'consuls,' as the generic designation of a class of public officers existing by public law, and recognised by numerous treaties, who are appointed by their government to reside in foreign countries, and especially in seaports, and other convenient points, to discharge administrative, and sometimes judicial, functions in regard to their fellow-citizens, merchants, mariners, travellers, and others, who dwell or happen to be in such places; to aid, by the authentication of documents abroad, in the collection of the public revenue; and, generally, to perform such other duties as may be assigned to them by the laws and orders of their government. Congress cannot, by legislative act, appoint or remove consuls any more than ministers; but it may increase at will the descriptions of consular officers; it may enlarge or diminish their functions; it may regulate their compensation; it may distinguish between some officers appointable with advice of the Senate, and others appointable by the President alone, or by a Head of Department.").

[10] A chargé d'affaires refers to a "person accredited by letter to the secretary of state or minister for foreign affairs of one country by the secretary of state or minister for foreign affairs of another country, in place of a duly accredited ambassador or minister." U.S. Dep't, Foreign Affairs Manual and Handbook, 5 FAH-1 Exhibit H-611, https://fam.state.gov/fam/05fah01/05fah010610.html#X611 (last visited June 22, 2022).

[11] Joseph P. Harris, The Advice and Consent of the Senate 36–40 (1953).

[12] Id.

[13] Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 91–93 (2007); Appointment of Consuls, 7 Op. Att'ys Gen. 242, 248 (1855).

[14] See Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 102 (2007). But see 22 U.S.C. § 7817 (establishing a "special envoy for North Korean human rights issues" who shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate).

[15] Currie, supra note 5, at 44.

[16] See 7 American State Papers: Indian Affairs 697–98 (1805).

[17] See Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause,31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 102–05 (2007); Edward Corwin, The President: Office and Powers 1787–1957, at 71 (4th ed. 1957); see 39 Annals of Cong. 1407, 1409–10 (1822) (finding by a House Select Committee that Senator Smith's position negotiating the treaty did not constitute an office); S. Rep. No. 53-227 at 25 (1894) (finding of a Senate Committee that the appointment of J.H. Blount to Hawaii did not require Senate confirmation).

and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Appointments Clause provides that the President shall appoint, subject to Senate confirmation, "Judges of the supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States."[1] Thus Supreme Court Justices are officers of the United States whose appointment must comply with the requirements of the Appointments Clause. Importantly, the Constitution provides that presidential nominees are subject to the "advice and consent" of the Senate. A range of matters are potentially relevant when the Senate considers whether to give its consent for nominations to the Nation's highest court, including political considerations, a nominee's judicial philosophy, fitness for the bench, past statements on issues relevant to the Court, and the overall balance of power between political factions.

Since the beginning of the Nation's history, just as the confirmation of Executive Branch officers has included political considerations, so to have nominees to the Supreme Court been accepted or rejected on political grounds.[2] For instance, the Senate rejected President George Washington's choice to replace the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court on largely political considerations.[3] In 1795, President Washington chose John Rutledge, who had previously served on the Supreme Court as an Associate Justice from 1789 to 1791, to replace John Jay, who had been elected Governor of New York.[4] After serving on the Court from 1789 to 1791, Rutledge had resigned his seat in order to serve as the chief justice of South Carolina's Supreme Court.[5] Prior to receiving a nomination to serve as Chief Justice on the U.S. Supreme Court, however, Rutledge gave a speech critical of the Jay Treaty reached with Great Britain, which had recently been approved for ratification by the Senate on June 24, 1795.[6] The Federalists strongly supported the treaty, and their opposition in the Senate to Rutledge's views ultimately sunk his nomination.[7] The Senate voted to reject the nomination in December 1795.[8] Of course, the Senate is not unique in considering politics and partisan considerations in this arena—every one of the twelve appointments President Washington made to the Supreme Court came from the Federalist Party,[9] and subsequent Presidents have considered politics in making their own appointments.[10]

Indeed, the political landscape profoundly informs and shapes the Supreme Court nomination and confirmation process. For instance, the timing of a Supreme Court vacancy can be crucially important: a vacancy occurring shortly before an election can alter the type of candidate that can realistically be confirmed; and prominent legal issues facing the country

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] See generally Joseph P. Harris, The Advice and Consent of the Senate 303 (1953).

[3] 1 Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 1789–1835, at 124–27 (1926).

[4] Harris, supra note 2, at 43; Supreme Court of the United States, About the Court, https://www.supremecourt.gov/about/members_text.aspx (last visited June 22, 2022). Rutledge served as Chief Justice on a recess appointment during the Court's 1795 August term. Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Appointments Process 51 (2003).

[5] Harris, supra note 2, at 42.

[6] Harris, supra note 2, at 43.

[7] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 51–52; Harris, supra note 2, at 43; Warren, supra note 3, at 128–37.

[8] United States Senate, Chief Justice Nomination Rejected, https://www.senate.gov/about/powers-procedures/nominations/a-chief-justice-rejected.htm (last visited June 22, 2022).

[9] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 51–52.

[10] Harris, supra note 2, at 302–03. See generally Henry Abraham, Justices, Presidents, and Senators: A History of the U.S. Supreme Court Appointments from Washington to Bush II (2007).

can affect the scope of appropriate views that a nominee must have.[11] The Senate's composition can also restrict a President's choices of who to nominate. A shift in party control of the Senate can dramatically alter the type of nominees a President can expect to be confirmed.[12] Likewise, public opinion of the President can shape the type of nominee a President can expect the Senate to support: a President with strong approval ratings, for instance, might face an easier task in achieving confirmation for a Justice, or might enjoy broader leeway in the type of Justice he could nominate in the first place.[13] An outgoing Justice's attributes can narrow the options available to a President. The President might find himself limited to moderate nominees when replacing a Justice seen as a swing vote on the Court. He might also find replacing a pillar of the right or left to require a nominee that appeals to one political side more strongly.[14] Finally, traditional norms of professional expectations play a role in circumscribing the eligible range of potential Supreme Court nominees—every single Justice has been a lawyer (though this is not required by the Constitution); since 1943, all Justices have graduated from accredited law schools; and most modern Justices graduated from top-ranked law schools and served on federal courts or in academia before confirmation.[15]

The rise of interest groups influencing the selection of Supreme Court Justices also reflects the increasing role of issue partisanship in the process. The nomination of Louis Brandeis to the Court in 1916 sparked a four month struggle with opposition from big business and past presidents of the American Bar Association.[16] Objections to his nomination included his judicial temperament and character, the alleged radicalism of his views, and also arguably reflected an anti-Semitic character.[17] He was eventually confirmed with the support of labor, consumer, and some religious groups.[18] Opposition to President Ronald Reagan's nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court is a particularly prominent example of the role interest groups may play.[19] Both labor and civil rights groups mounted significant opposition to the nomination. In the wake of that opposition's success, conservative groups were organized to counteract the perceived role of liberal interest organizations in influencing judicial nominations.[20]

Another important development regarding the selection of Supreme Court nominees is the increasingly public nature of the process. It was not until the twentieth century that open hearings were held over a Supreme Court nomination.[21] In 1916, the Senate did so for the

---

[11] See David Alistair Yalof, Pursuit of Justices: Presidential Politics and the Selection of Supreme Court Nominees 4 (1999). More recently, following the death of Associate Justice Antonin Scalia, President Barack Obama's nomination of Merrick Garland in 2016 to the High Court did not receive a hearing or a vote in the Republican-controlled Senate. That body refused to consider a Supreme Court nomination until after the fall's election. In 2017, President Donald Trump nominated and the Senate confirmed Neil Gorsuch to the Court. Sarah Lyall, Liberals Are Still Angry, but Merrick Garland Has Reached Acceptance, N.Y. Times (Feb. 19, 2017), https://www.nytimes.com/2017/02/19/us/politics/merrick-garland-supreme-court-obama-nominee.html; Audrey Carlsen & Wilson Andrews, How Senators Voted on the Gorsuch Nomination, N.Y. Times (Apr. 7, 2017), https://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2017/04/07/us/politics/gorsuch-confirmation-vote.html

[12] Yalof, supra note 11, at 5.

[13] Yalof, supra note 11, at 5.

[14] Yalof, supra note 11, at 5.

[15] Yalof, supra note 11, at 6, 170; Adrian Vermeule, Should We Have Lay Justices?, 59 Stan. L. Rev. 1569, 1574 (2007); Lee Epstein, et. al, The Supreme Court Compendium: Data, Decisions, and Developments 321–85 (6th ed. 2015).

[16] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 69.

[17] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 69.

[18] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 69–70.

[19] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 71–72.

[20] Gerhardt, supra note 4, at 71–72.

[21] Yalof, supra note 11, at 14–15.

nomination of Louis Brandeis.[22] Nine years later, Harlan Fiske Stone was the first nominee to appear personally before the Senate Judiciary Committee.[23] Stone's testimony was limited to the Teapot Dome Scandal. In 1939, Felix Frankfurter appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee and was "the first nominee to take unrestricted questions in an open, transcribed, public hearing."[24] Almost all nominees since 1955 have testified formally before the Senate Judiciary Committee.[25] Those hearings have been televised since 1981.[26] Finally, the particular procedures used by the Senate in considering nominations can affect the likelihood of confirmation for a Supreme Court Justice. In cases where the Senate has eliminated the sixty vote threshold necessary for confirmation, it may be easier to confirm a nominee to the bench (notwithstanding accompanying political ramifications).[27]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.6 Creation of Federal Offices

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Constitution gives Congress substantial power to establish federal government offices. As an initial matter, the Constitution vests the legislative power in Congress.[1] Article I bestows on Congress certain specified, or enumerated, powers.[2] The Court has recognized that these powers are supplemented by the Necessary and Proper Clause, which provides Congress with "broad power to enact laws that are 'convenient, or useful' or 'conducive' to [the] beneficial exercise" of its more specific authorities.[3] The Supreme Court has observed that the Necessary and Proper Clause authorizes Congress to establish federal offices.[4] Congress accordingly enjoys broad authority to create government offices to carry out various statutory functions [22] Yalof, supra note 11, at 14–15. Brandeis did not testify in the hearings, which were quite contentious and lasted months. See Harris, supra note 2, at 99–114.

[23] Yalof, supra note 11, at 14–15.

[24] Paul M. Collins, Jr. & Lori A. Ringhand, Supreme Court Confirmation Hearings and Constitutional Change 35 (2013).

[25] Yalof, supra note 11, at 14–15. In 1987, Douglas Ginsburg withdrew his nomination before a formal hearing was conducted. In 2016, Merrick Garland was nominated but was not given a hearing in the Senate.

[26] Yalof, supra note 11, at 14–15.

[27] 163 Cong. Rec. S2390 (daily ed. Apr. 6, 2017).

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 1.

[2] Id. art. I; United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 607 (2000).

[3] United States v. Comstock, 560 U.S. 126, 134 (2010) (quoting McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (Wheat.) 316, 413, 418 (1819)). See ArtI.S8.C18.1 Overview of Necessary and Proper Clause.

[4] See Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 883 (1991) (noting "Congress's authority to create offices and to provide for the method of appointment to those offices"); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 138 (1976) (per curiam) ("Congress may undoubtedly under the Necessary and Proper Clause create 'offices' in the generic sense and provide such method of appointment to those 'offices' as it chooses."), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81.

and directives.[5] The legislature may establish government offices not expressly mentioned in the Constitution in order to carry out its enumerated powers.[6]

The Appointments Clause supplies the method of appointment for certain specified officials, but also for "other [o]fficers" whose positions are "established by [l]aw." Although principal officers must be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, Congress "may by [l]aw" place the appointing power for inferior officers with the President alone, a department head, or a court.[7] As this section will explain, the Supreme Court has recognized Congress's discretion to establish a wide variety of governmental entities in the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Branches.

Congress's authority to establish offices is limited by the terms of the Appointments Clause. The structure of federal agencies must comply with the requirement that the President appoint officers, subject to Senate confirmation, although the appointment of "inferior officers" may rest with the President alone, department heads, or the courts.[8] More broadly, the Supreme Court has made clear that the Constitution imposes important limits on Congress's ability to influence or control the actions of officers once they are appointed. Likewise, it is widely believed that the President must retain a certain amount of independent discretion in selecting officers that Congress may not impede. These principles ensure that the President may fulfill his constitutional duty under Article II to "take [c]are" that the laws are faithfully executed.[9]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.7 Creation of Federal Offices with Blended Features

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the Constitution grants broad discretion to Congress to establish various offices across the federal government. Aside from Congress's clear authority to create Executive Branch offices to be filled by officers that execute the law,[1] as well as federal courts filled with judicial officers to adjudicate cases and controversies,[2] Congress may sometimes merge features of various federal entities and establish unique agencies within the federal government. For instance, in the 1989 case of Mistretta v. United States, the Court ruled that the structure of the United States Sentencing Commission, an entity placed by Congress in the Judicial Branch and charged with promulgating sentencing

---

[5] See Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 129 (1926) ("To Congress under its legislative power is given the establishment of offices, the determination of their functions and jurisdiction, the prescribing of reasonable and relevant qualifications and rules of eligibility of appointees, and the fixing of the term for which they are to be appointed and their compensation—all except as otherwise provided by the Constitution.").

[6] See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 883; Buckley, 424 U.S. at 138.

[7] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[8] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[9] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[1] See Myers, 272 U.S. 52, 129 (1926).

[2] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73 (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. § 1350).

guidelines for the federal courts, did not violate the separation of powers.[3] The Commission was composed of seven voting members appointed by the President with Senate confirmation.[4] The law required at least three members to be federal judges, and the President could remove Commission members for cause.[5] The challenger in that case argued, among other things,[6] that Congress's delegation of power to the Judiciary, and individual Article III judges, to promulgate sentencing guidelines was unconstitutional as it enlisted the Judiciary in exercising legislative authority.[7] In addition, the challenger argued that Congress had "eroded the integrity and independence of the Judiciary" by forcing Article III judges to share their power with non-judges and engage in the political work of promulgating sentencing guidelines. Further, while Article III judges enjoy constitutional protection from removal except for impeachment, here the statute required Article III judges to serve on the Commission subject to removal by the President.[8]

Acknowledging that the Commission constituted "an unusual hybrid in structure and authority" within the federal government, the Supreme Court upheld, in a vote of 8-1, the constitutionality of the Commission's design and duties.[9] In an opinion by Justice Harry Blackmun, the Court first examined whether creating an independent body, placed in the Judicial Branch, with the power to issue sentencing guidelines "vested in the Commission powers that are more appropriately performed by the other Branches or . . . undermine[d] the integrity of the judiciary."[10] The Court noted that "Congress may delegate to the Judicial Branch nonadjudicatory functions that do not trench upon the prerogatives of another Branch and that are appropriate to the central mission of the Judiciary."[11] Because judges have historically exercised discretion in sentencing decisions and the Judiciary has long exercised authority to issue rules "for carrying into execution [its] judgments," the Court reasoned that Congress could combine these features in the Commission and entrust it with the power to promulgate sentencing guidelines.[12] Although technically located in the Judicial Branch, the Commission's powers, the Court observed, were not unconstitutionally "united with the powers of the Judiciary."[13] The Commission was not a court, did not exercise judicial power, and was not controlled by the Judicial Branch; instead, the Commission was an independent agency accountable to Congress and its members were removable by the President.[14] In addition, placement of the Commission in the Judicial Branch did not increase that branch's authority.[15] Judges had historically decided sentencing questions in individual cases; the Commission simply did this via the promulgation of sentencing guidelines.[16]

---

[3] 488 U.S. 361, 412 (1989).

[4] 28 U.S.C. § 991(a).

[5] Id.

[6] The Court also rejected the argument that the Commission's structure violated the "nondelegation" doctrine. See ArtI.S1.5.2 Historical Background on Nondelegation Doctrine.

[7] Mistretta, 488 U.S. at 383.

[8] Id. at 384.

[9] Id. at 412. The Court also held that Congress's grant of authority to the Commission did not violate the nondelegation doctrine. Id. at 379.

[10] Id. at 385.

[11] Id. at 388.

[12] Id. at 384–97.

[13] Id. at 393.

[14] Id. at 393–94.

[15] Id. at 395.

[16] Id.

The Court next turned to the composition of the Commission and concluded that its design did not undermine the integrity of the Judicial Branch.[17] The service of three federal judges on the Commission, though "somewhat troublesome" in the eyes of the Court, did not on balance interfere with the integrity of the federal Judiciary as a whole.[18] The Court looked to the early historical practices of the country and determined that Article III of the Constitution did not bar judges from undertaking certain extrajudicial duties.[19] The judges on the Commission did not serve "pursuant to their status and authority as Article III judges, but solely because of their appointment by the President as the Act directs."[20] The power wielded by the judges as Commissioners thus was not judicial in nature, but administrative, pursuant to the legislation creating the commission.[21] The judges' service did not ultimately undermine the impartiality of the Judiciary because the Commission's task did "not enlist the resources or reputation of the Judicial Branch in either the legislative business of determining what conduct should be criminalized or the executive business of enforcing the law."[22] Instead, the Commission was dedicated to promulgating rules for sentencing, a topic traditionally within the province of the Judiciary.[23]

Finally, the Court examined the extent of the President's control over the Commission's functioning.[24] The Court determined that the President's power to remove the Commissioners for cause did not "compromise the impartiality" of the Judiciary or prevent that branch from performing its constitutional function because, even if removed as a Commissioner, a judge retained the status of an Article III judge.[25]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.8 Federal Versus Territorial Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Not every office created by Congress is a federal office subject to the Appointments Clause.[1] In Financial Oversight & Management Board for Puerto Rico v. Aurelius Investment,

---

[17] Id. at 397–408.

[18] Id. at 397.

[19] Id. at 398–99 ("The first Chief Justice, John Jay, served simultaneously as Chief Justice and as Ambassador to England, where he negotiated the treaty that bears his name. Oliver Ellsworth served simultaneously as Chief Justice and as Minister to France. While he was Chief Justice, John Marshall served briefly as Secretary of State and was a member of the Sinking Fund Commission with responsibility for refunding the Revolutionary War debt.").

[20] Id. at 404.

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 407–08.

[23] Id.

[24] Id. at 408–11.

[25] Id. at 409–11.

[1] See generally S.F. Arts & Athletics, Inc. v. U.S. Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 526, 543–44 (1987) (reasoning that the congressional grant of a corporate charter, as well as "the right to prohibit certain commercial and promotional uses of the word 'Olympic,'" did not render the Olympic Committee a government actor subject to constitutional challenge).

LLC, the Court considered the constitutionality of an oversight board (the Board) that Congress created in 2016 to manage financial issues of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, a U.S. territory.[2] Writing for the Court, Justice Stephen Breyer explained that provisions in Articles I and IV of the Constitution "empower Congress to create local offices for the District of Columbia and for Puerto Rico and the Territories."[3] Based on the Constitution's text, structure, and history, the Court reasoned that creating a local office "does not automatically make its holder an 'Officer of the United States'" within the meaning of Article II's Appointments Clause.[4] At the same time, an official's location in a territory does not, standing alone, exempt that office from the Appointment Clause's reach.[5] Instead, when Congress exercises its Article I or IV powers to create a local or territorial office, the Court examines whether Congress vested that official with "primarily local powers and duties."[6] If so, the official is not an "Officer of the United States" subject to the Appointments Clause.[7]

Based on the text of the 2016 law, the Aurelius Court concluded that when Congress created the Board, it exercised its Article IV powers under the Territories Clause.[8] And the Court concluded that the powers and duties that Congress assigned to the Board were "primarily local in nature."[9] Justice Breyer cited several factors that "taken together" demonstrated the Board's local nature: (1) the government of Puerto Rico paid the Board's expenses; (2) the Board developed fiscal plans with the elected government of Puerto Rico and could initiate bankruptcy proceedings for Puerto Rico; and (3) the Board's "broad investigatory powers"—akin to what federal officers exercise—were "backed by Puerto Rican, not federal, law."[10] Accordingly, the Court held that Board members were territorial officers, not federal "Officers," and thus their selection need not comply with the Appointments Clause.[11]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.9 Restrictions on Congress's Authority

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

While Congress enjoys a certain amount of discretion when designing federal agencies, the Supreme Court has regularly invalidated congressional attempts to "aggrandiz[e] its own

[2] No. 18-1334, slip op. at 2–6 (U.S. June 1, 2020). Congress created the Board as part of the Puerto Rico Oversight, Management, and Economic Stability Act (PROMESA), Pub. L. No. 114-187, 130 Stat. 549 (2016) (codified at 48 U.S.C. § 2101 et seq.).

[3] Aurelius Inv., LLC, slip op. at 2.

[4] Id. at 10.

[5] Id. at 6–9.

[6] Id. at 14.

[7] Id. at 14–17

[8] Id. at 4–8; see also U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2.

[9] Aurelius Inv., LLC, slip op. at 16.

[10] Id. at 15, 17.

[11] Id. at 15–17.

power at the expense of another branch."[1] For instance, while Congress may undoubtedly establish a wide variety of federal offices to carry out statutory duties, it may not appoint its own Members to carry out executive functions or reserve for itself the power of appointment.[2] In the 1991 case of Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, the Supreme Court examined the constitutionality of legislation that authorized a review board composed of Members of Congress to review and reverse decisions of the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority (MWAA).[3] The MWAA is a regional body established to oversee the management and operations of Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport.

The Court first ruled that Members of Congress on the Board exercised federal authority, even though the law specified that they would serve "in their individual capacities"[4] as opposed to serving in their official role as legislators.[5] In support of this conclusion, the Court noted that control over the airports in question was originally placed with the federal government and was transferred to the MWAA on condition that the States create the Board; the federal government has a significant interest in the operation of airports, which are crucial to government operations; and membership on the Board was limited to federal officials.[6]

Moreover, Congress exercised significant power over the appointment and removal of the Board members. The law required that the Board consist of nine members of Congress, eight of whom had to sit on specific congressional committees, chosen from a list provided by congressional leadership.[7] There was no requirement that the lists contain more recommendations than openings on the Board.[8] The Court concluded that this structure ensured congressional control of appointments.[9] Further, by controlling committee assignments, Congress had removal power over the Board "because depriving a Board member of membership in the relevant committees deprives the member of authority to sit on the Board."[10]

The Court ruled that the statute's provision requiring Members of Congress to sit on the Board violated the separation of powers.[11] The Court did not expressly decide whether the Board's power was executive or legislative in nature, but reasoned that, no matter how it was characterized, the statute's grant of authority to the Board was not constitutional.[12] If the Board's power was executive in nature, the Court explained, the Constitution barred an agent

---

[1] Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 182 (1995); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 122 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81; INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983); Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 735–36 (1986).

[2] In Buckley v. Valeo, discussed in more detail at ArtII.S2.C2.3.10 Officer and Non-Officer Appointments, the Court ruled that statutory provisions authorizing members of Congress to appoint Commissioners to the Federal Elections Commission were unconstitutional. 424 U.S. at 143 (per curiam).

[3] 501 U.S. 252, 255–61 (1991). See Metropolitan Washington Airports Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-591, 100 Stat. 3341. The legislation authorized the transfer of Dulles International Airport and Washington National Airport from federal control to the MWAA conditioned on the creation of a Board of Review created by the MWAA. Wash. Airports, 501 U.S. at 255–61. Virginia and the District of Columbia passed legislation authorizing the MWAA to create the Review Board. Id. at 261.

[4] Metropolitan Washington Airports Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-500, 100 Stat. 3341, § 6007(f)(1).

[5] Wash. Airports, 501 U.S. at 265–71.

[6] Id. at 266–69.

[7] One member was "chosen alternately . . . from a list provided by the Speaker of the House or the President pro tempore of the Senate, respectively." Id. at 268.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 268–69.

[10] Id. at 268–70.

[11] Id. at 274–76.

[12] Id. at 275–76.

of Congress from exercising it; and if the Board's power was legislative, then the Board could not operate without following the constitutional requirements of bicameralism and presentment for legislative action.[13]

Congress's control over appointments is further limited on the question of who can remove an incumbent officer.[14] In the 1986 case of Bowsher v. Synar, the Supreme Court invalidated a statute that gave an official controlled by Congress the power to order a decrease in federal spending.[15] A 1985 act[16] gave the Comptroller General authority, in the event of a budget shortfall, to issue a report detailing federal revenue and expenditure estimates, along with the specific reductions needed to cut the deficit to meet a statutory target.[17] The President was then required to order the "sequestration" of those funds pursuant to the Comptroller General's report.[18] The Court held that the Comptroller's power to trigger sequestration violated the separation of powers because a preexisting provision authorized Congress to remove the Comptroller General, who Congress viewed as an officer of the legislature,[19] through a joint resolution.[20] The High Court explained that the Constitution's division of power among the three branches of government barred "an active role for Congress in the supervision of officers charged with the execution of the laws it enacts."[21] The Court rejected the argument that the Comptroller Generalwas sufficiently independent from Congress such that there was no constitutional violation. The power of removal, for the Court, is a crucial tool of control; Congress's ability to remove the Comptroller General "dictate[s] that he will be subservient to Congress."[22] As a remedy for this constitutional defect, the Court left Congress's removal power in place, but invalidated the executive functions given to the Comptroller General.[23]

Just as Congress may not appoint Members to wield executive power or exercise direct control over Executive Branch officers, its authority to impose procedural restrictions on the President's nomination of an officer may also be limited. This issue arose in the 1989 Supreme Court case of Public Citizen v. Department of Justice, which examined whether the Federal Advisory Committee Act (FACA) applied to consultations between the Department of Justice (DOJ) and the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Federal Judiciary (ABA Committee).[24] The FACA required committees that advise the President, or other officers and agencies in the federal government, to follow a number of procedural requirements, such as filing a charter; keeping detailed minutes of meetings; and having meetings chaired by a federal government employee or officer authorized to adjourn any meeting.[25] The Court

[13] Id.

[14] Springer v. Gov't of Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 202 (1928) ("Legislative power, as distinguished from executive power, is the authority to make laws, but not to enforce them or appoint the agents charged with the duty of such enforcement. The latter are executive functions.").

[15] 478 U.S. 714, 735–36 (1986). For more on the Court's decision in Bowsher v. Synar, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal.

[16] Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Pub. L. 99-177, 99 Stat. 1038.

[17] Bowsher, 478 U.S. at 718, 732.

[18] Id. at 718.

[19] Id. at 731.

[20] Id. at 736.

[21] Id. at 722.

[22] Id. at 730.

[23] Id. at 734–36.

[24] 491 U.S. 440, 443 (1989).

[25] See 5 U.S.C. App. § 1 et seq. 5 U.S.C. App. § 3(2) ("The term "advisory committee" means any committee, board, commission, council, conference, panel, task force, or other similar group, or any subcommittee or other subgroup thereof (hereafter in this paragraph referred to as "committee"), which is—(A) established by statute or reorganization considered whether the Act covered consultations between DOJ and the ABA Committee regarding presidential nominations of federal judges. It noted that a strictly literal interpretation of the statute would conceivably reach every instance in which the President or an agency sought advice from "any group of two or more persons, or at least any formal organization," including private entities.[26] The Court concluded that Congress did not intend that result, as it would mean the procedural requirements of FACA applied every time the President sought the views of a group of two or more people, "or at least any formal organization."[27]

Accordingly, the Court examined Congress's intention in passing the FACA, including that Act's legislative history as well as the history of other efforts "to regulate the Federal Government's use of advisory committees."[28] The Court reasoned that it ultimately was a "close question whether FACA should be construed to apply to the ABA Committee," but constitutional considerations "tip[ped] the balance decisively against FACA's application."[29] The Court invoked the concept of constitutional avoidance, which essentially teaches that when faced with statutory ambiguity, if one interpretation of a statute would raise constitutional problems, but another, fairly possible interpretation does not, courts should adopt the latter construction.[30] The Court concluded that applying FACA to DOJ's consultations with the ABA Committee "would present formidable constitutional difficulties," namely, potentially infringing on the President's constitutional duty under Article II to nominate federal judges.[31] The Court accordingly concluded that FACA did not apply to DOJ's confidential consultations with the ABA Committee.[32]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.10 Officer and Non-Officer Appointments

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Supreme Court case law concerning which individuals in the federal government constitute "Officers of the United States"—and thus must be appointed pursuant to the requirements of the Appointments Clause—has been relatively sparse over the course of the plan, or (B) established or utilized by the President, or (C) established or utilized by one or more agencies, in the interest of obtaining advice or recommendations for the President or one or more agencies or officers of the Federal Government.").

[26] Pub. Citizen, 491 U.S. at 452, 455–64.

[27] Id. at 452–53.

[28] Id. at 452–64.

[29] Id. at 465.

[30] Id. at 465–66 (citing Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932)).

[31] Id. at 466–67.

[32] Id. at 467; id. at 467–88 (1989) (Kennedy, J., concurring) (concluding that the statute did apply to the ABA's consultations with DOJ but that this was an unconstitutional interference with the President's power to nominate judges).

Nation's history,[1] with many of the key Supreme Court decisions occurring in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.[2] In one of the earliest cases addressing the issue, Chief Justice John Marshall, riding circuit in the 1823 case of United States v. Maurice, defined an officer as one entrusted with a duty that is "a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the government, and not by contract, which an individual is appointed by government to perform."[3] A similar principle was espoused in an opinion issued by Attorney General Hugh Legare in 1843, wherein he contrasted the appointment of "permanent" customs inspectors who qualify as officers of the United States, with the appointment by customs collectors of "occasional inspectors" who do not.[4] In 1878, the Supreme Court held in United States v. Germaine that federal civil surgeons were employees not subject to the constitutional requirements of the Appointments Clause, rather than officers, because their positions were "occasional and intermittent," rather than "continuing and permanent."[5] However, some of the Court's early decisions addressing which individuals constitute officers tended not to examine closely the substantive differences between officers and non-officers, and instead simply relied on an individual's method of appointment.[6] In other words, according to some of these early cases, no matter the duties assigned to a position, if an individual was not appointed according to the strictures of the Appointments Clause, then by definition he or she could not constitute an officer; but if an individual was appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause, then he or she did qualify as an officer.[7]

---

[1] Stacy M. Lindstedt, Developing the Duffy Defect: Identifying Which Government Workers Are Constitutionally Required to Be Appointed, 76 Mo. L. Rev. 1143, 1151 (2011). The Executive Branch has taken the position, which does not appear to contradict Supreme Court case law, that temporary designations to offices are permissible without complying with the Appointments Clause. Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 106 (2007); Designation of Acting Dir. of the Off. of Mgmt. & Budget, 27 Op. O.L.C. 121, 123–25 (2003); Auth. of Lieutenant Colonel Commandant of Marine Corps, 2 Op. Att'ys Gen. 77, 78–79 (1828). Appointment & Removal of Inspectors of Customs, 4 Op. Att'ys Gen. 162, 163 (1843); The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'ys Gen. 141, 155–56 (1867). But see NLRB v. SW Gen., Inc., No. 15-1251, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. Mar. 21, 2017) (Thomas, J., concurring) (arguing that a temporary designation under the Federal Vacancies Reform Act was unconstitutional because the procedures of the Appointments Clause were not followed).

[2] See Gary Lawson, Federal Administrative Law 190 (7th ed. 2016).

[3] 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1214 (C.C.D. Va. 1823).

[4] Appointment & Removal of Inspectors of Customs, 4 Op. Att'ys Gen. 162, 163 (1843); see also Tenure of Off. of Inspectors of Customs, 1 Op. Att'ys Gen. 459, 459 (1821); Tenure of Off. of Inspectors of Customs, 2 Op. Att'ys Gen. 410, 412 (1831). In 1865, Attorney General James Speed reasoned that a statute which vested in assessors the power to appoint assistant assessors of the internal revenue service was unconstitutional because the former were not Heads of Departments. Appointment of Assistant Assessors of Internal Revenue, 11 Op. Att'ys Gen. 209, 209–12 (1865); see Act of Mar. 3, 1865, § 1, 13 Stat. 469. He concluded that assistant assessors constituted officers because Congress has created their office and they exercised independent authority. Appointment of Assistant Assessors of Internal Revenue, 11 Op. Att'ys Gen. 209, 211 (1865). The following year, Congress amended the statute to authorize the Treasury Secretary to appoint assistant assessors. Act of Jan. 15, 1866, 14 Stat. 2. For more on early Attorney General opinions regarding the Appointments Clause, see Aditya Bamzai, The Attorney General and Early Appointments Clause Practice, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1501, 1504–14 (2018).

[5] 99 U.S. 508, 511–12 (1878) (noting that the term officer "embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties") (citing United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393–94 (1867)); see Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310, 327 (1890) ("His position is without tenure, duration, continuing emolument, or continuous duties, and he acts only occasionally and temporarily. Therefore, he is not an 'officer,' within the meaning of the clause of the constitution referred to."); Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 100–11 (2007).

[6] See Landry v. FDIC, 204 F.3d 1125, 1132–33 (D.C. Cir. 2000) ("In fact, the earliest Appointments Clause cases often employed circular logic, granting officer status to an official based in part upon his appointment by the head of a department.") (citing United States v. Mouat, 124 U.S. 303, 307 (1888); Germaine, 99 U.S. at 510; United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall) 385, 393 (1867)); Wise v. Withers, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 331 (1806); John M. Burkoff, Appointment and Removal Under the Federal Constitution: The Impact of Buckley v. Valeo, 22 Wayne L. Rev. 1335, 1347 (1976).

[7] See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 124 U.S. 525, 531–32 (1888); Mouat, 124 U.S. at 307; Burnap v. United States, 252 U.S. 512, 516 (1920).

In the 1976 case of Buckley v. Valeo, the Court established that "Officers of the United States" are those persons "exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States."[8] In that case, the Court examined the appointment of members of the Federal Election Commission (FEC) charged with regulating federal elections by enforcing the Federal Election Campaign Act.[9] The FEC was composed of six members: four nominated by congressional leadership and two by the President, all of whom were subject to confirmation by both the Senate and House.[10] In examining whether the FEC members wielded significant authority, the Buckley Court distinguished among three types of powers the members exercised: functions concerning (1) the flow of information—"receipt, dissemination, and investigation"; (2) the implementation of the statute—"rulemaking and advisory opinions"; and (3) the enforcement of the statute"informal procedures, administrative determinations and hearings, and civil suits."[11]

The Buckley Court held that the first category of FEC duties could be performed by non-officers because they were "investigative and informative," essentially "in aid of the legislative function of Congress."[12] Such functions could therefore be exercised by individuals not appointed in conformity with the Appointments Clause.[13] The latter two categories of functions, however, were executive in nature and constituted "significant authority." The duties regarding implementation of the statute—including rulemaking, disbursal of funds, and decisions about who may run for a federal office—constituted significant authority that could be executed only by "Officers of the United States."[14] Likewise, the power to enforce the underlying statute, "exemplified by [the Commissioner's] discretionary power to seek judicial relief" by instituting civil litigation to vindicate public rights, amounted to authority that, according to the Court, must be exercised by an officer appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause.[15] In a footnote, the Court contrasted the duties of officers with "employees of the United States," who are "lesser functionaries subordinate to officers" and may be selected outside of the requirements of the Appointments Clause.[16] The Court thus concluded that most of the powers granted to the FEC could only be wielded by officers of the United States, and therefore could not be exercised by the FEC because the selection of its members did not comply with the Appointments Clause.[17] [8] 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976) (per curiam) (emphasis added), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81. Subsequent cases have followed the Court's analysis of "significant authority." See, e.g., Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 662 (1997) (acknowledging that military appellate judges exercise "significant authority"); Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 881–82 (1991) (holding that special trial judges of Article I tax courts are "Officers of the United States" based on the degree of authority they exercise).

---

[9] Buckley, 424 U.S. at 126. Congress had provided that the FEC be composed of eight members, which included six voting members and two nonvoting ex officio members. Id. at 113.

[10] Id.

[11] Id. at 137.

[12] Id. at 138.

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 140–41. The Court also noted with approval that prior decisions had found that a postmaster first class and the clerk of a district court qualified as officers. Id. at 126 (citing Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926) (postmaster) and Ex parte Hennen, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 225 (1839) (clerk)).

[15] Buckley, 424 U.S. at 138, 140–41.

[16] Id. at 126 n.162.

[17] Id. at 143; see id. at 267–82 (White, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (confirming the majority opinion's analysis on this point). While Buckley's "significant authority" definition of an officer went beyond the Court's prior jurisprudence on the matter, it arguably did not establish a conclusive test for what precisely constitutes significant authority. It bears mention in this vein that a Department of Justice Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) opinion, issued after Buckley, argued that two characteristics define an office of the United States. See Officers of the United States Within the Meaning of the Appointments Clause, 31 Op. O.L.C. 73, 73 (2007). According to the OLC, the position must first be endowed with delegated sovereign authority, such as the power to "bind third parties, or the Government

Nearly fifteen years after Buckley, the Supreme Court's opinion in Freytag v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue again examined what responsibilities make an individual an officer of the United States, concluding that a special trial judge of the U.S. Tax Court qualified as such an officer.[18] The Court ruled that special trial judges were officers because of the "significance of the duties and discretion" they possessed.[19] First, the Court noted that the office of special trial judge was "established by Law"[20] and its "duties, salary, and means of appointment" were specified in statute.[21] The Court contrasted the special trial judges with the position of special masters, who temporarily assisted Article III judges on an "episodic" basis, and whose positions, duties, and functions were not "delineated in a statute."[22] Second, special trial judges were entrusted with duties beyond "ministerial tasks," exercising significant discretion in taking testimony, conducting trials, ruling on evidence, and enforcing compliance with discovery orders.[23] In addition, the Court noted that, even leaving aside these duties, special trial judges qualified as officers because the underlying statute authorized special trial judges, in certain circumstances, to render independently binding decisions.[24] The Commissioner conceded that for these purposes, special trial judges acted as officers, but argued that the petitioners lacked standing to challenge those aspects of the judges' power.[25] The Court rejected this contention, concluding that it made no sense to consider special trial judges to operate as officers for some purposes, but not others.[26]

In the 2018 case of Lucia v. SEC, the Supreme Court reaffirmed its analysis in Freytag and concluded that administrative law judges (ALJs) within the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) qualified as officers of the United States.[27] The Court reasoned that because the duties of SEC ALJs essentially mirrored those of the special trial judges in Freytag, the SEC ALJs also constituted officers.[28] As an initial matter, both held "a continuing office established by law."[29] Further, special trial judges and SEC ALJs "exercise[d] the same 'significant discretion' when carrying out the same 'important functions.'"[30] Both types of itself, for the public benefit." Id. at 87. In addition, the position must be "continuing." Id. at 74. The OLC opinion offers two indicia of a continuing position. A position is continuing if it is "permanent, meaning that it is not limited by time or by being of such a nature that it will terminate by the very act of performance." Id. at 111 (internal quotations omitted). Alternatively, even if a position is temporary (because of an expiration date, or due to the nature of its duties), the presence of three factors can nevertheless indicate a "continuing" position: (1) the existence of the position is not personal, meaning that the duties continue even if the person changes; (2) it is not a "transient" position, meaning that the more enduring the position is the more likely it constitutes an office; and (3) the duties of the position are more than "incidental" to the government's operations. Id. at 100, 112.

[18] The Court held that the special trial judge was an inferior officer, rather than an employee. Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 881–82 (1991). The Court subsequently made clear that the exercise of significant authority establishes the line not between inferior and principal officers, but between "officer and non-officer." Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 662 (1997). In other words, whether a position qualifies as an "inferior officer" under Freytag concerns the difference between employees and officers and is conceptually distinct from whether an officer is properly viewed as a principal or inferior officer. See ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.1 Overview of Principal and Inferior Officers.

[19] Freytag, 501 U.S. at 881.

[20] Id. (quoting U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.).

[21] Freytag, 501 U.S. at 881.

[22] Id.

[23] Id. at 881–82.

[24] Id. at 882.

[25] Id.

[26] Id.

[27] Lucia v. SEC, No. 17-130, slip op. at 1–4 (U.S. June 21, 2018).

[28] Id. at 6–8.

[29] Id. at 8.

[30] Id. (quoting Freytag, 501 U.S. at 878).

officials were authorized to (1) "take testimony,"[31] (2) "conduct trials,"[32] (3) "rule on the admissibility of evidence,"[33] and (4) were entrusted with "the power to enforce compliance with discovery orders."[34] Moreover, the Court observed, SEC ALJs actually had somewhat more independent authority to render decisions than did the special trial judges in Freytag: while a major decision made by the special trial judges had no force unless a Tax Court judge adopted it as his own, the SEC could decline to review an ALJ's decision, in which case the decision became final and was "deemed the action of the Commission."[35] Accordingly, because SEC ALJs were "near-carbon-copies" of the special trial judges in Freytag, they were officers who must be appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause.[36] Importantly, the Court declined to elaborate on the significant authority test for determining whether an individual is an officer, reasoning that its analysis in Freytag resolved the case before it.[37] Because the petitioner had raised a "timely" Appointments Clause challenge, the Court remanded the case for a new hearing before a properly appointed ALJ or the Commission itself.[38]

In addition, while not directly applying the significant authority test to determine whether an individual counts as an officer, at least one other case discussed previously may at least shed some light on what types of duties might be relevant in determining if an individual qualifies as an officer, at least in the Executive Branch. In the 1986 case of Bowsher v. Synar,[39] the Court held that a statute authorizing an official controlled by Congress to carry out duties that were executive in nature violated the separation of powers.[40] The statute entrusted the Comptroller General with preparing a report detailing estimates of projected federal revenues and outlays as well as any necessary reductions to reduce the projected deficit to a specified target.[41] The Court reasoned that this required the Comptroller to "exercise judgment [31] Id. at 9 (quoting Freytag, 501 U.S. at 881) (quotation marks omitted). The Court noted that this included the authority to "receive evidence," "examine witnesses," and conduct pre-hearing depositions. Id. (quoting 17 C.F.R. §§ 201.111(c), 200.14(a)(4)) (quotation marks omitted).

---

[32] Id. at 9 (quoting Freytag, 501 U.S. at 882) (quotation marks omitted). This power includes the ability to administer oaths, rule on motions, and determine the course of the hearing. Id.

[33] Id. (quoting Freytag, 501 U.S. at 882) (quotation marks omitted).

[34] Id. (quoting Freytag, 501 U.S. at 882) (quotation marks omitted). In arguing that SEC ALJs are not officers under Freytag, the amicus appointed by the Court to argue that SEC ALJs were employees (the Solicitor General agreed with the challengers in the case) proffered two distinctions between the power of Tax Court special trial judges and SEC ALJs. First, the amicus noted that the Tax Court special trial judges have more expansive power to compel compliance with discovery orders—including ordering fines and imprisonment—than do SEC ALJs. Writing for the Court, Justice Elena Kagan rejected this argument, noting that Freytag did not reference any particular method of compelling compliance with discovery, and observing that the less stringent power wielded by SEC ALJs, including the power to exclude parties and attorneys from the proceedings, was sufficient under the reasoning of Freytag. Id. at 9–11. Second, the amicus noted that the Tax Court's rules provide that a special trial judge's factual finding "shall be presumed" correct, Tax Court Rule 183(d), whereas the SEC regulations do not contain a similar deferential standard. Justice Kagan rejected this argument as well, noting that the level of deference given to factual findings was not relevant to the Freytag Court's analysis. Further, Justice Kagan noted, the SEC frequently does afford a similar deference to its ALJs as a matter of practice. Id. at 9–13.

[35] Id. at 10 (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 78d–1(c)). See 17 C.F.R. §§ 201.360(d)(2).

[36] Id. at 6.

[37] Id.

[38] Id. at 12; see also Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 182 (1995) (holding that "one who makes a timely challenge to the constitutional validity of the appointment of an officer who adjudicates his case is entitled to a decision on the merits of the question and whatever relief may be appropriate if a violation indeed occurred"). Cf. Carr v. Saul, Nos. 19-1442, 20-105, slip op. at 2 (U.S. Apr. 22, 2021) (holding that petitioners, Social Security claimants, did not forfeit their Appointments Clause challenges by raising them for the first time in federal court and not before the administrative law judges who presided over their agency hearings).

[39] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal for additional discussion of the Bowsher decision.

[40] 478 U.S. 714, 717 (1986).

[41] Id. at 732.

concerning facts that affect the application of the Act [and] interpret the provisions of the Act to determine precisely what budgetary calculations are required."[42] The Comptroller enjoyed the final authority to determine budgetary cuts; and the President himself had to carry out the official's directives.[43] The Court concluded that these duties were executive in nature.[44] However, under a statute passed years before, only Congress could remove the Comptroller through a joint resolution.[45] The Court ruled that, by placing executive power in an officer that Congress itself controlled, the legislature had "intruded into the executive function" and violated the Constitution's separation of powers.[46]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.11 Principal and Inferior Officers

ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.1 Overview of Principal and Inferior Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Appointments Clause[1] establishes two tiers of officers:[2] (1) principal (or superior) officers, who must be appointed by the President with the Senate's advice and consent;[3] and (2)

[42] Id. at 733.

[43] Id.

[44] Id. at 732–33.

[45] The Comptroller could also have been removed through impeachment. Id. at 728.

[46] Id. at 734.

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] See United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 509 (1878) ("The Constitution for purposes of appointment very clearly divides all its officers into two classes.").

[3] See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 132 (1976) (per curiam) ("Principal officers are selected by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate."), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81. Although the Supreme Court has long used the term "principal officer" to describe the first category of officers subject to the Appointments Clause, the term itself derives, not from the Appointments Clause, but from the first clause of article II, section 2, which allows the President to require the written opinion of "the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments," on subjects relating to the duties of their respective offices. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1; NLRB v. SW Gen., Inc., No. 15-1251, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. Mar. 21, 2017) (Thomas, J., concurring) (noting that the Court has "long denominated" the noninferior officers referenced in the Appointments Clause "principal" officers (citing Germaine, 99 U.S. at 509, 511)); Germaine, 99 U.S. at 511 (noting that in the same section of the Constitution that contains the Appointments Clause, "the President may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, relating to the duties of their respective offices"); Tucker v. Comm'r, 135 T.C. 114, 122 (2010) (stating that "[t]he term 'principal officer' is not in the Appointments Clause but is borrowed from the immediately preceding clause (i.e., U.S. Const. art. II, sec. 2, cl. 1)"). Similarly, the Twenty-Fifth Amendment mentions the "principal officers of the executive departments. However, while the term "departments" is found in both clauses, it is unclear precisely how much relevance either provision has for interpreting the Appointments Clause." Compare Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 886 (1991) (concluding that the Court should interpret the meaning of "Heads of Departments" "consistently with its interpretation in other constitutional provisions" and ruling that the Tax Court was not a department), with id. at 915 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (arguing that the Tax Court is a Department because it is a "free-standing, self-contained entity in the Executive Branch"); Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Acct. Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 511 (2010) (adopting the reasoning of Justice Antonin Scalia's concurrence in Freytag and concluding that because the Securities and Exchange Commission "is a freestanding component of the Executive Branch, not subordinate to or contained within any other such component, it constitutes a 'Departmen[t]' for the purposes of the Appointments Clause"). Likewise, inferior officers, who must be appointed in the same manner unless Congress, by law, has vested their appointment in the President alone, in a court, or in a department head.[4] Both types of "officers" are those individuals who occupy positions that wield "significant authority."[5] The difference between the two is nevertheless important as the Constitution provides different requirements for their appointment. The Supreme Court has observed that the Framers provided "little guidance" into where the line between principal and inferior officers "should be drawn."[6] Accordingly, the Court has fashioned its own standards for distinguishing these officers which have evolved over time.

The focus of the Court's analysis in cases addressing the difference between principal and inferior officers has varied over time. The Court's early Appointments Clause cases did not present a clear picture of the differences between principal and inferior officers, often focusing on the method Congress prescribed for a given officer's appointment or the duration of an officer's tenure.[7] When questions concerning the principal-inferior officer distinction surfaced again in the second half of the twentieth century, the Court applied a functional, mulit-factor analysis, which emphasized that inferior officers, relative to principal officers, had more constrained duties and less discretion.[8] In 1997, the Court took a more formalist approach in defining the line between principal and inferior officers, holding that an inferior officer is one "whose work is directed and supervised at some level by others who were appointed by presidential nomination with the advice and consent of the Senate."[9] while the Opinions Clause includes the term "principal officer" and the Twenty-Fifth Amendment includes "principal officers," whether the substantive construction of either term is relevant to the Appointments Clause is unclear. See Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 722 (Scalia, J., dissenting) ("Even an officer who is subordinate to a department head can be a principal officer."); Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 667 (1997) (Souter, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (reasoning that an individual may be a principal officer even if he has a superior); NLRB v. SW Gen., Inc., slip op. at 1–2 (Thomas, J., concurring) (arguing that the general counsel of the NLRB may be a principal officer).

---

[4] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2; see also Edmond, 520 U.S. at 660 ("The prescribed manner of appointment for principal officers is also the default manner of appointment for inferior officers."). By default all "Officers of the United States"—both those specifically enumerated in the Clause (e.g., ambassadors) and "all other Officers . . . whose Appointments are not . . . otherwise provided for"—must be appointed by the President with the Senate's advice and consent, subject to Congress's power to vest the appointment of "such inferior Officers, as they think proper" in the President alone, the courts of law, or department heads. U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2; see also Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 126–27 (1926) ("[T]he appointment of all officers, whether superior or inferior, by the President is declared to be subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. . . . [T]he legislative power of Congress . . . is excluded save by the specific exception as to inferior offices in the clause that follows, viz, 'but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.'").

[5] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.10 Officer and Non-Officer Appointments. See also Freytag, 501 U.S. at 880–81 (examining the division between inferior officers and employees and analyzing the duties of particular inferior officers).

[6] Morrison, 487 U.S. at 671.

[7] The Court's early focus on who appointed an individual has led some courts and commentators to describe the Court's early Appointments Clause decisions as "circular." See Landry v. FDIC, 204 F.3d 1125, 1132–33 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (stating that "the earliest Appointments Clause cases often employed circular logic, granting officer status to an official based in part upon his appointment by the head of a department"); John M. Burkoff, Appointment and Removal Under the Federal Constitution: The Impact of Buckley v. Valeo, 22 WAYNE L. REV. 1335, 1347 (1976) (arguing that the Court's reasoning in its 1878 decision in United States v. Germaine "like much of the early law in this area, is entirely circular" because the Germaine Court had reasoned that a civil surgeon was an employee, not an inferior officer, because "none of the prescribed modes of appointment was used" in the surgeon's hiring). See United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 509 (1878).

[8] The Supreme Court's shift in focus to an official's duties and discretion is also reflected in the test the Court announced in Buckley for who constitutes an officer (rather than a mere employee) under the Appointments Clause: an officer is "any appointee exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81; see also ArtII.S2.C2.3.10 Officer and Non-Officer Appointments.

[9] Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 662–63 (1997). For more on the difference between functional and formalist approaches in separation of powers cases, see Intro.7.2 Separation of Powers Under the Constitution.

ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.2 Early Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

In cases arising in the nineteenth century and the early twentieth century, the Supreme Court—when it analyzed the issue at all—considered a range of factors in determining whether an official was a principal or an inferior officer, including who appointed the individual, the nature and purpose of the position established by Congress, the historical practice surrounding the appointment of such officials, and the practical consequences of requiring a particular method of appointment.[1] The following cases illustrate the Court's varied approaches to the question.

In Ex parte Hennen, the Supreme Court considered the authority of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana (Louisiana district court) to appoint, and later to remove, the clerk of that court.[2] The Court held that without question, "a clerk is one of the inferior officers contemplated by [the] provision" in the Appointments Clause allowing Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the courts of law.[3] The Court appeared to base its holding on the fact that Congress, through a series of statutes, established the Louisiana district court and directed the judge of that court to appoint a clerk.[4] In other words, Congress may have thought that clerks did not need to be appointed by the President because they did not constitute principal officers.

In Ex parte Siebold, the Supreme Court considered, among other issues, whether Congress had the authority to enact a law that required federal circuit courts to appoint election supervisors, who would monitor voting precincts within states where elections for congressional office were held. The challengers alleged that the election supervisors' duties were "entirely executive" (rather than judicial) in nature, so courts should not be permitted to appoint such officers.[5] The Court analyzed the constitutionality of the allegedly interbranch

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 510 (1878) (considering whether a civil surgeon appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions was an "Officer of the United States" by examining who appointed him and the nature of his employment); Rice v. Ames, 180 U.S. 371, 378 (1901) (holding that Congress had the authority to invest federal courts with the power to appoint "commissioners," whose position Congress created and "who are not judges in the constitutional sense"); see generally John M. Burkoff, Appointment and Removal Under the Federal Constitution: The Impact of Buckley v. Valeo, 22 Wayne L. Rev. 1335, 1349 n.61 (1976) (positing that "[a]t this point in our constitutional history, the Supreme Court was rather clearly deferring to established appointment practice rather than leading the way in defining on its own who were officers and who were not through the exercise of certain substantive duties").

[2] 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 230, 256–61 (1839).

[3] Id. at 258.

[4] Id. The Court noted that Louisiana was not a state when Congress first established federal district courts and authorized them to appoint clerks who would serve in both the district courts and the circuit courts located in those districts. Id. However, through subsequent laws concerning Louisiana (i.e., providing for a temporary government, admitting Louisiana into the Union, and including it in the circuit court system), Congress established the Louisiana district court and gave the judge of that court the authority to appoint a clerk for the district who would also serve as the circuit court clerk. Id. The Court ultimately held that although the Louisiana district court had appointed the petitioner as its clerk, the court's subsequent appointment of a different clerk and notice to the petitioner effected his removal from that office. Id. at 258–61.

[5] 100 U.S. 371, 397 (1879).

appointments on the apparent assumption that election supervisors were inferior officers.[6] The Court reasoned that although "[i]t is no doubt usual and proper to vest the appointment of inferior officers in that department of the government, executive or judicial, or in that particular executive department to which the duties of such officers appertain," the Constitution does not contain an "absolute requirement to this effect."[7]

Just before the turn of the century, in United States v. Eaton, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a statute allowing the President to "provide for the appointment of vice-consuls . . . in such manner and under such regulations as he shall deem proper," in view of the Appointments Clause's requirement of presidential nomination and Senate confirmation for the appointment of "consuls."[8] The Court held that vice-consuls, as defined in the statute, were inferior officers.[9] The Court looked to the nature of the office and noted that it was temporary and subordinate to other offices. In particular, the President could only appoint vice-consuls in temporary situations, when there was an absence or vacancy. Even though vice-consuls assumed the duties of their superior officers in those circumstances,[10] the Court reasoned that the delegation was "for a limited time and under special and temporary conditions," and thus did not "transform[ ]" the vice-consuls into principal officers.[11]

The Court also examined historical practices concerning the vice-consul position. The Court noted that while vice-consuls were nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate in "the earlier periods of the Government," those vice-consuls served as "permanent and in reality principal officers."[12] The Executive's prevailing practice in the case of consular office vacancies was to pay the acting officials as "de facto officers" for their temporary service, without requiring an appointment.[13] Finally, the Court expressed concern that "the discharge of administrative duties would be seriously hindered" if the Court invalidated "any and every delegation of power to an inferior to perform under any circumstances or exigency the duties of a superior officer."[14]

The Court thus concluded that the Appointments Clause's reference to "consuls" (who appear to qualify as principal officers) "does not embrace a subordinate and temporary office like that of vice-consul as defined in the statute."[15] Because vice-consuls qualified as inferior officers, Congress could place the power to appoint them with the President alone as provided in the Appointments Clause.

In its 1931 decision in Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, the Court determined that a United States commissioner was an inferior officer based on his relationship with the federal

---

[6] See id. (citing the portion of the Appointments Clause allowing Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President, the courts, or department heads).

[7] Id.; see also id. at 398 ("The observation in the case of Hennen . . . that the appointing power in the clause referred to 'was no doubt intended to be exercised by the department of the government to which the official to be appointed most appropriately belonged,' was not intended to define the constitutional power of Congress in this regard, but rather to express the law or rule by which it should be governed.").

[8] 169 U.S. 331, 336 (1898) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2; see also Eaton, 169 U.S. at 339, 343–44.

[9] Eaton, 169 U.S. at 343. The President subsequently delegated the appointment of vice-consuls, through regulations, to the Secretary of State. Id. at 337. The Eaton Court did not question the constitutionality of this delegation or the resulting method of appointment. See id. at 339, 343–44.

[10] Id. at 336–37, 339.

[11] Id. at 343.

[12] Id. at 343–44.

[13] Id. at 344.

[14] Id. at 343.

[15] Id.

district court that appointed him.[16] At that time, a federal statute authorized federal district courts to appoint commissioners, and authorized the commissioners to perform numerous functions, including making arrests, imposing pretrial imprisonment or bail, issuing warrants, and enforcing the arbitration awards of foreign consuls in certain disputes.[17] The Court held that, at least on the facts of the Go-Bart case, in considering the commissioner's ability to issue an arrest warrant and conducted an arraignment, the commissioner was an inferior officer.[18] The Court reasoned that all of the commissioner's acts "were preparatory and preliminary to a consideration of the charge by a grand jury and . . . [upon indictment,] the final disposition of the case in the district court."[19] In this regard, the Court reasoned, the commissioner "acted not as a court, or as a judge of any court, but as a mere officer of the district court in proceedings of which that court had authority to take control at any time."[20]

As the foregoing cases demonstrate, no clear line separated principal from inferior officers during this time.

ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.3 Modern Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

In the late twentieth century, in cases addressing the difference between principal and inferior officers, the Court began to emphasize the duties and discretion accompanying each office in a multi-factor analysis.[1]

In the 1988 case of Morrison v. Olson, the Court considered the constitutionality of the "independent counsel" provisions of the Ethics in Government Act.[2] The Act required the Attorney General to conduct a preliminary investigation into potential violations of certain federal criminal laws by certain high-ranking federal officials and to report his findings to a special court created by the act called the Special Division.[3] It also authorized the Special Division to appoint an independent counsel upon the Attorney General's application.[4]

In considering whether this independent counsel was a principal or an inferior officer, the Court declined to decide "exactly where the line falls" between the two types of officers.[5]

---

[16] 282 U.S. 344, 352–53 (1931).

[17] Id. at 353 n.2.

[18] Id. at 352 ("United States commissioners are inferior officers."); see also id. at 353–54 (declining to consider the relationship between the district court and its commissioners in "matters unlike that now before us").

[19] Id. at 354.

[20] Id.

[1] See, e.g., Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 194 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring) (concluding that military judges were inferior officers under the functional reasoning of Morrison). See supra Intro.7.2 Separation of Powers Under the Constitution.

[2] 487 U.S. 654, 659 (1988).

[3] Id. at 660–61.

[4] Id. at 661.

[5] Id. at 671.

However, in the Court's view, "several factors" placed the independent counsel squarely on the "'inferior officer' side of that line."[6] First, the Attorney General had the authority to remove the independent counsel, which suggested that the latter was "to some degree 'inferior' in rank and authority."[7] Second, Congress, through the Ethics in Government Act, limited the independent counsel's role to investigating and prosecuting specific federal crimes, granting him or her no authority to formulate federal policy or to exercise administrative duties apart from those necessary to operate this office.[8] Third, the Special Division defined and thereby circumscribed the independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction to a "limited" sphere.[9] And fourth, the independent counsel's office was temporary in that it terminated upon the conclusion of the investigation.[10] The Court held that "these factors relating to the 'ideas of tenure, duration . . . and duties' of the independent counsel are sufficient to establish that appellant is an 'inferior' officer in the constitutional sense."[11]

In Edmond v. United States, the Supreme Court considered whether judges of the Coast Guard Court of Criminal Appeals (Coast Guard Court) were principal or inferior officers in order to determine the constitutionality of the Secretary of Transportation's appointments of civilian judges to that court.[12] The Supreme Court began by observing that its cases up to that point had "not set forth an exclusive criterion for distinguishing between principal and inferior officers"[13] and that Coast Guard Court judges did not share all of the characteristics of officials previously held to be inferior officers.[14] For instance, the position of Coast Guard Court judge was not limited in tenure or jurisdiction in the same way as the independent counsel position deemed to be an inferior office in Morrison.[15] Although the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Coast Guard Court judges exercised "significant authority on behalf of the United States" (and were therefore officers), it held that such authority is a shared feature of inferior and principal officers and "marks, not the line between principal and inferior officer[s] . . . [but] the line between officer and non-officer."[16] Departing from its functional analysis in Morrison, the Court applied a more formal test—inferior officers are those "whose work is directed and supervised at some level by others who were appointed by presidential nomination with the advice and consent of the Senate."[17]

The Supreme Court proceeded to identify two entities that directed and supervised the Coast Guard Court judges' work.[18] The first, the Judge Advocate General, exercised

[6] Id.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 671–72.

[9] Id. at 661, 672.

[10] Id. at 672.

[11] Id. (internal citation omitted) (quoting United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 511 (1878)). The Court went on to hold that Congress had the authority to vest the power to appoint the independent counsel in the Special Division, a "specially created federal court," because the Appointments Clause allows Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in, among other entities, the "Courts of Law." Id. at 673–76.

[12] 520 U.S. 651, 658 (1997). At the time, the Coast Guard was situated within the Department of Transportation during times of peace. In 2002, Congress transferred the Coast Guard to the Department of Homeland Security for peacetime operations. Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135, 2249 (codified at 6 U.S.C. § 468(b)).

[13] Edmond, 520 U.S. at 661.

[14] See id.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 662 (citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976) (per curiam), superseded by statute, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81).

[17] Id. at 662–63. See Intro.7.2 Separation of Powers Under the Constitution.

[18] Edmond, 520 U.S. at 664.

"administrative oversight" over the court by prescribing procedural rules for the court and formulating policies applicable to appeals of court-martial cases.[19] The Judge Advocate General also had authority to remove Coast Guard Court judges from their judicial assignments at will.[20] The Supreme Court observed that the second entity exercising supervisory authority—the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (Appeals Court)—reviewed decisions of the Coast Guard Court in certain circumstances. In such cases, the Appeals Court deferred to the factual findings of the Coast Guard Court when there was "some competent evidence in the record to establish each element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt" but ultimately had the power to reverse the Coast Guard Court's decisions.[21] The Supreme Court held that in view of the supervisory roles of the Judge Advocate General and the Appeals Court, and notwithstanding the limitations on the latter's scope of review, the Coast Guard Court judges had "no power to render a final decision on behalf of the United States unless permitted to do so by other executive officers," and thus were inferior, not principal, officers.[22] Accordingly, the Court affirmed the validity of the Secretary of Transportation's civilian appointments to the Coast Guard Court.[23]

In 2010, the Supreme Court decided Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB or Board), a case centrally concerned with the constitutionality of limitations on the removal of members of the PCAOB, a board overseen by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and charged with, among other things, enforcing federal securities laws and promulgating professional accounting standards.[24] The Court first invalidated a statutory restriction on removing the PCAOB members, concluding that this good-cause removal protection violated Article II when combined with a second good-cause restriction on removing SEC members.[25] With this provision severed from the statute, the Court then rejected an additional constitutional challenge to the method of appointment of PCAOB members: the plaintiffs argued that, due to the significance of the duties the PCAOB members had, they were principal officers who must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.[26] The Court held, however, that the Board members were inferior, rather than principal, officers based on its reasoning in Edmond.[27] Specifically, the Court held that "[g]iven that the Commission is properly viewed, under the Constitution, as possessing the power to remove Board members at will, and given the Commission's other oversight authority, we have no hesitation in concluding that under Edmond the Board members are inferior officers."[28]

[19] Id.

[20] Id.

[21] Id. at 654–55.

[22] Id. at 655.

[23] Id. at 666.

[24] 561 U.S. 477, 485–86 (2010).

[25] The Court held that Congress could constitutionally limit the President's power to remove a principal officer at will in certain circumstances, and it could likewise limit a principal officer's power to remove an inferior officer at will, but it could not do both. Id. at 484, 495–96. Such "dual" limitations on removal were unconstitutional. Id. at 484, 492. For additional discussion of the Free Enterprise Fund decision as it relates to the removal of officers, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.7 Twenty-First Century Cases on Removal.

[26] Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 510. The Court held that the multi-member Commission is a department head for purposes of the Appointments Clause. Id. at 510–13.

[27] Id. at 510.

[28] Id. at 503–04 ("The Commission may, for example, approve the Board's budget, § 7219(b), issue binding regulations, §§ 7202(a), 7217(b)(5), relieve the Board of authority, § 7217(d)(1), amend Board sanctions, § 7217(c), or enforce Board rules on its own, §§ 7202(b)(1), (c).").

The Court considered the potential for review by a superior, Executive Branch official to be similarly critical in its 2021 decision in United States v. Arthrex, Inc..[29] Arthrex held that administrative patent judges' ability to render unreviewable decisions in certain proceedings, combined with protections against at-will removal, was "incompatible" with their appointment as inferior officers.[30] To remedy the constitutional defect, the Court ruled that the Director of the Patent and Trademark Office could review administrative patent judges' decisions unilaterally in the proceedings at issue, rendering "unenforceable" a particular statutory provision limiting the Director's review.[31]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.12 Departments Heads and Courts of Law

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

A related, recurring issue in the Court's Appointments Clause jurisprudence is the meaning of the terms "Heads of Departments" and "Courts of Law." For example, the Court in Freytag v. Commissioner analyzed whether the United States Tax Court was a "department" (headed by the Chief Judge) or a "court of law" in discussing the appointing authority for special trial judges of that court.[1] All nine Justices agreed that the Chief Judge could constitutionally appoint special trial judges, but they disagreed on the rationale. The five Justices in the majority opined that the Tax Court could not be a department because "departments" usually were denominated as such and headed by a cabinet officer.[2] The Court also observed that "[c]onfining the term 'Heads of Departments' . . . to executive divisions like the Cabinet-level departments constrains the distribution of the appointment power" because "Cabinet-level departments are limited in number and easily identified" and their heads "are subject to the exercise of political oversight and share the President's accountability to the people."[3] In the end, the Court sustained the challenged provision by holding that the Tax Court, as an Article I court, was a "Court of Law" within the meaning of the Appointments Clause.[4] The other four Justices would have held that the Tax Court, as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, was a "Department" for purposes of the Appointments Clause.[5]

The Court has also indicated that for purposes of the Appointments Clause, "Heads of Departments" can be understood more broadly than simply applying to the head of a traditional Cabinet-level agency. In Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the Court invalidated as unconstitutional the combination of two layers of [29] No. 19-1434 (U.S. June 21, 2021).

[30] Id. at 14.

[31] Id. at 22.

[1] Freytag v. Comm'r, 501 U.S. 868, 884 (1991).

[2] Id.

[3] Id. at 886

[4] Id. at 890–92.

[5] Id. at 901 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

removal protection for members of the PCAOB.[6] The underlying statute provided that PCAOB members could only be removed for cause by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). But the SEC members themselves could not be removed by the President except for cause. After invalidating the statutory removal protection for the PCAOB members, the Court ruled that appointment by the SEC of the PCAOB members was permissible under the Constitution.[7]

Because the Court had invalidated the removal protections for the PCAOB members, they were now removable at will by the SEC. And combined with the other oversight authority the SEC had over the PCAOB, according to its reasoning in Edmond v. United States, discussed earlier,[8] the Court concluded that the Board members were inferior officers eligible to be appointed by head of a department under the Appointments Clause.[9] Finally, the Court ruled that because the SEC "is a freestanding component of the Executive Branch, not subordinate to or contained within any other such component," the SEC members qualified as a "Head" of a "Department" under the Appointments Clause.[10]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.13 Changing the Duties of an Existing Officer

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Once an individual has been appointed to an office pursuant to the Appointments Clause, questions can arise concerning the circumstances in which an officer's duties may be altered after the officer's appointment. In the 1893 case of Shoemaker v. United States, the Court examined a statute that established a commission to oversee development of Rock Creek Park in the District of Columbia.[1] The Commission included two government officials who had already been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to other positions, but the plaintiffs argued that they needed to be separately appointed and confirmed in order to serve on the Commission.[2] They argued that while Congress may create offices, it may not circumvent the Appointments Clause by vesting additional powers in an existing officer. The Court ruled that because the officers in question had already been appointed through advice and consent, new duties "germane" to their offices could be assigned to them without a subsequent appointment and confirmation.[3] The Court rejected the appointments challenge because the new duties assigned to the officers were not "dissimilar to, or outside of the sphere

[6] See Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Acct. Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 484 (2010).

[7] Id. at 510–13.

[8] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.3 Modern Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers.

[9] Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 510.

[10] Id. at 511.

[1] 147 U.S. 282, 298–99 (1893).

[2] Id. at 300–01.

[3] Id.

of, their official duties."[4] Congress thus enjoys some discretion to "increase the power and duties of an existing office" without the necessity of a new appointment.[5]

Similarly, in the 1994 case of Weiss v. United States, the Court considered whether the selection of military judges to try criminal cases in the military justice system violated the Appointments Clause.[6] Like the commissioners in Shoemaker, the military judges were already appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate when they received their commissions as military officers.[7] Selection for the role of military judges was made by the Judge Advocate General for each of the military service branches.[8] The question in Weiss was whether serving as a military judge necessitated another appointment consistent with the Appointments Clause.[9] The Court distinguished the situation in Shoemaker. Shoemaker's germaneness test, the Court explained, helped to "ensure that Congress was not circumventing the Appointments Clause by unilaterally appointing an incumbent to a new and distinct office."[10] Unlike in Shoemaker where Congress had assigned specific, incumbent officers to new roles, here Congress had authorized the selection of an "indefinite number" of military judges "from among hundreds or perhaps thousands" of qualified commissioned officers.[11] Thus, in Weiss, the Court found "no ground for suspicion" that "Congress was trying to both create an office and also select a particular individual to fill" that office.[12]

Further, even if Shoemaker's germaneness standard applied, the Court concluded that the test was nevertheless satisfied in Weiss.[13] All military officers, the Court reasoned, "play a role in the operation of the military justice system," as they are authorized to impose punishments and act as a summary court-martial or president of a court-martial without a judge.[14] In the Court's view, the military judge position is less distinct from other positions in the military than a judge in civilian society is from other civilian offices. Unless detailed to a court-martial, military judges have no more authority than another commissioned military officer.[15] The Court concluded that the Appointments Clause did not require a separate appointment for military officers to the position of military judge.[16]

The Constitution thus does not give Congress unfettered discretion to augment the powers of existing offices. However, it may permit Congress to add duties that are germane to an office or to make an existing category of officers eligible for a new assignment akin to their existing duties, without requiring a new appointment. Given the paucity of case law on these issues, there may be limits that have not received extensive treatment by the Supreme Court. For instance, the Court has not had occasion to squarely address the hypothetical situation where

---

[4] Id. at 301.

[5] Id.

[6] 510 U.S. 163, 165–69 (1994).

[7] Id. at 170.

[8] Id. at 168–69. The Court declined to rule on the constitutionality of a statutory provision authorizing the selection of civilians as military judges as that issue was not presented here, as the relevant military judges were military officers. Id. at 170 n.4. See 10 U.S.C. § 866(a)(1).

[9] Weiss, 510 U.S. at 165.

[10] Id. at 174.

[11] Id.

[12] Id.

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 175–76.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 176. See also Ortiz v. United States, No. 16-1423 (U.S. June 22, 2018) (rejecting the argument that a military judge's dual service on the military Court of Criminal Appeals (CCA) and the Court of Military Commission Review (CMCR) violated the Appointments Clause).

Congress grants additional duties to an inferior officer (who was not subject to Senate advice and consent) such that the new duties transform the position to that of a principal officer.[17]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.14 Interbranch Appointments

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Appointments Clause provides that Congress may vest the appointment of inferior officers with the President alone, department heads, or the courts of law.[1] Both the Executive and Judicial Branches may thus be vested with authority to appoint inferior officers, as that term has been understood by the Supreme Court.[2] One recurring issue in litigation in this area has been whether Congress may authorize one branch of government to appoint inferior officers in another branch. For instance, may Congress entrust the courts of law with the power to appoint officers in the Executive Branch? The Supreme Court first squarely addressed the issue in the 1879 case of Ex parte Siebold, which examined the constitutionality of placing the power to appoint election supervisors—officers whose duties were allegedly "entirely executive in character"—with the Circuit Courts.[3] At issue was whether the Constitution permits "the courts of the United States to appoint officers whose duties are not connected with the judicial department."[4] The Supreme Court noted that the Constitution included no "absolute requirement" that Congress vest the "appointment of inferior officers in that department of the government . . . to which the duties of such officers pertain."[5] The Court reasoned that there was no "incongruity" between the judicial function and the appointment of election supervisors.[6] Therefore, the Court ruled, the interbranch appointment by the Judiciary of election supervisors did not violate the Constitution.

Likewise, the 1987 Supreme Court case of Young v. United States ex rel. Vuitton et Fils S.A. affirmed the inherent power of the Judiciary to appoint individuals to prosecute certain [17] See generally Weiss, 510 U.S. at 182–83 (Souter, J., concurring) (explaining that such a situation, though not presented in the case, would violate the Constitution).

---

[1] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.1 Overview of Principal and Inferior Officers to ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.3 Modern Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers.

[3] 100 U.S. 371, 397–99 (1879).

[4] Id. at 397. The Court distinguished a prior case, Ex parte Hennen, which stated that the appointment power "was no doubt intended to be exercised by the department of the government to which the official to be appointed most appropriately belonged," 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 230, 258 (1839), as "not intended to define the constitutional power of Congress in this regard, but rather to express the law or rule by which it should be governed." Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. at 398.

[5] Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. at 397.

[6] Id. at 398. The Court also appeared to approve of the judicial appointment of United States commissioners, who were granted certain executive powers by Congress, in Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 344, 353–54, 353 n.2 (1931). See Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 676 (1988) (describing the Court's decision in Go-Bart as "approv[ing] [the] court appointment of United States commissioners, who exercised certain limited prosecutorial powers").

crimes—namely, contempt proceedings.[7] In that case, a federal district court appointed private attorneys to prosecute the defendants in a criminal contempt proceeding for violating a judicial injunction.[8] The Court ultimately reversed the convictions because those private attorneys represented the beneficiary of the injunction and were thus unable to function as disinterested prosecutors on behalf of the government.[9] However, it first expounded on the inherent power of the Judiciary to appoint private attorneys to prosecute criminal contempt proceedings.[10] Although the power of prosecution is traditionally an executive function, the Judiciary nevertheless retains the inherent power to appoint attorneys to prosecute a contempt action in order to "vindicate" the Judiciary's authority to "enforce orders and to punish acts of disobedience."[11] The Court reasoned that a court's power to initiate prosecutions for contempt was not limited to punishing "in-court contempts that interfere with the judicial process," but included "out-of-court contempt[s], which require prosecution by a party other than the court."[12]

One year later in 1988, the Supreme Court also upheld Congress's power to vest the appointment of an independent prosecutor with the Judiciary. In Morrison v. Olson,[13] the Court considered the constitutionality of the independent counsel statute,[14] which required the Attorney General to apply in certain circumstances to a Special Division of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit for the appointment of an independent counsel.[15] The Special Division was composed of three federal judges[16] and enjoyed final authority to appoint and define the jurisdiction of an independent counsel, who would investigate and prosecute crimes committed by certain Executive Branch officials as well as individuals connected to presidential campaign committees.[17] In considering a challenge to Congress's authority to vest the appointment of the independent counsel outside the Executive Branch, the Court observed that the text of the Constitution appeared to give Congress broad discretion in choosing whether to place the appointment of inferior officers with the Judiciary, department heads, or the President.[18] Further, the Court noted that its prior decision in Siebold rejected a requirement that the appointment of inferior officers be vested in the specific branch of government to which the duties of those officers relate.[19] The Court explained that its prior decision in Vuitton had recognized a court's inherent power to appoint private attorneys to prosecute criminal contempt proceedings. The Court also noted with approval Congress's vestment of power with district courts to make interim appointments of United States Attorneys.[20] In light of these considerations, combined with the fact that the independent counsel statute barred judges of the Special Division from participating in any judicial [7] 481 U.S. 787, 793–801 (1987). See also 28 U.S.C. § 546(d) (authorizing district courts to appoint United States attorneys to fill vacancies in certain situations).

[8] 481 U.S. at 789–92.

[9] Id. at 803–14.

[10] Id. at 793–801.

[11] Id. at 796 (quoting Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 450 (1911)).

[12] Id. at 797.

[13] 487 U.S. 654 (1988).

[14] 28 U.S.C. §§ 591–599.

[15] Id. §§ 591–593. For more on Morrison v. Olson, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal.

[16] 28 U.S.C. §§ 49, 593.

[17] Id. § 593.

[18] Morrison, 487 U.S. at 673–74.

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 676–77; see 28 U.S.C. § 546.

proceeding concerning matters that involve an independent counsel they appointed, the appointment of the independent counsel by the Judiciary did not infringe upon "the constitutional limitation on 'incongruous' interbranch appointments."[21]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15 Removals

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.1 Overview of Removal of Executive Branch Officers

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Appointments Clause delineates the method of appointment for "Officers of the United States." Other provisions of the Constitution indicate that both judges and Executive Officers may be removed through impeachment;[1] and both may also voluntarily retire from their positions.[2] However, while the Constitution elsewhere provides that judicial officers maintain their office for life,[3] it is silent as to the tenure for Executive Branch officers.[4] Historical practice and judicial decisions acknowledge that the President is empowered to remove those officers he appoints without assent from Congress.[5] Congress has, however, historically enacted legislation that shields certain Executive Branch officials from removal except for cause, although exactly which types of officials may be protected is not settled definitively. Even for those officers who may be protected from at-will removal, Congress's ability to insulate them from presidential control is not unlimited; for instance, Congress generally may not impose two layers of removal protection on a specific office (i.e., Congress may not provide that an inferior officer may only be removed for cause if his superior officer is also protected by a for-cause removal provision).[6] As explained infra, in examining statutory protections from removal for Executive Branch officers, the Court has sometimes applied a formalist approach to interpreting the Constitution, stressing the importance of the text's division of powers

[21] Morrison, 487 U.S. at 677.

[1] See ArtII.S4.1 Overview of Impeachment Clause.

[2] See Mimmack v. United States, 97 U.S. 426, 436–37 (1878).

[3] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[4] Id. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[5] The assent of the Senate is required when an individual's appointment to an office serves to replace an existing principal officer. In that case, the prior officer is removed through the new appointment. Blake v. United States, 103 U.S. 227, 230, 237 (1880) ("It results that the appointment of Gilmore, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to the office held by Blake, operated in law to supersede the latter, who thereby, in virtue of the new appointment, ceased to be an officer in the army from and after, at least, the date at which that appointment took effect . . . ."); Keyes v. United States, 109 U.S. 336, 339 (1883); Mullan v. United States, 140 U.S. 240, 246–247 (1891); Wallace v. United States, 257 U.S. 541, 545 (1922). This principle does not extend to Article III judges, who enjoy life tenure. See Auth. of the President to Prospectively Appoint a Sup. Ct. Justice, 46 Op. O.L.C. 1, 1–2 (2022). In addition, the lawful appointment of a new inferior officer by the proper appointing authority can serve to remove the prior inferior officer from his position. Ex parte Hennen, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 230, 261 (1839) ("The power vested in the Court was a continuing power; and the mere appointment of a successor would, per se, be a removal of the prior incumbent, so far at least as his rights were concerned.").

[6] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.7 Twenty-First Century Cases on Removal.

among the three branches.[7] At other times it has applied a more functional analysis, giving Congress more room to design agencies as long as the broad background principle of a balance of power between the branches is respected.[8]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.2 Decision of 1789 and Removals in Early Republic

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

While the Constitution provides that federal judges shall retain their "offices during good behavior," which the Court has interpreted to mean that judges are entitled to life tenure absent resignation or impeachment,[1] it does not expressly specify how long Executive Branch officers may remain in office (although they may retire and are subject to impeachment).[2] The Framers' understanding of the removal power—regarding both who wields the power to remove Executive Branch officers as well as the circumstances in which they may be removed—is not clear from the records of the Constitutional Convention or other contemporaneous documents.[3] However, a major debate and decision of the First Congress on the matter, commonly known as the "Decision of 1789," has informed the Nation's understanding of where the removal power is placed,[4] although scholars and judges disagree

---

[7] See, e.g., Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Fin. Prot. Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. at 11 (U.S. June 29, 2020) ("The entire 'executive Power' belongs to the President alone."). For more on the difference between functional and formalist approaches in separation of powers cases, see Intro.7.2 Separation of Powers Under the Constitution.

[8] See, e.g., Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 689–90 (1988) ("The analysis contained in our removal cases is designed not to define rigid categories of those officials who may or may not be removed at will by the President, but to ensure that Congress does not interfere with the President's exercise of the "executive power" and his constitutionally appointed duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed" under Article II."); see John F. Manning, Separation of Powers As Ordinary Interpretation, 124 Harv. L. Rev. 1939, 1952 (2011).

[1] See Wellness Int'l Network, Ltd. v. Sharif, 575 U.S. 665, 668 (2015) (describing "the protections of Article III" enjoyed by federal judges as including "life tenure and pay that cannot be diminished").

[2] Compare U.S. Const. art. III, § 1 (federal judges) with id. art. II, § 2, cl. 2 (officers generally).

[3] For instance, courts and scholars have debated the significance of Alexander Hamilton's understanding, expressed in the Federalist Papers, of the scope of the President's removal power and the role of the Senate in removal decisions. See The Federalist No. 77 (Alexander Hamilton) (appearing to argue that the President would require Senate consent under the Constitution to remove Executive Branch officers); Alexander Hamilton, Pacificus No. I (June 29, 1793), in 4 The Works of Alexander Hamilton 432, 439 (Henry C. Lodge ed., 1971); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 136–37 (1926) (majority opinion) (arguing that Hamilton originally believed that Senate consent was required to remove Executive Branch officers, but that he later changed his mind); id. at 293 & n.86 (Brandeis, J., dissenting) (noting Hamilton's position in the Federalist No. 77); Seth Barrett Tillman, The Puzzle of Hamilton's Federalist No. 77, 33 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 149, 151 (2010) (arguing against the "standard or consensus view . . . that Hamilton was speaking to removal, [which] has been adopted by Supreme Court majorities and dissents, lower federal courts, and by academics in law and in other fields"); Jeremy D. Bailey, The New Unitary Executive and Democratic Theory: The Problem of Alexander Hamilton, 102 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 453, 458 (2008) ("If Hamilton is the father of the unitary executive, why did he write in The Federalist that the president would share the removal power with the Senate?").

[4] Saikrishna Prakash, New Light on the Decision of 1789, 91 Cornell L. Rev. 1021, 1022 (2006) ("One of the most significant yet less-well-known constitutional law decisions is the 'Decision of 1789.'"); Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 23 (1994) (noting the "great debate about the President's removal powers that occurred when the first Congress created the first departments in the new government—a debate known as the Decision of 1789").

about the best understanding of that decision.[5] The implications of the Decision of 1789 are particularly important because the Supreme Court has made clear that the views of the First Congress are "weighty evidence" of the Constitution's meaning since many of the Framers were elected to that body.[6]

The Decision of 1789 concerns the debate in the First Congress over whether the Constitution authorizes the President to remove Executive Branch officers unilaterally.[7] On May 19, 1789, Representative Elias Boudinot proposed establishing the executive departments of the Treasury, War, and Foreign Affairs;[8] Representative James Madison subsequently proposed that the Secretaries of these Departments be removable by the President alone.[9] The House debated the issue for over a month,[10] focusing in particular on whether the President enjoyed power under the Constitution to remove government officers absent legislation specifically authorizing him to do so.[11] Congress eventually passed bills for each department that removed any explicit mention of removal authority, but provided that a lower-level department official would take custody of the department's records whenever the department head "shall be removed from office by the President of the United States" or in any other case of a vacancy.[12]

The Supreme Court has cited the Decision of 1789 a number of times as congressional acknowledgment that Congress does not possess a direct role in the removal process.[13] There is some dispute over whether a majority of legislators affirmed that the Constitution vests the President with removal authority, or whether no majority actually supported a specific position on the issue.[14] Still, early historical practice confirms that the President's power to appoint Executive Branch officers includes authority to remove them. In the 1926 case of Myers v. United States, the Supreme Court opined that the Decision of 1789 affirmed that the President is entrusted with power to remove those officers he appoints, a proposition that "was soon accepted as a final decision of the question by all branches of the government."[15]

The Nation's first two Presidents, George Washington and John Adams, each unilaterally removed Executive Branch officers, although neither of them removed a large number of [5] See Prakash, supra note 4, at 1023–25 (describing different understandings of the debate espoused by scholars and judges). Compare Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 114 (1926) (Taft, J.) ("[T]here is not the slightest doubt, after an examination of the record, that the vote was, and was intended to be, a legislative declaration that the power to remove officers appointed by the President and the Senate vested in the President alone, and until the Johnson impeachment trial in 1868 its meaning was not doubted, even by those who questioned its soundness."), and 5 John Marshall, The Life of George Washington 200 (1807), with David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801, at 41 (1997) (arguing that "there was no consensus" in the House regarding whether the President received the removal power from "Congress or the Constitution itself"), and 1 Corwin on the Constitution 332 (Richard Loss ed., 1981).

[6] Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 723 (1986) (quoting Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 790 (1983)); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 146 (1926).

[7] See Josh Chafetz, Congress's Constitution, Legislative Authority and the Separation of Powers 100 (2017); Jerry L. Mashaw, Recovering American Administrative Law: Federalist Foundations, 1787–1801, 115 Yale L.J. 1256, 1282–89 (2006). For a record of the debate in Congress, see 1 Annals of Cong. 384–412, 473–608, 614–31, 635–39 (1789).

[8] 1 Annals of Cong. 368–69 (1789).

[9] 1 Annals of Cong. 371 (1789).

[10] Currie, supra note 5, at 36.

[11] Currie, supra note 5, at 36–41.

[12] See Act of Jul. 27, 1789, ch. 4, § 2, 1 Stat. 28, 29; Act of Sept. 2, 1789, ch. 12, § 7, 1 Stat. 65, 67; Act of Aug. 7, 1789, ch. 7, § 2, 1 Stat. 49, 50.

[13] See, e.g., Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 723 (1986); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 146 (1926); Parsons v. United States, 167 U.S. 324, 338–43 (1897).

[14] Chafetz, supra note 7, at 100–01; Prakash, supra note 4, at 1023–25.

[15] 272 U.S. 52, 136 (1926).

officials.[16] President Thomas Jefferson, although initially considered an opponent of a powerful Executive, likewise exercised this power, removing more officials than either Washington or Adams.[17] Presidents James Madison, James Monroe, and John Quincy Adams also exercised the power of removal over Executive Branch officers, although they appear to have each removed a smaller number than Jefferson.[18] This historical practice of presidential removal of Executive Branch officers was reinforced by Attorney General opinions affirming the President's constitutional power to do so.[19] Congress, however, asserted some control over the tenure of certain Executive Branch positions. During the Administration of President Monroe, Congress passed the Tenure of Office Act of 1820, which provided that certain Executive Officers be appointed for a term of four years, "but shall be removable from office at pleasure."[20]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.3 Removals in Jacksonian America Through the Nineteenth Century

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

While the first six Presidents of the young Republic exercised the power of removal over Executive Branch officers on a somewhat limited basis, President Andrew Jackson replaced more officials than all Presidents before him combined.[1] He instituted what was commonly known as the "spoils system," wherein a new presidential administration would remove a large number of federal officials and replace them with supporters.[2] Jackson embraced the Tenure of Office Act of 1820[3] and argued that "rotation in office" would improve government operations and serve a democratizing function that would curb the importance of privilege in

---

[16] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1537 (1833).

[17] Story, supra note 16, § 1537; Steven G. Calabresi & Christopher S. Yoo, The Unitary Executive During the First Half-Century, 47 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 1451, 1478–95, 1499–1501 (1997); Leonard D. White, The Federalists: A Study in Administrative History 285–88 (1948).

[18] Story, supra note 16, § 1537; Calabresi & Yoo, supra note 17, at 1507–26; Leonard D. White, The Jeffersonians: A Study in Administrative History 1801–1829, at 379–80 (1951).

[19] See, e.g., Dismission of a Paymaster Under Act of 1823, 2 Op. Att'ys Gen. 67 (1828) ("Mr. Clark held his commission as paymaster during the pleasure of the President; and the power of the President to dismiss him, at pleasure, is not disputed.").

[20] Act of May 15, 1820, ch. 102, § 1, 3 Stat. 582, 582.

[1] Daniel Walker Howe, What Hath God Wrought: The Transformation of America, 1815–1848 at 331–34 (2007); Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Appointments Process 52–53 (2003) [hereinafter Gerhardt, Appointments]; Carl R. Fish, The Civil Service and the Patronage 74 (1905). It appears that although President Jackson removed more officers than all his predecessors had combined, due to the smaller size of government at the time, President Jefferson removed a larger percentage of federal officers. Paul P. Van Riper, History of the United States Civil Service 30, 34–36 (1958); Steven G. Calabresi & Christopher S. Yoo, The Unitary Executive During the First Half-Century, 47 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 1451, 1533 (1997).

[2] Howe, supra note 1, at 333–34; Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., The Age of Jackson 46–47 (1945).

[3] Gerhardt, Appointments, supra note 1, at 52–53.

governmental offices.[4] Perhaps most famously, amidst conflict with Congress over the status of the Second Bank of the United States, Jackson dismissed Treasury Secretary William Duane.[5] Duane had effectively refused to withdraw federal monies from the Bank as instructed by President Jackson, so he was replaced by Roger Taney, who did.[6] A major fight with Congress ensued, and the Senate eventually passed a resolution in 1834 condemning Jackson's actions.[7] Congress did not, however, reverse Jackson's decision or pass legislation preventing such action in the future. Following a change in party control, the Senate expunged the prior censure in 1837.[8]

Presidents that followed Jackson largely continued the practice of removing Executive Branch officers, although their stated reasons for doing so varied. For example, President Martin Van Buren, who succeeded Jackson in office, continued the spoils system, removing Executive Branch officers at will and replacing them with party loyalists.[9] In contrast, the Nation's ninth president, William Henry Harrison, who had defeated Van Buren in 1841 and became the first Whig elected president, pledged not to replace Executive Branch officers for political reasons. Though Harrison died within a month after his inauguration, his brief record is somewhat mixed on the matter.[10] Harrison was succeeded by his Vice President John Tyler.[11] Although Tyler initially vowed, consistent with Harrison's Whig principles, not to remove Executive Branch officials for partisan reasons, he quickly did exactly that during his nearly four full years in office.[12] Opinions from his Attorney General issued during Tyler's time in office affirmed presidential removal authority in opinions that have informed subsequent practice and consideration of the removal power.[13] Attorney General Hugh S. Legare argued that, following the Decision of 1789, the whole country had acquiesced to the power of the President to remove Executive Branch officers.[14] One year later, he reaffirmed this conviction, noting that "Whatever I might have thought of the power of removal from office, if the subject were res integra, it is now too late to dispute the settled construction of 1789."[15] Likewise, President Zachary Taylor, also a member of the Whig party, removed nearly two-thirds of the prior President James Polk's appointees in his first year in office.[16]

The scope of the President's removal authority was at the center of the first impeachment of a United States President.[17] Congress on March 2, 1867 reauthorized (and amended), over [4] Andrew Jackson, First Annual Message (Dec. 8, 1829), in 3 A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents 309, 310 (James D. Richardson ed., 1897); Calabresi & Yoo, supra note 1, at 1478–95, 1531–32; Howe, supra note 1, at 333–34. It appears that Presidents Jefferson and Monroe also embraced rotation in office. Michael J. Gerhardt, Forgotten Presidents 32 (2013) [hereinafter Gerhardt, Forgotten].

[5] Howe, supra note 1, at 373–92; Calabresi & Yoo, supra note 1, at 1538–59.

[6] Howe, supra note 1, at 388.

[7] 10 Reg. Deb. 58 (1833); 10 Reg. Deb. 1187 (1834). See Claude G. Bowers, The Party Battles of the Jackson Period 330 (1965).

[8] 13 Reg. Deb. 504–05 (1837); Calabresi & Yoo, supra note 1, at 1558–59; see United States Senate, Party Division, https://www.senate.gov/history/partydiv.htm (last visited June 27, 2022).

[9] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 18–19; Leonard D. White, The Jacksonians: A Study in Administrative History, 1829–1861, at 309 (1954).

[10] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 31–33; White, supra note 9, at 311.

[11] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 37–45. Tyler was initially a member of the Democratic party, but left and was elected on the newly-formed Whig ticket. He was expelled from the Whigs after vetoing a legislative bill. Id.

[12] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 50–51.

[13] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 50–51.

[14] Power of President to Fill Vacancies, 3 Op. Att'ys Gen. 673, 673–76 (1841).

[15] Military Power of the President to Dismiss From Serv., 4 Op. Att'ys Gen. 1, 1–2 (1842).

[16] Gerhardt, Forgotten, supra note 4, at 74; Gerhardt, Appointments, supra note 1, at 52–55.

[17] See ArtII.S4.4.4 President Andrew Johnson and Impeachable Offenses.

the veto of President Andrew Johnson, the Tenure of Office Act.[18] That law provided that Executive Branch officers who had been Senate-confirmed (as well as future such officers) were entitled to remain in their position until a replacement was confirmed.[19] The law also provided that certain positions would retain their offices for the full term of the President who appointed them, plus one month thereafter, unless the Senate consented to their removal.[20] Johnson subsequently fired his Secretary of War Edwin Stanton without Senate approval. On February 24, 1868, the House voted to impeach President Johnson.[21] An important point of contention at the trial in the Senate was whether the Tenure of Office Act protected Stanton at all due to his appointment by President Abraham Lincoln, rather than President Johnson.[22] The Senate ultimately failed to convict President Johnson by one vote on three different articles, and it failed to vote on the remaining eight.[23] The Tenure of Office Act of 1867 was amended in 1869[24] and requirements concerning Senate approval for removal were repealed in 1887.[25]

By the end of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court affirmed that the President enjoyed the sole power of removal over Executive Branch officers.[26] In the 1897 case of Parsons v. United States, the Court concluded that the President was authorized to remove a U.S. attorney, even though the Tenure of Office Act of 1820 provided that the term of appointment was four years.[27] The Court reasoned that the Decision of 1789 and consistent government practice since indicated that the President enjoys the power of removal.[28] It thus interpreted the statute to establish that a term of office expired after four years, but did not bar the President from removing a U.S. attorney before that time.[29] Likewise, in 1903, the Court in Shurtleff v. United States reaffirmed this understanding of the President's power.[30] That case concerned a suit for back pay by a Senate-confirmed Executive Branch official who was removed without notice or a hearing. The statute establishing the officer's position provided that the President could remove him "for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office."[31] The Court concluded that while notice and a hearing might be required when an officer is removed for the reasons specified in the statute, the President also had authority to remove the officer for other reasons entirely and, in those circumstances, was not required to [18] Tenure of Office Act, ch. 154, 14 Stat. 430 (1867).

[19] Id.

[20] Id.

[21] Cong. Globe, 40th Cong. 2d Sess., 1400 (1868).

[22] William H. Rehnquist, Grand Inquests: The Historic impeachments of Justice Samuel Chase and President Andrew Johnson 221 (1992).

[23] 3 Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives § 2443 (1907); see Rehnquist, supra note 22, at 234–35.

[24] See Act of Apr. 5, 1869, ch. 10, §§ 1–2, 16 Stat. 6, 6–7. See Rev. Stat. 1767 (1875) ("Every person holding any civil office . . . by and with the advice and consent of the Senate . . . shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless" removed with Senate consent or replaced with Senate consent).

[25] Act of Mar. 3, 1887, ch. 353, 24 Stat. 500.

[26] Parsons v. United States, 167 U.S. 324, 338–43 (1897). The Court in 1886 affirmed the authority of Congress to restrict the removal of inferior officers by the head of a department for cause. United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483, 485 (1886).

[27] Parsons, 167 U.S. at 338–43.

[28] Id. at 338–39.

[29] Id.

[30] 189 U.S. 311 (1903).

[31] Id. at 313.

provide such procedural protection.[32] The Court thus rejected the suit because the President removed the officer for reasons other than those mentioned in the statute.[33]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.4 Removals in the 1920s

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Congress's authority to restrict the President's power to remove Executive Branch officers was squarely addressed by the Supreme Court in the 1926 case of Myers v. United States.[1] Myers concerned a postmaster who was removed from office in violation of a statute providing that postmasters could only be removed with the Senate's consent.[2] Chief Justice William Taft, a former President, writing for the Court in an opinion that took a formalist approach to the separation of powers, espoused a broad view of the President's authority under Article II.[3] His opinion examined the history of removals of Executive Branch officials as well as the constitutional text, and concluded that Article II's vestment of executive power in the President bestowed on him "the general administrative control of those executing the laws,"[4] including the "exclusive power of removal."[5] The Chief Justice described the Decision of 1789 at length, concluding that the First Congress had determined that "the power of appointment carried with it the power of removal," a rule that was "acquiesce[d] [to] for nearly three-quarters of a century by all branches of the government."[6] Congress had, Chief Justice Taft noted, disrupted this understanding by passing the Tenure of Office Act in 1867—which required Senate approval to remove Executive Branch officials and resulted in the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson—but, in the view of the Court, the Executive Branch never acquiesced to this assertion of power.[7]

The Court in Myers reasoned that Article II's vestment of executive power in the President authorized him to select subordinate officers and direct them in executing the law; and just as it was "essential" to select officers to execute the law, "so must be his power of removing those for whom he cannot continue to be responsible."[8] In the Court's reading of the Constitution, the grant of the executive power to the President, supplemented by the duty to take care that the law is faithfully executed, meant that executive power includes "the exclusive power of [32] Id. at 315–19.

[33] Id.

[1] 272 U.S. 52 (1926). See Ex parte Hennen, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 230, 261 (1839) (concluding that courts authorized to appoint their own clerks also were empowered to remove them).

[2] Myers, 272 U.S. at 106–07. The case was brought by the postmaster's intestate and sought backpay. Id.

[3] Id. at 131–77.

[4] Id. at 163–64 ("[T]o hold otherwise would make it impossible for the President, in case of political or other differences with the Senate or Congress, to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.").

[5] Id. at 122.

[6] Id. at 119, 148.

[7] Id. at 166–71.

[8] Id. at 117.

removal."[9] The Court thus invalidated the statute before it insofar as the law denied to the President "the unrestricted power of removal" of Executive Branch officers.[10]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.5 Removals in the 1930s

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Nine years after its decision in Myers v. United States, in which the Court invalidated a statute that prohibited the President from removing an executive official absent Senate approval,[1] the Supreme Court applied a much more functionalist approach in its analysis in another case addressing Congress's authority to restrict the President's removal authority.[2] In the 1935 case of Humphrey's Executor v. United States, the Court upheld a statute that limited the President's power to remove a Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC).[3] The statute in question provided that a Commissioner could be removed for "inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office."[4] The Commissioner's estate brought suit seeking backpay after President Franklin Roosevelt dismissed him.[5] In an opinion by Justice George Sutherland, the Court ruled that the President violated the statute because the law's specification of reasons for removal was meant to be exclusive and he did not base his removal of the Commissioner on any of the grounds listed in the statute.[6] The Court distinguished its prior decision in Shurtleff

[9] Id. at 122.

[10] Id. at 176.

[1] 272 U.S. 52 (1926).

[2] John F. Manning, Separation of Powers As Ordinary Interpretation, 124 Harv. L. Rev. 1939, 1952 (2011) (describing the Court in Humphrey's Executor as "using functionalist reasoning to sustain independent regulatory agencies").

[3] 295 U.S. 602 (1935). It appears that the only instances of a President expressly removing an officer with for-cause protection after notice, a hearing, and finding that the statutory reasons for removal were met occurred in late 1912 and early 1913 when President Taft removed two members of the Board of General Appraisers. See Aditya Bamzai, Taft, Frankfurter, and the First Presidential For-Cause Removal, 52 U. Rich. L. Rev. 691, 691–737 (2018). President Richard Nixon removed Raymond Lapin from his position as President of the Federal National Mortgage Association for "good cause," but without conducting a hearing for articulating what behavior constituted that cause. Id. at 746–47. Lapin brought suit challenging the action but eventually dropped his challenge. Id. Following the Supreme Court's 2021 decision in Collins v. Yellen, in which the Court ruled that a statutory removal protection for an agency with a single director was unconstitutional, President Biden removed the heads of two other agencies that had similar structural features and protection. See Matthew Goldstein et al., Biden Removes Chief of Housing Agency After Supreme Court Ruling, N.Y. Times (June 23, 2021), https://www.nytimes.com/2021/06/23/us/biden-housing-agency-supreme-court.html; Andrew Ackerman & Brent Kendall, Biden Administration Removes Fannie, Freddie Overseer After Court Ruling, Wall St. J. (June 23, 2021), https://www.wsj.com/articles/supreme-court-issues-mixed-ruling-on-government-seizure-of-fannie-freddie-profits-11624459222. Jim Tankersley, Biden Fires Trump Appointee as Head of Social Security Administration, N.Y. Times (July 9, 2021), https://www.nytimes.com/2021/07/09/business/biden-social-security-administration.html; Andrew Restuccia & Richard Rubin, Biden Ousts Social Security Chief, Wall St. J. (July 9, 2021), https://www.wsj.com/articles/biden-ousts-social-security-chief-11625871710.

[4] See 15 U.S.C. § 41.

[5] Humphrey's Ex'r, 295 U.S. at 618–19.

[6] Id. at 625–26.

v. United States, which interpreted a statutory list of grounds for removal not to be exclusive,[7] noting that while FTC Commissioners in Humphrey's Executor were appointed to a specific term of office, the officer in Shurtleff had no such restriction on his tenure.[8] In addition, the Court observed that Congress intended the Commission to be nonpartisan and not subject to the direction of the President.[9]

Turning to the constitutionality of limiting the President's power of removal, the Court read its recent decision in Myers narrowly to establish only that Congress could not condition the President's power to remove an Executive Branch officer on Senate approval.[10] Because the statute before it did not do that, it did not run afoul of Myers. The Court determined that the officer in that case, a postmaster, was charged solely with executive functions, whereas the office of an FTC Commissioner was tasked with "quasi-legislative" and "quasi-judicial" functions. The Commission was not "an arm or an eye of the executive" and it "must be free from executive control" "in the exercise of its duties."[11] The Court ruled that the Constitution permitted Congress, with respect to officers charged with quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions, to "fix the period during which they shall continue in office, and to forbid their removal except for cause . . . ."; and that the President's removal of a FTC Commissioner for reasons not listed in the statute thus violated the law.[12]

The Court's approval in Humphrey's Executor of restrictions on the President's power of removal over the heads of certain federal agencies has influenced the structure of the modern administrative state.[13] Congress has established a number of "independent" agencies that are headed by multi-member bodies whose officers may only be removed by the President for cause.[14] These independent agencies stand in contrast to what may be considered traditional Executive Branch agencies, with a single head who is removable at will by the President.[15] Because Congress has created a variety of agencies with various structural features,[16] certain

[7] See 189 U.S. 311 (1903).

[8] Humphrey's Ex'r, 295 U.S. at 622–24. The Court indicated that for the Shurtleff Court to interpret the removal provision as ensuring the life tenure of the appraiser "was so extreme as to forbid, in the opinion of the court, any ruling which would produce that result if it reasonably could be avoided." Id. at 23.

[9] Id. at 624–25.

[10] Id. at 626.

[11] Id. at 628.

[12] Id. at 629–32.

[13] The Court's view in Humphrey's Executor that the FTC did not wield executive power is no longer shared by the modern Court. Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Fin. Prot. Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. at 14 n.2 (U.S. June 29, 2020) ("The Court's conclusion that the FTC did not exercise executive power has not withstood the test of time."); City of Arlington v. FCC, No. 11-1545, slip op. at 13 n.4 (U.S. May 20, 2013) (noting that agency "activities take 'legislative' and 'judicial' forms, but they are exercises of—indeed, under our constitutional structure they must be exercises of—the 'executive Power'"); id. at 4 (Roberts, C. J. dissenting, joined by Kennedy & Alito, JJ.) ("What the Court says in footnote 4 of its opinion is good, and true . . . The Framers did divide governmental power in the manner the Court describes, for the purpose of safeguarding liberty.").

[14] There are other indicia of independence for federal agencies, although for cause removal protection is likely the most prominent indicator. See Elena Kagan, Presidential Administration, 114 Harv. L. Rev. 2245, 2376 (2001) (describing the "core legal difference" between independent and Executive Branch agencies as "the strength of the President's removal power"); Kirti Datla & Richard L. Revesz, Deconstructing Independent Agencies (and Executive Agencies), 98 Cornell L. Rev. 769, 775–76 (2013) ("[T]he conventional wisdom is that there are two types of agencies: executive and independent. Each type of agency comes with a set of rules that govern how the President can interact with them. The consensus view is that the dividing line is the presence of a for-cause removal protection clause."). But see Adrian Vermeule, Conventions of Agency Independence, 113 Colum. L. Rev. 1163, 1166 (2011) ("Legally enforceable for-cause tenure protection is neither necessary nor sufficient for operational independence.").

[15] Kagan, supra note 14, at 2376–77.

[16] Anne Joseph O'Connell, Bureaucracy at the Boundary, 162 U. Pa. L. Rev. 841, 846 (2014) ("And there are organizations entirely within the federal government that do not fit squarely within the Executive Branch, including but encompassing far more than independent regulatory commissions and boards.").

functions of a particular agency may (at least for constitutional purposes) be considered "executive" while others in the same agency may not.[17]

In the years following Humphrey's Executor, scholars have debated the constitutionality of independent agencies whose heads are insulated from presidential control, as well as what limits the Constitution may place on Congress's power to shield Executive Branch officers from removal.[18] As discussed infra, Congress in the twentieth century has also enacted legislation insulating agency officials other than the heads of multimember boards from removal.[19] However, Supreme Court decisions in the twenty-first century appear to reflect an increasing skepticism of such congressional limits on the President's power to remove agency officials.[20]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Although the number of cases squarely presenting the validity of for-cause removal protections is limited, the Court applied a functional analysis similar to Humphrey's Executor in a number of twentieth-century cases that affirmed the constitutionality of statutory independence from the President for certain Executive Branch officers.[1] For instance, in the 1958 case of Wiener v. United States,[2] the Court ruled that even in the absence of an express statutory restriction on removal, the President acted illegally by removing a member of the War Claims Commission on the grounds that the President simply wanted a member of his own choosing.[3] The Court read Humphrey's Executor as limiting the scope of Myers to "purely executive officers" and approving for-cause protections for "quasi-judicial" officers.[4] Examining the scope of the President's power to remove members of the Commission, the Court focused on the "nature of the function[s] Congress vested" in the Commission and concluded that its purpose was judicial—adjudicating claims free from presidential or congressional influence.[5] [17] See, e.g., Intercollegiate Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Copyright Royalty Bd., 684 F.3d 1332, 1341–42 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (concluding that "the powers in the Library [of Congress] and the [Copyright Royalty] Board to promulgate copyright regulations, to apply the statute to affected parties, and to set rates and terms case by case are ones generally associated in modern times with executive agencies rather than legislators. In this role the Library is undoubtedly a 'component of the Executive Branch'") (quoting Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Acct. Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 511 (2010)).

---

[18] Compare Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 2–4 (1994) (asserting that the Framers did not envision a unitary Executive), with Steven G. Calabresi & Saikrishna B. Prakash, The President's Power to Execute the Laws, 104 Yale L.J. 541, 547–50 (1994) (arguing that the theory of a unitary Executive flows from an originalist interpretation of the Constitution's meaning). See also Neomi Rao, Removal: Necessary and Sufficient for Presidential Control, 65 Ala. L. Rev. 1205, 1276 (2014).

[19] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal.

[20] See ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.6 Later Twentieth Century Cases on Removal.

[1] See, e.g., Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 659–60 (1988).

[2] The case presented another suit for backpay premised on an allegedly illegal removal.

[3] 357 U.S. 349 (1958).

[4] Id. at 352 (quoting Humphrey's Ex'r v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 628 (1935).

[5] Id. at 353–56.

Even though the statute was silent as to removal, the Court reasoned that because, "as one must take for granted," the President was precluded from influencing the Commission with regard to adjudicating claims, Congress must not have intended "to have hang over the Commission the Damocles' sword of removal" at will.[6] The Court thus concluded that, due to its judicial character, the President lacked an inherent power of removal at will over the Commission.

The Court also took a functional approach in upholding the constitutionality of a statute insulating a federal prosecutor from executive control. Following the scandal of Watergate and resignation of President Richard Nixon, Congress passed the Ethics of Government Act of 1978.[7] Title VI of that Act, the independent counsel statute, established a statutory mechanism for the appointment of a prosecutor by a Special Division of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit vested with a measure of independence from the Executive Branch.[8] The Special Division enjoyed authority to appoint and define the jurisdiction of the prosecutor, who could only be removed "by the personal action of the Attorney General and only for good cause, physical or mental disability . . . , or any other condition that substantially impairs the performance of such independent counsel's duties."[9]

In the 1988 case of Morrison v. Olson, the Supreme Court upheld the independent counsel statute against a constitutional challenge.[10] Writing for the Court, Chief Justice William Rehnquist concluded that the independent counsel was an inferior, rather than a principal, officer, whose appointment was not required to be made by the President subject to Senate confirmation.[11]

The Court also held that the Independent Counsel Act's provision limiting the authority of the Attorney General to remove the independent counsel for good cause did not impermissibly intrude on the President's power under Article II.[12] The Court rejected a formalist rule that would bar statutory for-cause removal protections for any individual tasked with "purely executive" functions; instead, it applied a functional test and asked whether Congress has "interfere[d] with the President's" executive power and his "duty to 'take care that the laws be faithfully executed.'"[13] The Court recognized that the independent counsel exercised "law enforcement functions that typically have been undertaken by officials within the Executive Branch,"[14] but noted that the position nevertheless has a "limited jurisdiction and tenure and lack[ed] policymaking or significant administrative authority."[15] The Court reasoned that it did "not see how the President's need to control" the independent counsel's discretion "is so central to the functioning of the Executive Branch" as to demand a constitutional rule

[6] Id. at 356.

[7] See Ethics in Government Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-521, 92 Stat. 1824.

[8] Id. §§ 601–04, 92 Stat. at 1867–75 (codified at 28 U.S.C. §§ 591–99). The independent counsel provisions have since expired. 28 U.S.C. § 599. The statute required the Attorney General to apply in certain circumstances to a Special Division of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit for the appointment of an independent prosecutor. Id. § 593(a).

[9] Id. § 596(a)(1).

[10] 487 U.S. 654, 659–60 (1988). This issue was foreshadowed in the experiences of the special prosecutor charged with investigating events connected to the break-in at the Watergate Hotel and Office Building. See ArtII.S4.4.7 President Richard Nixon and Impeachable Offenses.

[11] Morrison, 487 U.S. at 671. The Court concluded that the independent counsel was an inferior officer because the independent counsel (1) was removable by the Attorney General for cause; (2) had a limited scope of duties; (3) possessed limited jurisdiction; and (4) was limited in tenure. Id. at 671–72. For more on the distinction between principal and inferior officers, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.3 Modern Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers.

[12] Morrison, 487 U.S. at 686–93.

[13] Id. at 690 (quoting U.S. Const. art. II, § 3, cl. 5).

[14] Id. at 691.

[15] Id.

mandating removal at will.[16] The Court also concluded that the removal provision did not "impermissibly burden[ ]" the President's ability to control the independent counsel because the position could still be eliminated for cause.[17]

In addition, the Court concluded that the statute did not violate the separation of powers by undermining the Executive Branch's powers or prohibiting that branch from carrying out its constitutional duties.[18] The majority opinion reasoned that the statute ultimately gave "the Executive Branch sufficient control over the independent counsel to ensure that the President is able to perform his constitutionally assigned duties."[19] This control, the Court concluded, arose from the ability of the Attorney General to remove the independent counsel for good cause.[20]

While the Court's functional analyses in Humphrey's Executor, Wiener, and Morrison effectively allow removal protections for a range of federal entities, Congress's power to create agencies independent from executive control is far from absolute. For instance, in the 1986 case of Bowsher v. Synar, the Supreme Court applied a much more formalist approach to a separation of powers dispute and invalidated a statute that gave an official controlled by Congress power to order decreases in federal spending.[21] The Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985[22] gave the Comptroller General authority, in the event of a budget shortfall, to issue a report detailing federal revenue and expenditure estimates and the specific reductions needed to reduce the deficit to a statutory target.[23] The President was then required to order the "sequestration" of those funds pursuant to the Comptroller General's report.[24]

The Court held that vesting the Comptroller General with these authorities violated the separation of powers in light of Congress's removal authority; a prior law had authorized Congress to remove the Comptroller General through a joint resolution.[25] The High Court explained that the Constitution's division of power among the three branches of government barred "an active role for Congress in the supervision of officers charged with the execution of the laws it enacts."[26] The Constitution explicitly provides no role for Congress in the removal of officers beyond impeachment.[27] Allowing Congress to exercise removal power over an officer engaged in executive functions "would, in practical terms, reserve in Congress control over the execution of the laws."[28] Just as Congress may not itself execute the law, the Court said that it may not indirectly do so by "grant[ing] to an officer under its control what it does not

---

[16] Id. at 691–92.

[17] Id. at 692–93.

[18] Id. at 695.

[19] Id. at 693–96.

[20] Id. at 695–96; cf. Id. at 706 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (characterizing the Court's assertion as "somewhat like referring to shackles as an effective means of locomotion").

[21] 478 U.S. 714, 735–36 (1986). See ArtII.S2.C2.3.6 Creation of Federal Offices to ArtII.S2.C2.3.9 Restrictions on Congress's Authority.

[22] Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Pub. L. No. 99-177, 99 Stat. 1038 (codified at 2 U.S.C. § 901 et seq.).

[23] Bowsher, 478 U.S. at 718, 732.

[24] Id. at 718.

[25] Id. at 736.

[26] Id. at 722.

[27] Id.

[28] Id. at 726. Cf. Id. at 740 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The fact that Congress retained for itself the power to remove the Comptroller General thus is not necessarily an adequate reason for concluding that his role in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget reduction process is unconstitutional. It is, however, a fact that lends support to my ultimate conclusion that, in exercising his functions under this Act, he serves as an agent of the Congress."); Id. at 765 (White, J., dissenting) ("I cannot accept, however, that the exercise of authority by an officer removable for cause by a possess."[29] The Court reasoned that the Comptroller General's duties under the statute amounted to "execution of the law" because he was charged with interpreting statutory provisions and exercising independent judgment in preparing budget estimates and reductions. Additionally, the Comptroller General had "the ultimate authority to determine the budget cuts to be made," given that the President was required to carry out the Comptroller General's report through a sequestration order.[30] The Court concluded that by entrusting an officer "subject to removal only by itself" with execution of the law, "Congress in effect has retained control over the execution of the Act and has intruded into the executive function."[31]

ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.7 Twenty-First Century Cases on Removal

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

In the twenty-first century, the Court has applied a somewhat formalist approach to removal cases, invalidating removal protections for Executive Branch officials in three different decisions. In the 2010 case of Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the Court ruled that two layers of removal protection for an Executive Branch official impermissibly interfered with the President's powers under Article II of the Constitution.[1] In that case, the Court examined the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB or Board), an entity created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 to oversee aspects of the accounting industry.[2] The Board's members were appointed by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and were subject to the Commission's oversight when issuing rules and sanctions.[3] But the members of the PCAOB could not be removed from office except for good cause shown by the SEC in a formal proceeding.[4] Because the President could not remove the SEC Commissioners themselves without cause,[5] the Board members were thus insulated by two layers of removal protection.[6]

The Court's opinion stressed the importance of accountability for government officers that the Appointments Clause and its concomitant power of removal ensure. The Court joint resolution of Congress is analogous to the impermissible execution of the law by Congress itself, nor would I hold that the congressional role in the removal process renders the Comptroller an 'agent' of the Congress, incapable of receiving 'executive' power.").

---

[29] Id. at 726.

[30] Id. at 732–33.

[31] Id. at 734.

[1] See 561 U.S. 477, 484 (2010).

[2] 15 U.S.C. §§ 7211–20.

[3] Id. § 7217.

[4] Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 486.

[5] SEC Commissioners do not actually have an explicit statutory removal protection, but both parties agreed and the Court decided the case with the understanding that the Commissioners nonetheless may not be removed by the President except for the standard enunciated in Humphrey's Executor, 295 U.S. 602 (1935). Id. at 487.

[6] Id. at 495–98.

acknowledged that it had upheld removal restrictions for the principal officers of independent agencies in Humphrey's Executor and for certain inferior officers in Morrison, but concluded that the "novel" combination of dual for-cause removal restrictions "tranform[ed]" the independence of the Board in a manner that impaired the President's duty to execute the law.[7] A second layer of removal protection meant that "[n]either the President, nor anyone directly responsible to him, nor even an officer whose conduct he may review only for good cause, has full control of the Board."[8] Dual for-cause removal protections inhibit the principle of accountability for Executive Branch officers because they infringe on the President's "ability to execute the laws," by preventing him from "holding his subordinates accountable for their conduct."[9] The Court emphasized that the public does not vote for agency officials, but "look[s] to the President to guide the 'assistants or deputies . . . subject to his superintendence.'"[10] In other words, the President must be able to hold agency officers accountable for their actions, because it is ultimately the President who is accountable to the people for actions of the Executive Branch, rather than Executive Branch officers.[11] Because the statute "grant[ed] the Board executive power without the Executive's oversight," Congress had "subvert[ed] the President's ability to ensure that the laws are faithfully executed" in violation of Article II's vestment of executive power in the President.[12]

The Court's turn in the modern era toward a more formalist approach to interpreting the strictures of the Appointments Clause has been applied in two recent cases that further limit Congress's ability to shape the administrative state. These decisions concluded that an independent agency with a single director insulated from presidential control violated the separation of powers.

In Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), the Supreme Court concluded that Congress could not provide for-cause removal protections for the head of the CFPB, an independent financial regulatory agency led by a single Director.[13] The Court described the President's removal power as "unrestricted,"[14] rejecting the view that Humphrey's Executor and Morrison "establish a general rule that Congress may impose 'modest' restrictions on the President's removal power."[15] Instead, "the President's removal power is the rule, not the exception."[16] The Court explained that after Free Enterprise Fund, only "two exceptions" to the rule requiring removability remained.[17] First, under Humphrey's Executor, Congress may sometimes "create expert agencies led by a group of principal officers

[7] Id. at 496.

[8] Id.

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 497–98 (quoting The Federalist No. 72 (Alexander Hamilton)).

[11] Id. at 499 ("The growth of the Executive Branch, which now wields vast power and touches almost every aspect of daily life, heightens the concern that it may slip from the Executive's control, and thus from that of the people.").

[12] Id. at 498.

[13] No. 19-7, slip op. at 2–3 (U.S. June 29, 2020). This case also involved questions of standing. Id. at 9. Among other arguments, a court-appointed amicus curiae claimed that "a litigant wishing to challenge an executive act on the basis of the President's removal power must show that the challenged act would not have been taken if the responsible official had been subject to the President's control." Id. The Court rejected the idea that such a challenger has to prove this type of counterfactual, finding it sufficient to demonstrate an injury "from an executive act that allegedly exceeds the official's authority." Id. at 10.

[14] Id. at 2.

[15] Id. at 26. The court-appointed amicus curiae argued that the Court's precedent established that Congress may generally limit the President's removal power, with two exceptions: (1) "Congress may not reserve a role for itself in individual removal decisions"; and (2) Congress may not completely eliminate the President's removal power. Id. at 26–27.

[16] Id. at 27.

[17] Id. at 13.

removable by the President only for good cause" if the agency does not exercise substantial executive power.[18] In interpreting this 1935 case, the Seila Law Court interpreted Humphrey's Executor narrowly, saying that this exception permitted for-cause removal protections for "a multimember body of experts, balanced along partisan lines, that performed legislative and judicial functions and was said not to exercise any executive power."[19] The Court said that the second exception to the President's removal power allowed at least some removal protections for inferior officers, as in Morrison, if those officers have "limited duties and no policymaking or administrative authority."[20]

The Court concluded in Seila Law that the CFPB Director did not fall within either of these two exceptions.[21] The single Director was not a multimember expert body, and, in the view of the Court, could not be considered "a mere legislative or judicial aid."[22] Rather than performing merely reporting and advisory functions, the CFPB Director exercised executive power, possessing the authority "to promulgate binding rules fleshing out 19 federal statutes, [to] issue final decisions awarding legal and equitable relief in administrative adjudications," and to seek "daunting monetary penalties" in enforcement actions in federal court.[23] Neither could the CFPB Director be considered an inferior officer with limited duties.[24] And the Court ruled that it would not recognize a new exception to the President's removal authority for "an independent agency led by a single Director and vested with significant executive power."[25] The Court described the CFPB's structure as "unprecedented"[26] and "incompatible with our constitutional structure,"[27] saying that the agency's structure violated the Constitution "by vesting significant governmental power in the hands of a single individual accountable to no one."[28] Consequently, the Court concluded that the provision insulating the Director from removal was unconstitutional, severing the for-cause removal provision from the governing statute.[29]

Shortly thereafter, in Collins v. Yellen, the Supreme Court ruled that the structure of the Federal Housing Finance Agency (FHFA) violated the Constitution's separation of powers.[30]

---

[18] Id. at 2, 15–16. The Court said its decision in Wiener also fell within this exception. Id. at 15 (discussing Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349 (1958).

[19] Id. at 15 (emphasis added). The Court stressed that "[r]ightly or wrongly, the Court viewed the [Federal Trade Commission ('FTC')] (as it existed in 1935) as exercising 'no part of the executive power.'" Id. at 14 (quoting Humphrey's Ex'r v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 628 (1935). However, the Court also said that this conclusion has not withstood the test of time, and that the powers of the FTC—even as they existed in 1935—are now considered executive. Id. at 14 n.2.

[20] Id. at 16. This principle also extended to Perkins. Id. at 15 (discussing United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483 (1886).

[21] Id. at 16–18.

[22] Id.

[23] Id. at 17.

[24] Id.

[25] Id. at 18.

[26] Id. The Court acknowledged that there were four other relatively recent historical examples of Congress providing good-cause tenure to principal officers leading an agency, but dismissed these examples as also being controversial. Id. at 18–21 (discussing the Comptroller of the Currency, Office of the Special Counsel, Social Security Administration, and Federal Housing Finance Agency).

[27] Id. at 21.

[28] Id. at 23. The Court noted that the Executive Branch is the only branch led by a unitary head, and that the President's power is checked through democratic and political accountability. Id. at 22–23. Individual Executive Branch officials may still wield significant authority, but that authority remains subject to the ongoing supervision and control of the elected President. Id. at 23.

[29] Id. at 30–33 (plurality opinion); id. at 1 (Kagan, J., concurring in the judgment with respect to severability and dissenting in part).

[30] No. 19-422, slip op. at 26–32 (U.S. June 23, 2021).

Like the CFPB, the FHFA is headed by a single Director whom, under the statute establishing the agency, the President could remove only for cause.[31] The Collins Court considered Seila Law to be "all but dispositive" of the constitutional question, reasoning that differences in the "nature and breadth" of the agencies' respective regulatory authorities did not justify the constraint on the President's removal power.[32] The Court remanded the case for the lower courts to decide whether the challengers—shareholders of FHFA-regulated entities—were actually harmed by the existence of the statutory removal protection.[33]

Clause 3—Senate Recess

ArtII.S2.C3.1 Overview of Recess Appointments Clause

Article II, Section 2, Clause 3:

> The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

The Recess Appointments Clause, authorizing the President to make temporary appointments when the Senate is not in session, was adopted by the Constitutional Convention without dissent and without debate regarding the intent and scope of its terms. In the Federalist No. 67, Alexander Hamilton refers to the recess appointment power as "nothing more than a supplement . . . for the purpose of establishing an auxiliary method of appointment, in cases to which the general method was inadequate." It is generally accepted that the Clause was designed to enable the President to ensure the unfettered operation of the government during periods when the Senate was not in session and therefore unable to perform its advice and consent function. In addition to fostering administrative continuity, Presidents have exercised authority under the Recess Appointments Clause for political purposes, appointing officials who might have difficulty securing Senate confirmation.

Two fundamental textual issues arise when interpreting the Recess Appointments Clause. The first is the meaning of the phrase "the Recess of the Senate." The Senate may recess both between and during its annual sessions,[1] but the time period during which the President may make a recess appointment is not clearly answered by the text of the Constitution. The second fundamental textual issue is what constitutes a vacancy that "may happen" during the recess of the Senate. If the words "may happen" are interpreted to refer only to vacancies that arise during a recess, then the President would lack authority to make a recess appointment to a vacancy that existed before the recess began. For over two centuries the Supreme Court did not address either of these issues,[2] leaving it to the lower courts and other branches of government to interpret the scope of the Recess Appointments Clause.[3]

---

[31] 12 U.S.C. § 4512(b)(2).

[32] Collins, slip op. at 26–29.

[33] Id. at 36.

[1] For a discussion of the procedural requirements that apply to "adjourn[ments]," see ArtI.S5.C4.1 Adjournment of Congress.

[2] See NLRB v. Noel Canning, 573 U.S. 513, 526 (2014).

[3] For lower court decisions on the Recess Appointments Clause, see, e.g., Evans v. Stephens, 387 F.3d 1220, 122627 (11th Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 544 U.S. 942 (2005); United States v. Woodley, 751 F.2d 1008, 1012 (9th Cir. 1985) (en banc), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1048 (1986); United States v. Allocco, 305 F.2d 704, 712 (2d Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 964 (1963); In re Farrow, 3 Fed. 112 (C.C.N.D. Ga. 1880). For prior Executive Branch interpretations of the Recess Appointments Clause, see 25 Op. OLC 182 (2001); 20 Op. OLC 124, 161 (1996); 16 Op. OLC 15 (1992); 13 Op. OLC 271 (1989); 6 Op. OLC 585, 586 (1982); 3 Op. OLC 314, 316 (1979); 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 463 (1960); 33 Op. Att'y Gen. 20 (1921); 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 314 (1914); 26 Op. Att'y Gen. 234 (1907); 23 Op. Att'y Gen. 599 (1901); 22 Op. Att'y Gen. 82 (1898); 19 Op. Att'y Gen. 261 (1889); 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 28 (1884); 16 Op. Att'y Gen. 523 (1880); 15 Op. Att'y Gen. 207 (1877); 14 Op. Att'y Gen. 563 (1875); 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 455 (1868); 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 32 (1866); 11 Op. Att'y Gen. 179 (1865); 10 Op.

ArtII.S2.C3.1
Overview of Recess Appointments Clause

The Supreme Court ultimately adopted a relatively broad interpretation of the Clause in National Labor Relations Board v. Noel Canning.[4] With respect to the meaning of the phrase "Recess of the Senate," the Court concluded that the phrase applied to both inter-session recesses and intra-session recesses. In so holding, the Court, finding the text of the Constitution ambiguous,[5] relied on (1) a pragmatic interpretation of the Clause that would allow the President to ensure the "continued functioning" of the federal government when the Senate is away,[6] and (2) "long settled and established [historical] practice" of the President making intra-session recess appointments.[7] The Court declined, however, to say how long a recess must be to fall within the Clause, instead holding that historical practice counseled that a recess of more than three days but less than ten days is "presumptively too short" to trigger the President's appointment power under the Clause.[8] With respect to the phrase "may happen," the majority, again finding ambiguity in the text of the Clause,[9] held that the Clause applied both to vacancies that first come into existence during a recess and to vacancies that initially occur before a recess but continue to exist during the recess.[10] In so holding, the Court again relied on both pragmatic concerns[11] and historical practice.[12]

Even under a broad interpretation of the Recess Appointments Clause, the Senate may limit the ability to make recess appointments by exercising its procedural prerogatives. The Court in Noel Canning held that, for the purposes of the Recess Appointments Clause, the Senate is in session when the Senate says it is, provided that, under its own rules, it retains the capacity to transact Senate business.[13] In this vein, Noel Canning provides the Senate with the means to prevent recess appointments by a President who attempts to employ the "subsidiary Att'y Gen. 356 (1862); 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 523 (1846); 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 361 (1845); 3 Op. Att'y Gen. 673 (1841); 2 Op. Att'y Gen. 525 (1832); 1 Op. Att'y Gen. 631, 63334 (1823). For the early practice on recess appointments, see GEORGE HAYNES, THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES 77278 (1938).

[4] Noel Canning, at 522–50 (2014).

[5] Id. at 526–29. More specifically, the Court found nothing in dictionary definitions or common usage contemporaneous to the Constitution that would suggest that an intra-session recess was not a recess. The Court noted that, while the phrase "the Recess" might suggest limiting recess appointments to the single break between sessions of Congress, the word "the" can also be used "generically or universally," see, e.g., U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3, cl. 5 (directing the Senate to choose a President pro tempore "in the Absence of the Vice-President"), and that there were examples of "the Recess" being used in the broader manner at the time of the founding. Noel Canning, at 526–29.

[6] Noel Canning, at 528. ("The Senate is equally away during both an inter-session and an intra-session recess, and its capacity to participate in the appointments process has nothing to do with the words it uses to signal its departure.").

[7] The Court noted that Presidents have made "thousands" of intra-session recess appointments and that presidential legal advisors had been nearly unanimous in determining that the clause allowed these appointments. Id. at 529.

[8] Id. at 538. The Court left open the possibility that some very unusual circumstance, such as a national catastrophe that renders the Senate unavailable, could require the exercise of the recess appointment power during a shorter break. Id.

[9] The Court noted, for instance, that Thomas Jefferson thought the phrase in question could point to both vacancies that "may happen to be" during a recess as well as those that "may happen to fall" during a recess. Id. at 539 (emphasis added).

[10] Id. at 518–20.

[11] Id. at 542–43 ("[W]e believe the narrower interpretation risks undermining constitutionally conferred powers [in that] . . . [i]t would prevent the President from making any recess appointment that arose before a recess, no matter who the official, no matter how dire the need, no matter how uncontroversial the appointment, and no matter how late in the session the office fell vacant.").

[12] Id. at 543 ("Historical practice over the past 200 years strongly favors the broader interpretation. The tradition of applying the Clause to pre-recess vacancies dates at least to President James Madison.").

[13] Id. In the context of Noel Canning, the Court held that the Senate was in session even during a pro forma session, a brief meeting of the Senate, often lasting minutes, in which no legislative business is conducted. Id. at 554–56. Because the Journal of the Senate (and the Congressional Record) declared the Senate in session during those periods, and because the Senate could, under its rules, have conducted business under unanimous consent (a quorum being presumed), the Court concluded that the Senate was indeed in session. In so holding, the Court deferred to the method" for appointing officers of the United States (i.e., recess appointments) to avoid the "norm"[14] for appointment (i.e., appointment pursuant to the Article II, Section 2, Clause 2).[15]

ArtII.S2.C3.2 Recess Appointments of Article III Judges

Article II, Section 2, Clause 3:

> The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Federal judges clearly fall within the terms of the Recess Appointments Clause, in the sense that the Clause broadly authorizes temporary appointments for "all Vacancies." Nonetheless, other constitutional provisions could suggest hesitation before applying the Clause to Article III judges—although historically, Presidents have in fact made recess appointments to Article III courts.[1] The constitutional concern stems from the fact that Article III judges are appointed "during good behavior," subject only to removal through impeachment.[2] A judge, however, who is given a recess appointment may be "removed" by the Senate's failure to advise and consent to his appointment; moreover, on the bench, prior to Senate confirmation, he or she may be subject to influence not felt by other judges. Although the Supreme Court has not considered this issue, some federal appeals courts have rejected constitutional attacks upon the status of federal judges given recess appointments.[3]

Section 3—Duties

ArtII.S3.1 The President's Legislative Role

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other authority of Congress to "determine the Rules of its Proceedings," see U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 2, relying on previous case law in which the Court refused to question the validity of a congressional record. Noel Canning, at 555 (citing United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 5 (1892)).

---

[14] Noel Canning, at 556–57.

[15] It should be noted that, by an act of Congress, if a vacancy existed when the Senate was in session, the ad interim appointee, subject to certain exceptions, may receive no salary until he has been confirmed by the Senate. 5 U.S.C. § 5503 (2012). By targeting the compensation of appointees, as opposed to the President's recess appointment power itself, this limitation acts as an indirect control on recess appointments, but its constitutionality has not been adjudicated. A federal district court noted that "if any and all restrictions on the President's recess appointment power, however limited, are prohibited by the Constitution," restricting payment to recess appointees might be invalid. Staebler v. Carter, 464 F. Supp. 585, 596 n.24 (D.D.C. 1979).

[1] See generally, e.g., Edward A. Hartnett, Recess Appointments of Article III Judges: Three Constitutional Questions, 26 Cardozo L. Rev. 377 (2005).

[2] See ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[3] United States v. Woodley, 751 F.2d 1008, 1012 (9th Cir. 1985) (en banc), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1048 (1986). Other cases holding that the President's power under the Recess Appointments Clause extends to filling judicial vacancies in Article III courts include United States v. Allocco, 305 F.2d 704 (2d Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 964 (1963), and Evans v. Stephens, 387 F.3d 1220 (11th Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 544 U.S. 942 (2005). The opinions in the courts of appeals provide a wealth of data on the historical practice of giving recess appointments to judges, including the developments in the Eisenhower Administration, when three Justices, Earl Warren, William Brennan, and Potter Stewart, were so appointed and later confirmed after participation on the Court. The Senate in 1960 adopted a "sense of the Senate" resolution suggesting that the practice was not a good idea. 106 Cong. Rec. 18130–18145 (1960).

public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The first two clauses of Article II, Section 3 relate to the President's legislative role. The first clause, directing the President to report to the Congress on the state of the union, imposes a duty rather than confers a power and serves as the formal basis of the President's legislative leadership. The President's legislative role has grown substantially since 1900. This development, however, reflects changes in political and social forces rather than any pronounced change in constitutional interpretation. The rise of parties and the accompanying recognition of the President as party leader, the appearance of the National Nominating Convention and the Party Platform, and the introduction of the Spoils System all contributed to the growth of the President's legislative role.[1] While certain pre-Civil War Presidents, mostly of Whig extraction, professed hesitation regarding "usurping" legislative powers,[2] still earlier Presidents—including George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson—took a very different line, albeit less boldly and persistently than their later successors.[3] Today, there is no subject on which the President may not appropriately communicate to Congress, in as precise terms as he chooses, his conception of its duty. Conversely, the President is not obliged by this Clause to impart information which, in his judgment, should in the public interest be withheld.[4]

The second clause of Article II, Section 3 authorizes the President to convene or adjourn the Houses of Congress in certain circumstances. The President has frequently summoned both Houses into "extra" or "special sessions" for legislative purposes, and the Senate alone for the consideration of nominations and treaties. His power to adjourn the Houses has never been exercised.

ArtII.S3.2 Head of State

ArtII.S3.2.1 Early Doctrine on Receiving Ambassadors and Public Ministers

Article II, Section 3:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The third clause of Article II, Section 2 directs the President to "receive Ambassadors and other public ministers." An early opinion from Attorney General Caleb Cushing interpreted "Ambassadors and other public ministers" to encompass "all possible diplomatic agents which any foreign power may accredit to the United States."[1] According to John Bassett Moore in his famous International Law Digest, the term, as a practical construction of the Constitution, also

---

[1] N. Small, Some Presidential Interpretations of the Presidency (1932); W. Binkley, The President and Congress (2d ed. 1962); Edward Corwin, Total War and the Constitution chs. 1, 7 (1946).

[2] Presidents William Harrison, James Polk, Zackary Taylor, and Millard Fillmore all fathered sentiments to this general effect. See 4 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 1860, 1864 (J. Richardson ed. 1896); 6 id. at 2513–19, 2561–62, 2608, 2615.

[3] See sources cited supra.

[4] Warren, Presidential Declarations of Independence, 10 B.U. L. Rev. 1 (1930).

[1] 7 Ops. Atty. Gen. 186, 209 (1855).

encompasses all foreign consular agents who may not exercise their functions in the United States without an exequatur from the President.[2] The power to "receive" ambassadors and other foreign diplomatic and consular agents includes the right to refuse to receive them, to request their recall, to dismiss them, and to determine their eligibility under our laws.[3]

During the United States' formative years, the Founders expressed differing views regarding the scope of the President's reception power. Writing in 1790, Thomas Jefferson stated that "[t]he transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether."[4] The function "belongs . . . to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are specially submitted to the Senate."[5] Thus, when Edmond-Charles Genet, envoy to the United States from the first French Republic, sought an exequatur for a consul whose commission was addressed to the Congress of the United States, then-Secretary of State Jefferson informed Genet that as the President was the only channel of communication between the United States and foreign nations, it was from him alone "that foreign nations or their agents are to learn what is or has been the will of the nation." [6] Secretary Jefferson accordingly returned the consul's commission and declared that the President would issue no exequatur to a consul except upon a commission correctly addressed.

Consistent with Jefferson's view, Congress later in 1798 passed An Act to Prevent Usurpation of Executive Functions, or the Logan Act, which prohibits U.S. citizens from engaging in unauthorized negotiations with foreign governments having a dispute with the United States.[7] Congress enacted the law in response to the actions of a Philadelphia Quaker named George Logan, who went to Paris on his own to negotiate with the French Government in an effort to avert war between France and the United States.[8] The next year, John Marshall, then a Member of the House of Representatives, defended President John Adams for delivering a fugitive from justice to Great Britain under the twenty-seventh article of the Jay Treaty rather than leaving the matter to the courts. In Marshall's view, "[t]he President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." Thus, according to Marshall, "the demand of a foreign nation can only be made on [the President]," and "any act to be performed by the force of the nation is to be performed through him."[9] Ninety-nine years later, a Senate Foreign Relations Committee took occasion to reiterate Marshall's doctrine with elaboration.[10]

In contrast, James Madison expressed a more limited view of the President's reception power. In his attack upon President George Washington's Proclamation of Neutrality in 1793 at the outbreak of war between France and Great Britain, Madison argued that all large

---

[2] 5 John Bassett Moore, International Law Digest 15–19 (1906).

[3] Id. at 4:473–548; 5:19–32.

[4] Opinion on the Question Whether the Senate Has the Right to Negative the Grade of Persons Appointed by the Executive to Fill Foreign Missions (April 24, 1790) in 5 Writings of Thomas Jefferson 161, 162 (P. Ford ed., 1895).

[5] Id.

[6] 4 John Bassett Moore, supra note 2, at 680–81.

[7] This measure is now contained in 18 U.S.C. § 953.

[8] See Memorandum on the History and Scope of the Law Prohibiting Correspondence with a Foreign Government, S. Doc. No. 696, 64th Cong. (2d Sess. 1917). The author was Mr. Charles Warren, then Assistant Attorney General. Further details concerning the observance of the Logan Act are given in Edward Corwin, supra note 1, at 183–84, 430–31.

[9] 10 Annals of Cong. 596, 613–14 (1800). Marshall's statement is often cited, e.g., United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 318, 319 (1936), as if he were claiming sole or inherent executive power in foreign relations, but Marshall carefully propounded the view that Congress could provide the rules underlying the President's duty to extradite. When, in 1848, Congress did enact such a statute, the Court sustained it. Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 714 (1893)

[10] 9S. Doc. No. 56, 54th Congress, 2d Sess. (1897).

questions of foreign policy fell within the ambit of Congress, by virtue of its power to declare war. In support of this proposition, Madison disparaged the presidential function of reception, asserting that "little, if anything, more was intended by the [reception] clause, than to provide for a particular mode of communication, almost grown into a right among modern nations."[11] The Clause, in his view, did nothing more than "point[ ] out the department of the government" that is "most proper for the ceremony of admitting public ministers, of examining their credentials, and of authenticating their title to the privileges annexed to their character by the law of nations."[12] Accordingly, Madison concluded that "it would be highly improper to magnify the function into an important prerogative."[13] The right to receive ambassadors, in his view, did not grant the Executive the right to, for instance, recognize a new foreign government—a right that "belongs to the nation."[14]

In defending Washington's proclamation, Alexander Hamilton advocated for a broader view of the President's reception power. Writing under the pseudonym Pacificus, Hamilton opined that

> The right of the executive to receive ambassadors and other public ministers, may serve to illustrate the relative duties of the executive and legislative departments. This right includes that of judging, in the case of a revolution of government in a foreign country, whether the new rulers are competent organs of the national will, and ought to be recognized, or not; which, where a treaty antecedently exists between the United States and such nation, involves the power of continuing or suspending its operation . . . . This power of determining virtually upon the operation of national treaties, as a consequence of the power to receive public ministers, is an important instance of the right of the executive, to decide upon the obligations of the country with regard to foreign nations.[15]

In Hamilton's view, this right of the Executive, in certain cases, "to determine the condition of the nation" can sometimes "affect the exercise of the power of the legislature to declare war."[16] Nevertheless, Hamilton acknowledged that the Executive cannot control Congress's exercise of that power. In his view, however, "the executive, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, may establish an antecedent state of things, which ought to weigh in the legislative decision," such that the two braches share concurrent authorities in particular circumstances.[17]

Jefferson likewise did not officially support Madison's point of view. Writing about his July 10, 1793 conversation with Genet, Jefferson noted that he informed Genet that Congress was not the United States' sovereign. Instead, Congress was "sovereign in making laws only, the executive was sovereign in executing them, and the judiciary in construing them where they related to their department."[18] Thus, Jefferson explained to Genet, it is the President's—and not Congress's—responsibility "to see that treaties are observed," and that "the Constitution had made the President the last appeal" for his decisions related to treaties.[19]

---

[11] 1 Letters and Other Writings of James Madison 611 (1865).

[12] Id.

[13] Id.

[14] Letters of Helvidius, 5 Writings of James Madison 133 (G. Hunt ed., 1905).

[15] Letter of Pacificus, No. 1, 7 Works of Alexander Hamilton 76, 82–83 (J. Hamilton ed., 1851).

[16] Id.

[17] Id.

[18] 4 J. Moore, supra note 2, at 680–81.

[19] Id.

History has largely affirmed Hamilton's view of the President's reception power. After reviewing the circumstances surrounding the United States' recognition of new states, governments, and belligerency before 1906, John Basset Moore observed that "[i]n every case, . . . the question of recognition was determined solely by the Executive."[20] The President's power to receive thus encompasses the power to recognize new states, communities claiming the status of belligerency, and changes of government in established states. By the same token, the power also encompasses the power to decline recognition, and thereby decline diplomatic relations with such new states or governments.[21]

ArtII.S3.2.2 Specific Cases on Receiving Ambassadors and Public Ministers

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The question concerning whether Congress shares with the President the right to recognize new states was prominently raised in connection with Cuba's successful struggle for independence. Beset by numerous legislative proposals of a more or less mandatory character, urging recognition upon the President, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in 1897, made an elaborate investigation of the subject. The Committee concluded in a memorandum that "[t]he executive branch is the sole mouthpiece of the nation in communication with foreign sovereignties," and that "[i]n the department of international law, . . . a Congressional recognition of belligerency or independence would be a nullity."[1]

The Committee reasoned that the recognition of independence or belligerency of a foreign power "is distinctly a diplomatic matter" evidenced "either by sending a public minister to the government thus recognized, or by receiving a public minister therefrom."[2] The reception of a foreign envoy, the Committee stated, "is the act of the President alone."[3] The next step of sending a public minister to the nation thus recognized, is likewise "primarily the act of the President."[4] The Committee noted that the Senate can take no part in the selection at all until the President has sent in a nomination, and upon such nomination, act "in its executive capacity, and, customarily, in 'executive session.'"[5] Because "[f]oreign nations communicate only through their respective executive departments," their legislative departments' resolutions upon diplomatic matters "have no status in international law." Thus, while

---

[20] Id at 243–44. (noting that "In the case of the Spanish-American republics, of Texas, of Hayti, and of Liberia, the President, before recognizing the new state, invoked the judgment and cooperation of Congress; and in each of these cases provision was made for the appointment of a minister, which, when made in due form, constitutes, as has been seen, according to the rules of international law, a formal recognition. In numerous other cases, the recognition was given by the Executive solely on his own responsibility"), See also Restatement, Foreign Relations §§ 204, 205.

[21] See 4 J. Moore, supra note 2, at 243–44.

[1] S. Doc. No. 56, 54th Congress, 2d Sess. (1897), 20–22.

[2] Id.

[3] Id.

[4] Id.

[5] Id.

Congress can help the Cuban insurgents by legislation in many ways, "it cannot help them legitimately by mere declarations, or by attempts to engage in diplomatic negotiations, if our interpretation of the Constitution is correct."[6]

Congress was able ultimately to bundle a clause recognizing the independence of Cuba, as distinguished from its government, into the declaration of war of April 11, 1898, against Spain. For the most part, the sponsors of the clause defended it by arguing that at that point, diplomacy had come to an end, after the President himself had appealed to Congress to provide a solution for the Cuban situation. In response, Congress was about to exercise its constitutional power of declaring war, and as part of the exercise of that power, it has the right to state the purpose of the war which it was about to declare.[7]

After Cuba, numerous presidents had occasions to exercise their power to recognize—or in some cases, not recognize—new foreign states or governments. The recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1933, for instance, was an exclusively presidential act. President Woodrow Wilson, early in 1913, refused to recognize Provisional President José Victoriano Huerta as the de facto government of Mexico, thereby contributing materially to Huerta's downfall the year following. President Wilson also announced a general policy of nonrecognition of any government founded on acts of violence. While he observed this rule with considerable discretion, he consistently refused to recognize the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and his successors prior to President Franklin D. Roosevelt did the same. President Herbert Hoover's Administration similarly refused in 1932 to recognize the independence of the Japanese puppet state of Manchukuo. The People's Republic of China (PRC) likewise remained unrecognized from President Harry Truman's Administration until President Richard Nixon's de facto recognition through a 1972 visit, not long after the People's Republic of China was admitted to the United Nations and Taiwan excluded. President Jimmy Carter's official recognition of the PRC became effective on January 1, 1979.[8] The earlier nonrecognition of the PRC proved to be an important part of American foreign policy during the Cold War.[9]

ArtII.S3.2.3 Modern Doctrine on Receiving Ambassadors and Public Ministers

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other

[6] Id.

[7] Senator Knute Nelson of Minnesota said: The President has asked us to give him the right to make war to expel the Spaniards from Cuba. He has asked us to put that power in his hands; and when we are asked to grant that power—the highest power given under the Constitution—we have the right, the intrinsic right, vested in us by the Constitution, to say how and under what conditions and with what allies that war-making power shall be exercised. 31 Cong. Rec. 3984 (1898).

[8] Joint Communique of the United States of America and the People's Republic of China (Jan. 1, 1979).

[9] President Carter's termination of the Sino-American Mutual Defense Treaty (SAM Defense Treaty) with Taiwan, which precipitated a constitutional and political debate, was perhaps an example of nonrecognition or more appropriately derecognition. The Supreme Court declined to hear a challenge to whether President Carter could unilaterally terminate the SAM Defense Treaty absent Senate consent. Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996 (1979) (per curiam) (holding that the case was not justiciable). On recognition and nonrecognition policies in the post-World War II era, see Restatement, Foreign Relations, §§ 202, 203.

public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The Supreme Court considered whether the President has the exclusive power to grant formal recognition to a foreign sovereign in Zivotofsky v. Kerry.[1] At issue in that case was a provision of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act that allowed United States citizens born in Jerusalem to list their place of birth as "Israel" in their passports.[2] This provision sought to override legislatively a State Department policy that instructed agency employees to list the place of birth for citizens born in Jerusalem as "Jerusalem" in passports because the United States did not recognize any country as having sovereignty over Jerusalem.[3]

After examining the historical practice related to recognition and other functional considerations, the Supreme Court held that the President retains exclusive authority over the recognition of foreign sovereigns and their territorial bounds.[4] Although Congress, pursuant to its enumerated powers in the field of foreign affairs, may properly legislate on matters which precede and follow a presidential act of recognition—including in ways which may undercut the policies that inform the President's recognition decision—it may not alter the President's recognition decision.[5]

ArtII.S3.3 Enforcer of Laws

ArtII.S3.3.1 Overview of Take Care Clause

Article II, Section 3:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The Constitution provides that the President "shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed . . . ." This duty potentially implicates at least five categories of executive power, including: (1) powers the Constitution confers directly upon the President by the opening and succeeding clauses of Article II; (2) powers that congressional acts directly confer upon the President; (3) powers that congressional acts confer upon heads of departments and other executive agencies of the federal government; (4) power that stems implicitly from the duty to enforce the criminal statutes of the United States; and (5) power to carry out the so-called "ministerial duties," regarding which an executive officer can exercise limited discretion as to the occasion or manner of their discharge. The following essays explore some of the questions raised by these executive powers, including how the President may exercise the powers which the Constitution or the statutes confer upon him, the relationship between the Take Care

[1] 576 U.S. 1 (2015).

[2] Id. at 7.

[3] Id.

[4] The Court identified the Reception Clause, along with additional provisions in Article II, as providing the basis for the Executive's power over recognition. Id. at 11–15.

[5] See Zivotofsky, 576 U.S. at 29–30. While observing that Congress may not enact a law that directly contradicts a presidential recognition decision, the Court stated that Congress could still express its disagreement in multiple ways: For example, it may enact an embargo, decline to confirm an ambassador, or even declare war. But none of these acts would alter the President's recognition decision. Id. at 30

ArtII.S3.3.1
Overview of Take Care Clause

Clause and the President's power to remove—and thus supervise—those who wield executive power on his behalf, and the extent to which Congress can direct the actions of executive officials.

ArtII.S3.3.2 Who Can Fulfill the Take Care Duty

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Whereas the British monarch is constitutionally required to always act through agents if his acts are to receive legal recognition, the President is presumed to exercise certain of his constitutional powers personally. In an 1855 opinion, Attorney General Caleb Cushing identified several such examples, including the President's granting of reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States and his role as "the supreme commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."[1] According to Cushing, the President's power as Commander in Chief is "constitutionally inherent in the person of the President" such that "[n]o act of Congress, no act even of the President himself, can, by constitutional possibility, authorize or create any military officer not subordinate to the President."[2]

Moreover, according to Cushing, the President's obligation to act personally may be sometimes enlarged by statute. The act organizing the President with other designated officials into "an Establishment by name of the Smithsonian Institute," in Cushing's view, is one such example. Cushing also believed that expenditures from the "secret service" fund, in order to be valid, must be vouched for by the President personally.[3] On like grounds the Supreme Court once held void a court martial decree because it was not specifically approved by the President as required by the 65th Article of War.[4] The Court, however, has effectively overruled this case, and at any rate such cases are exceptional.[5]

Over time, the general rule that developed is that when any duty is cast by law upon the President, it may be exercised by him through the head of the appropriate department, whose acts, if performed within the law, become the President's acts.[6] In Williams v. United States,[7] for instance, the Supreme Court considered a statute that prohibited the advance of public

---

[1] 7 Ops. Atty. Gen. 453, 464–65 (1855).

[2] Id.

[3] Cf. 2 Stat. 78. The provision has long since dropped out of the statute book.

[4] Runkle v. United States, 122 U.S. 543 (1887).

[5] Cf. In In re Chapman, 166 U.S. 661, 670–671 (1897), the Supreme Court held that presumptions in favor of official action preclude collateral attack on the sentences of courts-martial. See also United States v. Fletcher, 148 U.S. 84, 88–89 (1893); Bishop v. United States, 197 U.S. 334, 341–42 (1905), both of which in effect repudiate Runkle.

[6] In exercising his or her executive power under the Constitution, the President speaks and acts through the heads of the several departments in relation to subjects which appertain to their respective duties. The heads of the departments are the President's authorized assistants in the performance of the his or her executive duties, and their official acts, promulgated in the regular course of business, are presumptively the President's acts. Wilcox v. McConnel, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 498, 513 (1839). See also United States v. Eliason, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 291 (1842); Williams v. United States, 42 U.S. (1 How.) 290, 297 (1843); United States v. Jones, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 92, 95 (1856); The Confiscation Cases, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 92 (1874); United States v. Farden, 99 U.S. 10 (1879); Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U.S. 755 (1880).

[7] 42 U.S. (1 How.) 290 (1843).

money in any case whatsoever to disbursing officers of the United States, except under special direction by the President.[8] The Supreme Court held that the act did not require the personal performance by the President of this duty.[9] Such a practice, said the Court, would "absorb the duties of the various departments of the government in the personal acts of one chief executive officer" and be not just impracticable but "impossible."[10] While "[t]he President's duty in general requires his superintendence of the administration," the Court reasoned that "he cannot be required to become the administrative officer of every department and bureau, or to perform in person the numerous details incident to services" which he is technically required by the Constitution and applicable laws to perform.[11] As a matter of administrative practice, in fact, most orders and instructions are attributed to the heads of the departments, even though such orders and instructions are based on powers conferred by statute on the President.[12]

ArtII.S3.3.3 Relationship Between Take Care Clause and President's Removal Power

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

As the Supreme Court has observed, the Constitution vests all executive power in the President, who must "take Care that laws be faithfully executed."[1] Because no single person could fulfill that responsibility alone, the Court notes, "the Framers expected that the President would rely on subordinate officers for assistance."[2] As a result, the Court reasoned that "[t]he President's power to remove—and thus supervise—those who wield executive power on his behalf follows from the text of Article II."[3]

Some early views of the President's removal power grounds this authority in large part in the Take Care Clause. In a 1789 debate in the First Congress concerning whether the Constitution authorizes the President to remove Executive Branch officers unilaterally, for instance, Representative James Madison expressed the view that the heads of certain executive departments should be removable by the President alone. According to him, it was "the intention of the Constitution, expressed especially in the faithful execution clause, that the first magistrate should be responsible" for the executive department, and this responsibility carried with it the power to "inspect and control" the conduct of subordinate

---

[8] 3 Stat. 723 (1823), now covered in 31 U.S.C. § 3324.

[9] See Williams, 42 U.S. at 297.

[10] Id.

[11] 942 U.S. (1 How.) at 297–98.

[12] See 38 Ops. Atty. Gen. 457, 458 (1936). If the President exercises his or her duty through subordinates, the President must appoint them or appoint the officers who appoint them, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 109–143 (1976), and he or she must have the power to discharge those officers in the Executive Branch, Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926).

[1] Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. 2 (U.S. 2020).

[2] Id.

[3] Id.

Executive Officers.[4] Vesting removal power in the Senate jointly with the President would, in Madison's view, "abolish at once the great principle of unity and responsibility in the executive department, which was intended for the security of liberty and the public good."[5]

Over time, however, as the Supreme Court refined its jurisprudence on the President's removal power, it came to characterize the basis of this power as stemming more generally from separation of power principles embedded in the Constitution's scheme, as evidenced by provisions including the Vesting Clause, Take Care Clause, and the Appointment Clause.[6]

ArtII.S3.3.4 Removal Power as the President's Primary Means of Supervision

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

If the President's duty to "take care" that laws are faithfully executed in part provides the basis for his authority to remove the principal officers who wield executive power on his behalf, a related question is whether such duty also entitles the President to substitute his own judgment for that of such principal officers regarding the discharge of such duty.[1] Put another way, does the Take Care Clause allows Congress to vest, in a head of an executive department, certain discretion which the President is not entitled to control, such that the President's only means of supervision is through the exercise of his removal authority?

An 1823 opinion rendered by Attorney General William Wirt asserted the proposition that the President's duty under the Take Care Clause generally required him to do no more than exercise his removal authority when those subordinate officers failed to discharge their duty to execute the laws faithfully, including by removing them or by setting in motion against them the processes of impeachment or of criminal prosecutions.[2]

---

[4] 1 Annals of Cong. 495, 499 (1789). For more information about the 1789 debate, also known as the "decision of 1789", see ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.2 Decision of 1789 and Removals in Early Republic.

[5] Id. Shortly thereafter, however, when the question arose as to the power of Congress to regulate the tenure of the Comptroller of the Treasury, Madison assumed a very different position. He conceded in effect that this office was to be an arm of certain of Congress's own powers and should therefore be protected against the President's removal power. Id. at 611–612. In Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803), Justice John Marshall drew a parallel distinction between the duties of the Secretary of State under the original act which had created a "Department of Foreign Affairs" and those which had been added by a later act. Id. at 166. The former duties were, according to Chief Justice Marshall, entirely political and thus must "conform precisely to the will of the President." Id. The latter duties, on the other hand, were exclusively of statutory origin and sprang from the powers of Congress. Id. Chief Justice John Marshall reasoned that with respect to these duties, the Secretary was "an officer of the law" and "amenable to the law for his conduct," suggesting that Congress may exercise certain removal power over Executive Officers.

[6] For a detailed discussion of the President's removal power and the evolution in its interpretation, see ArtII.S3.3.1 Overview of Take Care Clause through ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.7 Twenty-First Century Cases on Removal.

[1] For more information about the distinction between principal and inferior executive officers, see ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.1 Overview of Principal and Inferior Officers through ArtII.S2.C2.3.11.3 Modern Doctrine on Principal and Inferior Officers.

[2] 1 Ops. Atty. Gen. 624 (1823). See also B. Wyman, The Principles of the Administrative Law Governing the Relations of Public Officers 231–32 (1903) (describing the case of the Jewels of the Princess of Orange, in which the King of the Netherlands requested the return of certain jewels belonging to the Princess of Orange that were allegedly illegally imported into the United States and later seized by officers of the United States Customs; then Attorney General Roger Taney expressed the view that while the President may order the District Attorney to discontinue a prosecution,

In its 1838 decision Kendall v. United States ex rel. Stokes,[3] the Supreme Court agreed that the President's Take Care duty does not foreclose the possibility that Congress may entrust the construction of its statutes to an executive officer other than the President. In that case, the United States owed several mail carriers, who had performed services under contract, money. When Postmaster General Amos Kendall, at President Andrew Jackson's instigation, refused to pay it, Congress passed a special act ordering payment.[4] When Kendall continued to refuse to pay, the mail carriers sued and obtained a mandamus in the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia. The lower court concluded that the duty of the President under the Take Care Clause gave him no other control over the officer than to see that he acts honestly, with proper motives, but no power to construe the law and see that the executive action conforms to it.[5]

The Supreme Court affirmed, rejecting the argument every officer in the Executive Branch is under the exclusive direction of the President.[6] The Court noted that while there are "certain political duties imposed upon many officers in the executive department, the discharge of which is under the direction of the President," it would be "an alarming doctrine" to hold "that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the Constitution."[7] In such cases, the Court continued, "the duty and responsibility grow out of and are subject to the control of the law, and not to the direction of the President."[8] This was especially the case, the Court added, "where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial character."[9] In short, the Court recognized the underlying question of the case to be whether the President's duty to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed" made it constitutionally impossible for Congress ever to entrust the construction of its statutes to anybody but the President, and it answered this in the negative.

ArtII.S3.3.5 Interpretations of Law as Part of the President's Take Care Duties

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Because the interpretation of law and its scope is a necessary prerequisite to any enforcement action, the precise scope of the President's authority to "take Care that the laws be faithfully executed" is informed and shaped by this interpretive task. The power accruing to the decision to comply resides with the District Attorney, and in the event he "still continues a prosecution which the President is satisfied ought not to continue, the removal of the disobedient officer and the substitution of one more worthy in his place would enable the President through him faithfully to execute the law.").

---

[3] 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524 (1838).

[4] See id. at 528.

[5] See id. at 543.

[6] See id. at 610.

[7] Id.

[8] Id.

[9] Id.

the President from such interpretations is daily illustrated in relation to such statutes as the Anti-Trust Acts, the Taft-Hartley Act, and many other statutes.

Nor is this interpretive task the whole story. Not only do all presidential regulations and orders based on statutes that vest power in him or on his own constitutional powers have the force of law, provided they do not transgress the Supreme Court's reading of such statutes or of the Constitution,[1] but in several early cases, the Supreme Court has suggested that the President can sometimes make law in a more special sense. In the famous Neagle case,[2] an order of the Attorney General to a United States marshal to protect a Justice of the Supreme Court whose life has been threatened by a suitor was attributed to the President and held to be "a law of the United States" in the sense of section 753 of the Revised Statutes, and as such to afford basis for a writ of habeas corpus transferring the marshal, who had killed the attacker, from state to national custody. Speaking for the Court, Justice Samuel Miller inquired: "Is this duty [the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed] limited to the enforcement of acts of Congress or of treaties of the United States according to their express terms, or does it include the rights, duties and obligations growing out of the Constitution itself, our international relations, and all the protection implied by the nature of the government under the Constitution?"[3] The Court assumed an affirmative answer to the second branch of this inquiry, after noting several historical precedents.[4] And, in United States v. Midwest Oil Co.,[5] the Court ruled that the President had, by dint of repeated assertion of it from an early date, acquired the right to withdraw, via the Land Department, public lands, both mineral and non-mineral, from private acquisition, particularly given that Congress had never repudiated the practice.[6]

ArtII.S3.3.6 The President's Take Care Duties and International Law

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The President's duty to discharge the responsibilities of the United States in international law raises unique foreign relations considerations. One example of a significant exercise of the President's powers in this context was the closure of the Marconi Wireless Station at Siasconset, Massachusetts, by President Woodrow Wilson—in effort to avoid difficulties with other foreign governments—on the outbreak of the European War in 1914, after the company

[1] United States v. Eliason, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 291, 301–02 (1842); Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U.S. 487, 503 (1885); Smith v. Whitney, 116 U.S. 167, 180–81 (1886). For an analysis of the approach to determining the validity of presidential, or other executive, regulations and orders under purported congressional delegations or implied executive power, see Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281, 301–16 (1979).

[2] In re Neagle, 135 U.S. 1 (1890).

[3] 135 U.S. at 64. The phrase, "a law of the United States," came from the Act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 632). However, in the Act of June 25, 1948, 62 Stat. 965, 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(2), the phrase is replaced by the term, "an act of Congress," thereby eliminating the basis of the holding in Neagle.

[4] Neagle, 135 U.S. at 64–65.

[5] 236 U.S. 459 (1915). See also Mason v. United States, 260 U.S. 545 (1923).

[6] See Midwest Oil, 236 U.S. at 471–72.

refused to assure that it would comply with naval censorship regulations. Justifying this drastic invasion of private rights, Attorney General Thomas Gregory said:

> The President of the United States is at the head of one of the three great coordinate departments of the Government. He is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. . . . If the President is of the opinion that the relations of this country with foreign nations are, or are likely to be endangered, by action deemed by him inconsistent with a due neutrality, it is his right and duty to protect such relations; and in doing so, in the absence of any statutory restrictions, he may act through such executive office or department as appears best adapted to effectuate the desired end. . . . I do not hesitate, in view of the extraordinary conditions existing, to advise that the President, through the Secretary of the Navy or any appropriate department, close down, or take charge of and operate, the plant . . . should he deem it necessary in securing obedience to his proclamation of neutrality.[1]

ArtII.S3.3.7 Impounding Appropriated Funds

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The Take Care Clause has figured in debates between the political branches over the Executive Branch practice of impounding appropriated funds. No definition for this term exists in statute or in Supreme Court case law. One possible definition, though, describes Executive Branch action or inaction that results in a delay or refusal to spend appropriated funds, whether or not a statute authorizes the withholding.

It is difficult to state with certainty how frequently the Executive Branch has used impoundment. In perhaps the earliest example, President Thomas Jefferson delayed spending funds appropriated in 1803 for the purchase of gun boats, a response to international tensions concerning the port of New Orleans.[1] After Congress made the funds available, the President negotiated the Louisiana Purchase, rendering the immediate use of the gun-boat appropriation "unnecessary."[2] Presidents in the nineteenth[3] and twentieth centuries[4] similarly signaled a willingness to delay or withhold spending appropriated funds.

---

[1] 30 Ops. Atty. Gen. 291 (1914).

[1] See Sally K. & William D. Reeves, Two Hundred Years of Maritime New Orleans: An Overview, 35 Tul. Mar. L.J. 183, 186 (2010) (describing the Spanish intendant's refusal to allow American use of the port of New Orleans before its acquisition by the United States).

[2] 10 The Works of Thomas Jefferson in Twelve Volumes 41 (Paul L. Ford ed., 1905) (Third Annual Message to Congress). The next year, President Jefferson reported that the appropriation was slated for use. See Id. at 115 (Fourth Annual Message to Congress) (stating that the 1803 appropriation "is now in a course of execution to the extent there provided for").

[3] See, e.g., Ulysses S. Grant, Special Message to the House of Representatives (Aug. 14, 1876), reprinted in 7 A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents: 1789–1897, at 377 (James D. Richardson, ed., 1898) (asserting that though he approved of an act providing appropriations for river and harbor projects, no funds would be spent on projects that served "purely private or local interest" as opposed to national interests).

[4] See, e.g., H.R. Doc. No. 89–492, at 4 (1966) (message from President Lyndon B. Johnson stating that, as a means of controlling inflation, his Administration would withhold sums appropriated above the levels set forth in the

ArtII.S3.3.7
Impounding Appropriated Funds

Impoundments usually proceeded on the view that an appropriation sets a ceiling on spending for a particular purpose but typically did not mandate that all such sums be spent.[5] According to this view, if that purpose could be accomplished by spending less than the appropriation's total amount, there would be no impediment in law to realizing savings.[6] Impoundments were also justified on the ground that a statute, other than the appropriation itself, authorized the withholding.[7]

Executive impoundment reached its apex under President Richard Nixon, who employed impoundment more frequently than his predecessors.[8] Often, his Administration justified impoundments by stating that different funding levels,[9] or different funding models,[10] were preferable to the ones that Congress had selected when it appropriated the funds.

The Nixon impoundments were scrutinized in congressional hearings.[11] Members of Congress likened the impoundments to an unconstitutional assertion of a line-item veto.[12] By withholding funding for a program, these Members argued, the President could modify or terminate the program without having to veto formally the entire act that made the withheld funds available.[13] Administration officials, on the other hand, located the President's authority to impound funds in, among other places, the Take Care Clause.[14] These officials argued that the President's duty to ensure faithful execution of the laws was not confined to mechanically spending the funds provided in a particular appropriation. Instead, the President had to "consider all the laws" that bore on fiscal policy (e.g., statutes allegedly bearing on inflation) administration's budget request); Budget of the United States Government For The Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1943, at IX (1942) (relaying President Franklin D. Roosevelt's plan to restrict expenditures for certain civilian construction projects so as to focus on the war effort).

---

[5] See H.R. Exec. Doc. No. 44–23, at 2 (1876) (report of Secretary of War James Cameron arguing that spending "the full amount" of an appropriation "was in no way mandatory").

[6] Presidential Authority to Direct Departments and Agencies to Withhold Expenditures from Appropriations Made, 1 Op. O.L.C. Supp. 12, 16 (1937). In 1950, Congress authorized the use of reserves to realize savings. See General Appropriations Act of 1951, ch. 896, § 1211, 64 Stat. 595, 765–66 (1950).

[7] Executive Impoundment of Appropriated Funds: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 92nd Cong. 96 (1971) [hereinafter 1971 Impoundment Hearings] (statement of C. Weinberger, Deputy Director, Off. of Mgmt. & Budget, Exec. Off. of the President) (asserting that to stay within the statutory debt limit President Eisenhower directed that fiscal year (FY) 1958 spending not exceed FY1957 levels).

[8] Josh Chafetz, Congress's Constitution: Legislative Authority and the Separation of Powers 64 (2017) (noting estimates of $18 billion in Nixon-era withholdings and scholarly opinion that the extent of these impoundments constituted "a difference in kind, not simply in degree," from prior impoundments).

[9] Withholding of Funds for Housing and Urban Development Programs, Fiscal Year 1971, 92nd Cong. 163, 165 (1971) (statement of George Romney, Sec. of Transp.) (explaining that the administration did not "intend to accelerate" grant programs it had "scheduled for termination" and that therefore "extra" funds provided by Congress for one fiscal year would not be spent until the next).

[10] Letter to Rep. Clement J. Zablocki, U.S. House of Representatives, from Caspar W. Weinberger, Deputy Director, Office of Management and Budget (Mar. 9, 1971), reprinted in 1971 Impoundment Hearings, supra note 7, at 310 (urging that sums the administration was withholding from infrastructure categorical grant programs be repurposed for a revenue sharing program).

[11] This congressional interest eventually resulted in the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, which establishes the statutory framework that today governs the delay or withholding of budget authority. See Pub. L. No. 93-344, Title X, 88 Stat. 297, 332 (1974).

[12] For a discussion of line-item vetoes, see ArtI.S7.C2.3 Line Item Veto.

[13] See, e.g., Impoundment of Appropriated Funds by the President, Joint Hearings Before the Ad Hoc Subcomm. on Impoundments of Funds of the S. Comm. on Gov't Ops. and the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 59 (1973) (statement of Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey).

[14] Officials also argued that, acting under his foreign affairs or Commander in Chief powers, the President could withhold spending in these areas. See Id. at 271 (statement of Roy L. Ash, Director-Designate, Off. of Mgmt. & Budget, Exec. Off. of the President).

and accommodate the "purposes" of these other laws when deciding whether to spend all, or only some, of the funds appropriated for a particular program.[15]

The constitutional dimensions of impoundment disputes have been confined to the political branches. The Supreme Court has not directly considered the extent of the President's constitutional authority, if any, to impound funds.[16] However, a case decided in 1838, United States v. Kendall,[17] has been cited as standing for the proposition that the President may not direct the withholding of certain appropriations that, by their terms, mandate spending.[18]

In that case, the Court considered a statute directing one official (the Solicitor of the Treasury) to determine amounts the government owed to a mail contractor.[19] A second official (the Postmaster General) was then required to credit the contractor's account according to the Solicitor's findings.[20] The Postmaster General refused to make the full credit.[21] When the contractor then asked the federal courts to order that the full credit be made, the Postmaster General responded that only the President could control his execution of the law.[22] The Court rejected that argument. The President's duty to see that the laws be faithfully executed did not include the power to forbid the execution of a law requiring a precise, definite action, such as updating Post Office accounts to reflect the Solicitor's credit findings.[23]

ArtII.S3.4 Executive Privilege

ArtII.S3.4.1 Overview of Executive Privilege

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The doctrine of executive privilege defines the authority of the President to withhold documents or information in his possession or in the possession of the Executive Branch from the Legislative or Judicial Branch of the government. While the Constitution does not expressly confer upon the Executive Branch any such privilege, the Supreme Court has held that executive privilege derives from the constitutional separation of powers and from a necessary and proper concept respecting the carrying out of the duties of the presidency [15] See id. at 372, 381 (testimony of Joseph T. Sneed, Deputy Att'y Gen. of the United States).

[16] The Supreme Court resolved one impoundment-related dispute on statutory grounds. See Train v. City of New York, 420 U.S. 35, 43–44 (1975).

[17] 37 U.S. 524 (1838).

[18] See, e.g., The President's Veto Power, 12 U.S. Op. Off. Legal Counsel 128, 167 (1988) (noting that the Supreme Court has not recognized "an inherent power to impound" and that Kendall "can be read to support the proposition that the executive's duty faithfully to execute the laws requires it to spend funds at the direction of Congress"). Kendall did not involve foreign affairs or defense duties, where additional considerations might apply for determining the President's authority to engage in impoundment.

[19] An Act for the Relief of William B. Stokes, Richard C. Stockton, Lucius W. Stockton, and Daniel Moore, ch. 284, 6 Stat. 665 (1836)

[20] Id.

[21] Kendall, 37 U.S. at 611.

[22] Id. at 612–13.

[23] Id.

ArtII.S3.4.1
Overview of Executive Privilege

imposed by the Constitution.[1] Although there are various and distinct components to executive privilege,[2] the privilege's foundation lies in the proposition that in making judgments and reaching decisions, the President and his advisors must be free to discuss issues candidly, express opinions, and explore options without fear that those deliberations will later be made public.[3]

Conceptually, the doctrine of executive privilege may well reflect different considerations in different factual situations. Congress may seek information within the possession of the President in the course of exercising its investigatory powers;[4] government prosecutors may seek information in the course of investigating and prosecuting crimes;[5] and private parties may seek information in the possession of the President for use as evidence in either a criminal or civil proceeding.[6] In all of these contexts, the courts have generally assessed any asserted privilege by weighing the President's need for confidentiality against the interests of the party seeking the information.[7]

Today, it is apparent that executive privilege is qualified rather than absolute. For the vast majority of U.S. history, however, the existence and appropriate scope of the privilege was uncertain and nearly untouched by the courts.[8] Chief Justice John Marshall referred to the confidentiality of presidential communications in Marbury v. Madison and during the treason trial of former Vice President Aaron Burr,[9] but in "neither instance [ ] was Marshall forced to definitively decide whether such a presidential privilege existed and if so, in what form."[10] In fact, the judiciary's involvement in addressing the privilege's use in resisting disclosure in the face of either judicial or legislative subpoenas did not begin in earnest until the 1970s and the Administration of Richard Nixon.[11] Prior to the Nixon era, executive privilege's contours were defined, if at all, by historical practice and the actions and interpretations of Congress and the President. And with little further explication coming from the Supreme Court since, the Nixon era remains the defining era of judicial consideration of the privilege.

This lack of judicial involvement is most pronounced in the context of executive privilege disputes between Congress and the President. The Supreme Court has never directly considered the application of executive privilege in the context of a congressional [1] See United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 711 (1974) ("Nowhere in the Constitution . . . is there any explicit reference to a privilege of confidentiality, yet to the extent this interest relates to the effective discharge of a President's powers, it is constitutionally based.").

[2] See CRS Report R47102, Executive Privilege and Presidential Communications: Judicial Principles, by Todd Garvey at 3–5.

[3] Id. at 708.

[4] See, e.g., Senate Select Comm. On Presidential Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

[5] See, e.g., Nixon, 418 U.S. at 686.

[6] See, e.g., Dellums v. Powell, 561 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977).

[7] Nixon, 418 U.S. at 707.

[8] See Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425 (1977).

[9] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 169–70 (1803) (suggesting that "[t]he intimate political relation, subsisting between the president of the United States and the heads of departments, necessarily renders any legal investigation of the acts of one of those high officers peculiarly irksome, as well as delicate; and excites some hesitation with respect to the propriety of entering into such investigation"); United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30, 37 (noting that if a letter to President Jefferson "does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed").

[10] In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 738 (D.C. Cir. 1997).

[11] Id. at 739–40 ("[I]t was not until the 1970s and Watergate-related lawsuits seeking access to President Nixon's tapes as well as other materials that the existence of the presidential privilege was definitively established as a necessary derivation from the President's constitutional status in a separation of powers regime."); see also Id. at 742 ("These lawsuits, referred to generically as the Nixon cases, remain a quarter century later the leading—if not the only—decisions on the scope of the presidential communications privilege.").

investigation.[12] Lower federal court decisions are similarly scarce. The only appellate-level decision to reach the merits of an executive privilege dispute between Congress and a sitting President occurred nearly 50 years ago.[13] In light of this near judicial vacuum, the historical actions and interpretations of the branches necessarily play a significant role in establishing the meaning of executive privilege.

ArtII.S3.4.2 Defining Executive Privileges

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

There is not a single "executive privilege." Instead, a suite of distinct privileges exist, each of different—though sometimes overlapping—scope.[1] The political branches, in support of their often competing interests and priorities, have adopted somewhat divergent views on these different component privileges. Whereas Congress has generally interpreted executive privilege narrowly, limiting its application to the types of presidential, national security, and diplomatic communications referenced by judicial decisions,[2] the Executive Branch has historically viewed executive privilege more broadly, providing protections to different categories of documents and communications that implicate Executive Branch confidentiality interests.[3] Under the Executive Branch's interpretation, these privileges include

- the State Secrets Privilege, which protects certain military, diplomatic, and national security information;[4]

---

[12] The Supreme Court recently issued an opinion addressing congressional subpoenas for presidential records, but that case did not involve an assertion of executive privilege. See Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-760, slip op. at 5 (U.S. July 9, 2020) ("The President did not, however, resist the subpoenas by arguing that any of the requested records were protected by executive privilege."); Id. at 2 ("We have never addressed a congressional subpoena for the President's information.").

[13] See Senate Select Comm. on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974). The D.C. Circuit recently reached the merits of a dispute between the House and a former President. Trump v. Thompson, 20 F.4th 10 (D.C. Cir. 2021), cert. denied, No. 21A272, slip op. (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022) (2022).

[1] In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d at 736 (noting that "executive officials have claimed a variety of privileges to resist disclosure of information"). See also John E. Bies, Primer on Executive Privilege and the Executive Branch Approach to Congressional Oversight, Lawfare (June 16, 2017) ("[A] review of Executive Branch practice identifies a number of categories of information that the Executive Branch, at least, believes may be protected by an invocation of the privilege."), https://www.lawfareblog.com/primer-executive-privilege-and-executive-branch-approach-congressional-oversight.

[2] See H. Comm. on Oversight and Gov't Reform, 110th Cong., Rep. on President Bush's Assertion of Executive Privilege in Response to the Committee Subpoena to Attorney General Michael B. Mukaskey 8 (Comm. Print 2008) (rejecting an executive privilege claim on the grounds that "[t]he Attorney General did not cite a single judicial decision recognizing this alleged privilege"); H.R. Rep. No. 105–728, at 16 n. 43 (1998) ("As the D.C. Circuit has recently held, the doctrine of executive privilege which arises from the constitutional separation of powers applies only to decisionmaking of the President. Since the subject of the Committee's subpoena is not one that does (or legally could) involve Presidential decisionmaking, no constitutional privilege could be invoked here.") (citations omitted)).

[3] See Dep't of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Assertion of Executive Privilege Over Documents Generated in Response to Congressional Investigation into Operation Fast and Furious, 8 Op. O.L.C. 101, 116 (2012) ("The scope of executive privilege includes several related areas in which confidentiality within the Executive Branch is necessary for the effective execution of the laws.").

[4] Id. at 116–17.

- the Presidential Communications Privilege, which generally protects confidential communications between the President and his advisers that relate to presidential decisionmaking, as well as a certain subset of communications not involving the President but that are still made for purposes of advising the President;[5]
- the Deliberative Process Privilege, which protects pre-decisional and deliberative communications within Executive Branch agencies;[6] and
- the Law Enforcement Privilege, which protects the contents of open (and sometimes closed) law enforcement files, including communications related to investigative and prosecutorial decisionmaking.[7]

The Executive Branch has tended to consolidate these various privileges into one "executive privilege," particularly when responding to congressional investigative requests.[8] Congressional committees, on the other hand, have typically distinguished among the different individual privileges.[9]

The executive privileges may appropriately be treated as distinct, not only because of the different communications they protect, but also because the privileges appear to arise from different sources of law, with some more firmly established in judicial precedent than others. In short, the different privileges apply with different strengths and, in the congressional context, are balanced against Congress's Article I powers differently. For example, courts have "traditionally shown the utmost deference" to presidential claims of a need to protect military or diplomatic secrets.[10] The President's more generalized interest in the confidentiality of his other communications, though arising implicitly from the Constitution, has not been "extended this high degree of deference."[11] Because the other privileges have been given less weight, they are assessed differently in the face of an exercise of Congress's investigative powers. For example, when compared to the Presidential Communications Privilege, the Deliberative Process Privilege is more easily overcome by Congress and "disappears altogether when there is any reason to believe government misconduct occurred."[12] Its legal source also appears to be different from the Presidential Communications Privilege, as it arises "primarily" from the

[5] Id. at 116.

[6] See Dep't of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Assertion of Executive Privilege Over Documents Generated in Response to Congressional Investigation into Operation Fast and Furious, 36 Op. O.L.C. 1 (2012).

[7] See Dep't of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Protective Assertion of Executive Privilege Over Unredacted Mueller Report and Related Investigative Files, 43 Op. O.L.C. 374 (2019).

[8] See 8 Op. O.L.C. 101, 116 (reasoning that "[t]he scope of executive privilege includes several related areas"); 13 Op. O.L.C. 153, 154 (reasoning that "the Executive Branch's interest in keeping the information confidential" is "usually discussed in terms of 'executive privilege'").

[9] See H. Comm. on Oversight and Gov't Reform, 110th Cong., Rep. on President Bush's Assertion of Executive Privilege in Response to the Committee Subpoena to Attorney General Michael B. Mukaskey 8 (Comm. Print 2008) ("The Attorney General's argument that the subpoena implicates the 'law enforcement component' of executive privilege is equally flawed. There is no basis to support the proposition that a Law Enforcement Privilege, particularly one applied to closed investigations, can shield from congressional scrutiny information that is important for addressing congressional oversight concerns. The Attorney General did not cite a single judicial decision recognizing this alleged privilege."); H.R. Rep. No. 105–728, at 16 n. 43 (1998) ("As the D.C. Circuit has recently held, the doctrine of executive privilege which arises from the constitutional separation of powers applies only to decisionmaking of the President. Since the subject of the Committee's subpoena is not one that does (or legally could) involve Presidential decisionmaking, no constitutional privilege could be invoked here.") (citations omitted).

[10] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 710 (1974).

[11] Id. at 711.

[12] In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 746 (D.C. Cir. 1997). Given its broad scope, the Deliberative Process Privilege is "the most frequent form of executive privilege raised." Id. at 737.

common law,[13] but may have a "constitutional dimension."[14] Least potent are those executive privileges that arise purely from the common law, which have generally been viewed, at least by Congress, as legally insufficient to justify noncompliance with a congressional subpoena.[15]

ArtII.S3.4.3 State Secrets Privilege

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

In civil cases, the government may invoke the State Secrets Privilege to ensure the government is not forced to reveal military or other secrets. By contrast, in criminal cases, the Sixth Amendment guarantees a defendant compulsory process to obtain witnesses, and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment guarantees access to relevant exculpatory information in possession of the prosecution.[1] Generally speaking, when a judicial order directs the prosecution to provide information to a defendant that the prosecution does not wish to make available, the prosecution has the option of dropping the prosecution to avoid disclosure.[2]

In 1876, the Supreme Court first recognized the State Secrets Privilege in Totten v. United States.[3] Totten involved a breach of contract claim brought by the estate of a former Union Civil War spy against the government for compensation owed for secret wartime espionage services.[4] The Court dismissed the claim because "as a general principle, [ ] public policy forbids the maintenance of any suit in a court of justice, the trial of which would inevitably lead to the disclosure of matters which the law itself regards as confidential."[5] The Court reasoned

---

[13] In In re Sealed Case, the D.C. Circuit determined that "the deliberative process privilege is primarily a common law privilege," but that "[s]ome aspects of the privilege, for example the protection accorded the mental processes of agency officials, have roots in the constitutional separation of powers." 121 F.3d at 745, 737 n.4.

[14] Comm. on Oversight & Gov't Reform v. Lynch, 156 F. Supp. 3d 101, 104 (D.D.C. 2016). The scope and source of the Law Enforcement Privilege is unclear, particularly when asserted in the context of congressional investigations where committees have voiced consistent objections to its use. Congress has previously viewed the Executive Branch's position on the confidentiality of law enforcement information as a nondisclosure "policy" rather than a constitutionally based privilege. See H. Comm. on Oversight and Gov't Reform, 110th Cong., Rep. on President Bush's Assertion of Executive Privilege in Response to the Committee Subpoena to Attorney General Michael B. Mukaskey 8 (Comm. Print 2008).

[15] The Supreme Court recently stated in dicta that the recipients of a congressional subpoena "have long been understood to retain common law . . . privileges with respect to certain materials. . . ." Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-760, slip op. at 12 (U.S. July 9, 2020). This statement is in tension with the congressional practice of treating common law privileges as discretionary and has been subject to some criticism. See CRS Report RL30240, Congressional Oversight Manual, coordinated by Christopher M. Davis, Todd Garvey, and Ben Wilhelm at 62–63.

[1] See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and Rule 16, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. For an early judicial dispute involving executive privilege concerns, see United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30 and 187 (C.C.D. Va. 1807), where Aaron Burr sought certain exculpatory material from President Thomas Jefferson.

[2] See, e.g., Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165 (1969).

[3] 92 U.S. 105 (1876).

[4] Id.

[5] Totten v. U.S., 92 U.S. at 107.

that "[t]he service stipulated by the contract was a secret service; the information sought was to be obtained clandestinely, and was to be communicated privately; the employment and the service were to be equally concealed."[6]

Totten has continued to inform the treatment of claims brought against the government. In 2005, the Supreme Court considered a contract claim brought against the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) by alleged Cold War spies in Tenet v. Doe.[7] Affirming the "Totten" bar,[8] the Tenet Court stated: "Totten precludes judicial review in cases such as respondents' where success depends upon the existence of their secret espionage relationship with the [g]overnment."[9] In 2011, the Supreme Court again applied the Totten bar to dismiss a suit against the United States but this time outside the context of espionage contracts. In General Dynamics Corp. v. United States, the federal government asserted the State Secrets Privilege to prevent disclosing sensitive stealth technology in a defense contract dispute. While the government contractor in General Dynamics had set forth a prima facie valid affirmative defense to the government's allegation of breach of contract,[10] the Court held that the underlying subject matter of the suit rendered it nonjusticiable and the parties must remain "where they stood when they knocked on the courthouse door."[11] Referring to Totten and Tenet, the Court stated: "We think a similar situation obtains here, and that the same consequence should follow."[12] In not finding an enforceable contract, the Court held that "[w]here liability depends upon the validity of a plausible . . . defense, and when full litigation of that defense 'would inevitably lead to the disclosure of' state secrets, neither party can obtain judicial relief."[13] The Court reasoned: "Both parties—the [g]overnment no less than petitioners—must have assumed the risk that state secrets would prevent the adjudication of claims of inadequate performance."[14]

In a separate line of judicial inquiry regarding protection of state secrets outside the context of contract claims, the Supreme Court articulated an analytical framework for the State Secrets Privilege in its 1953 decision in United States v. Reynolds.[15] Reynolds involved multiple wrongful death claims against the government brought by the widows of three civilians who died aboard a military aircraft that crashed while testing secret electronic equipment.[16] The plaintiffs sought discovery of the official Air Force post-incident report and survivors' statements that were in the possession of the U.S. Air Force.[17] The Air Force opposed disclosure of the documents as the aircraft and its occupants were engaged in a secret mission.[18]

While Reynolds recognized that it is the judiciary's role to evaluate the validity of a claim of privilege, the Court declined to require that courts automatically compel inspection of the underlying information. The Court stated: "[T]oo much judicial inquiry into the claim of privilege would force disclosure of the thing the privilege was meant to protect, while a

[6] Id. at 106.

[7] 544 U.S. 1 (2005).

[8] The Totten bar has been labeled a "rule of non-justiciability, akin to a political question." Al-Haramain Islamic Found. Inc. v. Bush, 507 F.3d 1190, 1197 (9th Cir. 2007).

[9] Id. at 8.

[10] General Dynamics Corporation v. United States, 563 U.S. 478, 482 (2011).

[11] Id. at 487.

[12] Id. at 486.

[13] Id. at 486 (quoting Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105, (1876)).

[14] Id. at 491.

[15] 345 U.S. 1 (1953).

[16] Id. at 3.

[17] Id.

[18] 345 U.S. 1 (1953).

complete abandonment of judicial control would lead to intolerable abuses." To evaluate assertions of the State Secrets Privilege, the Reynolds Court identified a two-step analysis. The first requirement is a largely procedural hurdle to assure that the privilege is not "lightly invoked," in which the head of the department in control of the information in question, after "personal consideration," invokes the privilege in writing. The second requirement asks the court to evaluate whether there is a reasonable danger that disclosure "will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged."

The Supreme Court accepted the government's claim, holding that courts "must determine whether the circumstances are appropriate for the claim of privilege, and yet do so without forcing a disclosure of the very thing the privilege is designed to protect."[19] According to the Court, a private litigant's specific showing of necessity for the information should govern how far the trial court should probe. Where the necessity is strong, the trial court should require a strong showing that the privilege is appropriate, but once that is satisfied, the privilege must prevail no matter how compelling the need.[20] While Reynolds dealt with an evidentiary privilege, cases may be "dismissed on the pleadings without ever reaching the question of evidence" in other circumstances.[21]

While Reynolds and Totten remain the foundational cases on the state secrets privilege, the Supreme Court issued a pair of decisions in 2022 that impact the judicial understanding of that privilege. First, in United States v. Zubaydah, the Court determined that a court cannot declare that classified information apparently in the public domain is exempt from the State Secrets Privilege when the United States has not officially confirmed or denied such information.[22] Second, in Federal Bureau of Investigation v. Fazaga, the Court decided that certain Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) provisions, which specifically require courts to review the underlying classified FISA applications and information to determine the lawfulness of surveillance, do not displace the traditional Reynolds privilege that protects information that would harm national security if disclosed.[23]

ArtII.S3.4.4 Presidential Communications Privilege Generally

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Deriving implicitly from the President's powers under Article II and the separation of powers doctrine, the Presidential Communications Privilege (Communications Privilege)

[19] Id. at 8.

[20] Id. at 7–8, 9–10, 11. Privilege is often claimed for information relating to government employee clearances, disciplines, or discharges. See, e.g., Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592 (1988); Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988). After the Court approved a government secrecy agreement for CIA employees, Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980), the government expanded its secrecy program for classified and "classifiable" information. When Congress sought to curb this policy, a federal district judge declared the restrictions void as they encroached on the President's executive powers. Nat'l Fed'n of Fed. Emps. v. United States, 688 F. Supp. 671 (D.D.C. 1988), vacated and remanded sub nom. Am. Foreign Serv. Ass'n v. Garfinkel, 490 U.S. 153 (1989).

[21] Reynolds, 345 U.S. at 11, n.26.

[22] No. 20-827, slip op. (U.S. Mar. 3, 2022).

[23] No. 20-828, slip op. (U.S. Mar. 4, 2022).

protects the confidentiality of the President's decisionmaking process.[1] The Communications Privilege is grounded on the proposition that to make judgments and reach decisions the President and his advisers must be free to discuss issues candidly, express opinions, and explore options without fear that those deliberations will later be made public.[2]

The Communications Privilege is qualified, rather than absolute, and applies only to confidential communications made in support of official presidential decisionmaking that directly involve the President or close presidential advisers.[3] For the vast majority of U.S. history, however, the existence and appropriate scope of the Communications Privilege was uncertain and nearly untouched by the courts.[4] While Chief Justice John Marshall referred to the confidentiality of presidential communications in Marbury v. Madison and during the treason trial of former Vice President Aaron Burr,[5] in "neither instance [ ] was Marshall forced to definitively decide whether such a presidential privilege existed and if so, in what form."[6] In fact, the Judiciary's involvement in addressing the Communications Privilege's use in resisting disclosure in the face of either judicial or legislative subpoenas did not begin in earnest until the 1970s and the Administration of President Richard Nixon.[7] Prior to the Nixon era, the Communications Privilege's contours were instead left to be defined, if at all, by historical practice and the actions and interpretations of Congress and the President.

The years during and immediately following the Nixon Administration are arguably the defining era of the Communications Privilege's judicial development. It was during that time period (1972–1977) that the courts first confirmed the Communications Privilege's existence and began to delineate—but did not significantly develop—its application in criminal and civil proceedings, as well as its use in response to exercises of Congress's oversight and legislative powers.[8] In each of these contexts, courts were asked to resolve significant but unsettled

---

[1] See Nixon, 418 U.S. at 705–06.

[2] Id. at 708. In this sense, executive privilege is partly based on the theory that transparency can inhibit decisionmaking.

[3] See Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425 (1977).

[4] See, e.g., Raoul Berger, Executive Privilege: A Constitutional Myth 1 (1974) (describing executive privilege as a "myth" and a "product of the nineteenth century, fashioned by a succession of presidents who created 'precedents' to suit the occasion.").

[5] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 169–70 (1803) (suggesting that "[t]he intimate political relation, subsisting between the president of the United States and the heads of departments, necessarily renders any legal investigation of the acts of one of those high officers peculiarly irksome, as well as delicate; and excites some hesitation with respect to the propriety of entering into such investigation"); United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30, 37 (noting that if a letter to President Jefferson "does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed"). The Supreme Court addressed the State Secrets Privilege in United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1953) (articulating a "privilege which protects military and state secrets" that "belongs to the Government and must be asserted by it" but "is not to be lightly invoked.").

[6] In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d at 738.

[7] Id. at 739–40 ("[I]t was not until the 1970s and Watergate-related lawsuits seeking access to President Nixon's tapes as well as other materials that the existence of the presidential privilege was definitively established as a necessary derivation from the President's constitutional status in a separation of powers regime."); see also Id. at 742 ("These lawsuits, referred to generically as the Nixon cases, remain a quarter century later the leading—if not the only—decisions on the scope of the presidential communications privilege.").

[8] See, e.g., Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 707 (1974) (assessing the Privilege in the context of a criminal trial); Sirica, 487 F.2d at 717 (assessing the Privilege in the context of a grand jury investigation); Senate Select, 498 F.2d at 731 (assessing the Privilege in the context of a congressional investigation); Dellums v Powell, 561 F.2d 242, 249 (D.C. Cir. 1977) (assessing the Privilege in the context of civil case).

questions of constitutional law, ranging from whether the President is immune from all compulsory process to the scope and force of presidential claims of the Communications Privilege.[9]

ArtII.S3.4.5 Congressional Access to Presidential Information

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Presidents have claimed a right to withhold their communications from Congress since the start of the Republic.[1] Congress's resistance to such claims, however, is equally grounded in history.[2] The resulting, recurring, and often prominent disagreements over what has come to be known broadly as "executive privilege" tend to place in opposition two implied and often competing constitutional principles: Congress's right to obtain information necessary to carry out its legislative functions and the President's interest in protecting the confidentiality of his (and sometimes his subordinates') communications.[3]

Unlike more traditional legal disagreements between parties, resolution of these interbranch executive privilege disputes has not historically come from the courts. Instead, when conflict has been avoided, it has typically been because of a process of compromise and accommodation in which absolute claims—for either access or confidentiality—are relinquished and replaced by a negotiated resolution acceptable to both Congress and the Executive.[4]

The traditional preference for political rather than judicial solutions is supported by the fact that neither Congress nor the President appears to have sought judicial resolution of an

---

[9] President Nixon also asserted the Privilege in the impeachment context in response to subpoenas issued by the House Judiciary Committee. The House did not, however, enlist the aid of the courts in order to enforce its demands for information in that context, and instead chose to respond to the President's refusals by adopting a specific article of impeachment rebuking the President for his failure to comply with the committee's subpoenas. See H. Rep. No. 93-1305, 93rd Cong., at 206–13 (1974).

[1] See In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 736 (D.C. Cir. 1997) ("Since the beginnings of our nation, executive officials have claimed a variety of privileges to resist disclosure of information the confidentiality of which they felt was crucial to fulfillment of the unique role and responsibilities of the executive branch of our government.").

[2] Disputes between Congress and the President over executive privilege can be traced back to the 1790s. See Mark J. Rozell, Executive Privilege: Presidential Power, Secrecy, and Accountability 31–32 (2002) (describing the House's resistance to President Washington's refusal to disclose information relating to the Jay Treaty).

[3] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 711 (1974) ("Nowhere in the Constitution . . . is there any explicit reference to a privilege of confidentiality, yet to the extent this interest relates to the effective discharge of a President's powers, it is constitutionally based."); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187 (1957) ("The power of the Congress to conduct investigations is inherent in the legislative process."). For a thorough discussion of the judicial treatment of executive privilege see CRS Report R47102, Executive Privilege and Presidential Communications: Judicial Principles, by Todd Garvey.

[4] See In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d at 729 ("[G]iven the restrictions on congressional standing and the courts' reluctance to interfere in political battles, few executive-congressional disputes over access to information have ended up in the courts."); see also Breaking the Logjam: Principles and Practice of Congressional Oversight and Executive Privilege, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Federal Courts, Oversight, Agency Action and Federal Rights, Aug. 3, 2021.

interbranch executive privilege dispute until the 1970s.[5] Courts have also been wary of judicially declared outcomes and have generally sought to avoid adjudicating executive privilege disputes, instead encouraging the political branches to settle their differences while noting that judicial intervention should, as a prudential matter, "be avoided whenever possible" or at least "delayed until all possibilities for settlement have been exhausted."[6]

As a result, the judiciary has historically played a limited role in determining how executive privilege may be used to restrict congressional access to information.[7] The Supreme Court has never directly considered applying executive privilege in the context of a congressional investigation.[8] Lower federal court decisions are similarly scarce.[9] The only appellate-level decision to reach the merits of an executive privilege dispute between Congress and a sitting President occurred nearly fifty years ago during President Richard Nixon's administration.[10] In that case, the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities elected to seek a declaratory judgment in the courts with respect to the President's obligations to obey its subpoenas.[11]

Although not involving executive privilege, the Court in its 2020 decision, Trump v. Mazars, nevertheless recognized several important separation of powers-based limitations on Congress's ability to access presidential records.[12] Writing on behalf of the Court, Chief Justice John Roberts began by acknowledging three central limits on all congressional inquiries, regardless of the target of the inquiry: (1) there must be a valid legislative purpose related to a subject of legislation, (2) the purpose of the inquiry must not be for law enforcement or to expose for the sake of exposure, and (3) certain constitutional and common law privileges can limit disclosures of information.[13] The Court, however, viewed these limitations, standing alone, as inadequately checking Congress's powers in a dispute with the Executive Branch.[14]

[5] See Senate Select Comm. On Presidential Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974); see also James Hamilton, The Power to Probe: A Study of Congressional Investigations 197 (1976) (noting that the Senate Select Committee's lawsuit to enforce the subpoena issued to President Nixon was "the first civil action to enforce a congressional subpoena issued to the executive").

[6] See Cheney v. United States Dist. Court, 541 U.S. 913, 389 (2004) ("These 'occasion[s] for constitutional confrontation between the two branches' should be avoided whenever possible"); see also CRS Legal Sidebar LSB10432, Resolving Subpoena Disputes Between the Branches: Potential Impacts of Restricting the Judicial Role, by Todd Garvey.

[7] In addition to other justiciability issues, the Speech or Debate Clause, which generally prevents direct pre-enforcement challenges to congressional subpoenas, also plays a role in limiting litigation connected to Congress's investigatory powers. See CRS Report R45043, Understanding the Speech or Debate Clause, by Todd Garvey.

[8] See Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-760, slip op. at 2 (U.S. July 9, 2020) ("We have never addressed a congressional subpoena for the President's information.").

[9] There has been a recent increase in information access disputes between the branches making their way to the courts. See, e.g., CRS Testimony TE10064, Civil Enforcement of Congressional Authorities, by Todd Garvey. These cases have not, however, directly involved the merits of an interbranch executive privilege disputes.

[10] See Senate Select Comm. on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974). The D.C. Circuit reached the merits of a dispute between a House committee and a former President in 2021. Trump v. Thompson, 20 F.4th 10 (D.C. Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 1350 (2022).

[11] Senate Select, 498 F.2d at 726. The House Judiciary Committee's subpoenas were similarly rejected by the President, but instead of going to the courts for enforcement, the Committee adopted as one of its Articles of Impeachment the refusal of the President to honor its subpoenas. President Nixon's position was set out in a June 9, 1974, letter to the Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. 10 Wkly. Comp. Pres. Docs. 592 (1974). The impeachment article and supporting material are set out in H. Rep. No. 93–1305, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. (1974).

[12] See Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-760, slip op. at 2 (U.S. July 9, 2020).

[13] Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-760, slip op. at 2 (U.S. July 9, 2020).

[14] Id. at 3.

After all, according to Mazars, any paper possessed by a President could relate to a conceivable subject of legislation, possibly allowing Congress significant authority to interfere with the Executive Branch.[15]

Recognizing that the typical limits on the subpoena power did not prevent Congress from attempting to "aggrandize itself at the President's expense," the Chief Justice feared that judicial resolution of such a dispute using only those limits could deter negotiation between the two branches, historically the hallmark of such inquiries, and encourage Congress to seek compliance through the courts.[16] As a result, the Chief Justice instructed lower courts to perform a "careful analysis" using "[s]everal special considerations" that take "adequate account" of the separation of powers principles at stake during a legislative inquiry into the President's records.[17] Specifically, in such a dispute, courts should, among other considerations, (1) carefully assess whether the confrontation can be avoided by relying on other sources to provide Congress the information it needs in light of its legislative objective; (2) "insist" on a subpoena that is no broader than is reasonably necessary to support Congress's objective; (3) consider the nature of the evidence of Congress's legislative purpose, preferring more detailed and substantial evidence to vague or loosely worded evidence of Congress's purpose; and (4) assess the burdens, such as time and attention, the subpoena imposes on the President.[18]

ArtII.S3.4.6 Prosecutorial and Grand Jury Access to Presidential Information

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Recognizing that the "public has a right to every man's evidence," the Supreme Court has held that the President may be required to testify or produce documents in criminal proceedings when required by the courts.[1] This principle dates to the earliest days of the Republic, when Chief Justice John Marshall presided as the Circuit Justice for Virginia over the infamous treason trial of Aaron Burr. In that case, Chief Justice Marshall concluded that President Thomas Jefferson could be subject to a subpoena to provide a document relevant to

---

[15] Id.

[16] Id. While the papers at stake in Mazars were the President's personal records, the Court concluded that the close connection between the Office of the President and its occupant did not diminish the separation of powers concerns at issue, and may have even posed a "heightened risk" given the records' "less evident connection to a legislative task." Id. at 2. The Mazars Court likewise rejected the argument that separation of powers concerns were diminished because the records at issue were in the hands of a third party, as opposed to the President himself. Id. For the Court, the central issue was that the President's information was at stake, and ruling otherwise would have encouraged side-stepping constitutional requirements. Id.

[17] Id.

[18] Id. at 5. The Court observed that "[o]ther considerations may be pertinent as well." Id. at 6. While adopting this four-factor test, the Court rejected the need for a more "demanding" standard that would have required Congress to demonstrate a specific need for particular records that were "critical" to a legislative purpose. Id. at 2 (concluding that imposing a standard akin to the one governing executive privilege claims would "risk seriously impeding Congress in carrying out" inquiries to obtain information it needs to legislate effectively).

[1] See Trump v. Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. (U.S. July 9, 2020).

the trial.[2] Specifically, he declared that, in contrast to common law privileges afforded the King of England, the President was not "exempt from the general provisions of the constitution," like the Sixth Amendment, that provide for compulsory process for the defense.[3] Nonetheless, Chief Justice Marshall recognized that while the President could be subject to a criminal subpoena, the President could still withhold specific information from disclosure based on the existence of a privilege.[4] In the two centuries since the Burr trial, historical practice by the Executive Branch[5] and Supreme Court rulings "unequivocally and emphatically endorsed" Chief Justice Marshall's position that the President was subject to federal criminal process.[6] In 2020, the Court extended the precedent developed in federal criminal proceedings to state criminal proceeding in Trump v. Vance, concluding that the President was not absolutely immune from state criminal subpoenas.[7]

While the President is subject to criminal process, the question remains as to the limits on that process. The Court has recognized several constraints on the ability of a prosecutor to obtain evidence from the President through the use of a criminal subpoena.[8] First, like any citizen, the President can challenge a particular subpoena on the grounds that it was issued in bad faith or was unduly broad.[9] Second, the timing and scope of criminal discovery must be informed by the nature of the office of the President—for example, granting deference in scheduling proceedings to avoid significant interference with the President's official responsibilities.[10] Third, the President can raise subpoena-specific constitutional challenges, arguing that compliance with a particular subpoena would significantly interfere with his efforts to carry out an official duty.[11] As the Court first recognized in United States v. Nixon, one particularly notable constitutionally based challenge that a President can lodge against a criminal subpoena is a claim of executive privilege in certain presidential communications.[12]

---

[2] United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30, 34 (C.C.D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,692D).

[3] See id. (observing that while the King is born to power and can "do no wrong," the President, by contrast is "of the people" and subject to the law).

[4] United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 187, 192 (C.C.D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,694).

[5] Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. (discussing historical practices of Presidents Monroe, Grant, Ford, Carter, and Clinton).

[6] Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 704 (1997) (citing United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 706 (1974)). In rejecting separation of powers challenges to claims that the President is immune from federal criminal process, the Court rejected the argument that criminal subpoenas "rise to the level of constitutionally forbidden impairment of the Executive's ability to perform its constitutionally mandated functions." Id. at 702–03.

[7] See Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. (rejecting the categorical argument that state criminal subpoenas would unduly distract the President, impose a stigma on the presidency, or result in harassment by state prosecutors). The Vance Court also rejected the argument that a state prosecutor should have to satisfy a heightened standard of need before seeking a sitting President's records, absent any constitutional privileges. Id . Importantly, in Vance, the state prosecutor was seeking private presidential records, and no claim of executive privilege was at stake. Id. (Kavanaugh, J., concurring in the judgment). The Court refused to extend the heightened-need standard established in Nixon to private records, discussed infra, reasoning that: (1) Burr and its progeny foreclosed that argument; (2) the heightened-need standard was unnecessary to allow the President to fulfill his Article II functions; and (3) the public interest in fair and effective law enforcement favors "comprehensive access to evidence." Id. (majority opinion).

[8] See id.

[9] Id.

[10] Id.

[11] Id.

[12] 418 U.S. 683, 708 (1974)

In Nixon,[13] the Court confirmed several fundamental principles of the privilege protecting presidential communications.[14] First, Nixon recognized an implied constitutional privilege protecting presidential communications.[15] The Court stated that the "privilege of confidentiality of presidential communications" is "fundamental to the operation of Government and inextricably rooted in the separation of powers" and "the supremacy of each branch within its own assigned area of constitutional duties."[16] The Court held that the Communications Privilege, however, must not be "expansively construed" as it, like other privileges, is "in derogation of the search for truth."[17]

Second, the Court explicitly reaffirmed its role as the "ultimate interpreter of the Constitution" and the privileges emanating from it, noting that it was the Court, and not the President, that must have the final say on the Communications Privilege.[18]

Third, the Court held that the underlying justification for the Communications Privilege related to the "public interest" in the integrity of presidential decisionmaking.[19] "Human experience," the Court reasoned, "teaches that those who expect public dissemination of their remarks may well temper candor with a concern for appearances and for their own interests to the detriment of the decisionmaking process."[20] The Court added that there is a > public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions in Presidential decisionmaking. A President and those who assist him must be free to explore alternatives in the process of shaping policies and making decisions and to do so in a way many would be unwilling to express except privately.[21]

As such, the Court held that "[t]he President's need for complete candor and objectivity from advisers calls for great deference from the courts" and justified a "presumptive privilege for Presidential communications" made in "the exercise of Art. II powers."[22]

Fourth, the Court emphasized that the implied constitutional Privilege was not "absolute" or "unqualified," at least not when founded upon a "generalized" need for confidentiality in "nonmilitary and nondiplomatic discussions."[23] Instead, when the Communications Privilege is invoked in response to a judicial subpoena, a "confrontation with other values arise[s]" requiring courts to "resolve those competing interests in a manner that preserves the essential functions of each branch."[24] The President's interest, therefore, would need to be balanced

---

[13] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974). The Nixon opinion, which was before the Court on expedited direct appeal from the district court decision in Mitchell, was issued with some urgency. Noting the "public importance of the issues presented and the need for their prompt resolution," the Court issued its opinion only sixteen days after oral argument.

[14] Id. at 706 ("[N]either the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances.").

[15] Id. at 711 ("Nowhere in the Constitution . . . is there any explicit reference to a privilege of confidentiality, yet to the extent this interest relates to the effective discharge of a President's powers, it is constitutionally based.").

[16] Id. at 708, 705.

[17] Id. at 709–10 ("These and other interests are recognized in law by privileges against forced disclosure, established in the Constitution, by statute, or at common law. Whatever their origins, these exceptions to the demand for every man's evidence are not lightly created nor expansively construed, for they are in derogation of the search for truth.").

[18] Id. at 704.

[19] Nixon, 418 U.S. at 705.

[20] Id. at 705.

[21] Id. at 708.

[22] Id. at 706.

[23] Id. at 707.

[24] Id.

against the "fundamental and comprehensive" need to "develop all relevant facts" and evidence in a criminal case.[25] In weighing these interests, the Court held the following:

> We cannot conclude that advisers will be moved to temper the candor of their remarks by the infrequent occasions of disclosure because of the possibility that such conversations will be called for in the context of a criminal prosecution. On the other hand, the allowance of the privilege to withhold evidence that is demonstrably relevant in a criminal trial would cut deeply into the guarantee of due process of law and gravely impair the basic functions of the courts.

As a result, the Communications Privilege, when based "only on a generalized interest in confidentiality," "cannot prevail over the fundamental demands of . . . the fair administration of justice" and therefore "must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial."[26]

Finally, Nixon approved a "staged decisional structure." If a President determines that "compliance with a subpoena would be injurious to the public interest he may properly . . . invoke a claim of privilege."[27] Such an invocation creates "presumptive" protections for the subpoenaed material. As a result of these initial protections, a court may only order in camera review when the party has "made a sufficient showing to rebut the presumption."[28] Once the presumptively privileged material is reviewed in camera, a court may then direct the further disclosure of all "relevant" and "admissible" information.[29]

The Nixon opinion made two additional points worth noting. First, the Court repeatedly suggested that its analysis may have been different if instead of a generalized interest in the confidentiality of his communications, the President had asserted a claim of "military or diplomatic secrets."[30] "As to these areas of Art. II duties the courts have traditionally shown the utmost deference to Presidential responsibilities."[31] Second, the Court explicitly disclaimed any attempt to assess the application of the Communications Privilege in a congressional investigation: "we are not here concerned with the balance between the President's generalized interest in confidentiality . . . and congressional demands for information."[32]

---

[25] Nixon, 418 U.S. at 711–12 ("In this case we must weigh the importance of the general privilege of confidentiality of Presidential communications in performance of the President's responsibilities against the inroads of such a privilege on the fair administration of criminal justice.").

[26] Id. at 713.

[27] Id.

[28] Id. at 714.

[29] During that review (at least when the Privilege is asserted in response to a criminal trial subpoena) a court must distinguish between material that is both "probably admissible in evidence and relevant" and that which is not. Id. at 714. The latter material must be "restored to its privileged status" and "accorded that high degree of respect due the President of the United States," while the former would be provided to the requesting party. Id. at 714–16.

[30] Id. at 710.

[31] Id. at 710.

[32] Id. at 712 n.19. Shortly after the Supreme Court's opinion in Nixon, the House Judiciary Committee voted to recommend articles of impeachment against President Nixon for obstruction of justice, abuse of power, and contempt of Congress for his refusal to comply with congressional subpoenas. The contempt of Congress allegation was based on the President's failure to comply with subpoenas issued by the House Judiciary committee as part of its impeachment investigation. H.R. Rep. No. 93–1305 at 4 (1974). On August 9, 1974, before the full House considered the articles of impeachment but after determining that he had lost support in Congress and would not survive impeachment, President Nixon resigned.

ArtII.S3.4.7 Statutory Requirements and Communications Privilege

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

The Supreme Court considered the nature of executive privilege in a statutory context in its 1977 decision of Nixon v. Administrator of General Services (Nixon II).[1] In that case, former President Richard Nixon challenged the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act, a statute that nullified a contract that gave Nixon control over his own presidential records. The Act instead established a process to secure and preserve his records with a government agency.[2] Along with other claims, Nixon argued that provisions of the law permitting the screening and cataloguing of presidential materials by Executive Branch archivists impermissibly infringed on his Privilege. Nixon II was therefore distinct from Nixon I, because it concerned disclosure within the Executive Branch pursuant to a statutory provision, rather than disclosure outside the Executive Branch pursuant to a subpoena.

The Court rejected former President Nixon's position, holding that the statutory arrangement for preservation of the President's records worked only a "very limited intrusion" into the President's confidentiality interests, especially given that the law built in safeguards to prevent the public disclosure of protected materials.[3] Like the previous cases, the Court engaged in a balancing test, evaluating whether the public interest justified such an intrusion, ultimately holding that it did. Congress had acted, the Court determined, based on a variety of "important objectives," including to "preserve the materials for legitimate historical and governmental purposes"; "restore public confidence in our political processes by preserving the materials as a source for facilitating a full airing of the events leading to appellant's resignation"; and based on its "need to understand how those political processes had in fact operated in order to gauge the necessity for remedial legislation."[4]

The Court's view of the severity of the intrusion appears to have been colored by the fact that the claim was being made by a former President.[5] Although recognizing that the Communications Privilege "survives the individual President's tenure" and thus can be invoked by former Presidents to protect covered communications occurring while in office, the Court nonetheless noted that the President's interest in confidentiality is "subject to erosion over time after an administration leaves office."[6]

Nixon II also provided the Court's clearest explanation of the types of communications covered by the Communications Privilege. Interpreting Nixon, the Court held that the "the privilege is limited to communications 'in performance of [a President's] responsibilities,' 'of his

---

[1] Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425 (1977) [hereinafter Nixon II].

[2] Id. at 430–33.

[3] Id. 451 (noting a "consistent historical practice" in which archivists "have performed the identical task in each of the Presidential libraries without any suggestion that such activity has in any way interfered with executive confidentiality").

[4] Id. at 452–54.

[5] See ArtII.S3.4.9 Former Presidents and Communications Privilege.

[6] Nixon II, 433 U.S. at 451.

office,' and made 'in the process of shaping policies and making decisions.'"[7] This passage reflects the fundamental principle that the Communications Privilege does not act as a generalized safeguard for "Presidential privacy," but instead protects the public interest in effective and deliberative presidential decisionmaking. As such, the Communications Privilege applies not to all presidential communications, but only those that bear a relationship to a presidential decision.

Nixon II marked the end of President Nixon's lengthy and largely unsuccessful legal battles over the release of his communications. But the importance of the Nixon-era cases transcends those materials. The cases established the fundamental characteristics of the Communications Privilege: (1) there is a qualified constitutional privilege that provides presumptive protections to confidential communications made to assist presidential decisionmaking; (2) the Communications Privilege can be invoked to resist disclosure of covered communications in various contexts; and (3) the Communications Privilege is not absolute, and can be overcome when the party seeking the information can articulate a sufficient showing of need.

ArtII.S3.4.8 Separation of Powers and Communications Privilege

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

In 2004, the Supreme Court issued Cheney v. United States District Court[1] in which it reaffirmed distinctions first articulated in the Nixon-era cases between civil and criminal proceedings and expounded on the relationship between the Communications Privilege and the separation of powers.

The Cheney decision interacted with the Communications Privilege in a complicated procedural posture, and for this reason the implications of the decision to more traditional scenarios, especially to the congressional context, are difficult to discern. In Cheney, a federal district court had entered orders in a Federal Advisory Committee Act (FACA) lawsuit allowing discovery of documents relating to the structure and operation of the National Energy Policy Development Group (NEPDG), a task force chaired by the Vice President and established to give policy recommendations on energy issues to the President.[2] The George W. Bush Administration, though not asserting executive privilege, challenged that discovery order on the ground that it represented a "substantial intrusion[ ] on the process by which those in closest operational proximity to the President advise the President" in violation of the separation of powers.[3] The district court and the D.C. Circuit rejected the Administration's

[7] Id. at 449 (citations omitted). As such, it was only a "small fraction" of Nixon's complete collection of presidential records that would be covered by the Privilege. Id. at 454.

[1] Cheney v. United States Dist. Court, 542 U.S. 367, 383–91 (2004)

[2] Id. at 376.

[3] Id. at 381. That action was in the form of mandamus, which among other things requires a party to show that there is "no other adequate means to attain the relief" desired. Id. at 403.

arguments, mainly because the Administration had another means to protect its interests; it could assert executive privilege in response to the civil discovery subpoena.[4]

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that when a lower court has allowed "unnecessarily broad" discovery, reviewing courts have authority to "explore other avenues, short of forcing the Executive to invoke privilege."[5] The Court reasoned that to require the Executive Branch to assert the Communications Privilege in such a scenario would ignore the "weighty separation of powers objections raised in the case," because "[o]nce executive privilege is asserted, coequal branches of the Government are set on a collision course."[6] The Court determined that the lower courts had "labored under the mistaken assumption that the assertion of executive privilege is a necessary precondition to the Government's separation of powers objections."[7] Cheney, therefore, appears to suggest that there are separation of powers concerns associated with executive confidentiality issues that attach even before executive privilege is asserted.[8]

Cheney also reaffirmed the principle that the confidentiality interests associated with the Communications Privilege are weighed differently in different types of proceedings. In fact, the nature of the proceeding, whether civil or criminal, appears to affect both sides of the judicially developed balancing test. As for the requesting party, the Court held that "[t]he need for information for use in civil cases, while far from negligible, does not share the urgency or significance of [a] criminal subpoena," where the need for the information "is much weightier."[9] As for the President's interest, the court viewed the potential for a civil subpoena to disrupt the functioning of the Executive Branch as far greater than a criminal subpoena. In the criminal context, "there are various constraints . . . to filter out insubstantial legal claims," but "there are no analogous checks in the civil discovery process."[10] Like past cases, however, Cheney did not address how a congressional proceeding relates to either civil or criminal proceedings.[11]

ArtII.S3.4.9 Former Presidents and Communications Privilege

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other

[4] Id. at 376–77.

[5] Id. at 390.

[6] Id. at 391, 389.

[7] Cheney, 542 U.S. at 391.

[8] Id. at 385 (noting that "special considerations control when the Executive Branch's interests in maintaining the autonomy of its office and safeguarding the confidentiality of its communications are implicated."). See also, Karnoski v. Trump, 926 F.3d 1180, 1205–06 (9th Cir. 2019).

[9] Cheney, 542 U.S. at 384.

[10] Id. at 386 (noting that in the criminal system decisions are made by a "publicly accountable prosecutor subject to budgetary considerations" and subject to the "responsible exercise of prosecutorial discretion").

[11] The Supreme Court did appear to draw a distinction between the criminal process and the legislative process in Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-715, slip op. (U.S. May 12, 2020) ("Unlike in criminal proceedings, where '[t]he very integrity of the judicial system' would be undermined without 'full disclosure of all the facts,' efforts to craft legislation involve predictive policy judgments that are 'not hamper[ed] . . . in quite the same way' when every scrap of potentially relevant evidence is not available. While we certainly recognize Congress's important interests in obtaining information through appropriate inquiries, those interests are not sufficiently powerful to justify access to the President's personal papers when other sources could provide Congress the information it needs.") (citations omitted).

> public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

In Nixon II, the Supreme Court determined that the Communications Privilege continues to protect presidential communications after the conclusion of the Administration within which the communication occurred and may be asserted by the former President.[1] As described above, the Court found that a former President may "legitimately" assert the Communications Privilege to prevent disclosure of his official records after he has left office.[2] The Court reasoned that the confidentiality necessary to ensure the free exchange of ideas between the President and his advisers while the President is in office > cannot be measured by the few months or years between the submission of the information and the end of the President's tenure; the privilege is not for the benefit of the President as an individual, but for the benefit of the Republic. Therefore the privilege survives the individual President's tenure.[3]

The Court's determination appears to have rested on the reasoning that the general purpose of the Communications Privilege—ensuring the provision of frank advice to the President—could be threatened or undermined no matter when the disclosure of the covered communications occurs. Nixon II distinguished former Presidents from incumbents in three important ways. First, the Court explicitly stated that "to the extent that the privilege serves as a shield for executive officials against burdensome requests for information which might interfere with the proper performance of their duties, a former President is in less need of it than an incumbent."[4] Second, the Court concluded that the "expectation of the confidentiality of executive communications" is "subject to erosion over time after an administration leaves office."[5] Thus, the strength of a former President's Communications Privilege claim appears to dwindle as time passes.

Third and perhaps most importantly, the Court determined that because only the sitting President is "charged with performance of executive duty under the Constitution," he is "in the best position to assess the present and future needs of the Executive Branch, and to support invocation of the privilege accordingly."[6] In Nixon II, the fact that President Carte—the sitting President at the time—did not support former President Nixon's privilege claim "detract[ed] from the weight of" Nixon's assertion.[7] In the Court's view, it is the incumbent President who is better situated to make determinations about the need for executive confidentiality, because it is the incumbent President who may suffer the harm that the Communications Privilege purports to protect against if privileged documents were disclosed (namely that current advisers would be dissuaded from giving the incumbent President candid advice).[8] As a result, when the incumbent President does not support a former President's privilege claim, the strength of the claim declines.

The importance of the incumbent's concurrence to a privilege claim by a former President was recently reaffirmed in Trump v. Thompson.[9] Thompson arose from the inquiry conducted

---

[1] Nixon II, 433 U.S. at 446–49.

[2] Id. at 449.

[3] Id. (citations omitted).

[4] Id. at 448.

[5] Id. at 451.

[6] Id. at 449.

[7] Nixon II, 433 U.S. at 449.

[8] Id.

[9] Trump v. Thompson, 20 F.4th 10 (D.C. Cir. 2021), cert. denied, No. 21A272, slip op. (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022).

by the House Select Committee to Investigate the January 6th Attack on the U.S. Capitol (Select Committee). As part of its investigation, the Select Committee requested that the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) produce relevant presidential records from the former Trump Administration pursuant to the Presidential Records Act (PRA).[10] The request sought various categories of White House communications and documents created on or around January 6, 2021. Under the PRA, if any congressional committee requests a presidential record on a "matter within its jurisdiction" that is "needed for the conduct of its business and that is not otherwise available," the National Archives "shall" make the record available.[11] However, consistent with principles established in Nixon and Nixon II, the PRA also preserves the right of both current and former Presidents to assert privilege claims by providing that disclosure by NARA is "subject to any rights, defenses, or privileges which the United States or any agency or person may invoke."[12]

Shortly thereafter, President Joseph Biden determined that under the "unique and extraordinary circumstances" and because of Congress's "compelling need" to understand the "horrific events" of January 6, asserting executive privilege over the requested documents would not be "in the best interests of the United States."[13] Former President Trump disagreed and notified the Archivist that he was asserting the Communications Privilege. After President Biden clarified that he would "not uphold the former President's assertion of Privilege," former President Trump filed suit in federal district court to block NARA from disclosing privileged documents to the Select Committee.[14]

The D.C. District Court in Thompson viewed the case as "a dispute between a former and incumbent President."[15] Citing to Nixon II, the court stated that because the incumbent President is "best suited" to identify and determine the best interests of the Executive Branch, former President Trump's Privilege claim was "outweighed by President Biden's decision not to uphold the Privilege."[16] Moreover, the court reasoned that to side with the former President would not only second guess the sitting President's judgment, but also the Legislative Branch's judgment—for both President Biden and the House agreed that the requested documents should be disclosed.[17]

The D.C. Circuit affirmed the district court decision on appeal. The court acknowledged, with reference to Nixon II, that there was "no question" that former President Trump could assert the Communications Privilege and that the Communications Privilege was "of constitutional stature."[18] Nevertheless, the court held that a "rare and formidable alignment of [three] factors" supported disclosure of the documents to the Committee and outweighed the former President's interest in confidentiality.[19]

First, the court stated that President Biden's determination that it was neither in the Executive Branch's nor the public's interest to assert Privilege over the requested documents

[10] Id. at 16.

[11] 44 U.S.C. § 2205(2)(C).

[12] Id. at § 2205(2).

[13] Thompson, 20 F.4th at 20–21.

[14] Id. at 21–22.

[15] Trump v. Thompson, Civil Action No. 21-cv-2769 (TSC), 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 216812, at *26 (D.D.C. Nov. 9, 2021).

[16] Id. at *29.

[17] Id. at *27–29.

[18] Thompson, 20 F. 4th at 32.

[19] Id. at 33.

"carries immense weight in overcoming the former President's" claim.[20] Consistent with previous case law, the court viewed President Biden as "the principal holder and keeper of executive privilege" and the judiciary as "ill equipped to . . . second guess the expert judgment of the sitting President."[21]

Second, the House had a "uniquely weighty interest in investigating the causes and circumstances" of the January 6 attack on the U.S. Capitol.[22] Indeed, the court noted that having presented a "sound factual predicate" for the requested documents, "there would seem to be few, if any, more imperative interests squarely within Congress's wheelhouse than ensuring the safe and uninterrupted conduct of its constitutionally assigned business."[23]

Third, and "weighing still more heavily" against former President Trump, was "the fact that the judgment of the Political Branches is unified as to these particular documents."[24] The court was unwilling to "needlessly disturb 'the compromises and working arrangements that" the Congress and the President had already reached.[25]

In light of these three factors, the D.C. Circuit held that "the profound interests in disclosure advanced by President Biden and the January 6th Committee far exceed [former President Trump's] generalized concerns for Executive Branch confidentiality."[26] That holding was given added significance by the court's determination that it would have been compelled to reach that conclusion "under any of the tests advocated by former President Trump," including the "demonstrated, specific need" standard from Nixon or the "demonstrably critical" standard from Senate Select.[27] As such, it appears the Select Committee would have been able to overcome the Communications Privilege in this circumstance even if President Biden had supported former President Trump's Privilege claim.

The Supreme Court picked up on this point in denying former President Trump's petition to stay the D.C. Circuit decision.[28] In interpreting the opinion below, the Supreme Court—in an unsigned order—reasoned that Mr. Trump's "status as a former President [ ] made no difference to the court's decision" since the D.C. Circuit had "concluded that President Trump's claims would have failed even if he were an incumbent."[29] Because the former President's assertion of privilege would have been unsuccessful either way, the Court declared the D.C. Circuit's discussion of when executive privilege claims could properly be asserted by former Presidents to be nonbinding dictum.[30]

[20] Id.

[21] Id. at 35.

[22] Id.

[23] Id. at 35–36.

[24] Thompson, 20 F.4th at 37.

[25] Id. at 38 (quoting Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-715, slip op. (U.S. May 12, 2020)).

[26] Id. at 33.

[27] Id. at 41 ("The legislative interest at stake passes muster under any of the tests pressed by former President Trump.").

[28] Trump v. Thompson, No. 21A272, slip op. (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022). The Supreme Court later denied certiorari. No. 21A272, slip op. (U.S. Jan. 20, 2022).

[29] Id. Justice Clarence Thomas would have granted the former President's application. Justice Brett Kavanaugh authored a concurrence to clarify his position that "[a] former President must be able to successfully invoke the Presidential communications privilege for communications that occurred during his Presidency." Id. (Kavanaugh, J., concurring) Once invoked, it appears to be Justice Kavanaugh's view that the tests from Nixon and Senate Select "may apply to a former President's privilege claim as they do to a current President's privilege claim." Id. at 681.

[30] Id. at 680.

ArtII.S3.4.10 Deliberative Process and Law Enforcement Privileges

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Of the various executive privileges, the Deliberative Process Privilege is the one most frequently asserted.[1] The purpose underlying the Privilege is to protect the "'quality of agency decisions' by allowing government officials freedom to debate alternative approaches in private."[2] But the Deliberative Process Privilege applies only to those documents and communications that are predecisional, meaning they are created prior to the agency reaching its final decision, and deliberative, meaning they relate to the thought process of Executive officials and are not purely factual.[3] The Privilege does not protect entire documents. Rather, the Executive Branch must disclose non-privileged factual information that can be reasonably segregated from privileged information in the requested documents. And like the other executive privileges, the Deliberative Process Privilege is overcome by an adequate showing of need.[4]

The idea of the Deliberative Process Privilege was developed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to provide limited protection for communications and documents evidencing the predecisional considerations of agency officials.[5] Over time, the Executive Branch has melded this deliberative process idea with the recognized confidentiality interest in the President's communications with close advisers, such that the privilege would extend to any policy deliberations or communications within the Executive Branch in which the President may have an interest.

The result has been a presumption by the Executive, though regularly contested by Congress, that its predecisional deliberations are beyond the scope of congressional demand. For instance, Attorney General William French Smith advised President Ronald Reagan that "Congress will have a legitimate need to know the preliminary positions taken by Executive Branch officials during internal deliberations only in the rarest of circumstances."[6] According

---

[1] Given its broad scope, the Deliberative Process Privilege is "the most frequent form of executive privilege raised." In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 737 (D.C. Cir. 1997).

[2] Id. at 737 (quoting NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 151 (1975)).

[3] See Assassination Archives & Research Ctr. v. CIA, No. 18–5280, 2020 U.S. App. LEXIS 40001, 5–6 (D.C. Cir. Dec. 21, 2020) ("The privilege covers information that is both 'predecisional' and 'deliberative.' Documents are predecisional if they were 'generated before the adoption of an agency policy,' and deliberative if they 'reflect[ ] the give-and-take of the consultative process.'") (quoting Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Dep't of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 866 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

[4] See Comm. on Oversight & Gov't Reform v. Lynch, 156 F. Supp. 3d 101, 112–14 (D.D.C. 2016) (finding that a congressional committee's need for deliberative materials outweighed the Executive Branch's interest in confidentiality).

[5] See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 85–90 (1973).

[6] Letter from Attorney General William French Smith to President Reagan, October 31, 1981, reprinted in 5 Op. O.L.C. 27, 31 (1981) [hereinafter Smith Letter/Watt]; accord Memorandum to General Counsels' Consultative Group Re: Congressional Requests for Confidential Executive Branch Information, 13 Op. O.L.C. 153, 192 (1989) ("Congress will seldom have any legitimate legislative interest in knowing the precise predecisional positions and statements of particular Executive Branch officials.") [hereinafter Barr Memo]; Letter from Assistant Attorney General Robert Rabkin, Office of Legislative Affairs, DOJ, to Honorable John Linder, Chairman House Subcommittee on Rules and Organization of the House, Committee on Rules, June 27, 2000 at 5–6 ("[T]he Department has a broad confidentiality to this view, the need for the Executive to prevent disclosure of its deliberations is at its apex when Congress attempts to discover information about ongoing policymaking within the Executive Branch. In that case, the Executive has argued, the deliberative process exemption serves as an important boundary marking the separation of powers. When congressional oversight "is used as a means of participating directly in an ongoing process of decisionmaking within the Executive Branch, it oversteps the bounds of the proper legislative function."[7]

The legal justifications asserted by the Barack Obama Administration for withholding documents from Congress during a House probe into Operation Fast and Furious appear to reflect a heavy reliance on the Deliberative Process Privilege. In a letter to the President asking him to invoke executive privilege over the subpoenaed documents, Attorney General Eric Holder noted that "Presidents have repeatedly asserted executive privilege to protect confidential Executive Branch deliberative materials from congressional subpoena."[8] The Attorney General went on to argue that "[i]t is well established that 'the doctrine of executive privilege . . . encompasses Executive Branch deliberative communications.'"[9] The dispute ultimately reached the courts, and although the litigation was eventually settled, a federal district court initially held that after "balancing the competing interests" at stake, in this instance the Deliberative Process Privilege must yield to Congress's "legitimate need" for the documents.[10]

Similar to Deliberative Process Privilege, the Law Enforcement Privilege operates to protect information, the disclosure of which by the Executive Branch would have a chilling effect on conducting "the candid and independent analysis essential to just and effective law enforcement."[11] interest in matters that reflect its internal deliberative process. In particular, we have sought to ensure that all law enforcement and litigation decisions are products of open, frank, and independent assessments of the law and facts—uninhibited by political and improper influences that may be present outside the department. We have long been concerned about the chilling effect that would ripple throughout government if prosecutors, policy advisors at all levels and line attorneys believed that their honest opinion—be it 'good' or 'bad'—may be the topic of debate in Congressional hearings or floor debates. These include assessments of evidence and law, candid advice on strength and weaknesses of legal arguments, and recommendations to take or not to take legal action against individuals and corporate entities."); see also Smith Letter/Watt, supra, at 30 ("congressional oversight interest will support a demand for predecisional, deliberative documents in the possession of the Executive Branch only in the most unusual circumstances").

---

[7] Smith Letter/Watt at 30; see also Statement of Assistant Attorney General William H. Rehnquist, reprinted in Executive Privilege: The Withholding of Information by the Executive: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 92nd Cong., 1st Sess. 424 ("The notion that the advisors whom he has chosen should bear some sort of a hybrid responsibility to opinion makers outside of the government, which notion in practice would inevitably have the effect of diluting their responsibility to him, is entirely inconsistent with our tripartite systems of government. The President is entitled to undivided and faithful advice from his subordinates, just as Senators and Representatives are entitled to the same sort of advice from their legislative and administrative assistants, and judges to the same sort of advice from their law clerks.").

[8] Letter to President Barack Obama from Eric Holder, Attorney General, June 19, 2012, at 3.

[9] Id.

[10] Comm. on Oversight & Gov't Reform v. Lynch, 156 F. Supp. 3d 101, 112, 115 (D.D.C. 2016).

[11] Letter from Assistant Attorney General Robert Rabkin, Office of Legislative Affairs, DOJ, to Honorable John Linder, Chairman House Subcommittee on Rules and Organization of the House, Committee on Rules, June 27, 2000 at 5–6 ("The foregoing concerns apply with special force to Congressional requests for prosecution and declination memoranda and similar documents. These are extremely sensitive law enforcement materials. The Department's attorneys are asked to render unbiased, professional judgments about the merits of potential criminal and civil law enforcement cases. If their deliberative documents were made subject to Congressional challenge and scrutiny, we would face a grave danger that they would be chilled from providing the candid and independent analysis essential to just and effective law enforcement or just as troubling, that our assessments of the strengths and weaknesses of evidence of the law, before they are presented in court. That may result in an unfair advantage to those who seek public funds and deprive the taxpayers of confidential representation enjoyed by other litigants."). See also Dep't of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel, Protective Assertion of Executive Privilege Over Unredacted Mueller Report and Related Investigative Files, 43 Op. O.L.C. 374 (2019).

ArtII.S3.5 Presidential Immunity

ArtII.S3.5.1 Presidential Immunity to Suits and Official Conduct

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

In its 1867 decision Mississippi v. Johnson, the Supreme Court established that the President is largely beyond the reach of the judiciary by holding that it could not direct President Andrew Johnson in how he exercised his "purely executive and political" powers.[1] The Court stated, it had "no jurisdiction . . . to enjoin the President in the performance of his official duties."[2]

In subsequent decisions, however, the Court made clear that Johnson does not stand for the proposition that the President is immune from judicial process. For example, in United States v. Nixon,[3] the Court held that President Richard Nixon was amenable to a subpoena to produce evidence for use in a federal criminal case. There, the President had argued that he was immune to judicial process, claiming "that the independence of the Executive Branch within its own sphere insulates a President from a judicial subpoena in an ongoing criminal prosecution."[4] The Supreme Court unanimously disagreed, holding that "neither the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances."[5] The Court noted that the constitutional duty of courts "to do justice in criminal prosecutions" was counterbalanced by the claim of presidential immunity. To accept the President's argument, the Court further reasoned, would undermine the separation of powers that was at the core of "a workable government" as well as "gravely impair the role of the courts under Art. III."[6]

Throughout the Watergate investigation, it was unclear whether the President could be subject to criminal prosecution prior to being convicted upon impeachment.[7] The Court, however, resolved that courts may require the President to testify or produce documents in

---

[1] 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1867). The Court declined to express an opinion on "whether, in any case, the President of the United States may be required, by the process of this court, to perform a purely ministerial act under a positive law, or may be held amenable, in any case, otherwise than by impeachment for crime." 71 U.S. at 498. See Franklin v. Massachusetts, 505 U.S. 788, 825–28 (1992) (Scalia, J., concurring). In NTEU v. Nixon, 492 F.2d 587 (D.C. Cir. 1974), the court held that it could issue a writ of mandamus to compel the President to perform a ministerial act, although it said that if any other officer were available to whom the writ could run, it should be applied to him.

[2] Johnson, 71 U.S. at 501.

[3] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974)

[4] 418 U.S. at 706.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 706–07. The lower courts considered the issue more fully. In re Grand Jury Subpoena to Richard M. Nixon, 360 F. Supp. 1, 6–10 (D.D.C. 1973) (Judge Sirica), aff'd sub nom., Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700, 708–712 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (en banc) (refusing to find President immune from process). Assessments of the subpoena of President Jefferson in the Burr trial have conflicted. United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 187 (No. 14694) (C.C.D.Va. 1807). For the history, see Freund, Foreword: On Presidential Privilege, The Supreme Court, 1973 Term, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 13, 23–30 (1974).

[7] The Impeachment Clause, Article I, § 3, cl. 7, provides that a party convicted upon impeachment shall nonetheless be liable for criminal proceedings. Gouveneur Morris in the Convention and Alexander Hamilton in the criminal proceedings.[8] This principle dates to the earliest days of the Republic, when Chief Justice John Marshall presided as the Circuit Justice for Virginia over the treason trial of Aaron Burr. In that case, Chief Justice Marshall concluded that President Thomas Jefferson could be subject to a subpoena to provide a document relevant to the trial.[9] Specifically, Chief Justice Marshall declared that, in contrast to common law privileges afforded the King of England, the President was not "exempt from the general provisions of the constitution," like the Sixth Amendment, which provides the defense compulsory process.[10]

Nonetheless, Chief Justice Marshall recognized that while the President could be subject to a criminal subpoena, the President could still withhold information from disclosure based on executive privilege.[11] In the two centuries since the Burr trial, the Executive Branch's practices[12] and Supreme Court rulings "unequivocally and emphatically endorsed" Chief Justice Marshall's position that the President was subject to federal criminal process.[13] In its 2020 opinion in Trump v. Vance, the Court extended this precedent to state criminal proceedings, concluding that the President was not absolutely immune from state criminal subpoenas.[14]

Finally, with respect to civil liability, the Court held in Nixon v. Fitzgerald that the President is absolutely immune in actions for civil damages for all acts within the "outer perimeter" of his official duties.[15] The Court's close decision was premised on the President's "unique position in the constitutional scheme," that is, the Court conducted a "kind of 'public policy' analysis" of the "policies and principles that may be considered implicit in the nature of the President's office in a system structured to achieve effective government under a constitutionally mandated separation of powers."[16] Although the Constitution expressly afforded Members of Congress immunity in matters arising from "speech or debate" and was silent on presidential immunity, the Court nonetheless considered immunity to be "a functionally mandated incident of the President's unique office, rooted in the constitutional tradition of the separation of powers and supported by our history."[17]

Federalist Papers asserted that a criminal trial would follow a successful impeachment. See 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 500 (Max Farrand ed., 1937); The Federalist Nos. 65 & 69.

[8] See Trump v. Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. (July 9, 2020) (recognizing that the "public has a right to every man's evidence").

[9] See United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30, 34 (C.C.D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,692D).

[10] See id. (observing that while the King is born to power and can "do no wrong," the President, by contrast, is "of the people" and subject to the law).

[11] See United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 187, 192 (C.C.D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,694).

[12] See Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. at 7–9 (discussing historical practices of Presidents James Monroe, Ulysses S. Grant, Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter, and William Clinton).

[13] Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 704 (1997) (citing United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 706 (1974)). In rejecting separation of powers challenges to claims that the President is immune from federal criminal process, the Court rejected the argument that criminal subpoenas "rise to the level of constitutionally forbidden impairment of the Executive's ability to perform its constitutionally mandated functions." Id. at 702–03.

[14] See Vance, No. 19-635, slip op. at 12–15 (rejecting the categorical argument that state criminal subpoenas would unduly distract the President, impose a stigma on the presidency, or result in harassment by state prosecutors). The Vance Court also rejected the argument that a state prosecutor should satisfy a heightened standard of need when seeking a sitting President's records. Id. at 15–16. More important, in Vance, the state prosecutor sought private presidential records, and executive privilege was not at issue. Id. (Kavanaugh, J., concurring in the judgment). The Court refused to extend the heightened-need standard established in Nixon to private records, discussed infra, reasoning that: (1) Burr and its progeny foreclosed that argument; (2) the heightened-need standard was unnecessary to allow the President to fulfill his Article II functions; and (3) the public interest in fair and effective law enforcement favors "comprehensive access to evidence." Id. (majority opinion).

[15] Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982)

[16] Id. at 748.

[17] Id. at 749.

While the Court relied, in part, upon its practice of finding immunity for officers, such as judges, for whom the Constitution is silent, but for which a long common-law history exists, and in part upon historical evidence, which it admitted was fragmentary and ambiguous,[18] the Court focused on the fact that the President is different from all other executive officials. The President is charged with a long list of "supervisory and policy responsibilities of utmost discretion and sensitivity,"[19] and diversion of his energies by concerns with private lawsuits would "raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government."[20] Moreover, the presidential privilege is rooted in the separation of powers doctrine, counseling courts to tread carefully before intruding. While some interests are important enough to require judicial action, the Court reasoned that "merely private suit[s] for damages based on a President's official acts" do not serve this "broad public interest" necessitating the courts to act.[21] Finally, qualified immunity would not adequately protect the President, because judicial inquiry into a functional analysis of his actions would bring with it the evil immunity it was to prevent; absolute immunity was required.[22]

ArtII.S3.5.2 Presidential Immunity to Suits and Unofficial Conduct

Article II, Section 3:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

In Clinton v. Jones,[1] the Court, in a case of first impression, held that President William Clinton did not have qualified immunity from civil suit for conduct alleged to have taken place prior to his election, and therefore denied President Clinton's request to delay both the trial and discovery. The Court held that its precedents affording the President immunity from suit for his official conduct—primarily so that the President could perform his duties effectively absent fear that a particular decision might lead to personal liability—did not apply when the alleged conduct at issue had occurred before his election. Moreover, the Supreme Court observed, the separation of powers doctrine did not require a stay of all private actions against the President, as the trial court had sufficient powers to accommodate the President's schedule and his workload so as not to impede the President from performing his duties. Finally, the Court stated that allowing such suits to proceed would not generate a large volume of politically motivated harassing and frivolous litigation. Congress has the power, the Court advised, if it should think necessary, to protect the President.[2].

---

[18] Id. at 750–52 n.31.

[19] Id. at 750.

[20] Id. at 751.

[21] Id. at 754.

[22] Id. at 755–57. Justices Byron White, William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and Henry Blackmun dissented. The Court reserved decision on whether Congress could expressly create a damages action against the President and abrogate immunity, id. at 748–49 n.27, thus appearing to disclaim that the Constitution mandated the decision; Chief Justice Warren Burger disagreed with the implication of this footnote, id. at 763–64 n.7 (concurring opinion), and the dissenters noted they agreed with the Chief Justice on this point. Id. at 770 & n.4.

[1] 520 U.S. 681 (1997)

[2] 457 U.S. at 749.

ArtII.S3.5.2
Presidential Immunity to Suits and Unofficial Conduct

While courts may be unable to compel the President to act or prevent him from acting, his acts, when performed, are generally subject to judicial review and disallowance. Typically, the President's subordinates, through whom he acts, may be sued pursuant to a legal fiction to enjoin committing acts that might lead to irreparable damage[3] or to compel by writ of mandamus performing a duty required by law.[4] Such suits are usually brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.[5] In common law, courts may hold a subordinate executive officer personally liable for damages that resulted from any act the officer committed that was beyond his authority,[6] although he has immunity for anything, even malicious wrongdoing, that he does in performing his duties.[7]

Different rules prevail when a plaintiff sues an officer for wrongs based on a "constitutional tort."[8] The Court has suggested that, in some "sensitive" areas, officers acting in the "outer perimeter" of their duties may be accorded absolute immunity from liability.[9] To reach such officers for acts for which they can be held responsible, courts must use the general "federal question" jurisdictional statute.[10]

---

[3] E.g., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) (suit to enjoin Secretary of Commerce to return steel mills seized on President's order); Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981) (suit against Secretary of Treasury to nullify presidential orders on Iranian assets). See also Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad, 147 U.S. 165 (1893); Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U.S. 605 (1912).

[4] E.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803) (suit against Secretary of State to compel delivery of commissions of office); Kendall v. United States ex rel. Stokes, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524 (1838) (suit against Postmaster General to compel payment of money owed under act of Congress); Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 497 (1840) (suit to compel Secretary of Navy to pay a pension).

[5] This was based on the theory that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia had inherited, via the common law of Maryland, the jurisdiction of the King's Bench "over inferior jurisdictions and officers." Kendall v. United States ex rel. Stokes, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524, 614, 620–21 (1838). Congress has since authorized federal district courts outside the District of Columbia to entertain such suits. 76 Stat. 744 (1962), 28 U.S.C. §1361.

[6] E.g., Little v. Barreme, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 170 (1804); Bates v. Clark, 95 U.S. 204 (1877); United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196 (1882); Virginia Coupon Cases (Poindexter v. Greenhow), 114 U.S. 270 (1885); Belknap v. Schild, 161 U.S. 10 (1896).

[7] Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U.S. 483 (1896); Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564 (1959). See Westfall v. Erwin, 484 U.S. 292 (1988) (an action must be discretionary in nature as well as within the scope of employment, before a federal official is entitled to absolute immunity). Following the Westfall decision, Congress enacted the Federal Employees Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act of 1988 (the Westfall Act), which authorized the Attorney General to certify that an employee was acting within the scope of his office or employment at the time an incident occurred that led to a lawsuit; upon certification, the employee is dismissed from the action, and the United States is substituted. As a result, sometimes the action will be dismissed against the government because the government has not waived sovereign immunity under the Federal Tort Claims Act. United States v. Smith, 499 U.S. 160 (1991) (the Westfall Act bars suit against federal employee even if sovereign immunity forecloses suit against the government). Cognizant of the temptation of the government to immunize both itself and its employee, the Court in Gutierrez de Martinez v. Lamagno, 515 U.S. 417 (1995), held that an Attorney General's certification is subject to judicial review.

[8] The Supreme Court recognized an implied cause of action against officers accused of constitutional violations in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). In Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478 (1978), which concerned a Bivens action, the Court distinguished between common-law torts and constitutional torts and denied high federal officials, including cabinet secretaries, absolute immunity, in favor of the qualified immunity Congress had previously accorded high state officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. In Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982), the Court denied presidential aides derivative absolute presidential immunity, but it modified the rules of qualified immunity, making it more difficult to hold such aides, other federal officials, and state and local officials, liable for constitutional torts. In Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511 (1985), the Court extended qualified immunity to the Attorney General for authorizing a warrantless wiretap in a case involving domestic national security. Although the Court later held such warrantless wiretaps violated the Fourth Amendment, at the time of the Attorney General's authorization, this interpretation was not "clearly established," and Harlow immunity protected officials exercising discretion on such open questions. See also Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987) (in an exceedingly opaque opinion, the Court extended similar qualified immunity to FBI agents who conducted a warrantless search).

[9] Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 812 (1982)

[10] See 28 U.S.C. § 1331. On deleting the jurisdictional amount, see Pub. L. No. 94-574, 90 Stat. 2721 (1976), and Pub. L. No. 96-486, 94 Stat. 2369 (1980). If such suits are brought in state courts, they can be removed to federal district courts. 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a). See 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

ArtII.S3.5.3 Qualified Immunity Doctrine

Article II, Section 2, Clause 2:

> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

While the courts may be unable to compel the President to act or to prevent him from acting, his acts, when performed, are in proper cases subject to judicial review and disallowance. Typically, the subordinates through whom he acts may be sued, in a form of legal fiction, to enjoin the commission of acts which might lead to irreparable damage[1] or to compel by writ of mandamus the performance of a duty definitely required by law.[2] Such suits are usually brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.[3] In suits under the common law, a subordinate executive officer may be held personally liable in damages for any act done in excess of authority,[4] although immunity exists for anything, even malicious wrongdoing, done in the course of his duties.[5]

Different rules prevail when such an official is sued for a "constitutional tort" for wrongs allegedly in violation of our basic charter,[6] although the Court has hinted that in some

---

[1] E.g., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) (suit to enjoin Secretary of Commerce to return steel mills seized on President's order); Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981) (suit against Secretary of Treasury to nullify presidential orders on Iranian assets). See also Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad, 147 U.S. 165 (1893); Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U.S. 605 (1912).

[2] E.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803) (suit against Secretary of State to compel delivery of commissions of office); Kendall v. United States ex rel. Stokes, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524 (1838) (suit against Postmaster General to compel payment of money owed under act of Congress); Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 497 (1840) (suit to compel Secretary of Navy to pay a pension).

[3] This was originally on the theory that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia had inherited, via the common law of Maryland, the jurisdiction of the King's Bench "over inferior jurisdictions and officers." Kendall v. United States ex rel. Stokes, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524, 614, 620–21 (1838). Congress has now authorized federal district courts outside the District of Columbia also to entertain such suits. 76 Stat. 744 (1962), 28 U.S.C. § 1361.

[4] E.g., Little v. Barreme, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 170 (1804); Bates v. Clark, 95 U.S. 204 (1877); United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196 (1882); Virginia Coupon Cases (Poindexter v. Greenhow), 114 U.S. 270 (1885); Belknap v. Schild, 161 U.S. 10 (1896).

[5] Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U.S. 483 (1896); Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564 (1959). See Westfall v. Erwin, 484 U.S. 292 (1988) (action must be discretionary in nature as well as being within the scope of employment, before federal official is entitled to absolute immunity). Following the Westfall decision, Congress enacted the Federal Employees Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act of 1988 (the Westfall Act), which authorized the Attorney General to certify that an employee was acting within the scope of his office or employment at the time of the incident out of which a suit arose; upon certification, the employee is dismissed from the action, and the United States is substituted, the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) then governing the action, which means that sometimes the action must be dismissed against the government because the FTCA has not waived sovereign immunity. United States v. Smith, 499 U.S. 160 (1991) (Westfall Act bars suit against federal employee even when an exception in the FTCA bars suit against the government). Cognizant of the temptation of the government to immunize both itself and its employee, the Court in Gutierrez de Martinez v. Lamagno, 515 U.S. 417 (1995), held that the Attorney General's certification is subject to judicial review.

[6] An implied cause of action against officers accused of constitutional violations was recognized in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). In Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478 (1978), a Bivens action, the Court distinguished between common-law torts and constitutional torts and denied high federal officials, including cabinet secretaries, absolute immunity, in favor of the qualified immunity previously accorded high state officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. In Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982), the Court denied presidential aides derivative absolute presidential immunity, but it modified the rules of qualified immunity, making it more difficult to hold such aides, other federal officials, and indeed state and local officials, liable for constitutional torts. In Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511 (1985), the Court extended qualified immunity to the Attorney General for "sensitive" areas officials acting in the "outer perimeter" of their duties may be accorded an absolute immunity from liability.[7] Jurisdiction to reach such officers for acts for which they can be held responsible must be under the general "federal question" jurisdictional statute, which, as recently amended, requires no jurisdictional amount.[8]

Section 4—Impeachment

ArtII.S4.1 Overview of Impeachment Clause

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The Constitution gives Congress the authority to impeach and remove the President,[1] Vice President, and all federal "civil officers" for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.[2] This tool was inherited from English practice, in which Parliament impeached and convicted ministers and favorites of the Crown in a struggle to rein in the Crown's power.

Congress's power of impeachment is an important check on the Executive and Judicial Branches, recognized by the Framers as a crucial tool for holding government officers accountable for violations of the law and abuses of power.[3] Congress has most notably employed the impeachment tool against the President and federal judges, but all federal civil officers are subject to removal by impeachment.[4] The Senate has also concluded (by majority vote) on various occasions that an official impeached while in office remains subject to trial, conviction, and imposition of the penalty of disqualification even after he or she leaves office.[5] The practice of impeachment makes clear, however, that Members of Congress are not civil officers subject to impeachment and removal.[6] authorizing a warrantless wiretap in a case involving domestic national security. Although the Court later held such warrantless wiretaps violated the Fourth Amendment, at the time of the Attorney General's authorization this interpretation was not "clearly established," and the Harlow immunity protected officials exercising discretion on such open questions. See also Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987) (in an exceedingly opaque opinion, the Court extended similar qualified immunity to FBI agents who conducted a warrantless search).

---

[7] Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 812 (1982).

[8] See 28 U.S.C. § 1331. On deleting the jurisdictional amount, see Pub. L. No. 94-574, 90 Stat. 2721 (1976), and Pub. L. No. 96-486, 94 Stat. 2369 (1980). If such suits are brought in state courts, they can be removed to federal district courts. 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a).

[1] The Constitution contains a number of provisions that are relevant to the impeachment of federal officials. Article I, Section 2, Clause 5 grants the sole power of impeachment to the House of Representatives; Article I, Section 3, Clause 6 assigns the Senate sole responsibility to try impeachments; Article I, Section 3, Clause 7 provides that the sanctions for an impeached and convicted individual are limited to removal from office and potentially a bar from holding future office, but an impeachment proceeding does not preclude criminal liability; Article II, Section 2, Clause 1 provides that the President enjoys the pardon power, but it does not extend to cases of impeachment; and Article II, Section 4 defines which officials are subject to impeachment and what kinds of misconduct constitute impeachable behavior. Article III does not mention impeachment expressly, but Section 1, which establishes that federal judges shall hold their seats during good behavior, is widely understood to provide the unique nature of judicial tenure. And Article III, Section 2, Clause 3 provides that trials, "except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by jury."

[2] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[3] See The Federalist Nos. 65, 81 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

[4] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4; see ArtII.S4.4.5 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1865–1900).

[5] See 167 Cong. Rec. S609 (daily ed. Feb. 9, 2021) (determining that "Donald John Trump is subject to the jurisdiction of a Court of Impeachment for acts committed while President of the United States, notwithstanding the expiration of his term in that office"); Jared P. Cole & Todd Garvey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R46013, Impeachment and the Constitution 47–48 (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R46013.

[6] See ArtII.S4.4.3 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1789–1860).

While judicial precedents inform the effective substantive meaning of various provisions of the Constitution, impeachment is at bottom a unique political process largely unchecked by the judiciary. While the meaning of treason and bribery is relatively clear, the scope of high crimes and misdemeanors lacks a formal definition and has been fleshed out over time, in a manner perhaps analogous to the common law, through the practice of impeachments in the United States Congress.[7] The type of behavior that qualifies as impeachable conduct, and the circumstances in which impeachment is an appropriate remedy for such actions, are thus determined by, among other things, competing political interests, changing institutional relationships among the three branches of government, and legislators' interaction with and accountability to the public.[8] The weight of historical practice, rather than judicial precedent, is thus central to understanding the nature of impeachment in the United States.

ArtII.S4.2 Offices Eligible for Impeachment

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The Constitution provides that "[t]he President, Vice President, and all civil Officers of the United States" are subject to removal from office upon impeachment and conviction.[1] However, neither the text nor early historical sources precisely delineate who qualifies as a "civil officer." For example, debates at the Constitutional Convention do not appear to reveal the scope of who may be impeached beyond the provision's applicability to the President.[2] And while the Federalist Papers emphasized that the power of impeachment serves as a check on the Executive[3] and Judicial Branches,[4] they did not outline exactly what types of officials were considered to be civil officers.[5]

Historical practice thus informs the understanding of who qualifies as a civil officer. Aside from the President and Vice President, who are plainly identified in the Constitution's text as impeachable officials, historical practice indicates that federal judges clearly qualify as officers subject to impeachment and removal, as the majority of proceedings have applied to those positions.[6] Congress has also impeached the head of a cabinet-level Executive department.[7]

---

[7] 2 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 762 (1833) ("Not but that crimes of a strictly legal character fall within the scope of the power, (for, as we shall presently see, treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanours are expressly within it;) but that it has a more enlarged operation, and reaches, what are aptly termed, political offences, growing out of personal misconduct, or gross neglect, or usurpation, or habitual disregard of the public interests, in the discharge of the duties of political office. These are so various in their character, and so indefinable in their actual involutions, that it is almost impossible to provide systematically for them by positive law."); id. §§ 795–98.

[8] See Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis x--xi (2000). See also Story, supra note 7, at § 762.

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[2] Statements from at least one delegate indicate that participants at the Constitutional Convention assumed that judges were subject to impeachment. See 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 66 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (describing Rufus King's observation that judges would be impeachable because they hold their office during good behavior).

[3] The Federalist No. 66 (Alexander Hamilton).

[4] Id. at No. 79; Id. at No. 81; see generally ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause et seq.

[5] See, e.g., Va. Const. of 1776, para. 14 (providing that the chief executive of the state could only be impeached after leaving office); Del. Const. of 1776, art. 23 (same).

[6] See List of Individuals Impeached by the House of Representatives, U.S. House of Representatives, http://history.house.gov/Institution/Impeachment/Impeachment-List/ (last visited Jan. 24, 2018).

While this indicates a congressional understanding that high-level Executive officers may be subject to impeachment, it is unclear how far down the ranks of the federal bureaucracy this principle travels.[8]

The second impeachment trial of President Donald Trump centered on the question of whether former officials remain subject to trial by the Senate after leaving office. There is historical evidence to support an original understanding that former officials remain subject to conviction and punishment by the Senate for actions taken while in office.[9] The constitutional text, however, does not directly address the question. Former President Trump's attorneys viewed the Constitution's command that "[t]he President, Vice President and all Civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment . . . and Conviction," as supporting a requirement that the impeachment process applies only to officials who are holding office during the impeachment proceedings.[10] Justice Joseph Story, in his influential Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, similarly argued that "the language of the constitution may create some doubt, whether [disqualification] can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office."[11] Moreover, to extend the impeachment process to former officials could be viewed as in tension with the Constitution's otherwise clear break from the British model, which permitted impeachment of private citizens.[12]

But it has also been argued, including by the House managers in the second Trump trial, that the constitutionally enumerated punishments of removal from office and disqualification from future office are distinct components of the remedy for impeachable misconduct.[13] The fact that an official has left office, and is therefore no longer subject to removal, does not "exempt" them from the remaining penalty of disqualification.[14] Moreover, if impeachment does not extend to officials who are no longer in office, then an important aspect of the [7] See 3 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States §§ 2444–68 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3.pdf [hereinafter Hinds]; see infra ArtII.S4.4.5 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1865–1900).

[8] Judicial interpretations of which positions qualify as officers under the Appointments Clause may shed light on which Executive Branch positions are filled by civil officers that are subject to impeachment. See Akhil Reed Amar, On Impeaching Presidents, 28 Hofstra L. Rev. 291, 303 (1999); Michael J. Broyde & Robert A. Schapiro, Impeachment and Accountability: The Case of the First Lady, 15 Const. Comment. 479 (1998). The Supreme Court, in interpreting those provisions, has distinguished between officers, who exercise "significant authority" of the United States, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976), and employees, or non-officers who are "lesser functionaries subordinate to the officers of the United States." Id. at 126 n.162. The Court has further recognized the Constitution's distinction between principal officers, who must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and inferior officers, whose appointment may be placed in the President, department heads, or the courts of law. Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 663 (1997). Assuming this line of cases serves as a guide in deciding who is a civil officer subject to impeachment, it appears that "employees," as non-officers, are not subject to impeachment, while principal officers, such as the head of a cabinet-level Executive department, are. In between these two categories, historical practice does not indicate whether an inferior officer is subject to impeachment, as the House has never impeached such an individual.

[9] For a historical and textual interpretation of whether a former official is subject to trial for impeachment, see Jared P. Cole & Todd Garvey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., LSB10565, The Impeachment and Trial of a Former President (2021), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/LSB/LSB10565.

[10] U.S. Const. art. II § 4; Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part II, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 122–32 (2021).

[11] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 801 (1833).

[12] Id. at § 788.

[13] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part I, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 70–97 (2021).

[14] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part III, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 101 (2021).

impeachment punishment would be lost as Congress could never bar an official from holding office in the future as long as that individual resigns at some point prior to a Senate conviction.[15]

While these interpretive arguments have, and likely will continue to be raised, the Senate has determined by majority vote on multiple occasions that they retain the power to proceed against an Executive Branch official who has resigned from office. These decisions span from the trial of former Secretary of War William Belknap in 1876 to former President Trump in 2020.[16] Nevertheless, it appears that while Congress may have legal authority to impeach and try a former official, current disagreement on the matter may be widespread enough to create a practical obstacle to obtaining the supermajority necessary to convict a former official.

The Constitution's structure and historical practice also indicate that impeachment likely does not apply to Members of Congress.[17] First, Article II, Section 3 provides that officers of the United States are commissioned by the President;[18] Members of Congress receive no such commission. Second, Members may be removed from office by other means explicitly provided in the Constitution.[19] Third, the Ineligibility Clause bars any person "holding any office under the United States" from serving in any house of Congress, indicating the Members of Congress are not considered officers of the United States.[20]

Finally, congressional practice indicates that Members of Congress are not officers of the United States.[21] In 1797, the House of Representatives voted to impeach Senator William Blount, the first impeachment in the history of the young Republic.[22] Two years later, the Senate concluded that Senator Blount was not a civil officer subject to impeachment and voted to dismiss the articles because that body lacked jurisdiction over the matter.[23] This determination has been accepted ever since by the House and the Senate, and since then, the House has never again voted to impeach a Member of Congress.[24]

---

[15] Id. at 191.

[16] See Cole & Garvey, supra note 9 (discussing the Senate's decision to exercise jurisdiction in the Belknap impeachment); 167 Cong. Rec. S609 (daily ed. Feb. 9, 2021).

[17] See ArtII.S4.4.3 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1789–1860); The Federalist No. 66 (Alexander Hamilton).

[18] U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

[19] Id. art. I, § 5.

[20] Id. § 6.

[21] See Legal Aspects of Impeachment: An Overview, DOJ, Office of Legal Counsel 55 n.31 (1974), https://www.justice.gov/olc/page/file/980036/download ("The Senator William Blount precedent of 1798 does seem to have determined that the Senate will not try its members on an impeachment."); David Currie, The Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801 275–281 (1997).

[22] 3 Hinds, supra note 7, at §§ 2300–02.

[23] Id. at § 2318.

[24] See Charles W. Johnson, John V. Sullivan, and Thomas J. Wickham, Jr., House Practice: A Guide to the Rules, Precedents and Procedures of the House 604–06 (2017); Staff of H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Impeachment, Selected Materials 692 (Comm. Print 1973); Motions Sys. Corp. v. Bush, 437 F.3d 1356, 1373 (Fed. Cir. 2006) ("This principle has been accepted since 1799, when the Senate, presented with articles of impeachment against Senator William Blount, concluded after four days of debate that a Senator was not a civil officer for purposes of the Impeachment Clause."); Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis 48 (2000). In addition, in contrast to English practice, impeachment does not extend to private citizens or state officers, but is limited to officers of the federal government. 3 Hinds, supra note 7, at §§ 2007, 2315. No military officer has ever been impeached, which is consistent with the views of some early constitutional commentary that military officers are not subject to impeachment. Justice Joseph Story has suggested that "civil officers" was not intended to cover military officers. See II Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 789 (1833) (concluding that "[t]he sense, in which [civil] is used in the Constitution, seems to be in contradistinction to military, to indicate the rights and duties relating to citizens generally, in contradistinction to those of persons engaged in the land or naval service of the government").

ArtII.S4.3 Future of Impeachment Remedy

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

While the historical practices of Congress offer the best guide as to what behavior constitutes a high crime or misdemeanor, this principle does not necessarily preclude the development or expansion of impeachment's reach in the future. Indeed, as noted previously,[1] the absence of impeachment proceedings directed against particular conduct in the past does not mean that such conduct would not be deemed impeachable in different circumstances.[2] For example, certain conduct giving rise to impeachment might not have occurred or attracted notice at an earlier time. Understandings of impeachable behavior might also change over time to recognize impeachment as available for a wider range of behavior than has been previously recognized. One possibility, among others, is that impeachment may be seen as appropriate to punish violations of the law or the Constitution that lack an alternative remedy, such as redress in the federal courts.[3] For example, impeachment has been proposed, but never applied, for alleged violations of constitutional and statutory requirements relating to the use of military force without congressional authorization.[4]

Likewise, future impeachments might shed light on unresolved issues pertinent to the impeachment process. For instance, the applicability of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to federal impeachments is unclear.[5] In a suit challenging his impeachment and removal from office, former Judge Alcee Hastings argued that he had a property interest in his seat and salary and the government could not deprive him of these without according him due process—including a full trial before the entire Senate.[6] The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that due process applied to impeachment proceedings.[7] However, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reversed and remanded the ruling[8] because of the Supreme Court's intervening decision of Nixon v. United States.[9] On remand, the district court dismissed the case as nonjusticiable without commenting on the merits of the due process claim.[10] Presently, therefore, individual Senators themselves must decide whether the Due Process Clause applies to impeachment trials and what procedures such a requirement might entail. At times, this has led to inconsistent practices. For example, at the

---

[1] See ArtII.S4.4.2 Historical Background on Impeachable Offenses and accompanying notes.

[2] See Charles Black, Impeachment 33–36 (1974).

[3] Id.

[4] See, e.g., H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., H.R. Rep. No. 93-1305, at 220–26 (1974); H. Res. 370, 98th Cong. (1983) (alleging that President committed high crimes or misdemeanors by ordering the invasion of Grenada).

[5] The issue of due process in the House impeachment investigation was raised by the President's attorneys in the first Trump impeachment trial. See Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part II, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 175–80 (2021). The managers asserted that the argument that the President had been denied due process in the House impeachment investigation had "no grounding in law or fact." Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part III, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 211 (2021). For a discussion of the application of the Due Process Clause in House and Senate impeachment proceedings see Todd Garvey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45983, Congressional Access to Information in an Impeachment Investigation 17 n.118 (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45983.

[6] Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis 41 (2000).

[7] Hastings v. United States, 802 F. Supp. 490, 502 (D.D.C. 1992).

[8] Hastings v. United States, 988 F.2d 1280 (D.C. Cir. 1993).

[9] Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (1993).

[10] Hastings v. United States, 837 F. Supp. 3 (D.D.C. 1993).

trial of Alcee Hastings, several Senators had been Members of the House in the previous session that voted for impeachment.[11] All three recused themselves from trial to avoid the appearance of a conflict.[12] In contrast, the same situation presented itself at the trials of Judge John Pickering and President Bill Clinton, but no Senators recused themselves in those cases.[13]

ArtII.S4.4 Impeachable Offenses

ArtII.S4.4.1 Overview of Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The Constitution provides that the grounds of impeachment are for "treason, bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." While the types of conduct constituting treason and bribery are relatively well-understood terms,[1] the meaning of "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" is not defined in the Constitution or in statute.[2] The basic framework for impeachment was inherited from English practice by the colonies in their adoption of state constitutions.[3] Both experiences informed the adoption of impeachment provisions in the federal Constitution.

The common method for interpreting the Constitution's impeachment provisions stands in some contrast to that of other constitutional provisions. Whereas judicial precedent drives the prevailing understanding of many provisions of the Constitution, impeachment is essentially a political process that is largely unreviewable by the Judicial Branch.[4] As such, the historical practice of impeachment proceedings, rather than judicial decisions, informs our understanding of the Constitution's meaning in this area. In this vein, the meaning of "high crimes and misdemeanors" is informed not by judicial decisions, but by the history of congressional impeachments.[5]

---

[11] Gerhardt, supra note 6, at 41.

[12] Peter Hoffer & N.E.H. Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635–1805 213 (1984).

[13] Gerhardt, supra note 6, at 41

[1] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 3 ("Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."); 18 U.S.C. § 201 (bribery of public officials and witnesses). See also Act of April 30, 1790 § 21, 1 Stat. 112 (1845) (establishing bribery as a federal criminal offense).

[2] See Charles Black, Impeachment 27 (1974).

[3] The Federalist No. 65 (Alexander Hamilton); Peter Hoffer & N.E.H. Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635–1805 59–95 (1984).

[4] See Nixon, 506 U.S. at 237–38 (1993) (ruling that a challenge to the Senate's use of a trial committee to take evidence posed a nonjusticiable political question).

[5] 2 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 795 (1833) ("Again, there are many offences, purely political, which have been held to be within the reach of parliamentary impeachments, not one of which is in the slightest manner alluded to in our statute book. And, indeed, political offences are of so various and complex a character, so utterly incapable of being defined, or classified, that the task of positive legislation would be impracticable, if it were not almost absurd to attempt it."); id. at § 798 ("In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments, it will be found, that many offences, not easily definable by law, and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanours worthy of this extraordinary remedy.").

ArtII.S4.4.1
Overview of Impeachable Offenses

Impeachment has been used to remove government officers who abuse the power of the office; conduct themselves in a manner incompatible with the purpose and function of their office; or misuse the office for improper or personal gain.[6]

ArtII.S4.4.2 Historical Background on Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The concept of impeachment and the standard of "high crimes and misdemeanors"[1] originally stems from English Parliamentary practice.[2] The House of Commons impeached and tried before the House of Lords both private citizens and government officers, but not the Crown itself, for offenses considered beyond the reach of the common-law criminal courts.[3] The tool was used by Parliament to corral the power of the Crown and police political offenses committed by ministers and favorites of the King.[4] Impeachment applied to conduct that damaged the state or subverted the government.[5] The standard of "high crimes and misdemeanors" appears intended to address conduct involving an individual's abuse of power or office.[6] Punishment for a conviction could include a range of penalties, including imprisonment, fines, or even death.[7]

The American colonies adopted their own impeachment procedures that informed the Framers' understanding of impeachment.[8] These traditions extended into state constitutions established during the early years of the Republic. During the years of 1776–1787, states adopted into their constitutions' impeachment provisions that limited impeachment to government officials and restricted the punishment for impeachment to removal from office with the possibility of future disqualification from office.[9] At the state level, the body charged with trying an impeachment varied.[10]

---

[6] See Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess. 1400 (1868) (impeaching President Andrew Johnson for violating the Tenure of Office Act); 132 Cong. Rec. H4710–22 (daily ed. July 22, 1986) (impeaching Judge Harry E. Claiborne for providing false information on federal income tax forms); 156 Cong. Rec. 3155–57 (2010) (impeaching Judge G. Thomas Porteous for engaging in a corrupt relationship with bail bondmen where he received things of value in return for helping bondsman develop relationships with state judges).

[1] For more on the historical background of the impeachment clauses, see ArtIII.S1.10.2.2 Historical Background on Good Behavior Clause; ArtI.S2.C5.2 Historical Background on Impeachment; ArtI.S3.C6.2 Historical Background on Impeachment Trials.

[2] See The Federalist No. 65 (Alexander Hamilton); Raoul Berger, Impeachment: The Constitutional Problems 54 (1973); H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment 4 (Comm. Print 1974) [hereinafter Constitutional Grounds].

[3] Berger, supra note 2, at 59; Constitutional Grounds, supra note 2, at 4. The availability of impeachment in England appears to have depended on whether the offense endangered the government or society. See Peter Hoffer & N.E.H. Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635–1805 3 (1984).

[4] Constitutional Grounds, supra note 2, at 4–5.

[5] Id. (citing John Rushworth, The Tryal of Thomas Earl of Stafford, in 8 Historical Collections 8 (1686)).

[6] Id. at 4–6.

[7] Berger, supra note 2, at 67.

[8] See Hoffer & Hull, supra note 3, at 15–26.

[9] See id. at 68–95; see, e.g., Mass. Const. of 1780 § 2, art. VIII; § 3, art. VI; New York Const. of 1777 art. XXXIII.

[10] See Gordon S. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic 141 (1969); see, e.g., N.Y. Const. of 1777 arts. XXXII–XXXIII (providing that impeachments be tried before a court composed of Senators, judges of the Supreme Court, and the chancellor).

The standards for impeachments adopted at the Constitutional Convention were thus inspired by both English and colonial practice, but ultimately differed in structure from both these traditions. In particular, the Framers aimed to narrow the scope of impeachable offenses and persons subject to impeachment as compared to English practice.[11] For example, while according to English practice at the time of the Constitution's enactment, impeachment extended to anyone except a member of the royal family, the federal Constitution limited impeachment to federal government officers (including the President and Vice President).[12] In addition, whereas the English Parliament never formally defined the parameters of what counted as impeachable conduct, the Framers restricted impeachment to treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors.[13] In English practice, the Crown could pardon individuals following an impeachment conviction.[14] In contrast, the Framers restricted the pardon power from being applied to impeachments, rendering the impeachment process essentially unchecked by the Executive Branch.[15]

The Framers also rejected a proposal made during the Constitutional Convention to include—in addition to treason and bribery[16]—"maladministration" as an impeachable offense, which would have presumably incorporated a broad range of common-law offenses.[17] Although "maladministration" was a ground for impeachment in many state constitutions at the time of the Constitution's drafting,[18] the Framers instead adopted the term "high Crimes and misdemeanors" from English practice. James Madison, at the Constitutional Convention, objected to the inclusion of "maladministration" as grounds for impeachment because such a vague impeachment standard would "be equivalent to a tenure during pleasure of the Senate."[19] Immediately thereafter, the Convention voted to include "high crimes and misdemeanors" instead.[20] Arguably, the Framers' rejection of such a broad term supports the view that congressional disagreement with a President's policy goals is not sufficient grounds for impeachment.[21]

Of particular importance to the understanding of the practice in America were the roughly contemporaneous British impeachment proceedings of Warren Hastings, the governor general of India, which were transpiring at the time of the Constitution's formulation and ratification.[22] Hastings was charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, which included

---

[11] See Michael J. Gerhardt, Putting the Law of Impeachment in Perspective, 43 St. Louis U. L.J. 905, 908–12 (1999).

[12] 15 The American and English Encyclopedia of Law 1061, 1064 (David S. Garland & Lucius P. McGehee eds., 1900).

[13] Id. at 1066 (David S. Garland & Lucius P. McGehee eds., 1900). Further, the English House of Lords could convict on a bare majority, while the Framers required a two-thirds vote of the Senate to remove an officer. Id. at 1071. The House of Lords could also require any punishment upon conviction, while the federal Constitution limits the results of impeachment to removal from office and, potentially, disqualification from holding federal office in the future. Id. at 1072. Finally, British judges could be removed for a variety of reasons, while impeachment is the sole remedy to remove federal judges under the Constitution.

[14] 15 The American and English Encyclopedia of Law, supra note 12, at 1071–72.

[15] See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 1 (providing that the President "shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment").

[16] 2 James Madison, The Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787 Which Framed the Constitution of the United States of America 508 (Gaillard Hunt & James Brown Scott eds., 1987).

[17] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 550 (Max Farrand ed., 1911); see Michael J. Gerhardt, The Constitutional Limits to Impeachment and Its Alternatives, 68 Tex. L. Rev. 1, 14–15 (1989).

[18] Gerhardt, Constitutional Limits, supra note 17, at 29; Constitutional Grounds, supra note 2, at 11; Charles Black, Impeachment 29 (1974).

[19] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, supra note 17, at 550; Black, supra note 17, at 29–30.

[20] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, supra note 17, at 64–65; Black, supra note 17, at 28.

[21] Black, supra note 17, at 30.

[22] Constitutional Grounds, supra note 2, at 7; Hoffer & Hull, supra note 3, at 113–15.

corruption and abuse of power.[23] At the Constitutional Convention, George Mason positively referenced the impeachment of Hastings. At that point in the Convention, a proposal to define impeachment as appropriate for treason and bribery was under consideration. George Mason objected, noting that treason would not cover the misconduct of Hastings.[24] Moreover, he thought impeachment should extend to "attempts to subvert the Constitution."[25] Accordingly, he proposed that maladministration be included as an impeachable offense, although, as noted earlier, this was eventually rejected in favor of "high crimes and misdemeanors."[26]

The Framers thus ultimately considered impeachment to be an essential tool to hold government officers accountable for political crimes.[27] The representatives of the people were best placed to investigate the "conduct of public men."[28] Moreover, impeachment is an essential bulwark in the separation of powers for the legislature against the power of the Executive and Judicial Branches. The President enjoys the power to appoint—with Senate approval—officers of the United States in the Executive and Judicial Branches, as well as the authority to remove those in the Executive Branch.[29] Judicial officers, once appointed, maintain their positions for life.[30] Consequently, Congress's power of impeachment serves as a crucial legislative check on the potential "encroach[ing]" power of Executive Branch officers[31] and likewise guards against judicial "usurpations on the authority of the legislature."[32]

Evidence of precisely what conduct the Framers and ratifiers of the Constitution considered to constitute high crimes and misdemeanors is relatively sparse. At the North Carolina ratifying convention, James Iredell, later to serve as an associate Justice of the Supreme Court, noted the difficulty in defining what constitutes an impeachable offense, beyond causing injury to the government.[33] For him, impeachment was "calculated to bring [offenders] to punishment for crime which is not easy to describe, but which every one must be convinced is a high crime and misdemeanor against government. [T]he occasion for its exercise will arise from acts of great injury to the community."[34] He thought the President would be impeachable for receiving a "bribe or act[ing] from some corrupt motive or other,"[35] but not merely for "want of judgment."[36] Similarly, Samuel Johnston, then the governor of North Carolina and later the state's first Senator, thought impeachment was reserved for "great misdemeanors against the public."[37]

At the Virginia ratifying convention, a number of individuals claimed that impeachable offenses were not limited to indictable crimes.[38] For example, James Madison argued that were the President to assemble a minority of states in order to ratify a treaty at the expense of the

---

[23] Constitutional Grounds, supra note 2, at 7; Hoffer & Hull, supra note 3, at 113–15.

[24] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, supra note 17, at 550.

[25] Id.

[26] See ArtII.S4.4.2 Historical Background on Impeachable Offenses and accompanying notes.

[27] See The Federalist No. 65 (Alexander Hamilton).

[28] Id.

[29] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[30] Id. art. III, § 1.

[31] See The Federalist No. 66 (Alexander Hamilton).

[32] See Id. No. 81.

[33] See Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis 19 (2000).

[34] 4 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 113 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1827) [hereinafter Elliot's Debates] (North Carolina, statement of James Iredell).

[35] Id. at 127.

[36] Id. at 126.

[37] Id. See Gerhardt, supra note 33, at 19.

[38] See Id.

other states, this would constitute a impeachable "misdemeanor."[39] And Virginia governor Edmund Randolph, who would later become the Nation's first Attorney General, noted that impeachment was appropriate for a "willful mistake of the heart," but not for incorrect opinions.[40] In addition, Randolph argued that impeachment was appropriate for a President's violation of the Foreign Emoluments Clause, which, he noted, guards against corruption.[41]

James Wilson, delegate to the Constitutional Convention and later a Supreme Court Justice, delivered talks at the College of Philadelphia following the adoption of the federal Constitution concerning impeachment. He claimed that impeachment was reserved to "political crimes and misdemeanors, and to political punishments."[42] He argued that, in the eyes of the Framers, impeachments did not come "within the sphere of ordinary jurisprudence. They are founded on different principles; are governed by different maxims; and are directed to different objects."[43] Consequently, for Wilson, the impeachment and removal of an individual did not preclude a later trial and punishment for a criminal offense predicated on the same behavior.[44]

At the time of ratification of the Constitution, the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" thus appears understood to have applied to uniquely "political" offenses, or misdeeds committed by public officials against the state.[45] Alexander Hamilton, in explaining the Constitution's impeachment provisions, described impeachable offenses as arising from "the misconduct of public men, or in other words from the abuse or violation of some public trust."[46] Such offenses were "Political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself."[47] In the centuries following the Constitution's ratification, precisely what behavior constitutes a high crime or misdemeanor has been the subject of much debate.[48]

ArtII.S4.4.3 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1789–1860)

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Congressional understanding of the scope of activities subject to impeachment and the potential persons who may be impeached was first put to the test during the Adams Administration. In 1797, letters sent to President John Adams revealed a conspiracy by Senator William Blount—in violation of the United States government's policy of neutrality on [39] 1 Elliot's Debates, supra note 34, at 500.

---

[40] 2 id. at 401.

[41] David Robertson, Debates and Other Proceedings of the Convention of Virginia 345 (2d ed. 1805).

[42] James Wilson, Lectures on Law, reprinted in, 1 The Works of James Wilson 426 (Robert Green McCloskey ed., 1967).

[43] Id. at 408.

[44] Id.

[45] Gary L. McDowell, High Crimes and Misdemeanors: Recovering the Intentions of the Founders, 67 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 626, 638 (1999); Berger, supra note 2, at 59–61.

[46] The Federalist No. 65 (Alexander Hamilton).

[47] Id.

[48] Compare H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 110–18 (1998) (majority views), with id. at 204 (minority views). See Gary L. McDowell, High Crimes and Misdemeanors: Recovering the Intentions of the Founders, 67 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 626, 627 (1999); Laurence H. Tribe, Defining "High Crimes and Misdemeanors": Basic Principles, 67 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 712, 717 (1999).

the matter and the Neutrality Act[1]—to organize a military expedition with the British to invade land in the American Southwest under Spanish control.[2] The House voted to impeach Senator Blount on July 7, 1797,[3] while the Senate voted to expel Senator William Blount the next day.[4] Before impeaching Senator Blount, several House Members questioned whether Senators were "civil officers" subject to impeachment.[5] But Samuel W. Dana of Connecticut argued that Members of Congress must be civil officers, because other provisions of the Constitution that mention offices appear to include holding legislative office.[6] Despite already having voted to impeach Senator Blount, it was not until early in the next year that the House actually adopted specific articles of impeachment against Senator Blount.[7]

At the Senate impeachment trial in 1799, Blount's attorneys argued that impeachment was improper because Blount had already been expelled from his Senate seat and had not been charged with a crime.[8] However, the primary issue of debate was whether Members of Congress qualified as civil officers subject to impeachment. The House prosecutors argued that under the American system, as in England, virtually anyone was subject to impeachment.[9] The defense responded that this broad interpretation of the impeachment power would enable Congress to impeach state officials as well as federal, upending the proper division of federal and state authorities in the young Republic.[10] The Senate voted to defeat a resolution that declared Blount was a "civil officer" and therefore subject to impeachment.[11] The Senate ultimately voted to dismiss the impeachment articles brought against Blount because it lacked jurisdiction over the matter, although the impeachment record does not indicate precisely the basis for this conclusion.[12] Regardless, the House has not impeached a Member of Congress since.

The first federal official to be impeached and removed from office was John Pickering, a federal district judge. The election of President Thomas Jefferson in 1800, along with Jeffersonian Republican majorities in both House of Congress, signaled a shift from Federalist party control of government.[13] Much of the federal judiciary at this early stage of the Republic were members of the Federalist party, and the new Jeffersonian Republican majority strongly

---

[1] 1 Stat. 381, 384 § 5 (June 5, 1794).

[2] See Buckner F. Melton, The First Impeachment 60–103 (1998); Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis 48 (2000); David Currie, The Constitution in Congress: The Federalist Period 1789–1801 275–81 (1997).

[3] Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 87–88 (1999).

[4] Gerhardt, supra note 2, at 48; see U.S. Const. art. I, § 5.

[5] Currie, supra note 2, at 276.

[6] Id. (noting Article I, Section 9 and Article I, Section 3).

[7] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 87–88; Melton, supra note 2, at 104–89.

[8] Currie, supra note 2, at 277.

[9] Id. at 279.

[10] Id.

[11] 8 Annals of Cong. 2317 (1799).

[12] Peter Hoffer & N.E.H. Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635–1805 155 (1984). 9 Annals of Cong. 2648–49 (1799). Currie, supra note 2, at 2780–81. While the Senate's vote to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction might also be based on the fact that the Senator had been expelled from Congress, and therefore did not occupy an "office," it is generally accepted that the Senate's decision stands for the proposition that impeachment does not extend to Members of Congress. See Charles W. Johnson, John V. Sullivan, and Thomas J. Wickham, Jr., House Practice: A Guide to the Rules, Precedents and Procedures of the House 604–06 (2017); Staff of H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Impeachment, Selected Materials 692 (Comm. Print 1973); Motions Sys. Corp. v. Bush, 437 F.3d 1356, 1373 (Fed. Cir. 2006) ("This principle has been accepted since 1799, when the Senate, presented with articles of impeachment against Senator William Blount, concluded after four days of debate that a Senator was not a civil officer for purposes of the Impeachment Clause.").

[13] Hoffer & Hull, supra note 12, at 181.

opposed the Federalist-controlled courts.[14] John Pickering was impeached by the House of Representatives in 1803[15] and convicted by the Senate on March 12, 1804.[16] The circumstances of Judge Pickering's impeachment are somewhat unique as it appears that the judge had been mentally ill for some time, although the articles of impeachment did not address Pickering's mental faculties but instead accused him of drunkenness, blasphemy on the bench, and refusing to follow legal precedent.[17] Judge Pickering did not appear at his trial, and Senator John Quincy Adams apparently served as a defense counsel.[18] Following debate in a closed session, the Senate voted to permit evidence of Judge Pickering's insanity, drunkenness, and behavior on the bench.[19] The Senate also rejected a resolution to disqualify three Senators, who were previously in the House and had voted to impeach Judge Pickering, from participating in the impeachment trial.[20] The Senate voted to convict Judge Pickering guilty as charged, but the articles did not explicitly specify that any of Pickering's behavior constituted a high crime or misdemeanor.[21] Objections to the framing of the question at issue caused several Senators to withdraw from the trial.[22]

On the same day the Senate convicted Judge Pickering, the House of Representatives impeached Supreme Court Justice Samuel Chase.[23] Like the impeachment trial of Judge Pickering, the proceedings occurred following the election of President Thomas Jefferson and amidst intense conflict between the Federalists and Jeffersonian Republicans.[24] Justice Chase was viewed by Jeffersonian Republicans as openly partisan, and in fact the Justice did openly campaign for the election of Federalist John Adams in the election of 1800.[25] In addition, Republicans took issue with Justice Chase's aggressive approach to jury instructions in Sedition Act prosecutions.[26] The eight articles of impeachment accused him of acting in an "arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust" manner at trial, misapplying the law, and expressing partisan political views to a grand jury.[27] The Senate trial began on February 4, 1805. Both the House managers and defense counsel for Justice Chase presented witnesses detailing the Justice's behavior.[28] While some aspects of the dispute focused on whether Justice Chase took certain actions, the primary conflict centered on whether his behavior was impeachable.[29] Before reaching a verdict, the Senate approved a motion from Senator James Bayard, a Federalist from Delaware, that the underlying question be whether Justice Chase was guilty of

[14] Id. at 181.

[15] See 12 Annals of Cong. 642 (1803); 13 Annals of Cong. 380 (1803).

[16] See 13 Annals of Cong. 368 (1804); Hoffer & Hull, supra note 12, at 208, 216–17.

[17] Eleanore Bushnell, Crimes, Follies, and Misfortunes: The Federal Impeachment Trials 45–46 (1992).

[18] Hoffer & Hull, supra note 12, at 211–13.

[19] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 48–51. Scholars have noted that the Senate vote in favor of admitting evidence of insanity likely stemmed from two opposing reasons. The minority party Federalists—of which Judge Pickering was a member—considered evidence of insanity a reason to acquit the judge because it was not an impeachable offense. The majority party Republicans, in contrast, considered insanity a reason to remove him from the bench. Id. at 48–49.

[20] Id. at 47.

[21] 13 Annals of Cong. 367 (1804); Bushnell, supra note 17, at 53–54.

[22] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 53–54.

[23] 13 Annals of Cong. 1180 (1804); Bushnell, supra note 17, at 60.

[24] Hoffer & Hull, supra note 12, at 228–138.

[25] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 63.

[26] Josh Chafetz, Congress's Constitution 108 (2017).

[27] Impeachment, Selected Materials, supra note 12, at 133–35.

[28] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 63–73.

[29] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 67–84; see Gerhardt, supra note 2, at 181.

high crimes and misdemeanors, rather than guilty as charged.[30] The Senate vote ultimately fell short of the necessary two-thirds majority to secure a conviction on any of the articles.[31] Of the eight articles, a majority of Senators voted to convict on three, while the remaining five did not muster a majority for conviction.[32]

The trial raised a number of questions which have recurred throughout the history of impeachments. For example, is impeachment limited to criminal acts, or does it extend to non-criminal behavior?[33] The opposing sides in the Chase case took differing views on this matter, as they would in later impeachments to come.[34] Due in part to the charged political atmosphere of the historical context, the attempted impeachment of Justice Chase has also come to represent an important limit on the scope of the impeachment remedy. Commentators have interpreted the acquittal of Justice Chase as establishing that impeachment does not extend to congressional disagreement with a judge's opinions or judicial philosophy.[35] At least some of the Senators who voted to acquit did not consider the alleged offenses as rising to the level of impeachable behavior.[36]

By the time of the next impeachment in 1830, both houses of Congress were controlled by Jacksonian Democrats, and the federal courts were unpopular with Congress and the public.[37] The House of Representatives impeached James Peck, a federal district judge, for abusing his judicial authority. The sole article accused the judge of holding an attorney in contempt for publishing an article critical of Peck and barring the attorney from practicing law for 18 months. The context surrounding Judge Peck's actions involved disputes over French and Spanish land grant titles following the transfer of land in the Louisiana territory from French to U.S. control.[38] Shortly after Missouri was admitted to the United States as part of the Missouri Compromise in 1821, Judge Peck decided a land rights case against the claimants in favor of the United States.[39] The attorney for the plaintiffs wrote an article critical of the decision in a local paper.[40] Judge Peck held the attorney in contempt, sentenced him to jail for twenty-four hours, and barred him from practicing law for eighteen months.[41]

The House impeached Judge Peck by a wide margin.[42] Of central concern during the Senate trial were the limits of a judge's common law contempt power, a matter that appeared to be in dispute.[43] The Senate ultimately acquitted Judge Peck, with roughly half of the

---

[30] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 84.

[31] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 103.

[32] 14 Annals of Cong. 664–69 (1805); Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 103.

[33] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 82–87.

[34] H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., H.R. Rep. No. 93–1305, at 362–72 (1974) (minority views); 3 Lewis Deschler, Precedents of the United States of the House of Representatives, H.R. Doc. No. 94-661, at Ch. 14 § 3.8 (1974), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-DESCHLERS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-DESCHLERS-V3.pdf.

[35] See David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: the Most Endangered Branch, 1801–1805, 33 Wake Forest L. Rev. 219, 259 (1998); William H. Rehnquist, Grand Inquests: The Historic Impeachments 114 (1992); Chafetz, supra note 26, at 150. But see Chafetz, supra note 26, at 109 (arguing that Justice Chase returned to the bench "humbled" and that one result of the affair was that the Marshall Court "made its peace with Republican politics").

[36] See Michael J. Gerhardt, Putting the Law of Impeachment in Perspective, 43 St. Louis U. L.J. 905, 921 (1999).

[37] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 91.

[38] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 108–09; Bushnell, supra note 17, at 92.

[39] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 108–09.

[40] Id.

[41] Id.

[42] 6 Cong. Deb. 818–19 (1830).

[43] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 91–113.

Jacksonian Democrats voting against conviction.[44] Shortly thereafter, Congress passed a law reforming and defining the scope of the judicial contempt power.[45]

Finally, in the midst of the Civil War, federal district judge West H. Humphreys was appointed to a position as a judge in the Confederate government, but he did not resign as a United States federal judge.[46] In 1862, the House impeached and the Senate convicted Judge Humphreys for joining the Confederate government and abandoning his position.[47] As in the trial of Judge Pickering previously, Judge Humphreys did not attend the proceedings.[48] Unlike in the case of Judge Pickering, however, no defense was offered in the impeachment trial of Judge Humphreys.[49]

ArtII.S4.4.4 President Andrew Johnson and Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The impeachment and trial of President Andrew Johnson transpired in the shadow of the Civil War and the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln.[1] President Johnson was a Democrat and former slave owner who was the only Southern Senator to remain in his seat when the South seceded from the Union.[2] President Lincoln, a Republican, appointed Johnson military governor of Tennessee in 1862,[3] and Johnson was later selected as Lincoln's second-term running mate on a "Union" ticket.[4] Given these unique circumstances, President Johnson lacked both a party and geographic power base when in office, which likely isolated him when he assumed the presidency following the assassination of President Lincoln.[5]

The majority Republican Congress and President Johnson clashed over, among other things, Reconstruction policies implemented in the former slave states and control over officials in the Executive Branch.[6] President Johnson vetoed twenty-one bills while in office, compared to thirty-six vetoes by all prior Presidents. Congress overrode fifteen of Johnson's vetoes, compared to just six with prior Presidents.[7] On March 2, 1867, Congress reauthorized, over President Johnson's veto, the Tenure of Office Act, extending its protections for all officeholders.[8] In essence, the Act provided that all federal officeholders subject to Senate

---

[44] 7 Cong. Deb. 45 (1831).

[45] See Act of Mar. 2, 1831, ch. 99, 4 Stat. 487.

[46] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 3, at 114–16.

[47] 2 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States §§ 2385–97 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V2/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V2.pdf.

[48] Bushnell, supra note 17, at 115.

[49] Id.

[1] See William H. Rehnquist, Grand Inquests: The Historic Impeachments 185–98 (1992).

[2] Eleanore Bushnell, Crimes, Follies, and Misfortunes: The Federal Impeachment Trials 128 (1992).

[3] Id.

[4] Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 222 (1999)

[5] Bushnell, supra note 2, at 128.

[6] Michael Les Benedict, The Impeachment and Trial of Andrew Johnson 1–25 (1973); Keith Whittington, Constitutional Construction 113–57 (1999).

[7] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 222–23.

[8] Tenure of Office Act, 14 Stat. 430 (1867). Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 224.

confirmation could not be removed by the President except with Senate approval,[9] although the reach of this requirement to officials appointed by a prior administration was unclear.[10] Congressional Republicans apparently anticipated the possible impeachment of President Johnson when drafting the legislation; Republicans already knew of President Johnson's plans to fire Secretary of War Edwin Stanton and the Act provided that a violation of its terms constituted a "high misdemeanor."[11]

President Johnson subsequently fired Secretary Stanton without the approval of the Senate. Importantly, his cabinet unanimously agreed that the new restrictions on the President's removal power imposed by the Tenure of Office Act were unconstitutional.[12] Shortly thereafter, on February 24, 1868, the House voted to impeach President Johnson.[13] The impeachment articles adopted by the House against President Johnson included defying the Tenure of Office Act by removing Stanton from office[14] and violating (and encouraging others to violate) the Army Appropriations Act.[15] In addition, one article of impeachment accused the President of making "utterances, declarations, threats, and harangues" against Congress.[16]

The Senate appointed a committee to recommend rules of procedure for the impeachment trial which subsequently were adopted by the Senate, including a one-hour time limit for each side to debate questions of law that would arise during the trial.[17] Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase presided over the trial and was sworn in by Associate Justice Samuel Nelson.[18] During the swearing-in of the individual Senators, the body paused to debate whether Senator Benjamin Wade of Indiana, the president pro tempore of the Senate, was eligible to participate in the trial. Because the office of the Vice President was empty, under the laws of succession at that time Senator Wade would assume the presidency upon a conviction of President Johnson. Ultimately, the Senator who raised this point, Thomas Hendricks of Indiana, withdrew the issue and Senator Wade was sworn in.[19]

An important point of contention at the trial was whether the Tenure of Office Act protected Stanton at all due to his appointment by President Lincoln, rather than President Johnson.[20] Counsel for President Johnson argued that impeachment was inappropriate for violation of a statute whose meaning was unclear, and the statute barring removal of the Secretary of War was an unconstitutional intrusion into the President's authority under Article II.[21]

---

[9] Tenure of Office Act, 14 Stat. 430 (1867). See Michael J. Gerhardt, Constitutional Arrogance, 164 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1649, 1663 (2016).

[10] Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 228.

[11] Les Benedict, supra note 6, at 92–125.

[12] Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 230.

[13] Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess. 1400 (1868).

[14] See Act of March 2, 1867, ch. 154, § 6, 14 Stat. 430. Incidentally, such tenure protections were later invalidated as unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. See Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 106 (1926).

[15] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 226.

[16] Id. at 235.

[17] Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 219–20.

[18] Id. at 221.

[19] See Akhil Reed Amar, America's Unwritten Constitution (2012).

[20] Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 221.

[21] Id. at 230–31.

The Senate failed to convict President Johnson by one vote on three different articles, and it failed to vote on the remaining eight.[22] However, reports indicate that several Senators were prepared to acquit if their votes were needed.[23] Seven Republicans voted to acquit; of those Senators, some thought it questionable whether the Tenure of Office Act applied to Stanton and that it was improper to impeach a President for incorrectly interpreting an arguably ambiguous law.[24]

Certain commentators have concluded that the failure to convict President Johnson coincides with a general understanding that impeachment is appropriate for abuses of power or violations of the public trust, but does not pertain to political or policy disagreements with the President, no matter how weighty.[25]

ArtII.S4.4.5 Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses (1865–1900)

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The post-bellum experience in American history saw a variety of government officials impeached on a number of different grounds. These examples provide important principles that guide the practice of impeachment through the present day. For example, the Senate has not always conducted a trial following an impeachment by the House. In 1873, the House impeached federal district judge Mark. H. Delahay for, among other things, drunkenness on and off the bench.[1] The impeachment followed an investigation by a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee into his conduct.[2] Following the House vote on impeachment, Judge Delahay resigned before written impeachment articles were drawn up and the Senate did not hold a trial.[3] The impeachment of Judge Delahay indicates that the scope of impeachable behavior is not limited to strictly criminal behavior; Congress has been willing to impeach individuals for behavior that is not indictable, but nonetheless constitutes an abuse of an individual's power and duties.

This period of American history was fraught with partisan conflict over Reconstruction.[4] In addition to President Johnson, a number of other individuals were investigated by Congress during this time for purposes of impeachment. For example, in 1873, the House voted to authorize the House Judiciary Committee to investigate the behavior of Edward H. Durrell,

---

[22] 3 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States § 2443 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3.pdf; see Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 234–35.

[23] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 221; Hans L. Trefousse, Impeachment of a President: Andrew Johnson, the Blacks, and Reconstruction 169 (1975).

[24] Rehnquist, supra note 1, at 240–46.

[25] Peter Hoffer & N.E.H. Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635–1805 101 (1984); Michael J. Gerhardt, Putting the Law of Impeachment in Perspective, 43 St. Louis U. L.J. 905, 921–22 (1999).

[1] 3 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States §§ 2504–05 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3.pdf [hereinafter Hinds]; Charles W. Johnson, John V. Sullivan, and Thomas J. Wickham, Jr., House Practice: A Guide to the Rules, Precedents and Procedures of the House 608–13 (2017).

[2] 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at §§ 2504–05.

[3] Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 119 (1999).

[4] See generally Eric Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877 (1988).

federal district judge for Louisiana.[5] A majority of the House Judiciary Committee reported in favor of impeaching Judge Durell for corruption and usurpation of power, including interfering with the state's election.[6] Judge Durrell resigned on December 1, 1874, and the House discontinued impeachment proceedings.[7]

The first and only time a Cabinet-level official was impeached occurred during the presidential administration of Ulysses S. Grant. Grant's Secretary of War, William W. Belknap, was impeached in 1876 for allegedly receiving payments in return for appointing an individual to maintain a trading post in Indian territory.[8] Belknap resigned two hours before the House unanimously impeached him,[9] but the Senate nevertheless conducted a trial in which Belknap was acquitted.[10] During the trial, upon objection by Secretary Belknap's counsel that the Senate lacked jurisdiction because Belknap was now a private citizen, the Senate voted 37-29 in favor of jurisdiction.[11] A majority of Senators voted to convict Secretary Belknap, but no article mustered a two-thirds majority, resulting in acquittal. A number of Senators voting to acquit indicated that they did so because the Senate did not have jurisdiction over an individual no longer in office.[12] Notably, although bribery is explicitly included as an impeachable offense in the Constitution, the impeachment articles brought against Secretary Belknap instead charged his behavior as constituting high crimes and misdemeanors.[13] Bribery was mentioned at the Senate trial, but it was not specifically referenced in the impeachment articles themselves.[14]

ArtII.S4.4.6 Early Twentieth Century Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The twentieth century saw further development of the scope of conduct considered by Congress to be impeachable, including the extent to which non-criminal conduct can constitute impeachable behavior and the proper role of a federal judge. Further, the question of judicial review of impeachments received its first treatment in the federal courts.

The question of whether Congress can designate particular behavior as a "high crime or misdemeanor" via statute arose in the impeachment of Charles Swayne, a federal district judge for the Northern District of Florida, during the first decade of the twentieth century. A federal statute provided that federal district judges live in their districts and that anyone

[5] 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at §§ 2506–08.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. at § 2509. For a defense of Judge Durell's actions in the matters in question, see Charles Lane, Edward Henry Durell: A Study in Reputation, 13 Green Bag 2D 153, 153–68 (2010).

[8] 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at §§ 2444–68; see H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment 20 (Comm. Print 1974).

[9] Eleanore Bushnell, Crimes, Follies, and Misfortunes: The Federal Impeachment Trials 165 (1992).

[10] 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at §§ 2444–68.

[11] 3 Hinds, supra note 1, at §§ 2459–60. Two of the thirty-seven voting "guilty" and twenty-two of the twenty-five voting "not guilty" stated that they believed the Senate lacked jurisdiction in the case. 3 Hinds, supra note 1, § 2467.

[12] Bushnell, supra note 9, at 186.

[13] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[14] Bushnell, supra note 9, at 170.

violating this requirement was "guilty of a high misdemeanor."[1] Judge Swayne's impeachment originated from a resolution passed by the Florida legislature requesting the state's congressional delegation to recommend an investigation into his behavior.[2] The procedures followed by the House in impeaching Judge Swayne were somewhat unique. First, the House referred the impeachment request to the Judiciary Committee for investigation. Following this investigation, the House voted to impeach Judge Swayne based on the report prepared by the Committee.[3] The Committee was then tasked with preparing articles of impeachment to present to the Senate.[4] The House then voted again on these individual articles, each of which received less support than the single prior impeachment vote had received.[5] The impeachment articles accused Judge Swayne of a variety of offenses, including misusing the office, abusing the contempt power, and living outside his judicial district. At the trial in the Senate, Judge Swayne essentially admitted to certain accused behavior, although his attorneys did dispute the residency charge, and Swayne instead argued that his actions were not impeachable.[6] The Senate vote failed to convict Judge Swayne on any of the charges brought by the House.[7]

The impeachability of certain non-criminal behavior for federal judges was firmly established by the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald in 1912. Judge Archbald served as a federal district judge before being appointed to the short-lived U.S. Commerce Court, which was created to review decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.[8] He was impeached by the House for behavior occurring both as a federal district judge and as a judge on the Commerce Court.[9] The impeachment articles accused Judge Archbald of, among other things, using his position as a judge to generate profitable business deals with potential future litigants in his court.[10] This behavior did not violate any criminal statute and did not appear to violate any laws regulating judges.[11] Judge Archbald argued at trial that non-criminal conduct was not impeachable. The Senate voted to convict him on five articles and also voted to disqualify him from holding office in the future.[12] Four of those articles centered on behavior that occurred while Judge Archbald sat on the Commerce Court, the fifth described his conduct over the course of his career.[13]

In the 1920s, a series of corruption scandals swirled around the administration of President Warren G. Harding. Most prominently, the Teapot Dome Scandal, which involved the noncompetitive lease of government land to oil companies, implicated numerous government officials and led to resignations and the criminal conviction and incarceration of a cabinet-level official.[14] The Secretary of the Navy, at the time Edwin Denby, was entrusted with overseeing the development of oil reserves that had recently been located. The Secretary of the Interior,

---

[1] Revised Statutes of the United States, 2d Edition, Title XIII, Ch. 2 § 551 (1878); Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 123–24 (1999).

[2] Eleanore Bushnell, Crimes, Follies, and Misfortunes: The Federal Impeachment Trials 191 (1992).

[3] 39 Cong. Rec. 248 (1905).

[4] Bushnell, supra note 2, at 191–92.

[5] Id. at 191–93.

[6] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 123–25.

[7] 39 Cong. Rec. 3467–72 (1905).

[8] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 132.

[9] 48 Cong. Rec. 8904–34 (1912).

[10] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 133.

[11] Id. at 134.

[12] 49 Cong. Rec. 1438–48 (1913).

[13] Bushnell, supra note 2, at 221.

[14] See The Teapot Dome Scandal, 1922–24, in Congress Investigates: A Critical and Documentary History 460–74 (Roger A. Bruns, David L. Hostetter, Raymond W. Smock, eds., 2011).

ArtII.S4.4.6
Early Twentieth Century Jurisprudence on Impeachable Offenses

Albert Fall, convinced Denby that the Interior Department should assume responsibility for two of the reserve locations, including in Teapot Dome, Wyoming. Secretary Fall then leased the reserves to two of his friends, Harry F. Sinclair and Edward L. Doheny. Revelations of the lease without competitive bidding launched a lengthy congressional investigation which sparked the eventual criminal conviction of Fall for bribery and conspiracy and Sinclair for jury tampering. President Harding, however, died in 1923, before congressional hearings began. The affair also generated significant judicial decisions examining the scope of Congress's investigatory powers.[15]

One aspect of the controversy included an impeachment investigation into the decisions of then-Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty.[16] In 1922 the House of Representatives referred a resolution to impeach Daugherty for a variety of activities, including his failure to prosecute those involved in the Teapot Dome Scandal, to the House Judiciary Committee.[17] The House Judiciary Committee eventually found there was not sufficient evidence to impeach Daugherty. However, in 1924, a Senate special committee was formed to investigate similar matters.[18] That investigation spawned allegations of a variety of improper activities in the Justice Department. Daugherty resigned on March 28, 1924.[19]

In 1926, federal district judge George W. English was impeached for a variety of alleged offenses, including (1) directing a U.S. marshal to gather a number of state and local officials into court in an imaginary case where Judge English proceeded to denounce them; (2) threatening two members of the press with imprisonment without sufficient cause; and (3) showing favoritism to certain litigants before his court.[20] Judge English resigned before a trial in the Senate occurred and the Senate dismissed the charges without conducting a trial in his absence.[21]

Federal district judge Harold Louderback was impeached in 1933 for showing favoritism in the appointment of bankruptcy receivers, which were coveted positions following the stock market crash of 1929 and the ensuing Depression.[22] The House authorized a subcommittee to investigate, which held hearings and recommended to the Judiciary Committee that Judge Louderback be impeached.[23] The Judiciary Committee actually voted against recommending impeachment, urging censure of Judge Louderback instead, but permitted the minority report

[15] See McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 174–75 (1927) ("We are of opinion that the power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function."); Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 295 (1929) (observing that Congress has authority to require disclosures in aid of its constitutional powers).

[16] 6 Clarence Cannon, Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States § 536–38 (1936), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-CANNONS-V6/pdf/GPO-HPREC-CANNONS-V6.pdf [hereinafter Cannon].

[17] See 62 Cong. Rec. 12,381 (1922); Charges of Hon. Oscar E. Keller Against the Attorney General and the Attorney General's Answers Thereto Before the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, 67th Cong., 3d Sess., on H. Res. 425 (1922).

[18] S. Res. 157, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. (1924); Hearings Before the Select Committee on Investigation of the Attorney General, United States Senate, Investigation of Hon. Harry M. Daugherty, Formerly Attorney General of the United States, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. (1924).

[19] See The Teapot Dome Scandal, 1922–24, in Congress Investigates: A Critical and Documentary History 460–74 (Roger A. Bruns, David L. Hostetter, Raymond W. Smock, eds., 2011).

[20] 67 Cong. Rec. 6705–55 (1926); 6 Cannon, supra note 16, at §§ 544–47.

[21] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 144–46.

[22] 76 Cong. Rec. 4913–26 (1933); 6 Cannon, supra note 16, at §§ 514–24.

[23] Bushnell, supra note 2, at 191.

that favored impeachment to be reported to the House together with the majority report.[24] The full House voted to impeach anyway,[25] but the Senate failed to convict him.[26]

Shortly thereafter, the House impeached federal district judge Halsted L. Ritter for showing favoritism in and profiting from appointing receivers in bankruptcy proceedings; practicing law while a judge; and failing to fully report his income on his tax returns.[27] The Senate acquitted Judge Ritter on each individual count alleging specific behavior, but convicted him on the final count which referenced the previous articles, and charged him with bringing his court into disrepute and undermining the public's confidence in the judiciary.[28]

Congress's impeachment of Judge Ritter was the first to be challenged in court.[29] Judge Ritter brought a suit in the Federal Court of Claims seeking back pay, arguing that the charges brought against him were not impeachable under the Constitution and that the Senate improperly voted to acquit on six specific articles but to convict on a single omnibus article.[30] In rejecting Judge Ritter's suit, the court held that the Senate has exclusive jurisdiction over impeachments and courts lack authority to review the Senate's verdict.[31]

ArtII.S4.4.7 President Richard Nixon and Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The impeachment investigation and ensuing resignation of President Richard Nixon stands out as a profoundly important experience informing the standard for the impeachment of presidents.[1] Although President Nixon was never impeached by the House or subjected to a trial in the Senate, his conduct exemplifies for many authorities, scholars, and the general public the paradigmatic case of impeachable behavior in a President.

Less than two years after a landslide reelection as President, Richard Nixon resigned following the House Judiciary Committee's adoption of three articles of impeachment against him.[2] The circumstances surrounding the impeachment of President Nixon were sparked on June 17, 1972, by the arrest of five men for breaking into the Democratic National Headquarters at the Watergate Hotel and Office Building. The arrested men were employed by the Committee to Re-Elect the President (CRP), a campaign organization formed to support President Nixon's reelection.[3]

---

[24] Id. at 246.

[25] Id. at 245.

[26] 77 Cong. Rec. 4064–88 (1933).

[27] 80 Cong. Rec. 3066–92 (1936); Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 157.

[28] 80 Cong. Rec. 5602–08 (1936); Proceedings of the U.S. Senate in the Trial of Impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States District Judge for the Southern District of Florida, 74th Cong., 2d Sess., S. Doc. No. 74–200, at 637–38 (1936); Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 1, at 158–59.

[29] Ritter v. United States, 84 Ct. Cl. 293, 296 (1936), cert. denied, 300 U.S. 668 (1937).

[30] Bushnell, supra note 2, at 286–87.

[31] Ritter v. United States, 84 Ct. Cl. 293, 296 (1936), cert. denied, 300 U.S. 668 (1937).

[1] For a more detailed account of the Watergate Scandal, see Stanley I. Kutler, The Wars of Watergate (1990).

[2] Carroll Kilpatrick, Nixon Resigns, Wash. Post (Aug. 9, 1974), https://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/national/longterm/watergate/articles/080974-3.htm.

[3] Kutler, supra note 1, at 187–211.

ArtII.S4.4.7
President Richard Nixon and Impeachable Offenses

In the early summer of 1973, Attorney General Elliot Richardson appointed Archibald Cox as a special prosecutor to investigate the connection between the five burglars and CRP. Likewise, the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities initiated its own investigation.[4] After President Nixon fired various staffers allegedly involved in covering up the incident, he spoke on national television disclaiming knowledge of the cover up. However, the investigations uncovered evidence that President Nixon was involved, that he illegally harassed his enemies through, among other things, the use of tax audits, and that the men arrested for the Watergate break-in—the "plumbers unit," because they were used to "plug leaks" considered damaging to the Nixon Administration—had committed burglaries before.[5] Eventually a White House aide revealed that the President had a tape recording system in his office, raising the possibility that many of Nixon's conversations about the Watergate incident were recorded.[6]

The President refused to hand over such tapes to the special prosecutor or Congress. In his capacity as special prosecutor, Cox then subpoenaed tapes of conversations in the Oval Office on Saturday, October 20, 1973. This sparked the sequence of events commonly known as the Saturday Night Massacre.[7] In response to the subpoena, President Nixon ordered Attorney General Elliot Richardson to fire Special Prosecutor Cox. Richardson refused and resigned. Nixon ordered Deputy Attorney General William D. Ruckelshaus to fire the special prosecutor, but Ruckelshaus also refused to do so and resigned. Solicitor General Robert Bork, in his capacity as Acting Attorney General, then fired the special prosecutor.[8] Nixon eventually agreed to deliver some of the subpoenaed tapes to the judge supervising the grand jury. The Justice Department appointed Leon Jaworski to replace Cox as special prosecutor.

The House Judiciary Committee began an official investigation of the Watergate issue and commenced impeachment hearings in April 1974.[9] On March 1, 1974, a grand jury indicted seven individuals connected to the larger Watergate investigation and named the President as an unindicted coconspirator.[10] On April 18, a subpoena was issued, upon the motion of the special prosecutor, by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia requiring the production of tapes and various items relating to meetings between the President and other individuals. Following a challenge to the subpoena in district court, the Supreme Court reviewed the case. On July 24, 1974, the Supreme Court affirmed the district court's order.[11]

In late July, following its investigation and hearings, the House Judiciary Committee voted to adopt three articles of impeachment against President Nixon.[12] The first impeachment article alleged that the President obstructed justice by attempting to impede the investigation into the Watergate break-in.[13] The second charged the President with abuse of power for using federal agencies to harass his political enemies and authorizing burglaries of private citizens

---

[4] Kutler, supra note 1, at 323–49; Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 255–56 (1999) .

[5] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 255–56; Kutler, supra note 1, at 111–16, 351–72.

[6] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 256–57.

[7] Jerry Zeifman, Without Honor: Crimes of Camelot and the Impeachment of President Nixon 59 (1995).

[8] Carroll Kilpatrick, Nixon Forces Firing of Cox; Richardson, Ruckelshaus Quit, Wash. Post (Oct. 21, 1973), https://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/national/longterm/watergate/articles/102173-2.htm.

[9] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 258–59.

[10] United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 686–87 (1974).

[11] Id. at 713–14 (1974).

[12] H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., H.R. Rep. No. 93-1305, at 6–11 (1974).

[13] Id. at 1–2.

who opposed the President.[14] The third article accused the President of refusing to cooperate with the Judiciary Committee's investigation.[15]

The Committee considered but rejected two proposed articles of impeachment. The first rejected article concerned receiving compensation in the form of government expenditures at his private properties in California and Florida—which allegedly constituted an emolument from the United States in violation of Article II, Section, 1, Clause 7 of the Constitution—and tax evasion.[16] Those Members opposed to the portion of the charge alleging receipt of federal funds argued that most of the President's expenditures were made pursuant to a request from the Secret Service; that there was no direct evidence the President knew at the time that the source of these funds was public, rather than private; and that this conduct failed to rise to the level of an impeachable offense.[17] Some Members opposed to the tax evasion charge argued that the evidence was insufficient to impeach; others that tax fraud is not the type of behavior "at which the remedy of impeachment is directed."[18]

The second rejected article accused the President of concealing from Congress the bombing operations in Cambodia during the Vietnam conflict.[19] This article was rejected for two primary reasons: some Members thought (1) the President was performing his constitutional duty as Commander in Chief and (2) Congress was given sufficient notice of these operations.[20]

President Nixon resigned on August 9, 1974, before the full House voted on the articles.[21] The lessons and standards established by the Nixon impeachment investigation and resignation are disputed. On the one hand, the behavior alleged in the approved articles against President Nixon is arguably a "paradigmatic" case of impeachment, constituting actions that are almost certainly impeachable conduct for the President.[22]

On the other hand, the significance of the House Judiciary Committee's rejection of certain impeachment articles is unclear. In particular, whether conduct considered unrelated to the performance of official duties, such as the rejected article alleging tax evasion, can constitute an impeachable offense for the President is disputed. During the subsequent impeachment of President Bill Clinton, for example, the majority and minority reports of the House Judiciary Committee concerning the Committee's impeachment recommendation took different views on when conduct that might traditionally be viewed as private or unrelated to the functions of the presidency constituted an impeachable offense.[23] The House Judiciary Committee report that recommended articles of impeachment argued that perjury by the President was an impeachable offense, even if committed with regard to matters outside his official duties.[24] In contrast, the minority views contained in the report argued that impeachment was reserved for "conduct that constitutes an egregious abuse or subversion of the powers of the executive office."[25] The minority noted that the Judiciary Committee had rejected an article of [14] Id. at 3–4.

[15] Id. at 4.

[16] Id. at 217–19.

[17] Id. at 221.

[18] Id. at 223.

[19] Id. at 220–26.

[20] Id. at 219.

[21] Kilpatrick, Nixon Resigns, supra note 2.

[22] Michael J. Gerhardt, The Lessons of Impeachment History, 67 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 603, 604 (1999).

[23] Compare H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 110–18 (1998), with id. at 204–07 (minority views).

[24] See H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 108.

[25] Id.

impeachment against President Nixon alleging that he committed tax fraud, primarily because that "related to the President's private conduct, not to an abuse of his authority as President."[26]

ArtII.S4.4.8 President Bill Clinton and Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The impeachment of President Bill Clinton stemmed from an investigation that originally centered on financial transactions occurring many years prior to President Clinton taking federal office.[1] Attorney General Janet Reno appointed Robert Fiske, Jr. as a special prosecutor in January 1994 to investigate the dealings of President Clinton and his wife with the "Whitewater" real estate development during the President's tenure as attorney general and then governor of Arkansas.[2]

Following the reauthorization of the Independent Counsel Act in June, the Special Division of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit replaced Fiske in August with Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr, a former Solicitor General in the George H.W. Bush Administration and federal appellate judge.[3]

During the Whitewater investigation, Paula Jones, an Arkansas state employee, filed a civil suit against President Clinton in May 1994 alleging that he sexually harassed her in 1991 while governor of Arkansas.[4] Lawyers for Jones took depositions of President Clinton at the White House and asked questions about the President's relationship with staffers, including an intern named Monica Lewinsky.[5] Independent Counsel Starr received information alleging that Lewinsky had attempted to influence the testimony of a witness in the Jones litigation,[6] along with tapes of recordings between Monica Lewinsky and former White House employee Linda Tripp.[7] Tripp had recorded conversations between herself and Lewinsky concerning Lewinsky's relationship with the President and hope of obtaining a job outside the White House. Starr presented this information to Attorney General Reno. Reno petitioned the Special Division of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to expand the independent counsel's jurisdiction, and the Special Division issued an order on January 16, 1998, permitting the expansion of Starr's investigation into President Clinton's response to the Paula Jones case.[8] Over the course of the spring and summer a grand jury investigated

---

[26] Id.

[1] See Ken Gormley, Death of American Virtue: Clinton vs. Starr 33–114 (2010).

[2] Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 267 (1999); see generally Whitewater: Timeline, Wash. Post, http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/special/whitewater/timeline.htm (1998) (last visited Jan. 24, 2018).

[3] Gormley, supra note 1, at 143–69. A previous version of the statute under which the independent counsel was appointed was challenged as unconstitutional in Morrison v. Olson. 487 U.S. 654 (1998). The Supreme Court upheld the statute as constitutional. Id. at 685–96.

[4] In Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 684 (1997), the Supreme Court held that the President was subject to civil suits in his individual capacity while in office. Id. at 684.

[5] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 2, at 268.

[6] The Starr Report: Introduction, Wash. Post (1998), http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/special/clinton/icreport/5intro.htm.

[7] See Gormley, supra note 1, at 304–06.

[8] Id.

whether President Clinton committed perjury in his response to the Jones suit and whether he obstructed justice by encouraging others to lie about his relationship with Lewinsky.[9] President Clinton appeared by video before the grand jury and testified concerning the Lewinsky relationship.[10]

Independent Counsel Starr referred his report to the House of Representatives on September 9, 1998, noting that under the independent counsel statute, his office was required to do so because President Clinton engaged in behavior that might constitute grounds for impeachment.[11] The House then voted to open an impeachment investigation into President Clinton's behavior, released the Starr report publicly, and the House Judiciary Committee voted to release the tape of the President's grand jury testimony.[12]

Although the House Judiciary Committee already had conducted several hearings regarding the possibility of impeachment,[13] the Committee did not engage in an independent fact-finding investigation or call any live witnesses to testify about the President's conduct.[14] Instead, the Judiciary Committee largely relied on the Starr report to inform the Committee's own report recommending impeachment, which was released December 16, 1998.[15] The Committee report recommended impeachment of President Clinton on four counts.[16] The first article alleged that President Clinton perjured himself when testifying to a criminal grand jury regarding his response to the Jones lawsuit and relationship with Lewinsky.[17] The second alleged that the President committed perjury during a deposition in the civil suit brought against him by Paula Jones.[18] The third alleged that President Clinton obstructed justice in the suit brought against him by Jones and in the investigation by Independent Counsel Starr.[19] The fourth alleged that the President abused his office by refusing to respond to certain requests for admission from Congress and making untruthful responses to Congress during the investigation into his behavior.[20]

On December 19, 1998, in a lame-duck session, the House voted to approve the first and third articles.[21] After trial in the Senate, the President was acquitted on February 12, 1999.[22] Statements of the Senators entered into the record regarding the impeachment indicate disagreement about what constitutes an impeachable offense for the President and whether Clinton's behavior rose to this level.[23] For instance, Republican Senator Richard G. Luger

---

[9] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 2, at 269.

[10] H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 28 (1998); The Starr Report: Grounds For Impeachment, No. II, Wash. Post (1998), http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/special/clinton/icreport/7groundsii.htm.

[11] The Starr Report: Introduction, Wash. Post (1998), http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/special/clinton/icreport/5intro.htm; see 28 U.S.C. § 595(c).

[12] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 2, at 271.

[13] Background and History of Impeachment, Hearing Before the Subcomm. on the Constitution of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 2d Sess. (1998); Impeachment Inquiry: William Jefferson Clinton, President of the United States, Hearing Before the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 2d Sess. (1998).

[14] Michael J. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis 176–77 (2000).

[15] See H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 200–02 (1998) (minority views).

[16] H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 28.

[17] Id. at 2.

[18] Id. at 2–3.

[19] Id. at 3–4.

[20] Id. at 4–5.

[21] 144 Cong. Rec. 28,035–113 (1998).

[22] 145 Cong. Rec. 2375–78 (1999); Alison Mitchell, Clinton is Acquitted Decisively by Senate on Both Charges, N.Y. Times (Feb. 13, 1999), http://www.nytimes.com/learning/general/featured_articles/990216tuesday.html.

[23] See Published Closed Door Statements, 145 Cong. Rec. S1471–1637 (daily ed. Feb. 12, 1999); Gerhardt, supra note 14, at 175.

voted to convict on both articles, noting in his statement the gravity of the "presidential misconduct at issue" and arguing that the case was "not about adultery."[24] Instead, it centered on the obstruction of justice that occurred when the President "lied to a federal grand jury and worked to induce others to give false testimony."[25] For Senator Lugar, the President ultimately "betrayed [the] trust" of the nation through his actions and should be removed from office.[26] In contrast, Republican Senator Olympia Snowe voted to acquit on both articles. In her statement, she admonished the President's "lowly conduct," but concluded there was "insufficient evidence of the requisite untruth and the requisite intent" to establish perjury with regard to the concealment of his relationship with a subordinate; and the perjury charges regarding his relationship with a subordinate concerned statements that were largely "ruled irrelevant and inadmissible in the underlying civil case" which "undermine[d] [their] materiality."[27] She also stated that she thought one of the allegations in the second impeachment article had been proven—the President's attempt to influence the testimony of his personal assistant—but that the proper remedy for this was a criminal prosecution.[28] Indeed, a number of Senators indicated that they did not consider the President's behavior to constitute an impeachable offense because the President's conduct was not of a distinctly public nature.[29] For instance, Democratic Senator Byron L. Dorgan voted to acquit on both articles.[30] He described Clinton's behavior as "reprehensible," but concluded that it did not constitute "a grave danger to the nation."[31]

The significance of the Clinton impeachment experience to informing the understanding of what constitutes an impeachable offense is thus open to debate. One might point to the impeachment articles recommended by the House Judiciary Committee, but not adopted by the full House, as concerning conduct insufficient to establish an impeachable offense. Specifically, the House declined to impeach President Clinton for his alleged perjury in a civil suit against him as well as for alleged untruthful statements made in response to congressional requests.[32] Likewise, some scholars have pointed to the acquittal in the Senate of both impeachment articles that were brought by the House as evidence that the Clinton impeachment articles lacked merit or were adopted on purely partisan grounds.[33] The statements of some of the Senators just mentioned, reasoning that Clinton's conduct did not qualify as an impeachable offense, may provide support for arguments that impeachment is not an appropriate tool to address at least some sphere of conduct by a President not directly

---

[24] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of President William Jefferson Clinton, Volume IV: Statements of Senators Regarding the Impeachment Trial, 106th Cong., 1st Sess., S. Doc. No. 106-4, at 2571–72 (1999).

[25] Id.

[26] Id. at 2573.

[27] Id. at 3002.

[28] Id. at 3004.

[29] See 145 Cong. Rec. S1471–1637 (daily ed. Feb. 12, 1999); Gerhardt, supra note 14, at 175.

[30] Clinton Proceedings, supra note 24, at 2942.

[31] Id.

[32] 144 Cong. Rec. 28,110–12 (1998).

[33] Randall K. Miller, Presidential Sanctuaries After the Clinton Sex Scandals, 22 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 647, 728 (1999) ("President Clinton's acquittal, a constitutional law decision by the Senate—the final arbiter of the impeachment law—will reaffirm Congress's prior 'holdings' that impeachment carries a 'substantiality' requirement. Impeachable offenses are offenses seriously incompatible with the institutions of government or those that substantially impair a president's ability to perform his constitutional duties. President Clinton's conduct falls short of this extraordinarily high threshold."). But see Charles J. Cooper, A Perjurer in the White House?: The Constitutional Case for Perjury and Obstruction of Justice As High Crimes and Misdemeanors, 22 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 619, 621 (1999) ("[T]he crimes alleged against the President . . . plainly do involve the derelict violation of executive duties. Those crimes are plainly impeachable offenses.").

tied to his official duties.[34] However, the failure to convict President Clinton might instead simply reflect the failure of the House managers to prove their case,[35] or simply bare political calculation by some Senators.[36] Ultimately, the lessons of the Clinton impeachment experience will be revealed in the future practice of Congress when assessing whether similar conduct if committed by future Presidents is impeachable.

More broadly, the results of the Clinton impeachment revealed perceived problems with the Independent Counsel Act (ICA), the statute that authorized the investigation which sparked the impeachment proceedings.[37] Dating back at least to the 1988 Supreme Court case of Morrison v. Olson, some expressed concerned that the scope of an independent counsel's authority under the ICA, combined with a lack of accountability to the political branches, posed considerable risk of abuse.[38] The statute was permitted to lapse in 1999 amidst bipartisan congressional agreement that the law posed significant problems.[39]

ArtII.S4.4.9 President Donald Trump and Impeachable Offenses

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

President Donald Trump was impeached twice during his single term in office. In each case, he was acquitted on all counts by the Senate.

The first impeachment trial stemmed from a call President Trump had with the President Volodymyr Zelenskyy of Ukraine in which President Trump asked the Ukrainian President to announce two investigations: one involving his potential opponent in the upcoming 2020 presidential election and a second into unsubstantiated allegations that entities within Ukraine had interfered in the 2016 presidential election.[1] At the time of the call, the Office of Management and Budget had frozen $400 million in military aid to Ukraine at the direction of the President.[2] The contents of the call initially came to light through an intelligence community whistleblower report, but a summary of the call was later made public by President Trump.[3] [34] Michael J. Gerhardt, The Perils of Presidential Impeachment, 67 U. Chi. L. Rev. 293, 300 (2000) [hereinafter Gerhardt, Perils of Presidential Impeachment].

---

[35] See 145 Cong. Rec. S1577 (daily ed. Feb. 12, 1999).

[36] Gerhardt, supra note 14, at 175–76.

[37] Akhil Reed Amar, America's Unwritten Constitution 296 (2012); Gerhardt, supra note 14, at 189–91.

[38] Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 699–734 (1988) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (asserting that the independent counsel statute created improper incentives for investigations and prevented the President from holding prosecutors accountable) (quoting Brief for Edward H. Levi et. al, as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellees at 11, Morrison v. Olson, No. 87-1279 (Apr. 8, 1988)).

[39] See Saikrishna Prakash, The Chief Prosecutor, 73 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 521, 525–26 (2005) ("In the wake of Kenneth Starr's investigation of several Clinton-era scandals, a bipartisan consensus emerged against the use of independent counsels."); Gerhardt, supra note 14, at 189–91; see, e.g., Future of the Independent Counsel Act, Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, 106th Cong. 248 (1999) (statement of Janet Reno, Attorney General) ("However, after working with the Act, I have come to believe—after much reflection and with great reluctance—that the Independent Counsel Act is structurally flawed and that those flaws cannot be corrected within our constitutional framework."); id. at 425 (testimony of Kenneth Starr, Independent Counsel) (describing the independent counsel statute as creating a "fourth branch of government" with results that are "structurally unsound [and] constitutionally dubious").

[1] H.R. Rep. No. 116-346, at 81–83 (2019).

[2] Id. at 82.

[3] Id. at 126.

ArtII.S4.4.9
President Donald Trump and Impeachable Offenses

The House investigation proceeded in two phases. The fact-finding portion of the investigation was primarily handled by the House Intelligence Committee, in cooperation with the Committee on Oversight and Reform and the Committee on Foreign Affairs.[4] The early stage of this phase of the investigation saw some controversy over whether the House must explicitly authorize the initiation of an impeachment investigation. Although the Speaker of the House had announced that the committee investigations constituted an "official impeachment inquiry," the White House counsel objected to the investigations on the ground that the investigation lacked "the necessary authorization for a valid impeachment proceeding" and violated the Due Process Clause.[5] As a result, the President instructed members of his administration not to cooperate with the House's "unconstitutional inquiry."[6]

The House later took action to explicitly approve the impeachment investigation by adopting a resolution authorizing the House committees "to continue their ongoing investigations as part of the existing House of Representatives inquiry into whether sufficient grounds exist . . . to impeach Donald John Trump."[7] Nevertheless, the White House and other Executive Branch offices generally refused to comply with the House investigators requests for information, including subpoenas. Some Executive Branch officials, however, made the individual determination to cooperate with the impeachment inquiry and, as a result, the Intelligence Committee was able to hold a number of investigative hearings and issue a report outlining their findings. The record established in the fact finding phase was then provided to the Judiciary Committee.

Phase two of the impeachment investigation was conducted by the Judiciary Committee. This phase focused on whether the President's conduct, as uncovered in the fact finding phase of the inquiry, constituted an impeachable offense.[8] Following a series of hearings, the Committee recommended two articles of impeachment against the President, both of which were ultimately approved by the House. The first charged the President with abuse of power, alleging that he had used the powers of his office to solicit Ukraine's interference in the 2020 election and had conditioned official acts, such as the release of military aid to Ukraine and a White House visit, on President Zelenskyy agreeing to announce the investigations.[9] "President Trump," the article alleged, "engaged in this scheme or course of conduct for corrupt purposes in pursuit of personal political benefit."[10] The second article charged the President with obstruction of the House impeachment investigation by directing the "unprecedented, categorical, and indiscriminate defiance of subpoenas issued by the House of Representatives."[11] "This abuse of office," the article alleged, was "subversive of constitutional government" and "nullif[ied] a vital constitutional safeguard vested solely in the House of Representatives."[12] [4] See Staff of H. Perm. Select Comm. on Intelligence, H. Comm. on Oversight and Reform, & H. Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 116th Cong., The Trump-Ukraine Impeachment Inquiry Report: Report for the H. Perm. Select Comm. on Intelligence Pursuant to H. Res. 660 in Consultation with the H. Comm. on Oversight and Reform and the H. Comm. on Foreign Affairs (Comm. Print 2019).

---

[5] Press Release, Nancy Pelosi, Speaker of the House, Pelosi Remarks Announcing Impeachment Inquiry (Sept. 24, 2019), https://www.speaker.gov/newsroom/92419-0.

[6] See Letter from Pat Cipollone, White House Counsel, to Nancy Pelosi, Speaker of the House of Representatives, et al. (Oct. 8, 2019) https://s3.documentcloud.org/documents/6459967/PAC-Letter-10-08-2019.pdf.

[7] H.R. Res. 660, 116th Cong. (2019).

[8] See H.R. Rep. No. 116-346; Report by the Majority Staff of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 116th Cong., Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment (Comm. Print 2019).

[9] H.R. Res. 755, 116th Cong. (2019).

[10] Id.

[11] Id.

[12] Id.

Although the impeachment articles were adopted by the House on December 18, 2019, the managers were not appointed and the articles not delivered to the Senate until January 15, 2020.[13]

The Senate trial was characterized by deep partisan divides and complicated disagreements over questions of law and fact, including presidential motive. But one clear constitutional conflict that arose during the trial involved the proper relationship between impeachment and criminal law. Trial briefs and debate made clear that the House managers and President Trump's attorneys reached very different conclusions on the question of whether "high crimes and misdemeanors" require evidence of a criminal act or other legal violation.[14] The House, consistent with past impeachment practice, asserted that for purposes of Article II "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" "need not be indictable criminal offenses."[15] In response, however, the President's attorneys asserted that an "impeachable offense must be a violation of established law," and that the articles "fail[ed] to allege any crime or violation of law whatsoever, let alone 'high Crimes and Misdemeanors,' as required by the Constitution."[16] The acquittal provided no clear resolution to these conflicting positions, but the debate over a link between illegal acts and impeachable acts appears to have had some impact on individual Senators. Indeed, the House's managers' failure to allege an explicit criminal act appears, along with criticism of the House investigation and failure of the House to prove its case, to have been among the primary reasons given for acquittal.[17]

As the Senate trial proceeded, it became apparent that a major point of contention would be whether the Senate would call its own witnesses. The House managers asked that the Senate authorize subpoenas for relevant Executive Branch documents and for testimony from various White House officials including former National Security Advisor John Bolton.[18] With only forty-nine Senators voting in favor, the Senate chose not to approve that request, and the record was limited to the evidence provided by the House.[19]

---

[13] H.R. Res. 798, 116th Cong. (2020).

[14] U.S. Const. art. II, § 4.

[15] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of President Donald John Trump, Vol. I: Preliminary Proceedings, 116th Cong., S. Doc. No. 116-18, at 416 (2020).

[16] Id. at 471.

[17] See, e.g., Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of President Donald John Trump, Vol. IV: Statements of Senators, 116th Cong., S. Doc. No. 116-18, at 1914 (2020) (statement of Senator James M. Inhofe) ("Each of the past impeachment cases in the House of Representatives accused Presidents Johnson, Nixon, and Clinton of committing a crime. This President didn't commit a crime."); id. at 1984 (statement of Senator Ted Cruz) ("Indeed, in the Articles of Impeachment they sent over here, they don't allege any crime whatsoever. They don't even allege a single Federal law that the President violated."); id. at 1990 (statement of Senator David Perdue) ("President Trump is the first President ever to face impeachment who was never accused of any crime in these proceedings, whatsoever. These two Articles of Impeachment simply do not qualify as reasons to impeach any President"); id. at 2034 (statement of Senator John Cornyn) ("But they failed to bring forward compelling and unassailable evidence of any crime—again, the Constitution talks about treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; clearly, a criminal standard . . . ."). Other Senators identified the non-existence of a crime as an important factor in their vote, but nevertheless made clear their belief that a crime is not constitutionally required. See, e.g., id. at 1937 (statement of Senator Mitch McConnell) ("Now, I do not subscribe to the legal theory that impeachment requires a violation of a criminal statute, but there are powerful reasons why, for 230 years, every Presidential impeachment did in fact allege a criminal violation."); id. at 2016 (statement of Senator Rob Portman) ("In this case, no crime is alleged. Let me repeat. In the two Articles of Impeachment that came over to us from the House, there is no criminal law violation alleged. Although I don't think that that is always necessary—there could be circumstances where a crime isn't necessary in an impeachment . . . . ").

[18] See Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of President Donald John Trump, Vol. II: Floor and Trial Proceedings, 116th Cong., S. Doc. No. 116-18, at 1498–99 (2020).

[19] Id. at 1499.

Ultimately, the Senate acquitted President Trump on both counts. Article I failed by a vote of 48-52 while Article II failed by a vote of 47-53.[20]

The second Trump impeachment occurred a year later in the waning days of the Trump presidency following the events on January 6, 2021, at the U.S. Capitol in which some supporters of President Trump attempted to disrupt the congressional certification of the 2020 presidential election as having been won by Joseph Biden. The House moved quickly following those events. Passing on an investigation, the Judiciary Committee staff compiled publicly available evidence relating to the President's actions on January 6 and within one week had introduced and approved a single article of impeachment charging the President with "incitement to insurrection."[21] Specifically, the article alleged that in the months running up to January 6th the President had consistently "issued false statements asserting that the Presidential election results were the product of widespread fraud and should not be accepted by the American people."[22] He then repeated those claims when addressing a crowd on January 6, and "willfully made statements that, in context, encouraged—and foreseeably resulted in—lawless action at the Capitol. . . ."[23] Notably, although the House ultimately impeached President Trump prior to the expiration of his term, the Senate did not commence a trial until after President Trump had left office.[24]

The Senate trial saw the chamber make two important threshold determinations regarding trials of former Presidents. First, although the Constitution clearly requires the Chief Justice to preside over presidential impeachment trials, the Senate implicitly determined that that requirement does not extend to the trial of a former President. At the opening of the trial, Senator Patrick Leahy, President pro tempore of the United States Senate, was sworn in as presiding officer without objection.[25]

The Senate also made the threshold determination of whether it had the constitutional authority to try a former President. After briefing and debate on the question of whether the Senate had jurisdiction over a former President for acts that occurred during his tenure in office, the Senate explicitly determined by a vote of 56-44 that it did.[26] Thus a majority of Senators, as they have on previous occasions, determined that former officials may be tried by the Senate and, though not removable, remain subject to disqualification from holding future office if convicted.[27]

With respect to whether the President had committed an impeachable offense, the main substantive question during the trial arguably revolved around the proper application of the First Amendment. The former President's attorneys invoked the First Amendment as a defense to the impeachment charge, asserting that free speech protections apply and limit the [20] 166 Cong. Rec. S937 (daily ed. Feb. 5, 2020) (acquitting President Trump on Article I by a vote of 48-52); id. at S938 (acquitting President Trump on Article II by a vote of 47-53).

---

[21] See Staff of H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 116th Cong., Materials in Support of H. Res. 24 Impeaching Donald John Trump, President of the United States, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors (Comm. Print Jan. 12, 2021); H.R. Res. 24, 117th Cong. (2021).

[22] H.R. Res. 24, 117th Cong. (2021).

[23] Id.

[24] See Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Vol. I: Preliminary and Floor Trial Proceedings, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-3, at 23 (2021).

[25] 167 Cong. Rec. S142 (daily ed. Jan. 26, 2021) (swearing in Patrick Leahy (D-VT), President pro tempore of the United States Senate, as presiding officer).

[26] 167 Cong. Rec. S609 (daily ed. Feb. 9, 2021) (determining that "Donald John Trump is subject to the jurisdiction of a Court of Impeachment for acts committed while President of the United States, notwithstanding the expiration of his term in that office").

[27] See Jared P. Cole & Todd Garvey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R46013, Impeachment and the Constitution 47–48 (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R46013

conduct that can be considered an impeachable offense.[28] The President's political statements at the rally, his attorneys argued, constituted "core free speech under the First Amendment" and thus not an impeachable offense.[29] The House managers disagreed, arguing that "The First Amendment has no application in an impeachment proceeding" because impeachment "does not seek to punish unlawful speech, but instead to protect the Nation from a President who violated his oath of office and abused the public trust."[30] Moreover, even if the First Amendment did restrict the impeachment power, "it still would not protect President Trump's calls to violence," which the managers asserted fell within the well-established category of unprotected speech "directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action."[31] In the end, the First Amendment arguments made by the former President's attorneys do not appear to have had an impact on Senators, as only one Senator who voted to acquit the former President mentioned the First Amendment in the formal explanation of his vote.[32]

Although a majority of Senators voted to convict, former President Trump was ultimately acquitted by a vote of 57-43.[33]

ArtII.S4.4.10 Judicial Impeachments

Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Congress has impeached federal judges with comparatively greater frequency in recent decades, and some of these impeachments appear to augur important consequences for the practice in the future. In particular, within three years in the 1980s the House voted to impeach three federal judges, each occurring after a criminal trial of the judge. One impeached federal judge was not barred from future office and subsequently was elected to serve in the House of Representatives, the body that earlier had impeached him.[1] Another judge challenged the adequacy of his impeachment trial in a case that ultimately reached the Supreme Court, which ruled that the case was non-justiciable.[2]

The House of Representatives impeached federal district judge Harry E. Claiborne in 1986, following his criminal conviction and subsequent imprisonment for providing false statements on his tax returns.[3] Despite his incarceration, Judge Claiborne did not resign his [28] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part II, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 146–75 (2021).

---

[29] Id. at 156.

[30] Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Part III, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 208 (2021).

[31] Id. at 209 (citing Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969).

[32] See Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of Donald John Trump, Vol. II: Visual Aids from the Trial and Statements of Senators, 117th Cong., S. Doc. No. 117-3, at 875 (2021) (statement of Senator Dan Sullivan) ("[T]he House managers claimed, in arguing their incitement charge, that First Amendment political speech protections do not apply to elected officials in impeachment proceedings. A conviction based on this breathtaking precedent has the potential to significantly further undermine core constitutional protections for Americans and their ability to undertake political speech in the future.") But see id. at 791 (statement of Senator Charles E. Schumer) ("The First Amendment right to free speech protects Americans from jail, not Presidents from impeachment.").

[33] 167 Cong. Rec. S733 (daily ed. Feb. 13, 2021) (acquitting former President Trump by a vote of 57-43).

[1] See H. Res. 499 (Aug. 9, 1988); H.R. Rep. No. 100-810, at 8 (1988).

[2] Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 237–38 (1993).

[3] United States v. Claiborne, 727 F.2d 842 (9th Cir. 1984).

seat and continued to collect his judicial salary.[4] The House unanimously voted in favor of four articles of impeachment against him.[5] The first two articles against Judge Claiborne simply laid out the underlying behavior that had given rise to his criminal prosecution.[6] The third article "rest[ed] entirely on the conviction itself" and stood for the principle that "by conviction alone he is guilty of 'high crimes' in office."[7] The fourth alleged that Judge Claiborne's actions brought the "judiciary into disrepute, thereby undermining public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the administration of justice" which amounted to a "misdemeanor."[8]

The Senate impeachment trial of Judge Claiborne was the first in which that body used a committee to take evidence. Rather than conducting a full trial with the entire Senate, the committee took testimony, received evidence, and voted on pretrial motions regarding evidence and discovery.[9] The committee then reported a transcript of the proceedings to the full Senate, without recommending whether impeachment was warranted.[10] The Senate voted to convict Judge Claiborne on the first, second, and fourth articles.[11]

In 1988, the House impeached a federal district judge who had been indicted for a criminal offense but acquitted. Judge Alcee L. Hastings was acquitted in a criminal trial where he was accused of conspiracy and obstruction of justice for soliciting a bribe in return for reducing the sentences of two convicted felons.[12] After his acquittal, a judicial committee investigated the case and concluded that Judge Hasting's behavior might merit impeachment. The Judicial Conference (a national entity composed of federal judges that reviews investigations of judges and is authorized to refer recommendations to Congress) eventually referred the matter to the House of Representatives, noting that impeachment might be warranted.[13] The House of Representatives approved seventeen impeachment articles against Judge Hastings, including for perjury, bribery, and conspiracy.[14]

Judge Hastings objected to the impeachment proceedings as "double jeopardy" because he had already been acquitted in a previous criminal proceeding.[15] The Senate, however, rejected his motion to dismiss the articles against him.[16] The Senate again used a trial committee to

---

[4] Emily F.V. Tassel & Paul Finkelman, Impeachable Offenses: A Documentary History from 1787 to the Present 168 (1999).

[5] 132 Cong. Rec. H4710–22 (daily ed. July 22, 1986).

[6] H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Judge Harry E. Claiborne, Report to Accompany H. Res. 461, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., H.R. Rep. No. 99-688, at 1–2 (1986).

[7] Id. at 12.

[8] Id. at 23.

[9] Staff from the S. Impeachment Trial Comm., On the Impeachment of Harry E. Claiborne, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., S. Rep. No. 99-511, at 1–4 (1986).

[10] Id. at 1.

[11] 132 Cong. Rec. 29,870–72 (1986).

[12] H.R. Rep. No. 100-810, at 8 (1988).

[13] Id. The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980 authorizes the Judicial Conference to forward a certification to the House that impeachment of a federal judge may be warranted. 28 U.S.C. § 355.

[14] H. Res. 499 (Aug. 9, 1988); H.R. Rep. No. 100-810, at 8 (1988).

[15] Impeachment of Judge Alcee L. Hastings, Motions of Judge Alee L. Hastings to Dismiss Articles I-XV and XVII of the Articles of Impeachment Against Him and Supporting and Opposing Memoranda S. Doc. 101–4, at 48–65 (1989).

[16] The Impeachment Trial of Alcee Hastings, U.S. Senate, https://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/history/common/briefing/Impeachment_Hastings.htm (last visited Jan. 24, 2018).

receive evidence. That body voted to convict and remove Judge Hastings on eight articles, but did not vote to disqualify him from holding future office.[17] Judge Hastings was later elected to the House of Representatives.[18]

Before the trial of Judge Hastings even began in the Senate, the House impeached Judge Walter L. Nixon. Judge Nixon was convicted in a criminal trial of perjury to a grand jury and imprisoned.[19] Following an investigation by the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, the Judiciary Committee reported a resolution to the full House recommending impeachment on three articles.[20] The full House approved three articles of impeachment, the first two involving lying to a grand jury and the last for undermining the integrity of and bringing disrepute on the federal judicial system.[21] The Senate convicted Judge Nixon on the first two articles but acquitted him on the third.[22]

Judge Nixon challenged the Senate's use of a committee to receive evidence and conduct hearings. He brought a suit in federal court arguing that the use of a committee, rather than the full Senate, to take evidence violated the Constitution's provision that the Senate "try" all impeachments.[23] The Supreme Court ultimately rejected his challenge in Nixon v. United States, ruling that the issue was a non-justiciable political question because the Constitution grants the power to try impeachments "in the Senate and nowhere else"; and the word "try" "lacks sufficient precision to afford any judicially manageable standard of review of the Senate's actions."[24] As a result of this decision, impeachment proceedings appear largely immune from judicial review.[25]

Two judges have been impeached in the twenty-first century. As with the three impeachments of judges in the 1980s, the first followed a criminal indictment. District Judge Samuel B. Kent pled guilty to obstruction of justice for lying to a judicial investigation into alleged sexual misconduct and was sentenced to 33 months in prison.[26] The House impeached Judge Kent for sexually assaulting two court employees, obstructing the judicial investigation of his behavior, and making false and misleading statements to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) about the activity.[27] Judge Kent resigned his office before a Senate trial.[28] The Senate declined to conduct a trial following his resignation.

---

[17] 135 Cong. Rec. S13,783–87 (daily ed. Oct. 20, 1989).

[18] Tassel & Finkelman, supra note 4, at 173.

[19] H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Walter L. Nixon, Jr., Report to Accompany H. Res. 87, 101st Cong., 1st Sess., H.R. Rep. No. 101-36, at 12–13 (1989).

[20] Id. at 14–16.

[21] 135 Cong. Rec. H1802–11 (daily ed. May 10, 1989).

[22] 135 Cong. Rec. S14,633–39 (daily ed. Nov. 3, 1989).

[23] Nixon, 506 U.S. at 226.

[24] Id. at 229.

[25] The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia initially threw out Judge Hastings' Senate impeachment conviction, because the Senate had tried his impeachment before a committee rather than the full Senate. Hastings v. United States, 802 F. Supp. 490, 505 (D.D.C. 1992). The decision was vacated on appeal and remanded for reconsideration in light of Nixon v. United States. Hastings v. United States, 988 F.2d 1280 (D.C. Cir. 1993). The district court then dismissed the suit because it presented a nonjusticiable political question. Hastings v. United States, 837 F. Supp. 3, 5–6 (D.D.C. 1993).

[26] H. Comm. on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Judge Samuel B. Kent, Report to Accompany H. Res. 520, 11th Cong., 1st Sess. H.R. Rep. No. 111-159, at 6–13 (2009) [hereinafter Kent Impeachment].

[27] 155 Cong. Rec. H7053–67 (daily ed. June 19, 2009); Kent Impeachment, supra note 26, at 2–3.

[28] Charles W. Johnson, John V. Sullivan, and Thomas J. Wickham, Jr., House Practice: A Guide to the Rules, Precedents and Procedures of the House 608–13 (2017).

Although the four previous impeachments of federal judges followed criminal proceedings, the most recent impeachment did not.[29] In 2010, Judge G. Thomas Porteous Jr. was impeached for participating in a corrupt financial relationship with attorneys in a case before him, and engaging in a corrupt relationship with bail bondsmen whereby he received things of value in return for helping the bondsmen develop corrupt relationships with state court judges.[30] Judge Porteous was the first individual impeached by the House[31] and convicted by the Senate based in part upon conduct occurring before he began his tenure in federal office. The first and second articles of impeachment each alleged misconduct by Judge Porteous during both his state and federal judgeships.[32] The fourth alleged that Judge Porteous made false statements to the Senate and FBI in connection with his nomination and confirmation to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana.[33]

Judge Porteous's filings in answer to the articles of impeachment argued that conduct occurring before he was appointed to the federal bench cannot constitute impeachable behavior.[34] The House Managers' replication, or reply to this argument, argued that Porteous's contention had no basis in the Constitution.[35] On December 8, 2010, he was convicted on all four articles, removed from office, and disqualified from holding future federal offices.[36] The first article, which included conduct occurring before he was a federal judge, was affirmed 96-0.[37] The second article, approved 90-6, alleged that he lied to the Senate in his confirmation hearing to be a federal judge.[38] A number of Senators explicitly adopted the reasoning supplied by expert witness testimony before the House that the crucial issue regarding the appropriateness of impeachment was not the timing of the misconduct, but "whether Judge Porteous committed such misconduct and whether such misconduct demonstrates the lack of integrity and judgment that are required in order for him to continue to function" in office.[39]

Senator Claire McCaskill explained in her statement entered in the Congressional Record that Judge Porteous's argument for an "absolute, categorical rule that would preclude impeachment and removal for any pre-federal conduct" should be rejected.[40] "That should not be the rule," she noted, "any more than allowing impeachment for any pre-federal conduct that [29] The FBI investigated judicial corruption in Louisiana's 24th Judicial District, the court on which Judge Porteous served before being appointed to the District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana. The Department of Justice declined to seek criminal charges but did submit a complaint of judicial misconduct to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Report of the Impeachment Trial Comm. on the Articles Against Judge G. Thomas Porteous, Jr., 111th Cong., 2d Sess., S. Rep. No. 111-347, at 5 (2010) [hereinafter Porteous Impeachment].

[30] Porteous Impeachment, supra note 29, at 1–2.

[31] 156 Cong. Rec. 3155–57 (2010).

[32] Porteous Impeachment, supra note 29, at 1–2.

[33] Porteous Impeachment, supra note 29, at 2.

[34] 156 Cong. Rec. S2183–84 (daily ed. Apr. 12, 2010). See also Judge G. Thomas Porteous, Jr.'s Post-Trial Brief (Oct. 29, 2010), in Proceedings of the United States Senate in the Impeachment Trial of G. Thomas Porteous, Jr., A Judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, 111th Cong., 2d Sess., S. Doc. No. 111-20, at 61–76 (2010) [hereinafter Porteous Proceedings].

[35] 156 Cong. Rec. S2358 (daily ed. Apr. 15, 2010). See also Post-Trial Memorandum of the House of Representatives (Oct. 29, 2010), in Porteous Proceedings, supra note 29, at 304–15.

[36] 156 Cong. Rec. 19,134–36 (2010).

[37] 156 Cong. Rec. 8609 (2010).

[38] 156 Cong. Rec. 8610 (2010).

[39] To Consider Possible Impeachment of United States District Judge G. Thomas Porteous, Jr. (Part IV), Hearing Before the Task Force on Judicial Impeachment of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 111th Cong., 1st Sess., H. Hrg. 111–46, at 30 (Dec. 15, 2009) (statement of Michael J. Gerhardt, Professor of Law, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill School of Law); see, e.g., 156 Cong. Rec. S10,285 (daily ed. Dec. 15, 2010) (statement of Senator Tom Udall); id. at S10,284 (statement of Senator Patrick Leahy).

[40] 156 Cong. Rec. S10,282 (daily ed. Dec 15, 2010).

is entirely unrelated to the federal office."[41] Senator Patrick Leahy agreed, noting that he "reject[ed] any notion of impeachment immunity [for pre-federal behavior] if misconduct was hidden, or otherwise went undiscovered during the confirmation process, and it is relevant to a judge's ability to serve as an impartial arbiter."[42]

[41] Id.

[42] 156 Cong. Rec. S10, 284. See also id. at S10,286 (statement of Senator Jeanne Shaheen) ("I was totally unpersuaded by the defense team's argument that Judge Porteous's 'pre-Federal' conduct should be outside the scope of our deliberation—I do not believe the act of being confirmed to a Federal judgeship by the Senate erases or excuses an individual's conduct up to the point of confirmation."); id. at S10,405 (statement of Senator Jeff Sessions) ("The Constitution does not require that all conduct be committed post Federal appointment nor does it stipulate at all when the conduct must occur.").

ARTICLE III
JUDICIAL BRANCH

ARTICLE III
JUDICIAL BRANCH

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Sec. 1—Vesting Clause continued

Sec. 2, Cl. 1—Justiciability, Cases or Controversies continued

Sec. 2, Cl. 1—Justiciability, Cases or Controversies continued

Sec. 2, Cl. 1—Justiciability, Cases or Controversies continued

Sec. 2, Cl. 2—Justiciability, Supreme Court Jurisdiction continued

ARTICLE III—JUDICIAL BRANCH

ArtIII.1 Overview of Article III, Judicial Branch

Article III of the U.S. Constitution establishes the Judicial Branch of the federal government. Section 1 of Article III, known as the Judicial Vesting Clause, confers the federal judicial power on "one supreme Court" and "such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."[1] Through that language, the Constitution's Framers ensured the existence of a federal Supreme Court but left to Congress the decision of whether to establish lower federal courts.[2] The first Congress established lower federal courts in the first legislation related to the Federal Judiciary.[3] As the Nation expanded, Congress legislated to expand and restructure the Article III Judiciary[4] and also periodically created other tribunals known as "Article I courts" or "legislative courts."[5]

While Article III grants Congress significant authority to establish and structure federal courts, it also imposes key limitations designed to ensure the independence of the Judiciary. Article III, Section 1 provides that federal judges "shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour," which the Supreme Court has interpreted to grant federal judges life tenure, unless they voluntarily resign or are impeached and removed from the bench.[6] Section 1 also provides that federal judges shall receive compensation for their work, "which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office."[7] That provision prevents Congress from punishing unpopular judicial decisions by docking judges' pay.[8]

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1 authorizes the creation of federal courts with limited jurisdiction, providing that the "judicial Power shall extend" to certain enumerated categories of "Cases" and "Controversies."[9] Among other things, the Clause provides for federal court jurisdiction over cases "arising under" the Constitution or the laws or treaties of the United States (sometimes called "federal question jurisdiction")[10] and controversies between citizens of different states (known as "diversity jurisdiction").[11] Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 grants the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over a subset of federal cases, meaning that litigants may commence those cases in the Supreme Court rather than beginning the cases in a state court or a lower federal court and reaching the Supreme Court on appeal, if at all.[12] The Constitution's grant of Supreme Court original jurisdiction is self-executing, meaning that

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[2] The Framers generally accepted that state courts would play a significant role in interpreting and applying federal law, but they debated whether to leave that role entirely to state courts, subject to review by the federal Supreme Court, or whether lower federal court were more likely to apply federal law correctly, uniformly, and without bias. See ArtIII.S1.6.2 Historical Background on Relationship Between Federal and State Courts.

[3] 1 Stat. 73.

[4] See ArtIII.S1.8.1 Overview of Establishment of Article III Courts.

[5] See ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts.

[6] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; see also ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[7] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[8] See ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause. Article III's protections for federal judges do not apply to judges on Article I tribunals. See ArtIII.S1.9.2 Congressional Power to Structure Legislative Courts.

[9] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[10] See ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction.

[11] See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction. Other examples of matters subject to federal court jurisdiction include admiralty and maritime cases, cases to which the United States is a Party, and controversies between states. See generally ArtIII.S2.C1.1 Overview of Cases or Controversies.

[12] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2; see also ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction. Under current law, parties in most cases must seek Supreme Court review through a petition for a writ of certiorari, which the Court has discretion to grant or deny. See ArtIII.S2.C2.4 Supreme Court Appellate Jurisdiction.

Congress need not enact legislation to implement it.[13] None of the other grants of federal court jurisdiction are self-executing, however, so the lower federal courts can only hear cases to the extent Congress enacts legislation authorizing them to do so.[14] The Supreme Court has interpreted Article III as setting the outer bounds of federal court jurisdiction: Congress cannot grant jurisdiction beyond what Article III authorizes, but is not required to grant the federal courts the full authority it might choose to confer consistent with the constitutional authorization.[15]

The Supreme Court has also construed Article III to impose certain "justiciability" requirements that may limit federal courts' ability to hear cases that would otherwise fall within their jurisdiction.[16] Among other limitations, federal courts may not issue advisory opinions.[17] Relatedly, every federal court plaintiff must demonstrate standing to sue, which requires that the plaintiff possess a concrete and personal stake in the outcome of the case.[18] Federal courts may not hear cases that are not "ripe" for decision because the dispute has not developed enough for a court to decide the issues presented effectively[19] or those that have become "moot" and no longer present a live controversy.[20] The courts also cannot hear "political questions" best entrusted to the other branches of government[21] and generally avoid deciding constitutional questions when a case can be resolved on other grounds.[22]

The remainder of Article III governs specific judicial proceedings. Article III, Section 2, Clause 3 governs criminal trials, requiring a jury trial for the "Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment."[23] Article III, Section 3 governs trial and punishment for treason. Section 3, Clause 1 defines treason as "only . . . levying War against [the United States], or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort" and provides that conviction for treason requires the testimony of two witnesses "to the same overt Act" or "Confession in open Court."[24] Section 3, Clause 2 prohibits punishing treason by "Corruption of Blood."[25]

---

[13] Relatedly, Congress may not enact legislation limiting the Court's original jurisdiction. See, e.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137, 174 (1803).

[14] See, e.g., Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 364 (1959) (describing "enumerated classes of cases to which 'judicial power' was extended by the Constitution and which thereby authorized grants by Congress of 'judicial Power' to the 'inferior' federal courts"). Likewise, Article III provides that the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction is subject to "such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make." U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2; see also ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[15] See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (bestowing less than the maximum amount of diversity jurisdiction by granting federal courts jurisdiction in civil actions between citizens of different states and between a citizen of a state and a subject of a foreign state if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000).

[16] See ArtIII.S2.C1.3.1 Overview of Rules of Justiciability and Cases or Controversies Requirement.

[17] An advisory opinion is a non-binding interpretation of the law by a court, essentially the court providing advice on an abstract or hypothetical legal question. See ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[18] See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing.

[19] See ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1 Overview of Ripeness Doctrine.

[20] See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.1 Overview of Mootness Doctrine.

[21] See ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine.

[22] See ArtIII.S2.C1.10.1 Overview of Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine.

[23] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 3; see also ArtIII.S2.C3.1 Jury Trials.

[24] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1; see also ArtIII.S3.C1.1 Historical Background on Treason.

[25] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 2; see also ArtIII.S3.C2.1 Punishment of Treason Clause. "Corruption of blood" refers to "perpetual forfeiture of the estate of the person attainted [for treason], to the disinherison of his heirs, or of those who would otherwise be his heirs." Wallach v. Van Riswick, 92 U.S. 202, 210 (1876).

Section 1—Vesting Clause

ArtIII.S1.1 Overview of Judicial Vesting Clause

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Article III, Section 1 of the Constitution vests the "judicial Power of the United States" in the federal courts.[1] Associate Justice Samuel Miller described judicial power as "the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision."[2] The Supreme Court has explained that judicial power is "the right to determine actual controversies arising between diverse litigants, duly instituted in courts of proper jurisdiction."[3] Judicial power thus confers on federal courts the power to decide cases and to render a judgment that conclusively resolves each case.

While the Constitution provides that the judicial power "shall be vested" in the federal courts, the vesting of most of the judicial power is neither automatic nor mandatory. The Supreme Court exercises original jurisdiction over a limited class of cases, meaning that such cases may be filed directly in the Supreme Court rather than reaching the Court on appeal.[4] That original jurisdiction has been deemed to arise directly from the Constitution.[5] Outside the limited category of cases subject to original jurisdiction, the federal courts' authority to hear cases depends on both constitutional text and implementing statutes. Two prerequisites must be present before the federal courts may hear a case: first, the Constitution must have given the courts the capacity to receive jurisdiction, and, second, an act of Congress must have conferred it.[6] Congress has never vested in the federal courts all the jurisdiction that the Constitution would allow it to grant,[7] and the Supreme Court has not interpreted the Constitution to require that Congress confer the entire jurisdiction it might.[8]

One key feature of the federal judicial power is the power of judicial review, the authority of the federal courts to declare that federal or state government actions violate the Constitution.

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[2] Justice Samuel Miller, On the Constitution 314 (1891).

[3] Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 361 (1911).

[4] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[5] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[6] The Mayor v. Cooper, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 247, 252 (1868); Cary v. Curtis, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 236 (1845); Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850); United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32, 33 (1812); Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226 (1922). Some judges have expressed the opinion that Congress's authority is limited by provisions of the Constitution such as the Due Process Clause, so that a limitation on jurisdiction that denied a litigant access to any remedy might be unconstitutional. Cf. Eisentrager v. Forrestal, 174 F.2d 961, 965–966 (D.C. Cir. 1949), rev'd on other grounds sub nom, Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950); Battaglia v. General Motors Corp., 169 F.2d 254, 257 (2d Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 335 U.S. 887 (1948); Petersen v. Clark, 285 F. Supp. 700, 703 n.5 (N.D. Calif. 1968); Murray v. Vaughn, 300 F. Supp. 688, 694–695 (D.R.I. 1969). The Supreme Court has had no occasion to consider the question.

[7] For discussion of constitutional and statutory grants of federal court jurisdiction in two key areas, see ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction and ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

[8] See, e.g., Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 8, 10 (1799) (Justice Chase). But see Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 328–331 (1816); 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (1833) 1584–1590; Akhil Amar, A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction, 65 B.U. L. Rev. 205 (1985).

ArtIII.S1.1
Overview of Judicial Vesting Clause

The two essays that follow discuss the historical background of judicial review and Supreme Court doctrine related to judicial review, particularly the seminal case Marbury v. Madison.[9]

The general judicial power also includes certain ancillary powers of courts such as the authority to punish for contempt of their authority,[10] to issue writs in aid of jurisdiction when authorized by statute,[11] to make rules governing their process in the absence of statutory authorizations or prohibitions,[12] to order their own process so as to prevent abuse, oppression, and injustice, and to protect their own jurisdiction and officers in the protection of property in custody of law,[13] to appoint masters in chancery, referees, auditors, and other investigators,[14] and to admit and disbar attorneys.[15] The inherent powers of the federal courts are discussed in more detail in later essays.[16]

ArtIII.S1.2 Historical Background on Judicial Review

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

One key feature of the federal judicial power is the power of judicial review, the authority of federal courts to declare that federal or state government actions violate the Constitution. While judicial review is now one of the distinctive features of United States constitutional law, the Constitution does not expressly grant federal courts power to declare government actions unconstitutional. However, the historical record from the Founding and the early years of the Republic suggests that those who framed and ratified the Constitution were aware of judicial review, and that some favored granting courts that power.

The concept of judicial review was already established at the time of the Founding. The Privy Council had employed a limited form of judicial review to review colonial legislation and its validity under the colonial charters.[1] There were several instances known to the Framers of state court invalidation of state legislation as inconsistent with state constitutions.[2] Practically all of the Framers who expressed an opinion on the issue in the Convention appear to have assumed and welcomed the existence of court review of the constitutionality of legislation.[3] Alexander Hamilton argued in favor of the doctrine in the Federalist Papers.[4] In [9] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803). See ArtIII.S1.2 Historical Background on Judicial Review and ArtIII.S1.3 Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review.

---

[10] Michaelson v. United States, 266 U.S. 42 (1924).

[11] McIntire v. Wood, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 504 (1813); Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807).

[12] Wayman v. Southard, 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 1 (1825).

[13] Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U.S. 131 (1888).

[14] Ex parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300 (1920).

[15] Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 333, 378 (1867).

[16] See ArtIII.S1.4.1 Overview of Inherent Powers of Federal Courts.

[1] Julius Goebel, Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801, History of the Supreme Court of the United States 60–95 (1971).

[2] Id. at 96–142.

[3] 1 Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 97–98 (1913) (Gerry), 109 (King); 2 Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 28 (1913) (Morris and perhaps Sherman), 73 (Wilson), 75 (Strong, but the remark is ambiguous), 76 (Martin), 78 (Mason), 79 (Gorham, but ambiguous), 80 (Rutledge), 92–93 (Madison), 248 (Pinckney), 299 (Morris), 376 (Williamson), 391 (Wilson), 428 (Rutledge), 430 (Madison), 440 (Madison), enacting the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress explicitly provided for the exercise of the power,[5] and in other legislative debates questions of constitutionality and of judicial review were prominent.[6] Early Supreme Court Justices seem to have assumed the existence of judicial review.[7]

The Supreme Court first formally embraced the doctrine of judicial review in the 1803 case Marbury v. Madison.[8] Since Marbury, judicial review has become a core feature of American 589 (Madison); 3 Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 220 (1913) (Martin). The only expressed opposition to judicial review came from Mercer with a weak seconding from Dickinson. "Mr. Mercer . . . disapproved of the Doctrine that the Judges as expositors of the Constitution should have authority to declare a law void. He thought laws ought to be well and cautiously made, and then to be uncontroulable." 2 Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 298 (1913). "Mr. Dickinson was strongly impressed with the remark of Mr. Mercer as to the power of the Judges to set aside the law. He thought no such power ought to exist. He was at the same time at a loss what expedient to substitute." Id. at 299. Of course, the debates in the Convention were not available when the state ratifying conventions acted, so that the delegates could not have known these views about judicial review in order to have acted knowingly about them. Views, were, however, expressed in the ratifying conventions recognizing judicial review, some of them being uttered by Framers. 2 J. Elliot, Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 131 (1836) (Samuel Adams, Massachusetts), 196–97 (Ellsworth, Connecticut), 348, 362 (Hamilton, New York): 445–46. 478 (Wilson, Pennsylvania); 3 J. Elliot, Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 324–25, 539 , 541 (1836) (Henry, Virginia), 480 (Mason, Virginia), 532 (Madison, Virginia), 570 (Randolph, Virginia); 4 J. Elliot, Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 71 (1836) (Steele, North Carolina), 156–57 (Davie, North Carolina). In the Virginia convention, Chief Justice John Marshall observed if Congress "were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judge as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard . . . They would declare it void . . . . To what quarter will you look for protection from an infringement on the constitution, if you will not give the power to the judiciary? There is no other body that can afford such a protection." 3 id. at 553–54. Both Madison and Hamilton similarly asserted the power of judicial review in their campaign for ratification. The Federalist No. 39 (James Madison); id. Nos. 78, 81 (Alexander Hamilton). The persons supporting or at least indicating they thought judicial review existed did not constitute a majority of the Framers, but the absence of controverting statements, with the exception of the Mercer-Dickinson comments, indicates at least acquiescence if not agreements by the other Framers.

[4] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) ("The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution, is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges, as a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.").

[5] In enacting the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73, Congress chose not to vest "federal question" jurisdiction in the federal courts but to leave to the state courts the enforcement of claims under the Constitution and federal laws. In Section 25 of the Judiciary Act (1 Stat. 85), Congress provided for review by the Supreme Court of final judgments in state courts (1) "where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity;" (2) "where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity;" or (3) "where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed" thereunder. Id. § 25, 1 Stat. 73, 85–86.

[6] See in particular the debate on the President's removal powers, discussed in ArtII.S2.C2.3.15.1 Overview of Removal of Executive Branch Officers with statements excerpted in R. Berger, Congress v. The Supreme Court 144–150 (1969). Debates on the Alien and Sedition Acts and on the power of Congress to repeal the Judiciary Act of 1801 similarly saw recognition of judicial review of acts of Congress. C. Warren, supra at 107–124.

[7] Thus, the Justices on circuit refused to administer a pension act on the grounds of its unconstitutionally, see Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792) , and ArtIII.S1.4.4 Inherent Power to Issue Judgments. Chief Justice Jay and other Justices wrote that the imposition of circuit duty on Justices was unconstitutional, although they never mailed the letter in Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171 (1796), a feigned suit, the constitutionality of a federal law was argued before the Justices and upheld on the merits, in Ware v. Hylton, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 199 (1796), a state law was overturned, and dicta in several opinions asserted the principle. See Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386, 399 (1798) (Justice Iredell), and several Justices on circuit, quoted in Julius Goebel, supra note 1, at 589–592.

[8] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803).

constitutional law.[9] While the doctrine is well established, some legal commentators have criticized judicial review, and some who support it debate its doctrinal basis or how it should be applied.[10]

ArtIII.S1.3 Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Judicial review is one of the distinctive features of United States constitutional law. However, the Constitution does not expressly grant the federal courts the power to declare government actions unconstitutional. Instead, the Supreme Court established the doctrine in the 1803 case Marbury v. Madison.[1]

Marbury arose from a dispute over a government commission. Plaintiff William Marbury and others were appointed as justices of the peace while President John Adams was in office, and their commissions were signed but not delivered. When President Thomas Jefferson took office, the commissions were withheld on Jefferson's express instruction. Marbury sued Secretary of State James Madison in the Supreme Court, seeking a writ of mandamus compelling delivery of the commission. He invoked the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction under Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789.[2] The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice John Marshall, agreed with Marbury that Section 13 authorized the Court to issue writs of mandamus in suits in its original jurisdiction. However, the Court declined to issue the writ, concluding instead that the Section 13 authorization was an attempt by Congress to expand the Court's original jurisdiction beyond its constitutional limits and was therefore void.[3]

Chief Justice Marshall began his discussion of judicial review by opining, "The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest."[4] In answering the question in the affirmative, Chief Justice Marshall first recognized certain fundamental principles. The people had come together to establish a government. They provided for its organization, assigned powers to its various departments, and established certain limits not to be transgressed by those departments. The limits were

---

[9] See ArtIII.S1.3 Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review.

[10] See, e.g., G. Gunther, Constitutional Law 1–38 (12th ed. 1991); For expositions on the legitimacy of judicial review, see L. Hand, The Bill of Rights (1958); H. Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law: Selected Essays 1–15 (1961); A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics 1–33 (1962); R. Berger, Congress v. The Supreme Court (1969). For an extensive historical attack on judicial review, see 2 W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States chs. 27–29 (1953), with which compare Hart, Book Review, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 1456 (1954). A brief review of the ongoing debate on the subject, in a work that now is a classic attack on judicial review, is Westin, Introduction: Charles Beard and American Debate Over Judicial Review, 1790–1961, in C. Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution 1–34 (1962 reissue of 1938 ed.), and bibliography at 133–149. While much of the debate focuses on judicial review of acts of Congress, the similar review of state acts has occasioned much controversy as well.

[1] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803).

[2] 1 Stat. 73, 80.

[3] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) at 173–80.

[4] Id. at 176.

expressed in a written constitution, which would serve no purpose "if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained[.]"[5] Because the Constitution is "a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, . . . a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law."[6]

The Chief Justice then asked, "If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect?"[7] The answer, thought the Chief Justice, was clear: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each."[8] If a statute and the Constitution both apply to a single case, and conflict with one another, "the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty."[9] Because "the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply."[10] To declare otherwise, Chief Justice Marshall said, would be to permit the legislature to "pass[ ] at pleasure the limits imposed on its powers by the Constitution."[11]

The Chief Justice then turned from the philosophical justification for judicial review as arising from the very concept of a written constitution, to specific clauses of the Constitution. The judicial power, he observed, was extended to "all cases arising under the constitution."[12] It was "too extravagant to be maintained that the Framers had intended that a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises."[13] Suppose, he said, that Congress laid a duty on an article exported from a state or passed a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law or provided that treason should be proved by the testimony of one witness. Would the courts enforce such a law in the face of an express constitutional provision? They would not, he continued, because their oath required by the Constitution obligated them to support the Constitution and to enforce such laws would violate the oath.[14] Finally, the Chief Justice noted that the Supremacy Clause[15] gave the Constitution precedence over laws and treaties, providing that only laws "which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution shall be the supreme law of the land."[16]

Marbury v. Madison involved federal court review of a federal statute. Since the decision in Marbury, the Supreme Court has exercised its power of judicial review to examine the constitutionality of state statutes and federal and state executive actions.[17] State courts also

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 177.

[7] Id.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 178.

[10] Id. at 177–78.

[11] Id. at 178.

[12] Id. at 178 (citing U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1).

[13] Id. at 179.

[14] Id. at 179–80.

[15] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[16] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) at 180.

[17] See, e.g., Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cr.) 87 (1810); Little v. Barreme, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 170 (1804); Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958).

have the authority to hear federal constitutional claims,[18] and may consider the validity of state action under the federal Constitution, subject to discretionary review by the U.S. Supreme Court.[19]

As Marbury's doctrine of judicial review became settled law in federal court, state courts also embraced the doctrine, with state court judicial review under state constitutions established in all states by 1850.[20] The decision in Marbury v. Madison has never been disturbed. Although commentators have debated the merits and scope of judicial review throughout the Nation's history,[21] the Supreme Court continues to review the constitutionality of statutes and other government actions.[22]

ArtIII.S1.4 Inherent Powers of Federal Courts

ArtIII.S1.4.1 Overview of Inherent Powers of Federal Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Since the early years of the Republic, the Supreme Court has held that the federal courts possess certain inherent powers that are necessary for the courts to conduct their business and serve their constitutional function. In the 1812 case United States v. Hudson, the Court described inherent judicial powers as "certain implied powers [that] must necessarily result to our Courts of justice from the nature of their institution . . . which cannot be dispensed with in a Court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others."[1] These powers are not expressly enumerated in the Constitution, nor are they "immediately derived from statute."[2] In 1821, in Anderson v. Dunn, the Court explained, "Courts of justice are universally

---

[18] See ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[19] See, e.g., New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) (U.S. Supreme Court case involving a First Amendment challenge to a state law libel claim that was originally litigated in the Alabama courts); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003) (challenge to a state law banning consensual sexual activity between people of the same sex before the U.S. Supreme Court on appeal from a state criminal conviction).

[20] E. Corwin, The Doctrine of Judicial Review 75–78 (1914); Nelson, Changing Conceptions of Judicial Review: The Evolution of Constitution Theory in the State, 1790–1860, 120 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1166 (1972).

[21] See, e.g., G. Gunther, Constitutional Law 1–38 (12th ed. 1991); For expositions on the legitimacy of judicial review, see L. Hand, The Bill of Rights (1958); H. Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law: Selected Essays 1–15 (1961); A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics 1–33 (1962); R. Berger, Congress v. The Supreme Court (1969). For an extensive historical attack on judicial review, see 2 W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States chs. 27–29 (1953), with which compare Hart, Book Review, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 1456 (1954). A brief review of the ongoing debate on the subject, in a work that now is a classic attack on judicial review, is Westin, Introduction: Charles Beard and American Debate Over Judicial Review, 1790–1961, in C. Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution 1–34 (1962 reissue of 1938 ed.), and bibliography at 133–149. While much of the debate focuses on judicial review of acts of Congress, the similar review of state acts has occasioned much controversy as well.

[22] See, e.g., Iancu v. Brunetti, 139 S. Ct. 2294, 588 U.S. ___ (2019); Matal v. Tam, 137 S. Ct. 1744, 582 U.S. ___ (2017).

[1] 11 U.S. 32, 34 (1812).

[2] Id. See also Link v. Wabash R. Co., 370 U.S. 626, 630–631 (1962) (Inherent powers are "governed not by rule or statute but by the control necessarily vested in courts to manage their own affairs so as to achieve the orderly and expeditious disposition of cases.").

acknowledged to be vested, by their very creation, with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum, in their presence, and submission to their lawful mandates."[3]

Multiple Supreme Court cases have recognized inherent powers of the federal courts,[4] including the power to manage court proceedings,[5] to issue sanctions or hold parties in contempt for failure to comply with court orders,[6] and to issue and vacate judgments.[7] The following essays discuss each of those inherent powers in more detail.

ArtIII.S1.4.2 Inherent Powers Over Judicial Procedure

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Constitution divides the authority to set court procedures between the legislative and Judicial Branches. Congress enjoys substantial authority to make procedural rules for the courts. That authority is not expressly granted in the Constitution. Instead, the Supreme Court has explained that the power arises from Congress's authority to structure the federal court system, supplemented by the Necessary and Proper Clause.[1] In the 1825 case Wayman v. Southard, the Court held it to be "completely self-evident" that Congress has the authority to establish procedural rules for the federal courts.[2] The Court has approved procedural statutes that left some discretion to the federal courts, but has held that the courts do not have the inherent authority to expand their jurisdiction or to issue or execute judgments beyond what Congress has authorized.[3]

In 1934, recognizing the limited competence of the legislature to regulate court procedure and acknowledging the inherent power of courts to regulate the conduct of their business, Congress enacted the Rules Enabling Act.[4] The Act authorizes the Supreme Court to "prescribe general rules of practice and procedure and rules of evidence" for cases in the federal courts.[5] Such rules may not "abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right."[6] Procedural rules also

---

[3] 19 U.S. 204, 227 (1821)

[4] See Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43–44 (1991) (collecting cases and surveying inherent powers).

[5] See ArtIII.S1.4.2 Inherent Powers Over Judicial Procedure.

[6] See ArtIII.S1.4.3 Inherent Powers Over Contempt and Sanctions.

[7] See ArtIII.S1.4.4 Inherent Power to Issue Judgments.

[1] Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965).

[2] 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 1, 4 (1825).

[3] Fink v. O'Neil, 106 U.S. 272, 278, 280 (1882).

[4] 28 U.S.C. §§ 2071–2077.

[5] Id. § 2072(a).

[6] Id. § 2072(b). The Rules Enabling Act requires the Court to notify Congress of proposed amendments to procedural rules for the lower federal courts, but amendments take effect automatically unless Congress enacts legislation to reject or modify a proposed change. Id. §§ 2073, 2074. The Act also empowers the Supreme Court to create its own procedural rules, which need not be submitted to Congress before they take effect. Id. § 2071(a).

may not alter the jurisdiction or venue of federal courts.[7] Subject to those limitations, the Court has rejected constitutional challenges to rules promulgated under the Rules Enabling Act.[8]

In addition to the legislative power to regulate court procedures, some of which Congress has delegated to the Judicial Branch, the courts themselves possess inherent equitable powers over their procedures. This inherent power serves to prevent abuse, oppression, and injustice, and to protect the courts' jurisdiction and officers.[9] The Supreme Court has explained that such power is essential to and inherent in the organization of courts of justice.[10]

While the Court has not precisely delineated the outer boundaries of the federal courts' inherent powers to manage their own internal affairs, the Court has recognized two limits on the exercise of such authority.[11] First, a court, in exercising its inherent powers over its own processes, must act reasonably in response to a specific problem or issue confronting the court's fair administration of justice.[12] Second, any exercise of an inherent power cannot conflict with any express grant of or limitation on the district court's power as contained in a statute or rule, such as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.[13] Thus, as with rules promulgated under the Rules Enabling Act, no court-made rule can enlarge or restrict jurisdiction or abrogate or modify the substantive law. This limit applies equally to courts of law, equity, and admiralty, to rules prescribed by the Supreme Court for the guidance of lower courts, and to rules that lower courts make for their own guidance.[14]

Applying the foregoing standards, the Supreme Court has recognized that a federal district court, as an exercise of its inherent powers, can, in limited circumstances, rescind an order to discharge a jury and recall that jury in a civil case.[15] The Court has also acknowledged that federal courts possess the inherent power to control other aspects of regulating internal court proceedings, hearing a motion in limine;[16] dismissing a case for the convenience of the parties or witnesses because of the availability of an alternative forum;[17] and staying proceedings pending the resolution of parallel actions in other courts.[18] The federal courts also possess inherent power to amend their records, correct the errors of the clerk or other court

[7] United States v. Sherwood, 312 U.S. 584, 589–590 (1941); Mississippi Pub. Corp. v. Murphree, 326 U.S. 438 (1946).

[8] E.g., Sibbach v. Wilson, 312 U.S. 1, 14 (1941).

[9] Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U.S. 131 (1888); Covell v. Heyman, 111 U.S. 176 (1884); Buck v. Colbath, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 334 (1866).

[10] Eberly v. Moore, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 147 (1861); Arkadelphia Co. v. St. Louis S.W. Ry., 249 U.S. 134 (1919).

[11] See Dietz v. Bouldin, 579 U.S. ___, No. 15–458, slip op. at 4 (2016).

[12] Id. at 4–5.

[13] Id. at 4.

[14] Washington-Southern Nav. Co. v. Baltimore & P.S.B.C. Co., 263 U.S. 629, 635, 636 (1924). The Supreme Court does not prescribe how Courts of Appeals should exercise discretion vested in them. As long as a lower court keeps within the bounds of judicial discretion, its action is not reviewable. In re Burwell, 350 U.S. 521 (1956).

[15] Dietz v. Bouldin, No. 15–458, slip op. at 5–7 (acknowledging that while it is reasonable to allow a jury to reconvene after a formal discharge to correct an error and while such an exercise of authority does not conflict with a rule or statute, the exercise of the inherent power to rescind a discharge order needs to be carefully circumscribed to guarantee the existence of an impartial jury). The rule provided in Dietz extends only to civil cases, as additional constitutional concerns—namely, the attachment of the double jeopardy bar—might arise if a court were to recall a jury after discharge in a criminal case. See id. at 10.

[16] See Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38, 41 n.4 (1984). A motion in limine is a preliminary motion resolved by a court prior to trial and generally regards the admissibility of evidence. See Black's Law Dictionary 1171 (10th ed. 2014).

[17] See Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U.S. 501, 507–08 (1947). This doctrine is called forum non conveniens. See Black's Law Dictionary 770 (10th ed. 2014).

[18] See Landis v. N. Am. Co., 299 U.S. 248, 254 (1936).

officers, and rectify defects or omissions in their records.[19] The exercise of an inherent power can, at times, allow for departures from even long-established, judicially crafted common law rules; however, courts are not generally free to discover new inherent powers that are contrary to civil practice as recognized in the common law.[20]

Incident to the judicial power, federal courts possess inherent authority to supervise the conduct of their officers, parties, witnesses, counsel, and jurors by imposing rules to protect the rights of litigants and the orderly administration of justice.[21] Such supervision may be accomplished through a number of different means, including promulgation of general procedural rules as discussed in this essay, oversight of admission to the bar, imposition of contempt or sanctions for parties or attorney who disobey court orders or engage in misconduct, or case-by-case decisions to exclude individuals from the courtroom.[22]

ArtIII.S1.4.3 Inherent Powers Over Contempt and Sanctions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that federal courts possess inherent authority to punish contempt—i.e., disobedience of a court order or obstruction of justice—and to impose other sanctions on parties or attorneys who engage in misconduct.

The Court's contempt decisions have often distinguished between criminal and civil contempt.[1] Whether a contempt is civil or criminal can be of great importance. For instance, criminal contempt implicates procedural rights attendant to prosecutions, while civil contempt does not.[2] In Ex parte Grossman, while holding that the President may pardon a criminal contempt, Chief Justice William Howard Taft noted in dicta that the pardon power did not

---

[19] Gagnon v. United States, 193 U.S. 451, 456–59 (1904). The power to amend records conveys no power to create a record or recreate one of which no evidence exists. Id.

[20] See Dietz, slip op. at 12.

[21] McDonald v. Pless, 238 U.S. 264, 266 (1915); Griffin v. Thompson, 43 U.S. (2 How.) 244, 257 (1844). See Thomas v. Arn, 474 U.S. 140 (1985) (appeals court rule conditioning appeal on having filed with the district court timely objections to a master's report). In Rea v. United States, 350 U.S. 214, 218 (1956), the Court, citing McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), asserted that this supervisory power extends to policing the requirements of the Court's rules with respect to the law enforcement practices of federal agents. But compare United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727 (1980).

[22] See Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43–44 (1991) (collecting cases and surveying inherent powers). For further discussion of the contempt and sanctions powers, see ArtIII.S1.4.3 Inherent Powers Over Contempt and Sanctions.

[1] But see United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258 (1947). A civil contempt has been traditionally viewed as the refusal of a person in a civil case to obey a mandatory order. It is incomplete in nature, may be purged by obedience to the court order, and does not involve a sentence for a definite period. The classic criminal contempt is one where the act of contempt has been completed, punishment is imposed to vindicate the authority of the court, and a person cannot by subsequent action purge himself of such contempt. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 441–443 (1911); Ex parte Grossman, 267 U.S. 87 (1925). See also Bessette v. W.B. Conkey Co., 194 U.S. 324, 327–328 (1904).

[2] International Union, United Mine Workers of America v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821 (1994); Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966).

extend to civil contempt.[3] In Turner v. Rogers, the Court held that the Due Process Clause does not grant an indigent defendant a right to state-appointed counsel at a civil contempt proceeding.[4] Notwithstanding the importance of distinguishing between the two types of contempt, there have been instances where defendants have been charged with both civil and criminal contempt for the same act.[5]

The history of the contempt powers of the American Judiciary is marked by two trends: a shrinking of the courts' power to punish a person summarily and a multiplying of the due process requirements that must be met when finding an individual to be in contempt.[6] The power of the courts of the United States to punish contempts of their authority had its origin in the law and practice of England where disobedience of court orders was regarded as contempt of the King himself and attachment was a prerogative process derived from presumed contempt of the sovereign.[7] By the latter part of the eighteenth century, summary power to punish was extended to all contempts whether committed in or out of court.[8] In the United States, the Judiciary Act of 1789 broadly conferred power on all courts of the United States "to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same."[9] The abuse of this extensive power led to the passage of the Act of 1831, which limited the power of the federal courts to punish contempts to misbehavior in the presence of the courts "or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," misbehavior of officers of courts in their official capacity, and disobedience or resistance to any lawful writ, process or order of the court.[10]

Writing for the Court to sustain the Act of 1831 in Ex parte Robinson, Justice Stephen Field described the nature of the contempt power as follows:

> The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject, they became possessed of this power.[11]

---

[3] 267 U.S. 87, 119–120 (1925). In an analogous case, the Court was emphatic in a dictum that Congress cannot require a jury trial where the contemnor has failed to perform a positive act for the relief of private parties. Michaelson v. United States ex rel. Chicago, S.P., M. & Ry., 266 U.S. 42, 65–66 (1924). But see Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 202 (1968).

[4] 564 U.S. 431 (2011); cf. Hicks v. Feiock, 485 U.S. 624 (1988) (holding that a state may place the burden of proving inability to pay child support on a defendant faced with civil contempt).

[5] See United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 299 (1947).

[6] Many of the limitations placed on the inferior federal courts have been issued on the basis of the Supreme Court's supervisory power over them rather than upon a constitutional foundation, while, of course, the limitations imposed on state courts necessarily are on constitutional dimensions. Indeed, it is often the case that a limitation that is applied to an inferior federal court as a superintending measure is then transformed into a constitutional limitation and applied to state courts. Compare Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373 (1966), with Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194 (1968). The limitations then bind both federal and state courts alike. Therefore, in this section, Supreme Court constitutional limitations on state court contempt powers are cited without restriction for equal application to federal courts.

[7] Fox, The King v. Almon, 24 L.Q. Rev. 184, 194–195 (1908).

[8] Fox, The Summary Power to Punish Contempt, 25 L.Q. Rev. 238, 252 (1909).

[9] 1 Stat. 83, § 17 (1789).

[10] 18 U.S.C. § 401. Judge James H. Peck of the Federal District Court of Missouri was impeached for abuse of the contempt power, but was acquitted by the Senate. For a summary of the Peck impeachment and the background of the Act of 1831, see Felix Frankfurter & James Landis, Power of Congress Over Procedure in Criminal Contempts in 'Inferior' Federal Courts: A Study in Separation of Powers, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 1010, 1024–1028 (1924).

[11] 86 U.S. (19 Wall.) 505, 510 (1874).

While he expressed doubts concerning the validity of the 1831 Act as applied to the Supreme Court, Justice Field declared that there could be no question of its validity as applied to the lower courts because they are created by Congress and their "powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction."[12] With the passage of time, later adjudications, especially after 1890, came to place more emphasis on the inherent power of courts to punish contempts than upon the power of Congress to regulate summary attachment.

By 1911, the Court was saying that the contempt power must be exercised by a court without referring the issues of fact or law to another tribunal or to a jury in the same tribunal.[13] In Michaelson v. United States, the Court narrowly interpreted sections of the Clayton Act relating to punishment for contempt of court by disobedience of injunctions in labor disputes.[14] The sections in question provided for a jury upon the demand of the accused in contempt cases where the acts committed in violation of district court orders also constituted a crime. Although Justice George Sutherland reaffirmed earlier rulings establishing the authority of Congress to regulate the contempt power, he went on to qualify this authority and declared that "the attributes which inhere in the power [to punish contempt] and are inseparable from it can neither be abrogated nor rendered practically inoperative."[15] The Court mentioned specifically "the power to deal summarily with contempt committed in the presence of the courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," and the power to enforce mandatory decrees by coercive means.[16] The Court has held that this latter power to enforce includes the authority to appoint private counsel to prosecute a criminal contempt.[17]

Although the contempt power may be inherent, it is not unlimited. In Spallone v. United States, the Court held that a district court had abused its discretion by imposing contempt sanctions on individual members of a city council for refusing to vote to implement a consent decree remedying housing discrimination by the city.[18] The Court held that, "in view of the 'extraordinary' nature of the imposition of sanctions against the individual councilmembers," the proper remedy was to proceed first with contempt sanctions against the city, and only if that course failed should it proceed against the council members individually.[19]

In addition to the contempt power discussed above, the federal courts possess other inherent authorities to deter and punish misconduct.[20] The Supreme Court has explained that courts are elements of an independent and coequal branch of government, so once they are

[12] Id. at 511.

[13] Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 450 (1911). See also In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 595 (1895).

[14] 266 U.S. 42 (1924).

[15] Id. at 66.

[16] Id. at 65–66.

[17] Young v. United States ex rel. Vuitton, 481 U.S. 787, 793–801 (1987). However, the Court, invoking its supervisory power, instructed the lower federal courts first to request the United States Attorney to prosecute a criminal contempt and only if refused should they appoint a private lawyer. Id. at 801–802. Still using its supervisory power, the Court held that the district court had erred in appointing counsel for a party that was the beneficiary of the court order; disinterested counsel had to be appointed. Id. at 802–08. Justice Antonin Scalia contended that the power to prosecute is not comprehended within Article III judicial power and that federal judges had no power, inherent or otherwise, to initiate a prosecution for contempt or to appoint counsel to pursue it. Id. at 815. See also United States v. Providence Journal Co., 485 U.S. 693 (1988), which involved the appointment of a disinterested private attorney. The Supreme Court dismissed the writ of certiorari after granting it, however, holding that only the Solicitor General representing the United States could bring the petition to the Court. See 28 U.S.C. § 518.

[18] 493 U.S. 265 (1990).

[19] Id. at 280.

[20] United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32, 34 (1812) ("Certain implied powers must necessarily result to our courts of justice, from the nature of their institution. . . . To fine for contempt, imprison for contumacy, created and their jurisdiction established, they have the authority to do what courts have traditionally done in order to accomplish their assigned tasks.[21] Those inherent powers may be limited by statutes and by rules.[22] Nonetheless, the Court has asserted the power to act in areas not covered by statutes and rules and has held that Congress may regulate the courts' inherent sanctions power only by unmistakably enunciating its intention to limit the courts' inherent powers.[23]

Thus, in Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., the Court upheld the imposition of monetary sanctions against a litigant and his attorney for bad-faith litigation conduct in a diversity case.[24] Some of the conduct was covered by a federal statute and several sanction provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, but some was not. The Court held that, absent a showing that Congress had intended to limit the courts, they could use their inherent powers to impose sanctions for the entire course of conduct, including shifting attorneys' fees, which is ordinarily against the common-law American rule.[25] In another case, a party failed to comply with discovery orders and a court order concerning a schedule for filing briefs. The Supreme Court held that the attorneys' fees statute did not allow assessment of such fees in that situation, but it remanded for consideration of sanctions under both a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure and the trial court's inherent powers, subject to a finding of bad faith.[26] However, bad faith is not always required for the exercise of some inherent powers. For instance, courts may dismiss an action for an unexplained failure of the moving party to prosecute it.[27]

ArtIII.S1.4.4 Inherent Power to Issue Judgments

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Since 1792, the federal courts have emphasized finality of judgment as an essential attribute of judicial power. In that year, Congress authorized Revolutionary War veterans to file pension claims in circuit courts of the United States, directed the judges to certify to the Secretary of War the degree of a claimant's disability and their opinion with regard to the proper percentage of monthly pay to be awarded, but empowered the Secretary to withhold enforce the observance of order, &c., are powers which cannot be dispensed with in a court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others: and so far our courts, no doubt, possess powers not immediately derived from statute.").

---

[21] See Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 204, 227 (1821); Ex parte Robinson, 86 U.S. (19 Wall.) 505, 510 (1874); Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626, 630–631 (1962); Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43–46 (1991); id. at 58 (Scalia, J., dissenting); id. at 60, 62–67 (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

[22] Chambers, 501 U.S. at 47.

[23] Id. at 46–51.

[24] Id. at 35.

[25] Id. at 49–51. Nonetheless, the Court has clarified that because a court's order directing a sanctioned litigant to reimburse the legal fees and costs incurred by the wronged party as a result of bad faith conduct is compensatory, rather than punitive, in nature, a fee award may go no further than to redress the wronged party for losses sustained. See Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Haeger, 581 U.S. ___, No. 15–1406, slip op. at 5–6 (2017) (holding that a court, "when using its inherent sanctioning authority," must "establish a causal link—between the litigant's misbehavior and legal fees paid by the opposing party").

[26] Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 764 (1980).

[27] Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626 (1962).

judicially certified claimants from the pension list if he suspected "imposition or mistake."[1] The Justices then on circuit almost immediately forwarded objections to the President, contending that the statute was unconstitutional because the judicial power was constitutionally committed to the Judicial department, the duties imposed by the act were not judicial, and the subjection of a court's opinions to revision or control by an officer of the Executive or the Legislature was not authorized by the Constitution.[2]

In addition to the power to issue judgments, each federal court also possesses an inherent power to "to vacate its own judgment upon proof that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the court" or enforcement of the judgment would otherwise create inequity, and to "conduct an independent investigation in order to determine whether it has been the victim of fraud."[3] By contrast, the Court has held that Congress may not enact legislation that directs courts to reopen a final judgment.[4]

Federal courts also have authority to issue writs, though it is not clear whether the courts have any inherent power in this area absent statutory authorization by Congress. Since the Founding, Congress has assumed—under its power to establish inferior courts, its power to regulate the jurisdiction of federal courts, and the Necessary and Proper Clause—the power to regulate the issuance of writs.[5] Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 authorized the Supreme Court "to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States."[6] Section 14 provided that all "courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law."[7]

Although the Act of 1789 left the power to issues writs subject largely to the common law, it is significant as a reflection of the belief, in which the courts have generally concurred, that an act of Congress is necessary to confer judicial power to issue writs.[8] Whether Article III itself is an independent source of the power of federal courts to fashion equitable remedies for

---

[1] Act of March 23, 1792, 1 Stat. 243.

[2] 1 American State Papers: Miscellaneous Documents, Legislative and Executive, of the Congress of the United States 49, 51, 52 (1832). President Washington transmitted the remonstrances to Congress. 1 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 123, 133 (J. Richardson comp., 1897). The objections are also appended to the order of the Court in Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409, 410 (1792). Note that some of the Justices declared their willingness to perform under the Act as commissioners rather than as judges. Cf. United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40, 52–53 (1852). The assumption by judges that they could act in some positions as individuals while remaining judges, an assumption many times acted upon, was approved in Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 397–408 (1989).

[3] Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44 (1991) (citing Hazel–Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford–Empire Co., 322 U.S. 238 (1944); Universal Oil Products Co. v. Root Refining Co., 328 U.S. 575, 580 (1946)); see also Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211, 234 (1995).

[4] Plaut, 514 U.S. 211; see also ArtIII.S1.5.2 Reopening Final Judicial Decisions.

[5] Frankfurter & Landis, Power of Congress Over Procedure in Criminal Contempts in 'Inferior' Federal Courts—A Study in Separation of Powers, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 1010, 1016–1023 (1924).

[6] 1 Stat. 73, 81. "Section 13 was a provision unique to the Court, granting the power of prohibition as to district courts in admiralty and maritime cases." Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 4005, p. 98 (1996). See also R. Fallon, et al., Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System (6th ed. 2009), Ch. III, p. 268. In Marbury v. Madison, the Supreme Court limited the authority of Congress to empower the Court to issue writs, striking down Section 13. See 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803) (holding that Section 13 was an attempt by Congress to expand the Court's original jurisdiction beyond its constitutional limits and was therefore void).

[7] 1 Stat. 73, 81–82. See also United States v. Morgan, 346 U.S. 502 (1954) (holding that the All Writs section of the Judicial Code, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a), gives federal courts the power to employ the ancient writ of coram nobis).

[8] See, e.g., Pennsylvania Bureau of Correction v. United States Marshals Service, 474 U.S. 34 (1985) (holding that a federal district court lacked authority to order U.S. marshals to transport state prisoners, such authority not being constitutional violations or whether such remedies must fit within congressionally authorized writs or procedures is often left unexplored. In Missouri v. Jenkins, for example, the Court, rejecting a claim that a federal court exceeded judicial power under Article III by ordering local authorities to increase taxes to pay for desegregation remedies, declared that a court order directing a local government body to levy its own taxes is plainly a judicial act within the power of a federal court.[9] In the same case, the Court refused to rule on the difficult constitutional issues presented by the state's claim that the district court had exceeded its constitutional powers in a prior order directly raising taxes, instead ruling that the order had violated principles of comity.[10]

ArtIII.S1.5 Congressional Control Over Judicial Power

ArtIII.S1.5.1 Overview of Congressional Control Over Judicial Power

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Framers structured the Constitution to promote the separation of powers and, in particular, to protect the Judiciary from undue influence by Congress and the Executive Branch.[1] Nonetheless, the Constitution does not impose complete separation between the Judiciary and the political branches. Congress possesses substantial authority to regulate how the federal courts exercise judicial power, albeit subject to certain constitutional limitations.

For instance, the Supreme Court rejected a separation of powers challenge to legislation establishing the U.S. Sentencing Commission as an independent agency within the Judicial Branch.[2] On the other hand, while Congress can change the substantive law courts must apply and alter the jurisdiction of the federal courts, sometimes even with respect to pending cases,[3] it cannot direct the courts to reopen final judicial decisions.[4] The following essays discuss those two issues. Other issues related to congressional control over the Federal Judiciary, including granted by the relevant statutes). While the Court has held that statutory authorization to issue writs is necessary, it has also held that such authorizing legislation is not effective if it exceeds constitutional limits on the federal courts' jurisdiction. See Marbury, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803).

[9] 495 U.S. 33, 55 (1990) (citing Griffin v. Prince Edward County School Bd., 377 U.S. 218, 233–34 (1964)) (An order that local officials "exercise the power that is theirs" to levy taxes in order to open and operate a desegregated school system is "within the court's power if required to assure . . . petitioners that their constitutional rights will no longer be denied them.").

[10] Id. at 50–52.

[1] See, e.g., 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 44 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (discussion of how salary protection for judges could support judicial independence); id. at 429 (statement of Mr. Wilson in discussion of the Good Behavior Clause that "Judges would be in a bad situation if made to depend on every gust of faction which might prevail in the two branches of our Govt."); cf. The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

[2] See ArtIII.S1.5.3 Imposing Non-Adjudicatory Functions on Courts.

[3] See ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[4] See ArtIII.S1.5.2 Reopening Final Judicial Decisions.

Congress's power to establish federal courts,[5] create court procedural rules,[6] set federal court jurisdiction,[7] and alter federal judges' tenure in office,[8] are discussed elsewhere in this volume.

ArtIII.S1.5.2 Reopening Final Judicial Decisions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The core of the judicial power is the authority to render dispositive judgments. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has held that Congress violates the separation of powers when it purports to alter, or allow the Executive Branch to alter, final judgments of Article III courts.[1]

In 1792, in Hayburn's Case, the Supreme Court considered a petition for a writ of mandamus to direct a federal circuit court to proceed on a claim seeking a federal pension.[2] The petitioner argued that the courts had failed to give effect to an act of Congress. The Court noted, however, that "the reasons assigned by the judges," including Supreme Court Justices sitting on the circuit courts, "for declining to execute the . . . act of Congress, involve a great constitutional question."[3] Specifically, those judges contended that pension decisions under the Act were not judicial duties that Congress could constitutionally assign to the courts because the act rendered such decisions subject to review by the political branches.[4] The Court heard argument on the mandamus petition but postponed its decision until the next term. While the case remained pending, Congress enacted legislation providing an alternative means of relief for the pensioners; the Court then dismissed the mandamus petition without deciding the underlying constitutional question.[5]

Although the Court in Hayburn's Case did not decide the constitutionality of legislation subjecting court judgments to review by the political branches, the Court has since cited that decision to reject efforts to give federal courts jurisdiction over cases in which judgment would be subject to Executive or Legislative revision.[6] For example, in the 1948 case Chicago &

---

[5] See ArtIII.S1.8.1 Overview of Establishment of Article III Courts.

[6] See ArtIII.S1.4.1 Overview of Inherent Powers of Federal Courts

[7] See, e.g., ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.1 Overview of Supreme Court Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[8] See ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[1] Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211, 218–19 (1995). Congress also cannot legislate to "prescribe a rule for the decision of a cause in a particular way." United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128 (1871); see also Bank Markazi v. Peterson, 578 U.S. 212, 231 (2016) (Congress may not enact legislation "that directs, in 'Smith v. Jones,' 'Smith wins.'"). However, Congress possesses substantial authority to amend substantive laws or alter federal court jurisdiction in ways that affect pending litigation. See, e.g., Robertson v. Seattle Audubon Soc., 503 U.S. 429, 441 (1992); Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897 (2018); see also ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[2] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792).

[3] Id. at 410, footnote.

[4] Id. (noting objections that the statute "subjects the decisions of these courts . . . first to the consideration and suspension of the secretary at war, and then to the revision of the legislature").

[5] Id.

[6] See United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40 (1852); Gordon v. United States, 69 U.S. (2 Wall.) 561 (1865); In re Sanborn, 148 U.S. 222 (1893); cf. McGrath v. Kritensen, 340 U.S. 162, 167–168 (1950).

Southern Air Lines v. Waterman S.S. Corp., the Court held that an order of the Civil Aeronautics Board denying a certificate of convenience and necessity was not reviewable by the courts, despite statutory language to the contrary.[7] Congress had also rendered such an order subject to discretionary review and revision by the President, but the Supreme Court agreed with a lower federal court that the Judiciary did not have the authority to review the President's decision.[8] While the lower court had attempted to reconcile the statutory scheme by permitting presidential review of the order after judicial review, the Supreme Court rejected that interpretation, stating: "[I]f the President may completely disregard the judgment of the court, it would be only because it is one the courts were not authorized to render. Judgments within the powers vested in courts by the Judiciary Article of the Constitution may not lawfully be revised, overturned or refused faith and credit by another Department of Government."[9]

In the 1995 case Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., the Court held that legislation that directs courts to reopen a final judgment unconstitutionally intrudes on the Judiciary.[10] Plaut involved an amendment to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 that Congress enacted after a pair of Supreme Court opinions announced a time limit for bringing certain civil actions seeking damages under the Act.[11] The amended statute, Section 27A of the Securities Exchange Act, directed courts (upon a timely filed petition) to reinstate cases that had been dismissed because of the Court's rulings but that would have been timely under the governing statute of limitations when initially filed.[12] In Plaut, the Supreme Court held that Section 27A's reopening provision violated the doctrine of separation of powers.[13] The Court explained that, by applying retroactively to final decisions, Section 27A "reverses a determination once made, in a particular case."[14] The Court distinguished the command in Section 27A from other retroactive laws that mandate "an appellate court [to] apply [the new] law in reviewing judgments still on appeal that were rendered before the law was enacted."[15] The Court emphasized the difference between attempting to alter a final judgment—one rendered by a court and either not appealed or affirmed on appeal—and legislatively amending a statute as applied to a decision that was on appeal or otherwise not final at the time a federal court reviewed the determination below. A court must apply the law as revised when it considers a case on appeal. However, the Court reasoned that "[h]aving achieved finality, . . . a judicial decision becomes the last word of the judicial department with regard to a particular case or controversy, and Congress may not declare by retroactive legislation that the law applicable to that very case was something other than what the courts said it was."[16] Thus, in directing courts to reopen nonpending, previously decided cases, Congress violates the separation of powers by "depriving judicial judgments of the conclusive effect that they had when they were announced."[17]

---

[7] 333 U.S. 103 (1948).

[8] Id. at 111.

[9] Id. at 113.

[10] 514 U.S. 211 (1995).

[11] Lampf, Pleva, Lipkind, Prupis & Petigrow v. Gilbertson, 501 U.S. 350, 364 (1991); James B. Beam Distilling Co. v. Georgia, 501 U.S. 529, 544 (1991).

[12] See Federal Deposit Insurance Improvement Act of 1991, § 476, P.L. 102–242, 105. Stat. 2236.

[13] 514 U.S. at 240.

[14] Id. at 225.

[15] Id. at 226.

[16] Id. at 227.

[17] Id. at 227–28.

While Congress cannot require courts to reopen final judgments, it can "alter[ ] the prospective effect of injunctions entered by Article III courts."[18] Thus, in Miller v. French, the Court upheld a provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 that requires courts to stay a court-ordered injunction automatically for a specified period upon receiving a motion to terminate the injunction.[19] The Court ruled that the automatic stay provision did not amount to an unconstitutional legislative revision of a final judgment.[20] Rather, it merely altered the prospective effect of injunctions, and it is well established that such prospective relief "remains subject to alteration due to changes in the underlying law."[21]

ArtIII.S1.5.3 Imposing Non-Adjudicatory Functions on Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court has struck down congressional attempts to reassign constitutional functions from one branch of government to another branch, but has "upheld statutory provisions that to some degree commingle the functions of the Branches, but that pose no danger of either aggrandizement or encroachment."[1] In Mistretta v. United States, the Supreme Court rejected a separation of powers challenge to legislation establishing the U.S. Sentencing Commission.[2] Through the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, Congress created the Sentencing Commission as an independent agency in the Judicial Branch tasked with promulgating sentencing guidelines for federal judges to use when sentencing convicted offenders.[3] Under the Act, three Sentencing Commission members must be Article III judges. The President appoints all seven Commission members and can remove any member for cause.[4] In Mistretta, a criminal defendant sought to have the Sentencing Guidelines the Commission promulgated ruled unconstitutional, arguing in part that the Commission was constituted in violation of the doctrine of separation of powers.[5]

Upholding the constitutionality of establishing the Sentencing Commission as an independent body in the Judicial Branch, the Court acknowledged that the Commission is not a court and does not exercise judicial power.[6] Rather, its membership includes both judges and nonjudges, and its work has a "significantly political nature."[7] However, the Court held that the question of the Commission's constitutionality turns not on formal distinctions between [18] Id. at 222 (citing State of Pennsylvania v. The Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 59 U.S. 421 (1855)).

---

[19] 530 U.S. 327 (2000); see also 18 U.S.C. § 3626(e)(2).

[20] 530 U.S. at 342.

[21] Id. at 344.

[1] Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 383 (1989).

[2] 488 U.S. 361.

[3] The Sentencing Reform Act was enacted as chapter II of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act, Title II of P.L. 98–473, 98 Stat. 1976 (1984).

[4] 28 U.S.C. § 991.

[5] 488 U.S. at 370. The challenger also asserted that Congress delegated excessive authority to the Commission to structure the Guidelines. See id. For additional discussion of Mistretta, see ArtI.S1.3.2 Functional and Formalist Approaches to Separation of Powers; ArtI.S1.6.1 Criminal Statutes and Nondelegation Doctrine.

[6] Id. at 384–85.

[7] Id. at 393.

"political" and "judicial" functions, but rather on a practical inquiry whether the agency's structure "undermin[es] the integrity of the Judicial Branch" or "expand[s] the powers of the Judiciary beyond constitutional bounds."[8] The Court held that "the placement of the Sentencing Commission in the Judicial Branch has not increased the Branch's authority" because, "[p]rior to the passage of the Act, the Judicial Branch . . . decided precisely the questions assigned to the Commission: what sentence is appropriate to what criminal conduct under what circumstances."[9] The Court also rejected the challenger's contention that participating in policymaking would inevitably weaken the Judiciary. The Court noted that "Congress placed the Commission in the Judicial Branch precisely because of the Judiciary's special knowledge and expertise" with respect to sentencing, and concluded that this arrangement could not "possibly be construed as preventing the Judicial Branch 'from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions.'"[10] The Court further held that "the principle of separation of powers does not absolutely prohibit Article III judges from serving on [non-judicial] commissions" such as the Sentencing Commission or from sharing power on the Commission with members who are not judges.[11]

ArtIII.S1.6 Federal and State Courts

ArtIII.S1.6.1 Overview of Relationship Between Federal and State Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Constitution's Supremacy Clause provides that the Constitution, federal statutes, and treaties "shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."[1] The Supremacy Clause thus presumes that state courts will interpret—and be bound by—federal law.[2]

Under modern practice, both state and federal courts play an important role in interpreting and applying the Constitution and federal law.[3] However, at the time of the Founding it was not initially clear how that power would be divided between federal and state courts.[4]

In the years since the Founding, Supreme Court decisions have established that federal courts, particularly the Supreme Court, are the final authority on interpreting federal law, and federal courts possess the constitutional authority to review state court decisions that allegedly conflict with the Constitution or federal law.[5] Various statutory and court-made rules

[8] Id. at 393.

[9] Id. at 395.

[10] Id. at 395–96 (quoting Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977)).

[11] Id. at 404, 408.

[1] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[2] See, e.g., Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304, 342 (1816).

[3] See ArtIII.S1.6.3 Doctrine on Federal and State Courts.

[4] See ArtIII.S1.6.2 Historical Background on Relationship Between Federal and State Courts.

[5] See id.; see also ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law; ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

govern when such review is available, however. In some circumstances, a complainant bringing a claim under federal law is required to exhaust available state legislative or administrative remedies before seeking relief in federal court; by contrast, exhaustion of state judicial remedies—for example, by first bringing related state law claims in state court—is not generally required.[6] There are also circumstances in which the federal courts have the power to assert jurisdiction over a case but decline to do so out of respect for the sovereign authority of state courts.[7]

As for state courts, they are generally authorized to hear claims involving federal law, except in areas where the federal courts possess exclusive jurisdiction.[8] Moreover, subject to limited exceptions, state courts are usually required to hear cases arising under federal law over which they have jurisdiction.[9] State courts generally lack the authority to enjoin proceedings in federal court or prevent the enforcement of federal court judgments.[10]

ArtIII.S1.6.2 Historical Background on Relationship Between Federal and State Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

At the time of the Founding, each state had its own system of courts, while the Articles of Confederation did not provide for an independent Federal Judiciary.[1] The delegates to the Constitutional Convention agreed early on that the new Constitution should establish a federal Judicial Branch including a Supreme Court; however, they debated other questions about how to balance federal and state judicial power.

The Framers generally accepted that state courts would play a significant role in interpreting and applying federal law.[2] However, some of the Framers also entertained concerns about whether state courts would apply federal law correctly, uniformly, and without bias. Then, as now, the specific structure of state courts varied significantly from state to state. State court judges often did not enjoy the safeguards that were afforded federal judges, such as

---

[6] See ArtIII.S1.6.8 Exhaustion Doctrine and State Law Remedies; but see ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review (exhaustion of state judicial remedies is required before filing a federal habeas corpus petition).

[7] See ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention.

[8] See ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[9] See ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[10] See ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[1] Article IX of the Articles of Confederation authorized Congress to "appoint[ ] courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; and establish[ ] courts; for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures." The same Article further provided that Congress would be "the last resort on appeal, in all disputes and differences now subsisting, or that hereafter may arise between two or more states" and could appoint commissioners or judges to constitute a court to resolve such disputes.

[2] See, e.g., 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 243 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter, Convention Records]. For example, the Convention considered proposals that would require federal questions to be decided first in state court, but with a right of appeal to federal courts. See id. at 243, 424. Likewise, during the debate over ratification, Alexander Hamilton wrote that "the State courts will RETAIN the jurisdiction they now have, unless it appears to be taken away in one of the enumerated modes. . . . [Thus,] the State courts would have a concurrent jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws of the Union, where it was not expressly prohibited." The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton).

life tenure during good behavior and salary protection. Certain delegates to the Constitutional Convention expressed concerns as to whether state court judges might therefore be subject to political pressures that could affect their decision-making.[3] Others raised the prospect of disputes between states, noting that a state court might issue decisions that were biased in favor of its home state.[4] Some Founders worried that the multiple state courts could interpret federal law differently, undermining the interest in having uniform federal laws.[5]

To mitigate those concerns, the Framers provided for a federal Supreme Court with the power to review state judicial decisions involving issues of federal statutory or constitutional law.[6] Debate arose, however, on the question of whether lower federal courts were also necessary. Some delegates argued that establishing lower federal courts would encroach on the power of the states.[7] Some argued that a right of appeal from state court to a federal appellate court would suffice to ensure uniformity and prevent bias.[8] Other delegates countered that a right to appeal would provide less effective protection of federal rights than the right to consideration by an impartial tribunal in the first instance.[9] The Convention discussed whether creating lower federal courts would lessen the burden on the Supreme Court and prevent it from being overwhelmed by numerous appeals.[10] Some delegates voiced an interest in flexibility, contending that lower federal courts might be needed in the future even if they were not immediately necessary.[11]

Ultimately, the Framers left the decision of whether to create lower federal courts to Congress. Article III of the Constitution provides for "one supreme Court, and . . . such inferior

---

[3] James Madison expressed concern at the Convention about "improper Verdicts in State tribunals obtained under the biassed directions of a dependent Judge," and "disliked the election of the Judges by the Legislature or any numerous body" due to "the danger of intrigue and partiality" and the fact that legislators lacked the "requisite qualifications" to select suitable judges. Convention Records, supra note 2, at 120, 124. See also The Federalist No. 81 (Alexander Hamilton) ("State judges, holding their offices during pleasure, or from year to year, will be too little independent to be relied upon for an inflexible execution of the national laws.").

[4] E.g., Convention Records, supra note 2, at 124 (statement of Madison expressing concern about "the local prejudices of an undirected jury"); The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton) ("[T]he most discerning cannot foresee how far the prevalency of a local spirit may be found to disqualify the local tribunals for the jurisdiction of national causes.").

[5] As Hamilton wrote, "The mere necessity of uniformity in the interpretation of the national laws, decides the question. Thirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government, from which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed." The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[6] U.S. Const. art. III; 1 Stat. 73, 85; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816). Cf. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 295–296 (1921) ("I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as the laws of the several States.").

[7] See, e.g., Convention Records, supra note 2, at 124–25.

[8] For example, John Rutledge argued that "State Tribunals might and ought to be left in all cases to decide in the first instance" and that lower federal courts would be "an unnecessary encroachment on the jurisdiction of the States, and creating unnecessary obstacles to their adoption of the new system." Id. at 124.

[9] See, e.g., id. at 124–125 (statements of Madison, Wilson, & Dickinson); see also 25 The Papers of Alexander Hamilton 486 (Harold C. Syrett et al. ed 1977) ("The right of appeal is by no means equal to the right of applying, in the first instance, to a Tribunal agreeable to the suitor.").

[10] Madison observed at the Convention that without federal trial courts, appeals from state court "would be multiplied to a most oppressive degree." Convention Records, supra note 2, at 124. Even if a federal appeals court ordered a new trial, he asked, how could that provide an effective remedy when the case would be retried "under the biassed directions of a dependent Judge, or the local prejudices of an undirected jury? To remand the cause for a new trial would answer no purpose." Id. In a similar vein, another delegate argued that "the establishment of inferior tribunals [would] cost infinitely less than the appeals that would be prevented by them." Id. at 125; but see id. (statement of Sherman focused on "the supposed expensiveness of having a new set of Courts, when the existing State Courts would answer the same purpose").

[11] See, e.g., id. at 125 (statement of Dickinson).

Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."[12] The first Congress exercised its authority promptly, creating lower federal courts in the Judiciary Act of 1798, the first legislation related to the Federal Judiciary.[13]

ArtIII.S1.6.3 Doctrine on Federal and State Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

By specifying the extent of the "judicial Power," the Constitution authorized the creation of federal courts with limited subject matter jurisdiction. Article III identifies several categories of cases over which the Supreme Court possesses original jurisdiction.[1] In addition, the Constitution generally authorizes federal courts to hear "all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority," as well as admiralty cases, cases between citizens of different states, and cases between citizens of a state and a foreign state or its citizens.[2]

Within those broad categories, Congress has traditionally been understood to exercise significant discretion to decide which cases particular federal courts have jurisdiction to hear. The Constitution sets the maximum possible extent of federal court jurisdiction. Congress cannot expand such jurisdiction beyond the applicable constitutional limits, but is free to grant the federal courts authority over only a subset of constitutionally permissible cases. In practice, Congress has always granted the federal courts less expansive jurisdiction than the Constitution authorizes.[3] The first Judiciary Act granted the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction over matters including federal criminal cases, admiralty cases, and certain cases involving seizures of property under federal law.[4] The Act also granted the federal and state courts concurrent jurisdiction over other classes of cases, including certain tort suits brought by foreign nationals and common law suits brought by the United States government.[5] Since that time, Congress has periodically expanded the scope of federal court jurisdiction,[6] but has never provided for federal court jurisdiction in all possible cases that would be authorized under the Constitution's jurisdictional limits.[7] [12] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; cf. Convention Records, supra note 2, at 125 ("Mr. Wilson & Mr. Madison then moved . . . to add . . . the words following 'that the National Legislature be empowered to institute inferior tribunals'. They observed that there was a distinction between establishing such tribunals absolutely, and giving a discretion to the Legislature to establish or not establish them.").

---

[13] 1 Stat. 73.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] Id.

[3] See, e.g., Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 807 (1986) ("Although the constitutional meaning of 'arising under' may extend to all cases in which a federal question is 'an ingredient' of the action, . . . we have long construed the statutory grant of federal-question jurisdiction as conferring a more limited power.") (internal citation omitted).

[4] 1 Stat. 73, 77.

[5] Id.

[6] For example, Congress amended the current federal question statute, 28 U.S.C § 1331, in 1976 and 1980 to eliminate the jurisdictional amount requirement. Pub. L. No. 94-574, 90 Stat. 2721; Pub. L. No. 96-486, 94 Stat. 2369.

ArtIII.S1.6.3
Doctrine on Federal and State Courts

In contrast to the federal system, the states operate courts of general jurisdiction, which are not subject to the constitutional jurisdictional limits placed on federal courts.[8] As part of such general jurisdiction, state courts have concurrent jurisdiction to hear most cases that raise issues under the Constitution or federal law.[9] Congress may enact legislation providing that certain claims arising under federal law may only be heard in federal court.[10] However, unless Congress provides for exclusive federal court jurisdiction, a case raising federal law claims may proceed in either state or federal court.[11]

If a plaintiff files in state court a case over which the federal courts could exercise jurisdiction, the defendant may elect to remove the case to federal court pursuant to federal statute.[12] In addition, a party may seek Supreme Court review of a decision of a state's highest court in cases where a state law, executive action, or judicial interpretation allegedly conflicts with the Constitution or a federal law or treaty.[13]

As the following sections discuss in more detail, other interactions between federal and state courts may occur as cases move through the judicial system. For example, because the federal Constitution, statutes, and treaties are the "the supreme Law of the Land," and federal courts are the final authority on the interpretation of federal law, state courts applying federal law are bound by controlling decisions of the federal courts.[14] Relatedly, federal courts may sometimes enjoin proceedings in state court,[15] and federal courts can hear challenges to state criminal convictions pursuant to petitions for a writ of habeas corpus.[16] By contrast, state courts have much more limited power to enjoin or otherwise affect federal proceedings.[17] Nonetheless, as a matter of federal-state comity,[18] federal courts will sometimes abstain from

On the other hand, Congress has also limited federal court jurisdiction by periodically raising the amount in controversy requirement for diversity suits. See, e.g., Pub. L. 104-317 (104th Cong. 1996) (raising amount in controversy requirement from $50,000 to $75,000).

[7] For further discussion of the jurisdiction of the federal courts, see ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

[8] Court of General Jurisdiction, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) ("A court having unlimited or nearly unlimited trial jurisdiction in both civil and criminal cases."). States may also establish specialty courts with limited jurisdiction, such as family courts or land courts, but each state also has courts of general jurisdiction.

[9] E.g., Claflin v. Houseman. 93 US 130, 136 (1876) ("[I]f exclusive jurisdiction be neither express nor implied, the State courts have concurrent jurisdiction whenever, by their own constitution, they are competent to take it."); Charles Dowd Box Co. v. Courtney, 368 U.S. 502, 507 (1962) ("We start with the premise that nothing in the concept of our federal system prevents state courts from enforcing rights created by federal law.").

[10] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 3231 (granting the federal district courts "original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the States," over federal criminal proceedings); 28 U.S.C. § 1334 (granting district courts jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases); id. § 1337 (granting district courts jurisdiction over antitrust cases).

[11] See Gulf Offshore Co. v. Mobil Oil Corp., 453 U.S. 473, 477–84 (1981); Tafflin v. Levitt, 493 U.S. 455 (1990); Yellow Freight System, Inc. v. Donnelly, 494 U.S. 820 (1990). Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over the federal antitrust laws, even though Congress has not spoken expressly or impliedly. See General Investment Co. v. Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry., 260 U.S. 261, 287 (1922). For discussion of when state courts must hear federal claims, see ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[12] 28 U.S.C. § 1441. See also ArtIII.S2.C1.11.5 Removal from State Court to Federal Court.

[13] 28 U.S.C. § 1257.

[14] See ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law.

[15] See ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention.

[16] See ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

[17] See ArtIII.S1.6.6 Limits on State Court Control of Federal Proceedings.

[18] Comity is a self-imposed rule of judicial restraint whereby independent tribunals of concurrent or coordinate jurisdiction act to moderate the stresses of coexistence and to avoid collisions of authority. The Supreme Court has explained that comity is not a binding rule of law but "one of practice, convenience, and expediency," which persuades but does not command. Mast, Foos & Co. v. Stover Manufacturing Co., 177 U.S. 458, 488 (1900).

hearing cases raising novel questions of state law, and in some cases may require litigants to exhaust available remedies under state law before filing suit in federal court.[19]

ArtIII.S1.6.4 State Court Jurisdiction to Enforce Federal Law

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Unless the federal courts possess exclusive jurisdiction over a matter, state courts may hear cases over which federal courts would have also had jurisdiction.[1] However, it does not necessarily follow from the fact that state courts are authorized to hear claims arising under federal law that the state courts must agree to hear federal claims. In deciding multiple cases on this issue, the Supreme Court has ruled that state courts generally must hear federal law claims unless state law bars a state court from hearing a federal claim through a "neutral rule of judicial administration" that does not improperly burden claims arising under federal law.[2]

In the 1876 case Claflin v. Houseman, the Supreme Court held that state courts could hear cases arising under federal bankruptcy law.[3] The Court reasoned:

> The laws of the United States are laws in the several States, and just as much binding on the citizens and courts thereof as the State laws are. The United States is not a foreign sovereignty as regards the several States, but is a concurrent, and, within its jurisdiction, paramount sovereignty.[4]

The Court thus held that "the State courts have concurrent jurisdiction whenever, by their own constitution, they are competent to take it."[5] While Claflin concerned when state courts may exercise jurisdiction over federal claims, a number of subsequent cases have cited Claflin when considering when state courts may validly decline jurisdiction over federal claims.

In several cases, the Supreme Court has upheld state courts' refusal to hear federal claims, finding that state law provided a "valid excuse" to decline jurisdiction. For instance, in Douglas v. New York, N.H. & H.R. Co., the Court upheld a state law that allowed state courts to decline jurisdiction over both state and federal law claims when neither party was a resident of the State.[6] The Supreme Court noted that there was nothing in the federal statute at issue "that [19] See ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention; ArtIII.S1.6.8 Exhaustion Doctrine and State Law Remedies; ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

---

[1] See, e.g., Claflin v. Houseman. 93 U.S. 130, 136 (1876); Charles Dowd Box Co. v. Courtney, 368 U.S. 502, 507 (1962); Gulf Offshore Co. v. Mobil Oil Corp., 453 U.S. 473, 477–84 (1981).

[2] Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 374 (1990).

[3] 93 U.S. 130 (1876). Currently, federal law grants the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases, 28 U.S.C. § 1334, but that was not true at the time of the events at issue in Claflin.

[4] 93 U.S. at 136.

[5] Id.

[6] 279 U.S. 377 (1929). See also Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117 (1945) (upholding state court's application of state venue laws to dismiss for want of jurisdiction of an action brought under federal law because the cause of action arose outside the city court's territorial jurisdiction); Missouri ex rel. Southern R. Co. v. Mayfield, 340 U.S. 1 (1950) (holding that a state's application of the forum non conveniens doctrine to bar adjudication of a federal claim brought by nonresidents was constitutional as long as the policy was enforced impartially); Johnson v. Fankell, 520 U.S. 911 (1997) (holding that a state rule limiting interlocutory jurisdiction did not discriminate against federal claims). A related question is whether federal procedural rules apply in state courts when they hear federal claims. The Supreme Court purports to force a duty" to hear cases on state courts "as against an otherwise valid excuse."[7] In Howlett v. Rose, the Court summarized cases like Douglas, where states had validly declined to hear federal claims, as involving "neutral rule[s] of judicial administration."[8]

By contrast, in Mondou v. New York, N.H. & H.R. Co., a Connecticut court declined to hear a case arising under federal law, in part because the state court held it was "at liberty to decline cognizance of actions to enforce rights arising under [the federal] act, because . . . the policy manifested by it is not in accord with the policy of the state."[9] The Supreme Court rejected that proposition and held that the state court must hear the case. In so holding, the Court emphasized that the case did not involve "any attempt by Congress to enlarge or regulate the jurisdiction of state courts, or to control or affect their modes of procedure," but only a question of when state courts must hear federal claims that fall within their "ordinary jurisdiction, as prescribed by local laws."[10]

Similarly, in Testa v. Katt, the Rhode Island Supreme Court declined to enforce a federal statute containing a punitive damages provision, finding that the law was penal in nature and the "state need not enforce the penal laws of a government which is 'foreign in the international sense.'"[11] The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Rhode Island court must enforce the federal statute, and that a state policy of not enforcing penal statutes of other sovereigns was not a "valid excuse" under Douglas.[12] Among other things, the Court explained that "[i]t cannot be assumed, the supremacy clause considered, that the responsibilities of a state to enforce the laws of a sister state are identical with its responsibilities to enforce federal laws."[13]

In the 2009 case Haywood v. Drown, the Supreme Court considered a state statute that divested New York state courts of jurisdiction over suits under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 seeking money damages from corrections officers, as well as similar state law claims against corrections officers.[14] The Court held that the New York law violated the Supremacy Clause. Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens explained, "we have emphasized that only a neutral jurisdictional rule will be deemed a 'valid excuse' for departing from the default assumption" that state courts will hear federal claims.[15] Although the New York statute removed jurisdiction over both state and federal claims, the Court held, "equality of treatment" between state and federal claims "does not ensure that a state law will be deemed . . . a valid excuse for refusing to entertain a federal cause of action."[16] Rather, by distinguishing between Section 1983 claims against corrections officers and all other Section 1983 suits, New York undermined the federal policy of making relief under Section 1983 broadly available. The Court held that this was impermissible: "having made the decision to create courts of general jurisdiction that rejected that proposition in Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Bombolis, in which it declined to apply the Seventh Amendment's jury trial requirement to state courts enforcing a federal statute. 241 U.S. 211. The rule that state courts must entertain federal claims, the Court explained, did not imply that "for the purpose of enforcing the right, the state court was to be treated as a Federal court." Id. at 222.

---

[7] 279 U.S. at 388.

[8] 496 U.S. 356, 374 (1990).

[9] 223 U.S. 1, 55 (1912).

[10] Id. at 56–57. See also McKnett v. St. Louis & S.F. Ry., 292 U.S. 230, 233–34 (1934) ("[T]he Federal Constitution prohibits state courts of general jurisdiction from refusing to do so solely because the suit is brought under a federal law.").

[11] 330 U.S. 386, 388 (1947).

[12] Id. at 393.

[13] Id. at 389.

[14] 556 U.S. 729 (2009).

[15] Id. at 735.

[16] Id. at 738.

regularly sit to entertain analogous suits, New York is not at liberty to shut the courthouse door to federal claims that it considers at odds with its local policy."[17]

The question of state court enforcement of federal law is related to, but distinct from, the anti-commandeering doctrine.[18] In Printz v. United States, the Supreme Court distinguished between federal control over state courts and commandeering of the political branches of state government. Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion surveyed federal legislation from early Congresses that required state courts to take certain actions, such as recording applications for citizenship, but noted that state courts are bound by the Supremacy Clause, which expressly requires them to apply federal law. The Court thus concluded, "we do not think the early statutes imposing obligations on state courts imply a power of Congress to impress the state executive into its service."[19]

ArtIII.S1.6.5 Supreme Court Review of State Court Interpretations of Federal Law

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

As a substantive matter, state courts interpreting federal law are bound by applicable federal court precedents and subject to review by the Supreme Court. This rule dates back to Section 25 of Judiciary Act of 1789, which authorized the U.S. Supreme Court to review certain decisions of the states' highest courts involving the construction of the Constitution, a treaty, or federal law.[1]

The Supreme Court considered a constitutional challenge to Section 25 in the 1816 case Martin v. Hunter's Lessee.[2] In that case, litigation involving title to land in Virginia was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which held that a treaty between the United States and Britain controlled the dispute. On remand, the Virginia state court of appeals refused to honor the Supreme Court's judgment, opining that "the appellate power of the supreme court of the United States does not extend to this court under a sound construction of the constitution of the United States," and that Section 25 was unconstitutional in that it "extends the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court to this court."[3] The case returned to the U.S. Supreme Court, which upheld Section 25. Justice Joseph Story's majority opinion emphasized that the Constitution vests in the Supreme Court the authority to hear all cases subject to the federal

[17] Id. at 740.

[18] For further discussion of the anti-commandeering doctrine, see Amdt10.4.2 Anti-Commandeering Doctrine.

[19] 521 U.S. 898, 907 (1997).

[1] 1 Stat. 73, 85. The current statute authorizing Supreme Court review of "[f]inal judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State" in cases arising under the Constitution or federal laws or treaties is 28 U.S.C. § 1257.

[2] 14 U.S. 304 (1816).

[3] Id. at 323–24.

judicial power, explaining that "the constitution not only contemplated, but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals."[4]

Similarly, in Cohens v. Virginia, individuals convicted under Virginia state criminal law for selling lottery tickets argued that their convictions violated federal law. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the state argued that while the Virginia courts were constitutionally obliged to prefer federal law over conflicting state laws, the state courts, as courts of a separate sovereign, were bound only by their own interpretation of the supreme law.[5] The state further contended that the judicial power of the United States extended only to cases brought in the first instance in federal court. Chief Justice John Marshall's majority opinion rejected this narrow interpretation, holding that the words of the Constitution "give to the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. The words are broad enough to comprehend all cases of this description, in whatever Court they may be decided."[6]

ArtIII.S1.6.6 Limits on State Court Control of Federal Proceedings

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

State courts have limited authority to issue orders that would affect the federal courts.[1] For instance, state courts cannot prevent the effectuation of federal court judgments.[2] Nor do state courts have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus ordering the release of persons in federal custody or writs of mandamus requiring action by federal officials.[3]

In addition, state courts generally lack the power to enjoin federal court proceedings.[4] One exception to that rule occurs in cases in which a state court has custody of property subject to proceedings in rem or quasi in rem:[5] in such cases, where the state court has exclusive jurisdiction to proceed, it may enjoin the parties from further action in federal court.[6] [4] Id. at 342. See also id. at 351 ("[T]he appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and . . . the 25th section of the judiciary act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the constitution.").

---

[5] 19 U.S. 264 (1821).

[6] Id. at 416. See also Ableman v. Booth, 62 U.S. 506 (1859); Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U.S. 248 (1880).

[1] By contrast, federal courts may under certain circumstances enjoin actions in state courts. See ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention.

[2] McKim v. Voorhies, 11 U.S. 279, 281 (1812) ("the State Court had no jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States"). Cf. Riggs v. Johnson County, 73 U.S. 166, 195–96 (1868).

[3] Ableman v. Booth, 62 U.S. 506, 523 (1859) (when a prisoner is in federal custody, "neither the writ of habeas corpus, nor any other process issued under State authority, can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties"); Tarble's Case, 80 U.S. 397 (1872); McClung v. Sillman, 19 U.S. 598 (1821) (holding that a state court could not issue a writ of mandamus to an officer of the United States).

[4] Donovan v. City of Dallas, 377 U.S. 408 (1964); General Atomic Co. v. Felter, 434 U.S. 12 (1977) (per curiam).

[5] In rem and quasi in rem proceedings involve the determination of property rights with respect to a thing within the court's jurisdiction. See In Rem, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[6] Princess Lida v. Thompson, 305 U.S. 456 (1939).

ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Perhaps the fullest expression of the concept of comity may be found in the abstention doctrine.[1] The abstention doctrine instructs federal courts to abstain from exercising jurisdiction if applicable state law, which would be dispositive to the controversy, is unclear and a state court's interpretation of the state law might make resolving a federal constitutional issue unnecessary.[2] Abstention is not proper, however, where the relevant state law is settled,[3] or where it is clear that the state statute or action challenged is unconstitutional no matter how the state court construes state law.[4] Federal jurisdiction is not ousted by abstention; rather it is postponed.[5] The Supreme Court has said that abstention can serve interests of federal-state comity by avoiding "a result in 'needless friction with state policies,'"[6] and can spare "the federal courts of unnecessary constitutional adjudication."[7]

---

[1] For a definition and discussion of comity, see ArtIII.S2.C1.18.2 Suits Involving Foreign States.

[2] C. Wright, Handbook of the Law of Federal Courts 13 (4th ed. 1983). The basic doctrine was formulated by Justice Felix Frankfurter for the Court in Railroad Comm'n v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941). Another feature of the doctrine is that a federal court should refrain from exercising jurisdiction in order to avoid needless conflict with a state's administration of its own affairs, Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943); Alabama Public Service Comm'n v. Southern Ry., 341 U.S. 341 (1951); Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. v. Huffman, 319 U.S. 293 (1943); Martin v. Creasy, 360 U.S. 219 (1959); Moses H. Cone Hosp. v. Mercury Constr. Corp., 460 U.S. 1 (1983); New Orleans Public Service, Inc. v. Council of the City of New Orleans, 491 U.S. 350 (1989) (carefully reviewing the scope of the doctrine), especially where state law is unsettled. Meredith v. City of Winter Haven, 320 U.S. 228 (1943); County of Allegheny v. Frank Mashuda Co., 360 U.S. 185 (1959); Louisiana Power & Light Co. v. City of Thibodaux, 360 U.S. 25 (1959). See also Clay v. Sun Insurance Office Ltd., 363 U.S. 207 (1960). Also, although the sole fact that an action is pending in state court will not ordinarily cause a federal court to abstain, there are "exceptional" circumstances in which it should. Colorado River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800 (1976); Will v. Calvert Fire Insurance Co., 437 U.S. 655 (1978); Arizona v. San Carlos Apache Tribe, 463 U.S. 545 (1983). But, in Quackenbush v. Allstate Ins. Co., 517 U.S. 706 (1996), an exercise in Burford abstention, the Court held that federal courts have power to dismiss or remand cases based on abstention principles only where relief being sought is equitable or otherwise discretionary but may not do so in common-law actions for damages.

[3] City of Chicago v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., 357 U.S. 77 (1958); Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 249–51 (1967). See Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l. Union, 442 U.S. 289, 306 (1979) (quoting Harman v. Forssenius, 380 U.S. 528, 534–35 (1965)).

[4] Harman v. Forssenius, 380 U.S. 528, 534–35 (1965); Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l., 442 U.S. 289, 305–12 (1979). Abstention is not proper simply to afford a state court the opportunity to hold that a state law violates the federal Constitution. Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433 (1971); Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 379 n.5 (1978); Douglas v. Seacoast Products, Inc., 431 U.S. 265, 271 n.4 (1977); City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451 (1987) ("A federal court may not properly ask a state court if it would care in effect to rewrite a statute"). But if the statute is clear and there is a reasonable possibility that the state court would find it in violation of a distinct or specialized state constitutional provision, abstention may be proper, Harris County Comm'rs Court v. Moore, 420 U.S. 77 (1975); Reetz v. Bozanich, 397 U.S. 82 (1970), although not if the state and federal constitutional provisions are alike. Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 598 (1976).

[5] American Trial Lawyers Ass'n v. New Jersey Supreme Court, 409 U.S. 467, 469 (1973); Harrison v. NAACP, 360 U.S. 167 (1959). Dismissal may be necessary if the state court will not accept jurisdiction while the case is pending in federal court. Harris County Comm'rs v. Moore, 420 U.S. 77, 88 n.14 (1975).

[6] La. Power & Light Co. v. City of Thibodaux, 360 U.S. 25, 33 (1959) (quoting R.R. Comm'n of Tex. v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 500 (1941)).

[7] Harrison v. NAACP, 360 U.S. 167, 177 (1959).

During the 1960s, the Supreme Court disfavored the abstention doctrine, rejecting it in numerous cases, most of which concerned civil rights and civil liberties.[8] The Court cited time-consuming delays[9] and piecemeal resolution of important questions[10] as too-costly consequences of the doctrine. In addition to actions brought under civil rights statutes,[11] the Court, for a while, appeared to shelter cases involving First Amendment expression guarantees from the abstention doctrine, but this is no longer the rule.[12] Younger v. Harris[13] and its progeny signaled a trend toward the Court applying the absention doctrine more robustly.

As an alternative to abstention, the Supreme Court has sometimes encouraged or required lower federal courts to use certification procedures where they are available.[14] While this process is not grounded in the federal constitution, certification may allow federal courts to avoid relying on the abstention doctrine. Most states have adopted rules that allow federal courts to "certify," or refer, unsettled questions of state law to state courts.[15] The Court has sometimes required lower federal courts to certify to state courts questions which concern "novel issues of state law peculiarly calling for the exercise of judgment by the state courts," and involve construing a state law that is being challenged as unconstitutional.[16] The Court has also noted that certification may be appropriate where abstention would lead to undue "delay and expense"—although such concerns may not be sufficient to require a federal court to employ certification rather than abstention.[17]

ArtIII.S1.6.8 Exhaustion Doctrine and State Law Remedies

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and

---

[8] McNeese v. Cahokia Bd. of Educ., 373 U.S. 668 (1963); Griffin v. School Board, 377 U.S. 218 (1964); Hostetter v. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp., 377 U.S. 324 (1964); Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964); Davis v. Mann, 377 U.S. 678 (1964); Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965); Harman v. Forssenius, 380 U.S. 528 (1965); Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241 (1967); Wisconsin v. Constanineau, 400 U.S. 433 (1971).

[9] England v. Louisiana Bd. of Medical Examiners, 375 U.S. 411, 426 (1964) (Douglas, J., concurring). See C. Wright, Handbook of the Law of Federal Courts 305 (4th ed. 1983).

[10] Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 378–379 (1964).

[11] Compare Harrison v. NAACP, 360 U.S. 167 (1959), with McNeese v. Cahokia Bd. of Educ., 373 U.S. 668 (1963).

[12] Compare Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964), and Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965), with Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971), and Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971). See Babbitt v. United Farm Workers, 442 U.S. 289, 305–312 (1979).

[13] 401 U.S. 37 (1971). There is room to argue whether the Younger line of cases represents the abstention doctrine at all, but the Court continues to refer to it in those terms. E.g., Ankenbrandt v. Richards, 504 U.S. 689, 705 (1992); Sprint Commc'ns, Inc. v. Jacobs, 571 U.S. ___, No. 12-815, slip op. (2013).

[14] E.g., Mckesson v. Doe, No. 19-1108, slip op. at 5 (U.S. Nov. 2, 2020); Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132, 151 (1976); Lehman Brothers v. Schein, 416 U.S. 386, 390–91 (1974); Clay v. Sun Insurance Office Ltd., 363 U.S. 207, 212 (1960).

[15] See, e.g., Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 79 (1997) (describing certification and concluding that a federal appeals court erred when it "blend[ed]" the abstention inquiry with the certification inquiry).

[16] Mckesson, slip op. at 4–5; see also Arizonans for Official English, 520 U.S. at 79.

[17] Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 470–71 (1987). Cf., e.g., Expressions Hair Design v. Schneiderman, No. 15-1391, slip op. at 6–10 (U.S. Mar. 29, 2017) (Sotomayor, J., concurring) (comparing abstention with certification, and concluding that the lower court abused its discretion when it decided not to certify and instead "chose a convoluted course" by abstaining in part and deciding the question in part).

shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

In some circumstances, when a person seeking to bring a claim under federal law also has a remedy available under state law, that person will be required to exhaust state law remedies before proceeding in federal court. For instance, as discussed further in the next section, prisoners challenging their detention by state authorities must generally exhaust state law remedies before seeking a writ of habeas corpus in federal court.[1]

As another example, a person seeking to challenge state legislative action must await completion of the state legislative process before suing in federal court.[2] In Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., the Supreme Court declined to hear a claim that certain railroad rates that a state agency planned to promulgate were confiscatory in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.[3] Writing for the majority, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes noted that the Virginia state constitution allowed the railroads to challenge the new rates before the state Supreme Court of Appeals before they went into effect and explained that determination of rates, including review by the state court, amounted to a legislative process rather than a judicial one. Because completion of that legislative process might result in different rates and obviate the constitutional challenge, the Court concluded, the challengers "should make sure that the State in its final legislative action would not respect what they think their rights to be, before resorting to the courts of the United States."[4] Justice Holmes also emphasized that the Court's decision was grounded not in mandatory jurisdictional limits but rather in prudential considerations such as comity and efficiency.[5]

While complainants must generally exhaust available state legislative and administrative remedies before proceeding in federal court, they are not ordinarily required to seek a judicial remedy in state court before filing a claim in federal court.[6] Thus, in Bacon v. Rutland R.R., the Supreme Court held that the federal courts could hear a Fourteenth Amendment challenge to an order of the Public Service Commission of Vermont concerning a passenger railway station.[7] Justice Holmes, again writing for the majority, distinguished the Virginia system in Prentis, where "the [state] court was given legislative powers," and the Vermont system, which did "not attempt to confer legislative powers upon the court" but instead created a remedy that was "purely judicial."[8] Likewise, in Lane v. Wilson, the court held that a Black man denied voter registration in Oklahoma could challenge the denial in federal court without first pursuing a state law challenge that "has all the indicia of a conventional judicial proceeding and does not confer upon the Oklahoma courts any of the discretionary or initiatory functions that are characteristic of administrative agencies."[9]

---

[1] See ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

[2] See, e.g., Porter v. Investors Syndicate, 286 U.S. 461 (1932).

[3] 211 U.S. 210 (1908).

[4] Id. at 230.

[5] Id. at 232 ("[O]ur decision does not go upon a denial of power to entertain the bills at the present stage but upon our views as to what is the most proper and orderly course in cases of this sort when practicable."). Comity is a self-imposed rule of judicial restraint whereby independent tribunals of concurrent or coordinate jurisdiction act to moderate the stresses of coexistence and to avoid collisions of authority. The Court has elsewhere explained that it is not a rule of law but "one of practice, convenience, and expediency," which persuades but does not command. Mast, Foos & Co. v. Stover Manufacturing Co., 177 U.S. 458, 488 (1900).

[6] An exception occurs when a state prisoner petitions in federal court for a writ of habeas corpus. See ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

[7] 232 U.S. 134 (1914).

[8] Id. at 137–38. See also City Bank Farmers' Trust Co. v. Schnader, 291 U.S. 24 (1934).

[9] 307 U.S. 268, 274 (1939).

ArtIII.S1.6.8
Exhaustion Doctrine and State Law Remedies

Subject to limited exceptions, exhaustion of state remedies is not required before a person may seek relief under federal civil rights statutes such as 42 U.S.C. § 1983.[10] In Monroe v. Pape, the Supreme Court held that plaintiffs need not exhaust state judicial remedies before seeking relief in federal court under Section 1983.[11] In McNeese v. Board of Education, the Court extended that holding to state administrative remedies, holding that plaintiffs who sought to challenge school segregation need not first seek relief through a state administrative process.[12] In Patsy v. Florida Board of Regents, the Court reaffirmed that "exhaustion of state administrative remedies should not be required as a prerequisite to bringing an action pursuant to § 1983."[13]

ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Federal courts can hear challenges to state criminal convictions pursuant to petitions for a writ of habeas corpus. While early Supreme Court cases interpreted that authority narrowly, subsequent cases allowed for broader federal review of state court convictions. More recently, however, the Court has adopted a more limited approach to habeas review, and Congress has also enacted legislation limiting federal habeas review of state convictions.

At English common law, the writ of habeas corpus was available to attack pretrial detention and confinement by executive order; it could not be used to question the conviction of a person pursuant to the judgment of a court with jurisdiction over the person. In early cases, the Supreme Court applied the common law understanding of the writ.[1] After the Civil War, the Court adopted a broader view of when a court lacked jurisdiction over a petitioner. Thus, in the 1874 case, Ex Parte Lange, a person who had already completed one sentence on a conviction was released from custody on a second sentence on the ground that the court had lost jurisdiction upon completion of the first sentence.[2] In the 1880s, the Court held that the constitutionality of the statute upon which a charge was based could be examined on habeas, [10] Courts may require exhaustion of state administrative remedies before filing a Section 1983 suit when there are pending state administrative proceedings in which an important state interest is involved. See Ohio Civil Rights Comm'n v. Dayton Christian School, Inc., 477 U.S. 619, 627 n.2 (1986). Under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits employment discrimination on racial and other specified grounds, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may not consider a claim until a state agency having jurisdiction over employment discrimination complaints has had at least sixty days to resolve the matter. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–5(c); see Love v. Pullman Co., 404 U.S. 522 (1972). The Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act contains a specific, limited exhaustion requirement for adult prisoners bringing actions pursuant to § 1983. Patsy v. Florida Board of Regents, 457 U.S. 496, 508 (1982).

---

[11] 365 U.S. 167, 183 (1961) (reversed on other grounds).

[12] 373 U.S. 668 (1963).

[13] 457 U.S. 496, 516 (1982). See also, e.g., King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309 (1968); Houghton v. Shafer, 392 U.S. 639 (1968); Damico v. California, 389 U.S. 416 (1967).

[1] Ex parte Watkins, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 193 (1830) (Marshall, C.J.); cf. Ex parte Parks, 93 U.S. 18 (1876). But see Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 404–415 (1963). The expansive language used when Congress in 1867 extended the habeas power of federal courts to state prisoners "restrained of . . . liberty in violation of the constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States . . .," 14 Stat. 385, could have encouraged an expansion of the writ to persons convicted after trial.

[2] Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 163 (1874).

because an unconstitutional statute was said to deprive the trial court of its jurisdiction.[3] Other cases expanded the want-of-jurisdiction rationale.[4]

The Court started developing its modern approach to the writ of habeas corpus in the 1915 case Frank v. Mangum,[5] in which the Court reviewed on habeas a murder conviction in a trial in which there was substantial evidence of mob domination of the judicial process. This issue had been considered and rejected by the state appeals court. The Supreme Court indicated that, though it might initially have had jurisdiction, the trial court could have lost it if mob domination rendered the proceedings lacking in due process. The Court further held that, in order to determine if there had been a denial of due process, a habeas court should examine the totality of the process, including the appellate proceedings. Because the state appellate court had reviewed fully and rejected Frank's claim of mob domination, the Court held he had been afforded an adequate corrective process for any denial of rights, and his custody did not violate the Constitution.[6] Eight years later, in Moore v. Dempsey,[7] a case involving another conviction in a trial in which the court was alleged to have been influenced by a mob and in which the state appellate court had heard and rejected Moore's contentions, the Court directed that the federal district judge himself determine the merits of the petitioner's allegations.

In later cases, the Court abandoned its emphasis upon want of jurisdiction and held that the writ was available to consider constitutional claims as well as questions of jurisdiction.[8] The landmark case was Brown v. Allen,[9] in which the Court laid down several principles of statutory construction of the habeas statute. First, all federal constitutional questions raised by state prisoners are cognizable in federal habeas. Second, a federal court is not bound by state court judgments on federal questions, even though the state courts may have fully and fairly considered the issues. Third, a federal habeas court may inquire into issues of fact as well as of law, although the federal court may defer to the state court if the prisoner received an adequate hearing. Fourth, new evidentiary hearings must be held when there are unusual circumstances, when there is a "vital flaw" in the state proceedings, or when the state court record is incomplete or otherwise inadequate.

The Supreme Court authorized almost plenary federal habeas review of state court convictions in its famous "1963 trilogy."[10] First, in Townsend v. Sain, the Court dealt with the [3] Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371 (1880); Ex parte Royall, 117 U.S. 241 (1886); Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U.S. 86 (1890); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886).

---

[4] Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417 (1885); In re Nielsen, 131 U.S. 176 (1889); In re Snow, 120 U.S. 274 (1887); but see Ex parte Parks, 93 U.S. 18 (1876); Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U.S. 328 (1885). It is possible that the Court expanded the office of the writ because its reviewing power over federal convictions was closely limited. Frankfurter & Landis, Power of Congress Over Procedure in Criminal Contempts in 'Inferior' Federal Courts—A Study in Separation of Powers, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 1010, 1016–1023 (1924). Once such review was granted, the Court began to restrict the use of the writ. E.g., Glasgow v. Moyer, 225 U.S. 420 (1912); In re Lincoln, 202 U.S. 178 (1906); In re Morgan, 203 U.S. 96 (1906).

[5] 237 U.S. 309 (1915).

[6] Id.

[7] 261 U.S. 86 (1923).

[8] Walker v. Johnston, 312 U.S. 275 (1941). See also Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938).

[9] 344 U.S. 443 (1953). Brown coincided with the extension of most of the Bill of Rights to the states by way of incorporation and expansive interpretation of federal constitutional rights; previously, there was not a substantial corpus of federal rights to protect through habeas. See Wright v. West, 505 U.S. 277, 297–99 (1992) (O'Connor, J., concurring). In Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963), Justice William Brennan, for the Court, and Justice John Harlan, in dissent, engaged in a lengthy, informed historical debate about the legitimacy of Brown and its premises. Compare id. at 401–24, with id. at 450–61. See the material gathered and cited in L. Hand, The Bill of Rights (1958); H. Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law: Selected Essays 1220–1248 (1961).

[10] Sanders v. United States, 373 U.S. 1 (1963); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963); Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963). These cases dealt, respectively, with the treatment to be accorded a habeas petition in the three principal categories in which they come to the federal court: when a state court has rejected petitioner's claims on the merits, when a state court has refused to hear petitioner's claims on the merits because she has failed properly or timely to established principle that a federal habeas court is empowered, where a prisoner alleges facts which if proved would entitle him to relief, to relitigate facts, to receive evidence and try the facts anew, and sought to lay down broad guidelines as to when district courts must hold a hearing and find facts.[11] The Court stated: "Where the facts are in dispute, the federal court in habeas corpus must hold an evidentiary hearing if the habeas applicant did not receive a full and fair evidentiary hearing in a state court, either at the time of the trial or in a collateral proceeding."[12] To "particularize" this general test, the Court further held that an evidentiary hearing must take place when (1) the state hearing did not resolve the merits of the factual dispute; (2) the record as a whole does not fairly support the state factual determination; (3) the state court's fact finding procedure did not afford a full and fair hearing; (4) there is a substantial allegation of newly discovered evidence; (5) the material facts were not adequately developed at the state hearing; or (6) the state trier of fact did not appear to afford the habeas applicant a full and fair fact hearing.[13]

Second, Sanders v. United States[14] dealt with two interrelated questions: how to address successive petitions for the writ, when the second or subsequent application presented grounds previously asserted or not previously raised. Emphasizing that "[c]onventional notions of finality of litigation have no place where life or liberty is at stake and infringement of constitutional rights is alleged,"[15] the Court established generous standards for considering successive claims. As to previously asserted grounds, the Court held that courts may give controlling weight to a prior denial of relief if (1) the court had previously found against the applicant on the applicant's ground for relief, (2) the prior determination was on the merits, and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by revisiting the determination,[16] so that the habeas court might but was not obligated to deny relief without considering the claim on the merits.[17] With respect to grounds not previously asserted, a federal court considering a successive petition could refuse to hear the new claim if it decided the petitioner had present them, or when the petition is a second or later petition raising either old or new, or mixed, claims. Of course, as will be demonstrated infra, these cases have now been largely drained of their force.

[11] Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293, 310–12 (1963). If the district judge concluded that the habeas applicant was afforded a full and fair hearing by the state court resulting in reliable findings, the Court said, he may, and ordinarily should, defer to the state factfinding. Id. at 318. Under the 1966 statutory revision, a habeas court must generally presume correct a state court's written findings of fact from a hearing to which the petitioner was a party. A state finding cannot be set aside merely on a preponderance of the evidence and the federal court granting the writ must include in its opinion the reason it found the state findings not fairly supported by the record or the existence of one or more listed factors justifying disregard of the factfinding. Pub. L. No. 89-711, 80 Stat. 1105, 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d). See Sumner v. Mata, 449 U.S. 539 (1981); Sumner v. Mata, 455 U.S. 591 (1982); Marshall v. Lonberger, 459 U.S. 422 (1983); Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025 (1984); Parker v. Dugger, 498 U.S. 308 (1991); Burden v. Zant, 498 U.S. 433 (1991). The presumption of correctness does not apply to questions of law or to mixed questions of law and fact. Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104, 110–16 (1985). However, in Wright v. West, 505 U.S. 277 (1992), the Justices argued inconclusively whether deferential review of questions of law or especially of law and fact should be adopted.

[12] Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293, 312 (1963). The Court was unanimous on the statement, but it divided 5-4 on application.

[13] 372 U.S. at 313–18. Keeney v. Tamayo-Reyes, 504 U.S. 1, 5 (1992). Keeney formally overruled part of Townsend.

[14] 373 U.S. 1 (1963). Sanders was a § 2255 case, a federal prisoner petitioning for postconviction relief. The Court applied the same liberal rules with respect to federal prisoners as it did for states. See Kaufman v. United States, 394 U.S. 217 (1969). But see Davis v. United States, 411 U.S. 233 (1973); United States v. Frady, 456 U.S. 152 (1982).

[15] 373 U.S. at 8. The statement accorded with the established view that principles of res judicata were not applicable in habeas. E.g., Price v. Johnston, 334 U.S. 266 (1948); Wong Doo v. United States, 265 U.S. 239 (1924); Salinger v. Loisel, 265 U.S. 224 (1924). In 1948, Congress had appeared to adopt some limited version of res judicata for federal prisoners but not for state prisoners, Act of June 25, 1948, 62 Stat. 965, 967, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2244, 2255, but the Court in Sanders held the same standards applicable and denied the statute changed existing case law. 373 U.S. at 11–14. But see id. at 27–28 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

[16] 373 U.S. at 15. In codifying the Sanders standards in 1966, Pub. L. No. 89-711, 80 Stat. 1104, 28 U.S.C. § 2244(b), Congress omitted the "ends of justice" language. Although it was long thought that the omission probably had no substantive effect, this may not be the case. Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436 (1986).

[17] Id.

deliberately not raised it in the prior proceeding; if not, the Court noted, "[n]o matter how many prior applications for federal collateral relief a prisoner has made," the court must consider the merits of the new claim.[18]

Third, in Fay v. Noia,[19] the Court considered the issue of state defaults—that is, the effect on habeas when a defendant in a state criminal trial has failed to raise, in accordance with state procedure, a claim that he subsequently wants to raise on habeas. If, for example, a defendant fails to object to the admission of certain evidence on federal constitutional grounds in accordance with state procedure and within state time constraints, the state courts may therefore simply refuse to address the merits of the claim, and the state's "independent and adequate state ground" bars direct federal review of the claim.[20] Whether a similar result was required in habeas proceedings divided the Court in Brown v. Allen,[21] in which the majority held that a prisoner, whose appeal a state court had refused to hear because his papers had been filed a day late, could not be heard on habeas because of his state procedural default. The Court reached a different result in Fay v. Noia, holding that the adequate and independent state ground doctrine limited the Court's appellate review, but not its habeas review. A federal court has power to consider any claim that has been procedurally defaulted in state courts.[22] Still, the Court recognized that the states had legitimate interests that were served by their procedural rules, and that it was important that state courts have the opportunity to afford a claimant relief to which he might be entitled. Thus, a federal court had discretion to deny a habeas petitioner relief if it found that he had deliberately bypassed state procedure and intentionally waived his right to pursue his state remedy.[23]

Liberalization of the writ thus made it possible for convicted persons who had fully litigated their claims at state trials and on appeal, who had lacked the opportunity to have their claims reviewed due to procedural default, or who had been heard at least once on federal habeas, to have the chance to present their grounds for relief to a federal habeas judge. In addition to opportunities to relitigate the facts and the law relating to their convictions, prisoners could also take advantage of new constitutional decisions that were retroactive. The filings in federal courts increased year by year, but the numbers of prisoners who in fact obtained either release or retrial remained quite small. However, expansion of the writ generated opposition from state judges and state law enforcement officials and stimulated many efforts in Congress to enact restrictive habeas amendments.[24] The efforts were unsuccessful and, following changes in the composition of the Supreme Court, the Court adopted a more limited view of when habeas relief should be available.

---

[18] 373 U.S. at 17–19.

[19] 372 U.S. 391 (1963). Fay was largely obliterated over the years, beginning with Davis v. United States, 411 U.S. 233 (1973), a federal-prisoner post-conviction relief case, and Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72 (1977), but it was not formally overruled until Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 744–51 (1991).

[20] E.g., Murdock v. City of Memphis, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 590 (1875); Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117 (1945). In the habeas context, the procedural-bar rules are ultimately a function of the requirement that petitioners first exhaust state avenues of relief before coming to federal court.

[21] 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

[22] Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 424–34 (1963).

[23] 372 U.S. at 438–40.

[24] In 1961, state prisoner habeas filings totaled 1,020; in 1965, 4,845; in 1970, a high (to date) of 9,063; in 1975, 7,843; in 1980, 8,534; in 1985, 9,045; in 1986. On relief afforded, no reliable figures are available, but estimates indicate that at most 4% of the filings result in either release or retrial. C. Wright, A. Miller, & E. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure (1988 & supps.), § 4261, at 284–91.

In the 1977 case Wainwright v. Sykes, then-Justice William Rehnquist emphasized that the Court has significant discretion whether to award habeas relief.[25] After reviewing the case law on the 1867 statute, Justice Rehnquist remarked that the history "illustrates this Court's historic willingness to overturn or modify its earlier views of the scope of the writ, even where the statutory language authorizing judicial action has remained unchanged."[26] From early on, the Court has emphasized the equitable nature of the habeas remedy and the Judiciary's responsibility to guide the exercise of that remedy in accordance with equitable principles; thus, time and again, the Court has underscored that the federal courts have plenary power under the statute to implement it to the fullest while the Court's decisions may deny them discretion to exercise the power.[27]

Supreme Court cases since the 1970s have made several changes to the law related to habeas corpus relief. These cases generally reflect a departure from the 1963 trilogy and a narrowing view of when federal courts should undertake habeas review of state law criminal convictions.

First, the Court in search and seizure cases has returned to the standard of Frank v. Mangum, holding that where the state courts afford a criminal defendant the opportunity for a full and adequate hearing on his Fourth Amendment claim, his only avenue of relief in the federal courts is to petition the Supreme Court for review and that he cannot raise those claims again in a habeas petition.[28] Grounded as it is in the Court's dissatisfaction with the exclusionary rule, the case has not been extended to other constitutional grounds,[29] but the rationale of the opinion suggests the likelihood of reaching other exclusion questions.[30]

Second, the Court has formulated a "new rule" exception to habeas cognizance. That is, subject to two exceptions,[31] a case decided after a petitioner's conviction and sentence became final may not be the predicate for federal habeas relief if the case announces or applies a "new

---

[25] Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72, 81 (1977). Differing from the Court in the 1963 trilogy, the Wainwright Court favored decisions in habeas cases that promote finality, comity, judicial economy, and channeling the resolution of claims into the most appropriate forum. Keeney v. Tamayo-Reyes, 504 U.S. 1, 8–10 (1992). Overall, federalism concerns are critical. See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 726 (1991) ("This is a case about federalism." First sentence of opinion). Subsequent cases have drawn on Justice Powell's concurrence in Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 250 (1973). He suggested that habeas courts should entertain only those claims that go to the integrity of the fact-finding process, thus raising questions of the value of a guilty verdict, or that only those prisoners able to make a credible showing of "factual innocence" could be heard on habeas. Id. at 256–58, 274–75. As will be evident infra, some form of innocence standard appears in much of the Court's habeas jurisprudence.

[26] Wainwright, 433 U.S. at 81.

[27] 433 U.S. at 83; Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 495 n.37 (1976); Francis v. Henderson, 425 U.S. 536, 538 (1976); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 438 (1963). The dichotomy between power and discretion goes all the way back to the case imposing the rule of exhaustion of state remedies. Ex parte Royall, 117 U.S. 241, 251 (1886).

[28] Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976). The decision is based as much on the Court's dissatisfaction with the exclusionary rule as with its desire to curb habeas. Holding that the purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter unconstitutional searches and seizures rather than to redress individual injuries, the Court reasoned that no deterrent purpose was advanced by applying the rule on habeas, except to encourage state courts to give claimants a full and fair hearing. Id. at 493–95.

[29] Stone does not apply to a Sixth Amendment claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in litigating a search and seizure claim. Kimmelman v. Morrison, 477 U.S. 365, 382–383 (1986). See also Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545 (1979) (racial discrimination in selection of grand jury foreman); Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979) (insufficient evidence to satisfy reasonable doubt standard).

[30] See, e.g., Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 205 (1989) (O'Connor, J., concurring); Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 413–14 (1977) (Powell, J., concurring), and id. at 415 (Burger, C.J, dissenting); Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72, 87 n.11 (1977) (reserving Miranda).

[31] The first exception permits the retroactive application on habeas of a new rule if the rule places a class of private conduct beyond the power of the state to proscribe or addresses a substantive categorical guarantee accorded by the Constitution. The rule must, to say it differently, either decriminalize a class of conduct or prohibit the imposition of a particular punishment on a particular class of persons. The second exception would permit the rule."[32] A decision announces a new rule "if the result was not dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final."[33] Explaining this the court noted that if a rule "was susceptible to debate among reasonable minds," it could not have been dictated by precedent, and therefore it must be classified as a "new rule."[34]

Third, the Court has largely maintained the standards of Townsend v. Sain, as embodied in somewhat modified form in statute, with respect to when federal judges must conduct an evidentiary hearing. However, the Court has overturned one Townsend factor, not expressly set out in the statute, in order to bring the case law into line with other decisions. Townsend had held that a hearing was required if the material facts were not adequately developed at the state-court hearing. If the defendant had failed to develop the material facts in the state court, however, the Court held that, unless he had "deliberately bypass[ed]" that procedural outlet, he was still entitled to the hearing.[35] In Keeney v. Tamayo-Reyes, the Court overruled that point and substituted a much stricter "cause-and-prejudice" standard.[36]

Fourth, the Court has significantly stiffened the standards governing when a federal habeas court should entertain a second or successive petition filed by a state prisoner—a question at issue in Sanders v. United States.[37] A successive petition may be dismissed if the same ground was determined adversely to petitioner previously, the prior determination was on the merits, and "the ends of justice" would not be served by reconsideration. It is with the latter element that the Court has become more restrictive. A plurality in Kuhlmann v. Wilson[38] argued that the "ends of justice" standard would be met only if a petitioner supplemented her constitutional claim with a colorable showing of factual innocence. While the Court has not expressly adopted this standard, a later capital case utilized it, holding that a petitioner sentenced to death could escape the bar on successive petitions by demonstrating "actual innocence" of the death penalty by showing by clear and convincing evidence that no reasonable juror would have found the prisoner eligible for the death penalty under applicable state law.[39]

Even if the subsequent petition alleges new and different grounds, a habeas court may dismiss the petition if the prisoner's failure to assert those grounds in the prior, or first, petition constitutes "an abuse of the writ."[40] Following the 1963 trilogy and especially Sanders, the federal courts had generally followed a rule excusing the failure to raise claims in earlier application of "watershed rules of criminal procedure" implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding. Saffle v. Parks, 494 U.S. 484, 494–95 (1990) (citing cases); Sawyer v. Smith, 497 U.S. 227, 241–45 (1990).

---

[32] Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989) (plurality opinion); Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 313–19 (1989).

[33] Butler v. McKellar, 494 U.S. 407, 412 (1990) (quoting Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 314 (1989), which was quoting Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 314 (1989). This sentence was quoted again in Whorton v. Bockting, 549 U.S. 406, 416 (2007)).

[34] 494 U.S. at 415. See also Stringer v. Black, 503 U.S. 222, 228–29 (1992). This latter case found that two decisions relied on by petitioner merely drew on existing precedent and so did not establish a new rule. See also O'Dell v. Netherland, 521 U.S. 151 (1997); Lambrix v. Singletary, 520 U.S. 518 (1997); Gray v. Netherland, 518 U.S. 152 (1996). But compare Bousley v. Brooks, 523 U.S. 614 (1998).

[35] Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293, 313, 317 (1963), imported the "deliberate bypass" standard from Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 438 (1963).

[36] Keeney v. Tamayo-Reyes, 504 U.S. 1 (1992). This standard is imported from the cases abandoning Fay v. Noia and is discussed infra.

[37] 373 U.S. 1, 15–18 (1963). The standards are embodied in 28 U.S.C. § 2244(b).

[38] 477 U.S. 436 (1986).

[39] Sawyer v. Whitley, 505 U.S. 333 (1992). Language in the opinion suggests that the standard is not limited to capital cases. Id. at 339.

[40] The standard is in 28 U.S.C. § 2244(b), along with the standard that, if a petitioner "deliberately withheld" a claim, the petition can be dismissed. See also 28 U.S.C. § 2254 Rule 9(b) (judge may dismiss successive petition raising new claims if failure to assert them previously was an abuse of the writ).

petitions unless the failure was a result of "inexcusable neglect" or of deliberate relinquishment. In McClesky v. Zant,[41] the Court construed the "abuse of the writ" language to require a showing of both "cause and prejudice" before a petitioner may allege in a second or later petition a ground or grounds not alleged in the first. In other words, to avoid subsequent dismissal, a petitioner must allege in his first application all the grounds he may have, unless he can show cause, some external impediment, for his failure and some actual prejudice from the error alleged. If he cannot show cause and prejudice, the petitioner may be heard only if she shows that a "fundamental miscarriage of justice" will occur, which means she must make a "colorable showing of factual innocence."[42]

Fifth, the Court abandoned the rules of Fay v. Noia, although it was not until 1991 that it expressly overruled the case.[43] Fay raised the question of when a petitioner may present a claim in federal habeas proceedings that was not properly raised during state proceedings. The answer in Fay was that the federal court always had power to review the claim but that it had discretion to deny relief to a habeas claimant if it found that the prisoner had intentionally waived his right to pursue his state remedy through a "deliberate bypass" of state procedure.

That is no longer the law. Instead the Court has now held,

> In all cases in which a state prisoner has defaulted his federal claims in state court pursuant to an independent and adequate state procedural rule, federal habeas review of the claims is barred unless the prisoner can demonstrate cause for the default and actual prejudice as a result of the alleged violation of federal law, or demonstrate that failure to consider the claims will result in a fundamental miscarriage of justice. Fay was based on a conception of federal/state relations that undervalued the importance of state procedural rules.[44]

The "miscarriage-of-justice" element is probably limited to cases in which actual innocence or actual impairment of a guilty verdict can be shown.[45] The concept of "cause" excusing failure to observe a state rule is extremely narrow; "the existence of cause for procedural default must ordinarily turn on whether the prisoner can show that some objective factor external to the defense impeded counsel's efforts to comply with the State's procedural rule."[46] As for the "prejudice" factor, it is an undeveloped concept, but the Court's only case establishes a high barrier.[47]

---

[41] 499 U.S. 467 (1991).

[42] 499 U.S. at 489–97. The "actual innocence" element runs through the cases under all the headings.

[43] Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 744–51 (1991).

[44] Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 750 (1991). The standard has been developed in a long line of cases. Davis v. United States, 411 U.S. 233 (1973) (under federal rules); Francis v. Henderson, 425 U.S. 536 (1976); Engle v. Isaac, 456 U.S. 107 (1982); Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986); Harris v. Reed, 489 U.S. 255 (1989). Coleman arose because the defendant's attorney had filed his appeal in state court three days late. Wainwright v. Sykes involved the failure of defendant to object to the admission of inculpatory statements at the time of trial. Engle v. Isaac involved a failure to object at trial to jury instructions.

[45] E.g., Smith v. Murray, 477 U.S. 527, 538–39 (1986); Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478, 496 (1986). In Bousley v. Brooks, 523 U.S. 614 (1998), a federal post-conviction relief case, petitioner had pled guilty to a federal firearms offense. Subsequently, the Supreme Court interpreted the elements of the offense more narrowly than had the trial court in Bousley's case. The Court held that Bousley by his plea had defaulted, but that he might be able to demonstrate "actual innocence" so as to excuse the default if he could show on remand that it was more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have convicted him of the offense, properly defined.

[46] Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. at 488. This case held that ineffective assistance of counsel is not "cause" unless it rises to the level of a Sixth Amendment violation. See also Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 752–57 (1991) (because petitioner had no right to counsel in state postconviction proceeding where error occurred, he could not claim constitutionally ineffective assistance of counsel). The actual novelty of a constitutional claim at the time of the state

The Court continues, with some modest exceptions, to construe habeas jurisdiction restrictively; Congress has also enacted legislation restricting the availability of habeas relief. In Herrera v. Collins,[48] the Court appeared to take the position that, although a showing of actual innocence is required to permit a claimant to bring a successive or abusive petition, a claim of innocence alone is not sufficient to enable a claimant to obtain review of his conviction on habeas. Petitioners are entitled in federal habeas courts to show that they are imprisoned in violation of the Constitution, not to seek to correct errors of fact. But a claim of innocence does not bear on the constitutionality of a person's conviction or detention, and the execution of a person claiming actual innocence would not, by this reasoning, violate the Constitution.[49] In a subsequent part of the opinion, however, the Court assumed for the sake of argument that "a truly persuasive demonstration of 'actual innocence' made after trial would render the execution of a defendant unconstitutional," and it imposed a high standard for making this showing.[50]

In Schlup v. Delo,[51] the Court adopted the plurality opinion of Kuhlmann v. Wilson and held that, absent a sufficient showing of "cause and prejudice," a claimant filing a successive or abusive petition must, as an initial matter, make a showing of "actual innocence" so as to fall within the narrow class of cases implicating a fundamental miscarriage of justice. The Court divided, however, with respect to the showing a claimant must make. The dissenters argued for one standard, which would require that "to show 'actual innocence' one must show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found the petitioner eligible for the death penalty."[52] The Court adopted a second standard, under which the petitioner must demonstrate that "a constitutional violation has probably resulted in the conviction of one who is actually innocent." To meet this burden, a claimant "must show that it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have convicted him in the light of the new evidence."[53]

In the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA),[54] Congress imposed tight new restrictions on successive or abusive petitions, including making the circuit courts "gate keepers" in permitting or denying the filing of such petitions, with bars to appellate review of these decisions. The Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to court proceeding is "cause" excusing the petitioner's failure to raise it then, Reed v. Ross, 468 U.S. 1 (1984), although the failure of counsel to anticipate a line of constitutional argument then foreshadowed in Supreme Court precedent is insufficient "cause." Engle v. Isaac, 456 U.S. 107 (1982).

---

[47] United States v. Frady, 456 U.S. 152, 169 (1982) (under federal rules) (with respect to erroneous jury instruction, inquiring whether the error "so infected the entire trial that the resulting conviction violates due process").

[48] 506 U.S. 390 (1993).

[49] 506 U.S. at 398–417.

[50] 506 U.S. at 417–419. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas would have unequivocally held that "[t]here is no basis in text, tradition, or even in contemporary practice . . . for finding in the Constitution a right to demand judicial consideration of newly discovered evidence of innocence brought forward after conviction." Id. at 427–28 (concurring). However, it is not at all clear that all the Justices joining the Court believe innocence to be nondispositive on habeas. Id. at 419 (O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ., concurring), 429 (White, J., concurring). In House v. Bell, 547 U.S. 518, 554–55 (2006), the Court declined to resolve the issue that in Herrera it had assumed without deciding: that "a truly persuasive demonstration of 'actual innocence' made after trial would render the execution of a defendant unconstitutional."

[51] 513 U.S. 298 (1995).

[52] 513 U.S. at 334 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting, joined by Kennedy and Thomas, JJ.), 342 (Scalia, J., dissenting, joined by Thomas, J.). This standard was drawn from Sawyer v. Whitley, 505 U.S. 333 (1992).

[53] 513 U.S. at 327. This standard was drawn from Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986).

[54] Pub. L. No. 104-132, Title I, 110 Stat. 1217–21, amending 28 U.S.C. §§ 2244, 2253, 2254, and Rule 22 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

portions of AEDPA in Felker v. Turpin.[55] One important restriction in AEDPA bars a federal habeas court from granting a writ to any person in custody under a judgment of a state court "with respect to any claim that was adjudicated on the merits in State court proceedings unless the adjudication of the claim—(1) resulted in a decision that was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States."[56] The Court has made the significance of this restriction plain: Instead of assessing whether federal law was correctly applied de novo, as would be the course under direct review of a federal district court decision, the proper approach for federal habeas relief under AEDPA is the more deferential one of determining whether the Court has established clear precedent on the issue contested and, if so, whether the state's application of the precedent was reasonable, i.e., whether a fairminded jurist could find that the state acted in accord with the Court's established precedent.[57]

ArtIII.S1.7 Supreme Court Rulings

ArtIII.S1.7.1 Overview of Supreme Court Rulings

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Along with the Constitution and federal statutes, rulings of the Supreme Court are a key source of the law of the United States. In the view of many judges and commentators, Supreme Court decisions do not make law, which is the province of the Legislative Branch, but instead interpret and apply the Constitution and statutes.[1] Chief Justice John Marshall famously stated in the 1803 case Marbury v. Madison, "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is."[2] Over two centuries later, when nominated to be Chief Justice, then-Judge John Roberts likened the role of a Justice to the role of a baseball umpire who does not make the rules or play the game but instead simply applies the rules "to call balls and strikes."[3]

Nonetheless, as a practical matter, Supreme Court decisions may change the legal landscape by resolving open legal questions, striking down unconstitutional laws or government actions, or overruling prior judicial decisions. Court-created legal doctrines

---

[55] 518 U.S. 651 (1996).

[56] 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d) (emphasis added). The provision was applied in Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685 (2002). See also Renico v. Lett, 559 U.S. ___, No. 09-338, slip op. 9–12 (2010). For analysis of its constitutionality, see the various opinions in Lindh v. Murphy, 96 F.3d 856 (7th Cir. 1996) (en banc), rev'd on other grounds, 521 U.S. 320 (1997); Drinkard v. Johnson, 97 F.3d 751 (5th Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 520 U.S. 1107 (1997); Hall v. Washington, 106 F.3d 742 (7th Cir. 1997); O'Brien v. Dubois, 145 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 1998); Green v. French, 143 F.3d 865 (4th Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 1090 (1999).

[57] Harrington v. Richter, 562 U.S. 86, 102 (2011) (overturning Ninth Circuit's grant of relief, which was based on ineffective assistance of counsel); accord Premo v. Moore, 562 U.S. ___, No. 09-658, slip op. (2011) (same) and Cullen v. Pinholster, No. 09-1088, slip op. (2011) (same).

[1] See, e.g., Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 622–23 (1965) (quoting 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries 69) (stating that, at common law, "the duty of the court was not to 'pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one'"); but see, e.g., Geoffrey C. Hazard Jr., The Supreme Court as a Legislature, 64 Cornell L. Rev. 1 (1978).

[2] 5 U.S. 137, 177 (1803).

[3] Confirmation Hearing on the Nomination of John G. Roberts, Jr. to be Chief Justice of the United States, Hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 109th Cong. 2005.

determine the scope and effect of those changes. For instance, the doctrine of stare decisis counsels against the Court overruling its past decisions absent special justification to depart from precedent.[4] In addition, a number of Supreme Court cases have addressed the extent to which Court decisions announcing new rules of law apply retroactively.[5]

ArtIII.S1.7.2 Stare Decisis

ArtIII.S1.7.2.1 Historical Background on Stare Decisis Doctrine

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Stare decisis, Latin for "to stand by things decided,"[1] is a judicial doctrine under which a court follows the principles, rules, or standards of its prior decisions (or decisions of higher tribunals) when deciding a case with arguably similar facts.[2] The doctrine of stare decisis has "horizontal" and "vertical" aspects. A court adhering to the principle of horizontal stare decisis will follow its own prior decisions absent exceptional circumstances (e.g., the Supreme Court follows a precedent unless it has become too difficult for lower courts to apply).[3] By contrast, vertical stare decisis binds lower courts to follow strictly the decisions of higher courts within the same jurisdiction (e.g., a federal court of appeals must follow the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, the federal court of last resort).[4]

The doctrine of stare decisis in American jurisprudence has its roots in eighteenth-century English common law. In 1765, the English jurist William Blackstone described the doctrine of English common law precedent as establishing a strong presumption that judges, to promote stability in the law, would "abide by former precedents, where the same points come again in litigation" unless such precedents were "flatly absurd or unjust."[5] At least some of the Constitution's Framers favored judges' adherence to judicial precedent because it limited judges' discretion to interpret ambiguously worded provisions of law. For example, writing in the Federalist No. 78 during the debates over adoption of the Constitution in an essay

---

[4] See ArtIII.S1.7.2.2 Stare Decisis Doctrine Generally.

[5] See ArtIII.S1.7.3.1 Overview of Retroactivity of Supreme Court Decisions.

[1] The full Latin phrase is "stare decisis et non quieta movere—stand by the thing decided and do not disturb the calm." See James C. Rehnquist, Note, The Power That Shall Be Vested in a Precedent: Stare Decisis, The Constitution, and the Supreme Court, 66 B.U. L. Rev. 345, 347 (1986).

[2] Stare Decisis, Black's Law Dictionary 1626 (10th ed. 2014) (defining "stare decisis" as "the doctrine of precedent, under which a court must follow earlier judicial decisions when the same points arise again in litigation"); id. at 1366 (defining "precedent" as "a decided case that furnishes a basis for determining later cases involving similar facts or issues"). This essay does not examine the Supreme Court's reliance on the precedents of state court or foreign tribunals. It also does not examine how the Court determines whether a particular sentence in an opinion is a binding holding necessary to the decision for purposes of stare decisis or, rather, non-binding obiter dictum. See generally Obiter dictum, Black's Law Dictionary 1177 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "obiter dictum" as a "judicial comment made while delivering a judicial opinion, but one that is unnecessary to the decision in the case and therefore not precedential (although it may be considered persuasive)").

[3] Horizontal stare decisis, Black's Law Dictionary 1537 (10th ed. 2014) (defining "horizontal stare decisis" as "the doctrine that a court . . . must adhere to its own prior decisions, unless it finds compelling reasons to overrule itself").

[4] See id. (defining "vertical stare decisis" as "the doctrine that a court must strictly follow the decisions handed down by higher courts within the same jurisdiction").

[5] 1 William Blackstone Commentaries on the Laws of England 69–70 (describing precedent as "a permanent rule, which it is not in the breast of any subsequent judge to alter or vary from, according to his private sentiments").

addressing concerns about judicial power, Alexander Hamilton argued that courts should apply precedent to prevent judges from having unbounded discretion to interpret ambiguous legal texts.[6]

During Chief Justice John Marshall's tenure in the early 1800s, the newly created Supreme Court combined a strong preference for adhering to precedent with a "limited notion of error correction" when precedents had been eroded by subsequent decisions[7] or were "premised on an incomplete factual record."[8] The early Court was reluctant to overrule prior decisions when doing so would upset commercial reliance interests (e.g., precedents concerning matters of property or contract law).[9]

ArtIII.S1.7.2.2 Stare Decisis Doctrine Generally

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

In the modern era, the Supreme Court has applied the doctrine of stare decisis by following the rules of its prior decisions unless there is a "special justification"—or, at least, "strong grounds"—to overrule precedent.[1] This justification must amount to more than a [6] Federalist No. 78, at 439 (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1999) ("To avoid an arbitrary discretion in the courts, it is indispensable that [judges] should be bound down by strict rules and precedents, which serve to define and point out their duty in every particular case that comes before them . . . ."). Historical sources provide only limited insight into the Founders' views on stare decisis, and it is unclear whether Alexander Hamilton was referring to the presumption that a court should adhere to its own prior decisions or, rather, those of higher tribunals. Thomas R. Lee, Stare Decisis in Historical Perspective: From the Founding Era to the Rehnquist Court, 52 Vand. L. Rev. 647, 664 (1999). Other Founders held similar views on the benefits of precedent. See, e.g., 1 Diary and Autobiography of John Adams 167–68 (L.H. Butterfield, ed., 1961) (draft of Nov. 5, 1760) ("[E]very possible Case being thus preserved in Writing, and settled in a Precedent, leaves nothing, or but little to the arbitrary Will or uninformed Reason of Prince or Judge."). See also Caleb Nelson, Stare Decisis and Demonstrably Erroneous Precedents, 87 Va. L. Rev. 1, 9 (2001) ("[C]oncern about such discretion was a common theme throughout the antebellum period; in one form or another, it shaped most antebellum explanations of the need for stare decisis."). But see Letter from James Madison to C.E. Haynes (Feb. 25, 1831), reprinted in 9 The Writings of James Madison 443 (Gaillard Hunt ed., 1910) ("That cases may occur which transcend all authority of precedents must be admitted, but they form exceptions which will speak for themselves and must justify themselves.").

---

[7] See, e.g., Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 33, 34 (1830) (involving statutory construction).

[8] Lee, supra note 6, at 681–87, 734. See, e.g., United States v. Percheman, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 51, 88–89 (1833).

[9] See, e.g., McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 401 (1819) ("[A]n exposition of the constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded."). See also Lee, supra note 6, at 691.

[1] See Janus v. Am. Fed. of State, Cnty., & Mun. Emps., No. 16-1466, slip op. at 34 (2018) ("We will not overturn a past decision unless there are strong grounds for doing so."); Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 212 (1984) ("Although adherence to precedent is not rigidly required in constitutional cases, any departure from the doctrine of stare decisis demands special justification."). For a list of Supreme Court decisions on constitutional law questions that the Court has overruled during its more than 225-year history, see Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions, https://constitution.congress.gov/resources/decisions-overruled/.

Legal scholars continue to debate questions surrounding the doctrine of stare decisis that are beyond the scope of this essay, such as whether the Constitution requires (or even allows) the Supreme Court to follow precedent, and whether Congress could abolish stare decisis in constitutional cases. See, e.g., Richard H. Fallon, Jr., Stare Decisis and the Constitution: An Essay on Constitutional Methodology, 76 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 570, 571 (2001); Michael Stokes Paulsen, Abrogating Stare Decisis by Statute: May Congress Remove the Precedential Effect of Roe and Casey?, 109 Yale L.J. 1535, 1548 (2000).

disagreement with a prior decision's reasoning.[2] In adopting this approach, the Court has rejected a strict view of stare decisis that would require it to adhere to its prior decisions regardless of those decisions' merits or the practical implications of retaining or discarding precedent.[3] Instead, while the Court has stated that its precedents are entitled to respect and deference,[4] the Court considers the principle of stare decisis to be a discretionary "principle of policy" to be weighed and balanced along with the Court's views about a prior decision's merits, along with several pragmatic considerations, when determining whether to retain precedent in interpreting the Constitution[5] or deciding whether to hear a case.[6] Notably, the Court may avoid having to decide whether to overrule precedent if it can distinguish the law or facts of a prior decision from the case before it, or limit the prior decision's holding so it is inapplicable to the instant case.[7]

---

[2] Kimble v. Marvel Entm't, LLC, 576 U.S. 446, 455 (2015) ("[A]n argument that [the Court] got something wrong—even a good argument to that effect—cannot by itself justify scrapping settled precedent.").

[3] Cf. Super stare decisis, Black's Law Dictionary 1537 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "super stare decisis" as "the theory that courts must follow earlier court decisions without considering whether those decisions were correct"). A court following a prior decision because it was correctly decided is not adhering to stare decisis; it is merely reaffirming precedent. See Fallon, supra note 1, at 570 ("If a court believes a prior decision to be correct, it can reaffirm that decision on the merits without reference to stare decisis.").

[4] See, e.g., Citizens United v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 558 U.S. 310, 362 (2010) ("Our precedent is to be respected unless the most convincing of reasons demonstrates that adherence to it puts us on a course that is sure error.").

[5] Michael J. Gerhardt, The Role of Precedent in Constitutional Decisionmaking and Theory, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 68, 73, 134–35 (1991) [hereinafter Gerhardt, The Role of Precedent] (describing the Court's review of its precedents as a "process in which the Justices individually try to balance their respective views on how the Constitution should be interpreted and certain social or institutional values such as the need for stability and consistency in constitutional law"). Sometimes a Justice's judicial philosophy may conflict with precedent, potentially requiring a Justice to choose between following his or her philosophy, or making a pragmatic exception to it in order to maintain stability in the law. For example, some proponents of textualism and original meaning as methods of constitutional interpretation object to the use of judicial precedent that conflicts with the Constitution's text and its original meaning. In their view, this approach to precedent favors the Supreme Court's views over the views of those who ratified the Constitution, thereby allowing mistaken constitutional interpretations to persist. See Henry P. Monaghan, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Adjudication, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 723, 769–70 (1988). Nevertheless, textualists and originalists may adhere to precedent for pragmatic reasons, such as when doing so would promote stability in the law. For example, Justice Antonin Scalia, a textualist and originalist, followed long-standing precedent allowing for the Supreme Court to incorporate rights specifically enumerated in the Bill of Rights against state governments, even though he harbored significant doubts that such incorporation comported with the Constitution's original meaning. See, e.g., McDonald v. City of Chi., 561 U.S. 742, 791 (2010) (Scalia, J., concurring) ("Despite my misgivings about substantive due process as an original matter, I have acquiesced in the Court's incorporation of certain guarantees in the Bill of Rights 'because it is both long established and narrowly limited.'" (citing Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 275 (1994) (Scalia, J., concurring)).

[6] See Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 378 (Roberts, C.J., concurring) ("Stare decisis is . . . a 'principle of policy.' When considering whether to reexamine a prior erroneous holding, we must balance the importance of having constitutional questions decided against the importance of having them decided right." (citing Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 119 (1940))); Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828 (1991) ("Stare decisis is not an inexorable command; rather, it 'is a principle of policy and not a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision.'" (citation omitted)); Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 405–06 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting) ("The rule of stare decisis, though one tending to consistency and uniformity of decision, is not inflexible. Whether it shall be followed or departed from is a question entirely within the discretion of the court, which is again called upon to consider a question once decided. Stare decisis is usually the wise policy, because, in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right." (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)).

[7] The Justices have latitude in how broadly or narrowly they construe their prior decisions. See Gerhardt, The Role of Precedent, supra note 7, at 98 ("The Supreme Court can overturn or otherwise weaken precedents through explicit overrulings, overrulings sub silentio, or subsequent decisionmaking that narrows or distinguishes precedents to the point of practical nullification."). For more on the use of judicial precedent as a method of constitutional interpretation, see Intro.8.4 Judicial Precedent and Constitutional Interpretation. The Court has other means of avoiding a decision on whether to overrule precedent, which include the Court's "discretionary jurisdiction" to deny certiorari, the four votes required to grant certiorari, and the Court's rule generally limiting review to the questions presented or "fairly included" in the petition. Amy Coney Barrett, Symposium, Precedent and Jurisprudential Disagreement, 91 Tex. L. Rev. 1711, 1731–33 (2013).

ArtIII.S1.7.2.2
Stare Decisis Doctrine Generally

The Supreme Court has established special rules for applying stare decisis in constitutional cases. During the twentieth century,[8] the Court adopted a weaker form of stare decisis when deciding cases that implicated a prior constitutional interpretation, rather than a previous interpretation of a federal statute.[9] The Court has sought to justify this approach on the grounds that Congress may amend federal laws to address what it deems to be erroneous judicial statutory interpretations, whereas amending the Constitution to overturn a Supreme Court precedent is much more difficult.[10] In fact, in the history of the United States, only five Supreme Court precedents have been overturned through constitutional amendment.[11] Despite the Court's assertion that it applies a weaker form of stare decisis in constitutional cases, the Court still requires a "special justification" or at least "strong grounds" for overruling constitutional precedents.[12]

[8] One study determined that the "notion that the constitutional or statutory nature of a precedent affects its susceptibility to reversal was largely rejected in the founding era and did not gain majority support until well into the twentieth century."). Lee, supra note 6, at 735.

John R. Sand & Gravel Co. v. United States, 552 U.S. 130, 139 (2008) ("[S]tare decisis in respect to statutory interpretation has special force, for Congress remains free to alter what we have done." (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 665 (1944) ("In constitutional questions, where correction depends upon amendment and not upon legislative action this Court throughout its history has freely exercised its power to reexamine the basis of its constitutional decisions."); Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 406–07 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting) ("[I]n cases involving the Federal Constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, this Court has often overruled its earlier decisions."). The Supreme Court has suggested that stare decisis is at is weakest in cases involving rules of criminal procedure "that implicate fundamental constitutional protections." Alleyne v. United States, 570 U.S. 99, 116 n.5 (2013).

[9] The Supreme Court's belief in Congress's ability to correct the Court's errors through legislation has sometimes motivated the Court to retain precedent in cases in which Congress could enact corrective legislation. These cases encompass some disputes that implicate questions of tribal sovereign immunity, judicially created causes of action, or constraints on state action under the Commerce Clause. See South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc., No. 17-494, slip op. at 2 (2018) (Roberts, C.J., dissenting) ("The bar [for departing from stare decisis and overturning precedent] is even higher in fields in which Congress 'exercises primary authority' and can, if it wishes, override this Court's decisions with contrary legislation." (citations omitted)).

[10] See supra note 8. Professor Michael Gerhardt notes that the political branches have other options for reversing or constraining constitutional precedents outside of amending the Constitution, such as "congressional modifications of the Court's jurisdiction, the President's power to nominate Justices who might agree with her criticisms of certain precedents, the Senate's power to advise and consent to judicial nominations, and impeachment." Gerhardt, The Role of Precedent, supra note 7, at 72 n.16.

[11] These former precedents are Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 117–18 (1970) (holding that Congress could not establish a voting age of eighteen for state and local elections, but could do so for national elections), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XXVI ("The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age."); Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601, 637 (1895) (holding that a federal income tax violated the Constitution because it was not apportioned among the states based on congressional representation), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XVI ("The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."); Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162, 178 (1874) (upholding as constitutional a state law that limited the right of suffrage to men), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIX ("The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex."); Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 452–54 (1857) (holding that former slaves lacked standing to sue in federal court because they were not citizens, and that the federal government lacked the authority to regulate slavery in the territories), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amends. XIII ("Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."), and XIV ("All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."); Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 452 (1793) (holding that federal courts had jurisdiction over civil suits by private citizens against states) superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XI ("The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another state, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign state.").

[12] See supra note 1.

ArtIII.S1.7.2.3 Stare Decisis Factors

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

There are several factors the Supreme Court weighs when determining whether to reaffirm or overrule a prior decision interpreting the Constitution.[1] First, the Supreme Court may consider the quality of the decision's reasoning.[2] Another factor that the Supreme Court has considered when determining whether to overrule a precedent is whether a rule or standard that the prior case establishes for determining the constitutionality of a government action is too difficult for lower federal courts or other interpreters to apply and is thus "unworkable."[3] A third factor the Supreme Court may consider is whether the precedent departs from the Court's other decisions on similar constitutional questions, either because the precedent's reasoning has been eroded by later decisions,[4] or because the precedent is a recent outlier when compared to other decisions.[5]

The Supreme Court has also indicated that changes in how the Justices and society understand a decision's underlying facts may undermine a precedent's authoritativeness,

---

[1] Some Justices have argued that the Supreme Court's current stare decisis factors are confusing and should be revised to provide a better roadmap for decisionmaking. See, e.g., Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 7–8 (2020) (Kavanaugh, J., concurring in part) (describing the Supreme Court's jurisprudence on the stare decisis factors as a "muddle" and identifying three stare decisis factors: the merits of the decision, the precedent's practical consequences, and reliance interests).

[2] See, e.g., W. Va. State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 636–42 (1943) (overruling the Supreme Court's 3-year-old decision in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), which had upheld a state law compelling students to salute the American flag, because of significant disagreements with the Gobitis Court's analysis of the First Amendment, the importance of national unity, and other issues).

[3] See, e.g., Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528, 531 (1985) (overruling Nat'l League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), because Usery's rule for when state activities qualified for immunity from congressional regulation under the Commerce Clause had become unworkable, and the lower courts could not apply it consistently). See also Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 792 (2009) ("[T]he fact that a decision has proved 'unworkable' is a traditional ground for overruling it.").

[4] United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 521 (1995) ("And we think stare decisis cannot possibly be controlling when . . . the decision in question has been proved manifestly erroneous, and its underpinnings eroded, by subsequent decisions of this Court.").

[5] See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 233–34 (1995) (overruling Metro Broad., Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547 (1990), because it departed from a long line of precedents holding that the Fifth Amendment does not impose a lesser duty on the federal government than the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause imposes on state governments). See also Michael Stokes Paulsen, Does the Supreme Court's Current Doctrine of Stare Decisis Require Adherence to the Supreme Court's Current Doctrine of Stare Decisis?, 86 N.C. L. Rev. 1165, 1189 (2008) ("[A]ny fair discussion of the remnant-of-abandoned-doctrine factor of the Court's current stare decisis analysis must reckon with the seemingly equal but opposite restoration-of-departed-from doctrine counter-factor."). Occasionally, the Justices disagree over which line of precedent the Court should retain, and which line of precedent it should overrule or ignore. Compare Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 577–78 (2003) (Kennedy, J., for the majority) (striking down a Texas law that banned private, consensual same-sex sexual activity as violating the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause and overruling Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), in part because Bowers was inconsistent with subsequent Supreme Court precedents that protected personal autonomy to make decisions related to the family and intimate conduct), with Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 588 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (characterizing the precedents that the majority relied upon as outliers whose legal foundations had been eroded by a 1997 case holding that only "fundamental rights" that are "deeply rooted in [the] Nation's history and tradition" qualified for enhanced protection under the Due Process Clause) (quoting Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 721 (1997) (internal quotation marks omitted)).

leading the Court to overrule it.[6] Finally, the Supreme Court may consider whether it should retain a precedent, even if flawed, because overruling the decision would result in hardship to individuals, companies, or organizations;[7] society as a whole;[8] or Legislative,[9] Executive,[10] or Judicial Branch officers,[11] who relied on the decision's guidance as to which actions and practices comport with the Constitution.[12]

It is difficult to predict when the Supreme Court will overrule precedent because the Court has not provided an exhaustive list of the factors it uses to determine whether a decision should be overruled, or explained how it weighs them. Although much about how the Supreme Court views precedent remains unclear, the Court's factors for determining whether to retain or overrule precedent provides the Justices with significant discretion.[13] If the Court is unable to distinguish a precedent from the case before it, the Justices generally attempt to strike a [6] Casey, 505 U.S. at 855 (plurality opinion) (discussing the inquiry into whether "facts have so changed, or come to be seen so differently, as to have robbed the old rule of significant application or justification"). See also, e.g., South Dakota v. Wayfair, No. 17-494, slip op. at 18–19, 23–24 (2018) (overturning two precedents and determining that the Commerce Clause does not restrict states from requiring retailers that lack a physical presence in the state, such as internet retailers, to collect and remit taxes on sales made to state residents). The Wayfair Court noted that the U.S. economy had changed drastically, with a marked increase in the prevalence and power of internet access and concomitant increases in retailers selling goods remotely to consumers. Id. See also West Coast Hotel v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 390, 400 (1937) (overruling Adkins v. Children's Hosp., 261 U.S. 525 (1923), and stating that "the economic conditions which have supervened" during the Great Depression required reconsideration of the "exercise of the protective power of the state" to institute minimum wage laws).

[7] See, e.g., Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828 (1991) ("Considerations in favor of stare decisis are at their acme in cases involving property and contract rights, where reliance interests are involved . . . the opposite is true in cases such as the present one involving procedural and evidentiary rules." (citations omitted)); McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 401 (1819) ("[A]n exposition of the constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded."); Lee, supra note 6, at 691–703, 734.

[8] See, e.g., Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 431–32, 443 (2000) (declining to overrule the Court's 1966 decision in Miranda v. Arizona because the Miranda decision had "become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture").

[9] Some Justices have argued that legislators may rely on the Supreme Court's decisions about the constitutionality of certain types of laws. See, e.g., Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 589–90 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (arguing that numerous legislators had relied on the Court's decision in Bowers v. Hardwick when enacting laws regulating certain sexual behaviors deemed immoral by the governing majority).

[10] See, e.g., Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 358–59 (2009) (Alito, J., dissenting) (arguing that the majority had effectively overruled New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981), and thereby upset law enforcement officers' reliance on a precedent addressing the permissibility under the Fourth Amendment of searching a vehicle's occupant after arrest).

[11] Judges often rely on precedent, both explicitly by citing to precedent in their opinions, and implicitly, by accepting principles established by precedent, such as the power of judicial review. See, e.g., Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm'n, 576 U.S. 787, 805 (2015) (relying on three cases from the early twentieth century in holding that Arizona voters could remove from the state legislature the authority to redraw the boundaries for legislative districts and vest that authority in an independent commission). See also, e.g., Johnson v. United States, 576 U.S. 591, 606 (2015) (striking down part of a federal law as unconstitutional without citing Marbury v. Madison).

[12] See, e.g., Hubbard v. United States, 514 U.S. 695, 716 (1995) (Scalia, J., concurring in part) (stating that stare decisis "protects the legitimate expectations of those who live under the law"); Hilton v. S.C. Pub. Rys. Comm'n, 502 U.S. 197, 202 (1991) (stating that stare decisis "has added force when the legislature, in the public sphere, and citizens, in the private realm, have acted in reliance on a previous decision, for in this instance overruling the decision would dislodge settled rights and expectations or require an extensive legislative response") See also Randy J. Kozel, Stare Decisis as Judicial Doctrine, 67 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 411, 452 (2010) ("The universe of reliance interests can be usefully (if roughly) divided into four categories: reliance by specific individuals, groups, and organizations; reliance by governments; reliance by courts; and reliance by society at large.").

[13] Confirmation Hearing on the Nomination of Samuel A. Alito, Jr. To Be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: Hearing Before the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 109th Cong. 399 (2006) (statement of then-Judge Alito) ("They have said there has to be a special justification for overruling a precedent. There is a presumption that precedents will be followed. But it is not—the rule of stare decisis is not an inexorable command, and I don't think anybody would want a rule in the area of constitutional law that . . . said that a constitutional decision, once handed down, can never be overruled.").

delicate balance between maintaining a stable jurisprudence on which parties can rely,[14] while preserving sufficient flexibility to correct errors.[15]

ArtIII.S1.7.3 Retroactivity of Supreme Court Decisions

ArtIII.S1.7.3.1 Overview of Retroactivity of Supreme Court Decisions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Under English common law, from which much of the American judicial system is derived, judicial decisions applied retroactively. The Supreme Court has explained that the common law approach was motivated by the belief that "the duty of the court was not to 'pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one.'"[1] Applying judicial decisions retroactively can create practical difficulties, however: regulated parties must rely on the law as they understand it in making decisions and shaping their conduct, but court decisions may change the legal landscape by resolving open legal questions, striking down unconstitutional laws or government actions, or overruling prior judicial decisions. Early American cases generally followed the common law approach and held that Supreme Court decisions applied retroactively.[2] By contrast, starting in the 1960s, the Court has at times limited the retroactive application of judicial decisions announcing new rules of law in light of regulated entities' reliance on the prior rule.[3]

The Court's retroactivity jurisprudence distinguishes between criminal and civil cases. The following essays discuss the extent to which the Court has applied its decisions retroactively in criminal[4] and civil[5] litigation.

---

[14] See, e.g., Hilton, 502 U.S. at 202 ("Adherence to precedent promotes stability, predictability, and respect for judicial authority."); Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 827 (1991) ("Stare decisis is the preferred course because it promotes the evenhanded, predictable, and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the actual and perceived integrity of the judicial process."); Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 265–66 (1986) ("[T]he important doctrine of stare decisis [is] the means by which we ensure that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion. That doctrine permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals, and thereby contributes to the integrity of our constitutional system of government, both in appearance and in fact.").

[15] See, e.g., Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 172 (1989) ("Our precedents are not sacrosanct, for we have overruled prior decisions where the necessity and propriety of doing so has been established."); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 665 (1944) ("[W]hen convinced of former error, this Court has never felt constrained to follow precedent. In constitutional questions, where correction depends upon amendment and not upon legislative action this Court throughout its history has freely exercised its power to reexamine the basis of its constitutional decisions.").

[1] Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 622–23 (1965) (quoting 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries 69).

[2] E.g., Robinson v. Neil, 409 U.S. 505, 507 (1973) (Prior to 1965, "both the common law and our own decisions recognized a general rule of retrospective effect for the constitutional decisions of this Court . . . subject to limited exceptions.").

[3] See, e.g., Lemon v. Kurtzman, 411 U.S. 192, 198–99 (1973).

[4] See ArtIII.S1.7.3.2 Retroactivity of Criminal Decisions.

[5] See ArtIII.S1.7.3.3 Retroactivity of Civil Decisions.

ArtIII.S1.7.3.2 Retroactivity of Criminal Decisions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court's retroactivity jurisprudence distinguishes between criminal and civil cases.[1] On the criminal side, there may be further distinctions based on whether a criminal defendant has allegedly engaged in criminal conduct but has not yet been tried, has been convicted at trial and is pursuing a direct appeal, or has exhausted all direct appeals but can still seek collateral relief via a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The general rule prior to 1965 was that the Court's constitutional decisions involving criminal law applied retroactively, subject to limited exceptions.[2] The Court changed its approach in the 1965 case Linkletter v. Walker, in which it held that, with respect to new constitutional interpretations involving criminal rights, "the Constitution neither prohibits nor requires retrospective effect."[3]

In Linkletter and a case from the following year, the Court held that its decisions applied retroactively to all cases in which judgments of conviction were not yet final.[4] Later, however, the Court adopted a balancing process that resulted in different degrees of retroactivity in different cases.[5] Generally, in cases where the Court declared a rule that was "a clear break with the past," it denied retroactivity to all defendants, sometimes with the exception of the challenger before the Court.[6] By contrast, in certain cases where a new rule was intended to overcome an impairment of the truth-finding function of a criminal trial[7] or cases where the Court found that a constitutional doctrine barred the conviction or punishment of someone,[8] the Court granted its decisions full retroactivity, even for habeas claimants.

The Court's retroactivity jurisprudence later distinguished between criminal cases pending on direct review and cases pending on collateral review. For cases on direct review, the Court held, "a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions is to be applied retroactively to all cases, state or federal, pending on direct review or not yet final, with no exception for cases in which the new rule constitutes a 'clear break' with the past."[9] A plurality of the Court first endorsed a new standard for collateral review in Teague v. Lane,[10] and a majority of the Court adopted it in Penry v. Lynaugh.[11] In contrast to cases on direct appeal, for collateral review in [1] For discussion of civil cases, see ArtIII.S1.7.3.3 Retroactivity of Civil Decisions.

[2] Robinson v. Neil, 409 U.S. 505, 507 (1973).

[3] 381 U.S. 618, 629 (1965).

[4] Linkletter, 381 U.S. 618; Tehan v. United States ex rel. Shott, 382 U.S. 406 (1966).

[5] Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719 (1966); Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967); Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278 (1972).

[6] Desist v. United States, 394 U.S. 244, 248 (1969); United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531 (1975); Brown v. Louisiana, 447 U.S. 323, 335–36 (1980) (plurality opinion); Michigan v. Payne, 412 U.S. 47, 55 (1973); United States v. Johnson, 457 U.S. 537, 549–50, 551–52 (1982).

[7] Williams v. United States, 401 U.S. 646, 653 (1971) (plurality opinion); Brown v. Louisiana, 447 U.S. 323, 328–30 (1980) (plurality opinion); Hankerson v. North Carolina, 432 U.S. 233, 243 (1977).

[8] United States v. United States Coin & Currency, 401 U.S. 715, 724 (1971); Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786, 800 (1972); Robinson v. Neil, 409 U.S. 505, 509 (1973).

[9] Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314, 328 (1987) (cited with approval in Whorton v. Bockting, 549 U.S. 406, 416 (2007)).

[10] 489 U.S. 288 (1989).

[11] 492 U.S. 302 (1989).

federal courts of state court criminal convictions, the Court held that it generally will not give retroactive effect to "new rules" of constitutional interpretation—that is, rules "not 'dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final.'"[12] The Court held that a new rule may apply retroactively in a collateral proceeding "only if (1) the rule is substantive or (2) the rule is a 'watershed rul[e] of criminal procedure' implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding."[13] As the Teague plurality explained, the Court will apply a new rule in a collateral proceeding only if it places certain kinds of conduct "beyond the power of the criminal law-making authority to prescribe" or constitutes a "new procedure[ ] without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction is seriously diminished."[14]

Since Teague, the Court has consistently held that new substantive constitutional rules apply retroactively. The Court has described a substantive rule as one that alters the range of conduct that the law punishes, or that prohibits "a certain category of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense."[15] Thus, the Court has held that the first Teague exception is constitutionally based, as substantive rules set forth categorical guarantees that place certain laws and punishments beyond a state's power, making "the resulting conviction or sentence . . . by definition . . . unlawful."[16] In Montgomery v. Louisiana, the Court extended the holding of Teague beyond the context of federal habeas review, holding that when a new substantive rule of constitutional law controls the outcome of a case, state collateral review courts must give retroactive effect to that rule in the same manner as federal courts engaging in habeas review.[17]

In contrast, the Court has never invoked the second Teague exception for "watershed" procedural rules to hold that a new rule of criminal procedure must apply retroactively. The Court has explained that procedural rules simply regulate the manner of determining the defendant's guilt, so if a defendant does not receive the benefit of a new procedural rule, the underlying conviction or sentence may "still be accurate" and the "defendant's continued confinement may still be lawful" under the Constitution.[18] The court has explained that, under the second Teague exception, it is not enough "to say that a new rule is aimed at improving the accuracy of a trial. . . . A rule that qualifies under this exception must not only improve accuracy, but also alter our understanding of the bedrock procedural elements essential to the fairness of a proceeding."[19] In the 2021 case Edwards v. Vannoy, the Court noted that the Teague Court itself had stated it was "unlikely" that new watershed rules would emerge and, "in the 32 years since Teague, . . . the Court has never found that any new procedural rule [12] Whorton v. Bockting, 549 U.S. 406, 416 (2007). Put another way, it is not enough that a decision is "within the 'logical compass' of an earlier decision, or indeed that it is 'controlled' by a prior decision." A decision announces a "new rule" if its result "was susceptible to debate among reasonable minds" and if it was not "an illogical or even a grudging application" of the prior decision. Butler v. McKellar, 494 U.S. 407, 412–415 (1990). For additional elaboration on "new law," see O'Dell v. Netherland, 521 U.S. 151 (1997); Lambrix v. Singletary, 520 U.S. 518 (1997); Gray v. Netherland, 518 U.S. 152 (1996). But compare Bousley v. Brooks, 523 U.S. 614 (1998).

[13] Whorton v. Bockting, 549 U.S. 406, 416 (2007).

[14] 489 U.S. at 307, 311–313; see also Butler, 494 U.S. at 415–416.

[15] Welch v. United States, 578 U.S. 120, 132 (2016) (quoting Saffle v. Parks, 494 U.S. 484, 495 (1990); see also Schriro v. Summerlin, 542 U.S. 348, 353 (2004); Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 330 (1989).

[16] Montgomery v. Louisiana, 577 U.S. 190 (2016)

[17] 577 U.S. 190.

[18] Id. at 201.

[19] Sawyer v. Smith, 497 U.S. 227, 242 (1990) (internal quotations and citations omitted).

actually satisfies that purported exception."[20] The Court thus concluded, "New procedural rules do not apply retroactively on federal collateral review. The watershed exception is moribund."[21]

ArtIII.S1.7.3.3 Retroactivity of Civil Decisions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

As in criminal cases,[1] a civil case announcing a new legal rule might in theory apply retroactively in all instances, might apply purely prospectively, or might apply with "selective prospectivity" such that the prevailing party in the case obtains the retroactive benefit of a new rule but no one else does. In some civil cases, the Court has declined to apply new rules retroactively, sometimes even with respect to the prevailing party in the case.[2] In Chevron Oil Co. v. Huson, the Court held that the question of retroactivity was to be determined by balancing the equities, considering whether a decision announced a new principle of law, whether retroactive application would advance or hinder the purpose of the rule in question, and whether retroactive application would cause injustice or hardship that could be avoided through purely prospective application.[3]

In two cases from the 1990s, the Court revealed itself to be deeply divided on whether judicial decisions should, or must, apply retroactively. First, in American Trucking Assn's, Inc. v. Smith, the Court considered whether to give retroactive effect to a prior case holding unconstitutional the state's application of a highway tax.[4] The Court held that the decision did not apply retroactively. A four-Justice plurality applied the Chevron Oil test to reach that conclusion. Justice Antonin Scalia concurred in the judgment but disagreed with the plurality's reasoning.[5] The following year, in James B. Beam Distilling Co. v. Georgia, the Court considered whether a company could claim a tax refund under an earlier ruling holding unconstitutional the imposition of certain taxes upon its products.[6] A fractured Court held that the company could seek a refund.[7] [20] 141 S.Ct. 1547, 1557, 1555 (2021). See also id. at 1557 ("The Court has identified only one pre-Teague procedural rule as watershed: the right to counsel recognized in the Court's landmark decision in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 344–345 (1963).").

---

[21] Id. at 1560.

[1] For discussion of criminal cases, see ArtIII.S1.7.3.2 Retroactivity of Criminal Decisions.

[2] E.g., Cipriano v. City of Houma, 395 U.S. 701 (1969); Allen v. State Board of Elections, 393 U.S. 544 (1969); but see Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481 (1968).

[3] 404 U.S. 97 (1971).

[4] 496 U.S. 167 (1990).

[5] Id. at 200. Four dissenting Justices would have applied the prior case "only where, under state law, the time for challenging the tax has not expired," or in timely-filed challenges to the tax where "the decisions are not yet final." Id. at 224–25.

[6] 501 U.S. 529 (1991).

[7] Two Justices objected to the possibility of "selective prospectivity" noting that, in the earlier decision, the Court had applied the holding to the contesting company, and concluding that once a new rule has been applied retroactively to the litigants in a civil case, considerations of equality and stare decisis compel application to all. Id. at 532–44. Justice Byron White wrote separately to emphasize that it was permissible for the Court to apply its decisions purely prospectively. Id. at 544–47. By contrast, three concurring Justices argued that limiting the retroactive application of

In the 1993 case Harper v. Virginia Dep't of Taxation, a bare majority of the Court departed from the Chevron Oil balancing test and announced a new rule to determine the retroactive effect of civil cases.[8] The Court held: "When this Court applies a rule of federal law to the parties before it, that rule is the controlling interpretation of federal law and must be given full retroactive effect in all cases open on direct review and as to all events, regardless of whether such events predate or postdate our announcement of the rule."[9]

ArtIII.S1.8 Congressional Power to Establish Article III Courts

ArtIII.S1.8.1 Overview of Establishment of Article III Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Constitution established one federal court: the U.S. Supreme Court.[1] In lieu of mandating the creation other adjudicative bodies through the nation's founding document, the Framers vested the federal judicial power in the Supreme Court and "such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish,"[2] and authorized Congress, in its discretion, to "constitute Tribunals inferior to the [S]upreme Court."[3] In the years following the ratification of the Constitution, Congress has regularly exercised its power to create different federal tribunals that adjudicate a variety of legal disputes.

As authorized by the Constitution, Congress has established federal district and appellate courts and structured the Supreme Court. Congress has also periodically created courts under Article III to exercise specialized jurisdiction over specific categories of cases.[4] All of these courts, sometimes called "Article III courts" or "constitutional courts," share three key attributes.[5] First, they exercise the "judicial power of the United States" to resolve "cases" and "controversies" falling within the constitutional grant of federal court jurisdiction.[6] Second, judicial decisions, whether through partial or total prospectivity, violates Article III by expanding the jurisdiction of the federal courts beyond true cases and controversies. Id. at 547–49

---

[8] 509 U.S. 86 (1993).

[9] Id. at 97; see also Reynoldsville Casket Co. v. Hyde, 514 U.S. 749 (1995) (setting aside a state court refusal to give retroactive effect to a U.S. Supreme Court invalidation of that state's statute of limitations in certain suits); Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 184–85 (1995).

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[2] Id.

[3] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 9. For additional discussion of the Framers' views on legislative power to establish federal courts, see ArtIII.S1.8.2 Historical Background on Establishment of Article III Courts.

[4] In addition, Congress has created non-Article III tribunals, sometimes called "Article I courts" or "legislative courts," staffed by personnel such as administrative law judges, military judges, and federal magistrates. See ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts.

[5] When determining whether a court is a constitutional court, the Supreme Court has looked at how Congress structures the court and whether the structure of the court adheres to basic requirements of Article III, rather than relying on how Congress labels the court. See Glidden v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530 (1962) (Harlan, J.) (plurality opinion).

[6] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1. The Supreme Court has interpreted the "case or controversy" requirement of Article III to impose certain rules of justiciability, such as a prohibition on advisory opinions, requirements of standing and ripeness, and limitations on the ability of federal courts to decide "political questions." See generally Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 750 (1984); see also ArtIII.S2.C1.2 Historical Background on Cases or Controversies Requirement.

they are staffed by judges who hold their offices "during good Behaviour,"[7] which the Supreme Court has interpreted to guarantee life tenure "subject only to removal by impeachment."[8] Third, Article III judges' compensation cannot be "diminished during their Continuance in Office."[9]

The following essays discuss Congress's power to establish and abolish[10] Article III courts, including the lower courts[11] and courts of special jurisdiction,[12] and Congress's power to structure the Supreme Court.[13] Other essays explore Congress's authority to establish non-Article III courts[14] and Congress's authority to regulate the existing federal courts.[15]

ArtIII.S1.8.2 Historical Background on Establishment of Article III Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Before the Founding, each state had its own system of courts, while the Articles of Confederation did not provide for an independent Federal Judiciary.[1] At the Constitutional Convention, the delegates agreed early on to depart from existing practice and establish an independent federal Judicial Branch including a Supreme Court.[2] The Framers generally accepted that state courts would play a significant role in interpreting and applying federal law.[3] But, in light of concerns about whether state courts would apply federal law correctly,

---

[7] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[8] N. Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 59 (1982) (plurality opinion); United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 16 (1955) (stating that Article III "courts are presided over by judges appointed for life, subject only to removal by impeachment"); see also ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[9] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; see also ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause.

[10] See ArtIII.S1.8.5 Congressional Power to Abolish Federal Courts.

[11] See ArtIII.S1.8.4 Establishment of Inferior Federal Courts.

[12] See ArtIII.S1.8.6 Courts of Specialized Jurisdiction and Congress.

[13] See ArtIII.S1.8.3 Supreme Court and Congress.

[14] See ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts.

[15] See ArtIII.S1.5.1 Overview of Congressional Control Over Judicial Power; ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[1] Article IX of the Articles of Confederation authorized Congress to "appoint[ ] courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; and establish[ ] courts; for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures." The same Article further provided that Congress would be "the last resort on appeal, in all disputes and differences now subsisting, or that hereafter may arise between two or more states" and could appoint commissioners or judges to constitute a court to resolve such disputes.

[2] See, e.g., Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 79 (1913) ("That there should be a national judiciary was readily accepted by all.").

[3] See, e.g., 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 243 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter, Convention Records]. For example, the Convention considered proposals that would require federal questions to be decided first in state court, but with a right of appeal to federal courts. See id. at 243, 424. Likewise, during the debate over ratification, Alexander Hamilton wrote that "the State courts will RETAIN the jurisdiction they now have, unless it appears to be taken away in one of the enumerated modes. . . . [Thus,] the State courts would have a concurrent jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws of the Union, where it was not expressly prohibited." The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton). For additional discussion of the relationship between federal and state courts, see ArtIII.S1.6.1 Overview of Relationship Between Federal and State Courts.

uniformly, and without bias,[4] the Framers provided for a federal Supreme Court with the power to review state judicial decisions involving issues of federal statutory or constitutional law.[5]

However, the Framers debated whether the Constitution should also provide for the existence of lower federal courts.[6] James Madison's proposal for the new government, known as the Virginia Plan, provided for a "National Judiciary [to] be established to consist of one or more supreme tribunals, and of inferior tribunals to be chosen by the National Legislature."[7] In the Committee of the Whole, the proposal to establish a national Judiciary was adopted unanimously.[8] A clause providing that the Judicial Branch would "consist of One supreme tribunal, and of one or more inferior tribunals" was initially agreed to, but later reconsidered.[9] Critics of the provision argued that state courts could adequately adjudicate all necessary matters in the first instance, while appellate review the supreme tribunal would protect national interests and assure uniformity, and the provision for inferior tribunals was ultimately stricken out.[10]

Madison and James Wilson then moved to authorize Congress to "appoint inferior tribunals."[11] That proposal, sometimes called the Madisonian Compromise,[12] carried the implication that Congress could, in its discretion, either designate the state courts to hear federal cases or create federal courts.[13] Over the course of the Convention, the phrasing of the provision evolved into its present form, which vests federal judicial power in the "one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and [4] Madison expressed concern at the Convention about "improper Verdicts in State tribunals obtained under the biassed directions of a dependent Judge," and "disliked the election of the Judges by the Legislature or any numerous body" due to "the danger of intrigue and partiality" and the fact that legislators lacked the "requisite qualifications" to select suitable judges. 1 Convention Records, supra note 3, at 120, 124. See also The Federalist No. 81 (Alexander Hamilton) ("State judges, holding their offices during pleasure, or from year to year, will be too little independent to be relied upon for an inflexible execution of the national laws."); 1 Convention Records, supra note 3, at 124 (statement of Madison expressing concern about "the local prejudices of an undirected jury"); The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton) ("[T]he most discerning cannot foresee how far the prevalency of a local spirit may be found to disqualify the local tribunals for the jurisdiction of national causes."); id. ("The mere necessity of uniformity in the interpretation of the national laws, decides the question. Thirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government, from which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed.").

[5] U.S. Const. art. III; 1 Stat. 73, 85; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816). Cf. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 295–96 (1921) ("I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as the laws of the several States.").

[6] For additional discussion of the Convention's consideration of the judiciary, see 1 Julius Goebel, Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801, History of the Supreme Court of the United States (1971).

[7] 1 Convention Records, supra note 3, at 21–22. It is possible that this version may not be an accurate copy. See 3 Convention Records*id.* at 593–94.

[8] 1 Convention Records, supra note 3, at 95, 104.

[9] Id. at 95, 105. The words "one or more" were deleted the following day without recorded debate. Id. at 116, 119.

[10] Id. at 124–25.

[11] Id. at 125.

[12] See Richard H. Fallon, Jr. et al, Hart & Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 8 (7th ed. 2015).

[13] On offering their motion, Wilson and Madison "observed that there was a distinction between establishing such tribunals absolutely, and giving a discretion to the Legislature to establish or not establish them." 1 Convention Records, supra note 3, at 125.

establish."[14] Beyond that provision, the Constitution imposes few specific requirements related to the organization of the federal Judiciary.[15]

The first Congress exercised its discretion to create lower federal courts promptly in the Judiciary Act of 1789, the first legislation related to the Federal Judiciary.[16] Since that time, the Federal Judiciary has always consisted of one Supreme Court and multiple inferior federal courts, though Congress has periodically enacted legislation to change the size of the Supreme Court and the size and structure of the lower courts.[17]

ArtIII.S1.8.3 Supreme Court and Congress

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Constitution provides for a Judicial Branch including "one supreme Court."[1] It also appears to assume that the Supreme Court will include a Chief Justice, stipulating that "the Chief Justice shall preside" over any Presidential impeachment trial in the Senate.[2] However, the Constitution is silent on other matters such as the size and composition of the Supreme Court, the time and place for sitting, and the Court's internal organization, leaving those questions to Congress.

Congress first enacted legislation to structure the Supreme Court in the Judiciary Act of 1789.[3] Under the 1789 act, the Court comprised one Chief Justice and five Associate Justices.[4] Congress enacted legislation to change the size of the Court multiple times during the nineteenth century. In 1801, Congress reduced the size of the Court to five Justices. The 1801

---

[14] The Committee on Detail provided for the vesting of judicial power in one Supreme Court "and in such inferior Courts as shall, when necessary, from time to time, be constituted by the legislature of the United States." 2 id. at 186. Its draft also authorized Congress "[t]o constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Id. at 182. No debate is recorded when the Convention approved these two clauses. Id. at 315, 422–23, 428–30. The Committee of Style left the clause empowering Congress to "constitute" inferior tribunals, but it deleted "as shall, when necessary" from the Judiciary article, so that the judicial power was vested "in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time"—and here deleted "constitute" and substituted "ordain and establish." Id. at 600.

[15] Article I appears to assume the existence of a Chief Justice of the United States, providing that "[w]hen the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside." U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 6. Other provisions govern federal judges' tenure and compensation and set the bounds of federal court jurisdiction. See ArtIII.S1.5.1 Overview of Congressional Control Over Judicial Power; ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction. However, the Constitution does not specify the size of the Supreme Court or the number or size of the lower courts.

[16] 1 Stat. 73.

[17] See, e.g., Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20, § 1, 1 Stat. 73; Judiciary Act of 1801, ch. 4, § 3, 2 Stat. 89; Act of Mar. 8, 1802, ch. 8, § 1, 2 Stat. 132; Act of Feb. 24, 1807, ch. 16, § 5, 2 Stat. 420; Act of Mar. 3, 1837, ch. 34, § 1, 5 Stat. 176; Circuit Judges Act of 1869, ch. 22, 16 Stat. 44; Act of March 3, 1891, ch. 517, 26 Stat. 826. See also ArtIII.S1.8.3 Supreme Court and Congress; ArtIII.S1.8.4 Establishment of Inferior Federal Courts; ArtIII.S1.8.5 Congressional Power to Abolish Federal Courts.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[2] U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 6.

[3] Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. 73. For additional discussion of the Act and its working and amendments, see Frankfurter & Landis, The Business of the Supreme Court (1928); Charles Warren, New Light on the History of the Federal Judicial Act of 1789, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 49 (1923); see also Julius Goebel, Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801, History of the Supreme Court of the United States (1971).

[4] Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. 73, § 1.

statute did not eliminate an occupied seat on the Court; instead, it provided that the change would take effect "after the next vacancy."[5] Congress repealed the 1801 law before any vacancy occurred, leaving the size of the Court at six Justices.[6]

In the early years of the Republic, Supreme Court Justices were required to "ride circuit," spending part of their time hearing Supreme Court cases in the capital and part of each year traveling to hear cases in the lower federal circuit courts.[7] For a time during the 1800s, the number of Supreme Court Justices tracked the number of judicial circuits, facilitating the division of circuit-riding duties.[8] At its largest, during the Civil War, the Court had ten Justices, with the addition of the tenth seat on the Court coinciding with the establishment of the Tenth Circuit.[9] In 1866, Congress reduced the size of the Court to seven Justices, a change widely viewed as one of the Reconstruction Congress's restrictions on President Andrew Johnson.[10] In 1869, under a new presidential administration, Congress expanded the Court to include nine Justices.[11] The 1869 legislation was the last time Congress changed the size of the Supreme Court.

A notable unsuccessful attempt to enlarge the Court occurred in 1937, when President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's Administration proposed court expansion legislation that many regarded as an effort to make the Court more favorable to President Roosevelt's New Deal policies.[12] Congress declined to act on the proposal, with the Senate Judiciary Committee expressing concerns that it impermissibly infringed on the principle of judicial independence enshrined in Article III of the Constitution.[13] Proposals related to Supreme Court expansion also emerged following the death of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg and the confirmation of Justice Amy Coney Barrett in the weeks leading up to the 2020 presidential election.[14] While no provision of the Constitution expressly prohibits legislative changes to the size of the Supreme Court, and Congress has changed the size of the Court multiple times in the past, some commentators debated whether the proposals were inconsistent with constitutional norms. The proposals were not enacted, and the Supreme Court has had no occasion to consider their constitutionality.

Proposals have been made at various times to organize the Court into sections or divisions. No authoritative judicial analysis of those proposals is available, but Chief Justice Charles

---

[5] Judiciary Act of 1801, ch. 4, § 3, 2 Stat. 89, 89.

[6] Act of Mar. 8, 1802, ch. 8, § 1, 2 Stat. 132.

[7] The Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to circuit riding in Stuart v. Laird, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 299 (1803). A party challenging the practice argued that Supreme Court justices "have no right to sit as circuit judges, not being appointed as such, or in other words, that they ought to have distinct commissions for that purpose." The Court noted that the objection was "of recent date," and could not overcome "practice and acquiescence . . . for a period of several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system," which yielded an "irresistible answer" that circuit riding was constitutional. Id. at 309.

[8] See, e.g., Act of Feb. 24, 1807, ch. 16, § 5, 2 Stat. 420 (creating the Seventh Circuit and adding a seventh seat to the Supreme Court); Act of Mar. 3, 1837, ch. 34, § 1, 5 Stat. 176 (creating the Eighth and Ninth Circuits and increasing the size of the Supreme Court to nine Justices).

[9] Act of Mar. 3, 1863, ch. 100, 12 Stat. 794.

[10] Act of July 23, 1866, ch. 210, 14 Stat. 209. Like the 1801 legislation, the 1866 law provided that the Court would decrease in size as vacancies arose rather than eliminating any occupied seats on the bench. The number of Justices did not fall below eight before the end of Johnson's term. The 1866 legislation decoupled the number of judicial circuits from the number of Supreme Court Justices, and since that time there have usually been fewer seats on the Court than judicial circuits.

[11] Act of April 10, 1869, ch. 22, 16 Stat. 44.

[12] Judicial Procedures Reform Bill of 1937, S. 1392 (75th Cong. 1937).

[13] Reorganization of the Federal Judiciary, S. Rep. No. 75–711, at 20–23 (1937). The Roosevelt Administration eventually abandoned the plan after the Supreme Court began to vote to uphold New Deal legislation. See West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937).

[14] See, e.g., Judiciary Act of 2021, S. 1141, H.R. 2584 (117th Cong. 2021).

Evans Hughes, in a letter to Senator Burton Wheeler in 1937, expressed doubts concerning the validity of such a device and stated that "the Constitution does not appear to authorize two or more Supreme Courts functioning in effect as separate courts."[15] Other proposals would alter the size of the Court while also changing the Court's structure or composition, for example by seeking to impose partisan balance on the Court.[16] As with the foregoing proposals, the Supreme Court has not considered the constitutionality of these proposals.

In addition to setting the size of the Supreme Court, Congress also determines the time and place of the Court's sessions. Congress once exercised that power to change the Court's term to forestall a constitutional attack on the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801, with the result that the Court did not convene for fourteen months.[17] Congress also has significant authority to determine what cases the Court has jurisdiction to hear. The Constitution grants the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over the relatively narrow categories of "Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party,"[18] and the Court has held that its jurisdiction over such cases flows directly from the Constitution.[19] In "all the other Cases" subject to federal jurisdiction, Article III grants the Court "appellate Jurisdiction . . . with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."[20] Supreme Court decisions establish that the Exceptions Clause grants Congress broad power to regulate the Court's appellate jurisdiction.[21]

ArtIII.S1.8.4 Establishment of Inferior Federal Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

By vesting judicial power in "such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," the Framers allowed Congress to decide whether to establish lower federal courts.[1] Because Congress has the authority to decide whether the lower federal courts should exist, the legislature is also understood to enjoy broad power to structure the lower courts, make procedural rules for them, and regulate their jurisdiction.[2]

From the beginning, Congress has answered the question of whether there should be inferior federal courts in the affirmative. The first Congress exercised its discretion to create

---

[15] Reorganization of the Judiciary: Hearings on S. 1392 Before the Senate Judiciary Committee, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. (1937), pt. 3, 491. For earlier proposals to have the Court sit in divisions, see Frankfurter & Landis, supra note 3, at 74–85.

[16] See Eric J. Segall, Eight Justices Are Enough: A Proposal To Improve The United States Supreme Court, 45 Pepp. L. Rev. 547 (2018); Ganesh Sitaraman and Daniel Epps, How to Save the Supreme Court, 129 Yale L. J. 148 (2019).

[17] 1 Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 222–224 (rev. ed. 1926).

[18] U.S. Const. art III, § 2, cl. 2.

[19] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[20] U.S. Const. art III, § 2, cl. 2.

[21] See ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; see also U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 9 (authorizing Congress, in its discretion, to "constitute Tribunals inferior to the [S]upreme Court."); 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 125 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (observation of James Wilson and James Madison "that there was a distinction between establishing such [inferior] tribunals absolutely, and giving a discretion to the Legislature to establish or not establish them").

[2] See, e.g., ArtIII.S1.4.2 Inherent Powers Over Judicial Procedure; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

lower federal courts in the Judiciary Act of 1789, the first legislation related to the Federal Judiciary.[3] The 1789 Act created thirteen judicial districts, each of which had one district judge.[4] Single judge, trial-level district courts were to hold four sessions per year in each district. The Act further divided the country into three judicial circuits. It established "circuit courts," which were three-judge panels comprised of one district judge and two Supreme Court Justices. One noteworthy feature of the new Judiciary was that Supreme Court Justices were required to "ride circuit" and travel to the districts within their assigned circuits to hear cases—a burdensome requirement, given the transportation technology of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, particularly for Justices who were old or unhealthy or were assigned to outlying circuits.[5]

As the Nation grew, the Federal Judiciary also expanded, with each new state receiving a judicial district.[6] Congress reorganized the Federal Judiciary into six judicial circuits in 1801,[7] and thereafter periodically added new circuits to encompass new states.[8] In 1869, Congress enacted legislation creating circuit court judgeships.[9] The new circuit court judges presided over cases within their circuits, limiting the need for Supreme Court Justices to ride circuit. Then, in 1891, Congress created intermediate appellate courts, known as the United States Courts of Appeals, abolishing the circuit courts and removing any requirement the Supreme Court Justices ride circuit.[10] Since then, the federal judicial system has consisted of trial-level district courts with original jurisdiction over most federal cases, intermediate appellate courts, and the Supreme Court.

ArtIII.S1.8.5 Congressional Power to Abolish Federal Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Constitution provides that the judicial power shall be vested, at least in part, in "one supreme Court."[1] Thus, although Congress possesses substantial authority to structure the Supreme Court,[2] Congress cannot abolish the high court.

With respect to the lower federal courts, the constitutional authorization for Congress to "from time to time ordain and establish" inferior courts may imply that Congress can alter the

[3] 1 Stat. 73.

[4] The thirteen districts included one for each state that had ratified the Constitution at the time the Judiciary Act of 1789 was enacted, plus districts for Maine and Kentucky, which were then parts of Massachusetts and Virginia, respectively. Id.

[5] See, e.g., Joshua Glick, Comment, On the Road: The Supreme Court and the History of Circuit Riding, 24 Cardozo L. Rev. 1753 (2003).

[6] Some states were eventually divided into multiple judicial districts, and some districts were given more than one district judge. See, e.g., 6 Cong. Ch. 4 (Feb. 13, 1801); 12 Cong. Ch. 71 (Apr. 29, 1812).

[7] Judiciary Act of 1801, ch. 4, § 3, 2 Stat. 89. The Judiciary Act of 1801 was repealed in 1802, Act of Mar. 8, 1802, ch. 8, § 1, 2 Stat. 132, and soon thereafter Congress reorganized the judiciary into six different circuits, Act of Apr. 29, 1802, ch. 31, §§ 4, 5, 2 Stat. 156, 157–58.

[8] See, e.g., Act of Feb. 24, 1807, ch. 16, § 5, 2 Stat. 420; Act of Mar. 3, 1837, ch. 34, § 1, 5 Stat. 176.

[9] Circuit Judges Act of 1869, ch. 22, 16 Stat. 44.

[10] Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 826.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[2] See ArtIII.S1.8.3 Supreme Court and Congress.

system it establishes, including by eliminating exiting federal courts.[3] Moreover, having left to Congress the decision whether to establish lower federal courts,[4] it would be anomalous for the Constitution to provide that, once a court was established, Congress could never eliminate it. Historical practice suggests that Congress may abolish lower federal courts, though the Constitution may limit its ability to unseat current federal judges in doing so.

The Constitution provides that federal judges "shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour" and shall not have their compensation decreased while in office.[5] The Supreme Court has interpreted the Good Behavior Clause to grant Article III judges life tenure, unless they resign voluntarily or are impeached.[6] Thus, if Congress elects to eliminate an existing Article III court, it may raise the question of what should happen to the judges on that court.[7]

The first instance of Congress eliminating lower federal courts did not provide a clear answer to that question. The Judiciary Act of February 13, 1801, passed in the closing weeks of John Adams's presidency, made major structural changes to the federal courts.[8] Among other things, the act reorganized the existing three judicial circuits into six circuits and established six circuit courts consisting of three circuit judges each. President Adams appointed judges to many of the newly created seats, and those so-called "Midnight Judges" were confirmed by the Senate. However, in 1802, following a change in control of both the Executive and Legislative Branches, Congress repealed the Judiciary Act of 1801.[9] No provision was made for the displaced judges, apparently under the theory that if there were no courts there could be no judges to sit on them.[10]

Congress enacted legislation to change the Court's term to forestall a constitutional attack on the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801, with the result that the Court did not convene for fourteen months.[11] Once the Court reconvened, it rejected a challenge to the repeal in the 1803 case Stuart v. Laird.[12] That case involved a judgment of the U.S. court for the fourth circuit in the eastern district of Virginia, which was created by the 1801 Act and then abolished by the 1802 Act. A challenger argued that the judgment was void because the court that had issued it no longer existed. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that Congress has "constitutional authority to establish from time to time such inferior tribunals as they may think proper; and to transfer a cause from one such tribunal to another," and that the present case involved "nothing more than the removal of the suit" from the defunct court to a new one.[13] The Stuart Court did not directly address the issue of the displaced judges.[14]

---

[3] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[4] See ArtIII.S1.8.2 Historical Background on Establishment of Article III Courts.

[5] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[6] For additional discussion of the Good Behavior Clause, see ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[7] In contrast to Article III judges, judges on Article I courts do not enjoy constitutionally mandated life tenure, so the elimination an Article I court does not raise this issue. See ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts.

[8] Judiciary Act of 1801, ch. 4, § 3, 2 Stat. 89.

[9] Act of Mar. 8, 1802, ch. 8, § 1, 2 Stat. 132.

[10] This was the theory of John Taylor of Caroline, upon whom the Jeffersonians in Congress relied. W. Carpenter, Judicial Tenure in the United States 63–64 (1918). For full discussion of the controversy, see id. at 58–78.

[11] 1 Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 222–224 (rev. ed. 1926).

[12] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 299 (1803).

[13] Id. at 309.

[14] Chief Justice John Marshall recused himself from the case and later expressed skepticism about the decision, noting ironically in one letter "the memorable distinction as to tenure of office, between removing the Judge from the office, and removing the office from the Judge." Letter from Chief Justice Marshall to Henry Clay (Dec. 22, 1823), reprinted in Ruth Wedgwood, Cousin Humphrey, 14 Const. Comment 247, 267–69 (1997). For another early example of

On subsequent occasions when Congress eliminated Article III courts, the legislation provided for judges from the abolished courts to continue to serve on other Article III courts. In 1891, Congress enacted legislation creating new intermediate appellate courts and eliminating the then-existing federal circuit courts.[15] The 1891 Act authorized sitting circuit judges, who had previously heard cases on the circuit courts, to hear cases on the new appellate courts.[16] Congress again exercised its power to abolish a federal court in 1913, eliminating the short-lived Commerce Court.[17] The 1913 legislation provided for redistribution of the Commerce Court judges among the federal appeals courts.[18] In 1982, Congress enacted legislation abolishing the Article III Court of Claims and U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, instead establishing the Article I Court of Federal Claims and the Article III U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.[19] The statute provided for judges from the eliminated courts to serve instead on the Federal Circuit.[20]

ArtIII.S1.8.6 Courts of Specialized Jurisdiction and Congress

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Pursuant to its power to "ordain and establish" inferior federal courts, Congress has periodically created courts under Article III to exercise specialized jurisdiction over limited categories of cases. Those tribunals are like other Article III courts in that they exercise "the judicial power of the United States," and only that power.[1] In addition, judges on such courts must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, must hold office during good behavior subject to removal only by impeachment, and may not have their compensation diminished during their continuance in office.[2] While judges on specialized courts must enjoy life tenure on the federal bench during good behavior, like all Article III judges, judges holding lifetime appointments to the U.S. district courts or courts of appeals may serve for limited terms on courts of specialized jurisdiction.[3]

Several Article III courts of specialized jurisdiction are no longer in operation, either because they were established for a limited time or because they were deemed not to have legislation abolishing federal courts, see Act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. 762 (eliminating the then-existing circuit court, district court, and criminal court of the District of Columbia without providing for continued service by the sitting judges).

---

[15] Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 826.

[16] Id. § 3.

[17] The Court was created by the Act of June 18, 1910, 36 Stat. 539, and repealed by the Act of October 22, 1913, 38 Stat. 208, 219.

[18] 38 Stat. 208, 219.

[19] See Federal Courts Improvement Act of 1982, Pub. L. No. 97–164, Section 105(a), §§171–77, 96 Stat. 25, 27–28; see also 28 U.S.C. § 171(a) ("The court [of Federal Claims] is declared to be a court established under article I of the Constitution of the United States.").

[20] 96 Stat. 50.

[1] U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1

[2] Id.; see also ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause.

[3] See, e.g., Pub. L. No. 95–511, 92 Stat. 1788, 50 U.S.C. § 1803 (allowing for designation of district court judges to serve nonrenewable seven-year terms on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court); 8 U.S.C. §1532(a) (allowing for designation of district court judges to serve five-year terms on the U.S. Alien Terrorist Removal Court).

fulfilled their purposes. An example of the latter was the Commerce Court created by the Mann-Elkins Act of 1910,[4] which was given exclusive jurisdiction to enforce certain orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission.[5] Another court of specialized jurisdiction was the Emergency Court of Appeals established by the Emergency Price Control Act of January 30, 1942.[6] The Emergency Court of Appeals was established during World War II and was designed to operate temporarily to adjudicate matters related to wage and price controls. Composed of selected sitting judges of the United States district courts and circuit courts of appeal, the court was vested with the powers of a district court and granted "exclusive jurisdiction to set aside such regulation, order, or price schedule, in whole or in part, to dismiss the complaint, or to remand the proceeding."[7] Congress created another specialized court through the Ethics in Government Act.[8] That court, a "Special Division" of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, was charged with appointing an independent counsel to investigate and prosecute charges of illegality in the Executive Branch, upon the request of the Attorney General. It also had certain supervisory powers over the independent counsel.[9]

Perhaps the most prominent modern example of a specialized Article III court is the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, established in 1982.[10] In many respects, the Federal Circuit resembles the geographic circuit courts of appeals; however, rather than hearing appeals from district courts in a certain area of the country, it has exclusive jurisdiction to hear appeals from the United States Court of Federal Claims, the Federal Merit System Protection Board, the Court of International Trade, the Patent Office in patent and trademark cases, and in various contract and tort cases. One of those bodies, the Court of International Trade, is also an Article III specialty court.[11] The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, staffed by federal judges from other courts, is another Article III court of specialized jurisdiction authorized to transfer related civil actions pending in different judicial districts to a single district for trial.[12]

To facilitate the gathering of foreign intelligence information through electronic surveillance, search and seizure and other means, Congress authorized a specialized court in [4] Ch. 309, 36 Stat. 539.

[5] The Commerce Court operated for less than three years before Congress abolished it in 1913. See ArtIII.S1.8.5 Congressional Power to Abolish Federal Courts.

[6] 56 Stat. 23, §§ 31–33.

[7] 56 Stat. 31. The Supreme Court upheld the exclusive grant of jurisdiction to the court in Lockerty v. Philips, 319 U.S. 182 (1943). A similar court was created to be used in the enforcement of the economic controls imposed by President Richard Nixon in 1971. Pub. L. No. 92–210, 85 Stat. 743, 211(b). Although the controls ended in 1974, 12 U.S.C. § 1904 note, Congress continued the Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals and gave it new jurisdiction. Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973, Pub. L. No. 93–159, 87 Stat. 633, 15 U.S.C. § 754 (incorporating judicial review provisions of the Economic Stabilization Act). The Court was abolished, effective March 29, 1993, by Pub. L. No. 102–572, 106 Stat. 4506. Another similar specialized court was created by Section 209 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act, Pub. L. No. 93–226, 87 Stat. 999, 45 U.S.C. § 719, to review the final system plan under the Act. Regional Rail Reorganization Act Cases (Blanchette v. Connecticut Gen. Ins. Corp.), 419 U.S. 102 (1974).

[8] Ethics in Government Act, Title VI, Pub. L. No. 95–521, 92 Stat. 1867 (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. §§ 591–599). The Chief Justice designated three regular federal judges to comprise the court. Only one of the judges could be from the D.C. Circuit. 28 U.S.C. § 49.

[9] The constitutionality of the Special Division was upheld in Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 670–85 (1988). Authority for the court expired in 1999 under a sunset provision. Pub. L. No. 103–270, § 2, 108 Stat. 732 (1994).

[10] Federal Courts Improvement Act of 1982, Pub. L. No. 97–164, 96 Stat. 37, 28 U.S.C. § 1295. Among other things, the Federal Circuit assumed the appellate jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. See ArtIII.S1.8.5 Congressional Power to Abolish Federal Courts.

[11] The Court of International Trade began life as the Board of General Appraisers, became the United States Customs Court in 1926, was declared an Article III court in 1956, and came to its present form and name in 1980. Pub. L. No. 96–417, 94 Stat. 1727.

[12] 28 U.S.C. § 1407.

the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978.[13] Known as the FISA Court, this tribunal is composed of seven regular federal judges appointed by the Chief Justice for limited terms and receives applications from the United States and to issue warrants for intelligence activities. Another specialized court, the Alien Terrorist Removal Court, was established to review ex parte applications from the Department of Justice to order removal of certain aliens from the United States based on classified information.[14]

ArtIII.S1.9 Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts

ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Article III of the Constitution provides that "the judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."[1] A literal interpretation of that language might require that every case that falls within the "judicial Power of the United States" must be adjudicated, if at all, in Article III courts staffed by judges with constitutional protections.[2] Notwithstanding the foregoing text, however, Congress has assigned the authority to adjudicate a large swath of cases that would seemingly fall within the federal judicial power to non-Article III tribunals—forums with judicial officers who do not enjoy Article III protections. Those tribunals are often called "Article I courts" or "legislative courts," because they are created by Congress pursuant to its general legislative powers. They include specialized stand-alone courts, administrative agencies, and magistrate judges who serve under Article III judges.

Congress has periodically created Article I courts since the early years of the Republic.[3] Over the years, the Supreme Court has recognized certain limits on which matters may be heard by Article I courts instead of Article III courts. The case law in this area can be difficult to parse,[4] but generally identifies four key circumstances in which Congress may authorize [13] Pub. L. No. 95–511, 92 Stat. 1788, 50 U.S.C. § 1803. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 also established an appellate court called the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review, which reviews certain FISA Court orders. See id. § 1803(b).

[14] 8 U.S.C. §1532(a). The U.S. Alien Terrorist Removal Court has yet to conduct any proceedings.

[1] U.S. CONST. art III, § 1.

[2] Article III judges hold their jobs during good behavior, a provision that has been interpreted to grant judges life tenure unless they resign voluntarily or are impeached. See ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause. Article III judges also may not have their compensation reduced while on the bench. See ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause. In addition, Article III judges must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. See ArtII.S2.C2.3.5 Appointments of Justices to the Supreme Court. For discussion of Congress's authority to establish Article III courts, see ArtIII.S1.8.1 Overview of Establishment of Article III Courts.

[3] See, e.g., Act of September 29, 1789, ch. 24, 1 Stat. 95 (authorizing the executive branch to resolve disputes concerning military pensions); Act of September 1, 1789, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 55 (same for federal customs laws); American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 511 (1828) (upholding grant of admiralty jurisdiction to Florida territorial court).

[4] See, e.g., Northern Pipeline Const. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 91 (1982) (Rehnquist, J., concurring) (suggesting that another member of the panel believed the Court's cases on Article I courts to be "landmarks on a judicial 'darkling plain' where ignorant armies have clashed by night").

non-Article III courts to hear cases: (1) District of Columbia and territorial courts,[5] (2) military courts,[6] (3) courts hearing cases involving "public rights," which often arise between the government and private parties,[7] and (4) adjuncts to Article III courts.[8] Additionally, in some instances, non-Article III courts can hear certain matters based on the consent of the litigants.[9] The following essays first discuss Congress's authority to structure non-Article III courts and the Supreme Court's power to review such courts' decisions.[10] They then survey Supreme Court case law considering the different types of cases that may proceed in Article I courts.

ArtIII.S1.9.2 Congressional Power to Structure Legislative Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The issue of what matters Congress can entrust to Article I courts may raise important constitutional questions. The Supreme Court first distinguished between constitutional courts and legislative courts in its 1828 decision in American Ins. Co. v. Canter.[1] Justice Byron White later read Canter as raising the "simple" proposition that "[c]onstitutional courts exercise the judicial power described in Art. III of the Constitution; legislative courts do not and cannot."[2] A two-fold difficulty attended that proposition, however. First, the territorial court in Canter had issued a decision in admiralty, a subject specifically included within the grant of federal judicial power in Article III, raising the question of how a non-Article III court could receive and exercise that power.[3] Second, if territorial courts could not exercise Article III power, how could their decisions be subject to appellate review in the Supreme Court, or in any Article III court, which could exercise only Article III judicial power? Subsequent Supreme Court cases have clarified that Congress may in some cases allow non-Article III tribunals to hear matters that would fall within the scope of the federal judicial power, subject to appellate review by Article III courts.[4]

While Article I courts' jurisdiction may raise vexing legal questions, in other ways Congress enjoys ample authority to structure those courts. First, in creating legislative courts,

---

[5] See ArtIII.S1.9.4 District of Columbia and Territorial Courts.

[6] See ArtIII.S1.9.5 Non-Article III Military Courts.

[7] See ArtIII.S1.9.6 Legislative Courts Adjudicating Public Rights.

[8] See ArtIII.S1.9.7 Article I Adjuncts to Article III Courts.

[9] See ArtIII.S1.9.9 Consent to Article I Court Jurisdiction.

[10] See ArtIII.S1.9.2 Congressional Power to Structure Legislative Courts.

[1] 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 511 (1828).

[2] Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 106 (1982) (White, J., dissenting).

[3] U.S. Const. art III, § 2.

[4] Years after Canter, in Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, Justice John Harlan asserted that Chief Justice John Marshall in Canter "did not mean to imply that the case heard by the Key West court was not one of admiralty jurisdiction otherwise properly justiciable in a Federal District Court sitting in one of the States. . . . All the Chief Justice meant . . . is that in the territories cases and controversies falling within the enumeration of Article III may be heard and decided in courts constituted without regard to the limitations of that article." 370 U.S. 530, 544–45 (1962). For further discussion of when Congress can confer certain matters on Article I courts, see ArtIII.S1.9.4 District of Columbia and Territorial Courts; ArtIII.S1.9.5 Non-Article III Military Courts; ArtIII.S1.9.6 Legislative Courts Adjudicating Public Rights; ArtIII.S1.9.7 Article I Adjuncts to Article III Courts; ArtIII.S1.9.8 Bankruptcy Courts as Adjuncts to Article III Courts; ArtIII.S1.9.9 Consent to Article I Court Jurisdiction.

Congress is not limited by the provisions of Article III requiring that federal judges hold their offices during good behavior and prohibiting Congress from reducing their compensation.[5] Congress may limit tenure on an Article I tribunal to a term of years, as it has done in acts creating magistrate judgeships and the Tax Court.[6] It may also subject the judges of legislative courts to removal by the President[7] or reduce judges' salaries during their terms.[8]

In addition, Congress can vest in Article I courts nonjudicial functions of a legislative or advisory nature, meaning those courts may make rules or issue non-binding decisions.[9] And, while Congress cannot disturb final judgment of Article III courts, it can deprive legislative court judgments of finality.[10] Thus, in Gordon v. United States, the Court did not object to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury and Congress to revise or suspend the early judgments of the Court of Claims.[11] Likewise, in United States v. Ferreira, the Court sustained an act conferring on the Florida territorial court the non-judicial power to examine claims arising under the treaty with Spain and report its findings to the Secretary of the Treasury for subsequent action.[12]

ArtIII.S1.9.3 Supreme Court Review of Legislative Court Decisions

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

In American Ins. Co. v. Canter, the Supreme Court suggested that constitutional courts exercise the judicial power described in Article III of the Constitution, while legislative courts do not and cannot.[1] That proposition might be understood to mean that the judgments of legislative courts could never be reviewed by the Supreme Court or another Article III court.[2] However, the Court tacitly rejected that view in De Groot v. United States, taking jurisdiction to review a final judgment of the Court of Claims.[3]

---

[5] See U.S. Const. art III, § 1; ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause; ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause.

[6] 28 U.S.C. § 631(e) ("The appointment of any individual as a full-time magistrate judge shall be for a term of eight years, and the appointment of any individuals as a part-time magistrate judge shall be for a term of four years[.]"); 26 U.S.C. § 7443 ("The term of office of any judge of the Tax Court shall expire 15 years after he takes office.").

[7] McAllister v. United States, 141 U.S. 174 (1891).

[8] United States v. Fisher, 109 U.S. 143 (1883); Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553 (1933).

[9] For discussion of the prohibition on Article III courts issuing advisory opinions, see ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[10] For discussion of the finality of judgments of Article III courts, see ArtIII.S1.5.2 Reopening Final Judicial Decisions.

[11] 69 U.S. (2 Wall.) 561 (1865).

[12] 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40 (1852).

[1] Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 106 (1982) (White, J., dissenting) (discussing Canter, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 511 (1828)).

[2] Indeed, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney planned to express this view in Gordon v. United States, 69 U.S. (2 Wall.) 561 (1865). The opinion in Gordon was originally prepared by Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, but, following his death and reargument of the case, the Court issued the cited opinion. The Court later directed the publishing of Chief Justice Roger B. Taney's original opinion at 117 U.S. 697. See also United States v. Jones, 119 U.S. 477, 478 (1886) (noting that the official report of Chief Justice Samuel Chase's Gordon opinion and the Court's own record showed differences).

[3] 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 419 (1867). See also United States v. Jones, 119 U.S. 477 (1886).

Since the decision in De Groot, the authority of the Court to exercise appellate jurisdiction over legislative courts has turned not upon the nature or status of such courts but rather upon the nature of the proceeding before the lower court and the finality of its judgment. The Supreme Court has declined to review the administrative proceedings of legislative courts or entertain appeals from the advisory or interlocutory decrees of such a body.[4] But, in proceedings before a legislative court that are judicial in nature, subject to final judgment, and involve the performance of judicial functions and therefore the exercise of judicial power, the Court has accepted appellate jurisdiction.[5]

ArtIII.S1.9.4 District of Columbia and Territorial Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Article IV of the Constitution empowers Congress to "make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the territory or other Property belonging to the United States."[1] Congress has periodically invoked that authority to establish courts in U.S. territories. The Supreme Court's first opportunity to address the use of territorial courts came in the 1828 case Florida in American Insurance Co. v. Canter.[2] In Canter, the Court assessed the constitutionality of courts established in the territory of Florida. Challengers to the territorial court's jurisdiction argued that it could not properly hear cases arising under admiralty law, which instead must be heard in Article III courts.[3] Chief Justice John Marshall, writing for the Court, disagreed, explaining that territorial courts "are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the constitution on the general government, can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it." Instead, the Florida courts were "created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the government, or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory belonging to the United States." Thus, he held, the courts' jurisdiction "is conferred by Congress, in the execution of those general powers which that body possesses over the territories of the United States."[4] The Court noted that while, in the states, admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised only in courts established pursuant to Article III, the same limitation does not apply to the territorial courts, for "[i]n legislating for them Congress exercises the combined powers of the general, and of a state government."[5] Florida's territorial courts were abolished when the [4] E.g., Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig Nut Co., 272 U.S. 693 (1927); Federal Radio Comm'n v. General Elec. Co., 281 U.S. 464 (1930); D. C. Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462 (1983). See Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 576, 577–579 (1962).

[5] Pope v. United States, 323 U.S. 1, 14 (1944); D.C. Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462 (1983); Ortiz v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2165 (2018).

[1] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2.

[2] 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 511 (1828).

[3] Judges of these courts did not enjoy life tenure, but instead sat for four-year terms. Id. at 512.

[4] Id. at 546.

[5] Id.

territory became a state. Currently, the district courts in the federal territories of Guam,[6] the Virgin Islands,[7] and the Northern Mariana Islands[8] are legislative courts.[9]

A similar constitutional authority allows Congress to establish courts in the District of Columbia. Under Article I, Congress has the authority to "exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever" over the District of Columbia.[10] A series of early Supreme Court decisions treated the District of Columbia courts as legislative courts upon which Congress could impose nonjudicial functions. In Butterworth v. United States ex rel. Hoe, the Court sustained an act of Congress that conferred revisory powers upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in patent appeals and made its decisions binding upon the Commissioner of Patents.[11] The Court later sustained the authority of Congress to vest revisory powers in the same court over rates fixed by a public utilities commission[12] and orders of the Federal Radio Commission.[13] Those rulings were based on the assumption, express or implied, that the courts of the District were legislative courts, created by Congress pursuant to its plenary power to govern the District of Columbia. Similarly, in dictum in Ex parte Bakelite Corp., while reviewing the history and analyzing the nature of the legislative courts, the Court stated that the courts of the District were legislative courts.[14]

In the 1933 case O'Donoghue v. United States, the Court departed from its prior statements on the subject and held that the courts of the District of Columbia were constitutional courts exercising the judicial power of the United States.[15] Thus, the Court concluded, a federal law seeking to reduce judicial salaries could not apply to judges on the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Having decided that the D.C. courts were Article III courts, the Supreme Court had to reconcile the fact that such courts performed nonjudicial functions with the rule that constitutional courts can exercise only the judicial power of the United States. The Court did so by holding that, in establishing courts for the District, Congress performs dual functions pursuant to two distinct powers: its power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, and its plenary and exclusive power to legislate for the District of Columbia. The Court held that Article III, Section 1, limits the latter power with respect to tenure and compensation but not with respect to vesting legislative and administrative powers in such courts. Subject to the guarantees of personal liberty in the Constitution, the Court concluded, "Congress has as much power to vest courts of the District with a variety of jurisdiction and powers as a state legislature has in conferring jurisdiction on its courts."[16]

At the time the Court decided O'Donoghue, the D.C. courts had both local jurisdiction over District matters, similar to that of state courts, and also federal jurisdiction equivalent to that of other inferior federal courts. In 1970, Congress replaced the previous D.C. court system with two sets of courts: federal courts created pursuant to Article III (the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia), and local

[6] 48 U.S.C. § 1424, 1424b.

[7] 48 U.S.C. § 1611, 1614.

[8] 48 U.S.C. § 1821.

[9] The federal district court in Puerto Rico is an Article III court. See 28 U.SC. § 119.

[10] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 17.

[11] 112 U.S. 50 (1884).

[12] Keller v. Potomac Elec. Co., 261 U.S. 428 (1923).

[13] Federal Radio Comm'n v. General Elec. Co., 281 U.S. 464 (1930).

[14] 279 U.S. 438, 450–455 (1929).

[15] 289 U.S. 516, 551 (1933).

[16] Id. at 545.

courts similar to state and territorial courts, created pursuant to Article I (including the District of Columbia Court of Appeals).[17] In Palmore v. United States, a criminal defendant challenged the constitutionality of the District's Article I courts, arguing that charges under the D.C. criminal code amounted to a prosecution under federal law, and he was therefore entitled to consideration before an Article III court.[18] The Supreme Court rejected the argument, explaining that it was not necessary that every proceeding involving an act of Congress or a law made under its authority be conducted in an Article III court. State courts, after all, could hear cases involving federal law, as could territorial and military courts. Thus, "the requirements of Art. III, which are applicable where laws of national applicability and affairs of national concern are at stake, must in proper circumstances give way to accommodate plenary grants of power to Congress to legislate with respect to specialized areas having particularized needs and warranting distinctive treatment."[19]

ArtIII.S1.9.5 Non-Article III Military Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Article I grants Congress the authority "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval forces."[1] In the 1858 case Dynes v. Hoover, the Supreme Court upheld the use of this authority to create military courts.[2] In that case, the Court observed that "Congress has the power to provide for the trial and punishment of the military and naval offences," and that power "is given without any connection between it and the 3d article of the Constitution defining the judicial power of the United States; indeed, . . . the two powers are entirely independent of each other."[3]

Although Congress has broad authority to create and implement military courts, the Supreme Court has set some substantive limits on those courts' jurisdiction. For instance, military courts cannot be used to try civilians,[4] including the spouses of military members.[5] Additionally, the Court has held that military courts have jurisdiction over members of the military only when they are still in service.[6] However, military courts are able to try non-service related crimes while the defendant is still in the service.[7] Currently, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, an Article I court, sits at the apex of the military justice system.[8] Judges of that court sit for fifteen-year terms and can be removed by the President for [17] Pub. L. No. 91–358, 84 Stat. 475, D.C. Code § 11–101.

[18] 411 U.S. 389 (1973).

[19] Id. at 407–08.

[1] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 14.

[2] 61 U.S. (20 How.) 65, 79 (1857).

[3] Id.

[4] Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2, 121–22 (1867).

[5] Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 30 (1957); see also Kinsella v. United States ex rel. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234, 249 (1960).

[6] United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 14–15 (1955). But see 10 U.S.C. § 802(a).

[7] Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435, 450–51 (1987).

[8] 10 U.S.C. § 941.

neglect of duty, misconduct, or mental or physical disability. Another example of military courts are the military tribunals established by President George W. Bush by Executive Order shortly after the September 11, 2001, attacks.[9]

ArtIII.S1.9.6 Legislative Courts Adjudicating Public Rights

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court has held that Article I courts can adjudicate cases involving "public rights"—cases that arise between a private actor and the government. The public rights theory can be traced back to the Court's 1855 ruling in Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co.[1] In that case, Justice Joseph Story explained that, although Congress cannot withdraw from federal courts the jurisdiction to hear suits at common law, equity, or admiralty, "there are matters, involving public rights, which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them, and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper."[2] In essence, the Court distinguished between matters that historically had been decided by courts and matters that arose between the government and others and had been historically resolved by executive or legislative acts. Thus, under Murray's Lessee, certain matters arising between the government and others that might be susceptible to judicial determination may also be referred to Article I courts. Congress does not have sole discretion to determine what matters fall within that class. In subsequent cases, the Court has held that matters susceptible of judicial determination, but not requiring it, include claims against the United States;[3] the disposal of public lands and claims arising therefrom;[4] questions concerning membership in Indian tribes;[5] and questions arising out of the administration of the customs and internal revenue laws.[6] Courts such as consular courts and military courts martial may be justified on similar grounds.[7]

The Supreme Court has offered several rationales for why public rights cases can be handled in Article I courts. The first is based on the doctrine of sovereign immunity and postulates that, because Congress need not allow suits against the government at all, the

---

[9] Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, 66 Fed. Reg. 57, 833 (Nov. 13, 2001).

[1] 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272 (1855).

[2] Id. at 284.

[3] Gordon v. United States, 117 U.S. 697 (1865) (published 1885); McElrath v. United States, 102 U.S. 426 (1880); Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553 (1933). On the status of the then-existing Court of Claims, see Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530 (1962).

[4] United States v. Coe, 155 U.S. 76 (1894) (Court of Private Land Claims).

[5] Wallace v. Adams, 204 U.S. 415 (1907); Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, 174 U.S. 445 (1899) (Choctaw and Chickasaw Citizenship Court).

[6] Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, 279 U.S. 716 (1929); Ex parte Bakelite Corp., 279 U.S. 438 (1929).

[7] See In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891) (consular courts in foreign countries). Military courts may, on the other hand, be a separate entity of the military having no connection to Article III. Dynes v. Hoover, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 65, 79 (1858). But cf. Ortiz v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2165, 2168 (2018) (noting that the essential character of the military justice system is, "in a word, judicial"). For additional discussion of military courts, see ArtIII.S1.9.5 Non-Article III Military Courts.

legislature is free to attach conditions to the federal government being sued, including what type of forum the claims can be brought in.[8] The second major rationale is that, historically, these cases were conclusively determined by the Executive and Legislative Branches, "and that as a result there can be no constitutional objection to Congress's employing the less drastic expedient of committing their determination to a legislative court or an administrative agency."[9]

As a general matter, the Court has broadly defined public rights cases as those that arise "between the Government and persons subject to its authority in connection with the performance of the constitutional functions of the executive or legislative departments."[10] At the core of the public rights doctrine are cases involving claims for benefits against the government.[11] Private rights cases, by contrast, pertain to the "liability of one individual to another under the law as defined."[12] Beyond these general definitions, the Supreme Court has not articulated the exact parameters of the public rights doctrine. As Chief Justice John Roberts has noted, "our discussion of the public rights exception . . . has not been entirely consistent, and the exception has been the subject of some debate."[13] However, a series of Supreme Court cases have attempted to draw the line between public and private rights.

In 1932, in Crowell v. Benson, the Court approved an administrative scheme for evaluating maritime employee compensation claims, subject to judicial review, although the case involved a matter of private right.[14] The scheme was permissible, the Court said, because in cases arising out of congressional statutes, an administrative tribunal could make findings of fact and render an initial decision on legal and constitutional questions, as long as there was adequate review in a constitutional court.[15] The "essential attributes" of decisions must remain in an Article III court, but so long as they do, Congress may use administrative decisionmakers in those private rights cases that arise in the context of a comprehensive federal statutory scheme.[16]

In the 1982 case Northern Pipeline Const. Co. v. Marathon Pipeline Co., the Court addressed whether Article I bankruptcy courts could adjudicate common law contract and tort claims.[17] Acknowledging that the "distinction between public and private rights has not been definitely explained" in the Court's precedents, Justice William J. Brennan, writing for a plurality of the Court, traced three historical exceptions to the literal command of Article III: territorial courts, military courts, and courts and agencies that adjudicate public rights.[18]

---

[8] Northern Pipeline Constr. Co v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 67 (1981)

[9] Ex Parte Bakelite, 279 U.S. 438, 451 (1929) ("The mode of determining [public rights cases] . . . is completely within congressional control. Congress may reserve to itself the power to decide, may delegate that power to executive officers, or may commit it to judicial tribunals."). Although Congress has generally employed some level of judicial review for public rights cases, it is generally accepted that this is not constitutionally required. See id. at 451; Northern Pipeline, 458 U.S. at 68 n.20; Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 50–51 (1932).

[10] Crowell, 285 U.S. at 50.

[11] For example, the U.S. Tax Court is an Article I court that resolves disputes between taxpayers and the government. Although judges of the Tax Court exercise the "judicial power" of the United States, its judges do not enjoy life tenure, but rather sit for fifteen-year terms. And, unlike Article III judges who are subject to removal only through impeachment, Tax Court judges can be removed by the President for "inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office[.]" 26 U.S.C. §§ 7441–7443.

[12] Crowell, 285 U.S. at 51.

[13] Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594, 2611 (2011).

[14] 285 U.S. 22.

[15] Id. at 51–65.

[16] Id. at 50, 51, 58–63. For additional discussion of Crowell, see ArtIII.S1.9.7 Article I Adjuncts to Article III Courts.

[17] 458 U.S. 50 (1981).

[18] Id. at 69–70.

Disposing of the first two categories as clearly inapplicable, the plurality also rejected the public rights argument as the underlying case did not arise between government and a private party, but involved a state-created claim between two private parties.[19]

In two cases following Northern Pipeline, the Court rejected a bright line test for the distinction between public and private rights. It instead focused on substance—that is, on the extent to which a particular grant of jurisdiction to an Article I court threatened judicial integrity and separation of powers principles. First, in Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Products Co., the Court adopted a functional approach for determining when Congress may use non-Article III forums.[20] The statute in question created a system of binding arbitration, subject to limited judicial review, for determining the amount of compensation due to pesticide manufacturers whose data had been used by other manufacturers to register their products.[21] Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the majority, asserted that "substance rather than doctrinaire reliance on formal categories should inform application of Article III."[22] Because the arbitration scheme (1) was created by federal statute, (2) was a "pragmatic solution to the difficult problem of spreading [ ] costs," and (3) did not "preclude review of the arbitration proceeding by an Article III court," the Court found that it "did not threaten the independent role the Judiciary in our constitutional scheme."[23] Two years later, in Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) v. Schor, the Court reaffirmed Thomas's functional approach and held that the CFTC was empowered to hear common law counterclaims related to violations of the Commodities Exchange Act or CFTC regulations.[24]

In a subsequent case, Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, the Court held that the distinction between public and private rights determined both whether a matter could be referred to a non-Article III tribunal and whether Congress could dispense with a civil jury trial.[25] Granfinanciera suggests that seemingly private causes of action between private parties will also be deemed public rights when Congress, acting for a valid legislative purpose pursuant to its Article I powers, fashions a cause of action that is analogous to a common law claim and integrates it so closely into a public regulatory scheme that it becomes a matter appropriate for agency resolution with limited involvement by the Article III Judiciary.[26]

---

[19] Id. at 71

[20] 473 U.S. 568 (1984).

[21] Id. at 573–74.

[22] Id. at 587.

[23] Id. at 590.

[24] 478 U.S. 833, 857 (1986). In Schor, the Court described several non-determinative factors for assessing whether the adjudication of traditional Article III cases in a non-Article III forum threatens the institutional integrity of the judicial branch: (1) the "extent to which the 'essential attributes of judicial power' are reserved to Article III courts, and, conversely, the extent to which the non-Article III forum exercises the range of jurisdiction and powers normally vested only in Article III courts," (2) "the origins and importance of the right to be adjudicated"; and (3) "the concerns that drove Congress to depart from the requirements of Article III." Id. at 851.

[25] 492 U.S. 33, 51–55 (1989). While Granfinanciera was a Seventh Amendment jury-trial case, the decision is relevant to the Article III issue as well because, as the Court made clear, whether Congress can submit a legal issue to an Article I tribunal and whether it can dispense with a civil jury on that legal issue must be answered by the same analysis. Id. at 52–53 ("[T]he question whether the Seventh Amendment permits Congress to assign its adjudication to a tribunal that does not employ juries as factfinders requires the same answer as the question whether Article III allows Congress to assign adjudication of that cause of action to a non-Article III tribunal.") See also Oil States Energy Servs., LLC v. Greene's Energy Grp., LLC, 138 S. Ct. 1365, 1379 (2018) ("This Court's precedents establish that, when Congress properly assigns a matter to adjudication in a non-Article III tribunal, 'the Seventh Amendment poses no independent bar to the adjudication of that action by a nonjury factfinder.'" (quoting Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 53–54)).

[26] 492 U.S. at 52–54. The Court reiterated that the government need not be a party as a prerequisite to a matter being of public right. Id. at 54. Concurring, Justice Antonin Scalia argued that public rights historically were and

In the 2011 case Stern v. Marshall, the Court shifted away from the functionalism of Thomas and Schor and back towards the formalism of Northern Pipeline.[27] In Stern, the issue was whether a bankruptcy court could adjudicate a common law claim for fraudulent interference with a gift. In a 5-4 decision authored by Chief Justice John Roberts, the Court held that Article III prohibited the bankruptcy court's exercise of jurisdiction because the common law claim did not fall under the public rights exception. The Court acknowledged that Thomas and Schor had declined to limit the public rights exception to actions involving the government as a party, but it concluded that the Court had continued to limit the exception to claims deriving from a "federal regulatory scheme" or in which "an expert Government agency is deemed essential to a limited regulatory objective."[28] In rejecting applying the public rights exception to the fraudulent interference counterclaim, the Court observed that the claim was not one that could be "pursued only by grace of the other branches" or could have been "determined exclusively" by the Executive or Legislative Branches.[29] Additionally, the underlying claim did not "flow from a federal regulatory scheme" and was not limited to a "particularized area of law."[30] Because the counterclaim involved the "most prototypical exercise of judicial power," adjudication of a common law cause of action not created by federal law, the Court rejected the bankruptcy courts' exercise of jurisdiction over the counterclaim as a breach of Article III.[31]

Subsequently, in Oil States Energy Services, LLC v. Greene's Energy Group, LLC, the Court noted that it has not "definitively explained" the distinction between public and private rights, and its precedents applying the public-rights doctrine have "not been entirely consistent."[32] The Court observed, however, that its "precedents have given Congress significant latitude to assign adjudication of public rights to entities other than Article III courts."[33] In Oil States, the Court addressed whether inter partes review, a type of patent validity proceeding conducted by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO), violates Article III. The Court held that such proceedings "fall[ ] squarely within the public-rights doctrine" and therefore could constitutionally be conducted by a non-Article III tribunal.[34] In so holding, the Court described the public-rights doctrine as "cover[ing] matters 'which arise between the Government and persons subject to its authority in connection with the performance of the constitutional functions of the executive or legislative departments.'"[35]

ArtIII.S1.9.7 Article I Adjuncts to Article III Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and should remain only those matters to which the Federal Government is a party. Id. at 65. See also Stern v. Marshall, 564 U.S. 462, 490–91 (2011) ("[W]hat makes a right 'public' rather than private is that the right is integrally related to particular Federal Government action").

[27] 564 U.S. 462.

[28] Id. at 490.

[29] Id. at 493.

[30] Id.

[31] Id. at 494.

[32] 138 S. Ct. 1365, 1373 (2018) (additional citations omitted).

[33] Id.

[34] Id.

[35] Id.

shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court has held that Congress may create non-Article III forums where "adjuncts" to Article III courts adjudicate federal questions.[1] An "adjunct" is an adjudicator—most commonly an administrative agency or a magistrate judge—that does not function as an independent court but instead acts as a subordinate to the federal courts. Adjuncts have become highly important in the modern era, handling many cases involving public benefits and assisting Article III judges with their heavy caseload.

Support for the adjunct theory can be traced to the 1932 case Crowell v. Benson.[2] Crowell involved a challenge to the Longshoreman's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, which required that claims for injuries sustained while working on the navigable waters of the United States be filed with the U.S. Employees' Compensation Commission.[3] That agency was to conduct fact-finding and make initial findings of law.[4] An employer appealed an award of damages by the Commission, claiming that the grant of jurisdiction to the Commission violated Article III. In upholding the act, the Supreme Court delineated the proper role of the use of adjuncts in relation to Article III courts. The Court observed that "there is no requirement that, in order to maintain the essential attributes of the judicial power, all determinations of fact in constitutional courts shall be made by judges."[5] Instead, an adjunct may make findings of fact and initial legal determinations, but questions of law must be subject to de novo review in an Article III court.[6] Questions of jurisdictional fact—that is, facts that pertain to the jurisdiction of the agency itself—and constitutional fact are also subject to a more searching review by a constitutional court.[7] In sum, Crowell instructs that for Article III courts to retain the "essential attributes of the judicial power," adjuncts must act as subordinates to the Article III courts and not as independent adjudicators.

The framework established in Crowell provided the blueprint for the modern administrative state, starting with the New Deal and expanding throughout the twentieth and twenty-first centuries.[8] Administrative agencies perform a host of functions including making policy, promulgating rules, and adjudicating questions arising under federal law.[9] Many disputes that come before federal agencies concern public rights cases, with a large share of cases concerning the right to various government entitlements. For instance, the Social Security Administration (SSA), a federal agency that administers various government benefits including old age and disability benefits, has a complex adjudication process for determining who is entitled to these benefits, including several tiers of administrative review and review by both a federal district court and a circuit court of appeal.[10] Judicial review of SSA decisions

[1] Subject to the limitations discussed below, Congress may assign matters to adjuncts even when one of the three historical exceptions allowing assignment of a matter to a non-Article III tribunal is not applicable.

[2] 285 U.S. 22 (1932).

[3] Id. at 36–37.

[4] Id. at 54.

[5] Id. at 51.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. at 54–57.

[8] See Richard H. Fallon, Of Legislative Courts, Administrative Agencies, and Article III, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 915, 925 (1988).

[9] See Paul M. Bator, The Constitution as Architecture: Legislative and Administrative Courts Under Article III, 65 Ind. L. J. 233, 264 (1990).

[10] 42 U.S.C. § 405(g) ("Any individual, after any final decision of the Commissioner of Social Security made after a hearing to which he was a party . . . may obtain a review of such decision by a civil action . . . brought in [a] district court of the United States. . . . The judgment of the court shall be final except that it shall be subject to review in the closely follows the Crowell model: while factual findings made by an administrative law judge are subject to the highly deferential "substantial evidence" standard,[11] legal determinations "receive no deference" from either the district court or court of appeals.[12] While administrative law judges do not receive constitutionally protected life tenure or salary protection, there are statutory protections regarding their appointment, tenure, and compensation.

The second major subcategory of adjuncts is federal magistrate judges. In 1968, Congress enacted the Federal Magistrates Act, seeking to "reform the first echelon of the Federal Judiciary into an effective component of a modern scheme of justice by establishing a system of U.S. magistrates."[13] Magistrate judges are not appointed and confirmed like Article III judges and do not enjoy life tenure and salary protection. Instead, they are selected by district court judges and can be removed for good cause or if the Judicial Conference "determines that the services performed by his office are no longer needed."[14] Initially, magistrate judges were assigned a somewhat circumscribed role but, over the last several decades, Congress has expanded the role of magistrate judges to include the power to decide various motions, hear evidence, and try both criminal and civil cases. With the ever-burgeoning federal docket, magistrate judges have been deemed "nothing less than indispensable" in the federal judicial process.[15]

The Supreme Court's first occasion to consider the Magistrates Act came in Wingo v. Wedding.[16] In that case, the Court addressed whether the act permitted magistrate judges to hold evidentiary hearings in habeas corpus proceedings without the defendant's consent. The Court construed the statute to avoid potential Article III problems by interpreting the term "additional duties" in the act to not include the authority of a magistrate to hold evidentiary hearings, but instead allowing the magistrate simply to propose to the district court judge whether such a hearing should be held.[17] Two years later in Mathews v. Weber, the Court was tasked with interpreting whether "additional duties" could be read to permit referral of Social Security benefit cases to magistrate judges for preliminary review of the administrative record and preparation of a recommended ruling.[18] While the Court again avoided the potential Article III issues, it echoed the adjunct theory by observing that a district judge is free to follow or wholly reject a magistrate's recommendation and that the "authority—and the responsibility—to make informed, final determination . . . remains with the judge."[19] As a statutory matter, because the district judge was still free to follow or wholly ignore the magistrate's recommendation, the Court upheld the magistrate's "preliminary-review function" as one of the "additional duties" permitted under the act.[20] same manner as a judgment in other civil actions."); 28 U.S.C. § 1291 ("The courts of appeals . . . shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of the district courts of the United States.").

---

[11] 42 U.S.C. § 405(g) ("The findings of the Commissioner of Social Security as to any fact, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive.").

[12] See, e.g., Hickman v. Bowman, 803 F.2d 1377, 1380 (5th Cir. 1986); Foster v. Astrue, 548 F. Supp. 2d 667, 668 (E.D. Wis. 2008).

[13] Federal Magistrates Act, P.L. 90–578, 82 Stat. 1107; Mathews v. Weber, 423 U.S. 261 (quoting S. Rpt. 371, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 8 (1967)).

[14] 28 U.S.C. § 631.

[15] Government of Virgin Islands v. Williams, 892 F.2d 305, 308 (3d Cir. 1989).

[16] 418 U.S. 461 (1974).

[17] Id. at 472.

[18] 423 U.S. 261, 271 (1975).

[19] Id. at 271.

[20] Id. at 271–72.

In the 1980 case United States v. Raddatz, the Court finally addressed head-on the unresolved constitutional questions surrounding the Magistrates Act.[21] In Raddatz, a defendant challenged magistrates' statutory and constitutional authority to hear motions to suppress evidence in a criminal proceeding. Under the Act, magistrate judges could "hear and determine" any pretrial matter before the court, except for certain motions including motions to suppress evidence in criminal cases.[22] For those excluded motions, the district court judge could "designate a magistrate to conduct hearings, including evidentiary hearings, and to submit to a judge of the court proposed findings of fact and recommendations for the disposition" of the motions.[23] If either party objected to the proposed findings or recommendations, the district court judge was then required to make a "de novo determination" of the issues and could "accept, reject, or modify, in whole or in part, the findings or recommendations of the magistrate."[24] The defendant in Raddatz contended that these provisions required the district court judge to rehear the testimony on which the magistrate based his findings. The Court rejected that argument, holding that the district court need only make a de novo determination of the disputed findings and recommendations and not hold a de novo hearing.[25] With respect to the Article III challenge, the Court upheld the act, observing that the "ultimate decision" is reserved for the district court judge and that magistrates "are constantly subject to the court's control."[26]

Congress amended the Magistrates Act in 1979, further enlarging and clarifying magistrates' authority.[27] Under the new statute, upon designation by the district court judge and with consent of the parties, magistrate judges were authorized to preside over and enter final judgments in civil trials, including jury trials and misdemeanor criminal prosecutions.[28]

In Gomez v. United States, the Court addressed whether overseeing the selection of jurors in a felony criminal prosecution was among the "additional duties" envisioned in the Act.[29] The defendant in that case objected to the assignment of a magistrate judge both the before and after the magistrate judge selected the jury.[30] The Court agreed, and held that the Magistrates Act did not permit such an assignment. Applying the constitutional avoidance doctrine,[31] the Court focused on the statutory question of whether Congress would have intended magistrates to oversee this "critical stage of the criminal proceeding."[32] Speaking for a unanimous Court, Justice John Paul Stevens noted that, while a literal reading of the additional duties provision would allow magistrates to oversee felony trials, the "carefully defined grant of authority to conduct trials of civil matters and of minor criminal cases should be construed as an implicit withholding of the authority to preside at a felony trial."[33] Ultimately, the Court held that the [22] See 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A).

[21] 447 U.S. 667 (1980).

[23] Id. § 636(b)(1)(B).

[24] Id.

[25] Raddatz, 447 U.S. at 676.

[26] Id. at 682–83.

[27] Federal Magistrate Act of 1979, P.L. 96–82, 93 Stat. 643.

[28] 93 Stat. 643, 643–46. For discussion of the role of party consent to non-Article III courts' jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S1.9.9 Consent to Article I Court Jurisdiction.

[29] 490 U.S. 858 (1989).

[30] Id. at 860–61.

[31] For additional discussion of the constitutional avoidance doctrine, see ArtIII.S2.C1.10.1 Overview of Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine.

[32] Gomez, 490 U.S. at 873.

[33] Id. at 872.

"absence of a specific reference to jury selection in the statute, or, indeed, in the legislative history, persuades us that Congress did not intend the additional duties clause to embrace this function."[34]

ArtIII.S1.9.8 Bankruptcy Courts as Adjuncts to Article III Courts

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

In 1978, Congress revised the Bankruptcy Act and created bankruptcy courts as adjuncts of the district courts.[1] The courts were composed of judges vested with practically all the judicial power of the United States; however, the judges served for fourteen-year terms, subject to removal for cause by the judicial councils of the circuits, and with salaries subject to statutory change. The bankruptcy courts were given jurisdiction over not only civil proceedings arising under the bankruptcy code, but also all other proceedings arising in or related to bankruptcy cases. Review was available in Article III courts, but decisions could be reversed only if clearly erroneous.

This broad grant of jurisdiction brought into question what kinds of cases could be heard by an Article I court. In Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., a plurality of the Supreme Court held that the conferral of jurisdiction upon Article I judges to hear state claims regarding traditional common law actions was unconstitutional.[2] In a narrow holding, a plurality of the Court sought to rationalize and limit the Court's jurisprudence on Article I courts. According to the plurality, a fundamental principle of separation of powers requires the judicial power of the United States to be exercised by courts having the attributes prescribed in Article III. Congress may not evade the constitutional order by allocating judicial power to courts whose judges lack security of tenure and compensation. Only in three narrowly circumscribed instances may judicial power be distributed outside the Article III framework: in territories and the District of Columbia; courts-martial; and the adjudication of public rights.[3] In bankruptcy litigation not involving any of these exceptions, the plurality concluded, the judicial power cases could not be assigned to the tribunals created by the Act.[4]

The lack of a majority in Northern Pipeline left unclear the degree of discretion left in Congress to restructure the bankruptcy courts and placed in question the constitutionality of other legislative efforts to establish non-Article III tribunals. Congress responded to Northern Pipeline by enacting the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984.[5] Under

---

[34] Id. at 875–76. Importantly, in Gomez, the defendant had not given consent to the magistrate to select the jury, illustrating the limits of the adjunct theory when consent is withheld.

[1] Bankruptcy Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95–598, 92 Stat. 2549, codified in titles 11, 28. The bankruptcy courts were made adjuncts of the district courts by § 201(a), 28 U.S.C. § 151(a).

[2] 458 U.S. 50 (1982) (plurality opinion).

[3] Id. at 63–76.

[4] The plurality also rejected an alternative contention that, as adjuncts of the district courts, the bankruptcy courts were like United States magistrates or the agencies approved in Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 (1932), to which could be assigned fact-finding functions subject to review in Article III courts. Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 76–86 (1982). According to the plurality, the act vested too much judicial power in the bankruptcy courts to treat them like agencies, and it limited review by Article III courts too much.

[5] Pub. L. No. 98–353, 98 Stat. 333; 28 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq.

the Act, bankruptcy courts remained as Article I entities, and overall their powers as courts were not notably diminished. However, Congress established a division between core proceedings, which could be heard and determined by bankruptcy courts, subject to lenient review, and other proceedings, which, though initially heard and decided by bankruptcy courts, could be reviewed de novo in the district court at the behest of any party, unless the parties consented to bankruptcy court jurisdiction. A safety valve was included, permitting the district court to withdraw any proceeding from the bankruptcy court on cause shown.[6]

In Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, the Court considered whether a jury trial was required under the Seventh Amendment for a claim by a Chapter 11 bankruptcy trustee to void an allegedly fraudulent money transfer.[7] The Court found that the cause of action was founded on state law and, although denominated a core proceeding by Congress, was actually a private right.[8] Similarly, the Court in Stern v. Marshall held that a counterclaim of tortious interference with a gift, although made during a bankruptcy proceeding and statutorily deemed a core proceeding, was a state common law claim that did not fall under any of the public rights exceptions.[9] By contrast, in Executive Benefits Ins. Agency v. Arkison, the Court held that when the Constitution does not permit a bankruptcy court to enter final judgment on a bankruptcy-related claim, both the statute and the Constitution are satisfied if the bankruptcy court treats the matter as a non-core claim and issues proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to be reviewed de novo by the district court.[10] And, as the Court later held in Wellness International v. Sharif, a bankruptcy court may adjudicate with finality a so-called Stern claim—that is, a core claim that does not fall within the public rights exception—if the parties have provided knowing and voluntary consent.[11]

ArtIII.S1.9.9 Consent to Article I Court Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Congress has from time to time enacted legislation allowing non-Article III courts to adjudicate matters that would ordinarily proceed in Article III court based on the parties' consent.[1] The Supreme Court has upheld some such arrangements, but at times has invalidated them on separation of powers grounds.

---

[6] See 28 U.S.C. § 157.

[7] 492 U.S. 33 (1989).

[8] Id. at 55.

[9] 564 U.S. 462 (2011).

[10] 573 U.S. 25 (2014).

[11] 575 U.S. 665 (2015). For additional discussion of the role of consent in determining which claims legislative courts can hear, see ArtIII.S1.9.9 Consent to Article I Court Jurisdiction.

[1] For example, under the Federal Magistrates Act, upon the consent of the parties, a magistrate judge "may conduct any or all proceedings in a jury or nonjury civil matter and order the entry of judgment in the case." See 28 U.S.C. § 636(c)(1). Pursuant to the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, a district court, with the "consent of all parties to the proceeding," is permitted to refer a "proceeding related to a case under title 11 to a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine and to enter appropriate orders and judgments." See 28 U.S.C. § 157(c)(2). Other federal laws may provide for arbitration over discrete legal issues to occur based on the consent of the parties involved. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 4083(a).

The Supreme Court has identified two distinct rationales for the constitutional limitations on the creation of non-Article III tribunals. First, the Court has noted that Article III provides a personal right to individual litigants, preserving "their interest in an impartial and independent federal adjudication of claims."[2] Second, the Court has held that Article III safeguards structural principles, preserving the "role of the Judicial Branch" in our system of government by preventing Congress from transferring jurisdiction to non-Article III tribunals en-masse.[3] The Court has explained that, while individual rights can be waived, "notions of consent and waiver cannot be dispositive" with respect to Article III's structural protections because those "limitations serve institutional interests that the parties cannot be expected to protect"—separation of powers principles protecting the Judicial Branch from encroachment by the political branches.[4] When examining the structural component of Article III protections in consent cases, the Court has assessed the constitutionality of different judicial schemes using ad hoc balancing tests that rely on seemingly disparate principles, leaving open questions about when Congress can provide an alternative forum to an Article III court in which consenting parties can resolve their disputes.[5]

For example, in Commodities Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) v. Schor, the Supreme Court, in assessing the structural component of Article III's constitutional protections, rested its decision primarily on the breadth of matters adjudicated by the non-Article III tribunal at issue in that case.[6] Specifically, the Court upheld a law that allowed the CFTC to adjudicate common law claims that were "incidental to" and "completely dependent upon adjudication by the Commission of [public rights] claims created by federal law" and arose "out of the same transaction or occurrence" as the federal law claim.[7] For the Court, allowing an administrative agency to adjudicate such a "narrow class of common law claims" amounted to only a de minimis intrusion on the Judicial Branch.[8] Nonetheless, in noting the narrow nature of its holding, the Schor Court emphasized that Congress could not "create[ ] a phalanx of non-Article III tribunals equipped to handle the entire business of the Article III courts without any Article III supervision or control and without evidence of valid and specific legislative necessities," even if parties consented to adjudicate before such a forum.[9]

Five years later, in Peretz v. United States, the Court approached the issue of Article III's structural protections in a slightly different manner.[10] In Peretz, a criminal defendant who had failed to demand the presence of an Article III judge during the selection of his jury argued that having a magistrate judge oversee voir dire proceedings implicated the structural protections provided by Article III.[11] As in Schor, the Court rejected the idea that a judicial scheme granting a legislative court responsibilities traditionally exercised by a constitutional court ran counter to the institutional interests preserved by Article III.[12] But, while the Court in Schor focused on the narrow nature of the claims adjudicated by administrative agency in that

[2] Commodities Future Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 850 (1986).

[3] Id. (quoting National Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Co., 337 U.S. 582, 644 (1949) (Vinson, C.J., dissenting)).

[4] Id. at 851. Indeed, the Supreme Court has likened the structural protections provided by Article III, §1 to the limits on the subject-matter jurisdiction of a federal court imposed by Section 2 of Article III, which cannot be waived through consent. Id. at 850–51

[5] Id. at 848–49; see also Peretz v. United States, 501 U.S. at 930 (1991).

[6] 478 U.S. 833.

[7] Id. at 856.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 855.

[10] 501 U.S. at 930.

[11] Id. at 937.

[12] Id.

case, the Court in Peretz focused on the degree of control exercised by a constitutional court over the non-Article III court's work. The Court held that, "[b]ecause 'the entire [jury selection] process takes place under the district court's total control and jurisdiction,' there is no danger that use of the magistrate involves a 'congressional attempt'" to undermine the power of constitutional courts.[13]

In Stern v, Marshall, the Supreme Court held that the Bankruptcy Court lacked authority to enter judgment on a common law tort counterclaim.[14] The Court held that the parties had consented to having the Bankruptcy Court hear the counterclaim, but while such consent satisfied the requirements of the relevant statute, it could not overcome applicable constitutional limits.[15] In the wake of Stern, questions arose about the constitutionality of allowing consenting parties to proceed before a non-Article III court. In the 2015 case Wellness International v. Sharif, the Court held that Article III permits bankruptcy courts to adjudicate with finality Stern claims—claims designated for final adjudication in the bankruptcy court as a statutory matter, but prohibited from proceeding in that way as a constitutional matter—if the parties have provided knowing and voluntary consent.[16] In so holding, the Court used the ad hoc balancing test from Schor and Peretz to conclude that allowing bankruptcy courts to decide Stern claims by consent would not "impermissibly threaten the institutional integrity of the Judicial Branch."[17] Following Wellness International, questions remain about the exact scope of Congress's power to authorize non-Article III adjudication by litigant consent, but it appears that legislation that allows a relatively narrow class of claims to be adjudicated before a non-Article III tribunal with the parties' consent and provides Article III courts with some oversight of the legislative court's activities is likely to pass constitutional muster.

ArtIII.S1.10 Federal Judiciary Protections

ArtIII.S1.10.1 Overview of Federal Judiciary Protections

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Framers of the Constitution established the Federal Judiciary as an independent branch of government, alongside the Executive and Legislative Branches. While the Framers generally sought to structure the Constitution to ensure the separation of powers, they expressed particular concern about potential interference with the Judiciary by the political branches. James Wilson remarked at the Constitutional Convention that judges "would be in a bad situation if made to depend on every gust of faction which might prevail" in the political branches.[1] Likewise, in the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton famously opined that, of the [13] Id.

[14] 564 U.S. 462 (2011).

[15] Id. at 481–82.

[16] 575 U.S. 665 (2015).

[17] Id. at 678–79 (alterations omitted).

[1] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 429 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

three branches, the Judiciary "will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution; because it will be least in a capacity to annoy or injure them."[2]

Two key mechanisms that the Framers adopted to protect the Judiciary from political influence are the Good Behavior Clause and the Compensation Clause. The Good Behavior Clause provides that Supreme Court Justices and other federal judges "shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour."[3] The Supreme Court has interpreted the Clause to grant federal judges life tenure, unless they resign voluntarily or are impeached.[4] The Compensation Clause provides that federal judges shall be compensated for their service, and that such compensation "shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office."[5] Together, the two provisions prevent the political branches from seeking to influence the Judiciary by retaliating against disfavored court decisions by removing the judges responsible or docking their pay.[6] The following essays briefly outline the history of the Good Behavior Clause and the Compensation Clause, then survey the Supreme Court's decisions applying the two provisions.[7]

ArtIII.S1.10.2 Good Behavior

ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Article III, Section 1 provides that federal judges hold their offices "during good behavior."[1] This standard, borrowed from English law, ensures that federal judges hold their seats for life,

---

[2] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

[3] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[4] See, e.g., United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 16 (1955) (explaining that Article III courts "are presided over by judges appointed for life, subject only to removal by impeachment"); Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 59 (1982) (plurality opinion of Brennan, J.) ("The 'good Behaviour' Clause guarantees that Art[icle] III judges shall enjoy life tenure, subject only to removal by impeachment."); United States v. Hatter, 532 U.S. 557, 567 (2001) (explaining that the Good Behavior Clause grants federal judges "the practical equivalent of life tenure").

[5] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[6] Other aspects of the constitutional system also seek to safeguard the independence of the judiciary. For instance, the Supreme Court has construed Article III to limit Congress's ability to vest judicial functions in non-Article III tribunals on separation of powers grounds. See, e.g., Commodities Future Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 850 (1986); see also ArtIII.S1.9.1 Overview of Congressional Power to Establish Non-Article III Courts.

[7] See ArtIII.S1.10.2.1 Overview of Good Behavior Clause; ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause.

[1] The Constitution contains a number of provisions that are relevant to the impeachment of federal officials. Article I, Section 2, Clause 5 grants the sole power of impeachment to the House of Representatives; Article I, Section 3, Clause 6 assigns the Senate sole responsibility to try impeachments; Article I, Section 3, Clause 7 provides that the sanctions for an impeached and convicted individual are limited to removal from office and potentially a bar from holding future office, but an impeachment proceeding does not preclude criminal liability; Article II, Section 2, Clause 1 provides that the President enjoys the pardon power, but it does not extend to cases of impeachment; and Article II, Section 4 defines which officials are subject to impeachment and what kinds of misconduct constitute impeachable behavior. Article III does not mention impeachment expressly, but Section 1, which establishes that federal judges shall hold their seats during good behavior, is widely understood to provide the unique nature of judicial tenure. And Article III, Section 2, Clause 3 provides that trials, "except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by jury."

rather than set terms or at the will of a superior.[2] The applicability of the Good Behavior Clause to the removal of federal judges has been the subject of debate; in particular, whether the phrase elucidates a distinct standard for removal apart from the "high crimes and misdemeanors" standard applicable to the impeachment of other federal officers.[3] While this question has not been definitively resolved, historical practice indicates an understanding that the Good Behavior Clause protects federal judges from removal for congressional disagreement with legal or political opinions.[4]

ArtIII.S1.10.2.2 Historical Background on Good Behavior Clause

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Just as the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" for impeachments was borrowed from English practice,[1] so too was the term "good behavior" borrowed from English law concerning the duration of a judge's tenure.[2] Prior to 1701, the tenure of judges in England was established by the Crown, which often reserved the right to remove them.[3] In 1701 Parliament passed legislation barring the Crown from removing judges, providing that they served "Quamdiu se bene gesserint,"[4] and reserved for itself the authority to remove judges.[5] The standard of good behavior and insulation from removal by the Crown was mirrored in the constitutions of many American colonies[6] and was advanced by various proposals at the Constitutional Convention.[7]

The Framers considered the provision that federal judges maintain their seats during good behavior an "excellent barrier" against the risk of a legislature seeking to expand its power.[8] Rather than serving at the pleasure of the President or Congress, the protection of judges' seats and salary for life ensured an independent Judiciary that would not be unduly pressured

---

[2] See Hon. Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Reflections on the Independence, Good Behavior, and Workload of Federal Judges the John R. Coen Lecture Series University of Colorado School of Law, 55 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1, 3 (1983).

[3] See generally Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 237–38 (1993).

[4] See ArtIII.S1.10.2.3 Good Behavior Clause Doctrine. Article III, Section 1, also serves the essential purpose of protecting the independence of the judiciary and protecting litigants' rights to have claims adjudicated by an impartial judge free from the influence of another branch of government. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 849 (1986). Further, the clause bars congressional attempts to eliminate the role of constitutional courts by transferring jurisdiction to non-Article III courts, which guards against the aggrandizement of power by one branch of government over another. Id.

[1] For more on the historical background of the impeachment clauses, see The Power of Impeachment: Historical Background; The Power to Try Impeachments: Historical Background; Impeachable Offenses: Historical Background.

[2] Hon. Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Reflections on the Independence, Good Behavior, and Workload of Federal Judges the John R. Coen Lecture Series University of Colorado School of Law, 55 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1, 3 (1983). ("The phrase 'good Behaviour' was copied by the framers of our Constitution from English law.").

[3] Note, Judicial Disability and the Good Behavior Clause, 85 Yale L.J. 706, 720 (1976).

[4] The Latin phrase is sometimes translated as "so long as they conduct themselves well," Ginsburg, supra note 2, at 3 n.10, or "during good behavior." See Judicial Disability and the Good Behavior Clause, supra note 3, at 709.

[5] Act of Settlement, 12 & 13 Will. 3, ch. 2, § 3 (1700).

[6] See, e. g., 2 Benjamin P. Poore, The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the United States 1910 (2d ed. 1878).

[7] 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 21 (Max Farrand ed., 1966) (Virginia Plan); id. at 244 (New Jersey Plan); 3 id. at 600 (draft attributed to Charles Pinckney); id. at 621, 625 (Alexander Hamilton).

[8] See The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

by the political branches.[9] Insulating federal judges from removal was crucial because the Judiciary lacks the "sword" of the Executive power and the "purse" of the Legislature.[10] Rather, the judicial power consists of the reasoning and "judgements" of its officers.[11] As the Federal Judiciary is in some ways the least powerful branch of the government, ensuring judges' "permanency in office" was deemed essential to establishing an independent Judiciary.[12]

Further, this independence armed the Judiciary with the ability to defend and preserve a "limited constitution against legislative encroachments" against the rights of citizens.[13] In the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton argued that federal judges must "guard the constitution and the rights of individuals" against the possibility of laws that oppress political minorities.[14] Likewise, federal judges must ensure that the law is applied justly and evenly to all citizens. If judges could be removed at will or were appointed for specified periods, judges would be tempted to consider popular opinion in their rulings to the detriment of the Constitution and the rights of political minorities.[15]

ArtIII.S1.10.2.3 Good Behavior Clause Doctrine

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The meaning of the Good Behavior Clause has been the subject of long-standing debate. Some have argued that the phrase denotes an alternative standard of removal for federal judges beyond "high crimes and misdemeanors" that normally may give rise to the impeachment of federal officers.[1] Others have rejected this notion,[2] reading the "good behavior" phrase simply to make clear that federal judges retain their office for life unless they are removed via a proper constitutional mechanism. However, while one might find some support in early twentieth-century practice for the idea that the Clause constitutes an additional ground for removal of a federal judge,[3] the modern view of Congress appears to be

[9] Id.
[10] Id.
[11] Id.
[12] Id.
[13] Id.
[14] Id.
[15] Id.

[1] Raoul Berger, Impeachment: The Constitutional Problems 122–80 (1973) (arguing that the good behavior standard is distinct from "high crimes and misdemeanors" and Congress may remove judges whose "misbehavior" does not constitute a high crime or misdemeanor); Saikrishna Prakash, Steven D. Smith, How to Remove A Federal Judge, 116 Yale L.J. 72, 78 (2006) ("Congress . . . may establish any number of mechanisms for determining whether a judge has forfeited her office through misbehavior. . . . Congress can pass statutes that help implement the federal government's authority to remove federal judges who have misbehaved."); see 3 Lewis Deschler, Precedents of the United States of the House of Representatives, H.R. Doc. No. 94-661, at Ch. 14 § 3.9 (1974), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-DESCHLERS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-DESCHLERS-V3.pdf.

[2] Judith Rosenbaum et al., A Constitutional Perspective on Judicial Tenure, 61 Judicature 465, 474 (1978) (claiming that the terms were interchangeable for the Framers).

[3] See Staff of H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Impeachment, Selected Materials 666 (Comm. Print 1973).

that "good behavior" does not establish an independent standard for impeachable conduct.[4] In other words, the Good Behavior Clause simply indicates that judges are not appointed to their seats for set terms and cannot be removed at will; removing a federal judge requires impeachment and conviction for a high crime or misdemeanor.

Nevertheless, even if the Good Behavior Clause does not delineate a standard for impeachment and removal for federal judges, as a practical matter, the history of impeachments in the United States might indicate that the range of conduct meriting removal differs between judges and Executive Branch officials due to the distinct nature of each office. The Senate has never voted to remove the President or an Executive Branch official, but has done so to eight federal judges.[5] The conduct meriting impeachment and removal for federal judges has ranged from intoxication on the bench,[6] to abandoning the office and joining the Confederacy,[7] to various types of corruption. Congress has also impeached and removed federal judges for perjury and income tax evasion,[8] although it is unclear whether such behavior would necessarily be considered impeachable behavior for an Executive Branch official.[9]

Further, leaving aside whether the Good Behavior Clause establishes a separate standard for removal independent from high crimes and misdemeanors, historical conflicts between Congress and the Judiciary may inform the outer limits of what the Good Behavior Clause entails. For instance, in 1804 Jeffersonian Republicans attempted to remove Supreme Court Chief Justice Samuel Chase, who they viewed as openly partisan and biased against their party.[10] The allegations against Chief Justice Chase included that he acted in an "arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust manner" at trial, misapplied the law, and expressed partisan political views to a grand jury.[11] The attempt failed, and Congress has never removed a federal judge for disagreement with the law's application or because of difference in political views. Based on this historical practice, the good behavior standard arguably guards against the removal of a federal judge for disagreement with the law's interpretation or political disagreements.

That said, the Good Behavior Clause and the attendant clauses expressly dealing with impeachment do not insulate federal judges from criminal prosecutions.[12] For instance, Judge Harry E. Claiborne, before being impeached and removed from office as a federal judge,

---

[4] See Charles W. Johnson, John V. Sullivan, and Thomas J. Wickham, Jr., House Practice: A Guide to the Rules, Precedents and Procedures of the House 608–13 (2017); Impeachment, Selected Materials, supra note 3, at 666; Staff of H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment 17 (Comm. Print 1974); H.R. Rep. No. 105-830, at 110–18.

[5] See ArtI.S3.C6.3 Impeachment Trial Practices and ArtII.S4.4.1 Overview of Impeachable Offenses et seq.

[6] See 12 Annals of Cong. 642 (1803); 13 Annals of Cong. 380 (1803); 13 Annals of Cong. 368 (1804).

[7] 2 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States §§ 2385–97 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V2/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V2.pdf.

[8] 135 Cong. Rec. S14,633–39 (daily ed. Nov. 3, 1989) (removing Judge Walter L. Nixon for lying to a grand jury); 132 Cong. Rec. 29,870–72 (1986) (removing Judge Harry E. Claiborne for providing false statements on his income tax returns).

[9] President Clinton was impeached, but not convicted, for perjury to a grand jury. See discussion in ArtII.S4.4.8 President Bill Clinton and Impeachable Offenses. In the effort to impeach President Nixon, one of the articles of impeachment rejected by the House Judiciary Committee concerned tax evasion. See discussion in ArtII.S4.4.7 President Richard Nixon and Impeachable Offenses.

[10] 13 Annals of Cong. 1180 (1804).

[11] Impeachment, Selected Materials, supra note 3, at 133–35.

[12] See generally Chandler v. Judicial Council of Tenth Circuit of U.S., 398 U.S. 74, 140 (1970) (Douglas, J., dissenting) ("Federal judges are entitled, like other people, to the full freedom of the First Amendment. If they break a law, they can be prosecuted. If they become corrupt or sit in cases in which they have a personal or family stake, they can be impeached by Congress.").

challenged his indictment and prosecution as unconstitutional.[13] Specifically, he argued that the Constitution's vesting of the impeachment power in Congress precludes the criminal prosecution of an Article III judge unless he is first impeached and removed from office.[14] The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit rejected this argument, concluding that the Constitution's distinction between impeachment and criminal liability was meant to ensure that no individual who had been impeached and removed could claim double jeopardy as a shield against subsequent criminal prosecution.[15] Further, a criminal conviction does not "remove" an individual from office; Congress retains exclusive power to do so through the constitutional mechanism of impeachment.[16] Likewise, the Ninth Circuit rejected Claiborne's argument that it violates separation of powers for the Executive Branch to possess authority to bring criminal prosecutions against sitting Article III judges.[17] The court noted that potential defendants receive the same protections that ordinary citizens do, and criminal behavior is not part of a government official's duties.[18] Further, insulating federal judges from criminal liability would elevate them above the requirements of the very law they are entrusted with adjudicating fairly.[19]

ArtIII.S1.10.3 Compensation

ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Supreme Court has stated, "The Compensation Clause has its roots in the longstanding Anglo-American tradition of an independent Judiciary. A Judiciary free from control by the Executive and the Legislature is essential if there is a right to have claims decided by judges who are free from potential domination by other branches of government."[1] Before the Revolutionary War, American colonists recognized the role of judicial compensation in maintaining the independence of the Judiciary. Among other things, the Declaration of Independence objected to the fact that the King had "made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries."[2]

From the beginning of the Constitutional Convention, the Framers embraced salary protection as one means of bolstering judicial independence. The first resolution on the Judiciary introduced at the Convention provided that judges would "receive punctually at stated times fixed compensation for their services, in which no increase or diminution shall be

---

[13] United States v. Claiborne, 727 F.2d 842, 849 (9th Cir. 1984). See also United States v. Hastings, 681 F.2d 706, 709–11 (11th Cir. 1982) (rejecting similar claims), stay denied, 459 U.S. 1203 (1982); United States v. Isaacs, 493 F.2d 1124, 1141–44 (7th Cir. 1974) (same), cert. denied sub nom., 417 U.S. 976 (1974).

[14] Claiborne, 727 F.2d at 845–46.

[15] Id. at 846.

[16] Id.

[17] Id. at 849.

[18] Id. at 848.

[19] Id. at 849.

[1] United States v. Will, 449 U.S. 200, 217–18 (1980).

[2] The Declaration of Independence para. 11 (U.S. 1776).

made so as to affect the persons actually in office at the time of such increase or diminution."[3] Following debate, the prohibition on judicial salary increases was removed to allow Congress to adapt judicial pay to changing circumstances, but the prohibition on decreasing judicial salaries remained.[4] Alexander Hamilton highlighted the Compensation Clause in the Federalist Papers, asserting that, "next to permanency in office, nothing can contribute more to the independence of the judges than a fixed provision for their support," because, "[i]n the general course of human nature, a power over a man's subsistence amounts to a power over his will."[5] Chief Justice John Marshall later asserted that judges must have the independence to protect the poor and unpopular, and that the "greatest scourge" was an "ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent Judiciary."[6]

ArtIII.S1.10.3.2 Compensation Clause Doctrine

Article III, Section 1:

> The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

The Compensation Clause allows Congress to increase judicial salaries, but not to decrease them. During the Great Depression, Congress enacted appropriations legislation reducing "the salaries and retired pay of all judges (except judges whose compensation may not, under the Constitution, be diminished during their continuance in office)" by a fixed amount.[1] The statute avoided constitutional issues by expressly incorporating the limits of the Compensation Clause, but it sparked Supreme Court litigation to determine which federal judges were subject to the salary reduction. Ultimately, the Court held that judges of the District of Columbia courts were Article III judges who enjoyed constitutional salary protection and could not be subject to the statute.[2] On the other hand, the Court held that judges of the Court of Claims, a legislative court, could have their salaries reduced.[3]

Once a judicial salary increase has gone into effect, the Compensation Clause bars Congress from reducing or rescinding any part of the increase. However, Congress may alter a promised future increase before it becomes effective. Thus, in United States v. Will, the Court held that Congress could repeal or modify a statutorily defined formula for annual cost-of-living increases to the compensation of federal judges, but must act with respect to any particular increase before the increase takes effect.[4] To illustrate, in one of the years at issue in

---

[3] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 244 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[4] 2 id. at 45. See also, e.g., id (statement of Gouverner Morris that "[t]he value of money may not only alter but the State of Society may alter. In this event the same quantity of wheat, the same value would not be the same compensation. The Amount of salaries must always be regulated by the manners & the style of living in a Country").

[5] The Federalist No. 79 (Alexander Hamilton).

[6] United States v. Hatter, 532 U.S. 557 (2001) (quoting Proceedings and Debates of the Virginia State Convention, of 1829–1830, p. 619 (1830)).

[1] Legislative Appropriation Act of June 30, 1932, ch. 314, 47 Stat. 382, 401.

[2] O'Donoghue v. United States, 289 U.S. 516 (1933). Congress later established two sets of courts in the District: federal courts, created pursuant to Article III, and local courts equivalent to state and territorial courts, created pursuant to Article I. For further discussion of the constitutional status of the District of Columbia Courts, see ArtIII.S1.9.4 District of Columbia and Territorial Courts.

[3] Williams v. United States, 289 U.S. 553 (1933). But see Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530 (1962).

[4] 449 U.S. 200 (1980).

Will, a planned salary increase took effect on October 1, but the President signed a bill reducing the amount that same day. The Court held that the increase had gone into effect by the time the reduction was signed, rendering the reduction invalid.[5] Moreover, although the salary reductions in Will applied to various officials in all three branches of government, the Court further held that even a general, nondiscriminatory salary reduction, affecting judges but not aimed solely at them, is covered by the Compensation Clause.[6]

A separate question that has sparked Supreme Court litigation is whether the Compensation Clause limits Congress's power to increase the amount of federal income tax Article III judges pay. In Evans v. Gore, the Court invalidated the application of a 1919 income tax law to a sitting federal judge.[7] The Court extended that ruling in Miles v. Graham to exempt the salary of a judge of the Court of Claims appointed after the enactment of the relevant tax law.[8] In the 1939 case O'Malley v. Woodrough, the court disapproved of Evans and effectively overruled Miles, upholding a provision of the Revenue Act of 1932 that extended application of the income tax to salaries of judges taking office after June 6, 1932.[9] The Court regarded the tax neither as an unconstitutional diminution of the compensation of judges nor as an encroachment on the independence of the Judiciary.[10] To subject judges who take office after a stipulated date to a nondiscriminatory income tax, said the Court, "is merely to recognize that judges are also citizens, and that their particular function in government does not generate an immunity from sharing with their fellow citizens the material burden of the government whose Constitution and laws they are charged with administering."[11]

The Court formally overruled Evans in the 2001 case United States v. Hatter.[12] The Hatter Court reaffirmed the principle that judges should "share the tax burdens borne by all citizens,"[13] holding that "the potential threats to judicial independence that underlie [the Compensation Clause] cannot justify a special judicial exemption from a commonly shared tax."[14] The Court held that the Medicare tax, which was extended to all federal employees in 1982, was a non-discriminatory tax that could be applied to federal judges.[15] By contrast, the Court ruled that the 1983 extension of a Social Security tax to then-sitting judges violated the Compensation Clause, because judges were required to participate while almost all other federal employees were given a choice about participation.[16] Nor had Congress cured the constitutional violation by a subsequent enactment that raised judges' salaries by an amount greater than the amount of Social Security taxes that they were required to pay.[17]

[5] Id. at 224–25.
[6] Id. at 226.
[7] 253 U.S. 245 (1920).
[8] 268 U.S. 501 (1925).
[9] 307 U.S. 277 (1939).
[10] Id. at 278–82.
[11] Id. at 282.
[12] 532 U.S. 557 (2001).
[13] Id. at 571.
[14] Id.
[15] Id. at 572.
[16] Id.
[17] Id. at 578–81.

Section 2—Justiciability

Clause 1—Cases or Controversies

ArtIII.S2.C1.1 Overview of Cases or Controversies

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1 identifies the circumstances and parties to which the judicial power of the National Government applies.[1] As provided by the Constitution, the judicial power extends to nine classes of cases and controversies which fall into two general groups depending on the "character of the cause" and the "character of the parties."[2] As to the "character of the cause," the judicial power extends to cases arising under the "Constitution, the Laws of the United States and Treaties made under . . . their Authority"; to all cases "affecting Ambassadors, or other public Ministers and Consuls"; and to all cases of "admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction."[3] As to the "character of the parties," the judicial power extends to controversies where the "United States shall be a Party"; and controversies "between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State; between Citizens of different States;-between Citizens of the same State claiming Land under Grants of different States, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects."[4] In Cohens v. Virginia, Chief Justice John Marshall explained these principles, stating:

> In the first, jurisdiction depends on the character of the cause, whoever may be the parties. This class comprehends 'all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.' This cause extends the jurisdiction of the court to all the cases described, without making in its terms any exception whatever, and without any regard to the condition of the party. If there be any exception, it is to be implied, against the express words of the article. In the second class, the jurisdiction depends entirely on the character of the parties. In this are comprehended 'controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state,' and 'between a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects' if these be the parties, it is entirely unimportant, what may be the subject of controversy. Be it what it may, these parties have a constitutional right to come into the courts of the Union.[5]

The Supreme Court has further noted that judicial power is "the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 378 (1821).

[3] U.S. Const. art. III § 2, cl. 1.

[4] U.S. Const. art. III § 2, cl. 1.

[5] Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 378 (1821).

case before it for decision."[6] The meaning attached to the terms "cases" and "controversies"[7] determines therefore the extent of the judicial power as well as the capacity of the federal courts to receive jurisdiction. According to Chief Justice Marshall in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, judicial power is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted in a case and a case arises only when a party asserts his rights "in a form prescribed by law."[8]

Justiciable "cases" and "controversies" not only require that disputes be of the types specified in Article III, Section 2, Clause 1, but also that the disputes be, in fact, actual "cases" and "controversies." Consequently, the parties must truly be adverse to each, the dispute must be concrete, not hypothetical, and the dispute must be capable of being resolved through an award of specific relief. In Aetna Life Insurance Company v. Haworth, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes explained this aspect of the "cases" and "controversies" requirement stating:

> A "controversy" in this sense must be one that is appropriate for judicial determination. A justiciable controversy is thus distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical character; from one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. It must be a real and substantial controversy admitting of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character, as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts.[9]

Chief Justice Earl Warren also advised on the nature of "cases" and "controversies," noting:

> Embodied in the words "cases" and "controversies" are two complementary but somewhat different limitations. In part those words limit the business of federal courts to questions presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of resolution through the judicial process. And in part those words define the role assigned to the Judiciary in a tripartite allocation of power to assure that the federal courts will not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of government. Justiciability is the term of art employed to give expression to this dual limitation placed upon federal courts by the case and controversy doctrine.[10]

Factors which determine whether a dispute qualifies as a "case" or "controversy" under the Constitution include adversity, the existence of a real interest, and standing. Adversity requires that the parties be truly adverse to each other with real interests in contention.[11] As such, suits that are collusive or feigned by two friendly parties to resolve a question of interest to them are not justiciable.[12] A real interest requires that a real issue be presented, as contrasted with speculative, abstract, hypothetical, or moot issues or cases that are not yet ripe for review.[13] Standing concerns who may bring a suit and requires that the party seeking relief

---

[6] Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 356 (1911).

[7] The two terms may be used interchangeably, inasmuch as a "controversy," if distinguishable from a "case" at all, is so only because it is a less comprehensive word and includes only suits of a civil nature. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 239 (1937).

[8] Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824).

[9] Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 240–41 (1937). Cf. Public Service Comm'n v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 242 (1952).

[10] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 94–95 (1968).

[11] Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346 (1911).

[12] Lord v. Veazie, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 251 (1850).

[13] Alabama State Fed'n of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U.S. 450, 461 (1945) (stating that it is the Court's "considered practice not to decide abstract, hypothetical or contingent questions."); Giles v. Harris, 189 U.S. 475, 486 (1903) (stating that a party cannot maintain a suit "for a mere declaration in the air"); Texas v. ICC, 258 U.S. 158 (1922) ("It is only where rights, in themselves appropriate subjects of judicial cognizance, are being, or about to be, affected prejudicially has "alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpes the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends of illumination of difficult constitutional questions."[14] The constitutional requirements for standing under Article III require that the plaintiff has personally (1) suffered some actual or threatened injury; (2) that injury can fairly be traced to the challenged action of the defendant; and (3) that the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable decision.[15] Persons do not have standing to sue in federal court when they can only claim that they have an interest or have suffered an injury that is shared by all members of the public.[16] These factors are discussed at greater length in other Constitution Annotated essays.

ArtIII.S2.C1.2 Historical Background on Cases or Controversies Requirement

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Article III of the Constitution provides that "the judicial Power" of the United States "shall extend to" certain enumerated categories of "Cases" and "Controversies."[1] As later essays in this treatise discuss, the Supreme Court has interpreted this "Case or Controversy" language to impose significant restrictions on the federal courts' power to adjudicate disputes,[2] such as the Article III standing doctrine,[3] which forbids the Federal Judiciary from hearing cases in which the plaintiff lacks a personal stake in the outcome.[4] In light of the importance of those limitations on the federal courts' jurisdiction, this essay surveys available historical evidence illuminating what the Framers might have understood those words to mean.[5] The essay thus by the application or enforcement of a statute that its validty may be called in question by a suitor and determined by an exertion of the judicial power."); Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 324 (1936) ("The pronouncements, policies and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and its directors, their motives and desires, did not give rise to a justiciable controversy save as they had fruition in action of a definite and concrete character constituting an actual or threatened interference with the rights of the person complaining."

---

[14] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962). That persons or organizations have a personal, ideological interest sufficiently strong to create adverseness is not alone enough to confer standing; rather the adverseness is the consequence of one being able to satisfy the Article III requisite of injury in fact. Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United, 454 U.S. 464, 482–486 (1982); Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. To Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 225–226 (1974). Nor is the fact that, if plaintiffs have no standing to sue, no one would have standing, a sufficient basis for finding standing. Id. at 227.

[15] Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United, 452 U.S. 464, 472 (1982); Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984); Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–61 (1992); Monsanto C. v. Geerston Seed Farms, 561 U.S. ___, No. 09–475, slip op. (2010). But see United States v. Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388 (1980).

[16] Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. To Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974).

[1] U.S. Const. art. III § 2.

[2] See ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[3] See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing.

[4] See, e.g., Gill v. Whitford, 138 S. Ct. 1916, 1923 (2018) ("[A] plaintiff seeking relief in federal court must first demonstrate that he has standing to do so, including that he has 'a personal stake in the outcome[.]'") (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962)).

[5] This essay focuses on whether the Framers intended Article III's "Case or Controversy" language to limit the justiciability of disputes in federal court. For analysis of the separate issue of whether and how the definition of "Case" discusses pre-Convention English judicial practice before recounting relevant exchanges during the Constitutional Convention and the ratification debates.[6]

Because the Framers drew upon their knowledge of English practice when designing the Constitution, the legal principles prevailing in England at the time of the Founding provide the starting point for understanding the "Case or Controversy" language's historical origins.[7] Some evidence suggests that English courts entertained a fairly broad array of disputes before the Founding, including certain cases intended to vindicate the public interest rather than merely the personal interests of the plaintiff himself. For example, a prominent English treatise from the seventeenth Century discusses a particular form of judicial relief that English courts could award at the behest of a "stranger"—i.e., one who was not a "party" to the action challenged in the case.[8] Similarly, a case from 1741 suggests that some litigants could pursue certain lawsuits in English courts even if they possessed only a "remote" interest in the subject of the litigation.[9] Other evidence, however, suggests that in certain contexts English courts demanded that litigants possess a direct personal stake in the subject matter of the litigation. For instance, in its discussion of a form of judicial relief known as the "writ of prohibition," an English treatise from 1736 states that "no Man is [e]ntitled to a Prohibition unless he is in Danger of being injured by some Suit actually depending."[10] Similarly, in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, Sir William Blackstone wrote that no private person could sue a defendant for a public or common nuisance unless the nuisance caused that private person "some extraordinary damage."[11] may differ from the definition of "Controversy," compare, e.g., Akhil Reed Amar, A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction, 65 B.U. L. Rev. 205, 244 n.128 (1985) (suggesting that "Cases" and "Controversies" are "legally synonymous"), with, e.g., Robert J. Pushaw, Jr., Article III's Case/Controversy Distinction and the Dual Functions of Federal Courts, 69 Notre Dame L. Rev. 447, 448–49, 531 (1994) (concluding "that the Framers used 'cases' and 'controversy' as distinct terms to convey different meanings"); See also ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction (discussing the classes of "cases" and "controversies" established by Article III).

---

[6] Scholars have debated whether the historical evidence discussed in this essay supports the prevailing judicial interpretation of Article III. Compare, e.g., Bruce J. Terris, Ex Nihilo—The Supreme Court's Invention of Constitutional Standing, 45 Envtl. L. 849, 849 (2015) (concluding that there is no historical evidence "that the Framers meant [Article III's 'case or controversy' language] to require a showing of injury"), with, e.g., James Leonard & Joanne C. Brant, The Half-Open Door: Article III, The Injury-in-Fact Rule, and the Framers' Plan for Federal Courts of Limited Jurisdiction, 54 Rutgers L. Rev. 1, 2 (2001) ("[G]iven the historical context, the contemporary injury-in-fact rule is an acceptable interpretation of Article III because it reflects not only the Framers' likely concept of what the courts did, but also their view of the judicial role in maintaining the separation of powers."), and Ann Woolhandler & Caleb Nelson, Does History Defeat Standing Doctrine?, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 689, 691 (2004) ("We do not claim that history compels acceptance of the modern Supreme Court's vision of standing, or that the constitutional nature of standing doctrine was crystal clear from the moment of the Founding on. . . . We do, however, argue that history does not defeat standing doctrine; the notion of standing is not an innovation, and its constitutionalization does not contradict a settled historical consensus about the Constitution's meaning.").

[7] See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 460 (1939) (Frankfurter, J.) ("[T]he framers of the Judiciary Article gave merely the outlines of what were to them the familiar operations of the English judicial system and its manifestations on this side of the ocean before the Union."); Raoul Berger, Standing to Sue in Public Actions: Is it a Constitutional Requirement?, 78 Yale L.J. 816, 816 (1969) ("[I]t is hardly to be doubted that the Framers contemplated resort to English practice for elucidation, and so the Supreme Court has often held.").

[8] See, e.g., Edward Coke, The Second Part of the Institutes of the Lawes of England 602 (1642) ("[T]he [K]ings [C]ourts that may award prohibitions, being informed either by the parties themselves, or by any stranger, that any [C]ourt [T]emporall or [E]cclesiasticall doth hold plea of that (whereof they have not jurisdiction) may lawfully prohibit the same.") (emphasis added).

[9] Att'y Gen. v. Bucknall [1741] 26 Eng. Rep. 600, 600 ("Any persons, tho' the most remote in the contemplation of the charity, may be relators in an information. . . . It is not absolutely necessary that relators in an information for a charity, should be the persons principally interested.").

[10] 4 Matthew Bacon, A New Abridgement of the Law 244 (1736).

[11] See 3 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Law of England 219–20 (William Carey Jones ed., 1916) ("[T]he law gives no private remedy for anything but a private wrong. Therefore, no action lies for a public or common nuisance, but an indictment only: because the damage being common to all the king's subjects, no one can assign his particular proportion of it: or if he could, it would be extremely hard, if every subject in the kingdom were allowed to

Although the Convention records do not explicitly discuss why the Framers used the terms "Cases" and "Controversies" in Article III,[12] at least three events during the Convention suggest that the Framers did not intend Article III to empower federal judges to adjudicate every type of dispute that came before them. For one, the Framers explicitly rejected proposals to authorize federal judges to review statutes before they became effective. On May 29, 1787, Edmund Randolph proposed that the President, along with "a convenient number of the National Judiciary," would "compose a council of revision with authority to examine every act of the National Legislature before it shall operate."[13] The Framers ultimately voted to reject this proposal (or variations on it) three times during the Convention.[14]

The Framers also took no action[15] on an August 20, 1787 proposal that would have granted "[e]ach branch of the Legislature, as well as the Supreme Executive," the "authority to require the opinions of the supreme Judicial Court upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions."[16] As a result of this proposal's failure, the Constitution as ratified contains no provision authorizing the federal courts to issue advisory opinions.[17]

Perhaps the most illuminating exchange between the Framers about the justiciability of disputes occurred on August 27, 1787,[18] when Dr. William Samuel Johnson proposed to extend the judicial power of the United States not just to cases arising under federal statutes, but also to cases arising under the Constitution itself.[19] James Madison expressed concern that this proposal could grant the Judiciary too much power, and insisted that the federal courts' jurisdiction should instead "be limited to cases of a Judiciary Nature" only.[20] Dr. Johnson's proposal nevertheless passed unanimously.[21] The Convention records reflect that the Framers harass the offender with separate actions. For this reason, no person, natural or corporate, can have an action for a public nuisance, or punish it; but only the king in his public capacity of supreme governor, and pater-familias of the kingdom. . . . Yet this rule admits of one exception; where a private person suffers some extraordinary damage, beyond the rest of the king's subjects, by a public nuisance; in which case he shall have a private satisfaction by action."). See also Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1551–52 (2016) (Thomas, J., concurring) (analyzing this excerpt from Blackstone's Commentaries in a modern Article III standing case).

---

[12] See, e.g., Evan Tsen Lee & Josephine Mason Ellis, The Standing Doctrine's Dirty Little Secret, 107 Nw. U. L. Rev. 169, 232 (2012) ("There is scant evidence in the constitutional record regarding the drafting of what became the cases or language of Article III . . . the wording of 'cases' or 'controversies' seemed almost an afterthought."); James Leonard & Joanne C. Brant, The Half-Open Door: Article III, The Injury-in-Fact Rule, and the Framers' Plan for Federal Courts of Limited Jurisdiction, 54 Rutgers L. Rev. 1, 38 (2001) ("[T]he Framers . . . said next to nothing about the meaning of the case and controversy language in Article III."); Cass R. Sunstein, What's Standing After Lujan? Of Citizen Suits, "Injuries," and Article III, 91 Mich. L. Rev. 163, 173 (1992) ("There is relatively little explicit material on the Framers' conception of 'case or controversy.'").

[13] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 21 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [Farrand's Records].

[14] Id. at 140; 2 , id., at 298.

[15] See Russell Wheeler, Extrajudicial Activities of the Early Supreme Court, 1973 Sup. Ct. Rev. 123, 129 ("[T]he Constitutional Convention did not reject [this] motion, as is often assumed. The motion simply did not emerge from the Committee of Detail, to which he submitted it.") (footnote omitted); Raoul Berger, Standing to Sue in Public Actions: Is it a Constitutional Requirement?, 78 Yale L.J. 816, 830 n.72 (1969) (stating that the advisory opinion proposal "was referred to the Committee o[f] Detail and was heard of no more").

[16] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 341.

[17] Compare U.S. Const. art. II, § 2 (authorizing the President to "require the [o]pinion, in writing, of the principal [o]fficer in each of the executive [d]epartments") with U.S. Const. art. III (containing no analogous provision authorizing the President to require the federal courts to issue advisory opinions). See also ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions (defining "advisory opinions" and explaining that the Supreme Court has interpreted Article III to forbid federal courts from issuing them).

[18] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 430.

[19] Id. ("Docr. Johnson moved to insert the words 'this Constitution and the' before the word 'laws.'").

[20] Id. ("Mr. Madison doubted whether it was not going too far to extend the jurisdiction of the Court generally to cases arising Under the Constitution, & whether it ought not to be limited to cases of a Judiciary Nature. The right of expounding the Constitution in cases not of this nature ought not to be given to that Department.").

[21] Id. ("The motion of Docr. Johnson was agreed to nem: con:[.]").

discounted Madison's misgivings about granting the Federal Judiciary power over constitutional cases because the Framers "generally supposed" that the federal courts' jurisdiction would be "constructively limited to cases of a Judiciary nature."[22] This exchange therefore suggests that there are some disputes that arise under federal law, yet are still outside the federal courts' authority to adjudicate because they are not of "a Judiciary Nature."[23] The records of the Convention do not specify, however, what Madison and the other Framers understood "Judiciary Nature" to mean.[24]

Although the ratification debates that followed the Convention cast little light on the meaning of Article III's "Case or Controversy" language, they do at least reveal a consensus that federal judges would operate within a limited sphere.[25] Faced with Anti-Federalist criticisms that the Constitution would empower federal judges to "enlarge the sphere of their power beyond all bounds,"[26] supporters of the Constitution argued in the Federalist Papers that "the judicial authority" would have "precise limits beyond which the federal courts cannot extend their jurisdiction."[27]

ArtIII.S2.C1.3 Rules of Justiciability

ArtIII.S2.C1.3.1 Overview of Rules of Justiciability and Cases or Controversies Requirement

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The judicial power extends to nine classes of cases and controversies, which fall into two general groups. In the words of Chief Justice John Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia:[1] "In the first, jurisdiction depends on the character of the cause, whoever may be the parties. This class comprehends 'all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United

[22] Id.

[23] Leonard & Brant, supra note 6, at 39 (arguing that "the reference to 'Judiciary Nature'" in the Convention records reflects "that the Framers believed that there were constitutional restrictions on the sort of cases that the federal courts could hear").

[24] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 13, at 430. See also Leonard & Brant, supra note 6, at 39 ("[T]he reference to 'Judiciary Nature' is somewhat cryptic.").

[25] See, e.g., Jonathan T. Molot, Principled Minimalism: Restriking the Balance Between Judicial Minimalism and Neutral Principles, 90 Va. L. Rev. 1753, 1761–63 (2004) (explaining that the Federalists and Anti-Federalists both agreed that "judicial intrusions into the political realm" should be "limited").

[26] Brutus No. XII pt. 1. See also Brutus No. XI (expressing concern that the federal courts would exceed their jurisdiction); Brutus No. XV (warning "that the supreme court under this constitution would be exalted above all other power in the government, and subject to no control").

[27] The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton). See also The Federalist No. 48 (James Madison) (stating that federal judges would have their powers limited by "landmarks, still less uncertain" than the restrictions limiting the political branches); The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) (arguing that the federal judiciary would be "the weakest of the three departments of power" in part because it would exercise "neither force nor will, but merely judgment"); The Federalist No. 81 (Alexander Hamilton) (emphasizing the "comparative weakness" of the Judicial Branch).

[1] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821).

States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.' This cause extends the jurisdiction of the court to all the cases described, without making in its terms any exception whatever, and without any regard to the condition of the party. If there be any exception, it is to be implied, against the express words of the article. In the second class, the jurisdiction depends entirely on the character of the parties. In this are comprehended 'controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state,' and 'between a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects.' If these be the parties, it is entirely unimportant, what may be the subject of controversy. Be it what it may, these parties have a constitutional right to come into the courts of the Union."[2]

Judicial power is "the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision."[3] The meaning attached to the terms "cases" and "controversies"[4] determines therefore the extent of the judicial power as well as the capacity of the federal courts to receive jurisdiction. According to Chief Justice Marshall, judicial power is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted in a case and a case arises only when a party asserts his rights "in a form prescribed by law."[5] "By cases and controversies are intended the claims of litigants brought before the courts for determination by such regular proceedings as are established by law or custom for the protection or enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs. Whenever the claim of a party under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States takes such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting upon it, then it has become a case. The term implies the existence of present or possible adverse parties whose contentions are submitted to the Court for adjudication."[6]

Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes once essayed a definition, which, however, presents a substantial problem of labels. "A 'controversy' in this sense must be one that is appropriate for judicial determination. A justiciable controversy is thus distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical character; from one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. It must be a real and substantial controversy admitting of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character, as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts."[7] Of the "case" and "controversy" requirement, Chief Justice Earl Warren admitted that "those two words have an iceberg quality, containing beneath their surface simplicity submerged complexities which go to the very heart of our constitutional form of government. Embodied in the words 'cases' and 'controversies' are two complementary but somewhat different limitations. In part those words limit the business of federal courts to questions presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of resolution through the judicial process. And in part those words define the role assigned to the Judiciary in a tripartite allocation of power to assure that the federal courts will not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of government. Justiciability is the term of art employed to give expression to this dual limitation placed upon federal courts by the case and

[2] 19 U.S. at 378.

[3] Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 356 (1911).

[4] The two terms may be used interchangeably, inasmuch as a "controversy," if distinguishable from a "case" at all, is so only because it is a less comprehensive word and includes only suits of a civil nature. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 239 (1937).

[5] Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824).

[6] In re Pacific Ry. Comm'n, 32 F. 241, 255 (C.C. Calif. 1887) (Justice Field). See also Smith v. Adams, 130 U.S. 167, 173–174 (1889).

[7] Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 240–241 (1937). Cf. Public Service Comm'n v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 242 (1952).

controversy doctrine."[8] Justice Felix Frankfurter perhaps best captured the flavor of the "case" and "controversy" requirement by noting that it takes the "expert feel of lawyers" often to note it.[9]

From these quotations may be isolated several factors which, in one degree or another, go to make up a "case" and "controversy."

Almost inseparable from the requirements of adverse parties and substantial enough interests to confer standing is the requirement that a real issue be presented, as contrasted with speculative, abstract, hypothetical, or moot issues. It has long been the Court's "considered practice not to decide abstract, hypothetical or contingent questions."[10] A party cannot maintain a suit "for a mere declaration in the air."[11] In Texas v. ICC,[12] the State attempted to enjoin the enforcement of the Transportation Act of 1920 on the ground that it invaded the reserved rights of the State. The Court dismissed the complaint as presenting no case or controversy, declaring: "It is only where rights, in themselves appropriate subjects of judicial cognizance, are being, or about to be, affected prejudicially by the application or enforcement of a statute that its validity may be called in question by a suitor and determined by an exertion of the judicial power."[13] And in Ashwander v. TVA,[14] the Court refused to decide any issue save that of the validity of the contracts between the Authority and the Company. "The pronouncements, policies and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and its directors, their motives and desires, did not give rise to a justiciable controversy save as they had fruition in action of a definite and concrete character constituting an actual or threatened interference with the rights of the person complaining."[15]

Concepts of real interest and abstract questions appeared prominently in United Public Workers v. Mitchell,[16] an omnibus attack on the constitutionality of the Hatch Act prohibitions on political activities by governmental employees. With one exception, none of the plaintiffs had violated the Act, though they stated they desired to engage in forbidden political actions. The Court found no justiciable controversy except in regard to the one, calling for "concrete legal issues, presented in actual cases, not abstractions," and seeing the suit as really an attack on the political expediency of the Act.[17]

---

[8] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 94–95 (1968).

[9] "The jurisdiction of the federal courts can be invoked only under circumstances which to the expert feel of lawyers constitute a 'case or controversy.'" Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Comm. v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 149, 150 (1951).

[10] Alabama State Fed'n of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U.S. 450, 461 (1945).

[11] Giles v. Harris, 189 U.S. 475, 486 (1903).

[12] 258 U.S. 158 (1922).

[13] 258 U.S. at 162.

[14] 297 U.S. 288 (1936).

[15] 297 U.S. at 324. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes cited New York v. Illinois, 274 U.S. 488 (1927), in which the Court dismissed as presenting abstract questions a suit about the possible effects of the diversion of water from Lake Michigan upon hypothetical water power developments in the indefinite future, and Arizona v. California, 283 U.S. 423 (1931), in which it was held that claims based merely upon assumed potential invasions of rights were insufficient to warrant judicial intervention. See also Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 484–485 (1923); New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U.S. 328, 338–340 (1926); Georgia v. Stanton, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 50, 76 (1868).

[16] 330 U.S. 75 (1947).

[17] 330 U.S. at 89–91. Justices Hugo Black and William Douglas dissented, contending that the controversy was justiciable. Justice William Douglas could not agree that the plaintiffs should have to violate the act and lose their jobs in order to test their rights. In CSC v. National Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973), the concerns expressed in Mitchell were largely ignored as the Court reached the merits in an anticipatory attack on the Act. Compare Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968).

ArtIII.S2.C1.3.2 Historical Background on Justiciability and Cases or Controversies Requirement

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The potential for abuse of judicial power was of concern to the Founding Fathers, leading them to establish limits on the circumstances in which the courts could consider cases. When, late in the Convention, a delegate proposed to extend the judicial power beyond the consideration of laws and treaties to include cases arising under the Constitution, James Madison's notes captured these concerns. "Mr. Madison doubted whether it was not going too far to extend the jurisdiction of the Court generally to cases arising under the Constitution, and whether it ought not to be limited to cases of a Judiciary Nature. The right of expounding the Constitution in cases not of this nature ought not to be given to that Department." Consequently, "[t]he motion of Docr. Johnson was agreed to nem: con: it being generally supposed that the jurisdiction given was constructively limited to cases of a Judiciary nature—."[1]

This passage, and the language of Article III, Section 2, makes clear that the Framers did not intend for federal judges to roam at large in construing the Constitution and laws of the United States, but rather preferred and provided for resolution of disputes arising in a "judicial" manner. This interpretation is reinforced by the refusal of the Convention to assign the judges the extra-judicial functions that some members of the Convention—Madison and James Wilson notably—conceived for them. Thus, for instance, the Convention four times voted down proposals for judges, along with Executive Branch officials, to sit on a council of revision with the power to veto laws passed by Congress.[2] A similar fate befell suggestions that the Chief Justice be a member of a privy council to assist the President[3] and that the President or either House of Congress be able to request advisory opinions of the Supreme Court.[4] The intent of the Framers in rejecting the latter proposal was early effectuated when the Justices declined a request of President Washington to tender him advice respecting legal issues growing out of United States neutrality between England and France in 1793.[5] Moreover, the refusal of the Justices to participate in a congressional plan for awarding veterans' pensions[6] bespoke a similar adherence to the restricted role of courts. These restrictions have been encapsulated in a series of principles or doctrines, the application of which determines whether

---

[1] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 430 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[2] The proposal was contained in the Virginia Plan. 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 21 (Max Farrand ed., 1911). For the four rejections, see id. at 97–104, 108–10, 138–40; 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 73–80, 298 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[3] Id. at 328–29, 342–44. Although a truncated version of the proposal was reported by the Committee on Detail, id. at 367, the Convention never took it up.

[4] Id. at 340–41. The proposal was referred to the Committee on Detail and never heard of again.

[5] 1 C. Warren, supra at 108–111; 3 Correspondence and Public Papers of John Jay 633–635 (H. Johnston ed., 1893); H. Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law: Selected Essays 50–52 (1961).

[6] Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792) (discussed in ArtIII.S1.4.4 Inherent Power to Issue Judgments).

an issue is met for judicial resolution and whether the parties raising it are entitled to have it judicially resolved. Constitutional restrictions are intertwined with prudential considerations in the expression of these principles and doctrines, and it is seldom easy to separate the two strands.[7]

ArtIII.S2.C1.4 Advisory Opinions

ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

An advisory opinion is a non-binding interpretation of the law by a court,[1] essentially the court providing advice on an abstract or hypothetical legal question. The Supreme Court has defined an "advisory opinion" as an "advance expression[ ] of legal judgment upon issues" that are not before a court in the form of litigation involving concrete claims by adverse litigants.[2] The Court has long held that the language in Article III authorizing federal court jurisdiction over certain "Cases" and "Controversies" prohibits federal courts from issuing advisory opinions.[3] The Court has explained that cases seeking advisory opinions are not justiciable, meaning that the federal courts lack jurisdiction to decide such cases.[4]

The Supreme Court has recognized two primary reasons for the limitation on advisory opinions. First, the Court has explained that the "implicit policies in Article III" and separation of powers principles confine federal courts to assessing the validity of actions by the other branches of government only in the context of a case or controversy.[5] Second, the advisory opinion limitation promotes the prudential consideration that federal courts should decide legal questions in the context of an active, adversarial dispute. The Supreme Court has

---

[7] See, e.g., Justice Louis Brandeis dissenting in Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 341, 345–348 (1936). Cf. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 97 (1968); Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U.S. 549, 568–575 (1947).

[1] Advisory Opinion Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[2] United States v. Fruehauf, 365 U.S. 146, 157 (1961).

[3] E.g., Chi. & S. Air Lines v. Waterman S. S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 113–14 (1948) ("It has also been the firm and unvarying practice of Constitutional Courts to render no judgments not binding and conclusive on the parties and none that are subject to later review or alteration by administrative action.") (citing Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409; United States v. Ferreira, 13 How. 40 (1852); Gordon v. United States, 117 U.S 697; In re Sanborn, 148 U.S. 222; Interstate Commerce Comm'n v. Brimson, 154 U.S. 447; La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U.S. 423; Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346 (1911); United States v. Jefferson Electric Mfg. Co., 291 U.S. 386)).

[4] See, e.g., Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 361–63 (1911). For discussion of other constitutional requirements related to justiciability, see generally Justiciability .

[5] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 96 (1968). See also Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 357 (1911) ("[T]he right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional [can] only be exercised when a proper case between opposing parties was submitted for judicial determination . . . there [is] no general veto power in the court upon the legislation of Congress.") (citing Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 176–80 (1803)); Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U.S. 738, 819 (1824) ("[The Judicial Power] is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted to it by a party who asserts his rights in the form prescribed by law.").

concluded that courts operate best when confronted with disputes that involve "a clash of adversary argument exploring every aspect of a multifaced situation embracing conflicting and demanding interests."[6]

The ban on advisory opinions has been recognized as being at the "core of Article III," and one commentator has noted that "other justiciability doctrines exist largely to ensure that federal courts will not issue advisory opinions."[7] Despite the importance of the rule against advisory opinions, the Supreme Court has at times lacked precision in explaining when a legal opinion becomes "advisory" in nature.[8] In particular, cases from the 1920s and 1930s grappled with the question of whether the prohibition on advisory opinions also banned federal courts from issuing declaratory judgments—binding decisions that establish the legal rights of the parties without awarding other relief.[9] The following essays provide an overview of the prohibition against advisory opinions,[10] then discuss the relationship between advisory opinions and declaratory judgments.[11]

ArtIII.S2.C1.4.2 Advisory Opinion Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

At the time of the Founding, both English law[1] and existing state constitutions[2] allowed courts to issue advisory opinions. Nonetheless, the Framers declined to include explicit [6] Flast, 392 U.S. at 96–97 (1968) (quoting United States v. Fruehauf, 365 U.S. 146, 157 (1961)). See also Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 108 (1969) ("[T]he federal courts established pursuant to Article III of the Constitution do not render advisory opinions. . . . '[C]oncrete legal issues, presented in actual cases, not abstractions,' are requisite.").

[7] Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 2.2 (6th ed. 2012). See also California v. Texas, 141 S. Ct. 2104, 2116 (2021) ("To find standing here to attack an unenforceable statutory provision would allow a federal court to issue what would amount to an advisory opinion without the possibility of any judicial relief." (internal quotes and citation omitted)); Carney v. Adams, 141 S. Ct. 493, 498 (2020).

[8] Evan Tsen Lee, Deconstitutionalizing Justiciability: The Example of Mootness, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 603, 648 (1992) (arguing that the Supreme Court has been "extremely sloppy" in the use of the phrase "advisory opinions").

[9] See ArtIII.S2.C1.4.3 Advisory Opinions and Declaratory Judgments.

[10] See ArtIII.S2.C1.4.2 Advisory Opinion Doctrine.

[11] See ArtIII.S2.C1.4.3 Advisory Opinions and Declaratory Judgments.

[1] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 96 (1968) ("[T]he power of English judges to delivery advisory opinions was well established [at the Founding].") (citing 3 K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise 127–128 (1958)). See also 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries 162 (1765) (noting that Members of the House of Lords "have a right to be attended, and constantly are, by the judges of the court of king's bench and commonpleas, and such of the barons of the exchequer as are of the degree of the coif, or have been made serjeants at law; as likewise by the masters of the court of chancery; for their advice in point of law, and for the greater dignity of their proceedings."). But see Sackville's Case (1760), 28 Eng. Rep. 940, 2 Eden, 371 (issuing a formal, written extrajudicial opinion to the King as to whether an army officer could be tried by court martial, but noting that, according to Lord Mansfield, the judges are "very averse to giving extra-judicial opinions, especially where they affect a particular case").

[2] Mass. Const. ch. III, art. II. ("Each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor or the council, shall have authority to require the opinions of the justices of the supreme judicial court, upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions."). See also N.H. Const. art. 74 ("Each branch of the legislature as well as the governor and council shall have authority to require the opinions of the justices of the supreme court upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions.").

language in the Constitution that would have imposed an advisory role for the Supreme Court or other federal courts.[3] The final version of Article III states only that the "judicial power shall extend to" certain categories of "Cases" and "Controversies."[4] Although that language does not conclusively resolve the question of whether courts have the power to issue advisory opinions,[5] the Supreme Court resolved the issue early in the nation's history in two key cases.

The Supreme Court first issued a decision related to advisory opinions (albeit without using the term) in 1792, in Hayburn's Case.[6] In that case, the Supreme Court considered a petition for a writ of mandamus to direct a federal circuit court to proceed on a claim seeking a federal pension. The petitioner argued that the courts had failed to give effect to an act of Congress. The Court noted, however, that "the reasons assigned by the judges," including Supreme Court Justices sitting on the circuit courts, "for declining to execute the . . . act of Congress, involve a great constitutional question."[7] Specifically, those judges contended that pension decisions under the Act were not judicial duties that Congress could constitutionally assign to the courts because the Act subjected such decisions to "revision and control" by the legislature and an officer in the Executive department.[8] They determined that such control was "radically inconsistent with the independence of that judicial power which is vested in the courts" by the Constitution.[9] While Hayburn's Case remained pending, Congress enacted legislation providing an alternative means of relief for the pensioners; the Court then dismissed the mandamus petition without deciding the underlying constitutional question.[10] However, the circuit court opinions declining to issue non-final pension decisions have become an accepted part of the Court's justiciability jurisprudence. The Court has since confirmed that it has no jurisdiction where an opinion would be subject to later review and revision, as such a ruling can amount to no more than advice.[11]

---

[3] See James Madison, James Madison's Notes of the Constitutional Convention, Max Farrand, 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 17–23 (1911) (providing for "a convenient number of the National Judiciary, ought to compose a council of revision with authority to examine every act of the National Legislature before it shall operate"); Virginia (Randolph) Plan as Amended (providing that "the jurisdiction of the national Judiciary shall extend to . . . questions which involve the national peace and harmony."); James Madison, James Madison's Notes of the Constitutional Convention, Max Farrand, 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 334 ("Each branch of the Legislature, as well as the Supreme Executive shall have authority to require the opinions of the supreme Judicial Court upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions."). See also James Madison, James Madison's Notes of the Constitutional Convention, Max Farrand, 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 96–105 (1911) ("It was quite foreign from the nature of [the judicial] office to make them judges of the policy of public measures.") (quoting Elbridge Gerry, a delegate from Massachusetts).

[4] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2.

[5] Compare with U.S. Const. art. II, § 2 ("The President . . . may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments.") (emphasis added).

[6] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792).

[7] Id. at 410, footnote.

[8] Id..

[9] Id. See also Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211, 219 (1995) (holding that congressional statute that "retroactively command[ed] the federal courts" to reopen final judgments was unconstitutional). But see Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897, 905 (2018) (plurality) ("The separation of powers, among other things, prevents Congress from exercising the judicial power . . . At the same time, the legislative power is the power to make law, and Congress can make laws that apply retroactively to pending lawsuits, even when it effectively ensures that one side wins."); Bank Markazi v. Peterson, 136 S. Ct. 1310, 1325 (2016) ("Congress may indeed direct courts to apply new enacted, outcome-altering legislation in pending civil cases."). See also Constitution Annotated III.3.2.2.3.

[10] Id.

[11] See, e.g., Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346–48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring) (citing Hayburn's Case for the proposition that "the jurisdiction of federal courts is limited to actual cases and controversies; and that they have no power to give advisory opinions"). See also Chi. & S. Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp. 333 U.S. 103, 113–14 (1948) ("To revise or review an administrative decision which has only the force of a recommendation . . . would be to render an advisory opinion in its most obnoxious form."); United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.)

The Supreme Court produced the second early precedent against advisory opinions in 1793. In that year, President George Washington, seeking to determine the United States' legal rights and obligations in relation to ongoing conflicts between the European powers of France and Britain, sent a letter through his Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, to the Justices of the Supreme Court.[12] The letter asked if the Justices would be willing to render opinions on a number of legal questions of "considerable difficulty" that "do not give a cognizance of them to the tribunals of the country."[13] The Justices declined to provide an answer. Chief Justice John Jay drafted a response to the President explaining that "[t]he lines of separation drawn by the Constitution between the three departments of government . . . and our being judges of a court in the last resort . . . are considerations which afford strong arguments against the propriety of our extrajudicially deciding the questions alluded to."[14] Although the letter was not an official opinion of the Court, the Court has since cited it as a major source of the rule against advisory opinions.[15]

Subsequent precedents and practice have reaffirmed the prohibition on advisory opinions but raised some questions about its scope. In the 1948 case Chicago & Southern Air Lines v. Waterman S. S. Corp., the Court refused a private party's request for review of an order of the Civil Aeronautics Board that was, in effect, merely a recommendation to the President for his final action.[16] The Court explained that a judicial decision on the matter would be "an advisory opinion in its most obnoxious form—advice that the President has not asked, tendered at the demand of a private litigant, on a subject concededly within the President's exclusive, ultimate control."[17] While the Court's refusal to act was based in part on the risk of intruding on the President's authority, the Court also made clear that was not the sole relevant factor, as the Judiciary had "early and wisely determined that it would not give advisory opinions even when asked by the Chief Executive."[18]

The majority opinion in Chicago & Southern Air Lines stated that it has been "the firm and unvarying practice of Constitutional Courts to render no judgments not binding and conclusive on the parties and none that are subject to later review or alteration by administrative action."[19] However, while the Court has declined to issue advisory opinions via formal judicial decisions, Supreme Court Justices have at times offered their thoughts on the law in an informal capacity. For instance, in response to a letter calling for suggestions to improve in the operation of the courts, Supreme Court Justices drafted a letter suggesting that the requirement that Justices ride circuit was unconstitutional, though apparently they never 40, 48 (1852) (noting that the powers of a commissioner to "adjust claims to lands or money" is not "judicial . . . in the sense in which judicial power is granted by the Constitution to the courts of the United States").

[12] Letter from Thomas Jefferson, Sec. of State, to Chief Justice Jay and Associate Justices (July 18, 1793), reprinted in Richard H. Fallon, Jr., et al., Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 50–51 (7th ed. 2015).

[13] Id.

[14] Letter from Chief Justice Jay and Associate Justices to President George Washington (August 8, 1793) reprinted in Richard H. Fallon, Jr., et al., Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 52 (7th ed. 2015).

[15] Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 302 (2004) (plurality) (noting that 1793 correspondence involved "categorical" statement by the Court that the "giving of advisory opinions" was beyond the judiciary's power); Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 96 n.14 (1968) (noting that "[t]he rule against advisory opinions was established as early as 1793 . . . and the rule has been adhered to without deviation."). See also Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 354 (1911) (citing the 1793 correspondence in refusing to take jurisdiction over a case brought under a statute creating a lawsuit devised to test the constitutionality of a different statute).

[16] 333 U.S. 103 (1948).

[17] Id. at 113.

[18] Id.

[19] Id.

sent it.[20] Justice William Johnson communicated to President James Monroe, apparently with the knowledge and approval of the other Justices, the views of the Justices on the constitutionality of internal improvements legislation.[21] In addition, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes sent a letter to Senator Burton K. Wheeler questioning the constitutionality of a proposal from President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's administration to increase the membership of the Supreme Court and have the Court sit in divisions.[22] Other Justices have individually served as advisers and confidants of Presidents to one degree or another.[23]

Some commentators also contend that the precise meaning of the ban on advisory opinions became blurred in the twentieth century, as the Court has used the phrase to refer to a number of different distinct limitations on federal courts.[24] Primarily, the Court has used the term in reference to the Article III justiciability limitations on federal courts' jurisdiction, such as mootness or standing.[25] However, the Court has also linked the ban on advisory opinions to modern prudential doctrines, such as the Supreme Court's practice of not deciding questions in state court cases that have been resolved on a separate and independent state law ground,[26] and the practices of courts to avoid reaching constitutional issues or questions not necessary to the determination of the case.[27] These varying uses of the term "advisory opinion," combined

[20] 2 The Documentary History of the Supreme Court of the United States, 1789–1800: The Justices on Circuit: 1790–1794, at 89–91 (Maeva Marcus ed., 1985).

[21] 1 C. Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 595–597 (1926).

[22] Reorganization of the Judiciary: Hearings on S. 1392 Before the Senate Judiciary Committee, 75th Congress, 1st Sess. (1937), pt. 3, 491. See also Chief Justice Roger B. Taney's private advisory opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury that a tax levied on the salaries of federal judges violated the Constitution. S. Tyler, Memoirs of Roger B. Taney 432–435 (1876).

[23] E.g., Acheson, Removing the Shadow Cast on the Courts, 55 A.B.A.J. 919 (1969); Jaffe, Professors and Judges as Advisors to Government: Reflections on the Roosevelt-Frankfurter Relationship, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 366 (1969). The issue earned the attention of the Supreme Court when it upheld the congressionally authorized service of federal judges on the Sentencing Commission. Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 397–408 (1989) (citing examples and detailed secondary sources).

[24] See Evan Tsen Lee, Deconstitutionalizing Justiciability: The Example of Mootness, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 603, 648 (1992); see also Wright, Miller, & Cooper, 13 Fed. Prac. & Proc. Juris. § 3529.1 (3d ed.) (discussing different uses of the term).

[25] See, e.g., Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975) (noting that "[t]he exercise of judicial power under Art. III of the Constitution depends on the existence of a case or controversy" and that this is tied to the lack of power to issue advisory opinions); North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244, 246 (1971) (dismissing case on grounds of mootness, noting that "this Court [has] no power to issue advisory opinions"); Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45, 48 (1969) (in holding that recent amendment by Colorado Legislature rendered case moot, observing that "The case has therefore lost its character as a present, live controversy of the kind that must exist if we are to avoid advisory opinions on abstract propositions of law"); Pub. Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 89 (1947) (in finding that plaintiffs' claims not a justiciable "case or controversy" under Article III, noting that "[a]s is well known, the federal courts established pursuant to Article III of the Constitution do not render advisory opinions"); St. Pierre v. United States, 319 U.S. 41, 42 (1943) ("A federal court is without power to decide moot questions or to give advisory opinions which cannot affect the rights of the litigants in the case before it.").

[26] See Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117, 126 (1945) ("We are not permitted to render an advisory opinion, and if the same judgment would be rendered by the state court after we corrected its views of federal laws, our review could amount to nothing more than an advisory opinion."). See also Lambrix v. Singletary, 520 U.S. 518, 522–23 (1997) ("We in fact lack jurisdiction to review such independently supported judgments on direct appeal: since the state-law determination is sufficient to sustain the decree, any opinion of this Court on the federal question would be purely advisory.").

[27] See Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346–48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring) (noting that the federal courts "have no power to give advisory opinions" and discussing rules by which the Court has "avoiding passing upon a large part of all the constitutional questions pressed upon it for decision"). See also Lee, supra note 24, at 648–49 (discussing application of "advisory opinion" label to dicta).

with the fact that the Court has referenced it less frequently than any other justiciability rule,[28] have created confusion among scholars or practitioners about the precise meaning of the prohibition.

Beyond its constitutional role, the Court's rule against advisory opinions has repeatedly been recognized or applied in other, non-constitutional contexts. For instance, as noted, the Court has invoked the ban on advisory opinions to justify its practice of not deciding questions in state court cases that have been decided on a separate and independent state law ground.[29] The Court has also suggested that the advisory opinion ban might be relevant to other legal questions, such as whether the Court should issue purely prospective decisions,[30] whether a federal court should render alternative holdings or issue dicta,[31] and whether individual Justices should "engage[ ] in extrajudicial expression of their legal views."[32] As these references show, although the ban on advisory opinions is only rarely invoked by the Supreme Court, its implications are felt throughout the Court's jurisprudence and throughout the law.[33]

ArtIII.S2.C1.4.3 Advisory Opinions and Declaratory Judgments

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In contrast to a non-binding advisory opinion, a declaratory judgment is a "binding adjudication that establishes the rights and other legal relations of the parties without

---

[28] Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 2.2 (6th ed. 2012) (noting that "the Supreme Court expressly refers to the ban on advisory opinions less frequently than the other justiciability doctrines").

[29] See Herb, 324 U.S. at 126 ("We are not permitted to render an advisory opinion, and if the same judgment would be rendered by the state court after we corrected its views of federal laws, our review could amount to nothing more than an advisory opinion."). See also Lambrix, 520 U.S. at 522–23 ("We in fact lack jurisdiction to review such independently supported judgments on direct appeal: since the state-law determination is sufficient to sustain the decree, any opinion of this Court on the federal question would be purely advisory."). But see 16B Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller, et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 4021 (3d ed. 2018) (explanation that adequate-state-ground rule rests on prohibition against rendering advisory opinions is "circular"; in addition, "advisory opinion doctrine is [ ] inadequate to describe the full range of practice with respect to state law questions.").

[30] Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 301 (1967) (refusing to make a criminal procedure rule generally retroactive, holding it applied only to future cases plus the case announcing the rule, despite the resulting inequality to other pending cases, noting that the rule could not be purely prospective because of "[s]ound policies of decision-making, rooted in the command of Article III of the Constitution that we resolve issues solely in concrete cases or controversies"). See also Richard H. Fallon, Jr., et al., Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 54 (7th ed. 2015) (evaluating arguments about whether purely prospective decision would constitute an advisory opinion forbidden by Article III).

[31] See, e.g., Fallon, supra note 30, at 55 (asking whether "[w]hen a Court renders alternative holdings, has it violated constitutional norms?").

[32] Id. at 56 (citing examples of extrajudicial expressions of Justices' views).

[33] In a few other areas, courts issue opinions that might be considered "advisory," insofar as they do not directly affect the parties before the court. See Thomas Healy, The Rise of Unnecessary Constitutional Rulings, 83 N.C. L. Rev. 847 (2005) (considering the Court's examination of "unnecessary" constitutional issues in four contexts, qualified immunity, habeas corpus, harmless error, and Fourth Amendment good faith, and considering whether and when this practice can be consistent with the ban on advisory opinions). However, the Supreme Court has not addressed whether this practice can be reconciled with the ban on advisory opinions.

providing for or ordering enforcement."[1] While the two types of decisions are distinct, they share some similarities—for instance, neither directly yields an enforceable judgment. Thus, some Supreme Court cases from the 1920s and 1930s held that requests for declaratory relief were functionally requests for advisory opinions and thus outside the jurisdiction of the federal courts.[2] By contrast, other roughly contemporaneous decisions suggested that federal courts could issue declaratory judgments.[3]

Congress took up the issue in the Federal Declaratory Judgment Act of 1934.[4] The 1934 Act provided that "[i]n cases of actual controversy" federal courts could "declare rights and other legal relations of any interested party petitioning for such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be prayed."[5] The Senate report on the Act stated:

> The declaratory judgment differs in no essential respect from any other judgment except that it is not followed by a decree for damages, injunction, specific performance, or other immediately coercive decree. It declares conclusively and finally the rights of parties in litigations over a contested issue, a form of relief which often suffices to settle controversies and fully administer justice.[6]

The Supreme Court unanimously upheld the Act against a constitutional challenge in Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth.[7] In Aetna Life, the plaintiff, an insurance company, brought suit under the Act seeking a judicial declaration of its obligations to the insured defendant.[8] The Court noted that the 1934 Act, "in its limitation to 'cases of actual controversy,' manifestly has regard to the constitutional provision and is operative only in respect to controversies which are such in the constitutional sense."[9] In concluding that the case before it was not a request for an advisory opinion, the Court described advisory opinions as opinions on a "hypothetical basis," in contrast with "adjudication[s] of present right upon established fact."[10] The Court concluded that justiciable controversies under the Constitution must be concrete, as "distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character," and must be "admitting of specific relief through a decree of conclusive character."[11] In Aetna Life, those requirements were met because the parties' dispute of fact on the insured's disability or lack thereof was "essentially the same whether it [was] presented by the insured or the insurer"

---

[1] Declaratory Judgment, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[2] See Piedmont & Northern Ry. v. United States, 280 U.S. 469, 477 (1930) ("What plaintiffs are seeking is, therefore, in substance, a declaratory judgment that the Railway is within the exemption contained in paragraph 22 of the Act. Such a remedy is not within either the statutory or the equity jurisdiction of federal courts."); Willing v. Chi. Auditorium Ass'n, 277 U.S. 274, 289 (1928) ("What the plaintiff seeks is simply a declaratory judgment. To grant that relief is beyond the power conferred upon the federal judiciary.").

[3] Fidelity Nat'l Bank & Tr. Co. v. Swope, 274 U.S. 123 (1927); Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Wallace, 288 U.S. 249 (1933). Wallace was cited with approval inMedimmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 120 (2007) ("Article III's limitation of federal courts' jurisdiction to "Cases' and "Controversies,' reflected in the "actual controversy' requirement of the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a), [does not] require[ ] a patent licensee to terminate or be in breach of its license agreement before it can seek a declaratory judgment that the underlying patent is invalid, unenforceable, or not infringed.").

[4] 48 Stat. 955, as amended, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201–2202 .

[5] 48 Stat. 955. The language remains quite similar. 28 U.S.C. § 2201.

[6] S. Rep. No. 1005, 73d Congress, 2d Sess. (1934), 2. See also H. Rep. No. 1264, 73d Congress, 2d Sess. (1934), 2 (stating the intent "to confer upon the courts the power to exercise in some instances preventive relief; a function now performed rather clumsily by our equitable proceedings and inadequately by the law courts").

[7] 300 U.S. 227 (1937).

[8] Id. at 237–39.

[9] Id. at 239–40.

[10] Id. at 242.

[11] Id. at 240–41.

and could be cleanly resolved by a court.[12] As the Court explained, "[i]t is the nature of the controversy, not the method of its presentation or the particular party who presents it, that is determinative."[13]

The holding in Aetna Life does not dictate that requests for a declaratory judgment brought under the Declaratory Judgment Act should always be regarded as a "case or controversy." In contrast with Aetna Life, in the 1998 case Calderon v. Ashmus,[14] the Court held there was no case or controversy presented when a California inmate brought a class action lawsuit on behalf of all California death row inmates under the Declaratory Judgment Act. The inmates had sought a declaration that California death row inmates fell under certain provisions of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which would have affected the statute of limitations that applied to the inmates' federal habeas proceedings challenging their convictions or their sentences.[15] In a ruling that relied on the doctrine of standing, the Court cited the lack of an imminent need for the resolution of the issues presented and noted that even a favorable resolution for the plaintiff would only resolve the "single issue" of the statute of limitations, leaving the remainder of the dispute to other lawsuits.[16] In light of those facts, the Court concluded that the question presented was not "concrete enough" to justify Article III jurisdiction.[17]

As a general matter, the Court has insisted that "the requirements for a justiciable case or controversy are no less strict in a declaratory judgment proceeding than in any other type of suit,"[18] but has declined to adopt a bright-line test for when courts may issue declaratory judgments. As one decision explained: "The difference between an abstract question and a 'controversy' contemplated by the Declaratory Judgment Act is necessarily one of degree, and it would be difficult, if it would be possible, to fashion a precise test for determining in every case whether there is such a controversy."[19] Rather, the Court must consider in each case "whether the facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment."[20] Even if a declaratory judgment case presents a potentially justiciable case or controversy, the Court is not required to exercise its jurisdiction.[21]

Parties commonly seek declaratory judgments to settle disputes and identify rights in private areas, including insurance and patents in particular but extending into all areas of civil litigation. By statute, declaratory judgments are not available in tax cases.[22] Moreover, the Court has demonstrated reluctance to issue declaratory judgments resolving important

[12] Id. at 244.

[13] Id.

[14] 523 U.S. 740 (1998).

[15] Id. at 742–43.

[16] Id. at 748–49.

[17] Id. at 749.

[18] Alabama State Fed'n of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U.S. 450, 461 (1945).

[19] Maryland Cas. Co. v. Pacific Coal & Oil Co., 312 U.S. 270, 273 (1941).

[20] Id.

[21] Brillhart v. Excess Ins. Co. of Am., 316 U.S. 491, 494 (1942); Pub. Serv. Comm'n v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 243 (1952); Pub. Affairs Assocs. v. Rickover, 369 U.S. 111, 112 (1962). See also Wilton v. Seven Falls Co., 515 U.S. 277 (1995).

[22] Congress added an exception to the Declaratory Judgment Act with respect to federal taxes in 1935. 49 Stat. 1027. The Tax Injunction Act of 1937, 50 Stat. 738, 28 U.S.C. § 1341, prohibited federal injunctive relief directed at state taxes but said nothing about declaratory relief. It was held to apply, however, in California v. Grace Brethren Church, 457 U.S. 393 (1982). Earlier, in Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. v. Huffman, 319 U.S. 293 (1943), the Court had reserved the issue but held that considerations of comity should preclude federal courts from giving declaratory relief in such cases. Cf. Fair Assessment in Real Estate Ass'n v. McNary, 454 U.S. 100 (1981).

questions of public law, especially regarding the validity of legislation.[23] In such cases, the Court has strictly insisted that the controversy presented meet justiciability requirements such as concreteness and ripeness.[24] Notwithstanding those restrictions, several noteworthy constitutional decisions have been rendered in declaratory judgment actions.[25]

ArtIII.S2.C1.5 Adversity

ArtIII.S2.C1.5.1 Overview of Adversity Requirement

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The requirement that a case involve litigants who are genuinely adverse to each other imposes another limitation on the justiciability of disputes in federal court.[1] The Supreme Court has interpreted Article III of the Constitution to forbid federal courts from issuing binding judgments in cases that do not present "an honest and actual antagonistic assertion of rights by one party against another."[2] According to the Court, this adversity requirement helps ensure that the parties provide the Judiciary the factual information and legal advocacy it needs to resolve issues correctly.[3] Thus, where all the parties in a case seek the same result, there is generally no "Case" or "Controversy" under Article III, and the Court lacks jurisdiction to issue a ruling.[4] To the extent this limitation on federal jurisdiction derives from Article III of the Constitution, the courts may not modify it, and Congress cannot alter it without amending the Constitution.[5] [23] E.g., Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288 (1936); Electric Bond Co. v. SEC, 303 U.S. 419 (1938); United Pub. Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947); Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U.S. 426 (1948); Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U.S. 549, 572–73 (1947).

---

[24] United Pub. Workers, 330 U.S. 75; Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961); Altvater v. Freeman, 319 U.S. 359 (1943); International Longshoremen's Union v. Boyd, 347 U.S. 222 (1954); Pub. Serv. Comm'n v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237 (1952).

[25] E.g., Currin v. Wallace, 306 U.S. 1 (1939); Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325 (1939); Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288 (1936); Evers v. Dwyer, 358 U.S. 202 (1958).

[1] See, e.g., GTE Sylvania, Inc. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 445 U.S. 375, 382 (1980) (holding that Article III limits "the business of federal courts to questions presented in an adversary context") (quoting Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968)).

[2] See United States Nat'l Bank of Or. v. Indep. Ins. Agents of Am., Inc., 508 U.S. 439, 446 (1993) (quoting Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 359 (1911)) (brackets omitted). See also Ayestas v. Davis, 138 S. Ct. 1080, 1090 (2018) ("[C]ases and controversies in our legal system are adversarial in nature.").

[3] See, e.g., GTE Sylvania, 445 U.S. at 382–83 (stating that "[t]he clash of adverse parties" in a lawsuit "sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult questions") (quoting O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 494 (1974)) (ellipses omitted).

[4] Moore v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 47, 48 (1971) (per curiam). See also, e.g., GTE Sylvania, 445 U.S. at 383.

[5] See, e.g., Muskrat, 219 U.S. at 362 (holding that Congress "exceeded the limitations of legislative authority" by purporting to authorize federal courts to adjudicate disputes between non-adverse parties); id. at 361 (holding that Article III limits the federal judicial power to "determin[ing] actual controversies arising between adverse litigants").

The adversity requirement is closely related to other constitutional justiciability doctrines, especially Article III standing[6] and the bar against advisory opinions.[7] As explained in greater detail below, however, the adversity requirement has diminished in importance at the same time as the Supreme Court has applied other Article III justiciability doctrines—particularly Article III standing—more stringently over time.[8]

ArtIII.S2.C1.5.2 Early Adversity Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court's 1850 opinion in Lord v. Veazie is the seminal Supreme Court case establishing the adversity requirement.[1] The defendant in Lord, John W. Veazie, wanted the legal right to use the Penobscot River in Maine for transportation and navigation.[2] A gentleman named Moor, however, claimed to possess the sole right to navigate the river.[3] Veazie therefore tried to obtain a judicial declaration that he, not Moor, had the right to use the river.[4] Thus, Veazie and his brother-in-law,[5] Nathaniel Lord, entered into a contract warranting that Veazie held "the right to use the waters of the Penobscot River."[6] Lord then sued Veazie and asked the court to decide whether Veazie or Moor held the rights to the river.[7] [6] See, e.g., Flast, 392 U.S. at 100 ("[T]he standing requirement is closely related to, although more general than, the rule that federal courts will not entertain friendly suits or those which are feigned or collusive in nature.") (internal citations omitted); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962) ("Have the appellants alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions? This is the gist of the question of standing.") (emphases added).

---

[7] See, e.g., Princeton Univ. v. Schmid, 455 U.S. 100, 102 (1982) (per curiam) ("We do not sit to decide hypothetical issues or to give advisory opinions about issues as to which there are not adverse parties before us.") (emphases added); Flast, 392 U.S. at 96–97 ("[T]he rule against advisory opinions also recognizes that such suits often 'are not pressed before the Court with that clear concreteness provided . . . from a clash of adversary argument[.]'") (quoting United States v. Fruehauf, 365 U.S. 146, 157 (1961)) (emphases added); Muskrat, 219 U.S. at 362 ("If such actions . . . are sustained, the result will be that this court, instead of keeping within the limits of judicial power, and deciding cases or controversies arising between opposing parties . . . will be required to give opinions in the nature of advice concerning legislative action[.]") (emphases added). See generally ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions (analyzing the bar on advisory opinions).

[8] See, e.g., United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 755–63 (2013) (rejecting argument that defendant's nondefense of statute challenged by plaintiff rendered the parties insufficiently adverse partly because the parties had satisfied Article III's standing requirements).

[1] 49 U.S. (8 How.) 251 (1850).

[2] Id. at 252.

[3] Id. at 251.

[4] See id. at 252.

[5] Id. at 253 ("[T]he plaintiff in error is the son-in-law, and the defendant in error is the son, of said Samuel Veazie.").

[6] Id. at 252.

[7] Id.

ArtIII.S2.C1.5.2
Early Adversity Doctrine

The Lord Court determined that the federal courts could not—and should not—adjudicate the case.[8] The Court first explained that federal courts exist to resolve disputes between adverse parties.[9] Manufacturing a lawsuit between non-adverse parties solely to obtain a judicial opinion deciding a legal question, according to the Court, was an abuse of the judicial system.[10] Applying that principle to the facts of Lord, the Court observed that there was no true dispute between Lord and Veazie, as they entered into their contract solely to obtain a judicial determination regarding which person held the rights to use the Penobscot River.[11] The Court further protested that Lord had not named the true adverse party to that controversy—namely, Moor—as a defendant in the case, and had not even informed Moor of the lawsuit.[12] Thus, the case was a collusive suit between two friendly parties that offered Moor no opportunity to defend his interests.[13]

On various occasions during the remainder of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court invoked the principles it applied in Lord to evaluate whether litigants were sufficiently adverse.[14] It was not until its 1911 opinion in Muskrat v. United States,[15] however, that the Court held that the rule against deciding cases between non-adverse parties had a constitutional dimension.[16] The plaintiffs in Muskrat sought to invalidate certain federal statutes affecting the allotment of Indian lands.[17] Congress passed a law purporting to authorize the plaintiffs—and only those plaintiffs—to challenge those statutes in federal court.[18] The plaintiffs, invoking that law, sued the United States to determine whether the allotment statutes were constitutional.[19] Even though Congress purported to authorize the [8] See id. at 256 (holding that the judgment issued by the lower court was "a nullity and void").

[9] See id. at 255 ("It is the office of courts of justice to decide the rights of persons and of property, when the persons interested cannot adjust them by agreement between themselves,—and to do this upon the full hearing of both parties.").

[10] See id. ("[A]ny attempt, by a mere colorable dispute, to obtain the opinion of the court upon a question of law which a party desires to know for his own interest or his own purposes, when there is no real and substantial controversy between those who appear as adverse parties to the suit, is an abuse which courts of justice have always reprehended, and treated as a punishable contempt of court.").

[11] See id. at 254 ("The court is satisfied . . . that the contract set out in the pleadings was made for the purpose of instituting this suit, and that there is no real dispute between the plaintiff and defendant. On the contrary, it is evident that their interest in the question brought here for decision is one and the same, and not adverse; and that in these proceedings the plaintiff and defendant are attempting to procure the opinion of this court upon a question of law.").

[12] See id. ("[T]he plaintiff and defendant are attempting to procure the opinion of this court upon a question of law, in the decision of which they have a common interest as opposed to that of other persons, who are not parties to this suit, who had no knowledge of it while it was pending in the Circuit Court, and no opportunity of being heard there in defence of their rights.").

[13] See id. ("[T]heir conduct is the more objectionable, because they have brought up the question upon a statement of facts agreed on between themselves, without the knowledge of the parties with whom they were in truth in dispute.").

[14] Compare, e.g., Chicago & G. T. Ry. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345 (1892) ("It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of [a] legislative act."); Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 66 U.S. 419, 425–26 (1861) ("This appeal must be dismissed. Selah Chamberlain is, in fact, both appellant and appellee. . . . There is no material difference between this case and that of Lord vs. Veazie[.] . . . It is plain that this is no adversary proceeding, no controversy between the appellant and the nominal appellee."), with, e.g., Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Tr. Co., 15 S. Ct. 673, 674–75, 679 (1895) (determining that a particular lawsuit between a company and its stockholders "was not a collusive one"), vacated, 158 U.S. 601 (1895).

[15] 219 U.S. 346 (1911).

[16] See Martin H. Redish & Andrianna D. Kastanek, Settlement Class Actions, The Case-or-Controversy Requirement, and the Nature of the Adjudicatory Process, 73 U. Chi. L. Rev. 545, 567 (2006) (describing Muskrat as "[t]he leading decision" for the proposition "that the case-or-controversy language of Article III mandates litigant adverseness").

[17] 219 U.S. at 348–49.

[18] Id. at 350–51, 361–62.

[19] Id. at 348–50.

plaintiffs to file their lawsuit in federal court,[20] the Muskrat Court still concluded that the Judiciary lacked jurisdiction to decide the case.[21] The Court, invoking Article III, stated that the judicial power conferred by the Constitution only authorizes the federal courts to decide "cases" and "controversies"[22] between adverse parties.[23] The Court determined that the plaintiffs in Muskrat were not asking the courts to determine a controversy between adverse litigants as the Constitution contemplated.[24] Although the plaintiffs had named the United States as the defendant in their case, the Court determined that the United States did not have any interest adverse to the plaintiffs.[25] According to the Court, the plaintiffs were not trying to assert property rights against the government or obtain compensation for governmental wrongdoing;[26] instead, the plaintiffs merely sought a judicial declaration that a federal law was invalid.[27] The Supreme Court thus decided that Article III prohibited the federal courts from adjudicating the plaintiffs' constitutional challenge.[28] The Court further determined that the federal law purporting to authorize the plaintiffs to bring their lawsuit in federal court was invalid because it would require the courts to take a nonjudicial action:[29] resolving legal issues without an "actual controvers[y] arising between adverse litigants."[30] The Court therefore ruled that Article III forbade the federal courts from deciding the constitutional issues in Muskrat until they arose in the context of a suit between true adversaries.[31]

The Supreme Court continued to insist on an adversarial controversy between litigants as a prerequisite to federal jurisdiction on various occasions throughout the mid-twentieth century.[32] For instance, in the 1943 case of United States v. Johnson, the Court ruled that the district court should have dismissed a lawsuit as collusive because the plaintiff had "instituted [the proceeding] as a 'friendly suit' at [the] appellee's request" in order to test a statute's validity.[33] The Court ruled in its 1937 opinion in Aetna Life Insurance Co. of Hartford,

[20] Id. at 360.

[21] Id. at 363.

[22] Id. at 351, 361 (quoting U.S. Const. art. III, § 2).

[23] Id. at 361.

[24] Id.

[25] Id.

[26] Id.

[27] See id. at 361–62 (explaining that the plaintiffs sought "to determine the constitutional validity of [a] class of legislation, in a suit not arising between parties concerning a property right necessarily involved in the decision in question, but in a proceeding against the government in its sovereign capacity, and concerning which the only judgment required is to settle the doubtful character of the legislation in question").

[28] Id.

[29] Id. at 362.

[30] Id. at 361.

[31] Id. at 362 ("The questions involved in this proceeding as to the validity of the legislation may arise in suits between individuals, and when they do and are properly brought before this [C]ourt for consideration they, of course, must be determined in the exercise of its judicial functions."). That is not to say, however, that Article III categorically precludes plaintiffs from filing lawsuits to challenge a statute's constitutionality. See, e.g., MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 129 (2007) (explaining that Article III does not forbid plaintiffs from "seek[ing] a declaratory judgment regarding the constitutionality of a . . . statute") (citing Steffel v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 458–60 (1974)). See also Judgment, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) (defining a "declaratory judgment" as "a binding adjudication that establishes the rights and other legal relations of the parties").

[32] See, e.g., Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 100 (1968) (noting "the rule that federal courts will not entertain friendly suits or those which are feigned or collusive in nature") (internal citation omitted); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 505 (1961) (Frankfurter, J.) (discussing "the Court's refusal to entertain cases which disclosed a want of a truly adversary contest, of a collision of actively asserted and differing claims").

[33] 319 U.S. 302, 303–05 (1943).

Connecticut v. Haworth, by contrast, that a particular insurance dispute was justiciable because the insurer and the insured had genuinely adverse interests.[34]

ArtIII.S2.C1.5.3 Intra-Branch Litigation and Adversity Doctrine

Article III, Section 3, Clause 1:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

Even though the Court continued to enforce the adversity requirement into the mid-to-late twentieth century,[1] it gradually started to apply the doctrine more flexibly. In the 1949 case of United States v. Interstate Commerce Commission, for example, the Court ruled that despite the adversity doctrine, a governmental entity acting in one capacity may sometimes sue itself or another agency of the same government.[2] In that case, the United States, acting as a shipper performing wharfage services, filed a complaint with a now-defunct[3] federal agency called the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) against certain railroads.[4] The ICC ruled for the railroads and against the United States.[5] The United States then filed a federal lawsuit to set the ICC's order aside.[6] To comply with a statute requiring any plaintiff challenging an ICC order to sue the United States, the United States—as the plaintiff challenging the ICC's order—named itself as one of the defendants.[7] Although the Court acknowledged that, under normal circumstances, the adversity requirement bars a litigant from suing itself in federal court,[8] it decided that the adversity doctrine did not render the case nonjusticiable.[9] The real [34] See 300 U.S. 227, 242 (1937) ("There is here a dispute between parties who face each other in an adversary proceeding. The dispute relates to legal rights and obligations arising from the contracts of insurance. . . . Prior to this suit, the parties had taken adverse positions with respect to their existing obligations. Their contentions concerned the disability benefits which were to be payable upon prescribed conditions. On the one side, the insured claimed that he had become totally and permanently disabled and hence was relieved of the obligation to continue the payment of premiums and was entitled to the stipulated disability benefits. . . . On the other side, the company made an equally definite claim that the alleged basic fact did not exist, that the insured was not totally and permanently disabled and had not been relieved of the duty to continue the payment of premiums[.] . . . Such a dispute is manifestly susceptible of judicial determination."). See also ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions (discussing other aspects of Aetna's holding).

---

[1] See, e.g., Moore v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 47, 48 (1971) (per curiam) (holding that case presented "no case or controversy within the meaning of Art[icle] III" because "both litigants desire[d] precisely the same result"); Flast, 392 U.S. at 100 (noting "the rule that federal courts will not entertain friendly suits or those which are feigned or collusive in nature") (internal citation omitted); Poe, 367 U.S. at 505 (Frankfurter, J.) (discussing "the Court's refusal to entertain cases which disclosed a want of a truly adversary contest" or the lack of "a collision of actively asserted and differing claims").

[2] 337 U.S. 426, 429–31 (1949).

[3] See ICC Termination Act of 1995, Pub. L. No. 104-88, § 101, 109 Stat. 803 (1995) ("The Interstate Commerce Commission is abolished.").

[4] 337 U.S. at 428.

[5] Id. at 429.

[6] Id.

[7] Id. (quoting 28 U.S.C. § 46 (1949)).

[8] See id. at 430 ("There is much argument with citation of many cases to establish the long-recognized general principle that no person may sue himself. Properly understood the general principle is sound, for courts only adjudicate justiciable controversies. They do not engage in the academic pastime of rendering judgments in favor of persons against themselves. Thus a suit filed by John Smith against John Smith might present no case or controversy which courts could determine.").

[9] Id. at 431.

controversy in ICC, the Court explained, was not between the United States and itself, but between the United States and the railroads.[10] Thus, the court reasoned, the case presented a justiciable dispute between adverse parties.[11]

Similarly, in the 1974 case of United States v. Nixon, the Court determined that an intra-branch dispute between two Executive officers was justiciable.[12] In Nixon, a federal district court, at the request of a Special Prosecutor investigating an alleged conspiracy to defraud the United States and obstruct justice, had issued a subpoena duces tecum[13] directing President Richard Nixon to produce certain tape recordings and documents.[14] President Nixon argued that the district court could not issue the subpoena[15] because the dispute was an intra-branch controversy between two Executive officers.[16] The Court rejected President Nixon's argument, reasoning that he and the Special Prosecutor were adverse enough to create a justiciable controversy.[17] Because the Special Prosecutor's interests conflicted with those of President Nixon, and because the dispute over the subpoena arose in a criminal case that fell comfortably within the federal Judiciary's traditional powers, the Court held that Nixon presented an adversarial dispute despite the Executive Branch's presence on both sides of the controversy.[18] As a result of cases like Nixon and ICC, federal courts seldom dismiss intergovernmental disputes on adversity grounds alone[19]—at least when the relevant agencies are acting in different capacities.[20]

ArtIII.S2.C1.5.4 Executive Branch Determinations on Statute Constitutionality

Article III, Section 3, Clause 2:

> The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

Further demonstrating the Court's more flexible application of the adversity doctrine in the past few decades are the 1983 case of Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha,[1] the 2013 case of United States v. Windsor,[2] and the 2020 case of Seila Law LLC v. Consumer

---

[10] See id. at 430 ("This suit . . . is a step in proceedings to settle who is legally entitled to sums of money, the Government or the railroads.").

[11] See id. ("While this case is United States v. United States, et al., it involves controversies of a type which are traditionally justiciable.").

[12] 418 U.S. 683, 692 (1974).

[13] A subpoena is "a writ or order commanding a person to appear before a court or other tribunal, subject to a penalty for failing to comply." Subpoena, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019). A subpoena duces tecum is "a subpoena ordering the witness to appear in court and to bring specified documents, records, or things." Id. See also Fed. R. Crim. P. 17(c) (governing subpoenas duces tecum in federal criminal cases).

[14] 418 U.S. at 686–88.

[15] Id. at 692.

[16] Id. at 697.

[17] See id. at 696–97.

[18] Id. at 697.

[19] Michael Herz, United States v. United States: When Can the Federal Government Sue Itself?, 32 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 893, 895 (1991). See also, e.g., Joseph W. Mead, Interagency Litigation and Article III, 47 Ga. L. Rev. 1217, 1219 (2013) (claiming that it is "surprisingly common" for courts to adjudicate "litigation between federal agencies").

[20] See Dir., Office of Workers' Comp. Programs, Dep't of Labor v. Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., 514 U.S. 122, 128 (1995) (analyzing ICC and emphasizing that "the status of the Government as a statutory beneficiary or market participant must be sharply distinguished from the status of the Government as regulator or administrator").

[1] See 462 U.S. 919, 930 n.5, 939–40 (1983).

[2] See 570 U.S. 744, 756–63 (2013).

Financial Protection Bureau.[3] Each of those cases involved constitutional challenges to federal statutes.[4] In each case, the United States agreed with the challenger that the challenged law was unconstitutional, raising questions about whether the parties were genuinely adverse.[5] In all three cases, the Court suggested that certain aspects of the adversity doctrine are not constitutional mandates, but are instead merely prudential constraints that do not categorically deprive the federal courts of jurisdiction.[6] Prudential restrictions on the justiciability of disputes are judicially self-imposed limitations on federal jurisdiction that do not stem from Article III of the Constitution.[7] While constitutional limitations on justiciability often impose insuperable barriers to the jurisdiction of the federal courts that neither Congress, nor the parties, nor the Judiciary itself can abrogate without an amendment to Article III, litigants may overcome prudential barriers to justiciability by showing that it would be prudent for the court to adjudicate the case in question.[8] These cases therefore suggest that federal courts may sometimes adjudicate cases even if the plaintiff and the defendant desire the same ultimate result.[9]

In Chadha, the Court considered a constitutional challenge to a statute purporting to authorize a single house of Congress to pass a resolution overruling Executive Branch decisions not to deport certain otherwise deportable aliens.[10] The appellant (the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS)) and the appellee (an immigrant named Jagdish Rai Chadha) both agreed that the provision was unconstitutional,[11] which created concerns that the case was not an adversarial controversy.[12] The Supreme Court still concluded, however, that the parties were sufficiently adverse[13] because the INS still intended to deport Chadha if the federal courts ultimately rejected his constitutional challenge.[14] The Chadha Court acknowledged potential concerns about ruling on the provision's constitutionality when neither of the named parties argued that the law was valid.[15] Even so, the Court characterized those misgivings as purely prudential concerns, rather than insuperable constitutional obstacles to resolving the case.[16] The Court ultimately determined that these prudential

[3] See 140 S. Ct. 2183, 2196–97 (2020).

[4] See id. at 2194–95; Windsor, 570 U.S. at 752; Chadha, 462 U.S. at 923.

[5] See Seila Law, 140 S. Ct. at 2195, 2196–97; Windsor, 570 U.S. at 754; Chadha, 462 U.S. at 928.

[6] See Seila Law, 140 S. Ct. at 2196–97; Windsor, 570 U.S. at 756–63; Chadha, 462 U.S. at 930 n.5, 939–40.

[7] Cf. Windsor, 570 U.S. at 757 (discussing the prudential standing doctrine) (quoting Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984)).

[8] See id. at 760 ("Unlike Article III requirements—which must be satisfied by the parties before judicial consideration is appropriate—the relevant prudential factors that counsel against hearing this case are subject to 'countervailing considerations [that] may outweigh the concerns underlying the usual reluctance to exert judicial power.'") (quoting ,422 U.S. 490, 500–01 (1975)).

[9] See, e.g., Seila Law, 140 S. Ct. at 2196 ("[A]micus contends that we should dismiss the case because the parties agree on the merits of the constitutional question and the case therefore lacks 'adverseness.' That contention, however, is foreclosed by United States v. Windsor.") (internal citation omitted).

[10] 462 U.S. at 923 (explaining that Chadha presented "a challenge to the constitutionality of the provision in § 244(c)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act . . . authorizing one House of Congress, by resolution, to invalidate the decision of the Executive Branch, pursuant to authority delegated by Congress to the Attorney General of the United States, to allow a particular deportable alien to remain in the United States").

[11] Id. at 928.

[12] Id. at 939 (quoting Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring)).

[13] Id.

[14] Id. at 940 n.12. See also id. at 939 ("INS's agreement with Chadha's position does not alter the fact that the INS would have deported Chadha absent the Court of Appeals' judgment.").

[15] Id. at 940.

[16] Id.

concerns did not bar the Court from deciding the issue because Congress had intervened in the case to defend the statute's constitutionality, thus supplying the requisite adversity between the litigants.[17]

The Court again suggested that the adversity requirement has a non-constitutional, purely prudential component several decades later in Windsor.[18] Windsor involved a constitutional challenge to a federal statute that defined "marriage" to include "only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife."[19] The statute thus precluded persons in same-sex marriages from claiming federal estate tax exemptions for surviving spouses.[20] The respondent, Edith Schlain Windsor, sued the United States to invalidate the provision and obtain a refund of certain federal taxes she paid when she inherited her same-sex spouse's estate.[21] The United States, however, agreed with Windsor that the provision was unconstitutional.[22] Still, the United States continued to enforce the statute by denying refunds and assessing deficiencies against surviving spouses in same-sex marriages,[23] including Windsor herself.[24]

The Windsor Court determined that the parties were adverse even though the United States and Windsor agreed that the provision was unconstitutional.[25] The Court, citing Chadha, explained that "even where the Government largely agrees with the opposing party on the merits of the controversy, there is sufficient adverseness and an adequate basis for jurisdiction in the fact that the Government intended to enforce the challenged law against that party."[26] Because invalidating the challenged provision would require the United States to pay money it would not otherwise pay, the Court determined that the United States retained a sufficient stake in the lawsuit to render the case justiciable.[27] The Court also suggested, however, that it might have found the case nonjusticiable if the Executive simply paid Windsor the requested refund rather than enforcing the challenged law.[28]

The Windsor Court acknowledged concerns that the parties might not be fully adverse to each other.[29] As in Chadha, however, the Court characterized this risk as a remediable prudential issue, not an incurable jurisdictional defect.[30] Once the Attorney General

---

[17] Id. at 930 n.5, 939–40. See also Va. House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, 139 S. Ct. 1945, 1954 n.5 (2019) (discussing Chadha's adversity holding).

[18] 570 U.S. 744 (2013).

[19] Id. at 752 (citing 1 U.S.C. § 7). See also ArtVII.1 Historical Background on Ratification Clause (analyzing the Supreme Court's jurisprudence on sexual orientation).

[20] 570 U.S. at 750–51.

[21] See id. at 749–52, 753.

[22] Id. at 754.

[23] Id. at 756.

[24] See id. at 755 ("The United States has not complied with the [district court's ruling that the provision is unconstitutional]. Windsor has not received her refund, and the Executive Branch continues to enforce [the challenged provision]."). As the Supreme Court observed, the United States chose to continue enforcing the statute even though it believed the law was unconstitutional to maintain adversity between the parties and thereby allow the federal courts to adjudicate Windsor's constitutional challenge. See id. at 754.

[25] See id. at 759 ("[T]his case presents a justiciable controversy under Article III.").

[26] Id. (quoting INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 940 n.12 (1983)) (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted).

[27] Id. at 757–59.

[28] Id. at 758.

[29] Id. at 759 (quoting Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[30] Id. See also id. at 756 (concluding that dismissing the case as nonjusticiable would improperly "elide[ ] the distinction between two principles: the jurisdictional requirements of Article III and the prudential limits on its exercise"); id. at 760 ("Unlike Article III requirements—which must be satisfied by the parties before judicial consideration is appropriate—the relevant prudential factors that counsel against hearing this case are subject to announced that it would not defend the challenged provision, the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group (BLAG) of the House of Representatives intervened in the case to defend the law's constitutionality.[31] The Court therefore determined that "BLAG's sharp adversarial presentation of the issues satisfie[d] the prudential concerns that otherwise might counsel against hearing an appeal from a decision with which the principal parties agree."[32]

The Supreme Court reaffirmed Windsor's adversity holding in its 2020 decision in Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau.[33] In that case, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) issued a civil investigative demand to a law firm.[34] The law firm argued that the demand was invalid because the CFPB's structure violated the constitutional separation of powers.[35] Because the federal government, as the respondent in the case, agreed that the CFPB's structure contravened the separation of powers,[36] the Court appointed an amicus curiae to defend the CFPB's constitutionality.[37]

Although the court-appointed amicus urged the Court to consider whether the parties' agreement that the CFPB's structure was unconstitutional rendered the litigants insufficiently adverse to create a justiciable controversy, the Court ultimately ruled that the case was justiciable.[38] Citing Windsor, the Court explained that "a lower court order that presents real-world consequences for the Government and its adversary suffices to support Article III jurisdiction—even if 'the Executive may welcome' an adverse order that 'is accompanied by the constitutional ruling it wants.'"[39] Because the United States had not agreed to withdraw the civil investigative demand against the law firm, a judicial decision upholding or invalidating the CFPB would still have significant consequences for the parties despite their overlapping legal positions.[40] The Court thus determined that it had jurisdiction under Article III to issue such a decision.[41] The Court further ruled that its appointment of an 'countervailing considerations [that] may outweigh the concerns underlying the usual reluctance to exert judicial power.'") (quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500–01 (1975)).

[31] Id. at 754.

[32] Id. at 761.

[33] See 140 S. Ct. 2183, 2196–97 (2020).

[34] See id. at 2194.

[35] See id. at 2191 ("Congress provided that the CFPB would be led by a single Director, who serves for a longer term than the President and cannot be removed by the President except for inefficiency, neglect, or malfeasance. . . . The question before us is whether this arrangement violates the Constitution's separation of powers."); id. at 2194 (describing the law firm's argument "that the demand was invalid and must be set aside because the CFPB's structure violated the Constitution").

[36] See id. at 2195 ("[T]he Government agrees with petitioner on the merits of the constitutional question."). See also id. (noting that the Director of the CFPB "agree[d] with the Solicitor General's position . . . that her for-cause removal protection [wa]s unconstitutional").

[37] Id. An "amicus curiae" is "[s]omeone who is not a party to a lawsuit but who petitions the court or is requested by the court to file a brief in the action." Amicus Curiae, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[38] See 140 S. Ct. at 2196.

[39] See id. (quoting United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 758 (2013)).

[40] See id. at 2196–97 ("Here, petitioner and the Government disagree about whether petitioner must comply with the civil investigative demand. The lower courts sided with the Government, and the Government has not volunteered to relinquish that victory and withdraw the demand. To the contrary, while the Government agrees that the agency is unconstitutionally structured, it believes it may nevertheless enforce the demand on remand. Accordingly, our 'decision will have real meaning' for the parties.") (quoting INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 939 (1983)) (internal citation omitted).

[41] See id. at 2195–97.

amicus curiae to defend the CFPB's constitutionality adequately addressed any non-constitutional, prudential concerns about the parties' adverseness.[42]

Chadha, Windsor, and Seila Law thus hold that the adversity requirement does not always bar federal courts from deciding cases in which the defendant agrees that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he seeks. Those cases also suggest, however, that even though a defendant's agreement with the plaintiff's legal arguments will not necessarily vitiate the court's Article III jurisdiction, prudential concerns may counsel against resolving a case in which the parties have taken identical legal positions. As all three cases show, however, those concerns may lose force when a third party, such as a house of Congress or a court-appointed amicus curiae, appears in the litigation to supply the missing adversarial presentation of the pertinent legal issues.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6 Standing

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The concept of "standing" broadly refers to a litigant's right to have a court rule upon the merits of particular claims for which he seeks judicial relief.[1] The Supreme Court has held that, as a threshold procedural matter,[2] a litigant must have standing in order to invoke the jurisdiction of a federal court so that the court may exercise its "remedial powers on his behalf."[3] In general, for a party to establish Article III standing, he must allege (and ultimately prove) that he has a genuine stake in the outcome of the case because he has personally

[42] See id. at 2197 ("[A]s in Windsor, any prudential concerns with deciding an important legal question in this posture can be addressed by 'the practice of entertaining arguments made an amicus when the Solicitor General confesses error with respect to a judgment below,' which we have done.") (quoting Windsor, 570 U.S. at 760).

[1] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975) ("In essence the question of standing is whether the litigant is entitled to have the court decide the merits of the dispute or of particular issues."); Black's Law Dictionary 1536 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "standing" as "a party's right to make a legal claim or seek judicial enforcement of a duty or right").

[2] Federal courts must necessarily resolve standing inquiries before proceeding to the merits of a lawsuit. See, e.g., Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 732 (2008). In fact, a court may raise the issue of standing sua sponte (i.e., of its own accord) in order to ensure that it has jurisdiction, even if no party to the lawsuit contests standing. See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Mineta, 534 U.S. 103, 110 (2001) (per curiam). Although the Supreme Court must examine a litigant's standing when the lower court has erroneously assumed that standing exists, it will not investigate standing sua sponte in order to rule upon an issue that a lower court denied the litigant standing to bring before the court. Id.

[3] Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 38 (1976) (quoting Warth, 422 U.S. at 498–99). See also Davis, 554 U.S. at 732; Simon, 426 U.S. at 37 ("No principle is more fundamental to the judiciary's proper role in our system of government than the constitutional limitation of federal-court jurisdiction to actual cases or controversies. The concept of standing is part of this limitation.") (citation omitted); Warth, 422 U.S. at 498–99 ("In its constitutional dimension, standing imports justiciability: whether the plaintiff has made out a 'case or controversy' between himself and the defendant within the meaning of Art. III."). The Court has occasionally invoked the English common law tradition as supporting its inquiry into a litigant's standing. See, e.g., Ariz. Christian Sch. Tuition Org. v. Winn, 563 U.S. 125, 132 (2011) ("In the English legal tradition, the need to redress an injury resulting from a specific dispute taught the efficacy of judicial resolution and gave legitimacy to judicial decrees. . . . The Framers paid heed to these lessons.").

suffered (or will imminently suffer): (1) a concrete and particularized injury; (2) that is traceable to the allegedly unlawful actions of the opposing party; and (3) that is redressable by a favorable judicial decision.[4] These requirements seek to ensure that federal courts do not exceed their Article III power to decide actual "cases" or "controversies." [5]

The Court has held that the burden of establishing standing falls upon each party who seeks a distinct form of judicial relief,[6] including a party initiating a lawsuit,[7] intervening in a lawsuit,[8] or appealing a lower court decision.[9] Each of these parties must make an appropriate showing during each stage of the litigation[10] that the elements of injury, causation, and redressability existed at the outset of the lawsuit, and continue to exist,[11] for each claim[12] and [4] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–61 (1992) (listing the elements of standing). For further discussion on the elements of Article III standing, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.1 Overview of Lujan Test.

[5] Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 102 (1998) ("Article III, § 2, of the Constitution extends the 'judicial Power' of the United States only to 'Cases' and 'Controversies.' We have always taken this to mean cases and controversies of the sort traditionally amenable to and resolved by the judicial process.").

[6] The Supreme Court has indicated that if one party to a lawsuit has standing, other entities can join as parties without having to satisfy independently the demands of Article III, provided those parties do not seek a distinct form of relief from the party with standing. E.g., Horne v. Flores, 557 U.S. 433, 446 (2009) (determining that, because a school superintendent had standing to challenge lower court decisions in which he was named a defendant, the Court did not need to consider whether interveners, who were state legislators, had standing); Davis, 554 U.S. at 724 (requiring a litigant to have standing for each form of relief sought); Rumsfeld v. Forum for Acad. & Instit. Rights, Inc., 547 U.S. 47, 52 n.2 (2006) ("[T]he presence of one party with standing is sufficient to satisfy Article III's case-or-controversy requirement."); Director v. Perini N. River Assocs., 459 U.S. 297, 305 (1983) (stating that a justiciable controversy existed because an injured employee who sought coverage under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act was a party respondent before the court and had standing, and thus there was no need to determine whether the Director of the Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, as the official responsible for administration and enforcement of the Act, had standing).

[7] FW/PBS Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231 (1990) ("[P]etitioners in this case must allege . . . facts essential to show jurisdiction. If they fail to make the necessary allegations, they have no standing.") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

[8] A party seeking to intervene in a lawsuit (i.e., seeking to join a lawsuit already in progress) as a matter of right must have Article III standing to seek judicial relief that differs from that sought by the other litigants with standing. Town of Chester v. Laroe Estates, Inc., No. 16-605, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 5, 2017); Wittman v. Personhuballah, 578 U.S. 539, 543 (2016).

[9] Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 56 (1986).

The Supreme Court also addressed standing on appeal in a 2011 case in which government employees that had obtained a favorable judgment on the basis of qualified immunity sought to appeal a lower court's ruling that their conduct had violated the Constitution. The Court held that these officials had Article III standing because they had a personal stake in seeing the ruling overturned, as its mere existence could lead to the risk of future liability for them. Camreta v. Greene, 563 U.S. 692, 703 (2011) ("If the official regularly engages in that conduct as part of his job . . . he suffers injury caused by the adverse constitutional ruling. So long as it continues in effect, he must either change the way he performs his duties or risk a meritorious damages action.").

Standing on appeal may also be based on an alleged injury arising from the decision below—for example, where the lower court had ordered the appealing party to comply with a government demand that would injure that party, and overturning the lower court's decision would redress the injury by absolving the appealing party of an obligation to comply with the demand. See Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Fin. Prot. Bureau, No. 19-7 slip op. at 9 (U.S. June 29, 2020) (stating that a petitioner had "appellate standing" where the petitioner suffered a "concrete injury" that was "traceable to the decision below" and could be redressed by the Court). See also West Virginia v. Env't Prot. Agency, No. 20-1530, slip op. at 14 (U.S. June 30, 2022).

[10] Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693 (2013); Davis, 554 U.S. at 734 ("[A] plaintiff must demonstrate standing for each claim he seeks to press and for each form of relief sought. . . . While the proof to establish standing increases as the suit proceeds, the standing inquiry remains focused on whether the party invoking jurisdiction had the requisite stake in the outcome when the suit was filed.") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). See also Nat'l Org. for Women v. Scheidler, 510 U.S. 249, 255–56 (1994) (observing that, at the pleading stage, the plaintiff may have standing sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss if he sets forth "general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct") (citation omitted); Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992) (noting that the plaintiff's burden of proof on the standing issue differs depending on whether the case is at the pleading stage, the plaintiff is responding to a motion for summary judgment, or the case has gone to trial).

[11] Davis, 554 U.S. at 732–33 ("[I]t is not enough that the requisite interest exist at the outset. 'To qualify as a case fit for federal-court adjudication, an actual controversy must be extant at all stages of review, not merely at the time for each form of relief sought.[13] A litigant's failure to establish standing to sue may result in dismissal of his distinct claims for relief without a decision on the merits of those claims.[14]

Since the 1920s, the Supreme Court has offered various justifications for these somewhat amorphous[15] constitutional limitations on the categories of litigants who can maintain a claim for judicial relief in an Article III federal court.[16] Perhaps the most frequently cited rationale derives from the Constitution's separation of powers among the branches of government.[17] Issues of standing often arise when a private plaintiff sues the government, seeking to have it act in accordance with the Constitution or other law.[18] But, as the Court has frequently noted, the Constitution makes the political branches—and not the courts—responsible for "vindicating the public interest."[19] As a result, unelected judges lack the authority to render advisory opinions as to whether Congress or the Executive has followed the law; they may only decide a specific case brought before the court by a party that has suffered a particularized complaint is filed.'" (quoting Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 67 (1997)). If an injury no longer exists as the litigation progresses, the court may also lack jurisdiction under the related doctrine of mootness. See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.1 Overview of Mootness Doctrine to ArtIII.S2.C1.8.9 Class Action Litigation and Mootness.

---

[12] Davis, 554 U.S. at 734 ("[A] plaintiff must demonstrate standing for each claim he seeks to press and for each form of relief sought.") (internal quotation marks omitted).

[13] See, e.g., Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 111 (1983) ("Lyons fares no better if it be assumed that his pending damages suit affords him Art. III standing to seek an injunction as a remedy for the claim arising out of the October 1976 events. The equitable remedy is unavailable absent a showing of irreparable injury, a requirement that cannot be met where there is no showing of any real or immediate threat that the plaintiff will be wronged again . . . ").

[14] E.g., Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 502 (1975) (stating that if "the plaintiff's standing does not adequately appear from all materials of record, the complaint must be dismissed"). But see Gill v. Whitford, No. 16-1161, slip op. at 21 (U.S. June 18, 2018) (declining to direct dismissal of a partisan gerrymandering case that involved "an unsettled kind of claim . . . the contours and justiciability of which are unresolved" and, therefore, remanding the case for further proceedings).

[15] As discussed below, the Court's standing jurisprudence has been inconsistent in approach over the years. See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.3 Standing Doctrine from 1940s to 1970s.

[16] Although the Supreme Court has often stated that the standing inquiry focuses on whether the plaintiff is a proper party to maintain a claim for a particular form of judicial relief in federal court and not on the "issues he wishes to have adjudicated," the Court has acknowledged the difficulty in separating the plaintiff's status from the nature of his claims when applying principles of standing. Compare Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 38 (1976) ("[S]tanding focuses on the party seeking to get his complaint before a federal court and not on the issues he wished to have adjudicated." (quoting Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 99 (1968) (internal quotation marks omitted)), with Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 752 (1984) ("Typically, however, the standing inquiry requires careful judicial examination of a complaint's allegations to ascertain whether the particular plaintiff is entitled to an adjudication of the particular claims asserted.").

[17] E.g., Lujan, 504 U.S. at 576.

[18] See, e.g., Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U. S. 208, 221223 (1974) (holding that an association of officers and enlisted members of the military reserves, as well as individual members, lacked standing to sue as taxpayers in a case arguing that the Incompatibility Clause of Article I forbid certain Members of Congress from holding commissions in the Armed Forces Reserve). Issues of standing may also arise in cases in which a litigant sues a private party under a law providing for a private right of action against a private defendant. E.g., Spokeo Inc., v. Robins 578 U.S. 330, 342 (2016).

[19] Lujan, 504 U.S. at 576 ("Vindicating the public interest (including the public interest in Government observance of the Constitution and laws) is the function of Congress and the Chief Executive."); Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 488 (1923) ("We have no power per se to review and annul acts of Congress on the ground that they are unconstitutional. That question may be considered only when the justification for some direct injury suffered or threatened, presenting a justiciable issue, is made to rest upon such an act. Then the power exercised is that of ascertaining and declaring the law applicable to the controversy."); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 180 (1803). When reviewing administrative action or inaction of federal agencies, courts must be wary of intruding upon the President's duty under Article II, Section 3 of the Constitution to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed" by ordering the Executive to follow the law. Lujan, 504 U.S. at 577 (citing U.S. Const. art. II, § 3).

The Court has adhered to the standing doctrine even in cases in which no party exists who would have standing to challenge government action or inaction in the courts, noting that the political process is available to those seeking to vindicate generalized grievances. United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 179 (1974).

injury as a result of the government's actions.[20] Such deference to the political branches, particularly in cases raising questions about the separation of powers,[21] reflects the Court's understanding of the "limited . . . role of the courts in a democratic society,"[22] as well as its determination that federal courts should hear only those types of cases that the English judicial system would historically have considered suitable for judicial resolution.[23] And separation of powers concerns have also motivated the Court's conclusion that Article III limits Congress's ability to confer standing on plaintiffs to sue the government by enacting statutes containing "citizen-suit" provisions.[24] Such case law has reasoned that permitting plaintiffs who do not have a personal and direct stake in the outcome of a case to sue under one of these provisions would effectively allow the Legislative Branch to intrude upon the Executive Branch's duty to enforce the law.[25]

---

[20] See supra note 19. See also Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693, 693–94 (2013) (characterizing the standing requirement as "an essential limit on [the Court's] power: It ensures that we act as judges, and do not engage in policymaking properly left to elected representatives."). For more on Article III's bar on advisory opinions and its relationship to standing doctrine, see ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[21] Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 408–09 (2013) ("The law of Article III standing, which is built on separation of powers principles, serves to prevent the judicial process from being used to usurp the powers of the political branches."); Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 471 (1982) ("The judicial power of the United States defined by Art. III is not an unconditional authority to determine the constitutionality of legislative or executive acts."); id. at 474 ("Proper regard for the complex nature of our constitutional structure requires neither that the Judicial Branch shrink from a confrontation with the other two coequal branches of the Federal Government, nor that it hospitably accept for adjudication claims of constitutional violation by other branches of government where the claimant has not suffered cognizable injury."). Thus, the Court applies the standing requirements most stringently when litigants challenge the constitutionality of an action or omission by one or both of the political branches of government. Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 819–20 (1997) ("[O]ur standing inquiry has been especially rigorous when reaching the merits of the dispute would force us to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional."); Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 100, 101 (1968) ("The question whether a particular person is a proper party to maintain the action does not, by its own force, raise separation of powers problems related to improper judicial interference in areas committed to other branches of the Federal Government. Such problems arise, if at all, only from the substantive issues the individual seeks to have adjudicated."). The Court later stated that "Flast failed to recognize that [standing] doctrine has a separation of powers component, which keeps courts within certain traditional bounds vis-a-vis the other branches . . . " Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 353 n.3 (1996). In the Court's early years, Chief Justice John Marshall noted that if federal courts could hear "every question under the Constitution," rather than traditional "cases" or "controversies," then federal courts would have jurisdiction over many issues that should be the subject of legislative discussion and decision. 4 Papers of John Marshall 95 (Charles Cullen ed., 1984) ("If the judicial power extended to every question under the Constitution it would involve almost every subject proper for legislative discussion and decision; if to every question under the laws and treaties of the United States it would involve almost every subject on which the executive could act. The division of power [among the branches of government] could exist no longer, and the other departments would be swallowed up by the judiciary."). The French sociologist and political theorist Alexis de Tocqueville once noted the benefits of the U.S. federal judiciary's requirement that a litigant have a direct stake in the outcome of legal proceedings to maintain a lawsuit, stating that: "It will be seen, also, that by leaving it to private interest to censure the law, and by intimately uniting the trial of the law with the trial of an individual, legislation is protected from wanton assaults and from the daily aggressions of party spirit. The errors of the legislator are exposed only to meet a real want; and it is always a positive and appreciable fact that must serve as the basis of a prosecution." 1 Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America 102 (Philips Bradley, ed., 1945).

[22] Ariz. Christian Sch. Tuition Org. v. Winn, 563 U.S. 125, 133 (2011) ("Continued adherence to the case-or-controversy requirement of Article III maintains the public's confidence in an unelected but restrained Federal Judiciary.").

[23] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 337 ("Standing to sue is a doctrine rooted in the traditional understanding of a case or controversy."); Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 492 (2009) ("In limiting the judicial power to 'Cases' and 'Controversies,' Article III of the Constitution restricts it to the traditional role of Anglo-American courts, which is to redress or prevent actual or imminently threatened injury to persons caused by private or official violation of law.")

[24] Lujan, 504 U.S. at 577.

[25] Id. ("To permit Congress to convert the undifferentiated public interest in executive officers' compliance with the law into an 'individual right' vindicable in the courts is to permit Congress to transfer from the President to the courts the Chief Executive's most important constitutional duty, to 'take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.'") (quoting U.S. Const. art. II, § 3).

Although standing doctrine is grounded primarily in constitutional separation of powers concerns, the Supreme Court has also cited other rationales for its existence that may not be constitutional in nature. Requiring the litigant to have a personal stake in the outcome of his lawsuit ensures that a court will decide complex legal and factual issues in the context of a specific factual situation involving adverse parties who can more clearly illuminate for judges the issues in dispute.[26] Even in cases in which adversity between the parties exists, standing doctrine seeks to ensure that federal courts will not exercise the judicial power, which can significantly affect the lives, liberty, and property of others, to resolve generalized grievances brought primarily for the benefit of "concerned bystanders" who seek to vindicate abstract ideological interests (for example, a general interest in the protection of the environment is insufficient to confer standing).[27] More practical reasons for the standing requirements include a need to reserve the limited resources of the federal courts for concrete disputes;[28] the sweeping precedential effects of the Court's holdings on the merits in constitutional litigation, which can be difficult, if not impossible, for Congress to alter without amending the Constitution;[29] and a need for the court to fashion relief no more broadly than the litigant's situation requires.[30]

The Supreme Court has also previously recognized certain prudential limitations on the exercise of federal courts' jurisdiction, which, although lacking constitutional status, may nonetheless result in a court's refusal to hear a case: (1) when the litigant seeks to assert the rights of third parties not before the court; (2) when the litigant seeks redress for a generalized grievance widely shared by a large number of citizens; and (3) when the litigant challenges government action or inaction and its asserted interests do not fall within the zone of interests arguably protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional provision underlying its claims.[31] In recent years, however, the Court has questioned the basis of the doctrine of prudential standing.[32] The Court has suggested that the bar on generalized grievances is a constitutional (and not prudential) requirement.[33] Moreover, the Court likewise has determined that a court applying the "zone of interests" test should examine whether the [26] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962) (stating that the parties invoking the court's jurisdiction must have "alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions.").

[27] United States v. SCRAP, 412 U.S. 669, 687 (1973) (stating that the injury-in-fact requirement of standing "prevents the judicial process from becoming no more than a vehicle for the vindication of the value interests of concerned bystanders"). See also Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 494 (2009) ("While generalized harm to the forest or the environment will not alone support standing, if that harm in fact affects the recreational or even the mere esthetic interests of the plaintiff, that will suffice."); Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 62 (1986); Valley Forge Christian Coll., 454 U.S. at 472–73 ("[The standing requirement] tends to assure that the legal questions presented to the court will be resolved, not in the rarified atmosphere of a debating society, but in a concrete factual context conducive to a realistic appreciation of the consequences of judicial action. . . . The [Article III] aspect of standing also reflects a due regard for the autonomy of those persons likely to be most directly affected by a judicial order.").

[28] Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., 528 U.S. 167, 191 (2000) ("Standing doctrine functions to ensure, among other things, that the scarce resources of the federal courts are devoted to those disputes in which the parties have a concrete stake.").

[29] Ariz. Christian Sch. Tuition Org. v. Winn, 563 U.S. 125, 146 (2011) ("Making the Article III standing inquiry all the more necessary are the significant implications of constitutional litigation, which can result in rules of wide applicability that are beyond Congress's power to change.").

[30] Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 222 (1974).

[31] United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 760 (2013) ("Even when Article III permits the exercise of federal jurisdiction, prudential considerations demand that the Court insist upon 'that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions.'" (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 204); Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 12 (2004) (listing the three types of prudential restraints); Gladstone v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 99–100 (1979).

[32] Lexmark Int'l Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 572 U.S. 118, 127 n.3 (2014).

[33] Id.

plaintiff's claim falls within the scope of a statutory provision creating a cause of action.[34] Furthermore, Congress, through express legislation, may abrogate these prudential standing requirements, to the extent that they remain viable and are not mandated by the Constitution.[35]

The following essays trace the development of Article III standing doctrine in Supreme Court jurisprudence from its origins in the 1920s to the development of the modern doctrine and its key elements of injury, causation, and redressability. They then examine select topics that implicate the doctrine, including cases in which a plaintiff seeks to maintain standing to challenge government action or inaction by relying solely upon his status as a taxpayer, as well as the various forms of representational standing that a litigant who has not himself sustained injury may rely upon when asserting the rights of people not before the court. Finally, they conclude with an overview of standing for Members of Congress, congressional control of standing, and what remains of the concept of prudential standing.[36]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.2 Early Standing Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Prior to the 1970s, a litigant had standing only if he could show that his injury stemmed directly from the "violation of a legal right"[1] such as one recognized at common law or in statute.[2] The next section discusses how a significant increase in the power of federal administrative agencies to regulate businesses and individuals contributed to the Supreme Court's decision to discard this "legal injury" test in favor of the more familiar "injury-in-fact"

---

[34] Id.

[35] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 501 (1975) ("Congress may grant an express right of action to persons who otherwise would be barred by prudential standing rules.").

[36] Federal rules for standing do not apply in state courts, which may have their own rules not addressed in this essay. Asarco, Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 617 (1989) ("We have recognized often that the constraints of Article III do not apply to state courts, and accordingly the state courts are not bound by the limitations of a case or controversy or other federal rules of justiciability even when they address issues of federal law, as when they are called upon to interpret the Constitution or . . . a federal statute."). However, when a state court enters a judgment in a case in which the plaintiffs would not have had standing had they brought the case in federal court, a party may have standing to appeal that judgment in federal court if the judgment rests upon an allegedly incorrect interpretation of federal law and causes the appellant direct injury. Id. at 623–24 ("When a state court has issued a judgment in a case where plaintiffs in the original action had no standing to sue under the principles governing the federal courts, we may exercise our jurisdiction on certiorari if the judgment of the state court causes direct, specific, and concrete injury to the parties who petition for our review, where the requisites of a case or controversy are also met.") (citations omitted).

[1] Ala. Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U.S. 464, 479 (1938).

[2] Tenn. Elec. Power Co. v. TVA, 306 U.S. 118, 137–38 (1939). See also Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Comm. v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 140–41 (1951) ("The touchstone to justiciability is injury to a legally protected right"); Cass R. Sunstein, What's Standing After Lujan? Of Citizen Suits, "Injuries," and Article III, 91 Mich. L. Rev. 163, 170 (1992) (noting that, prior to the 1970s, litigants "with a concrete interest could not bring suit unless the common law, or some other source of law, said so. But if a source of law conferred a right to sue, 'standing' existed, entirely independently of 'concrete interest' or 'injury in fact.'").

standing requirement in 1970.[3] The Court, however, had already begun to develop some of the other basic principles of modern standing doctrine, such as the requirement that the litigant has suffered a particularized injury, decades earlier.[4]

While the Supreme Court had long recognized that its role under Article III is limited to "decid[ing] the rights of individuals" in particular cases rather than answering abstract questions about the constitutional authority of the political branches,[5] the Court decided two cases in the 1920s that established the foundation for modern standing doctrine. Although the Court's opinions in Fairchild v. Hughes[6] and Frothingham v. Mellon[7] do not employ the term "standing," these decisions embody the fundamental principle underlying the modern concept of standing that a litigant must allege an individualized injury in order to establish a justiciable "case or controversy" under Article III of the Constitution and invoke the jurisdiction of a federal court.

The Supreme Court's first foundational decision concerning Article III standing was the 1922 Fairchild case.[8] In that case, the Court held that the federal courts lacked jurisdiction to rule upon a taxpayer's challenge to the procedures by which the Nineteenth Amendment was ratified.[9] In affirming the lower court's dismissal of the case, the Court held that the plaintiff could not establish standing solely by relying upon his status as a citizen with nothing more than a general interest in ensuring that the federal government followed the law.[10] Although Justice Louis Brandeis's majority opinion alluded to Article III of the Constitution as the basis for the Court's ruling on the issue of standing, the Court did not explain the reasoning behind its holding in detail.[11]

A year later, in Frothingham v. Mellon, the Court elaborated on its rationale for the standing requirement.[12] In Frothingham, the Court considered various constitutional challenges to the Maternity Act, a federal statute that created a grant program to distribute taxpayer funds to states that agreed to cooperate with the federal government to protect the health of mothers and infants.[13] The Court declined to reach the merits of the individual

[3] Ass'n of Data Processing Serv. Orgs., Inc. v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150, 152 (1970) ("The first question is whether the plaintiff alleges that the challenged action has caused him injury in fact, economic or otherwise."). See also Boston Stock Exch. v. State Tax Comm'n, 429 U.S. 318, 320 n.3 (1977) (applying the injury-in-fact and zone of interest tests and finding that an out-of-state stock exchange had standing to bring a Commerce Clause challenge to a New York statute imposing a higher transfer tax on securities transactions involving an out-of-state sale). For more background on the decline of the "legal injury" test, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.3 Standing Doctrine from 1940s to 1970s.

[4] Steven L. Winter, The Metaphor of Standing and the Problem of Self-Governance, 40 STAN. L. REV. 1371, 1375–76 (1988) (including both Fairchild and Frothingham in a discussion of the Court's earliest standing cases).

[5] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 170 (1803) ("The province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals . . . "). See also DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 340 (2006) ("Chief Justice Marshall, in Marbury v. Madison . . . grounded the Federal Judiciary's authority to exercise judicial review and interpret the Constitution on the necessity to do so in the course of carrying out the judicial function of deciding cases.").

[6] 258 U.S. 126 (1922).

[7] 262 U.S. 478 (1923).

[8] Fairchild, 258 U.S. at 129–30.

[9] Id. at 127–30. The plaintiff had sought an injunction to prevent the Secretary of State from proclaiming the ratification of the amendment and the U.S. Attorney General from enforcing it. Id.

[10] Fairchild, 258 U.S. at 129–30.

[11] Id. at 127–30 ("Plaintiff's alleged interest in the question submitted is not such as to afford a basis for this proceeding. . . . [I]t is not a case within the meaning of § 2 of Article III of the Constitution, which confers judicial power on the federal courts . . . ").

[12] Frothingham was consolidated with Massachusetts v. Mellon, another case in which the State of Massachusetts challenged the same statute. Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 478–79. The Court also held that Massachusetts lacked standing to bring suit on its own or on behalf of its citizens to challenge the statute. Id. at 480–86. For more on Massachusetts v. Mellon, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.5 Taxpayer Standing.

[13] Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 479.

federal taxpayer's constitutional claims, determining that the plaintiff lacked Article III standing.[14] In support of its holding that the plaintiff lacked a sufficient stake in the outcome of the case, the Court noted that the taxpayer's interest in preventing increased tax liability was a "minute and indeterminable" interest widely shared with millions of other U.S. taxpayers, and that a court order enjoining the use of taxpayer funds for the grant program might not actually redress the plaintiff's injury because it might not actually decrease the plaintiff's tax liability.[15] Building on its decision in Fairchild, the Court in Frothingham specifically grounded the standing requirement in the Constitution's structural separation of powers among the branches of government, as well as the Founders' concerns with the proper role of the Judiciary in a democratic society.[16] The Court wrote that deciding the case on the merits would "be not to decide a judicial controversy" but would rather force the Court to "assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which we plainly do not possess."[17] Consequently, the Court declined to hear the case, partly in order to avoid resolving abstract questions of policy best suited for resolution by the political branches.[18]

Although the Court's decisions in Fairchild and Frothingham laid the groundwork for the standing doctrine, the Court's opinions from this early time period failed to clarify whether this limitation on the power of the Federal Judiciary was an unavoidable constitutional barrier to litigation or, rather, a prudential constraint on jurisdiction subject to waiver at a judge's discretion for compelling policy reasons.[19] Such fundamental questions about the standing doctrine would remain unanswered until later in the twentieth century.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.3 Standing Doctrine from 1940s to 1970s

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court's development of the standing doctrine from the 1940s to 1970s accompanied a significant increase in the power of federal administrative agencies to regulate businesses and individuals.[1] The rise of the administrative state raised the question of who could challenge various agency actions in federal court. During the first several decades of the administrative state, the Court's standing test considered whether a litigant had suffered a violation of an explicit legal right. For example, in the 1939 case Tennessee Electric Power Co. v.

[14] Id. at 486–87.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 488–89.

[17] Id.

[18] Id.

[19] See Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 92 (1968) ("[C]ommentators have tried to determine whether Frothingham establishes a constitutional bar to taxpayer suits or whether the Court was simply imposing a rule of self-restraint which was not constitutionally compelled.").

[1] Cass R. Sunstein, Standing and the Privatization of Public Law, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1432, 1437–43 (1988).

Tennessee Valley Authority, the Court determined that a proprietor of a business lacked standing to object to the government helping businesses compete with the proprietor's business.[2] The Court held that the proprietor had failed to identify any explicit legal right that the government had allegedly violated that was "one of property, one arising out of contract, one protected against tortious invasion, or one founded on a statute which confers a privilege."[3] A year later in FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, the Court held that an existing radio station had "standing" to appeal the Federal Communication Commission's grant of a license to a rival radio station.[4] The Court determined that the existing station's allegations of economic injury from increased competition qualified as a legal "injury" under the Communications Act of 1934, which authorized appeals of Commission orders by a "person aggrieved" or "whose interests [were] adversely affected" by grant or denial of a license.[5] Thus, it appears that the Court's constrained approach to standing during these early years resulted from its focus on whether the litigant had suffered injury to a specific legal right recognized by a federal statute or other source of law.[6] Prior to the enactment of the Administrative Procedure Act[7] and other federal statutes providing for judicial review of agency actions, litigants did not possess as many legal rights that could serve as a basis for standing.[8]

Although it is difficult to discern significant trends in the Court's standing jurisprudence during this era, the Court generally adopted an even more permissive approach to standing in the 1960s and 1970s to facilitate challenges to actions by federal agencies. The Administrative Procedure Act, enacted in 1945, provided for judicial review of agency actions, for example, under federal consumer and environmental laws.[9] The Court relaxed the legal injury requirement and allowed the private beneficiaries of those public interest protections to challenge federal agency action based on harms that were not specifically recognized by statute or at common law,[10] including noneconomic harms to private individuals' aesthetic or

[2] 306 U.S. 118, 144 (1939).

[3] Id. at 137, 147.

[4] 309 U.S. 470, 472, 477 (1940).

[5] Id. at 472–73, 476–77.

[6] Sunstein, What's Standing After Lujan?, supra note 1, at 180–81.

[7] 5 U.S.C. § 702 (stating that a "person suffering legal wrong because of agency action, or adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute is entitled to judicial review thereof").

[8] See Sunstein, What's Standing After Lujan?, supra note 1, at 180–81.

[9] Id. at 183–84 ("[C]ourts interpreted the 'legal wrong' test to allow many people affected by government decisions—including beneficiaries of regulatory programs—to bring suit to challenge government action. For example, courts concluded that displaced urban residents, listeners of radio stations, and users of the environment could proceed against the government to redress an agency's legally insufficient regulatory protection."). For additional examples of the Court's more permissive approach, see Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Group Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 72, 74–78 (1978) (finding that individuals who lived near the site of a proposed nuclear plant had established standing to challenge a statute that would support the construction of the plant); Flast, 392 U.S. at 105–06 ("[W]e hold that a taxpayer will have standing consistent with Article III to invoke federal judicial power when he alleges that congressional action under the taxing and spending clause is in derogation of those constitutional provisions which operate to restrict the exercise of the taxing and spending power."); Hardin v. Ky. Utils. Co., 390 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1968) (determining that a competing utility company had standing to challenge the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA)'s supply of power. See also Inv. Co. Inst. v. Camp, 401 U.S. 617, 621 (1971) ("Congress did legislate against the competition that the petitioners challenge.").

[10] See, e.g., Hardin, 390 U.S. at 6–7.

recreational interests.[11] However, as discussed below, this permissiveness declined after the late 1970s, as the Court began to adopt a stricter approach to standing, characterizing it as a core Article III concern.[12]

In the early 1970s, the Supreme Court recognized that a litigant needed standing to maintain a lawsuit but adopted a flexible approach toward the standing inquiry. For example, in Sierra Club v. Morton, an environmental group sought an injunction prohibiting federal officials from approving the construction of a ski resort in the Mineral King Valley adjacent to Sequoia National Park.[13] The Court found that the plaintiffs lacked standing, concluding that their abstract interest in environmental protection was insufficient to confer standing.[14] However, the Court's opinion allowed for the possibility that future litigants who claimed injury to their noneconomic interests (e.g., "recreational" injuries impacting their ability to use a park) might be able to establish standing, even if such injuries were widely shared among the public.[15]

The high-water mark for the Supreme Court's permissive approach to standing came in United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP).[16] In that case, the Court held that a group of Georgetown law students, together with the Environmental Defense Fund and the Izaak Walton League, had standing to challenge the Interstate Commerce Commission's (ICC's) approval of an increase to nationwide railroad freight rates on the grounds that it would ultimately result in "economic, recreational and aesthetic harm" to the groups' members.[17] The Court permitted the plaintiffs to establish standing at the pleading stage by combining a series of inferences about how they would suffer injury as persons "aggrieved" by the new rates.[18] The Court found it sufficient for standing that the plaintiffs had alleged that higher rail rates would discourage the use of recyclable materials because used materials were often transported by rail to be recycled.[19] As a result, the plaintiffs alleged that the ICC's rate increase would cause companies to extract more raw materials, such as lumber, from parks in the Washington Metropolitan Area, resulting in [11] See, e.g., United States v. SCRAP, 412 U.S. 669, 686–87 (1973) ("[N]either the fact that the appellees here claimed only a harm to their use and enjoyment of the natural resources of the Washington area, nor the fact that all those who use those resources suffered the same harm, deprives them of standing.").

[12] See, e.g., Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 41–42 (1976) ("[T]he 'case or controversy' limitation of Art. III still requires that a federal court act only to redress injury that fairly can be traced to the challenged action of the defendant, and not injury that results from the independent action of some third party not before the court.").

[13] 405 U.S. 727, 734–35 (1972).

[14] Id.

[15] Id. Under the Court's current standing doctrine, such recreational or aesthetic injuries may serve as the basis for standing. See, e.g., Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 494 (2009) ("While generalized harm to the forest or the environment will not alone support standing, if that harm in fact affects the recreational or even the mere esthetic interests of the plaintiff, that will suffice.").

[16] 412 U.S. 669 (1973). The Court later characterized the broad holding of the SCRAP case as extending standing "to the very outer limit of the law." Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 159 (1990). And the Court's 2013 decision in Clapper v. Amnesty International, in which the Court rejected standing based on chains of attenuated causal inferences, suggests that SCRAP is no longer good law. See 568 U.S. 398, 414 (2013).

[17] Id. at 675–76.

[18] Id. at 688–89 ("Here, the Court was asked to follow a far more attenuated line of causation to the eventual injury of which the appellees complained—a general rate increase would allegedly cause increased use of nonrecyclable commodities as compared to recycled goods, thus resulting in the need to use more natural resources to produce such goods, some of which resources might be taken from the Washington area, and resulting in more refuse that might be discarded in national parks in the Washington area.").

[19] Id. at 688–89.

people dumping more trash in the area's parks.[20] Consequently, the plaintiffs alleged, the new rates would cause environmental damage to parks in the area that they frequented.[21]

The Court found this attenuated causal chain of inferences to be sufficient for standing purposes, determining that the plaintiffs would suffer "specific and perceptible" recreational and aesthetic harms,[22] even if a large number of other people throughout the United States might claim similar harms from the agency's approval of the rate increase.[23] The Court's decision in SCRAP thus exemplifies the Court's broader view at that time of the types of injuries that could support a litigant's standing at the pleading stage in challenges to government action (e.g., noneconomic injuries, such as recreational injuries), as well as the types of inferences that a plaintiff could allege to connect such injuries to the defendant's actions to satisfy the standing requirement.

Although the Supreme Court demonstrated some flexibility in applying rules of standing during the 1970s, the Court did not wholly reject a more stringent standing requirement. For example, two years after its decision in SCRAP, it considered Warth v. Seldin, a case in which residents of Rochester, New York, sued the adjacent town of Penfield and members of its local government boards, claiming that a Penfield town ordinance and its enforcement "excluded persons of low and moderate income from living in the town" in violation of various provisions of the Constitution and federal law.[24] In explaining its decision on the issue of standing, the Court adopted a more stringent definition of "injury in fact" than it had in SCRAP, determining that the plaintiffs failed to show a "distinct and palpable" injury to themselves from the ordinance.[25] The Court further determined that the plaintiffs lacked standing because they had failed to demonstrate a "substantial probability" that their alleged inability to obtain affordable housing resulted from the enforcement of the town's ordinance instead of other factors, such as the independent decisions of real estate developers not to build housing for low-income individuals in the town.[26]

The Supreme Court followed its decision in Warth a year later with Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization, a case that introduced the concept of standing as a core Article III requirement.[27] In Simon, a group of indigent plaintiffs challenged an Internal Revenue Service ruling that allowed nonprofit hospitals to reduce the availability of free services and still retain their charitable organization status. The Court held that the plaintiffs lacked standing to sue because their injury depended on the independent actions of parties not before the Court—i.e., the hospitals.[28] Cases such as Warth and Simon began to rein in the [22] Id. at 686–89 ("[N]either the fact that the appellees here claimed only a harm to their use and enjoyment of the natural resources of the Washington area, nor the fact that all those who use those resources suffered the same harm, deprives them of standing.").

[20] Id.

[21] Id.

[23] Id. at 687 ("To deny standing to persons who are in fact injured simply because many others are also injured, would mean that the most injurious and widespread Government actions could be questioned by nobody. We cannot accept that conclusion.").

[24] 422 U.S. 490, 493 (1975).

[25] Id. at 501.

[26] Id. at 504–07.

[27] 426 U.S. 26, 41–42 (1976) ("[T]he 'case or controversy' limitation of Art. III still requires that a federal court act only to redress injury that fairly can be traced to the challenged action of the defendant, and not injury that results from the independent action of some third party not before the court.").

[28] Id. at 28.

more flexible standing test of the early 1970s[29] but left unresolved some questions about the legal basis for the standing inquiry and how rigidly courts should apply standing requirements. Nonetheless, these cases became the building blocks for later decisions that would usher in an era of stricter standing requirements,[30] ultimately culminating in the Court's watershed decision in Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife in the early 1990s.[31]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4 Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife Test

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.1 Overview of Lujan Test

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Although the Supreme Court had broadly outlined the basic elements of modern standing doctrine during the 1970s, the Court did not clearly articulate the now-classic three-part test that federal courts must apply when inquiring into a litigant's Article III standing until its 1992 decision in Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife.[1] In that case, which involved an environmental group's challenge under a citizen-suit provision to the Department of Interior's decision not to apply the consultation rules of the Endangered Species Act to federal agency actions outside of the United States and high seas, Justice Antonin Scalia synthesized several of the Court's standing cases from 1970s and 1980s to produce a three-part test.[2] Writing for the Court, he stated that a litigant seeking to invoke the jurisdiction of a federal court must demonstrate that:

- He has suffered an "injury in fact" that is "concrete," "particularized," and "actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical";
- That a causal connection exists between the injury and the challenged conduct of the defendant, such that the injury is "fairly traceable" to the defendant's conduct and not the result of action by third parties not before the court; and
- That it is "likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision."[3]

---

[29] See also, e.g., Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 260–64 (1977) (adopting a broad view of the standing requirement as encompassing both "constitutional limitations and prudential considerations").

[30] See, e.g., Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737 (1984); Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 485 (1982).

[31] 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992).

[1] 504 U.S. 555 (1992).

[2] Id. at 560–61.

[3] Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). Although the Court has characterized all three standing elements as constitutionally required, it has at times suggested that Congress may, to an extent, relax the causation and redressability requirements when it creates procedural rights for private citizens to exercise. For example, a plaintiff that is harmed by an agency decision, and alleges a procedural defect in that decision, "can assert that right . . . even though he cannot establish with any certainty" that the correct procedure would have resulted in a different decision. E.g., id. at 572 n.7. See also Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 497 (2009) (suggesting in dicta that Congress

This section explores the modern doctrine of Article III standing by examining cases in which the Supreme Court has interpreted and applied the three elements of the Lujan test in specific factual situations. Notably, although each standing element imposes an independent requirement on litigants, the three basic elements are interrelated.[4]

The first prong of the Lujan test requires a litigant to allege (and ultimately prove) that he has suffered an injury-in-fact. According to the Supreme Court, this key requirement has three components, obligating the litigant to demonstrate that he has suffered an injury that is (1) "concrete," (2) "particularized," and (3) "actual or imminent."[5] The meaning of each of these three components is best illustrated by a discussion of specific factual situations in which the Court has interpreted and applied it. The Lujan test also requires that a plaintiff be able to show causation and redressability.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.2 Concrete Injury

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

First, to have an injury-in-fact, a litigant must establish that he has suffered or is imminently threatened with a "concrete" injury—that is, an injury that is "real" and not "abstract."[1] Although the Supreme Court has not clearly articulated what makes a particular harm sufficiently concrete for standing purposes, it has provided some broad guidance. Over the years, the Court has decided several cases that explain the general types of injuries that qualify as concrete.[2] Many of these cases required the Justices to determine whether an may, by according a procedural right to private parties, "loosen the strictures of the redressability prong of [the] standing inquiry" so that standing exists even if the Court's enforcement of a procedural right would not necessarily result in the redress of the plaintiff's concrete injury). Despite this, a plaintiff must always show injury from an agency decision, even to claim a procedural error. See id. at 496 ("[D]eprivation of a procedural right without some concrete interest that is affected by the deprivation—a procedural right in vacuo—is insufficient to create Article III standing.").

[4] See Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 753 n.19 (1984) ("To the extent there is a difference [between the causation and redressability requirements of standing], it is that the former examines the causal connection between the assertedly unlawful conduct and the alleged injury, whereas the latter examines the causal connection between the alleged injury and the judicial relief requested."). See also Sprint Commc'ns Co. v. APCC Servs., Inc., 554 U.S. 269, 288 (2008) ("[T]he general 'personal stake' requirement and the more specific standing requirements (injury in fact, redressability, and causation) are flip sides of the same coin. They are simply different descriptions of the same judicial effort to ensure, in every case or controversy, 'that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination.'") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

[5] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–61 (1992).

[1] Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 340 (2016).

[2] See, e.g., Food Mktg. Inst. v. Argus Leader Media, No. 18-481, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 24, 2019) (holding that the U.S. Department of Agriculture's disclosure of annual store-level data regarding redemption of Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program benefits under the Freedom of Information Act would constitute a cognizable competitive and financial injury to grocery retailers); Plains Commerce Bank v. Long Family Land & Cattle Co., 554 U.S. 316, 324–26 (2008) (holding that a tribal court's exercise of jurisdiction over a discrimination claim against a non-Indian bank is a sufficiently concrete injury); Dep't of Commerce v. U.S. House of Representatives, 525 U.S. 316, 331 (1999) (determining that a voter's loss of a Representative to the United States Congress is a sufficiently concrete harm); GMC v. Tracy, 519 U.S. 278, 286 (1997) (stating that liability for payment of a tax that allegedly discriminated intangible injury sufficed for standing. The Court has identified several arguably noneconomic harms to be concrete injuries, including aesthetic injuries (e.g., harm to a plaintiff's ability to observe an animal species);[3] recreational injuries (e.g., injury to a plaintiff's enjoyment of natural resources such as a park);[4] certain procedural injuries (e.g., injury to a litigant's right to have an agency prepare an environmental impact statement for a federal agency action that affects his or her interests);[5] injuries to constitutional rights;[6] dilution of the effectiveness of a citizen's vote in a federal election;[7] and stigmatic injuries from racial discrimination.[8] By contrast, the Court has held that concrete injuries would not include, for example, psychological harm from observing the federal government's use of taxpayer money to provide financial assistance to a religious institution[9] or harms to the plaintiff's general interest in advancing abstract interests (e.g., an interest in having low-income people access health services).[10] Notably, the fact that an injury is "particularized"—or, in other words, that it affects the plaintiff individually[11]—does not necessarily make that injury a concrete harm.

Congress, by statute, can influence a court's standing analysis, but Congress cannot itself create standing in the absence of the constitutional prerequisites. When determining whether the defendant's alleged violation of a right created by Congress is sufficient by itself to against out-of-state interests in violation of the Commerce Clause amounts to a concrete harm); Int'l Primate Prot. League v. Adm'rs of Tulane Educ. Fund, 500 U.S. 72, 77 (1991) (holding that a litigants' loss of a right to sue in the forum of their choosing is a concrete harm); Franchise Tax Bd. v. Alcan Aluminum, 493 U.S. 331, 336 (1990) (determining that shareholders' reduced returns on their investments from an accounting method employed by California in calculating taxable income of companies in which they had invested is a concrete harm); Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 476 (1987) (finding the government's designation of film exhibitor's film as "political propaganda" is a sufficiently concrete harm for standing purposes).

[3] E.g., Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 562–63 (1992).

[4] United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures, 412 U.S. 669, 686–87 (1973).

[5] See, e.g., Lujan, 504 U.S. at 572 n.7. See also FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 21 (1998) (holding that a litigant's failure to obtain information that federal law requires to be disclosed can constitute a sufficiently concrete injury of his procedural statutory right for Article III standing purposes).

[6] See, e.g., Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 341 (noting that injuries to First Amendment rights to free speech and free exercise of religion may amount to concrete injuries). But see Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 13–16 (1972) (finding that civilians lacked standing to challenge the Department of the Army's alleged surveillance of peaceful political activity because they failed to allege a specific harm, beyond speculation, that it had a chilling effect on the exercise of their First Amendment rights).

[7] Dep't of Commerce v. U.S. House of Representatives, 525 U.S. 316, 331–32 (1999) (stating that "voters have standing to challenge an apportionment statute because they are asserting a plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes.") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

[8] Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 755 (1984) ("There can be no doubt that [the stigmatizing injury caused by racial discrimination] is one of the most serious consequences of discriminatory government action and is sufficient in some circumstances to support standing."). The Court has also held that a litigant may have standing when it alleges injury from the federal government's disregard of the basic structure of government established in the Constitution.

[9] Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 485 (1982) (indicating that psychological injuries stemming from the plaintiffs witnessing "conduct with which [they] disagree[d]" was an insufficient injury for standing).

[10] Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 497–98 (2009) (rejecting environmental organizations' argument that they had suffered a concrete injury because there was a "statistical probability" that at least some of their hundreds of thousands of members nationwide were threatened with concrete harm from Forest Service regulations); Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 39–40 (1976) ("We note at the outset that the five respondent organizations, which described themselves as dedicated to promoting access of the poor to health services, could not establish their standing on the basis of that goal. Our decisions make clear that an organization's abstract concern with a subject that could be affected by an adjudication does not substitute for the concrete injury required by [Article III]."). But see Havens Realty Corp. v. Coleman, 455 U.S. 363, 379 (1982) ("If, as broadly alleged, petitioners' steering practices have perceptibly impaired HOME's ability to provide counseling and referral services for low- and moderate-income home-seekers, there can be no question that the organization has suffered injury in fact. Such concrete and demonstrable injury to the organization's activities—with the consequent drain on the organization's resources—constitutes far more than simply a setback to the organization's abstract social interests.").

[11] For more on the Article III requirement that the plaintiff have suffered a particularized injury, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury.

constitute a concrete harm to a litigant for standing purposes, the Court has stated that federal courts should examine whether the injury is similar to a harm that "has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts."[12] But in doing so, courts must also give at least some weight to Congress's judgments about which intangible harms amount to concrete Article III injuries.[13] Thus, although Congress may, through enactment of legislation, elevate certain harms to the status of concrete injuries for standing purposes,[14] Congress cannot create standing for litigants who do not face at least a material risk of injury from a defendant's violation of the litigant's statutory rights.[15]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In addition to showing that he suffers a material risk of harm from an actual, concrete injury, the litigant must demonstrate that the injury is "particularized"—or, in other words, that it affects him in a "personal and individual way."[1] The "particularized injury" requirement has long served as a component of the Supreme Court's standing analysis,[2] barring plaintiffs from seeking judicial redress for generalized grievances undifferentiated from those that a large number of people could claim.[3] Nonetheless, the Court has generally been careful to distinguish "generalized grievances" that fail the particularity requirement from widespread injuries, such as mass torts, that are suffered by a large number of people but qualify as particularized because each person has sustained an individualized harm that is distinct from [12] Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 341 (2016).

---

[13] Id. at 343.

[14] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 578 (1992) ("As we said in Sierra Club, statutory 'broadening of the categories of injury that may be alleged in support of standing is a different matter from abandoning the requirement that the party seeking review must himself have suffered an injury.'").

[15] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 343; Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 496 (2009). See also Thole v. U.S. Bank N.A., No. 17-1712, slip op. at 4 (U.S. June 1, 2020) (rejecting the argument that the existence of a general cause of action for participants in a defined-benefit plan in the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 sufficed to provide Article III standing).

[1] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 n.1 (1992).

[2] See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury.

[3] Lujan, 504 U.S. at 573–74 ("We have consistently held that a plaintiff raising only a generally available grievance about government—claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large—does not state an Article III case or controversy."); accord Gill v. Whitford, No. 16-1161, slip op. at 21 (U.S. June 18, 2018) (holding that voters who, at trial, alleged statewide injury to Wisconsin Democrats as a result of vote dilution from the state legislature's partisan gerrymandering lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of that practice because they did not demonstrate individual and personal injury to their interests as voters in a particular district). But see United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744 (1995) (noting that "[d]emonstrating the individualized harm our standing doctrine requires may not be easy in the racial gerrymandering context, as it will frequently be difficult to discern why a particular citizen was put in one district or another" but concluding that where a plaintiff resides in a "gerrymandered district, however, the plaintiff has been denied equal treatment because of the legislature's reliance on racial criteria, and therefore has standing to challenge the legislature's action").

that suffered by the others.[4] In this vein, the Court has held that a litigant's failure to obtain information that federal law requires to be disclosed can constitute a sufficiently particularized injury of a procedural statutory right for Article III standing purposes, even if many individuals may suffer such an injury.[5]

However, even if a citizen has suffered a "particularized" injury of a statutory right, he must still demonstrate that such an injury is "concrete." The Supreme Court distinguished between the concepts of "concrete" and "particularized" injury in its 2016 decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins.[6] In Spokeo, the plaintiff, Thomas Robins, sued Spokeo, Inc., a company that operated a "people search engine," for alleged violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act of 1970 (FCRA).[7] The FCRA is a consumer protection statute that was enacted to ensure fairness, accuracy, and privacy in consumer credit reporting by imposing a number of requirements on consumer reporting agencies.[8] The plaintiff sought to pursue a class action lawsuit alleging that Spokeo had willfully reported incorrect information about him and other class members in search results on its website.[9]

The court of appeals had held that Spokeo had inflicted a concrete (albeit, intangible) Article III injury on Robins because they violated his statutory rights, causing him individualized injury and entitling him to statutory damages.[10] The Supreme Court reversed, holding that Spokeo's alleged procedural violations of the FCRA, even if they affected the plaintiff individually and were therefore "particularized," might not amount to "concrete" injuries, because "not all inaccuracies cause harm or present any material risk of harm."[11] Therefore, the Court remanded the case to the Ninth Circuit to decide whether such a risk could result from the defendant's purported procedural violations of the FCRA.[12] The Court's decision in Spokeo indicates that a defendant's actions, even if contrary to a procedural duty established by a federal statute providing a damages remedy and sufficient for a "particularized" injury, might not amount to a concrete injury sufficient for Article III standing if such injuries do not actually present a material risk of harm to the litigant.[13] Federal courts will judge whether the defendant's alleged violation of a right created by Congress is sufficient by itself to constitute a concrete harm to a litigant for standing purposes by considering whether the injury is similar to a harm that "has traditionally been regarded as providing a [4] Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 340 n.7 (2016).

[5] FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 21 (1998).

[6] 578 U.S. at 334.

[7] Id. at 334–36.

[8] Fair Credit Reporting Act §§ 607, 616, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681e, 1681n.

[9] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 334–36. The plaintiff had alleged that Spokeo had reported incorrect information concerning, among other things, his marital status and occupation, and thereby committed a technical violation of the FCRA that could damage his career prospects when he sought employment in the future. Id.

[10] Id. at 11.

[11] Id. See also Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 572 n.7 (1992).

[12] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 343.

[13] Id. For further discussion of Spokeo and its limits on Congress's ability to create new private rights of action, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury. See also TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, No. 20-297, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 25, 2021) (holding that certain members of a class action lawsuit against a credit reporting agency brought under the Fair Credit Reporting Act had not suffered a concrete injury because misleading information in their credit files had not been provided to third parties); Thole v. U.S. Bank N.A., No. 17-1712 slip op. at 2, 5–6 (U.S. June 1, 2020) (holding that participants in a defined-benefit plan lacked a concrete stake in a lawsuit seeking monetary and injunctive relief to remedy alleged mismanagement of the plan where the plaintiffs' monthly payments were fixed and not tied to plan performance).

basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts."[14] But in doing so, courts must give at least some weight to Congress's judgments about which intangible harms amount to concrete Article III injuries.[15]

In addition, the extent to which widespread environmental harms may constitute particularized injuries is an emerging issue in the Court's standing jurisprudence.[16] In a 2007 case in which the State of Massachusetts alleged particularized injury from climate change, the Court determined that the widely shared risks posed by rising sea levels constituted an individualized injury to the State in its capacity as owner of coastal property.[17] However, in that case, the Court did not address whether allegations of widespread harm from climate change would constitute particularized injury in a case brought by an individual plaintiff rather than a state.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.4 Actual or Imminent Injury

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

To satisfy the demands of Article III, a litigant must have suffered an "actual or imminent" injury or, in other words, have "sustained or [be] immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of the challenged . . . conduct."[1] To satisfy this test, a litigant's injury must either have already occurred, be presently occurring, or will imminently occur (i.e., be "certainly impending").[2] The "actual or imminent" injury prong of the Lujan test is related to the "redressability" prong. If the alleged injury is an imminent (i.e., future) harm, the litigant may demonstrate redressability only if the plaintiff has requested equitable relief (i.e., injunctive or declaratory relief).[3] On the other hand, if the injury occurred wholly in the past, the litigant may demonstrate redressability if it seeks monetary damages.[4] [14] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 341.

---

[15] Id. at 11.

[16] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 522 (2007) ("That these climate-change risks are 'widely shared' does not minimize Massachusetts' interest in the outcome of this litigation.").

[17] Id. at 522–23.

[1] Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 102 (1983) (citations omitted). The "actual or imminent" injury prong of the Lujan test is related to the "redressability" prong. If the alleged injury is an imminent (i.e., future) harm, the litigant may demonstrate redressability only if the plaintiff has requested equitable relief (i.e., injunctive or declaratory relief). See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 105–09 (1998). On the other hand, if the injury occurred wholly in the past, the litigant may demonstrate redressability only if it seeks monetary damages. See id. A litigant cannot demonstrate "actual or imminent injury" from a legal requirement that has "no means of enforcement." California v. Texas, No. 19-840, slip op. at 5 (U.S. June 17, 2021)

[2] See Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 401 (2013).

[3] See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 105–09 (1998).

[4] See id.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.4
Actual or Imminent Injury

The requirement that a litigant establish an "actual" (i.e., past or present) injury is largely synonymous with the requirement for a concrete and particularized injury.[5] For example, in Lewis v. Casey, the Court defined an "actual injury" to an inmate's constitutional right of access to the courts and counsel as requiring an inmate to "demonstrate that the alleged shortcomings in [a prison's] library or legal assistance program hindered his efforts to pursue a legal claim."[6] This evidentiary burden simply required a showing that the inmate had suffered an injury in the past that went beyond harm to "an abstract, freestanding right to a law library or legal assistance" and involved more than an allegation that a "prison's law library or legal assistance program [was] subpar in some theoretical sense."[7] The Court cited as an example of actual injury in this context that an inmate's legal complaint "was dismissed for failure to satisfy some technical requirement which, because of deficiencies in the prison's legal assistance facilities, he could not have known."[8]

The major questions that have arisen concerning the "actual or imminent" prong of the standing inquiry largely involve cases in which a litigant alleges future (i.e., "imminent") injury and seeks injunctive relief to prevent it.[9] The Supreme Court has decided several cases addressing when a litigant's alleged future injures are sufficiently imminent to confer standing to seek a court order aimed at redressing them.

For example, the Court has indicated that it may be difficult for a litigant to establish an "actual or imminent" injury when he seeks injunctive relief against government officials for allegedly illegal and unconstitutional systemic practices in their administration or enforcement of the law.[10] In O'Shea v. Littleton,[11] several residents of Cairo, Illinois, sued state and local officials for allegedly administering the criminal justice system in a discriminatory and unconstitutional manner through a pattern of illegal bondsetting, sentencing, and jury-fee practices.[12] The Court determined that the plaintiffs lacked standing to seek an injunction against these practices because they did not allege they had actually suffered (or would immediately suffer) injuries from the conduct of these officials.[13] Although some of the plaintiffs were defendants in past criminal cases, at the time that they brought their lawsuit, none of the plaintiffs were serving sentences, on trial, or awaiting trial, and they did not allege an intent to engage in illegal conduct in the future.[14] The plaintiffs thus failed to demonstrate [5] The distinction between past and present injuries sometimes becomes blurred in practice. See, e.g., Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417, 43031 (1998) (allowing the State of New York to challenge the President's authority to exercise a line-item veto, based on a subsequent exercise of that veto that would result in a "substantial contingent liability" of billions of dollars on the state).

[6] 518 U.S. 343, 351 (1996).

[7] See id.

[8] Id.

[9] A litigant that seeks damages for an asserted risk of future harm has not demonstrated a concrete harm sufficient for Article III standing unless "the exposure to the risk of future harm itself causes a separate concrete harm." TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, No. 20-297, slip op. at 20, 26 (U.S. June 25, 2021).

[10] E.g., Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362, 372 (1976) (determining that litigants could not show "real and immediate injury" because their allegations concerned "what one of a small, unnamed minority of policemen might do to them in the future because of that unknown policeman's perception of departmental disciplinary procedures.").

[11] 414 U.S. 488 (1974).

[12] Id. at 490–92.

[13] Id. at 494 ("Abstract injury is not enough. It must be alleged that the plaintiff 'has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury' as the result of the challenged statute or official conduct.").

[14] Id. at 494–95 ("Past exposure to illegal conduct does not in itself show a present case or controversy regarding injunctive relief, however, if unaccompanied by any continuing, present adverse effects. Neither the complaint nor respondents' counsel suggested that any of the named plaintiffs at the time the complaint was filed were themselves serving an allegedly illegal sentence or were on trial or awaiting trial before petitioners."). Notably, the O'Shea plaintiffs alleged that they would likely have a future challenge to the government's practices. If they had alleged that their past challenges to the government's conduct had evaded judicial review because the unconstitutional conduct more than mere speculation that they would be subject to the challenged law enforcement practices and suffer injuries as a result of being arrested, charged with crimes under laws they did not challenge as unconstitutional, and subject to proceedings before the criminal justice system.[15]

A decade later, the Court held that past illegal conduct by the government does not imply that the government will again violate the law in the future. For purposes of standing, this holding means that a litigant cannot use that past conduct to demonstrate imminent harm when seeking a declaration from the court that the agency's past action was illegal (i.e., a declaratory judgment) or an order preventing the agency from engaging in illegal conduct in the future (i.e., an injunction). In Los Angeles v. Lyons, the plaintiff sought damages for having allegedly suffered a chokehold at the hands of the city police department but also asked for injunctive relief prohibiting the city from using chokeholds in the future.[16] However, the Court found the plaintiff's allegations of future injury to be too speculative to support standing for the requested prospective injunctive relief because, although the plaintiff had been choked once, he could not realistically allege that there was a threat that he would again be arrested and illegally choked by the police as a result of the city's policy.[17]

In a 2013 case implicating national security issues, the Court addressed how likely the threat of future harm to the plaintiff must be in order for that harm to qualify as an imminent injury. In Clapper v. Amnesty International USA, attorneys, human rights, labor, legal, and media organizations brought constitutional challenges alleging prospective injury from surreptitious federal government surveillance practices conducted by the Executive Branch pursuant to Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA).[18] The plaintiffs alleged that these practices presented an "objectively reasonable likelihood" that the government would intercept their communications with individuals outside of the United States.[19] Although they could not definitively show that they or their clients or sources would be subject to these practices, the plaintiffs alleged threatened injury to their ability to "locate witnesses, cultivate sources, obtain information, and communicate confidential information to their clients."[20] Moreover, the plaintiffs alleged that they had sustained actual, present injury because the risk of surveillance was "so substantial that they ha[d] been forced to take costly and burdensome measures to protect the confidentiality of their international communications."[21]

The Court, in a 5-4 ruling written by Justice Samuel Alito, found that the plaintiffs lacked standing because they could not show that the FISA provision threatened them with "certainly ceased before the litigants could bring a lawsuit, then the Court may have addressed the doctrine of mootness. See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.7 Capable of Repetition, Yet Evading Review (discussing circumstances in which the Court has made an exception to the mootness doctrine because conduct is "capable of repetition, yet evading review").

[15] O'Shea, 414 U.S. 488 at 496 ("Of course, past wrongs are evidence bearing on whether there is a real and immediate threat of repeated injury. But here the prospect of future injury rests on the likelihood that respondents will again be arrested for and charged with violations of the criminal law and will again be subjected to bond proceedings, trial, or sentencing before petitioners."); id. at 498 ("[W]here respondents do not claim any constitutional right to engage in conduct proscribed by therefore presumably permissible state laws, or indicate that it is otherwise their intention to so conduct themselves, the threat of injury from the alleged course of conduct they attack is simply too remote to satisfy the case-or-controversy requirement and permit adjudication by a federal court."). See also Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362, 372 (1976).

[16] 461 U.S. 95, 105 (1983).

[17] Id. ("That Lyons may have been illegally choked by the police [in the past] . . . does nothing to establish a real and immediate threat that he would again be stopped for a traffic violation, or for any other offense, by an officer . . . who would illegally choke him into unconsciousness without any provocation or resistance on his part.").

[18] 568 U.S. 398, 401–02, 406–07 (2013). See also 50 U.S.C. § 1881a.

[19] Clapper, 568 U.S. at 401–02, 406–07.

[20] Id.

[21] Id. at 407.

impending" harm[22] or, at the very least, a substantial risk of harm from the government surveillance program.[23] Moreover, the plaintiffs could not, in the Court's view, "manufacture standing" by alleging present injury from the costs that they had incurred in order to avoid the hypothetical harm of government surveillance (e.g., travel expenses to conduct in-person conversations abroad).[24] It is important to note that Clapper arose in the sensitive areas of national security and foreign affairs, areas where the Court has "often found a lack of standing in cases" because of concerns about the Judiciary interfering with the political branches' activities.[25]

The following year, in a case not arising in the national security context, the Supreme Court appeared to adopt a broader view of the concept of "imminent harm." In Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, the Court addressed imminent harm in the context of a state government's threatened enforcement of an allegedly unconstitutional law against an individual.[26] The Court held that a potentially targeted person may mount a constitutional challenge to the law when enforcement is "sufficiently imminent." As a result, the plaintiff does not have to be arrested or prosecuted before challenging the law.[27] Instead, in order to have standing, the plaintiff must demonstrate "an intention to engage in a course of conduct arguably affected with a constitutional interest" that is "arguably proscribed by the statute challenged," as well as a credible threat of enforcement of the law against him or her.[28] Accordingly, the Court's decision in Susan B. Anthony List suggests that there are still circumstances in which a substantial risk of harm to a litigant (rather than "certainly impending" harm) will suffice for standing purposes.[29]

---

[22] In adopting a "certainly impending" standard, the five-Justice majority conceded that the Court's prior cases had not uniformly required literal certainty. Id. at 414 n.5.

[23] Id. at 401–02, 414 n.5. See also Trump v. New York, No. 20-366, slip op. at 1–2, 5–7 (U.S. Dec. 18, 2020) (per curiam) (rejecting plaintiffs' argument that they had standing to challenge a presidential memorandum directing the Secretary of Commerce to exclude from the federal census apportionment base "aliens who are not in lawful immigration status" because of a "substantial risk" that Commerce's implementation of the memorandum would lead to a reduction in congressional representation or federal funding).

[24] Clapper, 568 U.S. at 402, 407.

[25] Id. at 409. The Court noted that it had previously applied the standing requirements more strictly in cases concerning national security or foreign affairs, including challenges to "the constitutionality of a statute permitting the Central Intelligence Agency to account for its expenditures solely on the certificate of the CIA Director," United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 167–70 (1974); "the Armed Forces Reserve membership of Members of Congress," Schlesinger v. Reservists to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 209–11 (1974); and "an Army intelligence-gathering program," Laird, 408 U.S. at 11–16.

[26] 573 U.S. 682 (2014).

[27] Id. at 689–90, 695 (quoting Babbitt v. Farm Workers, 442 U.S. 289, 298 (1979)).

[28] Id. at 692–98. See also Dep't of Commerce v. New York, No. 18-966, slip op. at 8–10 (U.S. June 27, 2019) (deferring to the factual finding of the lower court that the Department of Commerce's reinstatement of a citizenship question on the federal census could cause concrete and imminent injury to states with large numbers of noncitizens by depriving them of federal funds distributed on the basis of state population because it would "depress the census response rate" among noncitizen households); Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1 (1988) (holding that a landlord and association of owners and lessors of real property had standing to challenge a city rent control ordinance because of the probability that, as a result of the enforcement of the ordinance, "a landlord's rent will be reduced below what he or she would otherwise be able to obtain in the absence of the Ordinance"); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188–89 (1973) (concluding that doctors had standing to challenge a Georgia statute restricting the performance of abortions "despite the fact that the record does not disclose that any one of them has been prosecuted, or threatened with prosecution, for violation of the State's abortion statutes" because they "should not be required to await and undergo a criminal prosecution as the sole means of seeking relief"). The Court relied on Doe v. Bolton to reach the same result in Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 62 (1976).

[29] See Susan B. Anthony List, 573 U.S. at 692–98 (referring several times to the threat of enforcement of the law against the litigants as "substantial"). See also Thole v. U.S. Bank N.A., No. 17-1712, slip op. at 5 (U.S. June 1, 2020) (concluding that participants in a defined-benefit plan lacked standing because they failed to adequately plead that the plan managers had "substantially increased the risk that the plan and the employer would fail and be unable to pay the participants' future pension benefits"). In the past, the Court has also described the standard for "imminent

The Supreme Court also found imminent harm in a 2008 lawsuit in which a candidate for Congress, who declared that he would "self-finance" his campaign, challenged provisions of federal election law that would have allowed his opponent to receive campaign contributions on more favorable terms.[30] The Court determined that the self-financing candidate faced the threat of immediate injury.[31] Although the opponent had not yet qualified for the campaign contribution benefit, the plaintiff had challenged the law after declaring his candidacy, as well as indicating his intent to spend enough of his personal funds during the campaign to trigger the benefit for his opponent.[32] With the election in the near future, and finding no indication that the plaintiff's opponent would relinquish the opportunity to receive expanded contributions, the Court determined that injury to the plaintiff was imminent and that the plaintiff had standing to sue.[33]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.5 Causation

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The second prong of the Lujan test for Article III standing requires the litigant to demonstrate that the injury-in-fact that he or she has suffered is "fairly traceable" to the challenged actions of the defendant.[1] Under Supreme Court jurisprudence, this requirement harm" as requiring the plaintiffs to show a "reasonable probability" of harm or a "threat of specific future harm." See, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Geertson Seed Farms, 561 U.S. 139, 153–55 (2010) (finding that conventional alfalfa farmers and environmental groups had demonstrated an imminent injury for standing purposes when they alleged that the Department of Agriculture's partial deregulation of genetically engineered alfalfa crops would pose a "reasonable probability" of infecting organic conventional alfalfa crops with an engineered gene); Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., 528 U.S. 167, 184 (2000) ("[W]e see nothing 'improbable' about the proposition that a company's continuous and pervasive illegal discharges of pollutants into a river would cause nearby residents to curtail their recreational use of that waterway and would subject them to other economic and aesthetic harms."); Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 13–14 (1972) ("Allegations of a subjective 'chill' [of First Amendment rights based on speculation] are not an adequate substitute for a claim of specific present objective harm or a threat of specific future harm; 'the federal courts established pursuant to Article III of the Constitution do not render advisory opinions.'") (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

---

[30] Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 728, 734–35 (2008).

[31] Id.

[32] Id.

[33] Id. See also Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson, No. 21-463, slip op. at 14 (U.S. Dec. 10, 2021) (determining that healthcare providers and other opponents of the Texas Heartbeat Act, which allowed private citizens to sue parties who perform or abet abortions after a fetal heartbeat is detected, lacked standing to sue a private defendant who had attested in sworn declarations that he would not bring a private right of action against the plaintiffs). Carney v. Adams, No. 19-309, slip op. at 1, 5–6, 12 (U.S. Dec. 10, 2020) (holding that an attorney lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of a provision in Delaware's state constitution that required appointments to Delaware's major courts to "reflect a partisan balance" when the attorney failed to demonstrate that he was "'able and ready' to apply" for a judicial vacancy).

[1] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–61 (1992) (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court has stated that plaintiffs challenging a law's constitutionality may have Article III even if they cannot trace their injuries to the challenged law, so long as their injuries are traceable to the conduct of the defendant. Collins v. Yellen, No. 19-422, slip op. at 17–19 (U.S. June 23, 2021) (determining that shareholders had Article III standing when their may not be met when the litigant's injury results at least in part from the actions of a third party not before the court or, more broadly, when "the line of causation between the illegal conduct and injury [is] too attenuated."[2]

For example, in Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Org., the Supreme Court found that the plaintiffs lacked standing because they failed to show that the defendants' actions had caused them harm, rather than the actions of absent third parties.[3] In that case, a group of indigent plaintiffs challenged an Internal Revenue Service (IRS) ruling that allowed nonprofit hospitals to reduce the availability of free services and still retain their charitable organization status.[4] The plaintiffs alleged that the Revenue Ruling made such hospitals less likely to grant free services to indigents.[5] However, the Court held that the plaintiffs lacked standing to sue because their injury was the result of independent action of parties not before the Court—i.e., the hospitals.[6] In other words, the hospitals' denial of services to the indigents, even if likely to injure them, was not fairly traceable to the federal government's issuance of the Revenue Ruling.[7] Instead, the Court determined that it was too speculative to conclude that the denial of service was caused by the Revenue Ruling or that the plaintiffs would receive free hospital services if the IRS revoked its rule, as hospitals could establish their own policies with respect to providing services to indigents without regard to the tax implications.[8] Thus, the plaintiffs lacked standing because they alleged future injuries that depended at least in part on the actions of third parties not before the court, and they could not show more than mere speculation that those third parties would establish policies that would injure them.[9] economic injuries were traceable to the Federal Housing Finance Agency's adoption of a new policy, even though the shareholders specifically challenged the constitutionality of the law that created the agency and defined its structure). In FEC v. Ted Cruz for Senate, the Court determined that a U.S. Senator and his campaign committee had standing to challenge the constitutionality of a provision in a federal campaign finance statute. The government argued that the Federal Election Commission's threatened enforcement of the statutory provision did not cause the litigants' Article III injuries; rather, the litigants' injuries stemmed from the agency's threatened enforcement of an implementing regulation that imposed loan-repayment limitations. Nonetheless, the Court held that the litigants had standing to challenge the statutory provision because "an agency's regulation cannot operate independently of the statute that authorized it." No. 21–12, slip op. at 22 (U.S. May 16, 2022) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Moreover, the litigants' injuries were traceable to the agency's threatened enforcement of the statute and implementing regulations despite the fact that the litigants had "knowingly triggered" the provisions' application. See id. at 4–5.

---

[2] Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 752 (1984).

[3] 426 U.S. 26, 42–44 (1976).

[4] Id. at 28.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 42.

[7] Id. at 41–42.

[8] Id. at 42–43 ("It is purely speculative whether the denials of service . . . fairly can be traced to [federal officials'] 'encouragement' or instead result from decisions made by the hospitals without regard to the tax implications."). Although the Court's decision in Simon signaled that the Court would take a less permissive approach to the standing doctrine than it had in prior years, the Court had reached a similar result a year earlier. See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 502, 506–07 (1975) (finding that low- and moderate-income residents of Rochester, New York, who sued the adjacent town of Penfield for allegedly excluding them from living in Penfield, lacked standing because the plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that their alleged inability to obtain affordable housing was fairly traceable to the town's zoning practices instead of other factors, such as the independent decisions of companies not to build housing for lower-income individuals in the town). For an example of a case from this era in which the Court found that a litigant had satisfied the causation requirement because the plaintiff's injury did not depend on the actions of absent third parties, see Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 264 (1977) (determining that a low-income person had shown a "substantial probability" that judicial relief addressing an allegedly racially discriminatory zoning practices would redress his inability to locate housing near his employer by permitting a specific housing project to move forward because the project's success did not depend on the actions of third parties not before the court).

[9] Simon, 426 U.S. at 42–43. But see Dep't of Commerce v. New York, No. 18-966, slip op. at 10–11 (U.S. June 27, 2019) (holding that states' alleged injuries stemming from the prospective loss of federal funds were fairly traceable to the Department of Commerce's inclusion of a citizenship question on the federal census questionnaire because a depressed census response rate, even if the result of unlawful third-party conduct, would be the "predictable outcome" of government action on third parties).

A further example of how the interplay between the decisions of absent third parties and the litigant's injury has affected the causation prong of the standing analysis is Allen v. Wright.[10] In that case, parents of African-American children who attended public schools alleged that the IRS had caused them injury by allowing racially discriminatory private schools to qualify for federal tax exemptions, preventing the desegregation of their children's schools.[11] The Court found these allegations did not establish sufficient causation for standing purposes.[12] Relying on its earlier decision in Simon, the Court determined that it was not clear that racial segregation in the public schools was linked to the IRS policies because private school officials might not change racially discriminatory school policies in response to a withdrawal of tax benefits, and, even if they did, parents of children attending private schools might not transfer their children to public school as a result of such changes.[13] Thus, the plaintiffs' allegations that the IRS policy had caused them injury rested on speculation about the actions of multiple third parties, and such speculation was insufficient to establish a causal connection between the defendant's actions and the plaintiffs' alleged injuries for standing purposes.[14]

As in the case of standing for procedural injuries, discussed above, certain kinds of equal protection injuries may be accepted as sufficient for standing even if the possibility of ultimate relief from that injury remains somewhat speculative. When a litigant challenges a governmental entity's alleged discriminatory practices on equal protection grounds, arguing that those practices have deprived it of a benefit granted to another favored class of individuals, the litigant may have standing even if it cannot demonstrate that it would have received the benefit in the absence of the government's conduct—or that a judicial order would result in its receipt of the benefit if it prevailed. Rather, the litigant must simply show that it would secure equal treatment under the law if it obtained judicial relief. Thus, for example, in Adarand Constructors v. Peña, the Court allowed a company's challenge to subcontractor compensation clauses in federal procurement contracts that allegedly favored small businesses controlled by racial minorities.[15] The Court held that, even if the company could not demonstrate that it would be the low bidder on any particular subcontract, it had alleged a sufficient injury from its inability to compete on an equal footing with other companies.[16] Similarly, the Court determined that a male plaintiff had standing to challenge Alabama laws that authorized courts to impose alimony obligations on husbands but not wives.[17] The Court permitted the challenge even though it was possible that prevailing in the suit would "not

[10] 468 U.S. 737 (1984).

[11] Id. at 739–40, 757–59.

[12] Id.

[13] Id.

[14] Id.

[15] 515 U.S. 200, 211 (1995).

[16] Id. See also Ne. Fla. Chapter of Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. City of Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 666 (1993) ("When the government erects a barrier that makes it more difficult for members of one group to obtain a benefit than it is for members of another group, a member of the former group seeking to challenge the barrier need not allege that he would have obtained the benefit but for the barrier in order to establish standing."); Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 280 n.14 (1978) ("The trial court found [an injury] in the University's decision not to permit Bakke to compete for all 100 places in the class, simply because of his race. Hence the constitutional requirements of Art. III were met. The question of Bakke's admission [or nonadmission] is merely one of relief.") (internal citation omitted).

[17] Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268, 271–73 (1979).

