ultimately bring [the plaintiff] relief from the judgment [for alimony] outstanding against him, as the State could respond to a reversal by neutrally extending alimony rights to needy husbands as well as wives."[18]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.6 Redressability

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The third and final prong of Lujan's test for Article III standing, which is closely related to the "causation" test,[1] requires the litigant to demonstrate that the injury he has purportedly suffered would likely be redressed if the court granted the relief that he has requested.[2] When analyzing the redressability element of standing, the Supreme Court has focused on the specific relief requested by the plaintiff in its complaint and considered whether granting that relief would redress the injury alleged. For example, in Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, the Court found a "substantial likelihood" that a proposed nuclear power plant would not be constructed in the absence of a limitation of liability provided under the Price-Anderson Act. As a result, the neighbors of the proposed nuclear plant had standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Price-Anderson Act because the environmental and health injuries they would allegedly suffer from the operation of the plant would be redressed if the Court struck down the contested provisions of the Act.[3]

---

[18] Id. See also Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728, 737–39 (1984) ("[W]e have frequently entertained attacks on discriminatory statutes or practices even when the government could deprive a successful plaintiff of any monetary relief by withdrawing the statute's benefits from both the favored and the excluded class."). The Court employed similar reasoning when holding that a general interest newspaper had standing to bring a First Amendment challenge to an allegedly discriminatory Arkansas sales tax exemption for special interest journals. Ark. Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 227 (1987) (stating that to hold otherwise would "effectively insulate underinclusive statutes from constitutional challenge").

[1] Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 753 n.19 (1984).

[2] Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 107 (1998) ("Relief that does not remedy the injury suffered cannot bootstrap a plaintiff into federal court; that is the very essence of the redressability requirement."). See also Utah v. Evans, 536 U.S. 452, 459–64 (2002) (holding that the State of Utah had demonstrated redressability for standing purposes because of its reasonable belief that if it prevailed, an injunction directing the Secretary of Commerce to recalculate and recertify an official census count would likely lead to a reapportionment of congressional representatives in its favor—a result permitted by the statutes that set forth the census process); Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–61 (1992).

[3] 438 U.S. 59, 74–81 (1978). See also Metro. Wash. Airports Auth. v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, 501 U.S. 252, 264–65 (1991) (holding that individuals living under airplane flight paths could bring a constitutional challenge to a congressionally created "Board of Review" that had power to veto airport authority development plans because invalidation of the veto power could prevent the enactment of plans for further development and could thus redress the individuals' alleged prospective injuries of increased air traffic, accident risks, noise, and pollution). Similarly, in a case where a creditor challenged a bankruptcy court's structured dismissal of a corporate reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code that denied the creditor the opportunity to obtain a settlement or assert a claim with "litigation value," the Court held that a decision in the creditor's favor was likely to redress the loss. See Food Mktg. Inst. v. Argus Leader Media, No. 18-481, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 24, 2019) (holding that a grocery retailers' association had standing to appeal a lower court's judgment directing the U.S. Department of Agriculture to disclose commercial information that could injure the retailers financially, even though the agency

In contrast, in Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, an environmental group sued a manufacturer for its past violations of the Emergency Planning and Community Right-to-Know Act (EPCRA).[4] A citizen-suit provision of EPCRA authorizes suits against a company for its failure to submit information timely about the storage of hazardous chemicals, as well as toxic releases, at the company's facilities.[5] Although the company-defendant had later filed the overdue forms to address its violations of EPCRA,[6] the plaintiffs asked the court to declare that the company had violated EPCRA and order various forms of injunctive and compensatory relief.[7] The Court, noting that none of the requested forms of relief would reimburse the plaintiffs for losses caused by the company's late reporting of its chemical information, found that it lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate the merits of the plaintiff's claims.[8] In other words, because the plaintiff's requested relief, even if granted, could not remedy the plaintiffs' alleged past injuries, the plaintiff's injuries were not redressable, and they therefore lacked standing to sue. Furthermore, to the extent that the plaintiffs requested prospective relief in the form of an injunction preventing future harm, they lacked standing because they failed to allege continuing or threatened injury from an ongoing violation of EPCRA by the defendant that could be redressed by a court order granting such relief.[9]

Nonetheless, when a litigant faces the threat of future injury as a result of ongoing violations of federal law, its injuries may be redressable by injunctive relief or a civil penalty payable to the U.S. Treasury. In Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services, Inc., the Court considered whether a plaintiff who brought a citizen suit (i.e., a private action to enforce the law) under the Clean Water Act[10] could demonstrate standing to sue a company in order to compel its compliance with the terms of a permit to reduce water pollution. The plaintiff argued that its injuries would be redressed by a civil penalty payable to the U.S. Treasury because those penalties, like injunctions, deter future violations.[11] The Court agreed, holding that civil penalties, even if payable to the U.S. Treasury rather than the plaintiff, could prevent the threat of future injury rather than solely to serve as compensation for past injuries.[12] would retain discretion under the Freedom of Information Act to disclose the information if the Court reversed the lower court's ruling, because the government had represented "unequivocally" that it would maintain the confidentiality of the contested data unless a court directed disclosure); Czyzewski v. Jevic Holding Corp., No. 15-649, slip op. at 11 (U.S. Mar. 22, 2017) (holding that the "mere possibility" that a plaintiff's injury will not be remedied by a favorable decision is insufficient to conclude the plaintiff lacks standing because of want of redressability). For other cases in which the Court accepted relatively tenuous connections between the litigant's requested judicial relief and its alleged injury, see Watt v. Energy Action Educ. Found., 454 U.S. 151, 160–62 (1981) and Bryant v. Yellen, 447 U.S. 352, 366–68 (1980).

---

[4] 523 U.S. 83, 88 (1998).

[5] See id. at 86–88.

[6] Id. at 88.

[7] Id. at 105.

[8] Id. at 105–06, 109. Among other relief, the plaintiffs had requested a declaratory judgment that the company had violated EPCRA and various civil penalties. Although the requested civil penalties could be viewed as compensation to the plaintiffs, the Court noted that they were payable to the U.S. Treasury rather than the plaintiffs, and therefore could not remedy the plaintiff's injury from the company's late filing. Id. at 106. Instead, civil penalties paid to the government would vindicate only "the 'undifferentiated public interest' in faithful execution of EPCRA. This does not suffice." Id.

[9] Id. at 108–09. The Court also held that a plaintiff seeking to maintain standing solely to recover the costs of bringing suit cannot show redressability. Id. at 107.

[10] The relevant Clean Water Act provision authorizes suit by "a person or persons having an interest which is or may be adversely affected." 33 U.S.C. § 1365(a), (g).

[11] Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services, Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 173 (2000).

[12] Id. at 174, 185–86 ("It can scarcely be doubted that, for a plaintiff who is injured or faces the threat of future injury due to illegal conduct ongoing at the time of suit, a sanction that effectively abates that conduct and prevents its recurrence provides a form of redress. Civil penalties can fit that description. To the extent that they encourage

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.6
Redressability

A litigant may have more difficulty establishing redressability when it alleges an indirect injury from government action or inaction, and when redress would require actions by an independent third party not before the court. For instance, in Linda R.S. v. Richard D., the Supreme Court considered a Texas law imposing criminal sanctions on parents who failed to meet their child support obligations.[13] Texas state courts had construed the law as imposing no duty of support on the parents of children born to unmarried parents, and the mother of an out-of-wedlock child challenged Texas's refusal to enforce the law against her child's absentee father.[14] The Court held that the plaintiff had failed to allege facts sufficient to support judicial intervention because she did not show that her failure to obtain child support resulted from Texas's decision.[15] The Court noted that even in the unlikely event that the Court ordered the district attorney to enforce the law against the child's father, the father would simply go to jail without being compelled to pay child support in order to get out of jail.[16] Therefore, the plaintiff-mother's injury was not redressable, as her requested injunctive relief against state officials could not compel the father (a third party) to redress her monetary injury through payment of child support.[17]

The Supreme Court has also held, however, that redressability may exist even when the litigant's requested judicial relief would not completely redress its injury.[18] In the 2007 case Massachusetts v. EPA, the Court held that the State of Massachusetts had standing to challenge the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA)'s refusal to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles under the Clean Air Act (CAA).[19] The Court determined that directing EPA to reexamine its refusal to regulate such emissions would redress the alleged risk of injury to plaintiffs' interests from rising sea levels, even if judicial relief resulted in only incremental steps to slow or reduce global warming.[20] In so holding, the Court rejected the argument that an EPA rule would fail to redress the state's injury because (1) it would not affect emissions by the existing automobile fleet, and (2) other countries would continue to increase greenhouse gas emissions.[21] Thus, the Court suggested that a litigant may establish that its injury is redressable even if it cannot show that a favorable judicial decision will completely redress the harm.[22] defendants to discontinue current violations and deter them from committing future ones, they afford redress to citizen plaintiffs who are injured or threatened with injury as a consequence of ongoing unlawful conduct.").

---

[13] 410 U.S. 614, 614–16 (1973).

[14] Id.

[15] Id. at 618.

[16] Id. at 618–19.

[17] Id.

[18] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 525–26 (2007).

[19] Id. at 505–06.

[20] Id. at 525–26 ("While it may be true that regulating motor-vehicle emissions will not by itself reverse global warming, it by no means follows that we lack jurisdiction to decide whether EPA has a duty to take steps to slow or reduce it."). See also Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 242–43 (1982) (holding that a church and its followers alleged a redressable injury from a state law requiring a church to register with, and report certain information to, the state if more than 50% of its contributions came from nonmembers, even though the Court's declaration that the "50 percent rule" was unconstitutional would not necessarily exempt the church from the requirements of that law).

[21] See Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 525–26.

[22] See id. See also Uzuegbunam v. Preczewski, No. 19-1968, slip op. at 12 (U.S. Mar. 8, 2021) (holding that plaintiffs who requested nominal damages for a past violation of their First Amendment rights had established redressability for standing purposes).

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.5 Taxpayer Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In general, a litigant may not rely solely upon his status as a federal taxpayer to maintain Article III standing to challenge government policy or spending decisions.[1] Such taxpayer lawsuits, which are distinguishable from cases in which a litigant challenges the assessment of a tax as unconstitutional,[2] often ask a court to decide abstract legal questions regarding the authority of the political branches of government—a task that potentially raises concerns regarding the proper role of the Judiciary.[3] And as a practical matter, litigants arguing that their taxes have been spent unlawfully may simply fail to satisfy the elements of Article III standing, as their complaints may amount to generalized grievances about government spending or policy decisions shared with millions of other taxpayers.[4] Moreover, it may be difficult for a taxpayer-litigant to demonstrate that his or her increased tax liability is traceable to the government spending or policy decision challenged and that judicial relief would effectively reduce the litigant's tax liability.[5] These concerns have led the Supreme Court to permit taxpayer lawsuits only in narrow circumstances.

One of the Supreme Court's earliest decisions on Article III standing involved a taxpayer lawsuit. In the 1923 case Frothingham v. Mellon, the Court declined to reach the merits of an individual federal taxpayer's Tenth Amendment and Due Process challenges to the disbursement of federal funds to states under a federal appropriations law, determining that the plaintiff lacked Article III standing.[6] The Court wrote that deciding the case on the merits would not decide a judicial controversy but would rather "assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which we plainly do not possess."[7]

The Supreme Court further explained its justification for rejecting taxpayer lawsuits in the 1970s. In a case in which a federal taxpayer-plaintiff challenged a federal law allowing the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to withhold from the public detailed information about the Agency's expenditures, alleging that it violated the Statement and Account Clause of the

---

[1] E.g., Hein v. Freedom from Religion Found., Inc., 551 U.S. 587, 599 (2007) (plurality opinion) ("As a general matter, the interest of a federal taxpayer in seeing that Treasury funds are spent in accordance with the Constitution does not give rise to the kind of redressable 'personal injury' required for Article III standing.").

[2] Id.

[3] See, e.g., Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 486–87 (1923).

[4] Id. ("[A U.S. federal taxpayer's] interest in the moneys of the Treasury—partly realized from taxation and partly from other sources—is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of equity.").

[5] E.g., Ariz. Christian Sch. Tuition Org. v. Winn, 563 U.S. 125, 129, 136–38 (2011) ("To find injury, a court must speculate that elected officials will increase a taxpayer-plaintiff's bill to make up a deficit.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

[6] Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 486–87. See also ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury.

[7] Id. at 489.

Constitution,[8] the Supreme Court refused to reach the merits of the case.[9] It determined that the plaintiff's claims raised a generalized grievance, not about Congress's exercise of its taxing and spending power, but rather Congress's exercise of power to regulate the CIA through a statute governing disclosure of information.[10] In another case, an association of officers and enlisted members of the military reserves, as well as individual members, argued that the Incompatibility Clause of Article I[11] forbid certain Members of Congress from holding commissions in the Armed Forces Reserve. The Court held that they lacked standing to sue as taxpayers because they had brought generalized grievances against Executive Branch actions permitting Members of Congress to retain their status as members of the Reserves, and thus lacked the individualized injuries that might provide standing to challenge Congress's exercise of its power under the Taxing and Spending Clause.[12]

For nearly a century since Frothingham, the Supreme Court has generally barred federal courts from entertaining cases in which a plaintiff relies solely upon his status as a taxpayer to establish standing.[13] The principal exception to this rule, albeit a narrow exception,[14] arises in the context of the First Amendment. The Court carved out a narrow exception to its general rule in the 1968 case Flast v. Cohen.[15] In Flast, the taxpayer-plaintiff challenged federal spending under a federal statute, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, on the grounds that it violated specific guarantees in the First Amendment's Establishment Clause[16] by subsidizing teaching at religious schools.[17] In a departure from its earlier standing cases, the Court held that the plaintiffs possessed a genuine stake in the outcome of the case sufficient for standing.[18] The Court applied a two-factor test that considered whether there was (1) a "logical link" between the plaintiff's taxpayer status and "the type of legislative enactment attacked"; and (2) "a nexus" between the status of the taxpayer-plaintiff and "the

---

[8] Article I, Section 9, Clause 7 of the Constitution, known as the Statement and Account Clause, provides that "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time."

[9] United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 166–68, 175 (1974).

[10] Richardson, 418 U.S. at 166–68 ("Although the status [the plaintiff] rests on is that he is a taxpayer, his challenge is not addressed to the taxing or spending power, but to the statutes regulating the CIA."). See also DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 337–39, 343–47 (holding that Ohio taxpayers lacked standing to challenge state and local tax credits and exemptions for a vehicle manufacturer as violations of the Commerce Clause because they sought to advance a generalized grievance and failed to meet the standing requirements of causation and redressability). But see FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 21 (1998) (holding that a litigant's failure to obtain information that federal law requires to be disclosed can constitute a sufficiently concrete injury for Article III standing purposes).

[11] The Incompatibility Clause in Article I, Section 6, Clause 2 of the Constitution, provides that "no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office." For more on the Incompatibility Clause, see ArtI.S6.C2.3 Incompatibility Clause and Congress.

[12] Schlesinger v. Reservists to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 209–11, 228 (1974). See also Lance v. Coffman, 549 U.S. 437, 441–42 (2007) (per curiam) ("The only injury plaintiffs allege is that the law—specifically the Elections Clause—has not been followed. This injury is precisely the kind of undifferentiated, generalized grievance about the conduct of government that we have refused to countenance in the past."); Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633, 633 (1937) (per curiam) ("It is an established principle that to entitle a private individual to invoke the judicial power to determine the validity of executive or legislative action he must show that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining a direct injury as the result of that action and it is not sufficient that he has merely a general interest common to all members of the public.").

[13] See Hein v. Freedom from Religion Found., Inc., 551 U.S. 587, 609 (2007) (plurality opinion).

[14] See id. ("It is significant that, in the four decades since its creation, the Flast exception has largely been confined to its facts. We have declined to lower the taxpayer standing bar in suits alleging violations of any constitutional provision apart from the Establishment Clause.").

[15] 392 U.S. 83 (1968).

[16] The Establishment Clause of the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . " U.S. Const. amend. I.

[17] Flast, 392 U.S. at 85.

[18] Id. at 102–06.

precise nature of the constitutional infringement alleged."[19] The Court determined that, in contrast to the plaintiffs in Frothingham, the Flast plaintiffs had not alleged that Congress had exceeded its powers under the Taxing and Spending Clause in Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution, but rather that Congress, by exercising its taxing and spending powers under that Clause in authorizing the challenged federal expenditures, had exceeded a specific constitutional limitation on its taxing and spending power (i.e., the First Amendment's Establishment Clause).[20] The Court noted Establishment Clause drafter James Madison's specific interest in preventing the federal government from collecting taxpayer money and spending it in favor of religion.[21] Consequently, the Court found that the plaintiffs had standing to sue by distinguishing Flast from Frothingham on the grounds that the Flast plaintiffs sought to uphold a specific limit set forth in the Establishment Clause on how federal taxpayer money is used.[22]

Since Flast, the issue of taxpayer standing has periodically arisen in the context of Establishment Clause challenges to federal financial assistance for religious organizations.[23] In subsequent cases, the Court has construed Flast's exception to the general rule barring taxpayer standing quite narrowly.[24] Thus, when a federal agency disposed of surplus federal real property by conveying it to a private religious college without requiring the school to pay for it, the Court found that plaintiffs seeking to bring an Establishment Clause challenge to the transfer lacked standing to sue as taxpayers.[25] The Court distinguished the case from Flast for two major reasons. First, unlike in Flast, the plaintiffs had challenged a federal agency's decision to transfer property rather than Congress's enactment of the law authorizing the transfer.[26] Second, the property transfer implicated Congress's power under the Property Clause[27] rather than the Taxing and Spending Clause.[28] By drawing these distinctions, the Court construed its precedent in Flast narrowly, determining that Flast's exception to the general bar on taxpayer standing was limited to congressional acts that relied upon the Taxing and Spending Clause.

The Court again refused to recognize taxpayer standing in a 2007 Establishment Clause challenge. In Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation, taxpayer plaintiffs challenged the Executive Branch's funding of its officials' religiously themed speeches promoting federal [19] Id. at 102. In so holding the Court distinguished Doremus v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 429 (1952). In Doremus, the Court held that a parent and student lacked standing to sue as state taxpayers to challenge a New Jersey statute providing for the reading of Bible verses at the beginning of each day of public school as a violation of the First Amendment Establishment Clause. Id. at 430. The Court characterized the plaintiffs' alleged injury as a "religious difference" rather than a direct financial injury that resulted from the expenditure of taxpayer funds for a religious purpose. Id. at 433–35. In Flast, the Court distinguished Doremus on the grounds that the reading of Bible verses involved no ostensible expenditure of public funds, and thus the Doremus plaintiffs failed to establish a logical link between their taxpayer status and the challenged state law. See Flast, 392 U.S. at 102.

[20] Flast, 392 U.S. at 102–06.

[21] Id. at 103–04.

[22] Id..

[23] For further discussion on challenges to federal financial assistance to private religious organizations, see Amdt1.3.4.1 Overview of Financial Assistance to Religion.

[24] Hein v. Freedom from Religion Found., Inc., 551 U.S. 587, 593 (2007) (plurality opinion) ("In [Flast], we recognized a narrow exception to the general rule against federal taxpayer standing.").

[25] Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 482 (1982).

[26] Id. at 479–80.

[27] Id. Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution vests Congress with the "Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the . . . Property belonging to the United States . . ." U.S. CONST. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2. For more on the Property Clause, see ArtIV.S3.C2.1 Property Clause Generally.

[28] Valley Forge, 454 U.S. at 468, 479–80.

assistance to religious organizations and community groups.[29] A three-Justice plurality suggested that taxpayer-plaintiffs lack standing to challenge Executive Branch funding of religious activities out of general Executive Branch appropriations because such cases do not involve Congress specifically authorizing, appropriating, or mandating the use of federal funds for religious purposes.[30] Continuing to adhere to its narrow interpretation of the Flast exception, the Court held four years later that taxpayers lacked standing to challenge Arizona's provision of tax credits to individuals who contributed to scholarship organizations that funded students' attendance at private religious schools.[31] Because the tax credits did not compel individual taxpayers to support sectarian activities in the way that government spending could, the Court held that no aid flowed directly from the government to religious organizations, and therefore the plaintiffs could not surmount the general bar on taxpayer standing.[32]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6 Representational Standing

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.1 Overview of Representational Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Federal courts must sometimes decide whether a litigant who has not suffered an injury-in-fact may request judicial relief on behalf of an injured third party who has not appeared before the court. The presumption is that an uninjured litigant lacks standing to sue and cannot raise claims on behalf of a third party.[1] The Supreme Court, however, has at times

[29] Hein, 551 U.S. at 592–96 (plurality opinion). Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 of the Constitution contains language that is known as the Taxing and Spending Clause, providing, "The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States . . . " U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1. For more on the Taxing and Spending Clause, see ArtI.S8.C1.1.1 Overview of Taxing Clause and ArtI.S8.C1.2.1 Overview of Spending Clause.

[30] Hein, 551 U.S. at 592–96. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas concurred in the judgment but would have overruled Flast v. Cohen.

[31] Ariz. Christian Sch. Tuition Org. v. Winn, 563 U.S. 125, 129 (2011).

[32] Id. at 142 ("[T]ax credits and governmental expenditures do not both implicate individual taxpayers in sectarian activities. A dissenter whose tax dollars are 'extracted and spent' knows that he has in some small measure been made to contribute to an establishment in violation of conscience. . . . When the government declines to impose a tax, by contrast, there is no such connection between dissenting taxpayer and alleged establishment.") (internal citations omitted). The Court also stated that the plaintiffs could not show causation and redressability because the alleged subsidization of religious activity was the result of private third-party action and not solely the result of government action. Id. at 143. But see Grand Rapids Sch. Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 380 n.5 (1985) (stating that the Court has found standing to sue in "numerous cases" involving "Establishment Clause challenges by state taxpayers to programs for aiding nonpublic schools").

[1] United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 571 v. Brown Grp., Inc., 517 U.S. 544, 557 (1996). The foundational case for the general bar on third-party standing is Yazoo & Miss. Valley R.R. v. Jackson Vinegar Co., 226 U.S. 217, 219–20 (1912) (holding that a railway company could not assert the rights of hypothetical third parties in a challenge to a Mississippi statute providing a penalty for lost or damaged freight). See also Sec'y of State of Md. v. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 947 n.5 (1984) (noting that third-party standing is disfavored in part due to "Art. III's requirement that a plaintiff have a 'sufficiently concrete interest in the outcome of the suit to make it a case or permitted this form of "representational standing," allowing certain relationships between an uninjured litigant and an injured third party to overcome that presumption.[2] Thus, for example, courts may permit representational standing when a formal association seeks to bring suit on behalf of its members;[3] a state sues on behalf of its citizens;[4] a plaintiff asserts a claim assigned to it by another party (e.g., a claim assigned to it by the government under a qui tam[5] provision);[6] or an agent brings suit on behalf of its principal.[7] Such issues may also arise when a party brings a facial challenge to a law on First Amendment grounds, arguing that although the party itself is not subject to the law, it would be unconstitutional for the government to apply it to third parties with which the litigant has some form of close relationship (e.g., a business relationship).[8]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.2 Associational Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and controversy,'" and in part due to the prudential concern that "if the claim is brought by someone other than one at whom the constitutional protection is aimed," it may be "an abstract, generalized grievance that the courts are neither well equipped nor well advised to adjudicate" (citations omitted)).

[2] United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 571, 517 U.S. at 557 ("[T]he entire doctrine of 'representational standing' . . . rests on the premise that in certain circumstances, particular relationships (recognized either by common-law tradition or by statute) are sufficient to rebut the background presumption (in the statutory context, about Congress's intent) that litigants may not assert the rights of absent third parties.") (internal citations omitted). Notably, the concept of representational standing, which involves a litigant who has not suffered an injury-in-fact bringing suit on behalf of an injured third party, differs from the issue of "third-party" or jus tertii standing. The latter concept, which is discussed in more detail below, is a prudential doctrine that refers to a situation in which an injured party asserts the rights of someone who is not before the court as part of the legal theory underlying its claim or defense. An example of a case concerning third-party standing is Eisenstadt v. Baird, in which the Court held that a person convicted for distributing a contraceptive device to an unmarried woman had standing to assert the constitutional rights of unmarried persons denied access to contraception when challenging the Massachusetts law under which he was convicted on equal protection grounds. E.g., 405 U.S. 438, 445–46 (1972) (holding that an advocate of contraception convicted for giving a contraceptive device to an unmarried woman had standing to assert the rights of unmarried persons denied access to contraception, as such persons were not themselves subject to prosecution and would unlikely be able to assert their constitutional right to use it). For more on third-party standing, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9.3 Third Party Standing.

[3] E.g., Int'l Union v. Brock, 477 U.S. 274, 290 (1986).

[4] E.g., Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 520 (2007).

[5] "Qui tam is short for the Latin phrase qui tam pro domino rege quam pro ipso in hac parte sequitur, which means 'who pursues this action on our Lord the King's behalf as well as his own.'" Vt. Agency of Nat. Res. v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765, 768 n.1 (2000). Qui tam lawsuits allow a private party to enforce a law by acting as a "private attorney general." John C. Coffee, Jr., Rescuing the Private Attorney General: Why the Model of the Lawyer as Bounty Hunter Is Not Working, 42 Md. L. Rev. 215, 215–16 (1983) (providing an overview of the concept of private attorneys general).

[6] E.g., Vt. Agency of Nat. Res., 529 U.S. at 778.

[7] E.g., Sprint Commc'ns Co. v. APCC Servs., Inc., 554 U.S. 269, 271 (2008).

[8] E.g., Sec'y of State of Md. v. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 958 (1984). Issues of representational standing may also arise in the context of class action lawsuits (i.e., lawsuits by representative parties on behalf of all members of a class of similar plaintiffs that have aggregated their claims in one case). See, e.g., Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 803–06 (1985) (determining that class action defendant had standing to challenge a Kansas Supreme Court judgment rendered against it on the grounds that the judgment would bind the oil and gas company that would not bind all potential plaintiffs because the company "had a distinct and personal interest in seeing the entire plaintiff class bound by res judicata just as [it] is bound"); United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 403–04 (1980) (holding that a proposed class representative retained a personal stake sufficient for the representative to appeal a court's ruling denying his class certification motion even though the named plaintiff's substantive claim had expired); Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 402 (1975) (determining that a "live controversy" existed for purposes of Article III standing "between a named defendant and a member of the class represented by the named plaintiff, even though the claim of the named plaintiff ha[d] become moot").

Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Perhaps the most obvious context in which the Supreme Court confronts issues of representational standing is when a formal association sues to redress injury to its members. In the past, associations seeking relief in federal court have included environmental groups,[1] unions (i.e., associations of workers),[2] and trade associations (i.e., associations of businesses).[3] While an organization may have standing to sue on its own behalf when it sustains an injury as an organization (e.g., a loss of membership),[4] the Supreme Court held in Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Commission, that an association has standing to sue to redress its members' injuries, even when the association has not itself suffered injury, when: "(a) its members would otherwise have standing to sue in their own right; (b) the interests it seeks to protect are germane to the organization's purpose; and (c) neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires the participation of individual members in the lawsuit."[5]

In subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court has elaborated on the three prongs of the Hunt test. The first two prongs of this three-part test reflect Lujan's constitutional minimum requirements, assuring that the association possesses a genuine stake in the controversy and that the lawsuit involves a contest between adversarial parties.[6] Therefore, Congress may not waive these requirements through the enactment of legislation. However, the third requirement for associational standing is a prudential limitation, focusing on "administrative convenience and efficiency," that Congress may modify or eliminate in certain contexts.[7] Applying the third prong, the Court has found that associations lack standing when, for example, it would be too difficult to establish individualized proof of injury for each member of an association that seeks monetary damages on behalf of its members[8] or when resolving an association's claims would require the Court to ascertain each member's individual views on a

[1] E.g., Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 563 (1992); Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 731 (1972).

[2] E.g., Int'l Union v. Brock, 477 U.S. 274, 276 (1986).

[3] E.g., Hunt v. Wash. State Apple Advert. Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 344–45 (1977) (determining that a state agency that represents an industry of the state and acts like a trade association but with compelled membership may have standing to sue for its members' injuries).

[4] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 511 (1975).

[5] United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 571 v. Brown Grp., Inc., 517 U.S. 544, 553 (1996) (quoting Hunt, 432 U.S. at 343). See also Brock, 477 U.S. at 282–90 (applying the three-part test and determining that an automobile workers union had associational standing to challenge a Department of Labor policy directive interpreting the trade readjustment allowance (TRA) benefit eligibility provisions of the Trade Act of 1974). Some argue that an association is able to more effectively advance the shared interests of its members by pooling financial resources and expertise. Id. at 290 ("[T]he primary reason people join an organization is often to create an effective vehicle for vindicating interests that they share with others.").

[6] United Food & Commercial Workers, 517 U.S. at 554–57.

[7] Id.

[8] See Brock, 477 U.S. at 287 ("Neither these claims nor the relief sought required the District Court to consider the individual circumstances of any aggrieved UAW member. The suit raises a pure question of law: whether the Secretary properly interpreted the Trade Act's TRA eligibility provisions. And the relief requested, and granted by the District Court, leaves any questions regarding the eligibility of individual TRA claimants to the state authorities given jurisdiction over such questions by [the Trade Act of 1974].") (citations omitted). But see Warth, 422 U.S. at 515–16 (finding that an association of construction firms lacked standing to seek damages for lost profits and business because "whatever injury may have been suffered is peculiar to the individual member concerned, and both the fact and extent of injury would require individualized proof").

particular matter.[9] Nonetheless, Congress may override judicial concerns about the difficulty in establishing individualized proof for each member of an association if the association satisfies the first two elements of the Hunt test.[10]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.3 States and Parens Patriae

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

A state has standing to sue in its sovereign capacity for injuries to its own interests.[1] For example, the Supreme Court upheld standing for: (1) Wyoming to sue Oklahoma for an injury to its ability to collect a specific tax that allegedly resulted from Oklahoma requiring its coal-fired electric utilities to burn at least 10% Oklahoma-mined coal;[2] (2) California to sue the Secretary of the Interior for injury to its financial interests from the Secretary of Interior choosing one form of bidding system over another in awarding leases for oil and gas exploration development of Outer Continental Shelf lands;[3] and (3) several states from increased natural gas costs resulting from a Louisiana tax on natural gas imported into the state.[4]

However, a distinct issue of representational standing arises when a state seeks to sue on behalf of its citizens in federal court. The Supreme Court has long recognized that a state may sue as parens patriae—literally, "parent of his or her country"[5]—but only when it has a

---

[9] Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 321 (1980) (finding that the women's division of a religious organization lacked standing to assert the rights of its members under the Free Exercise Clause because the Court needed to ascertain each member's individual views as to the "permissibility, advisability, and/or necessity of abortion" in order to rule upon the organization's constitutional claims). Because individuals in the organization could have diverse views on the issue of abortion, inquiring into each member's individual views was "necessary in a free exercise case [in order] to show the coercive effect of the enactment as it operates against [an individual] in the practice of his religion." Id.

[10] United Food & Commercial Workers, 517 U.S. at 554–57.

[1] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 516–20 (2007). See also West Virginia v. Env't Prot. Agency, No. 20-1530, slip op. at 14 (U.S. June 30, 2022) (noting that states had been injured for Article III standing purposes when a federal appeals court decision had purported to revive an Environmental Protection Agency rule that required the states to "more stringently regulate power plant emissions within their borders").

[2] Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 440, 451 (1992).

[3] Watt v. Energy Action Educ. Found., 454 U.S. 151, 153 160–61 (1981).

[4] Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 736 (1981).

[5] Black's Law Dictionary 1221 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "parens patriae" as "a doctrine by which a government has standing to prosecute a lawsuit on behalf of a citizen" but stating that the "state ordinarily has no standing to sue on behalf of its citizens, unless a separate, sovereign interest will be served by the suit"). For a historical discussion of parens patriae suits, see New York v. New Jersey, 256 U.S. 296, 301–02 (1921) ("The health, comfort and prosperity of the people of the State and the value of their property being gravely menaced, as it is averred that they are by the proposed action of the defendants [in executing a sewer project that would allegedly discharge polluted water into New York Harbor], the State is the proper party to represent and defend such rights by resort to the remedy of an original suit in this court under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States."); Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U.S. 208, 241 (1901) ("[I]f the health and comfort of the inhabitants of a State are threatened, the State is the proper party to represent and defend them."). Since deciding these cases, the Court has taken a narrower view of the parens patriae separate "sovereign interest" at stake in the outcome of the controversy.[6] And while a state may sue to assert its rights under federal law, it may not sue to protect its citizens from federal law on the grounds that Congress has intruded upon an area of traditional state authority.[7]

For instance, in Massachusetts v. Mellon the State of Massachusetts sought to maintain a lawsuit against the federal government challenging the Maternity Act, a federal statute that created a grant program to distribute taxpayer funds to states that agreed to cooperate with the federal government to protect the health of mothers and infants.[8] Massachusetts argued that Congress had usurped state powers over traditionally local matters in violation of the Tenth Amendment.[9] The Supreme Court first found that the state lacked standing to sue on its own behalf because it had no separate sovereign interest that would be affected by the statute (e.g., a property interest).[10] The Court then determined that Massachusetts lacked standing to sue as a representative of its citizens because it was the role of the federal government to act as representative, or parens patriae, of Massachusetts citizens with respect to federal laws.[11] As a result, the Court reasoned that Massachusetts lacked standing to pursue its Tenth Amendment claim, which sought to protect its citizens from a federal statute.[12]

Several decades later, the Supreme Court discussed a state's standing to sue protect its sovereign interests in a major environmental case. In the 2007 case Massachusetts v. EPA, the Court held that the State of Massachusetts had standing to challenge the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA)'s denial of a petition asking the agency to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles under the Clean Air Act (CAA).[13] The Court determined that Massachusetts had standing for two major reasons. First, the Court held that the because the dispute involved the proper construction of the CAA, and because Congress had granted a specific procedural right in the Act to protect the state's concrete interests in EPA's regulatory actions, the state had a personal stake in the outcome and could assert that procedural right without meeting the normal standards for immediacy and redressability.[14] Second, the Court deemed Massachusetts' alleged injury—its loss of shore land from global-warming induced sea level rise—an independent quasi-sovereign interest in preserving its territory separate from its citizens' interests and thus sufficient for standing.[15]

The Supreme Court's reasoning in Massachusetts v. EPA did not endorse the concept of parens patriae standing generally, but it did recognize that the states "are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction."[16] The court thus allowed Massachusetts's doctrine. In particular, the Court now requires that the state have a "separate sovereign interest" at stake apart from litigating the "personal claims of its citizens." Pennsylvania v. New Jersey, 426 U.S. 660, 665 (1976).

---

[6] Id. ("It has . . . become settled doctrine that a State has standing to sue only when its sovereign or quasi-sovereign interests are implicated and it is not merely litigating as a volunteer the personal claims of its citizens.").

[7] Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 520 n.17 (1923).

[8] Id. at 479. The Court consolidated the case with the above-discussed case of Frothingham v. Mellon.

[9] Massachusetts, 262 U.S. at 479.

[10] Id. at 482–85 ("It follows that in so far as the case depends upon the assertion of a right on the part of the State to sue in its own behalf we are without jurisdiction. . . . [W]e are called upon to adjudicate, not rights of persons or property, not rights of dominion over physical domain, not quasi-sovereign rights actually invaded or threatened, but abstract questions of political power, of sovereignty, of government.").

[11] Id. at 486.

[12] Id.

[13] 549 U.S. 497, 505–06 (2007).

[14] Id. at 516–18 ("When a litigant is vested with a procedural right, that litigant has standing if there is some possibility that the requested relief will prompt the injury-causing party to reconsider the decision that allegedly harmed the litigant.").

[15] Id. at 518–20 (citing Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 237 (1907)).

[16] Massachusetts, 262 U.S. at 518.

suit as one that involved its rights under federal law (i.e., the CAA's citizen-suit provision), and not solely an action (as in Mellon) involving a state seeking to protect its citizens from the operation of a federal statute.[17] Although the Court also determined that Massachusetts had standing to sue for injury to its "quasi-sovereign" interest in protecting its territory, it is unclear whether the Court established a new precedent on a state's standing to sue as parens patriae. The Court's decision in Massachusetts v. EPA could be characterized as resting on principles of federalism and a state's sovereign prerogative to regulate in-state motor vehicle emissions.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.4 Assignees of a Claim

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

An assignment of a legal claim occurs when one party (the "assignor") transfers its rights in a cause of action to another party (the "assignee").[1] The Supreme Court has held that a private litigant may have standing to sue to redress an injury to another party when the injured party has assigned at least a portion of its claim for damages from that injury to the litigant. The Supreme Court in the 2000 case Vermont Agency of Natural Resources v. United States ex rel. Stevens held that private individuals may have Article III standing to bring a qui tam civil action in federal court under the federal False Claims Act (FCA) on behalf of the federal government if authorized to do so.[2] The FCA imposes civil liability upon "any person" who, among other things, knowingly presents to the federal government a false or fraudulent claim for payment.[3] To encourage citizens to enforce the Act, in certain circumstances, a private individual, known as a "relator," may bring a civil action for violations of the Act. Such plaintiffs sue under the name of the United States and may receive a share of any recovered proceeds from the action.[4] Under the FCA, the relator is not merely the agent of the United States but an individual with an interest in the lawsuit itself.[5]

Ordinarily, if the relator's financial interest in the outcome of the case were merely a byproduct of the suit itself, there would be no injury sufficient for standing.[6] In Stevens,

---

[17] Id. at 520 n.17 ("[T]here is a critical difference between allowing a State 'to protect her citizens from the operation of federal statutes' (which is what Mellon prohibits) and allowing a State to assert its rights under federal law (which it has standing to do).") (citations omitted).

[1] Black's Law Dictionary 136 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "assignment" as "the transfer of rights or property").

[2] 529 U.S. 765, 768, 778 (2000).

[3] 31 U.S.C. § 3729(a).

[4] Id. § 3730(d)(1)–(2).

[5] Vt. Agency of Natural Res., 529 U.S. at 772 ("For the portion of the recovery retained by the relator . . . some explanation of standing other than agency for the Government must be identified.") (citing 31 U.S.C. § 3730).

[6] Id. at 772–73 ("An interest unrelated to injury in fact is insufficient to give a plaintiff standing. . . . A qui tam relator has suffered no [invasion of a legally protected right]—indeed, the 'right' he seeks to vindicate does not even fully materialize until the litigation is completed and the relator prevails.") (citations omitted). The Supreme Court has held that a litigant's interest in recovering attorneys' fees or the costs of bringing suit by itself normally does not however, the Supreme Court recognized a distinction that confers standing upon qui tam plaintiffs in FCA cases. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the Court, determined that assignments of claims are distinguishable from cases in which a litigant has a mere financial interest in the outcome of the suit because the assignee-plaintiff actually owns a stake in the dispute as a legal matter.[7] Justice Scalia drew support for this distinction from the long-standing historical practice of the government assigning a portion of its damages claim to a private party and allowing that party to assert the injury suffered by the federal government as a representative of the United States.[8] The Court noted the "long tradition of qui tam actions in England and the American colonies,"[9] concluding that "Article III's restriction of the judicial power to 'Cases' and 'Controversies' is properly understood to mean 'cases and controversies of the sort traditionally amenable to, and resolved by, the judicial process.'"[10]

Eight years after deciding Stevens, the Supreme Court again found that an assignee of a claim had standing, even when the assignee had promised to remit all of the money it recovered in the proceedings to the assignor.[11] In Sprint Communications Co. v. APCC Services, Inc., payphone operators had assigned their legal claims for money owed to them by long-distance communications carriers to third-party collection agencies.[12] The agencies were authorized to bring suit on behalf of the payphone operators and promised to pay all of the proceeds of the litigation to the payphone operators for a fee.[13] The Court held that these collection agencies had standing to pursue the operators' claims because of the long history of courts' acceptance of such claims.[14] Assignment was sufficient to transfer the injury to the collections agencies, and the injury to the operators that had been transferred to the collection agencies would be redressed by a favorable judicial decision, even if the agencies would subsequently pay all of the proceeds to the operators.[15]

The Stevens and Sprint cases could have broader implications for Article III standing doctrine, as they suggest a way in which the constitutional limitations on standing may be bypassed through the assignment of rights to a third party.[16] For instance, if Congress enacts a federal statute recognizing an injury to the federal government that otherwise satisfies Article III's requirements, it may assign a portion of its claim to a private party, thereby potentially giving that plaintiff standing to sue as a representative of the United States.[17] This is confer standing to sue. E.g. Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 107 (1998) ("The litigation must give the plaintiff some other benefit besides reimbursement of costs that are a byproduct of the litigation itself."); Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 70–71 (1986) ("[T]he mere fact that continued adjudication would provide a remedy for an injury that is only a byproduct of the suit itself does not mean that the injury is cognizable under Art. III.").

[7] Vt. Agency of Natural Res., 529 U.S. at 773.

[8] Id. at 774, 778

[9] Id.

[10] Id. Although the Court held that the relator had standing to sue under the qui tam provision, it ultimately determined that the plaintiff could not maintain the action against a state agency for allegedly submitting false grant claims to the EPA because states were not "persons" subject to liability under the False Claims Act. Id. at 787.

[11] Sprint Commc'ns Co. v. APCC Servs., Inc., 554 U.S. 269, 271 (2008).

[12] Id. at 271–72.

[13] Id. at 272.

[14] Id. at 273–75. The Court noted that "federal courts routinely entertain suits which will result in relief for parties that are not themselves directly bringing suit. Trustees bring suits to benefit their trusts; guardians ad litem bring suits to benefit their wards; receivers bring suit to benefit their receiverships; assignees in bankruptcy bring suit to benefit bankrupt estates; executors bring suit to benefit testator estates; and so forth." Id. at 287–88.

[15] Id. at 286–87 ("[I]f the [collection agencies] prevail in this litigation, the long-distance carriers would write a check to [them] for the amount of dial-around compensation owed. What does it matter what the [agencies] do with the money afterward?").

[16] See also ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury.

[17] See Vt. Agency of Natural Res., 529 U.S. at 773.

essentially the operation of the False Claims Act.[18] However, it is unclear whether every such statute would necessarily resolve all Article III standing concerns. In Stevens and Sprint, the Court gave significant weight to the lengthy history of courts recognizing the types of assignments at issue when determining that the litigants in those cases had standing to sue.[19] Moreover, there may be a number of concerns about the constitutionality and practicality of using assignments to delegate core government functions (e.g., criminal prosecutions) to private parties when courts have not historically recognized claims based on such assignments, including concerns about interference with the Executive Branch's Article II powers and prosecutorial discretion.[20]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.5 Agency and Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Broadly speaking, an agency relationship may arise when one person (a "principal") and another person (an "agent") agree that the agent will perform certain actions on behalf of the principal, subject to the principal's control.[1] Such a relationship may also arise when the law authorizes one person to represent another person's interests.[2] Agency relationships may raise questions of representational standing when an uninjured litigant acts as the authorized agent for another individual who has suffered an injury-in-fact by seeking relief in federal court on behalf of that individual. For example, if authorized by law, a parent might sue on behalf of an injured minor child. In order for such a litigant to seek relief for another party he must be officially authorized to do so (either by consent or as a matter of law), and the advocate's relationship with the third party must exhibit some of the "most basic features of an agency relationship," such as the right to control the agent's actions.[3]

One form of "agency standing" is the common-law concept of "next friend standing," which involves an uninjured third party pursuing legal claims for the benefit of an injured party who

---

[18] 31 U.S.C. §§ 3729–3733.

[19] See id. at 774, 778; Sprint Commc'ns Co., 554 U.S. at 273–75.

[20] See Heather Elliott, Congress's Inability to Solve Standing Problems, 91 B.U. L. Rev. 159, 195–204 (2011) (questioning whether Congress's assignment of claims to citizen suitors in order to confer standing would be constitutional or practical).

[1] Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01 ("Agency is the fiduciary relationship that arises when one person (a 'principal') manifests assent to another person (an 'agent') that the agent shall act on the principal's behalf and subject to the principal's control, and the agent manifests assent or otherwise consents so to act.").

[2] See generally Black's Law Dictionary 1142 (9th ed. 2009) (defining a "next friend" as "a person who appears in a lawsuit to act for the benefit of an incompetent or minor plaintiff; but who is not a party to the lawsuit and is not appointed as a guardian").

[3] Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693, 702 (2013). See also, e.g., Thole v. U.S. Bank N.A., No. 17-1712, slip op. at 4 (U.S. June 1, 2020) (rejecting the argument that uninjured participants in a defined-benefit plan could sue as the plan's representatives because, unlike "guardians, receivers, and executors," the plaintiffs had not been "legally or contractually appointed to represent the plan").

cannot appear in court on his own behalf.[4] This form of representational standing is often implicated in the context of habeas corpus proceedings, in which a litigant seeks a judicial determination that a prisoner should receive a new trial, new sentence, or be released.[5] For instance, in Whitmore v. Arkansas, a death row inmate challenged the constitutional validity of a death sentence imposed on a fellow capital defendant as a "next friend" of the defendant when the defendant decided not to appeal his sentence to the Arkansas Supreme Court.[6] The U.S. Supreme Court determined that the third-party inmate lacked standing to bring an Eighth Amendment objection as the "next friend" of the capital defendant.[7] The Court stated that the two-part test for "next friend" standing that the proposed next friend must meet in order to invoke federal court jurisdiction requires: (1) the real party in interest to be unable to "appear on his own behalf to prosecute the action" because of inaccessibility, mental incompetence, or other disability; and (2) the "next friend" to "be truly dedicated to the best interests of the person on whose behalf he seeks to litigate" and to have a significant relationship with the real party in interest so that the next friend's claims are not generalized grievances.[8] In Whitmore, the proposed "next friend" failed to satisfy the first prong—and therefore lacked standing to sue—because he had not demonstrated that the real party in interest (i.e., the capital defendant) was unable to litigate the case due to disability after the defendant had voluntarily waived his right to appeal his sentence.[9]

The Supreme Court more recently discussed the limits of standing based on an agency theory in a case in which private parties sought to act as agents of the California government in a federal lawsuit. In Hollingsworth v. Perry, the Court considered a Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection and Due Process Clause challenge to Proposition 8, a law that amended the California Constitution to provide that only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California.[10] A federal district court had invalidated Proposition 8, but state and local officials declined to defend that ruling on appeal, so the official "proponents" of the proposition, who were private parties, sought to defend the law. The Court held that it lacked the authority to address the validity of Proposition 8 on the merits because the proponents did not have standing to invoke the jurisdiction of the federal courts to defend the proposition.[11] The Court first held that the proponents lacked a "direct stake" in the outcome of their appeal and "their only interest in having the District Court order reversed was to vindicate the [4] Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 162 (1990) ("Most frequently, 'next friends' appear in court on behalf of detained prisoners who are unable, usually because of mental incompetence or inaccessibility, to seek relief themselves."). See also Black's Law Dictionary 1142 (9th ed. 2009) (defining a "next friend" as "a person who appears in a lawsuit to act for the benefit of an incompetent or minor plaintiff; but who is not a party to the lawsuit and is not appointed as a guardian").

[5] Other contexts in which it may be relevant include actions on behalf of infants, other minors, and adult mental incompetents. Whitmore, 495 U.S. at 162 n.4. The Court has held that a parent-child relationship "easily satisfies" the "close relationship" requirement for "next friend" standing. See Sessions v. Morales-Santana, No. 15-1191, slip. op. at 7 (U.S. June 12, 2017).

[6] Whitmore, 495 U.S. at 151. The Court had rejected the litigant's argument that he had standing in his individual capacity. Id. at 161–62

[7] Id. at 165.

[8] Id. at 163–64.

[9] Id. at 165. See also Sessions v. Morales-Santana, slip. op. at 7 (holding that the death of the real party in interest meets the "hindrance" requirement for "next friend" standing); Gilmore v. Utah, 429 U.S. 1012, 1016 (1976) (Burger, C.J., concurring) (suggesting that a competent defendant's "knowing and intelligent" waiver of his right to seek appellate review of his sentence deprives the Court of jurisdiction to hear a "next friend" application for a stay of execution); id. at 1017 (Stevens, J., concurring) ("In my judgment the record not only supports the conclusion that Gilmore was competent to waive his right to appeal, but also makes it clear that his access to the courts is entirely unimpeded and therefore a third party has no standing to litigate an Eighth Amendment claim—or indeed any other claim—on his behalf.").

[10] Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693, 688–90 (2013).

[11] Id. at 689.

constitutional validity of a generally applicable California law."[12] The Court then rejected the argument that the referendum proponents had standing because they were formally authorized to litigate on behalf of the State of California, as the litigants were private individuals rather than state officials or authorized agents of the state.[13] In rejecting what the Court viewed as a "generalized grievance," the Court emphasized that the proponents had no official role in enforcing California law distinguishable from the general interest of every citizen of California.[14]

Similarly, in Virginia House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, discussed below,[15] the Supreme Court concluded that one chamber of the Virginia legislature lacked standing to represent the Commonwealth's interests in appeal of a federal district court order requiring the redrawing of a 2011 legislative redistricting map for two reasons: (1) Virginia law designated the Virginia Attorney General as the commonwealth's exclusive representative in litigation; and (2) the chamber claimed earlier in the litigation that it was vindicating its own interests, as opposed to those of Virginia.[16]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.6 Overbreadth Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Generally, a litigant challenging a law as unconstitutional may not assert the rights of a third party, and thus he must show that the law is either unconstitutional as applied to him (i.e., an "applied challenge")[1] or that there are no circumstances in which the law would be constitutional (i.e., a "facial challenge").[2] However, there is an exception to this general rule known as the doctrine of overbreadth, which generally arises in the context of First

[12] Id. at 649.

[13] Id. at 696–99. The Court noted that an essential feature of agency is the principal's right to control the agent's actions. Here, the proponents decided "what arguments to make and how to make them." Id. at 15. The Court also noted that the proponents were not elected to their position, took no oath, had no fiduciary duty to the people of California, and were not subject to removal. Id. See also Arizonans for Official English v. Ariz., 520 U.S. 43, 67–70 (1997) (determining that a former state employee lacked standing to defend an appeal of a lower court decision in her favor after she had left state employment); Karcher v. May, 484 U.S. 72, 74 (1987) (holding that public officials who had previously participated in a lawsuit as interveners solely in their official capacities as state legislators lacked standing to appeal an adverse judgment after they had left office).

[14] Hollingsworth, 570 U.S. 693, 672. See also Brnovich v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., No. 19-1257, slip op. at 12 (U.S. July 1, 2021) (holding that the Arizona Attorney General, whom state law authorized to represent the state in any federal court action, had standing to prosecute the appeal of a Ninth Circuit decision that an Arizona voting restriction violated the Voting Rights Act of 1965).

[15] See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.7 Federal and State Legislators and Standing.

[16] See No. 18-281, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 17, 2019).

[1] Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. 957, 966 n.3 (1982) ("A litigant has standing to challenge the constitutionality of a statute only insofar as it adversely affects his own rights.").

[2] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987) ("A facial challenge to a legislative Act is, of course, the most difficult challenge to mount successfully, since the challenger must establish that no set of circumstances exists under which the Act would be valid.").

Amendment challenges.[3] The Supreme Court has held that prudential and constitutional limitations on third-party standing might not apply in cases in which the litigant brings a facial First Amendment challenge to a law as being substantially too broad and therefore chilling third parties' rights protected by the First Amendment.[4] The Court has permitted standing for such litigants when the law interferes with a potential or currently existing relationship (e.g., a business relationship) with a third party whose First Amendment rights could be hindered by the law.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.7 Federal and State Legislators and Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has also created specific standing rules for federal courts to apply when members of a legislative body seek to uphold the effectiveness of their votes or vindicate their institution's powers and prerogatives by suing (or defending) another unit of the same government in federal court.[1] The Court has held that legislators may have standing to sue in order to maintain the effectiveness of votes that they have cast in their capacity as legislators if their votes ultimately did not prevail. In Coleman v. Miller, twenty-four members of the Kansas state legislature sought a writ of mandamus compelling state officials to recognize that Kansas had not ratified an amendment to the Federal Constitution, the Child Labor Amendment,[2] challenging the way that the vote had been taken.[3] Twenty of the members, who were senators, had voted to reject the amendment, but the measure ratifying the amendment

---

[3] For a more detailed explanation of this First Amendment doctrine, see Amdt1.7.2.1 The Overbreadth Doctrine, Statutory Language, and Free Speech.

[4] Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973) ("[P]articularly where conduct and not merely speech is involved, we believe that the overbreadth of a statute must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep."). See also Munson Co., 467 U.S. at 958 ("Facial challenges to overly broad statutes are allowed not primarily for the benefit of the litigant, but the benefit of society—to prevent the statute from chilling the First Amendment rights of other parties not before the court."); Black's Law Dictionary 1213 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "overbreadth doctrine" as the "doctrine holding that if a statute is so broadly written that it deters free expression, then it can be struck down on its face because of its chilling effect—even if it also prohibits acts that may legitimately be forbidden.").

[5] Munson Co., 467 U.S. at 958. See also, e.g., U.S. Dep't of Labor v. Triplett, 494 U.S. 715, 720–21 (1990) ("When, however, enforcement of a restriction against the litigant prevents a third party from entering into a relationship with the litigant (typically a contractual relationship), to which relationship the third party has a legal entitlement (typically a constitutional entitlement), third-party standing has been held to exist.") (citation omitted); Virginia v. Am. Booksellers Ass'n, 484 U.S. 383, 392–93 (1988) (allowing standing, based on the overbreadth exception, to book sellers to assert the First Amendment rights of potential book buyers); City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 459 n.7 (1987) (stating that a gay rights activist had standing to bring a First Amendment overbreadth challenge a local ordinance making it an offense to verbally interrupt a policeman because he had shown "a genuine threat of enforcement" of the ordinance against him in the future (quoting Steffel v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 475 (1974))).

[1] E.g., Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 826 (1997).

[2] The proposed Amendment provided in part that "Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age." Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 435 n.1 (1939) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[3] Id. at 436–37.

nevertheless passed the state senate.[4] The plaintiffs alleged that an illegal tie-breaking vote for ratification by the Lieutenant Governor had deprived their votes of effectiveness.[5] Relying on several precedents, the Court held that the petitioners had "claimed a right and privilege under the Constitution . . . to have their votes given effect and the state court has denied that right and privilege."[6] Because the state legislators alleged that their votes had been voided by the improper procedure that led to the approval of the amendment, and those votes would have been sufficient to defeat the proposal, the legislators had a sufficient stake in the outcome that supported their standing to sue.[7]

Decades later, the Supreme Court took a more narrow view of individual legislator standing in Raines v. Byrd.[8] In that 1997 case, six Members of Congress challenged the Line Item Veto Act of 1996 (LIVA), a statute that authorized the President to cancel certain spending and tax benefit measures after signing them into law, as contrary to the bicameralism and presentment requirements of the Constitution.[9] The Members argued that they had suffered injury because LIVA altered the effect of the votes they would cast in the future and divested them of their constitutional role in the repeal of legislation.[10]

The Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, found that the Members lacked standing to challenge LIVA because they had not suffered an injury different from that suffered by Congress as a whole.[11] Citing separation of powers concerns about resolving a dispute implicating the constitutional authority of Congress and the Executive in a lawsuit brought by legislators, the Court, in refusing to proceed to the merits, noted that the Member-plaintiffs had not suffered the concrete deprivation of a private right, like the loss of their seats in Congress, but instead alleged a general diminution of their political power.[12] The Court thus distinguished Raines from its earlier decision in Coleman on the grounds that the latter case had involved legislators who alleged that their votes had been nullified, whereas the LIVA challenged in Raines did not significantly impact the power of the Members' votes because they could vote to exempt future appropriations bills from LIVA or repeal LIVA if necessary.[13] Although the Court determined that it lacked jurisdiction over the Members' claims, it left open the possibility that one or both houses of Congress—or perhaps a

[4] Id. at 435–36.

[5] Id. at 435–38.

[6] Id. at 438, 446 ("We think that these senators have a plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes."). See also Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 822 (1997) (discussing the votes that comprised a majority of the Court for this rule).

[7] Coleman, 307 U.S. at 438, 446.

[8] 521 U.S. 811 (1997).

[9] Id. at 814, 816. For more on the bicameralism and presentment requirements, see ArtI.S1.2.2 Origin of a Bicameral Congress and Amdt20.S3.1 Presidential Succession.

[10] Raines, 521 U.S. at 816.

[11] Id. at 820–21 (citing Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 496, 512–14 (1969)).

[12] Raines, 521 U.S. at 820–21 ("The claimed injury thus runs (in a sense) with the Member's seat, a seat which the Member holds . . . as trustee for his constituents, not as a prerogative of personal power."). The Court distinguished this type of grievance from Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 512–17 (1969), in which the Court allowed a Member of Congress to challenge his exclusion from the House of Representatives. In Raines, the Court wrote that the Member of Congress in Powell had standing to sue because he alleged injury to a personal, private right (i.e., his right to his congressional seat and federal salary) rather than injury to Congress as an institution. Raines, 521 U.S. at 820–21.

[13] Id. at 824 ("In the vote on the [LIVA], their votes were given full effect. They simply lost that vote."). The Court also found a lack of historical practice involving suits maintained to redress injury to institutional power. Id. at 826–28.

committee—would have standing to sue for redress of alleged institutional injuries to Congress if authorized by at least one of the Houses, provided that another legislative remedy was not available to them.[14]

In two state legislator standing cases that did not raise similar separation of powers concerns, the Supreme Court rested its standing analysis on the specific features of the state governments at issue. In the first case, Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Comm'n, the Court considered a state ballot initiative that would vest the authority to draw legislative districts in an independent commission. The Arizona State Legislature, acting pursuant to an authorizing resolution, challenged that ballot initiative, claiming that it had suffered injured by a diminution in its legislative authority.[15] Noting that the case did not raise separation of powers concerns that might arise if Congress sued the President, the Court held that the Arizona legislature was a proper party to sue because, like the plaintiffs in Coleman, it had lost the opportunity to adopt a redistricting plan (i.e., its members' votes were nullified).[16] Moreover, such an institutional injury to the legislature could serve as the basis for a lawsuit, at least when the legislature authorized suit by enacting a resolution in each chamber.[17]

By contrast, in Virginia House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, the Supreme Court held that a single house of the bicameral Virginia state legislature lacked standing to appeal a federal district court order requiring the redrawing of a 2011 legislative redistricting map.[18] The Virginia House of Delegates (House) had previously intervened to defend the constitutionality of the legislative redistricting plan against a voter-led Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause challenge, but the Virginia Attorney General, who was the primary defending party, had decided not to appeal an unfavorable ruling.[19] As discussed, in determining that the House lacked standing to appeal on behalf of the state, the Court noted that Virginia law assigned the Virginia Attorney General the task of representing the state in appeals like the one before the Court.[20] Moreover, the Attorney General had not delegated such litigation authority to the House of Delegates.[21] Unlike in Arizona State Legislature, the House lacked standing to appeal in its own right because it was a single component of the bicameral state legislature responsible for redistricting and could thus not assert the interests of the legislature as a whole.[22] Moreover, the House's alleged injury (i.e., invalidation of a state redistricting law) was not cognizable for standing purposes as it did not permanently deprive the House of its role in redistricting and the House did not suffer a cognizable injury merely because its composition (and, therefore, the content of legislation) could be altered by the electorate as a result of a redrawn redistricting map.[23] In this regard, the Court noted that the

[14] Id. at 829.

[15] 576 U.S. 787, 788 (2015).

[16] Id. at 795–99 & n.12.

[17] Id. The Court did not specifically state that the legislature was required to enact an authorizing resolution in order to establish standing.

[18] No. 18-281, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. June 17, 2019). The district court had held that the redistricting plan unconstitutionally sorted voters based on race in several districts. Id.

[19] Id. at 1–4. As the Court noted, "[b]ecause [the House of Delegate's participation in prior proceedings did not entail] invoking a court's jurisdiction, it was not previously incumbent on the House to demonstrate its standing." In Bethune-Hill, the House sought to appeal the district court's ruling when the Virginia Attorney General had decided not to appeal on behalf of the state defendants; therefore, the House had to establish standing independently. Id.

[20] Id.

[21] Id. at 4–5.

[22] Id. at 7–8.

[23] Id. at 8–12. The House had pursued the appeal based solely on its role in the legislative process.

invalidation of the redistricting law did not infringe upon the unique legislative powers of the Virginia House by altering the manner in which it conducted its day-to-day-operation (e.g., by altering its committee structure).[24]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.8 Congressional Control of Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In addition to interpreting Article III as a limit on the categories of litigants who may maintain a lawsuit in federal court, the Supreme Court has also held that the Constitution constrains Congress's ability to confer standing on private individuals through the enactment of "citizen-suit" provisions that authorize private individuals to enforce federal laws against the government or private parties.[1] Congress may elevate certain categories of harm to the status of cognizable Article III injuries, such as economic injury that results from lawful competition[2] or social and professional injury resulting from living in a racially segregated community.[3] It may not, however, abrogate Article III constraints on federal court jurisdiction by conferring standing on private parties in the absence of a material risk of particularized injury to them from the defendant's violations of their statutory rights.[4]

A major case addressing the constitutional limits on the scope of Congress's authority to create statutory rights for private citizens (or a class of citizens) to sue is Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife.[5] In Lujan, Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, stated that Article III generally limits Congress's ability to create standing by allowing a plaintiff to sue for procedural injuries even where the defendant's violation of the plaintiff's statutory rights would not cause the plaintiff any other concrete injury.[6] Although Congress may relax the

[24] Id. at 10–11.

[1] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 577 (1992).

[2] Hardin v. Ky. Utils. Co., 390 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1968) (determining that a utility company had standing to challenge the TVA's supply of power in competition with certain utility companies because, as a competitor of TVA, the Kentucky Utilities Company fell within the zone of interests that Congress sought to protect in a federal statute from competitive injury even when the statute did not specifically confer standing and the plaintiff's alleged competitive injuries would not have sufficed by themselves for standing).

[3] Havens Realty Corp. v. Coleman, 455 U.S. 363, 368–69, 374 (1982) (holding that a "tester plaintiff" who pretended to be interested in renting apartments for the purpose of obtaining evidence of racially discriminatory practices had standing based on Congress's creation of a statutory right to truthful information concerning the availability of housing); Gladstone v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 114–15 (1979) (holding that homeowners in a neighborhood affected by allegedly racially discriminatory housing practices that manipulated the racial composition of the neighborhood had suffered a cognizable Article III injury for purposes of suing under the Fair Housing Act). See also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 578; cf. Trafficante v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205, 212 (1972) (concluding that tenants of an apartment complex who had been deprived of the benefits of interracial association as a result of discriminatory rental practices had standing to sue their landlord under the Fair Housing Act).

[4] Gladstone, 441 U.S. at 100.

[5] 504 U.S. 555 (1992).

[6] Id. at 572. The Court distinguished this situation from one in which "plaintiffs are seeking to enforce a procedural requirement the disregard of which could impair a separate concrete interest of theirs," such as "a hearing

Article III standards for immediacy and redressability of the injury in such provisions,[7] Congress cannot create standing for redress of generalized grievances about government by providing litigants with an "abstract, self-contained, noninstrumental 'right' to have the Executive observe the procedures required by law."[8] To allow Congress to do so through enactment of provisions providing private rights of action would "transfer from the President to the courts the Chief Executive's most important constitutional duty, to 'take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed'" and make the courts the continuing monitors of Executive action.[9]

Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote a separate concurrence in Lujan in which he suggested that Congress has broad authority to confer standing on private parties in citizen-suit provisions, so long as it explicitly creates procedural rights and concrete interests for citizens to sue upon.[10] Noting that government policies had become more "far-reaching" and that "we must be sensitive to the articulation of new rights of action that do not have clear analogs in our common-law tradition,"[11] Justice Kennedy wrote that "Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before . . . . In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit."[12] Determining that the citizen-suit provision at issue in Lujan did not specifically provide that "any person" would suffer a cognizable injury as a result of any statutory violation, Justice Kennedy agreed that the plaintiff environmental group lacked standing to sue.[13]

The Court decided FEC v. Akins, a 1998 case, consistently with Justice Kennedy's views, holding that Congress may confer standing by providing a general procedural right of access to information to "any party," and that deprivation of this right is a sufficiently concrete injury for standing purposes and not a generalized grievance.[14] More than a decade later, in Massachusetts v. EPA, a majority of the Court formally adopted Justice Kennedy's view that Congress may create standing to sue by identifying cognizable injuries and creating procedural rights for citizens to sue upon to redress those injuries.[15] In Summers v. Earth Island Institute, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that the deprivation of a litigant's procedural prior to denial of their license application, or the procedural requirement for an environmental impact statement before a federal facility is constructed next door to them." Id.

---

[7] Id. at 572 n.7 ("The person who has been accorded a procedural right to protect his concrete interests can assert that right without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy.").

[8] Id. at 573–74. Justice Antonin Scalia later referred to this type of procedural right as a "procedural right in vacuo" that was insufficient for Article III standing. Summers v. Earth Island Institute, 555 U.S. 488, 496 (2009).

[9] Lujan, 504 U.S. at 577 (citing U.S. CONST. art. II, § 3). Justice Antonin Scalia's opinion for the Court acknowledged that Congress may be able to elevate injuries that were "previously inadequate in law" to the status of concrete Article III injuries. Lujan, 504 U.S. at 578.

[10] Id. at 580–81 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("While it does not matter how many persons have been injured by the challenged action, the party bringing suit must show that the action injures him in a concrete and personal way.").

[11] Id. at 580.

[12] Id.

[13] Id.

[14] FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 21 (1998) (holding that a litigant's failure to obtain information that federal law requires to be disclosed can constitute a sufficiently concrete injury for Article III standing purposes); Public Citizen v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 449–50 (1989) (same).

[15] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 516 (2007) ("Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before. In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit." (quoting Lujan, 504 U.S. at 580 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)).

right—the right to use a federal administrative appeals process to challenge certain actions of the U.S. Forest Service—without injury to any separate concrete interest cannot support Article III standing to sue.[16] But, in a concurrence, Justice Kennedy again suggested that the result would have been different—and Massachusetts v. EPA would have applied—if Congress had specifically identified a separate concrete interest that would have been affected by the deprivation of the procedural right.[17]

As the Court held more recently in Spokeo v. Robins, federal courts will judge whether the defendant's alleged violation of a right created by Congress is sufficient by itself to constitute a concrete harm to a litigant for standing purposes by considering whether it is similar to a harm that "has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts."[18] But in doing so, courts must give at least some weight to Congress's judgments about which intangible harms amount to concrete Article III injuries.[19]

The principle emerging from these cases is that Congress has some ability to expand standing beyond the Court's traditional conception by granting a litigant a separate concrete interest, apart from a bare procedural right, that could serve as the basis for an injury-in-fact if violated.[20] At the same time, Congress must respect the limits that Article III establishes, and it cannot elevate certain categories of harm to the status of concrete injuries. For example, Congress likely cannot elevate a trivial injury, such as a company reporting an incorrect zip code for an individual, to the status of an Article III injury.[21] The Court has not articulated a clear rule for distinguishing between the types of intangible harms Congress may elevate to injuries-in-fact for standing purposes and those harms that are simply too trivial to serve as Article III injuries.[22] However, the Court has confirmed that it will independently review whether such harms are in fact "concrete injuries" sufficient for standing purposes.[23]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9 Prudential Standing

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9.1 Overview of Prudential Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Even when a litigant satisfies Article III's constitutional standing requirements, a federal court may refuse to adjudicate its claims for relief "under the prudential principles by which

[16] 555 U.S. 488, 496 (2009).

[17] Id. at 501 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

[18] Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 341 (2016). As noted, in Spokeo v. Robins, the Court clarified that Congress cannot confer standing on plaintiffs who do not face at least a material risk of injury from the defendant's violation of statutory rights. Id. at 343. For further discussion of Spokeo, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.4.3 Particularized Injury.

[19] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 43.

[20] Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 516.

[21] Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 343.

[22] See generally id.

[23] TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, No. 20-297, slip op. at 10 (U.S. June 25, 2021).

the Judiciary seeks to avoid deciding questions of broad social import where no individual rights would be vindicated and to limit access to the federal courts to those litigants best suited to assert a particular claim."[1] The Supreme Court has applied these prudential principles to standing doctrine[2] in several circumstances. A court may refuse to hear a case as a matter of self-restraint in at least three situations: (1) when the litigant seeks to assert the rights of third parties not before the court; (2) when the litigant seeks redress for a generalized grievance widely shared by a large number of citizens that is better addressed legislatively; and (3) when the litigant's asserted interests do not fall within the zone of interests arguably protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional provision underlying its claims.[3]

At least the first two of these situations also implicate the concerns of constitutional standing in some cases, while the third appears to be purely prudential. Thus, more recently, the Court has questioned whether the doctrine of prudential standing should even exist, indicating that the bar on generalized grievances is a constitutional (and not prudential) requirement and rejecting a prudential application of the "zone of interests" test in favor of one aimed at determining whether the plaintiff's claim falls within the scope of a statutory provision conferring a right of action.[4] Regardless of the uncertain state of the law in this area, Congress may abrogate prudential standing requirements through the enactment of legislation containing express language to that effect.[5] As discussed, while Congress may eliminate or modify prudential standing limits, it cannot supersede the Article III minimum requirements of injury, causation, and redressability.[6]

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9.2 Zone of Interests Test

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

One type of prudential standing limitation that may counsel against the exercise of jurisdiction over a dispute involves the application of the "zone of interests" test, which asks

[1] Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 99–100 (1979).

[2] This section discusses only the prudential standing doctrine. However, it is important to note that other "prudential" doctrines that have a basis in Article III of the Constitution may be relevant to the question of whether a federal court may exercise jurisdiction over a litigant's claims for relief. See, e.g., ArtIII.S2.C1.5.1 Overview of Adversity Requirement (discussing the adversity requirement); ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine to ArtIII.S2.C1.9.11 Nonjusticiability of Partisan Gerrymandering Claims (discussing the political question doctrine).

[3] United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 760 (2013) ("Even when Article III permits the exercise of federal jurisdiction, prudential considerations demand that the Court insist upon 'that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions.'" (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962)); Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 12 (2004) (listing the three types of prudential restraints).

[4] Lexmark Int'l Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 572 U.S. 118, 127 n.3 (2014).

[5] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 501 (1975) ("Congress may grant an express right of action to persons who otherwise would be barred by prudential standing rules.").

[6] Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 820 n.3 (1997) ("It is settled that Congress cannot erase Article III's standing requirements by statutorily granting the right to sue to a plaintiff who would not otherwise have standing.").

whether the litigant's grievance arguably[1] falls within the scope of the statute or constitutional provision in question.[2] This test is "not meant to be especially demanding,"[3] and the Supreme Court has sometimes applied it liberally, finding it to be satisfied even when Congress has not specifically intended to protect a particular litigant's interests.[4] For example, the Court determined that irrigation districts and operators of ranches had prudential standing to sue under a citizen-suit provision of the Endangered Species Act—a statute directed primarily at furthering environmental protection—to challenge the Fish and Wildlife Service (FWS)'s enforcement of the Act.[5] The Court found that the litigants had standing even though they alleged that the FWS's actions would cause them economic (and not environmental) harm by reducing the amount of water they would receive from a federal water-management project for their activities.[6] And the Court also concluded that tenants of an apartment complex had prudential standing to sue their landlord under the Fair Housing Act for allegedly discriminatory rental practices.[7] The Court reached this result even though the tenants themselves were not directly subject to such practices because Congress intended to confer standing on "all in the same housing unit who are injured by racial discrimination," such that depriving the residents of the benefits of interracial association qualified as a cognizable injury under the Act.[8]

Although the Supreme Court has often categorized the "zone of interests" test as a prudential limitation on the Court's exercise of its jurisdiction, in the recently decided case Lexmark, International, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the Court, stated that "it does not belong there" and that a court applying the test should use traditional tools of statutory interpretation to ascertain whether a plaintiff has a right to sue under a particular provision creating a substantive cause of action.[9] Thus, the Court may

---

[1] Nat'l Credit Union Admin. v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 522 U.S. 479, 488–99 (1998) ("Our prior cases, therefore, have consistently held that for a plaintiff's interests to be arguably within the 'zone of interests' to be protected by a statute, there does not have to be an 'indication of congressional purpose to benefit the would-be plaintiff.'") (citation omitted).

[2] Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 162 (1997) ("[A] plaintiff's grievance must arguably fall within the zone of interests protected or regulated by the statutory provision or constitutional guarantee invoked in the suit.") (citation omitted).

[3] Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi Indians v. Patchak, 567 U.S. 209, 225 (2012).

[4] See Thompson v. N. Am. Stainless, 562 U.S. 170, 178 (2011) (concluding that a man who alleged that he had been fired in retaliation for his fiance (and coworker)'s sex discrimination charge had standing to sue under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act as his claim fell within the zone of interests that Congress sought to protect in the Act because the "purpose of Title VII is to protect employees from their employers' unlawful actions"); FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 19 (1998) ("History associates the word 'aggrieved' [in a citizen-suit provision] with a congressional intent to cast the standing net broadly—beyond the common-law interests and substantive statutory rights upon which 'prudential' standing traditionally rested."); Clarke v. Sec. Indus. Ass'n, 479 U.S. 388, 399 (1987) ("In cases where the plaintiff is not itself the subject of the contested regulatory action, the test denies a right of review if the plaintiff's interests are so marginally related to or inconsistent with the purposes implicit in the statute that it cannot reasonably be assumed that Congress intended to permit the suit."). But see Air Courier Conference of Am. v. Am. Postal Workers Union, 498 U.S. 517, 524–25 (1991) (finding that postal workers could not challenge a Postal Service regulation employing the use of private couriers in certain situations based on their interest in job opportunities)); Block v. Cmty. Nutrition Inst., 467 U.S. 340, 347 (1984) (examining a statutory scheme in its entirety to determine that Congress intended to preclude ultimate consumers of dairy products from obtaining judicial review of milk market orders issued by the Secretary of Agriculture under the authority of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937).

[5] Bennett, 520 U.S. at 166.

[6] Id.

[7] Trafficante v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205, 212 (1972).

[8] Id.

[9] 572 U.S. 118, 127 (2014). See also, e.g., Bank of Am. Corp. v. City of Miami, No. 15-1111, slip op. at 5 (U.S. May 1, 2017) (confirming that the "zone of interests" test amounts to an inquiry into whether a statutory provision conferring a cause of action encompasses the litigant's claim).

have ceased to regard the zone-of-interests test as an aspect of prudential standing, although it is unclear how this change to the doctrine will practically affect the Court's application of the "zone of interests" test in future cases.

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9.3 Third Party Standing

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Second, as discussed above, the Supreme Court has stated that courts may refuse to allow litigants who have suffered an injury-in-fact to rest their claims for relief on third parties' rights.[1] The Court has characterized such prudential restraints as "not constitutionally mandated" and "designed to minimize unwarranted intervention into controversies where the applicable constitutional questions are ill-defined and speculative."[2] Although the Court has found prudential standing to be present in several cases,[3] it has shown a reluctance to allow litigants to assert the rights of third parties because those parties may not need or wish to assert those rights, and courts prefer to avoid unnecessary decisions on constitutional issues.[4] Furthermore, a litigant may be a less effective advocate for the third parties' rights than the third parties themselves.[5]

Barrows v. Jackson illustrates the prudential application of "third-party standing."[6] In that case, homeowners sued a neighbor for the alleged breach of a private covenant forbidding the use and occupancy of homes in the neighborhood by "non-Caucasians."[7] The Court had previously held that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade a state court from enforcing such

---

[1] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499–500 (1975) ("Second, even when the plaintiff has alleged injury sufficient to meet the 'case or controversy' requirement, this Court has held that the plaintiff generally must assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties.").

[2] Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 314, 320 (1991) (holding that a political party could not assert the rights of candidates for nonpartisan political office where "no obvious barrier exist[ed] that would prevent a candidate from asserting his or her own rights").

[3] June Med. Servs. LLC v. Russo, No. 18-1323 slip op.at 4–5 (U.S. June 29, 2020) (plurality opinion) (observing that the Court has "long permitted abortion providers to invoke the rights of their actual or potential patients in challenges to abortion-related regulations" and has "generally permitted plaintiffs to assert third-party rights in cases where the 'enforcement of the challenged restriction against the litigant would result indirectly in the violation of third parties' rights'" (quoting Kowalski v. Tesmer, 543 U.S. 125, 130 (2004))); Caplin & Drysdale v. United States, 491 U.S. 617, 623–24 n.3 (1989) (holding that a law firm had standing to assert a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment rights because it would receive a portion of defendant's forfeited assets if its Sixth Amendment claim were successful and the Singleton test for third-party standing was met); Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 682–84 (1977) (permitting a contraceptive vendor to challenge a law limiting distribution); Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 192–97 (1976) (allowing a licensed beer vendor to assert an Equal Protection Clause challenge to alcohol laws that established different ages for sale of beer to men and women).

[4] Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 113–14 (1976) (noting courts' reluctance to allow litigants to assert the rights of third parties but concluding that physicians had standing to assert their patients' rights in a challenge to a state statute limiting the circumstances in which the physicians could receive Medicaid reimbursement for abortions).

[5] Id.

[6] 346 U.S. 249, 258 (1953).

[7] Id.

racially restrictive covenants against African-American purchasers of real estate through the award of damages.[8] However, in Barrows, no African-Americans had appeared before the court to assert their constitutional rights, and, indeed, the Court found that it would have been difficult for them to do so because they were not property owners subject to the covenant.[9] But the Court waived the normal prudential standing rule against third-party standing and determined that the defendant property owner could rely upon the state court's interference with third-party rights in her defense because: (1) she would suffer injury if she lost by having to pay damages for breach of the covenant; and (2) the African-Americans (i.e., the third parties) who would be injured by the enforcement of the covenant were unlikely to be able to assert their constitutional rights themselves.[10]

Thus, although a litigant may not generally challenge government action on the grounds that it infringes another's rights,[11] it may do so in certain narrowly defined contexts. As this section has discussed, standing may be found when a litigant challenges a statute as unconstitutionally overbroad on its face in violation of the First Amendment[12] or when the litigant suffers some injury and third parties whose rights the litigant relies upon face an obstacle to protecting their own interests.[13] The Supreme Court has also permitted criminal defendants to challenge their convictions by asserting the rights of persons not before the Court whose rights would be negatively affected by enforcement of the law in question.[14] These circumstances are relevant to a prudential standing inquiry as well as to constitutional standing.

[8] Id. at 254–59 (citing Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 18–23 (1948)).

[9] Id.

[10] Id. ("The relation between the coercion exerted on [the respondent property owner] and her possible pecuniary loss thereby is so close to the purpose of the restrictive covenant, to violate the constitutional rights of those discriminated against, that respondent is the only effective adversary of the unworthy covenant in its last stand.").

[11] E.g., Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 544 (1986) (determining that an individual school board member lacked standing to appeal a lower court decision on behalf of the full school board because he could not "step into the shoes of the Board and invoke its right to appeal"); United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 21–23 (1960) ("[O]ne to whom application of a statute is constitutional will not be heard to attack the statute on the ground that impliedly it might also be taken as applying to other persons or other situations in which its application might be unconstitutional."); Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44, 46 (1943) (holding that a doctor who wished to give his patients advice about birth control lacked standing to represent the interests of his patients in a Fourteenth Amendment challenge to Connecticut statutory provisions).

[12] See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.6.6 Overbreadth Doctrine.

[13] E.g., Barrows, 346 U.S. at 255–59. See also Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392, 394 (1998) (holding that a White criminal defendant had standing to raise equal protection and due process claims when challenging alleged discrimination against African Americans in the selection of grand jurors); Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 403–04, 411 (1991) (finding that a White man had standing to bring a Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause challenge to a jury-selection process during which the prosecutor exercised peremptory challenges to exclude seven African Americans from the jury because a criminal defendant may raise the equal protection rights of a juror excluded from service); Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474, 476–77 (1990) (holding that a White criminal defendant had standing to raise a Sixth Amendment challenge to the exclusion of African Americans from his jury). The Supreme Court has also held that Powers applies in the context of civil litigation. Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614, 629 (1991).

[14] E.g., Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 445–46 (1972) (holding that an advocate of contraception convicted for giving a contraceptive device to an unmarried woman had standing to assert the rights of unmarried persons denied access to contraception, as such persons were not themselves subject to prosecution and would unlikely be able to assert their constitutional right to use it). But see Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 133 (1978) (affirming that "Fourth Amendment rights are personal rights that may not be asserted vicariously"). When a criminal defendant challenges a federal criminal statute as exceeding the federal government's powers and interfering with traditional state powers in violation of the Tenth Amendment, then the prudential bar on third-party standing does not apply. The defendant has an individual interest in the court's resolution of the federalism question and is not improperly asserting rights that belong to the states. Bond v. United States, 564 U.S. 211, 220–26 (2011).

ArtIII.S2.C1.6.9.4 Generalized Grievances

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Finally, federal courts may refuse on prudential grounds to entertain "generalized grievances," which are "abstract questions of wide public significance . . . pervasively shared and most appropriately addressed in the representative branches."[1] Although the Court has at times characterized the bar on generalized grievances as prudential,[2] in dicta in the 2014 case Lexmark International, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc. the Court stated that cases raising generalized grievances "are barred for constitutional reasons, not 'prudential' ones."[3] The Court's opinion in Lexmark thus casts doubt on the continued viability of the prudential standing doctrine—both because of the Court's determination that the bar on generalized grievances is a constitutional (and not prudential) requirement and its rejection of the "zone of interests" test in favor of one aimed at determining whether the plaintiff's claim falls within the scope of a statutory provision conferring a right of action.[4]

Despite uncertainty regarding the continuing viability of the prudential standing doctrine, the constitutional minimum requirements of standing remain one of the most important justiciability doctrines. The courts have consistently applied that doctrine to implement Article III's limits on federal judicial power. Those limits require courts to decide actual "cases" or "controversies" rather than to render opinions on abstract questions better suited for resolution by the political branches of government.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7 Ripeness

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1 Overview of Ripeness Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

[1] Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 474–75 (1982) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). See also Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 220–21 (1974); United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 175 (1974).

[2] E.g., Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 (1975) ("[T]he Court has held that when the asserted harm is a 'generalized grievance' shared in substantially equal measure by all or a large class of citizens, that harm alone normally does not warrant exercise of jurisdiction.").

[3] 572 U.S. 118, 127 n.3 (2014).

[4] Id.

[5] Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 750 (1984) ("The [Article III] doctrine that requires a litigant to have 'standing' to invoke the power of a federal court is perhaps the most important of [the justiciability] doctrines.").

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Like the other justiciability doctrines, the ripeness doctrine defines the limits of a federal court's jurisdiction to adjudicate certain disputes.[1] Ripeness concerns "the timing of judicial intervention," and prevents federal courts "from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements" by adjudicating disputes too early.[2] Any party to the litigation—as well as the judge—may challenge a case as unripe at any stage in the litigation, including for the first time on appeal.[3] To determine whether a particular dispute is ripe for judicial resolution, courts employ the Abbott Laboratories test, named after the Supreme Court's decision in Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner.[4] The Abbott Laboratories standard requires courts to evaluate two factors to determine whether a dispute is ripe: "(1) the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and (2) the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration" until a later time.[5] A claim may be unripe if it is based upon future events that may not occur as predicted or at all.[6] If waiting to decide a case would put the court in a better position to resolve the dispute, such as when further factual development would help the court adjudicate the case, the case may be unripe and therefore nonjusticiable.[7] As discussed below, ripeness issues arise in a wide variety of contexts, including challenges to administrative agencies' actions or policies and pre-enforcement challenges to criminal statutes.[8]

The ripeness doctrine stems partly from Article III's constitutional command that the federal courts only hear "Cases" and "Controversies."[9] To the extent that ripeness derives from

---

[1] See, e.g., Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 559 U.S. 662, 670 n.2 (2010) ("Ripeness reflects constitutional considerations that implicate 'Article III limitations on judicial power,' as well as 'prudential reasons for refusing to exercise jurisdiction.'") (quoting Reno v. Catholic Soc. Servs., Inc., 509 U.S. 43, 57 n.18 (1993)).

[2] Thomas v. Union Carbide Agric. Prods. Co., 473 U.S. 568, 580 (1985) (quoting Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 148 (1967), abrogated on other grounds by Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99 (1977)). See also Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 320 (1991) ("Justiciability concerns not only the standing of litigants to assert particular claims, but also the appropriate timing of judicial intervention."); Anderson v. Green, 513 U.S. 557, 559 (1995) (per curiam) ("[R]ipeness is peculiarly a question of timing.") (quoting Blanchette v. Conn. Gen. Ins. Corps., 419 U.S. 102, 140 (1974)); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 114 (1976) (per curiam) (same). Statutory and other non-constitutional restrictions may limit the appropriate timing of judicial intervention as well. See, e.g., Woodford v. Ngo, 548 U.S. 81, 88–89 (2006) ("[N]o one is entitled to judicial relief for a supposed or threatened injury until the prescribed administrative remedy has been exhausted.") (quoting McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, 193 (1969)); Dalton v. Specter, 511 U.S. 462, 469 (1994) (holding that, as a general matter, only "final agency action[s]" are subject to judicial review under the Administrative Procedure Act) (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 704).

[3] E.g., DBSI/TRI IV Ltd. P'ship v. United States, 465 F.3d 1031, 1038 (9th Cir. 2006) ("[R]ipeness [is a] jurisdictional issue[ ] that may be raised at any time, even for the first time on appeal."); Utah v. U.S. Dep't of Interior, 210 F.3d 1193, 1196 n.1 (10th Cir. 2000) (similar). See also Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 808 (2003) ("[T]he question of ripeness may be considered on a court's own motion.").

[4] 387 U.S. 136.

[5] Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 808. See also, e.g., Stolt-Nielsen S.A., 559 U.S. at 670 n.2 (same); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998) (same); Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 300–01 (1998); Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Res. Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 201 (1983) (same).

[6] See Texas, 523 U.S. at 300 ("A claim is not ripe for adjudication if it rests upon 'contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.'") (quoting Thomas, 473 U.S. at 580–81). See also Trump v. New York, No. 20-366, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Dec. 18, 2020) (applying this rule).

[7] See, e.g., Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 812 ("[F]urther factual development would 'significantly advance our ability to deal with the legal issues presented.'") (quoting Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Grp., Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 82 (1978)); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, 523 U.S. at 737 (same); Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 506 (1989) ("It will be time enough for federal courts to address the meaning of the preamble [to the challenged statute] should it be applied to restrict the activities of appellees in some concrete way.").

[8] See ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1 Overview of Ripeness Doctrine through ArtIII.S2.C1.7.10 Continuing Vitality of Ripeness Doctrine.

[9] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1. See also, e.g., Trump, No. 20-366, slip op. at 3–4 (explaining that the ripeness doctrine "originat[es] in the case-or-controversy requirement of Article III"); Stolt-Nielsen S.A., 559 U.S. at 670 n.2

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1
Overview of Ripeness Doctrine

Article III of the Constitution, it overlaps with other justiciability doctrines that are also derived from the "Case" or "Controversy" requirement, especially the standing doctrine.[10] Thus, in recent years, the Supreme Court has increasingly recognized that because standing and ripeness are based on the same constitutional limitations on the federal courts' jurisdiction, they frequently "boil down to the same question."[11] In particular, the Supreme Court has observed that the standing doctrine's temporal inquiry into whether the plaintiff has suffered an imminent injury overlaps substantially with the ripeness doctrine's inquiry into whether withholding judicial consideration of a dispute would cause "the parties a sufficient 'hardship.'"[12]

In addition to its constitutional dimension, the ripeness doctrine is also partly based on prudential considerations that do not directly derive from the Constitution.[13] The Supreme Court has recognized that, even when Article III of the U.S. Constitution does not forbid a court from deciding an issue, it may nonetheless be appropriate for courts to postpone adjudicating that issue because subsequent events may make it easier or unnecessary to resolve that dispute.[14] Thus, to determine whether a case is ripe for adjudication, the court must assess not only whether the case is presently justiciable within the meaning of Article III's case or controversy requirement, but also whether it would be prudent to decide the case at the present time.[15] The Supreme Court, however, has not squarely articulated which aspects of the ripeness doctrine are mandated by the Constitution and which are instead based solely on prudential concerns.[16] Moreover, as explained in greater detail below, the Supreme Court has recently questioned the continuing vitality of the ripeness doctrine's prudential dimension.[17] As a result, presently it is unclear whether—and, if so, when—federal courts should dismiss a case as prudentially unripe.

("Ripeness reflects constitutional considerations that implicate 'Article III limitations on judicial power.'") (quoting Reno v. Catholic Soc. Servs., Inc., 509 U.S. 43, 57 n.18 (1993)); Blanchette v. Conn. Gen. Ins. Corps., 419 U.S. 102, 138 (1974) ("Issues of ripeness involve, at least in part, the existence of a live 'Case or Controversy.'").

[10] See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 n.10 (1975) ("The standing question thus bears close affinity to questions of ripeness—whether the harm asserted has matured sufficiently to warrant judicial intervention."); Trump, No. 20-366, slip op. at 3–4 (describing standing and ripeness as "related doctrines"); DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 352 (2006) ("The doctrines of mootness, ripeness, and political question all originate in Article III's 'case' or 'controversy' language, no less than standing does."). See generally ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing through ArtIII.S2.C1.11.6 Supplemental Jurisdiction (analyzing the various justiciability doctrines).

[11] MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 128 n.8 (2007) (quoting Lujan v. Defs. of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992)); Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 157 n.5 (2014) (similar); Trump, No. 20-366, slip op. at 7 (dismissing case on both standing and ripeness grounds).

[12] MedImmune, 549 U.S. at 128 n.8 (quoting Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 149 (1967), abrogated on other grounds by Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99 (1977)).See ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing (discussing the standing doctrine's imminent injury requirement); Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560 (applying that requirement).

[13] Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Grp., Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 82 (1978). See also, e.g., Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 808 (2003) ("The ripeness doctrine is 'drawn both from Article III limitations on judicial power and from prudential reasons for refusing to exercise jurisdiction.'") (quoting Reno, 509 U.S. at 57 n.18).

[14] See, e.g., Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 733 n.7 (1997) ("The agency does not question that Suitum properly presents a genuine 'case or controversy' sufficient to satisfy Article III, but maintains only that Suitum's action fails to satisfy our prudential ripeness requirements."); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 735 (1998) ("The ripeness doctrine reflects a judgment that the disadvantages of premature review that may prove too abstract or unnecessary ordinarily outweigh the additional costs of . . . postimplementation litigation.").

[15] See, e.g., Duke Power, 438 U.S. at 81 (concluding that the case presented a ripe "Case or Controversy" as a constitutional matter, and that "[t]he prudential considerations embodied in the ripeness doctrine also argue[d] strongly for a prompt resolution of the claims presented").

[16] See, e.g., Armstrong World Indus., Inc. ex rel. Wolfson v. Adams, 961 F.2d 405, 411 n.12 (3d Cir. 1992) (observing that "[t]he Supreme Court itself has not been consistent" with respect to the constitutional and prudential aspects of ripeness).

[17] ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing through ArtIII.S2.C1.11.6 Supplemental Jurisdiction.

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.2 United Public Workers and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court's decision in United Public Workers of America (C.I.O.) v. Mitchell, is the starting point for discussing the ripeness doctrine.[1] The plaintiffs in United Public Workers attempted to challenge the constitutionality of a statute that prohibited certain Executive Branch employees from engaging in specified political activities.[2] The Court declined to resolve the claims of several challengers who had not yet taken part in such political acts, and who merely sought a judicial declaration that the statute was unconstitutional.[3] Because the Court could "only speculate" about the political activities those challengers wanted to conduct, the Court ruled that they failed to present a justiciable case or controversy under Article III.[4] The Court reasoned that the Judiciary may only review a statute's constitutionality when litigants face actual—rather than legal—violations of their constitutional rights.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.3 Abbott Laboratories Trilogy and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court refined the ripeness doctrine in three opinions known as the "Abbott Laboratories trilogy."[1] Each of these three cases involved pre-enforcement challenges to

[1] 330 U.S. 75 (1947).

[2] Id. at 81–82.

[3] Id. at 82–84. One of the challengers had in fact engaged in political activity and consequently faced "removal from his position." Id. at 91–92. The Supreme Court concluded that although that single employee's challenge to the statute was "appropriate for [immediate] judicial determination," the other employees' challenges were not. Id. at 91.

[4] Id. at 89–90. The Court also based its reasoning on Article III's prohibition against advisory opinions. See id. For further discussion of the rule against advisory opinions, see ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[5] 330 U.S. at 89–90 ("The power of courts, and ultimately of this Court to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress arises only when the interests of litigants require the use of this judicial authority for their protection against actual interference. A hypothetical threat is not enough.").

[1] See Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136 (1967), abrogated on other grounds by Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99 (1977); Gardner v. Toilet Goods Ass'n, 387 U.S. 167 (1967); Toilet Goods Ass'n, Inc. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158 (1967).

regulations promulgated by the Commissioner of Food and Drugs.[2] The Supreme Court concluded that some of those pre-enforcement challenges were ripe for adjudication, but others were not.[3]

The Court first explained that the ripeness doctrine serves two purposes.[4] First, the doctrine mitigates the risk that courts will "entangl[e] themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies" by adjudicating claims prematurely.[5] Second, the doctrine shields administrative agencies from judicial interference until they finalize their decision.[6]

The Court then articulated a two-factor test for determining whether a particular controversy is ripe: the court must evaluate both (1) "the fitness of the issues for judicial decision" and (2) "the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration."[7] Under the first factor, cases that present purely legal issues are particularly likely to be fit for judicial resolution.[8] By contrast, where it would be easier to resolve a challenge to an administrative action in the context of a specific attempt to enforce the agency's regulations than in the context of a pre-enforcement challenge, the challenge is less likely to be ripe.[9] As to the "hardship" factor, the Court explained that, where an administrative regulation threatens noncompliant parties with "an immediate and substantial impact"[10]—such as the "seizure of goods, heavy fines, adverse publicity, [or] possible criminal liability"[11]—a pre-enforcement challenge to that regulation is especially likely to be ripe. The Court, opined that courts ordinarily must entertain challenges to regulations that threaten regulated entities with serious penalties if they fail to modify their behavior.[12]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.4 Modern Ripeness Doctrine Generally

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

---

[2] Abbott Labs., 387 U.S. at 138, 153–54; Gardner, 387 U.S. at 168; Toilet Goods Ass'n, 387 U.S. at 159–60.

[3] Compare Gardner, 387 U.S. at 170 ("[R]espondents' challenge to these regulations is ripe for judicial review."), with Toilet Goods Ass'n, 387 U.S. at 161 ("[T]he controversy is not presently ripe for adjudication.").

[4] Abbott Labs., 387 U.S. at 148.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 148–49 (explaining that the ripeness doctrine "protect[s] the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties").

[7] Id. at 149.

[8] Id.

[9] See Gardner v. Toilet Goods Ass'n, 387 U.S. 167, 171 (1967) (assessing whether "consideration of the underlying legal issues would necessarily be facilitated if they were raised in the context of a specific attempt to enforce the regulations").

[10] Id. See also Abbott Labs., 387 U.S. at 152 ("This is also a case in which the impact of the regulations upon the petitioners is sufficiently direct and immediate as to render the issue appropriate for judicial review at this stage.").

[11] Toilet Goods Ass'n, Inc. v. Gardner, , 387 U.S. 158, 165 (1967).

[12] Abbott Labs., 387 U.S. at 153 ("[W]here a regulation requires an immediate and significant change in the plaintiffs' conduct of their affairs with serious penalties attached to noncompliance, access to the courts . . . must be permitted, absent a statutory bar or some other unusual circumstance . . . .").

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has invoked Abbott Laboratories' two-part "fitness" and "hardship" test on numerous occasions since 1967,[1] deeming a variety of controversies unripe under that standard.[2] A discussion of post-1967 Supreme Court cases that have refined and developed the Abbott Laboratories standard follows.

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.5 Fitness and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has considered several factors when determining whether an issue is "fit" for judicial review under Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner. First, the Court has inquired whether further factual development would make it easier to resolve the parties' dispute.[1] For instance, in National Park Hospitality Ass'n v. Department of Interior, a nonprofit trade association challenged a National Park Service regulation that purported to render the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (CDA) inapplicable to certain government contracts.[2] Noting that the CDA's applicability could vary from contract to contract, the Court determined that awaiting further factual development in the form of a dispute over a particular contract would facilitate the Court's review of the regulation.[3] The Court therefore deemed the challenge unripe.[4]

By contrast, cases presenting purely legal rather than factual questions are more likely to be fit for immediate adjudication.[5] For example, in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. State Energy Resources Conservation & Development Commission, the Supreme Court held that whether federal law preempted a state statute was primarily a legal question and therefore ripe for judicial review.[6]

---

[1] See, e.g., Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 559 U.S. 662, 670 n.2 (2010); Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 808 (2003); Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 300–01 (1998); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998); Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Res. Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 201 (1983).

[2] See Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 808; Texas, 523 U.S. at 301–02; Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc., 523 U.S. at 732–33.

[1] See, e.g., Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 812; Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc., 523 U.S. at 737; Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Grp., Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 82 (1978).

[2] 538 U.S. at 804–05.

[3] See id. ("[F]urther factual development would 'significantly advance our ability to deal with the legal issues presented' . . . [J]udicial resolution of the question presented here should await a concrete dispute about a particular concession contract.") (quoting Duke Power, 438 U.S. at 82).

[4] Id. at 805.

[5] See Whitman v. Am. Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 531 U.S. 457, 479 (2001); Thomas v. Union Carbide Agric. Prods. Co., 473 U.S. 568, 581 (1985).

[6] See 461 U.S. 190, 201 (1983).

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.5
Fitness and Ripeness

A claim may not be fit for adjudication if it is based on "contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all."[7] For instance, in Texas v. United States, the State of Texas asked a federal district court to determine the validity of certain provisions of the Texas Education Code that permitted the state to sanction local school districts if they failed to meet state-mandated educational achievement levels.[8] Because the Supreme Court did not know whether or when the State would ever issue such a sanction, the Court unanimously concluded that the validity of the Texas statute was not yet ripe for adjudication.[9]

Similarly, when a party challenges the constitutionality of a state law, but that state's courts have not yet had an opportunity to delimit the scope and applicability of that law, the claim may be unfit for adjudication.[10] As the Supreme Court has noted, waiting until state courts have had a chance to interpret a challenged law may sharpen the issues for judicial review.[11]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.6 Hardship and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

When considering Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner's "hardship" prong, the Supreme Court has often considered whether one or more of the parties face adverse legal consequences as a result of the challenged action.[1] For instance, in Ohio Civil Rights Commission v. Dayton Christian Schools, Inc., the Ohio Civil Rights Commission initiated administrative proceedings against a nonprofit religious education provider, alleging that the nonprofit had discriminated [7] Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 300 (1998) (quoting Thomas, 473 U.S. at 580–81). See also Trump v. New York, No. 20-366, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Dec. 18, 2020) (applying this rule); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 736 (1998) ("[D]epending upon the agency's future actions to revise the Plan or modify the expected methods of implementation, review now may turn out to have been unnecessary.").

[8] 523 U.S. at 297, 299.

[9] Id. at 300 (quoting Toilet Goods Ass'n, Inc. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158, 163 (1967)).

[10] See id. at 301; Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 323 (1991).

[11] Renne, 501 U.S. at 323. ("Postponing consideration of the questions presented, until a more concrete controversy arises, also has the advantage of permitting the state courts further opportunity to construe [the challenged law], and perhaps in the process to 'materially alter the question to be decided.'") (quoting Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l Union, 442 U.S. 289, 306 (1979)); Texas, 523 U.S. at 301. In this respect, ripeness dovetails with the various abstention doctrines that federal courts utilize to avoid interfering with the states. For an overview of those doctrines, see generally ArtIII.S1.6.7 Federal Non-Interference with State Jurisdiction and Abstention.

[1] AT&T Corp. v. Iowa Utils. Bd., 525 U.S. 366, 386 (1999) ("When . . . there is no immediate effect on the plaintiff's primary conduct, federal courts normally do not entertain pre-enforcement challenges to agency rules and policy statements."); Reno v. Catholic Soc. Servs., Inc., 509 U.S. 43, 58 (1993) (holding that a challenge to a regulation that "impose[d] no penalties for violating any newly imposed restriction" would "not be ripe before the regulation's application to the plaintiffs in some more acute fashion"); Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 809 (2003) (explaining that "a hardship showing" requires "adverse effects of a strictly legal kind") (quoting Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998)).

against one of its teachers on the basis of sex.[2] The nonprofit asserted that it terminated the teacher based on its religious views that mothers should stay home with school-aged children and that the Commission's actions consequently violated the First Amendment's Religion Clauses.[3] The nonprofit thus filed a federal lawsuit to enjoin the administrative proceedings. The Supreme Court ruled that the Commission's administrative action threatened the nonprofit with sanctions for allegedly constitutionally protected conduct and thus that the nonprofit's challenge to those proceedings was ripe.[4]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.7 Administrative Law and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Challenges to federal administrative agencies' actions, decisions, and policies often implicate the ripeness doctrine.[1] In such cases, courts consider "whether judicial intervention would inappropriately interfere with further administrative action."[2] The ripeness doctrine thereby not only "protect[s] the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties," but also "prevent[s] the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies."[3] For example, in Ohio Forestry Association, Inc. v. Sierra Club, an environmental organization challenged the United States Forest Service's interim federal land and resource management plan on the ground that

---

[2] 477 U.S. 619, 623–24 (1986).

[3] Id. at 623–25. See also Amdt1.2.1 Overview of the Religion Clauses (Establishment and Free Expression Clauses) through Amdt1.2.3.4 Church Leadership and the Ministerial Exception (analyzing the First Amendment's Religion Clauses).

[4] Id. at 625 n.1. However, the Court ultimately ruled that the district court should have abstained from deciding the case on other grounds. See id. at 625.

[1] See, e.g., Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 808 (2003) ("Absent a statutory provision providing for immediate judicial review, a regulation is not ordinarily considered the type of agency action 'ripe' for judicial review . . . until the scope of the controversy has been reduced to more manageable proportions, and its factual components fleshed out, by some concrete action applying the regulation to the claimant's situation in a fashion that harms or threatens to harm him.") (quoting Lujan v. Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n, 497 U.S. 871, 891 (1990)) (brackets omitted). See also E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. v. Train, 430 U.S. 112, 128 n.19 (1977) (concluding that "consideration of whether EPA's variance provision has the proper scope would be premature"). Several non-constitutional doctrines, including the "exhaustion" doctrine and the "final agency action" doctrine, may also influence the appropriate timing of challenges to administrative actions. See, e.g., Woodford v. Ngo, 548 U.S. 81, 88–89 (2006) ("[N]o one is entitled to judicial relief for a supposed or threatened injury until the prescribed administrative remedy has been exhausted.") (quoting McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, 193 (1969)); Dalton v. Specter, 511 U.S. 462, 469 (1994) (holding that, as a general matter, only "final agency action[s]" are subject to judicial review under the Administrative Procedure Act) (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 704).

[2] Ohio Forestry Ass'n v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733; Whitman v. Am. Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 531 U.S. 457, 479 (2001). See also Lujan, 497 U.S. at 894 ("[W]e intervene in the administration of the laws only when, and to the extent that, a specific 'final agency action' has an actual or immediately threatened effect. . . . Until confided to us, however, more sweeping actions are for the other branches [of the federal government].").

[3] Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc., 523 U.S. at 732–33 (quoting Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 148–49 (1967), abrogated on other grounds by Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99 (1977)). See also Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 807–08 (same); Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Res. Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 200 (1983) (same).

it permitted too much logging and clearcutting of trees.[4] The Supreme Court concluded that the organization's challenge was unripe,[5] in part because reviewing the plan immediately could obstruct the Forest Service from refining its policies by either revising the plan or applying it to specific sites.[6]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.8 Criminal Statutes and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has frequently scrutinized the ripeness of pre-enforcement challenges to criminal statutes.[1] The Court has explained that, when challenging a criminal statute, the plaintiff need not "first expose himself to actual arrest or prosecution."[2] Rather, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to allege that he (1) intends to engage in constitutionally protected activity prohibited by the statute and (2) faces a "credible threat of prosecution."[3] For example, an abortion provider who faces "a sufficiently direct threat" that a state will prosecute him for violating a statute that criminalizes abortion need not necessarily await prosecution before challenging that statute's constitutionality.[4]

Conversely, a challenger who cannot claim that he has "ever been threatened with prosecution, that a prosecution is likely, or even that a prosecution is remotely possible" cannot "allege a dispute susceptible to resolution by a federal court."[5] For example, in Poe v. Ullman, the plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of a state statute that criminalized the use of contraceptive devices.[6] Even though the statute had been on the books for more than eight decades, the state had only attempted to enforce it on a single occasion, and drugstores in the state commonly and openly sold such devices without any apparent fear of prosecution.[7] Thus,

---

[4] Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc., 523 U.S. at 728.

[5] Id. at 732.

[6] Id. at 735 ("[F]rom the agency's perspective, immediate judicial review directed at the lawfulness of logging and clearcutting could hinder agency efforts to refine its policies: (a) through revision of the Plan, e.g., in response to an appropriate proposed site-specific action that is inconsistent with the Plan, or (b) through application of the Plan in practice, e.g., in the form of site-specific proposals, which are subject to review by a court applying purely legal criteria.").

[1] See, e.g., Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 167–68 (2014); Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l Union, 442 U.S. 289, 297–302 (1979); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188–89 (1973); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 101–02 (1968); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 498–509 (1961).

[2] Babbitt, 442 U.S. at 298 (quoting Steffel v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 459 (1974)) (brackets omitted).

[3] Id. (quoting Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188 (1973)).

[4] See Doe, 410 U.S. at 188.

[5] Babbitt, 442 U.S. at 298–99 (quoting Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 42 (1971)).

[6] 367 U.S. at 498.

[7] See id. at 501–02.

the plaintiffs faced no reasonable fear of prosecution, and the Court accordingly held that the constitutionality of the statute was not ripe for decision.[8]

One might argue, however, that the Court has not always applied these principles consistently. In Epperson v. Arkansas, for example, the plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of an Arkansas statute that made it a misdemeanor to teach the theory of evolution in public schools and universities.[9] No teacher had ever been prosecuted under the challenged statute.[10] Even though the plaintiff did not appear to face a reasonable threat of prosecution, the Court concluded—with minimal discussion—that the plaintiff had nonetheless presented a justiciable controversy.[11] Epperson is therefore arguably inconsistent with the Court's other ripeness cases. The Court has attempted to reconcile Epperson by focusing on the age of the statute being challenged; a challenge to a criminal statute that has been on the books for decades yet has almost never been enforced will likely not be ripe for immediate review, whereas a pre-enforcement challenge to a statute that is "recent and not moribund" may be justiciable.[12] That distinction, however, may not be altogether satisfying; the anti-evolution statute in Epperson had been on the books for four decades, yet the Supreme Court nonetheless deemed the plaintiff's challenge ripe for immediate adjudication.[13] Thus, as the Court itself has intimated, it is not always easy to predict whether any given pre-enforcement challenge to a criminal statute will be justiciable.[14]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.9 Takings and Ripeness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Until very recently, the Supreme Court applied special ripeness rules in regulatory takings cases in which a litigant alleges that a governmental entity has "taken" his property without paying "just compensation" as the Fifth Amendment requires.[1] Under the doctrine established

[8] See id. at 508. Cf. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 480–81 (1965) (deeming a challenge to an anti-contraceptive statute justiciable where appellants had been arrested for violating the statute, found guilty, and fined).

[9] See 393 U.S. 97, 98–99 (1968).

[10] Id. at 101–02.

[11] See id. at 102.

[12] See Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188–89 (1973).

[13] See Epperson, 393 U.S. at 98, 101–02.

[14] See Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 508 (1961) (remarking, in the course of dismissing as unripe a pre-enforcement challenge to a criminal statute, that "[j]usticiability is . . . not a legal concept with fixed content or susceptible of scientific verification").

[1] U.S. CONST. amend. V ("[N]or shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."). See Horne v. Dep't of Agric., 569 U.S. 513, 524–28 (2013); Stop the Beach Renourishment, Inc. v. Fla. Dep't of Envtl. Prot., 560 U.S. 702, 729 & n.10 (2010); Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 618, 620–22 (2001); Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 733–34 (1997); Lucas v. S.C. Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1010–14 (1992); Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 533–34 (1992); Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S. 1, 11–17 (1990); First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 312 n.6 (1987); MacDonald, Sommer & Frates v. Yolo in Williamson County Regional Planning Commission v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City,[2] a plaintiff could not pursue a takings claim against a state entity in federal court until the plaintiff had (1) received a final decision from the state government regarding the challenged regulation's application to his property; and (2) sought compensation through state-provided procedures.[3] Williamson County's context-specific ripeness rule created potentially significant obstacles for takings plaintiffs. As the Court later held in San Remo Hotel, L.P. v. City & County of San Francisco, when a plaintiff first litigates a takings claim in state court as mandated by Williamson County, the federal full faith and credit statute bars the plaintiff from relitigating the Takings Clause issues in a subsequent federal lawsuit.[4] Thus, under Williamson County and San Remo, a plaintiff could not file a takings lawsuit in federal court before pursuing his claim in state court, yet if he lost in state court, his subsequent federal lawsuit would fail as well.[5] The Court ultimately concluded that this special ripeness rule imposed "an unjustifiable burden on takings plaintiffs" and conflicted with the Court's Takings Clause jurisprudence.[6] The Court therefore overruled Williamson County in Knick v. Township of Scott.[7] After Knick, a property owner may bring a takings claim in a federal court without first seeking compensation in state court.[8]

ArtIII.S2.C1.7.10 Continuing Vitality of Ripeness Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

Cty., 477 U.S. 340, 348–53 (1986); Williamson Cty. Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 186, 190–91, 195, 200 (1985), overruled by Knick v. Twp. of Scott, No. 17-647 (U.S. June 21, 2019). See also, e.g., Knick, No. 17-647, slip op. at 22 (characterizing the aforementioned cases as articulating "a 'prudential' ripeness rule"); Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 339 (2002) ("[I]t is the interest in informed decisionmaking that underlies our decisions imposing a strict ripeness requirement on landowners asserting regulatory takings claims."); Pennell v. City of San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 8–10 (1988) (holding that "it would be premature" to consider challenger's claim that local ordinance violated the Takings Clause). See generally Amdt5.9.6 Regulatory Takings and Penn Central Framework (defining and discussing regulatory takings).

[2] 473 U.S. at 186, 190–91, 195, 200.

[3] Suitum, 520 U.S. at 734 (quoting Williamson Cty., 473 U.S. at 186, 194) (brackets omitted). See also, e.g., Palazzolo, 533 U.S. at 618, 620–22.

[4] 545 U.S. 323, 326–48 (2005). See also 28 U.S.C. § 1738 (Full Faith and Credit Act); ArtIV.S1.1 Overview of Full Faith and Credit Clause through ArtIV.S1.5.2 Specifically Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause (analyzing the Full Faith and Credit Act).

[5] Knick, No. 17-647, slip op. at 1–2 ("The takings plaintiff thus finds himself in a Catch-22: He cannot go to federal court without going to state court first; but if he goes to state court and loses, his claim will be barred in federal court. The federal claim dies aborning.").

[6] Id. at 2.

[7] Id. at 23.

[8] Id. at 2, 23.

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Even though the Supreme Court has applied the Abbott Laboratories standard on numerous occasions since 1967,[1] the Court has signaled that it may be willing to modify the standard, or perhaps even abrogate the ripeness doctrine entirely.

For example, recent Supreme Court decisions have questioned the ripeness doctrine's prudential underpinnings. Before 2014, the Court had held repeatedly that the ripeness doctrine had both constitutional and prudential dimensions.[2] However, in Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, the Court, quoting its earlier holding that "'a federal court's obligation to hear and decide' cases within its jurisdiction 'is virtually unflagging,'" questioned whether it is proper to deem a claim "nonjusticiable on grounds that are prudential, rather than constitutional."[3] And in its 2020 ripeness opinion, the Court deemed a case unripe without mentioning the doctrine's prudential component or discussing Abbott Laboratories' fitness and hardship factors.[4] It is therefore possible that the Supreme Court may someday unmoor the ripeness doctrine from its prudential foundations and replace the two-pronged Abbott Laboratories test with a new legal standard predicated solely on Article III's Case or Controversy requirement.

The ripeness doctrine has also arguably diminished in importance as the Supreme Court has developed and refined other justiciability doctrines, especially the doctrine of Article III standing. In MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc. and Susan B. Anthony List, the Court observed that because standing and ripeness both derive from the provisions of Article III limiting the federal courts' jurisdiction to "Cases" and "Controversies," the two doctrines often " boil down to the same question."[5] Thus, the Court ruled in Trump v. New York that a challenge to an Executive Branch policy was premature under the standing and ripeness doctrines alike.[6] Consequently, under MedImmune, Susan B. Anthony List, and Trump, the degree to which the ripeness doctrine imposes any limitation on the justiciability of disputes that the Article III standing doctrine does not already impose is uncertain. Future Supreme Court decisions may clarify the extent to which the ripeness doctrine continues to play a role in the application of Article III's case or controversy requirement.

---

[1] See, e.g., Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 559 U.S. 662, 670 n.2 (2010); Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 808 (2003); Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 300–01 (1998); Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998); Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Res. Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 201 (1983).

[2] Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 808 (quoting Reno v. Catholic Soc. Servs., Inc., 509 U.S. 43, 57 n.18 (1993)). See also Stolt-Nielsen, 559 U.S. at 670 n.2; Suitum v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 733 n.7 (1997).

[3] 573 U.S. 149, 167 (2014) (quoting Lexmark Int'l, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 572 U.S. 118, 125–26 (2014)) (internal quotation marks omitted). But see id. ("[W]e need not resolve the continuing vitality of the prudential ripeness doctrine in this case because the 'fitness' and 'hardship' factors are easily satisfied here.").

[4] Trump v. New York, No. 20-366, slip op. at 1–7 (Dec. 18, 2020).

[5] Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 157 n.5 (2014). See also MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 128 n.8 (2007) ("The justiciability problem . . . can be described in terms of standing (whether plaintiff is threatened with 'imminent' injury in fact 'fairly . . . trace[able] to the challenged action of the defendant,') or in terms of ripeness (whether there is sufficient 'hardship to the parties [in] withholding court consideration' until there is enforcement action).") (quoting Lujan v. Defs. of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992); Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 149 (1967), abrogated on other grounds by Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99 (1977)).

[6] See No. 20-366, slip op. at 6–7 ("[T]he standing and ripeness inquiries both lead to the conclusion that judicial resolution of this dispute is premature.").

ArtIII.S2.C1.8 Mootness

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.1 Overview of Mootness Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In addition to the other justiciability doctrines discussed above, the Supreme Court's doctrine on mootness imposes another limitation on justiciability derived from Article III's case-or-controversy requirement[1] on the federal courts' jurisdiction to resolve disputes.[2] "It has long been settled that a federal court has no authority 'to give opinions upon moot questions;'"[3] that is, "when the issues presented are no longer 'live' or the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome."[4] "[A]n actual controversy must exist not only at the time the complaint is filed, but through all stages of the litigation."[5] Thus, "if an intervening circumstance deprives the plaintiff of a 'personal stake in the outcome of the lawsuit[ ]' at any point during litigation, the action can no longer proceed and must be dismissed as moot."[6] The Supreme Court has justified the mootness doctrine on the ground that it "ensures that the Federal Judiciary confines itself to its constitutionally limited role of adjudicating actual and concrete disputes, the resolutions of which have direct consequences on the parties involved."[7] [1] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 2 (stating that "[t]he judicial Power" of the federal courts shall only extend to certain categories of "Cases" and "Controversies").

---

[2] E.g., Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 180 (2000) ("The Constitution's case-or-controversy limitation on federal judicial authority . . . underpins . . . our mootness jurisprudence."); Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747, 754 (1976) ("Insofar as the concept of mootness defines constitutionally minimal conditions for the invocation of federal judicial power, its meaning and scope, as with all concepts of justiciability, must be derived from the fundamental policies informing the 'cases or controversies' limitation imposed by Art[icle] III."); DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312, 316 (1974) (per curiam) ("The inability of the federal judiciary 'to review moot cases derives from the requirement of Art[icle] III of the Constitution under which the exercise of judicial power depends upon the existence of a case or controversy.'") (quoting Liner v. Jafco, Inc., 374 U.S. 301, 306 n.3 (1964)); SEC v. Med. Comm. for Human Rights, 404 U.S. 403, 407 (1972) (same); North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244, 246 (1971) (per curiam) (same).

[3] Church of Scientology of Cal. v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992) (quoting Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651, 653 (1895)). See also, e.g., Calderon v. Moore, 518 U.S. 149, 150 (1996) (same).

[4] Cty. of Los Angeles v. Davis, 440 U.S. 625, 631 (1979) (quoting Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 498 (1969)). See also, e.g., Chafin v. Chafin, 568 U.S. 165, 172 (2013) (same); City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 287 (2000) (same).

[5] Kingdomware Techs., Inc. v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1969, 1975 (2016) (quoting Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc., 568 U.S. 85, 90–91 (2013)). See also, e.g., Decker v. Nw. Envtl. Def. Ctr., 568 U.S. 597, 609 (2013) ("It is a basic principle of Article III that a justiciable case or controversy must remain extant at all stages of review, not merely at the time the complaint is filed.") (quoting United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 936 (2011) (per curiam)); Lewis v. Cont'l Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 477–78 (1990) ("To sustain our jurisdiction . . . it is not enough that a dispute was very much alive when suit was filed, or when review was obtained in the Court of Appeals."); Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 317 (1988) ("That the dispute between parties was very much alive when suit was filed . . . cannot substitute for the actual case or controversy that an exercise of this Court's jurisdiction requires."); Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361, 363 (1987) ("Article III of the Constitution requires that there be a live case or controversy at the time that a federal court decides the case; it is not enough that there may have been a live case or controversy when the case was decided by the court whose judgment we are reviewing.").

[6] Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 577 U.S. 153, 161 (2016) (quoting Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 569 U.S. 66, 72 (2013)).

[7] Genesis Healthcare, 569 U.S. at 71.

According to the Supreme Court, "[a] case that becomes moot at any point during the proceedings is "no longer a "Case" or "Controversy" for purposes of Article III," and is outside the jurisdiction of the federal courts."[8] Because mootness is a jurisdictional limitation, a federal court can—and indeed must—dismiss a moot case even if none of the parties ask the court to do so.[9] A question about mootness may, in other words, arise at any time during the lifespan of a case, even on appeal.[10] In this respect, mootness "bears close affinity to" the other justiciability doctrines derived from Article III of the Constitution,[11] including standing[12] and the prohibition against advisory opinions.[13] To the extent that the mootness doctrine regulates "the appropriate timing of judicial intervention,"[14] mootness serves as the converse of the ripeness doctrine,[15] which restrains the Judiciary from adjudicating a case before it develops into a live dispute.

The Supreme Court has steadily developed the substantive and procedural aspects of the mootness doctrine over the course of nearly a century and a half. The Court has ultimately settled on the following formulation of the doctrine: "If an intervening circumstance deprives

---

[8] United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. 1532, 1537 (2018) (quoting Already, 568 U.S. at 91). See also, e.g., Iron Arrow Honor Soc'y v. Heckler, 464 U.S. 67, 70 (1983) (per curiam) ("Federal courts lack jurisdiction to decide moot cases because their constitutional authority extends only to actual cases or controversies."); St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Barry, 438 U.S. 531, 537 (1978) ("[M]ootness . . . implicates our jurisdiction."); Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24, 36 (1974) ("[P]urely practical considerations have never been thought to be controlling by themselves on the issue of mootness in this Court . . . [W]e are limited by the case-or-controversy requirement of Art[icle] III to adjudication of actual disputes between adverse parties."); North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244, 246 (1971) (per curiam) ("Mootness is a jurisdictional question because the Court 'is not empowered to decide moot questions or abstract propositions.'") (quoting United States v. Alaska S.S. Co., 253 U.S. 113, 116 (1920)).

[9] See, e.g., Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. at 933–34 (deeming case moot even though "[n]o party had raised any issue of mootness in the [court below], and the Court of Appeals did not address the issue sua sponte"); St. Paul, 438 U.S. at 537 ("At the threshold, we confront a question of mootness. Although not raised by the parties, this issue implicates our jurisdiction."); Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1978) ("There is, at the outset, a question of mootness. Although the parties have not addressed this question in their briefs, 'they may not by stipulation invoke the judicial power of the United States in litigation which does not present an actual case or controversy.'") (quoting Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 398 (1975)); Rice, 404 U.S. at 246 ("Although neither party has urged that this case is moot, resolution of the question is essential if federal courts are to function within their constitutional sphere of authority.").

[10] See, e.g., Lewis, 494 U.S. at 477–78 ("To sustain our jurisdiction . . . it is not enough that a dispute was very much alive when suit was filed, or when review was obtained in the Court of Appeals.").

[11] See, e.g., Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 n.10 (1975) ("The standing question . . . bears close affinity to questions of . . . mootness—whether the occasion for judicial intervention persists.").

[12] DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 352 (2006) ("The doctrines of mootness, ripeness, and political question all originate in Article III's 'case' or 'controversy' language, no less than standing does."); Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 180 (2000) ("The Constitution's case-or-controversy limitation on federal judicial authority . . . underpins both our standing and our mootness jurisprudence.")

[13] See City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 287 (2000) (explaining that, if a case becomes moot, then "any opinion as to the legality of the challenged action would be advisory") (emphasis added); See generally ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions (discussing the bar on advisory opinions).

The Court has emphasized, however, that mootness is conceptually distinct from the other Article III justiciability doctrines. See, e.g., Friends of the Earth, 528 U.S. at 190–91 (emphasizing "the distinction between mootness and standing" and explaining that mootness is more than "simply 'standing set in a time frame'") (quoting Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 68 n.22 (1997)); Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361, 364 n.* (1987) ("We reject respondents' argument that the questions of mootness and standing are necessarily intertwined."). Whereas "[s]tanding doctrine functions to ensure, among other things, that the scarce resources of the federal courts are devoted to those disputes in which the parties have a concrete stake[,] . . . by the time mootness is an issue, the case has been brought and litigated, often . . . for years." Friends of the Earth, 528 U.S. at 191. Moreover, as explained in greater detail below, the mootness doctrine is subject to exceptions that do not exist in the standing context. See, e.g., id. at 190–91 ("[I]f mootness were simply 'standing set in a time frame,' the exception to mootness that arises when the defendant's allegedly unlawful activity is 'capable of repetition, yet evading review,' could not exist. . . . Standing admits of no similar exception; if a plaintiff lacks standing at the time the action commences, the fact that the dispute is capable of repetition yet evading review will not entitle the complainant to a federal judicial forum.").

[14] E.g., Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 320 (1991).

[15] See, e.g., Note, Standing to Sue for Members of Congress, 83 Yale L.J. 1665, 1674 n.38 (1974) (describing "[r]ipeness" as "the converse of mootness").

the plaintiff of a 'personal stake in the outcome of the lawsuit[ ]' at any point during litigation," then—subject to certain exceptions analyzed below—"the action can no longer proceed and must be dismissed as moot."[16]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.2 Early Mootness Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court's 1895 decision in Mills v. Green[1] was the first Supreme Court opinion that directly addressed the mootness doctrine.[2] Mills involved the election of delegates to a convention to revise South Carolina's constitution.[3] A South Carolina citizen filed suit, claiming that the state's voter registration statutes unconstitutionally "abridg[ed], imped[ed], and destroy[ed] the suffrage of citizens of the state and of the United States."[4] While the case was pending on appeal, the date of the delegate election for the convention passed, the delegates were selected, and the constitutional convention had assembled.[5] The Supreme Court therefore concluded that there was no longer any "actual controversy involving real and substantial rights between the parties" and dismissed the appeal accordingly.[6] The Court explained that the Federal Judiciary's "duty" under the Constitution was only "to decide actual controversies," not "to give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare principles or rules of law which cannot affect the matter in issue in the case before it."[7] Applying that principle to the facts of the case before it, the Court emphasized that "the whole object of the [plaintiff's lawsuit] was to secure a right to vote at the election."[8] Because the Court could not retroactively make the plaintiff eligible to vote in an election that had already occurred, the Court concluded it was unable to grant the plaintiff the relief that he sought.[9] Mills therefore firmly established the legal principle that otherwise justiciable cases may become nonjusticiable with the passage of time.[10]

---

[16] Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 577 U.S. 153, 160–61 (2016) (quoting Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 569 U.S. 66, 72 (2013)).

[1] 159 U.S. 651 (1895).

[2] See Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 331 (1988) (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring) (describing Mills as "the case originally enunciating the mootness doctrine").

[3] 159 U.S. at 652.

[4] Id. at 651–52.

[5] Id. at 657.

[6] Id. at 653.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 657.

[9] Id. at 658 ("It is obvious, therefore, that, even if the bill could properly be held to present a case within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, no relief within the scope of the bill could now be granted.").

[10] Mills does not hold, however, that an election dispute invariably becomes moot after the election occurs. See Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 287–88 (1992) ("We start with Reed's contention that we should treat the controversy as moot because the election is over. We should not."); Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414, 417 n.2 (1988) ("Although the

Notably, the Mills Court did not expressly base its holding on Article III's "case or controversy" requirement; nothing in Mills squarely suggested that the mootness doctrine was a constitutionally mandated limitation on the federal courts' jurisdiction, as opposed to a self-imposed prudential restriction on the justiciability of disputes.[11] Thus, the Court applied the mootness doctrine articulated in Mills on various occasions throughout the early- to mid-twentieth century without explicitly suggesting that federal courts lacked the constitutional authority to adjudicate moot cases.[12] It was not until the Court's 1964 decision in Liner v. Jafco, Inc.[13] that the Court first explicitly acknowledged mootness's constitutional dimension.[14] The respondents in Liner had successfully convinced a state court to enter an injunction[15] to prohibit picketing at a construction site.[16] The petitioners thereafter appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, contending that the state court lacked the authority to issue the injunction.[17] While the case was pending, however, "construction at the site had been completed."[18] The Court therefore had to determine whether the completion of the construction project rendered the case moot.[19]

The Court answered that question in the negative.[20] The Court observed that the respondents had "filed a bond providing that, if the injunction action failed," the respondents would have to pay the petitioners "all such costs, damages, interest, and other sums as may be awarded and recovered against the [respondents] in any suit or suits which may be hereafter bro[u]ght for wrongfully suing out said Injunction."[21] Because the petitioners could therefore November 1984 election in which appellees had first hoped to present their proposal to the citizens of Colorado is long past, we note that this action is not moot."); Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 737 n.8 (1974) ("The 1972 election is long over, and no effective relief can be provided to the candidates or voters, but this case is not moot."); Rosario v. Rockefeller, 410 U.S. 752, 756 n.5 (1973) ("Although the June primary election has been completed and the petitioners will be eligible to vote in the next scheduled New York primary, this case is not moot."). As explained in greater detail below, see Exceptions to Mootness: Capable of Repetition, Yet Evading Review (discussing the "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception to the mootness doctrine), if a case involving an election dispute implicates legal issues that may recur in the future, that case does not necessarily become moot once the challenged election ends. See Norman, 502 U.S. at 288 ("Even if the issue before us were limited to petitioners' eligibility to use the Party name on the 1990 ballot, that issue would be worthy of resolution as 'capable of repetition, yet evading review.'" (quoting Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 816 (1969))); Meyer, 486 U.S. at 417 n.2 ("It is reasonable to expect that the same controversy will recur between these two parties, yet evade meaningful judicial review."); Storer, 415 U.S. at 737 n.8 ("[T]he issues properly presented, and their effects on independent candidacies, will persist as the California statutes are applied in future elections. This is, therefore, a case where the controversy is 'capable of repetition, yet evading review.'"); Rosario, 410 U.S. at 756 n.5 ("Although the June primary election has been completed and the petitioners will be eligible to vote in the next scheduled New York primary, this case is not moot, since the question the petitioners raise is 'capable of repetition, yet evading review.'").

---

[11] See 159 U.S. at 651–58.

[12] See, e.g., United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 632–33, 635 (1953) (analyzing mootness without mentioning Article III's case-or-controversy requirement).

[13] 375 U.S. 301 (1964).

[14] See, e.g., Lucero v. Bureau of Collection Recovery, Inc., 639 F.3d 1239, 1242 (10th Cir. 2011) (describing Liner as "the first occasion in which the Supreme Court expressly derived its lack of jurisdiction to review moot cases from Article III"); N.J. Tpk. Auth. v. Jersey Cent. Power & Light, 772 F.2d 25, 31 n.11 (3d Cir. 1985) (explaining that "[t]he Supreme Court first explicitly relied on Article III" as the basis for the mootness doctrine in Liner, thereby "elevat[ing] . . . mootness doctrine to constitutional status").

[15] An injunction is "a court order commanding or preventing an action." Injunction, Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014).

[16] 375 U.S. at 302.

[17] Id. at 303–04.

[18] Id. at 303.

[19] Id. at 304.

[20] See id. at 304–09.

[21] Id. at 302–03.

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.2
Early Mootness Doctrine

potentially recover damages if "the injunction was wrongfully sued out,"[22] the Court determined that Liner was "not a case where th[e] Court's decision on the merits" would not "affect the rights of the litigants."[23] The Court accordingly concluded that the case was not moot because the petitioners retained "a substantial stake in the judgment" that existed "apart from and [wa]s unaffected by the completion of construction."[24]

In reaching this holding, the Liner Court expressly stated that the mootness doctrine "derives from the requirement of Article III of the Constitution under which the exercise of judicial power depends upon the existence of a case or controversy."[25] The Court's decision to characterize mootness as a constitutional doctrine had significant practical and doctrinal implications. As the Court would explain in other opinions following Liner, a federal court lacks jurisdiction to adjudicate a moot case even if all parties consent because moot cases do not constitute justiciable "cases or controversies" within the meaning of Article III.[26] Thus, the Constitution requires the federal courts to raise and decide issues of mootness even if the parties have not raised the issue themselves.[27] Likewise, because mootness is a constitutional limitation on the federal courts' jurisdiction, a court must also "address the question of mootness before reaching the merits" of the parties' claims.[28] Moreover, the constitutional status of the mootness doctrine entails that Congress may not statutorily authorize federal courts to adjudicate moot cases.[29]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.3 Modern Mootness Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

[22] Id. at 305.

[23] Id. at 306.

[24] Id. at 305.

[25] Id. at 306 n.3.

[26] See, e.g., Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 397 (1975) ("While the parties may be permitted to waive nonjurisdictional defects, they may not by stipulation invoke the judicial power of the United States in litigation which does not present an actual 'case or controversy.'").

[27] See, e.g., United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 933–34 (2011) (per curiam) (deeming case moot even though "[n]o party had raised any issue of mootness in the [court below], and the Court of Appeals did not address the issue sua sponte"); St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Barry, 438 U.S. 531, 537 (1978) ("At the threshold, we confront a question of mootness. Although not raised by the parties, this issue implicates our jurisdiction."); Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1978) ("There is, at the outset, a question of mootness. Although the parties have not addressed this question in their briefs, 'they may not by stipulation invoke the judicial power of the United States in litigation which does not present an actual case or controversy.'") (quoting Sosna, 419 U.S. at 398); North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244, 246 (1971) (per curiam) ("Although neither party has urged that this case is moot, resolution of the question is essential if federal courts are to function within their constitutional sphere of authority.").

[28] E.g., Sosna, 419 U.S. at 397.

[29] See, e.g., Houston v. Marod Supermarkets, Inc., 733 F.3d 1323, 1342 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Congress . . . may not bypass the Constitution's 'Case or Controversy' requirement."); Wilcox Elec., Inc. v. Fed. Aviation Admin., 119 F.3d 724, 727 (8th Cir. 1997) ("Congress may not, of course, change or undermine Article III.").

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has decided mootness issues in a wide array of contexts since the Supreme Court decided Liner in 1964.[1] As a result, the Court has developed a robust body of precedent governing when a case should (or should not) be dismissed as moot, as well as what procedures a federal court should follow after a case becomes moot.

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.4 General Criteria of Mootness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Under current law, "a case is moot when the issues presented are no longer 'live' or the parties lack a cognizable interest in the outcome."[1] "[A]n actual controversy must exist not only at the time the complaint is filed, but through all stages of the litigation."[2] Thus, "[i]f an

[1] See, e.g., North Carolina v. Covington, 138 S. Ct. 2548, 2552–53 (2018) (per curiam) (electoral redistricting case); Kernan v. Cuero, 138 S. Ct. 4, 7 (2017) (habeas corpus case); FTC v. Phoebe Putney Health Sys., Inc., 568 U.S. 216, 224 n.3 (2013) (antitrust case); Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 568 U.S. 115, 120 (2013) (admiralty case); Pac. Bell Tel. Co. v. Linkline Commc'ns, Inc., 555 U.S. 438, 446 (2009) (antitrust case); Lopez v. Gonzales, 549 U.S. 47, 52 n.2 (2006) (immigration case); Tory v. Cochran, 544 U.S. 734, 736–37 (2005) (defamation case); Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 218–19 (1990) (civil rights case); FDIC v. Mallen, 486 U.S. 230, 236 n.7 (1988) (banking law case); Gwaltney of Smithfield, Ltd. v. Chesapeake Bay Found., Inc., 484 U.S. 49, 66 (1987) (environmental law case); INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 426 n.3 (1987) (immigration case); Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 686 n.* (1986) (free speech case); Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 168 n.2 (1986) (habeas corpus case); Golden State Transit Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 475 U.S. 608, 613 n.3 (1986) (labor law case); Ohio v. Kovacs, 469 U.S. 274, 277–78 (1985) (bankruptcy case); U.S. Dep't of Justice v. Provenzano, 469 U.S. 14, 14–16 (1984) (privacy law case); Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts, 467 U.S. 561, 568–72 (1984) (employment law case); Local No. 82, Furniture & Piano Moving, Furniture Store Drivers, Helpers, Warehousemen & Packers v. Crowley, 467 U.S. 526, 535 n.11 (1984) (labor law case); Consol. Rail Corp. v. Darrone, 465 U.S. 624, 630–31 (1984) (discrimination case); INS v. Phinpathya, 464 U.S. 183, 188 n.6 (1984) (immigration case); City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 96, 101 (1983) (civil rights case); Johnson v. Bd. of Educ. of City of Chi., 457 U.S. 52, 52–54 (1982) (per curiam) (discrimination case); Havens Realty Corp. v. Coleman, 455 U.S. 363, 370–71 (1982) (housing law case); Univ. of Tex. v. Camenisch, 451 U.S. 390, 391–98 (1981) (discrimination case); Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 486–87 (1980) (prison law case); Quern v. Mandley, 436 U.S. 725, 733 n.7 (1978) (public assistance law case); Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 11 (1975) (family law case); Vill. of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1974) (zoning law case); Mancusi v. Stubbs, 408 U.S. 204, 205–07 (1972) (habeas corpus case); Socialist Labor Party v. Gilligan, 406 U.S. 583, 584, 589 (1972) (election law case); Roudebush v. Hartke, 405 U.S. 15, 18–19 (1972) (election law case); Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 140–41 (1971) (legislative apportionment case).

[1] Cty. of Los Angeles v. Davis, 440 U.S. 625, 631 (1979) (quoting Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 498 (1969)). See also, e.g., Chafin v. Chafin, 568 U.S. 165, 172 (2013) (same); City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 287 (2000) (same).

[2] Kingdomware Techs., Inc. v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1969, 1975 (2016) (quoting Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc., 568 U.S. 85, 90–91 (2013)). See also, e.g., Decker v. Nw. Envtl. Def. Ctr., 568 U.S. 597, 609 (2013) ("It is a basic principle of Article III that a justiciable case or controversy must remain extant at all stages of review, not merely at the time the complaint is filed.") (quoting United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 936 (2011) (per curiam)); Lewis v. Cont'l Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 477–78 (1990) ("To sustain our jurisdiction . . . it is not enough that a dispute was very much alive when suit was filed, or when review was obtained in the Court of Appeals."); Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 317 (1988) ("That the dispute between parties was very much alive when suit was filed . . . cannot substitute for the actual case or controversy that an exercise of this Court's jurisdiction requires."); Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361, 363 (1987) ("Article III of the Constitution requires that there be a live case or controversy at the time that a federal court decides the case; it is not enough that there may have been a live case or controversy when the case was decided by the court whose judgment we are reviewing.").

intervening circumstance deprives the plaintiff of a 'personal stake in the outcome of the lawsuit[ ]' at any point during litigation, the action can no longer proceed and must be dismissed as moot."[3] "A case becomes moot only when it is impossible for a court to grant any effectual relief whatever to the prevailing party."[4] When (1) "it can be said with assurance that there is no reasonable expectation that the alleged violation will recur;" and (2) "interim relief or events have completely and irrevocably eradicated the effects of the alleged violation," then "the case is moot because neither party has a legally cognizable interest in the final determination of the underlying questions of fact and law."[5]

Significantly, however, a case does not necessarily become moot simply because intervening events make it impossible for a federal court to issue the exact form of relief that the plaintiff requests.[6] As long as the court retains the ability to "fashion some form of meaningful relief, "then that" is sufficient to prevent th[e] case from being moot."[7] To illustrate, "[i]f there is any chance of money changing hands" as a result of the lawsuit, then the "suit remains live."[8] Similarly, even if it is uncertain that the relief granted by the court will ultimately have any meaningful practical impact on the plaintiff, that does not itself render the case moot.[9]

Intervening circumstances that may render a case moot can result either from actions attributable to the litigants or from outside forces. For example, in the City News & Novelty, Inc. v. City of Waukesha case discussed in greater detail below, the Court ruled that an adult business's challenge to a municipality's decision to deny the business's license became moot after the business chose to cease operations while the case was pending on appeal.[10] A lawsuit predicated upon a federal statute may also become moot if Congress amends the statute while the suit remains pending.[11] A case may also become moot merely through the passage of time; for instance, the Court ruled in Camreta v. Greene that a child's constitutional challenge to an elementary school's methods of interviewing its students became moot after "the child [grew]

---

[3] Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 577 U.S. 153, 161 (2016) (quoting Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 569 U.S. 66, 72 (2013)). See also Calderon v. Moore, 518 U.S. 149, 150 (1996) (per curiam) ("[M]ootness can arise at any stage of litigation.").

[4] Knox v. Serv. Emps. Int'l Union, Local 1000, 567 U.S. 298, 307 (2012) (quoting City of Erie, 529 U.S. at 287) (internal quotation marks omitted). See also, e.g., Mission Prod. Holdings, Inc. v. Tempnology, LLC, 139 S. Ct. 1652, 1660 (2019) (same); Campbell-Ewald, 577 U.S. at 161 (same); Decker, 568 U.S. at 609 (same); Chafin, 568 U.S. at 172 (same).

[5] Cty. of Los Angeles, 440 U.S. at 631. See also, e.g., City of Erie, 529 U.S. at 287 (holding that a case becomes moot "when the challenged conduct ceases such that 'there is no reasonable expectation that the wrong will be repeated'") (quoting United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633 (1953)).

[6] See Chafin, 568 U.S. at 177 ("Such relief would of course not be fully satisfactory, but with respect to the case as a whole, even the availability of a partial remedy is sufficient to prevent a case from being moot.") (quoting Calderon, 518 U.S. at 150) (brackets and internal quotation marks omitted); Church of Scientology of Cal. v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12–13 (1992) ("While a court may not be able to return the parties to the status quo ante . . . a court can fashion some form of meaningful relief in circumstances such as these . . . The availability of this possible remedy is sufficient to prevent this case from being moot.").

[7] Church of Scientology, 506 U.S. at 12–13. See also, e.g., Chafin, 568 U.S. at 177 ("[E]ven the availability of a partial remedy is sufficient to prevent a case from being moot.") (quoting Calderon, 518 U.S. at 150) (brackets and internal quotation marks omitted).

[8] Mission Prod. Holdings, 139 S. Ct. at 1660.

[9] See Chafin, 568 U.S. at 175 ("Enforcement of the order may be uncertain if Ms. Chafin chooses to defy it, but such uncertainty does not typically render cases moot. Courts often adjudicate disputes where the practical impact of any decision is not assured.").

[10] See 531 U.S. 278, 281–84 (2001).

[11] Lewis v. Cont'l Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 474 (1990) ("We conclude that the case has been rendered moot by 1987 amendments to the Bank Holding Company Act.").

up and moved across the country" and thus would "never again be subject to the . . . in-school interviewing practices whose constitutionality [wa]s at issue."[12]

The Court's 1974 opinion in DeFunis v. Odegaard illustrates how the aforementioned legal principles apply in practice.[13] The petitioner in DeFunis applied for admission at a public law school.[14] After the school rejected his application, the petitioner filed suit, "contending that the procedures and criteria employed by the Law School Admissions Committee invidiously discriminated against him on account of his race."[15] The trial court agreed and ordered the law school to admit the petitioner.[16] The petitioner accordingly started taking classes at the law school while the case was on appeal.[17] By the time the case reached the Supreme Court, the petitioner had almost completed his law degree,[18] such that the petitioner stood to "receive his diploma regardless of any decision th[e] Court might reach on the merits of [h]is case."[19] Because the petitioner would "complete his law school studies at the end of the term . . . regardless of any decision th[e] Court might reach on the merits," the Court concluded that the case was moot.[20]

Because federal courts lack jurisdiction to adjudicate moot cases, a federal court can—and indeed must—dismiss a moot case even if none of the parties ask the court to do so.[21] Moreover, because mootness deprives the courts of jurisdiction to hear a case, the Supreme Court has stated that litigants have "a 'continuing duty to inform the Court'" of intervening events that could potentially render a case moot.[22] "The usual rule in federal cases is that an actual controversy must exist at stages of appellate or certiorari review, and not simply at the date the action is initiated."[23] As a result, a party may raise a mootness challenge at any time during the litigation, including for the first time on appeal.[24] "[A]n appeal should therefore be dismissed as moot when, by virtue of an intervening event, a court of appeals cannot grant 'any

[12] 563 U.S. 692, 698 (2011).

[13] 416 U.S. 312 (1974) (per curiam).

[14] Id. at 314.

[15] Id. See also Amdt14.S1.8.4.1 Early Doctrine on Appropriate Scrutiny and Amdt14.S1.8.4.2 Modern Doctrine on Appropriate Scrutiny (discussing constitutional challenges to educational admissions practices that allegedly discriminate on the basis of race).

[16] Id. at 314–15.

[17] Id. at 315.

[18] See id.

[19] Id. at 317.

[20] Id. at 319–20.

[21] See, e.g., United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 933–34 (2011) (per curiam) (deeming case moot even though "[n]o party had raised any issue of mootness in the [court below], and the Court of Appeals did not address the issue sua sponte"); St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Barry, 438 U.S. 531, 537 (1978) ("At the threshold, we confront a question of mootness. Although not raised by the parties, this issue implicates our jurisdiction."); Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1978) ("There is, at the outset, a question of mootness. Although the parties have not addressed this question in their briefs, 'they may not by stipulation invoke the judicial power of the United States in litigation which does not present an actual case or controversy.'") (quoting Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 398 (1975)); North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244, 246 (1971) (per curiam) ("Although neither party has urged that this case is moot, resolution of the question is essential if federal courts are to function within their constitutional sphere of authority.").

[22] Bd. of License Comm'rs of Town of Tiverton v. Pastore, 469 U.S. 238, 240 (1985) (per curiam) (quoting Fusari v. Steinberg, 419 U.S. 379, 391 (1975) (Burger, C.J., concurring)). See also City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 288 (2000) (chastising litigant for its "failure, despite its obligation to the Court, to mention a word about the potential mootness issue in its brief in opposition to the petition for writ of certiorari").

[23] E.g., Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973).

[24] E.g., DBSI/TRI IV Ltd. P'ship v. United States, 465 F.3d 1031, 1038 (9th Cir. 2006) (explaining that mootness is a "jurisdictional issue[ ] that may be raised at any time, even for the first time on appeal"); Cont'l Cas. Co. v. Anderson Excavating & Wrecking Co., 189 F.3d 512, 518 (7th Cir. 1999) ("A case can become moot at any time, and destroy the court's jurisdiction."); Smith v. United States, 921 F.2d 136, 138 (8th Cir. 1990) ("Mootness goes to the very heart of Article III jurisdiction, and any party can raise it at any time.").

effectual relief whatever' in favor of the appellant."[25] "If a party to an appeal suggests that the controversy has, since the rendering of judgment below, become moot, that party bears the burden of coming forward with subsequent events that have produced that alleged result."[26]

The Supreme Court has developed several doctrines that govern how courts should dispose of cases that become moot during the pendency of an appeal.[27] When reviewing a lower court's judgment, an appellate court has several potential options for resolving the case: it may affirm—that is, approve—the judgment;[28] it may reverse—that is, overturn—the judgment;[29] it may vacate the judgment—that is, nullify the judgment[30] and thereby "strip[ ] the decision below of its binding effect;"[31] or it may remand the case to the lower court for further proceedings.[32] As the Court explained in its 1950 opinion in United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., "[t]he established practice of the Court in dealing with a civil case from a court in the federal system which has become moot" on appeal or before the Court has issued its "decision on the merits is to reverse or vacate the judgment below and remand with a direction to dismiss."[33] Disposing of a moot case in this manner thereby "clears the path for future relitigation of the issues between the parties and eliminates a judgment, review of which was prevented through happenstance."[34] Put another way, the Munsingwear procedure for disposing of cases that become moot on appeal "prevent[s] a judgment, unreviewable because of mootness, from spawning any legal consequences," and thereby ensures that the federal appellate courts, rather than individual litigants, have the last word on the answers to legal questions.[35]

The Supreme Court has noted, however, "the decision whether to vacate" a moot case pursuant to Munsingwear "turns on 'the conditions and circumstances of the particular case.'"[36] To that end, the Supreme Court has crafted several exceptions to the Munsingwear

---

[25] Calderon v. Moore, 518 U.S. 149, 150 (1996) (per curiam) (quoting Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651, 653 (1895)). See also, e.g., Church of Scientology of Cal. v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992) ("[I]f an event occurs while a case is pending on appeal that makes it impossible for the court to grant 'any effectual relief whatever' to a prevailing party, the appeal must be dismissed.") (quoting Mills, 159 U.S. at 653).

[26] Cardinal Chem. Co. v. Morton Int'l, Inc., 508 U.S. 83, 98 (1993).

[27] See, e.g., Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. All. Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 314 (1999) ("Generally, an appeal from the grant of a preliminary injunction becomes moot when the trial court enters a permanent injunction, because the former merges into the latter. We have dismissed appeals in such circumstances.").

[28] Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014).

[29] Id.

[30] Id.

[31] Deakins v. Monaghan, 484 U.S. 193, 200 (1988).

[32] Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014).

[33] United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36, 39 (1950). See also, e.g., Azar v. Garza, 138 S. Ct. 1790, 1793 (2018) (per curiam) (vacating and remanding a moot case for dismissal in the manner contemplated by Munsingwear); United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. 1532, 1542 (2018) (same); United States v. Microsoft Corp., 138 S. Ct. 1186, 1188 (2018) (per curiam) (same); Camreta v. Greene, 563 U.S. 692, 712–14 (2011) (same); Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 80 (1997) (same); Frank v. Minn. Newspaper Ass'n, Inc., 490 U.S. 225, 227 (1989) (per curiam) (same); Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361, 363 (1987) (same); Iron Arrow Honor Soc'y v. Heckler, 464 U.S. 67, 73 (1983) (per curiam) (same); Great W. Sugar Co. v. Nelson, 442 U.S. 92, 92–94 & n.* (1979) (per curiam) (same); Cty. of Los Angeles v. Davis, 440 U.S. 625, 634 (1979) (same); Weinstein v. Bradford, 423 U.S. 147, 148–49 (1975) (per curiam) (same); Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 403–04 (1975) (same); Bd. of Sch. Comm'rs of City of Indianapolis v. Jacobs, 420 U.S. 128, 130 (1975) (per curiam) (same). See also, e.g., Alvarez v. Smith, 558 U.S. 87, 94–97 (2009) (analyzing the Munsingwear rule); U.S. Bancorp Mortg. Co. v. Bonner Mall P'ship, 513 U.S. 18, 22 (1994) (describing Munsingwear as "[t]he leading case on vacatur"); Great W. Sugar Co. v. Nelson, 442 U.S. 92, 93 n.* (1979) (per curiam) ("United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., is perhaps the leading case on the proper disposition of cases that become moot on appeal.").

[34] Munsingwear, 340 U.S. at 40.

[35] See id. at 41.

[36] Azar, 138 S. Ct. at 1792 (quoting United States v. Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt-Actien Gesellschaft, 239 U.S. 466, 478 (1916)).

rule.[37] For one, the Supreme Court has specified that "vacatur is in order" under Munsingwear only when mootness occurs through "happenstance"—that is, "circumstances not attributable to the parties"—or "the 'unilateral action of the party who prevailed in the lower court.'"[38] Thus, if a case becomes moot as a result of the parties' mutual agreement to settle the case, the Court has held that federal courts should generally not vacate the judgment.[39] The Court has justified this exception by explaining that "where mootness results from settlement . . . the losing party has voluntarily forfeited his legal remedy by the ordinary processes of appeal or certiorari, thereby surrendering his claim to the . . . remedy of vacatur."[40] Such cases are therefore "not unreviewable, but simply unreviewed" as a result of the losing party's "own choice."[41] Likewise, the Court has ruled that it is inappropriate to "clear[ ] the path for future relitigation of the issues between the parties"[42] when the plaintiff renders the case moot by voluntarily agreeing to permanently withdraw its claims against the defendant.[43] In such instances, rather than wiping the slate clean in the manner contemplated by Munsingwear, the Court has ordered that the case be dismissed with prejudice to refiling so that "it cannot be resumed in this or any subsequent action."[44] Dismissing the case with prejudice thereby "prevent[s] the regeneration of the controversy" if the plaintiff later changes its mind and attempts to relitigate the dismissed claims in federal court.[45]

Nor does the Court follow its usual practice of vacating the judgment with directions to dismiss when a case has become moot due to an intervening change in the governing law.[46] Instead, the Court ordinarily "remand[s] for further proceedings in which the parties may, if necessary, amend their pleadings or develop the record more fully" to respond to the intervening change in law.[47] For instance, in Diffenderfer v. Central Baptist Church of Miami, [37] See, e.g., Camreta, 563 U.S. at 712 (explaining that, although the Munsingwear rule provides the "established" practice for resolving a civil case that "becomes moot pending appeal," the Munsingwear doctrine is "not exceptionless").

[38] Arizonans for Official English, 520 U.S. at 71–72 (quoting U.S. Bancorp, 513 U.S. at 23). See also Azar, 138 S. Ct. at 1792 ("One clear example where vacatur is in order is when mootness occurs through the unilateral action of the party who prevailed in the lower court.") (brackets and internal citations quotation marks omitted); Karcher v. May, 484 U.S. 72, 83 (1987) ("Th[e] controversy did not become moot due to circumstances unattributable to any of the parties. The controversy ended when the losing party . . . declined to pursue its appeal. Accordingly, the Munsingwear procedure is inapplicable to this case.").

[39] U.S. Bancorp, 513 U.S. at 29. See also, e.g., Alvarez v. Smith, 558 U.S. 87, 94–97 (2009) (analyzing the interplay between Munsingwear and U.S. Bancorp).

[40] U.S. Bancorp, 513 U.S. at 25.

[41] Id.

[42] See Munsingwear, 340 U.S. at 40.

[43] See Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 513 (1989); Deakins v. Monaghan, 484 U.S. 193, 199–200 (1988).

[44] Deakins, 484 U.S. at 200 n.4. See also Webster, 492 U.S. at 513 ("Because this dispute was rendered moot in part by appellees' willingness permanently to withdraw their equitable claims from their federal action, a dismissal with prejudice is indicated.") (quoting Deakins, 484 U.S. at 200) (brackets omitted).

[45] Deakins, 484 U.S. at 200.

[46] E.g., Lewis v. Cont'l Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 482 (1990) ("Our ordinary practice in disposing of a case that has become moot on appeal is to vacate the judgment with directions to dismiss. However, in instances where the mootness is attributable to a change in the legal framework governing the case, and where the plaintiff may have some residual claim under the new framework that was understandably not asserted previously, our practice is to vacate the judgment and remand for further proceedings in which the parties may, if necessary, amend their pleadings or develop the record more fully.") (internal citations omitted).

[47] Id. See also U.S. Dep't of Treasury, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms v. Galioto, 477 U.S. 556, 559–60 (1986) (remanding case for further proceedings following amendment of statutory provision at issue); Crowell v. Mader, 444 U.S. 505, 505–06 (1980) ("Appellees may still wish to attack the newly enacted legislation . . . [W]e direct that the judgment of the District Court be vacated without prejudice to such further proceedings in the District Court as may be appropriate.").

Florida, Inc., the plaintiff challenged a Florida statute as unconstitutional.[48] While the litigation was pending, however, the Florida legislature repealed the challenged statute and enacted a new statute in its place.[49] "[R]ather than remanding the case to the District Court for dismissal" in the manner contemplated by Munsingwear, the Supreme Court "remand[ed] the case to the District Court with leave to the appellants to amend their pleadings."[50] Resolving the case in this way thereby afforded the appellants an opportunity "to demonstrate that the repealed statute retain[ed] some continuing force or to attack the newly enacted legislation."[51]

Finally, "[t]he Court's treatment of cases that become moot on review from the lower federal courts" differs from its treatment of moot cases arising from state courts.[52] The Court's "regular practice in the latter situation has been to dismiss the case and leave the judgment of the state court undisturbed," rather than to vacate the judgment in the manner contemplated by Munsingwear.[53] According to the Court, allowing state court judgments in moot cases to stand "evinces a proper recognition that in the absence of any live case or controversy, [the Court] lack[s] jurisdiction and thus also the power to disturb the state court's judgment."[54]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.5 Exceptions to Mootness Generally

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Significantly, the Court has recognized several exceptions to the general mootness principles discussed above. These exceptions are known as the "voluntary cessation" doctrine[1] and the "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception.[2] The Court has also developed special mootness principles that govern criminal cases[3] and class action cases.[4]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.6 Voluntary Cessation Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and

---

[48] 404 U.S. 412, 412–14 (1972) (per curiam).

[49] Id. at 414.

[50] Id. at 415.

[51] Id.

[52] ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 621 n.1 (1989).

[53] Id. (citing Kan. Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Corp. Comm'n of Kan., 481 U.S. 1044 (1987); Times-Picayune Publ'g Corp. v. Schulingkamp, 420 U.S. 985 (1975)).

[54] Id.

[1] See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.6 Voluntary Cessation Doctrine.

[2] See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.7 Capable of Repetition, Yet Evading Review.

[3] See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.8 Criminal Cases and Mootness.

[4] See ArtIII.S2.C1.8.9 Class Action Litigation and Mootness.

Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

First, the Supreme Court has held that a party's voluntary cessation of an unlawful practice will usually not moot its opponent's challenge to that practice.[1] Thus, "a defendant cannot automatically moot a case by simply ending its unlawful conduct once sued."[2] This exception to the mootness doctrine exists because if a litigant could defeat a lawsuit simply by temporarily ceasing its unlawful activities, there would be nothing to stop that litigant from engaging in that unlawful behavior again after the court dismissed the case[3]; the litigant would effectively "be free to return to [its] old ways."[4]

The 1982 case of City of Mesquite v. Aladdin's Castle, Inc. illustrates how this "voluntary cessation" doctrine applies in practice.[5] The plaintiff in City of Mesquite challenged the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance.[6] While the case was pending, however, the city repealed the offending provisions of the ordinance.[7] The Court, explaining that "a defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice," concluded that the city's revision of the ordinance did not render the plaintiff's challenge moot.[8] Because "the city's repeal of the objectionable language" in the ordinance "would not preclude it from reenacting precisely the same provision" if the case were dismissed on mootness grounds, the Court concluded that it needed to "confront the merits of the" plaintiff's constitutional challenge.[9]

---

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. 1532, 1537 n.* (2018); Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, 137 S. Ct. 2012, 2019 n.1 (2017); Knox v. Serv. Emps. Int'l Union, Local 1000, 567 U.S. 298, 307 (2012); Buckhannon Bd. & Care Home, Inc. v. W. Va. Dep't of Health & Human Res., 532 U.S. 598, 609 (2001); City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 287–89 (2000); Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189 (2000); Ne. Fla. Chapter of Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. City of Jacksonville, Fla., 508 U.S. 656, 662 (1993); Chi. Teachers Union, Local No. 1, AFT, AFL-CIO v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 305 n.14 (1986); United States v. Generix Drug Corp., 460 U.S. 453, 456 n.6 (1983); City of Mesquite v. Aladdin's Castle, Inc., 455 U.S. 283, 289 (1982); Cty. of Los Angeles v. Davis, 440 U.S. 625, 631 (1979); Allee v. Medrano, 416 U.S. 802, 810 (1974).

[2] Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc., 568 U.S. 85, 91 (2013).

[3] See id. (explaining that, in the absence of the voluntary cessation doctrine, "a defendant could engage in unlawful conduct, stop when sued to have the case declared moot, then pick up where he left off, repeating this cycle until he achieves all his unlawful ends"); Knox, 567 U.S. at 307 ("[A] dismissal for mootness would permit a resumption of the challenged conduct as soon as the case is dismissed."); City News & Novelty, Inc. v. City of Waukesha, 531 U.S. 278, 284 n.1 (2001) ("[A] party should not be able to evade judicial review, or to defeat a judgment, by temporarily altering questionable behavior."); City of Mesquite, 455 U.S. at 289 ("In this case the city's repeal of the objectionable language would not preclude it from reenacting precisely the same provision if the District Court's judgment were vacated."); United States v. Trans-Mo. Freight Ass'n, 166 U.S. 290, 309 (1897) ("If the mere dissolution of the association worked an abatement of the suit as to all the defendants . . . it is plain that they have thus discovered an effectual means to prevent the judgment of this court being given upon the question really involved in the case. The defendants having succeeded in the court below, it would only be necessary thereafter to dissolve their association and instantly form another of a similar kind, and the fact of the dissolution would prevent an appeal to this court or procure its dismissal if taken. This result does not and ought not to follow.").

[4] Allee, 416 U.S. at 811 (quoting Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 376 (1963)). See also, e.g., Friends of the Earth, 528 U.S. at 189 (same).

[5] 455 U.S. 283.

[6] Id. at 284–86.

[7] Id. at 288.

[8] Id. at 288–89.

[9] Id. at 289. The Court subsequently elaborated that "City of Mesquite does not stand for the proposition that it is only the possibility that the selfsame statute will be enacted that prevents a case from being moot; if that were the rule, a defendant could moot a case by repealing the challenged statute and replacing it with one that differs only in some insignificant respect." Ne. Fla. Chapter of Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. City of Jacksonville, Fla., 508 U.S. 656,

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.6
Voluntary Cessation Doctrine

The DeFunis v. Odegaard case discussed above, by contrast, exemplifies when the voluntary cessation doctrine will not save a case from dismissal.[10] To reiterate, the petitioner in DeFunis claimed that certain law school admissions practices and criteria discriminated against him on the basis of race.[11] While the case was pending, however, the petitioner began taking classes at the law school, and had almost completed his law degree by the time the case reached the Supreme Court.[12] The Court rejected the petitioner's argument that the voluntary cessation doctrine rendered the case justiciable because the case's mootness had "partially stem[med] from a policy decision on the part of the respondent Law School authorities" to allow the petitioner to complete his law school studies and receive his diploma.[13] The Court emphasized that the respondents had not voluntarily ceased the allegedly discriminatory admissions practices that the petitioner challenged as unconstitutional; instead, the case became moot because the petitioner was just a few credits shy of completing his degree.[14] In other words, the case was moot not because the school stopped engaging in allegedly unlawful activity, but rather because the petitioner would "receive his diploma regardless of any decision th[e] Court might reach on the merits of th[e] case."[15]

The Court has clarified several other aspects of the voluntary cessation doctrine. For one, if it is "absolutely clear" that the allegedly wrongful behavior will not recur after the court dismisses the case, then a case can become moot notwithstanding a party's voluntary cessation of that unlawful behavior.[16] "The 'heavy burden of persua[ding]' the court that the challenged conduct cannot reasonably be expected to start up again lies with the party asserting mootness."[17] To illustrate, in Preiser v. Newkirk, a prisoner claimed that prison officials had unlawfully transferred him from a medium security institution to a more restrictive maximum security institution, and asked the court to order his return to the medium security prison.[18] While the case was pending, however, officials transferred the prisoner back to the medium security institution, and then subsequently transferred him to an even less restrictive minimum security institution.[19] According to the Court, these subsequent developments made it "clear that correction authorities harbor[ed] no animosity toward" the plaintiff, such that there was "no reasonable expectation that the wrong" challenged by the prisoner would "be 662 (1993). But see Princeton Univ. v. Schmid, 455 U.S. 100, 103 (1982) (per curiam) (deeming case moot, without explicitly mentioning the voluntary cessation doctrine, where intervening party "substantially amended its regulations" "while the case was pending on appeal").

[10] See 416 U.S. 312, 318 (1974) (per curiam).

[11] Id. at 314–15.

[12] Id. at 315–17.

[13] Id. at 317.

[14] See id. at 318.

[15] Id. at 317.

[16] Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, 137 S. Ct. 2012, 2019 n.1 (2017) (quoting Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189 (2000)). See also, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Slater, 528 U.S. 216, 222 (2000) (per curiam) ("Voluntary cessation of challenged conduct moots a case, however, only if it is 'absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur.'") (quoting United States v. Concentrated Phosphate Export Ass'n, 393 U.S. 199, 203 (1968)).

[17] Friends of the Earth, 528 U.S. at 189 (quoting Concentrated Phosphate Export Ass'n, 393 U.S. at 203). See also, e.g., Trinity Lutheran Church, 137 S. Ct. at 2019 n.1; Adarand Constructors, 528 U.S. at 222. See also Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc., 568 U.S. 85, 91 (2013) (explaining that a party's burden to avoid the voluntary cessation doctrine is "formidable").

[18] 422 U.S. 395, 396–98 (1975).

[19] Id. at 401.

repeated.'"[20] The Court therefore deemed the case nonjusticiable even though the prison officials themselves had rendered the case moot by transferring the prisoner to a less restrictive institution.[21]

Additionally, the voluntary cessation doctrine typically applies only when a party to the case voluntarily discontinues an allegedly unlawful action. If, instead, a case becomes moot because "of the voluntary acts of a third party non-defendant," the voluntary cessation doctrine will usually not save that case from dismissal.[22] For instance, in Iron Arrow Honor Society v. Heckler, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (Secretary) promulgated a regulation barring recipients of federal funding from "providing significant assistance to any . . . organization . . . which discriminates on the basis of sex."[23] The petitioner, an all-male honorary organization at a public university, commenced a lawsuit seeking to prevent the Secretary from interpreting that regulation in a manner that would require the university to ban the organization from conducting activities on campus so long as it continued to exclude women.[24] While the lawsuit was pending, however, the university determined that no matter whether the Secretary's regulation required the university to ban the organization, the university's own non-discrimination code independently barred the organization from operating on campus until it discontinued its male-only membership policy.[25] Because no judicial ruling with respect to the Secretary's interpretation of the regulation would have any effect on the university's independent decision to ban the organization pursuant to its own non-discrimination policy, the Court concluded that "the dispute as to how the [r]egulation should be interpreted" was "classically 'moot.'"[26] The Court concluded that the voluntary cessation doctrine did not save the case from dismissal, as it was "the voluntary acts of a third party non-defendant"—namely, the university—that rendered the case moot, rather than the voluntary acts of the Secretary herself.[27]

Similarly, the voluntary cessation doctrine will not save a case from dismissal when it is the losing party, rather than the prevailing party, whose voluntary actions render the case moot during the pendency of an appeal.[28] Thus, in City News & Novelty, Inc. v. City of Waukesha, a retailer of sexually explicit materials challenged a municipality's decision to deny its adult business license.[29] After the lower courts ruled against the retailer, the retailer asked the Supreme Court to review the judgment in the municipality's favor.[30] While the appeal was pending, however, the retailer opted to close its business.[31] The Court determined that the retailer's decision to cease operations had rendered the case moot because the retailer no

[20] Id. at 402 (quoting Concentrated Phosphate Export Ass'n, 393 U.S. at 203); United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633 (1953)).

[21] Id. ("We have before us more than a mere voluntary cessation of allegedly illegal conduct, where we would leave the defendant free to return to his old ways.") (ellipses, brackets, and internal quotation marks omitted).

[22] Iron Arrow Honor Soc'y v. Heckler, 464 U.S. 67, 72 (1983) (per curiam) (emphasis added). See also Deakins v. Monaghan, 484 U.S. 193, 200 n.4 (1988) ("The Court's ability to prevent respondents from renewing their claims after they are dismissed as moot distinguishes this case from one in which a defendant attempts to avoid appellate review by voluntarily ceasing the challenged conduct without losing the ability to reinitiate the conduct once the mooted case is dismissed.").

[23] Iron Arrow, 464 U.S. at 68 (quoting 45 C.F.R. § 86.31(b)(7) (1975)) (emphasis omitted).

[24] Id. at 69.

[25] Id. at 69–70.

[26] Id. at 70–71.

[27] Id. at 72.

[28] City News & Novelty, Inc. v. City of Waukesha, 531 U.S. 278, 284 (2001).

[29] Id. at 281–82.

[30] Id. at 282.

[31] Id. at 282–83.

longer had any cognizable interest in the outcome of the case.[32] Even though the circumstance rendering the case moot was the retailer's voluntary decision to close its business, the Court nonetheless concluded that the voluntary cessation doctrine did not render the case justiciable.[33] The Court emphasized that because the lower courts had ruled against the retailer, the retailer "left the fray as a loser, not a winner."[34] The Court reasoned that the retailer's voluntary cessation of its business therefore did "not keep [its opponent] under the weight of an adverse judgment" or "reward an arguable manipulation of [the Court's] jurisdiction."[35]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.7 Capable of Repetition, Yet Evading Review

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has generally declined to deem cases moot that present issues or disputes that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review."[1] This exception to the mootness doctrine applies "only in exceptional situations"[2] in which (1) "the challenged action is in its duration too short to be fully litigated prior to cessation or expiration;" and (2) "there is a reasonable expectation that the same complaining party will be subject to the same action

[32] Id. at 283–85.

[33] Id. at 283–84.

[34] Id. at 284.

[35] Id.

[1] See, e.g., Kingdomware Techs., Inc. v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1969, 1976 (2016); Turner v. Rogers, 564 U.S. 431, 439–41 (2011); Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 735–36 (2008); FEC v. Wis. Right to Life, Inc., 551 U.S. 449, 462 (2007); Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 287–88 (1992); Int'l Org. of Masters, Mates & Pilots v. Brown, 498 U.S. 466, 473 (1991); Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414, 417 n.2 (1988); Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 317–23 (1988); Burlington N. R.R. v. Bhd. of Maint. of Way Emps., 481 U.S. 429, 436 n.4 (1987); Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., 481 U.S. 252, 257–58 (1987); Cal. Coastal Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 577–78 (1987); Press-Enter. Co. v. Super. Ct. of Cal. for Cty. of Riverside, 478 U.S. 1, 6 (1986); Globe Newspaper Co. v. Super. Ct. for Cty. of Norfolk, 457 U.S. 596, 603 (1982); Democratic Party of U.S. v. Wisconsin ex rel. La Follette, 450 U.S. 107, 115 n.13 (1981); Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 377 (1979); Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 526 n.5 (1979); First Nat'l Bank of Bos. v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 774 (1978); United States v. N.Y. Tel. Co., 434 U.S. 159, 165 n.6 (1977); Neb. Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 546–47 (1976); Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 110 n.11 (1975); Super Tire Eng'g Co. v. McCorkle, 416 U.S. 115, 125–27 (1974); Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 737 n.8 (1974); Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 333 n.2 (1972); S. Pac. Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U.S. 498, 514–16 (1911). But see, e.g., United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. 1532, 1540–42 (2018) (rejecting litigants' argument that defendants' allegedly unlawful practice was capable of repetition yet evading review); Alvarez v. Smith, 558 U.S. 87, 93–94 (2009) (same); Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1998) (same); Lewis v. Cont'l Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 481–82 (1990) (same); Lane v. Williams, 455 U.S. 624, 633–34 (1982) (same); Ill. State Bd. of Elections v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173, 187 (1979) (same); Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119, 133 (1977) (same); Weinstein v. Bradford, 423 U.S. 147, 148–49 (1975) (per curiam) (same); Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 403 (1975) (same); Diffenderfer v. Cent. Baptist Church of Miami, Fla., Inc., 404 U.S. 412, 414 (1972) (per curiam) (same).

[2] Kingdomware Techs., 136 S. Ct. at 1976 (quoting Spencer, 523 U.S. at 17).

again."[3] According to the Court, if this exception to mootness did not exist, then certain types of time-sensitive controversies would become effectively unreviewable by the courts.[4]

The classic example of a dispute that is "capable of repetition, yet evading review" is a pregnant woman's constitutional challenge to an abortion regulation.[5] Once a woman gives birth, abortion is no longer an option for terminating that particular pregnancy. However, litigation of national political significance can rarely be fully resolved in a mere nine months; "the normal 266-day human gestation period is so short that [a] pregnancy will come to term before" the parties and the court could realistically litigate a constitutional challenge to an abortion statute to its conclusion.[6] Thus, if a challenge to an abortion regulation became moot as soon as the challenger gave birth, "pregnancy litigation seldom w[ould] survive much beyond the trial stage, and appellate review w[ould] be effectively denied."[7] Because the Supreme Court has decided that "[o]ur law should not be that rigid," the Court ruled in its 1973 opinion in Roe v. Wade that "[p]regnancy provides a classic justification for a conclusion of nonmootness."[8] The Roe Court reasoned that, because "[p]regnancy often comes more than once to the same woman, and . . . if man is to survive, it will always be with us," challenges to the constitutionality of abortion statutes usually will not become moot at the conclusion of an individual challenger's pregnancy.[9]

The Court has deemed certain controversies "capable of repetition, yet evading review" outside the abortion context as well.[10] For example, in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., an advocacy organization claimed that restrictions on "electioneering communications" established by the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 unconstitutionally prohibited the organization from broadcasting certain political advertisements shortly before the 2004 election.[11] Even though the case did not reach the Supreme Court until long after the 2004 election had passed, the Court nonetheless concluded that the case was not moot.[12] The Court reasoned that the organization "credibly claimed that it planned on running 'materially similar' future targeted broadcast ads" in advance of future

---

[3] United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 938 (2011) (per curiam) (quoting Spencer, 523 U.S. at 17). See also, e.g., Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. at 1540 (same); Kingdomware Techs., 136 S. Ct. at 1976 (same); Turner, 564 U.S. at 439–40 (quoting Weinstein, 423 U.S. at 149) (same); Wis. Right to Life, 551 U.S. at 462 (same); Lewis, 494 U.S. at 482 (same); Meyer, 486 U.S. at 417 n.2 (quoting Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S. 478, 482 (1982)) (per curiam) (same); Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429, 434 n.5 (1980) (same); Gannett, 443 U.S. at 377 (same); Ill. State Bd. of Elections, 440 U.S. at 187 (same); SEC v. Sloan, 436 U.S. 103, 109 (1978) (same); Bellotti, 435 U.S. at 774 (same). The Court has explained, however, that the "capable of repetition yet evading review" doctrine "will not revive a dispute which became moot before the action commenced." Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 320 (1991).

[4] See, e.g., Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 400 (1975) ("[T]he case before us is one in which state officials will undoubtedly continue to enforce the challenged statute and yet, because of the passage of time, no single challenger will remain subject to its restrictions for the period necessary to see such a lawsuit to its conclusion.").

[5] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973) (quoting S. Pac. Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U.S. 498, 515 (1911)).

See generally Amdt14.S1.6.4.1 Abortion, Roe v. Wade, and Pre-Dobbs Doctrine (analyzing Supreme Court jurisprudence regarding abortion).But see Azar v. Garza, 138 S. Ct. 1790, 1791–93 (2018) (dismissing abortion case as moot without applying, analyzing, or mentioning the "capable of repetition yet evading review" doctrine).

[6] See Roe, 410 U.S. at 125.

[7] See id.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. (quoting S. Pac. Terminal Co., 219 U.S. at 515). See also Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 117 (1976) ("A woman who is no longer pregnant may nonetheless retain the right to litigate the point because it is 'capable of repetition yet evading review.'") (quoting Roe, 410 U.S. at 124–25).

[10] See supra note 1.

[11] FEC v. Wis. Right to Life, Inc., 551 U.S. 449, 457–60 (2007).

[12] Id. at 462–64.

elections,[13] and the period between elections was too short to allow the organization sufficient time to fully litigate its constitutional challenges sufficiently in advance of the election date.[14]

By contrast, the Court determined that the constitutional challenge in the DeFunis case mentioned above was not "capable of repetition, yet evading review."[15] To reiterate, the petitioner in DeFunis claimed that certain law school admissions practices and criteria unconstitutionally discriminated against him on the basis of race.[16] While the case was pending, however, the petitioner began taking classes at the law school, and was just about to receive his diploma.[17] Unlike the challenger to the abortion statute in Roe, who could very well have become pregnant again in the future,[18] the petitioner in DeFunis would "never again be required to run the gantlet of the Law School's admissions process" once he received his juris doctorate.[19] The DeFunis Court therefore concluded that the petitioner's constitutional challenges were "not 'capable of repetition' so far as [the petitioner was] concerned."[20] The Court further opined that challenges raised by other disappointed applicants would not evade future review either, as the Court had "no reason to suppose that a subsequent case attacking [the law school's admission] procedures w[ould] not come with relative speed to th[e] Court."[21]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.8 Criminal Cases and Mootness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has also articulated special mootness principles that apply in criminal cases.[1] Because criminal sentences are generally limited in duration, courts will sometimes be unable to rule on the merits of a criminal defendant's appeal before that defendant's sentence expires.[2] Thus, the Court has ruled that a criminal defendant who "wish[es] to continue his appeals after the expiration of his sentence must suffer some 'continuing injury' or 'collateral

---

[13] Id. at 463.

[14] See id. at 462–63. See also Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 735–36 (2008) (rejecting mootness challenge in case whose facts "closely resemble[d]" those at issue in Wisconsin Right to Life).

[15] 416 U.S. at 318–19.

[16] Id. at 314–15.

[17] Id. at 315–17.

[18] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973).

[19] 416 U.S. at 319.

[20] Id.

[21] Id.

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 936 (2011) (per curiam); Turner v. Rogers, 564 U.S. 431, 439 (2011); Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 3–16 (1998); Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 371 n.2 (1993); Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 391 n.4 (1985); Lane v. Williams, 455 U.S. 624, 630–34 (1982); Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 108 n.3 (1977) (per curiam); Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 50–58 (1968); Carafas v. LaVallee, 391 U.S. 234, 236–38 (1968).

[2] See, e.g., Sibron, 392 U.S. at 50, 52 ("It is asserted that because Sibron has completed service of the six-month sentence imposed upon him as a result of his conviction, the case has become moot . . . We have concluded that the case is not moot . . . There was no way for Sibron to bring his case here before his six-month sentence expired.").

consequence' sufficient to satisfy Article III."[3] Put another way, if the defendant can point to some "disabilities or burdens (which) . . . flow from" his conviction even after his release from prison, then he retains "a substantial stake in the judgment of conviction which survives the satisfaction of the sentence imposed on him" and therefore presents a justiciable controversy.[4] If, by contrast, the defendant cannot make such a showing, then the expiration of the defendant's criminal sentence will render the defendant's appeal moot.[5] Thus, in Carafas v. LaVallee, the petitioner faced lingering legal "disabilities or burdens" as a result of his conviction even though he had already "been unconditionally released from custody."[6] Specifically, the laws of the state in which the petitioner resided prohibited convicted felons from "engag[ing] in certain businesses," "serv[ing] as an official of a labor union," "vot[ing] in any election held in" his state of residence, and "serv[ing] as a juror."[7] The petitioner therefore retained "a substantial stake" in challenging the validity of his conviction so that he could engage in activities that his criminal record would otherwise prohibit.[8] The Supreme Court thus determined that, "[o]n account of these 'collateral consequences'" of his conviction, the petitioner's case was "not moot."[9] "When the defendant challenges his underlying conviction," the Supreme Court generally "presume[s] the existence of collateral consequences" sufficient to save the defendant's appeal from dismissal on mootness grounds.[10] The Court has justified this presumption on the ground that "most criminal convictions do in fact entail adverse collateral legal consequences."[11] The Court has generally declined to presume, however, that collateral consequences will result from other types of criminal sanctions, such as a revocation of parole.[12]

ArtIII.S2.C1.8.9 Class Action Litigation and Mootness

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

---

[3] Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. at 936. See also, e.g., Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 371 n.2 ("We have often observed . . . that 'the possibility of a criminal defendant's suffering" collateral legal consequences "from a sentence already served' precludes a finding of mootness.") (quoting Mimms, 434 U.S. at 108 n.3).

[4] 391 U.S. at 237 (quoting Fiswick v. United States, 329 U.S. 211, 222 (1946)).

[5] E.g., Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. at 936.

[6] Carafas, 391 U.S. at 236–37.

[7] Id. at 237.

[8] Id. (quoting Fiswick, 329 U.S. at 222).

[9] Id. at 237–38 (quoting Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 633–34 & n.2 (1968)).

[10] Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. at 936. See also, e.g., Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 391 n.4 (1985) (deeming case "not moot" where "some collateral consequences of [the party's] conviction remain[ed]").

[11] Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 55 (1968).

[12] Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 14 (1998) ("declin[ing] to presume that collateral consequences adequate to meet Article III's injury-in-fact requirement" would result from a "petitioner's parole revocation"). See also, e.g., Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. at 936–37 ("[W]hen a defendant challenges only an expired sentence, no such presumption [of non-mootness] applies, and the defendant must bear the burden of identifying some ongoing 'collateral consequence' that is 'traceable' to the challenged portion of the sentence and is 'likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision.'") (quoting Spencer, 523 U.S. at 7) (brackets omitted).

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has also developed special mootness rules that apply in class action cases.[1] In a class action, the plaintiff[2] (known as the "class representative" or the "named plaintiff") represents not only his own interests, but also the interests of other injured persons (the "class members") who are similarly situated to the class representative but are not named as formal parties to the suit.[3] Intervening events may sometimes render the controversy moot as to the named plaintiff but not as to the class members.[4] For example, in the 1979 case of Bell v. Wolfish, several pretrial detainees initiated a class action lawsuit challenging the conditions of confinement at a custodial facility not only on their own behalf, but also on behalf of other detainees as well.[5] However, the named plaintiffs were transferred or released from the facility while the case was pending, and therefore were no longer being subjected to the allegedly unlawful conditions of confinement by the time the Supreme Court took up the case.[6] Although the named plaintiffs no longer had any personal stake in the outcome of the litigation, the class members who remain confined in that facility still potentially had live claims against the defendant.[7] To address cases of this sort, the Court has ruled that a justiciable controversy may potentially exist "between a named defendant and a member of the class represented by the named plaintiff, even though the claim of the named plaintiff has become moot."[8] Put another way, "the termination of a class representative's claim does not" necessarily "moot the claims of the unnamed members of the class."[9] The Court, applying that principle, has occasionally

---

[1] See Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 577 U.S. 153, 161 (2016); Cty. of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 51–52 (1991); U.S. Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 395–409 (1980); Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank, Jackson, Miss. v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 339–40 (1980); Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 526 n.5 (1979); Swisher v. Brady, 438 U.S. 204, 213 n.11 (1978); Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119, 127–36 (1977); Pasadena City Bd. of Educ. v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424, 430 (1976); Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747, 752–57 (1976); Bd. of Sch. Comm'rs of City of Indianapolis v. Jacobs, 420 U.S. 128, 128–30 (1975) (per curiam); Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 110 n.11 (1975); Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 397–403 (1975). The Court has emphasized, however, that the legal principles pertaining to mootness and class actions have little to no application outside the class action context. See United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 138 S. Ct. 1532, 1539 (2018) (explaining that the holdings in the cases listed above are "tied . . . to the class action setting from which [they] emerged"); Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 569 U.S. 66, 73–74 (2013) (holding that, because class "actions are fundamentally different from collective actions under the" Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), "the mere presence of collective-action allegations in [an FLSA] complaint cannot save the suit from mootness once the individual claim is satisfied").

[2] While it is also possible to bring a class action in federal court against a class of defendants, class actions on behalf of classes of plaintiffs are more common. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) ("One or more members of a class may sue or be sued.") (emphasis added).

[3] See, e.g., Gen. Tel. Co. of Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 155–56 (1982) ("The class-action device was designed as 'an exception to the usual rule that litigation is conducted by and on behalf of the individual named parties only' . . . We have repeatedly held that 'a class representative must be part of the class and possess the same interest and suffer the same injury as the class members.'") (quoting Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 700–01 (1979); E. Tex. Motor Freight Sys. Inc. v. Rodriguez, 431 U.S. 395, 403 (1977)). See generally Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

[4] See, e.g., Sosna, 419 U.S. at 401 ("Although the controversy is no longer alive as to appellant Sosna, it remains very much alive for the class of persons she has been certified to represent.").

[5] See Bell, 441 U.S. at 523.

[6] See id. at 526 n.5.

[7] See id.

[8] Sosna, 419 U.S. at 402. See also Nielsen v. Preap, 139 S. Ct. 954, 962–63 (2019) (opinion of Alito, J., for three Justices) (concluding that class action case was not moot where "there was at least one named plaintiff with a live claim when the class was certified").

[9] Bell, 441 U.S. at 526 n.5 (quoting Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 110 n.11 (1975)). See also, e.g., Cty. of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 51 (1991) (same); U.S. Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 404 (1980) (holding that an "appeal of the denial of [a] class certification motion" "does not become moot upon expiration of the named plaintiff's substantive claim"). But see Azar v. Garza, 138 S. Ct. 1790, 1791–93 (2018) (per curiam) (dismissing a putative class action as moot without applying, analyzing, or mentioning this principle); Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119, 132 (1977)

resisted efforts by defendants to moot a class action case by offering to pay the class representative's entire individual claim over the class representative's objection.[10] According to the Court, allowing a class action case to become moot "simply because the defendant has sought to 'buy off' the individual private claims of the named plaintiffs" would "frustrate the objectives of class actions" because it would "requir[e] multiple plaintiffs to bring separate actions, which effectively could be 'picked off' by a defendant's tender of judgment."[11] The Court has explicitly declined to decide, however, whether other methods of mooting a class action could be permissible, such as by "deposit[ing] the full amount of the plaintiff's individual claim in an account payable to the plaintiff" and then successfully convincing the court to "enter[ ] judgment for the plaintiff in that amount."[12] The lower courts have therefore "split on whether actual payment of full relief moots an individual's claim."[13] "The Supreme Court has not yet resolved the split, and commentators disagree on how the Court will ultimately decide the unresolved . . . question."[14]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9 Political Questions

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The political question doctrine limits the ability of the federal courts to hear constitutional questions even where other justiciability requirements, such as standing, ripeness, and mootness, would otherwise be met.[1] The Supreme Court has stated that, for purposes of Article III of the Constitution,[2] "no justiciable 'controversy' exists when parties seek adjudication of a political question."[3] But the term "political question" is a legal term of art that on its face gives little indication of what sorts of cases the doctrine bars federal courts from deciding. The (holding that a class action may be unable to proceed where an intervening event moots "not only the claims of the named plaintiffs but also the claims of a large number of unnamed plaintiffs").

[10] See Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 577 U.S. 153, 156 (2016) (holding that "an unaccepted offer to satisfy the named plaintiff's individual claim" does not "render a case moot when the complaint seeks relief on behalf of the plaintiff and a class of persons similarly situated"); Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank, Jackson, Miss. v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 339 (1980) ("To deny the right to appeal simply because the defendant has sought to 'buy off' the individual private claims of the named plaintiffs would be contrary to sound judicial administration.").

[11] Roper, 445 U.S. at 339.

[12] Campbell-Ewald, 577 U.S. at 166 ("That question is appropriately reserved for a case in which it is not hypothetical.").

[13] Kuntze v. Josh Enters., Inc., 365 F. Supp. 3d 630, 640 (E.D. Va. 2019) (citing numerous cases).

[14] Id. at 641 (citing scholarly articles and treatises).

[1] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 198–99 (1962) (discussing difference between jurisdiction and "appropriateness of the subject matter for judicial consideration," known as "justiciability").

[2] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2.

[3] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 516 (2007). See also DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 352 (2005) ("The doctrines of mootness, ripeness, and political question all originate in Article III's 'case' or 'controversy' language, no less than standing does."); Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 215 (1974) ("[T]he presence of a political question suffices to prevent the power of the federal judiciary from being invoked by the complaining party.").

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1
Overview of Political Question Doctrine phrase, which has its origins in Chief Justice John Marshall's landmark opinion in Marbury v. Madison,[4] is potentially misleading, as federal courts deal with political issues, in the sense of controversial and government-related issues, all the time.[5] Rather than referring generally to any such political issue, the term "political question" expresses the principle that some issues are either entrusted solely to another branch of government or are beyond the competence of the Judiciary to review. Finding that a matter qualifies as a political question divests federal courts of jurisdiction, meaning they lack the power to rule on the matter.[6]

The Supreme Court identified six factors relevant to the political question doctrine in the 1962 case Baker v. Carr:

> Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found [1] a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or [2] a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or [3] the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or [4] the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or [5] an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or [6] the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.[7]

The variation among the criteria emphasizes the diverse purposes that the doctrine is said to serve, embodying both separation of powers principles[8] and prudential concerns such as the competency of courts.[9] These six criteria appear in recent Supreme Court opinions applying the political question doctrine.[10] However, Justices of the Supreme Court have recognized confusion around the political question doctrine, both when Baker was decided and [4] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 165–66 (1803) ("By the constitution of the United States, the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. . . . He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts.").

[5] See, e.g., Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 2.6.1 (6th ed. 2012). Cf. Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536, 540 (1927) (sustaining claim against judges of elections in Texas for refusing to allow a citizen to vote in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment and noting that "[t]he objection that the subject-matter of the suit is political is little more than a play upon words").

[6] Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 195 (2012) (holding that courts lack authority to decide political questions when there is a commitment of the issue to another department or where there is a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving them) (citing Baker, 369 U.S. at 217).

[7] Baker, 369 U.S. at 217.

[8] Id. (describing political questions as including cases involving "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department" or "the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government").

[9] Id. (describing political questions as including cases involving "a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it").

[10] See, e.g., Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 195–97. Despite the frequency with which courts cite the Baker criteria, a notable commentator has dismissed them as "useless in identifying what constitutes a political question." Chemerinsky, supra note 5, at § 2.6. See also id. ("The Constitution does not mention judicial review, much less limit it by creating 'textually demonstrable commitments' to other branches. Similarly, the most important constitutional provision . . . certainly do not include 'judicially discoverable and manageable standards.'"). That commentator is hardly alone in this sentiment. One treatise on justiciability notes that "application of the political-question tests of Baker v. Carr is so highly individualized as to suggest that there is no political question doctrine at all, but only a number of discrete questions that have been characterized as political." 13C Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 3534 (3d ed. Oct. 2020 Update). The same treatise concludes that "there is no workable definition of characteristics that might be found to distinguish political questions from judicial questions." Id.

subsequently.[11] Among other things, judges have disagreed on how to identify a political question, as well as on fundamental matters such as whether the political question doctrine originates in constitutional or prudential principles or what purpose the doctrine allegedly serves.[12]

So far, the Supreme Court has elected not to resolve these disputes in a comprehensive fashion. Despite these uncertainties, the doctrine remains alive and well today,[13] even if, as one treatise has stated, "the category of political questions 'is more amenable to description by infinite itemization than by generalization.'"[14] Following that pattern of itemization, the Court has applied the political question doctrine in some areas of foreign policy, Congress's internal governance, impeachment, and in cases involving partisan gerrymandering.[15] This essay explores all of these issues, tracing the development of the political question doctrine from its foundations in Marbury to its refinement in Baker to its modern applications.

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.2 Marbury v. Madison and Political Question Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The political question doctrine has its origins in the foundational case for judicial review, Marbury v. Madison.[1] Marbury involved a suit to force Secretary of State James Madison to deliver a signed commission to a newly appointed official, William Marbury.[2] The commission had been signed by the previous administration but not delivered; following the change in [11] See, e.g., Baker, 369 U.S. at 210 (stating that the political question doctrine has caused "[m]uch confusion."); Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 202 (Sotomayor, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (noting that "the proper application of Baker's six factors has generated substantial confusion in the lower courts").

[12] See Martin H. Redish, Judicial Review and the "Political Question", 79 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1031, 1039–43 (1985) (comparing "classical" interpretation of the political question doctrine, in which jurisdiction is withheld because the Constitution has textually committed the issue to another agency, and the "prudential" interpretation of the doctrine, in which rationales other than the text of the Constitution are used to justify judicial abdication). Compare Schlesinger, 418 U.S. at 215 ("[T]he concept of justiciability, which expresses the jurisdictional limitations imposed upon federal courts by the 'case or controversy' requirement of Art[icle] III, embodies both the standing and political question doctrines upon which petitioners in part rely."); Baker, 369 U.S. at 198–99 (court's determination that the case presented no political question "settles the only possible doubt that it is a case or controversy"); Id. at 210 ("The nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers."), with id. at 217 (noting that political questions may involve prudential concerns such as a "lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards" or "the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question").

[13] See, e.g., Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 201 (reversing the lower court's conclusion that the case presented a political question and remanding to decide case on the merits).

[14] Wright & Miller, supra note 10, at § 3534.

[15] See ArtIII.S2.C1.9.5 Modern Political Question Doctrine, ArtIII.S2.C1.9.6 Foreign Affairs as a Political Question, and ArtIII.S2.C1.9.7 Congressional Governance as a Political Question.

[1] 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 165–66 (1803).

[2] Id. at 153–57.

presidential administrations, Madison refused to deliver it.[3] Among the issues presented in that case, the Court examined whether it even had the authority to adjudicate the legality of Madison's refusal to deliver the commission.[4] That question, according to Chief Justice John Marshall's opinion for the Court, turned on "the nature" of the government action in question. As the Court explained, "Questions, in their nature political, or which are, by the constitution and laws, submitted to the executive, can never be made in this court."[5] Thus, if the act of an official is one in which the "executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear that their acts are only politically examinable."[6] However, if a "specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend on the performance of that duty," then injured individuals have a right to resort to the courts.[7] According to the Chief Justice, "[t]he power of nominating to the senate, and the power of appointing the person nominated" were political questions, and fundamentally unreviewable.[8] By contrast, "if, for example, Mr. Marbury had taken the oaths of a magistrate, and proceeded to act as one; in consequence of which a suit had been instituted against him, in which his defense had depended on his being a magistrate, the validity of his appointment must have been determined by judicial authority."[9] Ultimately, the Court concluded that the question of whether to deliver Marbury's commission was not a political one, as Marbury had a legal right in the appointment.[10]

Although the Court in Marbury opined that it could not decide "[q]uestions[ ] in their nature political," that case did not articulate the political question doctrine as the concept is understood today—a rule that deprives the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear certain cases, including cases involving claims of constitutional rights.[11] Rather, Marbury indicated only that some decisions are inherently discretionary and are therefore immune from judicial scrutiny because there is no enforceable legal right at stake.

In the years following Marbury, the Court invoked the political question doctrine when deferring to the factual or policy determinations of the other branches in certain categories of cases.[12] For example, the Court held in the 1827 case Martin v. Mott,[13] that the legality of the President's decision to call out the militia in response to a supposed national emergency was beyond judicial scrutiny.[14] Similarly, in Williams v. Suffolk Insurance Co.,[15] an 1839 case raising the question of who ruled the Falkland Islands, the Court concluded that the Executive

[3] Id.

[4] Id. at 165.

[5] Id. at 170.

[6] Id. at 166.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 167. See also Chi. & S. Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 112–13 (1948) ("[A]dministrative orders are not reviewable unless and until they impose an obligation, deny a right or fix some legal relationship . . . [t]o revise or review an administrative decision, which has only the force of a recommendation . . . would be to render an advisory opinion.").

[9] Marbury, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) at 167.

[10] Id.

[11] See ArtIII.S2.C1.9.5 Modern Political Question Doctrine, ArtIII.S2.C1.9.6 Foreign Affairs as a Political Question, and ArtIII.S2.C1.9.7 Congressional Governance as a Political Question.

[12] Tara Leigh Grove, The Lost History of the Political Question Doctrine, 90 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1908, 1911–12 (2015) (arguing that nineteenth century "political-question doctrine" was simply an application of deference by the judicial branch to the factual determinations made by the other branches).

[13] 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 19 (1827).

[14] Id. at 32–33.

[15] 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 415 (1839).

had the final word on questions of foreign sovereignty.[16] The Court also concluded that this deference in the realm of foreign affairs applied to the President's authority to enter into treaties.[17] In several cases from the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Court also expressed a willingness to defer to Congress with respect to certain legal questions. For example, the Court concluded that the Judiciary was required to defer absolutely to congressional recognition of Indian tribes,[18] as well as congressional determinations of when wars begin and when they conclude.[19]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.3 Luther v. Borden and Guarantee Clause

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In 1849, in the case Luther v. Borden,[1] the Court expanded the political question doctrine and took another step toward the modern judicial approach to political questions. Luther arose out of a rebellion against the government of Rhode Island due to the state constitution, which [16] Id. at 420 ("[W]hen the executive branch of the government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive on the judicial department."). See also Oetjen v. Cent. Leather Co., 246 U.S. 297, 302 (1918) (holding that courts could not reexamine the validity of a levy by a Mexican commanding general during a Mexican civil war); Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 212 (1890) ("Who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory, is not a judicial, but a political[ ] question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges."); Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 308–09 (1829) ("A question like this respecting the boundaries of nations, is, as has been truly said, more a political than a legal question; and in its discussion, the courts of every country must respect the pronounced will of the legislature.").

[17] Doe v. Braden, 57 U.S. (16 How.) 635, 657 (1854) (holding that the duty of courts with respect to a treaty is "to interpret it and administer it according to its terms," not to evaluate whether "the person who ratified the treaty on behalf of a foreign nation had the power" to enter it). See also Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503, 514 (1947) (holding that the question of whether a treaty survived the war with Germany is "essentially a political question" and "[w]e find no evidence that the political departments have considered the collapse and surrender of Germany as putting an end" to treaty obligations); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289–90 (1902) (concluding that the validity of extradition treaty between Kingdom of Prussia and United States was a political question, observing that both governments acted as though the treaty was still valid and the Court had no authority to say otherwise).

[18] United States v. Sandoval, 231 U.S. 28, 45–46 (1913) ("Taking these decisions together, it may be taken as the settled doctrine of this court that Congress, in pursuance of the long-established policy of the government, has a right to determine for itself when the guardianship which has been maintained over the Indian shall cease. It is for that body, and not the courts, to determine when the true interests of the Indian require his release from such condition of tutelage."); United States v. Holliday, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 407, 419 (1866) ("In reference to all matters of this kind, it is the rule of this court to follow the action of the executive and other political departments of the government, whose more special duty it is to determine such affairs. If by them those Indians are recognized as a tribe, this court must do the same.").

[19] Commercial Tr. Co. v. Miller, 262 U.S. 51, 57 (1923). See also The Protector, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 700, 701 02 (1871) ("Acts of hostility by the insurgents occurred at periods so various, and of such different degrees of importance, and in parts of the country so remote from each other, both at the commencement and the close of the late civil war, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to say on what precise day it began or terminated. It is necessary, therefore, to refer to some public act of the political departments of the government to fix the dates.").

[1] 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849).

significantly limited the right to vote.[2] Rhode Island citizens who had become dissatisfied with the existing regime held a constitutional convention, called elections, and declared the winners the valid government of Rhode Island.[3] When the existing "charter government" opposed these efforts and declared the conduct illegal, the newly elected governor of the rebel government, Thomas Dorr, gathered an armed force to assert the legitimacy of his government and its constitution.[4] In response, the charter government called the militia and declared martial law.[5] In the course of events, charter government agents broke into plaintiff Luther's house in order to arrest him for his support of Dorr.[6] Luther then sued for trespass.[7] The question of the legitimacy of the home break-in necessarily gave rise to the question of which government—the charter government or the rebel government—was the legitimate government of the state at the time of the break-in.

Luther alleged that the charter government that authorized the break-in was unconstitutional, in part because the voting restrictions in the Rhode Island constitution violated the U.S. Constitution's Guarantee Clause,[8] which states that "[t]he United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government."[9] The Supreme Court refused to reach the question, instead concluding that the question of which government was lawful, and whether a government was a "republican" one, was a political question for Congress to decide and entirely outside the purview of the Judiciary.[10] In an opinion by Chief Justice Roger Taney, the Court held that courts were not institutionally competent to judge republicanism or governmental legitimacy because judicial standards were lacking.[11] Further, an attempt to judge whether a government was legitimate could undermine other branches and ultimately cast all the acts of the questioned government into doubt: as the Court explained, "[i]f the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the Constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy, not of order."[12] The Court concluded that while a court should "always be ready to meet any question confided to it by the Constitution, it is equally its duty not to pass beyond its appropriate sphere of action."[13] In the years following Luther to the present, the Court has routinely held that cases involving the Guarantee Clause present nonjusticiable political questions.[14]

---

[2] William M. Wiecek, The Guarantee Clause of the U.S. Constitution 86–97 (1972); see also Luther, 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 35–36 ("For some years previous to the disturbances of which we are now speaking, many of the citizens became dissatisfied with the charter government, and particularly with the restriction upon the right of suffrage.").

[3] Luther, 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 35–36.

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 36–37.

[6] Id. at 37.

[7] Id. at 34.

[8] The Supreme Court's opinion seems to assume that Luther had argued that the charter government was unconstitutional, at least in part, because of the Guarantee Clause. See id. at 35–36 (discussing the Guarantee clause). However, scholars have argued that Luther never raised the Guarantee Clause issue and that the Court's discussion on this issue was dicta. See e.g., Tara Leigh Grove, The Lost History of the Political Question Doctrine, 90 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1908, 1927–29 & n.108 (2015) (noting that "review of the record indicates that the plaintiff did not raise [a Guarantee Clause] claim" and suggesting that Chief Justice Roger B. Taney may have chosen to mention the Guarantee Clause to influence debates over slavery).

[9] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4.

[10] Luther, 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 35–36 ("Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. . . . Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts.").

[11] Id.

[12] Id. at 36.

[13] Id. at 39.

[14] See, e.g., Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm'n, 576 U.S 787, 795 n.3 (2015) (noting that the question of whether the Guarantee Clause was violated by way of referendum process was a nonjusticiable

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.4 From Coleman v. Miller to Baker v. Carr

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court also applied the political question doctrine in the 1939 case Coleman v. Miller.[1] In Coleman, the Court addressed the Kansas legislature's recent approval of the proposed Child Labor Amendment to the Constitution, which had been submitted to the states for ratification thirteen years prior.[2] Members of the Kansas legislature who had voted against the amendment petitioned for a writ of mandamus, seeking to revoke the approval.[3] They raised certain procedural challenges to the ratification and argued that the passage of time had rendered Kansas's approval of the amendment invalid.[4] The opinion of the Court, authored by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, affirmed an opinion from the Supreme Court of Kansas denying the plaintiffs' petition.[5] Chief Justice Hughes's opinion explained that the "efficacy of ratifications by state legislature . . . should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments."[6] The Court further clarified, citing to Luther, that it was a question solely for Congress, and not for the courts, whether an amendment had been adopted within a "reasonable time."[7]

It was against this background that the Court decided Colegrove v. Green,[8] in 1946. By that time, movement of populations from rural to urban areas had led to severe political question); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 182 n.17 (1980) (refusing to reach merits of Guarantee Clause challenge to preclearance requirements of Voting Rights Act, as such challenge was nonjusticiable); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 223–24 (1962) (citing many cases holding Guarantee Clause challenges nonjusticiable, but holding that this had no effect on Equal Protection challenge to malapportionment in Tennessee); Pac. States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118, 133–36, 151 (1912) (concluding that the question of whether amendment to Oregon constitution adding initiative and referendum procedures was nonjusticiable political question; concluding that "[a]s the issues presented, in their very essence, are, and have long since by this court been, definitely determined to be political and governmental, and embraced within the scope of the powers conferred upon Congress, and not, therefore, within the reach of judicial power"); Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U.S. 548, 578–80 (1900) (holding that court had no jurisdiction over challenge to gubernatorial election in Kentucky based on Guarantee Clause; "enforcement of this guaranty belong[s] to the political department"). But see New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 184–85 (1992) (noting that "perhaps not all claims under the Guarantee Clause present nonjusticiable political questions").

[1] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[2] Id. at 435–36.

[3] Id. at 436.

[4] Id.

[5] The splintered opinions in Coleman make it difficult to determine the Court's holding. Although Justice Charles Evans Hughes's opinion was styled "the opinion of the Court," it was joined by only two other justices. Four other justices concurred in the judgment, in twin opinions by Justices Felix Frankfurter and Hugo Black arguing that the petitioners lacked standing. Id. at 456–59. Two other justices, Justices Pierce Butler and James McReynolds, dissented. But, as the Supreme Court later explained in analyzing the multiple opinions in Coleman, "even though there were only two Justices who joined Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes' opinion on the merits, it is apparent that the two dissenting Justices joined his opinion as to the standing discussion. Otherwise, Justice Felix Frankfurter's opinion denying standing would have been the controlling opinion." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 822 n.5 (1997) (discussing the various opinions in Coleman).

[6] Coleman, 307 U.S. at 450.

[7] Id. at 454.

[8] 328 U.S. 549 (1946).

"malapportionment" in state legislatures.[9] Throughout the country, state legislative districts were drawn such that voters in rural areas had disproportionate power compared to their urban counterparts. State governments, made up of the representatives of those rural voters, were unwilling to fix this problem.[10] As a result, voters in underrepresented districts turned to the courts and the Constitution for a remedy. In Colegrove, a seven-member Court was presented with a constitutional challenge to an Illinois districting arrangement where plaintiffs were members of districts with much larger populations than other districts.[11] The challenge was based, in part, on the Guarantee Clause, as well as on the Fourteenth Amendment. A plurality[12] of three Justices joined an opinion by Justice Felix Frankfurter, concluding that the Court lacked jurisdiction in light of the "peculiarly political nature" of the case.[13] The plurality noted that under Article I, Section 4 of the Constitution, "The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for . . . Representative, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations."[14] Citing that provision, the plurality concluded that the authority to regulate state districting rested "exclusively" with Congress, and courts had no authority to "enter this political thicket."[15] The Colegrove plurality's view of the political question doctrine, as the Supreme Court later recognized, "left pervasive malapportionment unchecked."[16]

Sixteen years later, the Court confronted malapportionment again in Baker v. Carr.[17] Rejecting Colegrove, the Baker Court set forth the modern rule on political questions and justiciability.[18] In Baker, the Court addressed an equal protection challenge to malapportioned

[9] Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 2.6.3 (6th ed. 2012).

[10] Id. See also Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 567 (1964) ("The complexions of societies and civilizations change, often with amazing rapidity. A nation once primarily rural in character becomes predominantly urban. Representation schemes once fair and equitable become archaic and outdated.") (footnote omitted).

[11] Colegrove, 328 U.S. at 550.

[12] When no majority of the Supreme Court agrees on an opinion in a case, the Court may issue a plurality opinion articulating the reasoning that received the most votes. The Supreme Court has stated, "When a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, 'the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds.'" Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193 (1977) (quoting Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 169 n.15 (1976) (opinion of Stewart, Powell, & Stevens, JJ.)). For discussion of the precedential value of plurality decisions, see Kevin M. Lewis, What Happens When Five Supreme Court Justices Can't Agree?, Cong. Research Serv. (June 4, 2018), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/LSB/LSB10113.

[13] Colegrove, 328 U.S. at 552 (holding that a complaint alleging that "great mass of the white population intends to keep the blacks from voting" had no judicial remedy, "[u]nless we are prepared to supervise the voting in that state by officers of the court, it seems to us that all the plaintiff could get from equity would be an empty form") (citing Giles v. Harris, 189 U.S. 475, 487–88 (1903)). Justice Wiley Rutledge concurred in the result in Colegrove, getting the Court to a majority of four votes. Id. at 564 (Rutledge, J., concurring in the result). However, Justice Wiley Rutledge would have dismissed for want of equitable power to grant relief, rather than a want of jurisdiction because of the presence of a political question. Id. at 565.

[14] U.S. Const. art. I, § 4, cl. 1.

[15] Colegrove, 328 U.S. at 556.

[16] Evenwel v. Abbott, No. 14-940, slip op. at 2 (U.S. Apr. 4, 2016).

[17] 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).

[18] One year prior to Baker, the Court ruled, in the 1960 case Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), in an opinion by Justice Felix Frankfurter, that Colegrove did not form an obstacle to a challenge to an election district allegedly drawn to remove Black voters from the district. Id. at 346–48. See also Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 904–05 (1996) (concluding that standing existed in an equal protection challenge to North Carolina districting based on race); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 922 (1995) (holding that an allegation that race was the legislature's rationale in drawing district lines could go forward, even though Department of Justice concluded that racial districting is necessary under the Voting Rights Act).

districts in the State of Tennessee[19] and concluded that, notwithstanding the political question doctrine, the plaintiffs' challenge to the state legislative map could proceed.[20] The Court in Baker identified the six criteria for "political question" cases listed above, reviewed areas where the Court had previously applied the political question doctrine, and concluded that past challenges brought under the Guarantee Clause had failed largely due to a lack of "judicially manageable standards."[21] By contrast, the Court reasoned, "[j]udicial standards under the Equal Protection Clause are well developed and familiar."[22] Shortly after Baker, the Supreme Court found the "judicially manageable standard" it was looking for, and articulated the so-called "one-person-one-vote" rule to overturn malapportioned districts.[23] Since Baker, courts have consistently determined that challenges to state legislative apportionment are justiciable.[24]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.5 Modern Political Question Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Baker criteria are quoted in virtually every case involving the political question doctrine. However, since Baker, the Court has applied the doctrine on relatively few occasions and has taken a fairly narrow view of its reach. As a result, it remains the case that the "political question doctrine can only be understood by examining the specific areas where the Supreme Court has invoked it."[1] Since Baker, those areas include cases involving some aspects of foreign policy, congressional internal regulation, impeachment, and partisan gerrymandering.[2] [19] In Baker, unlike Gomillion, the plaintiffs did not allege any discrimination in drawing of the districts, but rather that their equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment were violated by the "debasement" of their votes, insofar as their votes counted "less" than voters in other districts. Baker, 369 U.S. at 187–88.

---

[20] Id. at 237.

[21] Id. at 223 ("[T]he only significance that Luther could have for our immediate purposes is in its holding that the Guaranty Clause is not a repository of judicially manageable standards which a court could utilize independently in order to identify a State's lawful government.").

[22] Id. at 226.

[23] See Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 568 (1964). See also Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 18 (1964) ("While it may not be possible to draw congressional districts with mathematical precision, that is no excuse for ignoring our Constitution's plain objective of making equal representation for equal numbers of people the fundamental goal[.]").

[24] See also U.S. Dep't of Commerce v. Montana, 503 U.S. 442, 456–59 (1992) (concluding that congressional apportionment of congressional districts among states did not involve nonjusticiable political question).

[1] Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 2.6.1 (6th ed. 2012).

[2] In other areas, the Court has declined to invoke the political-question doctrine. Some cases in this category are discussed below. See also, e.g., Cty. of Oneida v. Oneida Indian Nation of N.Y., 470 U.S. 226, 248–50 (1985) (holding that damages claims for tribal land use brought by certain Indian nations was justiciable even though case involved Congress's authority over Indian affairs); Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 351–53 (1976) (holding that dismissal of state public employees because of partisan affiliation did not involve political questions because the political question doctrine was only implicated in cases involving separation of powers).

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.6 Foreign Affairs as a Political Question

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

One area where the political question doctrine has significant importance is in foreign affairs. In 1918, the Court wrote that "[t]he conduct of the foreign relations of our government is committed by the Constitution to the executive and legislative'—the political'—departments of the government, and the propriety of what may be done in the exercise of this political power is not subject to judicial inquiry or decision."[1] However, despite that sweeping statement, as the Court recognized in Baker, not "every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance;" rather, the Court analyzes each question on a case-by-case basis.[2] For example, many pre-Baker cases concluded that the Judiciary was bound to defer to the political department on certain questions involving the validity of treaties[3] or the recognition of foreign governments.[4] The Baker Court characterized those cases as ones in which "resolution of such issues frequently turn on standards that defy judicial application, . . . involve the exercise of a discretion demonstrably committed to the executive or legislature . . . [or] uniquely demand single-voiced statement of the Government's views."[5]

The first major post-Baker case to consider these principles was the 1973 case Gilligan v. Morgan.[6] In Gilligan, the Supreme Court determined that the political question doctrine was one reason to bar a suit for broad equitable relief against the Governor of Ohio that alleged that the training of the Ohio National Guard was defective, leading to the violence that occurred at Kent State University three years earlier.[7] The plaintiffs sought a "judicial evaluation of the appropriateness of the 'training, weaponry and orders' of the Ohio National Guard" and "continuing judicial surveillance" over the Guard to ensure compliance with any court-approved requirements.[8] Although the case did not involve foreign policy, it raised related considerations. Recognizing that the case involved "[t]he complex, subtle, and professional decisions as to the composition, training, equipping and control of a military force,"[9] the Court gave two reasons why the political question doctrine applied. First, Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution gives the authority for "organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia" to Congress.[10] Second, in concert with the explicit textual commitment of military

---

[1] Oetjen v. Cent. Leather Co., 246 U.S. 297, 302 (1918) (holding that courts could not reexamine the validity of a levy by a Mexican commanding general during a Mexican civil war).

[2] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211–12 (1962)

[3] See Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849).

[4] See Commercial Tr. Co. v. Miller, 262 U.S. 51, 57 (1923). See also The Protector, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 700, 701–02 (1871).

[5] Baker, 369 U.S. at 211.

[6] 413 U.S. 1 (1973).

[7] Id. at 5–6.

[8] Id. at 6.

[9] Id. at 10.

[10] Id. at 6–7 (citing U.S. Const. art. I, § 8).

supervision to a branch outside the Judiciary, the Court recognized that the Judicial Branch was uniquely poorly suited to supervise this activity: "[I]t is difficult to conceive of an area of governmental activity in which the courts have less competence."[11] Following what Baker called the "impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion,"[12] the Court concluded that the case involved a political question.

The Court next considered whether it could hear a case involving a foreign policy question in 1979, in Goldwater v. Carter.[13] Goldwater involved the question of whether courts could entertain a lawsuit by Members of Congress over the President's unilateral termination of a joint defense treaty with Taiwan. The plaintiff Members argued that this unilateral action deprived them of their constitutional role with respect to a change in the supreme law of the land.[14] The Court voted to dismiss the case without hearing oral argument. Although six Justices voted to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, no opinion received five votes. Justice William Rehnquist, writing for a plurality of four Justices, argued that the question presented was nonjusticiable "because it involve[d] the authority of the President in the conduct of our country's foreign relations and the extent to which the Senate or the Congress is authorized to negate the action of the President."[15] The plurality made three main points in support of the lack of justiciability. First, the question involved separation of powers between two branches, each with resources "available to protect and assert its interests."[16] Second, the question involved foreign affairs. Finally, the Constitution was silent on the question presented, providing no standards to evaluate the question of the role of Congress in the termination of treaties.[17] The fifth vote was provided by Justice Lewis Powell, who agreed that the complaint should be dismissed, but for the lack of a ripe dispute, rather than on political question grounds.[18] Justice Thurgood Marshall also concurred in the dismissal, but provided no reasoning to support his decision.[19]

In other cases, however, the Supreme Court has explicitly rejected the application of the political question doctrine, notwithstanding a foreign affairs or foreign treaty dimension to the case. For example, in Japan Whaling Ass'n v. American Cetacean Society,[20] the Court found that the political question doctrine did not prevent federal courts from adjudicating a question involving the interpretation of the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling.[21] Citing Baker, the Court noted that not every matter that touches foreign relations or foreign treaties was nonjusticiable; rather, the question was whether the case "revolve[d] around policy choices and value determinations constitutionally committed for resolution" to the other branches.[22] In Japan Whaling, the question presented was whether the Secretary of

[11] Id. at 10.

[12] Baker, 369 U.S. at 217).

[13] 444 U.S. 996 (1979).

[14] Id. at 997–98 (Powell, J., concurring in the judgment).

[15] Id. at 1002 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment).

[16] Id. at 1004.

[17] Id.

[18] Id. at 998 (Powell, J., concurring in the judgment).

[19] Id. at 996. The other three Justices were split on the case. Justices White and Harry Blackmun agreed that the case should have been granted certiorari, but did not express an opinion on the merits or on the justiciability question and argued that the Court should not have passed on these questions without oral argument. Id. at 1006 (Blackmun, J., dissenting in part). Justice William Brennan argued that the Court should not have dismissed the case and would have affirmed the lower court's opinion on the merits. Id. at 1006 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

[20] 478 U.S. 221 (1986).

[21] Id. at 229–30.

[22] Id. at 230. See also Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 856–58 (2014) (reviewing case involving a criminal statute enacting the International Convention on Chemical Weapons, but not finding it necessary to "interpret the Commerce should have certified Japan as "diminishing the effectiveness" of the International Whaling Commission's quotas under statutes that purportedly required the Secretary to do so.[23] According to the Court, this question involved "applying no more than the traditional rules of statutory construction" in interpreting the Convention and the statutes at issue, and as such, did not present a political question.[24]

The Court again found it had authority to make limited constitutional determinations in the foreign policy context in Boumediene v. Bush.[25] There, the Court considered whether it could entertain habeas petitions from prisoners designated as enemy combatants and detained at the United States Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.[26] The United States argued that, because Guantanamo Bay was not a part of the United States, the United States had no sovereignty over it, and as such, the writ of habeas could not extend to prisoners held there.[27] The Court agreed that, because the question of who held sovereignty over the location was a political question, it would "not question the Government's position that Cuba, not the United States, maintains sovereignty, in the legal and technical sense of the term, over Guantanamo Bay."[28] However, the Court went on to hold that nothing barred it from considering the "practical sovereignty" or "objective degree of control" the United States had over Guantanamo Bay.[29] Previous cases designating sovereignty as a political question, the Court asserted, had referred to sovereignty in the "narrow, legal sense of the term," rather than the "colloquial sense."[30] Further, as it was this colloquial sense that was relevant to the habeas writ, the Court reasoned that it had jurisdiction to evaluate the prisoners' claims.[31]

The Court's embrace of a narrow conception of the political question doctrine continued in the most recent case to consider the political question limits to federal court jurisdiction in foreign affairs, Zivotofsky v. Clinton.[32] In Zivotofsky, the Court concluded that the political question doctrine could not justify refusing to hear cases involving the constitutionality of a federal statute. There, the Court addressed a statute that provided that Americans born in Jerusalem may elect to have "Israel" listed as the place of birth on their passports.[33] When the State Department refused to follow that law under a long-standing policy of not taking a position on the political status of Jerusalem, plaintiff Zivotofsky sued to enforce the statute.[34] The Supreme Court concluded that the political question doctrine did not bar it from hearing the case; as the Court noted, the courts were "not being asked to supplant a foreign policy decision of the political branches with the courts' own unmoored determination of what United scope of the Convention"); Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 434 (1920) (concluding that statute enacting the Migratory Bird Treaty between the United States and Great Britain was valid).

[23] Japan Whaling, 478 U.S. at 227–29.

[24] Id. at 230.

[25] 553 U.S. 723 (2008).

[26] Id. at 732–33.

[27] Id. at 753.

[28] Id. at 753–54 ("[D]etermination of sovereignty over an area is for the legislative and executive departments.") (citing Vermilya-Brown Co. v. Connell, 335 U.S. 377, 380 (1948)).

[29] Id. at 754.

[30] Id.

[31] Id. at 754–55 ("Accordingly, for purposes of our analysis, we accept the Government's position that Cuba, and not the United States, retains de jure sovereignty over Guantanamo Bay. . . . [H]owever, we take notice of the obvious and uncontested fact that the United States, by virtue of its complete jurisdiction and control over the base, maintains de facto sovereignty over this territory.").

[32] 566 U.S. 189 (2012).

[33] Id. at 191.

[34] Id.

States policy toward Jerusalem should be."[35] Instead, the court was being asked to engage in the "familiar" exercise of determining what the statute meant, and whether it was constitutional.[36] The Court concluded that this exercise would require careful examination of the "textual, structural, and historical evidence" but that this was "what courts do," and the difficulty of the problem was no justification for avoiding it.[37]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.7 Congressional Governance as a Political Question

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has also applied the political question doctrine to cases involving the internal governance of the Congress, though recent decisions have construed the doctrine narrowly in this context. In the pre-Baker case Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark,[1] plaintiffs challenging a tariff law contended that the law was invalid because a section of the bill passed by Congress was omitted from the final version of the law signed by the President.[2] The Court concluded that it could not adjudicate this issue; because of the "respect due to a co-ordinate branch of the government," the Court had to take as "conclusive" the fact that the act was attested by the signatures of the presiding officers of the houses of Congress and approved by the President.[3] Baker explained that Clark signified the need for "respect" to coequal branches and for "finality and certainty" about statutes.[4] A few cases since Baker have added color to the concept of "respect" in this context.

For example, in Powell v. McCormack,[5] an individual elected to the House of Representatives challenged a House resolution excluding him from his seat in Congress. Although the Member-elect met the age and citizenship requirements in Article I, Section 2, the House found that he had misrepresented travel expenses and made illegal salary payments to his wife.[6] The defendants—Members and officers of the House—argued that the text of the Constitution, specifically Article I, Section 5, gave Congress exclusive authority to judge the qualifications of its own Members, so Congress could determine that the Member

[35] Id. at 196.

[36] Id.

[37] Id. at 201.

[1] 143 U.S. 649 (1892).

[2] Id. at 668–69, 672.

[3] Id. at 673. Cf. United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 4 (1892) (holding that where Senate journal speaks on whether a quorum was present, "it must be assumed to speak the truth").

[4] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 214 (1962).

[5] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[6] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 ("No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.").

was unqualified.[7] The Supreme Court held that the case could go forward and that the Member-elect was entitled to relief.[8] On the question of justiciability, the Court explained that, despite the text the defendants cited from Article I, Section 5, there was no "textually demonstrable commitment" of this constitutional question to another branch.[9] At most, the Constitution gave Congress the power to judge the "qualifications expressly set forth in the Constitution," not the power to set new qualifications.[10] Nor did the Court conclude that "lack of the respect due co-ordinate branches" barred hearing the case, notwithstanding that it was interpreting the Constitution "in a manner at variance with the construction given the document by another branch." [11] In the view of the Powell Court, constitutional conflicts with other branches were inevitable under the constitutional system and were no excuse for avoiding a case where there existed "judicially manageable standards" sufficient to judge the question.[12]

Similar principles animated the Court's decision in INS v. Chadha.[13] There, the Court considered the constitutionality of a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act authorizing one House of Congress, by resolution, to invalidate a decision of the Executive Branch to suspend the deportation of an alien.[14] The United States argued that Chadha presented a nonjusticiable political question, because Article I granted Congress the power to "establish a uniform Rule of Naturalization," providing it with unreviewable authority over the regulation of aliens.[15] As in Powell, the Court rejected the application of the political question doctrine.[16] The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Warren Burger, observed that what was at issue was not Congress's plenary authority over aliens, but rather whether it had chosen "a constitutionally permissible means of implementing that power."[17] Because that latter question was squarely within the Judiciary's purview, the political question doctrine did not bar consideration of the case, regardless of the fact that judicial review limited Congress's authority as a practical matter.[18]

Respect for the coordinate branches also did not prevent the Court from reaching the merits of the dispute in United States v. Munoz-Flores,[19] which concerned whether a federal statute violated the Origination Clause of the Constitution, a provision that requires revenue-raising legislation to originate in the House of Representatives.[20] In that case, Munoz-Flores was ordered to pay a special assessment under the Victims of Crime Act of 1984

---

[7] 395 U.S. at 519 ("Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members[.]") (citing U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 1).

[8] Id. at 489.

[9] Id. at 548.

[10] Id.

[11] Id. at 549. But see Roudebush v. Hartke, 405 U.S. 15, 18–19 (1972) (noting that "[w]hich candidate is entitled to be seated in the Senate is, to be sure, a nonjusticiable political question" with respect to which of two candidates is entitled to be seated in a close election); Reed v. Cty. Comm'rs, 277 U.S. 376, 388 (1928) (The Senate "is the judge of the elections[.] . . . It is fully empowered, and may determine such matters without the aid of the House of Representatives or the executive or judicial department.").

[12] 395 U.S. at 549.

[13] 462 U.S. 919, 940 (1983).

[14] Id. at 923.

[15] Id. at 940 (citing U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.).

[16] Id. at 942–93.

[17] Id. at 941.

[18] Id. at 941–42 ("No policy underlying the political question doctrine suggests that Congress or the Executive . . . can decide the constitutionality of a statute; that is a decision for the courts.").

[19] 495 U.S. 385 (1990).

[20] U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 1 ("All bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives[.]").

and challenged the statute as unconstitutional because the bill was "for raising revenue" and did not originate in the House of Representatives.[21] The Government objected that hearing the case expressed a "lack of respect" for the House: in the Government's view, the House made an unreviewable determination that the Act was not for the purpose of raising revenue when it passed the legislation.[22] The Court rejected that argument, holding that Munoz-Flores's challenge was no different than any other constitutional challenge to a law involving separation of powers, and judicial review did not evidence a "lack of respect."[23]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.8 Impeachment and Political Question Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In 1993, the Court applied the political question doctrine to a judicial challenge to impeachment proceedings. In Nixon v. United States, a former federal judge challenged his removal by the Senate.[1] He argued that the Senate proceedings used to convict him, which allowed a committee of Senators, rather than the whole Senate, to hear evidence against him after he was impeached by the House, violated the constitutional requirement that the Senate "try all Impeachments."[2] In an opinion by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, the Court held that Nixon presented a nonjusticiable political question.[3] A few primary considerations motivated the Court's conclusion. First, the Court noted that the text of the Constitution gives the Senate "sole" authority to try impeachments, which, according to the Court, amounted to a sufficient "textual commitment" of the question as to what "try" meant to a coordinate department.[4] Second, the Court noted that the existence of a firm textual commitment was strengthened by a lack of "judicially manageable standards" in the vagueness of the word "try"; the Court contrasted that vague term with the concrete requirement that convictions require a two-thirds vote, concluding that the Senate was intended to have discretion over the precise procedures for impeachments.[5] The Court distinguished the alleged "textual commitment" that was insufficient in Powell v. McCormack, maintaining that the textual commitment to the Senate of defining "try" did not undermine any other provision to the Constitution, such as the enumerated qualifications set forth in Article I, Section 5 that were at stake in Powell.[6] Altogether, the Court concluded that without a judicially manageable standard to limit the [23] Id. at 393. The Court ultimately rejected Munoz-Flores's challenge on the merits and held that the Victims of Crime Act was not a bill "for raising revenue." Id. at 400.

[21] 495 U.S. at 387–88.

[22] Id. at 391–92.

[1] 506 U.S. 224 (1993).

[2] Id. at 229 ("The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments") (citing U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 6).

[3] Id. at 238.

[4] Id. at 235–36.

[5] Id. at 228–29.

[6] Id. at 237–38 (citing Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 519 (1969)).

Senate's authority, such as the specific textual rules on qualifications that were present in Powell, it could not overturn the Senate's judgment.[7]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.9 Political Process, Elections, and Gerrymandering

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Finally, the Court in the modern era has applied the political question doctrine to some aspects of legislative regulation of elections,[1] particularly in the area of partisan gerrymandering. Partisan gerrymandering is "the practice of dividing a geographic area into electoral districts, often of highly irregular shape, to give one political party an unfair advantage by diluting the opposition's voting strength."[2] Government officials seeking to draw legislative districts to affect election results may adopt several different tactics. For instance, they may create districts containing different numbers of voters, effectively diluting the votes of individuals in more populous districts.[3] In the alternative, legislators may create districts that contain equal numbers of voters, but where boundaries are drawn to manipulate the concentration of voters in each district based on characteristics such as voters' race or their political affiliation. The Supreme Court has held that Equal Protection challenges to race-based gerrymandering and one-person-one-vote claims based on unequal districts are justiciable.[4] However, for decades the Court was unable to agree on an approach to challenges to partisan gerrymandering.

Unlike one-person-one-vote cases, a partisan gerrymandering case typically involves a voter in a district that is not malapportioned based on population, but rather has been drawn to disadvantage one political party. In the words of the Supreme Court, in a political gerrymander, voters affiliated with a disfavored party are either (1) "packed" into a few districts—in effect conceding those districts by large margins and "wasting" votes that could help the disfavored party compete in other areas—or (2) "cracked" into small groups and

---

[7] Id.

[1] The Court appears to have applied the political-question doctrine, without explicitly identifying the doctrine, in the election context but outside the gerrymandering context in O'Brien v. Brown, 409 U.S. 1 (1972) (per curiam). In O'Brien, the Court addressed an application to stay an order of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which had held that the action of the Democratic Party's National Convention's Credentials Committee in refusing to seat certain delegates was unconstitutional. Id. at 2. The Court granted the stay, noting that "[w]e must also consider the absence of authority supporting the action of the Court of Appeals in intervening in the internal determinations of a national political party, on the eve of its convention, regarding the seating of delegates. . . . Judicial intervention in this area has traditionally been approached with great caution and restraint." Id. at 4 (citing Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849)).

[2] Black's Law Dictionary 696 (7th ed. 1999). See also Rucho v. Common Cause, No. 18-422, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 27, 2019) ("In 1812, Governor of Massachusetts and future Vice President Elbridge Gerry notoriously approved congressional districts that the legislature had drawn to aid the Democratic-Republican Party. The moniker 'gerrymander' was born when an outraged Federalist newspaper observed that one of the misshapen districts resembled a salamander.").

[3] Unequal districting, also known as malapportionment, was at issue in Baker v. Carr. See ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine.

[4] Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993).

spread across multiple districts so that they cannot achieve a majority in any one district.[5] In these circumstances, plaintiffs cannot argue that their votes are inherently worth less than that of any other voter; rather, they must argue that the creation of a district that disfavors a particular political party violates the Constitution for other reasons.[6]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.10 Evolving Doctrine on Partisan Gerrymandering

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Supreme Court jurisprudence related to partisan gerrymandering has evolved over time. In fractured opinions in the 1986 case Davis v. Bandemer, six Justices of the Court concluded that political gerrymandering claims were justiciable.[1] However, subsequent Supreme Court decisions cast doubt on Bandemer's holding. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor concurred in the judgment in Bandemer, but disputed that the issue presented was justiciable. She argued that "[t]he Equal Protection Clause does not supply judicially manageable standards for resolving purely political gerrymandering claims,"[2] and that the case before the Court required "precisely the sort of 'initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion' that Baker v. Carr recognized as characteristic of political questions."[3] Justice O'Connor concluded that "the legislative business of apportionment is fundamentally a political affair, and challenges to the manner in which an apportionment has been carried out . . . present a political question in the truest sense of the term."[4]

In the years following Bandemer, multiple Justices of the Supreme Court concluded in non-binding opinions that challenges to partisan gerrymandering are nonjusticiable.[5] Like Justice O'Connor in Bandemer, those Justices focused primarily on the second and third Baker factors: the "lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving" these cases and "the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion."[6] For instance, in 2004, in Vieth v. Jubelirer,[7] a plurality of

---

[5] See Rucho, No. 18-422, slip op. at 4.

[6] See Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 305 (2004) (explaining potential theories for how gerrymandering could represent a constitutional violation).

[1] 478 U.S. 109 (1986). Although six Justices found the claim in Bandemer to be justiciable, they were unable to agree on a standard for evaluating political gerrymandering claims. Compare id. at 132 (in opinion for four Justices, concluding that "unconstitutional discrimination occurs only when the electoral system is arranged in a manner that will consistently degrade a voter's or a group of voters' influence on the political process as a whole") (White, J.), with id. at 173–75 (in opinion for two Justices, considering number of factors a court should look at concerning the fairness and constitutionality of a redistricting plan) (Powell, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

[2] Id. at 147 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[3] Id. at 155

[4] Id. at 145.

[5] See infra.

[6] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).

[7] 541 U.S. 267 (2004).

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.10
Evolving Doctrine on Partisan Gerrymandering

four Justices voted to overturn Bandemer and concluded that political gerrymandering claims were not justiciable due to the lack of such standards.[8] Justice Anthony Kennedy, concurring in the judgment, wrote separately to express his view that, while no standards existed at the time, they might "emerge in the future."[9] Thus, five Justices concluded that the specific political gerrymandering claims at issue in Vieth were nonjusticiable, but a majority of the Court left open the possibility of exercising jurisdiction over some future partisan gerrymandering claims. In other cases, the Court divided on or otherwise declined to reach the merits of cases involving partisan gerrymandering.[10]

ArtIII.S2.C1.9.11 Nonjusticiability of Partisan Gerrymandering Claims

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

A majority of the Court addressed the justiciability of partisan gerrymandering claims in the 2019 case Rucho v. Common Cause. In that case, voters in North Carolina and Maryland challenged the partisan gerrymandering of their districts under the First Amendment, the Equal Protection Clause, the Elections Clause, and Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution.[1] The Supreme Court, in a 5-4 decision, held that partisan gerrymandering claims are not justiciable. Chief Justice John Roberts's majority opinion described districting as an inherently political process, which the Constitution entrusts to state legislatures and Congress.[2] The Court further explained that the Constitution imposes no absolute right to proportionate political representation.[3] Absent a right to strict proportional representation, the Court opined, courts deciding partisan gerrymandering cases would inevitably need to "make their own political judgment about how much representation particular political parties deserve—based on the votes of their supporters—and to rearrange the challenged districts to achieve that end."[4] Thus, unlike claims alleging racial gerrymandering (which is always unconstitutional) or

[8] Id. at 305–06.

[9] Id. at 311–12 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment).

[10] See, e.g., League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Perry (LULAC), 548 U.S. 399, 447 (2006) (although unable to agree on a full opinion, agreeing that constitutional challenge to partisan gerrymandering claim should be dismissed); Gill v. Whitford, No. 16-1161, slip op. at 13 (U.S. June 18, 2018) ("Our considerable efforts in Gaffney, Bandemer, Vieth, and LULAC leave unresolved whether such claims may be brought in cases involving allegations of partisan gerrymandering. In particular, two threshold questions remain: what is necessary to show standing in a case of this sort, and whether those claims are justiciable. Here we do not decide the latter question because the plaintiffs in this case have not shown standing under the theory upon which they based their claims for relief.").

[1] Rucho v. Common Cause, No. 18-422, slip op. at 1 (U.S. June 27, 2019). See also U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1 ("The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States.").

[2] Rucho, No. 18-422, slip op. at 8–9.

[3] Id. at 16 ("Our cases, however, clearly foreclose any claim that the Constitution requires proportional representation or that legislatures in reapportioning must draw district lines to come as near as possible to allocating seats to the contending parties in proportion to what their anticipated statewide vote will be.") (quoting Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 130 (1986)).

[4] Id. at 17.

malapportionment (which is "relatively easy to administer as a matter of math"), the Rucho Court recognized that the inherently political nature of redistricting would require courts adjudicating partisan gerrymandering claims to adjudicate when partisanship has gone "too far" in influencing the redistricting process.[5]

Quoting Justice Anthony Kennedy's concurrence in Vieth, the Court stated that any appropriate standard for resolving partisan gerrymandering claims "must be grounded in a 'limited and precise rationale' and be 'clear, manageable, and politically neutral.'"[6] However, after looking to the text of the Constitution and to various tests proposed by the parties, the Rucho Court concluded that it could identify no "limited and precise standard that is judicially discernable and manageable" for evaluating when partisan activity goes too far.[7] Explaining that "federal courts are not equipped to apportion political power as a matter of fairness,"[8] the Court emphasized that, by intervening in disputes over partisan redistricting, federal courts would "inject [themselves] into the most heated partisan issues,"[9] and "would risk assuming political, not legal, responsibility for a process that often produces ill will and distrust."[10] The Court thus concluded that "partisan gerrymandering claims present political questions beyond the reach of the federal courts" because "[f]ederal judges have no license to reallocate political power between the two major political parties, with no plausible grant of authority in the Constitution, and no legal standards to limit and direct their decisions."[11] While acknowledging that "[e]xcessive partisanship in districting leads to results that reasonably seem unjust," the Rucho majority rejected the notion that "this Court can address the problem of partisan gerrymandering because it must."[12] Rather, the Court asserted, state courts, state legislatures, and Congress all have authority to address partisan gerrymandering.[13]

ArtIII.S2.C1.10 Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.1 Overview of Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine is a set of rules the Supreme Court has developed over time that guide a federal court's disposition of cases that raise constitutional questions. Summarized by Justice Louis Brandeis in his concurring opinion in Ashwander v. Tennessee

[5] Id. at 20.

[6] Id. at 15 (quoting Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 306–08 (2004) (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment)).

[7] Id. at 22.

[8] Id. at 17.

[9] Id. at 15 (quoting Bandemer, 478 U.S. at 145 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment)) (brackets in original).

[10] Id. (quoting Vieth, 541 U.S. at 307 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment)).

[11] Id. at 30.

[12] Id. at 30–31 (quoting Gill v. Whitford, No. 16-1161, slip op. at 12–13 (U.S. June 18, 2018)).

[13] Id. at 31–33.

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.1
Overview of Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine

Valley Authority, the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine consists of seven rules generally known as: (1) the Rule Against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits; (2) Ripeness; (3) Judicial Minimalism; (4) the Last Resort Rule; (5) Standing and Mootness; (6) Constitutional Estoppel; and (7) the Constitutional-Doubt Canon.[1] Rules 1, 2, 5, and 6—the Rule Against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits, Ripeness, Standing and Mootness, and Constitutional Estoppel—inform whether a federal court should hear a case that has met the minimum Article III case-or-controversy requirements for a federal court to have jurisdiction.[2] As such, these four rules provide a further threshold that a case must clear for a federal court to hear it. By comparison, Rules 3, 4, and 7—Judicial Minimalism, the Last Resort Rule, and the Constitutional-Doubt Canon—address how a federal court should approach a constitutional question in a case before it.

The fundamental principle of the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine is a federal court should interpret the Constitution only when it is a "strict necessity."[3] The reason for this is threefold: first, because the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, its interpretation has broad implications; second, an unelected Supreme Court exercising judicial review to countermand actions by an elected Congress or Executive or state governments is in tension with principles of democracy; and third, because the Supreme Court's authority depends, as a practical matter, on the Executive enforcing and the people accepting its rulings the Court must be careful not to squander public goodwill by issuing ill-considered opinions.

The Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine provides federal courts procedural and substantive guidance on how to address cases involving constitutional questions. Rules 1, 2, and 5—the Rule Against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits,[4] Ripeness,[5] and Standing[6] and Mootness[7]—are procedural in nature and ensure that the Court only hears cases that are concrete, rather than speculative, and argued by parties genuinely and personally vested in the outcome such that they are the best advocates for their respective positions. Constitutional Estoppel bars a party from challenging a law's constitutionality when he or she is enjoying the benefits of such law.[8]

Rules 3, 4, and 7—Judicial Minimalism, the Last Resort Rule, and the Constitutional-Doubt Canon—inform how federal courts should resolve constitutional questions in cases before them. Rule 3, Judicial Minimalism, instructs federal courts to answer constitutional questions narrowly and with reference to the specific circumstances at hand. Rule 4, the Last Resort Rule, advises that Justices should resolve cases on non-constitutional

[1] Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346–48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). The Constitutional-Doubt Canon is sometimes referred to as the Avoidance Canon. For further discussion on the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine, see Andrew Nolan, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R43706, The Doctrine of Constitutional Avoidance: A Legal Overview (2014), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R43706.

[2] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1 ("The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects".).

[3] Rescue Army v. Mun. Ct. of L.A., 331 U.S. 549, 568 (1947).

[4] The Rule Against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits corresponds to the adversity requirement discussed in ArtIII.S2.C1.5.1 Overview of Adversity Requirement.

[5] For discussion on Ripeness, see ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1 Overview of Ripeness Doctrine.

[6] For discussion on Standing, see ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing.

[7] For discussion on Mootness, see ArtIII.S2.C1.8.1 Overview of Mootness Doctrine.

[8] Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U.S. 245, 255 (1947) ("[I]t is an elementary rule of constitutional law that one may not 'retain the benefits of the Act while attacking the constitutionality of one of its important conditions.'"). See also Buck v. Kuykendall, 267 U.S. 307, 316 (1925) ("[O]ne cannot in the same proceeding both assail a statute and rely upon it. Nor can one who avails himself of the benefits conferred by a statute deny its validity." (citations omitted)).

grounds, if possible, before resolving them on constitutional grounds. And Rule 7, the Constitutional-Doubt Canon, provides that courts should construe a statute to be constitutional if such a construction is plausible.

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.2 Judiciary in the Constitutional Framework

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court developed the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine to minimize concerns about unelected federal judges setting aside Congress's laws on constitutional grounds. Underlying the Constitution is the principle that government legitimacy depends on the consent of the people. Noting that "Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," the Declaration of Independence justified the colonies' separation from the British Crown, because it had, through "repeated injuries and usurpations," deprived the colonists of government that represented and protected their interests.[1]

Contemplating that popular sovereignty would guard against tyranny, the Framers provided for the people to elect the House of Representatives directly and the Senate and the Executive indirectly. Popular sovereignty, which the Framers viewed as necessary for a free and republican government, meant government by the majority.[2] The Framers, however, feared that conflicting opinions and rivalries among factions of citizens might cause political instability or, if a faction gained a political majority, harm "the public good and the rights of other citizens."[3] To avoid this, the Framers crafted a Constitution that disbursed the limited powers of the new American government across three departments: the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judiciary, each with a unique role in securing for the Republic "a steady, upright, and impartial administration of laws."[4]

The Framers were also concerned that different branches might attempt to expand their powers beyond those granted by the Constitution and upset the balance the Framers designed to "secure the blessings of liberty."[5] Consequently, the Framers provided each branch some

---

[1] The Declaration of Independence (1776).

[2] John Locke, Second Treatise § 97 (1689) ("And thus every Man, by consenting with others to make one Body Politick under one Government, puts himself under an Obligation to every one of that Society, to submit to the determination of the majority, and to be concluded by it; or else this original Compact, whereby he with others incorporates into one Society, would signifie nothing and be no Compact, if he be left free, and under no other ties, than he was in before in the state of Nature.").

[3] The Federalist No. 10 (James Madison). See also The Federalist No. 51 (James Madison) ("It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard one part of the society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of the society against the injustice of the other part. Different interests necessarily exist in different classes of citizens. If a majority be united by a common interest, the rights of the minority will be insecure.").

[4] Id. No. 50 (James Madison).

[5] U.S. Const. pmbl.

ability to offset the power of the other two.[6] Describing the division of federal power among the three branches in the Federalist No. 78, Alexander Hamilton identified the Judicial Branch as posing the least danger to the constitutional framework. He stated:

> Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive that, in a government in which they are separated from each other, the Judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution; because it will be least in a capacity to annoy or injure them. The executive not only dispenses the honors but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. The Judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of the society, and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither FORCE nor WILL but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficacy of its judgments.[7]

Although Hamilton viewed the Judicial Branch as the weakest of the branches, the Framers saw it as critical to preserving the rights of individuals and ensuring that the Legislative and Executive Branches did not exceed their constitutionally-granted powers.[8] Hamilton recognized the Constitution as superior to acts passed by Congress because the Constitution, by virtue of its ratification process,[9] manifests the intentions of the people, whereas acts of Congress merely manifest the intention of the people's agents.[10] He wrote: "[W]henever a particular statute contravenes the Constitution, it will be the duty of the judicial tribunals to adhere to the latter and disregard the former."[11]

Hamilton further described the Judiciary as the "bulwarks of a limited Constitution against legislative encroachments," stating: "[E]very act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void."[12] Hamilton also viewed the Judiciary as protecting minority interests from potential oppression by the majority, stating:

> This independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors which the arts of designing

---

[6] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

[7] Id.

[8] Id. ("The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited Constitution. By a limited Constitution, I understand one which contains certain specific exceptions to the legislative authority; such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bills of attainder, no ex-post-facto laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way then through the medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void. Without this, all the reservations of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing.").

[9] Id. No. 40 (James Madison) (describing the Constitution as being submitted to "the people themselves" for ratification). Delegates to state ratifying conventions were selected by popular vote. John Hart Ely, Democracy and Distrust, A Theory of Judicial Review 5 (1980).

[10] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) ("If there should be an irreconcilable variance between the [Constitution and a statute], that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents."). See The Federalist No. 49 (James Madison) ("As the people are the only legitimate fountain of power, and it is from them that the constitutional charter, under which the several branches of government hold their power is derived."); see also M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316, 404–05 (1819) (Marshall, C.J.) ("The government of the Union, then . . . is, emphatically and truly, a government of the people. In form, and in substance, it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be directly exercised on them, and for their benefit.").

[11] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) ("If there should be an irreconcilable variance between the [Constitution and a statute], that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.").

[12] Id.

> men, or the influence of particular conjunctures, sometimes disseminate among the people themselves, and which, though they speedily give place to better information, and more deliberate reflection, have a tendency, in the meantime, to occasion dangerous innovations in the government, and serious oppressions of the minor party in the community.[13]

Whether the Framers intended to authorize the Judiciary to set aside laws passed by the elected legislature, as Hamilton envisioned, has been the subject of debate from the Nation's earliest days. The Constitution does not expressly provide for judicial review. And while it is clear from the Federalist Papers that many Framers contemplated judicial review as including the power to invalidate acts that violated the Constitution, it is less clear whether delegates to the state ratification conventions agreed as to what judicial review might entail.[14]

Chief Justice John Marshall's opinion in his seminal 1803 decision, Marbury v. Madison firmly entrenched judicial review as a tenet of the new Republic.[15] Chief Justice Marshall saw judicial review as implicit in the Constitution because, among other reasons, written constitutions are the paramount law; legislative acts contrary to the Constitution are thereby void; and the Constitution provides for the judicial department to interpret the law. In Marbury, Chief Justice Marshall wrote:

> That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis, on which the whole American fabric has been erected. . . . This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns, to different departments, their respective powers. . . . Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution is void. . . . It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. . . . [I]n declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank. Thus, the particular phraseology of the constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle . . . that a law repugnant to the constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.[16]

---

[13] Id.

[14] There was not always consensus that the federal courts had the power to strike down laws as unconstitutional. President Andrew Jackson once opined: "[T]he opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both." Andrew Jackson, Veto Message (July 10, 1832), http://avalon.law.yale.edu/19th_century/ajveto01.asp. After identifying the twenty-five delegates with the greatest impact on the Constitutional Convention, historian Charles Beard identified those who either directly or indirectly supported "judicial control"—John Blair of Virginia, John Dickinson of Delaware, Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, Alexander Hamilton of New York, William Johnson of Connecticut, Rufus King of Massachusetts, James Madison of Virginia, Luther Martin of Maryland, George Mason of Virginia, Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, Robert Morris of Pennsylvania, William Paterson of New Jersey, Edmund Randolph of Virginia, George Washington of Virginia, Hugh Williamson of North Carolina, and James Wilson of Pennsylvania—either directly or indirectly supported "judicial control." Charles Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution 47 (Dover ed. 2006).

[15] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803). For an earlier case recognizing judicial review, see Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171 (1796). See also Herbert Wechsler, Principles, Politics & Fundamental Law (1961) ("The courts have both the title and the duty when a case is properly before them to review the actions of the other branches in the light of constitutional provisions, even though the action involves value choices . . . ."); William Michael Treanor, Judicial Review Before Marbury, 58 Stan. L. Rev. 455 (2005); Robert P. Frankel, Jr., Before Marbury: Hylton v. United States and the Origins of Judicial Review, 28 J. Sup. Ct Hist. 1 (2003).

[16] Marbury, 5 U.S. 137 at 176–80 (emphasis retained). See also Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 103 (1958) ("The Judiciary has the duty of implementing the constitutional safeguards that protect individual rights.").

Lending support to the notion that the Constitution contemplates judicial review, the Framers distinguished the Judicial Branch from the Legislative and Executive Branches by freeing it from most forms of political accountability.[17] Unlike the Legislative and Executive Branches, the Federal Judiciary is not subject to elections or term limits. Instead, the President nominates and the Senate approves Justices to the Supreme Court.[18] The Constitution further secures the Judiciary's independence from public pressure and Legislative and Executive Branch influence by providing Justices life tenure during Good Behavior[19] and preventing Congress from reducing the Justices' compensation.[20]

Congress, however, has some checks on the Judiciary. Justices can be impeached,[21] and the Exceptions Clause in Article III grants Congress the power to make "exceptions" and "regulations" to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction.[22] In addition, Congress can dilute the influence of individual Justices by increasing the number of Justices on the Court.[23] Finally, the Judiciary's reliance on the other branches to give effect to its rulings provides a further check: If the Judicial Branch's rulings are not enforced, the Judiciary becomes, in practical effect, a nullity, incapable of meaningfully performing its duty of preserving the Constitution.[24] Consequently, while the Judicial Branch is largely insulated from political pressure, it is not completely insulated.

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.3 Counter-Majoritarian Difficulty

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a

---

[17] The Federalist No. 49 (James Madison) ("The [Judiciary], by the mode of their appointment, as well as by the nature and permanency of it, are too far removed from the people to share much in their prepossessions."). See also id. No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) ("The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited Constitution. By a limited Constitution, I understand one which contains certain specific exceptions to the legislative authority; such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bills of attainder, no ex-post-facto laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way then through the medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void. Without this, all the reservations of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing.").

[18] U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2 ("[The President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint . . . Judges of the supreme Court . . . .").

[19] The Good Behavior Clause created a "permanent tenure of judicial offices" to ensure an "independent spirit in judges." The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton). See ArtIII.S1.10.2.3 Good Behavior Clause Doctrine.

[20] The Compensation Clause created a "fixed provision for [the judiciary's] support" to prevent the political branches from having power over a Justice's pecuniary remuneration and, with that, "power over his will." The Federalist No. 79 (Alexander Hamilton). See ArtIII.S1.10.3.1 Historical Background on Compensation Clause.

[21] Jared P. Cole & Todd Garvey, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R46013, Impeachment and the Constitution (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R46013.

[22] See Kevin Lewis, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R44967, Congress's Power over Courts: Jurisdiction Stripping and the Rule of Klein (2018), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R44967.

[23] Joanna Lampe, Cong. Rsch. Serv., LSB10562, "Court Packing": Legislative Control Over the Size of the Supreme Court (2020), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/LSB/LSB10562.

[24] Chief Justice John Marshall recognized this problem in Marbury v. Madison, ruling that while Marbury was entitled to his commission, the Court could not effectuate its delivery because the Judiciary Act of 1793's writs of mandamus provision was unconstitutional. 5 U.S. 137, 176 (1803) ("The authority, therefore, given to the supreme court, by the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, appears not to be warranted by the constitution; and it becomes necessary to enquire whether a jurisdiction, so conferred, can be exercised.").

State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine posits that unelected jurists should exercise caution in striking down laws on constitutional grounds. While Congress can amend statutes when it disagrees with the Supreme Court's statutory interpretations, Congress has no recourse when it disagrees with the Court's constitutional interpretations other than to amend the Constitution.[1] Consequently, judicial review may frustrate the public "by foreclosing all democratic outlet for the deep passions [an] issue arouses, by banishing the issue from the political forum that gives all participants, even the losers, the satisfaction of a fair hearing and an honest fight, [and] by continuing the imposition of a rigid national rule instead of allowing for regional differences."[2] The problem posed by an unelected Supreme Court holding Congress's laws to be unconstitutional and void has been described as the "counter-majoritarian difficulty."[3]

Because the Court relies on public goodwill to ensure its rulings have practical effect, the Court's opinions must be principled so that the public respects the Court's judgments, even when it disagrees with its conclusions. In short, the Supreme Court's authority depends on political majorities being willing to abide by rulings counter to their interests. As the Court observed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey: "the Court's power lies . . . in its legitimacy, a product of substance and perception that shows itself in the people's acceptance of the Judiciary as fit to determine what the Nation's law means and to declare what it demands."[4] Consequently, the Supreme Court must ensure the "peaceful coexistence of the counter-majoritarian implications of judicial review and the democratic principles upon which our Federal Government in the final analysis rests."[5] In part to minimize this perceived counter-majoritarian difficulty, the Court developed the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine to instruct federal courts on how to approach constitutional questions.

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.4 Ashwander and Rules of Constitutional Avoidance

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a

---

[1] John Hart Ely, Democracy and Distrust, A Theory of Judicial Review 4–5 (1980) ("[I]n non-constitutional contexts, the court's decisions are subject to overrule or alteration by ordinary statute. The court is standing in for the legislature, and if it has done so in a way the legislature does not approve, it can soon be corrected. When a court invalidates an act of the political branches on constitutional grounds, however, it is overruling their judgment, and normally doing so in a way that is not subject to 'correction' by the ordinary lawmaking process. Thus the central function, and it is at the same time the central problem of judicial review: a body that is not elected or otherwise politically responsibly in any significant way is telling the people's elected representatives that they cannot govern as they'd like.").

[2] See Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 1002 (1992) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

[3] Alexander M. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics 16–23 (1962). Bickel noted: W]hen the Supreme Court declares unconstitutional a legislative act or the action of an elected executive, it thwarts the will of representatives of the actual people of the here and now; it exercises control, not on behalf of the prevailing majority, but against it. . . . "[I]t is the reason the charge can be made that judicial review is undemocratic." Id. at 16–17.

[4] Casey, 505 U.S. at 865 (plurality opinion).

[5] United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 192 (1974) (Powell, J., concurring).

State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

From early on, the Supreme Court viewed setting aside Congress's laws on constitutional grounds as problematic and has avoided doing so "unless such adjudication is unavoidable."[1] For example, in the 1798 Calder v. Bull decision, Justice James Iredell stated: "If any act of Congress, or of the Legislature of a state, violates those constitutional provisions, it is unquestionably void; though, I admit, that as the authority to declare it void is of a delicate and awful nature, the court will never resort to that authority, but in a clear and urgent case."[2] Similarly, in the 1819 Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward decision, Chief Justice John Marshall wrote: "On more than one occasion, this court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of [whether a law is constitutional]; and has declared, that in no doubtful case, would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the constitution."[3] And, in the 1827 Ogden v. Saunders decision, Justice Bushrod Washington noted that judicial deference to the Legislative Branch means that laws should be presumed constitutional unless "proved beyond all reasonable doubt."[4] Later in the nineteenth century, Chief Justice Morrison Waite stated in the Union Pacific Railroad v. United States (The Sinking Fund Cases): "Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger."[5]

Over five decades later, Justice Louis Brandeis, in his influential concurrence in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, described the Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine as "a series of rules under which [the Court] has avoided passing upon a large part of all the constitutional questions pressed upon it for decision."[6] The Ashwander Rules[7] include:

- Rule 1) The Rule against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits. Parties to a case must be adverse to each other. Justice Brandeis stated: "The Court will not pass upon the constitutionality of legislation in a friendly, non-adversary, proceeding, declining

[1] Spector Motor Serv., Inc. v. McLaughlin, 323 U.S. 101, 105 (1944).

[2] Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 399 (1798) (Iredell, J.). Justice James Iredell further noted that the inverse was also true: "If, on the other hand, the Legislature of the Union, or the Legislature of any member of the Union, shall pass a law, within the general scope of their constitutional power, the Court cannot pronounce it to be void, merely because it is, in their judgment, contrary to the principles of natural justice. The ideas of natural justice are regulated by no fixed standard: the ablest and the purest men have differed upon the subject . . . ." Id.

[3] Trustees of Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 17 U.S. 518, 625 (1819) (Marshall, C.J.).

[4] Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. 213, 270 (1827) (Washington, J.) ("But if I could rest my opinion in favour of the constitutionality of the law on which the question arises, on no other ground than this doubt so felt and acknowledged, that alone would, in my estimation, be a satisfactory vindication of it. It is but a decent respect due to the wisdom, the integrity and the patriotism of the legislative body, by which any law is passed, to presume in favour of its validity, until its violation of the constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt.").

[5] Union Pacific Railroad v. United States (The Sinking Fund Cases), 99 U.S. 700, 718 (1878).

[6] Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 346 (1936) (Brandeis, J. concurring). In Ashwander, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes in a plurality opinion upheld Congress's constitutional authority to construct the Wilson Dam and dispose of the resulting electric energy. Id. at 326–30. Justice Brandeis argued that the Court should not have addressed the constitutional questions involved in the case, because Ashwander had not suffered an injury sufficient to bring the suit. Id. at 341–44. The Constitutional Avoidance Canon guides all federal courts. American Foreign Serv. Ass'n v. Garfinkel, 490 U.S. 153, 161 (1989).

[7] Ashwander, 297 U.S. at 346–48 (Brandeis, J. concurring). The Constitutional-Doubt Canon is sometimes referred to as the Avoidance Canon.

because to decide such questions 'is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest, and vital controversy between individuals.'"[8]

- Rule 2) Ripeness. The court should not resolve constitutional questions prematurely. As Justice Brandeis wrote: "The Court will not 'anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it'"[9] and "'[i]t is not the habit of the Court to decide questions of a constitutional nature unless absolutely necessary to a decision of the case.'"[10]
- Rule 3) Judicial Minimalism. The court should decide questions of constitutional law narrowly. Justice Brandeis stated: "The Court will not 'formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied.'"[11]
- Rule 4) The Last Resort Rule. If possible, a court should resolve a case on non-constitutional grounds instead of resolving it on constitutional grounds. Explaining this rule, Justice Brandeis stated: "The Court will not pass upon a constitutional question . . . if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed . . . . [I]f a case can be decided on either of two grounds, one involving a constitutional question, the other a question of statutory construction or general law, the Court will decide only the latter."[12] He further added: "Appeals from the highest court of a state challenging its decision of a question under the Federal Constitution are frequently dismissed because the judgment can be sustained on an independent state ground."[13]
- Rule 5) Standing and Mootness. The complainant should suffer an actual injury; as Justice Brandeis noted: "The Court will not pass upon the validity of a statute upon complaint of one who fails to show that he is injured by its operation."[14]
- Rule 6) Constitutional Estoppel. A party cannot challenge a law's constitutionality when he or she enjoys the benefits of such law.[15] Justice Brandeis stated: "The Court

---

[8] Id. at 346 (quoting Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345 (1892)). The Rule Against Feigned or Collusive Lawsuits corresponds to the adversity requirement discussed in ArtIII.S2.C1.5.1 Overview of Adversity Requirement.

[9] Id. at 346–47 (quoting Liverpool, N.Y. & Phila. S.S. Co. v. Comm'rs of Emigration, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885) and citing Proprietors of Charles River Bridge v. Proprietors of Warren Bridge, 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 420, 553 (1837); Trademark Cases, 100 U.S. 82, 96 (1879); Arizona v. California, 283 U.S. 423, 462–64 (1931); Abrams v. Van Schaick, 293 U.S. 188 (1934); and Wilshire Oil Co. v. United States, 295 U.S. 100 (1935)). The ripeness requirement is discussed, in ArtIII.S2.C1.7.1 Overview of Ripeness Doctrine.

[10] Ashwander, 297 U.S. at 347 (quoting Burton v. United States, 196 U.S. 283, 295 (1905)).

[11] Id. (quoting Liverpool, N.Y. & Phila. S.S. Co. v. Emigration Comm'rs, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885)).

[12] Id. (quoting Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R., 213 U.S. 175, 191 (1909); Light v. United States, 220 U.S. 523, 538 (1911)).

[13] Id. (citing Berea Coll. v. Ky., 211 U.S. 45, 53 (1908)).

[14] Id. at 347–48 (citing Columbus & Greenville Railway v. Miller, 283 U.S. 96, 99–100 (1939); Concordia Fire Institute Co. v. Illinois, 292 U.S. 535, 547 (1934); Corp. Comm'n of Okla. v. Lowe, 281 U.S. 431, 438 (1930); Sprout v. South Bend, 277 U.S. 163, 167 (1928); Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923); Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126 (1922); Heald v. District of Columbia, 259 U.S. 114, 123 (1922); Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U.S. 610, 621 (1915); Hatch v. Reardon, 204 U.S. 152, 160–61 (1907); Tyler v. The Judges, 179 U.S. 405 (1900)). Standing and mootness are discussed, in ArtIII.S2.C1.6.1 Overview of Standing and ArtIII.S2.C1.8.1 Overview of Mootness Doctrine, respectively.

[15] Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U.S. 245, 255 (1947) ("[I]t is an elementary rule of constitutional law that one may not 'retain the benefits of the Act while attacking the constitutionality of one of its important conditions.'" (citations omitted)). See also Buck v. Kuykendall, 267 U.S. 307, 316 (1925) ("[O]ne cannot in the same proceeding both assail a statute and rely upon it. Nor can one who avails himself of the benefits conferred by a statute deny its validity." (citations omitted)).

will not pass upon the constitutionality of a statute at the instance of one who has availed himself of its benefits."[16]

- Rule 7) The Constitutional-Doubt Canon. Courts should construe statutes to be constitutional if such a construction is plausible. Explaining this requirement, Justice Brandeis noted: "'When the validity of an act of the Congress is drawn in question, and even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised, it is a cardinal principle that this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.'"[17]

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.5 Judicial Minimalism

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Providing substantive guidance on how courts should address constitutional questions, judicial minimalism instructs that courts should not issue rulings "[in] broader [terms] than [are] required by the precise facts to which [the ruling] is to be applied"[1] or "formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied."[2] Instead, courts should limit their rulings to the facts of the instant case and avoid establishing broad precedents. Courts can use judicial minimalism to forestall ruling on politically sensitive issues, thereby allowing the elected legislature to craft a political resolution of the question.[3] In addition, by drafting opinions narrowly, Justices may find it easier to build consensus in the Court by reducing the scope of issues to which they must agree.

When employing judicial minimalism, courts frequently pass over questions of constitutional import to focus more narrowly on issues specific to the case. For instance, in Liverpool, N.Y. & Philadelphia Steamship Co. v. Commissioners on Emigration,[4] the Court was asked whether Congress could (1) ratify state laws that were previously struck down as unconstitutional state regulation of foreign commerce, or (2) bar claims for damages that the

---

[16] Ashwander, 297 U.S. at 348 (citing St. Louis Malleable Casting Co. v. Prendergast Construction Co., 260 U.S. 469 (1923); Wall v. Parrot Silver & Copper Co. 244 U.S. 407, 411–12 (1917); Great Falls Manufacturing Co. v. Garland, 124 U.S. 581 (1888)).

[17] Id. (quoting Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932) and citing Interstate Com. Comm'n v. Or.-Wash. R.R. & Navigation Co., 288 U.S. 14, 40 (1933); Lucas v. Alexander, 279 U.S. 573, 577 (1929); Richmond Screw Anchor Co. v. United States, 275 U.S. 331, 346 (1928); Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1928); Mo. Pac. R.R. v. Boone, 270 U.S. 466, 471–72 (1926); Panama R.R. v. Johnson, 264 U.S. 375, 390 (1924); Linder v. United States, 268 U.S. 5, 17–18 (1922); Texas v. E. Tex. R.R., 258 U.S. 204, 217 (1922); Baender v. Barnett, 255 U.S. 224 (1921); United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U.S. 394, 401 (1916); United States v. Del. & Hudson Co., 213 U.S. 366, 407–08 (1909)).

[1] Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 347 (1936) (quoting Liverpool, N.Y. & Phila. S.S. Co. v. Comm'rs of Emigration, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885)).

[2] Liverpool, N.Y. & Phila. S.S. Co., 113 U.S. at 39.

[3] See, e.g., Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529 (2013) (limiting ruling to Voting Rights Act (VRA) Section 4 and suggesting that Congress revisit related VRA Section 5).

[4] Liverpool, 113 U.S. 33.

unconstitutional state laws caused.[5] Noting that the case presented questions as to "the constitutionality of the act of congress" that were "of very grave importance,"[6] the Court held it was "constrained to reverse the judgment, without deciding any of them."[7] In making this decision, the Court observed it was bound by two rules: "one, never to anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it; the other, never to formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is applied."[8] Focusing on the case's record, the Court found it incomplete and remanded the case for a new trial to determine the missing facts.[9]

Later, in Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colorado Civil Rights Commission, the Court passed over complex constitutional issues to resolve the case on grounds specific to its facts. In Masterpiece Cakeshop, the question before the Supreme Court was whether a Colorado civil rights statute, which protected gay persons from being discriminated against when they were trying to procure goods and services, violated the First Amendment by requiring a baker to create a wedding cake for a same-sex couple. The baker viewed creating the cake to be an expressive artistic statement, and the civil rights statute as compelling him to use his artistry to express a message endorsing same-sex marriage despite his "sincere religious beliefs and convictions" to the contrary.[10] Recognizing the conundrum presented by the case, the Court commented that while "religious and philosophical objections [to same-sex marriage] are protected, it is a general rule that such objections do not allow business owners . . . to deny protected persons equal access to goods and services under a neutral and generally applicable public accommodations law."[11] The Court, however, also took note of the baker's view that requiring him to create the cake amounted to forcing him to make an artistic expressive statement contrary to his religious beliefs.

In a decision written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the Court adopted a judicial minimalist approach. Instead of addressing the constitutional questions raised by the interplay of the Colorado civil rights statute and the baker's First Amendment free exercise and free speech rights, the Court found that, during hearings before the Colorado Civil Rights Commission, several commissioners denigrated the baker's religious beliefs, thereby violating his free exercise rights. Finding that "the Commission's hostility was inconsistent with the First Amendment's guarantee that our laws be applied in a manner that is neutral toward religion," the Court ruled in favor of the baker.[12] The Court emphasized, however, the limited application of Masterpiece Cakeshop to other cases, stating:

> The outcome of cases like this in other circumstances must await further elaboration in the courts, all in the context of recognizing that these disputes must be resolved with

[5] Id. at 36.

[6] Id.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. Justice Stanley Matthews also cited ripeness as a reason to remand the case. Id. at 39.

[9] Id.

[10] Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colo. Civil Rights Comm'n, No. 16-111, slip op. at 1–2 (U.S. June 4, 2018).

[11] Id. at 9.

[12] Id. at 18. Discussing the actions of the commissioners, the Court stated: "The official expressions of hostility to religion in some of the commissioners' comments—comments that were not disavowed at the Commission or by the State at any point in the proceedings that led to affirmance of the order—were inconsistent with what the Free Exercise Clause requires." Id. The Court also noted that the Commission's treatment of the baker differed from its treatment of other bakers who had refused to prepare cakes with messages that they found offensive. The Court stated: "The Commission's disparate consideration of Phillips' case compared to the cases of the other bakers suggests the same." Id.

> tolerance, without undue disrespect to sincere religious beliefs, and without subjecting gay persons to indignities when they seek goods and services in an open market.[13]

A variation on the judicial minimalist approach is the practice of "assuming but not deciding" a constitutional issue. In these decisions, the Court foregoes resolving an underlying constitutional question, in favor of treating the constitutional question as resolved for the limited purpose of deciding the instant case. Such an approach enables the Court to resolve the dispute at issue without determining the underlying constitutional question. For instance, in National Aeronautics & Space Administration (NASA) v. Nelson, the Court chose to "assume, without deciding," that the Constitution protects informational privacy.[14] Based on this assumption, the Court found that NASA's background checks did not violate the "assumed" constitutionally protected right to informational privacy. While "assuming but not deciding" allows the Court to resolve time-sensitive disputes while deferring resolution of thorny or politically sensitive constitutional questions, some have characterized the approach as disingenuous. Arguing that the NASA decision "makes no sense," Justice Antonin Scalia, while concurring in the judgment, wrote: "The Court decides that the Government did not violate the right to informational privacy without deciding whether there is a right to informational privacy . . . ."[15]

In summary, judicial minimalism enables the Court to develop binding precedent on a legal issue slowly, thereby providing opportunity for the government's Legislative and Executive Branches to resolve contested constitutional issues through the political process. Judicial minimalism further alleviates the counter-majoritarian difficulty because the resulting decisions are unlikely to have far-reaching precedential impacts, while still resolving the case before the court. Judicial minimalism, however, may lead to decisions that provide limited guidance to future courts, to the Legislative and Executive Branches, and to the public as to what the Constitution permits.

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.6 Last Resort Rule

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

[13] Id. The Court further emphasized the ruling's narrowness, stating: "Given all these considerations, it is proper to hold that whatever the outcome of some future controversy involving facts similar to these, the Commissioners' actions here violated the Free Exercise Clause; and its order must be set aside." Id. at 3. See also Scheutte v. Coal. to Defend Affirmative Action, 572 U.S 291, 314 (2014) (ruling on Michigan referendum, rather than broader racial issues); Harris v. Quinn, 573 U.S. 616, 656 (2014) (refusing to extend Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)).

[14] National Aeronautics & Space Admin. v. Nelson, 562 U.S, 134, 138 (2011) (Alito, J.) ("We assume, without deciding, that the Constitution protects a privacy right of the sort mentioned in Whalen and Nixon. We hold, however, that the challenged portions of the Government's background check do not violate this right in the present case.").

[15] Id. at 165 (Scalia, J., concurring) (emphasis retained). Justice Antonin Scalia further noted: "I fail to see the minimalist virtues in delivering a lengthy opinon analyzing that right while coyly noting that the right is 'assumed' rather than 'decided.'" Id.

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Under the Last Resort Rule, a court should "not pass upon a constitutional question . . . if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed."[1] Accordingly, if a court can resolve a case on both constitutional and non-constitutional grounds, the court should do so on non-constitutional grounds.[2] By doing so, the court avoids creating constitutional precedent unnecessarily, while giving the political process time to resolve contentious constitutional issues. Because the Last Resort Rule informs the order in which the Court should address constitutional and non-constitutional questions in a case, it is sometimes described as a "rule of judicial procedure."[3]

An example of the Court's use of the Last Resort Rule is its decision in Bond v. United States.[4] In Bond, federal prosecutors charged Carol Bond with violating Section 229 of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act (CWCIA) when she caused "a minor thumb burn readily treated by rinsing with water" to her husband's lover by applying toxic chemicals to the paramour's car, mailbox, and door knob.[5] Bond argued that Section 229 (1) "exceeded Congress's enumerated powers and invaded powers reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment"[6] and (2) did not apply to her because "her conduct, though reprehensible, was not at all 'warlike.'"[7] Faced with resolving Bond on either statutory or constitutional grounds, the Court, relying on the Last Resort Rule, considered first whether it could resolve the case based on Bond's argument that Section 229 did not apply to her actions.[8] After analyzing the CWCIA, the Court concluded that Congress did not intend for Section 229 to apply to Bond's circumstance.[9]

---

[1] Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 347 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). See also Eustis v. Bolles, 150 U.S. 361, 366 (1893) ("[W]here the record discloses that if a question has been raised and decided adversely to a party claiming the benefit of a provision of the constitution or laws of the United States, another question, not federal has been also raised and decided against such party, and the decision of the latter question is sufficient, notwithstanding the federal question, to sustain the judgment, this court will not review the judgment.").

[2] Berea Coll. v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45, 53 (1908) ("[W]hen a state court decides a case upon two grounds, one Federal and the other non-Federal, this court will not disturb the judgment if the non-Federal ground, fairly construed, sustains the decision."); Allen v. Arguimbau, 198 U.S. 149, 154–55 (1905) ("[I]f the judgment rested on two grounds, one involving a Federal question and the other not, or if it does not appear on which of two grounds the judgment was based, and the ground independent of a Federal question is sufficient in itself to sustain it, this court will not take jurisdiction."); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U.S. 590, 636 (1874) ("If [the judgment] was erroneously decided against plaintiff in error, then this court must further inquire, whether there is any other matter or issue adjudged by the State court, which is sufficiently broad to maintain the judgment of that court, notwithstanding the error in deciding the issue raised by the Federal question. If this is found to be the case, the judgment must be affirmed without inquiring into the soundness of the decision on such other matter or issue.").

[3] Antonin Scalia & Bryan A. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 251 (2012).

[4] Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844 (2014).

[5] Id. at 852.

[6] Id. at 853. Discussing Bond's constitutional claim, the Court noted that, under the Constitution, the states retained "broad authority to enact legislation for the public good-what we have often called a 'police power.'" Id. at 854 (citing United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 567 (1995)). As a consequence, the Court explained, "[a] criminal act committed wholly within a State 'cannot be made an offence against the United States, unless it have some relation to the execution of a power of Congress, or to some matter within the jurisdiciton of the United States.'" Id. (quoting United States v. Fox, 95 U.S. 670, 672 (1878)).

[7] Id. at 853.

[8] Id. at 855.

[9] Id. at 866 ("[I]f section 229 reached Bond's conduct, it would mark a dramatic departure from that constitutional structure and a serious reallocation of criminal law enforcement authority between the Federal Government and the States. Absent a clear statement of that purpose, we will not presume Congress to have authoried such a stark intrusion into traditional state authority.").

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.6
Last Resort Rule

Based on the Last Resort Rule, the Supreme Court has remanded cases involving constitutional questions to lower courts to see if the case can be resolved on statutory grounds. For example, in Escambia County v. McMillan, the Supreme Court remanded a case affirmed by the appellate court on constitutional grounds because the district court also found a statutory violation.[10] The Supreme Court instructed the appellate court to determine if it could affirm the district court's decision based on the statutory rather than the constitutional ruling.[11] In other cases, the Court has avoided ruling on a constitutional question by deciding a case based on statutory reasons not considered by the lower court.[12] For instance, the Court resolved Siler v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad by ruling that the Railroad Commission violated a Kentucky statute—an issue the Kentucky state court had not considered.[13] By reaching this conclusion, the Court avoided addressing Siler's constitutional questions.[14]

Siler concerned questions of federal and state law. While the Supreme Court interpreted the Kentucky statute in Siler, the Court often remands cases involving constitutional and state law issues to state courts so they can first resolve state law questions. Consistent with this approach, the Supreme Court has dismissed state court appeals based on constitutional questions if state law can sustain the judgment.[15] Besides avoiding constitutional questions, remanding state law questions to state courts has other advantages: First, the Court avoids using its resources to decide questions where its decisions would be advisory.[16] Second, the Court acknowledges state expertise and autonomy to interpret state laws.[17] Declining to rule on a constitutional question when a ruling on either of two state laws could resolve the case,[18] the Court observed:

> The doctrine that the Court will not "anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it" . . . is a well-settled doctrine of this Court

[10] Escambia Cnty. v. McMillan, 466 U.S. 48, 51 (1984).

[11] Id.

[12] Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R., 213 U.S. 175, 191 (1909) ("This court . . . can, if it deem it proper, decide the local questions only, and omit to decide the federal questions."). See also Jean v. Nelson, 472 U.S. 846 (1985); United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84 (1985); Gulf Oil Co. v. Bernard, 452 U.S. 89 (1981). But see Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89 (1984) (holding Eleventh Amendment bars federal courts from hearing state law cases when the state is the defendant).

[13] Siler, 213 U.S. at 194

[14] Id. at 193.

[15] Berea Coll. v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45, 53 (1908) ("[W]hen a state court decides a case upon two grounds, one Federal and the other non-Federal, this court will not disturb the judgment if the non-Federal ground, fairly construed, sustains the decision." (citations omitted)). See also Allen v. Arguimbau, 198 U. S. 149, 154–55 (1905).

[16] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1040–41 (1983) ("Respect for the independence of state courts, as well as avoidance of rendering advisory opinions, have been the cornerstones of this Court's refusal to decide cases where there is an adequate and independent state ground. It is precisely because of this respect for state courts, and this desire to avoid advisory opinions, that we do not wish to continue to decide issues of state law that go beyond the opinion that we review, or to require state courts to reconsider cases to clarify the grounds of their decisions."). See also Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 79 (1938) ("[Federal] [s]upervision over either the legislative or the judicial action of the states is in no case permissible except as to matters by the constitution specifically authorized or delegated to the United States. Any interference with either, except as thus permitted, is an invasion of the authority of the state, and, to that extent, a denial of its independence.").

[17] Giles v. Teasley, 193 U.S. 146, 160 (1904) ("[I]f the decision of a state court rests on an independent ground—one which does not necessarily include a determination of the Federal right claimed—or upon a ground broad enough to sustain it without deciding the Federal question raised, this court has no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the state court." (citations omitted)). See also Wade v. Lawder, 165 U.S. 624, 628 (1897) ("The decree rested on grounds broad enough to sustain it without reference to any federal question."); Dower v. Richards, 151 U.S. 658, 666 (1894) ("[A] writ of error can be sustained only when the decision of the state court is against a right claimed under the constitution and laws of the United States. And if the decision of the state court rests on an independent ground of law, not involving any federal question, this court has no jurisdiction." (citations omitted)).

[18] Clay v. Sun Ins. Office Ltd., 363 U.S. 207 (1960).

> which, because it carries a special weight in maintaining proper harmony in federal-state relations, must not yield to the claim of the relatively minor inconvenience of postponement of decision.[19]

Third, the Court avoids having to rule on unfamiliar state law. In Spector Motor Service v. McLaughlin, the Court ruled that federal litigation should be held pending state court resolution of "intertwined" local law.[20] Justice Felix Frankfurter stated:

> [W]e have insisted that federal courts do not decide questions of constitutionality on the basis of preliminary guesses regarding local law. Avoidance of such guesswork, by holding the litigation in the federal courts until definite determinations on local law are made by the state courts, merely heeds this time-honored canon of constitutional adjudication.[21]

The Court has used the Last Resort Rule to avoid politically contentious issues. For example, in Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., the Court directed the parties to litigate their state law questions in state court and ordered the lower federal court to hold the federal case in abeyance pending the state litigation. By doing this, the Court avoided ruling on the politically charged issue of whether the Railroad Commission of Texas violated the Constitution by requiring white Pullman conductors, and not black Pullman porters, to operate sleeping cars. Reasoning that "[s]uch constitutional adjudication plainly can be avoided if a definitive ruling on the state issue would terminate the controversy," Justice Frankfurter stated: "[The equal protection issue] touches a sensitive area of social policy upon which the federal courts ought not to enter unless no alternative to its adjudication is open."[22]

ArtIII.S2.C1.10.7 Constitutional-Doubt Canon

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Posited on the premise that Congress "legislates in the light of constitutional limitations,"[1] the Constitutional-Doubt Canon provides that federal courts should construe statutes so that

---

[19] Id. at 211–12 (citations omitted).

[20] Spector Motor Serv. v. McLaughlin, 323 U.S. 101, 105 (1944).

[21] Id. See also Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315, 333 (1943); City of Chicago v. Fieldcrest Dairies, 316 U.S. 168, 173 (1942).

[22] R.R. Comm'n of Tex. v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 498 (1941). See also Harris Cnty. Comm'r v. Moore, 420 U.S. 77, 88–89 (1975) (holding federal court to abstain until Texas court resolves state constitutional questions); Reetz v. Bozanich, 397 U.S. 82, 87 (1970) ("[T]he federal court should have stayed its hand while the parties repaired to the state courts for a resolution of their state constitutional questions.").

[1] Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 191 (1991). See also Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64 (1981) ("The Congress is a coequal branch of government whose Members take the same oath as [the judiciary] to uphold the Constitution of the United States.").

they do not violate the Constitution.[2] Describing the Constitutional-Doubt Canon, Justice Louis Brandeis stated: "When the validity of an act . . . is drawn in question, and even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised . . . [the Court] will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided."[3] Consequently, if a statute is susceptible to two plausible interpretations, one of which violates the Constitution, the Constitutional-Doubt Canon instructs courts to choose the interpretation consistent with the Constitution.[4] If the statute is not susceptible to a plausible constitutional interpretation, the Constitutional-Doubt Canon is inapplicable.[5] The Constitutional-Doubt Canon cannot be construed to make a statute broader[6] or be applied to Executive actions.[7]

[2] McFadden v. United States, 576 U.S. 186, 197 (2015) ("[T]his canon 'is a tool for choosing between competing plausible interpretations of a provision.'" (citations omitted)); Warger v. Shauers, 574 U.S. 40, 50 (2014) ("[The canon] 'has no application in the absence of . . . ambiguity.'" (citations omitted)); Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 211 (2009) ("Although this Court will often strain to construe legislation so as to save it against constitutional attack, it must not and will not carry this to the point of perverting the purpose of a statute."); Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 515 (1964) ("[T]his Court will not consider the abstract question of whether Congress might have enacted a valid statute but instead must ask whether the statute that Congress did enact will permissibly bear a construction rendering it free from constitutional defects."). See also Clark v. Martinez, 543 U.S. 371, 381 (2005); United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Coop., 532 U.S. 483, 494 (2001).

[3] Ashwander v. Tenn. Valley Auth., 297 U.S. 288, 348 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). See United States v. Palomar-Santiago, No. 20-437, slip op. at 7 (U.S. May 24, 2021) ("Courts should indeed construe statutes 'to avoid not only the conclusion that [they are] unconstitutional, but also grave doubts upon that score.'" (citations omitted)); Nielsen v. Preap, No. 16-1363, slip op. at 25 (U.S. Mar. 19, 2019) ("This canon provides that '[w]hen a serious doubt is raised about the constitutionality of an act of Congress, . . . this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.'" (citations omitted)); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932) ("When the validity of an act of the Congress is drawn in question, and even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised, it is a cardinal principle that this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided."); Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1927) ("[A]s between two possible interpretations of a statute, by one of which it would be unconstitutional and by the other valid, our plain duty is to adopt that which will save the Act. Even to avoid a serious doubt the rule is the same."); United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U.S. 394, 401 (1916) ("A statute must be construed, if fairly possible, so as to avoid not only the conclusion that it is unconstitutional, but also grave doubts upon that score.").

[4] Jennings v. Rodriguez, No. 15-1204, slip op. at 12 (U.S. Feb. 27, 2018) ("When 'a serious doubt' is raised about the constitutionality of an act of Congress, 'it is a cardinal principle that this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.'" (citations omitted)); Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 238 (1998) (construction of statute that avoids invalidation best reflects congressional will); United States v. Harris, 347 U.S. 612, 618 (1954) ("[I]f this general class of offenses can be made constitutionally definite by a reasonable construction of the statute, this Court is under a duty to give the statute that construction."); United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41, 45 (1953) (noting canon is controlling "in the choice of fair alternatives" (citations omitted)); Michaelson v. United States, 266 U.S. 42 (1924) (construing Clayton Act narrowly to avoid constitutional questions); United States ex rel. Att'y Gen. v. Del. & Hudson Co., 213 U.S. 366, 407 (1909) ("[W]hen the constitutionality of a statute is assailed, if the statute be reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, by one of which it would be unconstitutional and by the other valid, it is our plain duty to adopt that construction which will save the statute from constitutional infirmity."). See also Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844 (2014); Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 405–06 & n.40 (2010); Gonzales v. Carhart, 550 U.S. 124, 153–54 (2007); Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001); United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64, 78 (1994); Peretz v. United States, 501 U.S. 923, 929–30 (1991); Gomez v. United States, 490 U.S. 858, 864 (1989); Public Citizen v. Dep't of Just., 491 U.S. 440, 465–67 (1989); Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Fla. Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988); Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330–331 (1988); Lowe v. Sec. & Exch. Comm'n, 472 U.S. 181, 227 (1985) (White, J., concurring); Schneider v. Smith, 390 U.S. 17, 26 (1968); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932); United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U.S. 394, 401 (1916); Hooper v. California, 155 U.S. 648, 657 (1895).

[5] Jennings, No. 15-1204, slip op. at 12 ("In the absence of more than one plausible construction, the canon simply 'has no application.'" (citations omitted)); Moore Ice Cream Co. v. Rose, 289 U.S. 373, 379 (1933) ("But avoidance of a difficulty will not be pressed to the point of disingenuous evasion. Here the intention of the Congress is revealed too distinctly to permit us to ignore it because of mere misgivings as to power. The problem must be faced and answered.").

[6] United States v. Davis, No. 18-431, slip op. at 17 (U.S. June 24, 2019) ("[W]hen presented with two "fair alternatives," this Court has sometimes adopted the narrower construction of a criminal statute to avoid having to hold it unconstitutional if it were construed more broadly. But no one before us has identified a case in which this Court has invoked the canon to expand the reach of a criminal statute in order to save it. Yet that is exactly what the government seeks here.").

The Constitutional-Doubt Canon provides a way for the Court to avoid ruling on constitutional questions that are contentious or where the Court's interpretation would meet with general, public disfavor. By choosing to interpret a statute to conform with constitutional requirements, the Court communicates to Congress, in effect, what the Court believes the Constitution requires. As Congress has the power to amend law, if Congress disagrees with how the Court has interpreted a statute, Congress can revise the statute. While this leaves open the possibility that the Court will have to revisit the constitutional question in the context of the revised statute, the Constitutional-Doubt Canon has allowed the issue to be publicly vetted further and possibly resolved through the political process. If Congress does not amend the statute, the Court's constitutionally compliant interpretation of the statute governs despite another interpretation having possibly been a more natural reading of the statute.

The Court has stressed that the Constitutional-Doubt Canon does not give courts leeway to interpret a statute in a manner that effectively rewrites the statute to conform to the Constitution.[8] In United States v. Locke, the Court stated: "[w]e cannot press statutory construction 'to the point of disingenuous evasion' even to avoid a constitutional question."[9] Instead, applying conventional tools of statutory interpretation, the Court must find the statute to be subject to two valid interpretations. In Jennings v. Rodriguez, the Court stated: "The canon of constitutional avoidance 'comes into play only when, after the application of ordinary textual analysis, the statute is found to be susceptible of more than one construction.'"[10]

The Constitutional-Doubt Canon has been criticized as incentivizing the Court to interpret statutes in ways that appear to defy the statute's express language in order to avoid resolving contentious constitutional questions.[11] However, the Court may believe that a political, rather than judicial, resolution to certain issues would be preferable for the Nation. For instance, in United States v. Seeger[12] and Welsh v. United States,[13] the Court was confronted with whether the conscientious objector provisions of Section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act violated the Constitution's Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses. Among other things, Section 6(j) specified "belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior

[7] Fed. Commc'ns Comm'n v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502 (2009) ("The so-called canon of constitutional avoidance is an interpretive tool, counseling that ambiguous statutory language be construed to avoid serious constitutional doubts. We know of no precedent for applying it to limit the scope of authorized executive action.").

[8] Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Fin. Prot. Bureau, No. 19-7, slip op. at 29 (U.S. June 19, 2020) ("Constitutional avoidance is not a license to rewrite Congress's work to say whatever the Constitution needs it to say in a given situation. Without a proffered interpretation that is rooted in the statutory text and structure, and would avoid the constitutional violation we have identified, we take Congress at its word . . . ."); Jennings v. Rodriguez, No. 15-1204, slip op. at 14 (U.S. Feb. 27, 2018) ("Spotting a constitutional issue does not give a court the authority to rewrite a statute as it pleases. Instead, the canon permits a court to 'choos[e] between competing plausible interpretations of a statutory text.'" (citations omitted)); McFadden v. United States, 576 U.S. 186, 197 (2015); Warger v. Shauers, 574 U.S. 40, 50 (2014); Yu Cong Eng v. Trinidad, 271 U.S. 500, 518 (1926) ("[A]mendment may not be substituted for construction, and . . . a court may not exercise legislative functions to save the law from conflict with constitutional limitation.").

[9] United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 96 (1984) (quoting Moore Ice Cream Co., 289 U.S. at 379).

[10] Jennings v. Rodriguez, No. 15-1204, slip op. at (842) (U.S. Feb. 27, 2018) (citations omitted). See also Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1 (2009).

[11] See, e.g., Ullman v. United States, 350 U.S. 422, 43 (1956); Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 867–68 (2014) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (commenting that Court applied the Constitutional-Doubt Canon incorrectly when it interpreted the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act).

[12] United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965).

[13] Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970).

to those arising from any human relation, but does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code" for conscientious-objector status.[14]

Using the Constitutional-Doubt Canon, the Court avoided ruling on what the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses consider "religion" in Seeger and Welsh, allowing more time for public consensus to form on the issue. In Seeger, the draft board denied conscientious-objector status to Daniel Seeger because he did not meet the Section 6(j) requirement of having beliefs based on a Supreme Being. Despite Section 6(j) expressly precluding beliefs based on "philosophical views" or a "personal moral code," the Court interpreted Section 6(j)'s "belief in a relation to a Supreme Being" requirement to cover Seeger's "sincere and meaningful belief which occupies in the life of its possessor a place parallel to that filled by the God of those admittedly qualifying for the exemption."[15] By finding the draft board to have misread Section 6(j), the Court avoided addressing the implications of the case for the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses, while finding Seeger entitled to conscientious-objector status. Hinting at how the Court might have resolved the case on constitutional grounds, the Court noted that "[t]his construction avoids imputing to Congress an intent to classify different religious beliefs, exempting some and excluding others, and is in accord with the well-established congressional policy of equal treatment for those whose opposition to service is grounded in their religious tenets."[16]

The Supreme Court's Section 6(j) interpretation in Seeger, however, provided limited guidance to draft boards on how to distinguish persons with "essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views"[17] who did not qualify for conscientious-objector status from those with "[a] sincere and meaningful belief . . . parallel to that filled by the God of those admittedly qualifying for exemption"[18] who did. The result was that several years later the Court was confronted with a near replica of Seeger. In Welsh, Elliott Ashton Welsh II challenged the draft board's denial of conscientious objector status under Seeger.[19] Welsh, however, characterized his beliefs as not religious.[20] Revisiting Section 6(j), the Court construed it to cover individuals, like Welsh, "whose consciences, spurred by deeply held moral, ethical, or religious beliefs, would give them no rest or peace if they allowed themselves to become a part of an instrument of war"[21] notwithstanding Section 6(j)'s express language that "essentially political,

[14] Seeger, 380 U.S. at 165 (emphasis added); see also Act of June 24, 1948, ch. 625, tit. I, § 6(j), 62 Stat. 609, 612–13 (amended by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, Pub. L. No. 90-40, § 5, 81 Stat. 100, 104 (codified at 50 U.S.C. § 3806(j))).

[15] Seeger, 380 U.S. at 176.

[16] Id.

[17] Act of June 24, 1948, ch. 625, tit. I, § 6(j), 62 Stat. 609, 612–13 (amended by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, Pub. L. No. 90-40, § 5, 81 Stat. 100, 104 (codified at 50 U.S.C. § 3806(j))).

[18] Seeger, 380 U.S. at 176.

[19] Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970). Mr. Welsh had been sentenced to prison for three years for "refusing to submit to induction into the Armed Forces" on June 1, 1966. Welsh, 398 U.S. at 335. In 1967, Congress revised the conscientious objector exclusion provision, deleting language providing that "[r]eligious training and belief" means "an individual's belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation" so that the statute provided that "'religious training and belief' does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal code." Military Selective Service Act of 1967, Pub. L. No. 90-40, § 7, 81 Stat. 100, 104 (codified at 50 U.S.C. § 3806(j)). On September 23, 1968, the Ninth Circuit denied Mr. Welsh's appeal of his conviction. Welsh v. United States, 404 F.2d 1078 (9th Cir. 1968). In its Welsh decision, the Supreme Court referenced Section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act "as it read during the period relevant to this case," which was the pre-1967 language of Section 6(j).

[20] Welsh, 398 U.S. at 341. The opinion notes that while Welsh "originally characterized his beliefs as nonreligious, he later upon reflection . . . declared that his beliefs were 'certainly religious in the ethical sense of the word.'" Id.

[21] Id. at 344.

sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code"[22] did not qualify for conscientious-objector status. In short, the Seeger and Welsh Courts essentially interpreted Section 6(j)'s definition of religious belief to encompass theistic and non-theistic worldviews depending on "whether the beliefs professed by a registrant are sincerely held and whether they are, in [the conscientious objector applicant's] own scheme of things, religious"[23] despite Congress's express language in Section 6(j) excluding "political, sociological, or philosophical views, or a merely personal moral code."[24]

One criticism of the Constitutional-Doubt Canon is that it can result in tenuous statutory interpretations that undermine the Court's credibility and defeat the purpose of judicial review to "declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void."[25] For instance, in his concurring opinion in Welsh, Justice John Marshall Harlan II expressed dismay with the Court's use of statutory construction in Seeger and Welsh,[26] stating: "[T]he liberties taken with the statute both in Seeger and today's decision cannot be justified in the name of the familiar doctrine of construing federal statutes in a manner that will avoid all possible constitutional infirmities in them."[27] Justice Harlan observed that the natural reading of Section 6(j) and its legislative history clearly indicated Congress's intent that conscientious-objector status be limited to those whose beliefs were theistic. The result of the Court's interpretations, in Justice Harlan's view, deprived Section 6(j) of "all meaning in order to avert the collision between its plainly intended purpose and the commands of the Constitution."[28] Nevertheless, the Constitutional-Doubt Canon provided a way for the Court to return the contentious issue to the political branches for further debate and consideration.

ArtIII.S2.C1.11 Federal Question Jurisdiction

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitution authorizes the federal courts to exercise jurisdiction over all cases "arising under" the Constitution or the laws or treaties of the United States. The federal courts' power to hear such cases is often referred to as "arising under" jurisdiction or "federal

---

[22] Act of June 24, 1948, ch. 625, tit. I, § 6(j), 62 Stat. 609, 612–13 (amended by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, Pub. L. No. 90-40, § 5, 81 Stat. 100, 104 (codified at 50 U.S.C. § 3806(j))).

[23] Seeger, 380 U.S. at 185; Welsh, 398 U.S. at 339.

[24] Act of June 24, 1948, ch. 625, tit. I, § 6(j), 62 Stat. 609, 612–13 (amended by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, Pub. L. No. 90-40, § 5, 81 Stat. 100, 104 (codified at 50 U.S.C. § 3806(j))).

[25] The Federalist No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton).

[26] Welsh, 398 U.S. at 344 (Harlan, J., concurring) ("Candor requires me to say that I joined the Court's opinion in [Seeger] only with the gravest misgiving as to whether it was a legitimate exercise in statutory construction, and today's decision convinces me that in doing so I made a mistake which I should now acknowledge.").

[27] Id. at 345.

[28] Id. at 354.

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1
Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction question" jurisdiction.[1] The Supreme Court has explained that a case arises under the Constitution or laws of the United States "whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either."[2]

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.2 Historical Background on Federal Question Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Near the beginning of the Constitutional Convention, the delegates expressed an intent to create a Federal Judiciary with jurisdiction to hear cases arising under federal statutory law.[1] Federal jurisdiction over cases involving the Constitution and treaties was added to drafts of Article III later in the Convention.[2] Even as the Framers planned to vest federal question jurisdiction in the federal courts, they generally accepted that state courts would play a significant role in interpreting and applying federal law and did not make the constitutional grant of jurisdiction over cases arising under federal law exclusive to the federal courts.[3] On the other hand, the Framers entertained concerns about whether state courts would apply federal law correctly, uniformly, and without bias.[4] To mitigate those concerns, the Constitution allowed for Supreme Court appellate review of state judicial decisions involving issues related to federal treaties, statutes, or constitutional law.[5] The Constitution also granted Congress

---

[1] Cases arising under the Constitution or federal law are just one of several categories of cases that the Constitution authorizes the federal courts to hear. See also, e.g., ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States; ArtIII.S2.C2.1 Overview of Supreme Court Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C2.5 Supreme Court Review of State Court Decisions; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C1.12.2 Historical Background on Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction; to ArtIII.S2.C1.12.8 Exclusivity of Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction.

[2] Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 379 (1821).

[1] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22, 211–12, 220, 244 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Convention Records]; 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 146–47, 186–87 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[2] Convention Records, supra note 1, at 423–24, 430, 431.

[3] See, e.g., Convention Records, supra note 1, at 243, 424; see also The Federalist No. 65 (Alexander Hamilton).

[4] For instance, James Madison expressed concern about "improper Verdicts in State tribunals obtained under the biassed directions of a dependent Judge" and "the local prejudices of an undirected jury." Convention Records, supra note 1, at 124. In The Federalist Alexander Hamilton stated that "the most discerning cannot foresee how far the prevalency of a local spirit may be found to disqualify the local tribunals for the jurisdiction of national causes," and argued in favor of uniformity that "[t]hirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government, from which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed." The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton). Hamilton also raised the possibility that "State judges, holding their offices during pleasure, or from year to year, will be too little independent to be relied upon for an inflexible execution of the national laws." The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[5] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2 ("In all the other Cases before mentioned [including cases arising under the Constitution and federal law or treaties], the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction[.]"); cf. 1 Stat. 73, 85; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816).

discretion to establish lower federal courts, which could consider questions arising under the Constitution or federal law or treaties in the first instance.[6]

In the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton explained that the grant of federal question jurisdiction in Article III was based on the "obvious consideration that there ought always to be a constitutional method of giving efficacy to constitutional provisions."[7] Specifically, he argued, "restrictions on the authority of the state legislations" must rest upon either "a direct negative on the state laws, or an authority in the federal courts, to overrule such as might be in manifest contravention of the articles of union."[8] Hamilton noted that the Framers had adopted the latter approach of authorizing enforcement by the federal courts, which he "presume[d] will be most agreeable to the states."[9]

The Constitution vests federal judicial power in "one supreme Court" and any lower federal courts that Congress creates.[10] The Constitutional provisions authorizing the establishment of lower federal courts and the grant of federal question jurisdiction to those courts are not self-executing, but instead had to be implemented (if at all) through federal legislation.[11] In the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress created lower federal courts but did not grant them general federal question jurisdiction.[12] This meant that litigants could sue in state court to enforce rights under the Constitution or a federal law or treaty, then appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court if the state courts rejected a federal constitutional challenge to a state law or held invalid a federal law or treaty.[13] In the late eighteenth century, Congress enacted statutes granting the lower federal courts jurisdiction over selected cases arising under federal law, such as suits relating to patents.[14]

Broader statutory grants of federal question jurisdiction were enacted in the nineteenth century. Following the Civil War, Congress granted the federal courts jurisdiction over civil rights cases, seeking to protect newly created federal civil rights.[15] The current statutory grant of federal jurisdiction over civil rights cases is codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1343, which authorizes the district courts to hear civil actions including suits to redress the deprivation "under color of any State law," of any "right, privilege or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States or by any Act of Congress providing for equal rights of citizens or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States," and suits "[t]o recover damages or to secure equitable or other relief under any Act of Congress providing for the protection of civil rights, including the right to vote."[16] Plaintiffs frequently rely on Section 1343 to bring suits in federal court under

---

[6] U.S. Const.art. III, § 1 ("The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."); cf. Convention Records, supra note 1, at 125.

[7] The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 475.

[10] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[11] See, e.g., Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 364 (1959) (describing "enumerated classes of cases to which 'judicial power' was extended by the Constitution and which thereby authorized grants by Congress of 'judicial Power' to the 'inferior' federal courts"); cf. Convention Records, supra note 1, at 125 ("Mr. Wilson & Mr. Madison then moved . . . to add . . . the words following 'that the National Legislature be empowered to institute inferior tribunals'. They observed that there was a distinction between establishing such tribunals absolutely, and giving a discretion to the Legislature to establish or not establish them.").

[12] 1 Stat. 73, 77.

[13] 1 Stat. 73, 85.

[14] Act of April 10, 1790, § 5, 1 Stat. 111, as amended, Act of February 21, 1793, § 6, 1 Stat. 322.

[15] Act of April 9, 1866, § 3, 14 Stat, 27; Act of May 31, 1870, § 8, 16 Stat. 142; Act of February 28, 1871, § 15, 16 Stat. 438; Act of April 20, 1871, §§ 2, 6, 17 Stat. 14, 15.

[16] 28 U.S.C. § 1343(a)(3), (4).

42 U.S.C. § 1983, challenging state and local governmental practices including racial discrimination, electoral malapportionment and suffrage restrictions, unconstitutional police practices, and state restrictions on access to welfare and other public assistance.[17]

In 1875, Congress enacted legislation conferring general federal question jurisdiction on the lower federal courts.[18] The 1875 statute included an amount in controversy requirement, creating federal court jurisdiction over federal question suits only if the plaintiff sought money damages of more than five hundred dollars. Since that time, Congress has expanded the availability of general federal question jurisdiction by repealing the amount in controversy requirement.[19] Additional statutory provisions grant the federal courts subject matter jurisdiction to enforce federal law in specific areas.[20]

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.3 Constitutional and Statutory Grants of Federal Question Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The federal courts' authority to hear federal question cases is rooted in both constitutional text and a number of implementing statutes.[1] The Constitution authorizes the Federal Judiciary to hear "all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority."[2] The Supreme Court held in the 1821 case Cohens v. Virginia that a case "arises under" the Constitution or laws of the United States "whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either," and that cases arising under federal law include all cases that "grow

[17] Section 1983 authorizes private civil suits for the "deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution" and federal laws. In these suits, Section 1983 provides the substantive cause of action and Section 1343 grants the federal courts jurisdiction. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). Section 1343's grant of federal court jurisdiction is not exclusive, meaning that plaintiffs may also elect to bring claims under Section 1983 in state court. See, e.g., Maine v. Thiboutot, 448 U.S. 1 (1980).

[18] Act of March 3, 1875, § 1, 18 Stat. 470 (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1331(a)). The 1875 act also allowed either party to remove a federal question case from state court to federal court.

[19] Congress amended the current federal question statute, 28 U.S.C § 1331, in 1976 and 1980 to eliminate the jurisdictional amount requirement. Pub. L. No. 94-574, 90 Stat. 2721; Pub. L. No. 96-486, 94 Stat. 2369.

[20] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 3231 (granting the federal district courts "original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the States," over federal criminal proceedings); 28 U.S.C. § 1257 (granting the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over "[f]inal judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State" in cases arising under the Constitution or federal laws or treaties); id. § 1334 (granting district courts jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases); id. § 1337 (granting district courts jurisdiction over antitrust cases).

[1] This essay focuses on constitutional text and procedural statutes that authorize the federal courts to hear federal question cases. For discussion of the types of substantive legal issues that may give rise to federal question jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S2.C1.11.4 Substantive Claims and Defenses in Federal Question Cases.

[2] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

out of the legislation of Congress, whether they constitute the right or privilege, or claim or protection, or defense of the party, in whole or in part, by whom they are asserted."[3]

Congress also plays a role in conferring federal question jurisdiction. The Constitution vests federal judicial power in "one supreme Court" and any lower federal courts that Congress creates.[4] When Congress creates lower federal courts, it generally also specifies (either then or in a separate statute) what portions of the federal judicial power those courts may exercise.[5] In Osborn v. Bank of the United States, decided three years after Cohens, the Court explained that the "arising under" clause in Article III "enables the judicial department to receive jurisdiction to the full extent of the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, when any question respecting them shall assume such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting on it."[6] Writing for the Court, Chief Justice John Marshall opined, "when a question to which the judicial power of the Union is extended by the constitution, forms an ingredient of the original cause, it is in the power of Congress to give the [lower federal courts] jurisdiction of that cause, although other questions of fact or of law may be involved in it."[7] Thus, although the Constitution grants the Judiciary as a whole the power to adjudicate federal questions, it generally leaves to Congress the authority to confer that jurisdiction on specific federal courts.[8]

Within that constitutional framework, the current general federal question statute, 28 U.S.C § 1331, grants the federal district courts "original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States."[9] Additional statutes grant the federal courts jurisdiction over certain specific categories of cases arising under the Constitution and federal law.[10] Although the language of Section 1331 is similar to the constitutional text authorizing the grant of federal question jurisdiction, the Supreme Court has held that the statutory grant of jurisdiction in Section 1331 is narrower than the full authority Congress might choose to confer consistent with the constitutional authorization.[11] In a 2016 case, the Court explained that it > has long read the words "arising under" in Article III to extend quite broadly, "to all cases in which a federal question is 'an ingredient' of the action." . . . In the statutory [3] 19 U.S. 264, 379 (1821). Cf. Franchise Tax Bd. v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust, 463 U.S. 1, 9 (1983) (quoting T.B. Harms Co. v. Eliscu, 339 F.2d 823, 827 (2d Cir. 1964)) ("[A] case may 'arise under' a law of the United States if the complaint discloses a need for determining the meaning or application of such a law.").

[4] U.S. Const. art. III, § 1.

[5] See, e.g., Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 364 (1959) (describing "enumerated classes of cases to which 'judicial power' was extended by the Constitution and which thereby authorized grants by Congress of 'judicial Power' to the 'inferior' federal courts").

[6] 22 U.S. 738, 818 (1824).

[7] Id. at 823.

[8] Cf. U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2 (granting the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over "Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party" but providing that the Court's appellate jurisdiction shall be subject to "such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make"); see also ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[9] 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

[10] See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 3231 (granting the federal district courts "original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the States," over federal criminal proceedings); 28 U.S.C. § 1257 (granting the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over "[f]inal judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State" in cases arising under the Constitution or federal laws or treaties); id. § 1334 (granting district courts jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases); id. § 1337 (granting district courts jurisdiction over antitrust cases).

[11] See. e.g., Verlinden B. V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 495 (1983); Shoshone Mining Co. v. Rutter, 177 U.S. 505 (1900).

> context, however, we opted to give those same words a narrower scope "in the light of [§ 1331's] history[,] the demands of reason and coherence, and the dictates of sound judicial policy."[12]

Because cases that fall within the narrower statutory grant of federal question jurisdiction also fall within the broader constitutional grant, most court cases considering the scope of federal question jurisdiction focus on application of the relevant jurisdictional statute and do not reach constitutional questions.[13]

In determining whether a case satisfies the general federal question statute, courts ask whether a federal question appears in the plaintiff's "well-pleaded complaint."[14] This means that, as a statutory matter, the existence of a federal question depends on the actual claims that the plaintiff raises, and the existence of an actual or potential defense to liability based on federal law is not sufficient to establish federal question jurisdiction.[15] This is an example of when statutory federal question jurisdiction is less than the constitutional maximum, which can include cases involving only a federal defense.[16]

The Supreme Court has explained that most cases subject to arising under jurisdiction "are covered by Justice [Oliver Wendell] Holmes' statement that a 'suit arises under the law that creates the cause of action,'" meaning that "the vast majority" of federal question cases raise claims based directly on federal law.[17] Less often, a case may arise under the laws of the United States "if a well-pleaded complaint establishe[s] that its right to relief under state law requires resolution of a substantial question of federal law in dispute between the parties."[18] For instance, in Smith v. Kansas City Title & Trust Co., the Court held that federal question jurisdiction existed in a state law suit by a shareholder claiming that a corporation could not lawfully buy certain federal bonds because the issuance of the bonds was unconstitutional.[19]

As a matter of both constitutional scope and statutory authority, federal question jurisdiction is not limited to suits originally filed in federal court. Beginning with the enactment Section 25 the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress has granted the Supreme Court jurisdiction to review decisions of the states' highest courts when those decisions involve

---

[12] Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith Inc. v. Manning, 578 U.S. 374, 385 (2016) (quoting Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 807 (1986); Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 379 (1959)) (alterations in original).

[13] See, e.g., Romero, 358 U.S. at 379. Congress first enacted a statute granting the federal courts general federal question jurisdiction in 1875. Act of March 3, 1875, § 1, 18 Stat. 470 (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1331(a)). The 1875 statute, like the current federal question statute, used language similar to that of the Constitution. Early cases interpreting the statutory language relied heavily on Chief Justice John Marshall's construction of the constitutional grant of jurisdiction. See, e.g., Pacific R.R. Removal Cases, 115 U.S. 1 (1885). More recent cases have favored a more limited interpretation. See infra notes 14–16 and accompanying text.

[14] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. at 9–10. If the complaint states a case arising under the Constitution or federal law, then federal jurisdiction exists even if the federal claim ultimately fails on the merits. In such a case, the proper course for the court is to dismiss for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted rather than for lack of jurisdiction. Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678 (1946).

[15] Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149, 152 (1908) ("Although such allegations show that very likely, in the course of the litigation, a question under the Constitution would arise, they do not show that the suit, that is, the plaintiff's original cause of action, arises under the Constitution."); see also State of Tennessee v. Union & Planters' Bank, 152 U.S. 454 (1894).

[16] See, e.g., Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 379 (1821).

[17] Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 808 (1986) (internal citations omitted).

[18] Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. at 13.

[19] 255 U.S. 180 (1921). By contrast, the Court found no federal question jurisdiction in a case concerning whether the Employment Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 preempted a state law allowing for garnishment of unpaid taxes from an ERISA-covered vacation benefit plan, Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. 1, and in a case where plaintiffs raised state law negligence claims based in part on allegations that a defendant produced a drug that was misbranded in violation of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, Merrell Dow, 478 U.S. 804.

certain issues arising under the Constitution, treaties, or federal law.[20] The Supreme Court upheld Section 25 against a constitutional challenge in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee.[21] In addition, as explained in more detail in a later section, if a plaintiff files a case subject to federal court jurisdiction in state court, the defendant may elect to remove the case to federal court.[22] Once the federal courts have jurisdiction over a case, they have the authority to decide any issue necessary to the disposition of the case, including questions of law or fact that do not arise under federal law.[23]

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.4 Substantive Claims and Defenses in Federal Question Cases

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Federal question jurisdiction is the basis for many of the Supreme Court's high-profile cases. In particular, federal question cases may involve claims of an actual or threatened invasion of the plaintiff's constitutional rights by some act of public authority. The "arising under" clause thus provides the main textual basis for the implied power for federal courts to review the constitutionality of legislation and other government actions.[1]

There are multiple types of legal claims that may give rise to federal question jurisdiction.[2] Congress often creates federal question jurisdiction by enacting legislation creating substantive legal rights or obligations and explicitly granting the courts jurisdiction to enforce them.[3] Sometimes this jurisdiction is exclusive. For instance, the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over federal criminal cases and cases arising under bankruptcy, antitrust, or

---

[20] 1 Stat. 73, 85; see also 28 U.S.C. § 1257.

[21] 14 U.S. 304 (1816). See also Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264 (1821).

[22] See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1441; see also ArtIII.S2.C1.11.5 Removal from State Court to Federal Court.

[23] See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a); see also ArtIII.S2.C1.11.6 Supplemental Jurisdiction.

[1] While federal question jurisdiction is often the basis for constitutional claims brought in federal court, cases arising under the Constitution or federal law are just one of several categories of cases that the Constitution authorizes the federal courts to hear. See also, e.g., ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States; ArtIII.S2.C2.1 Overview of Supreme Court Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C2.5 Supreme Court Review of State Court Decisions; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C1.12.2 Historical Background on Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction; to ArtIII.S2.C1.12.8 Exclusivity of Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction.

[2] This essay focuses on substantive legal issues that may give rise to federal question jurisdiction. For discussion of the constitutional text and procedural statutes that authorize the federal courts to hear federal question cases, see ArtIII.S2.C1.11.3 Constitutional and Statutory Grants of Federal Question Jurisdiction.

[3] Congress also sometimes enacts federal statutes that create new legal duties but do not explicitly allow individuals to sue to enforce the law. While the Supreme Court has in the past recognized "implied" rights of action in limited circumstances, more recent case law has instructed courts to "interpret the statute Congress has passed to determine whether it displays an intent to create not just a private right but also a private remedy." Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 286 (2001).

copyright law.[4] In other areas, Congress allows both state and federal courts to hear cases based on federal statutes.[5] For example, 28 U.S.C. § 1343 grants the federal courts jurisdiction over civil rights claims arising under the Constitution or federal law, including claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983,[6] but state courts may also hear such claims.[7]

Federal question cases may also arise under treaties to which the United States is a party. The Supreme Court has held that some treaties are "self-executing" and thus "directly enforceable as domestic law in our courts," while others are not.[8] If a treaty is not self-executing, Congress must enact legislation to implement the treaty before it can be enforced in U.S. court.[9]

In addition, the constitutional judicial power of federal courts extends to cases arising under judge-made legal doctrines. One example of this is cases involving federal common law. "Common law" refers to legal rules drawn from judicial decisions, rather than a statute or constitution.[10] Although the Supreme Court famously announced in Erie Railroad v. Tompkins that "[t]here is no federal general common law,"[11] it is well settled that there are some areas where courts apply federal common law, and the Supreme Court has held that the federal courts have the power to hear federal common law claims.[12] Federal courts primarily create and apply federal common law in two circumstances: where a federal rule of decision is necessary to protect uniquely federal interests, or where Congress has given the courts the power to develop substantive law.[13]

A related example of judge-made law that raises constitutional issues subject to federal question jurisdiction is the doctrine articulated in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents.[14]

---

[4] See 18 U.S.C. § 3231 (federal criminal proceedings); 28 U.S.C. § 1334 (bankruptcy cases); id. § 1337 (antitrust cases); id. § 1337 (patent and copyright cases).

[5] State courts presumptively enjoy concurrent jurisdiction to enforce federal law, and Congress must explicitly or implicitly confine jurisdiction to the federal courts to oust the state courts. See Gulf Offshore Co. v. Mobil Oil Corp., 453 U.S. 473, 477–84 (1981); Tafflin v. Levitt, 493 U.S. 455 (1990); Yellow Freight System, Inc. v. Donnelly, 494 U.S. 820 (1990).

[6] Section 1983 authorizes private civil suits for the "deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution" and federal laws. In these suits, Section 1983 provides the substantive cause of action and Section 1343 grants the federal courts jurisdiction. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[7] See, e.g., Maine v. Thiboutot, 448 U.S. 1 (1980).

[8] Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 519 (2008).

[9] Id. at 505.

[10] Common Law, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019).

[11] 304 U.S. 64, 78 (1938). Under the Rules of Decision Act, there is a presumption against the creation of federal common law, and federal courts apply state common law when possible. 28 U.S.C. § 1652; see also Tex. Indus., Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc., 451 U.S. 630, 640–41 (1981) ("The vesting of jurisdiction in the federal courts does not in and of itself give rise to authority to formulate federal common law.").

[12] Tex. Indus., 451 U.S. at 640.

[13] Id. In determining whether to create federal common law, the Court's inquiry focuses on whether a judge-made rule would effectuate the intent of Congress. See, e.g., Cannon v. Univ. of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 688 (1979). Congress can enact legislation to displace the judicially created law. City of Milwaukee v. Illinois, 451 U.S. 304 (1981).

[14] 403 U.S. 388 (1971). Some have likened the holding in Bivens to the creation of federal common law. See, e.g., Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 742 (2020) (discussing the petitioners' arguments "[a]nalogizing Bivens to the work of a common-law court"); Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 75 (2001) (Scalia, J., concurring) (stating that "Bivens is a relic of the heady days in which this Court assumed common-law powers to create causes of action"). Justice John Harlan's concurrence in Bivens suggested that liability in that case was not based on common law. 403 U.S. at 403 (Harlan, J., concurring) ("I do not think that the fact that the interest is protected by the Constitution rather than statute or common law justifies the assertion that federal courts are powerless to grant damages in the absence of explicit congressional action authorizing the remedy.").

Bivens and its progeny allowed individuals to sue federal agents directly under the Constitution without a federal statute authorizing relief.[15] More recent Supreme Court cases have construed Bivens narrowly.[16]

Other times, federal question jurisdiction exists even though the case, as originally filed, includes only state law civil claims or criminal charges. For instance, a state law civil claim may be filed in federal court, or removed from state to federal court before trial, if a "right to relief under state law requires resolution of a substantial question of federal law in dispute between the parties."[17] In other cases, litigation based on state law questions may proceed through the state courts before receiving federal court review. This often occurs in cases where a civil or criminal defendant invokes the Constitution or a federal statute as a defense to liability. Under the general federal question statute, the federal district courts do not have statutory jurisdiction to hear those cases in the first instance.[18] However, they fall within the constitutional bounds of federal question jurisdiction,[19] and Congress has granted the Supreme Court statutory jurisdiction to hear such cases on appeal from a decision of a state's highest court.[20] A number of high-profile cases have come to the Supreme Court in this way. For instance, the First Amendment case New York Times v. Sullivan involved a state law libel claim that was originally litigated in the Alabama courts.[21] Likewise, Lawrence v. Texas, in which the Court struck down a state law banning consensual sexual activity between people of the same sex, was an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court from a state criminal conviction.[22]

Both constitutional and statutory federal question jurisdiction may also exist based on the identity of a party, particularly when a party has sufficiently close ties to the federal government.[23] The Constitution specifically grants federal courts jurisdiction over "Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party," but those cases may also be understood to fall within federal question jurisdiction.[24] The federal courts have statutory jurisdiction over suits where the United States itself is either a plaintiff or a defendant.[25] Similarly, federal statutes authorize the removal to federal court of certain state law civil and criminal claims against federal officers or other persons acting pursuant to federal authority.[26] The Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to the removal of claims against federal revenue officers in Tennessee v. Davis, explaining that federal court jurisdiction over such cases

---

[15] See also Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979), Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980).

[16] See, e.g., Egbert v. Boule, 2022 WL 2056291 (June 8, 2022).

[17] Franchise Tax Bd. v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust, 463 U.S. 1, 13 (1983). See also ArtIII.S2.C1.11.3 Constitutional and Statutory Grants of Federal Question Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C1.11.5 Removal from State Court to Federal Court.

[18] 28 U.S.C § 1331; see also Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149, 152 (1908).

[19] See, e.g., Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. 738, 818 (1824).

[20] 28 U.S.C. § 1257.

[21] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[22] 539 U.S. 558 (2003). Federal courts may also review state law criminal proceedings via a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. While habeas proceedings may relate to state court proceedings, a habeas petition begins a new federal case. For discussion of federal habeas review of state criminal proceedings, see ArtIII.S1.6.9 Habeas Review.

[23] Federal court jurisdiction also depends on the identities of the parties when jurisdiction is based on diversity of citizenship. Diversity jurisdiction is distinct from federal question jurisdiction. See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States.

[24] See Lynch v. Household Finance Corp., 405 U.S. 538, 549 n.17 (1972) (listing 28 U.S.C. §§ 1345 and 1346 among other "particular statutes [that] grant jurisdiction, without regard to the amount in controversy, in virtually all areas that otherwise would fall under the general federal-question statute").

[25] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1345, 1346.

[26] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1442(a)(1), 2679(d).

implicated the federal government's fundamental interest in "preserving its own existence" against state proceedings that might undermine federal authority.[27]

Article III also allows Congress to grant federal court jurisdiction in cases involving federally chartered corporations, such as banks or railroads. In Osborn v. Bank of the United States, Chief Justice John Marshall held that Congress's authorization for the Bank of the United States to sue and be sued also granted the federal courts jurisdiction over all cases to which the bank was a party.[28] Similarly, in the Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, the Court held that tort actions against railroads with federal charters could be removed to federal courts solely based on federal incorporation.[29] In a 1992 case, American National Red Cross v. S. G., the Court held that when a federal statutory charter expressly mentions the federal courts in a provision allowing an entity to sue and be sued, the charter creates federal question jurisdiction over such suits.[30] Congress has enacted legislation limiting the extent to which some federally chartered corporations can sue or be sued in federal court based solely on federal incorporation.[31]

Federal question cases usually involve the application of federal substantive law, whether as the direct basis for a claim or defense or as a substantial legal question that may determine rights under state law. Some scholars and advocates take an expansive view of constitutional federal question jurisdiction under a theory known as "protective jurisdiction," arguing that Congress has the constitutional power to confer federal jurisdiction over claims based entirely on state law.[32] They posit that in areas where Congress has the authority to legislate pursuant to one of its enumerated powers,[33] it could enact a jurisdictional statute that creates no new substantive federal legal rights or obligations.[34] The jurisdictional statute would itself be the law of the United States within the meaning of Article III, and would validly create federal question jurisdiction, even though Congress enacted no substantive rule of decision. The Supreme Court has declined to adopt the doctrine, instead finding other bases for federal court jurisdiction in cases where it might apply.[35]

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.5 Removal from State Court to Federal Court

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and [27] 100 U.S. 257, 262 (1880). For additional discussion of Davis, see ArtIII.S2.C1.11.5 Removal from State Court to Federal Court.

[28] 22 U.S. 738 (1824).

[29] 115 U.S. 1 (1885).

[30] 505 U.S. 247 (1992). The Court has held, however, that a general authorization to sue and be sued that does not expressly mention suits in federal courts does not confer jurisdiction.

[31] See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1349 ("The district courts shall not have jurisdiction of any civil action by or against any corporation upon the ground that it was incorporated by or under an Act of Congress, unless the United States is the owner of more than one-half of its capital stock.").

[32] See generally, e.g., Paul Mishkin. The Federal "Question" Jurisdiction of the District Courts, 53 Col. L. Rev. 157, 184–196 (1953); Scott A. Rosenberg, Note, The Theory of Protective Jurisdiction, 57 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 933 (1982); Loretta Shaw, Comment, A Comprehensive Theory of Protective Jurisdiction: The Missing "Ingredient" of "Arising Under" Jurisdiction, 61 Fordham L. Rev. 1235 (1993).

[33] See generally ArtI.S1.3.3 Enumerated, Implied, Resulting, and Inherent Powers.

[34] Rosenberg, supra note 32, at 937.

[35] See, e.g., Verlinden B. V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 491 n.17 (1983); Mesa v. California, 489 U.S. 121, 137 (1989).

Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitution's grant of federal question jurisdiction over cases "arising under" the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States extends to some cases filed in state court. Congress has provided that a state court defendant may remove a case to federal court if the case could originally have been brought in federal court.[1] The current general removal statute is codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1441, and additional statutes authorize removal in specific circumstances.[2]

In Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, the Supreme Court likened removal before trial to federal appellate review of state court judgments, asserting that both served the purposes of promoting fairness and ensuring the uniform interpretation of federal law.[3] Decades later, in Chicago & N.W. Railway v. Whitton's Administrator, the Court upheld a removal statute against a constitutional challenge.[4] The Court expressed "doubt" as to whether removal before trial "can properly be called an exercise of appellate jurisdiction," stating that removal might "more properly be regarded as an indirect mode by which the Federal court acquires original jurisdiction of the causes."[5] However, noting that both state and federal courts had frequently recognized the constitutionality of removal statutes, the Court concluded that, except where the Constitution expressly specifies original or appellate jurisdiction, Congress has discretion to legislate "the manner and conditions upon which [the federal judicial power] shall be exercised."[6]

In Tennessee v. Davis, the Court considered the constitutionality of a statute that allowed removal to federal court of state court civil or criminal proceedings against any federal revenue officer "on account of any act done under color of his office or of any [federal revenue] law."[7] The Court explained that federal court jurisdiction over such cases implicated the federal

---

[1] 28 U.S.C. § 1441. The removal statute applies not only to federal question cases but also to cases where the federal courts possess diversity jurisdiction because the parties are from different states. For discussion of diversity jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States.

[2] See 28 U.S.C. § 1442 (suits or prosecutions against federal officers and agencies); id. § 1442a suits or prosecutions against members of the armed forces); id. § 1443 (civil rights cases); id. § 1444 (foreclosure actions against the United States); id. § 1452 (claims related to bankruptcy cases); id. § 1453 (class actions); id. § 1454 (patent, plant variety protection, and copyright cases).

[3] 14 U.S. 304, 347–51 (1816). In upholding a statute that allowed the Supreme Court to review state court judgments, the Court explained, "The constitution of the United States was designed for the common and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The judicial power . . . was not to be exercised exclusively for the benefit of parties who might be plaintiffs, and would elect the national forum, but also for the protection of defendants who might be entitled to try their rights, or assert their privileges, before the same forum. [If] the plaintiff may always elect the state court, the defendant may be deprived of all the security which the constitution intended in aid of his rights. Such a state of things can, in no respect, be considered as giving equal rights." Id. at 348–49.

[4] 80 U.S. 270 (1872). This case arose under state law, and removal was based on diversity of citizenship. See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States.

[5] Id. at 287.

[6] Id. at 288–89; see also The Moses Taylor, 71 U.S. 411, 429–430 (1867); Mayor and Aldermen of City of Nashville v. Cooper, 73 U.S. 247, 251–54 (1868).

[7] 100 U.S. 257, 261 (1880). The case involved a state prosecution of a federal internal revenue agent who had killed a man while seeking to seize an illicit distilling apparatus and claimed that he had acted in self-defense. See id. at 260.

government's fundamental interest in "preserving its own existence," preventing states from undermining federal policies by prosecuting federal agents.[8] The Court stated, "Cases arising under the laws of the United States are such as grow out of the legislation of Congress, [whether] they constitute th[e] right or privilege, or claim or protection, or defence of the party, in whole or in part."[9] It held that the Constitution's grant of federal question jurisdiction extended to the protection of federal agents performing their official duties, and that the removal statute was a valid grant of federal question jurisdiction under the Necessary and Proper Clause.[10]

The modern analog to the federal officer removal statute at issue in Davis is codified in 28 U.S.C. § 1442.[11] The Supreme Court has construed that statute broadly to cover all cases where federal officers can raise a colorable defense arising out of their duty to enforce federal law.[12] The Court has interpreted other removal statutes, such as the civil rights removal statute, more narrowly.[13]

ArtIII.S2.C1.11.6 Supplemental Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;— to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

A single case may simultaneously involve claims that give rise to federal court jurisdiction and claims that, standing alone, would not. The federal courts may often consider both sets of claims together under the doctrine of supplemental jurisdiction. The doctrine is grounded in the broad interpretation of Article III jurisdiction articulated in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, where Chief Justice John Marshall explained that the Constitution grants the federal courts jurisdiction when a federal question "forms an ingredient of the original cause, . . . although other questions of fact or of law may be involved in it."[1] Supreme Court cases and [11] 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a)(1) (authorizing removal of any "civil action or criminal prosecution that is commenced in a State court and that is against or directed to . . . [t]he United States or any agency thereof or any officer (or any person acting under that officer) of the United States or of any agency thereof, in an official or individual capacity, for or relating to any act under color of such office or on account of any right, title or authority claimed under any Act of Congress for the apprehension or punishment of criminals or the collection of the revenue").

[8] Id. at 262.

[9] Id. at 264.

[10] Id. at 263–71.

[12] Willingham v. Morgan, 395 U.S. 402, 406–07 (1969); see also Maryland v. Soper, 270 U.S. 9 (1926). Removal by a federal officer or agency must be predicated on the allegation of a colorable federal defense. Mesa v. California, 489 U.S. 121 (1989). In 1991, the Supreme Court held that a federal agency was not permitted to remove a case under the statute's plain meaning. International Primate Protection League v. Tulane Educ. Fund, 500 U.S. 72 (1991). Congress amended the statute in 1996 to specify that actions against agencies were removable. Pub. L. 104-317, § 206(a)(1).

[13] See, e.g., Johnson v. Mississippi, 421 U.S. 213 (1975) (to warrant removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1443(1), it must appear that (1) "the right allegedly denied the removal petitioner arises under a federal law 'providing for specific civil rights stated in terms of racial equality'" and (2) "the removal petitioner is denied or cannot enforce the specified federal rights in the courts of (the) State.") (quoting Georgia v. Rachel, 384 U.S. 780, 792, 808 (1966)) (additional quotes removed); see also; City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808 (1966).

[1] 22 U.S. 738, 823 (1824).

federal legislation identify circumstances in which federal courts may exercise supplemental jurisdiction to hear claims over which they would not otherwise have jurisdiction, including state law claims between non-diverse parties.[2]

One form of supplemental jurisdiction, also called ancillary jurisdiction, pendent jurisdiction, or pendent claim jurisdiction, exists when a claim that would not otherwise be subject to federal court jurisdiction arises from the same set of facts as a claim that is subject to federal court jurisdiction.[3] Some sources use the term pendent jurisdiction to refer to cases where related federal and non-federal claims appear in a plaintiff's complaint.[4] By contrast, ancillary jurisdiction may refer to cases where a complaint raises one or more claims subject to federal court jurisdiction, then a defendant responds by raising compulsory counterclaims that would not independently meet the jurisdictional requirements.[5]

The doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction has its roots in the 1861 case Freeman v. Howe.[6] Freeman involved federal court proceedings related to the seizure of rail cars. The original parties were from different states, and the case proceeded in federal court pursuant to diversity jurisdiction. Other parties who did not satisfy the requirements for diversity jurisdiction then sought to intervene and assert rights to the seized property. The Supreme Court held that the federal courts could hear claims from the non-diverse parties, stating that an equitable claim like those at issue "is not an original suit, but ancillary and dependent, supplementary merely to the original suit, . . . and is maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties."[7]

By contrast, in Kokkonen v. Guardian Life Ins. Co., the Court held that the federal courts lacked ancillary jurisdiction to hear state law breach of contract claims related to a settlement agreement that resolved earlier federal court litigation.[8] Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion identified two purposes of ancillary jurisdiction: "to permit disposition by a single court of claims that are, in varying respects and degrees, factually interdependent," or "to enable a court to function successfully, that is, to manage its proceedings, vindicate its authority, and effectuate its decrees."[9] The Court held that federal jurisdiction over the breach of contract claims would not serve those purposes.

With respect to pendent jurisdiction over state and federal claims contained in a single complaint, the Supreme Court in Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R. considered whether federal courts could exercise jurisdiction over a case involving federal constitutional claims

---

[2] Supplemental jurisdiction may exist in cases where federal court jurisdiction is based on either the existence of a federal question or diversity of citizenship. For discussion of diversity jurisdiction, where the federal courts possess jurisdiction over a case because the parties are from different states, see ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction to ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases; ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens to ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States.

[3] See, e.g., Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 380–81 (1959); Fitzgerald v. United States Lines Co., 374 U.S. 16 (1963); Rosado v. Wyman, 397 U.S. 397, 402–05 (1970). While some courts and commentators consider pendent jurisdiction to be one type of ancillary jurisdiction, others use the two terms to refer to distinct but related categories of cases See, e.g., Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction 343 (5th ed. 2007); see also infra notes 4–5 and accompanying text.

[4] For example, plaintiffs suing for civil rights violations often raise claims under the federal statute 42 U.S.C. § 1983 as well analogous state law claims.

[5] Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 270 U.S. 593 (1926).

[6] 65 U.S. 450 (1861).

[7] Id. at 460.

[8] 511 U.S. 375 (1994). See also Peacock v. Thomas, 516 U.S. 349 (1996) (holding that federal courts do not possess ancillary jurisdiction over new actions in which a federal judgment creditor seeks to impose liability for a money judgment on a person not otherwise liable for the judgment).

[9] Kokkonen, 511 U.S. at 379–80.

and claims under state law.[10] The court explained that the constitutional claims gave rise to federal court jurisdiction, and thereafter the federal court could "decide all the question[s] in the case, even though it decided the Federal questions adversely to the party raising them," and even if it declined to decide the federal questions and instead resolved the case on state law grounds.[11]

The Supreme Court articulated a test for when courts should exercise pendent jurisdiction in the 1933 case Hurn v. Oursler.[12] In that case, the Court distinguished between "a case where two distinct grounds in support of a single cause of action are alleged, one only of which presents a federal question"—which was subject to ancillary jurisdiction—and "a case where two separate and distinct causes of action are alleged, one only of which is federal in character" —which was not.[13]

Lower federal courts had difficulty applying the rule in Hurn, and several decades later the Court articulated a new test in United Mine Workers v. Gibbs.[14] Stating that courts applying Hurn had been "unnecessarily grudging" in hearing pendent claims, the Court explained:

> Pendent jurisdiction, in the sense of judicial power, exists whenever there is [a federal question claim], and the relationship between that claim and the state claim permits the conclusion that the entire action before the court comprises but one constitutional "case."[15]

To warrant the exercise of pendent jurisdiction, "[t]he state and federal claims must derive from a common nucleus of operative fact."[16] But if the federal issues are substantial and plaintiff's federal and state claims "are such that he would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding, then . . . there is power in federal courts to hear the whole."[17] Although the Gibbs Court held that the "judicial power" under the Constitution allowed for pendent jurisdiction in a large class of cases, the Court also emphasized that federal courts could properly decline to exercise that power over state claims based on "considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants," as well to foster comity between federal and state courts.[18]

Pendent jurisdiction does not exist if a plaintiff's federal claim is insubstantial or patently without merit.[19] The Supreme Court has also held that when the Eleventh Amendment bars a federal claim against state officials, federal courts may not exercise jurisdiction over pendent state law claims.[20] If a federal claim is substantial enough to confer jurisdiction but is dismissed before trial, or if a pendent state law claim substantially predominates, a federal court may be justified in dismissing the state claim.[21] However, there is no requirement that federal courts resolve cases involving both federal and state law claims on federal grounds

---

[10] 213 U.S. 175 (1909).

[11] Id. at 191.

[12] 289 U.S. 238 (1933).

[13] Id. at 246.

[14] 383 U.S. 715 (1966).

[15] Id. at 725.

[16] Id.

[17] Id.

[18] Id. at 726

[19] Hagans v. Lavine, 415 U.S. 528, 537–38 (1974); see also Gibbs, 383 U.S. at 725.

[20] Pennhurst State School & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 120 (1984). For further discussion of the Eleventh Amendment, see Amdt11.5.1 General Scope of State Sovereign Immunity.

[21] Gibbs, 383 U.S. at 726–27.

when possible.[22] On the contrary, the doctrine of constitutional avoidance counsels that federal courts should not decide federal constitutional claims if they can avoid doing so, meaning that it may be an abuse of discretion for a federal court to reach a federal constitutional question when it could decide a case on state law grounds.[23]

The foregoing cases considered when federal courts may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over claims over which they would not otherwise have jurisdiction. A related doctrine, sometimes called pendent party jurisdiction, allows the federal courts to hear claims involving parties who might not otherwise be subject to federal subject matter jurisdiction.[24]

In 1978, in Owen Equipment & Erection Co. v. Kroger, the Supreme Court announced a limit on pendent party jurisdiction, holding that a plaintiff could not amend her complaint to add a claim against a third-party defendant that was a resident of the plaintiff's home state.[25] The Court again limited pendent party jurisdiction in the 1989 case Finley v. United States.[26] Justice Antonin Scalia's majority opinion in Finley declined to disturb the doctrine of pendent claim jurisdiction laid out in Gibbs, and explicitly acknowledged that pendent party jurisdiction also fell within the constitutional grant of federal judicial power. However, the Court declined to "read jurisdictional statutes broadly" in support of pendent party jurisdiction.[27] The majority emphasized that its holding, based on application of the jurisdictional statutes, "can of course be changed by Congress."[28]

The following year, Congress enacted legislation that expressly granted the federal courts pendent party jurisdiction.[29] Codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1367, the statute provides that, subject to certain limitations, once the federal district courts have jurisdiction over a case, they "shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution," including "claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties."[30] Section 1367(b) codified the holding in Owen Equipment imposing limits on the federal courts' ability to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over certain claims by plaintiffs against non-diverse defendants.[31] More generally, the Supreme Court has

---

[22] See, e.g., Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R.R., 244 U.S. 499, 508 (1917) (holding that, once federal court jurisdiction is established, it extends "to the determination of all questions involved in the case, including questions of state law, irrespective of the disposition that may be made of the Federal question, or whether it be found necessary to decide it at all").

[23] Hagans, 415 U.S. at 549–50; Schmidt v. Oakland Unified School Dist., 457 U.S. 594 (1982) (per curiam); Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R., 213 U.S. 175, 191 (1909). For discussion of the constitutional avoidance doctrine, see ArtIII.S2.C1.10.1 Overview of Constitutional Avoidance Doctrine.

[24] In addition to subject matter jurisdiction, there is a separate constitutional requirement that any court hearing a claim against a party must also possess personal jurisdiction over that party. See generally Amdt14.S1.7.1.1 Overview of Personal Jurisdiction and Due Process.

[25] 437 U.S. 365 (1978).

[26] 490 U.S. 545 (1989).

[27] Id. at 556.

[28] Id.

[29] Act of Dec. 1, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-650, 104 Stat. 5089, § 310 (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1367).

[30] 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a); see also 28 U.S.C. § 1441(c) (allowing for removal to federal court of any civil action that includes "(A) a claim arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States (within the meaning of section 1331 of this title), and (B) a claim not within the original or supplemental jurisdiction of the district court or a claim that has been made nonremovable by statute").

[31] 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b) ("In any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction founded solely on section 1332 of this title, the district courts shall not have supplemental jurisdiction under subsection (a) over claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14, 19, 20, or 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or over claims by persons proposed to be joined as plaintiffs under Rule 19 of such rules, or seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24 of such rules, when exercising supplemental jurisdiction over such claims would be inconsistent with explained that Section 1367 "codified [the] principles" of Gibbs and related cases in a supplemental jurisdiction statute that "combines the doctrines of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction under a common heading."[32]

ArtIII.S2.C1.12 Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.1 Overview of Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The federal courts' jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases derives from the Constitution and federal statutes. Article III of the Constitution extends the federal judicial power to "all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction."[1] By giving the Federal Judiciary jurisdiction over admiralty cases—and authorizing Congress to regulate that jurisdiction[2]—the Framers sought to ensure that federal courts would resolve cases that might implicate the Nation's foreign policy.[3] The Framers also recognized that uniform federal admiralty jurisdiction could protect maritime commerce from the diverse and unpredictable procedural rules that state admiralty courts had applied under the Articles of Confederation.[4]

Beginning with the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress established the federal district courts and granted them "exclusive" and "original"[5] subject matter jurisdiction over any "civil case of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction."[6] Congress also allowed state courts to exercise concurrent the jurisdictional requirements of section 1332."). See also Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Services, Inc., 545 U.S. 546, 573 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (quoting House Report on Section 1367, which was also adopted by the Senate).

---

[32] City of Chicago v. Int'l College of Surgeons, 522 U.S. 156 (1998).

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1. Federal courts have treated the "admiralty" and "maritime" aspects of such jurisdiction as functionally synonymous. This essay sometimes refers to "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" as "admiralty jurisdiction." Jurisdiction generally refers to a court's power to decide a case. Jurisdiction, Black's Law Dictionary 980 (10th ed. 2014).

[2] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; id. § 2, cl. 1; United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32, 33 (1812).

[3] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, § 1666 (1833).

[4] Id.; Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 456–57 (1847).

[5] If a court has "original jurisdiction" over a particular subject matter, then it may hear and decide a case concerning that matter before any other tribunal does. Original Jurisdiction, Black's Law Dictionary 982 (10th ed. 2014).

[6] The current version of this statutory grant of admiralty jurisdiction is located at 28 U.S.C. § 1333(1). Congress also granted the federal district courts exclusive jurisdiction over prize cases, which have historically involved property (e.g., a ship) used by an enemy, captured during wartime, and brought into the United States. Id. § 1333(2). Under federal law, the district courts have jurisdiction over cases involving the seizure and forfeiture of a vessel for violating federal law. Id. §§ 1333(1), 1356. Congress also granted district courts in U.S. territories jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. See The City of Panama, 101 U.S. 453, 458 (1880).

In general, district courts have discretion as to whether to retain admiralty jurisdiction over suits between foreign parties. Charter Shipping Co. v. Bowring, Jones & Tidy, Ltd., 281 U.S. 515, 517 (1930); The Maggie Hammond, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 435, 450, 457 (1869).

jurisdiction over admiralty cases in which plaintiffs seek traditional common law remedies.[7] Under the "saving to suitors clause" in Section 9 of the Judiciary Act, courts retain concurrent jurisdiction over most contract and tort claims that fall within federal admiralty jurisdiction because a plaintiff may bring a personal action against an individual defendant seeking common law remedies (e.g., payment of money damages).[8] However, in general, plaintiffs must pursue actions in federal court when they seek remedies that lie against property in rem, such as the seizure of a vessel to enforce a maritime lien.[9]

Much of the Supreme Court's jurisprudence on admiralty jurisdiction has examined the territorial extent of such jurisdiction and which types of cases fall within this limited grant of jurisdiction. Generally, courts consider the location in which a tort or crime occurs to be a major factor when determining whether the tort or crime falls within admiralty jurisdiction.[10] The Court has held that, under the Constitution, admiralty jurisdiction extends to all navigable public waters, regardless of whether they are saltwater or freshwater, or subject to the ebb and flow of the tide.[11] Admiralty jurisdiction also extends to contracts, regardless of where they are entered into or to be performed, provided that their subject matter is "essentially maritime."[12]

When a federal court exercises admiralty jurisdiction over a case,[13] it follows a special set of procedural rules. Notably, jury trials are unavailable in civil admiralty proceedings[14] unless Congress provides otherwise.[15] Thus, in federal admiralty proceedings, the judge typically decides issues of both law and fact. When a federal or state court exercises admiralty jurisdiction over a case, the judge must apply the substantive rules of federal maritime law,[16]

---

[7] 28 U.S.C. § 1333(1) ("The district courts shall have original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the States, of . . . [a]ny civil case of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases all other remedies to which they are otherwise entitled.") (emphasis added). See also, e.g., Lewis v. Lewis & Clark Marine, Inc., 531 U.S. 438, 454 (2001); Schoonmaker v. Gilmore, 102 U.S. 118, 119 (1880); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 337 (1816). Lawsuits brought under the savings clause in state court may not be removed to federal court unless independent grounds exist, other than admiralty, for the federal court's exercise of jurisdiction. Romero v. Int'l Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 371–72 (1959).

[8] For more on the relationship between federal and state court jurisdiction in admiralty cases, see ArtIII.S2.C1.12.8 Exclusivity of Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction.

[9] See id. In in rem admiralty proceedings, the court takes custody of the res or property. The property itself is made the defendant in the case, and parties who have an interest in it "may appear" and each "propound independently his interest." Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 583, 599 (1858).

[10] Exec. Jet Aviation, Inc. v. City of Cleveland, 409 U.S. 249, 268 (1972).

[11] See, e.g., Southern S.S. Co. v. NLRB, 316 U.S. 31, 41 (1942); The Montello, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 430, 441–45 (1874); The Daniel Ball, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 557, 563–64 (1870). Congress has some power to extend the territorial scope of admiralty jurisdiction. For example, in the Extension of Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 46 U.S.C. § 30101, Congress augmented admiralty jurisdiction so that it encompasses claims that involve injury or damage to persons or property "caused by a vessel on navigable waters," even if such injury or damage is "done or consummated on land" (e.g., collision of a ship with a bridge).

[12] Ex parte Easton, 95 U.S. 68, 72 (1877).

[13] A federal court exercising admiralty jurisdiction is sometimes said to be "sitting in admiralty."

[14] E.g., The Whelan, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 112, 112 (1812); The Schooner Betsey, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 443, 452 (1807); The Schooner Sally, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 406, 406 (1805); La Vengeance, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 297, 301 (1796).

[15] Congress may, consistent with the Constitution, provide for jury trials in admiralty cases. See Fitzgerald v. United States Lines Co., 374 U.S. 16, 20 (1963) (noting that the Seventh Amendment does not require jury trials in admiralty cases but "neither that Amendment nor any other provision of the Constitution forbids them"); The Propeller Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 443, 460 (1852). The Great Lakes Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1873, provides that parties to a lawsuit involving maritime contracts or torts may demand a jury trial in admiralty cases that arise upon the Great Lakes, provided that the vessels involved meet certain conditions.

[16] Federal maritime law incorporates common principles that commercial nations have recognized. The United States has adopted this maritime law through its "laws and usages" with some modifications to account for local conditions. See The Lottawanna, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 558, 572–73 (1875) ("In this respect it is like international law or the laws of war, which have the effect of law in no country any further than they are accepted and received as such.").

which is a type of federal common law[17] that Congress may revise.[18] In the absence of controlling federal maritime law, federal courts have sometimes applied substantive state law in admiralty cases when it would not interfere with the uniformity of federal maritime law.[19] In some cases, such as those involving maritime torts in a state's territorial waters, the Court has held that state law may supplement federal maritime law with additional remedies.[20]

This group of essays examines the Constitution's grant of federal judicial power over cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The first essay provides an overview of the historical development of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the United States. Subsequent essays examine Supreme Court decisions that interpret the territorial and conceptual scope of this jurisdiction. The essays conclude by discussing when concurrent federal and state jurisdiction exists over maritime claims and, alternatively, when such claims fall within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts.

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.2 Historical Background on Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitution's Framers were familiar with the concept of a separate and specialized admiralty jurisdiction. Prior to the Founding, the British Crown commissioned vice-admiralty courts in the American colonies.[1] These courts, which were subordinate to the English admiralty courts, exercised jurisdiction over maritime cases that arose in the colonies independently of the colonial courts of common law and equity.[2]

In the years leading up to the American Revolution, the jurisdiction of the independent vice-admiralty courts led to disputes between the colonists and the British Crown. For [17] Federal courts have explained the content of the general maritime law. See generally Kermarec v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 358 U.S. 625, 628 (1959); Carlisle Packing Co. v. Sandanger, 259 U.S. 255, 259 (1922); Chelentis v. Luckenbach S.S. Co., 247 U.S. 372, 381–82 (1918); United States v. Ames, 99 U.S. 35, 35–36 (1879).

[18] Congress may, consistent with the Constitution, revise federal maritime law. See Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 55 (1932); In re Garnett, 141 U.S. 1, 14 (1891). Congress might also rely, to an extent, on its power to regulate maritime commerce when revising general maritime law. The Lottawanna, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) at 577. See also, e.g., U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 10 (granting Congress power to "define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations"); id. § 8, cl. 11 (giving Congress power to "declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water").

[19] Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U.S. 149, 158–59 (1920). See also Goett v. Union Carbide Corp., 361 U.S. 340, 342 (1960) (holding that, in a wrongful death case, a state law may supply the standard for liability in a maritime tort that arises within the state's territorial jurisdiction); Wilburn Boat Co. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 348 U.S. 310, 320–21 (1955) (holding that state law governed the effect of marine insurance warranties when Congress had left regulation of marine insurance to the states).

[20] E.g., Yamaha Motor Corp. v. Calhoun, 516 U.S. 199, 202, 215 (1996) (holding that state remedies for the wrongful death of a nonseafarer in state territorial waters were not preempted by federal law, where federal law provided no other remedy).

[1] Waring, 46 U.S. at 454; 3 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 68–70 (Philadelphia 1893) (1768). See also Story, supra note 3, at § 1659.

[2] See supra note 1.

example, the colonists objected to the Crown's prosecution of colonists in the vice-admiralty courts, without trial by jury, for allegedly violating a British tax law, the 1765 Stamp Act.[3] In 1774, the First Continental Congress's delegates cited this extension of British admiralty courts' jurisdiction "beyond their ancient limits" as one of the major grievances against Great Britain.[4] Denial to the colonists of trial by jury in the vice-admiralty courts helped to motivate the colonists' 1776 Declaration of Independence, which cited the British King depriving the colonists "in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury" as a justification for separating from Great Britain.[5]

After declaring independence, each state established its own admiralty courts.[6] State admiralty courts adopted a wide variety of procedural practices, particularly with respect to the availability of jury trials.[7] Although the Articles of Confederation authorized Congress to establish a tribunal to hear appeals from state admiralty courts in prize cases, this appeal mechanism failed to resolve many conflicts among state admiralty court decisions.[8]

Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 do not provide much insight into the Framers' reasons for conferring admiralty jurisdiction on the Federal Judiciary.[9] Delegate Charles Pinckney's plan for the federal government, which he had submitted to the Convention, would have authorized Congress to establish separate admiralty courts in each of the states.[10] In addition, the issue of admiralty jurisdiction received a brief mention in a Convention debate over whether the Constitution should specifically create lower federal courts.[11] Delegate James Wilson argued that the "national Government" should have jurisdiction over admiralty cases because they would often implicate controversies with foreign parties that should remain outside of state court jurisdiction.[12]

Toward the end of the Convention, the Committee of Detail, which was responsible for drafting the Constitution, included the clause granting the Federal Judiciary admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in one of its drafts.[13] This clause would establish uniform federal jurisdiction to resolve conflicts among the states with respect to prize cases, and the Convention delegates appear to have accepted it without controversy.[14]

---

[3] The Avalon Project at Yale Law School, Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress, https://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/resolves.asp. See also C.J. Hendry Co. v. Moore, 318 U.S. 133, 141 (1943) (noting that the "rise of the vice-admiralty courts" was "prompted in part by the [British] Crown's desire to have access to a forum not controlled by the obstinate resistance of American juries").

[4] See supra note 3. The colonial vice-admiralty courts had long exercised a more expansive jurisdiction than that of the English admiralty courts. See Atkins v. Disintegrating Co., 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 272, 304 (1874); Waring, 46 U.S. (5 How.) at 454.

[5] Nat'l Archives, Declaration of Independence: A Transcription.

[6] Harrington Putnam, How the Federal Courts Were Given Admiralty Jurisdiction, 10 Cornell L.Q. 460, 461–63 (1925). For example, Virginia established a court to hear cases related to "vessels and their cargoes," which had jurisdiction over prize cases. Id.

[7] The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton).

[8] Putnam, supra note 6, at 463–64. See also Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union of 1781, art. IX.

[9] Putnam, supra note 6, at 460 (noting that the subject of admiralty courts "received but scant attention in the deliberations of the Federal Constitutional Convention").

[10] Id. at 460, 465–66. See also, e.g., 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 159 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) (reproducing one version of the Pinckney Plan in a Committee of Detail draft).

[11] 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 124 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[12] Id.

[13] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, supra note 11, at 186–87. This draft granted the "Supreme Court" jurisdiction over admiralty cases but vested the federal "Judicial Power" in the Supreme Court and lower federal courts. See id. The Constitution's final text specifically extended the federal "judicial Power" to admiralty cases. U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[14] Putnam, supra note 6, at 469 ("[T]he experience of prize appeals, and the conflicts in the separate State courts, had prepared the Convention to accept a uniform Federal system, as essential to maritime commerce."). See also 3

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.2
Historical Background on Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction

Writing in the Federalist Papers in support of the Constitution's ratification, Alexander Hamilton maintained that even the most adamant opponents of a strong central government had acknowledged that the Federal Judiciary should take cognizance of admiralty cases.[15] Such cases, he wrote, "depend on the laws of nations, and so commonly affect the rights of foreigners, that they fall within the considerations which are relative to the public peace."[16] The Founders believed that admiralty jurisdiction should extend to the adjudication of prize cases involving the capture of foreign ships[17] and torts involving foreign ships,[18] both of which could implicate foreign affairs.[19] Hamilton also argued that federal courts should have exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty cases in order to provide uniform practices with respect to jury trials, which varied widely in state courts.[20]

By giving the Federal Judiciary jurisdiction over admiralty cases—and authorizing Congress to regulate that jurisdiction[21]—the Framers sought to ensure that federal courts would resolve cases that might implicate the nation's foreign policy.[22] The Framers also recognized that uniform federal admiralty jurisdiction could protect maritime commerce from the diverse and unpredictable procedural rules that state admiralty courts had applied under the Articles of Confederation.[23] After the Constitution's ratification, commercial maritime activity continued to expand throughout the United States. The importance of uniform admiralty jurisdiction grew as the Nation acquired new territories with inland waters and new inventions like the steamboat increased commerce on U.S. waterways.[24]

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.3 Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction Generally

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Since the Founding, the Supreme Court has grappled with the scope of federal courts' "admiralty and maritime" jurisdiction under Article III of the Constitution and federal

---

Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, § 1658 (1833) ("The propriety of this delegation of power seems to have been little questioned at the time of adopting the constitution.").

[15] The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[16] Id. See also Story, supra note 14, at §§ 1664–1667.

[17] Story, supra note 14, at § 1662.

[18] Id. § 1664.

[19] See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 475 (1793) (noting that "as the seas are the joint property of nations, whose right and privileges relative thereto, are regulated by the law of nations and treaties, [admiralty and maritime] cases necessarily belong to national jurisdiction.").

[20] The Federalist No. 83 (Alexander Hamilton).

[21] See U.S. Const. art. III, § 1; id. § 2, cl. 1; United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32, 33 (1812).

[22] Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 456–57 (1847); Story, supra note 14, at § 1666.

[23] Id.; Waring, 46 U.S. (5 How.) at 456–57.

[24] The Hine v. Trevor, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 555, 562 (1867) ("[W]ith the vast increase of inland navigation consequent upon the use of steamboats, and the development of wealth on the borders of the rivers, which thus became the great water highways of an immense commerce, the necessity for an admiralty court, and the value of admiralty principles in settling controversies growing out of this system of transportation, began to be felt.").

statutes.[1] The Supreme Court has held that "all suits involving maritime claims, regardless of the remedy sought, are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction within the meaning of Article III whether they are asserted in the federal courts or, under the saving clause, in the state courts."[2] Generally, the Court's cases analyzing admiralty jurisdiction have addressed when particular claims qualify as "maritime." Such cases have examined: (1) the territorial extent of such jurisdiction; (2) its subject matter scope; and (3) the availability of concurrent state court jurisdiction over maritime claims.

The Supreme Court has held that neither Congress, the states, nor U.S. courts can enlarge admiralty jurisdiction beyond its constitutional limits.[3] Congress has successfully enlarged the Judiciary Act's initial statutory grant of admiralty jurisdiction to the lower federal courts on several occasions,[4] which suggests that it has not granted the courts admiralty jurisdiction to the full extent that the Constitution allows.[5] However, the precise boundaries that the Constitution establishes for this jurisdiction remain unclear.[6] The Court has suggested that various historical and policy-based considerations may delineate the jurisdiction's boundaries, including the types of maritime cases that state admiralty courts could adjudicate at the time of the Constitution's adoption;[7] the Framers' reasons for conferring admiralty jurisdiction on the Federal Judiciary (for example, to establish more uniformity in admiralty proceedings);[8] and Congress's practical need to address new "maritime concerns."[9]

The extent to which Congress may reduce the scope of admiralty jurisdiction is also unclear. In one case, the Supreme Court suggested that "grave" constitutional questions would arise if the Court interpreted the Jones Act to prohibit federal courts from exercising admiralty jurisdiction over a seaman's personal injury claims against his employer while allowing such suits at common law.[10] The Court avoided ruling on whether the statute would encroach on the Constitution's grant of admiralty jurisdiction by construing the Jones Act to allow the seaman to sue either on the "admiralty side" of a federal court with trial by judge or the "law side" of the

---

[1] Neither the Constitution nor federal law specifically defines the phrase "admiralty and maritime." In one early case, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney noted the difficulties in ascertaining the extent of such jurisdiction. The Steamer St. Lawrence, 66 U.S. (1 Black) 522, 526–27 (1862). See also The Lottawanna, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 558, 574–77 (1874).

[2] Romero v. Int'l Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 367 n.23 (1959).

[3] The Steamer St. Lawrence, 66 U.S. (1 Black) at 527.

[4] See, e.g., Death on the High Seas Act, 46 U.S.C. §§ 30301–30308; Extension of Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, id. § 30101; Ship Mortgage Act, id. §§ 31301–31309; Shipowner's Limitation of Liability Act, id. §§ 30501–30512.

[5] See, e.g., Gutierrez v. Waterman Steamship Co., 373 U.S. 206, 209 (1963) (implicitly upholding Congress's expansion of admiralty jurisdiction to encompass some claims arising from injury or damage to property caused by a vessel on navigable waters that the Court had previously held not to fall within admiralty jurisdiction when the injury or damage was consummated on land).

[6] The Steamer St. Lawrence, 66 U.S. (1 Black) at 526–27. See also The Belfast, 74 U.S. 624, 636 (1869) (stating that the federal power to hear admiralty cases extends to "all such cases of a maritime character as were cognizable in the admiralty courts of the States at the time the Constitution was adopted").

[7] Id.

[8] The Steamer St. Lawrence, 66 U.S. (1 Black) at 526–27.

[9] Detroit Trust Co. v. The Thomas Barlum, 293 U.S. 21, 52 (1934). Because the Supreme Court often evaluates the scope of both constitutional and statutory admiralty jursidiction based on historical or common law factors, it can be difficult to ascertain whether some of the Court's rulings are grounded in its interpretation of the Constitution or, rather, federal statutory law. See, e.g., T. Smith & Son, Inc. v. Taylor, 276 U.S. 179, 182 (1928) (holding that admiralty had no jurisdiction over a wrongful death suit arising from an incident in which a sling knocked a longshoreman working on a wharf to unload a vessel into the water without specifying whether Congress could confer admiralty jurisdiction over such suits by subsequently enacting a statute).

[10] Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U.S. 375, 386, 389–90 (1924) ("[T]here are boundaries to the maritime law and admiralty jurisdiction which inhere in those subjects and cannot be altered by legislation, as by excluding a thing falling clearly within them or including a thing falling clearly without."). The Court also indicated that, generally, Congress's enactments modifying admiralty jurisdiction "must be coextensive with and operate uniformly in the whole of the United States." Id. at 387.

court with a right to a jury trial.[11] The Court's decision suggests that the Constitution may impose some limits on Congress's ability to withdraw certain maritime-related claims from admiralty jursidiction, at least when those claims remain cognizable in common law courts.

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.4 Territorial Extent of Admiralty Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Generally, courts consider the location in which a tort or crime occurs to be a major factor when determining whether the tort or crime falls within admiralty jurisdiction.[1] Early in U.S. history, the Supreme Court interpreted the territorial extent of federal admiralty jurisdiction in accordance with the rules of the English admiralty courts.[2] As a result, the Court construed that jurisdiction narrowly, limiting it to causes of action that arose on the high seas and rivers subject to the ebb and flow of the tide.[3]

The law changed significantly in the mid-nineteenth century when the Court held that the English rules on jurisidiction at the time of the U.S. Constitution's adoption could not limit the territorial extent of federal admiralty jursidiction.[4] In The Propeller Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh,[5] the Court reviewed a federal law that extended admiralty jursidiction over certain claims that arose on the Great Lakes and connecting waters.[6] The Court upheld the law, determining that the Constitution's initial grant of admiralty jurisdiction embraced such waters, even if they were beyond the ebb and flow of the tide.[7] A couple of decades later, the Court specifically held that admiralty jurisdiction, as conferred by the Constitution and federal statutes, extended to claims arising on all navigable waters of the United States.[8]

---

[11] Id. at 389–90.

[1] Exec. Jet Aviation, Inc. v. City of Cleveland, 409 U.S. 249, 268 (1972).

[2] The Thomas Jefferson, 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 428, 429–30 (1825). See also The Steamboat Orleans v. Phoebus, 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 175, 183 (1837); Peyroux v. Howard, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 324, 343 (1833).

[3] See supra note 2.

[4] Jackson v. S.B. Magnolia, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 296, 299 (1858); The Propeller Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 443, 455–57 (1851). See also Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 459 (1847); De Lovio v. Boit, 7 F. Cas. 418, 443–44 (C.C.D. Mass. 1815) (Story, Cir. J.).

[5] The Propeller Genesee Chief, 53 U.S. (12 How.) at 455–57.

[6] 5 Stat. 726, 726–27 (1845). See also The Propeller Genesee Chief, 53 U.S. (12 How.) at 451–52.

[7] Id. at 457.

[8] The Hine v. Trevor, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 555, 569 (1866).

Thus, according to modern understanding, admiralty jurisdiction extends to all public waters that are navigable in fact,[9] regardless of whether they are saltwater or freshwater, or subject to the ebb and flow of the tide.[10]

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.5 Jurisdiction Over Categories of Admiralty Cases

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In the modern era, most cases that fall within admiralty jurisdiction involve one of two subjects: torts committed on the high seas or other navigable waters; or maritime contracts or services, which often relate to shipping on navigable waters.[1] State courts may have concurrent jurisdiction over maritime contract or tort claims that fall within federal admiralty jurisdiction when the defendant brings a personal action against a defendant, but generally only federal admiralty courts may exercise jurisdiction over cases in which the plaintiff seeks remedies against property in rem.[2]

---

[9] The Daniel Ball, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 557, 563–64 (1870) (defining "navigable in fact" as waters that are "used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water").

[10] See, e.g., Southern S.S. Co. v. NLRB, 316 U.S. 31, 41 (1942): The Montello, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 430, 441–45 (1874); The Eagle, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 15, 20–21 (1869); The Magnolia, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 296, 301–02 (1858); Fretz v. Bull, 53 U.S. (23 How.) 466, 468 (1852). Claims that arise on artificial bodies of navigable water may be subject to admiralty jurisdiction. The Robert W. Parsons, 191 U.S. 17, 26–27 (1903) (intrastate waters of Erie canal); Ex parte Boyer, 109 U.S. 629, 632 (1884) (Illinois and Michigan canal); Escanaba Co. v. Chi., 107 U.S. 678, 682–83 (1883) (Chicago River and its branches). The jurisdiction also extends to waters that can be made navigable with "reasonable improvement." United States v. Appalachian Elec. Power Co., 311 U.S. 377, 407–09 (1940).

Some earlier Supreme Court cases appeared to limit admiralty jurisdiction's territorial extent to navigable waters with a nexus to interstate or international commerce. See, e.g., The Daniel Ball, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) at 564–65; Nelson v. Leland, 63 U.S. (22 How.) 48, 56 (1860). However, these cases may have rested on the obsolete notion that congressional conferral of admiralty jurisdiction depended on Congress's commerce power. See London Guar. & Accident Co. v. Indus. Accident Comm'n, 279 U.S. 109, 124 (1929); The Belfast, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 624, 641 (1869). Because the Constitution explicitly includes admiralty jurisdiction within the federal judicial power, no separate nexus to commerce is required for that jurisdiction.

[1] Early in U.S. history, some federal courts of appeals held that federal admiralty jurisdiction encompassed a broader variety of contracts and torts than the jurisdiction that admiralty courts in England or its North American colonies exercised. These early courts looked to customary international maritime law for the extent of jurisdiction. E.g., The Seneca, 21 F. Cas. 1081, 1082–84 (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1829) (holding that a dispute among a vessel's owners over where it would be employed fell within federal admiralty jurisdiction); DeLovio v. Boit, 7 F. Cas. 418, 444 (C.C.D. Mass. 1815) (determining that claims stemming from an insurance policy were within the nonexclusive federal admiralty jurisdiction). The Court later held that admiralty jurisdiction in federal courts is broader than that sustained in England. E.g., N.J. Steam Navigation Co. v. Merch. Bank of Boston, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 344, 386, 389 (1848). See also Atkins v. Disintegrating Co., 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 272, 304 (1874) ("The Constitution, in the grant of the admiralty jurisdiction, refers to it as it existed in this and other maritime countries at the time of the adoption of that instrument. It was then greatly larger here than in England. The hostility of the common-law courts there had wrought the reduction.").

[2] See Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 460–61 (1847). In in rem admiralty proceedings, the court takes custody of the res or property. The property itself is made the defendant in the case, and parties who have an interest in it "may appear" and each "propound independently his interest." Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 583, 599 (1858).

Congress has also granted federal district courts sitting in admiralty exclusive and original jurisdiction over prize and seizure cases.[3] Historically, prize cases have involved property (e.g., a ship) used by an enemy, captured during wartime, and brought into the United States.[4] The court's jurisidiction extends to proceedings in which a party seeks to acquire title legally to property taken as a prize.[5]

Cases involving the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for violating federal law or another nation's laws also fall within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of federal courts.[6] Vessels may be seized for engaging in activities such as conducting prohibited trade[7] or violating the revenue laws.[8] Federal courts also have exclusive jurisdiction over criminal cases against U.S. persons or vessels that arise within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, which generally encompasses navigable waters within U.S. territory but outside of any particular state's jurisdiction.[9]

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.6 Torts Committed on Navigable Waters

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Maritime torts include injuries to persons,[1] damages to property arising out of collisions or other negligent acts,[2] product liability suits,[3] and violent dispossession of property.[4] Cases

---

[3] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1333, 1356. See also 10 U.S.C. ch. 883; The Admiral, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 603, 612 (1866); The Amiable Nancy, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 546, 557–58 (1818); Bingham v. Cabbot, 3 (3 Dall.) U.S. 19, 41 (1795).

[4] The Sally, 12 U.S. (8 Cr.) 382, 384 (1814); The Rapid, 12 U.S. (8 Cr.) 155, 162 (1814). See also United States v. Ames, 99 U.S. 35, 43 (1879); Jennings v. Carson, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 2, 20 (1807).

[5] Supra notes 2, 3, 4 and accompanying text.

[6] See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1333, 1356. United States v. La Vengeance, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 297, 301 (1796) (holding that an in rem proceeding involving seizure and forfeiture of a vessel for exporting arms and ammunition in violation of federal law was within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts). Accord United States v. The Schooner Betsey and Charlotte, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 443, 452 (1808) (determining that Congress intended for federal admiralty courts to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over seizures of ships for violating federal law on navigable waters).

[7] E.g., The Samuel, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 9, 14 (1816) (engaging in prohibited trade in violation of federal law); Hudson v. Guestier, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 293, 294 (1808) (violating French law by trading at a certain port); United States v. Schooner Sally of Norfolk, 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 406, 406 (1805) (engaging in the slave trade); La Vengeance, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) at 301 (exporting prohibited weapons).

[8] E.g., Maul v. United States, 274 U.S. 501, 511–12 (1927); The Brig Ann, 13 U.S. (9 Cr.) 289, 289–90 (1815); The Sarah, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 391, 394–96 (1823). At least some cases involving the seizure and forfeiture of vessels on state navigable waters for violations of state law may be heard in state courts. C.J. Hendry Co. v. Moore, 318 U.S. 133, 153 (1943).

[9] 18 U.S.C. § 7. See also United States v. Flores, 289 U.S. 137, 150 (1933) (noting that admiralty courts had long exercised jurisdiction over criminal cases that arose on navigable waters); United States v. Rodgers, 150 U.S. 249, 266 (1893) (holding that federal courts had jurisdiction under federal law "to try a person for an assault, with a dangerous weapon, committed on a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, when such vessel is in the Detroit River, out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, and within the territorial limits of the Dominion of Canada").

[1] E.g., Brady v. Roosevelt S.S. Co., 317 U.S. 575, 576–77 (1943); Atl. Transp. Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U.S. 52, 62–63 (1914); Leathers v. Blessing, 105 U.S. 626, 630 (1882); The S.B. New World v. King, 57 U.S. (16 How.) 469, 472–73 (1854).

involving tort claims fall within admiralty jurisdiction when two requirements are met: (1) the commission or consummation of the act that gives rise to the claim occurs on navigable waters;[5] and (2) the tort bears a significant relationship to traditional maritime activity.[6]

The first requirement for admiralty jurisdiction, which is based on the location of the incident, is satisfied if the tort arises on the high seas or on other navigable waters of the United States.[7] Prior to Congress's enactment of the Extension of Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1948, the Supreme Court had held that some claims arising from injury or damage to property caused by a vessel on navigable waters did not fall within admiralty jurisdiction when they were consummated on land (e.g., collision of a ship with a bridge).[8] In the Extension Act,[9] Congress enlarged admiralty jurisdiction to encompass many of these claims. The Court implicitly upheld that expansion of admiralty jurisdiction as within constitutional limits[10] when determining that the jurisdiction ecompassed a tort that arose when a longshoreman slipped on loose beans that spilled from negligently packed cargo on a dock during a vessel's unloading.[11] In addition to Congress's expansion of admiralty jurisdiction, the Court has

---

The Supreme Court has held that plaintiffs may recover under general maritime law for the wrongful death of a seaman. Moragne v. States Marine Lines, 398 U.S. 375, 409 (1970), overruling The Harrisburg, 119 U.S. 199 (1886). See also Miles v. Apex Marine Corp., 498 U.S. 19, 37 (1990).

The federal Death on the High Seas Act, 46 U.S.C. §§ 30301–30308, permits recovery of damages for deaths of seamen and other persons that occur more than three miles from shore.

[2] E.g., The Raithmoor, 241 U.S. 166, 177 (1916); Erie R.R. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co., 204 U.S. 220, 223–25 (1907); The Propeller Commerce, 66 U.S. (1 Black) 574, 579 (1862).

[3] Air & Liquid Sys. Corp. v. DeVries, No. 17-1104, slip op. at 5 (2019); E. River S.S. Corp. v. Transamerica Delaval Inc., 476 U.S. 858, 865 (1986). In a maritime product liability action, a federal court "acts as a common law court" and may derive federal maritime law from various sources, including "judicial opinions, legislation, treatises, and scholarly writings." Air & Liquid Sys. Corp., slip op. at 4.

[4] See L'Invincible, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 238, 257 (1816).

[5] Exec. Jet Aviation, Inc. v. City of Cleveland, 409 U.S. 249, 268 (1972). Admiralty courts may decline to exercise jurisdiction over maritime tort lawsuits between foreign parties. Canada Malting Co. v. Paterson S.S., Ltd., 285 U.S. 413, 418 (1932).

[6] Exec. Jet Aviation, 409 U.S. at 268. A federal court sitting in admiralty may proceed against defendants in personam in a maritime tort case. The Rock Island Bridge, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 213, 215 (1867). When the "cause of the injury" is subject to a maritime lien, such as a vessel involved in a collision, the court may also proceed against the subject property in rem. Id.

[7] Victory Carriers, Inc. v. Law, 404 U.S. 202, 205 (1971). See also Gonsalves v. Morse Dry Dock & Repair Co., 266 U.S. 171, 172 (1924); Phila. v. Phila. & Havre De Grace Steam Towboat Co., 64 U.S. (23 How.) 209, 215 (1859).

[8] See, e.g., T. Smith & Son, Inc. v. Taylor, 276 U.S. 179, 182 (1928) (holding that admiralty had no jurisdiction over a wrongful death suit arising from an incident in which a sling knocked a longshoreman working on a wharf to unload a vessel into the water); The Panoil, 266 U.S. 433, 435 (1925) (determining that a case brought against a vessel for damaging a federally constructed dike did not fall within the admiralty jurisdiction because the dike was part of the land). Cf. The Admiral Peoples, 295 U.S. 649, 651–52 (1935) (holding that admiralty jurisdiction existed over a tort claim that arose when an injured passenger fell from a gangplank onto a dock because the gangplank was part of the vessel); Minnie v. Port Huron Terminal Co., 295 U.S. 647, 648 (1935) (determining that a longshoreman's tort claims fell within the admiralty jurisdiction when he had sustained injuries unloading cargo from a vessel in navigable waters after a swinging hoist knocked him off of the vessel and on to the deck of a wharf); Doullut & Williams Co. v. United States, 268 U.S. 33, 33–35 (1925) (determining that admiralty jurisdiction extended over a case seeking recovery for damages to clusters of pilings driven into navigable waters and used exclusively as aids-in-navigation); The Blackheath, 195 U.S. 361, 367–68 (1904) (claims against vessel for damage to government aid-in-navigation beacon fell within admiralty jurisdiction).

[9] 46 U.S.C. § 13101.

[10] See Gutierrez v. Waterman Steamship Co., 373 U.S. 206, 209 (1963).

[11] Id. at 207–10. In the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C. § 30104, Congress provided seamen or their personal representatives a private right of action against employers, with the right of trial by jury, to seek compensation for injuries or death that occur within the course of employment. This right exists even if the injury occurred on land. Swanson v. Marra Bros., Inc., 328 U.S. 1, 4 (1946); O'Donnell v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 318 U.S. 36, 43 (1943). See also Sw. Marine, Inc. v. Gizoni, 502 U.S. 81, 86–89 (1991) (addressing which workers qualify as seamen for Jones Act purposes); maintained a few historical exceptions to a strict situs test for maritime jurisdiction.[12] However, even with such congressional and judicial guidance, it may occasionally be difficult to distinguish maritime torts from land-based torts. For example, the Court held that admiralty jurisdiction did not extend to an injury caused by defective pier-based equipment that a dock worker suffered when unloading a vessel; thus, the worker had to resort to state law for a remedy.[13]

The Supreme Court's jurisprudence on the second factor, which asks whether the tort bears a significant relationship to a traditional maritime activity, may also raise complex interpretive questions. For example, in Executive Jet Aviation v. City of Cleveland, a jet aircraft departing a Cleveland airport collided with seagulls, crashed, and sank into the navigable state territorial waters of Lake Erie.[14] The owners of the aircraft sued a federal air traffic controller and others for negligence, seeking to invoke the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts.[15] The Court held that, in addition to establishing that the commission or consummation of the wrongful act took place on navigable waters,[16] the plaintiffs had to show that the tort bore a "significant relationship to traditional maritime activity."[17] Because a land-based aircraft's flight between two locations within the United States's continental boundaries did not possess such a relationship, the Court held that federal courts could not exercise admiralty jurisdiction.[18] However, the Court's opinion in Executive Jet suggests that Congress may have some flexibility to expand admiralty jurisdiction to encompass claims like those at issue in the case by enacting laws that, for example, enlarge the concept of a "traditional maritime activity."[19]

In other cases, the Supreme Court has determined that admiralty jurisdiction exists because a case involves a traditional maritime activity. For example, the Court upheld the exercise of admiralty jursidiction over a collision between two private pleasure boats on navigable waters—even though pleasure boating was not exclusively a commercial activity—because such a collision could impact maritime commerce.[20] For similar reasons, the McDermott Int'l, Inc. v. Wilander, 498 U.S. 337, 356–57 (1991) (same). State and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction over Jones Act claims, which are personal actions. Am. Dredging Co. v. Miller, 510 U.S. 443, 455 (1994). See also Engel v. Davenport, 271 U.S. 33, 37–38 (1926).

[12] See, e.g., Seas Shipping Co. v. Sieracki, 328 U.S. 85, 90 (1946) (determining that a stevedore's employee could bring unseaworthiness claims for injuries that occurred on board a docked vessel); Mahnich v. Southern S.S. Co., 321 U.S. 96 (1944); O'Donnell v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 318 U.S. 36, 41–42 (1943) (recognizing that a seaman may claim maintenance and cure, which generally refers to living expenses and medical care, for injuries that occur on land because "from its dawn, the maritime law has recognized the seaman's right to maintenance and cure for injuries suffered in the course of his service to his vessel, whether occurring on sea or on land").

[13] Victory Carriers, Inc., 404 U.S. at 204, 212.

[14] Exec. Jet Aviation v. City of Cleveland, 409 U.S. 249, 250 (1972).

[15] Id. at 250–51.

[16] Id. at 253.

[17] Id. at 268.

[18] Id. at 274.

[19] Id.

[20] Foremost Ins. Co. v. Richardson, 457 U.S. 668, 674–76 (1982) ("[T]he smooth flow of maritime commerce is promoted when all vessel operators are subject to the same duties and liabilities."). See also Sisson v. Ruby, 497 U.S. 358, 359, 362 (1990) (holding that admiralty jurisdiction existed in a limitation of liability suit involving a fire on a pleasure boat docked at a marina on a navigable waterway that damaged several other vessels because the incident could potentially disrupt maritime commerce); Leathers v. Blessing, 105 U.S. 626, 629 (1881) (determining that a federal court could exercise jurisdiction over a tort claim involving a fully loaded vessel that had recently completed its voyage and was docked at a wharf at the time of plaintiff's alleged injury).

Court held that a dredging company's vessel was engaged in a traditional maritime activity when it damaged an underwater freight tunnel while performing maintenance work.[21]

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.7 Maritime Contracts or Services

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In contract cases, the subject matter of the contract, claim, or service controls whether a claim falls within admiralty jurisdiction.[1] Contracts "purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation, are cognizable in the admiralty."[2] The Supreme Court has not established a clear test for when a transaction is a maritime contract. Instead, the Court has declared that the "boundaries of admiralty jurisdiction over contracts" are "conceptual rather than spatial" and "have always been difficult to draw."[3] The Court has examined "precedent and usage" when determining whether a contract is essentially maritime.[4]

Contract cases that fall within federal admiralty jurisdiction[5] include actions for pilotage charges[6] or towage;[7] actions for repair of a vessel already used in navigation;[8] actions on [21] Jerome B. Grubart, Inc. v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 513 U.S. 527, 539–40 (1995) (determining that a tort claim fell within admiralty jurisdiction when it arose from damage to a freight tunnel and other buildings allegedly caused when a barge negligently drove piles into the riverbed). See also Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. v. Kierejewski, 261 U.S. 479, 480–81 (1923) (holding that repair of a vessel was a traditional maritime activity in a case in which an employee drowned when one of his employer's tugs knocked him off a scaffold on a float near a vessel he was repairing).

---

[1] Ex parte Easton, 95 U.S. 68, 72 (1877) (stating that admiralty jurisdiction "extends to all contracts, claims, and services essentially maritime"); Waring v. Clarke, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 441, 459 (1847). *Accor*d Exxon Corp. v. Cent. Gulf Lines, Inc., 500 U.S. 603, 611 (1991).

Congress may authorize courts to refer disputes over maritime contracts to arbitration when the parties have agreed to arbitrate. Marine Transit Corp. v. Dreyfus, 284 U.S. 263, 277 (1932); Red Cross Line v. Atl. Fruit Co., 264 U.S. 109, 124 (1924) (determining that the New York legislature could grant New York state courts the authority to compel specific performance of an arbitration agreement pertaining to a contract made and performed in the state because it was valid under state law and the general maritime law). Agency contracts, which establish a fiduciary relationship between a principal and an agent, may fall within the admiralty jurisdiction if their subject matter is maritime. Exxon Corp., 500 U.S. at 612, overruling Minturn v. Maynard, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 477 (1855).

[2] The Belfast, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 624, 637 (1869).

[3] Kossick v. United Fruit Co., 365 U.S. 731, 735 (1961).

[4] Id. See also Norfolk Southern Ry. v. James N. Kirby, Pty. Ltd., 543 U.S. 14, 25 (2004) (stating that the court must examine "whether the principal objective of a contract is maritime commerce"); Grant v. Poillon, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 162, 168 (1858).

[5] Because of the Judiciary Act's "saving to suitors" clause, the contract cases in this paragraph do not necessarily fall within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. Most contract actions may be brought in either federal or state court. See, e.g., Atl. & Gulf Stevedores, Inc. v. Ellerman Lines, Ltd., 369 U.S. 355, 359–60 (1962) ("[An in personam] suit for breach of a maritime contract, while it may be brought in admiralty, may also be pursued in an ordinary civil action."). For more on the exclusivity of federal court jurisdiction over admiralty cases, see "Exclusivity of Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction."

[6] Ex parte McNiel, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 236, 243 (1872). Pilotage charges are fees owed to an individual who pilots a vessel in territorial waters. See id. at 237. See also Hobart v. Drogan, 35 U.S. (10 Pet.) 108, 119–20 (1836).

bottomry or respondentia bonds;[9] agreements of consortship between the masters of two vessels engaged in wrecking;[10] cases arising under marine insurance policies;[11] charter parties;[12] compensation for temporary wharfage;[13] contracts for loading or unloading vessels;[14] contracts for transportation of passengers or merchandise by ship,[15] which includes contracts of affreighment;[16] contracts with materialmen for the repair or supply of a foreign ship;[17] salvage services;[18] suits by seamen for wages;[19] and surveys of damaged vessels.[20]

---

[7] See Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 177 U.S. 328, 642–43 (1900). Towage charges are fees owed to an individual who tows property for another person. Id. at 644–45. In several cases, the Supreme Court has examined clauses in towage contracts that relieve a party from liability for damage to the property towed. E.g., Boston Metals Co. v. The Winding Gulf, 349 U.S. 122, 122–23 (1955) (holding invalid a "contract designed to shift responsibility for a towboat's negligence from the towboat to its innocent tow"); Bisso v. Inland Waterways Corp., 349 U.S. 85, 85, 95 (1955) (determining that a towboat cannot "contract against all liability for its own negligent towage"); Sun Oil v. Dalzell Towing Co., 287 U.S. 291, 292–93 (1932).

[8] New Bedford Dry Dock Co. v. Purdy, 258 U.S. 96, 99 (1922); The General Smith, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 438, 443 (1819). Admiralty jurisdiction extends to such actions even though the repairs are made in dry dock rather than on navigable waters. North Pac. S.S. Co. v. Hall Bros. Marine Ry. & Shipbuilding Co., 249 U.S. 119, 128–29 (1919). However, contracts and agreements that relate to a vessel's original construction do not fall within admiralty jurisdiction. Id. at 126–27. See also Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rhode, 257 U.S. 469, 475–76 (1922); Thames Towboat Co. v. The Schooner Francis McDonald, 254 U.S. 242, 244 (1920); Edwards v. Elliott, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 532, 555 (1874); Roach & Long v. Chapman, 63 U.S. (22 How.) 129, 132 (1860); People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 393, 402 (1858).

[9] See O'Brien v. Miller, 168 U.S. 287, 297 (1897); Ins. Co. v. Gossler, 96 U.S. 645, 648 (1877); The Grapeshot, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 129, 135 (1870). Historically, bottomry and respondentia bonds were a form of debt incurred to supply a ship during a voyage, enforceable in admiralty as a lien on the ship or cargo. The Grapeshot, 76 U.S. at 135; O'Brien, 168 U.S. at 288–89.

The Supreme Court Court initially held that ordinary mortgages on ships were not maritime contracts, even though secured by a vessel, its gear, or its cargo, because they were not entered into with reference to "navigation or perils of the sea." See Bogart v. The Steamboat John Jay, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 399, 401–02 (1855). However, Congress extended admiralty jurisdiction to encompass such mortgages in the Ship Mortgage Act, 46 U.S.C. §§ 31301–31309. See also Detroit Trust Co. v. The Thomas Barlum, 293 U.S. 21, 52 (1934).

[10] Andrews v. Wall, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 568, 572 (1845). In one type of consortship agreement, shipowners or salvors agree to cooperate in salvaging a wreck and split the proceeds. See id. at 571.

However, admiralty jurisdiction does not extend to contracts of partnership in the earnings of a single ship. Ward v. Thompson, 63 U.S. (22 How.) 330, 333 (1859), see also Vandewater v. Mills, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 82, 92 (1857); or most actions for accounting (i.e., a determination of how much one litigant owes another). Swift & Co. Packers v. Compania Colombiana del Caribe, 339 U.S. 684, 692–93 (1950).

[11] Wilburn Boat Co. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 348 U.S. 310, 313–14 (1955); Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 1, 31, 35 (1871). Although cases arising under marine insurance policies are within admiralty jurisdiction, state law may determine the outcome. See id. at 320–21 (holding that state law governs the effect of marine insurance warranties when Congress has not enacted conflicting federal legislation regulating marine insurance or occupied the field of regulation).

[12] In a charter party, an entity hires a ship or its officers. See, e.g., Armour & Co. v. Fort Morgan S.S. Co., 270 U.S. 253, 259 (1926).

[13] Ex parte Easton, 95 U.S. 68, 77 (1877). Wharfage refers to a "contract for the use of a wharf by the master or owner of a ship or vessel." Id.

[14] Am. Stevedores, Inc. v. Porello, 330 U.S. 446, 456 (1947) (holding that jurisdiction extended to a stevedoring contract's indemnity provision because "although admiralty jurisdiction over contracts partly maritime and partly non-maritime in nature is doubtful . . . [t]o sever a contract provision for indemnity for damages arising out of the performance of wholly maritime activities would only needlessly multiply litigation. Such a provision is a normal clause in contracts to act for others and no more determines the nature of a contract than do conditions on the time and place of payment.").

[15] The Moses Taylor, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 411, 427 (1867). See also Norfolk Southern Ry. v. James N. Kirby, Pty. Ltd., 543 U.S. 14, 24 (2004) (holding that contracts for transportation of goods were maritime contracts even though the final leg of the journey took place on land by rail).

[16] N.J. Steam Navigation Co. v. Merch. Bank of Boston, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 344, 385–87 (1848). See also The Eddy, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 481, 494 (1867); Morewood v. Enequist, 64 U.S. (23 How.) 491, 493–94 (1860). A contract of affreightment involves hiring a vessel to transport merchandise or passengers. Id. at 492. See also Archawski v. Hanioti, 350 U.S. 532, 536 (1956) (holding that admiralty jurisdiction extends to claims arising from the alleged violation of an affreightment

ArtIII.S2.C1.12.8 Exclusivity of Federal Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In Article III of the Constitution, the Framers granted the Federal Judiciary jurisdiction over "admiralty and maritime" cases to ensure that courts would apply uniform rules in deciding cases that could affect domestic commerce and might implicate foreign affairs.[1] In the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress conferred exclusive admiralty jurisdiction on the federal district courts[2] while preserving concurrent state court jurisdiction over common law remedies so that the states could supplement the administration of federal maritime law.[3]

In practice, state courts retain concurrent jurisdiction over most contract and tort cases that fall within federal admiralty jurisdiction because a plaintiff may bring a personal action contract for transportation of passengers); Krauss Bros. Lumber Co. v. Dimon S.S. Corp., 290 U.S. 117, 122 (1933) (determining that admiralty jurisdiction extended to a contract of affreightment provision that provided a lower freight rate in certain circumstances).

---

At one time, the Supreme Court held that admiralty jurisdiction did not extend to contracts of affreightment for the transportation of goods within the boundaries of one state. Maguire v. Card, 62 U.S. (21 How.) 248, 251 (1859) ("So in respect to the completely internal commerce of the States, which is the subject of regulation by their municipal laws; contracts growing out of it should be left to be dealt with by its own tribunals."). See also Allen v. Newberry, 62 U.S. (21 How.) 244, 245 (1859); Vandewater v. Mills, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 82, 92 (1857) ("This is nothing more than an agreement for a special and limited partnership in the business of transporting freight and passengers between New York and San Francisco, and the mere fact that the transportation is by sea, and not by land, will not be sufficient to give the court admiralty jurisdiction of an action for a breach of the contract."). The Court later held that admiralty jursidiction extended to such cases. See generally The Belfast, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 624, 642 (1869).

[17] The St. Jago de Cuba, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 409, 416 (1824); The General Smith, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 438, 443 (1819); The Aurora, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 96, 105 (1816).

[18] The S.S. Jefferson, 215 U.S. 130, 143 (1909) (holding that claims for compensation for salvage services provided to a ship in dry dock fell within the admiralty jurisdiction); Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 119 U.S. 625, 626–27 (1887) (determining that salvage of a floating dry dock was not within the admiralty jurisdiction because it was used to lift ships out of the water and not as an aid-in-navigation).

[19] Sheppard v. Taylor, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 675, 711 (1831) (stating that admiralty jurisdiction extends to a seaman's action for wages, whether in rem or in personam).

[20] Janney v. Columbian Ins. Co., 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 411, 418 (1825). Surveying a ship generally refers to inspecting it. See id. at 417.

[1] The Lottawanna, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 558, 575 (1874). See also Chelentis v. Luckenbach S.S. Co., 247 U.S. 372, 381–82 (1918).

[2] State courts may also lack jurisdiction over maritime cases as a result of federal preemption. See, e.g., Maryland Casualty Co. v. Cushing, 347 U.S. 409, 415 (1954) (holding that federal law limiting a shipowner's liability preempted a state statute authorizing direct suit against an insurance company).

[3] 28 U.S.C. § 1333(1). If the Judiciary Act's "saving to suitors" clause authorizes a litigant to bring suit in state court, the plaintiff may also choose to bring its claims on the "law side" of a federal court and obtain a jury if an independent basis for jurisdiction exists (e.g., diversity of citizenship) and the amount-in-controversy requirement is satisfied. Seas Shipping Co. v. Sieracki, 328 U.S. 85, 88–89 (1946). See also, e.g., Fitzgerald v. United States Lines Co., 374 U.S. 16, 20–21 (1963) (holding that admiralty claims joined with a Jones Act claim must be submitted to a jury "when both arise out of one set of facts"); Panama R.R. v. Johnson, 264 U.S. 375, 388 (1924) (upholding suit on a federal court's "law side" for a Jones Act claim as consistent with Congress's power to "alter, qualify or supplement the maritime rules"). See also 46 U.S.C. § 30104. Jones Act claims may also be brought in state court. Panama R.R., 271 U.S. at 561.

seeking common law remedies against an individual defendant in most of these cases.[4] In an in personam case[5] under the common law, liability attaches to property only to the extent of the individual defendant's title in that property.[6] When bringing such maritime actions against defendants, the plaintiff may choose either federal or state court.

By contrast, the Supreme Court has held that, as a matter of statute, federal courts have exclusive admiralty jurisdiction over cases in which the plaintiff seeks remedies for maritime torts or contracts that lie against property in rem (e.g., the seizure of a vessel to enforce a maritime lien).[7] For example, the Court held invalid a California court's application of a statute that allowed the state's courts to subject vessels to condemnation and sale in lawsuits brought directly against the vessels for breaches of maritime contracts.[8] The Court determined that the federal courts traditionally had exclusive jurisdiction under the Judiciary Act over such in rem admiralty proceedings.[9] Such actions were not saved by the Judiciary Act's savings clause because they were based on civil (i.e., statutory) law rather than common law.[10]

Other in rem cases that are subject to the federal courts' exclusive jurisdiction include cases involving limitation of a shipowner's liability;[11] prize, capture, and seizure cases;[12] and suits against the United States.[13] Only a federal court sitting in admiralty may enforce a [4] Atl. & Gulf Stevedores, Inc. v. Ellerman Lines, Ltd., 369 U.S. 355, 359–60 (1962) ("[An in personam] suit for breach of a maritime contract, while it may be brought in admiralty, may also be pursued in an ordinary civil action."); Red Cross Line v. Atl. Fruit Co., 264 U.S. 109, 123 (1924) ("By reason of the saving clause, state courts have jurisdiction in personam, concurrent with the admiralty courts, of all causes of action maritime in their nature arising under charter parties."); Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 177 U.S. 638, 643, 648 (1900) (holding that a state court could enforce a lien on a vessel for towage charges because the plaintiff had brought suit in personam against individual defendants rather than in rem against the vessel, placing the claims within the savings clause).

The Supreme Court has held that, in general, federal admiralty courts cannot issue some forms of equitable relief (e.g., ordering specific performance of a contract). In re The Steamer Eclipse, 135 U.S. 599, 608 (1890). But see Swift & Co. Packers v. Compania Colombiana del Caribe, 339 U.S. 684, 690–93 (1950).

[5] Generally, in personam jurisdiction refers to a court's power over a person (or entity) who is a party to, or involved in, a case or controversy before the court, including its power to render judgments affecting that person's rights. Black's Law Dictionary 982 (10th ed. 2014).

[6] A case does not fall within federal courts' exclusive admiralty jurisdiction merely because it involves the issuance of an "auxiliary attachment" against the vessel. Rounds v. Cloverport Foundry & Machine Co., 237 U.S. 303, 306 (1915). In exercising in personam jurisdiction, a state court may "adopt such remedies, and . . . attach to them such incidents, as it sees fit so long as it does not attempt to make changes in the substantive maritime law." Am. Dredging Co. v. Miller, 510 U.S. 443, 447 (1994) (internal quotation marks omitted). See also Madruga v. Superior Court, 346 U.S. 556, 561–63 (1954) (upholding state court jurisdiction over a lawsuit seeking a judicial order directing the sale of a vessel and the partition of its proceeds, in part, because the Court could not foresee any "possible injury to commerce or navigation if states continue to be free to follow their own customary partition procedures" and "the state court in this proceeding acts only upon the interests of the parties over whom it has jurisdiction in personam").

[7] Am. Dredging Co., 510 U.S. at 446; The Robert W. Parsons, 191 U.S. 17, 37 (1903); The Hine v. Trevor, 71 U.S. 555, 569 (1866); The Moses Taylor, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 411, 427 (1866). In in rem admiralty proceedings, the court takes custody of the res or property. The property itself is made the defendant in the case, and parties who have an interest in it "may appear" and each "propound independently his interest." Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 583, 599 (1858) (vessel as a res). See also United States v. Freights, 274 U.S. 466, 470 (1927) (debt as a res).

[8] The Moses Taylor, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) at 424–25, 431.

[9] Id. at 427.

[10] Id. at 431.

[11] Ex parte Green, 286 U.S. 437, 439–40 (1932) ("[T]he state court has no jurisdiction to determine the question of the owner's right to a limited liability, and [if] the value of the vessel be not accepted as the limit of the owner's liability, the federal court is authorized to resume jurisdiction and dispose of the whole case.").

[12] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1333, 1356. See also 10 U.S.C. ch. 883.

[13] In rem proceedings cannot successfully be maintained against a vessel that is U.S. government property without the federal government's consent. See The Siren, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 152, 154 (1869). Suits against the federal government for injury caused by a U.S.-owned vessel's negligence may be brought under the Suits in Admiralty Act. See generally 46 U.S.C. ch. 309. For further discussion of the United States' immunity from suit, see Amdt11.6.3 Officer Suits and State Sovereign Immunity.

maritime lien, which may arise, for example, out of a maritime contract or tort.[14] State legislatures may enact laws providing for state court jurisdiction over in rem maritime actions only in certain, narrowly defined circumstances.[15]

In the absence of controlling federal maritime law, courts have sometimes applied substantive state law in admiralty cases when it would not interfere with the uniformity of federal maritime law.[16] For example, in Southern Pacific Co v. Jensen, the Supreme Court held that a state could not apply its workers' compensation law to stevedores injured when unloading a ship at a wharf in navigable waters under a maritime contract.[17] The Court reasoned that workers' compensation was not a common law remedy preserved for the state courts under the Judiciary Act, and that its application would interfere with the general maritime law's uniformity in violation of the Constitution.[18] In Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, the Court held that Congress could not authorize the states to establish their own workers' compensation laws for maritime employees.[19] Although the Constitution permits Congress to legislate on maritime rights, obligations, and remedies, it forbids Congress from delegating its power to the states to create new rights by permitting the states to modify the maritime law in a manner that would "work material injury" to the "characteristic features" of the law or interfere with its uniformity.[20]

Other provisions of the Constitution may also influence federal admiralty jurisdiction. For example, the Eleventh Amendment prohibits federal courts sitting in admiralty from entertaining jurisdiction over lawsuits brought in rem against state-chartered vessels without

---

[14] Federal admiralty jurisdiction is exclusive when litigants seek to enforce a lien created on a vessel or its cargo under general maritime law. See Cutler v. Rae, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 729, 731 (1849). States cannot enforce maritime liens in rem. The Glide, 167 U.S. 606, 623–24 (1897). See also Moran v. Sturges, 154 U.S. 256, 283 (1894); Edwards v. Elliott, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 532, 557 (1874); Leon v. Galceran, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 185, 190 (1871). However, when a tort is not maritime, a litigant may pursue the lien's enforcement in state court when state law provides a lien on the vessel. Johnson v. Chi. & Pac. Elevator Co., 119 U.S. 388, 399–400 (1886).

[15] C. J. Hendry Co. v. Moore, 318 U.S. 133, 134, 153 (1943) (upholding a California law authorizing state courts to exercise jurisdiction in a forfeiture proceeding involving a purse net seized from a fishing boat in navigable waters for violating state law because in rem forfeiture proceedings for violations of state law had long been recognized as a common law remedy not within federal courts' exclusive admiralty jurisdiction).

[16] Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U.S. 149, 158–59 (1920). See also Goett v. Union Carbide Corp., 361 U.S. 340, 342 (1960) (holding that, in a wrongful death case, state law may supply the standard for liability in a maritime tort that arises within the state's territorial jurisdiction); Wilburn Boat Co. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 348 U.S. 310, 320–21 (1955) (holding that state law governed the effect of marine insurance warranties when Congress had left regulation of marine insurance to the states).

In other cases, such as those involving maritime torts in a state's territorial waters, state law may supplement federal maritime law with additional remedies if not preempted under federal law. For example, states may supplement federal maritime law with additional remedies for maritime torts in some circumstances. E.g., Yamaha Motor Corp. v. Calhoun, 516 U.S. 199, 202, 215 (1996) (upholding against a preemption challenge state remedies for the wrongful death of a non-seafarer in state territorial waters in the absence of federal remedies).

[17] S. Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U.S. 205, 217–18 (1917).

[18] Id. See also N. Coal & Dock Co. v. Strand, 278 U.S. 142, 145 (1928); Clyde S.S. Co. v. Walker, 244 U.S. 255, 257 (1917). The Supreme Court had previously allowed the states to regulate some aspects of maritime workers' compensation. Sultan R. & T. Co. v. Dep't of Labor & Indus., 277 U.S. 135, 136–37 (1928) (upholding state law requiring companies to report number and wages of men employed and pay premiums into the state's workers' compensation fund); Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rohde, 257 U.S. 469, 477 (1922) ("[A]s to certain local matters regulation of which would work no material prejudice to the general maritime law, the rules of the latter might be modified or supplemented by state statutes.").

[19] See Knickerbocker Ice Co., 253 U.S. at 160, 163–64.

[20] Id. at 158–60, 164. See also Wash. v. W. C. Dawson & Co., 264 U.S. 219, 227–28 (1924). In 1927, Congress responded to decisions such as Knickerbocker and Jensen by enacting the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, a federal framework that provides for the payment of compensation to certain maritime workers for job-related injuries. 33 U.S.C. §§ 901–950.

the state's consent.[21] However, the Eleventh Amendment does not bar admiralty courts from hearing lawsuits in rem in which litigants seek to recover state property, like a shipwreck, that the state does not actually possess.[22]

ArtIII.S2.C1.13 Cases to Which the United States Is a Party

ArtIII.S2.C1.13.1 Overview of Cases to Which the United States Is a Party

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Article III authorizes federal courts to exercise jurisdiction over "Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party."[1] While the Constitution does not explicitly authorize the federal government to bring suits, since the early years of the Republic, the Supreme Court and Congress have accepted that the United States can both sue and be sued, subject to certain legal limits.[2] The following essays discuss constitutional issues that may arise when the United States files suit as a plaintiff,[3] including suits by the federal government against the states.[4] The essays then briefly explore legal questions related to suits where the United States or a federal entity is a defendant.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C1.13.2 Right of the United States to Sue

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Although the Constitution does not explicitly authorize the federal government to bring suits, the Supreme Court, Congress, and legal commentators have long accepted the federal

---

[21] Ex parte New York, 256 U.S. 490, 494, 497 (1921). See also Ex parte New York, 256 U.S. 503, 510–11 (1921) (determining that a claimant could not maintain suit against a state-owned vessel in rem when the state employed the vessel solely for its use); Workman v. New York City, 179 U.S. 552, 565 (1900) (holding that a municipal corporation like New York City is subject to admiralty jurisdiction in an in personam maritime tort action because the city may sue and be sued).

[22] Cal. v. Deep Sea Research, 523 U.S. 491, 506–07 (1998).

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] See, e.g., Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73; Dugan v. United States, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 172 (1818).

[3] See ArtIII.S2.C1.13.2 Right of the United States to Sue.

[4] See ArtIII.S2.C1.13.3 Suits Against States.

[5] See ArtIII.S2.C1.13.4 Suits Against the United States and Sovereign Immunity.

government's ability to do so. In his 1833 Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story noted that while "an express power is no where given in the constitution, the right of the United States to sue in its own courts is clearly implied in that part respecting the judicial power."[1] Justice Story reasoned, "all the usual incidents appertaining to a personal sovereign, in relation to contracts, and suing, and enforcing rights, so far as they are within the scope of the powers of the government, belong to the United States, as they do to other sovereigns."[2] Through the Judiciary Act of 1789 and subsequent amendments to the Act, Congress has granted federal district courts jurisdiction to hear civil suits brought by the United States as party plaintiff in law or equity.[3]

In 1818, the Supreme Court ruled that the United States could sue in its own name in all contract cases without congressional authorization for such suits.[4] The Court later extended this rule to other types of actions in which the government seeks to vindicate its own interests.[5]

The Court has also upheld statutes granting the federal government authority to sue to vindicate certain interests of the general public. For instance, in United Steelworkers v. United States, the Court upheld a provision of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1949 that authorized the Attorney General to sue for an injunction against strikes that imperil national health or safety.[6] The Court held that the statue could require courts to "exercis[e] powers of a legislative or executive nature."[7] It further held that the statute properly "recognize[s] certain rights in the public to have unimpeded for a time production in industries vital to the national health or safety" and "makes the United States the guardian of these rights in litigation."[8] In the 1960 case United States v. Raines, the Court upheld a provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 that authorized the Attorney General to sue for injunctive relief against interference with voting rights.[9] In response to the challengers' argument that it was "beyond the power of Congress to authorize the United States to bring [an] action in support of private constitutional rights," the Court held that "there is the highest public interest in the due observance of all the constitutional guarantees, including those that bear the most directly on private rights, and we think it perfectly competent for Congress to authorize the United States to be the guardian of that public interest in a suit for injunctive relief."[10]

---

[1] 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1274 (1833).

[2] Id.

[3] 1 Stat. 73. The provision is now codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1345. Because the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction extends only to cases enumerated in the Constitution, the United States must bring suits against persons or corporations in the lower federal courts. The United States may bring suits against a state in the Supreme Court pursuant to the Court's original jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C. § 1251(b)(2), or the United States may bring such suits in the district courts. Case v. Bowles, 327 U.S. 92, 97 (1946). As in other judicial proceedings, the United States, like any party plaintiff, must have an interest in the subject matter and a legal right to the remedy sought. United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 125 U.S. 273 (1888).

[4] Dugan v. United States, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 172 (1818).

[5] See, e.g., Cotton v. United States, 52 U.S. 229 (1850) (United States could bring suit for trespass); United States v. Gear, 44 U.S. 120 (1945) (United States could sue for injunction against mining on public lands).

[6] 361 U.S. 39 (1960).

[7] Id. at 43.

[8] Id.

[9] 362 U.S. 17 (1960).

[10] Id. at 27. See also Oregon v. Mitchell, in which two of the four cases considered were actions by the United States to enjoin state compliance with the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970. 400 U.S. 112 (1970).

ArtIII.S2.C1.13.2
Right of the United States to Sue

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, the Attorney General initiates suits by the federal government in the name of the United States.[11] To date, the Supreme Court has declined to address whether the United States may sue to protect the constitutional rights of its citizens without statutory authorization.[12]

ArtIII.S2.C1.13.3 Suits Against States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Controversies to which the United States is a party include suits brought by the federal government as plaintiff against states as party defendants.[1] The first Supreme Court case involving the federal government suing a state arose from a late-nineteenth Century action by the United States to recover on bonds issued by North Carolina.[2] While the parties did not raise the question of federal court jurisdiction over the suit, the Court, in deciding the case on its merits in favor of the state, tacitly assumed that it had jurisdiction to hear such cases.

Two years later, the State of Texas directly challenged the federal courts' jurisdiction over it in response to a bill in equity the United States brought to determine the boundary between Texas and the Territory of Oklahoma.[3] Texas, among other things, contended that the United States could not sue a state without the state's consent. The Supreme Court held that it had jurisdiction over the suit. Emphasizing that under Article III federal jurisdiction encompasses cases to which the United States and a state are parties, Justice John Marshall Harlan noted that the Constitution made no exception for suits brought by the United States.[4] With respect to the state's argument that it had not consented to the suit, the Court concluded that Texas had given consent to be sued by the United States "when [it was] admitted to the Union upon an equal footing in all respects with the other States."[5]

The Supreme Court routinely accepted jurisdiction over suits by the federal government against states in subsequent cases. In 1926, the Court decided a dispute between the United States and Minnesota over land patents that the United States had issued to Minnesota in

---

[11] United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 125 U.S. 273 (1888); United States v. Beebe, 127 U.S. 338 (1888); United States v. Bell Telephone Co., 128 U.S. 315 (1888).

[12] This question came before the Supreme Court in the 2021 case United States v. Texas, but the Court dismissed that case without a substantive decision. 142 S. Ct. 522 (Mem.) (2021).

[1] The Eleventh Amendment and the common law doctrine of sovereign immunity bar suits against states by private individuals and by other states; however, those authorities do not bar suits against states by the federal government. See U.S. CONST. amend. XI; see also Amdt11.1 Overview of Eleventh Amendment, Suits Against States to Amdt11.6.4 Tort Actions Against State Officials.

[2] United States v. North Carolina, 136 U.S. 211 (1890).

[3] United States v. Texas, 143 U.S. 621 (1892).

[4] Id. at 644. For additional discussion of the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[5] Id. at 642–46. This suit was specifically authorized by the Act of Congress of May 2, 1890, providing for a temporary government for the Oklahoma territory to determine ownership of Greer County. 26 Stat. 81, 92, § 25. See also United States v. Louisiana, 339 U.S. 699, 701–02 (1950).

breach of U.S. trust obligations to the Chippewa tribe.[6] Similarly, in a 1931 case, the Court took jurisdiction of a suit by the United States against Utah to quiet title to land forming the beds of certain sections of the Colorado River and its tributaries with the states.[7] In 1947, the Court exercised jurisdiction over a suit the United States brought against California to determine ownership of and paramount rights over submerged land and the oil and gas thereunder off the coast of California between the low-water mark and the three-mile limit.[8] The Court decided like suits against Louisiana and Texas in 1950.[9]

In contrast to the foregoing cases, in the 1935 case United States v. West Virginia, the Court dismissed a suit in equity brought by the United States to determine the navigability of the New and Kanawha Rivers.[10] While the Court stated that it "can no longer be doubted" that the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction "includes cases brought by the United States against a state,"[11] it concluded that the case before it was not justiciable because it presented "no actual or threatened interference with the authority of the United States."[12] West Virginia thus does not appear to cast doubt on the authority of the United States to sue a state in federal court. Instead, it instructs that such suits remain subject to generally applicable justiciability requirements.[13]

In addition to allowing the United States to initiate suits against the states, the Court has also, at times, allowed the federal government to intervene in suits between states.[14]

ArtIII.S2.C1.13.4 Suits Against the United States and Sovereign Immunity

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In addition to suits brought by the federal government as a plaintiff, "Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party" may include cases brought against the United States

[6] United States v. Minnesota, 270 U.S. 181 (1926). For an earlier suit against a state by the United States, see United States v. Michigan, 190 U.S. 379 (1903).

[7] United States v. Utah, 283 U.S. 64 (1931).

[8] United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19 (1947).

[9] United States v. Louisiana, 339 U.S. 699 (1950); United States v. Texas, 339 U.S. 707 (1950). See also United States v. Maine, 420 U.S. 515 (1975).

[10] 295 U.S. 463 (1935).

[11] Id. at 470.

[12] Id. at 473.

[13] For discussion of the various constitutional requirements related to justiciability, see generally Article III.

[14] See Oklahoma v. Texas, 252 U.S. 372 (1920); Id. 258 U.S. 574, 581 (1922); Florida v. Georgia, 58 U.S. 478, 495 (1854).

as a defendant.[1] Those cases fall within Article III's grant of federal court jurisdiction;[2] however, the doctrine of sovereign immunity may limit such suits.

While state sovereign immunity is rooted in part in the Eleventh Amendment,[3] no provision of the Constitution expressly grants the federal government immunity from suit. Instead, most judges and commentators agree that federal sovereign immunity is a common law doctrine drawn from pre-Founding English law.[4] Since the early years of the Republic, the Supreme Court has repeatedly adopted the position that the United States may not be sued unless it consents.[5] The Court has applied the doctrine of sovereign immunity to bar suits from proceeding without consent against the federal government for actions of its agents or employees[6] and against federal agencies[7] and government corporations.[8] The Court has further held that any waiver of sovereign immunity must come from an act of Congress; Executive officials are powerless either to waive such immunity or to confer jurisdiction on a federal court.[9] In the 2019 case Thacker v. Tennessee Valley Authority, the Court rejected a separation of powers challenge to a statute that waived the immunity of a government-owned corporation.[10]

---

[1] U.S. Const. art III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] In addition to falling within federal court jurisdiction as cases to which the United States is a party, these cases may also fall within federal court jurisdiction as cases arising under the Constitution or the laws or treaties of the United States. See ArtIII.S2.C1.11.1 Overview of Federal Question Jurisdiction.

[3] See U.S. Const. amend. XI; see also Amdt11.1 Overview of Eleventh Amendment, Suits Against States to Amdt11.6.4 Tort Actions Against State Officials.

[4] See, e.g., Erwin Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 9.2 (5th ed. 2007). Compare The Siren, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 152, 153–54 (1869) ("It is a familiar doctrine of the common law, that the sovereign cannot be sued in his own courts without his consent."); with Kennecott Copper Corp. v. State Tax Com'n, 327 U.S. 573, 580 (1946) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting) ("Though this immunity from suit without consent is embodied in the Constitution, it is an anachronistic survival of monarchical privilege, and runs counter to democratic notions of the moral responsibility of the State.").

[5] This rule first appeared in embryonic form in an obiter dictum by Chief Justice Jay in Chisholm v. Georgia, where he indicated that a suit would not lie against the United States because "there is no power which the courts can call to their aid." 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 478 (1793). In Cohens v. Virginia, also in dictum, Chief Justice John Marshall noted, "the universally received opinion is that no suit can be commenced or prosecuted against the United States." 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 412 (1821). The issue was more directly in question in United States v. Clarke, where Chief Justice John Marshall stated that, as the United States is "not suable of common right, the party who institutes such suit must bring his case within the authority of some act of Congress, or the court cannot exercise jurisdiction over it." 33 U.S. (8 Pet.) 436, 444 (1834). See also United States v. McLemore, 45 U.S. (4 How.) 286 (1846); Hill v. United States, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 386, 389 (1850); De Groot v. United States, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 419, 431 (1867); United States v. Eckford, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 484, 488 (1868); The Siren, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 152, 154 (1869); Nichols v. United States, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 122, 126 (1869); The Davis, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 15, 20 (1870); Carr v. United States, 98 U.S. 433, 437–39 (1879).

[6] Gibbons v. United States, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 269, 275 (1869); Peabody v. United States, 231 U.S. 530, 539 (1913); Koekuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. United States, 260 U.S. 125, 127 (1922); Kawananakoa v. Polyblank, 205 U.S. 349, 353 (1907) ("there can be no legal right as against the authority that makes the law on which the right depends"). See also The Western Maid, 257 U.S. 419, 433 (1922); Sloan Shipyards v. United States Fleet Corp., 258 U.S. 549, 570 (1922); cf. 39 Ops. Atty. Gen. 559, 562 (1938).

[7] Federal Housing Administration, Region No. 4 v. Burr, 309 U.S. 242, 244 (1940) ("[T]here can be no doubt that Congress has full power to endow the Federal Housing Administration with the government's immunity from suit or to determine the extent to which it may be subjected to the judicial process.").

[8] Federal Land Bank v. Priddy, 295 U.S. 229, 231 (1935). The Court has also held that Indian nations are exempt from suit without further congressional authorization. United States v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 309 U.S. 506 (1940).

[9] United States v. New York Rayon Co., 329 U.S. 654 (1947). Congress may also grant or withhold immunity from suit on behalf of government corporations. Brady v. Roosevelt S.S. Co., 317 U.S. 575 (1943).

[10] 139 S.Ct. 1435 (2019). Specifically, the Court rejected an argument that allowing suits against the corporation "would conflict with the 'constitutional scheme'—more precisely, with 'separation-of-powers principles'—by subjecting the TVA's discretionary conduct to 'judicial second-guessing.'" Id. at 1441 (quoting Resp. Br.).

Congress has waived federal sovereign immunity through statutes such as the Administrative Procedure Act,[11] the Federal Tort Claims Act,[12] and the Tucker Act.[13] In the absence of a waiver of sovereign immunity authorizing suits against the government itself, the Supreme Court has at times allowed suits to go forward against federal officials sued in their individual capacity.[14] For instance, in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents[15] and its progeny, the Court allowed individuals to sue federal agents directly under the Constitution without a federal statute authorizing relief.[16] More recent Supreme Court cases have construed Bivens narrowly.[17]

ArtIII.S2.C1.14 Controversies Between Two or More States

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.1 Historical Background on Controversies Between Two or More States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The extension of federal judicial power to controversies between states and the vesting of original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of suits to which a state is a party had its origin in experience. Prior to independence, disputes between colonies claiming charter rights to territory were settled by the Privy Council. Under Article IX of the Articles of Confederation, Congress was made "the last resort on appeal" to resolve "all disputes and differences . . . between two or more States concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever," and to constitute what in effect were ad hoc arbitral courts for determining such disputes and rendering a final judgment therein. When the Philadelphia Convention met in 1787, serious

[11] 5 U.S.C. § 702.

[12] 28 U.S.C. § 2674.

[13] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(a), 1491(a)(1).

[14] In addition to the Bivens line of cases discussed infra, see, e.g., United States v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196 (1882).

[15] 403 U.S. 388 (1971). Some have likened the holding in Bivens to the creation of federal common law. See, e.g., Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 742 (2020) ("Analogizing Bivens to the work of a common-law court, petitioners and some of their amici make much of the fact that common-law claims against federal officers for intentional torts were once available. . . . With the demise of federal general common law, a federal court's authority to recognize a damages remedy must rest at bottom on a statute enacted by Congress, . . . and no statute expressly creates a Bivens remedy."); Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, (2001) (Scalia, J., concurring) ("Bivens is a relic of the heady days in which this Court assumed common-law powers to create causes of action—decreeing them to be 'implied' by the mere existence of a statutory or constitutional prohibition."). Justice John Harlan's concurrence in Bivens suggested that liability in that case was not based on common law. 403 U.S. at 403 (Harlan, J., concurring) ("I do not think that the fact that the interest is protected by the Constitution rather than statute or common law justifies the assertion that federal courts are powerless to grant damages in the absence of explicit congressional action authorizing the remedy.").

[16] See also Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979), Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980).

[17] See, e.g., Egbert v. Boule, 2022 WL 2056291 (June 8, 2022).

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.1
Historical Background on Controversies Between Two or More States disputes over boundaries, lands, and river rights involved ten states.[1] It is hardly surprising, therefore, that during its first sixty years the only state disputes coming to the Supreme Court were boundary disputes[2] or that such disputes constitute the largest single number of suits between states. Since 1900, however, as the result of the increasing mobility of population and wealth and the effects of technology and industrialization, other types of cases have occurred with increasing frequency.

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.2 Boundary Disputes Between States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Among the earlier suits between states, the suit between New Jersey and New York[1] is significant for applying a rule laid down earlier in Chisholm v. Georgia (i.e., that the Supreme Court may proceed ex parte if a state refuses to appear when duly summoned). The long drawn out litigation between Rhode Island and Massachusetts is also significant for its rulings: that, although the Constitution does not extend the judicial power to all controversies between states, it does not exclude any;[2] that a boundary dispute is a justiciable and not a political question;[3] and that a prescribed rule of decision is unnecessary in such cases. On the last point, Justice Henry Baldwin stated:

> The submission by the sovereigns, or states, to a court of law or equity, of a controversy between them, without prescribing any rule of decision, gives power to decide according to the appropriate law of the case (11 Ves. 294); which depends on the subject-matter, the source and nature of the claims of the parties, and the law which governs them. From the time of such submission, the question ceases to be a political one, to be decided by the sic volo, sic jubeo, of political power; it comes to the court, to be decided by its judgment, legal discretion and solemn consideration of the rules of law appropriate to its nature as a judicial question, depending on the exercise of judicial power; as it is bound to act by known and settled principles of national or municipal jurisprudence, as the case requires.[4]

---

[1] C. Warren, The Supreme Court and Disputes Between States, 34 Bull. of William and Mary, No. 4 (1940), 7–11. For a more comprehensive treatment of background as well as the general subject, see C. Warren, The Supreme Court and the Sovereign States (1924).

[2] Warren, supra note 1, at 13. However, only three such suits were brought in this period, 1789–1849. During the next ninety years, 1849–1939, at least twenty-nine such suits were brought. Id. at 13, 14.

[1] New Jersey v. New York, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 284 (1831).

[2] Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657, 721 (1838)

[3] 37 U.S. at 736–37.

[4] Id. at 737. Chief Justice Roger B. Taney dissented because of his belief that the issue was not one of property in the soil, but of sovereignty and jurisdiction, and hence political. Id. at 752–53. For different reasons, it should be noted, a suit between private parties respecting soil or jurisdiction of two states, to which neither state is a party, does not come within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Fowler v. Lindsey, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 411 (1799). For recent boundary cases, see United States v. Maine (Rhode Island and New York Boundary Case), 469 U.S. 504 (1985); United

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.3 Modern Suits Between States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Beginning with Missouri v. Illinois & Chicago District,[1] which sustained jurisdiction to entertain an injunction suit to restrain the discharge of sewage into the Mississippi River, water rights, the use of water resources, and the like, have been a source of suits between states. Such suits have been especially frequent in the western states,[2] where water is in short supply, but they have not been confined to any one region.[3] In Kansas v. Colorado,[4] the Court established the principle of the equitable division of river or water resources between conflicting state interests.[5]

In the 1931 case, New Jersey v. New York,[6] New Jersey sought to enjoin New York for diverting water into the Hudson River watershed for New York's use in such a way as to diminish the flow of the Delaware River in New Jersey, injure its shad fisheries, and harm the saline contents of the Delaware River. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, writing for the majority, explained:

> A river is more than an amenity, it is a treasure. It offers a necessity of life that must be rationed among those who have power over it. New York has the physical power to cut off all the water within its jurisdiction. But clearly the exercise of such a power to the destruction of the interest of lower States could not be tolerated. And on the other hand equally little could New Jersey be permitted to require New York to give up its power altogether in order that the river might come down to it undiminished. Both States have real and substantial interests in the River that must be reconciled as best they may.[7]

States v. Louisiana (Alabama and Mississippi Boundary Case), 470 U.S. 93 (1985); United States v. Maine, 475 U.S. 89 (1986); Georgia v. South Carolina, 497 U.S. 336 (1990); Mississippi v. Louisiana, 506 U.S. 73 (1992).

[1] 180 U.S. 208 (1901).

[2] E.g. Montana v. Wyoming, 563 U.S. 368 (2011); Texas v. New Mexico and Colorado, No. 141, Orig., slip op. at 1 (U.S. Mar. 5, 2018); Texas v. New Mexico, No. 65, Orig., slip op. at 1 (U.S. Dec. 14, 2020).

[3] See, e.g., Florida v. Georgia (2018 Florida), No. 142, Orig., slip op. at 1 (U.S. June 27, 2018) ("This case concerns the proper apportionment of the water of an interstate river basin. Florida, a downstream State, brought this lawsuit against Georgia, an upstream State, claiming that Georgia has denied it an equitable share of the basin's waters.").

[4] 206 U.S. 46 (1907). See also Idaho ex rel. Evans v. Oregon and Washington, 444 U.S. 380 (1980).

[5] See also 2018 Florida, slip op. at 10 ("Where, as here, the Court is asked to resolve an interstate water dispute raising questions beyond the interpretation of specific language of an interstate compact, the doctrine of equitable apportionment governs our inquiry." (citing Colorado v. New Mexico, 459 U.S. 176, 183 (1982)); Virginia v. Maryland, 540 U.S. 56, 74 n.9 (2003) ("Federal common law governs interstate bodies of water, ensuring that the water is equitably apportioned between the States and bodies of water, ensuring that the water is equitably apportioned between the States and that neither State harms the other's interest in the river.").

[6] 283 U.S. 336 (1931).

[7] Id. at 342. See also Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U.S. 589 (1945); Idaho ex rel. Evans v. Oregon, 462 U.S. 1017 (1983). In Ohio v. Wyandotte Chemicals Corp., 401 U.S. 493 (1971), the Court held it had jurisdiction of a suit by a state against citizens of other states to abate a nuisance allegedly caused by the dumping of mercury into streams that

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.3
Modern Suits Between States

In Florida v. Georgia, the Supreme Court issued two opinions concerning how to apportion water from an interstate river basin known as the Apalachicola-Chattahoochee-Flint (ACF) River basin.[8] Florida, the downstream state, alleged that Georgia overconsumed the ACF basin's waters, leading to the collapse of its local oyster industry and harming Florida's river ecosystems.[9] After agreeing to exercise original jurisdiction, the Supreme Court appointed a Special Master to take evidence and issue a report with recommendations on how to resolve the dispute.[10] The Court explained that "given the complexity of many water-division cases, the need to secure equitable solutions, the need to respect the sovereign status of the States, and the importance of finding flexible solutions to multi-factor problems, we typically appoint a Special Master and benefit from detailed factual findings."[11]

The Special Master in Florida v. Georgia recommended that the Court dismiss the case because the relief Florida sought—a limitation on Georgia's consumptive use of ACF Basin waters—would not redress the alleged injury without also joining the Army Corps of Engineers (Corps) as party to the case.[12] Although the Corps operated a dam that controlled the amount of water flowing southward into Florida, it was not a defendant in the suit because it was protected by sovereign immunity.[13] The Special Master recommended dismissing the case based on the "single, discrete" conclusion that Florida's injury could not be redressed without a judicial decree that was binding on both Georgia and the Corps as defendants.[14] Florida lodged exceptions to the Special Master's report, and, in a 5-4 opinion issued in 2018, the Supreme Court declined to adopt the Special Master's recommendation of dismissal.[15]

At the outset of its 2018 opinion, the Supreme Court summarized "several related but more specific sets of principles" that govern the doctrine of equitable apportionment in interstate disputes between two states.[16] The Court remanded the case to the Special Master assigned to the dispute, concluding that he had applied too strict a standard on the issue of redressability.[17] The Court advised the Special Master that, "[c]onsistent with the principles that guide our inquiry in this context, answers need not be 'mathematically precise or based on definite present and future conditions.' Approximation and reasonable estimates may prove 'necessary to protect the equitable rights of a State.' . . . Flexibility and approximation are ultimately run into Lake Erie, but it declined to permit the filing because the presence of complex scientific issues made the case more appropriate for first resolution in a district court. See also Texas v. New Mexico, 462 U.S. 554 (1983); Nevada v. United States, 463 U.S. 110 (1983)

[8] 2018 Florida, slip op. at 1; Florida v. Georgia (2021 Florida), No. 142, Orig., slip op. at 1 (U.S. Apr. 1, 2021).

[9] 2021 Florida, slip op. at 5.

[10] See 2018 Florida, slip op. at 6.

[11] Id. at 14.

[12] Id. at 7.

[13] Id. at 2–3, 6.

[14] Id. at 7 (emphasis in original).

[15] Id. at 15.

[16] 2018 Florida, slip op. at 10. Specifically, when asked to resolve such a dispute under the doctrine of equitable apportionment, the Court should consider the following principles: (1) that the two states "possess an equal right to make a reasonable use of the waters of the stream"; (2) that "the Court's 'effort always is to secure an equitable apportionment without quibbling over formulas' . . . [and w]here '[b]oth States have real and substantial interests in the River,' those interests 'must be reconciled as best they may be'"; (3) that, "in light of the sovereign status and 'equal dignity' of States, . . . the complaining State must demonstrate that it has suffered a 'threatened invasion of rights' that is 'of serious magnitude'"; and (4) that "where a complaining State meets its 'initial burden of showing 'real or substantial injury,' this Court, recalling that equitable apportionment is 'flexible,' not 'formulaic,' will seek to 'arrive at a just and equitable apportionment of an interstate stream' by 'consider[ing] 'all relevant factors.'" Id. at 11–14 (citations omitted).

[17] Id. at 15.

often the keys to success in our efforts to resolve water disputes between sovereign States that neither Congress 'nor the legislature of either State' has been able to resolve."[18]

On remand, a newly appointed Special Master recommended that the Supreme Court dismiss Florida's request for equitable apportionment, and the Court agreed.[19] In a unanimous opinion issued in 2021, the Supreme Court held that Florida did not meet its evidentiary burden to show that Georgia's consumption of ACF Basin waters caused Florida's alleged harm.[20] Rather, the evidence suggested Florida's mismanagement of its own fisheries contributed to its oyster industry's collapse, and Florida did not show any "actual" or "real-world" damage to its ecosystems.[21]

Other types of interstate disputes of which the Court has taken jurisdiction include suits by a state as the donee of the holders of bonds issued by another state, and the ability to collect thereon;[22] by Virginia against West Virginia to determine the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia that the latter owed the former;[23] and by Arkansas to enjoin Texas from interfering with the performance of a contract by a Texas foundation to contribute to the construction of a new hospital in the medical center of the University of Arkansas.[24] Other examples include a suit brought by one state against another to enforce a contract between the two,[25] a suit in equity between states for the determination of a decedent's domicile for inheritance tax purposes,[26] and a suit by two states to restrain a third from enforcing a natural gas measure that purported to restrict the interstate flow of natural gas from the state in the event of a shortage.[27]

In Texas v. New Jersey,[28] the Court adjudicated a multistate dispute about which state should be allowed to escheat intangible property consisting of uncollected small debts held by a corporation. Emphasizing that the states could not constitutionally provide a rule of settlement and that no federal statute governed the matter, the Court evaluated the possible rules and chose the one easiest to apply and least likely to lead to continuing disputes.[29]

In general, in taking jurisdiction of these suits, along with those involving boundaries and the diversion or pollution of water resources, the Supreme Court relied on the liberal construction of the term "controversies between two or more States" that the Court enunciated

---

[18] Id. at 37 (quoting Idaho ex rel. Evans v. Oregon, 462 U.S. 1017, 1026 (1983)); Virginia v. West Virginia, 220 U.S. 1, 27 (1911).

[19] See 2021 Florida, slip op. at 1.

[20] Id. at 5.

[21] See id. at 5–10.

[22] South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U.S. 286 (1904).

[23] Virginia v. West Virginia, 220 U.S. 1 (1911).

[24] Arkansas v. Texas, 346 U.S. 368 (1953).

[25] Kentucky v. Indiana, 281 U.S. 163 (1930).

[26] Texas v. Florida, 306 U.S. 398 (1939). In California v. Texas, 437 U.S. 601 (1978), the Court denied a state leave to file an original action against another state to determine the contested domicile of a decedent for death tax purposes, with several Justices of the view that Texas v. Florida had either been wrongly decided or was questionable. But, after determining that an interpleader action by the administrator of the estate for a determination of domicile was barred by the Eleventh Amendment, Cory v. White, 457 U.S. 85 (1982), the Court over dissent permitted filing of the original action. California v. Texas, 457 U.S. 164 (1982).

[27] Pennsylvania v. West Virginia, 262 U.S. 553 (1923). The Court, in Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725 (1981), over dissent, relied on this case in permitting a suit contesting a tax imposed on natural gas, the incidence of which fell on the suing state's consuming citizens. And, in Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437 (1992), the Court permitted a state to sue another to contest a law requiring that all in-state utilities burn a mixture containing at least 10% in-state coal, the plaintiff state having previously supplied 100% of the coal to those utilities and thus suffering a loss of coal-severance tax revenues.

[28] 379 U.S. 674 (1965). See also Pennsylvania v. New York, 407 U.S. 206 (1972).

[29] Id. at 683.

in Rhode Island v. Massachusetts,[30] and Chief Justice John Marshall fortified in dictum in Cohens v. Virginia[31] that "it is entirely unimportant, what may be the subject of controversy. Be it what it may, these parties have a constitutional right to come into the Courts of the Union."[32]

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.4 Cases Where the Court Has Declined Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Centering its attention upon the elements of a case or controversy, the Court has declined jurisdiction in certain circumstances. For example, in Alabama v. Arizona,[1] where Alabama sought to enjoin nineteen states from regulating or prohibiting the sale of convict-made goods, the Court stated that jurisdiction of suits between states will be exercised only when absolutely necessary.[2] The Court explained that the equity requirements in a suit between states are more exacting than in a suit between private persons, and that a plaintiff state asking leave to sue another state must show the threatened injury to be of great magnitude and imminent.[3] The Court further explained that the burden on the plaintiff state to establish all the elements of a case is greater than the burden generally required by a plaintiff seeking an injunction in cases between private parties.[4]

Pursuing a similar line of reasoning, the Court declined to take jurisdiction of a suit brought by Massachusetts against Missouri and certain of its citizens to prevent Missouri from levying inheritance taxes upon intangibles held in trust in Missouri by resident trustees.[5] In holding that the complaint presented no justiciable controversy, the Court declared that, to constitute such a controversy, the complainant state must show that it "has suffered a wrong through the action of the other State, furnishing ground for judicial redress, or is asserting a right against the other State which is susceptible of judicial enforcement according to . . . the common law or equity systems of jurisprudence."[6] The fact that the trust property was sufficient to satisfy the claims of both states and that recovery by either would not impair any

---

[30] 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657 (1838).

[31] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821).

[32] Id. at 378. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 368 U.S. 71, 79–80 (1961); Texas v. New Jersey, 379 U.S. 674, 677 (1965); Pennsylvania v. New York, 407 U.S. 206 (1972).

[1] 291 U.S. 286 (1934). The Court has been loath to permit filings of original actions where the parties might be able to resolve their disputes in other courts, even in cases in which the jurisdiction over the particular dispute is exclusively original. Arizona v. New Mexico, 425 U.S. 794 (1976) (dispute subject of state court case brought by private parties); California v. West Virginia, 454 U.S. 1027 (1981). But in Mississippi v. Louisiana, 506 U.S. 73 (1992), the Court's reluctance to exercise original jurisdiction ran afoul of the "uncompromising language" of 28 U.S.C. § 1251(a) giving the Court "original and exclusive jurisdiction" of these kinds of suits.

[2] Alabama v. Arizona, 291 U.S. 286, 291 (1934).

[3] Id. at 292.

[4] Id.

[5] Massachusetts v. Missouri, 308 U.S. 1, 20 (1939).

[6] Id. at 15–16 (citing Florida v. Mellon, 273 U.S. 12 (1927)).

rights of the other distinguished the case from Texas v. Florida,[7] where the Court held the contrary. Furthermore, the Missouri statute providing for reciprocal privileges in levying inheritance taxes did not confer upon Massachusetts any contractual right.[8] The Court then proceeded to reiterate its earlier rule that a state may not invoke the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for the benefit of its residents or to enforce the individual rights of its citizens.[9] Moreover, the Court held that Massachusetts could not invoke the original jurisdiction of the Court by making citizens of Missouri parties to a suit that was not otherwise maintainable.[10] Accordingly, Massachusetts was held to have an adequate remedy in Missouri's courts or in a federal district court in Missouri.[11]

In 2020, the Supreme Court declined to allow Texas to file a bill of complaint in which Texas alleged that four states allowed "material illegality"[12] in the 2020 general elections held in their states.[13] Texas argued that alleged flaws in voting processes in Pennsylvania, Georgia, Michigan, and Wisconsin affected an "outcome determinative" number of votes in the 2020 presidential election.[14] The Supreme Court denied Texas's motion under the rationale that Texas lacked standing because it did not have a "judicially cognizable interest in the manner in which another State conducts its elections."[15]

ArtIII.S2.C1.14.5 Enforcement Authority

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In 2015, the Court, noting that proceedings under its original jurisdiction are "basically equitable,"[1] took the view that its enforcement authority encompasses ordering disgorgement of part of one state's gain from its breach of an interstate compact, as well as reforming certain agreements adopted by the states.[2] In so doing, the Court emphasized that its enforcement

[7] 306 U.S. 398 (1939).

[8] See id. at 16–17.

[9] Massachusetts, 308 U.S. at 17 (citing Oklahoma v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., 220 U.S. 277, 286 (1911) and Oklahoma ex rel. Johnson v. Cook, 304 U.S. 387, 394 (1938)). See also New Hampshire v. Louisiana and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U.S. 76 (1883), which held that a state cannot bring a suit on behalf of its citizens to collect on bonds issued by another state, and Louisiana v. Texas, 176 U.S. 1 (1900), which held that a state cannot sue another to prevent maladministration of quarantine laws.

[10] Massachusetts, 308 U.S. at 17, 19.

[11] See id. at 19–20.

[12] Mot. for Leave to File Bill of Complaint, Texas v. Pennsylvania at 2, No. 155, Orig. (U.S. Dec. 11, 2020).

[13] Order, Texas v. Pennsylvania, No. 155, Orig. (U.S. Dec. 11, 2020).

[14] Mot. for Leave, supra note 12, at 2.

[15] Order, supra note 13.

[1] Kansas v. Nebraska, 574 U.S. 445, 451 (2015).

[2] Kansas, 574 U.S. at 461–64 Equity is "the system of law or body of principles originating in the English Court of Chancery." Equity, Black's Law Dictionary 656 (10th ed. 2014). Persons who sought equitable relief "sought to do justice in cases for which there was no adequate remedy at common law," A.H. Manchester, Modern Legal History of England authority derives both from its "inherent authority" to apportion interstate streams between states equitably and from Congress's approval of interstate compacts.[3] As to its inherent authority, the Court noted that states bargain for water rights "in the shadow of" the Court's broad power to apportion them equitably and it is "difficult to conceive" that a state would agree to enter an agreement as to water rights if the Court lacked the power to enforce the agreement.[4] The Court similarly reasoned that its remedial authority "gains still greater force" because a compact between the states, "having received Congress's blessing, counts as federal law."[5] The Court stated, however, that an interstate compact's "legal status" as federal law could also limit the Court's enforcement power because the Court cannot order relief that is inconsistent with a compact's express terms.[6]

ArtIII.S2.C1.15 States and Citizens of Other States

ArtIII.S2.C1.15.1 Historical Background on Controversies Between a State and Citizens of Other States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court's decision in Chisholm v. Georgia[1] that cases "between a state and citizens of another state" included those where a state was a party defendant provoked the proposal and ratification of the Eleventh Amendment. Since then, controversies between a state and citizens of another state include only those cases where the state has been a party plaintiff or has consented to be sued.[2] As a party plaintiff, a state may bring actions against citizens of other states to protect its legal rights or in some instances as parens patriae to protect the health and welfare of its citizens. In general, the Court has tended to construe strictly this grant of judicial power, which simultaneously comes within its original jurisdiction, by applying the concepts of cases and controversies more rigorously than in cases between private parties.[3] Specifically, in these circumstances, the Court holds rigorously to the

---

AND WALES, 1750–1950, at 135–36 (1980), i.e., cases in which the English courts of law could afford no relief to a plaintiff. While eventually courts of law and courts providing equitable relief merged into a single court in most jurisdictions, an equitable remedy refers to a remedy that equity courts would have historically granted. See 1 DAN B. DOBBS, DOBBS LAW OF REMEDIES: DAMAGES - EQUITY - RESTITUTION § 2.1(2), at 59–61 (2d ed. 1993). Compensatory damages are a classic "legal" remedy, whereas an injunction is a classic "equitable" remedy. See RICHARD L. HASEN, REMEDIES 141 (2d ed. 2010).

[3] Id. at 454–55.

[4] See Kansas, 574 U.S. at 455 (quoting Texas v. New Mexico, 462 U.S. 554, 569 (1983)).

[5] Id.

[6] Id.

[1] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793).

[2] See the discussion under the Eleventh Amendment.

[3] Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923); Florida v. Mellon, 273 U.S. 12 (1927); New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U.S. 328 (1926).

rule that all the party defendants are citizens of other states[4] and adheres to congressional distribution of its original jurisdiction concurrently with that of other federal courts.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C1.15.2 Jurisdiction Confined to Civil Cases

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Cohens v. Virginia[1] includes dicta about whether the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction encompasses suits between a state and its own citizens. Long afterwards, the Supreme Court dismissed an action for want of jurisdiction because the record did not show that the corporation against which the suit was brought was chartered in another state.[2] Subsequently, the Court has ruled that it will not entertain an action by a state to which its citizens are either parties of record or would have to be joined because of the effect of a judgment upon them.[3] In dictum, Chief Justice John Marshall also indicated in Cohens that perhaps no jurisdiction existed over suits by states to enforce their penal laws.[4] Sixty-seven years later, the Court wrote this dictum into law in Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co.[5] In Pelican, Wisconsin sued a Louisiana corporation to recover a judgment rendered in its favor by one of its own courts. Relying partly on the rule of international law that the courts of no country execute the penal laws of another; partly upon the Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which vested the Supreme Court with exclusive jurisdiction of controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party; and partly on Justice James Iredell's dissent in Chisholm v. Georgia,[6] where he confined the term "controversies" to civil suits, Justice Horace Gray ruled for the Court that, for purposes of original jurisdiction, "controversies between a State and citizens of another State" are confined to civil suits.[7]

ArtIII.S2.C1.15.3 The State's Real Interest

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a

---

[4] Pennsylvania v. Quicksilver Co., 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 553 (1871); California v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 U.S. 229 (1895); Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 184 U.S. 199 (1902).

[5] Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U.S. 265 (1888).

[1] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 398–99 (1821).

[2] Pennsylvania v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 553 (1871).

[3] California v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 U.S. 229 (1895); Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 184 U.S. 199 (1902).

[4] Cohens, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) at 398–99.

[5] 127 U.S. 265 (1888).

[6] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 431–32 (1793).

[7] Wisconsin, 127 U.S. at 289–300.

ArtIII.S2.C1.15.3
The State's Real Interest

State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Ordinarily, a state may not sue in its name unless it is the real party in interest with real interests. It can sue to protect its own property interests,[1] and, if it sues for its own interest as owner of another state's bonds, rather than as an assignee for collection, jurisdiction exists.[2] The Court refused to allow a state to sue when, to avoid Eleventh Amendment restrictions on suing states, the state had passed a statute to collect on another state's bonds held by one of its citizens.[3] Nor can a state sue citizens of other states on behalf of its own citizens to collect claims.[4]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16 Diversity Jurisdiction

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, authorizes Congress to grant federal courts subject matter jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different states—commonly known as "diversity jurisdiction."[1] Although Justice Joseph Story concluded in the early case Martin v. Hunter's Lessee that "the language of [Article III]. . . . is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the legislature," such that "Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into operation,"[2] numerous subsequent Supreme Court decisions repudiated this stance, recognizing instead that Article III's grant of subject matter jurisdiction is permissive and subject to congressional discretion.[3]

Congress has invoked this authority and enacted legislation granting federal courts diversity jurisdiction since the Judiciary Act of 1789.[4] That statute conferred diversity jurisdiction only when a suit was between a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought

---

[1] Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 54 U.S. (13 How.) 518, 559 (1852); Oklahoma ex rel. Johnson v. Cook, 304 U.S. 387 (1938); Georgia v. Evans, 316 U.S. 159 (1942).

[2] South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U.S. 286 (1904).

[3] New Hampshire v. Louisiana, 108 U.S. 76 (1883).

[4] Oklahoma ex rel. Johnson v. Cook, 304 U.S. 387 (1938).

[1] See Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226, 233–34 (1922); Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. 247, 252 (U.S. 1968). For more information about Congress's power to establish Article III courts and their jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S1.8.1 Overview of Establishment of Article III Courts.

[2] 14 U.S. 304, 328 (1816).

[3] See supra note 1; see also, e.g., Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 82–83 (2010); Kentucky v. Powers, 201 U.S. 1, 24–25 (1906); Stevenson v. Fain, 195 U.S. 165, 167 (1902); Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U.S. 150, 157–59 (1893); In re Sewing Mach. Co. 85 U.S. 553, 563 (1873); Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. 441, 449 (1850).

[4] See Act of Sept. 24, 1789, § 11, 1 Stat. 73. The statute also granted federal courts jurisdiction over suits between a citizen of a state and an alien. See id.

and a citizen of another state.[5] The Judiciary Act of 1789 further limited diversity jurisdiction to cases where the amount in controversy—that is, the value of the relief sought—was at least $5,000.[6] The Judiciary Act of 1875 eliminated the requirement that one of the parties be a citizen of the forum state, requiring only diverse citizenship and a minimum jurisdictional amount in controversy.[7] The current diversity jurisdiction provision is codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1332, and grants federal court jurisdiction in all civil actions between citizens of different states and between a citizen of a state and a subject of a foreign state if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000.

Although the broad strokes of these requirements have remained the same since 1875, the statute has grown increasingly complex over the years. For instance, Congress amended the statutory provision via the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (CAFA).[8] Among other changes, CAFA expanded federal courts' jurisdiction over class actions by substituting in these cases a minimal diversity-of-citizenship requirement in place of the usual complete diversity requirement, which requires each plaintiff be a citizen of a different state from each defendant. Under the minimal diversity requirement, federal courts possess diversity jurisdiction over a class action when any one of the plaintiffs is a citizen of a different state from any defendant.[9] CAFA also imposed an amount-in-controversy threshold of $5,000,000 in class actions, and allowed plaintiffs to aggregate their monetary claims to calculate the statutory amount in controversy.[10]

The following essays do not cover the extensive case law interpreting the various statutory requirements for diversity jurisdiction.[11] They instead provide an overview of the constitutional parameters of diversity jurisdiction, including a historical perspective on the purpose of diversity jurisdiction; the Supreme Court's interpretations of the meaning of "citizens of different states" under Article III; and related federalism principles implicated by diversity jurisdiction.

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.2 Historical Background on Diversity Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The records of the Constitutional Convention do not shed substantial light on why the Framers included diversity jurisdiction among the judicial powers of the federal courts.[1] The

[5] See Id.

[6] See id.

[7] Act of Mar. 3, 1875, § 1, 18 Stat. 470.

[8] Pub. L. No. 109–2, § 4(a), 119 Stat. 9 (2005).

[9] See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d).

[10] Id.

[11] See, e.g., Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 91 (2010) (interpreting the meaning of "principal place of business" under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2)).

[1] See Henry J. Friendly, The Historic Basis of Diversity Jurisdiction, 41 Harv. L. Rev. 483, 484 (1928).

traditional explanation most often cited by judges and legal scholars is that the Framers provided diversity jurisdiction to address the concern that state courts would be prejudiced against out-of-state litigants, particularly if one party was an in-state resident.[2]

Writings and statements of several Framers support this traditional explanation. For instance, at the Virginia Convention, James Madison stated his belief that the diversity jurisdiction clause was "salutary," citing the possibility that "a strong prejudice may arise in some states, against the citizens of others, who may have claims against them."[3] In the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton similarly argued that a national Judiciary "ought to preside in all cases in which one State or its citizens are opposed to another State or its citizens" to ensure "the inviolable maintenance of [the] equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the Union will be entitled."[4] Hamilton contended that a federal court, "having no local attachments, will be likely to be impartial between the different States and their citizens."[5] Chief Justice John Marshall likewise explained in an early case that, while it might be true that state courts would "administer justice as impartially" as federal courts, "it is not less true that the [C]onstitution itself either entertains apprehensions on this subject, or views with such indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions of suitors" as to warrant the establishment of diversity jurisdiction in the federal courts.[6]

Historians have proffered other explanations for the Constitution's diversity-jurisdiction provision.[7] As the volume of diversity litigation in federal court has grown over the years, commentators continue to debate the purpose of diversity jurisdiction.[8] Given that contemporary society has evolved significantly from the conditions that existed in 1789, questions have arisen periodically concerning the continued need for diversity jurisdiction, including whether to retain, abolish, or curtail to some degree the statutory grant of this form of federal subject matter jurisdiction.[9]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.3 Citizens of Different States and Diversity Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens

---

[2] See, e.g., Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U.S. 20, 34 (1883); Barrow S.S. Co. v. Kane, 170 U.S. 100, 111 (1898). See also Friendly, supra note 1, at 492–93; Charles Warren, New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789, 37 Harv. L. Rev. 49, 82 (1923).

[3] Reprinted in 3 Elliot's Debates, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 533 (1836).

[4] See The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[5] Id.

[6] Bank of U.S. v. Deveaux, 9 U.S. 61, 87 (1809).

[7] See, e.g., Friendly, supra note 1, at 496 (suggesting that "the desire to protect creditors against [state] legislation favorable to debtors was a principal reason for the grant of diversity jurisdiction"); 13 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters § 3601 (3d. ed. Apr. 2021) (describing some commentators' views that the grant of diversity jurisdiction stemmed from "a desire to protect commical interests from class bias").

[8] See, e.g., Lumbermen's Mut. Cas. Co. v. Elbert, 348 U.S. 48, 54 (1954) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (commenting on "the mounting mischief inflicted on the federal judicial system by the unjustifiable continuance of diversity jurisdiction").

[9] See Wright & Miller, supra note 7.

of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The constitutional grant of diversity jurisdiction extends to controversies between "Citizens of different States." Since Congress first exercised its constitutional prerogative to vest diversity jurisdiction in the federal courts in the Judiciary Act of 1789, the Supreme Court has considered the meaning of "Citizens of different States," and the constitutional reach of diversity jurisdiction, on numerous occasions.

In Hepburn v. Ellzey,[1] Chief Justice John Marshall confined the meaning of the word "state" as used in the Constitution to "the members of the American confederacy," ruling that a citizen of the District of Columbia thus could not maintain a suit against a citizen of Virginia in federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction. Chief Justice Marshall noted that it was "extraordinary that the courts of the United States, which are open to aliens, and to the citizens of every state in the union, should be closed upon [citizens of the District of Columbia].—But this is a subject for legislative not for judicial consideration."[2] The Court subsequently applied the same rule to citizens of the U.S. territories.[3]

Whether the Chief Justice had in mind a constitutional amendment or a statute when he spoke of legislative consideration remains unclear. Congress addressed the issue in 1940 by statutorily conferring on federal district courts jurisdiction over civil actions, not involving federal questions, "between citizens of different States, or citizens of the District of Columbia, the Territory of Hawaii, or Alaska and any State or Territory."[4] In National Mutual Ins. Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co.,[5] the Court upheld that amendment in a 5-4 decision, but a majority of Justices could not agree on the reasoning. Two Justices thought that Chief Justice Marshall's 1804 decision should be overruled, but the other seven Justices disagreed. Three of the seven Justices thought the statute could be sustained under Congress's power to enact legislation for District of Columbia inhabitants, but the remaining four plus the other two rejected this theory. The statute was upheld because a total of five Justices voted to sustain it, although of the two theories relied upon, seven Justices rejected one and six the other. The result, attributable to "conflicting minorities in combination,"[6] means that Hepburn v. Ellzey is still good law insofar as it holds that the District of Columbia is not a state for purposes of Article III, but is overruled insofar as it holds that District citizens may not invoke federal diversity jurisdiction.[7]

In a typical two-party case, "diversity" exists if a citizen of one state sues a citizen of another state. In a multiparty case, Chief Justice Marshall established in an early case, Strawbridge v. Curtiss, that there must be complete diversity—that is, no party on one side could be a citizen of any state of which any party on the other side was a citizen.[8] In State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. v. Tashire, the Court clarified that this complete diversity requirement flows from the diversity jurisdiction statute, rather than from the constitutional grant of

[1] 6 U.S. (2 Cr.) 445 (1805).

[2] Id. at 453.

[3] City of New Orleans v. Winter, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 91 (1816).

[4] Pub. L. No. 76–463, 54 Stat. 143 (1940). The relevant provision was later revised to read "The word 'States,' as used in this section, includes the Territories and the District of Columbia." See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(b) (1948).

[5] 337 U.S. 582 (1949).

[6] Id. at 655 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

[7] See id. The statute's provision allowing citizens of Puerto Rico to sue in diversity was sustained in Americana of Puerto Rico, Inc. v. Kaplus, 368 F.2d 431 (3d Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 386 U.S. 943 (1967), under Congress's power to make rules and regulations for U.S. territories. Cf. Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 580–97 (1976) (discussing congressional acts with respect to Puerto Rico).

[8] 7 U.S. (3 Cr.) 267 (1806).

authority,[9] noting that Chief Justice Marshall, in Strawbridge, "purported to construe only '[t]he words of the act of congress.'"[10] Article III's diversity requirement, the Court held in Tashire, requires only that "any two adverse parties are not co-citizens" and thus "poses no obstacle to the legislative extension of federal jurisdiction" by requiring only minimal diversity.[11]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.4 Citizenship of Natural Persons and Corporations

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, state citizenship of an individual is determined by the concept of domicile[1] rather than residence.[2] While the Supreme Court's definition has varied across cases,[3] this generally means that a person is a citizen of the state that is his or her true, fixed, and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which he or she intends to return whenever he or she is absent from it.[4] Actions may disclose this intention more clearly and decisively than statements.[5] A person may change his or her domicile in an instant by taking up residence in a new place with the intention of remaining there indefinitely; he or she may obtain the benefit of diversity jurisdiction by making this change alone,[6] provided the change is more than a temporary expedient.[7]

Whether corporations, which are not explicitly referenced in Article III, should be treated as citizens of a certain state or states for purposes of diversity jurisdiction is a question with which the Supreme Court has long wrestled. The Court first directly addressed the issue in Bank of the United States v. Deveaux,[8] in which Chief Justice John Marshall declared: "That invisible, intangible, and artificial being, that mere legal entity, a corporation aggregate, is certainly not a citizen; and consequently cannot sue or be sued in the courts of the United States, unless the rights of the members, in this respect, can be exercised in their corporate name." Nevertheless, the Court upheld diversity jurisdiction in that case because the members of the bank as a corporation were citizens of one state and the opposing party was a citizen of

---

[9] 386 U.S. 523, 530 (1967).

[10] Id. at 530.

[11] Id. When Congress enacted the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (CAFA), for instance, it expanded federal courts' jurisdiction over class actions by requiring only minimal diversity between plaintiffs and defendants. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d); see also ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

[1] Chicago & N.W.R.R. v. Ohle, 117 U.S. 123 (1886).

[2] Sun Printing & Pub. Ass'n v. Edwards, 194 U.S. 377 (1904).

[3] Knox v. Greenleaf, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 360 (1802); Shelton v. Tiffin, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 163 (1848); Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U.S. 619 (1914).

[4] Stine v. Moore, 213 F.2d 446, 448 (5th Cir. 1954).

[5] Tiffin, 47 U.S. (6 How.) at 163.

[6] Williamson, 232 U.S. 619.

[7] Jones v. League, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 76 (1855).

[8] 9 U.S. (5 Cr.) 61, 86 (1809).

another. The holding that corporations were citizens of the states where their stockholders lived was reaffirmed a generation later,[9] but pressures were building for change. While corporations were assuming an ever more prominent economic role, the Strawbridge rule, which required complete diversity between each plaintiff and each defendant,[10] operated to close the doors of the federal courts to corporations with stockholders in many states.

The Supreme Court overruled Deveaux in 1844, when a divided Court held that "a corporation created by and doing business in a particular state, is to be deemed to all intents and purposes as a person, although an artificial person, an inhabitant of the same state . . . capable of being treated as a citizen of that state, as much as a natural person."[11] Ten years later, the Court abandoned that rationale, but it achieved the same result by "indulg[ing] in the fiction that, although a corporation was not itself a citizen for diversity purposes, its shareholders would be conclusively presumed citizens of the incorporating State."[12] "State of incorporation" remained the guiding rule for determining the place of corporate citizenship until Congress amended the jurisdictional statute in 1958.[13] Concern over growing dockets and companies incorporating in states of convenience led to a "dual citizenship" rule, whereby "a corporation shall be deemed to be a citizen of any State by which it has been incorporated and of the State where it has its principal place of business."[14] The right of foreign corporations to invoke diversity jurisdiction is not one that a state may require corporations to waive as a condition of doing business in that state.[15]

Unincorporated associations, such as partnerships, joint stock companies, labor unions, governing boards of institutions, and the like, do not enjoy the same status as corporations. The actual citizenship of each of its members must be considered in determining whether diversity exists.[16]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.5 Insufficient or Manufactured Diversity

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made,

---

[9] Com. & R.R. Bank v. Slocomb, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 60 (1840).

[10] Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 7 U.S. (3 Cr.) 267 (1806).

[11] Louisville, C. & C.R.R. v. Letson, 43 U.S. (2 How.) 497, 558 (1844).

[12] United Steelworkers v. R.H. Bouligny, Inc., 382 U.S. 145, 148 (1965) (citing Marshall v. Balt. & Ohio R.R., 57 U.S. (16 How.) 314 (1854)). See Muller v. Dows, 94 U.S. 444 (1877); St. Louis & S.F. Ry. v. James, 161 U.S. 545 (1896); Carden v. Arkoma Assocs., 494 U.S. 185, 189 (1990).

[13] See Pub. L. No. 85-552, 72 Stat. 415 (1958).

[14] 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). In Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 84–86 (2010), the Court recounted the development of the rules on corporate jurisdictional citizenship in deciding that a corporation's "principal place of business" under the statute is its "nerve center," the place where the corporation's officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation's activities. The Court concluded in Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer, 276 U.S. 518, 522–25 (1928), that diversity jurisdiction existed even though the plaintiff-corporation, a Kentucky corporation, created diversity by dissolving itself and obtaining a charter as a Tennessee corporation; the only change being the state of incorporation, while the name, officers, shareholders, and location of the business remained the same. In Hertz, the Court observed that, as a result of Black & White, a corporation could "manipulate federal-court jurisdiction" through its choice of the state of incorporation. Hertz, 559 U.S. at 85.

[15] In Terral v. Burke Constr. Co., 257 U.S. 529 (1922), the Court resolved two conflicting lines of cases and voided a state statute that required the cancellation of a foreign corporation's license to do business in the state upon notice that the corporation had removed a case to a federal court.

[16] Chapman v. Barney, 129 U.S. 677 (1889); Great S. Fire Proof Hotel Co. v. Jones, 177 U.S. 449 (1900); Thomas v. Bd. of Trs., 195 U.S. 207 (1904); United Steelworkers v. R.H. Bouligny, Inc., 382 U.S. 145 (1965); Carden v. Arkoma Assocs., 494 U.S. 185 (1990). Compare People of P.R. v. Russell & Co., 288 U.S. 476 (1933), with Carden, 494 U.S. at 189–190, and Navarro Sav. Ass'n v. Lee, 446 U.S. 458 (1980).

under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Historically, regardless of the parties' diverse citizenship, the Supreme Court has recognized two substantive exceptions to diversity jurisdiction: the domestic relations exception[1]—which precludes federal courts from issuing divorce, alimony, or child custody decrees—and the probate exception—which precludes federal courts from probating a will or administering an estate.[2] In Ankenbrandt v. Richards, the Court clarified that the domestic relations exception exists as a matter of statutory interpretation, and that Article III, Section 2 "does not mandate the exclusion of domestic relations from federal-court jurisdiction."[3] In Marshall v. Marshall, the Court similarly interpreted the probate exception as a matter of statutory construction, confirming its narrow scope as "reser[ving] to state probate courts the probate or annulment of a will and the administration of a decedent's estate," and "preclud[ing] federal courts from endeavoring to dispose of property that is in the custody of a state probate court."[4]

A litigant who, because of diversity of citizenship, has the option to sue in state or federal court, will generally consider the relative advantages and disadvantages of each forum in deciding where to pursue litigation. Where diversity is lacking, a litigant who perceives an advantage in the federal forum will sometimes attempt to create diversity. In the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress exempted from diversity jurisdiction suits on choses of action in favor of an assignee unless the suit could have been brought in federal court if no assignment had been made.[5] Nevertheless, a person could create diversity by a bona fide change of domicile even if that is the sole motive of creating domicile.[6]

Similarly, one could create diversity, or defeat it, by choosing a personal representative of the requisite citizenship.[7] Most attempts to manufacture or create diversity have involved corporations. A corporation cannot get into federal court by transferring its claim to a subsidiary incorporated in another state.[8] For a time, the Supreme Court tended to look disapprovingly at collusory incorporations and the creation of dummy corporations for purposes of creating diversity.[9] As discussed further in the next essay, however, the Court, in Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co.,[10] upheld diversity in a case in which the plaintiff-corporation, a Kentucky corporation, dissolved itself

[1] See Barber v. Barber, 62 U.S. (21 How.) 582 (1858); Ex parte Burrus, 136 U.S. 586 (1890); Ankenbrandt v. Richards, 504 U.S. 689, 695–97 (1992).

[2] See In re Broderick's Will, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 503 (1875); Marshall v. Marshall, 547 U.S. 293, 299–31 (2006).

[3] Ankenbrandt, 504 U.S. at 695–97.

[4] Marshall, 547 U.S. at 331.

[5] Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. XIX, § 11, 1 Stat. 73, 78; see also Turner v. Bank of N. Am., 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 8 (1799); Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850). The present statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1359, provides that no jurisdiction exists in a civil action in which any party, by assignment or otherwise, has been improperly or collusively made or joined to invoke such court's jurisdiction of. See Kramer v. Caribbean Mills, 394 U.S. 823 (1969).

[6] Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U.S. 619 (1914); Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U.S. 315 (1889).

[7] Mecom v. Fitzsimmons Drilling Co., 284 U.S. 183 (1931).

[8] Miller & Lux v. E. Side Canal & Irrigation Co., 211 U.S. 293 (1908).

[9] E.g., S. Realty Co. v. Walker, 211 U.S. 603 (1909).

[10] 276 U.S. 518 (1928).

and obtained a charter as a Tennessee corporation in order to file the action in federal court. At the time, federal courts applied federal common law rules that, compared to relevant state laws, were more favorable to the plaintiff.[11]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.6 State Law in Diversity Cases and the Erie Doctrine

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Because a federal court's subject matter jurisdiction in diversity cases is predicated upon the fact that the opposing litigants are from different states, rather than upon questions of federal law, a foundational question in these cases is which law—federal or state—should apply. In the 1938 decision Erie Railroad v. Tompkins,[1] the Supreme Court set forth what is now commonly known as the Erie doctrine, which generally requires a federal court to apply state substantive law, unless the matter before it is governed by federal law. In so holding, Erie repudiated a prior body of jurisprudence based upon the Court's 1842 decision in Swift v. Tyson.[2] As legal commentators have noted, "[p]robably no Supreme Court decision rendered during the twentieth century has had as significant an impact on the distribution of judicial power between the federal government and the states as has [Erie]."[3]

In both Swift and Erie, the Supreme Court considered Section 34 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which provided that "[t]he laws of the several states" should generally apply in federal courts unless applicable federal laws require otherwise.[4] In Swift, Justice Joseph Story ruled for the Court that state court decisions were not "laws" within the meaning of Section 34.[5] Thus, while such state decisions were entitled to respect, they were generally not binding on federal judges except with regard to matters of a "local nature," such as statutory interpretations pertaining to real estate and other things of permanent locality.[6] For nearly a

[11] Id. at 528–29.

[1] 304 U.S. 64, 80 (1938).

[2] 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1 (1842).

[3] 19 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: jurisdiction and Related Matters § 4503 (3d. ed. Apr. 2021).

[4] Section 34 of the Judiciary Act provided that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." 1 Stat. 92. With some minor changes, the section now appears as 28 U.S.C. § 1652.

[5] 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1, 19 (1842). The issue in the case was whether a pre-existing debt was good consideration for an indorsement of a bill of exchange so that the endorsee would be a holder in due course.

[6] Id. Justice Joseph Story concluded: "The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared in the language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr. R. 883, 887, to be in great measure, not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world." Id. The idea that the same law should prevail in Rome as in Athens was also used by Justice Joseph Story in DeLovio v. Boit, 7 F. Cas. 418, 443 (No. 3776) (C.C.D. Mass. 1815). For a more recent use, see United States v. Jefferson Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 380 F.2d 385, 398 (5th Cir. 1967) (dissenting opinion).

century after Swift, the Court issued a series of decisions that expanded the areas in which federal judges were free to construct a federal common law, while restricting the definition of "local" laws.[7]

Although there was some dissatisfaction with Swift,[8] it was the Supreme Court's decision in Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co.[9] that brought disagreement on these choice-of-law issues to its apex. In Black & White, a Kentucky corporation that sought the application of more favorable federal common law was permitted to create diversity jurisdiction by reincorporating in another state, even though the only change made to the corporation was its state of incorporation; the corporation's name, officers, shareholders, and location of the business all remained the same.[10] A Court majority, over a strong dissent by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes,[11] found no collusion and upheld diversity jurisdiction. The resulting application of federal common law allowed the corporation to prevail on its claims when it would have otherwise lost under state law had it sued in state court.[12] Perhaps more than any other decision, Black & White precipitated Erie's overruling of Swift.[13]

[7] The expansions included: Lane v. Vick, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 464 (1845) (wills); Chicago City v. Robbins, 67 U.S. (2 Bl.) 418 (1862) and Baltimore & Ohio R.R. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368 (1893) (torts); Yates v. City of Milwaukee, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 497 (1870) (real estate titles and riparian rights); Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 215 U.S. 349 (1910) (mineral conveyances); Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 134 (1847) (contracts); Lake Shore & M.S. Ry. v. Prentice, 147 U.S. 101 (1893). It was suggested that uniformity, the goal of Justice Joseph Story's formulation, was not being achieved, in great part because state courts followed their own rules of decision even when prior federal decisions were contrary. Felix Frankfurter, Distribution of Judicial Power Between Federal and State Courts, 13 Cornell L.Q. 499, 529 n.150 (1928). Moreover, the Court held that, although state court interpretations of state statutes or constitutions were to be followed, federal courts could ignore them if they conflicted with earlier federal constructions of the same statute or constitutional provision, Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 134 (1847), or if they were issued after the case had been tried in federal court, Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U.S. 20 (1883), thus promoting lack of uniformity. See also Gelpcke v. City of Debuque, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 175 (1865); Williamson v. Berry, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 495 (1850); Pease v. Peck, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 595 (1856); Watson v. Tarpley, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 517 (1856).

[8] Extensions of Swift's scope were frequently rendered by a divided Court over dissents. E.g., Gelpcke v. City of Debuque, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 175 (1865); Lane v. Vick, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 464 (1845); Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 215 U.S. 349 (1910). In Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 401–04 (1893), Justice Stephen Johnson Field dissented in an opinion in which he expressed the view that the Supreme Court's disregard of state court decisions was unconstitutional, a view endorsed by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co., 76 U.S. 518, 533 (1928) (dissenting opinion), and adopted by the Court in Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). Numerous proposals were introduced in Congress to change the rule.

[9] In Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co., 276 U.S. 518, Black & White contracted with a railroad to provide exclusive taxi service at the railroad station. Brown & Yellow began operating taxis at the same station, and Black & White wanted to enjoin that operation. It was a settled rule in Kentucky courts that such exclusive contracts were contrary to public policy and were unenforceable in court. Therefore, Black & White dissolved itself in Kentucky and reincorporated in Tennessee, solely to create diversity of citizenship and enable the company to sue in federal court. Black & White's effort was successful, and the Supreme Court ruled that diversity was present and an injunction should issue. In McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943) Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 293 U.S. 335 (1934), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo, appeared to retreat somewhat from its extensions of Swift, holding that state law should be applied, through a "benign and prudent comity," in a case "balanced with doubt," a concept first used by Justice Joseph P. Bradley in Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U.S. 20 (1883).

[10] Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co., 276 U.S. at 523.

[11] Id. at 532 (joined by Brandeis and Stone, JJ.). Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes presented his view that Swift had been wrongly decided, but he preferred not to overrule it but instead to "not allow it to spread . . . into new fields." Id. at 535.

[12] Id. at 523.

[13] Judge Henry Friendly wrote: "Having served as [Justice Louis Brandeis's] law clerk the year Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co. came before the Court, I have little doubt he was waiting for an opportunity to give Swift v. Tyson the happy dispatch he thought it deserved." H. Friendly, Benchmarks 20 (1967).

In Erie, a citizen of Pennsylvania sued a railroad incorporated in New York for injuries caused by the defendant's train while the plaintiff was walking along the tracks.[14] Relevant Pennsylvania law, according to the defendant, would have limited the railroad's liability because the plaintiff was a trespasser, while applicable federal common law would permit him to recover for negligence as a licensee who was allowed on the premise.[15] After the plaintiff sued and recovered in a New York federal court, the railroad appealed, eventually presenting the issue to the Supreme Court as to whether the matter concerned a question of "local" law under Swift.[16]

Writing for the Court in Erie, Justice Louis Brandeis overruled Swift. He explained that the Swift rule failed to bring about uniformity of decisions as intended.[17] Moreover, its application prompted those seeking to avail themselves to more favorable federal rules to create diversity jurisdiction, resulting in discrimination against citizens of a state by noncitizens.[18] Justice Brandeis further concluded the Swift rule was also unconstitutional because "Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a State whether they be local in their nature or 'general,' be they commercial law or a part of the law of torts," and "[n]o clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts."[19] Justice Brandeis also clarified that the unconstitutional assumption of power was made not by Congress, but by the Court itself: "[W]e do not hold unconstitutional § 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 or any other Act of Congress. We merely declare that in applying the doctrine this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which in our opinion are reserved by the Constitution to the several States."[20]

As legal commentators have observed:

> It is impossible to overstate the importance of the Erie decision. It announces no technical doctrine of procedure or jurisdiction, but goes to the heart of the relations between the Federal Government and the states, and returns to the states a power that had for nearly a century been exercised by the federal government.[21]

Erie was remarkable in a number of ways aside from the doctrine it announced. It reversed a 96-year-old precedent, which counsel had specifically not questioned; it reached a constitutional decision when a statutory interpretation was available, though perhaps less desirable; and it marked the only time in United States constitutional history when the Court has held that it had undertaken an unconstitutional action.

The precise constitutional basis of Erie has been the subject of debate, however, with the Court at times seemingly distancing itself from Erie's constitutional holding.[22] Nonetheless, in the years since the decision, the Court has reaffirmed the constitutional basis of Erie under which "neither Congress nor the federal courts can, under the guise of formulating rules of decisions for federal courts, fashion rules which are not supported by a grant of federal authority contained in Article I or some other section of the Constitution; in such areas state

---

[14] Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 69 (1938).

[15] Id. at 69–70.

[16] See id. 70–71.

[17] Id. at 74–75.

[18] Id. at 71–77.

[19] Id. at 78.

[20] Id. at 79–80.

[21] Wright & Miller, supra note 3, § 4503. See also In Praise of Erie—And of the New Federal Common Law, in H. Friendly, Benchmarks 155 (1967) law must govern because there can be no other law."[23] Erie ultimately appears to derive from the federalism principles embodied in the Tenth Amendment, which limits the federal government, including Congress and the federal courts, to the authority delegated to it by the Constitution and reserves those powers not so delegated to the states or to the people.[24]

[22] See Guar. Tr. Co. of N.Y. v. York, 326 U.S. 99, 109 (1945) (referring to the "policy" embodied in Erie as opposed to its constitutional imperative).

Since the Supreme Court's landmark 1938 decision, Erie Railroad v. Tompkins,[25] the Court's jurisprudence on federal courts' application of state law in diversity cases has evolved. At first, the Supreme Court indicated that federal courts sitting in diversity were bound by state court decisions even when such decisions were not binding on other state judges. That is, federal courts sitting in diversity must follow not only the decisions of the highest court of a state, but also decisions of intermediate appellate courts[26] and courts of first instance.[27] The Court subsequently concluded that federal judges are to give careful consideration to lower state court decisions, but they generally must construe the state law themselves if the state's highest court has not spoken definitively on the question.[28] In the event of a state supreme court reversal of an earlier decision, the federal courts are, of course, bound by the later decision, and a judgment of a federal district court, correct when rendered, must be reversed on appeal if the state's highest court subsequently changed the applicable law.[29]

ArtIII.S2.C1.16.7 Conflicts-of-Law and Procedural Rules in Diversity Cases

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction; to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In diversity jurisdiction cases that present conflicts-of-law issues—that is, in cases in which the laws of two or more states could apply to the dispute—the Court has reiterated that the district court is to apply the conflict-of-law rules of the state in which it sits. In other words, in a federal court case in State A in which the law of State B applies under State A's conflict-of-law rules, perhaps because a contract was made in State B or a tort was committed there, the federal court is to apply State A's conception of State B's law.[1]

---

[23] Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 471–72 (1965).

[24] See Intro.7.3 Federalism and the Constitution.

[25] 304 U.S. 64, 80 (1938).

[26] See West v. Am. Tel. & Tel. Co., 311 U.S. 223 (1940); Six Cos. of Cal. v. Joint Highway Dist., 311 U.S. 180 (1940); Stonerv. N.Y. Life Ins. Co., 311 U.S. 464 (1940).

[27] See Fid. Union Tr. Co. v. Field, 311 U.S. 169 (1940).

[28] King v. Ord. of Com. Travelers of Am., 333 U.S. 153 (1948); Bernhardt v. Polygraphic Co. of Am., 350 U.S. 198, 205 (1956) (1910 decision must be followed in absence of confusion in state decisions because there were "no developing line of authorities that cast a shadow over established ones, no dicta, doubts or ambiguities . . . , no legislative development that promises to undermine the judicial rule"). See also Commissioner v. Estate of Bosch, 387 U.S. 456, 465 (1967).

[29] Vanderbark v. Owens-Ill. Glass Co., 311 U.S. 538 (1941); Huddleston v. Dwyer, 322 U.S. 232 (1944); Nolan v. Transocean Air Lines, 365 U.S. 293 (1961).

[1] Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941); Griffin v. McCoach, 313 U.S. 498 (1941); Wells v. Simonds Abrasive Co., 345 U.S. 514 (1953); Nolan v. Transocean Air Lines, 365 U.S. 293 (1961).

The greatest difficulty in applying the Erie doctrine, which generally directs federal courts sitting in diversity to apply state substantive law but federal procedural law, has been in cases in which the distinction between substantive and procedural rules is blurred.[2] In 1945, in Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. York, the Court held that a state statute of limitations, which was at times deemed a matter of "procedure" but would have barred suit in state court, applied to bar the case in federal court.[3] The Court regarded the substance-procedure distinction as immaterial. Instead, "since a federal court adjudicating a state-created right solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties is for that purpose, in effect, only another court of the State, it cannot afford recovery if the right to recover is made unavailable by the State nor can it substantially affect the enforcement of the right as given by the State."[4] This outcome-determinative standard, the Court explained, was compelled by Erie's "intent," which was to ensure that, in all cases where a federal court is exercising jurisdiction solely because of the parties' diverse citizenship, "the outcome of the litigation in the federal court should be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if tried in a State court."[5]

The Supreme Court's application of the outcome-determinative standard created substantial doubt that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were valid in diversity jurisdiction cases.[6] In 1965, however, the Court, in Hanna v. Plumer, limited the standard's application in matters governed by the Federal Rules.[7] Under Hanna and its progeny, the outcome-determinative standard is not the proper test when the question is the application of one of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Instead, if the rule is valid under the Rules Enabling Act—which authorizes the Supreme Court to prescribe general rules of practice and procedure and rules of evidence for the federal courts—and the Constitution, it is to be applied regardless of state law to the contrary.[8]

Some uncertainty remains as to which law to apply—state or federal—in the absence of a federal statute or a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure. In Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Electric Cooperative, Inc., the Supreme Court said that "outcome" was no longer the sole determinant, and that countervailing considerations expressed in federal policy on the conduct of federal trials should be considered.[9] Under this balancing standard, the Court held that a state rule that requires a judge (rather than a jury) to decide whether a particular defense applied in a tort action had to yield to a federal policy favoring juries, as reflected by the Seventh Amendment.[10]

---

[2] Notably, courts in diversity actions were free to formulate a federal common law, but were required by the Conformity Act, § 5, 17 Stat. 196 (1872), to conform their procedure to that of the state in which the court sat. Erie then ruled that state substantive law was to control in federal court diversity actions, while by implication matters of procedure in federal court were subject to congressional governance. Congress authorized the Court to promulgate rules of civil procedure, 48 Stat. 1064 (1934), which it did in 1938, a few months after Erie was decided. 302 U.S. 783.

[3] 326 U.S. 99 (1945).

[4] Id. at 108–09.

[5] Id. at 109.

[6] Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949) (state rule making unsuccessful plaintiffs liable for all expenses and requiring security for such expenses as a condition of proceeding in federal court); Woods v. Interstate Realty Co., 337 U.S. 535 (1949) (state statute barring foreign corporation not qualified to do business in the state applies in federal court); Ragan v. Merchs. Transfer & Warehouse Co., 337 U.S. 530 (1949) (state rule determinative when an action is begun for purposes of statute of limitations applicable in federal court although a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure states a different rule).

[7] Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460 (1965).

[8] See Burlington N. R. Co. v. Woods, 480 U.S 1, 5–8 (1987); Bus. Guides, Inc. v. Chromatic Comm'ns Enterps., Inc., 498 U.S. 533, 551–52 (1991); Shady Grove Orthopedic Assocs. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 559 U.S. 393, 398–401 (2010).

[9] 356 U.S. 525 (1958).

[10] Id. at 537–38.

Later, in Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., the Supreme Court considered whether to apply a state statute—which gave state appellate courts the authority to determine if a damages award is excessive or inadequate if it deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation—or a federal court-created practice of reviewing awards to determine whether they were so exorbitant that it shocked the conscience of the court.[11] The Court first determined that the state statute was both substantive and procedural, and that substantial variation in damage awards would result depending on whether the state or the federal approach was applied.[12] It then followed the mode of analysis under York, emphasizing the importance of federal courts reaching the same outcome as would the state courts,[13] rather than what had been the prevailing standard under Byrd, in which the Court balanced state and federal interests to determine which law to apply.[14] The Court's evolving approach to deciding whether state or federal law applies in these cases reflects a continuing difficulty of accommodating "the constitutional power of the states to regulate the relations among their citizens" on the one hand, and "the constitutional power of the federal government to determine how its courts are to be operated" on the other hand.[15]

Although it seems clear that Erie applies in non-diversity cases in which the source of the right sued upon is state law,[16] it is also evident that Erie is not always applicable in diversity cases, regardless of whether the issue is substantive or procedural. For instance, it may be that there is an overriding federal interest that compels national uniformity of rules, such as a case involving the appropriate rule for determining a bank's liability for guaranteeing a forged federal check;[17] whether a tortfeasor is liable to the United States for hospitalization of a soldier and loss of his services;[18] or the validity of a defense raised by a federal officer sued for allegedly committing libel in the course of his official duties.[19] In such cases, when the issue is controlled by federal law, common or otherwise, the result is binding on state as well as on federal courts.[20] As a result, notwithstanding Justice Louis Brandeis's oft-quoted statement that there is "no federal general common law,"[21] there are areas of law where "federal judges may appropriately craft the rule of decision."[22] Nonetheless, because legislative power is

[11] 518 U.S. 415 (1996).

[12] Id. at 428–31.

[13] E.g., Guar. Tr. Co. v. York, 326 U.S. 99,108–09 (1945).

[14] E.g., Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Elec. Coop., 356 U.S. 525 (1958).

[15] 19 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: jurisdiction and Related Matters § 4511 (3d. ed. Apr. 2021).

[16] See Maternally Yours v. Your Maternity Shop, 234 F.2d 538, 540 n.1 (2d Cir. 1956) (noting, in a case in which the court exercises supplemental jurisdiction over a state law unfair competition claim, that "the Erie doctrine applies, whatever the ground for federal jurisdiction, to any issue or claim which has its source in state law"). The contrary view was implied in Levinson v. Deupree, 345 U.S. 648, 651 (1953), and by Justice Robert Jackson in D'Oench, Duhme & Co. v. FDIC, 315 U.S. 447, 466–67, 471–72 (1942) (concurring opinion). See Wichita Royalty Co. v. City Nat'l Bank, 306 U.S. 103 (1939).

[17] Clearfield Tr. Co. v. United States, 318 U.S. 363 (1943). See also Nat'l Metro. Bank v. United States, 323 U.S. 454 (1945); D'Oench, Duhme & Co., 315 U.S. 447; United States v. Standard Rice Co., 323 U.S. 106 (1944); United States v. Acri, 348 U.S. 211 (1955); Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275 (1958); Bank of Am. Nat'l Tr. & Sav. Ass'n v. Parnell, 352 U.S. 29 (1956). But see United States v. Yazell, 382 U.S. 341 (1966); O'Melveny & Myers v. FDIC, 512 U.S. 79 (1994).

[18] United States v. Standard Oil Co., 332 U.S. 301 (1947). Federal law applies in maritime tort cases brought on the "law side" of the federal courts in diversity cases. Pope & Talbot v. Hawn, 346 U.S. 406 (1953).

[19] Howard v. Lyons, 360 U.S. 593 (1959). Matters concerned with foreign relations also are governed by federal law in diversity. Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398 (1964). Federal common law also governs a government contractor defense in certain cases. Boyle v. United Techs. Corp., 487 U.S. 500 (1988).

[20] Free v. Bland, 369 U.S. 663 (1962); Yiatchos v. Yiatchos, 376 U.S. 306 (1964).

[21] See Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 78 (1938).

[22] See Rodriguez v. FDIC, No. 18-1269, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Feb. 25, 2020).

vested in Congress, federal common law plays a "necessarily modest role"[23] under the Constitution; such common lawmaking must be "necessary to protect uniquely federal interests."[24]

ArtIII.S2.C1.17 Land Grants by Different States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitution allows federal courts to exercise jurisdiction over controversies "between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States."[1] The provision has its roots in the Articles of Confederation. The Articles of Confederation did not create an independent federal Judiciary, but provided that Congress would be "the last resort on appeal" in "controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more states" and could appoint commissioners or judges to constitute a court to resolve such disputes.[2] An initial proposal from the Constitutional Convention's Committee of Detail would have adopted a similar approach and granted the Senate the authority to resolve certain disputes, including "Controversies concerning Lands claimed under different Grants of two or more States."[3] That proposal was defeated in the Convention.[4] The delegates later added the current clause to the jurisdiction of the Federal Judiciary without reported debate.[5]

Congress has implemented the clause via legislation, vesting jurisdiction in the federal district courts.[6] The provision has produced few Supreme Court cases, and none since the early twentieth century. The Court has explained that the constitutional provision and its implementing statute apply only to disputes between citizens of the same state.[7] With respect to the reference to land grants "of different States," the Court has held that the provision applies even if one of the states at issue was previously part of the other.[8]

---

[23] Id.

[24] Texas Indus., Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc., 451 U.S. 630, 640 (1981) (quoting Banco Nacional de Cuba, 376 U.S. at 426) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also, e.g., Rodriguez, 140 S. Ct. at 717–18 (concluding that a federal common law rule inappropriately developed by the lower courts concerning allocation of a refund to an affiliated group of corporations did not implicate any significant federal interests and did not necessitate discarding the application of state law with respect to the tax dispute).

[1] U.S. Const. art III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] Articles of Confederation, art. IX.

[3] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 162–63, 171, 184–85 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[4] Id. at 400–01.

[5] Id. at 431–32.

[6] 28 U.S.C. § 1354. Earlier versions of the statute vested jurisdiction in the now-defunct federal circuit courts. See U.S. v. Sayward, 160 U.S. 493 (1895).

[7] Stevenson v. Fain, 195 U.S. 165 (1904). Disputes between citizens of different states may instead fall within the federal courts' diversity jurisdiction. See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

[8] Town of Pawlet v. Clark, 13 U.S. 292 (1815); Colson v. Lewis, 15 U.S. 377 (1817).

ArtIII.S2.C1.18 Foreign States or Citizens

ArtIII.S2.C1.18.1 Controversies Between a State or its Citizens and Foreign States or Citizens

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

Article III allows federal courts to exercise jurisdiction over controversies "between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects."[1] However, two post-ratification developments have limited the scope of federal court jurisdiction under this provision. First, the Supreme Court has applied the law of nations to hold that foreign states are generally immune from suit in U.S. federal courts without their consent.[2] That immunity extends to suits brought by American states against foreign nations.[3] Second, the Court has construed the Eleventh Amendment to bar suits by foreign states against a state of the United States.[4]

In addition to the foregoing limits, the grants of jurisdiction in Article III, Section 2, Clause 1 are not self-executing. Instead, the constitutional text sets the maximum extent of federal court jurisdiction and leaves Congress discretion to determine how much of that jurisdiction to grant.[5] Congress has always granted the federal courts less expansive jurisdiction than the Constitution authorizes, including with respect to cases involving foreign states or citizens. In 28 U.S.C. § 1332, Congress granted federal courts jurisdiction over disputes where "the matter in controversy" exceeds $75,000 between "citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state" (except claims between citizens of a state and lawful permanent residents of the same state) or "a foreign state . . . as plaintiff and citizens of a State or of different States."[6]

Article III does not provide for federal court jurisdiction over disputes between one or more foreign states or their subjects to which no U.S. state or citizen is a party. However, suits that fall outside the scope of the constitutional and statutory grants of jurisdiction over suits

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[2] The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 116 (1812); Berizzi Bros. Co. v. S.S. Pesaro, 271 U.S. 562 (1926); Compania Espanola v. The Navemar, 303 U.S. 68 (1938); Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States, 304 U.S. 126, 134 (1938).

[3] Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 292 U.S. 313, 330 (1934).

[4] Id.

[5] This is true of all constitutional grants of federal court jurisdiction except for the limited grant of original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. Compare ArtIII.S2.C1.11.3 Constitutional and Statutory Grants of Federal Question Jurisdiction with ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction; see generally ArtIII.S1.6.1 Overview of Relationship Between Federal and State Courts.

[6] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(a)(2), 1332(a)(4). Another provision of the statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1), empowers the federal courts to hear "diversity" cases between citizens of different states. See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

between a state or its citizens and foreign states or citizens may proceed in federal court if they fall within another grant of Article III jurisdiction, for example because they involve questions arising under a federal law or treaty.[7]

ArtIII.S2.C1.18.2 Suits Involving Foreign States

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Constitution authorizes federal courts to hear certain cases involving foreign states, but does not expressly provide foreign states a right of access to U.S. federal courts. Nonetheless, the Supreme Court has held that "[a] foreign sovereign, as well as any other foreign person, who has a demand of a civil nature against any person here, may prosecute it in our courts."[1] The Court based that holding in part on general international law principles of comity[2] and in part on the fact that "[t]he Constitution expressly extends the judicial power to controversies between a State, or citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, without reference to the subject-matter of the controversy."[3]

While foreign states may sue in U.S. court, the Supreme Court has repeatedly applied the doctrine of sovereign immunity to hold that a foreign state cannot be sued in federal court unless it consents to the suit.[4] The doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity is not rooted in the text of the Constitution, but instead derives from "the principle of comity."[5] Foreign sovereign immunity is not absolute. For instance, the Court has held that once a foreign government avails itself of the privilege of suing in the courts of the United States, it subjects itself to the procedures and rules of decision governing those courts and accepts whatever liabilities the court may decide to be a reasonable incident of bringing the suit.[6] Thus, the Court has held that a foreign nation instituting a suit in federal court cannot invoke sovereign immunity as a defense to a counterclaim arising from of the same transaction.[7] The Court has extended that holding to deny a defense of sovereign immunity on a counterclaim that was not related to the

---

[7] Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354 (1959). The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976, Pub. L. No. 94–538, 90 Stat. 2891, provides for jurisdiction over suits by and against foreign states and also appears to comprehend suits by an alien against a foreign state that would be beyond the constitutional grant discussed in this essay. However, the Court has construed the Act as creating a species of federal question jurisdiction. Verlinden B. V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480 (1983).

[1] The Sapphire, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 164, 167 (1871); see also Pfizer, Inc. v. Government of India, 434 U.S. 308 (1978).

[2] Id. (explaining that to deny a sovereign the privilege of access to court "would manifest a want of comity and friendly feeling").

[3] Id.

[4] The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 116 (1812); Berizzi Bros. Co. v. S.S. Pesaro, 271 U.S. 562 (1926); Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 292 U.S. 313, 330 (1934); Compania Espanola v. The Navemar, 303 U.S. 68 (1938); Guaranty Trust Co. v. United States, 304 U.S. 126, 134 (1938).

[5] Guaranty Trust Co., 304 U.S. at 134.

[6] Id.

[7] Id.

sovereign's initial claim but that was limited to the amount of the sovereign's claim, so it functioned as a setoff to the non-sovereign defendant's liability.[8]

The political branches of the federal government, rather than the courts, are primarily responsible for determining when a foreign state may sue in federal court or claim sovereign immunity.[9] Only a government that has been recognized by the political branches as the authorized government of the foreign state may maintain a suit on behalf of a national sovereign in the courts of the United States.[10] Likewise, as the responsible agency for the conduct of foreign affairs, the State Department is generally responsible for suggesting to the courts that a sovereign be granted immunity from a particular suit.[11]

ArtIII.S2.C1.18.3 Limits on Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

The Supreme Court has narrowly construed the grant of jurisdiction over suits between a state or its citizens and foreign states or citizens. As in cases involving diversity jurisdiction,[1] suits brought in federal court under this provision must clearly state in the record the citizenship of the parties. In 1809, the Supreme Court ruled that a federal court could not take jurisdiction of a case where the record described the plaintiffs as aliens and subjects of the United Kingdom, while the defendants were described as "late of the district of Maryland" but were not designated as citizens of Maryland.[2] Twenty years later, the Court narrowly construed Section 11 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which granted the federal courts jurisdiction over cases where an alien was a party, in order to keep it within the limits of this clause.[3] The Court held that the judicial power did not apply to private suits in which an alien is a party, unless a citizen is the adverse party.[4] The Court extended this interpretation in 1870, holding that if there is more than one plaintiff or defendant in a case, each plaintiff must be competent [8] National Bank v. Republic of China, 348 U.S. 356, 361 (1955). In addition, certain of the benefits extending to a domestic sovereign do not extend to a foreign sovereign suing in the courts of the United States. For instance, while the United States and its member states are exempt from the operation of the statute of limitations, a foreign sovereign is not. Nor is a foreign sovereign exempt from costs or from giving discovery. Guaranty Trust Co., 304 U.S. at 135, 137.

[9] Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Kerry, 576 U.S. 1 (2015).

[10] Guaranty Trust Co., 304 U.S. at 137 (citing Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 212 (1890)); Matter of Lehigh Valley R.R., 265 U.S. 573 (1924). Whether a government is to be regarded as the legal representative of a foreign state a political question. See ArtIII.S2.C1.9.6 Foreign Affairs as a Political Question.

[11] Ex parte Peru, 318 U.S. 578, 589 (1943) (distinguishing Compania Espanola v. The Navemar, 303 U.S. 68 (1938), which held that where the Executive Department neither recognizes nor disallows the claim of immunity, the court is free to examine that question for itself).

[1] Federal diversity cases involve disputes between citizens of different states. See ArtIII.S2.C1.16.1 Overview of Diversity Jurisdiction.

[2] Hodgson & Thompson v. Bowerbank, 9 U.S. (5 Cr.) 303 (1809).

[3] Jackson v. Twentyman, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 136 (1829).

[4] Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354 (1959).

to sue and each defendant must be liable to suit.[5] However, the Court has held that these rules do not preclude a suit between citizens of the same state if the plaintiffs are merely nominal parties and are suing on behalf of an alien.[6]

The constitutional grant of jurisdiction over suits between a state or its citizens and foreign states or citizens does not apply to suits involving Indian tribes. In Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, Chief Justice John Marshall concluded that the Cherokee Nation was "a state" in the sense that it was "a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself."[7] However, he concluded, the tribe was not "a state of the union"; nor was it a "foreign state" within the meaning of Article III's text, since it was a part of the United States and dependent upon it.[8]

Clause 2—Supreme Court Jurisdiction

ArtIII.S2.C2.1 Overview of Supreme Court Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution defines the Supreme Court's jurisdiction. The clause creates two types of Supreme Court jurisdiction that apply to different categories of cases. First, the clause grants the Court original jurisdiction over "Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party."[1] The constitutional grant of original jurisdiction over such cases means that they may be filed directly in the Supreme Court rather than reaching the Court on appeal from another court. The Supreme Court has held that its original jurisdiction flows directly from the Constitution and is therefore self-executing without further action by Congress.[2]

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 also provides for Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over all other cases subject to federal court jurisdiction, "with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."[3] Known as the "Exceptions Clause," this provision allows the Court to review both decisions of the inferior federal courts and final judgments of state courts, if authorized by Congress.[4] The Supreme Court has generally indicated that the constitutional grant of appellate jurisdiction is not self-executing—meaning that Congress must enact legislation to empower the Court to hear cases on appeal—and Congress has exercised its power to implement the provision by granting the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over a subset of the cases included in the constitutional grant. Congress and the [5] Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 172 (1871). But see Lacassagne v. Chapuis, 144 U.S. 119 (1892) (holding that a lower federal court had jurisdiction over a proceeding to impeach its former decree, although the parties challenging the prior judgment were both aliens).

---

[6] Browne v. Strode, 9 U.S. (5 Cr.) 303 (1809).

[7] 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 1, 16 (1831).

[8] Id. at 16–20.

[1] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.3 Original Cases Affecting Ambassadors, Public Ministers, and Consuls.

[3] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[4] See ArtIII.S2.C2.4 Supreme Court Appellate Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.5 Supreme Court Review of State Court Decisions; ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

Court have also construed the Exceptions Clause to provide Congress significant control over the Court's appellate jurisdiction and proceedings.[5]

ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution grants the Supreme Court "original Jurisdiction" over "all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party."[1] When the Court has original jurisdiction over a case, it means that a party may commence litigation in the Supreme Court in the first instance rather than reaching the high court on appeal from a state court or an inferior federal court.

From the beginning, the Supreme Court has indicated that its original jurisdiction flows directly from the Constitution and is therefore self-executing without further action by Congress.[2] In Chisholm v. Georgia, the Court considered an action of assumpsit against the State of Georgia by a citizen of another state.[3] Congress in Section 3 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 had granted the Court original jurisdiction in suits between a state and citizens of another state, but had not authorized actions of assumpsit in such cases or prescribed forms of process for the exercise of original jurisdiction.[4] The Court sustained its jurisdiction and its power to provide forms of process and rules of procedure in the absence of congressional enactments.[5] In 1861, Chief Justice Roger Taney reviewed applicable precedents and stated that, in all cases where the Constitution grants the Supreme Court original jurisdiction, the Court has authority "to exercise it without further act of Congress to regulate its powers or confer jurisdiction, and that the court may regulate and mould the process it uses in such manner as in its judgment will best promote the purposes of justice."[6]

Under Supreme Court doctrine and long-standing congressional practice, the Court's original jurisdiction is not necessarily exclusive. In some cases, Congress has granted the lower federal courts concurrent jurisdiction, meaning that cases subject to original Supreme Court jurisdiction may either be filed directly in the Supreme Court or in one of the lower federal courts. Chief Justice John Marshall appears to have assumed in Marbury v. Madison that the Court had exclusive jurisdiction of cases within its original jurisdiction.[7] However, beginning

---

[5] See ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction.

[1] U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[2] But, in Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 80, Congress purported to grant the Court original jurisdiction. The statutory conveyance still exists today but does not encompass all cases included in the Constitutional grant of original jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1251.

[3] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793). In an earlier case, the question of jurisdiction was not raised. Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 402 (1792).

[4] 1 Stat. 80.

[5] The backlash of state sovereignty sentiment resulted in the proposal and ratification of the Eleventh Amendment. The Amendment did not affect the direct flow of original jurisdiction to the Court, although cases to which states were parties were now limited to states as party plaintiffs, to two or more states disputing, or to United States suits against states.

[6] Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 98 (1861).

[7] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137, 174 (1803).

with the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress gave the inferior federal courts concurrent jurisdiction in some such cases.[8] The federal circuit courts sustained the grant of jurisdiction in early cases,[9] and the Supreme Court upheld concurrent jurisdiction in the nineteenth century.[10] In another case from the late nineteenth century, the Court relied on the first Congress's interpretation of Article III in declining original jurisdiction of an action by a state to enforce a judgment for a pecuniary penalty awarded by one of its own courts.[11] Noting that Section 13 of the Judiciary Act referred to "controversies of a civil nature," Justice Horace Gray declared that it "was passed by the first Congress assembled under the Constitution, many of whose members had taken part in framing that instrument, and is contemporaneous and weighty evidence of its true meaning."[12]

Although Congress may allow the lower federal courts to hear cases subject to Supreme Court original jurisdiction, the legislature can neither expand nor contract the constitutional grant of original jurisdiction to the Court. Thus, in Marbury, Chief Justice Marshall invalidated a provision of Section 13 of the 1789 Act because he interpreted the statute to give the Court power to issue a writ of mandamus in an original proceeding, which the Constitution did not authorize.[13] In so holding, the Chief Justice did not defer to the constitutional judgment of the Congress that enacted the 1789 Act.

Although the Supreme Court has held that Congress lacks the power to expand or contract the Court's original jurisdiction, the Court has assumed significant latitude to interpret the jurisdictional grant itself. In some cases, such as Missouri v. Holland,[14] the Court has adopted a liberal construction of its original jurisdiction, but the more usual view is that "our original jurisdiction should be invoked sparingly."[15] The Court has thus held that original jurisdiction "is limited and manifestly to be sparingly exercised, and should not be expanded by construction."[16] The Court has emphasized that its exercise of original jurisdiction is not obligatory but discretionary, to be determined on a case-by-case basis on grounds of practical necessity.[17] The Court has explained that it will exercise original jurisdiction "only in appropriate cases."[18] It has further stated that "the question of what is appropriate concerns of

---

[8] In Section 3 of the 1789 Act. The present division is in 28 U.S.C. § 1251.

[9] United States v. Ravara, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 297 (C.C. Pa. 1793).

[10] Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657 (1838); Bors v. Preston, 111 U.S. 252 (1884); Ames v. Kansas ex rel. Johnston, 111 U.S. 449 (1884). Such suits could be brought and maintained in state courts as well. Plaquemines Tropical Fruit Co. v. Henderson, 170 U.S. 511 (1898); Ohio ex rel. Popovici v. Agler, 280 U.S. 379 (1930).

[11] Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U.S. 265 (1888).

[12] 127 U.S. at 297. See also the dictum in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 398–99 (1821); Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 431–32 (1793).

[13] Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803). The Chief Justice declared that "a negative or exclusive sense" had to be given to the affirmative enunciation of the cases to which original jurisdiction extends. Id. at 174. Other cases have since followed this exclusive interpretation. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807); New Jersey v. New York, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 284 (1831); Ex parte Barry, 43 U.S. (2 How.) 65 (1844); Ex parte Vallandigham, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 243, 252 (1864); Ex parte Yerger, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 85, 98 (1869). In Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633 (1937), the Court was asked to unseat Justice Black on the ground that his appointment violated Article I. § 6, cl. 2. Although the Court rejected the application, the Court did not point out that it was being asked to assume original jurisdiction in violation of Marbury v. Madison.

[14] 252 U.S. 416 (1920). See also South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966), and Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970).

[15] Utah v. United States, 394 U.S. 89, 95 (1968).

[16] California v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 U.S. 229, 261 (1895). The Court has frequently used the word "sparingly" in this context. E.g., Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 450 (1992); Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 739 (1981); United States v. Nevada, 412 U.S. 534, 538 (1973).

[17] Texas v. New Mexico, 462 U.S. 554, 570 (1983).

[18] Illinois v. City of Milwaukee, 406 U.S. 91, 93 (1972). In this case, and in Washington v. General Motors Corp., 406 U.S. 109 (1972), and Ohio v. Wyandotte Chemicals Corp., 401 U.S. 493 (1971), the Court declined to permit adjudication course the seriousness and dignity of the claim; yet beyond that it necessarily involves the availability of another forum where there is jurisdiction over the named parties, where the issues tendered may be litigated, and where appropriate relief may be had."[19] Although the Court has exercised its original jurisdiction sparingly, where claims are of sufficient "seriousness and dignity" and resolution by the Judiciary is of substantial concern, the Court will hear them.[20] In cases subject to concurrent original and appellate jurisdiction, the Supreme Court has discretion to decline to exercise original jurisdiction and instead require that a case first proceed through the lower federal courts.[21]

ArtIII.S2.C2.3 Original Cases Affecting Ambassadors, Public Ministers, and Consuls

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Supreme Court's original jurisdiction extends in part to cases affecting ambassadors and consuls. In addition to the general legal considerations relation to original jurisdiction discussed in the preceding essay, the Court has considered several legal questions specific to this grant of jurisdiction.[1] One question is whether the Court possesses original jurisdiction over cases where an ambassador or consul merely possesses an indirect interest in the outcome of the proceeding or whether such a person must be a party in interest. In United States v. Ortega, the Court ruled that a prosecution for violating international law and the laws of the United States by "offering violence" to a foreign minister was not a suit "affecting" the minister but rather a public prosecution for vindication of the law of nations and the laws of the United States.[2]

Another question is whether the Supreme Court can determine the official status of a person claiming to be an ambassador or consul. The Court has refused to review the decision of of environmental pollution cases within its original jurisdiction because the nature of the cases required the resolution of complex, novel, and technical factual questions not suitable for resolution by the Supreme Court in the first instance, but which could be brought in the lower federal courts. The Court has not barred all such cases, however. Vermont v. New York, 406 U.S. 186 (1972) (granting leave to file complaint). In other instances, notably involving "political questions," cf. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923), the Court has simply refused permission for parties to file bills of complaint without hearing them on the issue or producing an opinion. E.g., Massachusetts v. Laird, 400 U.S. 886 (1970) (constitutionality of United States action in Indochina); Delaware v. New York, 385 U.S. 895 (1966) (constitutionality of electoral college under one-man, one-vote rule).

---

[19] Id. at 93–94.

[20] Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 451 (1982). The principles are the same whether the Court's jurisdiction is exclusive or concurrent. Texas v. New Mexico, 462 U.S. 554 (1983); California v. West Virginia, 454 U.S. 1027 (1981); Arizona v. New Mexico, 425 U.S. 794 (1976). Cf. Florida v. Georgia, 138 S. Ct. 2502, 2509 (2018) ("'This Court has recognized for more than a century its inherent authority, as part of the Constitution's grant of original jurisdiction, to equitably apportion interstate streams between States.' But we have long noted our 'preference' that States 'settle their controversies by mutual accommodation and agreement.'" (quoting Kansas v. Nebraska, 135 S. Ct. 1042, 1052 (2015); Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 564 (1963))).

[21] See, e.g., Ohio v. Wyandotte Chemicals Corp., 401 U.S. 493 (1971); Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., 324 U.S. 439 (1945); Massachusetts v. Missouri, 308 U.S. 1 (1939).

[1] For discussion of other issues related to original jurisdiction, including the question whether Congress can vest concurrent jurisdiction in the Supreme Court and lower federal courts, see ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[2] 24 U.S. (11 Wheat.) 467 (1826).

the Executive Branch with respect to the public character of a person claiming to be a public minister and has laid down the rule that it has the right to accept a certificate from the Department of State on such a question.[3]

A third question is whether the grant of original jurisdiction extends to cases affecting ambassadors and consuls accredited by the United States to foreign governments. The Court has answered that question in the negative, holding that the clause applies only to persons accredited to the United States by foreign governments.[4]

In matters of particular delicacy, such as suits under the law of nations against ambassadors and public ministers or their servants, Congress until recently made the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court exclusive of that of other courts.[5] By accepting Congress's distribution of exclusive and concurrent original jurisdiction,[6] the Court has tacitly sanctioned the legislature's power to make such jurisdiction exclusive or concurrent as it may choose.

ArtIII.S2.C2.4 Supreme Court Appellate Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Most Supreme Court cases fall within the Court's appellate jurisdiction rather than its original jurisdiction.[1] Congress has authorized Supreme Court review of decisions of the state courts and lower federal courts through two procedural mechanisms: appeals and petitions for a writ of certiorari.[2] The Court has discretion to grant or deny review via a petition for a writ of certiorari; by contrast, the Court is required to exercise jurisdiction over cases properly before it on direct appeal. Over time, Congress has limited the types of cases subject to direct appeal to the Supreme Court, rendering more cases subject to discretionary review via certiorari.[3] The Court has also issued rulings that limit the scope of direct appellate review and thus reduce the attendant burden on the Court.

For the first century of the Court's existence, most of its cases were direct appeals. Early decisions of the Supreme Court emphasized the mandatory nature of appellate review. Chief Justice John Marshall first implied that the Court is obligated to take and decide cases meeting jurisdictional standards in Marbury v. Madison.[4] The Chief Justice explained in greater detail in Cohens v. Virginia:

> The Judiciary cannot, as the legislature may, avoid a measure because it approaches the confines of the constitution. We cannot pass it by because it is doubtful. With whatever doubts, with whatever difficulties, a case may be attended, we must decide it,

[3] In re Baiz, 135 U.S. 403, 432 (1890).

[4] Ex parte Gruber, 269 U.S. 302 (1925).

[5] 1 Stat. 80–81 (1789). Since 1978, the Court's jurisdiction has been original but not exclusive. Pub. L. No. 95-393, § 8(b), 92 Stat. 810, 28 U.S.C. § 1251(b)(1).

[6] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[1] For discussion of the Court's original jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction; ArtIII.S2.C2.3 Original Cases Affecting Ambassadors, Public Ministers, and Consuls.

[2] 28 U.S.C. §§ 1253–1257.

[3] See, e.g., Act of June 27, 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-352, § 3, 102 Stat. 662.

[4] 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 137 (1803).

> if it be brought before us. We have no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given. The one or the other would be treason to the constitution.[5]

The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that courts only declare what the law is in specific cases[6] and are without will or discretion to make or change the law.[7] The early Court's statements that it could not decline to hear cases that fell within its jurisdiction rest on similar grounds as other Court holdings that embraced mandatory limitations of the judicial process, such as justiciability requirements that limit the federal courts' jurisdiction to certain cases and controversies.[8]

The broad grant of appellate jurisdiction in the 1789 Act and the Supreme Court's determination that the exercise of such jurisdiction was mandatory eventually caused overcrowding on the Supreme Court's docket. In 1891, among other reforms, Congress enacted legislation replacing mandatory Supreme Court direct review with the option to petition for a writ of certiorari in many types of cases.[9] In addition, while some modern cases echo Chief Justice Marshall's earlier rulings discussed above,[10] the Court has also adopted several discretionary rules that limit its exercise of judicial review.[11] The Court has applied prudential theorems limiting the scope of its review more or less strictly on a case-by-case basis.[12]

ArtIII.S2.C2.5 Supreme Court Review of State Court Decisions

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction includes the authority to review decisions of both lower federal courts and state courts.[1] The current statute authorizing Supreme Court

---

[5] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 404, (1821).

[6] See, e.g., Justice George Sutherland in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525, 544 (1923), and Justice Owen Roberts in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 62 (1936).

[7] "Judicial power, as contradistinguished from the powers of the law, has no existence. Courts are the mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing." Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738, 866 (1824) (Marshall, C.J.). See also Justice Roberts in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 62–63 (1936).

[8] The political question doctrine is another limitation arising in part out of inherent restrictions and in part from prudential considerations. For a discussion of limitations utilizing both stands, see Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 346–56 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). See generally, ArtIII.S2.C1.2 Historical Background on Cases or Controversies Requirement.

[9] Act of March 3, 1891, ch. 517, 26 Stat. 826. In 1988, Congress enacted legislation that replaced direct appeals with discretionary certiorari petitions in almost all remaining circumstances. Act of June 27, 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-352, § 3, 102 Stat. 662. But see, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1253 (authorizing direct appeal to the Supreme Court of decisions of a three-judge district court).

[10] Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 548–49 (1969); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211 (1962); Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 248 (1967).

[11] See, e.g., Zucht v. King, 260 U.S. 174 (1922) (holding that the Court may decline to hear an appeal that does not present a substantial federal question).

[12] See Justice Louis Brandeis' concurring opinion in Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 346 (1936). And contrast A. Bickel, supra note 3, at 111–198, with Gunther, The Subtle Vices of the "Passive Virtues": A Comment on Principle and Expediency in Judicial Review, 64 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1964).

[1] For additional discussion of the relationship between state and federal courts, see ArtIII.S1.6.1 Overview of Relationship Between Federal and State Courts.

review of state court decisions allows the Court to review the judgments of "the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had."[2] This is often the state's court of last resort, but it may be an intermediate appellate court or a trial court, if its judgment is final under state law and cannot be reviewed by any state appellate court.[3] The Court has held that it may only review final state court judgments. Such a judgment "must be subject to no further review or correction in any other state tribunal; it must also be final as an effective determination of the litigation and not of merely interlocutory or intermediate steps therein. It must be the final word of a final court."[4] The object of this rule is to avoid piecemeal interference with state court proceedings; it promotes harmony by preventing federal intervention until the state court efforts are finally resolved.[5] For similar reasons, the Court requires that a party seeking to litigate a federal constitutional issue on appeal from a state court judgment must have raised the issue in state court at an appropriate time and with sufficient precision to allow the state court to consider it.[6]

When the judgment of a state court rests on an adequate, independent ground based on state law, the Court will not review any federal question presented, even if the state court decided the federal question incorrectly.[7] The Court has stated that the reason for this rule is "obvious" and "is found in the partitioning of power between the state and Federal judicial systems and in the limitations of our own jurisdiction."[8] The Court further explained, "Our only power over state judgments is to correct them to the extent that they incorrectly adjudge federal rights. . . . We are not permitted to render an advisory opinion, and if the same judgment would be rendered by the state court after we corrected its views of Federal laws, our review could amount to nothing more than an advisory opinion."[9] Thus, when deciding whether to review a state court judgment, the Court faces two interrelated decisions: (1) whether the state court judgment is based upon a nonfederal ground and (2) whether the nonfederal ground is adequate to support the state court judgment. It is the responsibility of the Court to determine for itself the answer to both questions.[10]

---

[2] 28 U.S.C. § 1257(a). See R. Stern & E. Gressman, Supreme Court Practice ch. 3 (6th ed. 1986).

[3] Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U.S. 45, 47 (1935); Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 62 (1960); Thompson v. City of Louisville, 362 U.S. 199, 202 (1960); Metlakatla Indian Community v. Egan, 363 U.S. 555 (1960); Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514, 516, 517 (1968); Koon v. Aiken, 480 U.S. 943 (1987). In Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821), the judgment reviewed was that of the Quarterly Session Court for the Borough of Norfolk, Virginia.

[4] Market Street Ry. v. Railroad Comm'n, 324 U.S. 548, 551 (1945). See also San Diego Gas & Electric Co. v. City of San Diego, 450 U.S. 621 (1981); Flynt v. Ohio, 451 U.S. 619 (1981); Minnick v. California Dep't of Corrections, 452 U.S. 105 (1981); Florida v. Thomas, 532 U.S. 774 (2001). The Court has developed a series of exceptions permitting review when the federal issue in the case has been finally determined but there are still proceedings to come in the lower state courts. Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 476–487 (1975). See also Fort Wayne Books, Inc. v. Indiana, 489 U.S. 46 (1989); Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 304 (1989); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 907 n.42 (1982).

[5] Republic Natural Gas Co. v. Oklahoma, 334 U.S. 62, 67–69 (1948); Radio Station WOW v. Johnson, 326 U.S. 120, 123–24 (1945).

[6] New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U.S. 63, 67 (1928); See also Bankers Life & Casualty Co. v. Crenshaw, 486 U.S. 71, 77 (1988); Webb v. Webb, 451 U.S. 493, 501 (1981). The same rule applies on habeas corpus petitions. E.g., Picard v. Connor, 404 U.S. 270 (1972).

[7] Murdock v. City of Memphis, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 590 (1875); Black v. Cutter Laboratories, 351 U.S. 292 (1956); Wilson v. Loew's, Inc., 355 U.S. 597 (1958).

[8] Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117, 125–26 (1945). Whereas declining to review judgments of state courts that rest on an adequate and independent determination of state law protects the sovereignty of states, the Court has emphasized that review of state court decisions that invalidate state laws based on interpretations of federal law, "far from undermining state autonomy, is the only way to vindicate it" because a correction of a state court's federal errors necessarily returns power to the state government. Kansas v. Carr, 136 S. Ct. 633, 641 (2016) (quoting Kansas v. Marsh, 548 U.S. 163, 184 (2006) (Scalia, J., concurring)).

[9] Id. For additional discussion of advisory opinions, see ArtIII.S2.C1.4.1 Overview of Advisory Opinions.

[10] E.g., Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 366 (1990); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 455 (1958).

ArtIII.S2.C2.5
Supreme Court Review of State Court Decisions

The first question, whether a state court judgment is based on a nonfederal ground, may arise in several factual situations. A state court may have based its decision on two grounds, one federal and one nonfederal.[11] Alternatively, a state court may have based its decision solely on a nonfederal ground, but the federal ground may have been clearly raised.[12] In other cases, both federal and nonfederal grounds may have been raised but the state court judgment is ambiguous or is without a written opinion stating the ground relied on.[13] Or the state court may have decided the federal question although it could have based its ruling on an adequate, independent nonfederal ground.[14] For the Supreme Court to review a state court decision, it is necessary that it appear from the record that a federal question was presented, that the disposition of that question was necessary to the determination of the case, and that the federal question was actually decided or that the judgment could not have been rendered without deciding it.[15]

Several factors affect the answer to the second question, whether the nonfederal ground is adequate to support the decision. In order to preclude Supreme Court review, the nonfederal ground must be broad enough, without reference to the federal question, to sustain the state court judgment;[16] it must be independent of the federal question;[17] and it must be tenable.[18] Rejection of a litigant's federal claim by the state court on state procedural grounds, such as failure to tender the issue at the appropriate time, will ordinarily preclude Supreme Court review as an adequate independent state ground,[19] so long as the local procedure does not discriminate against raising federal claims and has not been used to stifle a federal claim or to evade vindication of federal rights.[20]

---

[11] Fox Film Corp. v. Muller, 296 U.S. 207 (1935); Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961).

[12] Wood v. Chesborough, 228 U.S. 672, 676–80 (1913).

[13] Lynch v. New York ex rel. Pierson, 293 U.S. 52, 54–55 (1934); Williams v. Kaiser, 323 U.S. 471, 477 (1945); Durley v. Mayo, 351 U.S. 277, 281 (1956); Klinger v. Missouri, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 257, 263 (1872); cf. Department of Mental Hygiene v. Kirchner, 380 U.S. 194 (1965).

[14] Poafpybitty v. Skelly Oil Co., 390 U.S. 365, 375–376 (1968).

[15] Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. v. Oklahoma, 303 U.S. 206 (1938); Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423, 434–437 (1959). When there is uncertainty about what the state court did, the previous practice was to remand for clarification. Minnesota v. National Tea Co., 309 U.S. 551 (1940); California v. Krivda, 409 U.S. 33 (1972). See California Dept. of Motor Vehicles v. Rios, 410 U.S. 425 (1973). The Court has adopted a presumption that when a state court decision fairly appears to rest on federal law or to be interwoven with federal law, and when the adequacy and independence of any possible state law ground is not clear from the face of the opinion, the Court will accept as the most reasonable explanation that the state court decided the case as it did because it believed that federal law required it to do so. If the state court wishes to avoid the presumption it must make clear by a plain statement in its judgment or opinion that discussed federal law did not compel the result, that state law was dispositive. Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983). See Harris v. Reed, 489 U.S. 255, 261 n.7 (1989) (collecting cases); Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991) (applying the rule in a habeas case).

[16] Murdock v. City of Memphis, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 590, 636 (1875). A new state rule cannot be invented for the occasion in order to defeat the federal claim. E.g., Ford v. Georgia, 498 U.S. 411, 420–425 (1991).

[17] Enterprise Irrigation Dist. v. Farmers' Mutual Canal Co., 243 U.S. 157, 164 (1917); Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 290 (1958).

[18] Enterprise Irrigation Dist. v. Farmers' Mutual Canal Co., 243 U.S. 157, 164 (1917); Ward v. Love County, 253 U.S. 17, 22 (1920); Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U.S. 313 (1958).

[19] Beard v. Kindler, 558 U.S. 53 (2009) (firmly established procedural rule adequate state ground even though rule is discretionary). Accord, Walker v. Martin, 562 U.S. 307 (2011). See also Nickel v. Cole, 256 U.S. 222, 225 (1921); Wolfe v. North Carolina, 364 U.S. 177, 195 (1960). But see Davis v. Wechsler, 263 U.S. 22 (1923); Brown v. Western Ry. of Alabama, 338 U.S. 294 (1949).

[20] Davis v. Wechsler, 263 U.S. 22, 24–25 (1923); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 455–458 (1958); Barr v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 146, 149 (1964). This rationale probably explains Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U.S. 443 (1965). See also in the criminal area, Edelman v. California, 344 U.S. 357, 362 (1953) (dissenting opinion); Brown v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443, 554 (1953) (dissenting opinion); Williams v. Georgia, 349 U.S. 375, 383 (1955); Monger v. Florida, 405 U.S. 958 (1972) (dissenting opinion).

ArtIII.S2.C2.6 Exceptions Clause and Congressional Control over Appellate Jurisdiction

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Unlike the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction,[1] Article III provides that the Court's appellate jurisdiction is subject to "Exceptions" and "Regulations" prescribed by Congress.[2] Congress and the Court have construed this provision, sometimes called the "Exceptions Clause," to grant Congress significant control over the Court's appellate jurisdiction and proceedings. In addition, Congress possesses extensive authority to regulate the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts, and may limit the cases the Supreme Court can hear on appeal by generally stripping the federal courts of jurisdiction over certain cases.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 provides that the Supreme Court "shall have" appellate jurisdiction over certain matters, subject to regulation by Congress.[3] Since Congress first enacted legislation to structure the Federal Judiciary in the Judiciary Act of 1789, the legislature has often exercised this power by granting the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over a subset of the cases included in the constitutional grant.[4] Several decisions of the Court from the 1700s and 1800s considered the extent to which the Court could exercise appellate jurisdiction absent express authorization from Congress. In the 1796 case Wiscart v. D'Auchy, the Court considered whether it could review admiralty cases.[5] A majority of the Court held that it had jurisdiction to review admiralty cases because such cases fell within the scope of a statute authorizing review of federal circuit court decisions in "civil actions." In so holding, the majority stated that congressional authorization was necessary to create jurisdiction and that, if Congress provided for jurisdiction, the Court must accept it: "If Congress had provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction; and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it."[6] By contrast, in the 1810 case Durousseau v. United States, Chief Justice John Marshall accepted the validity of legislation limiting the Court's jurisdiction but suggested that, in the absence of such congressional action, the Court's appellate jurisdiction would have been measured by the

[1] For discussion of the Court's original jurisdiction, see ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[2] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[3] Id.

[4] See, e.g., Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 80.

[5] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 321 (1796).

[6] Id. at 327.

constitutional grant.[7] However, later cases have generally taken the view that "the Supreme Court possesses no appellate power in any case, unless conferred upon it by act of Congress."[8]

Congress has on occasion used its power to regulate Supreme Court jurisdiction to forestall a possible adverse decision from the Court. In Ex parte McCardle, the Court granted certiorari to review the denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus from a civilian convicted of acts obstructing Reconstruction.[9] Anticipating that the Court might void, or at least undermine, congressional reconstruction of the Confederate States, Congress overrode the President's veto to enact a provision repealing the statute that authorized the appeal.[10] Although the Court had already heard argument in the case, it dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction. The Court stated, "We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words."[11] Since its decision in McCardle, the Supreme Court has upheld numerous legislative limits on its jurisdiction.[12]

Congress also possesses significant power to prevent Supreme Court appellate review by limiting the federal courts' jurisdiction over certain classes of cases, or even specific cases, a practice sometimes called "jurisdiction stripping."[13] The Constitution provides for the existence of a Supreme Court, but leaves to Congress the decision whether to establish inferior federal courts.[14] That broad grant of discretion has been interpreted also to grant Congress

---

[7] 10 U.S. (6 Cr.) 307, 313–14 (1810) ("Had the judicial act created the supreme court, without defining or limiting its jurisdiction, it must have been considered as possessing all the jurisdiction which the constitution assigns to it. . . . [I]n omitting to exercise the right of excepting from its constitutional powers, [Congress] would have necessarily left those powers undiminished. The appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act. They are given by the constitution. But they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject."). See also Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506, 512–13 (1869) ("It is quite true . . . that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred 'with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make.'"); United States v. More, 7 U.S. (3 Cr.) 159 (1805); but cf. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75, 93 (1807) (Marshall, C.J.) ("Courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction.")

[8] Barry v. Mercein, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 103, 119 (1847); see also Daniels v. Railroad, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 250, 254 (1865); Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 8, 10 (1799).

[9] 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869).

[10] By the Act of February 5, 1867, § 1, 14 Stat. 386, Congress had authorized appeals to the Supreme Court from circuit court decisions denying a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Previously, the Court's jurisdiction to review habeas corpus decisions, based in Section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 81, was somewhat unclear. Compare United States v. Hamilton, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 17 (1795), and Ex parte Burford, 7 U.S. (3 Cr.) 448 (1806), with Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807). The repealing statute was the Act of March 27, 1868, 15 Stat. 44. The repealed act was reenacted March 3, 1885. 23 Stat. 437.

[11] 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) at 513. A few years after McCardle, in Ex parte Yerger, the Court held that the Judiciary Act of 1789 gave it the authority to review on certiorari a circuit court's denial of a habeas petition from of a person held by the military in the South, suggesting that the repeal at issue in McCardle did not deprive the Court of all jurisdiction over the matter but simply eliminated one possible statutory grant. 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 85 (1869). See also Felker v. Turpin, 518 U.S. 651 (1996).

[12] See The Francis Wright, 105 U.S. 381, 385–386 (1882); Luckenbuch S. S. Co. v. United States, 272 U.S. 533, 537 (1926); American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville, T. & K.W. Ry., 148 U.S. 372, 378 (1893); United States v. Bitty, 208 U.S. 393 (1908); United States v. Young, 94 U.S. 258 (1876); Insurance Co. v. Ritchie, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 541 (1866); Railroad v. Grant, 98 U.S. 398 (1878); Bruner v. United States, 343 U.S. 112 (1952); District of Columbia v. Eslin, 183 U.S. 62 (1901); Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897 (2018); see also Walker v. Taylor, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 64 (1847).

[13] For additional discussion of jurisdiction stripping, see generally Kevin Lewis, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R44967, Congress's Power over Courts: Jurisdiction Stripping and the Rule of Klein (2018), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R44967.

[14] U.S. Const. art III, § 1 ("The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."); U.S. Const. art I, § 8, cl. 9 (allowing Congress "[t]o constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court").

expansive authority to regulate the structure and jurisdiction of the lower federal courts.[15] Separation of powers considerations bar Congress from requiring courts to reopen final judicial decisions[16] or dictating a certain substantive outcome in pending litigation.[17] However, the Court has upheld legislation that deprives the federal courts of jurisdiction over certain matters, including legislation that removed jurisdiction over a specific pending case.[18] Jurisdiction stripping statutes may limit the Court's appellate jurisdiction; by contrast, Congress cannot enact legislation to limit the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction.[19]

In addition to regulating the federal courts' jurisdiction, since the early years of the Republic Congress has enacted legislation regulating court proceedings, for instance by setting the times and places for holding court, even of the Supreme Court, and limiting the courts' power to issue injunctions.[20] One striking example of regulating when the Court sits occurred following the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801. Congress enacted legislation changing the Court's term to forestall a constitutional attack on the repeal, with the result that the Court did not convene for fourteen months.[21] Examples of restrictions on injunctions include limitations on injunctions related to taxes[22] and the Norris-La Guardia Act, which limits the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes.[23]

---

[15] See, e.g., United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cr.) 32, 33 (1812); Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657, 721–722 (1838); Cary v. Curtis, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 236 (1845); Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226, 233–234 (1922); Ladew v. Tennessee Copper Co., 218 U.S. 357, 358 (1910); Venner v. Great Northern R. Co., 209 U.S. 24, 35 (1908); Kentucky v. Powers, 201 U.S. 1, 24 (1906); Stevenson v. Fain, 195 U.S. 165, 167 (1904); Plaquemines Tropical Fruit Co. v. Henderson, 170 U.S. 511, 513–521 (1898); The Mayor v. Cooper, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 247, 251–252 (1868); South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 331 (1966); Palmore v. United States, 411 U.S. 389, 400–02 (1973); Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372 (1977). A minority view, articulated by Justice Joseph Story in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, argues that the Constitution requires Congress to create inferior federal courts and vest them with all the jurisdiction they are capable of receiving. 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 329–336 (1816); see also, e.g., Amar, A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two-Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction, 65 B.U. L. Rev. 205 (1985); Amar, The Two-Tiered Structure of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 138 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1499 (1990).

[16] Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211 (1995).

[17] United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. 128 (1871); see also Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897, 905 (2018) (plurality opinion) (Congress cannot usurp the judiciary's power by saying "in Smith v. Jones, Smith wins.").

[18] Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897 (2018); cf. United States v. Sioux Nation of Indians, 448 U.S. 371, 374 (1980).

[19] See ArtIII.S2.C2.2 Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction.

[20] Supreme Court Justices have, at times, opposed legislation that might regulate the Court or its procedures. See, e.g., John G. Roberts, Jr., 2021 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary (2021); Letter from Charles Evans Hughes, C.J., to Burton K. Wheeler, U.S. Sen. (Mar. 21, 1937), reprinted in S. Rep. No. 75–711, app. c at 40 (1937). In addition, even absent clearly established constitutional limits on Congress's authority to regulate court proceedings, the legislature has often deferred to the courts, and especially the Supreme Court, to regulate their own procedures. For instance, the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071–2077, authorizes the Supreme Court to make procedural rules for the inferior federal courts, subject to approval by Congress, and further allows the Court to make its own procedural rules without legislative oversight.

[21] 1 Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 222–224 (rev. ed. 1926).

[22] Act of March 2, 1867, 10, 14 Stat. 475, as amended, now 26 U.S.C. § 7421 (federal taxes): Act of August 21, 1937, 50 Stat. 738, 28 U.S.C. § 1341 (state taxes). See also Act of May 14, 1934, 48 Stat. 775, 28 U.S.C. § 1342 (state rate-making).

[23] 47 Stat. 70 (1932), 29 U.S.C. §§ 101–115. The Court has upheld the Act and applied it liberally through the years. See Lauf v. E.G. Shinner & Co., 303 U.S. 323, 330 (1938); New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Co., 303 U.S. 552 (1938); Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Chicago River & I. R.R., 353 U.S. 30 (1957); Boys Markets v. Retail Clerks Union, 398 U.S. 235 (1970).

Clause 3—Trials

ArtIII.S2.C3.1 Jury Trials

Article III, Section 2, Clause 3:

> The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Article III, Section 2, Clause 3 is one of two constitutional provisions—the other being the Sixth Amendment—that provide a right to jury trial in federal criminal cases.[1] In addition to providing such a right generally in all criminal cases except impeachment cases,[2] this Clause also specifies the venue in which a trial must take place: in the state where the crime was committed, or at a place directed by Congress if the crime was not committed within any states.[3] The Sixth Amendment later further imposed other requirements related to the right, including that the trial be speedy and public, and that the trial take place before a jury summoned from the state and district in which the crime was committed.[4]

Section 3—Treason

Clause 1—Meaning

ArtIII.S3.C1.1 Historical Background on Treason

Article III, Section 3, Clause 1:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Treason Clause is a product of the Framer's awareness of the "numerous and dangerous excrescences" which had distorted the English law of treason. The Clause was therefore intended to put "extend[ing] the crime and punishment of treason" beyond Congress's power.[1] Debate in the Constitutional Convention, remarks in the ratifying conventions, and contemporaneous public comments make clear that the Framers

[1] The Supreme Court has held that the Sixth Amendment's right to jury, including the requirement that a jury verdict be unanimous, applies to states through the Fourteenth Amendment. Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968); see also Ramos v. Louisiana, No. 18-5924, slip op. at 7 (U.S. 2020) (holding that the Sixth Amendment's requirement of a unanimous verdict applies to states through the Fourteenth Amendment).

[2] The Supreme Court, however, has long held that the guarantees of jury trial under Article III, Section 2, Clause 3 and the Sixth Amendment do not apply to petty offenses because at the time of the Constitution's adoption, such offenses were tried summarily without a jury under common law. See Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373, 378–79 (1966).

[3] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl.3.

[4] U.S. Const. amend. VI; see generally Amdt6.1 Overview of Sixth Amendment, Rights in Criminal Prosecutions.

[1] 2 Debates in the Several State Conventions on Adoption of the Constitution 469 (Jonathan Elliott ed., 1836) (James Wilson). James Wilson apparently drafted the clause as a member of the Committee of Detail and had some firsthand knowledge of how treason charges could be abused. See Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1, 23 & note 32 (1944); J. Hurst, The Law of Treason in the United States: Selected Essays 90–91, 129–136 (1971).

contemplated a restrictive concept of the crime of treason that would prevent the politically powerful from escalating ordinary partisan disputes into capital charges of treason, as so often had happened in England.[2]

Thus, the Framers adopted two of the three formulations and the phraseology of the English Statute of Treason enacted in 1350,[3] but they conspicuously omitted the phrase defining as treason the "compass[ing] or imagin[ing] the death of our lord the King,"[4] under which most of the English law of "constructive treason" had been developed.[5] Beyond limiting Congress's power to define treason,[6] the Clause also limits Congress's ability to make proof of the offense of treason easy to establish[7] and to define the punishment for treason.[8]

ArtIII.S3.C1.2 Levying War as Treason

Article III, Section 3, Clause 1:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

Early judicial interpretation of the Treason Clause and the term "levying war" arose in the context of the partisan struggles of the early nineteenth century and the treason trials of Aaron Burr and his associates. In Ex parte Bollman,[1] which involved two of Burr's confederates, Chief Justice John Marshall, speaking for himself and three other Justices, confined the meaning of levying war to the actual waging of war. Chief Justice Marshall distinguished the offence of conspiring to levy war and the offence of actually levying war. In his view, "[t]he first must be brought into operation by the assemblage of men for a purpose treasonable in itself, or the fact of levying war cannot have been committed."[2] This "enlistment of men to serve against the government," according to him, "does not amount to levying war."[3]

---

[2] 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 345–50 (Max Farrand ed., 1911); 3 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 102–03 (Max Farrand ed., 1911); id. at 447, 451, 466; 3 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 209, 219, 220 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) ; The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison); id. No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton); The Works of James Wilson 663–69 (R. McCloskey ed. 1967). The matter is comprehensively discussed in J. Hurst supra note 1, at chs. 3, 4.

[3] 25 Edward III, Stat. 5, ch. 2. See J. Hurst, supra note 1, at ch. 2.

[4] J. Hurst supra note 1, at 15, 31–37, 41–49, 51–55.

[5] Id.; see also id. at 152–53 ("[T]he record does suggest that the clause was intended to guarantee nonviolent political processes against prosecution under any theory or charge, the burden of which was the allegedly seditious character of the conduct in question. The most obviously restrictive feature of the constitutional definition is its omission of any provision analogous to that branch of the Statute of Edward III which punished treason by compassing the death of the king. In a narrow sense, this provision perhaps had no proper analogue in a republic. However, to interpret the silence of the Treason Clause in this way alone does justice neither to the technical proficiency of the Philadelphia draftsmen nor to the practical statecraft and knowledge of English political history among the Framers and proponents of the Constitution. The charge of compassing the king's death had been the principal instrument by which 'treason' had been used to suppress a wide range of political opposition, from acts obviously dangerous to order and likely in fact to lead to the king's death to the mere speaking or writing of views restrictive of the royal authority.").

[6] The clause does not, however, prevent Congress from specifying other crimes of a subversive nature and prescribing punishment, so long as Congress is not merely attempting to evade the restrictions of the Treason Clause. E.g., Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75, 126 (1807); Wimmer v. United States, 264 Fd. 11, 12–13 (6th Cir. 1920), cert. denied, 253 U.S. 494 (1920).

[7] By the requirement of two witnesses to the same overt act or a Confession in open Court.

[8] Cl. 2, "Corruption of the Blood and Forfeiture."

[1] 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807).

[2] Id. at 126.

[3] Id.

Chief Justice Marshall was careful, however, to state that the Court did not mean that no person could be guilty of this crime who had not appeared in arms against the country. He stated: "On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."[4] But, Chief Justice Marshall emphasized, "there must be an actual assembling of men, for the treasonable purpose, to constitute a levying of war."[5]

Based on these considerations and because no part of the crime charged had been committed in the District of Columbia, the Court held that Bollman and Swartwout could not be tried in the District, and ordered their discharge. Chief Justice Marshall continued by saying that "the crime of treason should not be extended by construction to doubtful cases"[6] and concluded that no conspiracy for overturning the Government and "no enlisting of men to effect it, would be an actual levying of war."[7]

ArtIII.S3.C1.3 Trial of Aaron Burr

Article III, Section 3, Clause 1:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

After authoring the Supreme Court's decision in Ex Parte Bollman,[1] in which the Court ordered the discharge of two of Aaron Burr's associates, Chief Justice John Marshall presided over the treason trial of Burr. His ruling[2] denying a motion to introduce certain collateral evidence bearing on Burr's activities is significant both for rendering the latter's acquittal inevitable and for the qualifications and exceptions made to the Bollman decision. In brief, Chief Justice Marshall's ruling held that Burr, who had not been present at the assemblage on Blennerhassett's Island, could be convicted of advising or procuring a levying of war only upon the testimony of two witnesses to his having procured the assemblage. Because the operation had been covert, such testimony was naturally unobtainable. The net effect of Marshall's pronouncements was to make it extremely difficult to convict one of levying war against the United States short of the conduct of or personal participation in actual hostilities.[3]

---

[4] Id.

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 127.

[7] Id.

[1] 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807).

[2] United States v. Burr, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 469, Appx. (1807).

[3] There have been lower court cases in which the Government obtained convictions of treason. Following the Whiskey Rebellion, the Government obtained convictions of treason based on a ruling that forcible resistance to the Government enforcing revenue laws was a constructive levying of war. United States v. Vigol, 29 F. Cas. 376 (No. 16621) (C.C.D. Pa. 1795); United States v. Mitchell, 26 F. Cas. 1277 (No. 15788) (C.C.D. Pa. 1795). After conviction, the defendants were pardoned. See also for the same ruling in a different situation the Case of Fries, 9 F. Cas. 826, 924 (Nos. 5126, 5127) (C.C.D. Pa. 1799, 1800). The defendant was again pardoned after conviction. About a half century later, a court held that participating in forcible resistance to the Fugitive Slave Law was not a constructive levying of war. United States v. Hanway, 26 F. Cas. 105 (No. 15299) (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1851). Although the United States Government regarded the activities of the Confederate States as a levying of war, the President by Amnesty Proclamation of December 25, 1868, pardoned all those who had participated on the Southern side in the Civil War. In applying the Captured and Abandoned Property Act of 1863 (12 Stat. 820) in a civil proceeding, the Court declared that the

ArtIII.S3.C1.4 Aid and Comfort to the Enemy as Treason

Article III, Section 3, Clause 1:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

Since Ex Parte Bollman, the few treason cases that have reached the Supreme Court arose in the context of World War II and involved defendants charged with adhering to enemies of the United States and giving them aid and comfort. In the first of these cases, Cramer v. United States,[1] the Court considered whether the "overt act" at issue must itself manifest a treacherous intention or if it was enough that other proper evidence support such an intention.[2] The Court, in a 5-4 opinion by Justice Robert Jackson, in effect took the former view, holding that the Treason Clause's "two-witness principle" prohibited "imputation of incriminating acts to the accused by circumstantial evidence or by the testimony of a single witness,"[3] even though the single witness in question was the accused himself. "Every act, movement, deed, and word of the defendant charged to constitute treason must be supported by the testimony of two witnesses,"[4] Justice Jackson asserted. Justice William Douglas in a dissent, joined by Chief Justice Harlan Stone and Justices Hugo Black and Stanley Reed, contended that Cramer's treasonable intention was sufficiently shown by overt acts as attested to by two witnesses each, plus statements Cramer made on the witness stand.

In the second case, Haupt v. United States,[5] the Supreme Court sustained a treason conviction for the first time in its history. Although the overt acts that supported the treason charge—including defendant's harboring and sheltering of his son who was an enemy spy and saboteur, and assisting his son in purchasing an automobile and obtaining employment in a defense plant—were all acts that a father might naturally perform for a son, the Court held that this fact did not necessarily relieve such acts of the treasonable purpose of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Speaking for the Court, Justice Jackson said: "No matter whether young Haupt's mission was benign or traitorous, known or unknown to the defendant, these acts were aid and comfort to him."[6] These acts, Justice Jackson continued, "were more than casually useful; they were aids in steps essential to his design for treason."[7] Thus, "[i]f proof be added that the defendant knew of his son's instruction, preparation and plans, the purpose to aid and comfort the enemy becomes clear."[8] The Court further held that conversation and occurrences foundation of the Confederacy was treason against the United States. Sprott v. United States, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 459 (1875). See also Hanauer v. Doane, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 342 (1871); Thorington v. Smith, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 1 (1869); Young v. United States, 97 U.S. 39 (1878). While Sprott, Hanauer, Thorington, and Young discussed concepts concerning adhering to the United States' enemies and giving enemies of the United States Aid and Comfort, these are not criminal cases. Instead, they dealt with attempts to recover property under the Captured and Abandoned Property Act by persons who claimed that they had given no aid or comfort to the enemy. These cases did not, therefore, interpret the Constitution.

---

[1] 325 U.S. 1 (1945).

[2] Id.

[3] Id. at 35.

[4] Id. at 34–35. Earlier, Justice Jackson had declared that this phase of treason consists of two elements: "adherence to the enemy; and rendering him aid and comfort." Id. at 29. A citizen, it was said, may take actions "which do aid and comfort the enemy . . . but if there is no adherence to the enemy in this, if there is no intent to betray, there is no treason." Id.

[5] 330 U.S. 631 (1947).

[6] Id. at 635.

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 635–36.

long prior to the indictment were admissible evidence on the question of defendant's intent. And more important, it held that the constitutional requirement of two witnesses to the same overt act or confession in open court does not operate to exclude confessions or admissions made out of court if such evidence is merely corroborative and where a legal basis for the conviction has been laid by the testimony of two witnesses.

This relaxation of restrictions surrounding the definition of treason evoked obvious satisfaction from Justice Douglas, who saw in Haupt a vindication of his position in Cramer. In Justice Douglas's view, Cramer was wrongly decided because it departed from the rules that "the overt act and the intent with which it is done are separate and distinct elements of the crime"[9] and that "[i]ntent need not be proved by two witnesses but may be inferred from all the circumstances surrounding the overt act."[10] In Justice Douglas's view, "proof of treasonable intent in the doing of the overt act necessarily involves proof that the accused committed the overt act with the knowledge or understanding of its treasonable character."[11] He further opined that the Haupt decision was "truer to the constitutional definition of treason" by holding that "an act, quite innocent on its face, does not need two witnesses to be transformed into a incriminating one." [12]

In a third case, Kawakita v. United States,[13] the Supreme Court sustained a treason conviction against a defense that the defendant, a dual citizen of Japan and United States, had renounced his American citizenship. In that case, the defendant, who was a native-born citizen of the United States and also a national of Japan by reason of Japanese parentage and law, served during the war as a civilian interpreter of a private corporation producing war materials for Japan and was accused of brutally abusing American prisoners of war who were forced to work for the corporation. Upon his return to the United States following Japan's surrender, the defendant was charged with treason for his conduct toward American prisoners of war. In affirming the conviction, the Court concluded that the question regarding whether the defendant had intended to renounce American citizenship was peculiarly one for the jury and their verdict that he had not so intended was based on sufficient evidence. An American citizen, the Court continued, owes allegiance to the United States wherever he may reside, and dual nationality does not alter the situation.[14]

The vacillation of Chief Justice John Marshall between the Bollman[15] and Burr[16] cases and the vacillation of the Court in the Cramer[17] and Haupt[18] cases leave the law of treason in a somewhat uncertain condition. The difficulties created by Burr, however, have been largely

[9] Id. at 645.

[10] Id.

[11] Id.

[12] Id. at 645–46. Justice William Douglas cites no cases for these propositions. Justice Frank Murphy in a solitary dissent stated: "But the act of providing shelter was of the type that might naturally arise out of petitioner's relationship to his son, as the Court recognizes. By its very nature, therefore, it is a non- treasonous act. That is true even when the act is viewed in light of all the surrounding circumstances. All that can be said is that the problem of whether it was motivated by treasonous or non-treasonous factors is left in doubt. It is therefore not an overt act of treason, regardless of how unlawful it might otherwise be." Id. at 649.

[13] 343 U.S. 717 (1952).

[14] 343 U.S. at 732. For citations in the subject of dual nationality, see id. at 723 n.2. Three dissenters asserted that Kawakita's conduct in Japan clearly showed he was consistently demonstrating his allegiance to Japan. Id. at 746 ("As a matter of law, he expatriated himself as well as that can be done.").

[15] Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75 (1807).

[16] United States v. Burr, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 469 (1807).

[17] Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1 (1945).

[18] Haupt v. United States, 330 U.S. 631 (1947).

obviated by punishing acts ordinarily treasonable in nature under a different label,[19] within a formula provided by Chief Justice Marshall himself in Bollman. There, Chief Justice Marshall opined that "Crimes so atrocious as those which have for their object the subversion by violence of those laws and those institutions which have been ordained in order to secure the peace and happiness of society, are not to escape punishment, because they have not ripened into treason."[20] In his view, "[t]he wisdom of the legislature is competent to provide for the case,"[21] and Framers must have intended this legislative approach in the punishment of such cases because such general laws would be "formed upon deliberation, under the influence of no resentments, and without knowing on whom they were to operate."[22]

Clause 2—Punishment

ArtIII.S3.C2.1 Punishment of Treason Clause

Article III, Section 3, Clause 2:

> The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

Among other measures, the Confiscation Act of 1862 "to suppress Insurrection, to punish Treason and Rebellion, to seize and confiscate the Property of Rebels" authorized the President to confiscate certain Confederate property through court action.[1] Because of President Abraham Lincoln's concern that such authority raised concerns under the Punishment of Treason Clause, the act was accompanied by an explanatory joint resolution which stipulated that only a life estate terminating with the death of the offender could be sold and that at his death his children could take the fee simple by descent as his heirs without deriving any title from the United States.[2] In applying this act, passed pursuant to the war power and not the power to punish treason,[3] the Supreme Court in one case[4] quoted with approval the English distinction between a disability absolute and perpetual and a disability personal or temporary. Corruption of blood as a result of attainder of treason was cited as an example of the former and was defined as the disability of any of the posterity of the attained person "to claim any inheritance in fee simple, either as heir to him, or to any ancestor above him."[5]

---

[19] Cf. United States v. Rosenberg, 195 F.2d 583 (2d. Cir. 1952), cert denied, 344 U.S. 889 (1952), holding that in a prosecution under the Espionage Act for giving aid to a country, not an enemy, an offense distinct from treason, neither the two-witness rule nor the requirement as to the overt act is applicable.

[20] Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cr.) 75, 126 (1807).

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 127. Justice Felix Frankfurter appended to his opinion in Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1, 25 n.38 (1945), a list taken from the government's brief of all the cases prior to Cramer in which the Treason Clause was construed.

[1] 12 Stat. 589, § 5. This act incidentally did not designate rebellion as treason.

[2] 12 Stat. 627.

[3] Miller v. United States, 78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 268, 305 (1871).

[4] Wallach v. Van Riswick, 92 U.S. 202, 213 (1876).

[5] Lord de la Warre's Case, 11 Coke Rept. 1a, 77 Eng. Rept. 1145 (1597). A number of cases dealt with the effect of a full pardon by the President of owners of property confiscated under this Act. They held that a full pardon relieved the owner of forfeiture as far as the government was concerned but did not divide the interest acquired by third persons from the government during the lifetime of the offender. Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Bosworth, 133 U.S. 92, 101 (1890); Knote v. United States, 95 U.S. 149 (1877); Wallach v. Van Riswick, 92 U.S. 202, 203 (1876); Armstrong's Foundry, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 766, 769 (1868). There is no direct ruling on the question of whether only citizens can commit treason. In Carlisle v. United States, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 147, 154–155 (1873), the Court declared that aliens while domiciled in this country owe a temporary allegiance to it and may be punished for treason equally with a native-born citizen in the absence of a treaty stipulation to the contrary. This case involved the attempt of certain British subjects

ArtIII.S3.C2.1
Punishment of Treason Clause

to recover claims for property seized under the Captured and Abandoned Property Act, 12 Stat. 820 (1863), which provided for the recovery of property or its value in suits in the Court of Claims by persons who had not rendered aid and comfort to the enemy. Earlier, in United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 76, 97 (1820), which involved a conviction for manslaughter under an Act punishing manslaughter and treason on the high seas, Chief Justice John Marshall going beyond the necessities of the case stated that treason "is a breach of allegiance, and can be committed by him only who owes allegiance either perpetual or temporary." However, see In re Shinohara, Court Martial Orders, No. 19, September 8, 1949, p. 4, Office of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, reported in 17 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 283 (1949). In this case, an enemy alien resident in United States territory (Guam) was found guilty of treason for acts done while the enemy nation of which he was a citizen occupied such territory. Under English precedents, an alien residing in British territory is open to conviction for high treason on the theory that his allegiance to the Crown is not suspended by foreign occupation of the territory. DeJager v. Attorney General of Natal (1907), A.C., 96 L.T.R. 857. See also 18 U.S.C. § 2381.

ARTICLE IV
RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN THE STATES

ARTICLE IV
RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN THE STATES

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ARTICLE IV—RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN THE STATES

ArtIV.1 Overview of Article IV, Relationships Between the States

Article IV of the U.S. Constitution is sometimes called the "States' Relations Article."[1] It contains several provisions concerning the federalist structure of government established by the Constitution, which divides sovereignty between the states and the National Government.[2]

Sections 1 and 2 concern the states' relationships with each other. Section 1 is referred to as the Full Faith and Credit Clause, and requires states to recognize the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of other states;[3] for example, states must generally give effect to judgments issued by an out-of-state court.[4] Section 2 addresses interstate comity, that is, harmony and cooperation among the states. Its first clause grants the citizens of each state the privileges and immunities of the citizens of other states, preventing states from discriminating against non-residents in favor of their own citizens.[5] Its second clause addresses when a person accused of a crime flees from one state to another, requiring the state where the fugitive is found to return him to the state where he has been charged with a crime, upon proper demand.[6]

Sections 3 and 4 concern the states' relationships to the National Government. Section 3 grants Congress two important powers: to admit new states into the union,[7] and to govern federal territories and property.[8] Through Section 4, known as the Guarantee Clause, the United States promises to protect the states against foreign invasion and domestic insurrection, and to ensure that each state has "a Republican Form of Government."[9]

---

[1] Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 379 (1978).

[2] See generally Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 457–60 (1991) (describing the "federalist structure of joint sovereigns" established under the Constitution).

[3] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.

[4] See ArtIV.S1.1 Overview of Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[5] See ArtIV.S1.1 Overview of Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[6] See ArtIV.S2.C2.1 Overview of Extradition (Interstate Rendition) Clause. The third clause of Section 2 envisioned an analogous process for enslaved persons who escaped to another state, but it was nullified in 1865 by the Thirteenth Amendment.

[7] See ArtIV.S3.C1.1 Overview of Admissions (New States) Clause.

[8] See ArtIV.S3.C2.1 Property Clause Generally.

[9] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4, cl. 1. The Supreme Court has generally refused to hear cases on the Guarantee Clause based on the political question doctrine. ArtIII.S2.C1.9.1 Overview of Political Question Doctrine; ArtIV.S4.2 Guarantee Clause Generally.

Section 1—Full Faith and Credit Clause

ArtIV.S1.1 Overview of Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

The Constitution's federalist structure allows each state to maintain its own government.[1] This structure creates a risk that multiple states will exercise their powers over the same issue or dispute, leading to confusion and uncertainty.[2] The Constitution's Full Faith and Credit Clause mitigates that risk by adjusting the states' interrelationships.[3] The Clause requires each state to give "Full Faith and Credit" to "the public Acts" of "every other State," such as other states' statutes.[4] The Clause also requires states to give "Full Faith and Credit" to the "Records[ ] and judicial Proceedings of every other State."[5]

The Supreme Court's interpretation of the Clause has shifted over time.[6] The Court has settled on a doctrinal framework that treats out-of-state court judgments differently from out-of-state laws.[7] Whereas the modern Court generally requires states to give out-of-state judgments conclusive effect, states have more freedom to apply their own laws in their own courts, so long as they do not close their courts completely to claims based on other states' laws.[8]

The Clause also authorizes Congress to enact "general Laws" that "prescribe the Manner in which [states'] Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof."[9] Congress has invoked this authority several times, such as to require federal and territorial

---

[1] See Intro.7.3 Federalism and the Constitution. See also, e.g., Underwriters Nat'l Assurance Co. v. N.C. Life & Accident & Health Ins. Guar. Ass'n, 455 U.S. 691, 703–04 (1982) ("Ours is a union of States, each having its own judicial system capable of adjudicating the rights and responsibilities of the parties brought before it.").

[2] See, e.g., Underwriters Nat'l Assurance, 455 U.S. at 704 ("[T]here is always a risk that two or more States will exercise their power over the same case or controversy, with the uncertainty, confusion, and delay that necessarily accompany relitigation of the same issue.").

[3] See, e.g., V.L. v. E.L., 577 U.S. 404, 407 (2016) (per curiam) (explaining that the Full Faith and Credit Clause "alter[s] the status of the several states as independent foreign sovereignties, each free to ignore obligations created under the laws or by the judicial proceedings of the others, and to make them integral parts of a single nation") (quoting Milwaukee Cnty. v. M.E. White Co., 296 U.S. 268, 277 (1935)).

[4] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1. See also, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, No. 14-1175, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Apr. 19, 2016) ("A statute is a 'public Act' within the meaning of the Full Faith and Credit Clause.").

[5] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.

[6] See generally ArtIV.S1.3.2 Modern Doctrine on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[7] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 538 U.S. 488, 494 (2003) ("[O]ur precedent differentiates the credit owed to laws (legislative measures and common law) and to judgments.") (quoting Baker v. Gen. Motors Corp., 522 U.S. 222, 232 (1998)).

[8] See, e.g., id. ("Whereas the full faith and credit command 'is exacting' with respect to '[a] final judgment . . . rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment,' it is less demanding with respect to choice of laws. We have held that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not compel 'a state to substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes dealing with a subject matter concerning which it is competent to legislate.'") (internal citations omitted; alterations in original). Compare ArtIV.S1.3.1 Early Precedent on Full Faith and Credit Clause and ArtIV.S1.3.2 Modern Doctrine on Full Faith and Credit Clause, with ArtIV.S1.4.1 Early Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause and ArtIV.S1.4.2 Modern Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[9] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.

courts to apply the same full faith and credit principles as state courts.[10] However, the Supreme Court has not yet considered where the outer boundaries of that power lie.[11]

Litigants frequently ask state judges to enforce judgments entered by other states' courts, such as judgments for monetary damages.[12] Those judges must decide whether to honor that judgment—and, if so, what legal effect the judgment will have. In addition, the Full Faith and Credit Clause requires states to recognize other states' "public Acts," such as statutes.[13] This language has raised questions regarding how state courts must treat other states' laws. Besides the question of which state's laws a court must apply when two statutes conflict, the Court has also considered whether a state court must entertain causes of action based on other states' laws. The Court has interpreted the Clause to require states to open their courts to claims based on other states' laws under various circumstances.[14]

Whereas the Full Faith and Credit Clause's first sentence mandates that "Full Faith and Credit . . . be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State," its second sentence authorizes Congress to "prescribe . . . the Effect" of "such Acts, Records, and Proceedings."[15] The relationship between these two sentences raises interpretive questions. Because the first sentence already requires states to give out-of-state acts and proceedings full faith and credit, the Framers' reasons for authorizing Congress to specify the effect of those acts and proceedings are unclear.[16] Nor is it clear whether the Clause's second sentence empowers Congress to enact legislation allowing states to refuse to give effect to particular categories of acts, records, and proceedings.[17] Congress has seldom invoked its legislative authority under the Clause and thus has rarely tested that power's potential limits.[18] As a result, the scope of Congress's powers under the Clause remains unsettled.[19]

---

[10] See generally ArtIV.S1.5.1 Generally Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause to ArtIV.S1.5.2 Specifically Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[11] See generally ArtIV.S1.5.1 Generally Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause to ArtIV.S1.5.2 Specifically Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[12] See, e.g., 18B Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4467 (5th ed. 2019) (describing "enforcement of money judgments" as "[t]he most familiar application" of full faith and credit principles).

[13] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1. See also Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, No. 14-1175, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Apr. 19, 2016) ("A statute is a 'public Act' within the meaning of the Full Faith and Credit Clause.").

[14] See ArtIV.S1.4.2 Modern Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[15] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1.

[16] See, e.g., Jeffrey M. Schmitt, A Historical Reassessment of Full Faith and Credit, 20 Geo. Mason L. Rev. 485, 485 (2013) ("The Constitution commands that 'Full Faith and Credit shall be given' to state acts, records, and judgments. Although this clause appears to create a self-executing constitutional directive, the very next sentence provides that Congress 'may' prescribe the manner in which state acts and judgments 'shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.' Paradoxically, the Full Faith and Credit Clause thus arguably seems to give Congress the power to nullify the command that full faith and credit be given. Any plausible interpretation of the Clause must reconcile this apparent conflict.") (footnotes omitted).

[17] See, e.g., Charles M. Yablon, Madison's Full Faith and Credit Clause: A Historical Analysis, 33 Cardozo L. Rev. 125, 126 (2011) ("The apparent inconsistency in the language of the Full Faith and Credit Clause becomes a concrete legal issue . . . if Congress chooses to pass a law that appears to violate the mandate of the first sentence of the Clause.").

[18] See Larry Kramer, Same-Sex Marriage, Conflict of Laws, and the Unconstitutional Public Policy Exception, 106 Yale L.J. 1965, 2005 (1997) (describing Congress's power under the Clause's second sentence as "untested and practically unexercised").

[19] See, e.g., Jeffrey M. Schmitt, A Historical Reassessment of Full Faith and Credit, 20 Geo. Mason L. Rev. 485, 485 (2013) ("[T]he Court has not yet ruled on the second portion of the Clause—that is, it has not addressed the contours of Congress's full faith and credit power.").

ArtIV.S1.2 Historical Background on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Before the Constitution's ratification, English and colonial courts struggled with how to treat judgments from other sovereigns' courts.[1] While some courts held that judgments from other jurisdictions should have conclusive effect in other courts, others held that such judgments were only presumptively binding.[2] The Articles of Confederation attempted to address this uncertainty by providing that "[f]ull faith and credit shall be given in each of these states to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other state."[3] Nevertheless, it remained unclear whether the Articles of Confederation merely required courts to accept other states' records as evidence, or if it instead required courts to afford such records conclusive effect.[4]

When the Framers decided to include a full faith and credit provision in the Constitution, they debated whether and how it should differ from the Articles of Confederation. For instance, whereas the Articles only granted full faith and credit to the "records, acts, and judicial proceedings" of "courts and magistrates,"[5] the Framers decided to extend full faith and credit to legislative acts as well.[6]

The Framers also debated whether to empower Congress to pass legislation governing the authentication, execution, and effect of out-of-state acts.[7] While some Framers advocated

---

[1] See, e.g., Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U.S. (8 Wall.) 457, 465 (1873) (describing "the uncertainty and confusion that prevailed in England and this country as to the credit and effect which should be given to foreign judgments, some courts holding that they should be [c]onclusive of the matters adjudged, and others that they should be regarded as only prima facie binding"); M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 312, 325 (1839) ("[W]e need not doubt what the framers of the Constitution intended to accomplish by [the Full Faith and Credit Clause], if we reflect how unsettled the doctrine was upon the effect of foreign judgments, or the effect, rei judicatae, throughout Europe, in England, and in these States, when our first confederation was formed.").

[2] Thompson, 85 U.S. (8 Wall.) at 465.

[3] Articles of Confederation, art. IV, § 3.

[4] See, e.g., Stephen E. Sachs, Full Faith and Credit in the Early Congress, 95 Va. L. Rev. 1201, 1224–25 (2009) ("The divergence between 'authentication' and 'effect' interpretations of the [Articles of] Confederation's [Full Faith and Credit] Clause soon appeared in contemporary state court decisions."); Ralph U. Whitten, The Original Understanding of the Full Faith and Credit Clause and the Defense of Marriage Act, 32 Creighton L. Rev. 255, 282–88 (1998) (analyzing the "five reported decisions interpreting the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the Articles of Confederation" and concluding that "[t]he debate in the cases interpreting the Articles of Confederation Clause concerned whether the language of the Clause should be given an evidentiary meaning or should be understood as elevating state judgments to the status of domestic judgments in other states"). See also The Federalist No. 42 (James Madison) (describing the Articles of Confederation's full faith and credit provision as "extremely indeterminate"); Charles M. Yablon, Madison's Full Faith and Credit Clause: A Historical Analysis, 33 Cardozo L. Rev. 125, 140 (2011) (maintaining that "the faith and credit clause in the Articles of Confederation had no clear and determinate meaning").

[5] Articles of Confederation, art. IV, § 3 (emphasis added).

[6] Compare 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 188 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Committee of Detail draft proposing that "[f]ull faith shall be given in each State to the acts of the Legislatures, and to the records and judicial proceedings of the Courts and Magistrates of every other State") (emphasis added), with id. at 447 (reflecting that Hugh Williamson "moved to substitute in place of" the Committee of Detail's full faith and credit provision "the words of the Articles of Confederation on the same subject" because "[h]e did (not) understand precisely the meaning of the article"). See also id. (noting that James Wilson and William Samuel Johnson "supposed the meaning" of the Committee of Detail's provision "to be that Judgments in one State should be the ground of actions in other States, [and] that acts of the Legislatures should be included, for the sake of Acts of insolvency"). See also U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1 ("Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State.") (emphasis added).

[7] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 448.

giving such acts, records, and proceedings binding effect as an unalterable constitutional command,[8] others supported letting Congress prescribe the effect that acts, records, and proceedings would have in other states.[9] The Framers ultimately chose the latter option.[10] The Framers also debated the scope of Congress's power to pass such laws. Some Framers proposed to authorize Congress to determine the effect of out-of-state judgments only, fearing that allowing Congress to prescribe the effect of out-of-state statutes would usurp states' authority.[11] Others argued that unless Congress could prescribe the effect of other states' nonjudicial acts, the Full Faith and Credit Clause would have no meaningful effect.[12] Over several dissenting votes, the Framers authorized Congress to prescribe the effect of states' legislative acts as well as states' judgments.[13]

The Framers also considered whether to require Congress to legislate regarding the authentication and effect of states' acts, records, and proceedings, or whether to merely allow Congress to pass such laws.[14] The Framers ultimately selected the latter option, though the Convention records do not explicitly specify why the Framers did so.[15]

Finally, the Framers deliberated whether to require states to give full faith and credit to other states' acts, records, and proceedings versus encouraging states to do so.[16] The Framers

[8] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 448 ("Mr. Randolph said there was no instance of one nation executing judgments of the Courts of another nation. He moved the following proposition. 'Whenever the Act of any State, whether Legislative Executive or Judiciary shall be attested & exemplified under the seal thereof, such attestation and exemplification, shall be deemed in other States as full proof of the existence of that act—and its operation shall be binding in every other State, in all cases to which it may relate, and which are within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the State, wherein the said act was done.'").

[9] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 448 (noting that James Madison "wished the [federal] Legislature might be authorized to provide for the execution of Judgments in other States, under such regulations as might be expedient"); 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 448 (Gouverneur Morris's proposal to require Congress to "determine the proof and effect" of out-of-state "acts, records, and proceedings").

[10] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 601; U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1 ("[T]he Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records, and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.").

[11] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 485 (September 1, 1787 draft providing that "the Legislature shall by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, Records, & proceedings shall be proved, and the effect which Judgments obtained in one State, shall have in another") (emphasis added); 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 488–89 ("Mr. Randolph considered it as strengthening the general objection agst. the plan, that its definition of the powers of the Government was so loose as to give it opportunities of usurping all the State powers. He was for not going farther than the Report, which enables the Legislature to provide for the effect of Judgments.").

[12] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 488 ("Mr. Wilson remarked, that if the Legislature were not allowed to declare the effect the provision would amount to nothing more than what now takes place among all Independent Nations.").

[13] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 488 ("Mr. Govr. Morris moved to amend the Report concerning the respect to be paid to Acts Records &c of one State, in other States (see Sepr. 1.) by striking out 'judgments obtained in one State shall have in another' and to insert the word 'thereof' after the word 'effect[.]'"); 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489 ("On the amendment as moved by Mr[.] Govr. Morris[:] Mas. ay. Ct ay. N. J. ay. Pa. ay. Md. no. Va no. N. C. ay. S. C. ay. Geo. no. [Ayes—6; noes—3.]"). See also 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 488 ("Docr. Johnson thought the amendment as worded would authorize the Genl. Legislature to declare the effect of Legislative acts of one State, in another State.").

[14] Compare 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 485 ("[T]he Legislature shall by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, Records, & proceedings shall be proved . . .") (emphasis added), with 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489 (James Madison's motion to replace "shall" with "may.").

[15] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489 ("On motion of Mr. Madison . . . 'shall' between 'Legislature' & 'by general laws' [was] struck out, and 'may' inserted. . . ."); U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1 ("[T]he Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.") (emphasis added). But see David E. Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 Yale L.J. 1584, 1626–27 (2009) (suggesting that James Madison proposed this change to address Edmund Randolph's concern that the Full Faith and Credit Clause gave Congress too much power).

[16] Compare 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 485 (draft providing that "Full faith and credit ought to be given in each State to the public acts, records, and Judicial proceedings of every other State. . . .") (emphasis added), with 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489 (James Madison's motion to replace "ought to" with "shall").

ultimately selected the former option.[17] The Convention records do not reveal why the Framers made that choice, and scholars have debated whether the Framers intended that choice to have any substantive effect.[18]

The Full Faith and Credit Clause provoked little to no opposition or discussion during the ratification debates.[19] In the Federalist Papers, James Madison described the Clause's grant of congressional authority to legislate regarding out-of-state acts, records, and judicial proceedings' authentication and effect as "an evident and valuable improvement on" the Articles of Confederation's full faith and credit provision.[20] Madison thus maintained that Congress's authority under the Clause would amount to "a very convenient instrument of justice" that would "be particularly beneficial on the borders of contiguous States."[21]

ArtIV.S1.3 Judicial Proceedings

ArtIV.S1.3.1 Early Precedent on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

After the Full Faith and Credit Clause's ratification, jurists debated whether states only needed to accept out-of-state judgments as evidence in judicial proceedings, or if they needed to give out-of-state judgments conclusive effect instead.[1] The Supreme Court reached the latter conclusion in Mills v. Duryee, holding that states ordinarily cannot reexamine an out-of-state judgment's merits.[2] The Court reasoned that if "judgments of the state Courts" were "considered prima facie evidence only," the Full Faith and Credit Clause "would be utterly unimportant and illusory," as "[t]he common law would give such judgments precisely the same effect."[3]

The legal basis for the Mills Court's ruling was not self-evident. As another chapter of this treatise explains, the First Congress passed a statute requiring "every court within the United

---

[17] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489 ("On motion of Mr. Madison, 'ought to' was struck out, and 'shall' inserted. . . ."); U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1 ("Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State.") (emphasis added).

[18] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 6, at 489.

[19] See, e.g., James D. Sumner, Jr., The Full-Faith-and-Credit Clause—Its History and Purpose, 34 Or. L. Rev. 224, 235 (1955) ("Little attention was given the full-faith-and-credit provision before and during ratification . . . It is interesting to note that not a single debate arose on this provision of the Constitution in the ratifying conventions of the various states."); Max Radin, The Authenticated Full Faith and Credit Clause: Its History, 39 Ill. L. Rev. 1, 9 (1944) ("There is almost no reference to [the Full Faith and Credit Clause] in the debates in the various states on adopting the Constitution.").

[20] The Federalist No. 42 (James Madison).

[21] Id.

[1] See Stephen E. Sachs, Full Faith and Credit in the Early Congress, 95 Va. L. Rev. 1201, 1232 (2009).

[2] 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 481, 484 (1813) ("Congress ha[s] therefore declared the effect of the record by declaring what faith and credit shall be given to it."); id. ("[I]t is beyond all doubt that the judgment of the Supreme Court of New York was conclusive upon the parties in that state. It must, therefore, be conclusive here also."). See also Christmas v. Russell, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 290, 302–03 & n.14 (1866) (interpreting Mills as holding that a judicial record, "when duly authenticated, shall have in every other court of the United States the same faith and credit as it has in the State court from whence it was taken," and that "it is not competent for any other State to authorize its courts to open the merits and review the cause").

[3] 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) at 485. See also Hampton v. M'Connel, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 234, 235 (1818) (explaining that Mills held "that the judgment of a state court should have the same credit, validity and effect, in every other court of the United States, which it had in the state where it was pronounced").

States" to give "faith and credit" to properly authenticated judicial records and proceedings.[4] It is unclear whether the Mills Court meant that the Constitution itself requires state courts to give conclusive effect to out-of-state judgments, or that the full faith and credit statute mandated that result instead.[5] The answer to that question has significant practical consequences: If the Constitution itself requires states to give out-of-state judgments conclusive effect, then Congress may lack the power to modify that rule legislatively.[6] Although Mills contains language supporting either interpretation,[7] the Court apparently construed Mills as an interpretation of the full faith and credit statute from 1813 to 1887.[8]

The early Court nonetheless recognized limited circumstances in which states could disregard out-of-state judgments. In M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, the Court held that a state need not enforce another state's judgment if the first state's statute of limitations has expired.[9] In D'Arcy v. Ketchum, the Court ruled that if a state court renders a judgment against a defendant whom the plaintiff did not properly serve with process, other states need not give that judgment full faith and credit.[10] And in Thompson v. Whitman, the Court held that a state need not honor an out-of-state judgment from a court that lacked jurisdiction to issue it.[11]

---

[4] See Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122. See also ArtIV.S1.5.1 Generally Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[5] See Jeffrey M. Schmitt, A Historical Reassessment of Full Faith and Credit, 20 Geo. Mason L. Rev. 485, 521 (2013) ("While Mills holds that conclusive effect must be given to state judgments, it is unclear whether this holding was derived from the 1790 Act, the Constitution, or both.") (footnotes omitted).

[6] See David E. Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 Yale L.J. 1584, 1590 (2009) (arguing that the Supreme Court's later decision to cast Mills's holding "as constitutional rather than statutory in origin entirely changed the perceived allocation of power between the legislative and judicial branches"). See also ArtIV.S1.3.2 Modern Doctrine on Full Faith and Credit Clause and ArtIV.S1.5.2 Specifically Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause.

[7] Compare 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) at 484 ("The act declares that the record duly authenticated shall have such faith and credit as it has in the state Court from whence it is taken . . . Congress ha[s] therefore declared the effect of the record by declaring what faith and credit shall be given to it.") (first and second emphases added), and id. at 485 ("[T]he [C]onstitution contemplated a power in [C]ongress to give a conclusive effect to such judgments. And we can perceive no rational interpretation of the [A]ct of [C]ongress, unless it declares a judgment conclusive when a Court of the particular state where it is rendered would pronounce the same decision.") (emphases added), with id. ("Were the construction contended for by the Plaintiff in error to prevail, . . . this clause in the constitution would be utterly unimportant and illusory.") (emphasis added), and Schmitt, supra note 5, at 512 n.155 ("[I]f Justice Story were referring only to the 1790 Act [in Mills], he would have said that such a construction would render the Act, rather than the Constitution, illusory.").

[8] See, e.g., D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 52 U.S. (11 How.) 165, 175–76 (1850) (suggesting that Mills involved the "construction of the act of 1790") (emphasis added); Christmas, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) at 302 (stating that Mills involved "the construction of th[e] act of Congress") (emphasis added); Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 457, 462 (1873) ("The court in [Mills] held that the act gave to the judgments of each State the same conclusive effect, as records, in all the States, as they had at home . . .") (emphasis added). But see ArtIV.S1.3.2 Modern Doctrine on Full Faith and Credit Clause (explaining how the Court's interpretation of Mills shifted in 1887).

[9] See 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 312, 328 (1839) ("[T]he statute of limitations of Georgia can be pleaded to an action in that state, founded upon a judgment rendered in the state of South Carolina.").

[10] 52 U.S. at 165–68, 172–76. See also Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 404, 406 (1855) ("[W]henever an action is brought in one State on a judgment recovered in another, it is not enough to show it to be valid in the State where it was rendered; it must also appear that the defendant was either personally within the jurisdiction of the State, or had legal notice of the suit . . .").

[11] 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) at 469 (holding that "the jurisdiction of the court by which a judgment is rendered in any State may be questioned in a collateral proceeding in another State, notwithstanding the" Full Faith and Credit Clause).

ArtIV.S1.3.2 Modern Doctrine on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

The Supreme Court reinterpreted the Full Faith and Credit Clause in Chicago & Alton Railroad v. Wiggins Ferry Co., in which the Court indicated that the Clause itself, not just the statute Congress passed to implement the Clause, compelled its holding in Mills requiring states to give out-of-state judgments conclusive effect.[1] Cases following Chicago & Alton Railroad similarly characterized the Clause itself as imposing this requirement, often without mentioning the full faith and credit statute.[2] The Court did not explain why it reconceptualized Mills's holding as a constitutional command rather than a legislative mandate.[3]

Thus, under the Court's current interpretation of the Clause, courts ordinarily must give an out-of-state judgment the same effect it would have in the state that issued it.[4] A court may not disregard an out-of-state judgment merely "because it disagrees with the reasoning underlying the judgment or deems it to be wrong on the merits"; the Clause "precludes any inquiry into the merits of the cause of action, the logic or consistency of the decision, or the validity of the legal principles on which the judgment is based."[5] Nor may state courts decline to enforce other states' judgments for public policy reasons.[6]

Still, the modern Court recognizes limited circumstances in which a state may refuse to enforce an out-of-state judgment.[7] For example, a state need not honor a judgment if the

---

[1] See 119 U.S. 615, 622 (1887) ("Without doubt the constitutional requirement (article 4, § 1) that 'full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state,' implies that the public acts of every state shall be given the same effect by the courts of another state that they have by law and usage at home. This is clearly the logical result of the principles announced as early as 1813, in Mills v. Duryee, . . . and steadily adhered to ever since.") (emphasis added).

[2] See, e.g., Harris v. Balk, 198 U.S. 215, 221 (1905) ("The state court of North Carolina has refused to give any effect in this action to the Maryland judgment; and the Federal question is whether it did not thereby refuse the full faith and credit to such judgment which is required by the Federal Constitution. If the Maryland court had jurisdiction to award it, the judgment is valid and entitled to the same full faith and credit in North Carolina that it has in Maryland as a valid domestic judgment.") (emphasis added); Clarke v. Clarke, 178 U.S. 186, 195 (1900) (discussing "the constitutional requirement that full faith and credit must be given in one state to the judgments and decrees of the courts of another state") (emphasis added). See also Ann Woolhandler & Michael G. Collins, Jurisdictional Discrimination and Full Faith and Credit, 63 Emory L.J. 1023, 1034 (2014) ("It was only in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century that the Court began to indicate that the Constitution on its own might require the enforcement of sister-state judgments.").

[3] See Woolhandler & Collins, supra note 2, at 1034 ("The Court provided no explanation for its move . . ."). See also Chi. & A. R., 119 U.S. at 622; Clarke, 178 U.S. at 195; Harris, 198 U.S. at 221.

[4] See, e.g., Thompson v. Thompson, 484 U.S. 174, 180 (1988) (holding that the Clause requires states "to accord the same force to judgments as would be accorded by the courts of the State in which the judgment was entered"); V.L. v. E.L., 577 U.S. 404, 407 (2016) (per curiam) ("With respect to judgments, 'the full faith and credit obligation is exacting.' . . . 'A final judgment in one State, if rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment, qualifies for recognition throughout the land.'") (quoting Baker v. Gen. Motors Corp., 522 U.S. 222, 233 (1998)); Underwriters Nat'l Assurance Co. v. N.C. Life & Accident & Health Ins. Guar. Ass'n, 455 U.S. 691, 704 (1982) ("[T]he judgment of a state court should have the same credit, validity, and effect, in every other court of the United States, which it had in the state where it was pronounced.") (citation omitted).

[5] V.L., 577 U.S. at 407 (quoting Milliken v. Meyer, 311 U.S. 457, 462 (1940)).

[6] See, e.g., Baker, 522 U.S. at 233 ("[O]ur decisions support no roving 'public policy exception' to the full faith and credit due judgments.") (emphasis omitted); Estin v. Estin, 334 U.S. 541, 546 (1948) (explaining that the Full Faith and Credit Clause "order[s] submission by one State even to hostile policies reflected in the judgment of another State").

[7] See, e.g., Nelson v. George, 399 U.S. 224, 229 (1970) ("[T]he Full Faith and Credit Clause does not require that sister States enforce a foreign penal judgment . . ."); Milwaukee Cnty. v. M.E. White Co., 296 U.S. 268, 276 (1935) (suggesting that courts need not honor a judgment "procured by fraud").

rendering court lacked jurisdiction to enter it.[8] A court's power to scrutinize another court's jurisdiction is limited, however.[9] The court must ordinarily presume that the issuing court had jurisdiction unless the judicial record or other evidence reveals a jurisdictional defect.[10] If the parties in the first action litigated whether the rendering court had jurisdiction, and the first court answered that question affirmatively, the second court must accept that conclusion.[11]

Because the Full Faith and Credit Clause ordinarily requires states to give out-of-state judgments the same effect as the states that issued them,[12] whether a judgment has conclusive effect depends on whether the issuing court would regard the judgment as "final." While some states hold that a judgment is final for full faith and credit purposes even when it is pending on appeal, other states hold that a judgment is not final until the appellate process has concluded.[13]

ArtIV.S1.4 State Public Acts and Records

ArtIV.S1.4.1 Early Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

While the Supreme Court considered the Full Faith and Credit Clause's applicability to public acts several times during the early twentieth century,[1] its opinion in Bradford Electric Light Co. v. Clapper proved especially significant.[2] In Clapper, a Vermont resident who worked

---

[8] See, e.g., V.L., 577 U.S. at 407 ("A State is not required, however, to afford full faith and credit to a judgment rendered by a court that 'did not have jurisdiction over the subject matter or the relevant parties.'") (quoting Underwriters Nat'l Assurance, 455 U.S. at 705); Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 805 (1985) ("[A] judgment issued without proper personal jurisdiction over an absent party is not entitled to full faith and credit elsewhere . . .").

[9] See, e.g., V.L., 577 U.S. at 407 ("That jurisdictional inquiry, however, is a limited one.").

[10] Id. ("[I]f the judgment on its face appears to be a 'record of a court of general jurisdiction, such jurisdiction over the cause and the parties is to be presumed unless disproved by extrinsic evidence, or by the record itself.'") (quoting Milliken, 311 U.S. at 462).

[11] See Underwriters Nat'l Assurance, 455 U.S. at 706 ("[A] judgment is entitled to full faith and credit—even as to questions of jurisdiction—when the second court's inquiry discloses that those questions have been fully and fairly litigated and finally decided in the court which rendered the original judgment.") (quoting Durfee v. Duke, 375 U.S. 106, 111 (1963)).

[12] See supra note 4 and accompanying text.

[13] Compare, e.g., Brinker v. Superior Ct., 1 Cal. Rptr. 2d 358, 360 (Cal. Ct. App. 1991) ("Under New Jersey law, a judgment is 'final' for res judicata purposes, even though it is pending on appeal. Accordingly, the New Jersey judgment . . . was entitled to full faith and credit.") (internal citations omitted), with, e.g., Andre v. Morrow, 680 P.2d 1355, 1362 (Idaho 1984) ("The second main element for recognition under principles of full faith and credit is a final judgment. Under the law of California, 'a judgment does not become final so long as the action in which it is rendered is pending . . . and an action is deemed pending until it is finally determined on appeal or until the time for an appeal has passed.'") (ellipses in original) (quoting Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Nakano, 87 P.2d 700, 702 (Cal. 1939)).

[1] See, e.g., Supreme Council of the Royal Arcanum v. Green, 237 U.S. 531, 544 (1915) (concluding that a New York court violated the Full Faith and Credit Clause by failing to give Massachusetts law "controlling effect"); N.Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161 (1914) (asserting that a "foundation[al]" principle of the Full Faith and Credit Clause is that one state may not enact statutes that "operate beyond the jurisdiction of that State" to "destroy freedom of contract" in another state); Converse v. Hamilton, 224 U.S. 243, 261 (1912) (holding that "the laws of Minnesota . . . were not accorded that faith and credit to which they were entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States"); Olmsted v. Olmsted, 216 U.S. 386, 395 (1910) (concluding that the Full Faith and Credit Clause did not "requir[e] the courts of the state of New York to give force and effect to the statute of the state of Michigan, so as to control the devolution of title to lands in New York").

[2] See 286 U.S. 145 (1932), overruled in part by Crider v. Zurich Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 39 (1965).

for a Vermont company died while working in New Hampshire.[3] His widow sued his employer in a New Hampshire court under New Hampshire's employers' liability statute.[4] The employer argued that the Full Faith and Credit Clause required the New Hampshire court to apply Vermont's worker's compensation law.[5] The Supreme Court explained that the Clause leaves "room for some play of conflicting policies," and "does not require the enforcement of every right conferred by a statute of another state."[6] The Court thus indicated that courts should balance each state's interests when determining which of two competing state statutes to apply.[7] Because Vermont had stronger interests in the dispute than New Hampshire, the Court ruled that Vermont law applied.[8]

The Supreme Court refined Clapper's balancing approach in Alaska Packers Ass'n v. Industrial Accident Commission of California.[9] In that case, a California company executed an employment contract in California with a nonresident alien from Mexico.[10] The contract provided that the company would transport the worker to Alaska to perform seasonal work, and then return him to California to be paid.[11] The parties agreed in their contract to be bound by Alaska's worker's compensation law in the event the worker was injured.[12] After the worker was injured in Alaska, California's Industrial Accident Commission awarded him compensation under California's worker's compensation statute.[13] The employer argued that, by applying California law, the Commission had denied Alaska law full faith and credit.[14] Noting that requiring courts to apply other states' statutes whenever they conflict with the home state's laws would produce the "absurd result" that no state could apply its own laws in its own courts, the Alaska Packers Court rejected the employer's argument.[15] Although the Court reaffirmed Clapper's holding that courts should balance states' competing interests when deciding which of two states' laws to apply, it added a new presumption in favor of states

[3] Id. at 151.

[4] Id. at 150.

[5] See id. at 151, 159.

[6] See id. at 160.

[7] See id. at 159–62. See also Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 538 U.S. 488, 495 (2003) (explaining that Clapper held that courts should "appraise[ ] and balance[ ] state interests when invoking the Full Faith and Credit Clause to resolve conflicts between overlapping laws of coordinate States").

[8] See 286 U.S. at 161–63 ("[T]he mere fact that the Vermont legislation does not conform to that of New Hampshire does not establish that it would be obnoxious to the latter's public policy to give effect to the Vermont statute in cases involving only the rights of residents of that state incident to the relation of employer and employee created there. . . . The interest of New Hampshire was only casual. Leon Clapper was not a resident there. He was not continuously employed there. So far as it appears, he had no dependent there. It is difficult to see how the state's interest would be subserved, under such circumstances, by burdening its courts with this litigation. . . . [T]he rights as between the company and Leon Clapper or his representative are to be determined according to the Vermont act.").

[9] 294 U.S. 532 (1935).

[10] Id. at 538, 542.

[11] Id. at 538.

[12] Id.

[13] See id. at 537–39.

[14] Id. at 539. Alaska was a territory rather than a state at this time, but the court assumed—and the parties conceded—that the federal full faith and credit statute made full faith and credit principles equally applicable to territorial laws. See id. at 546. See also ArtIV.S1.5.1 Generally Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause (discussing this statute).

[15] See 294 U.S. at 547 ("A rigid and literal enforcement of the full faith and credit clause, without regard to the statute of the forum, would lead to the absurd result that, wherever the conflict arises, the statute of each state must be enforced in the courts of the other, but cannot be in its own. Unless by force of that clause a greater effect is thus to be given to a state statute abroad than the clause permits it to have at home, it is unavoidable that this Court determine for itself the extent to which the statute of one state may qualify or deny rights asserted under the statute of another.").

applying their own laws.[16] Reasoning that California had a strong interest in providing a remedy for injured workers within its borders,[17] the Court let California apply its own laws to the dispute.[18]

That same year, the Court considered whether the Clause required states to entertain causes of action based on other states' laws. In Broderick v. Rosner, New York's Superintendent of Banks sued various stockholders in New Jersey under New York's shareholder liability statute.[19] The New Jersey courts ruled that the Superintendent could not maintain a lawsuit in New Jersey based on another state's shareholder liability laws.[20] The Supreme Court held that the Full Faith and Credit Clause required the New Jersey courts to entertain the suit.[21] The Court reasoned that permitting states to deny jurisdiction to hear cases based on other states' laws would allow states to "escape [their] constitutional obligations" to give other states' public acts full faith and credit.[22]

The Court again considered the Clause's application to out-of-state statutes in John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Yates.[23] In Yates, a man bought a life insurance contract in New York, where he resided with his wife.[24] After he died, his widow moved to Georgia and sued to enforce the insurance policy in a Georgia court.[25] The Georgia courts refused to apply a New York law that gave the insurance company a meritorious defense to the widow's claim.[26] The Supreme Court ruled that the Georgia courts needed to give the New York law full faith and credit.[27] Notably, the Court did not mention or apply Alaska Packers' holding that courts must balance states' competing interests when deciding whether to apply another state's

---

[16] See id. at 547–48 ("[T]he conflict is to be resolved, not by giving automatic effect to the full faith and credit clause, compelling the courts of each state to subordinate its own statutes to those of the other, but by appraising the governmental interests of each jurisdiction, and turning the scale of decision according to their weight. . . . Prima facie every state is entitled to enforce in its own courts its own statutes, lawfully enacted. One who challenges that right, because of the force given to a conflicting statute of another state by the full faith and credit clause, assumes the burden of showing, upon some rational basis, that of the conflicting interests involved those of the foreign state are superior to those of the forum."). See also J. Stephen Clark, Conflicts Originalism: The "Original Content" of the Full Faith and Credit Clause and the Compulsory Choice of Marriage Law, 118 W. Va. L. Rev. 547, 553 (2015) (opining that Alaska Packers "weakened [Clapper's] balancing approach by adding a strong presumption that a forum state's choice to disregard sibling law and apply its own law is constitutional"); Crider v. Zurich Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 39, 40 (1965) (describing Alaska Packers as "mark[ing] a break with the Clapper philosophy").

[17] See 294 U.S. at 542–43 ("The probability is slight that injured workmen, once returned to California, would be able to retrace their steps to Alaska, and there successfully prosecute their claims for compensation. Without a remedy in California, they would be remediless, and there was a danger that they might become public charges, both matters of grave public concern to the state. California, therefore, had a legitimate public interest in . . . providing a remedy available to [the injured worker] in California.").

[18] See id. at 549–50 ("[California's] interest is sufficient to justify its legislation and is greater than that of Alaska, of which the employee was never a resident and to which he may never return. Nor should the fact that the employment was wholly to be performed in Alaska, although temporary in character, lead to any different result.").

[19] 294 U.S. 629, 637–38 (1935).

[20] See id. at 638–39.

[21] Id. at 647.

[22] See id. at 642–43 ("The power of a state to determine the limits of the jurisdiction of its courts and the character of controversies which shall be heard therein is subject to the limitations imposed by the Federal Constitution. . . . A 'State cannot escape its constitutional obligations (under the full faith and credit clause) by the simple device of denying jurisdiction in such cases to Courts otherwise competent.'") (quoting Kenney v. Supreme Lodge of the World, 252 U.S. 411, 415 (1920)); id. at 643 (holding that a state "may not . . . deny the enforcement of claims otherwise within the protection of the full faith and credit clause, when its courts have general jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties").

[23] 299 U.S. 178 (1936).

[24] Id. at 179.

[25] Id.

[26] See id. at 179–82.

[27] Id. at 183.

statute.[28] Instead, the Court reasoned that the case presented "no occurrence, nothing done, to which the law of Georgia could apply" because "[t]he contract of insurance was made, and the death of the insured occurred in," New York.[29]

ArtIV.S1.4.2 Modern Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

The Court reinterpreted the Full Faith and Credit Clause in Pacific Employers Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission.[1] In that case, a Massachusetts resident was injured while working for a Massachusetts company in California.[2] The California Industrial Accident Commission awarded the employee compensation under California's worker's compensation law.[3] The employer's insurer challenged the award, claiming that California violated the Clause by applying its own law instead of Massachusetts'.[4] The Pacific Employers Court opined that "the very nature of the federal union of states, to which are reserved some of the attributes of sovereignty, precludes resort to the full faith and credit clause as the means for compelling a state to substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes dealing with a subject matter concerning which it is competent to legislate."[5] Quoting Alaska Packers, the Court explained that rigidly requiring states to apply other states' statutes in the event of a conflict would create "the absurd result" that a state's laws would apply in other states' courts, but not its own courts.[6] However, unlike in Clapper and Alaska Packers, the Court did not balance the states' competing interests to determine which law applied.[7] Instead, the Court declared that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not "enable one state to legislate for the other or to project its laws across state lines so as to preclude the other from prescribing for itself the legal consequences of acts within it."[8] The Court thus upheld the California award.[9]

---

[28] See id. at 179–83.

[29] See id. at 182. See also Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hague, 449 U.S. 302, 310–11 (1981) (plurality opinion) (interpreting Yates to "stand for the proposition that if a State has only an insignificant contact with the parties and the occurrence or transaction, application of its law is unconstitutional," and that "a postoccurrence change of residence to the forum State—standing alone—was insufficient to justify application of forum law").

[1] 306 U.S. 493 (1939).

[2] Id. at 497–98.

[3] Id.

[4] Id. at 497.

[5] Id. at 501.

[6] Id. ("A rigid and literal enforcement of the full faith and credit clause, without regard to the statute of the forum, would lead to the absurd result that, wherever the conflict arises, the statute of each state must be enforced in the courts of the other, but cannot be in its own.") (quoting Alaska Packers Ass'n v. Indus. Accident Comm'n, 294 U.S. 532, 547 (1935)). See also id. at 501–02 ("[I]n cases like the present[, a rigid interpretation of the Full Faith and Credit Clause] would create an impasse which would often leave the employee remediless. Full faith and credit would deny to California the right to apply its own remedy, and its administrative machinery may well not be adapted to giving the remedy afforded by Massachusetts. Similarly, the full faith and credit demanded for the California Act would deny to Massachusetts the right to apply its own remedy, and its Department of Industrial Accidents may well be without statutory authority to afford the remedy provided by the California statute.").

[7] See id. at 497–505. See also Crider v. Zurich Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 39 (1965) (describing Pacific Employers as "mark[ing] a break with the Clapper philosophy"); Carroll v. Lanza, 349 U.S. 408, 412 (1955) (stating that Pacific Employers "departed . . . from the Clapper decision"); J. Stephen Clark, Conflicts Originalism: The "Original Content" of the Full Faith and Credit Clause and the Compulsory Choice of Marriage Law, 118 W. VA. L. REV. 547, 553 (2015) (observing that "in Pacific Employers . . . the Court abandoned the balancing method altogether").

[8] 306 U.S. at 504–05.

Since Pacific Employers, the Court has repeatedly reaffirmed that courts should no longer balance states' interests when evaluating whether to apply another state's laws.[10] The Court has stated that it abandoned the interest-balancing approach because there are no clear standards for assessing which state's interest is weightier in a particular case.[11] Thus, subject to the exceptions discussed below, "a State need not 'substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes dealing with a subject matter concerning which it is competent to legislate.'"[12] For instance, the Court ruled in Sun Oil Co. v. Wortman that a state may apply its own statute of limitations to claims governed by another state's laws, because states are "competent to legislate" procedural rules to govern suits in their own courts.[13]

Nonetheless, the Court has recognized limits on a state's discretion to apply its own law. For example, in Franchise Tax Board v. Hyatt (Franchise Tax Board II), a Nevada court awarded damages against a California agency that exceeded the damages Nevada would award in a similar suit against its own agencies.[14] The Court explained that the Full Faith and Credit Clause forbids states from applying "a special rule of law that evinces a 'policy of hostility'" towards other states.[15] Because the Nevada court did not "appl[y] the principles of Nevada law ordinarily applicable to suits against Nevada's own agencies," but instead "applied a special rule of law applicable only in lawsuits against its sister States, such as California," the Supreme Court held that the Nevada court's decision "reflect[ed] a constitutionally impermissible 'policy of hostility'" toward other states and thus violated the Clause.[16] While the Court suggested that policy considerations might "justify the application of a special rule of Nevada law that discriminate[d] against its sister States" in a different case, Nevada had not offered "sufficient policy considerations" in Franchise Tax Board II.[17]

Nor may states close their courts to claims based on other states' laws. For instance, in Hughes v. Fetter, a Wisconsin resident died in an automobile collision with another Wisconsin resident that occurred in Illinois.[18] The decedent's administrator—who was also a Wisconsin resident—sued the other driver and his insurer in a Wisconsin state court, asserting claims

---

[9] See id. at 497, 505.

[10] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 538 U.S. 488, 496 (2003) [hereinafter Franchise Tax Bd. I] (explaining that the Court has "abandoned the balancing-of-interests approach to conflicts of law under the Full Faith and Credit Clause"); Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, No. 14-1175, slip op. at 7–8 (U.S. Apr. 19, 2016) [hereinafter Franchise Tax Bd. II] (similar).

[11] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. I, 538 U.S. at 498 ("[T]he question of which sovereign interest should be deemed more weighty is not one that can be easily answered."); id. at 496 ("As Justice Robert H. Jackson . . . aptly observed, 'it [is] difficult to point to any field in which the Court has more completely demonstrated or more candidly confessed the lack of guiding standards of a legal character than in trying to determine what choice of law is required by the Constitution.'") (quoting Justice Robert H. Jackson, Full Faith and Credit—The Lawyer's Clause of the Constitution, 45 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 16 (1945)); Franchise Tax Bd. II, slip op. at 8 (conceding that the interest-balancing approach "led to results that seemed to differ depending, for example, upon whether the case involved commercial law, a shareholders' action, insurance claims, or workman's compensation statutes").

[12] Franchise Tax Bd. I, 538 U.S. at 496 (quoting Pac. Emp'rs Ins., 306 U.S. at 501). See also, e.g., Pink v. A.A.A. Highway Express, Inc., 314 U.S. 201, 210 (1941) (holding that the Full Faith and Credit Clause "is not an inexorable and unqualified command," but rather "leaves some scope for state control within its borders of affairs which are peculiarly its own"); Nevada v. Hall, 440 U.S. 410, 422 (1979) ("[T]he Full Faith and Credit Clause does not require a State to apply another State's law in violation of its own legitimate public policy."), overruled on other grounds by Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, No. 17-1299, slip op. at 1–18 (U.S. May 13, 2019).

[13] See 486 U.S. 717, 722 (1988).

[14] Franchise Tax Bd. II, slip op. at 3–4.

[15] Id. at 4 (quoting Franchise Tax Bd. I, 538 U.S. at 499).

[16] Id. at 6–7.

[17] See id. at 7 (quoting Carroll, 349 U.S. at 413).

[18] 341 U.S. 609, 610, 613 (1951).

based on Illinois' wrongful death statute.[19] The Wisconsin court ruled that Wisconsin's wrongful death statute—which only provided a cause of action for deaths occurring in Wisconsin—established a public policy barring Wisconsin courts from hearing lawsuits based on other states' wrongful death laws.[20] Building on its earlier decision in Broderick v. Rosner,[21] the Supreme Court reversed, holding that Wisconsin violated the Full Faith and Credit Clause by refusing to hear the administrator's claim.[22] The Court emphasized that Wisconsin had not merely opted to apply its own wrongful death statute to the plaintiff's claims, which likely would be permissible.[23] Rather, Wisconsin had wholly "close[d] the doors of its courts to the cause of action created by the Illinois wrongful death act."[24] By doing so, Wisconsin contravened "the strong unifying principle embodied in the Full Faith and Credit Clause looking toward maximum enforcement in each state of the obligations or rights created or recognized by the statutes of sister states."[25]

ArtIV.S1.5 Congressional Enforcement

ArtIV.S1.5.1 Generally Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Congress first invoked the Clause in 1790 to pass legislation establishing methods for authenticating other states' acts, records, and proceedings.[1] The 1790 Act provided that if a litigant duly authenticated a judicial record or proceeding, then "every court within the United States" would have to grant that record or proceeding the same "faith and credit" as it would "have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records" were taken.[2] By applying this command to "every court within the United States," Congress required federal courts to give state judgments full faith and credit, even though the Full Faith and Credit

[19] See id.

[20] See id. at 610 & n.2.

[21] 294 U.S. 629 (1935). See also supra ArtIV.S1.4.1 Early Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause (discussing Broderick).

[22] See 341 U.S. at 613–14.

[23] See id. at 612 n.10 ("The present case is not one where Wisconsin, having entertained appellant's lawsuit, chose to apply its own instead of Illinois' statute to measure the substantive rights involved. This distinguishes the present case from those where we have said that 'Prima facie every state is entitled to enforce in its own courts its own statutes, lawfully enacted.'") (quoting Alaska Packers Ass'n v. Indus. Accident Comm'n, 294 U.S. 532, 547 (1935)).

[24] Id. at 611.

[25] Id. at 612. See also Carroll, 349 U.S. at 413 (explaining that Hughes "held that Wisconsin could not refuse to entertain a wrongful death action under an Illinois statute for an injury occurring in Illinois, since [the Court] found no sufficient policy considerations to warrant such refusal"); Wells v. Simonds Abrasive Co., 345 U.S. 514, 518 (1953) (stating that "[t]he crucial factor" in Hughes "was that the forum laid an uneven hand on causes of action arising within and without the forum state"); Howlett ex rel. Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 381 (1990) (citing Hughes for the proposition "that a court of otherwise competent jurisdiction may not avoid its parallel obligation under the Full Faith and Credit Clause to entertain another State's cause of action by invocation of the term 'jurisdiction'").

[1] See Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122 ("[T]he acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto . . ."); id. ("[T]he records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state, shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form."). See also San Remo Hotel, L.P. v. City & Cnty. of S.F., 545 U.S. 323, 336 (2005) ("In 1790, Congress responded to the Constitution's invitation by enacting the first version of the full faith and credit statute.").

[2] Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122.

Clause only applies to states.[3] The 1790 Act, however, only purported to grant "faith and credit" to "records and judicial proceedings;" it did not list legislative acts among the legal documents entitled to full faith and credit.[4]

Congress amended the 1790 Act in 1804.[5] The 1804 Act added provisions governing the authentication and effect of "records and exemplifications of office books, which are or may be kept in any public office of any state, not appertaining to a court."[6] Additionally, whereas the 1790 Act only applied to state acts, records, and proceedings, the 1804 Act expanded the statute to also apply to U.S. territories' acts, records, and proceedings.[7] However, like the 1790 Act, the 1804 Act did not explicitly require states to give faith and credit to other states' legislative acts.[8]

The full faith and credit statute remained essentially unchanged until 1948, when Congress enacted the current Full Faith and Credit Act.[9] Like its predecessors, the Full Faith and Credit Act prescribes methods by which one may authenticate an act, record, or proceeding of a state, territory, or possession.[10] But unlike its predecessors, the Full Faith and Credit Act requires state and territorial courts to give "full faith and credit" not only to other jurisdictions' judicial records and proceedings, but also to legislative acts.[11] The Act's legislative history suggests that Congress did not intend that change to alter the Supreme Court's prevailing rule

[3] Compare id. (emphasis added), with U.S. Const. art. IV, § 1 (providing that "Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State") (emphasis added). See also Univ. of Tenn. v. Elliott, 478 U.S. 788, 799 (1986) ("The Full Faith and Credit Clause is of course not binding on federal courts . . ."); Kremer v. Chem. Constr. Corp., 456 U.S. 461, 462–63 (1982) (explaining that the 1790 Act "directed that all United States courts afford the same full faith and credit to state court judgments that would apply in the State's own courts").

[4] See Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122 (emphasis added).

[5] See Act of Mar. 27, 1804, ch. 56, 2 Stat. 298.

[6] See id.

[7] Compare Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122 ("[T]he acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated . . .") (emphasis added), and id. ("[T]he records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state, shall be proved or admitted . . .") (emphasis added), with Act of Mar. 27, 1804, ch. 56, § 2, 2 Stat. 299 ("[A]ll the provisions of this act, and the act to which this is a supplement, shall apply as well to the public acts, records, office books, judicial proceedings, courts and offices of the respective territories of the United States, and countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, as to the public acts, records, office books, judicial proceedings, courts and offices of the several states.") (emphasis added). See also Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fe Ry. v. Sowers, 213 U.S. 55, 64 (1909) (explaining that while the 1790 Act "did not include the territories," the 1804 Act "extend[ed] the provisions of the former statute to the public acts, records, judicial proceedings, etc., of the territories").

[8] See Act of Mar. 27, 1804, ch. 56, 2 Stat. 298. See also David E. Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 Yale L.J. 1584, 1633 (2009) (stating that the 1804 Act contained "no mention of any effect that 'public acts' must be given").

[9] Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 646, § 1738, 62 Stat. 947 (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1738). See also Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Epstein, 516 U.S. 367, 373 (1996) (referring to the 1948 Act as the "Full Faith and Credit Act"). But see Kurt H. Nadelmann, Full Faith and Credit to Judgments and Public Acts, 56 Mich. L. Rev. 33, 81 (1957) (noting that Congress made minor, non-substantive changes to the statute in 1875 and 1926).

[10] See 28 U.S.C. § 1738 ("The Acts of the legislature of any State, Territory, or Possession of the United States, or copies thereof, shall be authenticated by affixing the seal of such State, Territory, or Possession thereto."); id. ("The records and judicial proceedings of any court of any such State, Territory or Possession, or copies thereof, shall be proved or admitted in other courts within the United States and its Territories and Possessions by the attestation of the clerk and seal of the court annexed, if a seal exists, together with a certificate of a judge of the court that the said attestation is in proper form.").

[11] See id. ("Such Acts, records and judicial proceedings . . . shall have the same full faith and credit in every court within the United States . . .") (emphasis added). See also Ralph U. Whitten, Full Faith and Credit for Dummies, 38 Creighton L. Rev. 465, 471 (2005) ("In the 1948 revision of the Judicial Code, the wording of the first implementing statute was amended to include state statutes . . .").

that states generally may apply their own laws in their own courts.[12] Read literally, however, the Act's text suggests that courts must give other states' laws conclusive effect, which would modify that rule substantially.[13] The Supreme Court has not adopted that literal interpretation of the Act, however.[14]

Congress has not amended the Full Faith and Credit Act since 1948.[15] Thus, under current law, "all courts" in the United States—including federal courts—must "treat a state court judgment with the same respect that it would receive in the courts of the rendering state."[16] Thus, the Act ordinarily precludes parties from relitigating issues that other courts have adjudicated.[17]

ArtIV.S1.5.2 Specifically Applicable Federal Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1:

> Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Congress has also passed full faith and credit statutes governing specific categories of acts, records, and proceedings.[1] For example, the Parental Kidnaping Prevention Act (PKPA)

---

[12] See H.R. Rep. No. 80-308, at A150 (1947) (stating that the revisers changed the statutory language merely to "follow[ ] the language of Article IV, Section 1 of the Constitution"). See also ArtIV.S1.4.2 Modern Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause (analyzing how the modern Court treats out-of-state public acts).

[13] See Willis L.M. Reese, Full Faith and Credit to Statutes: The Defense of Public Policy, 19 U. CHI. L. REV. 339, 343 (1952) ("As part of the 1948 revision to the Judicial Code, the implementing statute was amended so as to provide that both statutes and judgments alike should be accorded the 'same full faith and credit' throughout the country 'as they have . . . in the courts of such State . . . from which they are taken.' What, if anything, was intended to be accomplished by this amendment is by no means clear, since, so far as it appears, it was enacted by Congress without discussion and the Revisers' Notes state simply that it 'follows the language' of the full faith and credit clause itself. Taken literally, however, the amendment would seem to constitute a clear mandate that the Supreme Court should henceforth interject itself more forcibly into the field of choice of law."); Ralph U. Whitten, The Constitutional Limitations on State Choice of Law: Full Faith and Credit, 12 MEM. ST. U. L. REV. 1, 60–61 (1981) (surmising that the drafters of the 1948 amendment may not have appreciated or intended the consequences of affording full faith and credit to other states' legislative acts).

[14] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 538 U.S. 488, 494 (2003) (reaffirming "that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not compel 'a state to substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes dealing with a subject matter concerning which it is competent to legislate'") (quoting Sun Oil Co. v. Wortman, 486 U.S. 717, 722 (1988)). See generally ArtIV.S1.4.2 Modern Doctrine on State Law on Full Faith and Credit Clause. See also David E. Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 YALE L.J. 1584, 1620 (2009)(opining that the Supreme Court "has declined to take the 1948 Code's nominal prescription to replicate the effect of sister-state legislative acts seriously").

[15] Compare Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 646, § 1738, 62 Stat. 947, with 28 U.S.C. § 1738.

[16] Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Epstein, 516 U.S. 367, 373 (1996). See also Kremer v. Chem. Constr. Corp., 456 U.S. 461, 466 (1982) ("Section 1738 requires federal courts to give the same preclusive effect to state court judgments that those judgments would be given in the courts of the State from which the judgments emerged."); Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90, 96 (1980) (same).

[17] See San Remo Hotel, L.P. v. City & Cnty. of S.F., 545 U.S. 323, 336 (2005) (explaining that the Full Faith and Credit Act implements "[t]he general rule . . . that parties should not be permitted to relitigate issues that have been resolved by courts of competent jurisdiction").

[1] See, e.g., 22 U.S.C. § 9003(g) ("Full faith and credit shall be accorded by the courts of the States and the courts of the United States to the judgment of any other such court ordering or denying the return of a child, pursuant to the [Hague] Convention, in an action brought under [the International Child Abduction Remedies Act]."); 25 U.S.C. § 1911(d) ("The United States, every State, every territory or possession of the United States, and every Indian tribe shall give full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of any Indian tribe applicable to Indian child custody proceedings to the same extent that such entities give full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of any other entity.").

extends full faith and credit to child custody determinations.[2] Section 40221(a) of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 requires states to give certain out-of-state protection orders full faith and credit.[3] And the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act governs the enforcement of out-of-state child support orders.[4]

Notably, each of these statutes requires states to give full faith and credit to particular acts, records, or proceedings. Congress has rarely enacted legislation purporting to allow states to not honor out-of-state acts or judgments.[5] For instance, Section 2(a) of the Defense of Marriage Act provided that "no State, territory, or possession of the United States, or Indian tribe" would "be required to give effect to any public act, record, or judicial proceeding of any other State, territory, possession or tribe respecting a relationship between persons of the same sex that is treated as a marriage under the laws of such other State, territory, possession, or tribe, or a right or claim arising from such relationship."[6] Scholars debated whether the Full Faith and Credit Clause authorized Congress to allow states to disregard out-of-state marriages in this fashion.[7] The Supreme Court mooted this debate when it held in Obergefell v. Hodges "that there is no lawful basis for a State to refuse to recognize a lawful same-sex marriage performed in another State on the ground of its same-sex character."[8] Because the Obergefell Court based its ruling on the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court left questions regarding Congress's power under the Full Faith and Credit Clause unanswered.[9] Thus, the boundaries of Congress's authority to prescribe the effect of state acts, records, and proceedings under the Clause remain unsettled.[10]

---

[2] Pub. L. No. 96-611, §§ 6–10, 94 Stat. 3566 (1980) (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. § 1738A). See also Thompson v. Thompson, 484 U.S. 174, 180 (1988) ("At the time Congress passed the PKPA, custody orders held a peculiar status under the full faith and credit doctrine . . . The anomaly traces to the fact that custody orders characteristically are subject to modification as required by the best interests of the child. As a consequence, some courts doubted whether custody orders were sufficiently 'final' to trigger full faith and credit requirements, and this Court had declined expressly to settle the question. Even if custody orders were subject to full faith and credit requirements, the Full Faith and Credit Clause obliges States only to accord the same force to judgments as would be accorded by the courts of the State in which the judgment was entered. Because courts entering custody orders generally retain the power to modify them, courts in other States were no less entitled to change the terms of custody according to their own views of the child's best interest.") (internal citations omitted).

[3] Pub. L. No. 103-322, § 40221(a), 108 Stat. 1796, 1926 (1994) (codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 2265).

[4] Pub. L. No. 103-383, 108 Stat. 4063 (1994) (codified as amended at 28 U.S.C. § 1738B).

[5] See, e.g., Charles M. Yablon, Madison's Full Faith and Credit Clause: A Historical Analysis, 33 Cardozo L. Rev. 125, 135–36 (2011) (observing that "[t]he republic had been in existence for over 200 years before Congress" passed legislation purporting to "abrogate[ ] the full faith and credit mandate").

[6] See Pub. L. No. 104-199, § 2(a), 110 Stat. 2419 (1996) (codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1738C).

[7] Compare, e.g., Ralph U. Whitten, Original Understanding, 32 Creighton L. Rev. 255, 391 (1998) (arguing that Congress has "broad power to create statutes like DOMA under the Effects Clause"), with, e.g., 142 Cong. Rec. S5932 (daily ed. June 6, 1996) (letter from Professor Laurence H. Tribe to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy) (arguing that DOMA § 2(a) was "plainly unconstitutional" because "the congressional power to 'prescribe . . . the effect' of sister-state acts, records, and proceedings, within the context of the Full Faith and Credit Clause, includes no congressional power to prescribe that some acts, records and proceedings that would otherwise be entitled to full faith and credit . . . shall instead . . . be entitled to no faith or credit at all") (first ellipses in original).

[8] 576 U.S. 644, 681 (2015). See generally Amdt14.S1.8.13.1 Overview of Fundamental Rights (analyzing Obergefell).

[9] See Symeon C. Symeonides, Choice of Law in the American Courts in 2015: Twenty-Ninth Annual Survey, 64 Am. J. Comp. L. 221, 294 (2016).

[10] See Jeffrey M. Schmitt, A Historical Reassessment of Full Faith and Credit, 20 Geo. Mason L. Rev. 485, 485 (2013) ("[T]he Court has not yet ruled on the second portion of the Clause—that is, it has not addressed the contours of Congress's full faith and credit power."); Mark D. Rosen, Congress's Primary Role in Determining What Full Faith and Credit Requires: An Additional Argument, 41 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 7, 11 (2010) ("As to precedent regarding congressional power to reduce the credit that . . . must be given to another state's laws or judgments, all we have are equivocal and somewhat contradictory statements by less than a majority of the Court."). Compare Thomas v. Wash. Gas Light Co., 448 U.S. 261, 272 n.18 (1980) (plurality opinion) ("[T]here is at least some question whether Congress may cut back on the measure of faith and credit required by a decision of this Court."), with Yarborough v. Yarborough, 290 U.S. 202, 215

Section 2—Interstate Comity

Clause 1—Privileges and Immunities

ArtIV.S2.C1.1 Overview of Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The first section of Article IV, Section 2 provides that the citizens of each state shall be "entitled to all Privileges and Immunities" of the citizens of other states. The provision is often called the "Privileges and Immunities Clause" or the "Comity Clause."[1] This Clause, which is textually tied to state citizenship, should not be confused with the distinct provision in the Fourteenth Amendment—the "Privileges or Immunities Clause"—which protects the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States against state invasion.[2]

The key purpose of the Privileges and Immunities Clause "was to help fuse into one Nation a collection of independent sovereign States."[3] Under the prevailing view of the Clause, its central requirement is that "in any state every citizen of any other state is to have the same privileges and immunities which the citizens of that state enjoy."[4] In other words, the Clause "prevents a state from discriminating against citizens of other states in favor of its own."[5] The Clause's concerns implicate not only individual rights to nondiscriminatory treatment, but also "the structural balance essential to the concept of federalism."[6]

Most cases under the Privilege and Immunities Clause concern discriminatory state residency requirements or other preferences for state residents versus nonresidents. (For purposes of the Privileges and Immunities Clause, "the terms 'citizen' and 'resident' are 'essentially interchangeable.'"[7]) The Clause's prohibitions reach not only facial classifications based on state residency or citizenship, but also state or municipal laws[8] whose "practical n.2 (1933) (Stone, J., dissenting) (arguing that "[t]he mandatory force of the full faith and credit clause as defined by this Court may be, in some degree not yet fully defined, . . . contracted by Congress.").

[1] See Robert G. Natelson, The Original Meaning of the Privileges and Immunities Clause, 43 Ga. L. Rev. 1117, 1122 (2009).

[2] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 ("No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; . . . " (emphasis added)).

[3] Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 395 (1948). While the Privileges and Immunities Clause was "intended to create a national economic union," the Court "has never held that [the Clause] protects only economic interests." Supreme Ct. of N.H. v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 280, 281 n.11 (1985) (citations omitted).

[4] Hague v. Comm. for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 511 (1939); see also Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36, 77 (1872) (stating the "sole purpose" of the Privileges and Immunities Clause is "to declare to the several States, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens . . . the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction").

[5] Hague, 307 U.S. at 511; accord United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 643 (1883) ("[The Privileges and Immunities Clause's] object is to place the citizens of each state upon the same footing with citizens of other states, and inhibit discriminative legislation against them by other states.").

[6] Austin v. New Hampshire, 420 U.S. 656, 662 (1975).

[7] Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 524 n.8 (1978) (quoting Austin, 420 U.S. at 662 n.8).

[8] United Bldg. & Const. Trades Council of Camden Cnty. & Vicinity v. Mayor of Camden, 465 U.S. 208, 214 (1984) ("The fact that the ordinance in question is a municipal, rather than a state, law does not somehow place it outside the scope of the Privileges and Immunities Clause."). In applying the Privileges and Immunities Clause to municipal and local laws, United Building reasoned that the Clause should not permit states to exclude out-of-state residents from benefits through the simple expedient of delegating authority to political subdivisions. Id. at 217.

effect" is discriminatory against out-of-state residents.[9] Controversies between a state and its own citizens are not covered by the provision.[10]

Not all distinctions between state residents and nonresidents violate the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[11] States may, for example, limit voting rights to state residents or make state residency a qualification for elective office.[12] Nor must a state "always apply all its laws or all its services equally to anyone, resident or nonresident."[13] Rather, discrimination only implicates the Clause when it relates to a right or activity that is sufficiently "fundamental."[14] (Whether a right or activity is fundamental under the Privileges and Immunities Clause is doctrinally distinct from whether a right is fundamental under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process or Equal Protection Clauses.[15]) For example, the right of nonresidents to "ply their trade, practice their occupation, or pursue a common calling" on substantially equal terms as state citizens is protected as fundamental under the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[16]

Even if a state law discriminates against nonresidents as to a fundamental right or activity, it may still be constitutional if the state can justify its action under a two-step test developed by the Supreme Court. First, the state must show there is "a substantial reason for the difference in treatment."[17] Second, the discrimination must bear a "substantial relationship to the State's objective."[18] Under this form of intermediate scrutiny,[19] the Court has struck down, for example, state preferences for hiring in-state residents to work on oil and gas pipelines[20] and residency requirements for admission to a state bar.[21]

Beyond state discrimination against nonresidents[22] and the right to travel,[23] the Privileges and Immunities Clause's significance has waned with the incorporation of most of the Bill of Rights against state invasion via the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process

---

[9] Hillside Dairy Inc. v. Lyons, 539 U.S. 59, 67 (2003) (citing Chalker v. Birmingham & N.W. Ry., 249 U.S. 522, 527 (1919)).

[10] Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130, 138 (1873); Cove v. Cunningham, 133 U.S. 107 (1890). But see Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 75 (1982) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[11] Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 383 (1978).

[12] Id.

[13] McBurney v. Young, 569 U.S. 221, 226 (2013) (quoting Baldwin, 436 U.S. at 383).

[14] United Bldg., 465 U.S. at 218 (citing Baldwin, 436 U.S. at 388); see also Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546, 551–52 (Washington, Circuit Justice, C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823).

[15] See Amdt14.S1.8.13.1 Overview of Fundamental Rights.

[16] Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 524 (1978); accord Supreme Ct. of N.H. v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 280 (1985); Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396 (1948).

[17] Piper, 470 U.S. at 284.

[18] Id.; accord Toomer, 334 U.S. at 396.

[19] See Julian N. Eule, Laying the Dormant Commerce Clause to Rest, 91 YALE L.J. 425, 454 (1982) (likening the Privileges and Immunities Clause test to "intermediate scrutiny under contemporary equal protection jurisprudence"); Kathleen M. Sullivan, Post-Liberal Judging: The Roles of Categorization and Balancing, 63 U. COLO. L. REV. 293, 297 (1992) (same).

[20] Hicklin, 437 U.S. at 526–28.

[21] Barnard v. Thorstenn, 489 U.S. 546 (1989); Supreme Ct. of Va. v. Friedman, 487 U.S. 59 (1988); Piper, 470 U.S. at 288.

[22] State protectionism and discrimination against nonresidents may also implicate the Equal Protection Clause or the Dormant Commerce Clause. See, e.g., Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison, 520 U.S. 564, 569 n.4 (1997) (challenge to discriminatory state tax exemption made under Dormant Commerce Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, and the Privileges and Immunities Clause).

[23] See, e.g., Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 501–02 (1999); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 200 (1973), abrogated on other grounds by Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Org., No. 19-1393 (U.S. June 24, 2022); New York v. O'Neill, 359 U.S. 1, 569 (1959).

Clause.[24] Challenges to a state's abridgement of enumerated constitutional rights are thus more often asserted under those constitutional amendments (as incorporated via the Fourteenth Amendment), instead of the Privileges and Immunities Clause.

ArtIV.S2.C1.2 Historical Background on Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The notion of "privileges and immunities"—that is, particular legal benefits or exemptions—derives from concepts developed by English medieval law.[1] The Articles of Confederation contained a lengthier provision[2] that provided the direct precedent for the Privileges and Immunities Clause:

> The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State, to any other State, of which the owner is an inhabitant; provided also that no imposition, duties or restriction shall be laid by any State, on the property of the United States, or either of them.[3]

Charles Pinckney of South Carolina claimed to have introduced the Privileges and Immunities Clause at the Constitutional Convention.[4] The Committee of Detail drafted and reported language identical to the final Clause, which passed the Convention without substantial debate.[5] Perhaps because the Privileges and Immunities Clause was drawn from the Articles of Confederation, it also "drew virtually no attention" in the ratification debates.[6] The Clause is discussed in the Federalist papers only as a means of support for other arguments.[7]

---

[24] See Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 379 (1978) ("Historically, [the Privileges and Immunities Clause] has been overshadowed by the appearance in 1868 of similar language in § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and by the continuing controversy and consequent litigation that attended that Amendment's enactment and its meaning and application.").

[1] For sources discussing the historical origins of privileges and immunities under English and colonial law, see, for example, Thomas H. Burrell, A Story of Privileges and Immunities: From Medieval Concept to the Colonies and United States Constitution, 34 Campbell L. Rev. 7 (2011); Robert G. Natelson, The Original Meaning of the Privileges and Immunities Clause, 43 Ga. L. Rev. 1117 (2009).

[2] James Madison also thought in the Articles' longer version was somewhat unclear. The Federalist No. 42 (James Madison) ("There is a confusion of language [in the Articles' Privileges and Immunities Clause], which is remarkable.").

[3] Articles of Confederation of 1781 art. IV, § 1.

[4] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 173–74 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[5] Id. at 187, 443. Ironically, the only noted objection came from Pinckney himself, who thought "some provision should be included in favor of property in slaves." Id. at 443. (The South Carolinians—the only delegation to vote "no" on the Privileges and Immunities Clause—subsequently obtained a provision to that effect in the form of the Fugitive Slave Clause. Id. at 443, 446; U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 3.).

[6] David S. Bogen, The Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV, 37 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 794, 840 (1986).

[7] See The Federalist No. 42 (James Madison); The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

Despite the textual differences between the Privileges and Immunities Clause and its predecessor in the Articles of Confederation, the Supreme Court has concluded that the Constitution's briefer phrasing was intended to have the same meaning.[8] The privileges and immunities protected are thus the same under both the Articles and the Constitution.[9] Accordingly, the specific examples listed in the Articles' version (for example, "free ingress and regress to and from any other State," "all the privileges of trade and commerce") may be used to "give some general idea of the class of civil rights meant by the phrase" in the Constitution.[10]

ArtIV.S2.C1.3 Purpose of Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

At least four theories have been proffered as to the purpose of the Privileges and Immunities Clause. First, the Clause could be read as a guarantee to the citizens of the different states of equal treatment by Congress, as a kind of equal protection clause binding on the federal government. Though this view received some recognition in Justice John Catron's opinion in Dred Scott v. Sandford,[1] it has long been viewed as obsolete.[2]

Second, the Clause could be read to guarantee to the citizens of each state certain natural, fundamental rights inherent in the citizenship of people in a free society, which no state could deny to citizens of other states (and without regard to how it treats its own citizens). This theory found some expression in a few early state cases,[3] and best accords Justice Bushrod Washington's famous dicta on the Clause in Corfield v. Coryell.[4] This theory might have endowed the Supreme Court with authority to review state legislation similar to that which it later came to exercise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses, but it was firmly rejected by the Court.[5]

---

[8] Austin v. New Hampshire, 420 U.S. 656, 661 (1975) ("[Protection for privileges and immunities] was carried over into the comity article of the Constitution in briefer form but with no change of substance or intent, unless it was to strengthen the force of the clause in fashioning a single nation.").

[9] Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 75 (1873).

[10] Id.

[1] 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 518, 527–29 (1857) (Catron, J., concurring), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

[2] Instead, the Court read the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause to impose equal protection standards on the federal government. See, e.g., Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954); Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 168 (1964); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 641–42 (1969).

[3] Campbell v. Morris, 3 H. & McH. 288 (Md. 1797); Murray v. McCarty, 2 Munf. 373 (Va. 1811); Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. 507 (N.Y. 1812); Douglas v. Stephens, 1 Del. Ch. 465 (1821); Smith v. Moody, 26 Ind. 299 (1866).

[4] 6 F. Cas. 546, 550 (Washington, Circuit Justice, C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823); see also Hague v. Comm. of Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 511 (1939) ("At one time it was thought that [the Privileges and Immunities Clause] recognized a group of [natural] rights . . . and that the purpose of the section was to create rights of citizens of the United States by guaranteeing the citizens of every State the recognition of this group of rights by every other State. Such was the view of Justice Washington.").

Other notable proponents of the natural-rights view include Justices Stephen Johnson Field, Joseph Bradley, and Benjamin Robbins Curtis. See Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 97–98 (1973) (Field, J., dissenting); id. at 117–18 (Bradley, J., dissenting); Dred Scott, 60 U.S. at 580 (Curtis, J., dissenting). The natural rights concept of privileges and immunities was also strongly held by abolitionists and their congressional allies, who drafted the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Howard Jay Graham, Our 'Declaratory' Fourteenth Amendment, reprinted in Howard Jay Graham, Everyman's Constitution: Historical Essays on the Fourteenth Amendment, the Conspiracy Theory, and American Constitutionalism 295 (1968).

[5] See, e.g., McKane v. Durston, 153 U.S. 684, 687 (1894).

Third, the Clause could be read to guarantee the citizen of any state the same rights that he enjoys at home, even when he is in another state. On this view, the Clause would enable a citizen to carry his rights of state citizenship with him throughout the United States, unaffected by state lines. The Court has also rejected this theory.[6]

The fourth theory—and the one the Court ultimately accepted—is that the Clause forbids any state to discriminate against citizens of other states in favor of its own. It is this narrow interpretation that has become the settled one. As the Court explained in the 1869 case Paul v. Virginia:

> It was undoubtedly the object of [the Privileges and Immunities Clause] to place the citizens of each State upon the same footing with citizens of other States, so far as the advantages resulting from citizenship in those States are concerned. It relieves them from the disabilities of alienage in other States; it inhibits discriminating legislation against them by other States; it gives them the right of free ingress into other States, and egress from them; it insures to them in other States the same freedom possessed by the citizens of those States in the acquisition and enjoyment of property and in the pursuit of happiness; and it secures to them in other States the equal protection of their laws.[7]

ArtIV.S2.C1.4 Self-Executing Nature of Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

In the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court held that the Privileges and Immunities Clause is self-executing. That is, Congress generally lacks power to enact enforcement legislation under the Clause, which is instead left to the states and the judicial process.[1] The Supreme Court has also held that, like the Fourteenth Amendment's protections, the Privileges and Immunities Clause protects only against state action, and not private conduct.[2] Federal statutes prohibiting private conspiracies to deprive any person of equal privileges and immunities secured by state laws,[3] or punishing the denial of the right of citizens to reside peacefully in the several states and to have free ingress into and egress from such states by non-state actors,[4] have been held unconstitutional for these reasons.

---

[6] See, e.g., City of Detroit v. Osborne, 135 U.S. 492, 498 (1890).

[7] 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168, 180 (1869); see also Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) at 77; Chambers v. Balt. & Ohio R.R., 207 U.S. 142 (1907); Whitfield v. Ohio, 297 U.S. 431 (1936).

[1] United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 643–44 (1883); see also Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36, 77 (1872) ("[T]he entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States . . . lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal government."); accord The Federalist No. 80 (Alexander Hamilton).

[2] United States v. Wheeler, 254 U.S. 281, 298 (1920), disapproved of on other grounds, United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 759 n.16 (1966). See also Amdt14.2 State Action Doctrine.

[3] Harris, 106 U.S. at 643. See also Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U.S. 678, 689–90 (1887).

[4] Wheeler, 254 U.S. at 298.

ArtIV.S2.C1.5 Citizenship Under Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

Whether free Black Americans were protected as citizens under the Privileges and Immunities Clause (and other constitutional protections) was a contentious issue before the Civil War.[1] The unamended Constitution grants Congress power to "establish a uniform rule of naturalization" as to foreigners,[2] but did not otherwise speak directly to who is a "citizen" of a state or of the United States.[3] A common view at the time was that national citizenship was derivative of state citizenship, and that the latter could be conferred by birth within a jurisdiction, as under the English common law.[4]

Nonetheless, in the notorious Dred Scott case, the Supreme Court held that Black Americans, whether free or enslaved, could not be "citizens" under the Constitution.[5] "Citizens of each State," Chief Justice Roger Taney concluded, meant citizens of the United States as understood when the Constitution was adopted; descendants of African slaves were not then regarded as capable of citizenship in Taney's view.[6] Citing the Privileges and Immunities Clause, Chief Justice Taney argued that if free Black Americans could be made citizens of one state, the Constitution would grant them > the right to enter every other State whenever they pleased, singly or in companies, without pass or passport, and without obstruction, to sojourn there as long as they pleased, . . . and it would give them the full liberty of speech in public and in private upon all subjects upon which its own citizens might speak; to hold public meetings upon political affairs, and to keep and carry arms wherever they went.[7]

Such an outcome, Chief Justice Taney maintained, "the great men of the slaveholding States, who took so large a share in framing the Constitution" would not have permitted.[8] Because Dred Scott was not a "citizen" under this reasoning, the Court held that federal courts lacked jurisdiction over his suit for freedom because there was no diversity of state citizenship under Article III, Section 2.[9]

In dissent, Justice Benjamin Robbins Curtis denied the Chief Justice's historically dubious assertion that there were no free Black Americans who were state citizens when the

---

[1] See Ryan C. Williams, Originalism and the Other Desegregation Decision, 99 Va. L. Rev. 493, 505–20 (2013) (summarizing the debates over the citizenship status of free Black Americans prior to the Dred Scott decision).

[2] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4; see also ArtI.S8.C4.1.1 Overview of Naturalization Clause.

[3] The Constitution uses the phrase "citizen of the United States" in several places, including the qualifications for Members of Congress, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2; § 3, cl. 3, and for the Presidency (which additionally requires the person to be a "natural born" citizen), see U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5. State citizenship is referenced in the Privileges and Immunities Clause and Article III's provisions for federal jurisdiction, see U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 1.

[4] Williams, supra note 1, at 507 (citing James H. Kettner, The Development of American Citizenship, 1608–1870, at 287 (1978)).

[5] Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 403–27 (1857) (Taney, C.J.), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

[6] Id. at 402–05.

[7] Id. at 417.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 427.

Constitution was ratified.[10] Justice Curtis further argued that the states retained the right to extend citizenship to classes of persons born within their borders, and that a person upon whom state citizenship was conferred became a citizen of that state and the United States under the Constitution.[11]

Dred Scott's holding was superseded by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, which declares: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."[12] Thus, after 1868, the "citizens of each State" under the Privileges and Immunities Clause include at least all persons born in the United States, or naturalized U.S. citizens, who reside in that state.

ArtIV.S2.C1.6 Corporations and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

A long line of Supreme Court cases has found the Privileges and Immunities Clause to be "inapplicable" to corporations (as opposed to natural persons).[1] As early as 1839, the Court reasoned that a corporation, as a discretionary creation of state law, could not claim "the rights which belong to its members as citizens of a state."[2] The Court reached a similar conclusion in 1869 in Paul v. Virginia.[3] By 1898, the Court declared it "well settled" that "a corporation is not a citizen within the meaning of the [Privileges and Immunities Clause]."[4] The Court has extended this rule to state law trusts because of their similarity to the corporate form.[5]

The Court has continued to adhere to its settled view that the Privileges and Immunities Clause does not protect corporations,[6] despite later holdings that other constitutional protections—such as the Equal Protection Clause,[7] First Amendment,[8] and Fourth Amendment[9]—apply to corporations. As a result, challenges to state protectionism and discrimination against out-of-state corporations are typically brought under the "dormant" Commerce Clause,[10] and not the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[11]

---

[10] Id. at 573–76 (Curtis, J., dissenting). On the contrary, Justice Curtis asserted that there was "no doubt" that free native-born Black residents were citizens of states such as New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, and New Jersey, and had the right to vote in some of them. Id.

[11] Id. at 576–90.

[12] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

[1] W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization of Cal., 451 U.S. 648, 656 (1981) (citing Hemphill v. Orloff, 277 U.S. 537, 548–50 (1928)).

[2] Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 519, 586–87 (1839) (Taney, C.J.).

[3] 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168, 180–81 (1869) (Field, J.).

[4] Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 259 (1898). See also, e.g., Anglo-Am. Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co., 191 U.S. 373, 374 (1903) (Holmes, J.); Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U.S. 28, 45 (1900).

[5] Hemphill, 277 U.S. at 548–50.

[6] See Tenn. Wine & Spirits Retailers Ass'n v. Thomas, No. 18-96, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 26, 2019); Asbury Hosp. v. Cass Cnty., N.D., 326 U.S. 207, 211 (1945).

[7] Santa Clara Cnty. v. S. Pac. R. Co., 118 U.S. 394 (1886).

[8] See generally Citizens United v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 558 U.S. 310, 342 (2010) (collecting cases).

[9] See Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 311 (1978).

[10] See, e.g., Tenn. Wine & Spirits, No. 18-96, slip op. at 10; see generally ArtI.S8.C3.7.1 Overview of Dormant Commerce Clause; ArtI.S8.C3.7.5 General Prohibition on Facial Discrimination.

ArtIV.S2.C1.7 Privileges and Immunities of Citizens Defined

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The classical judicial exposition of the meaning of "privileges and immunities" is that of Justice Bushrod Washington in 1823 in Corfield v. Coryell.[1] The question at issue was the validity of a New Jersey statute that prohibited "any person who is not, at the time, an actual inhabitant and resident in this State" from raking or gathering clams, oysters, or shells in any of the state's waters on board any vessel not owned by state residents.[2] In Corfield, Justice Washington described the privileges and immunities under the Clause as "those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have, at all times, been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union."[3] Although a full list would be "tedious," Justice Washington opined that they include:

> Protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through, or to reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the state; to take, hold and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the state; may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental: to which may be added, the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the state . . . .[4]

After so defining the private and personal rights that were protected, Justice Washington distinguished them from a right to share in a state's public property. In particular, Corfield held that the right of a state to the clams and oysters within its waters to be in the nature of a property right, held by the state "for the use of the citizens thereof."[5] The statute at issue was thus upheld because New Jersey need not grant "cotenancy in the common property of the State, to the citizens of all the other States."[6]

Following Corfield, the Court has held that for an activity to be protected by the Privileges and Immunities Clause as "fundamental," it must be so "basic and essential" that "interference

---

[11] But see Tyler Pipe Indus., Inc. v. Wash. State Dep't of Revenue, 483 U.S. 232, 264–65 (1987) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (criticizing Dormant Commerce Clause doctrine as textually and historically unjustified and noting that "discrimination against citizens of other States" is more properly regulated by the Privileges and Immunities Clause).

[1] 6 F. Cas. 546 (Washington, Circuit Justice, C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823); Austin v. New Hampshire, 420 U.S. 656, 661 (1975) (characterizing Corfield as "the first, and long the leading, explication of the [Privileges and Immunities] Clause").

[2] Corfield, 6 F. Cas. at 550.

[3] Id. at 551.

[4] Id. at 551–52.

[5] Id. at 552.

[6] Id.

with [it] would frustrate the purposes of the formation of the Union."[7] Activities such as the pursuit of occupations or common callings within the state[8] (including the right to practice law[9]), the right to seek employment on public contracts,[10] the ownership and disposition of property within the state,[11] and access to state courts,[12] have all been recognized as fundamental and protected under the Privileges and Immunities Clause. In contrast, recreational fishing and hunting (that is, not tied to one's commercial livelihood[13]) has been held not a fundamental activity.[14] Accessing public records through a state freedom of information act has also been held not to be a fundamental activity; a state may therefore limit such access to its own citizens.[15]

ArtIV.S2.C1.8 Valid Residency Distinctions under Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

Universal practice has established a political exception to the Privilege and Immunities Clause. A state may thus "require residence within its limits for a given time before a citizen of another State who becomes a resident thereof shall exercise the right of suffrage or become eligible to office."[1]

In addition, purely private and personal rights are not in all cases beyond the reach of state legislation that differentiates between citizens and noncitizens. Broadly speaking, these rights may be reasonably regulated by a state under its police power. The Court has recognized cases in which a state may reasonably resort to discrimination against nonresidents in aid of its own public health, safety, and welfare. For example, a state may reserve the right to sell insurance to persons who have resided within the state for a prescribed period.[2] A state may also require a nonresident who does business within the state[3] or who uses the state's highways[4] to consent, expressly or by implication, to service of process on an agent within the state. A state

---

[7] Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 387 (1978).

[8] See, e.g., Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 524 (1978); Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 403 (1948); Ward v. Maryland, 79 U.S. 418, 430 (1870).

[9] See, e.g., Supreme Ct. of N.H. v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274 (1985).

[10] See United Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Mayor of Camden, 465 U.S. 208 (1984).

[11] See, e.g., Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 258 (1898); see also Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U.S. 176, 184 (1878).

[12] See, e.g., Can. N. Ry. v. Eggen, 252 U.S. 553, 560 (1920).

[13] See, e.g., Toomer, 334 U.S. at 403; Mullaney v. Anderson, 342 U.S. 415, 418 (1952).

[14] Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 388 (1978); McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391, 395 (1876).

[15] McBurney v. Young, 569 U.S. 221, 228–29 (2013). The Court further found that any incidental burden on a nonresident's ability to earn a living, own property, or exercise another fundamental activity could largely be ameliorated by using other available authorities, emphasizing that the primary purpose of the state freedom of information act was to provide state citizens with a means to obtain an accounting of their public officials. Id.

[1] Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 256 (1898). As to voting rights, see Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972), but not as to candidacy, this exception is qualified by the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 383 (1978) (citing Kanapaux v. Ellisor, 419 U.S. 891 (1974); Chimento v. Stark, 353 F. Supp. 1211 (D.N.H. 1973), aff'd, 414 U.S. 802 (1973)).

[2] La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U.S. 465 (1919).

[3] Doherty & Co. v. Goodman, 294 U.S. 623 (1935).

[4] Hess v. Pawloski, 274 U.S. 352, 356 (1927).

may also limit a nonresident's dower rights[5] or may treat the community property rights of nonresident married persons as governed by the laws of their domicile, rather than by the laws it promulgates for its own residents.[6]

ArtIV.S2.C1.9 State Natural Resources and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

In Corfield v. Coryell,[1] Justice Bushrod Washington (while riding circuit) held that a state could discriminate against nonresidents who sought to harvest oysters and clams in state waters, despite the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[2] The precise holding of Corfield was confirmed by the Supreme Court fifty years later in the 1877 case McCready v. Virginia, which upheld a Virginia law permitting only Virginians to catch or plant oysters in state rivers.[3] In cases blending Commerce Clause and Privileges and Immunities challenges, Geer v. Connecticut extended the same rule to wild game,[4] while Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter applied it to water rights.[5]

The virtual demise of the state ownership theory of animals and natural resources in the Commerce Clause context[6] compelled the Court to review its precedents on distinctions between residents and nonresidents related to natural resources. In Baldwin v. Fish & Game Commission of Montana, the Court addressed a challenge to Montana's laws for elk-hunting licenses, which charged nonresidents higher fees than residents.[7] The Court was asked to overrule the Privileges and Immunities Clause holdings of Corfield, Geer, and McCready as having "no remaining vitality."[8] Baldwin declined to do so, holding that while state control over wildlife is "not exclusive and absolute," recreational hunting was not a fundamental right under the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[9] Because recreational activity—in contrast to "common callings"[10]—was not "a means to the nonresident's livelihood," the state could distinguish between residents and nonresidents consistently with the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[11]

---

[5] Ferry v. Spokane, P. & S. Ry., 258 U.S. 314 (1922); accord Ferry v. Corbett, 258 U.S. 609 (1922).

[6] Conner v. Elliott, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 591, 593 (1856).

[1] See ArtIV.S2.C1.7 Privileges and Immunities of Citizens Defined.

[2] Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546, 552 (Washington, Circuit Justice, C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823).

[3] 94 U.S. 391, 395–96 (1877).

[4] 161 U.S. 519 (1896), overruled by Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1979).

[5] 209 U.S. 349, 357 (1908), overruled by Sporhase v. Nebraska ex rel. Douglas, 458 U.S. 941 (1982).

[6] See Douglas v. Seacoast Prods., Inc., 431 U.S. 265, 284 (1977) ("The 'ownership' language of cases such as [Geer and McCready] must be understood as no more than a 19th-century legal fiction expressing 'the importance to its people that a State have power to preserve and regulate the exploitation of an important resource.'" (citing Toomer v. Witsell, 344 U.S. 385, 402 (1948)).

[7] 436 U.S. 371, 372–74 (1978).

[8] Id. at 386.

[9] Id. at 386–88.

[10] See ArtIV.S2.C1.10 Occupations and Privileges and Immunities Clause.

[11] Baldwin, 436 U.S. at 388; cf. Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 403 (1948) (holding that commercial shrimping "like other common callings, is within the purview of the privileges and immunities clause").

ArtIV.S2.C1.10 Occupations and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The Supreme Court has long held that the right of nonresidents "to ply their trade, practice their occupation, or pursue a common calling" is a fundamental right protected by the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[1] Indeed, "privileges of trade and commerce" were explicitly included among the privileges and immunities listed in the Articles of Confederation.[2] The Clause therefore "guarantees to citizens of State A" the right of "doing business in State B on terms of substantial equality with the citizens of that State."[3]

In Toomer v. Witsell, the Court held that "commercial shrimping . . . like other common callings, is within the purview of the privileges and immunities clause."[4] Discriminatory fees exacted from nonresidents for a license to shrimp were thus unconstitutional.[5] The Court has similarly struck down discrimination against nonresidents in licenses for commercial fishing[6] and in hiring for work on oil and gas pipelines.[7]

The Court held in Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper that the right to practice law, like the right to pursue other occupations, is protected under the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[8] As a result, although a state may generally regulate the practice of law in its jurisdiction, it may not exclude nonresidents from state bar admission without a substantial reason.[9] Nor may a federal court, without substantial reason, require an attorney to have an office within the state as a condition of admission to practice.[10]

ArtIV.S2.C1.11 Access to Courts and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The right to sue and defend in the courts is one of the highest and most essential privileges of citizenship and must be allowed by each state to the citizens of all other states to the same extent that it is allowed to its own citizens.[1] The constitutional requirement is satisfied if nonresidents are given access to the state's courts upon terms that, in themselves, are

---

[1] See, e.g., Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 524 (1978).

[2] Articles of Confederation of 1781 art. IV, § 1. The Supreme Court has interpreted the constitutional provision to have "no change of substance or intent" from the Articles' version. Austin v. New Hampshire, 420 U.S. 656, 661 (1975).

[3] Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396 (1948).

[4] Id. at 403.

[5] Id.

[6] Mullaney v. Anderson, 342 U.S. 415, 418 (1952).

[7] Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 531 (1978).

[8] 470 U.S. 274, 283 (1985).

[9] Id. at 288; accord Supreme Ct. of Va. v. Friedman, 487 U.S. 59, 61 (1988); Barnard v. Thorstenn, 489 U.S. 546, 558–59 (1989).

[10] Frazier v. Heebe, 482 U.S. 641, 649 (1987). Although it drew upon Piper, Frazier was decided under the Court's inherent supervisory authority, rather than on constitutional grounds. Id. at 645.

[1] Chambers v. Balt. & Ohio R.R., 207 U.S. 142, 148 (1907); McKnett v. St. Louis & S.F. Ry., 292 U.S. 230, 233 (1934); see also Christopher v. Harbury, 536 U.S. 403, 415 n.12 (2002) (noting that the Supreme Court has at various times grounded "the right of access to courts" in the Privileges and Immunities Clause, the First Amendment, the Fifth Amendment, and the Fourteenth Amendment).

reasonable and adequate for enforcing any rights they may have, even though they may not be precisely the same as those accorded to resident citizens.[2]

On this basis, the Supreme Court upheld a state statute of limitations that prevented a nonresident from suing in the state's courts after expiration of the time for suit in the place where the cause of action arose.[3] The Court also upheld a statute that suspended its operation as to resident plaintiffs, but not as to nonresidents, during the defendant's absence from the state.[4] A state law making it discretionary for courts to entertain an action by a nonresident of the state against a foreign corporation doing business in the state was sustained because it applied equally to citizens and noncitizens residing out of the state.[5] A statute permitting a suit in the state's courts for wrongful death occurring outside the state, only if the decedent was a resident of the state, was sustained because it operated equally upon representatives of the deceased whether citizens or noncitizens.[6] Being nondiscriminatory, a Uniform Reciprocal State Law to secure the attendance of witnesses from within or without a state in criminal proceedings does not violate this Clause.[7]

ArtIV.S2.C1.12 Taxation and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

In the exercise of its taxing power, a state may not discriminate substantially between residents and nonresidents without violating the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[1] In the 1871 case Ward v. Maryland, the Court invalidated a state law that imposed taxes only upon nonresidents who sold within the state goods that were produced in other states.[2] The Court similarly held unconstitutional a Tennessee license tax that varied based on whether the person taxed had his chief office within the state or outside it.[3] In Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co.,[4] the Court, while sustaining a state's right to tax income accruing within its borders to nonresidents, held the particular tax void because it denied to nonresidents exemptions that were allowed to residents.[5] In contrast, because it did not discriminate between citizens and noncitizens, the Court sustained a state statute taxing businesses hiring persons within the state for labor outside the state.[6] [2] Can. N. Ry. v. Eggen, 252 U.S. 553 (1920).

---

[3] Id. at 563.

[4] Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, 93 U.S. 72, 76 (1876).

[5] Douglas v. N.Y., New Haven & Hartford R.R., 279 U.S. 377 (1929).

[6] Chambers, 207 U.S. 142.

[7] New York v. O'Neill, 359 U.S. 1 (1959).

[1] A territorial government, if authorized by Congress, may impose a discriminatory license tax on nonresident fishermen operating within its waters consistent with the Privileges and Immunities Clause. See Haavik v. Alaska Packers Ass'n, 263 U.S. 510 (1924). The Court in Haavik reasoned that "citizens of every state are treated alike" under the tax because "[o]nly residents of the territory are preferred." Id.

[2] 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 418, 424 (1871); see also Downham v. Alexandria Council, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 173, 175 (1870).

[3] Chalker v. Birmingham & N.W. Ry., 249 U.S. 522 (1919).

[4] 252 U.S. 60 (1920).

[5] Id. at 62–64; see also Shaffer v. Carter, 252 U.S. 37 (1920). In Austin v. New Hampshire, 420 U.S. 656 (1975), the Court held void a state commuter income tax because the State imposed no income tax on its own residents; thus, the tax fell exclusively on nonresidents' income and was not offset even approximately by other taxes imposed upon residents alone. Id. at 665–66.

[6] Williams v. Fears, 179 U.S. 270, 274 (1900).

In Lunding v. New York Tax Appeals Tribunal, the Court addressed a New York law denying nonresidents any deduction from taxable income for alimony payments, although it permitted residents to deduct such payments.[7] Although the Court observed that "the Privileges and Immunities Clause affords no assurance of precise equality in taxation between residents and nonresidents,"[8] the state must show a "substantial reason" for the disparity, and the discrimination must bear a "substantial relationship" to that reason.[9] Under this analysis, the Court read its precedents to prohibit a state from denying nonresidents a general tax exemption provided to residents, but permitting limits on "nonresidents' deductions of business expenses and nonbusiness deductions based on the relationship between those expenses and in-state property or income."[10] In Lunding, as the state flatly denied the deduction to nonresidents, the Court found that New York had "not presented a substantial justification for the categorical denial of alimony deductions to nonresidents."[11]

What at first glance may appear to be a discrimination may turn out not to be when a state's entire system of taxation is considered. On the basis of overall fairness, the Court has sustained a Connecticut statute that required nonresident stockholders to pay a state tax measured by the full market value of their stock while resident stockholders were subject to local taxation on the market value of that stock reduced by the value of the real estate owned by the corporation.[12] Moreover, occasional or accidental inequality to a nonresident taxpayer is not sufficient to defeat a scheme of taxation whose operation is generally equitable.[13] In an early case the Court dismissed the contention that a state violated the Privileges and Immunities Clause by subjecting its own citizens to a property tax on a debt due from a nonresident secured by real estate situated where the debtor resided.[14]

ArtIV.S2.C1.13 Right to Travel and Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 1:

> The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

The Supreme Court has long recognized the right to travel from one state to another under the Privileges and Immunities Clause,[1] as well as other constitutional provisions.[2] For

[7] 522 U.S. 287 (1998).

[8] Id. at 297.

[9] Id. at 298.

[10] Id. at 302.

[11] Id. at 315.

[12] Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Connecticut, 185 U.S. 364, 371 (1902).

[13] Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U.S. 525 (1919).

[14] Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U.S. 491, 499 (1879).

[1] See, e.g., Ward v. Maryland, 79 U.S. 418, 430 (1870) ("[The Privileges and Immunities] clause plainly and unmistakably secures and protects the right of a citizen of one State to pass into any other State of the Union . . . ."); Paul v. Virginia, 75 U.S. 168, 180 (1868) (stating that the Privileges and Immunities Clause includes "the right of free ingress into other States, and egress from them"), overruled on other grounds by United States v. S.-E. Underwriters Ass'n, 322 U.S. 533 (1944); see generally United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 762–67 (1966) (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (surveying cases).

[2] See Guest, 383 U.S. at 759 ("Although there have been recurring differences in emphasis within the Court as to the source of the constitutional right of interstate travel, there is no need here to canvass those differences further. All have agreed that the right exists.").

example, the Court held that a state could not constitutionally limit access to medical care to its own residents, and deny access to nonresidents, without interfering with the right to travel.[3]

In Saenz v. Roe, the Court characterized the constitutional "right to travel" as having "at least three different components":

> It protects [1] the right of a citizen of one State to enter and to leave another State, [2] the right to be treated as a welcome visitor rather than an unfriendly alien when temporarily present in the second State, and, [3] for those travelers who elect to become permanent residents, the right to be treated like other citizens of that State.[4]

While the Court did not expressly identify the constitutional basis of the first component, it noted that the Articles of Confederation's privileges and immunities clause explicitly protected the "free ingress and regress to and from any other State."[5] As for the second component of the right to travel, the Court found it to be "expressly protected by the text of the Constitution" through the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[6] Saenz connected the third component of the right to travel to the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause.[7]

Clause 2—Interstate Extradition

ArtIV.S2.C2.1 Overview of Extradition (Interstate Rendition) Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 2:

> A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

The Extradition Clause,[1] which is also referred to as the Interstate Rendition Clause,[2] applies to a person accused of a crime in one state who flees to another state. The Extradition Clause "preclude[s] any state from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice" and "enable[s] each state to bring offenders to trial as swiftly as possible in the state where the alleged offense was committed."[3] To fulfill those ends, the Extradition Clause contemplates that the Governor of the state from which the accused has fled (the demanding state) may seek his return from the state to which the accused has fled (the asylum state). Interstate rendition was "intended to be a summary and mandatory executive proceeding derived from" the [3] Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 200 (1973), abrogated on other grounds by Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Org., No. 19-1393 (U.S. June 24, 2022).

---

[4] 526 U.S. 489, 500 (1999) (numbering added).

[5] Id. at 501 (citing Articles of Confederation of 1781 art. IV, § 1).

[6] Id. at 501–502.

[7] Id. at 502–03 (citing U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1). The Commerce Clause is another potential textual basis for the right to travel. See Guest, 383 U.S. at 758 (citing Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 173 (1941)).

[1] See, e.g., Pierce v. Creecy, 210 U.S. 387, 393 (1908); Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 379 (1978).

[2] See, e.g., Pollack v. Duff, 793 F.3d 34, 44 (D.C. Cir. 2015).

[3] Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 287 (1978).

ArtIV.S2.C2.1
Overview of Extradition (Interstate Rendition) Clause

Extradition Clause.[4] The Extradition Clause is nearly unchanged in substance from the analogous provision in the Articles of Confederation[5] and was approved unanimously at the Constitutional Convention with little debate.[6]

The Extradition Clause is not self-executing, and the Constitution provides Congress no express grant of power to implement it. Yet the Second Congress passed a law, the current iteration of which is known as the Extradition Act, requiring the governor of each state to deliver up fugitives from justice found in their state, upon lawful demand from another state.[7] The Supreme Court accepted this "contemporaneous construction" as establishing the constitutional validity of the legislation.[8] In Kentucky v. Dennison,[9] however, the Court held that this statute was merely "declaratory" of a moral duty of state and that the federal government "has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever, and compel him to perform it."[10] Because of Dennison, a federal court could not issue a writ of mandamus to compel the Governor of one state to surrender a fugitive to another state.[11] Long considered a constitutional derelict, Dennison was finally formally overruled by the Court in 1987.[12]

Currently, states and territories may invoke the power of federal courts to enforce the Extradition Act against asylum state officers, including seeking equitable relief to compel performance of federally imposed duties.[13] The duty of one state to surrender a fugitive to another is not absolute and unqualified, however—if the fugitive is imprisoned in the asylum state, for example, the asylum state may satisfy its own laws before returning the fugitive to the demanding state.[14]

---

[4] Id. at 288 (citing Biddinger v. Comm'r of Police, 245 U.S. 128, 132 (1917)).

[5] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. IV, para. 2, ("If any Person guilty of, or charged with, treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any state, shall flee from Justice, and be found in any of the united states, he shall upon demand of the Governor or executive power of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, and removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence.").

[6] See 2 Max Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 443 (Max Farrand ed., 1911). The Convention replaced the term "high misdemeanor" with "other Crime" because "high misdemeanor" (which was used in the Articles of Confederation's version) had a technical meaning thought to be "too limited." Id.

[7] 1 Stat. 302 (1793). The current interstate Extradition Act is codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3182. The Act requires rendition of fugitives at the request of a demanding territory, as well as of a state, thus extending beyond the terms of the Extradition Clause. In New York ex rel Kopel v. Bingham, 211 U.S. 468 (1909), the Court held that this legislative extension was permissible. See Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 483 U.S. 219, 229–30 (1987).

[8] Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U.S. 80, 94 (1885); see also Innes v. Tobin, 240 U.S. 127 (1916). As Justice Story wrote in Prigg v. Pennsylvania: "[T]he natural, if not the necessary conclusion is, that the national government, in the absence of all positive provisions to the contrary, is bound, through its own proper departments, legislative, judicial, or executive, as the case may require, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution . . . . [I]t has, on various occasions, exercised powers which were necessary and proper as means to carry into effect rights expressly given, and duties expressly enjoined thereby." 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539, 616, 619–20 (1842).

[9] 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66 (1861). Cf. Prigg, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) at 612.

[10] Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) at 107.

[11] Id. at 109–10. In 1934, Congress plugged the loophole created by Dennison by making it a federal crime for any person to flee from one state to another to avoid prosecution in certain cases. 48 Stat. 782 (1934); 18 U.S.C. § 1073.

[12] Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 483 U.S. 219, 230 (1987) ("Kentucky v. Dennison is the product of another time. The conception of the relation between the States and the Federal Government there announced is fundamentally incompatible with more than a century of constitutional development."); accord New Mexico ex rel. Ortiz v. Reed, 524 U.S. 151, 155 (1998).

[13] Branstad, 483 U.S. at 230.

[14] Taylor v. Taintor, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 366, 371 (1873).

ArtIV.S2.C2.2 Meaning of Fugitive from Justice

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 2:

> A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

Although a person must be charged with a crime to be a fugitive from justice under the Extradition Clause, the Extradition Clause does not require the state demanding extradition (the "demanding state") to have charged the fugitive before he left the state. Instead, the Extradition Clause only requires the accused to be located in a state different from the one in which he is charged.[1] Moreover, the accused may have left the state for reasons other than avoiding justice because the reason the accused departed is immaterial.[2]

A demanding state that has received a fugitive from another state may be required to surrender him to a third state upon an extradition warrant.[3] A person indicted a second time for the same offense is still considered a fugitive under the Extradition Clause, even if, after dismissal of the first indictment, he left the demanding state with the knowledge of and without objection by state authorities.[4] But a defendant cannot be extradited if he was only constructively present in the demanding state when the crime with which he is charged was alleged to have been committed.[5]

The words "treason, felony or other crime," as used in the Extradition Clause, embrace every criminal offense forbidden and made punishable by state law,[6] including misdemeanors.[7]

ArtIV.S2.C2.3 Extradition (Interstate Rendition) Procedures

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 2:

> A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

A person must be charged with a crime in the regular course of judicial proceedings before the state's Governor may demand his return from another state.[1] The accused has no constitutional right to a hearing before the Governor of the asylum state (the state where the fugitive is located) on whether he has been substantially charged with a crime and is a fugitive from justice.[2] Nor may courts inquire into the motives of the Governors of the demanding and surrendering states.[3]

---

[1] Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U.S. 80, 95 (1885); see also Strassheim v. Daily, 221 U.S. 280 (1911); Appleyard v. Massachusetts, 203 U.S. 222 (1906); Ex parte Reggel, 114 U.S. 642, 650 (1885).

[2] Drew v. Thaw, 235 U.S. 432, 439 (1914).

[3] Innes v. Tobin, 240 U.S. 127 (1916).

[4] Bassing v. Cady, 208 U.S. 386 (1908).

[5] Hyatt v. People ex rel. Corkran, 188 U.S. 691 (1903).

[6] Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 103 (1861).

[7] Taylor v. Taintor, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 366, 375 (1873).

[1] Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 104 (1861); Pierce v. Creecy, 210 U.S. 387 (1908); see also In re of Strauss, 197 U.S. 324, 325 (1905); Marbles v. Creecy, 215 U.S. 63 (1909); Strassheim v. Daily, 221 U.S. 280 (1911).

[2] Munsey v. Clough, 196 U.S. 364, 372 (1905); Pettibone v. Nichols, 203 U.S. 192 (1906).

[3] Pettibone, 203 U.S. at 203.

The asylum state's courts cannot use habeas corpus to refuse to surrender the accused based on speculations about the accused's trial in the demanding state.[4] Likewise the asylum state's courts cannot hear the accused's arguments that the statute of limitations has expired,[5] or that confinement in the demanding state's prison would constitute cruel and unjust punishment,[6] although the accused may make such arguments in the demanding state's courts. An accused will, however, be discharged on habeas corpus if he shows by clear and satisfactory evidence that he was outside the demanding state when the crime occurred.[7] If, however, the evidence is conflicting, habeas corpus is not the proper proceeding to try the question of alibi.[8]

The role of habeas corpus in interstate rendition cases is, therefore, very limited.[9] Once the asylum state's governor grants extradition, a court considering releasing the accused on habeas grounds can only decide: "(a) whether the extradition documents on their face are in order; (b) whether the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (c) whether the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (d) whether the petitioner is a fugitive."[10]

Nothing in the Constitution exempts an offender from trial and punishment following extradition, even though he was brought from another state by unlawful violence,[11] or by abuse of legal process.[12] A fugitive lawfully extradited from another state may be tried for an offense other than that for which he was surrendered.[13] The rule is different, however, for fugitives surrendered by a foreign government, pursuant to treaty. In that case, the fugitive may only be tried "for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition, until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings."[14]

Clause 3—Slavery

ArtIV.S2.C3.1 Fugitive Slave Clause

Article IV, Section 2, Clause 3:

> No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

This Clause, effectively nullified by the Thirteenth Amendment's abolition of slavery,[1] contemplated the existence of a right on the part of a slaveholder to reclaim an enslaved person

---

[4] Drew v. Thaw, 235 U.S. 432, 440 (1914).

[5] Biddinger v. Commissioner of Police, 245 U.S. 128, 135 (1917); see also Rodman v. Pothier, 264 U.S. 399 (1924).

[6] Sweeney v. Woodall, 344 U.S. 86, 89–90 (1952).

[7] Hyatt v. People ex rel. Corkran, 188 U.S. 691 (1903); see also South Carolina v. Bailey, 289 U.S. 412 (1933).

[8] Munsey v. Clough, 196 U.S. 364, 375 (1905).

[9] Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 289 (1978). In California v. Superior Court, 482 U.S. 400, 407 (1987), the Court reiterated that extradition is a "summary procedure."

[10] Doran, 439 U.S. at 289.

[11] Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 444 (1886); Mahon v. Justice, 127 U.S. 700, 707, 712, 714 (1888).

[12] Cook v. Hart, 146 U.S. 183, 193 (1892); Pettibone v. Nichols, 203 U.S. 192, 215 (1906).

[13] Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U.S. 537, 543 (1893).

[14] United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 430 (1886).

[1] U.S. Const. amend. XIII.

who had escaped to another state.[2] Following the debate on the constitutional provision requiring states to return felons who had fled from one state to another,[3] Pierce Butler and Charles Pinckney of South Carolina moved "to require fugitive slaves and servants to be delivered up like criminals."[4] Although James Wilson and Roger Sherman objected that this "would oblige the executive of the State to [seize fugitive slaves], at the public expense," the provision was approved by the Convention unanimously without further debate.[5]

Congress had the power to enact legislation enforcing the Clause,[6] which it first did in 1793.[7] Under the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Fugitive Slave Clause, the owner of an enslaved person had the same right to seize and repossess him in another state as the local laws of his own state granted to him, and state laws that penalized such a seizure were unconstitutional.[8] Moreover, states had no concurrent power to legislate on the subject.[9] However, a state statute providing a penalty for harboring an escaped slave was held not to conflict with the Clause because it did not affect the right or remedy of the slaveholder, but rather a rule of conduct for its own citizens in the exercise of states' police power.[10]

Section 3—New States and Federal Property

Clause 1—Admissions

ArtIV.S3.C1.1 Overview of Admissions (New States) Clause

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The first clause of Article IV, Section 3 authorizes Congress to admit new states into the union. It is sometimes called the Admissions Clause, the Admission Clause, or the New States Clause.[1]

The Admissions Clause contains two main limitations on congressional power to admit new states. The first limitation is based on the constitutional text: when a proposed new state

---

[2] See 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §§ 1804–1805 (1833).

[3] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2.

[4] 2 Max Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 443 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911).

[5] Id. at 446. Although the Articles of Confederation lacked an analogous provision, see 3 Story's Commentaries, supra note 2, at § 1805, the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, even as it abolished slavery in the Territory, provided for the return of fugitive slaves who escaped there. See Ordinance of 1787 art. VI ("Provided, always, That any person escaping into the [territory], from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid.").

[6] Jones v. Van Zandt, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 215, 229 (1847).

[7] 1 Stat. 302 (1793). The enforcement provisions of Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 were strengthened as part of the Compromise of 1850. See 9 Stat. 462 (1850).

[8] Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539, 612 (1842); Ableman v. Booth, 62 U.S. (21 How.) 506 (1859).

[9] Prigg, 41 U.S. at 625.

[10] Moore v. Illinois, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 13, 17 (1853).

[1] See, e.g., Ralph H. Brock, The Ultimate Gerrymander: Dividing Texas into Four New States, 6 Cardozo Pub. L. Pol'y & Ethics J. 651, 662 (2008) (using the term "Admissions Clause" to refer to this provision); Robert Barrett, History on an Equal Footing: Ownership of the Western Federal Lands, 68 U. Colo. L. Rev. 761, 767 (1997) (using the term "New States Clause" to refer to this provision); Peter Raven-Hansen, The Constitutionality of D.C. Statehood, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 160, 167 (1991) (using the term "Admission Clause" to refer to this provision).

is formed from territory in the jurisdiction of an existing state or states, the consent of the affected state legislatures is required (in addition to congressional approval).[2] For example, Virginia's consent was given to the admission of the state of Kentucky, formed out of Virginia's western regions in 1792.[3]

Because the Clause uses a semicolon instead of a comma after the phrase "no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State," a literal reading of the text might incorrectly suggest that the Constitution categorically forbids forming a new state out of the territory of an existing state.[4] The drafting history of the Admissions Clause shows, however, that the Framers contemplated that new states could be formed from the territory of an existing state, if that state consented.[5] In practice, Congress—beginning with the First Congress[6]—has several times admitted new states formed out of the territory of a consenting existing state without constitutional controversy.[7]

The second limitation, known as the "equal footing doctrine"[8] is rooted in long-standing congressional practice[9] and judicial interpretations of the Admissions Clause. Under the equal footing doctrine, new states must be admitted on equal terms "with all of the powers of sovereignty and jurisdiction which pertain to the original states."[10] In particular, Congress may not impose conditions on a state's admission that would diminish the equal sovereignty of the states.[11]

Thirty-seven states have been admitted to the United States under the Admissions Clause. Vermont was the first in 1791,[12] and Hawaii the most recent in 1959.[13] Beyond requiring at least one act of Congress for admission (and, if applicable, the consent of affected state legislatures), the Admissions Clause leaves the details of the admission process to congressional determination. Most states were first organized by Congress as federal

---

[2] U.S. Const. art IV, § 3, cl. 2.

[3] 1 Stat. 189 (1791). The circumstances surrounding the admission of Vermont, the first new state following the Constitution's ratification, are somewhat ambiguous. Although New York claimed Vermont as part of its territory, Vermont declared independence from New York in 1777 and functioned as an independent republic until its admission in 1791. See generally Vasan Kesavan and Michael Stokes Paulsen, Is West Virginia Unconstitutional?, 90 Cal. L. Rev. 291, 371–75 (2002). Although the New York legislature did consent to the admission of Vermont, it is not clear whether consent was constitutionally required, because Vermont was (arguably) not within New York's jurisdiction. Id. In fact, records from the Convention show that the Framers carefully worded the Admissions Clause to allow Vermont's admission as a state without "a dependence on the consent of N[ew] York." See 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 463 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records].

[4] See Kesavan & Paulsen, supra note 3, at 332–82 (examining this so-called "semicolon problem" at length). Sources as authoritative as the Supreme Court and Justice Story have misquoted the Admissions Clause with the ambiguous second semicolon replaced by a comma. See Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212, 223 (1845); 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1308 (1833).

[5] See 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 455, 464. This intended meaning is clear from earlier drafts of the Clause; the ambiguous semicolon was added only by the Committee of Style late in the Convention. Id. at 602.

[6] See Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 790 (1983) (actions of the First Congress provide "contemporaneous and weighty evidence" of Constitution's meaning) (quotations and citations omitted).

[7] See, e.g., 1 Stat. 189 (1791) (admission of Kentucky, with the consent of Virginia); 3 Stat. 544 (1820) (admission of Maine, with the consent of Massachusetts).

[8] See ArtIV.S3.C1.3 Equal Footing Doctrine Generally.

[9] In its acts of admission (or in enabling acts setting out a process for state admission), Congress has consistently specified that the new state is admitted "on an equal footing with the original states, in all respects whatever." See, e.g., 1 Stat. 491–92 (1796) (Tennessee); 2 Stat. 173 (1802) (Ohio); 5 Stat. 144 (1837) (Michigan); 9 Stat. 452 (1850) (California); 36 Stat. 557 (1910) (New Mexico and Arizona).

[10] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 573 (1911).

[11] Id. at 567–68, 573.

[12] 1 Stat. 191 (1791).

[13] 73 Stat. 4 (1959).

territories before their admission as states,[14] but that is not constitutionally required. Texas, for example, was an independent republic before it was annexed by the United States and admitted as state in 1845.[15]

ArtIV.S3.C1.2 Historical Background on Admissions Clause

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Articles of Confederation did not provide for any general process to admit new states.[1] Instead, the Articles stated that Canada (referring to what was then the British Province of Quebec) could join the Confederation as of right, but "no other colony shall be admitted" without the consent of nine states.[2] Despite this deficiency, the Confederation Congress enacted laws—most notably the Northwest Ordinance of 1787—which organized the territories of the United States, establishing a system of territorial government and a process for admitting new states from federal territory.[3]

At the Constitutional Convention, a provision for congressional authority to admit new states was one of the original resolutions in the Virginia Plan presented by Edmund Randolph.[4] The Convention rejected a proposal by Elbridge Gerry to limit the number of western states so that they should "never be able to outnumber the Atlantic states."[5] The Committee of Detail's early draft of the Clause required a supermajority (two-thirds) of Congress to admit a new state and explicitly required that admission be "on the same terms with the original States."[6] Gouverneur Morris, however, successfully moved to remove the "same terms" language, over James Madison's objection,[7] arguing that Congress should be able [14] See U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2; ArtIV.S3.C2.3 Power of Congress over Territories.

[15] 5 Stat. 797 (1845); see also United States v. Texas, 143 U.S. 621, 634 (1892).

[1] See The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison).

[2] Articles of confederation of 1781, art. XI. ("Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the united states, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this union: but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine states.").

[3] See Northwest Ordinance of 1787, art. V. The Ordinance followed Virginia's 1784 cessation to the United States of its territory northwest of the Ohio river (and similar cessations by other states claiming the territory), upon the condition that new states should be formed from the territory and admitted to the union on an equal footing with the original states. See Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212, 221–22 (1845). The First Congress reenacted the Northwest Ordinance after the Constitution's ratification. 1 Stat. 50 (1789).

[4] See 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] ("Resolvd. that provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a 'voluntary junction of Government & Territory or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the National legislature less than the whole.") & 121 (approval of the resolution).

[5] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 4, at 3.

[6] Id. at 188. This language echoed the Northwest Ordinance's provision that new states from the territory would be admitted "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." Northwest Ordinance of 1787, art. V.

[7] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 4, at 454 (Madison argued that "the Western States neither would nor ought to submit to a Union which degraded them from an equal rank with the other States.").

to set the terms for state admission to limit the power of new western states.[8] Morris, joined by Luther Martin, also successfully moved to strike out the congressional supermajority requirement for admission.[9]

The remaining debates focused on whether the consent of an affected state should be required when a new state is formed from its territory. Luther Martin repeatedly argued that a consent requirement would give "large States claiming the Western lands" (such as Virginia and North Carolina) an effective veto over the admission of new states.[10] The prevailing view at the Convention, however, was that Congress should not have the power to "dismember a State without its consent."[11] After some minor changes intended to facilitate the admission of Vermont,[12] Gouverneur Morris and John Dickinson proposed language substantially similar to the final Admissions Clause, which passed the Convention.[13]

ArtIV.S3.C1.3 Equal Footing Doctrine Generally

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Despite the Constitutional Convention's rejection of explicit language guaranteeing the equality of newly admitted states, Congress has provided in state admission acts that the new state enters the union "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."[1] With the admission of Louisiana in 1812, the principle of equality was extended to states created out of territory not possessed by the United States at the time of the Constitution's ratification.[2]

The equal footing doctrine is a constitutional requirement and not merely a statutory interpretation of Congress's acts of admission.[3] The Supreme Court has held the sovereign equality of states to be an inherent attribute of the "Union" envisioned in the Constitution.[4] The constitutional basis for the doctrine was clear at least by the 1845 decision in Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, if not before.[5]

---

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 454.

[10] Id. at 455; see also id. at 463–64.

[11] Id. at 455 (statement of Roger Sherman); see also id. at 462.

[12] Id. at 463.

[13] See id. at 464 ("New States may be admitted by the Legislature into the Union: but no new State shall be hereafter formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any of the present States without the consent of the Legislature of such State as well as of the General Legislature.") & 465 ("Nor shall any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts thereof, without the consent of the Legislatures of such States, as well as of the Legislature of the U. States."). The Committee of Style merged these two clauses and edited this language into its final form. Id. at 578, 602.

[1] See, e.g., 1 Stat. 491 (1796) (Tennessee); see generally Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212, 221 (1845). Vermont and Kentucky were admitted using somewhat different terminology. 1 Stat. 191 (1791); 1 Stat. 189 (1791).

[2] 2 Stat. 701, 703 (1812).

[3] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 567 (1911).

[4] Id.; accord McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry., 235 U.S. 151 (1914); Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Illinois, 146 U.S. 387, 434 (1892); Knight v. U.S. Land Ass'n, 142 U.S. 161, 183 (1891); Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 57, 65 (1873).

[5] 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212 (1845); see also Mayor of New Orleans v. United States, 35 U.S. (10 Pet.) 662 (1836); Permoli v. Municipality No. 1 of New Orleans, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 589 (1845).

Pollard's Lessee involved conflicting claims to certain partially inundated lands covered by the Mobile River in the city of Mobile, Alabama.[6] The enabling act for the admission of Alabama had contained both a declaration of equal footing and an explicit reservation to the United States of these lands, as covered by "navigable waters."[7] The plaintiff in Pollard's Lessee derived his claim from a grant by the United States after Alabama's admission as state.[8] The key question in the case was thus whether the United States could convey valid title to the property. Because the original states had sovereignty and jurisdiction over their navigable waters and the soil beneath them, the Court reasoned that retention by the United States of title to such lands, as a condition of statehood, would put Alabama on an unequal footing with the original states.[9] Thus, at its admission, Alabama acquired sovereignty over its "navigable waters and soils under them . . . and no compact that might be made between her and the United States could diminish or enlarge these rights."[10]

In the 1911 decision Coyle v. Smith, the Court invalidated a restriction imposed by Congress in the enabling act for the admission of Oklahoma, which purported to require that the new state's capital be located at Guthrie until 1913.[11] The Court held that Congress could not use conditions on admission to "restrict the powers of such new state in respect of matters which would otherwise be exclusively within the sphere of state power."[12] To diminish state sovereignty in this way would violate the Constitution by creating "a union of States unequal in power, as including States whose powers were restricted only by the Constitution, with others whose powers had been further restricted by an act of Congress accepted as a condition of admission."[13]

Broadly speaking, every new state may exercise all the powers of government which belong to the original thirteen states.[14] It acquires general jurisdiction, civil and criminal, for the preservation of public order, and the protection of persons and property throughout its territory, except on lands the United States has reserved as its property.[15] Conditions of territorial government, such as the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 and similar acts, are no longer operative once a state is admitted, except when adopted by state law.[16] It also follows from the equal footing doctrine that the citizens of a territory, upon admission, "became citizens of the United States and of the [admitted] state."[17]

Historically, the equal footing doctrine has been applied almost exclusively in the context of conditions on the admission of new states.[18] More recently, the Supreme Court in the 2000s

---

[6] Pollard's Lessee, 44 U.S. at 219–20.

[7] 3 Stat. 489, 492 (1819).

[8] Pollard's Lessee, 44 U.S. at 219.

[9] Id. at 228–29.

[10] Id.; see also id. at 222–23.

[11] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 579 (1911); 34 Stat, 267, 269 (1906).

[12] Coyle, 221 U.S. at 568.

[13] Id. at 567.

[14] Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212, 223 (1845); McCabe v. Atchison T. & S.F. Ry., 235 U.S. 151 (1914).

[15] Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U.S. 151, 167 (1886).

[16] Permoli v. Municipality No. 1, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 589, 609 (1845); Escanaba & Lake Mich. Transp. Co. v. City of Chicago, 107 U.S. 678, 689 (1883); Sands v. Manistee River Imp. Co., 123 U.S. 288, 296 (1887); see also Withers v. Buckley, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 84, 92 (1858); Huse v. Glover, 119 U.S. 543 (1886); Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U.S. 1, 9 (1888); Cincinnati v. Louisville & Nashville R.R., 223 U.S. 390 (1912).

[17] Boyd v. Nebraska ex rel. Thayer, 143 U.S. 135, 176 (1892).

[18] See South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 328–29 (1966) ("The doctrine of the equality of States . . . applies only to the terms upon which States are admitted to the Union, and not to the remedies for local evils which have subsequently appeared." (citations omitted)).

and 2010s has relied on the general principle of equality sovereignty among the states to strike down both federal and state laws outside the state admission context.[19]

ArtIV.S3.C1.4 Permissible Conditions on State Admissions

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The equal footing doctrine does not mean that Congress may not place any conditions in legislation admitting new states. Rather, Congress has broad power to impose conditions under its authority over federal territories,[1] its enumerated powers,[2] and the Admissions Clause itself. The equal footing doctrine only prohibits conditions which limit state sovereignty after admission, in areas that are "exclusively within the sphere of state power."[3] It follows that at least two broad categories of admission conditions are constitutional notwithstanding the equal footing doctrine.

First, Congress may impose "provisions which are fulfilled by the admission of the state."[4] For example, Congress may require the population of a territory to have a certain number of inhabitants before it seeks admission[5] or that proposed state laws or constitutions meet congressional standards (and be ratified by the people of the state) to qualify for admission.[6] As the Supreme Court has stated, the Admissions Clause "is not a mandate, but a power to be exercised with discretion."[7] Congressional prerequisites for admission do not violate the equal footing doctrine because they do not bind the newly sovereign state after admission.[8]

Second, Congress may impose post-statehood requirements in state admission acts that would be a valid exercise of congressional power if they were subject of federal legislation after admission.[9] Thus, Congress may include in an admission or enabling act regulations of interstate commerce or commerce with Indian Tribes, or regulations of federal lands within a state.[10] Such provisions derive force not from their acceptance as a term of admission but from the Supremacy Clause[11] and "the power of Congress extended to the subject."[12] Because

---

[19] See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. v. Hyatt, 136 S. Ct. 1277, 1282 (2016); Shelby Cnty. v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529 (2013) (citing Nw. Austin Mun. Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U.S. 193, 203 (2009)); see also Amdt10.4.3 Equal Sovereignty Doctrine.

[1] See ArtIV.S3.C2.3 Power of Congress over Territories.

[2] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

[3] Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 568 (1911).

[4] See id.

[5] See, e.g., 1 Stat. 50, 53 (1798).

[6] See, e.g., 13 Stat. 30, 31 (1864) (conditions for Nevada's constitution); 2 Stat. 173, 174 (1802) (conditions for Ohio's constitution); see generally Permoli v. Municipality No. 1 of City of New Orleans, 44 U.S. 589 (1845).

[7] Coyle, 221 U.S. at 568.

[8] See Bolln v. Nebraska, 176 U.S. 83, 89 (1900).

[9] Coyle, 221 U.S. at 573–74.

[10] See, e.g., Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U.S. 223 (1900) (regulation of federal lands); United States v. Sandoval, 231 U.S. 28 (1913) (regulating commerce with Indian tribes); United States v. Chavez, 290 U.S. 357 (1933) (same); Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1888) (prevention of interference with navigability of waterways under the interstate Commerce Clause).

[11] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2; see ArtVI.C2.1 Overview of Supremacy Clause.

[12] Coyle, 221 U.S. at 574.

Congress's power in these areas extends equally to the original states, such legislation is not invalid under the equal footing doctrine just because it is part of an act of state admission.

ArtIV.S3.C1.5 Equal Footing and Property Rights in Submerged Lands

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The equal footing doctrine has great significance for the property rights to land under navigable waters[1] and tidally influenced waters.[2] In Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, the Supreme Court held that the equal footing doctrine requires that the title to lands beneath navigable waters generally passes to a new state upon its admission.[3] The principle of this case supplies the rule of decision for many property disputes decided by the Court.[4] The Court has summarized title consequences of the equal footing doctrine as follows:

> Upon statehood, the State gains title within its borders to the beds of waters then navigable (or tidally influenced). It may allocate and govern those lands according to state law subject only to the paramount power of the United States to control such waters for purposes of navigation in interstate and foreign commerce. The United States retains any title vested in it before statehood to any land beneath waters not then navigable (and not tidally influenced), to be transferred or licensed if and as it chooses.[5]

Beginning with the 1894 case Shively v. Bowlby, the Court has recognized the authority of the United States, while territorial status continues, to transfer title to land below navigable waters when necessary for "public purposes appropriate to the objects for which the United States hold the territory."[6] Thus, despite the rule of Pollard's Lessee, the United States may "defeat a prospective State's title to land under navigable waters by a prestatehood conveyance of the land to a private party for a public purpose appropriate to the Territory."[7] The United

[1] "Navigable waters," for equal footing purposes, are those waters used, or susceptible to use, for trade and travel at the time of statehood. PPL Montana, LLC v. Montana, 565 U.S. 576, 590–92 (2012). Navigability of rivers is determined on a segment-by-segment basis, and lands under portions of a stream that were impassable at statehood were not conveyed by force of the doctrine. Id. at 594–60; see also United States v. Utah, 283 U.S. 64 (1931).

[2] See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Mississippi, 484 U.S. 469, 476 (1988); Knight v. U.S. Land Ass'n, 142 U.S. 161, 183 (1891).

[3] 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212, 223 (1845); see also Martin v. Waddell, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 367, 410 (1842).

[4] See, e.g., PPL Montana, LLC, 565 U.S. 576; Phillips Petroleum Co., 484 U.S. 469; Utah Div. of State Lands v. United States, 482 U.S. 193 (1987); Oregon ex rel. State Land Bd. v. Corvallis Sand & Gravel Co., 429 U.S. 363 (1977); Texas v. Louisiana, 410 U.S. 702 (1973); Bonelli Cattle Co. v. Arizona, 414 U.S. 313 (1973), overruled by Corvallis Sand & Gravel Co., 429 U.S. 363 (1977); Utah v. United States, 403 U.S. 9 (1971); Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Illinois, 146 U.S. 387 (1892); Hallett v. Beebe, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 25 (1851); Pollard v. Kibbe, 50 U.S. (9 How.) 471 (1850).

[5] PPL Montana LLC, 565 U.S. at 591 (citations and quotations omitted).

[6] Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U.S. 1, 48 (1894); see also Joy v. St. Louis, 201 U.S. 332 (1906). Shively explained that the United States might make such transfers "whenever it becomes necessary to perform international obligations, or to effect the improvement of such lands for the promotion and convenience of commerce with foreign nations and among the several states" or "in case of some international duty or public exigency." 152 U.S. at 48, 50.

[7] Utah Div. of State Lands, 482 U.S. at 197; Choctaw Nation v. Oklahoma, 397 U.S. 620, 634–35 (1970).

States may also defeat a prospective state's title through a clear intention to reserve submerged lands to itself as part of a federal reservation, such as a wildlife refuge, or an Indian reservation.[8]

That said, because control over property underlying navigable waters is so closely tied to state sovereignty,[9] states enjoy a strong "presumption of title" to submerged lands beneath inland navigable waters within their boundaries.[10] To determine whether that presumption is overcome, courts apply a two-step test: (1) "whether the United States clearly intended to include submerged lands within the reservation"; and (2) "whether the United States expressed its intent to retain federal title to [the] submerged lands."[11] Intent by the United States to defeat state title must be "'definitely declared or otherwise made very plain.'"[12]

In 1947, the Court in United States v. California refused to extend Pollard's Lessee's rule for land under inland navigable waters to submerged lands in the three-mile marginal belt under the ocean along a state's coast.[13] Whether the states or the federal government had rights to these lands "became of great potential importance at the beginning of [the twentieth] century when oil was discovered there."[14] Examining the historical evidence, the Court held that, unlike inland navigable waters, the thirteen original colonies did not acquire ownership of the land under their marginal seas upon independence and that therefore "national rights are paramount."[15]

Indeed, the Court applied the Pollard's Lessee principle in reverse for lands under marginal seas in United States v. Texas.[16] Although Texas was an independent republic with conceded sovereignty over the submerged lands of its marginal sea before its annexation to the United States, Texas was held to have implicitly surrendered its sovereignty over these submerged lands upon admission.[17] Congress responded to the California and Texas decisions in 1953 through the Submerged Lands Act[18] and Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act.[19] These laws divided jurisdiction over the continental shelf, with Congress generally ceding to the coastal states title to submerged lands at a specified distance from their coasts (generally three geographical miles).[20] For its part, the United States confirmed its exclusive control over the outer continental shelf, meaning all submerged lands beyond those reserved to states and up the edge of the United States' jurisdiction and control.[21] The result of these laws is that,

[8] See, e.g., Alaska v. United States, 545 U.S. 75, 100 (2005) (United States reserved title to submerged lands under Glacier Bay); Idaho v. United States, 533 U.S. 262, 280–81 (2001) (United States reserved title to submerged lands under Lake Coeur d'Alene, in trust for the Coeur d'Alene Tribe); United States v. Alaska, 521 U.S. 1, 62 (1997) (United States reserved title to submerged lands beneath tidally influenced waters within the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge).

[9] Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 552 (1981).

[10] Alaska, 545 U.S. at 78–79.

[11] Id. at 100.

[12] Alaska, 521 U.S. at 34 (quoting United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49, 55 (1926)).

[13] United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 38 (1947); accord United States v. Louisiana, 339 U.S. 699 (1950).

[14] California, 332 U.S. at 38.

[15] Id. at 31, 36.

[16] 339 U.S. 707, 716 (1950); see also United States v. Maine, 420 U.S. 515 (1975) (reaffirming the California, Louisiana, and Texas cases).

[17] Texas, 339 U.S. at 718.

[18] 67 Stat. 29 (1953) (codified as amended at 43 U.S.C. §§ 1301–1315). The Court upheld the constitutionality of the Submerged Lands Act in Alabama v. Texas, 347 U.S. 272 (1954).

[19] 67 Stat. 462 (1953) (codified as amended at 43 U.S.C. §§ 1331–1356b).

[20] 43 U.S.C. §§ 1301(a)(1), 1311; see generally United States v. Alaska, 521 U.S. 1, 5–6 (1997); United States v. Louisiana, 363 U.S. 1, 6–10 (1960).

[21] 43 U.S.C. §§ 1331–32; see generally Parker Drilling Mgmt. Servs. v. Newton, No. 18-389, slip op. at 3–4 (U.S. June 10, 2019).

despite the Court's decision in California, state claims to submerged lands beneath waters within three nautical miles of their coasts are analyzed under the Pollard's Lessee framework.[22]

ArtIV.S3.C1.6 Equal Footing and Rights of Indian Tribes

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The constitutional authority of Congress to regulate commerce with Indian Tribes,[1] and of the United States to make treaties with them,[2] are not inconsistent with the equality of new states.[3] Congress may therefore impose conditions in an enabling act that regulate commerce with Indian Tribes, such as a condition forbidding the introduction of liquor into Indian territory, and those conditions remain valid after statehood.[4]

Similarly, treaties entered into between the United States Indian Tribes during a territorial period—which may, for example, grant the Tribe rights to fish in designated waters, or hunt and gather on lands ceded by a tribe to the United States—are not automatically extinguished by statehood.[5] Such treaty rights are valid unless Congress clearly indicates its intent to abrogate them in its act of admission, or the treaty itself makes clear that the parties intended the rights to terminate at statehood.[6] The United States may also transfer title in territorial lands to Indian Tribes by treaty, which is not extinguished by statehood; but title to property underlying navigable waters must be reserved or conveyed by a clear statement or it will pass to the state upon admission under the rule of Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan.[7]

Under the 1882 decision United States v. McBratney, when a state admission or enabling act contains no clear provision excluding state jurisdiction, state courts are vested with jurisdiction over crimes committed on Indian reservations by non-Indians against non-Indians upon statehood.[8] However, Congress may explicitly preempt state jurisdiction in Indian

---

[22] See Alaska v. United States, 545 U.S. 75, 78–79 (2005).

[1] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3; see ArtI.S8.C3.9.1 Scope of Commerce Clause Authority and Indian Tribes.

[2] U.S. Const. art. II, §2, cl. 2; see ArtII.S2.C2.1.3 Scope of Treaty-Making Power.

[3] See Dick v. United States, 208 U.S. 340. 405–06 (1908); accord Johnson v. Gearlds, 234 U.S. 422, 439 (1914); United States v. Sandoval, 231 U.S. 28, 47 (1913); Ex parte Webb, 225 U.S. 663 (1912).

[4] Sandoval, 231 U.S. at 49.

[5] See Minnesota v. Mille Lacs Band of Chippewa Indians, 526 U.S. 172, 204 (1999); United States v. Winans, 198 U.S. 371, 378 (1905). The Supreme Court formerly held to the contrary in Ward v. Race Horse, which had applied the equal footing doctrine to find that a treaty granting hunting rights to certain tribes was implicitly extinguished by Wyoming's admission as a state. 163 U.S. 504, 515–16 (1896), overruled by Herrera v. Wyoming, No. 17-532 (U.S. May 20, 2019). The Court later explained that Race Horse "rested on a false premise" that state sovereignty over natural resources was an area of exclusive state jurisdiction. Mille Lacs, 526 U.S. at 204. Rather, "[a]lthough States have important interests in regulating wildlife and natural resources within their borders, this authority is shared with the Federal Government when the Federal Government exercises one of its enumerated constitutional powers, such as treaty making." Id. In Herrera v. Wyoming, the Court definitively overruled the equal footing holding of Race Horse. See Herrera, slip op. at 11.

[6] Herrera, slip op. at 13–14; see also Mille Lacs, 526 U.S. at 206–07.

[7] See Idaho v. United States, 533 U.S. 262, 272–74 (2001); Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 551–52 (1981); see also United States v. State of Oregon, 295 U.S. 1, 14 (1935); United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49, 54–55 (1926).

[8] United States v. McBratney, 104 U. S. 621, 623–24 (1882); accord Draper v. United States, 164 U.S. 240, 245–247 (1896).

country by federal law, and state jurisdiction is implicitly preempted "when the exercise of state jurisdiction would unlawfully infringe on tribal self-government."[9] In Oklahoma v. Castro-Huerta, the Court extended McBratney's presumption of state criminal jurisdiction to crimes committed by non-Indians against Indians on Indian reservations, absent congressional preemption.[10] Because divesting a state of jurisdiction over crimes within its territory affects its sovereignty under the equal footing doctrine, the Court required "clear statutory language" in a state enabling act or another act of Congress to preclude state criminal jurisdiction over crimes by non-Indians.[11]

ArtIV.S3.C1.7 Effect of State Admission on Pending Judicial Proceedings

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 1:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

In its acts of admission, Congress may explicitly provide for the transfer and disposition of civil and criminal cases pending in the territorial courts following statehood, consistently with the Constitution.[1] Territorial courts are generally "legislative courts" not subject to Article III.[2] Because the federal government has plenary authority in a territory, there is no distinction between federal and state jurisdiction while the territory exists.[3]

After statehood, cases pending in the territorial courts of exclusive federal cognizance are generally transferred to the federal court having jurisdiction over the area.[4] Cases not cognizable in the federal courts are transferred to the tribunals of the new state, and those over which federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction may be transferred either to the state or federal courts by the party possessing the option under existing law.[5] When a formerly territorial case is transferred to a state court under the operation of the enabling act and the state constitution, the appellate procedure is governed by the state law.[6]

Without action from Congress, the Supreme Court may not directly review the decision of a territorial court of appeals after that court has ceased to exist following statehood.[7] But Congress may by law provide for Supreme Court appellate review of such cases or for their transfer to an appropriate federal court.[8] When Congress neglected to make provision for

---

[9] Oklahoma v. Castro-Huerta, No. 21-429, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 29, 2022).

[10] Id. at 6–7, 25.

[11] Id. at 23 (citing Draper, 164 U.S. at 242–43).

[1] See, e.g., 36 Stat. 557, 565–65 (1910) (treatment of cases pending in New Mexican territorial courts after state admission).

[2] See ArtIV.S3.C2.3 Power of Congress over Territories. The federal courts of the District of Columbia and territory of Puerto Rico, however, are Article III courts. See ArtIII.S1.9.4 District of Columbia and Territorial Courts.

[3] Benner v. Porter, 50 U.S. 235, 242 (1850); see generally ArtIII.S1.6.1 Overview of Relationship Between Federal and State Courts; ArtIII.S1.6.3 Doctrine on Federal and State Courts.

[4] Baker v. Morton, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 150, 153 (1871).

[5] Id.

[6] John v. Paullin, 231 U.S. 583 (1913).

[7] Hunt v. Palao, 45 U.S. (4 How.) 589 (1846).

[8] Benner, 50 U.S. (9 How.) at 245–46.

disposition of certain pending cases in an enabling act for the admission of a state, a subsequent act addressing the omission was held valid.[9]

Clause 2—Territory and Other Property

ArtIV.S3.C2.1 Property Clause Generally

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2:

> The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 3, Clause 2 of Article IV empowers Congress to dispose of and regulate constitutionally acquired federal property.[1] The Supreme Court has explained that "[t]he occasion for the grant was the obvious necessity of making provision for the government of the vast territory acquired by the United States."[2] The Supreme Court continued "[t]he grant was made in broad terms, and the power of regulation and disposition was not confined to territory, but extended to 'other property belonging to the United States,' so that the power may be applied . . . 'to the due regulation of all other personal and real property rightfully belonging to the United States.'"[3]

The Constitution does not address how the government may exercise this power, but the Supreme Court historically has described Congress's authority under the Property Clause as "plenary"[4] and "without limitations."[5] The Court has summarized Congress's authority, stating:

> With respect to the public domain, the Constitution vests in Congress the power of disposition and of making all needful rules and regulations. That power is subject to no limitations. Congress has the absolute right to prescribe the times, the conditions, and the mode of transferring this property, or any part of it, and to designate the persons to whom the transfer shall be made. No State legislation can interfere with this right or embarrass its exercise; and to prevent the possibility of any attempted interference with it . . . .[6]

Consequently, the Court has generally been deferential to congressional uses of Property Clause authority. In the 1840 decision United States v. Gratiot,[7] for instance, the Supreme Court interpreted the Property Clause as applying to a lease of a lead mine on government land. The defendants in that case argued that the phrase "dispose of" should be interpreted narrowly to apply to the sale but not the leasing of property, and that, therefore, Congress lacks

---

[9] Freeborn v. Smith, 69 U.S. (2 Wall.) 160 (1865).

[1] Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529, 537–38 (1976); Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U.S. 46, 89 (1907); see Camfield v. United States, 167 U.S. 518, 524 (1897) (holding that "the government has, with respect to its own lands, the rights of an ordinary proprietor").

[2] Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 331 (1936).

[3] Id. (quoting Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §§ 1325–26 (1833)).

[4] Cal. Coastal Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 594 (1987).

[5] Id. (quoting United States v. City of San Francisco, 310 U.S. 16, 29–30 (1940)). See also Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 294–95 (1958); Alabama v. Texas, 347 U.S. 272, 273 (1954); FPC v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U.S. 17, 21 (1952); United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 27 (1947); Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 92, 99 (1872); United States v. Gratiot, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 526, 537 (1840).

[6] Gibson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 99.

[7] 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 526 (1840).

the power "to give or authorize leases of the public lands."[8] In upholding the lease, the Court rejected such a narrow interpretation, stating that "disposal must be left to the discretion of Congress."[9] Nearly a century later, the Court similarly rejected a narrow interpretation of the Property Clause in a challenge over a statutorily authorized contract through which the federal agency, the Tennessee Valley Authority, agreed to purchase power lines and real property for the construction of a dam. In that case, the Court held that the Clause extended to the disposal of potential electrical energy made available by the construction of a dam, as well as the transmission lines and other equipment necessary to generate the energy.[10]

ArtIV.S3.C2.2 Federal and State Power Over Public Lands

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2:

> The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

The Property Clause provides that public lands may only be disposed of with congressional authorization.[1] The Supreme Court has held "that the power of Congress is exclusive, and that only through its exercise in some form can rights in lands belonging to the United States be acquired."[2] However, the Court held that, by being aware of and doing nothing to halt the long-time practice of presidents withdrawing land from the public domain by Executive Orders, Congress had acquiesced to the practice.[3] In 1976, Congress reversed course by passing legislation establishing procedures for land withdrawals and explicitly repealing congressional acquiescence to the practice, as well as any implicit executive withdrawal authority.[4]

Congress may dispose of public property in a manner that furthers public policy, as determined exclusively by Congress.[5] The Court has likened congressional authority over federal land within states to that of states' police power.[6] The Court has explained that "[t]he general government doubtless has a power over its own property analogous to the police power of the several states, and the extent to which it may go in the exercise of such power is measured by the exigencies of the particular case."[7] In its 1976 Kleppe v. New Mexico decision, the Court restated the applicable principles governing Congress's power under the Property

[8] Id. at 533.

[9] Id. at 538. See also Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529, 541 (1976) ("In short, Congress exercises the powers both of a proprietor and of a legislature over the public domain.") (citing Alabama v. Texas, 347 U.S. at 273; Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 297 (1929) (repudiated on other grounds by United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 519–20 (1995)); United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U.S. 459, 474 (1915)).

[10] Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 335–40 (1936). See also Ala. Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U.S. 464 (1938).

[1] United States v. Fitzgerald, 40 U.S. (15 Pet.) 407, 421 (1841). See also Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States, 243 U.S. 389, 403–04 (1917).

[2] Utah Power & Light Co., 243 U.S. at 404.

[3] Sioux Tribe v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, 324–25 (1942); United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U.S. 459, 469 (1915).

[4] Pub. L. No. 94–579, § 704(a), 90 Stat. 2792 (1976).

[5] United States v. City of San Francisco, 310 U.S. 16, 30 (1940) ("The power over the public land thus entrusted to Congress is without limitations. And it is not for the courts to say how that trust shall be administered. That it for Congress. Thus, Congress may constitutionally limit the disposition of the public domain to a manner consistent with its views of public policy." (internal citations omitted)). See also Light v. United States, 220 U.S. 523, 535–36 (1911).

[6] Camfield v. United States, 167 U.S. 518, 525 (1897).

[7] Id.

Clause unanimously upholding a federal law to protect wild-roaming horses and burros on federal lands.[8] The Court explained that the Property Clause, in broad terms, gives Congress the power to determine what are "'needful' rules 'respecting' the public lands."[9] The Court continued that, while the outer limits of this authority is unsettled, "we have repeatedly observed that '[t]he power over the public land thus entrusted to Congress is without limitations.'"[10]

Over the course of the Nation's history, the Court has held that Congress's authority over public land includes: the right "to prescribe the times, the conditions, and the mode of transferring this property, or any part of it, and to designate the persons to whom the transfer shall be made"[11]; "to declare the dignity and effect of titles emanating from the United States"[12]; to determine the validity of grants which precede the government's acquisition of the property[13]; to exempt lands privately acquired under the homestead laws from previously contracted debts[14]; to withdraw land from settlement and to prohibit grazing thereon[15]; to restrict the construction of fencing on private land that abuts public land to prevent the unlawful occupation of public property[16]; to limit destruction of federal property[17]; to define and abate nuisances that affect the property[18]; to prohibit the introduction of liquor on lands purchased by the federal government for an Indian reservation[19]; and to protect wildlife located on public land.[20]

In Kleppe, the Court recognized that Congress's power over federal lands includes power to regulate the lands, stating "Absent consent or cession a State undoubtedly retains jurisdiction over federal lands within its territory, but Congress equally surely retains the power to enact legislation respecting those lands pursuant the Property Clause."[21] No state may tax federal property pursuant to state authority,[22] nor may state legislation interfere with the power of Congress under the Property Clause or embarrass its exercise.[23] Moreover, when Congress acts with respect to lands covered by the Clause, its legislation preempts conflicting state

[8] Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529, 539 (1976).

[9] Id.

[10] Id. (quoting City of San Francisco, 310 U.S. at 29–30). See also Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 294–295 (1958); Alabama v. Texas, 347 U.S. 272, 273 (1954); FPC v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U.S. 17, 21 (1952); United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 27 (1947); Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 92, 99 (1872); United States v. Gratiot, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 526, 537 (1840).

[11] Gibson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 99. See also Emblem v. Lincoln Land Co., 184 U.S. 660, 664 (1902); Irvine v. Marshall, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 558, 566–67 (1858).

[12] Bagnell v. Broderick, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 436, 450 (1839). See also Field v. Seabury, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 323, 332 (1857).

[13] Tameling v. U.S. Freehold & Immigr. Co., 93 U.S. 644, 663 (1877). See also Maxwell Land-Grant Case, 121 U.S. 325, 365–66 (1887).

[14] Ruddy v. Rossi, 248 U.S. 104, 107 (1918).

[15] Light v. United States, 220 U.S. 523, 535–36 (1911). See also The Yosemite Valley Case, 82 U.S. (15 Wall.) 77, 93–94 (1873).

[16] Id. See also United States v. Waddell, 112 U.S. 76, 79–80 (1884); Jourdan v. Barrett, 45 U.S. (4 How.) 169 (1846).

[17] Hunt v. United States, 278 U.S. 96, 101 (1928).

[18] Camfield v. United States, 167 U.S. 518, 525 (1897).

[19] United States v. McGowan, 302 U.S. 535, 539 (1938).

[20] Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529, 539 (1976); McKelvey v. United States, 260 U.S. 353, 359 (1922).

[21] Kleppe, 426 U.S. at 543 (citing Mason Co. v. Tax Comm'n of Wash., 302 U.S. 186, 197 (1937); Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States, 243 U.S. 389, 403–405 (1917); Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U.S. 276, 283 (1899)). See also Wilson v. Cook, 327 U.S. 474, 487–88 (1946); Surplus Trading Co. v. Cook, 281 U.S. 647, 650 (1930).

[22] Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U.S. 151 (1886).

[23] Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 92, 99 (1872). See also Emblem v. Lincoln Land Co., 184 U.S. 660, 664 (1902); Irvine v. Marshall, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 558 (1858).

laws.[24] Thus, by virtue of the Treaty of 1868 through which the federal government agreed to allow an Indian tribe living on a reservation in Arizona to engage in self-governance, the tribal court, rather than Arizona state courts, had jurisdiction over a suit for a debt owed by a tribal resident to a non-Indian operating a federally licensed store on the reservation.[25]

Federal law resolves questions of whether title to land formerly owned by the United States has been conveyed to another.[26] After title has passed from the United States, however, "that property, like all other property in the state, is subject to the state legislation; so far as that legislation is consistent with the admission that the title passed and vested according to the laws of the United States."[27] Courts also will look to state law to address questions of precisely what property the federal government conveyed to a grantee.[28] However, a state statute enacted after a federal grant of property cannot operate to vest in the state rights that either remained in the United States or passed to its grantee.[29]

ArtIV.S3.C2.3 Power of Congress over Territories

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2:

> The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Congress holds broad authority over territories of the United States.[1] The Court has held that, with regard to territories, "Congress has the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and local, Federal and state, and has full legislative power over all subjects upon which the legislature of a state might legislate within the state."[2] Congress may legislate directly with respect to the local affairs of a territory, or it may delegate that power to the territories,[3] except as limited by the Constitution.[4] Pursuant to this authority, for example, Congress has

[24] Kleppe, 426 U.S. 529; Cal. Coastal Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 593–94 (1987) (applying traditional preemption analysis to a question of whether state environmental laws apply to a private company utilizing an unpatented mining permit on federal land).

[25] Williams v. Lee, 358 U.S. 217, 223 (1959).

[26] United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. 1, 28 (1935) ("The laws of the United States alone control the disposition of title to its lands. The states are powerless to place any limitation or restriction on that control.").

[27] Wilcox v. McConnel, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 498, 517 (1839).

[28] Oklahoma v. Texas, 258 U.S. 574, 595 (1922) ("if its [i.e., a federal treaty or statute conveying federal property] intention be not otherwise shown, it will be taken to have assented that its conveyance should be construed and given effect in this particular according to the law of the state in which the land lies.").

[29] United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. at 29 ("In construing a conveyance by the United States of land within a state, the settled and reasonable rule of construction of the state affords a guide in determining what impliedly passes to the grantee as an incident to land expressly granted.").

[1] Hooven & Allison Co. v. Evatt, 324 U.S. 652, 673–74 (1945); Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 305 (1922); Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138, 149 (1904); United States v. Gratiot, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 526, 537 (1840); Sere & Laralde v. Pitot, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 332, 336–37 (1810). See also Vermilya-Brown Co. v. Connell, 335 U.S. 377, 381 (1948); United States v. Vaello Madero, No. 20-303, slip op. at 2 (U.S. Apr. 21, 2022) (explaining that the Territory Clause "affords Congress broad authority to legislate with respect to the U.S. Territories" and that, in "[e]xercising that authority, Congress sometimes legislates differently with respect to the Territories . . . that it does with respect to the States.").

[2] Simms v. Simms, 175 U.S. 162, 168 (1899). See also El Paso & Ne. Ry. v. Gutierrez, 215 U.S. 87 (1909); United States v. McMillan, 165 U.S. 504, 510 (1897); The Late Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1, 42 (1890); First Nat'l Bank v. County of Yankton, 101 U.S. 129, 133 (1880).

[3] Binns v. United States, 194 U.S. 486, 491 (1904). See also Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U.S. 15, 44 (1885); Sere & Laralde, 10 U.S. (6 Cr.) at 336.

[4] Simms, 175 U.S. at 163; Wagoner v. Evans, 170 U.S. 588, 591 (1898); Walker v. New Mexico & S. Pac. R.R., 165 U.S. 593, 604 (1897)

prohibited territorial legislatures from enacting local or special laws on enumerated subjects.[5] Further, Congress has extended the full range of constitutional protections enjoyed by United States residents in territories that have been incorporated as a part of the country by congressional action,[6] but has not done so in "unincorporated" territories (that is, those territories not clearly on the pathway to U.S. statehood).[7] Congress may establish, either directly or indirectly through authorization to a territorial legislature, "legislative courts" pursuant to the Property Clause rather than "constitutional courts" established by Article III.[8] These legislative courts also may exercise admiralty jurisdiction despite the fact that admiralty jurisdiction may be exercised in the states only by Article III courts.[9] Congress also may establish non-judicial territorial offices,[10] and if the powers and duties assigned to these offices are "primarily local" in nature, then the manner of appointment for officials to these offices does not have to comply with Article II's Appointments Clause.[11]

---

[5] Binns, 194 U.S. at 491. See also Murphy, 114 U.S. at 44; Sere & Laralde, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) at 336.

[6] Simms, 175 U.S. at 163; Wagoner, 170 U.S. at 591; Walker, 165 U.S. at 604.

[7] Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 (1922); Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138 (1904); Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901) (collectively, the Insular Cases). The Court stated: "The guaranties of certain fundamental personal rights declared in the Constitution, as, for instance, that no person could be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," apply to persons in Puerto Rico. Balzac, 258 U.S. at 312. However, the full scope of constitutional provisions that are applicable in Puerto Rico and the other territories is unsettled. Id. ("The Constitution, however, contains grants of power, and limitations which in the nature of things are not always and everywhere applicable and the real issue in the Insular Cases was not whether the Constitution extended to the Philippines or Porto Rico when we went there, but which ones of its provisions were applicable by way of limitation upon the exercise of executive and legislative power in dealing with new conditions and requirements."). See also Posadas de P.R. Assocs. v. Tourism Co. of P.R., 478 U.S. 328, 331 n.1 (1986) (equality of voting rights applicable in Puerto Rico); Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party, 457 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1982) (First Amendment speech applicable in Puerto Rico); Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974) (procedural due process applicable in Puerto Rico); Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465 (1979) (search and seizure applicable in Puerto Rico); Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572 (1976) (equal protection principles applicable in Puerto Rico); Ocampo v. United States, 234 U.S. 91 (1914) (Sixth Amendment jury trial applicable in Philippines); Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197 (1903) (grand jury indictment and trial by jury applicable in Hawaii). See also Califano v. Torres, 435 U.S. 1, 4 n.6 (1978) (right to travel assumed). The vitality of the Insular Cases has been questioned by some Justices (see, e.g., Harris v. Rosario, 446 U.S. 651, 652–53 (1980); Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465, 474, 475 (1979) (concurring opinion of four justices)) Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 14 (1957) (plurality opinion)), but the Court adheres to it (United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 268 (1990)). See also Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. for P.R. v. Aurelius Inv., LLC, 140 S. Ct. 1649, 1655 (2020) (describing the Insular Cases as "much-criticized," but declining to overrule them "whatever their continued validity.").

[8] Am. Ins. Co. v. Canter, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 511, 546 (1828). See also Romeu v. Todd, 206 U.S. 358, 368–69 (1907); United States v. McMillan, 165 U.S. 504, 510 (1897); McAllister v. United States, 141 U.S. 174, 180 (1891); The City of Panama, 101 U.S. 453, 460 (1880); Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 154 (1879); Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 648, 655 (1874); Clinton v. Englebrecht, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 434, 447 (1872); Benner v. Porter 9 (How.) 235, 236 (1850).

[9] Am. Ins. Co. v. Canter, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) at 545 ("Although admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the states in those Courts, only, which are established in pursuance of the 3d article of the Constitution; the same limitation does not extend to the territories."); The City of Panama, 101 U.S. at 460.

[10] Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. for P.R., 140 S. Ct. at 1654–55.

[11] Id. at 1665. See ArtII.S2.C2.3.4 Ambassadors, Ministers, and Consuls Appointments.

Section 4—Republican Form of Government

ArtIV.S4.1 Historical Background on Guarantee of Republican Form of Government

Article IV, Section 4:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

Article IV, Section 4 is generally known as the "Guarantee Clause."[1] Through its terms, the United States makes three related assurances to the states: (1) a guarantee of a republican form of government; (2) protection against foreign invasion; and (3) upon request by the state, protection against internal insurrection or rebellion.[2]

An early version of the Guarantee Clause was among the resolutions of the Virginia Plan introduced at the Constitutional Convention by Edmund Randolph and attributed to James Madison.[3] The resolution went through several formulations during the debates at the Convention.[4] During a key debate, Gouverneur Morris objected to the resolution because "[h]e should be very unwilling that such laws as exist in R[hode] Island ought to be guarantied."[5] Randolph explained that, rather than cementing the existing laws of the states, the resolution had two objects: "1. to secure Republican Government[;] 2. to suppress domestic commotions."[6] Along with concerns about rebellions, delegates expressed fears that a monarchy might arise in a particular state and "establish a tyranny over the whole [United States]."[7]

Answering Morris's objection, Madison moved to substitute language that "the Constitutional authority of the States shall be guarant[eed] to them respectively [against] domestic as well as foreign violence,"[8] with Randolph then moving to add language that "no State shall be at liberty to form any other than a Republican [Government]."[9] James Wilson

---

[1] See, e.g., New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 183 (1992); Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Mont., 436 U.S. 371, 379 (1978). At times, particularly in older cases, the term is spelled "Guaranty Clause." See, e.g., Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 209 (1962); Texas v. White, 74 U.S. 700, 729 (1868).

[2] U.S. Const. art. IV, § 4. The Clause uses the term "domestic violence" in the now-archaic sense of "[i]nsurrection or unlawful force fomented from within a country," and not the modern usage meaning violence between romantic partners or within a household. See Domestic Violence, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2022); The Federalist No. 21 (Alexander Hamilton) .

[3] See 1 Max Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22 (Max Farrand, ed. 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] ("Resd. that a Republican government & the territory of each State . . . ought to be guaranteed by the United States to each State."). In an April 1787 letter to Randolph, Madison suggested that "an article ought to be inserted expressly guaranteeing the tranquility of the states against internal as well as external danger. . . . Unless the Union be organized efficiently on republican principles innovations of a much more objectionable form may be obtruded." 2 Writings of James Madison 336 (G. Hunt ed., 1900). For background on the origins of the Guarantee Clause, see W. Wiecek, The Guaranteeadmit a new state Clause of the U.S. Constitution ch. 1 (1972).

[4] On June 11, 1787, the original resolution was amended to read "Resolved that a republican constitution and its existing laws ought to be guaranteed to each state by the United States." 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 193–94.

[5] See 2 id. at 47; see also 2 id. at 48 (delegates expressing worry about "perpetuating the existing Constitutions of states" and the difficulty of having the federal government decide between competing state governments).

[6] Id. This statement echoed Randolph's earlier argument that "a republican government must be the basis of our national union; and no state in it ought to have it in their power to change its government into a monarchy." See 1 id. at 206.

[7] 2 id. at 48.

[8] 2 id. at 47–48

[9] 2 id. at 48.

then introduced, as a "better expression of the idea," language substantially similar to the final form of the Guarantee Clause, which the Convention approved unanimously.[10]

In light of its text and framing, the Guarantee Clause was intended to be more than an authorization for the federal government to protect states against foreign invasion or internal insurrection,[11] a power already conferred elsewhere in the Constitution.[12] While the precise contours of what constitutes a "republican form of government" are debatable,[13] an additional object of the Guarantee Clause was to prevent states from establishing monarchical or despotic governments.[14]

Except for a brief period during Reconstruction, the authority granted by the Guarantee Clause has been largely unexplored.[15] The Supreme Court and other federal courts have largely declined to hear legal challenges based on the Guarantee Clause because they present nonjusticiable political questions.[16]

ArtIV.S4.2 Guarantee Clause Generally

Article IV, Section 4:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

In Luther v. Borden,[1] the Supreme Court in 1849 held that questions arising under the Guarantee Clause are generally political, and not judicial, in character.[2] Luther was formally an action for damages for trespass, but under the rather "unusual" circumstances of Dorr's Rebellion, a pro-suffrage revolt that led to two competing claimants for Rhode Island's lawful government.[3] The defendants in Luther justified their breaking and entering into the plaintiff's home under a declaration of martial law and based on the plaintiff's alleged [10] 2 id. at 48–49 (resolving "that a Republican [form of Government shall] be guarantied to each State & that each State shall be protected agst. foreign & domestic violence"). The Committee of Detail added the language providing that state legislatures must first ask for protection against domestic violence. 2 id. at 144, 148, 159, 174. Later motions to strike that proviso failed, 2 id. at 466–67, and during that debate the word "foreign" before "invasion" was deleted as superfluous. Id.

[11] See generally The Federalist No. 21 (Alexander Hamilton); The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison).

[12] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 15 (granting Congress power to "provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"); see generally ArtI.S8.C15.1 Congress's Power to Call Militias.

[13] See Deborah Jones Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 23 (1988) ("Even today, the outer boundaries of the guarantee clause remain murky; no single scholarly work can capture the full meaning of 'republican government.'"); ArtIV.S4.3 Meaning of a Republican Form of Government.

[14] See 3 Story's Commentaries § 1808 ("The want of a [Guarantee Clause] was felt, as a capital defect in the plan of the confederation . . . . If a despotic or monarchical government were established in one state, it would bring on the ruin of the whole republic."); The Federalist No. 21 (Alexander Hamilton).

[15] See generally Wiecek, supra note 3, at chs. 5–7; Texas v. White, 74 U.S. 700, 728–29 (1868) (Chase, C.J.) (grounding the establishment of Reconstruction governments in the former Confederate states as an "exercise of the power conferred by the guaranty clause" to the United States).

[16] See, e.g., Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 223–28 (1962) (reviewing cases); Pac. States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118, 148–51 (1912); Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. 1, 42–47 (1849). But see New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 185 (1992) ("More recently, the Court has suggested that perhaps not all claims under the Guarantee Clause present nonjusticiable political questions." (citing Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 582 (1964))).

[1] 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849); see also ArtIII.S2.C1.9.3 Luther v. Borden and Guarantee Clause.

[2] Id. at 42.

[3] Id. at 29–30; see also Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 218–219 (1962) (summarizing facts and holding of Luther).

participation in insurrection. The plaintiff questioned the authority and republican character of the state government, alleging the defendants to be the insurrectionists.[4] Thus, to adjudicate the trespass claim in Luther was in effect to decide "which of two rival governments was the legitimate government of Rhode Island."[5]

Chief Justice Roger Taney held that the political branches of government, and not the federal courts, should decide such questions: "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State . . . as well as its republican character."[6]

Luther further held that it rested with Congress to determine the proper means to fulfill the guarantee of protection to the states against insurrection.[7] Although the Court suggested that Congress might have empowered the Judiciary to decide whether the federal government should intervene, Congress had instead authorized the President to call out the militia in the case of insurrection against a state's government.[8] It followed, reasoned Chief Justice Taney, that the President "must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress"; this political determination is not subject to judicial review.[9]

During Reconstruction, the Court in Texas v. White posited that the President's actions in establishing temporary state governments in the defeated Confederate states at the end of the Civil War was justified as an exercise of his powers as Commander in Chief.[10] Because "the power to carry into effect the clause of guaranty is primarily a legislative power, and resides in Congress," however, those arrangements were necessarily provisional.[11] It was generally up to Congress to organize and recognize new republican governments in these states.[12]

The next major controversies under the Guarantee Clause arose in the Progressive Era, where various state popular democratic reforms were alleged to destroy the republican form of government ensured by the Clause. In Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, the Supreme Court in 1912 declined to address a claim that the popular initiative and referendum provisions of Oregon's Constitution violated the Guarantee Clause.[13] Relying on Luther v. Borden, the Court dismissed the case for lack of jurisdiction as a political question "conferred upon Congress and not, therefore, within the reach of judicial power."[14]

In later cases summarily dismissing similar challenges, Pacific States and Luther came to stand for the proposition that Guarantee Clause questions are never justiciable.[15] Baker v.

---

[4] Luther, 48 U.S. at 34–35.

[5] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 184 (1992).

[6] Luther, 48 U.S. at 42.

[7] Id. at 42–43.

[8] 1 Stat. 424 (1795); 10 U.S.C. § 251.

[9] Luther, 48 U.S. at 43.

[10] 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 700, 729–30 (1869) (Chase, C.J.).

[11] Id. at 730–31.

[12] Id. Similarly, in Georgia v. Stanton, when the state challenged Reconstruction legislation on the premise that Georgia already had a republican form of government (and thus Congress could not act), the Court viewed the act of Congress as determinative and declined to address the question as a political matter. 73 U.S. 50, 76–77 (1867); see also Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U.S. 548, 578–79 (1900).

[13] 223 U.S. 118, 133–34, 140 (1912).

[14] Id. at 151.

[15] See Kiernan v. City of Portland, 223 U.S. 151 (1912); Marshall v. Dye, 231 U.S. 250, 256–57 (1913); City of Denver v. N.Y. Tr. Co., 229 U.S. 123, 141 (1913); Davis v. Ohio, 241 U.S. 565 (1916); O'Neill v. Leamer, 239 U.S. 244, 247–48 (1915); Ohio ex rel. Davis v. Hildebrant, 241 U.S. 565, 569–70 (1916); Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U.S. 219, 234 (1917); Ohio ex rel. Bryant v. Akron Metro. Park Dist., 281 U.S. 74, 79–80 (1930); Cochran v. La. State Bd. of Educ., 281 U.S. 370, 374 (1930); Highland Farms Dairy v. Agnew, 300 U.S. 608, 612 (1937); Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 556 (1946) (plurality opinion).

Carr, despite its general curbing of the political-question doctrine, left these Guarantee Clause precedents intact.[16] The Supreme Court continued to follow them through the 1980s.[17]

In the 1990s, however, the Court in dicta raised the possibility that "perhaps not all claims under the Guarantee Clause present nonjusticiable political questions."[18] In Gregory v. Ashcroft, the Court suggested that the Guarantee Clause might operate as a constraint upon Congress's power to regulate the activities of the states.[19] More recently, however, the Court has continued to find Guarantee Clause questions nonjusticiable despite opportunities to revive the Clause.[20]

ArtIV.S4.3 Meaning of a Republican Form of Government

Article IV, Section 4:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

Although the Supreme Court has generally avoided addressing Guarantee Clause questions because of their political character,[1] it has occasionally ruled on the merits of such challenges. These decisions, as well as contemporaneous sources, shed some light on the meaning of the "Republican Form of Government" guaranteed by the Clause.[2] For example, in the Federalist No. 39, James Madison emphasizes popular sovereignty and majoritarian control as among "the distinctive characters of the republican form":

In a few nineteenth century cases, however, the Court disposed of Guarantee Clause questions on the merits, despite Luther. See Forsyth v. City of Hammond, 166 U.S. 506, 519 (1897); Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162, 175–78 (1874).

[16] 369 U.S. 186, 218–32 (1962). Baker found that Guarantee Clause questions were nonjusticiable not because they involved matters of state governmental structure but because they lacked "judicially manageable standards which a court could utilize independently in order to identify a State's lawful government." Id. at 218, 222–23. Baker therefore held that the Guarantee Clause precedents "have no bearing" of the justiciability of a challenge to state legislative apportionment based on the Equal Protection Clause. Id. at 228.

[17] See City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 182 n.17 (1980); Quinn v. Millsap, 491 U.S. 95, 102 (1989).

[18] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 185 (1992) (citing Reynolds v. Sims, 377, 533, 582 (1964)).

[19] 501 U.S. 452, 463 (1991) ("[T]he authority of the people of the States to determine the qualifications of their most important government officials . . . is a power reserved to the States under the Tenth Amendment and guaranteed them by [the Guarantee Clause]." (citations omitted)). Both New York and Gregory cite the argument set out in Deborah Jones Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1988).

[20] See Rucho v. Common Cause, No. 18–422, slip op. at 30 (U.S. June 27, 2019) ("This Court has several times concluded, however, that the Guarantee Clause does not provide the basis for a justiciable claim."); Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm'n, 576 U.S. 787, 795 n.3 (2015) ("The people's sovereign right to incorporate themselves into a State's lawmaking apparatus . . . is one this Court has ranked a nonjusticiable political matter." (citing Pac. States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118 (1912)).

[1] See ArtIV.S4.2 Guarantee Clause Generally.

[2] For scholarly examinations of this issue, see, for example, W. Wiecek, The Guarantee Clause of the U.S. Constitution ch. 1 (1972); Deborah Jones Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 22–25 (1988) (finding "widespread agreement" among scholars that the "core" of republican government is "one in which the people control their rulers"); Akhil Reed Amar, The Central Meaning of a Republican Government: Popular Sovereignty, Majority Rule, and the Denominator Problem, 65 U. Colo. L. Rev. 749, 786 (1994) (concluding that the "central meaning" of the republican government in the Founding Era was "popular sovereignty, majority rule, and the people's right to alter or abolish [the government]"); Robert G. Natelson, A Republic, Not a Democracy—Initiative, Referendum, and the Constitution's Guarantee Clause, 80 Tex. L. Rev. 807, 814–15 (2002) (surveying historical sources to conclude that "republican form of government," as used in the Guarantee Clause, had three core features: majority rule, the absence of monarchy, and the rule of law).

ArtIV.S4.3
Meaning of a Republican Form of Government

> [W]e may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior. It is ESSENTIAL to such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion, or a favored class of it; . . . It is SUFFICIENT for such a government that the persons administering it be appointed, either directly or indirectly, by the people; and that they hold their appointments by either of the tenures just specified[.][3]

The 1874 case of Minor v. Happersett represents a rare instance of the Supreme Court directly deciding a Guarantee Clause issue. In Minor, the Court addressed whether Missouri's denial of the right to vote to women complied with the Constitution.[4] The Court stated that the Guarantee Clause leaves room for states to structure their governments in various ways yet remain "republican."[5] Relying on historical practice as dispositive of the matter, the Court held that the Guarantee Clause did not require women's suffrage because at the time of ratification, women "were excluded from suffrage in nearly all the States," with the franchise "only bestowed upon men and not upon all of them."[6] Later, the Court held in Forsyth v. City of Hammond that the Guarantee Clause did not prevent a state from determining municipal boundaries through its courts instead of the state legislature.[7]

In other cases, the Court found occasions to opine on the nature of a republican government guaranteed by the Clause in dicta. For example, In re Duncan observes:

> By the constitution, a republican form of government is guarant[eed] to every state in the Union, and the distinguishing feature of that form is the right of the people to choose their own officers for governmental administration, and pass their own laws in virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies, whose legitimate acts may be said to be those of the people themselves . . . .[8]

Similarly, the Court in United States v. Cruikshank, while adopting a narrow construction of the rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause,[9] stated that a republican form of government includes "a right on the part of its citizens to meet

---

[3] See, e.g., The Federalist No. 39 (James Madison); see also The Federalist No. 22 (Alexander Hamilton) "[T]he fundamental maxim of republican government . . . requires that the sense of the majority should prevail."); The Federalist No. 57 (James Madison) ("The elective mode of obtaining rulers is the characteristic policy of republican government.").

[4] 88 U.S. 162 (1874), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIX. See also Amdt19.1 Overview of Nineteenth Amendment, Women's Voting Rights. The primary constitutional basis for the claim in Minor was the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause. Minor, 88 U.S. at 165.

[5] Minor, 88 U.S. at 175 ("No particular government is designated as republican, neither is the exact form to be guaranteed, in any manner especially designated.").

[6] Id. Continuing in this vein, the Court reasoned that the Guarantee Clause could not secure women the right to vote because "[n]o new State has ever been admitted to the Union which has conferred the right of suffrage upon women, and this has never been considered a valid objection to her admission" and "the right of suffrage was withdrawn from women as early as 1807 in the State of New Jersey, without any attempt to obtain the interference of the United States to prevent it." Id. at 177–78.

[7] 166 U.S. 506, 519 (1897) ("[L]egislative control in such matters is not one of the essential elements of a republican form of government [under the Guarantee Clause].").

[8] 139 U.S. 449, 461 (1891). The Court paraphrased Daniel Webster's "masterly statement of the American system of government" as one where "the people are the source of all political power, but that, as the exercise of governmental powers immediately by the people themselves is impracticable, they must be exercised by representatives of the people; that the basis of representation is suffrage." Id. at 461–62.

[9] United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 551–57 (1875) (holding that First and Second Amendment rights were not a privilege of U.S. citizenship secured against state invasion by the Fourteenth Amendment); see also Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1872); Amdt14.S1.2.1 Privileges or Immunities of Citizens and the peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances" as well as the "equality of the rights of citizens."[10]

Slaughter-House Cases. The Court later held those rights were incorporated against the states through the Due Process Clause. See McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010); De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364 (1937).

[10] Cruikshank, 92 U.S. at 552, 555.

ARTICLE V
AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

ARTICLE V
AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ARTICLE V—AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

ArtV.1 Overview of Article V, Amending the Constitution

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article V sets forth procedures for amending the Constitution.[1] Most of the Article's text addresses the proposal and ratification of amendments.[2] Two sentences at the end of the Article make certain subjects unamendable.[3] Since the Founding, Congress has used Article V's procedures to propose thirty-three constitutional amendments.[4] The states have ratified twenty-seven of these proposed amendments, which include the first ten amendments, known as the Bill of Rights,[5] thereby making them part of the Constitution.

Article V establishes two methods for proposing amendments to the Constitution.[6] The first method requires both the House and Senate to propose a constitutional amendment by a vote of two-thirds of the Members present.[7] This is the only method for proposing amendments that has been used thus far. Alternatively, Article V provides that Congress "shall" call a convention for proposing amendments upon the request of two-thirds of the state legislatures.[8] This method of proposing amendments, which scholars have debated at length, has never been used.[9]

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. V. This essay does not examine whether Article V provides the exclusive procedures for amending the Constitution. See generally, e.g., Akhil Reed Amar, The Consent of the Governed: Constitutional Amendment Outside Article V, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 457, 458–59 (1994) (arguing that the people of the United States may amend the Constitution using methods not specifically outlined in Article V).

[2] U.S. Const. art. V.

[3] Id. ("Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.").

[4] For a list of the twenty-seven amendments the states ratified, see Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally. For a list of the six constitutional amendments that Congress proposed but the states have not ratified, see Intro.3.7 Proposed Amendments Not Ratified by the States.

[5] The Bill of Rights safeguards certain individual rights from government interference. For a discussion of the proposal and ratification of the Bill of Rights, see Intro.3.2 Bill of Rights (First Through Tenth Amendments).

[6] U.S. Const. art. V ("The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments. . . .").

[7] Id.; Nat'l Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, 386 (1920) ("The two-thirds vote in each house which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum—and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership, present and absent.").

[8] U.S. Const. art. V.

[9] See ArtV.3.3 Proposals of Amendments by Convention.

Article V also sets forth two methods for states to ratify amendments to the Constitution.[10] Congress determines which method the states must follow in order for proposed amendments to become effective.[11] The first method of ratification requires three-fourths of the state legislatures to ratify an amendment to the Constitution.[12] Alternatively, Congress may require that three-fourths of state ratifying conventions approve a proposed amendment.[13] Congress has specified this second mode of amendment only once, for the Twenty-First Amendment, which repealed the Eighteenth Amendment establishing Prohibition.[14]

The last two sentences of Article V make certain subjects unamendable.[15] The first of these sentences prohibited amendments prior to 1808 that would have affected the Constitution's limitations on Congress's power to (1) restrict the slave trade, or (2) levy certain taxes on land or slaves.[16] This sentence's limitations on amendments have expired. The second sentence of Article V, which remains in effect, prohibits amendments that would deprive states, without their consent, from having equal suffrage in the Senate.[17] Scholars have debated whether the last two sentences of Article V effectively prohibit (or formerly prohibited) amendments on these subjects.[18]

This essay examines Article V's procedures for amending the Constitution. It begins with an overview of the historical background of Article V. The Essay then examines relevant Supreme Court decisions, historical practices, and academic debates related to the methods that Article V establishes for proposing and ratifying constitutional amendments.

ArtV.2 Historical Background on Amending the Constitution

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight

[10] U.S. Const. art. V (stating that amendments to the Constitution may be ratified "by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress").

[11] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 730 (1931) ("The choice . . . of the mode of ratification lies in the sole discretion of Congress.").

[12] U.S. Const. art. V.

[13] Id.

[14] See ArtV.4.3 Ratification by Conventions. The Eighteenth Amendment prohibited "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes." U.S. Const. amend. XVIII, repealed by id. amend. XXI.

[15] Id. art. V ("Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.").

[16] See id. See also Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171, 177 (1796) (Paterson, J., concurring) (recounting Founding-era debates over these limitations on amendments).

[17] U.S. Const. art. V.

[18] See generally, e.g., Douglas Linder, What in the Constitution Cannot Be Amended?, 23 Ariz. L. Rev. 717, 733 (1981). See also ArtV.5 Unamendable Subjects.

shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Prior to the Founding, the people of the United States experienced difficulties in attempting to amend the Nation's first charter, the Articles of Confederation.[1] Under the Articles, Congress and all of the states had to approve amendments before they would become effective.[2] Perhaps unsurprisingly, attempts to amend the Articles to address perceived shortcomings, such as Congress's lack of authority to raise revenues by levying import duties, were unsuccessful.[3] Nonetheless, several state constitutions in existence at the time of the Founding provided for amendments.[4] Moreover, at least one state, Vermont, successfully modified its charter by following the specific amendment procedures in its constitution.[5] These early provisions for amendments in the Articles and state charters informed the Founder's deliberations at the Convention.

During early debates over the Federal Constitution, the delegates agreed to consider language that would permit the states to amend the Nation's charter without Congress's approval.[6] Proponents of including specific procedures for amending the Constitution maintained that such a mechanism would provide stability to the new government.[7] For example, George Mason stated it was "better to provide for [amendments] in an easy, regular and Constitutional way than to trust [alterations] to chance and violence."[8] He argued that states should have the power to amend the Constitution without Congress's approval because the national legislature would inevitably abuse its power and ignore states' calls for necessary changes.[9] Other delegates viewed the inclusion of a provision for amending the Constitution as unnecessary or improper.[10]

---

[1] See, e.g., 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 558 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787) (statement of Alexander Hamilton).

[2] Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union of 1781, art. XIII ("And the Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.").

[3] Charles Pinckney, Observations on the Plan of Government Submitted to the Federal Convention of May 28, 1787, reprinted in 3 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 120–21 ("[I]t is to this unanimous consent, the depressed situation of the Union is undoubtedly owing. Had the measures recommended by Congress and assented to, some of them by eleven and others by twelve of the States, been carried into execution, how different would have been the complexion of Public Affairs? To this weak, this absurd part of the Government, may all our distresses be fairly attributed."). See also 1 Constitutional Documents and Records, 1776–1787, at 140–41 (Merrill Jensen ed., 1976) (discussing a proposal to grant Congress the power to collect import duties).

[4] See, e.g., Mass Const. of 1780, pt. 2, ch. 6, art. X (setting forth procedures for amending the Massachusetts Constitution that included two-thirds of eligible voters calling a convention for that purpose); Md. Const. of 1776, The Constitution, or Form of Government, cl. LIX (authorizing the state legislature to amend the Constitution by an affirmative vote before and after a new election, but requiring a higher vote threshold for approval of amendments affecting the government of the eastern shore); Vt. Const. of 1777, ch. 2, § XLIV (establishing a council empowered to call a convention for amending the Constitution).

[5] Vt. Sec. of State, The Amendment Process, https://sos.vermont.gov/vsara/learn/constitution/amending-the-constitution/process/.

[6] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 22 (Madison's notes, May 29, 1787) ("Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto.").

[7] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 121–22, 202–03 (Madison's notes, June 5, 11, 1787).

[8] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 121–22, 202–03 (Madison's notes, June 5, 11, 1787).

[9] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 121–22, 202–03 (Madison's notes, June 5, 11, 1787).

[10] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 121–22, 202–03 (Madison's notes, June 5, 11, 1787).

ArtV.2
Historical Background on Amending the Constitution

The delegates did not consider the draft Article V language until a month before the end of the Federal Convention.[11] At that time, the draft text required Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution upon the request of two-thirds of the states.[12] Some delegates believed that this text made amendments too difficult and advocated for Congress to play a greater role in proposing amendments. For instance, Alexander Hamilton, who noted the difficulties in amending the Articles of Confederation,[13] suggested that Congress, acting on its own initiative, should have the power to call a convention to propose amendments.[14] In his view, Congress would perceive the need for amendments before the states.[15] Roger Sherman took Hamilton's proposal a step further, moving that Congress itself be authorized to propose amendments that would become part of the Constitution upon ratification by all of the states.[16] James Wilson moved to modify Sherman's proposal to require three-fourths of the states for ratification of an amendment.[17] James Madison offered substitute language that permitted two-thirds of both houses of Congress to propose amendments, and required Congress to propose an amendment after two-thirds of the states had applied for one.[18] This language passed unanimously.[19]

The delegates also debated whether Article V should prohibit amendments on certain subjects. Some delegates from the southern states, including John Rutledge of South Carolina, opposed allowing amendments to existing provisions of the draft Constitution that already limited Congress's power to (1) restrict the importation of slaves, or (2) levy taxes on land or slaves.[20] Fervent disagreement between northern and southern states over slavery prompted inclusion of these provisions.[21] To preserve the compromise on the issue of slavery, the delegates added a sentence to the draft of Article V prohibiting amendments on these subjects before 1808.[22] At a later meeting of the convention, Roger Sherman and Gouverneur Morris proposed that no state should, without its consent, be deprived of equal suffrage in the Senate.[23] This proposal, which sought to safeguard state sovereignty and the delegates'

[11] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 461 (Journal, Aug. 30, 1787).

[12] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 557 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787).

[13] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 558. As noted, the Articles of Confederation required Congress and all of the states to approve an amendment before it would become effective. Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union of 1781, art. XIII ("And the Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.").

[14] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 558 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787). In contrast to Hamilton's views, some delegates expressed concerns that the draft Article V language made the amendment process too easy. For instance, Elbridge Gerry raised concerns that a majority of states at a convention could ratify amendments that would subvert state constitutions. 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 557–58. See also Douglas Linder, What in the Constitution Cannot Be Amended?, 23 Ariz. L. Rev. 717, 720 (1981).

[15] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 558 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787).

[16] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 558 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787).

[17] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 559.

[18] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 559.

[19] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 559.

[20] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 559.

[21] Linder, supra note 14, at 721. Some of the delegates were apparently concerned that amendments removing the limitation on Congress's power to levy direct taxes without apportionment could result in federal taxes on slaves, who were considered property at the time. The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison) (stating that both exceptions in the first sentence on unamendable subjects "must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it").

[22] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 559 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787).

[23] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 630–31 (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787).

delicate compromise on the structure of the national legislature,[24] was agreed to without debate and appended to the end of the draft text.[25]

Finally, as the Convention drew to a close, the delegates agreed to include a means for the states to propose constitutional amendments. George Mason expressed concerns that, as drafted, Article V would permit Congress to block constitutional amendments favored by the states.[26] Gouverneur Morris and Elbridge Gerry proposed to remedy this perceived problem by requiring Congress to call a convention of the states for proposing amendments upon the application of two-thirds of the states.[27] James Madison did not see the need for this convention mechanism.[28] He argued that Congress would be bound to propose amendments legislatively upon the request of two-thirds of the states.[29] Nevertheless, Madison did not oppose including a provision allowing for a constitutional convention.[30] The motion passed unanimously.[31]

Following the Convention, the debates over ratifying the Constitution briefly touched upon Article V's procedures for amending the Nation's charter. Federalists, who generally supported a strong central government, argued that Article V's high vote thresholds for proposing and ratifying amendments would protect the Constitution from destructive changes, while permitting amendments to address significant shortcomings in the document.[32] Anti-Federalists, on the other hand, expressed concerns that Article V would make amending the Constitution too difficult once it was ratified.[33] Consequently, they advocated for "amendments" to certain subjects prior to submitting the Constitution to the states.[34] Federalists opposed such amendments as premature.[35]

After the states ratified the Constitution, debates continued over amendments, including the adoption of a Bill of Rights.[36] In his 1789 Inaugural Address, President George Washington

---

[24] Linder, supra note 14, at 722.

[25] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 630–31 (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787).

[26] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 629.

[27] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 629.

[28] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 629–30.

[29] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 629–30.

[30] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 629–30. In remarks that presaged later scholarly debates over the proposal of amendments by a convention of the states, Madison questioned how such a Convention would be formed and conduct itself. 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 630. After the Convention, James Madison wrote in the Federalist Papers that Article V with the state convention mechanism "equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other." The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison).

[31] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 630 (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787).

[32] The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison) ("The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults."). See also The Federalist No. 22 (Alexander Hamilton) ("When the concurrence of a large number is required by the constitution to the doing of any national act, we are apt to rest satisfied that all is safe, because nothing improper will be likely to be done; but we forget how much good may be prevented, and how much ill may be produced, by the power of hindering the doing what may be necessary, and of keeping affairs in the same unfavorable posture in which they may happen to stand at particular periods.").

[33] For insight into the Anti-Federalist position on this issue, see Centinel II, Freeman's J. (Phila.), Oct. 24, 1787, reprinted in 2 The Complete Anti-Federalist (Herbert L. Storing ed., 1981).

[34] See id.

[35] See generally The Federalist No. 85 (Alexander Hamilton) (providing a broad overview of the debate).

[36] See President George Washington, First Inaugural Address (Apr. 30, 1789).

alluded to these ongoing debates, stating that the people of the United States would ultimately judge when it was appropriate to exercise "the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution."[37]

ArtV.3 Proposals

ArtV.3.1 Overview of Proposing Amendments

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article V establishes two methods for proposing amendments to the Constitution.[1] The first method requires both the House and Senate to propose a constitutional amendment by a vote of two-thirds of the Members present.[2] Since the Founding, Congress has followed this procedure to propose thirty-three constitutional amendments, which were sent to the states for potential ratification.[3] The states ratified twenty-seven of these amendments.[4]

Alternatively, Article V provides that Congress "shall" call a convention for proposing amendments upon the request of two-thirds of the states.[5] This method of proposing amendments has never been used.[6] Scholars continue to debate issues surrounding these Article V conventions, including: (1) whether Congress must call a convention upon receiving the requisite number of state applications; (2) whether the convention can be limited in any way (the "runaway convention" debate); and (3) Congress's control over other aspects of a convention (e.g., rules of procedure).[7]

---

[37] See id.

[1] U.S. Const. art. V ("The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments. . . .").

[2] Id.; Nat'l Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, 386 (1920) ("The two-thirds vote in each house which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum—and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership, present and absent.").

[3] For a list of constitutional amendments that Congress proposed but the states did not ratify, see Intro.3.7 Proposed Amendments Not Ratified by the States. At least 11,000 proposals to amend the Constitution have been introduced in Congress, but were not approved by the two-thirds majority in each house required for submission to the states for ratification. U.S. Senate: Measures Proposed to Amend the Constitution, https://www.senate.gov/legislative/MeasuresProposedToAmendTheConstitution.htm.

[4] See Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally.

[5] U.S. Const. art. V.

[6] See ArtV.3.3 Proposals of Amendments by Convention.

[7] See ArtV.3.3 Proposals of Amendments by Convention.

ArtV.3.2 Congressional Proposals of Amendments

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The first method for proposing amendments permits two-thirds of the Members of the House and Senate to propose a constitutional amendment when they "shall deem it necessary."[1] This is the only method that has thus far been used to propose amendments to the Constitution.

The Supreme Court addressed Article V's procedures for congressionally proposed constitutional amendments in the National Prohibition Cases, which challenged the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment.[2] In these cases, the Supreme Court held that both the House and Senate must propose a constitutional amendment by a vote of two-thirds of the Members present (rather than two-thirds of the entire membership present and absent), assuming the presence of a quorum.[3] The Court also held that Congress's successful proposal of an amendment indicates that Congress considers the amendment "necessary."[4] Thus, it appears that the Court will not require Congress to state that an amendment is necessary specifically or second-guess Congress's judgment on the issue of necessity.[5]

Although Members of Congress have introduced more than 11,000 proposed amendments to the Constitution since the Founding,[6] Congress has approved only thirty-three proposed amendments by the requisite two-thirds vote.[7] Congress has historically proposed constitutional amendments by enacting a joint resolution.[8] Following historical practice involving proposing amendments, which included the Bill of Rights, Members of Congress have

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. V.

[2] 253 U.S. 350 (1920).

[3] Id. at 386 ("The two-thirds vote in each house which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership, present and absent.").

[4] Id.

[5] See id.

[6] U.S. Senate: Measures Proposed to Amend the Constitution, https://www.senate.gov/legislative/MeasuresProposedToAmendTheConstitution.htm.

[7] For a list of constitutional amendments that Congress proposed but the states did not ratify, see Intro.3.7 Proposed Amendments Not Ratified by the States.

[8] 1 Annals of Cong. 735 (1789).

proposed amendments as codicils (i.e., supplementary articles), rather than line-by-line revisions to the Constitution's text.[9] After congressional approval, proposed amendments are sent to the states for potential ratification.[10]

ArtV.3.3 Proposals of Amendments by Convention

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article V establishes an alternative method for amending the Constitution by a convention of the states.[1] It provides that Congress "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments" upon the request of two-thirds of the state legislatures.[2] This method of proposing amendments, which scholars have debated at length, has never been used.[3] This essay surveys a few of the most prominent debates surrounding an Article V convention of the states.

One ongoing debate concerns whether Congress must call a convention upon the request of two-thirds of the states. Article V states that Congress "shall call a Convention" when enough states have applied for one. Some of the Constitution's Framers, concerned that Congress would block amendments favorable to the states,[4] argued that this language would obligate Congress to call for a convention after receiving the requisite number of state requests.[5] Furthermore, some of the earliest Members of Congress argued that Congress had no power to deliberate on whether to call an Article V convention once it received the requisite number of applications.[6]

However, more recently, some modern scholars have theorized that Congress may be able to block a convention by exercising its apparent role in reviewing state applications and

---

[9] Id. at 733–44 (1789).

[10] Under current federal law, the Archivist of the United States is responsible for certifying a state's ratification of a constitutional amendment. See National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984, 98 Stat. 2291, 1 U.S.C. § 106b.

[1] U.S. Const. art. V.

[2] Id.

[3] Although the convention method for proposing amendments has never been used, some scholars have speculated that the states may "prod" Congress into proposing an amendment on a particular matter by applying for an Article V convention on that issue. See, e.g., Dwight W. Connely, Amending the Constitution: Is This Any Way to Call for a Constitutional Convention?, 22 Ariz. L. Rev. 1011, 1015, 1016 n.49 (1980).

[4] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 629–31 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787).

[5] For example, writing in the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton stated that Congress would be "obliged" to call a convention "on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the States." The Federalist No. 85 (Alexander Hamilton).

[6] 1 Annals of Cong. 260–61 (1789).

deciding whether the requisite number of states has applied for a convention.[7] In addition, Congress might refuse to submit amendments that result from an Article V convention to the states for ratification.[8] Because it seems unlikely that the Supreme Court would order Congress to call a convention or submit a proposed amendment to the states,[9] such arguments raise questions about whether Article V effectively obligates Congress to call for a convention.

Another ongoing debate revolves around whether a state convention, once called, may be limited to addressing certain topics. Concerns with a so-called "runaway convention" that proposes amendments on subjects beyond the scope of the initial call have prompted many of these debates. Some commentators have argued that states may (or must) determine the scope of an Article V convention by applying for a convention on a specific subject or group of subjects.[10] Congress would then be obliged to call a convention only on the issues in the state applications.[11] Other scholars have argued that the text of the Constitution provides only for a general convention, one not limited in scope to considering amendments on a particular matter.[12]

A third prominent debate concerns Congress's control over other aspects of a convention. During debates over the Constitution, James Madison questioned how an Article V convention would be formed and conduct its proceedings.[13] In the modern era, scholars have debated various issues, including: (1) how delegates to the convention should be chosen; (2) whether Congress, state legislatures, or the delegates should set rules of procedure for the convention; (3) the vote threshold would be required to propose an amendment in convention; and (4) how voting rights on a proposed amendment should be apportioned among the states.[14] Beginning at least as early as the 1960s, Members of Congress have introduced various pieces of legislation that would seek to establish some procedures for an Article V convention.[15]

---

[7] See Michael B. Rappaport, Reforming Article V: The Problems Created by the National Convention Amendment Method and How to Fix Them, 96 Va. L. Rev. 1509, 1527 (2010) ("If different states apply for limited conventions covering marginally different subjects, then it is quite possible that Congress will use its discretion to determine that the requisite number of states have not agreed on a single subject to apply for a convention. Similarly, even if two-thirds of the states applied for the same limited convention, Congress might use its discretion to determine that limited conventions are not allowed."). But see Morris D. Forkosch, The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions, 51 Minn. L. Rev. 1053, 1079 (1967) ("Congress has its own independent machinery to propose amendments in the first alternative, and to give Congress the power to review the proposals necessarily deprives the [state convention method] of its independence.").

[8] See Michael Stern, Reopening the Constitutional Road to Reform: Toward a Safeguarded Article V Convention, 78 Tenn. L. Rev. 765, 777–78 (2011). But see Gerland Gunther, The Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 14 Ga. L. Rev. 1, 23 (1979) (acknowledging that Congress may review applications for a convention for conformity with Article V, but adopting the view that Congress cannot refuse to submit a proposed amendment to the states).

[9] One scholar has suggested that, even if the Supreme Court exercised jurisdiction over the case, it appears unlikely the Court would "issue an order compelling Congress to carry out a duty which can hardly be called a simple ministerial duty or would, in the alternative, take it upon itself to prescribe the procedures for a convention." See Paul G. Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 903, 905–06 (1968) ("Whether any legal procedure would be available to compel [Congress] to perform its duty is another question.").

[10] Rappaport, supra note 7, at 1518 (surveying scholarly debates on the issue). Some scholars have argued that Article V permits states to apply for a convention on particular amendment text. E.g., Rappaport, supra note 7, at 1518.

[11] Limited convention proposals could call for an Article V convention to consider an amendment establishing congressional term limits or requiring a balanced federal buget, for example. Rappaport, supra note 7, at 1513.

[12] See Rappaport, supra note 7, at 1518.

[13] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 4, at 630 (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787).

[14] See, e.g., Sam J. Ervin, Jr., Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 875, 892–94 (1968) (discussing federal legislation seeking to address these questions).

[15] See, e.g., id.

ArtV.3.3
Proposals of Amendments by Convention

Since 1960, the states have submitted more than 180 applications for Article V conventions on various subjects.[16] However, Congress has never deemed Article V's threshold for calling a convention to be met. Many unresolved questions surround the state application process, including how to determine whether state applications address the same subject matter and whether the applications expire after a certain amount of time.[17] In the past several decades, the states have come closest to satisfying the threshold for calling a convention of the states on the issues of apportionment in state legislatures[18] and requiring a balanced federal budget.[19]

ArtV.3.4 Role of the President in Proposing an Amendment

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The Constitution does not specifically establish a role for the President in amending the Constitution.[1] Nonetheless, some Presidents have played a ministerial role in transmitting Congress's proposed amendments to the states for potential ratification. For example, President George Washington sent the first twelve proposed amendments, including the ten proposals that later became the Bill of Rights, to the states for ratification after Congress approved them.[2] In addition, President Abraham Lincoln signed the joint resolution proposing the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery even though his signature was not necessary for proposal or ratification of the amendment.[3]

Despite these examples of Presidents playing an informal, ministerial role in the amendment process, the Supreme Court has articulated the Judicial Branch's understanding [16] Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, Selected Memorials, https://clerk.house.gov/SelectedMemorial.

[17] Is There a Constitutional Convention in America's Future?: Hearing Before the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 103d Cong. 6–10 (1993).

[18] Some states sought an Article V convention to consider a constitutional amendment that would overturn the Supreme Court's decision in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964). In that case, the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause requires that state legislative houses be apportioned "substantially" on the basis of population. Id. at 568–76.

[19] See Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, Selected Memorials, https://clerk.house.gov/SelectedMemorial; Michael Stokes Paulsen, A General Theory of Article V: The Constitutional Lessons of the Twenty-seventh Amendment, 103 YALE L.J. 677, 764–89 (1993) (cataloguing state applications for conventions on different subjects). This essay not examine whether a state may amend, rescind, or place conditions on an application for a convention.

[1] See U.S. CONST. art. V. This essay does not examine whether the President has any role in an Article V convention of the states.

[2] Letter from President George Washington to Governor Charles Pinckney (Oct. 2, 1789), https://digital.scetv.org/teachingAmerhistory/lessons/GWashingtonLetter.htm. Under modern federal law, the Archivist of the United States is responsible for certifying a state's ratification of a constitutional amendment. See National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984, 98 Stat. 2291, 1 U.S.C. § 106b.

[3] The House Joint Resolution Proposing the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, 38th Cong. (1865), https://www.ourdocuments.gov/document_data/pdf/doc_040.pdf.

that the President has no formal constitutional role in that process. In a brief opinion in the 1798 case Hollingsworth v. Virginia, the Court held that the Eleventh Amendment had been "constitutionally adopted."[4] The Supreme Court reporter recorded Justice Samuel Chase's statement during oral argument that the President "has nothing to do with the proposition, or adoption, of amendments to the Constitution."[5]

Later, in the 1920 case Hawke v. Smith, the Supreme Court characterized the Court's decision in Hollingsworth as having "settled" that "submission of a constitutional amendment did not require the action of the President."[6] Therefore, the Court appears to have adopted the view that the President cannot veto a proposed amendment.

ArtV.4 Ratification

ArtV.4.1 Overview of Ratification of a Proposed Amendment

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article V sets forth two methods by which states may ratify amendments to the Constitution.[1] Congress determines which of the two methods the states must use in order to ratify a particular proposed amendment.[2] The first method of ratification requires three-fourths of the state legislatures to ratify an amendment to the Constitution.[3] Alternatively, Congress may require that three-fourths of state ratifying conventions approve a proposed amendment.[4] Congress has specified this second mode of amendment only once, for the Twenty-First Amendment, which repealed the Eighteenth Amendment establishing Prohibition.[5]

---

[4] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378, 382 (1798).

[5] Id. at 381 n.2. See also Seth Barrett Tillman, A Textualist Defense of Article I, Section 7, Clause 3: Why Hollingsworth v. Virginia Was Rightly Decided, and Why INS v. Chadha Was Wrongly Reasoned, 83 Tex. L. Rev. 1265, 1275 (2005) (recounting how the Supreme Court reporter recorded Justice Chase's statement during oral argument).

[6] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 229 (1920). President Jimmy Carter signed a joint resolution purporting to extend the deadline for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment despite being advised that his signature was unnecessary. Ratification of the Equal Rts. Amend., 44 Op. O.L.C. 1, 8–9 (2020).

[1] U.S. Const. art. V (stating that amendments to the Constitution may be ratified "by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress").

[2] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 730 (1931) ("The choice . . . of the mode of ratification. . .lies in the sole discretion of Congress.").

[3] U.S. Const. art. V.

[4] Id.

[5] See Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally. The Eighteenth Amendment prohibited "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes." U.S. Const. amend. XVIII, repealed by id. amend. XXI.

ArtV.4.2 State Legislatures

ArtV.4.2.1 Congressional Deadlines for Ratification of an Amendment

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The first method of ratification requires three-fourths of the state legislatures to ratify a proposed amendment to the Constitution.[1] Although this method has been used to ratify twenty-six of the Constitution's twenty-seven successful amendments,[2] many questions concerning this mode of ratification remain unresolved.

One prominent question is whether Congress may place a deadline on the states' ratification of a proposed amendment, either in the text of the proposed amendment or the accompanying joint resolution. The text of Article V does not specifically address the issue. In Dillon v. Gloss, the Supreme Court held that the Constitution implictly authorizes Congress to "fix a definite period" for ratification of an amendment.[3] In that case, the Court upheld Congress's specification of a seven-year time limit on the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment establishing Prohibition.[4]

The Dillon Court determined that Congress's specific power to determine the mode of ratification (i.e., by state legislatures or state ratifying conventions) implied an incidental authority to specify a deadline for ratification.[5] Furthermore, as a practical matter, a definite period for ratification would ensure that states understood how much time they had to ratify the amendment.[6] Although the Court also opined that, regardless of whether Congress specifies a deadline, the time period for ratification must be "reasonable," it appears this language was subsequently regarded as nonbinding dicta in Coleman v. Miller.[7] Beginning with its 1917 proposal of what would become the Eighteenth Amendment, Congress has specified a deadline of seven years for the ratification of every proposed amendment except for the proposal that became the Nineteenth Amendment recognizing women's suffrage.[8]

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. V.

[2] Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally.

[3] 256 U.S. 368, 375–76 (1921).

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 376.

[6] Id.

[7] 307 U.S. 433, 453 (1939) (discussing Dillon, 256 U.S. at 375–76). In Coleman, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes suggested, in an opinion titled "Opinion of the Court," that Congress is responsible for "promulgating" the "adoption" of a constitutional amendment and, consequently, Congress had the power to determine whether ratification of a proposed amendment occurred within a "reasonable time." Coleman, 307 U.S. at 453–56. However, subsequent commentators have argued that this dicta in Coleman is incorrect because the Constitution gives Congress no such role. See, e.g., Ratification of the Equal Rts. Amend., 44 Op. O.L.C. 1, 30–31 (2020).

[8] See Ratification of the Equal Rts. Amend., 44 Op. O.L.C. at 15.

Limited historical practice suggests that if Congress does not specify a deadline for ratification, the amendment remains pending before the states until the requisite number of states have ratified it. In 1992, the Twenty-Seventh Amendment, which addressed the effective date of congressional pay raises, became part of the Constitution more than 202 years after it was proposed.[9] At the time, the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) advised that the amendment became part of the Constitution once the Archivist of the United States certified that the requisite number of states had ratified the amendment.[10] Rejecting dicta to the contrary in Dillon, the OLC stated that, in the absence of a congressionally proposed deadline, an amendment remains pending before the states.[11]

ArtV.4.2.2 Effect of Prior Rejection of an Amendment or Rescission of Ratification

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Additional unresolved questions are whether a state may (1) ratify an amendment after rejecting it, or (2) rescind its ratification of a constitutional amendment before that amendment becomes part of the Constitution. The Supreme Court addressed these issues in Coleman v. Miller.[1] In Coleman, twenty-four members of the Kansas state legislature sought a writ of mandamus compelling state officials to recognize that Kansas had not ratified an amendment to the Federal Constitution, the Child Labor Amendment,[2] challenging the way the vote was taken.[3] One of the plaintiffs' arguments was that the ratification was invalid because the Kansas state legislature previously rejected the amendment.[4]

The Supreme Court indicated that whether a state could ratify an amendment after rejecting it—or rescind an amendment already ratified—were political questions for Congress

---

[9] For more on the Twenty-Seventh Amendment's ratification and authentication, see Intro.3.6 Post-War Amendments (Twenty-Third Through Twenty-Seventh Amendments) and Amdt27.1 Overview of Twenty-Seventh Amendment, Congressional Compensation.

[10] Cong. Pay Amend., 16 Op. O.L.C. 85, 87 (1992).

[11] Id. at 90, 97. Otherwise, in the OLC's view, the Article V process would become unworkable because states would not know whether they could still ratify an amendment. Id. at 97 ("The implicit time limit thesis is thus deeply implausible, because it introduces hopeless uncertainty into that part of the Constitution that must function with a maximum of formal clarity if it is to function."). In 2020, the OLC advised that Congress lacks the authority to: (1) extend the ratification deadline for an amendment pending before the states; or (2) revive an amendment after the initial deadline has expired, without restarting the Article V process. Ratification of the Equal Rts. Amend., 44 Op. O.L.C. at 3.

[1] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[2] The proposed Amendment provided in part that "Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age." Id. at 435 n.1 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[3] Id. at 436–37.

[4] Id. at 447.

to resolve.[5] As support for this theory, the Court cited Congress's 1868 adoption of a concurrent resolution declaring that the Fourteenth Amendment had been ratified.[6] Congress adopted this resolution despite the fact that three states had previously rejected the amendment before later ratifying it, and two states attempted to rescind their prior ratifications.[7]

However, it is unclear whether this historical practice remains relevant. The adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment presented special circumstances. The three southern states that previously rejected the Amendment had constituted new governments at Congress's direction as a result of Reconstruction by the time they ratified it.[8] Thus, the Court's ruling would not appear to have definitively resolved questions about the effect of a prior ratification or rejection.[9] Furthermore, since Coleman, some commentators have expressed doubts that Congress has any constitutional role in determining whether a state has properly ratified a proposed constitutional amendment.[10]

ArtV.4.2.3 Authentication of an Amendment's Ratification

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Another prominent debate surrounds the method by which the states' ratification of an amendment is authenticated. Article V provides that an amendment becomes part of the Constitution "when ratified" by three-fourths of state legislatures or state ratifying conventions.[1] In Dillon v. Gloss, the Supreme Court held that an amendment becomes part of the Constitution on the day that the number of state ratifications meets the three-fourths

---

[5] Id. at 449–50.

[6] Id. at 448–50.

[7] Id. ("[T]he political departments of the Government dealt with the effect both of previous rejection and of attempted withdrawal and determined that both were ineffectual in the presence of an actual ratification."). The three states that rejected the Amendment before later ratifying it were Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The two states that ratified the Amendment and later sought to rescind their ratifications were New Jersey and Ohio. Id.

[8] Id.

[9] See, e.g., Idaho v. Freeman, 529 F. Supp. 1107, 1150 (D. Idaho 1981) ("Until the technical three-fourths has been reached, a rescission of a prior ratification is clearly a proper exercise of a state's power granted by the article V phrase 'when ratified' especially when that act would give a truer picture of local sentiment regarding the proposed amendment."), vacated as moot, NOW, Inc. v. Idaho, 459 U.S. 809 (1982).

[10] See Ratification of the Equal Rts. Amend., 44 Op. O.L.C. 1, 30 (2020) (expressing the view that a congressional role in "promulgating" a constitutional amendment ratified by three-fourths of the states lacks a basis in the Constitution's text); Cong. Pay Amend., 16 Op. O.L.C. 85. 98–99 (1992) ("[C]ongressional promulgation is neither required by Article V nor consistent with constitutional practice.").

[1] U.S. CONST. art. V. The Supreme Court has held that state legislatures perform a federal constitutional function when ratifying proposed constitutional amendments. Consequently, the people of a state cannot limit the legislature's performance of this function through a popular referendum, the enactment of state constitutional provisions, or other means. See Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 136–37 (1922) (rejecting the argument that the people of a state could deprive the state legislature of the power to ratify the Nineteenth Amendment establishing women's suffrage by threshold.[2] Consequently, the date on which an Executive Branch official proclaims the amendment has been ratified is not controlling.[3]

Under current federal law, the Archivist of the United States is responsible for certifying that a proposed constitutional amendment has been ratified after receiving "official notice" from three-fourths of the states that they have adopted the amendment in accordance with the Constitution.[4] The Archivist publishes the amendment's text along with a certificate listing the states that have adopted the amendment.[5] The Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel has adopted the view that, in order to perform this duty, the Archivist must determine whether "he has received official notice that an amendment has been adopted according to the provisions of the Constitution."[6] The Archivist may consult the Attorney General on this legal question, as he did with respect to the states' ratification of the Twenty-Seventh Amendment.[7]

ArtV.4.3 Ratification by Conventions

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Alternatively, Congress may require that state ratifying conventions approve a proposed amendment.[1] Congress has specified this second mode of amendment only once, for the Twenty-First Amendment, which repealed the Eighteenth Amendment establishing Prohibition.[2] In the joint resolution proposing the Twenty-First Amendment, Congress specified that "conventions in three-fourths of the several States" must ratify the Amendment for it to become operative.[3]

At the time Congress proposed the Twenty-First Amendment in 1933, many politicans believed that only state ratifying conventions should ratify constitutional amendments that enacting state constitutional provisions); Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 231 (1920) (holding that a state lacked the power to require submission of the state's ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment to a popular referendum).

---

[2] 256 U.S. 368, 376 (1921).

[3] Id.

[4] See National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984, 98 Stat. 2291, 1 U.S.C. § 106b.

[5] Id. Since the early days of the United States, various Executive Branch officials have performed the ministerial duty of certifying the ratification of a constitutional amendment. In 1818, Congress enacted a law providing that the Secretary of State would perform this role. Act of Apr. 20, 1818, ch. 80, § 2, 3 Stat. 439. Congress later transferred this role to the Administrator of General Services and then to the Archivist of the United States. See Cong. Pay Amend., 16 Op. O.L.C. 85, 98 (1992) (discussing the history of the Executive Branch's ministerial duty).

[6] Cong. Pay Amend., 16 Op. O.L.C. at 99.

[7] Id.

[1] U.S. Const. art. V.

[2] See Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally.

[3] The House Joint Resolution Proposing the Twenty-First Amendment to the Constitution, 72nd Cong. (1933), https://www.docsteach.org/documents/document/21st-amendment.

implicated individual rights and morals.[4] In addition to seeking a ratification method deemed to better reflect the popular will, Congress may have also wished to bypass the Temperance lobby, which remained powerful in state legislatures.[5] According to this view, by specifying that specially elected state delegates would ratify the Amendment, rather than state legislators, Congress increased the Amendment's chances of successful ratification.[6]

Neither the Constitution nor Supreme Court precedent specifically provides guidance as to how the states should convene ratifying conventions, select delegates, or conduct the proceedings. The thirty-eight state conventions that considered the ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment in 1933 followed a variety of procedures.[7] In general, the delegates at the state conventions, most of whom were pledged to vote for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, did not engage in significant deliberation on an issue that already received strong popular support at the polls.[8]

ArtV.4.4 Choosing a Mode of Ratification

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The Supreme Court has held that Congress determines whether state legislatures or state ratifying conventions should consider the ratification of a proposed constitutional amendment.[1] In United States v. Sprague, the federal government indicted defendants under the National Prohibition Act (NPA) for unlawfully transporting and possessing intoxicating liquors.[2] The lower courts quashed the indictment, determining that Congress lacked the authority to enact the NPA.[3] These courts held that the Eighteenth Amendment, which granted Congress the authority to enact laws like the NPA, was invalid because state legislatures had ratified it rather than state ratifying conventions.[4]

---

[4] Everett S. Brown, Ratification of the Twenty First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States: State Convention Records and Laws 3 (2003).

[5] Robert P. George & David A. J. Richards, The Twenty-First Amendment, Nat'l Const. Ctr., https://constitutioncenter.org/interactive-constitution/interpretation/amendment-xxi/interps/151 ("[P]olitical prudence pointed in the direction of ratifying conventions as a way of leaving gun-shy legislators with their eyes on re-election out of the process and 'off the hook.'").

[6] See id.

[7] Brown, supra note 4, at 8–9.

[8] Brown, supra note 4, at 5–7.

[1] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 730 (1931) ("The choice . . . of the mode of ratification lies in the sole discretion of Congress."). Presumably, Congress could also choose the mode of ratification for amendments proposed by an Article V convention of the states. See U.S. Const. art. V.

[2] Sprague, 282 U.S. at 729.

[3] Id.

[4] See id. at 729–30.

On appeal, the Supreme Court considered whether state conventions should have ratified the Eighteenth Amendment because it conferred new powers on Congress to abridge individual rights by enacting laws to enforce Prohibition.[5] The Court rejected this argument, determining that "the choice . . . of the mode of ratification lies in the sole discretion of Congress."[6]

State legislatures have ratified twenty-six of the twenty-seven amendments that have become part of the Constitution.[7] As noted, Congress has chosen the convention method of ratification only once.[8] In the joint resolution proposing the Twenty-First Amendment repealing Prohibition, Congress specified that "conventions in three-fourths of the several States" must ratify the Amendment for it to become operative.[9]

ArtV.5 Unamendable Subjects

Article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The last two sentences of Article V made certain subjects unamendable.[1] The first of these sentences prohibited amendments prior to 1808 that would have affected either of two subjects addressed in Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution: (1) limitations on Congress's power to prohibit or restrict the importation of slaves before 1808; and (2) limitations on Congress's power to enact an unapportioned direct tax.[2] As noted, during the convention in Philadelphia, some delegates from the southern states opposed allowing amendments to provisions of the Constitution that limited Congress's power to restrict or tax the slave trade.[3] To mitigate these

[5] Id.

[6] Id. at 730.

[7] For information about the ratification of amendments to the Constitution and the text of the amendments, see Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally.

[8] See Intro.3.1 Ratification of Amendments to the Constitution Generally.

[9] The House Joint Resolution Proposing the Twenty-First Amendment to the Constitution, 72nd Cong. (1933), https://www.ourdocuments.gov/document_data/pdf/doc_040.pdf.

[1] U.S. Const. art. V ("Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.").

[2] Id.

[3] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 559 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records] (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787). The latter provision was apparently motivated in part by concerns over federal taxes on slaves, who were considered property at the time. The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison) (stating that both exceptions in the first sentence on unamendable subjects "must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it"). See also Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171, 177 (1796) (Paterson, J., concurring) (recounting debates over these limitations on amendments).

concerns, the delegates added a sentence prohibiting amendments on these subjects before 1808.[4] This sentence's restrictions on amendments have expired.

The second sentence of Article V, which remains in effect, provides "that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."[5] This provision was introduced by Roger Sherman, one of the architects of the Connecticut Compromise, out of concern that three-quarters of the States might use Article V to abolish or deprive smaller states of their representation in the Senate.[6] Writing in the Federalist Papers after the Federal Convention, James Madison suggested that this exception would assuage concerns that large states would use the amendment process to infringe upon the sovereignty of the smaller states by reducing their voting power in the Senate.[7] He wrote, "The exception in favor of the equality of suffrage in the Senate, was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by that principle of representation in one branch of the legislature; and was probably insisted on by the States particularly attached to that equality."[8]

By expressly prohibiting amendments that would deprive a state of equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent, Article V enshrines the "partly federal, and partly national" structure of the bicameral Congress, which was at the heart of the Connecticut Compromise.[9] In vesting the legislative power in a bicameral Congress, the Framers of the Constitution purposefully divided and dispersed legislative power between two Chambers—the House of Representatives with representation based on a state's population and the Senate with equal state representation.[10] The Framers recognized that the division of legislative power between two distinct Chambers of elected members was needed "to protect liberty" and address the states' fear of an imbalance of power in Congress.[11] As later explained by Chief Justice Warren

---

[4] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 559 (Madison's notes, Sept. 10, 1787).

[5] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 559. The Supreme Court has indicated that the equal suffrage provision does not prohibit Congress from refusing to seat a Senator while it investigates his election or qualifications. Barry v. United States, 279 U.S. 597, 615–16 (1929).

[6] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 629 (Madison's notes, Sept. 15, 1787) ("Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate."). Sherman's proposal also would have prohibited amendments that affected a state "in its internal police." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 629. After Sherman's amendment to the draft Article V was voted down, he moved to strike Article V altogether. 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 630. Gouverneur Morris proposed the final provision, which lacked the language that Madison had opposed limiting amendments that would affect a state in its "internal police." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 631. The motion "being dictated by the circulating murmurs of the small States was agreed to without debate." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 630–31.

[7] The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison).

[8] Id. During the Federal Convention, Madison had argued against equality of suffrage for the states in the Senate—an unpopular notion in the larger states. See, e.g., 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 551 (Madison's notes, July 7, 1787) (statement of James Madison).

[9] See INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 950 (1983). Roger Sherman and other delegates from Connecticut repeatedly advanced a legislative structure early in the Convention debates that eventually was proposed as the Great Compromise. See 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 3, at 196. Historians often credit Sherman and the Connecticut delegates as the architects of the Great Compromise. Mark David Hall, Roger Sherman and the Creation of the American Republic 96–98 (2013) (discussing Sherman's proposal during the Convention debates that led to the "Connecticut Compromise"); Max Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 106 (1913). See also Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 12–13 (1964) (discussing Sherman's role in the Connecticut Compromise).

[10] U.S. Const. art. I, § 7. cl. 2. See The Federalist No. 39 (James Madison) ("The house of representatives will derive its powers from the people of America, and the people will be represented in the same proportion, and on the same principle, as they are in the Legislature of a particular State. So far the Government is national not federal. The Senate on the other hand will derive its powers from the States, as political and co-equal societies; and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate, as they now are in the existing Congress. So far the government is federal, not national.").

[11] See INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 950 (1983) ("[T]he Framers were. . .concerned, although not of one mind, over the apprehensions of the smaller states. Those states feared a commonality of interest among the larger states would work to their disadvantage; representatives of the larger states, on the other hand, were skeptical of a legislature that

Burger, "the Great Compromise, under which one House was viewed as representing the people and the other the states, allayed the fears of both the large and small states."[12] By diffusing legislative power between two Chambers of Congress, including a Senate in which the states had equal suffrage, the Framers of the Constitution also sought to promote the separation of powers, federalism, and individual rights.[13] They designed the bicameral Congress so that "legislative power would be exercised only after opportunity for full study and debate in separate settings."[14]

Controversial since its inception because it protects small state interests against those of larger states, Article V's prohibition on amending the Constitution so as to deprive states of equal suffrage has been a subject of scholarly interest. In discussions on whether the Article V prohibition should be given full legal force,[15] some commentators have noted that the Constitution's text and the Framers' intent require the provision to have legal effect.[16] Commentators have also argued that the people of the United States have accepted other limitations on the amending power (e.g., the high vote threshold for proposal and ratification of amendments).[17] Thus, in their view, it is unclear why the limitation on depriving states of equal suffrage in the Senate should not also have legal effect.[18]

Academic debates over the legal force of Article V's clause on unamendable subjects echo broader discussions of other possible external, textual, or implicit limitations on the amendment of the Constitution.[19] For example, scholars have debated whether it is possible to could pass laws favoring a minority of the people." See also The Federalist No. 51 (James Madison) ("In republican government, the legislative authority necessarily predominates. The remedy for this inconveniency is to divide the legislature into different branches; and to render them, by different modes of election and different principles of action, as little connected with each other as the nature of their common functions and their common dependence on the society will admit."); Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States, supra note 9, at 99–112 (describing the debate among the states regarding the structure of Congress).

---

[12] Chadha, 462 U.S. at 950 (1983). See also Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States, supra note 9, at 105–06 (explaining the structure of Congress as achieved under the "Great Compromise").

[13] See The Federalist No. 62 (James Madison) ("[A] senate, as a second branch of the legislative assembly, distinct from, and dividing the power with, a first, must be in all cases a salutary check on the government. It doubles the security to the people, by requiring the concurrence of two distinct bodies in schemes of usurpation or perfidy, where the ambition or corruption of one would otherwise be sufficient."). See also John F. Manning, Textualism as a Nondelegation Doctrine, 97 Columbia L. Rev. 673, 708–09 (1997) (describing how the legislative procedures "promote caution and deliberation; by mandating that each piece of legislation clear an intricate process involving distinct constitutional actors, bicameralism and presentment reduce the incidence of hasty and ill-considered legislation").

[14] Chadha, 462 U.S. at 951.

[15] See generally, e.g., Douglas Linder, What in the Constitution Cannot Be Amended?, 23 Ariz. L. Rev. 717, 717 (1981).

[16] Id. at 733.

[17] John R. Vile, Limitations on the Constitutional Amending Process, 2 Const. Comment. 373, 379 (1985).

[18] Id. ("It is unclear why the United States should be bound by one such restraint, the super-majorities required for most amendments, and not another, the unanimous state consent required for altering a state's equal suffrage in the Senate."). Commentators who oppose the disproportionate influence of less populated states in the Senate and electoral college have argued that the Article V prohibition should not have full legal force. These arguments, however, are not reconcilable with Article V's express language or the intent of the Framers in adopting it. For instance, some scholars have argued that the provision is "merely declaratory" by reasoning that sovereignty resides in the people of the United States, and past actors cannot bind "the will of the people" in the future. See Linder, supra note 15, at 722–23. Article V, however, provides that a state's body politic may consent to no longer having equal suffrage, but the "will of the people" as expressed by the political entities whose agreement is necessary to amend the Constitution cannot deprive an unconsenting state of equal suffrage. Scholars have also debated whether the equal suffrage requirement could be removed in two steps by: (1) amending the Constitution to repeal the limitation; and (2) amending the document to alter equal suffrage. See generally George Mader, Binding Authority: Unamendability in the United States Constitution—A Textual and Historical Analysis, 99 Marq. L. Rev. 841, 852–53 (2016); Richard Albert, Amending Constitutional Amendment Rules, 13 Int'l J. Const. L. 655, 663 (2015). A two-step process to such an end, however, would still violate Article V's plain language providing that a state cannot be deprived of equal suffrage without its consent.

[19] Mader, supra note 18, at 845–46 (surveying relevant scholarship).

amend those provisions of the Nation's charter that embody fundamental norms or characteristics of the U.S. Government (e.g., provisions that establish a republican form of government).[20] Other debates have focused on whether Article V's procedures for amendment can themselves be amended.[21] Such debates, many of which have been part of the national conversation since the Founding,[22] raise critical questions about how the Nation may alter its fundamental law.

[20] See Mader, supra note 18, at 845–46.

[21] Mader, supra note 18, at 848 ("It is generally accepted that constitutional amending provisions can be used to amend themselves."). But see Linder, supra note 15, at 733 ("Article five itself cannot be amended so as to create any new limitations on the amending power.").

[22] President George Washington, First Inaugural Address (Apr. 30, 1789).

ARTICLE VI
SUPREME LAW

ARTICLE VI
SUPREME LAW

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ARTICLE VI—SUPREME LAW

ArtVI.1 Overview of Article VI, Supreme Law

Article VI establishes that the Constitution, U.S. laws, and treaties made under the authority of the United States are the Nation's supreme law and are binding on state judges notwithstanding any state constitution or law. Article VI also expressly provides that the new U.S. government established under the Constitution remained bound by the obligations of the predecessor governments established under the Articles of Confederation and Continental Congresses. In addition, Article VI provides that federal and state executive and judicial officers as well as members of federal and state legislatures shall take an oath to support the Constitution. Finally, Article VI expressly bars using religious tests as a qualification to hold "any Office or public Trust under the United States." [1]

Clause 1—Obligations of New Federal Government

ArtVI.C1.1 Debts and Engagements Clause

Article VI, Clause 1:

> All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This provision, variously called the "Debts Clause," "Engagements Clause," or "Debts and Engagements Clause,"[1] provides that the United States will recognize the debts and engagements of its predecessor governments—namely, the Continental Congresses and the federal government under the Articles of Confederation.[2] This "declaratory proposition" served to assure the United States' foreign creditors, in particular, that the adoption of the Constitution did not have "the magical effect of dissolving [the United States'] moral obligations."[3]

To finance the American Revolutionary War, the Continental Congress borrowed money from foreign and domestic sources.[4] To assure creditors that the new government would honor these obligations, the Articles of Confederation provided:

> All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed, and debts contracted by, or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States, in pursuance of the

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. VI.

[1] See, e.g., David M. Golove & Daniel J. Hulsebosch, A Civilized Nation: The Early American Constitution, the Law of Nations, and the Pursuit of International Recognition, 85 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 932, 1066 n.282 (2010) (referring to this provision as the "Debts Clause"); Vasan Kesavan, When Did the Articles of Confederation Cease to Be Law?, 78 Notre Dame L. Rev. 35, 51 (2002) (referring to this provision as the "Engagements Clause"); Stephen E. Sachs, Constitutional Backdrops, 80 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 1813, 1827 (2012) (referring to this provision as the "Debts and Engagements Clause").

[2] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 1.

[3] The Federalist No. 43 (James Madison); accord 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §§ 1826–28 (1833); The Federalist No. 84 (Alexander Hamilton); Lunaas v. United States, 936 F.2d 1277, 1278 (Fed. Cir. 1991) ("[Through the Debts and Engagements Clause] the nation undertook to assure creditors that the adoption of the Constitution would not erase existing obligations recognized under the Articles of Confederation.").

[4] See generally David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: Substantive Issues in the First Congress, 1789–1791, 61 U. Chi. L. Rev. 775, 802 (1994) ("The Revolution had been fought in substantial part on credit, and many creditors had not been paid.").

present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States, and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged.[5]

The question of whether the new constitution should include a similar provision arose at the Constitutional Convention. As originally proposed, the Debts Clause provided that "The Legislature of the U.S. shall have power to fulfil the engagements which have been entered into by Congress, and to discharge as well the debts of the U.S.: as the debts incurred by the several States during the late war, for the common defence and general welfare."[6] There followed some debate over whether the Debts Clause should provide that the new Congress "shall discharge the debts," or merely that it has the power to do so.[7]

Eventually, Edmund Randolph proposed a version stating prior debts "shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the Confederation," which the Convention approved.[8] The second part of the original proposal, concerning Congress's power to pay debts, was separated from the Debts Clause and became part of Congress's Article I spending power.[9] Both of these provisions were quickly put to use by the First Congress, which in 1790 enacted Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton's plan to settle the Confederation's debts (and, more controversially, those of the states).[10]

After the federal government satisfied the financial obligations inherited from the Confederation, the Debts and Engagements Clause has rarely been a topic of debate.[11] The few Supreme Court cases that discuss the Clause concern the question of whether the Northwest Ordinance of 1787—particulary its prohibition on slavery in what was then the Northwest Territory—was among the "engagements entered into" by the Articles of Confederation, which the new federal government was obliged to respect.[12]

---

[5] Articles of Confederation of 1781, art. XII.

[6] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 355–56 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[7] See id. at 377 (Gouverneur Morris introduces version stating the legislature "shall discharge the debts"), 412 (objection of George Mason to the "shall" language as "too strong").

[8] Id. at 414. Randolph's version is substantially the same as the final constitutional clause, save that the Committee of Style changed the description of the debts as contracted "by or under the authority of Congress" to "before the adoption of this Constitution." Compare id. at 414, with id. at 693 (Committee of Style draft).

[9] See id. at 497; U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 ("The Congress shall have Power . . . to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States . . . .").

[10] See Act of Aug. 4, 1790, 1 Stat. 138.

[11] See Jeffrey Sikkenga, Debt Assumption, in The Heritage Guide to the Constitution, https://www.heritage.org/constitution/#!/articles/6/essays/132/debt-assumption ("After some political struggles in the early 1790s, the new federal government made good on the bond obligations inherited from the Articles of Confederation, thus vitiating the possibility for serious constitutional controversy.").

[12] Compare Strader v. Graham, 51 U.S. 82, 97 (1850) (Chief Justice Roger Taney) (expressing view that the Northwest Ordinance "ceased to be in force upon the adoption of the Constitution"), with Pollard's Heirs v. Kibbe, 39 U.S. 353, 417 (1840) (Baldwin, J., concurring) (relying on the Engagements Clause to argue that the Northwest Ordinance, "the most solemn of all engagements, has become a part of the Constitution, and [remains] valid"), and Strader, 51 U.S. at 98 (Catron, J., dissenting) (similar). See generally Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 320–21 (1901) (White, J., concurring) (summarizing this debate).

Chief Justice Roger Taney's view prevailed for a time, infamously, in Dred Scott v. Sanford, 60 U.S. 393, 438 (1857) (holding that the Northwest Ordinance "had become inoperative and a nullity upon the adoption of the Constitution"), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. Const. amend XIV. This issue was rendered moot by the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment, whose language parallels the Ordinance and prohibits slavery throughout the United States. Compare Ordinance of 1787 art. VI ("There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said [Northwest] territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted . . . .") with U.S. Const. amend. XIII ("Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."). See generally Amdt13.1 Overview of Thirteenth Amendment, Abolition of Slavery.

Clause 2—Supremacy Clause

ArtVI.C2.1 Overview of Supremacy Clause

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Supremacy Clause was a response to problems with the Articles of Confederation (the Articles), which governed the United States from 1781 to 1789. The Articles conspicuously lacked any similar provision declaring federal law to be superior to state law. As a result, during the Confederation era, federal statutes did not bind state courts in the absence of state legislation implementing them. To address this issue and related political difficulties, the Confederation Congress called for a convention in 1787 to revise the Articles. While the Supremacy Clause was not a source of major disagreement at the Constitutional Convention that followed, it generated intense controversy during debates over the Constitution's ratification. But advocates of federal supremacy prevailed. The Constitution was ratified in 1788 with the Supremacy Clause.[1]

The Supremacy Clause is among the Constitution's most significant structural provisions. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the Supreme Court relied on the Clause to establish a robust role for the federal government in managing the nation's affairs. In its early cases, the Court invoked the Clause to conclude that federal treaties and statutes superseded inconsistent state laws. These decisions enabled the young Republic to enforce the treaty ending the Revolutionary War, charter a central bank, and enact other legislation without interference from recalcitrant states.[2]

The Supreme Court continued to apply this foundational principle—that federal law prevailed over conflicting state law—throughout the latter half of the nineteenth century.[3] But other aspects of the Court's federalism jurisprudence limited the Supremacy Clause's role during that era. Throughout this period, the Court embraced what academics have called the doctrine of "dual federalism," under which the federal government and the states occupied largely distinct, non-overlapping zones of constitutional authority.[4] While federal supremacy persisted as a background principle during these years, the Court's bifurcation of federal and state authority minimized the instances in which the two could conflict.[5]

To the extent that the Supremacy Clause did play an explicit role in the federalism disputes of this era, the Supreme Court applied it in ways that reinforced dual federalism's sharp division of federal and state power. In a series of early-twentieth-century decisions, the Court developed a precursor to the doctrine of "field preemption"—the principle that some federal legislation implicitly prevents states from adopting any laws regulating the same

---

[1] See ArtVI.C2.2.1 Articles of Confederation and Supremacy of Federal Law to ArtVI.C2.2.3 Debate and Ratification of Supremacy Clause.

[2] See Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824); McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819); Ware v. Hylton, 3 U.S. 199 (1796).

[3] See Davis v. Elmira Sav. Bank, 161 U.S. 275 (1896).

[4] See, e.g., Edward S. Corwin, The Passing of Dual Federalism, 36 Va. L. Rev. 1, 4 (1950).

[5] See N.Y. Cent. & Hudson River R.R. Co. v. Tonsellito, 244 U.S. 360 (1917); Charleston & W. Carolina Ry. v. Varnville Furniture Co., 237 U.S. 597 (1915); Chi., Rock Island & Pac. Ry. v. Hardwick Farmers Elevator Co., 226 U.S. 426 (1913).

general subject. Some of the Court's early field-preemption decisions aggressively employed the new doctrine, concluding that any congressional action in certain fields automatically displaced all state laws in those fields.[6]

But the Supreme Court's initial foray into field preemption soon gave way to broader legal and political trends. During the New Deal era of the 1930s and 1940s, the Court acceded to demands for a more active national government by revising other elements of its federalism jurisprudence.[7] This about-face marked the demise of dual federalism, as the Court expanded the areas in which the federal government and the states possessed concurrent authority. To prevent the federal government's newly expanded powers from smothering state regulatory authority, the Court simultaneously narrowed the circumstances in which federal law displaced state law. Besides retreating from the "automatic" field preemption of the early twentieth century, the Court articulated a "presumption against preemption," under which federal law does not displace state law "unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress."[8]

As the preceding discussion suggests, the Supreme Court has channeled contemporary Supremacy Clause doctrine into the language of "federal preemption." The Court's cases recognize several types of preemption. At the highest level of generality, federal law can preempt state law either expressly or impliedly. Federal law expressly preempts state law when it contains explicit language to that effect.[9] By contrast, federal law impliedly preempts state law when that intent is implicit in its structure and purpose.[10]

The Court has also identified different subcategories of implied preemption. As noted, field preemption occurs where federal law is "so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it," or where "the federal interest is so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject."[11] In contrast, conflict preemption occurs where compliance with both federal and state law is impossible ("impossibility preemption") or where state law poses an obstacle to federal objectives ("obstacle preemption").[12]

Because preemption issues are primarily questions of statutory interpretation, the Supremacy Clause's role in contemporary legal doctrine differs from that of many other constitutional provisions. The basic principle enshrined in the Clause—federal supremacy—is now well-settled. Generally, litigants do not dispute the Clause's meaning or advance conflicting theories on its scope. Rather, preemption cases ordinarily turn on the same types of issues—like the textualist/purposivist divide and administrative deference—that recur in all manner of statutory litigation.[13]

This essay chronicles the Supremacy Clause's evolution from a deeply controversial repudiation of the Articles of Confederation to its contemporary role as an essential bedrock of the structural Constitution.

---

[6] See Chi., Rock Island & Pac. Ry., 226 U.S. at 435.

[7] Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937).

[8] Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947).

[9] See Hillsborough Cnty. v. Automated Med. Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 713 (1985).

[10] See id.

[11] Gade v. Nat'l Solid Wastes Mgmt. Ass'n, 505 U.S. 88, 98 (1992) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[12] See id.

[13] See ArtVI.C2.3.4 Modern Doctrine on Supremacy Clause. For an overview of the textualist/purposivist debate in statutory interpretation, see Valerie C. Brannon, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45153, Statutory Interpretation: Theories, Tools, and Trends (2018), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45153. For an overview of administrative deference, see Valerie C. Brannon & Jared P. Cole, Cong. Rsch. Serv., LSB10204, Deference and its Discontents: Will the Supreme Court Overrule Chevron? (2018), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/LSB/LSB10204.

ArtVI.C2.2 Historical Background

ArtVI.C2.2.1 Articles of Confederation and Supremacy of Federal Law

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Supremacy Clause was a response to the political regime established under the Articles of Confederation (the Articles), which governed the United States from 1781 to 1789.[1] The Articles established a weak national government, providing that the states retained their "sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction, and right" that was not "expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled."[2] Under the Articles, the Confederation Congress—which performed both legislative and executive functions—had the power to wage war, coin money, establish post offices, and negotiate with Indian tribes.[3] But the Confederation Congress could not levy taxes or regulate interstate commerce. Moreover, the Articles did not make federal law supreme over state law. While Article XIII required states to "abide by the determinations of" the Confederation Congress,[4] the effect of that provision was limited. Indeed, under Article XIII, it was unclear whether federal law was binding in state courts without state legislation implementing it.[5] James Madison thus criticized the Articles as establishing "nothing more than a mere treaty" of "amity of commerce" and "alliance" in which federal law was merely "recommendatory" for the states.[6]

Article XIII's ambiguity on federal supremacy was particularly important vis-à-vis the Treaty of Paris, which ended the Revolutionary War between Britain and the United States in 1783.[7] Among other things, the treaty prohibited "impediment[s]" to the recovery of pre-war debts.[8] But the lack of clarity over federal supremacy—coupled with an absence of state legislation implementing the treaty—created uncertainties surrounding the enforcement of state laws impairing the rights of British creditors.[9] These types of uncertainties—and broader

[1] Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union (1777); but see Vasan Kesavan, When Did the Articles of Confederation Cease to be Law?, 78 Notre Dame L. Rev. 35, 44 (2002) (discussing academic arguments over whether the Articles of Confederation "cease[d] to be law" when the Constitution was ratified in the early summer of 1788, or when a new Congress and President assumed office in the spring of 1789).

[2] Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union art. II.

[3] Id. art. IX.

[4] Id. art. XIII.

[5] See Caleb Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225, 247–48 (2000) ("[Article XIII] did not necessarily mean that Congress's acts automatically became part of the law applied in state courts; it could be read to mean only that each state legislature was supposed to pass laws implementing Congress's directives. If a state legislature failed to do so, and if Congress's acts had the status of another sovereign's law, then Congress's acts might have no effect in the courts of that state.").

[6] James Madison, "Vices of the Political System of the United States," (Apr. 1787), in 9 The Papers of James Madison 345, 351–52 (Robert A. Rutland & William M.E. Rachal eds., 1975).

[7] Definitive Treaty of Peace Between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, U.S.-Gr. Brit., Sept. 3, 1783, 8 Stat. 80.

[8] Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union art. IV.

[9] Nelson, supra note 5, at 248.

dissatisfaction with the national government's weakness—prompted the Confederation Congress to call for a convention in 1787 to "revis[e]" the Articles.[10]

ArtVI.C2.2.2 Supremacy Clause and the Constitutional Convention

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

Despite the Constitutional Convention's limited mandate, its delegates began drafting an entirely new constitution shortly after convening. During the drafting process, the delegates considered several options for resolving conflicts between federal and state law. One proposal—the Virginia Plan—would have granted Congress the power to veto state laws and employ military force against states that disobeyed federal law.[1] Another option—the New Jersey Plan—also proposed giving Congress the power to use military force against recalcitrant states, and included a provision that one scholar has described as the "incubus" of what became the Supremacy Clause.[2] This provision read:

> Resd. that all Acts of the U. States in Congs. made by virtue & in pursuance of the powers hereby & by the articles of confederation vested in them, and all Treaties made & ratified under the authority of the U. States shall be the supreme law of the respective States so far forth as those Acts or Treaties shall relate to the said States or their Citizens, and that the Judiciary of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions, any thing in the respective laws of the Individual States to the contrary notwithstanding. . . .[3]

While the Convention ultimately rejected the New Jersey Plan and proceeded with consideration of the Virginia Plan, it dispensed with the latter's proposals for a congressional veto and the use of military force. Instead, the Convention unanimously approved a provision that closely tracked the New Jersey Plan's "supremacy clause."[4]

In July 1787, the Convention adjourned to allow the Committee of Detail to draw up a draft constitution.[5] The Committee of Detail's final report contained a "supremacy clause" that read:

> The Acts of the Legislature of the United States made in pursuance of this Constitution, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be

---

[10] Resolution of Congress (Feb. 21, 1787), in The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 45 (John P. Kaminski & Gaspare J. Saladino eds., 1981).

[1] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 21 (Max Farrand ed., 1911) [hereinafter Farrand's Records].

[2] 2 John R. Vile, The Constitutional Convention of 1787: A Comprehensive encyclopedia of America's founding 773 (2005); see also Christopher R. Drahozal, The Supremacy Clause: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution 16 (2004) (describing the provision as "the earliest version of what was to become the Supremacy Clause").

[3] 1 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 245.

[4] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 22. The approved clause read: "Resolved that the legislative acts of the United States made by virtue and in pursuance of the articles of Union and all Treaties made and ratified under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the respective States as far as those acts or Treaties shall relate to the said States, or their Citizens and Inhabitants—and that the Judiciaries of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions, any thing in the respective laws of the individual States to the contrary notwithstanding." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 22.

[5] Drahozal, supra note 2, at 21.

> the supreme law of the several States, and of their citizens and inhabitants; and the judges in the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions; anything in the Constitutions or laws of the several States to the contrary notwithstanding.[6]

This provision departed from the clause approved by the Convention as a whole by explicitly providing that federal law was supreme over state "Constitutions," in addition to state "laws."

When the Convention considered the Committee of Detail's report, it unanimously approved an amendment clarifying that the federal Constitution itself—in addition to federal statutes and treaties—was supreme over state law.[7] The Convention's Committee of Style ultimately placed the Supremacy Clause in Article VI, immediately before a provision requiring all judges to take an oath supporting the Constitution.[8] The final Supremacy Clause read:

> "This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."[9]

ArtVI.C2.2.3 Debate and Ratification of Supremacy Clause

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Supremacy Clause generated significant controversy during debates over the Constitution's ratification. Anti-Federalist opponents of the Constitution argued that the Clause would make the national government overly powerful and infringe on state sovereignty. The stridency of these criticisms varied.

One Anti-Federalist contended that the Clause would force the country into "one large system of lordly government."[1] Another critic similarly argued that the Constitution would effectuate "a complete consolidation of all of the states into one, however diverse the parts of it

---

[6] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 183.

[7] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 389. The amendment replaced the phrase "The Acts of the Legislature of the United States made in pursuance of this Constitution" with the following language: "This Constitution & the laws of the U.S. made in pursuance thereof." 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 389.

[8] For a detailed summary of the Supremacy Clause's textual evolution, see Drahozal, supra note 2, at 68–70.

[9] 2 Farrand's Records, supra note 1, at 663. One commentator has argued that the phrase "any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding" is a "non obstante provision"—an eighteenth-century legal term of art instructing courts not to apply the general presumption against implied repeals. Caleb Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225, 238–41 (2000). According to this theory, the Supremacy Clause's non obstante provision means "that courts should not automatically seek narrowing constructions of express preemption clauses" in federal statutes. Id. at 294. Other scholars have questioned this reading of the Supremacy Clause and argued that its adoption would be inconsistent with other aspects of contemporary federalism jurisprudence. See Daniel J. Meltzer, Preemption and Textualism, 112 Mich. L. Rev. 1, 47–52 (2013); Roderick M. Hills, Jr., Against Preemption: How Federalism Can Improve the National Legislative Process, 82 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1, 6 n.12 (2007).

[1] A Federal Republican, "A Review of the Constitution" (Nov. 28, 1787), in 14 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 255, 269 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1983).

may be."[2] Some Anti-Federalists framed this criticism as a conceptual argument, asserting that two sovereigns could not exist within the same territory, and that one would "necessarily" destroy the other.[3] Along these lines, one opponent claimed that the Supremacy Clause would allow the federal government to prevent states from levying taxes and thereby "absorb" their powers.[4]

Other Anti-Federalists offered more limited criticisms. Some critics objected to making treaties supreme to state law. These commentators contended that this aspect of the Supremacy Clause would allow for the displacement of state law without the approval of both Houses of Congress, because the President and the Senate could make treaties without the approval of the House of Representatives.[5] Some opponents also argued that, without a federal bill of rights, the Supremacy Clause would allow the federal government to override state constitutional guarantees of individual liberties.[6]

Federalist supporters of the Constitution rejected these arguments. Some supporters dismissed concerns about the elimination of state governments, noting that the Constitution granted the federal government only limited powers.[7] Others minimized the Supremacy Clause's significance, characterizing it as a truism that "resulted by necessary and unavoidable implication from the very act of constituting a Federal Government[ ] and vesting it with certain specified powers."[8] In response to concerns about the treaty power, Federalists contended that the supremacy of treaties was essential to the federal government's credibility as a negotiator with foreign powers.[9] Others argued that, while the House of Representatives had no formal role in the ratification of treaties, it nevertheless operated as a "restraining influence" on that process because of its general legislative powers.[10] Finally, while a federal Bill of Rights was ultimately adopted after the Constitution's ratification, some Federalists

---

[2] Agrippa X, Massachusetts Gazette (Jan. 1, 1788), in 5 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 576 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1998).

[3] The Impartial Examiner I, Virginia Independent Chronicles (Feb. 20, 1787), in 8 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 387, 392 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1988); see also George Mason, Debates of the Virginia Convention (June 19, 1788), in 10 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 1402 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1993) (arguing that the Constitution would "destroy the State Governments, whatever may have been the intention."); Robert Whitehill, Debates of the Pennsylvania Convention (Dec. 8, 1787), in 2 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 526 (Merill Jensen et al. eds., 1976) (arguing that the Supremacy Clause was a "concluding clause[ ] that the state governments will be abolished").

[4] Brutus I, New York Journal (Oct. 18, 1787), in 13 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 411, 415 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1981); see also An Old Whig VI, Philadelphia Independent Gazette (Nov. 24, 1787), in 14 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 215–16 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1983) (arguing that. under the Supremacy Clause, "no individual state can collect a penny, unless by the permission of Congress . . . Not a single source of revenue will remain to any state, which Congress may not stop at their [sic] sovereign will and pleasure").

[5] An Old Whig III, Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer (Oct. 20, 1787), in 13 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 425–26 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1981); Federal Farmer IV, Letters to the Republican (Oct. 12, 1787), in 14 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 42–43 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1983); George Mason, Objections to the Constitution (Oct. 7, 1787), in 8 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 40, 44–45 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1988).

[6] See Patrick Henry, Debates of the Virginia Convention (June 19, 1788), in 10 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 1349 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1993); Elbridge Gerry, Objections to Signing the National Constitution (Nov. 3, 1787), in 13 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 546, 548 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1981); George Mason, Objections to the Constitution (Oct. 7, 1787), in 8 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 40, 43 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1988).

[7] A Native of Virginia, Observations upon the Proposed Plan of Federal Government (Apr. 2, 1788), in 9 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 655, 692 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1990).

[8] The Federalist No. 33 (Alexander Hamilton).

[9] The Federalist No. 64 (John Jay).

[10] James Wilson, Debates of the Pennsylvania Convention (Dec. 11, 1787), in 2 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 416 (Merrill Jensen et al. eds., 1976).

challenged the necessity of those amendments during the ratification debates.[11] These advocates contended that explicit rights guarantees were superfluous, because the federal government's limited powers would prevent it from infringing individual liberties.[12]

The Federalists prevailed. In June 1788, New Hampshire became the ninth state to ratify the Constitution, giving it effect in the ratifying states.[13] Federal law thus became the "supreme Law of the Land."[14]

ArtVI.C2.3 Doctrine

ArtVI.C2.3.1 Early Doctrine on Supremacy Clause

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The balance of power between the federal government and the states continued to be a source of controversy after the Constitution's ratification.[1] But in a series of foundational decisions, the Supreme Court interpreted the Supremacy Clause as establishing a robust role for the national government in managing the nation's affairs. In 1796, the Court held that the Treaty of Paris—which, as noted, prohibited impediments to the recovery of pre-war debts—superseded a Virginia statute allowing debtors to satisfy any obligations to British subjects by payment to the state treasury.[2]

Slightly more than two decades later, the Court again invoked the Supremacy Clause to resolve another hotly contested political dispute. In 1819, the Court held in McCulloch v. Maryland that a state tax on notes issued by the Second Bank of the United States impermissibly conflicted with federal law.[3] The Bank had attracted criticism from skeptics of federal power, who challenged Congress's authority to charter it. In McCulloch, the Court sustained the federal government's power to charter the Bank under the Necessary and Proper Clause, while invalidating the state tax on the Bank's notes under the Supremacy Clause. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice John Marshall explained that "the power to tax involves the power to destroy," striking down the state tax because it unlawfully burdened the Bank's operations.[4] [11] James Wilson, Speech at a Public Meeting in Philadelphia (Oct. 6, 1787), in 13 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 337, 339–340 (John P. Kaminski et al. eds., 1981).

---

[12] Id.

[13] Christopher R. Drahozal, The Supremacy Clause: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution 34 (2004).

[14] U.S. Const. art. VI cl. 2.

[1] See generally William Nisbet Chambers, Political Parties in a New Nation: The American Experience, 1776–1809 (1963) (discussing the key political controversies of the early Republic, many of which involved the relative powers of the federal government and the states).

[2] See Ware v. Hylton, 3 U.S. 199, 235–39 (1796).

[3] 17 U.S. 316 (1819).

[4] Id. at 327. This principle—that states cannot interfere with or control the operations of the federal government—has evolved into what is often called the "intergovernmental immunity" doctrine. For many years, the Supreme Court applied this doctrine to condemn state laws that "increase[d] the cost to the Federal Government of performing its functions." United States v. Cnty. of Fresno, 429 U.S. 452, 460 (1977). But the Court later narrowed this rule. Today, a state law violates the intergovernmental immunity doctrine only if it regulates the federal government directly or discriminates against the federal government or those with whom the federal government deals. North

ArtVI.C2.3.1
Early Doctrine on Supremacy Clause

Five years after McCulloch, the Court employed similar reasoning in Gibbons v. Ogden, holding that federal coastal licenses displaced a state law conferring a monopoly on a steamboat company.[5] After concluding that Congress had the authority to issue the licenses under the Commerce Clause, Chief Justice John Marshall explained that the licenses superseded the relevant state law, which "interfere[d] with" federal policy.[6] The early Court thus gave shape to the basic principle underlying the Supremacy Clause: where federal and state law clashed, federal law was supreme.[7]

ArtVI.C2.3.2 Dual Federalism in Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Supreme Court continued to apply the basic principle of federal supremacy throughout the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. But the Supremacy Clause's role during that era was limited by other aspects of the Court's federalism jurisprudence. Throughout this period, the Court embraced what academics have called the doctrine of "dual federalism," under which the federal government and the states occupied largely distinct, non-overlapping zones of constitutional authority.[1] Applying this framework, the Court adopted a narrow interpretation of Congress's Commerce Clause authorities[2] and construed the Tenth Amendment as imposing strict additional limitations on federal power.[3] The Court also relied on the Dormant Commerce Clause to conclude that states lacked the power to regulate certain subjects of exclusive federal concern.[4] While federal supremacy thus persisted

---

Dakota v. United States, 495 U.S. 423, 435 (1990) (plurality op.); id. at 444 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment) (noting that "[a]ll agree" with this aspect of the plurality opinion). In evaluating whether a state law discriminates against the federal government, courts assess whether the law singles out the federal government or its contractors or regulates them unfavorably on some basis related to their governmental status. See United States v. Washington, No. 21-404 (U.S. June 21, 2022).

[5] 22 U.S. 1, 82–87 (1824).

[6] Id. at 82.

[7] The Supremacy Clause also served as the foundation for a mid-nineteenth century decision that occupies an inglorious place in the Nation's constitutional history. In its 1842 decision in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, the Supreme Court held that the federal Fugitive Slave Act—which allowed slaveholders to recover escaped slaves—superseded a Pennsylvania law that prohibited the "remov[al]" of African-Americans from the state for the purpose of enslavement. 41 U.S. 539 (1842).

[1] See Edward S. Corwin, The Passing of Dual Federalism, 36 Va. L. Rev. 1, 4 (1950) (defining "Dual Federalism" as involving the following "postulates": "1. The national government is one of enumerated powers only; 2. Also the purposes which it may constitutionally promote are few; 3. Within their respective spheres the two centers of government are 'sovereign' and hence 'equal'; 4. The relation of the two centers with each other is one of tension rather than collaboration.").

[2] See, e.g., Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 303–04 (1936) (holding that the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 exceeded the scope of Congress's Commerce Clause authority); ALA Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 546 (1935) (holding that a "code of fair competition" adopted under the National Industrial Recovery Act exceeded the scope of the Commerce Power); United States v. E.C. Knight, 156 U.S. 1, 12 (1895) (holding that the Sherman Antitrust Act's application to acquisitions in the sugar refining industry exceeded the scope of the Commerce Power).

[3] See, e.g., Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 273–74 (1918) (holding that a federal law prohibiting the interstate shipment of goods produced using child labor violated the Tenth Amendment).

[4] See, e.g., Wabash, St. Louis & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U.S. 557, 575 (1886) (holding that a state law regulating railroad rates violated the Dormant Commerce Clause); Welton v. Missouri, 91 U.S. 275, 281 (1876) (holding that a as a background principle during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Court's bifurcation of federal and state authority minimized the instances in which the two could conflict.[5]

To the extent that the Supremacy Clause played an explicit role in the federalism disputes of this era, the Court applied it in ways that reinforced the sharp division of federal and state power. In a series of early-twentieth-century decisions, the Court developed a precursor to the doctrine of "field preemption"—the principle that some federal legislation implicitly prevents states from adopting any laws regulating the same general subject. For example, in Southern Railway v. Reid, the Court held that the Interstate Commerce Act (ICA)—which regulated railroad rates—superseded a state law requiring railroads to transport tendered freight.[6] The Court reasoned that Congress had "taken possession of the field" of railroad rate regulation with the ICA, thereby precluding even supplementary state regulations.[7] In another decision, the Court held that a different federal law requiring railroads to secure the safe transportation of property upon reasonable terms displaced a state law compelling railroads to settle certain claims within forty days.[8] In his opinion for the Court, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes rejected the argument that the state law did not conflict with the federal law, explaining that the absence of such a conflict was "immaterial," because "coincidence is as ineffective as opposition" when "Congress has taken [a] particular subject-matter in hand."[9] In yet another field-preemption case, the Court held that a federal law involving railroads' liability for employee injuries superseded state common law claims based on such injuries.[10]

While the Supreme Court's reasoning in these cases varied, one commentator has noted the readiness with which the Court concluded that federal law preempted the relevant fields.[11] For example, in one decision, the Court appeared to suggest that any federal legislation in certain fields precluded states from adopting even supplementary regulations of the same subject.[12] Under this theory of "automatic" preemption, Congress's authority over certain subjects was one of "latent exclusivity," meaning "the power of the states ended as soon as Congress chose to exercise its regulatory power" in those fields.[13] However, this view of federal power—which was related to notions of dual federalism—would soon give way to broader legal and political trends.

---

state law requiring peddlers of out-of-state merchandise to pay a tax and obtain a license violated the Dormant Commerce Clause because it regulated a subject "of national importance"); see also Cooley v. Bd. of Wardens, 53 U.S. 299, 319–20 (1851) (distinguishing between subjects of the Commerce Power that were "in their nature national," and therefore subject to exclusive federal regulation, and those that were subject to concurrent federal and state regulation).

[5] But see Davis v. Elmira Sav. Bank, 161 U.S. 275, 284 (1896) (holding that the National Bank Act superseded a state law regarding the distribution of an insolvent national bank's assets).

[6] 222 U.S. 424, 438 (1912).

[7] Id. at 442.

[8] Charleston & W. Carolina Ry. v. Varnville Furniture Co., 237 U.S. 597, 603–04 (1915).

[9] Id. at 604.

[10] N.Y. Cent. & Hudson River R.R. v. Tonsellito, 244 U.S. 360, 362 (1917).

[11] See Stephen A. Gardbaum, The Nature of Preemption, 49 Cornell L. Rev. 767, 783 (1994).

[12] See Chi., Rock Island & Pac. Ry. v. Hardwick Farmers Elevator Co., 226 U.S. 426, 435 (1913) ("[I]t must follow in consequence of the action of Congress . . . that the power of the State over the subject-matter ceased to exist from the moment that Congress exerted its paramount and all embracing authority over the subject. We say this because the elementary and long settled doctrine is that there can be no divided authority over interstate commerce and that the regulations of Congress on that subject are supreme.").

[13] Gardbaum, supra note 11, at 783.

ArtVI.C2.3.3 New Deal and Presumption Against Preemption

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Supreme Court abandoned dual federalism during the New Deal era of the 1930s and 1940s. In those years, the Court acceded to demands for a more active national government by revising its Commerce Clause and Tenth Amendment jurisprudence.[1] The federal government thereby gained vast new powers to regulate the economy, which it deployed in new and creative ways.[2] But this expansion of federal authority threatened sweeping consequences when paired with the Court's aggressive application of the Supremacy Clause. Specifically, if field preemption automatically followed from many types of federal legislation, Congress's enhanced powers would displace large swathes of state regulation—even in cases when state regulation did not conflict with federal law. To avoid this outcome, the New Deal Court retreated from dual federalist notions of "latent exclusivity," clarifying that federal law displaced state law only if Congress's intention to do so was clear.

In Mintz v. Baldwin, for example, the Court rejected the argument that a federal law regulating the inspection and transportation of cattle superseded a state order compelling certain breeders to remove uncertified cattle from the state.[3] In rejecting this argument, the Court explained that "[t]he purpose of Congress to supersede or exclude state action against the ravages of disease is not lightly to be inferred," and that "[t]he intention so to do must definitely and clearly appear."[4] The Court endorsed a similar principle in Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., where it held that the federal Warehouse Act superseded some—but not all—state law claims against grain-warehouse operators.[5] The Court explained that, in evaluating whether federal law displaces state law, it "start[ed] with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States were not to be superseded . . . unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress."[6] The Court continues to apply this "presumption against preemption" to this day-albeit in limited circumstances.[7]

ArtVI.C2.3.4 Modern Doctrine on Supremacy Clause

Article VI, Clause 2:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United

---

[1] See Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 125 (1942) (holding that Congress's Commerce Clause authority extends to intrastate activities that in the aggregate "exert[ ] a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce"); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 119–24 (1941) (upholding the Fair Labor Standards Act as a permissible exercise of the Commerce Power that did not violate the Tenth Amendment); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 49 (1937) (upholding the National Labor Relations Act as a permissible exercise of the Commerce Power).

[2] See, e.g., 2 Bruce Ackerman, We the People: Transformations 281–311 (1998).

[3] 289 U.S. 346, 350 (1933).

[4] Id. at 350.

[5] 331 U.S. 218, 230–37 (1947).

[6] Id. at 230.

[7] See ArtVI.C2.3.4 Modern Doctrine on Supremacy Clause.

States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

Since the mid-twentieth century, the Supreme Court has channeled its Supremacy Clause jurisprudence into the language of "federal preemption."[1] The Court's cases identify several types of preemption. At the highest level of generality, federal law can preempt state law either expressly or impliedly. Federal law expressly preempts state law when it contains explicit language to that effect.[2] By contrast, federal law impliedly preempts state law when that intent is implicit in its structure and purpose.[3]

The Court has also distinguished between different forms of implied preemption. As noted, field preemption occurs where federal law is "so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it," or where "the federal interest is so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject."[4] In contrast, conflict preemption occurs where compliance with federal and state law is impossible ("impossibility preemption") or where state law poses an obstacle to federal objectives ("obstacle preemption").[5]

In all preemption cases, "the purpose of Congress is the ultimate touchstone" of the Court's statutory analysis.[6] In analyzing congressional purpose, the Court continues to invoke the presumption against preemption from Mintz and Rice—albeit in limited circumstances. While the Court regularly employed this presumption in the 1980s and 1990s,[7] it has invoked it less consistently in recent years.[8] Moreover, in a 2016 decision, the Court departed from prior case law[9] when it explained that the presumption does not apply in express-preemption cases.[10] The Court has also acknowledged exceptions to the presumption in cases involving subjects that the states have not traditionally regulated,[11] and cases involving subjects in which the

---

[1] See Stephen A. Gardbaum, The Nature of Preemption, 49 Cornell L. Rev. 767, 789 n.65 (1994) (noting that the term "preemption" first appeared in the U.S. Reports in 1917, but was not generally used until the 1940s).

[2] See Hillsborough Cnty. v. Automated Med. Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 713 (1985).

[3] See id.

[4] Gade v. Nat'l Solid Wastes Mgmt. Ass'n, 505 U.S. 88, 98 (1992) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[5] See id.

[6] Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555, 565 (2009) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[7] See, e.g., De Buono v. NYSA-ILA Med. & Clinical Servs. Fund, 520 U.S. 806, 814 (1997); N.Y. State Conf. of Blue Cross & Blue Shield Plans v. Travelers Ins. Co., 514 U.S. 645, 654 (1995); Bldg. & Const. Trades Council v. Assoc. Builders & Contractors, 507 U.S. 218, 224 (1993); Cipollone v. Liggett Grp., Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 518 (1992); Gade v. Nat'l Solid Wastes Mgmt. Ass'n, 505 U.S. 88, 116 (1992); Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Mass., 471 U.S. 724, 740 (1985); Hillsborough Cnty. v. Automated Med. Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 715 (1985); Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 746 (1981).

[8] See, e.g., Mutual Pharm. Co., Inc. v. Bartlett, 133 S. Ct. 2466 (2013) (holding that federal law preempted state law without mentioning the presumption against preemption); Kurns v. R.R. Friction Prods. Corp., 565 U.S. 625 (2012) (similar); PLIVA, Inc. v. Mensing, 564 U.S. 604, 622 (2011) (similar); Bruesewitz v. Wyeth LLC, 562 U.S. 223 (2011) (similar); Rowe v. N.H. Motor Transp. Ass'n, 552 U.S. 364 (2008) (similar); Geier v. Am. Honda Motor Co., Inc., 529 U.S. 861 (2000) (similar).

[9] See, e.g., CTS Corp. v. Waldburger, 134 S. Ct. 2175, 2188–89 (2014) ("When the text of a pre-emption clause is susceptible of more than one plausible reading, courts ordinarily accept the reading that disfavors preemption.") (internal quotation marks and citations omitted); Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555, 565 (2009) (explaining that the presumption against preemption applies "[i]n all preemption cases"); Altria Grp., Inc. v. Good, 555 U.S. 70, 77 (2008) (explaining that the Court "begin[s its] analysis" with a presumption against preemption "[w]hen addressing questions of express or implied pre-emption") (emphasis added); Bates v. Dow Agrosciences, LLC, 544 U.S. 431, 449 (2005) ("Even if [the defendant] had offered us a plausible alternative reading of [the relevant preemption clause]—indeed, even if its alternative were just as plausible as our reading of the text—we would nevertheless have a duty to accept the reading that disfavors preemption."); Egelhoff v. Egelhoff ex rel. Breiner, 532 U.S. 141, 151 (2001) (invoking the presumption against preemption in interpreting ERISA's preemption clause); Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 485 (1996) (explaining that the presumption against preemption applies "[i]n all preemption cases"); De Buono v. NYSA-ILA Med. & Clinical Servs. Fund, 520 U.S. 806, 814 (1997) (invoking the presumption against federal government has historically had a significant regulatory presence.[12] Accordingly, while the presumption remains relevant in certain implied-preemption disputes,[13] the Court has narrowed the circumstances in which it applies.

As the federal government's regulatory role has expanded, preemption has become a ubiquitous feature of the modern administrative state. Preemptive federal statutes now shape the regulatory environment for most major industries, including pharmaceutical drugs, securities, nuclear safety, medical devices, air transportation, banking, automobiles, and telecommunications.[14] While preemption is thus a pervasive feature of the contemporary legal landscape, the Supremacy Clause's role in modern legal doctrine differs from that of many other constitutional provisions. Preemption cases are primarily exercises in statutory interpretation—not constitutional analysis. Generally, litigants do not dispute the Supremacy Clause's meaning or advance conflicting theories on its scope. The basic principle enshrined in the Clause—federal supremacy—is now well-settled. As a result, the Supremacy Clause does not play a central role in modern debates over federalism; those battles are instead typically fought on the terrain of the Commerce Clause, the Spending Clause, and the Fourteenth Amendment.[15] Today, preemption cases ordinarily turn on the same types of issues—like the textualist/purposivist divide and administrative deference—that recur in all manner of statutory litigation.[16] But the Supremacy Clause's modern role as a background principle hardly negates its importance. Federal supremacy remains a foundational doctrine of constitutional law that undergirds much of the modern regulatory state.

Clause 3—Oaths of Office

ArtVI.C3.1 Oaths of Office Generally

Article VI, Clause 3:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the preemption in interpreting ERISA's preemption clause); Travelers, 514 U.S. at 654 (same); Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 518 (invoking the presumption against preemption in interpreting the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act's preemption clause).

[10] Puerto Rico v. Franklin Cal. Tax-Free Tr., 136 S. Ct. 1938, 1946 (2016) (explaining that in express-preemption cases, the Court "do[es] not invoke any presumption against pre-emption but instead focus[es] on the plain wording of the [preemption] clause, which necessarily contains the best evidence of Congress's pre-emptive intent").

[11] See Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Comm., 531 U.S. 341, 347–48 (2001).

[12] See United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89, 108 (2000).

[13] See, e.g., Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555, 565 (2009).

[14] See generally Jay B. Sykes & Nicole Vanatko, Cong. Rsch. Serv., R45825, Federal Preemption: A Legal Primer (2019), https://crsreports.congress.gov/product/pdf/R/R45825.

[15] That the Supremacy Clause is not the locus for most modern federalism disputes is attributable to its basic function in the structural Constitution. Unlike the Commerce Clause, the Spending Clause, and the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supremacy Clause is not an independent source of federal authority. Instead, the Supreme Court has explained that the Supremacy Clause is a "rule of decision" for resolving conflicts between federal and state law. Murphy v. NCAA, 138 S. Ct. 1461, 1479 (2018). Because the basic principle underlying this "rule of decision" is now well-established, contemporary federalism cases typically hinge on disagreements over the scope of provisions granting the federal government various powers.

[16] See, e.g., Va. Uranium, Inc. v. Warren, 139 S. Ct. 1894, 1906 (2019) (Gorsuch, J., lead op.) (rejecting a field-preemption argument on textualist grounds); id. at 1909 (Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment) (concurring with Justice Gorsuch's conclusion, but declining to join his "discussion of the perils of inquiring into legislative motive"); id. at 1917 (Roberts, J., dissenting) (arguing that a state law fell within a federally preempted field because of its purpose); Nina A. Mendelson, Chevron and Preemption, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 737 (2004) (reviewing the case law on judicial deference to agency determinations that federal law preempts state law).

several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

Congress may require no other oath of fidelity to the Constitution, but it may add to this oath such other oath of office as its wisdom may require.[1] It may not, however, prescribe a test oath as a qualification for holding office, such an act being in effect an ex post facto law,[2] and the same rule holds in the case of the states.[3]

Commenting in the Federalist Papers on the requirement that state officers, as well as members of the state legislatures, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution, Alexander Hamilton wrote: "Thus the legislatures, courts, and magistrates, of the respective members, will be incorporated into the operations of the national government as far as its just and constitutional authority extends; and it will be rendered auxiliary to the enforcement of its laws."[4] The younger Charles Cotesworth Pinckney had expressed the same idea on the floor of the Philadelphia Convention: "They [the states] are the instruments upon which the Union must frequently depend for the support and execution of their powers. . . ."[5] Indeed, the Constitution itself lays many duties, both positive and negative, upon the different organs of state government,[6] and Congress may frequently add others, provided it does not require the state authorities to act outside their normal jurisdiction. Early congressional legislation contains many illustrations of such action by Congress.

The Judiciary Act of 1789[7] not only left the state courts in sole possession of a large part of the jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different states and in concurrent possession of the rest, and by other sections state courts were authorized to entertain proceedings by the United States itself to enforce penalties and forfeitures under the revenue laws, examples of the principle that federal law is law to be applied by the state courts, but also any justice of the peace or other magistrates of any of the states were authorized to cause any offender against the United States to be arrested and imprisoned or bailed under the usual mode of process. From the beginning, Congress enacted hundreds of statutes that contained provisions authorizing state officers to enforce and execute federal laws.[8] Pursuant to the same idea of treating state governmental organs as available to the national government for administrative purposes, the Act of 1793 entrusted the rendition of fugitive slaves in part to national officials and in part to state officials and the rendition of fugitives from justice from one state to another exclusively to the state executives.[9]

With the rise of the doctrine of states' rights and of the equal sovereignty of the states with the National Government, the availability of the former as instruments of the latter in the

---

[1] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 416 (1819).

[2] Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 333, 337 (1867).

[3] Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 277, 323 (1867). See also Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966), in which the Supreme Court held that antiwar statements made by a newly elected member of the Georgia House of Representatives were not inconsistent with the oath of office to support to the United States Constitution.

[4] The Federalist No. 27 (Alexander Hamilton). See also, id. No. 45 (James Madison).

[5] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 404 (Max Farrand ed., 1937).

[6] See U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 1; id. § 4, cl. 1; id. § 10; id. art. II, § 1, cl. 2; id. art. III, 2, cl. 2; id. art. IV, §§ 1 & 2; id. art. V; id. amends. 13–15, 17, 19, 25, & 26.

[7] 1 Stat. 73 (1789).

[8] See Warren, Federal Criminal Laws and the State Courts, 38 Harv. L. Rev. 545 (1925); Holcomb, The States as Agents of the Nation, 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law 1187 (1938); Barnett, Cooperation Between the Federal and State Governments, 7 Ore. L. Rev. 267 (1928). See also J. Clark, The Rise of a New Federalism (1938); E. Corwin, Court Over Constitution 148–68 (1938).

[9] 1 Stat. 302 (1793).

execution of its power came to be questioned.[10] In Prigg v. Pennsylvania,[11] decided in 1842, the constitutionality of the provision of the Act of 1793 making it the duty of state magistrates to act in the return of fugitive slaves was challenged; and in Kentucky v. Dennison ,[12] decided on the eve of the Civil War, similar objection was leveled against the provision of the same act which made it "the duty" of the chief executive of a state to render up a fugitive from justice upon the demand of the chief executive of the state from which the fugitive had fled. The Court sustained both provisions, but upon the theory that the cooperation of the state authorities was purely voluntary. In Prigg, the Court, speaking by Justice Joseph Story, said that "while a difference of opinion has existed, and may exist still on the point, in different states, whether state magistrates are bound to act under it, none is entertained by this Court, that state magistrates may, if they choose, exercise that authority, unless prohibited by state legislation."[13] Subsequent cases confirmed the point that Congress could authorize willing state officers to perform such federal duties.[14] Indeed, when Congress in the Selective Service Act of 1917 authorized enforcement to a great extent through state employees, the Court rejected "as too wanting in merit to require further notice" the contention that the Act was invalid because of this delegation.[15] State officials were frequently employed in the enforcement of the National Prohibition Act, and suits to abate nuisances as defined by the statute were authorized to be brought, in the name of the United States, not only by federal officials, but also by "any prosecuting attorney of any State or any subdivision thereof."[16]

In Dennison, however, the Court held that, although Congress could delegate, it could not require performance of an obligation. The "duty" of state executives in the rendition of fugitives from justice was construed to be declaratory of a "moral duty." Chief Justice Roger Taney wrote for the Court: "The Act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty, nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the Executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever, and compel him to perform it. . . . It is true," the Chief Justice conceded, "that in the early days of the Government, Congress relied with confidence upon the co-operation and support of the States, when exercising the legitimate powers of the General Government, and were accustomed to receive it, [but this, he explained, was] upon principles of comity, and from a sense of mutual and common interest, where no such duty was imposed by the Constitution."[17]

---

[10] For the development of opinion, especially on the part of state courts, adverse to the validity of such legislation, see 1 J. Kent, Commentaries on American Law 396–404 (1826).

[11] 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842).

[12] 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66 (1861).

[13] 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539, 622 (1842). See also Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 108 (1861). The word "magistrates" in this passage does not refer solely to judicial officers but reflects the usage in that era in which officers generally were denominated magistrates; the power thus upheld is not the related but separate issue of the use of state courts to enforce federal law.

[14] United States v. Jones, 109 U.S. 513, 519 (1883); Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 280 (1897); Dallemagne v. Moisan, 197 U.S. 169, 174 (1905); Holmgren v. United States, 217 U.S. 509, 517 (1910); Parker v. Richard, 250 U.S. 235, 239 (1919).

[15] Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 389 (1918). The Act was 40 Stat. 76 (1917).

[16] 41 Stat. 314, § 22. In at least two states, the practice was approved by state appellate courts. Carse v. Marsh, 189 Cal. 743, 210 Pac. 257 (1922); United States v. Richards, 201 Wis. 130, 229 N.W. 675 (1930). On this and other issues under the Act, see Hart, Some Legal Questions Growing Out of the President's Executive Order for Prohibition Enforcement, 13 Va. L. Rev. 86 (1922).

[17] 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 107–08 (1861) .

Eighteen years later, in Ex parte Siebold,[18] the Court sustained the right of Congress, under Article I, section 4, paragraph 1 of the Constitution, to impose duties upon state election officials in connection with a congressional election and to prescribe additional penalties for the violation by such officials of their duties under state law. Although the doctrine of the holding was expressly confined to cases in which the National Government and the states enjoy "a concurrent power over the same subject matter," no attempt was made to catalogue such cases. Moreover, the outlook of Justice Joseph Bradley's opinion for the Court was decidedly nationalistic rather than dualistic, as is shown by the answer made to the contention of counsel "that the nature of sovereignty is such as to preclude the joint co-operation of two sovereigns, even in a matter in which they are mutually concerned . . . ."[19] To this Justice Bradley replied: "As a general rule, it is no doubt expedient and wise that the operations of the State and national governments should, as far as practicable, be conducted separately, in order to avoid undue jealousies and jars and conflicts of jurisdiction and power. But there is no reason for laying this down as a rule of universal application. It should never be made to override the plain and manifest dictates of the Constitution itself. We cannot yield to such a transcendental view of state sovereignty. The Constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land, and to these every citizen of every State owes obedience, whether in his individual or official capacity."[20]

Conflict thus developed early between these two doctrinal lines. But it was the Siebold line that prevailed. Enforcement of obligations upon state officials through mandamus or through injunctions was readily available, even when the state itself was immune, through the fiction of Ex Parte Young,[21] under which a state official could be sued in his official capacity but without the immunities attaching to his official capacity. Although the obligations were, for a long period, in their origin based on the United States Constitution, the capacity of Congress to enforce statutory obligations through judicial action was little doubted.[22] Nonetheless, it was only recently that the Court squarely overruled Dennison. "If it seemed clear to the Court in 1861, facing the looming shadow of a Civil War, that 'the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever, and compel him to perform it,' . . . basic constitutional principles now point as clearly the other way."[23] That case is doubly important, because the Court spoke not only to the Extradition Clause and the federal statute directly enforcing it, but it also enforced a purely statutory right on behalf of a Territory that could not claim for itself rights under the Clause.[24]

Even as the Court imposes new federalism limits upon Congress's powers to regulate the states as states, it has reaffirmed the principle that Congress may authorize the federal courts to compel state officials to comply with federal law, statutory as well as constitutional. "[T]he

[18] 100 U.S. 371 (1880).

[19] 100 U.S. at 391.

[20] 100 U.S. at 392.

[21] 209 U.S. 123 (1908). See also Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U.S. 531, 541 (1876).

[22] Maine v. Thiboutot, 448 U.S. 1 (1980) .

[23] Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 483 U.S. 219, 227 (1987) (Dennison "rests upon a foundation with which time and the currents of constitutional change have dealt much less favorably.").

[24] In including territories in the statute, Congress acted under the Territorial Clause rather than under the Extradition Clause. New York ex rel. Kopel v. Bingham, 211 U.S. 468 (1909).

Supremacy Clause makes federal law paramount over the contrary positions of state officials; the power of federal courts to enforce federal law thus presupposes some authority to order state officials to comply."[25]

No doubt, there is tension between the exercise of Congress's power to impose duties on state officials[26] and the developing doctrine under which the Court holds that Congress may not "commandeer" state legislative or administrative processes in the enforcement of federal programs.[27] However, the existence of the Supremacy Clause and the federal oath of office, as well as a body of precedent, indicates that coexistence of the two lines of principles will be maintained.

ArtVI.C3.2 Religious Test

ArtVI.C3.2.1 Historical Background on Religious Test for Government Offices

Article VI, Clause 3:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

England historically required public officeholders not only to swear an oath of loyalty to the Crown, the head of the state-sponsored Church of England, but also to take communion in that church.[1] Religious test oaths were initially required in the colonies, as well, as part of the legal framework supporting state-established churches.[2] The Constitution Annotated discusses the features of historic state-sponsored religions, known as religious establishments, in the context of the Religion Clauses.[3] Looking specifically at religious tests, early Puritans and other colonists believed oaths requiring conformance to Christian values were necessary to ensure that officials were of good moral character.[4] These arguments held particular force

[25] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 179 (1992). See also FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 761–65 (1982); Washington v. Washington State Commercial Passenger Fishing Vessel Ass'n, 443 U.S. 658, 695 (1979); Illinois v. City of Milwaukee, 406 U.S. 91, 106–08 (1972).

[26] The practice continues. See Pub. L. No. 94-435, title III, 90 Stat. 1394, 15 U.S.C. § 15c (authorizing state attorneys general to bring parens patriae antitrust actions in the name of the state to secure monetary relief for damages to the citizens of the state); Medical Waste Tracking Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-582, 102 Stat. 2955, 42 U.S.C. § 6992f (authorizing states to impose civil and possibly criminal penalties for violations of the Act); Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act, Pub. L. No. 103-159, tit. I, 107 Stat. 1536, 18 U.S.C. § 922s (imposing on chief law enforcement officer of each jurisdiction to ascertain whether prospective firearms purchaser has a disqualifying record).

[27] New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992).

[1] See Test Act, Encyclopedia Britannica, https://www.britannica.com/topic/test-act (last visited July 13, 2022); Leo Pfeffer, Church, State, and Freedom 252 (rev. ed. 1967). For more discussion of English test oaths, see Amdt1.2.2.2 England and Religious Freedom.

[2] See Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies. Cf., e.g., Pfeffer, supra note 1, at 252–53 (noting that "for a short time Rhode Island was an exception" in not requiring religious tests and giving examples of the oaths required by early state constitutions).

[3] Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[4] See, e.g., Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 250 (2003); John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 50 (4th ed. 2016).

for colonies seeking to establish religiously pure communities.[5] Religious minorities protested these oaths, some because of general religious objections to taking oaths, and others because the oaths elevated specific religious views.[6]

As the movement to disestablish state-sponsored religion gained traction in the years following the Revolution,[7] some Founders argued a person's religious beliefs should no longer disqualify them for public office.[8] At the federal constitutional convention, on August 20, 1787, Charles Pinckney introduced a prohibition on religious tests.[9] His proposal read: "No religious test or qualification shall ever be annexed to any oath of office under the authority of the U.S."[10] Pinckney explained that this provision was expected in "a System founded on Republican Principles."[11] He stressed that the new democracy stemmed from the Enlightenment movement,[12] a philosophy that emphasized individual reasoning over central state dogmas and led to more religious toleration.[13] Opposing Pinckney's proposal, Roger Sherman believed the provision was unnecessary because the "prevailing liberality" towards religious beliefs would itself provide "sufficient security" against religious tests.[14] The convention voted to adopt the final version of Pinckney's proposal on August 30, 1787, with the journal recording the vote as unanimous, and James Madison's notes recording North Carolina as the only "no" vote on the Article as a whole.[15]

The constitutional prohibition on religious tests engendered some controversy during state ratification debates, particularly given that most states still retained some form of religious test for public officeholders.[16] Some delegates to state ratification conventions opposed the provision on the grounds that it would allow non-Christians to obtain public office.[17] One Massachusetts delegate claimed, for example, "that a person could not be a good man without being a good Christian."[18] Delegates favoring the provision believed it helped secure religious liberty by preventing government persecution of disfavored sects and government interference in matters of private conscience.[19] One delegate pointed out that requiring a religious test oath would not necessarily ensure officeholders would be of good morals, since "unprincipled and

---

[5] See, e.g., Lambert, supra note 4, at 236–37.

[6] See, e.g., Witte & Nichols, supra note 4, at 50.

[7] See Amdt1.2.2.5 Virginia's Movement Towards Religious Freedom; Amdt1.2.2.8 Early Interpretations of the Religion Clauses.

[8] See, e.g., Pfeffer, supra note 1, at 253; see also, e.g., Letter from Benjamin Franklin to Richard Price (Oct. 9, 1780), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Franklin/01-33-02-0330 (expressing his opposition to religious tests and his hope that states would move further away from them).

[9] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 342 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[10] Id.

[11] 3 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 122 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[12] Id.

[13] See generally, e.g., Shane J. Ralston, American Enlightenment Thought, Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy, https://iep.utm.edu/american-enlightenment-thought/ (last visited Aug. 15, 2022).

[14] 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 468 (Max Farrand ed., 1911).

[15] Id. at 461, 468.

[16] See, e.g., Pfeffer, supra note 1, at 254.

[17] Letter from James Madison to Thomas Jefferson (Oct. 17, 1788), (noting this view disapprovingly); see also, e.g., XXX The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution and the Adoption of the Bill of Rights 403 (eds. John P. Kaminski et al. 2009) (statement of Mr. Abbot) [hereinafter Documentary History of Ratification].

[18] VI Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 1377 (statement of Col. Jones).

[19] See, e.g., VI Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 1421–22 (statement of Rev. Backus); X Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 1531 (statement of Mr. Johnson); XXX Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 404–05 (statement of Mr. Parsons). Accord A Landholder VII, reprinted in III Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 498–500.

dishonest men will not hesitate to subscribe to any thing" for their advancement.[20] That same delegate argued "that there are worthy characters among men of every other denomination . . . and even among those who have no other guide, in the way to virtue and heaven, than the dictates of natural religion."[21] Ultimately, not only did the states ratify the Constitution's "no religious test" clause, many states removed or loosened their own religious test oaths between 1789 and 1796.[22]

In the 1800 presidential contest between Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, a New York minister named William Linn published a pamphlet opposing Jefferson on the basis that he "reject[ed]" the "Christian Religion" and openly professed "Deism."[23] Acknowledging that the Constitution did not prevent non-Christians from serving, Linn nonetheless argued that Jefferson should "set his name to the first part of the apostle's creed" in order to prove his character.[24] Linn and like-minded ministers argued that voters should impose their own religious test—a voluntary restriction that would be all the more "striking" given the lack of a constitutional provision requiring Christianity.[25] Voters rejected these arguments and elected Jefferson president.[26] Adams attributed his electoral loss to popular opposition to a religious establishment, noting presumably false claims that Adams would have "introduce[d] an Establishment of Presbyterianism."[27] In his view, a number of voters "said Let Us have an Atheist or Deist or any Thing rather than an Establishment of Presbyterianism."[28]

ArtVI.C3.2.2 Interpretation of Religious Test Clause

Article VI, Clause 3:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

In a 1787 article defending the necessity of the Constitution's bar on religious tests, Oliver Ellsworth, third Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, defined a religious test as "an act to be done, or profession to be made, relating to religion (such as partaking of the Sacrament according to certain rites and forms, or declaring one's belief of certain doctrines), for the purpose of determining whether his religious opinions are such that he is admissible to a public office."[1] In 1941, the Supreme Court recognized in dicta that the U.S. Constitution [20] VI Documentary History of Ratification, supra note 17, at 1376 (statement of Rev. Shute).

[21] Id.

[22] Witte & Nichols, supra note 4, at 50–51.

[23] William Linn, Serious Considerations on the Election of a President 4 (1800).

[24] Id. at 32.

[25] Id. at 28; see also Lambert, supra note 4, at 276–78.

[26] Lambert, supra note 4, at 280–81.

[27] Letter from John Adams to Mercy Otis Warren (Aug. 8, 1807), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Adams/99-02-02-5203.

[28] Id.

[1] A Landholder VII, reprinted in III The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution and the Adoption of the Bill of Rights 499 (eds. John P. Kaminski et al. 2009).

prohibited "the religious test oath . . . prevalent in England."[2] Nonetheless, even at that time, a number of state constitutions required office holders to hold a general belief in God's existence.[3]

It was not until 1961 that the Supreme Court ruled that the U.S. Constitution barred religious tests for state office.[4] In Torcaso v. Watkins, the Court held that a Maryland provision requiring public officeholders to declare a "belief in the existence of God" violated the First Amendment's Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.[5] The basis of the decision was the First Amendment's protections for "freedom of belief and religion."[6] However, the Court's opinion also relied on Article VI's prohibition on religious tests to support the idea that religious test oaths were contrary to American tradition.[7] Some other decisions have similarly suggested that the Religion Clauses prohibit laws that institute religious tests for participation in public life.[8]

The provision prohibiting religious tests does not prohibit other types of oaths for public officeholders,[9] although First Amendment protections for speech and association may sometimes limit the government's ability to require oaths that burden those rights.[10]

---

[2] Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 265 (1941). See also, e.g., Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61, 65 (1946) (noting that a conscientious objector's "religious scruples would not disqualify him from becoming a member of Congress or holding other public offices," citing Article VI's religious tests bar).

[3] See Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 468–70 (1892) (citing various state constitutional provisions to demonstrate their "recognition of religious obligations").

[4] Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 496 (1961).

[5] Id. at 489 (quoting Md. Const. Declaration of Rights art. 37).

[6] Id. at 496.

[7] Id. at 491–92.

[8] See, e.g., Bd. of Educ. v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687, 702 (1994) (plurality opinion); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 305 (1940).

[9] Am. Commc'ns Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 414 (1950).

[10] Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths to Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech; Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits.

ARTICLE VII
RATIFICATION

ARTICLE VII
RATIFICATION

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ARTICLE VII—RATIFICATION

ArtVII.1 Historical Background on Ratification Clause

Article VII:

> The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

In Owings v. Speed[1] the question at issue was whether the Constitution operated upon an act of Virginia passed in 1788. The Supreme Court held it did not, stating in part:

> The Conventions of nine States having adopted the Constitution, Congress, in September or October, 1788, passed a resolution in conformity with the opinions expressed by the Convention, and appointed the first Wednesday in March of the ensuing year as the day, and the then seat of Congress as the place, 'for commencing proceedings under the Constitution.'
>
> Both Governments could not be understood to exist at the same time. The New Government did not commence until the old Government expired. It is apparent that the government did not commence on the Constitution being ratified by the ninth State; for these ratifications were to be reported to Congress, whose continuing existence was recognized by the Convention, and who were requested to continue to exercise their powers for the purpose of bringing the new Government into operation. In fact, Congress did continue to act as a Government until it dissolved on the 1st of November, by the successive disappearance of its Members. It existed potentially until the 2d of March, the day proceeding that on which the Members of the new Congress were directed to assemble.
>
> The resolution of the Convention might originally have suggested a doubt, whether the government could be in operation for every purpose before the choice of a President; but this doubt has been long solved, and were it otherwise, its discussion would be useless, since it is apparent that its operation did not commence before the first Wednesday in March 1789 . . . .

[1] 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 420, 422–23 (1820).

FIRST AMENDMENT
FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

FIRST AMENDMENT
FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

FIRST AMENDMENT—FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Amdt1.1 Overview of First Amendment, Fundamental Freedoms

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution,[1] viewed broadly, protects religious liberty and rights related to freedom of speech. Specifically, the Religion Clauses prevent the government from adopting laws "respecting an establishment of religion"—the Establishment Clause—or "prohibiting the free exercise thereof"—the Free Exercise Clause. The First Amendment also expressly protects the freedoms of speech, press, peaceable assembly, and petition to the Government.

The Constitution Annotated essays discussing the First Amendment begin with the Religion Clauses, reviewing the history of these Clauses before explaining, in turn, the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses. The Religion Clause section ends with an essay exploring the relationship between the Religion Clauses and the Free Speech Clause. The Constitution Annotated then turns to this latter Clause, discussing interpretations of the Free Speech Clause before describing Supreme Court cases recognizing constitutional protections for freedom of association. Next, the Constitution Annotated explains the Free Press Clause. The First Amendment essays end by discussing the Clauses protecting the freedoms of assembly and petition.

Amdt1.2 Religion

Amdt1.2.1 Overview of the Religion Clauses (Establishment and Free Expression Clauses)

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The first two provisions of the First Amendment, known as the Religion Clauses, state that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."[1] The Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses were ratified as part of the Bill of Rights in 1791[2] and apply to the states by incorporation through the Fourteenth Amendment.[3] Together with the constitutional provision prohibiting religious tests as a qualification for office,[4] these clauses promote individual freedom of religion and separation of church and state.

The Supreme Court has acknowledged that the Religion Clauses "are not the most precisely drawn portions of the Constitution."[5] The Framers' goal was "to state an objective, not to write a statute."[6] The clauses are "cast in absolute terms" and either, "if expanded to a

---

[1] U.S. CONST. amend. I.

[1] U.S. CONST. amend. I (emphasis added).

[2] For a discussion of the adoption of the Religion Clauses, see Amdt1.2.2.7 Constitutional Convention, Ratification, and the Bill of Rights.

[3] See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947) (incorporating the Establishment Clause); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940) (incorporating the Free Exercise Clause).

[4] ArtVI.C3.2.1 Historical Background on Religious Test for Government Offices.

[5] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

[6] Id.

logical extreme, would tend to clash with the other."[7] Accordingly, the Court has said that "rigidity could well defeat the basic purpose of these provisions, which is to insure that no religion be sponsored or favored, none commanded, and none inhibited."[8] The breadth of the clauses has allowed debates over their proper scope since ratification.[9] It has also led to some "internal inconsistency" in the Supreme Court's opinions interpreting these clauses,[10] as well as interpretations that have shifted over time.

The following essays discuss the historical background of the Religion Clauses, including a discussion of colonial religious establishments and the shift in early America towards greater religious freedom.[11] Next, essays address how both clauses prevent the government from interfering in certain religious disputes.[12] Essays then examine, in turn, Supreme Court interpretations of the Establishment Clause[13] and the Free Exercise Clause.[14] Finally, two essays explore the relationship between the two Religion Clauses,[15] as well as the relationship between the Religion Clauses and the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause.[16]

One preliminary issue broadly relevant across Religion Clause jurisprudence is what the First Amendment means when it refers to "religion." Some early cases suggested that courts might determine what is properly considered to be "religion."[17] In an 1890 case rejecting a Free Exercise Clause challenge to a law disenfranchising polygamists, the Court said calling the advocacy of polygamy "a tenet of religion" would "offend the common sense of mankind."[18] Later cases, however, seemed to retreat from this suggestion as they restricted the ability of the government, including courts, to judge the legitimacy of religious beliefs.[19] Nonetheless, the Religion Clauses extend only to sincere religious activities, and in evaluating constitutional claims, the government may investigate whether a person's beliefs are insincere and whether they are secular, stemming from political, sociological, or philosophical views rather than religious beliefs.[20]

---

[7] Id. at 668–69. See also Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[8] Walz, 397 U.S. at 669.

[9] See Amdt1.2.2.8 Early Interpretations of the Religion Clauses.

[10] Walz, 397 U.S. at 668.

[11] Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[12] Amdt1.2.3.1 Overview of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes; Amdt1.2.3.2 Doctrinal Basis of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes; Amdt1.2.3.3 Neutral Principles of Law and Government Resolution of Religious Disputes; and Amdt1.2.3.4 Church Leadership and the Ministerial Exception (government resolution of religious disputes).

[13] Amdt1.3.1 General Principle of Government Neutrality to Religion to Amdt1.3.7.3 Establishment Clause and Historical Practices and Tradition (Establishment Clause).

[14] Amdt1.4.1 Overview of Free Exercise Clause to Amdt1.4.3.5 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice Regulating Prisons and the Military (Free Exercise Clause).

[15] Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[16] Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause.

[17] See Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 162 (1879) (discussing the meaning of "religion").

[18] Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 341–42 (1890), overruled in part by Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

[19] See, e.g., United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 184 (1965); United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 88 (1944); Amdt1.4.2 Laws Regulating Religious Belief.

[20] Frazee v. Ill. Dep't of Emp. Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 833 (1989); see also, e.g., Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 216 (1972) (noting that "philosophical" beliefs would not "rise to the demands of the Religion Clauses," but finding evidence for "the claim that the traditional way of life of the Amish is not merely a matter of personal preference, but one of deep religious conviction"). In a case interpreting a federal conscientious objector statute, the Supreme Court said that "the central consideration in determining whether . . . beliefs are religious is whether these beliefs play the role of a religion and function as a religion in the registrant's life." Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333, 339 (1970).

A religious belief may fall within the scope of the clauses even if it is not consistent with the tenets of a particular Christian sect, and non-Christian religions are also protected.[21] One 1965 case noted "the ever-broadening understanding of the modern religious community," discussing conceptions beyond even traditional theism.[22] In an Establishment Clause case decided a few years earlier, the Court had stated that the government may not "aid all religions as against non-believers," or "aid those religions based on a belief in the existence of God as against those religions founded on different beliefs."[23]

Amdt1.2.2 Historical Background

Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As the Supreme Court has recognized, many colonists left Europe and settled in America "to escape the bondage of laws which compelled them to support and attend government-favored churches."[1] Scholars have described the modern concepts of "religious liberty" and "separation of church and state" as originating with the development of the United States.[2] The Framers of the Religion Clauses built upon almost two centuries of historical developments that shaped this American model of religious freedom after the arrival of the earliest colonists. During these formative years—and even after the First Amendment's ratification—the concept of freedom of religion lacked a fixed meaning.[3] The concept evolved significantly over the colonial period in tandem with political and social movements. Accordingly, while the Supreme Court has often suggested that colonial and Revolutionary history is important in determining the meaning of the Religion Clauses,[4] jurists and historians have disagreed about which history appropriately informs the clauses, given the complexity and variability of that history.[5]

The colonists left a European society in which church and state were closely interconnected.[6] Historically, political leaders throughout the world believed that a government could not legislate to preserve public morals or maintain civil order unless the state based its rule in a religion that was followed by the populace.[7] The features of historic state-sponsored religions, known as religious "establishments," included a government-

---

[21] See, e.g., Frazee, 489 U.S. at 834; Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972).

[22] Seeger, 380 U.S. at 180.

[23] Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 495 (1961).

[1] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947).

[2] See, e.g., Robert T. Miller, Religious Conscience in Colonial New England, 50 J. Church & State 661, 661 (2008); Leo Pfeffer, Church State and Freedom 727 (rev. ed. 1967); Sanford Hoadley Cobb, The Rise of Religious Liberty in America vii (Johnson Reprint Corp. 1970) (1902).

[3] See, e.g., Thomas J. Curry, Church and State in Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century America, 7 J. L. & Religion 261, 271–73 (1989).

[4] E.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 162 (1878).

[5] See generally, e.g., Steven K. Green, The Supreme Court's Ahistorical Religion Clause Historicism, 73 Baylor L. Rev. 505 (2021).

[6] John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 1 (4th ed. 2016).

[7] See, e.g., Pfeffer, supra note 2, at 4; Richard Hooker, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1590s), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 30–33 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009); John Locke, A Letter on Toleration (1689), in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra, at 50.

recognized state church; laws outlining religious orthodoxy or church governance; compulsory church attendance; state financial support for the church; proscriptions on religious dissent; the limitation of political participation to the state church's members; and the use of churches for civil functions such as education or marriage.[8]

Even in colonial times, there were debates about what types of state support for religion created a religious "establishment," and what level of state support was appropriate. Although some of the colonists may have fled religious persecution in England and other European countries, many New World colonies initially mandated the practice of a specific religion and persecuted those who did not comply.[9] Some of the colonies that did not designate a single official religion still limited citizenship to Christians and adopted other hallmarks of an established state religion.[10]

During the colonial period and Revolution, however, some colonies began to recognize broader conceptions of religious liberty and embrace greater separation between church and state.[11] Delegates to the Continental Congress expressed diverse views on the issue in debates leading up to the adoption of the First Amendment's Religion Clauses.[12] Although the Religion Clauses immediately constrained the federal government, some states continued to support religious establishments even after the First Amendment's ratification.[13] Nonetheless, all states had disestablished religion decades before the Supreme Court held that states were legally obligated to comply with the Religion Clauses through the Fourteenth Amendment, reflecting continued debates and shifting attitudes towards religious liberty.[14]

Amdt1.2.2.2 England and Religious Freedom

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Religious freedom has played a central role in the mythos of the United States's Founding.[1] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has sometimes looked to state sponsorship of religion prior to the Founding to determine what the drafters of the First Amendment's Religion Clauses

---

[8] See Michael W. McConnell, Establishment and Disestablishment at the Founding, Part I: Establishment of Religion, 44 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 2105, 2131 (2003); Chester James Antieau et al., Freedom from Federal Establishment 1–2 (1964).

[9] See, e.g., Everson, 330 U.S. at 9–10. See Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies.

[10] See Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies; Amdt1.2.2.4 Colonial Concepts of Religious Liberty.

[11] See Amdt1.2.2.5 Virginia's Movement Towards Religious Freedom.

[12] See Amdt1.2.2.5 Virginia's Movement Towards Religious Freedom; Amdt1.2.2.6 Continental Congresses and Religious Freedom.

[13] See Amdt1.2.2.8 Early Interpretations of the Religion Clauses.

[14] See Amdt1.2.2.8 Early Interpretations of the Religion Clauses. The process of disestablishment was gradual in many states, with various elements of the religious establishments being repealed at different times.

[1] See, e.g., Samuel Adams, The Rights of the Colonists, A List of Violations of Rights and a Letter of Correspondence (1772), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 202–04 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009); IV. The Declaration as Adopted by Congress, Nat'l Archives, Founders Online (July 6, 1775), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-01-02-0113-0005. Cf., e.g., Robert T. Miller, Religious Conscience in Colonial New England, 50 J. Church & State 661, 662 (2008) (stating that English colonization of North America was motivated by a variety of factors, including not only religious motives but also "imperialism, economic and social pressures, humanitarianism, and the spirit of adventure").

intended to reject.[2] While a unified church and state was once the dominant governance model worldwide,[3] the Church of England provides one particularly salient example of a state religion that was familiar to the Founders.[4]

King Henry VIII established the Church of England through the Act of Supremacy in 1534,[5] and Queen Elizabeth reestablished the Church in 1559 after a period of political and religious turbulence.[6] The Church of England's establishment placed the country's ecclesiastical courts under domestic control rather than under the control of the Pope.[7] These ecclesiastical courts, which operated in parallel with England's civil courts, had jurisdiction over purely religious matters such as spiritual nonconformity; so-called moral offenses such as drunkenness or adultery; and disputes over marriages, tithes, wills, and defamation.[8]

Following the end of the English Civil War in 1651, four acts collectively known as the Clarendon Code reentrenched the church.[9] One of these laws, the Act of Uniformity of 1662, prescribed a common form of worship and required ministers to follow this form of worship to hold religious office.[10] Other laws limited officeholding to Anglicans and restricted non-Anglican worship.[11] The ecclesiastical courts were also restored in 1661 with largely unchanged jurisdiction, although use of the courts declined significantly over the ensuing decades.[12]

Thus, English laws preferred members of the established Church of England, excluded dissenters, and commingled ecclesiastical and civil functions.[13] The government dictated official modes of worship, claimed jurisdiction over areas such as education and marriage that had previously been governed by the Roman Catholic Church, required membership in the established church to be considered a legal citizen, and criminalized religious dissent.[14] Nonetheless, the government did not view the Act of Uniformity as violating freedom of conscience: in England's view, while it dictated public observance of religion and prevented dissenters from undermining the established church, it did not dictate private beliefs.[15]

The Toleration Act of 1689 lifted criminal penalties for nonconformists' public worship if the dissenters took certain oaths or declared their loyalty to the crown and professed their

---

[2] See, e.g., Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 425–26 (1962).

[3] See, e.g., Leo Pfeffer, Church State and Freedom 3 (1967).

[4] See, e.g., Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 184–94 (2003) (discussing the influence of English dissenters on the Founders).

[5] John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 16 (4th ed. 2016).

[6] Michael W. McConnell, Establishment and Disestablishment at the Founding, Part I: Establishment of Religion, 44 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 2105, 2112–13, 2113 n.30 (2003). See also Lambert, supra note 4, at 37–40 (discussing political and religious developments in this period).

[7] R.B. Outhwaite, The Rise and Fall of the English Ecclesiastical Courts, 1500–1860, at 15 (J.H. Baker ed., 2006). See also id. (noting arguments that the break with Rome led to the decline of these courts); id. at 68–77 (discussing these arguments as well as contemporaneous criticisms of the courts).

[8] Id. at 5–7.

[9] Clarendon Code, Encyclopedia Britannica, https://www.britannica.com/event/Clarendon-Code (last visited June 1, 2022).

[10] Id.

[11] See id.

[12] Outhwaite, supra note 7, at 79, 95.

[13] Chester James Antieau et al., Freedom from Federal Establishment 3 (1964).

[14] Witte & Nichols, supra note 5, at 16–17.

[15] Lambert, supra note 4, at 40. Cf., e.g., Douglas Laycock, Continuity and Change in the Threat to Religious Liberty: The Reformation Era and the Late Twentieth Century, 80 Minn. L. Rev. 1047, 1064 (1996) (discussing English imprisonment of Quakers and execution of Catholics).

Christian belief.[16] However, the law did not extend the right of public worship to Roman Catholics or other non-Protestant dissenters, and all non-Anglicans continued to be barred from holding public office.[17] Furthermore, the Church of England retained its special status. England considered the Toleration Act to apply directly to the colonies.[18] As discussed in subsequent essays, this Act granted more religious liberty than some of the colonies did at the time and influenced those colonies to move toward further religious freedom.[19]

Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

At least initially, the colonies largely continued the historical practice of having state-established religion in America; although not every colony had one officially designated state religion, every colonial government had some elements of a religious "establishment," as defined in an earlier essay.[1] Nonetheless, even the colonies that did designate and support an official religion viewed their own governments as quite different from the English system.[2]

The first English colony, Virginia, illustrates the evolving approach to government and religion. Virginia established the Church of England as the colony's official church.[3] Early governors adopted martial laws requiring daily worship and prohibiting blasphemy, among other provisions prescribing religious order.[4] The government supported and required conformity to the established church, and church vestries exercised semi-civil political functions.[5] As England reetrenched the established church after the English Civil War, Virginia followed the crown's instructions by supporting the church.[6] Among other provisions, Virginia laws adopted in 1661 and 1662 required colonists to erect churches and support ministers at public expense, prescribed proper forms of worship, and punished those who publicly worshipped outside the established church.[7] However, in contrast to England, the civil government rather than church authorities assumed jurisdiction over marriages, wills, and

---

[16] Toleration Act, Encyclopedia Britannica, https://www.britannica.com/event/Toleration-Act-Great-Britain-1689 (last visited June 1, 2022).

[17] Toleration Act, 1689, The Jacobite Heritage, http://www.jacobite.ca/documents/1689toleration.htm (last updated Oct. 26, 2003).

[18] The application was debated by the colonies, but in 1752, a Presbyterian minister seeking licenses to preach in Virginia obtained an opinion from the British attorney general saying that the Toleration Act did apply in the colonies and the minister should receive his licenses. George William Pilcher, Samuel Davies and Religious Toleration in Virginia, 28 The Historian 48, 62–63 (1965).

[19] See Amdt1.2.2.2 England and Religious Freedom; see also, e.g., Pfeffer, supra note 3, at 93.

[1] Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[2] Thomas J. Curry, The First Freedoms 133, 209–13 (1986).

[3] Michael W. McConnell, Establishment and Disestablishment at the Founding, Part I: Establishment of Religion, 44 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 2105, 2116 (2003) (discussing the first and second Virginia charters); see also Curry, supra note 2, at 29 (discussing early religious legislation, including regulations of the Virginia Company).

[4] Articles, Laws, and Orders, Virginia (1610–11), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 84–86 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009). Later forms of government in the colony continued to intertwine religious and civil authority. See Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 54–56 (2003).

[5] See Sanford Hoadley Cobb, The Rise of Religious Liberty in America 80–81, 87 (Johnson Reprint Corp. 1970) (1902).

[6] Id. at 91–92.

[7] McConnell, supra note 3, at 2118–19.

the appointment of ministers[8]—although such functions were, by law, carried out in accordance with the Church of England's doctrines.[9] The Church of England was also established in the Carolinas, but those colonies tolerated a greater diversity of religious views than Virginia.[10]

The New England colonies of Plymouth, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Haven were established by Puritans who similarly provided for colonial government sponsorship of that religion. These colonies sought to establish a unified community operating according to a "pure" religious doctrine[11] that followed "the first Plantation of the Primitive Church" rather than the established Church of England.[12] In Massachusetts Bay, Puritans mandated the construction and financial support of Congregational churches.[13] A public confession of faith was necessary to become a citizen of the colony.[14] Dissenters in these colonies were punished harshly with imprisonment or expulsion, and Massachusetts executed four Quakers between 1658 and 1661.[15] Nonetheless, Puritan churches were independent associations that lacked a central church authority in the manner of the Church of England.[16]

Although New England Puritans operated their colonies according to religious doctrine, they distinguished civil from religious authority, and clergy could exercise authority only over religious affairs.[17] Notably, the Puritans did not create ecclesiastical courts,[18] which they had protested in England.[19] The Puritans' conception of separate spheres of authority, however, did not preclude the civil government from prosecuting idolatry or blasphemy.[20] In the Puritans' view, liberty of conscience did not encompass the liberty to practice religious error.[21] Accordingly, punishing those who deviated from religious doctrine did not violate liberty of conscience, and the government could punish public deviations or errors without improperly invading the church's authority.[22]

There is some debate over whether there was an established church in the colony of New York, in the sense of an officially designated state church.[23] New York, like the Carolinas, demonstrated the conflict between the unpopular established Church of England and other, more popular religious causes.[24] The colony guaranteed free religious exercise to all Christians

---

[8] Curry, supra note 2, at 30.

[9] McConnell, supra note 3, at 2118–19.

[10] See Cobb, supra note 5, at 116–19; Curry, supra note 2, at 56–62.

[11] Curry, supra note 2, at 3–5. Cf. McConnell, supra note 3, at 2121–22 (distinguishing the Pilgrim settlers of Plymouth from other New England Puritans).

[12] John Cotton, Sermon, Gods Promise to His Plantation (1630), https://digitalcommons.unl.edu/etas/22.

[13] Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 76 (2003).

[14] Id. at 78–79.

[15] Curry, supra note 2, at 21–22.

[16] Curry, supra note 2, at 5; Lambert, supra note 13, at 82.

[17] Lambert, supra note 13, at 82.

[18] Curry, supra note 2, at 5.

[19] R.B. Outhwaite, The Rise and Fall of the English Ecclesiastical Courts, 1500–1860, at 72, 76–77 (J.H. Baker ed., 2006). For more discussion of the English ecclesiastical courts, see Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[20] Lambert, supra note 13, at 84.

[21] Curry, supra note 2, at 6. See also, e.g., id. at 88–89 (discussing Massachusetts prosecutions of those who criticized Congregationalism or the colony's treatment of religious dissenters); Lambert, supra note 13, at 90 (describing Puritan thinkers who defined religious liberty "in terms of religious purity").

[22] Curry, supra note 2, at 6, 8; see also John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 26–27 (4th ed. 2016) (discussing the cooperation of church and state in Puritan colonies).

[23] See, e.g., Curry, supra note 2, at 71.

[24] Curry, supra note 2, at 76.

but required parishes to select ministers and collect taxes to establish and support churches at the local level.[25] Following the Toleration Act's adoption in England, New York excluded Catholics from guarantees of the liberty of conscience and adopted the Ministry Act of 1693, which required "the settling of a ministry."[26] There was debate over whether this act referred only to Anglican ministers, or whether the language was broad enough to allow towns to select other Protestant ministers.[27]

Maryland somewhat similarly faced pressure from the Church of England after initially tolerating more religious diversity.[28] Early colonial leaders were Catholic and seemed to hope that Catholics and Protestants could live together peacefully in Maryland.[29] Lord Baltimore largely ignored his authority from England to build and dedicate Anglican churches, along with requests from Catholics for special government recognition.[30] In 1649, Maryland adopted the Act Concerning Religion, which guaranteed that no person "professing to believe in Jesus Christ" could be troubled in the free exercise of religion—but also decreed strict penalties for blasphemy by non-Trinitarians.[31] However, following political and religious upheaval in the colony, in the late 1600s and early 1700s, the Maryland government adopted laws depriving Catholics of their previously held civil rights and, ultimately, establishing the Church of England.[32]

Amdt1.2.2.4 Colonial Concepts of Religious Liberty

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Although the colonies did not grant full religious freedom as the concept would be understood today, some nonetheless refrained from establishing an official state-sponsored church and granted more religious liberty than, for example, Virginia or the Puritan colonies.[1]

Rhode Island granted more religious liberty than other New England colonies. Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, was expelled from Massachusetts Bay for criticizing the Puritan government and arguing for a stronger separation between church and state.[2] Williams was himself a Puritan minister who sought to propagate the "true church"—but he believed this could be achieved only by maintaining "a wall of Separation between the Garden

---

[25] Curry, supra note 2, at 62–63; McConnell, supra note 3, at 2130.

[26] Curry, supra note 2, at 64–65.

[27] Curry, supra note 2, at 65–67.

[28] See McConnell, supra note 3, at 2128.

[29] Kenneth Lasson, Free Exercise in the Free State: Maryland's Role in the Development of First Amendment Jurisprudence, 31 J. Church & St. 419, 422–23 (1989); Curry, supra note 2, at 31–33.

[30] Curry, supra note 2, at 35–36.

[31] Curry, supra note 2, at 38–39; Lasson, supra note 29, at 428–29.

[32] Curry, supra note 2, at 35–48; Lasson, supra note 29, at 435.

[1] In addition to Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, discussed here, New Jersey also did not have an established church. Thomas J. Curry, The First Freedoms 72 (1986). Cf. Sanford Hoadley Cobb, The Rise of Religious Liberty in America 416 (Johnson Reprint Corp. 1970) (1902) (saying instructions from the crown to support the Church of England "kept up the fiction of an establishment in New Jersey"). Further, although Georgia established the Church of England, it also guaranteed freedom of religion to non-Catholics and tolerated significant religious diversity. Cobb, supra, at 419; Curry, supra, at 152–53. For a definition of religious "establishment," see Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[2] Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 88–89 (2003).

of the Church and the Wildernes[s] of the world."[3] In a pamphlet published in England, Williams argued against civil persecution for matters of conscience, writing that civil states should not be the judges of spiritual matters.[4]

Rhode Island's royal charter granted liberty of conscience, providing that no person would be "molested, punished, disquieted or called in question, for any differences in opinion in matters of religion," so long as the person did not "actually disturb the civil peace."[5] To preserve this civil peace, however, the civil government prohibited crimes such as adultery and fornication, and required observance of the Sabbath.[6] Furthermore, the colony adopted laws limiting citizenship and public office to Protestants.[7] Nonetheless, Rhode Island did not adopt criminal laws persecuting the few Catholic and Jewish people residing within the colony,[8] and in contrast to other New England colonies, Rhode Island generally found no reason to charge Quakers with breach of the civil peace.[9]

Pennsylvania also granted some religious liberty. William Penn, a Quaker, founded Pennsylvania in 1681 as a "holy experiment" in religious liberty.[10] Accordingly, the initial laws for the colony granted religious freedom to all theists, providing that anyone who would "acknowledge the one Almighty and eternal God, to be the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the world" could not "be molested or prejudiced for their religious persuasion, or practice" or "compelled, at any time, to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place or ministry whatever."[11] Although the diverse religious groups in Pennsylvania had social and political disagreements, they did not face persecution from the government for their religious beliefs alone, as they did elsewhere.[12] While this made Pennsylvania unusually tolerant for the era, the colony still limited office-holding to Christians, forbade work on the Sabbath, and prohibited a variety of "offences against God" such as swearing, drunkenness, and fornication.[13]

---

[3] Roger Williams, Mr. Cottons Letter Lately Printed, Examined and Answered (1644), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 147 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009); see also Curry, supra note 1, at 15, 17.

[4] Roger Williams, The Bloudy Tenent, of Persecution for Cause of Conscience (1644), reprinted in 5 The Founder's Constitution 48–49 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987).

[5] Rhode Island Royal Charter, 1663, R.I. Sec'y of State, https://www.sos.ri.gov/assets/downloads/documents/RI-Charter-annotated.pdf (last visited June 14, 2022).

[6] Curry, supra note 1, at 20–21.

[7] Leo Pfeffer, Church State and Freedom 85 (rev. ed. 1967).

[8] Id.; see also Curry, supra note 1, at 90–91 (saying that Jewish people in the colony "were free to practice their religion" but "did so as second-class citizens," and claiming that "Catholics never came to the colony in numbers sufficient to test its liberality").

[9] Curry, supra note 1, at 23.

[10] Lambert, supra note 2, at 102 (quoting a letter from William Penn to James Harrison). See also William Penn, Frame of Government of Pennsylvania (1682), in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 3, at 117.

[11] Laws Agreed Upon in England, &c, 1682, in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 3, at 118.

[12] See, e.g., Lambert, supra note 2, at 114.

[13] Laws Agreed Upon in England, &c, 1682, in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 3, at 118–19.

Amdt1.2.2.5 Virginia's Movement Towards Religious Freedom

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Virginia, which initially established the Church of England as the church of the colony,[1] began to provide greater religious liberty in the years leading up to the adoption of the Constitution. Toward the end of the colonial period, some Virginia leaders began to look to Pennsylvania as a model for liberty, expressing distaste for Virginia's state-sponsored religious establishment.[2] By the time Virginia adopted its first state constitution in 1776, it provided that "all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience."[3] Notwithstanding this new constitutional protection for the free exercise of religion, the Church of England remained Virginia's legally established church.[4] There was significant debate over the next decade about whether the state could or should impose a general assessment to support religion, or whether financial support would instead become voluntary.[5]

In 1779, Jefferson introduced his Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom in the Virginia Assembly.[6] Considered by many to be the forerunner of the First Amendment's Religion Clauses,[7] the bill was a sweeping statement for religious freedom and against state establishment of religion.[8] Among other provisions, it stated that compelled financial support for churches and religious test oaths infringed individual liberty and corrupted religion.[9] It further provided that allowing the civil magistrate "to intrude his powers into the field of opinion . . . at once destroys all religious liberty."[10] Accordingly, the bill would have prevented Virginia from compelling anyone "to frequent or support any religious worship" or otherwise burdening a person "on account of his religious opinions or belief."[11] The bill was not adopted in that legislative session.[12]

By contrast, later in 1779, the Assembly considered—but also rejected—a bill that would have established the "Christian Religion" as the state's official religion, required recognized churches to subscribe to certain beliefs, and assessed ministerial taxes.[13] In 1784, Patrick Henry, who had opposed Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom, introduced A Bill

---

[1] For a discussion of the Virginia establishment, see Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies.

[2] See, e.g., Letter from James Madison to William Bradford (Apr. 1, 1774), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-01-02-0031.

[3] Va. Const. of 1776, § 16, https://encyclopediavirginia.org/entries/the-constitution-of-virginia-1776.

[4] Thomas J. Curry, The First Freedoms 133, 135–36 (1986).

[5] Id. at 136.

[6] Thomas Jefferson, Draft of the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church & State 48 (Lenni Brenner, ed., 2004).

[7] See, e.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 163–64 (1878).

[8] Draft of the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church and State, supra note 6, at 48–50.

[9] Id. at 49.

[10] Id. See also id. ("[I]t is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order . . . .").

[11] Id. at 49–50.

[12] Id. at 48.

[13] Curry, supra note 4, at 139.

Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion.[14] The law proposed a general assessment: taxpayers could direct the funds to the "society of Christians" of their choice, and any nondesignated funds would be used "for the encouragement of seminaries of learning" in the state.[15]

While the bill creating an assessment for Christian teachers was being considered, James Madison wrote and circulated his Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments, which contributed significantly to the bill's defeat.[16] Madison's Memorial and Remonstrance claimed that the right to free exercise of religion was "unalienable," and that religion was "wholly exempt" from the "cognizance" of civil society.[17] He asserted the bill violated fundamental principles of equality and departed from America's "generous policy" of religious freedom for the previously "persecuted and oppressed."[18] Other opponents of the assessment raised concerns about the rights of non-Christians, a position that was still somewhat uncommon in the colonies at that time.[19] Following this public opposition to Henry's bill, Madison reintroduced Jefferson's bill for establishing religious freedom.[20] The Statute for Religious Freedom was enacted in 1786, finally disestablishing religion in the state.[21]

Although Virginia's experience does not represent the full picture of the early American experience with religious liberty, it helped set the stage for the adoption of the Religion Clauses.[22] While Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and (eventually) Virginia moved towards greater religious freedom, other states—and some within those states—continued to support state establishments and a more limited view of religious liberty.[23]

---

[14] A Bill Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion, Monticello Digital Classroom, https://classroom.monticello.org/media-item/a-bill-establishing-a-provision-for-teachers-of-the-christian-religion/ (last visited June 17, 2022).

[15] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 73–74 (1947) (supplemental appendix).

[16] Curry, supra note 4, at 143.

[17] James Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments (June 20, 1785), in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church and State, supra note 6, at 68.

[18] Id. at 69–71.

[19] See Curry, supra note 4, at 145.

[20] Letter from James Madison to Thomas Jefferson (Jan . 22, 1786), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-08-02-0249.

[21] Id. Jefferson was in Paris at the time, and later that year, told Madison the act had "been received with infinite approbation" by European citizens. Letter from Thomas Jefferson to James Madison (Dec. 16, 1786), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-09-02-0108. In Jefferson's eyes, it was "honorable" for the Virginia legislature "to have produced the first legislature who has had the courage to declare that the reason of man may be trusted with the formation of his own opinions." Id.

[22] See, e.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 163 (1878). See also Timothy L. Hall, Roger Williams and the Foundations of Religious Liberty., 71 B.U.L. Rev. 455, 458 (1991) (arguing that overreliance on Jefferson and Madison's writings "has left first amendment jurisprudence theoretically impoverished").

[23] Amdt1.2.2.2 England and Religious Freedom; Amdt1.2.2.4 Colonial Concepts of Religious Liberty.

Amdt1.2.2.6 Continental Congresses and Religious Freedom

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Continental Congresses of 1784–1789 addressed a number of issues relating to religion.[1] In some instances, the Congresses' work reflected the ongoing debates and shifting norms relating to church and state.

One of the grievances that the First Continental Congress identified in its 1774 "Declaration and Resolves" addressed to Great Britain was the Quebec Act.[2] The congressional resolution described this Act as "establishing the Roman Catholic religion" in Quebec, a province which was expanded to include parts of the modern Midwest.[3] On its face, the Quebec Act did not establish a religion in the sense of requiring adherence or compelling support.[4] Instead, it stated that Roman Catholic citizens in the province "may have, hold, and enjoy, the free Exercise of the Religion of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's Supremacy."[5] The colonists saw this parliamentary sanction for the Catholic Church in the expanded territory, albeit limited, as a threat.[6] Nevertheless, only about two weeks after adopting the Declaration and Resolves, the Continental Congress wrote a letter "to the Inhabitants of the Province of Quebec," arguing that Great Britain had violated their rights by altering the province's government and making religious liberty for Catholics a matter of the King's grace.[7] The letter stated that the Quebec Act's guarantee of "liberty of conscience in . . . religion" was a poor substitute for the God-given rights the province had been denied, for the English version of the right was a "precarious" one subject to "arbitrary alterations."[8] These somewhat contradictory stances likely reflected political considerations.

Members of the First Continental Congress also faced appeals for freedom of conscience from within their own territory. Notably, a group of Massachusetts Baptists complained of persecution to delegates of the Continental Congress in 1774.[9] John Adams, in his diary, wrote that he was "indignant . . . at seeing [his] State and her Delegates thus summoned before a self created Trybunal."[10] According to Adams's account, one Pennsylvanian asserted that New England's stance on "Liberty of Conscience" was standing in the way of forming "a Union of the Colonies."[11] The dissenters' primary grievances seemed to be taxes for the support of the

---

[1] See, e.g., John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 65–69 (4th ed. 2016).

[2] Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress, Avalon Project, Yale L. Sch. (Oct. 14, 1774), https://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/resolves.asp (last visited June 1, 2022).

[3] Id.

[4] See Great Britain: Parliament—The Quebec Act: October 7, 1774, Avalon Project, Yale L. Sch., https://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/quebec_act_1774.asp (last visited June 1, 2022).

[5] Id. Among other provisions, the Act also required any "Ordinance touching Religion" to "receive[ ] his Majesty's Approbation" before going into effect. Id.

[6] Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America 209, 213 (2003).

[7] Continental Congress to the Inhabitants of the Province of Quebec (Oct. 26, 1744), reprinted in 5 The Founder's Constitution 61 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987).

[8] Id. at 63 (internal quotation marks and emphasis omitted).

[9] See Isaac Backus, A History of New England 1774–75, reprinted in The Founder's Constitution, supra note 7, at 65.

[10] Diary of John Adams, In Congress, September-October 1774, https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Adams/01-03-02-0016-0022.

[11] Id.

established churches.[12] The Baptists objected to the tax on grounds of conscience.[13] In response, John and Samuel Adams apparently argued that Massachusetts had "the most mild and equitable Establishment of Religion"[14]—but in resisting any commitment to further change, John Adams reportedly said that the objectors "might as well expect a change in the solar system, as to expect [Massachusetts] would give up their establishment."[15]

In other matters, the Continental Congress recognized and seemed to support religion. As the Supreme Court has noted, "the Continental Congress, beginning in 1774, adopted the traditional procedure of opening its sessions with a prayer offered by a paid chaplain."[16] According to a contemporaneous account from John Adams, there was some opposition to the first motion to open a session with prayer given the religious diversity of the representatives, until Samuel Adams "said he was no Bigot, and could hear a Prayer" from someone of another faith.[17] The Continental Congress also, for example, occasionally declared days of fasting and thanksgiving,[18] and voted to import Bibles for distribution,[19] although it never appropriated the funds for this latter activity.[20]

In contrast, the Second Continental Congress recognized and attempted to accommodate pacifists during the Revolutionary War, stating that Congress intended "no violence to their consciences" and asking pacifists to contribute by doing only what they could "consistently with their religious principles."[21] The Northwest Ordinance, adopted by the Confederation Congress in 1787, provided that no person in the territory could "be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments" so long as he was acting "in a peaceable and orderly manner."[22] Furthermore, in 1785, the Confederation Congress rejected a proposal that would have set aside lots in the western territory for the support of religion,[23] with James Madison saying the provision "smell[ed] . . . of an antiquated Bigotry."[24]

Overall, the roots of both the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause and the tension between them are evident in the period immediately prior to ratification of the Constitution. While there was some movement towards greater religious liberty and separation of church and state, continued support for religious activity was seen as a basic part

---

[12] Thomas J. Curry, The First Freedoms 131 (1986).

[13] Backus, supra note 9, at 65.

[14] Diary of John Adams, In Congress September-October 1774, https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Adams/01-03-02-0016-0022; cf. Backus, supra note 9, at 65 (saying both John and Samuel Adams described the Massachusetts establishment as "a very slender one, hardly to be called an establishment").

[15] Backus, supra note 9, at 65.

[16] Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 787 (1983).

[17] Letter from John Adams to Abigail Adams (Sept. 16, 1774), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Adams/04-01-02-0101.

[18] See, e.g., Religion and the Founding of the American Republic, Libr. of Cong., https://www.loc.gov/exhibits/religion/rel04.html#obj107 (last visited June 21, 2022).

[19] 8 Journals of the Continental Congress 734–35 (Worthington Chauncy Ford ed., 1907).

[20] Witte & Nichols, supra note 1, at 68.

[21] 8 Journals of the Continental Congress 189 (Worthington Chauncy Ford ed., 1905).

[22] Northwest Ordinance § 14, art. 1, (July 13, 1787), https://www.archives.gov/milestone-documents/northwest-ordinance (last reviewed May 10, 2022).

[23] 28 Journals of the Continental Congress 293–94 (John C. Fitzpatrick ed., 1933).

[24] Letter from James Madison to John Monroe (May 29, 1785), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-08-02-0156.

of the fabric of society.[25] Even in protecting modes of worship in the territories, the Northwest Ordinance provided that "religion, morality, and knowledge" were "necessary to good government" and should "be encouraged."[26]

Amdt1.2.2.7 Constitutional Convention, Ratification, and the Bill of Rights

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Constitution adopted by the Constitutional Convention in 1787 was largely silent on matters of religion.[1] Nonetheless, matters of religious freedom remained on the Founder's minds.[2] By 1787, a number of states had adopted constitutions containing some protections for religious freedom, though not all were as broad in scope as the ratified First Amendment.[3] Some state constitutions seemingly limited protections for religious freedom to certain types of believers.[4] Furthermore, as discussed elsewhere, some of those states still supported religious establishments,[5] even as other constitutional provisions limited some aspects of state establishments.[6] North Carolina's constitution, for example, granted freedom of conscience and forbade an "establishment of any one religious church or denomination in this State, in preference to any other," but further provided that the constitution did not "exempt preachers of treasonable or seditious discourses, from legal trial and punishment."[7]

---

[25] Curry, supra note 12, at 218.

[26] Northwest Ordinance (1787), supra note 22, § 14, art. 3.

[1] Cf. Carl H. Esbeck, Uses and Abuses of Textualism and Originalism in Establishment Clause Interpretation, 2011 Utah L. Rev. 489, 496–97 (describing three aspects of the 1787 Constitution as "tak[ing] into account religious freedom": (1) the provisions permitting affirmations in lieu of oaths; (2) the Sunday Clause of the presidential veto; and (3) the No Religious Test Clause). See ArtVI.C3.2.1 Historical Background on Religious Test for Government Offices.

[2] See, e.g., John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 70–71 (4th ed. 2016) (discussing Charles Pinckney's draft Constitution containing a provision prohibiting the federal legislature from passing laws "on the subject of Religion").

[3] See, e.g., Va. Const. of 1776, § 16 ("[A]ll men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and . . . it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity towards each other."); Mass. Const. of 1780, art. II ("[N]o subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained of conscience; and . . . it for worshipping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, or for his religious profession or sentiments, provided he doth not disturb the public peace or obstruct others in their religious worship . . . .").

[4] See, e.g., N.J. Const. of 1776, XIX ("[N]o Protestant inhabitant of this Colony shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right, merely on account of his religious principles . . . ."); Penn. Const. of 1776, Declaration of Rights, II ("Nor can any man, who acknowledges the being of a God, be justly deprived or abridged of any civil right as a citizen, on account of his religious sentiments or peculiar mode of religious worship . . . ."); Md. Const. of 1776, Declaration of Rights, XXXIII ("[A]ll persons, professing the Christian religion, are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty . . . .").

[5] Amdt1.2.2.2 England and Religious Freedom; Amdt1.2.2.4 Colonial Concepts of Religious Liberty. See also, e.g., Md. Const. of 1776, Declaration of Rights, XXXIII ("[T]he Legislature may, in their discretion, lay a general and equal tax, for the support of the Christian religion . . . .").

[6] See, e.g., N.J. Const. of 1776, XVIII ("[N]or shall any person, within this Colony, ever be obliged to pay tithes, taxes, or any other rates, for the purpose of building or repairing any other church or churches, place or places of worship, or for the maintenance of any minister or ministry . . . ."); id. at XIX ("[T]here shall be no establishment of any one religious sect in this Province, in preference to another . . . ."); Delaware Declaration of Rights, § 2 (Sept. 11, 1776), reprinted in 5 The Founder's Constitution 70 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987) ("[N]o man ought or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship or maintain any ministry contrary to or against his own free will and consent . . . .").

[7] N.C. Const. of 1776, art. XXXIV; Declaration of Rights art. XIX.

During the debates over ratifying the Constitution, both proponents and opponents argued for the addition of a bill of rights, frequently citing religious freedom as one of the rights that should be expressly protected.[8] Seven states considered amendments expressly protecting religious freedom, and four states ratified the Constitution only after officially recommending such amendments.[9] Virginia, for example, proposed an amendment stating that "all men have an equal, natural and unalienable right to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, and . . . no particular religious sect or society ought to be favored or established by Law in preference to others."[10]

James Madison, a key figure in the framing and adoption of the Constitution and the First Amendment, initially considered a bill of rights unnecessary.[11] Among his objections to such an enumeration, he was concerned that express declarations "of some of the most essential rights" would be stated too narrowly.[12] Focusing specifically on "the rights of Conscience," he noted that some states wanted to deny equal rights to non-Christians, suggesting any public definition of religious freedom would be too narrow.[13] Madison, however, was ultimately persuaded to introduce the amendments that would become the Bill of Rights.[14]

On June 8, 1789, Madison introduced a proposed constitutional amendment in the House of Representatives which read: "The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or on any pretext, infringed."[15] He further proposed an amendment that expressly prohibited states from "violat[ing] the equal rights of conscience."[16] Explaining this second provision, Madison believed "every Government should be disarmed of powers which trench upon those particular rights," and wrote that "State Governments are as liable to attack these invaluable privileges as the General Government is."[17]

On August 15, the House considered a version of the amendment that read: "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."[18] Debate

---

[8] For example, writing from France, Thomas Jefferson argued the need for such protections while otherwise praising the document. See, e.g., Letter from Thomas Jefferson to James Madison (Dec. 20, 1787), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-12-02-0454; Letter from Thomas Jefferson to William Stephens Smith (Feb. 2, 1788), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-12-02-0590. See also, e.g., Brutus II (Nov. 1, 1787), reprinted in XIII Commentaries on the Constitution 525–26 (John P. Kaminski & Gaspare J. Saladino eds., 1981) (discussing the importance of rights of conscience and the need for a bill of rights); John Leland, Objections to the Constitution (Feb. 28, 1788), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 409 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009) (arguing that the proposed Constitution did not sufficiently protect religious liberty).

[9] See Carl H. Esbeck, supra note 1, at 511. For the text of the proposals, see The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 8, at 415–17.

[10] Amendments Proposed by the Virginia Ratifying Convention (June 27, 1788), in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 8, at 416.

[11] Letter from James Madison to Thomas Jefferson (Oct. 17, 1788), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-11-02-0218.

[12] Id.

[13] Id. But cf., e.g., Letter from James Madison to John Brown (Aug. 23, 1785), reprinted in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church & State 75 (Lenni Brenner, ed., 2004) (giving advice on Kentucky's Constitution, saying it might restrain the legislature "from meddling with religion").

[14] One important figure pushing for express guarantees of religious liberty was John Leland, who mounted a political challenge to Madison and ultimately exacted a guarantee that Madison would propose an amendment protecting religious liberty. See, e.g., Gregory C. Downs, Religious Liberty That Almost Wasn't: On the Origin of the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, 30 U. Ark. Little Rock L. Rev. 19, 21, 27 (2007).

[15] 1 Annals of Cong. 451 (1789).

[16] Id. at 452.

[17] Id. at 458.

[18] Id. at 757.

revealed differences of opinion on what such an amendment should accomplish, but some Members expressed concern that the amendment would unduly prohibit government support for religion—even by the states—and thereby abolish religion altogether.[19] Two days later, the House considered the amendment providing that "no State shall infringe the equal rights of conscience," along with other rights.[20] Madison "conceived this to be the most valuable amendment in the whole list," again arguing it was necessary to prevent both state and federal governments from infringing "these essential rights."[21] Ultimately, the version passed by the House on August 24 read: "Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed."[22] The House also passed the amendment providing that "[n]o state shall infringe . . . the rights of conscience."[23]

Debate in the Senate was not recorded, but on September 3, 1789, the Senate considered the constitutional amendments adopted by the House.[24] The Senate adopted amendments rewriting the first provision to read: "Congress shall make no law establishing one religious sect or society in preference to others."[25] On September 9, the Senate combined the religion amendments with the other rights that would ultimately be part of the First Amendment into a provision reading: "Congress shall make no law establishing articles of faith or a mode of worship, or prohibiting the free exercise of religion, or abridging the freedom of speech . . . ."[26] This version was adopted and sent to the House the same day.[27] The House amendment guaranteeing the rights of conscience against the states was not approved by the Senate.[28]

A joint committee was appointed to resolve the differences between the Chambers, and although there is no surviving record of the committee debate, on September 24, 1789, it reported the text that would become the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof of speech . . . ."[29] On December 15, 1791, this language was ratified by the requisite number of states.

---

[19] See id. at 757–59.

[20] Id. at 783. Informing this fear that voluntarism would lead to the abolition of religion is the fact that at this time, most of the history of religion involved some level of state sponsorship of religion. See, e.g., Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses; Amdt1.2.2.3 State-Established Religion in the Colonies.

[21] Id. at 784.

[22] Congress Creates the Bill of Rights, Nat'l Archives 31, https://www.archives.gov/files/legislative/resources/bill-of-rights/CCBR_IIB.pdf (last visited June 3, 2022).

[23] Id. at 140.

[24] S. Journal, 1st Cong., 1st Sess. 70 (1789).

[25] Id.

[26] Id. at 77. The Senate rejected alternative drafts which would have, for example, spelled out that Congress could not establish any particular sect in preference to another. Id. at 70.

[27] Id. at 77–78.

[28] Id. at 72.

[29] Id. at 87; see also 1 Annals of Cong. 948 (1789).

Amdt1.2.2.8 Early Interpretations of the Religion Clauses

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Even after the First Amendment was ratified and the Founders almost universally embraced the general principle of liberty of conscience, significant disagreement remained as to the scope of the prohibition on establishment and the protections of free exercise.[1]

At the time of the Revolution, the majority of the states retained at least some elements of religious establishments, including requiring church attendance, collecting tithes, and burdening the rights of religious dissenters.[2] States did not become subject to the First Amendment when it was adopted in 1791, and accordingly had more leeway to regulate on the subject of religion, but the movement to disestablish official state religions nonetheless continued to gain support as views changed about the appropriate role of church and state.[3] In 1791, one prominent minister, arguing against state-established religions, noted that by that time, most states had "no legal force used about religion, in directing its course, or supporting its preachers."[4] Seven disestablishments of state sanctioned religions occurred after the First Amendment's adoption, with the last, Massachusetts's, occurring in 1833.[5] This gradual disestablishment was accompanied in many cases by civil regulation of the corporate forms and property rights of the churches,[6] eventually leading to questions about whether such regulation was contrary to constitutional guarantees of religious liberty.[7]

Maryland's experience serves as one example of this trend. The state's 1776 constitution extended legal toleration to all Christian sects but required officeholders to declare Christian belief and authorized the state legislature to impose a general "tax for the support of the Christian religion."[8] Maryland had thus abandoned its Church of England establishment but continued to generally support Christianity and adopted laws regulating the Anglican church.[9] However, a 1784 bill that would have levied a tax for the support of ministers was defeated.[10] The bill's opponents argued that it would have preferred certain sects, impermissibly set up the legislature as the judge of acceptable worship, and set up a confrontation with sects such as Quakers that would refuse to pay.[11] In 1810, Maryland amended its constitution by providing that it would no longer be lawful to tax citizens to support religion.[12] However, the state's

---

[1] See, e.g., John Witte, Jr. & Joel A. Nichols, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment 41 (4th ed. 2016).

[2] Id. at 57–58.

[3] See id.

[4] John Leland, The Rights of Conscience Inalienable (1791), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience 338 (Daniel L. Dreisbach & Mark David Hall eds., 2009).

[5] Carl H. Esbeck, Uses and Abuses of Textualism and Originalism in Establishment Clause Interpretation, 2011 Utah L. Rev. 489, 492–93.

[6] See, e.g., Sarah Barringer Gordon, The First Disestablishment: Limits on Church Power and Property Before the Civil War, 162 U. Pa. L. Rev. 307, 311–12 (2014).

[7] See, e.g., Amdt1.2.3.2 Doctrinal Basis of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes.

[8] Kenneth Lasson, Free Exercise in the Free State: Maryland's Role in the Development of First Amendment Jurisprudence, 31 J. Church & St. 419, 440–41 (1989).

[9] Thomas J. Curry, Church and State in Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century America, 7 J. L. & Religion 261, 153–55 (1989).

[10] Id. at 155–56.

[11] Id.

[12] 380 Archives of Maryland, Amendments to the Maryland Constitutions 19, ch. CLXVII (1810), https://msa.maryland.gov/megafile/msa/speccol/sc2900/sc2908/000001/000380/html/am380-19.html.

constitution continued to require officeholders to declare a general belief in existence of God until 1961, when the provision was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.[13]

These diverse and shifting views over religion were also reflected at the federal level. For example, early Congresses employed chaplains and supported proclamations for national days of thanksgiving.[14] By the 1800s, however, James Madison and Thomas Jefferson had seemingly changed their mind on the propriety of government prayer.[15] Toward the end of his presidency, Jefferson explained that he would not recommend a day of prayer because even voluntary language suggested an authority over religion that, in his view, the government did not possess.[16] James Madison eventually concluded that establishing a congressional chaplain was a "palpable violation" of the Constitution.[17] Further, although as President, he had issued proclamations for national days of prayer and thanksgiving, Madison believed these religious proclamations were similarly problematic.[18] Madison stated that he had issued the proclamations only at Congress's request, and had used language intended "to deaden as much as possible any claim of political right to enjoin religious observances" by referring to "the voluntary compliance of individuals."[19]

Another example of the debate over the separation of church and state involved an 1811 bill that would have incorporated the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia.[20] Then-President Madison vetoed the bill, stating that it violated the Establishment Clause by enacting rules for the church's "organization and polity," giving a "legal force and sanction" to certain articles of church administration and actions.[21] The House of Representatives failed to override the veto.[22] In the debate preceding that vote, some proponents of the bill argued that it did not violate the Establishment Clause because it did not establish a National Church such as the Church of England.[23] Another Member argued that if the debated bill infringed the Constitution, then Congress had similarly violated the Constitution by appointing and paying chaplains.[24]

Other debates during this period focused on whether the United States could be considered a Christian nation.[25] In the 1797 Treaty of Tripoli, the government assured the Muslim state of Tripoli that because "the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian Religion, . . . no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of

---

[13] Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 489 (1961).

[14] See, e.g., Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 787–88 & n.9 (1983); Witte & Nichols, supra note 1, at 89.

[15] Thomas J. Curry, The First Freedoms 218–19 (1986).

[16] Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Samuel Miller (Jan. 23, 1808), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/99-01-02-7257.

[17] James Madison, Detached Memoranda [1817–1832], reprinted in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church and State 264 (Lenni Brenner ed., 2004).

[18] Id. at 265.

[19] Id. at 266.

[20] James Madison, Veto Message to the House of Representatives of the United States (Feb. 21, 1811), in Jefferson & Madison on Separation of Church and State, supra note 17, at 198.

[21] Id. at 198–99.

[22] 22 Annals of Cong. 998 (1811).

[23] Id. at 984.

[24] Id.

[25] Cf. Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 471 (1892) (noting a variety of "unofficial declarations" and "organic utterances" in legal documents suggesting "that this is a Christian nation"). In Vidal v. Girard's Executors, the Supreme Court described America as "a Christian country" but also relied on the country's "variety of religious sects" and state guarantees of religious freedom in its opinion interpreting a will. 43 U.S. (2 How.) 127, 198–99 (1844).

the harmony existing between the two countries."[26] Beginning in the nineteenth century, Congress failed to adopt a variety of proposals that would have amended the Constitution to describe the United States as a Christian nation, or the federal government as a Christian one.[27]

Amdt1.2.3 Religious Disputes

Amdt1.2.3.1 Overview of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Taken together, the Religion Clauses create a separation between church and state.[1] The preamble to the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, drafted by Thomas Jefferson, outlined the Founder's view of the separate spheres of authority: "the civil magistrate" should not interfere with religious belief, but should be able "to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order."[2]

Under a doctrine sometimes called "religious autonomy"[3] or "ecclesiastical abstention,"[4] the Supreme Court has long held that these principles require civil courts to refrain from adjudicating ecclesiastical disputes.[5] Nonetheless, so long as they avoid "determining ecclesiastical questions," civil courts can resolve disputes between religious parties by applying "neutral principles of law."[6]

For example, churches may sometimes split into factions after disagreeing about religious doctrine, and those factions may then further dispute which group is entitled to possess church property.[7] The Supreme Court has said that religious organizations are subject to the same legal protections and constraints as "other voluntary associations" and may come to court for adjudication of their property rights.[8] However, in the course of adjudicating such a property dispute, the courts must refrain from resolving any "underlying controversies over religious

---

[26] Treaty of Peace and Friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and Subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary (1797), reprinted in The Sacred Rights of Conscience, supra note 4, at 476.

[27] See Richard Albert, Constitutional Amendment and Dismemberment, 43 Yale J. Int'l L. 1, 40 (2018).

[1] See, e.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 164 (1878) (quoting Letter from Thomas Jefferson to the Danbury Baptist Ass'n (Jan. 1, 1802), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-36-02-0152-0006).

[2] Id. at 163 (quoting Va. Code Ann. § 57-1) (internal quotation mark omitted).

[3] See, e.g., Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Juan v. Feliciano, No. 18-921, slip op. at 4 (U.S. Feb. 24, 2020) (per curiam). This case involved a claim that the Puerto Rico Supreme Court should have abstained from resolving an allegedly ecclesiastical dispute, but the U.S. Supreme Court instead resolved the case on jurisdictional grounds. Id. at 4–5.

[4] See, e.g., Puri v. Khalsa, 844 F.3d 1152, 1162 (9th Cir. 2017); Winkler v. Marist Fathers of Detroit, Inc., 901 N.W.2d 566, 573 (Mich. 2017); St. Joseph Catholic Orphan Soc'y v. Edwards, 449 S.W.3d 727, 738 (Ky. 2014).

[5] Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679, 731 (1871). See also United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 86–88 (1944) (holding, in the context of a criminal prosecution for mail fraud, that the Court would have violated the First Amendment if it submitted the truth of the defendants' religious beliefs to the jury).

[6] Presbyterian Church in the U.S. v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 447, 449 (1969).

[7] See, e.g., id. at 441–42; Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 597 (1979).

[8] Watson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 714; see also Wolf, 443 U.S. at 603–04 (noting that by relying on ordinary legal documents like trusts, religious organizations can order their private affairs to "ensure that a dispute over the ownership of church property will be resolved in accord with the desires of the members").

doctrine," and may only apply "neutral principles" of property law.[9] Accordingly, the government may not resolve such disputes by evaluating which faction's beliefs more faithfully reflect the religious order's beliefs.[10] By contrast, if a deed or other legal document expressly indicates which group is entitled to the property, a court may enforce that legal instrument,[11] so long as it "defer[s] to the [religious body's] resolution" of any religious issues.[12]

Amdt1.2.3.2 Doctrinal Basis of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Since at least the early 1800s, the Supreme Court has resolved religious entities' legal disputes over property rights,[1] focusing in part on the legal rights attached to the corporate form of the religious bodies.[2] In Watson v. Jones, issued in 1871, the Court reiterated that "religious organizations" come before the court in the same posture as other entities organized for charitable purposes, saying that "their rights of property, or of contract, are equally under the protection of the law, and the actions of their members subject to its restraints."[3] However, the Supreme Court also articulated limits on civil courts' ability to adjudicate religious disputes, although at first it did not expressly ground these limitations in the Constitution's Religion Clauses.[4]

Specifically, Watson involved a religious schism and a property dispute. After some members of a congregation disagreed with the national church's anti-slavery views, the local church separated "into two distinct bodies, with distinct members and officers, each claiming to be the true Walnut Street Presbyterian Church" and entitled to its property.[5] A federal court had concluded that the faction recognized by the national governing body was entitled to the property, and the Supreme Court affirmed.[6] The Court said that where a congregation is subordinate to "superior ecclesiastical tribunals," civil courts should defer to the resolution of any religious issues by the "church judicatories."[7] More broadly, the Court said that civil courts may not adjudicate any matter "which concerns theological controversy, church discipline, ecclesiastical government, or the conformity of the members of the church to the standard of

---

[9] Presbyterian Church in the U.S., 393 U.S. at 449.

[10] Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church, 344 U.S. 94, 117–19 (1952).

[11] See Watson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 722–23; Wolf, 443 U.S. at 606.

[12] Wolf, 443 U.S. at 604.

[1] See Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U.S. (9 Cranch) 43, 45, 55 (1815) (ruling that an Episcopal church held title to property even after disestablishment of the Church of England in the state).

[2] See Pawlet v. Clark, 13 U.S. (9 Cranch) 292, 334, 336 (1815) (ruling that an Episcopal church was not entitled to a glebe where the church had not been legally recognized either by England or by the state of New Hampshire, and was instead "a mere voluntary society of Episcopalians").

[3] 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679, 714 (1871).

[4] Id. at 729; see also Presbyterian Church in the U.S. v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 445, 447 (1969) (noting that Watson was "decided before the application of the First Amendment to the States but nonetheless informed by First Amendment considerations").

[5] Watson, 80 U.S. at 717.

[6] See id. at 735.

[7] Id. at 722–23, 727. See also Shepard v. Barkley, 247 U.S. 1, 2 (1918) (affirming decision citing Watson to defer to church authority's resolution of a property dispute); cf. Bouldin v. Alexander, 82 U.S. (15 Wall) 131, 137, 139–40 (1872) ("In a congregational church, the majority, if they adhere to the organization and to the doctrines, represent the church.").

morals required of them."[8] Allowing these decisions "of ecclesiastical cognizance" to be reviewed by secular courts "would lead to the total subversion" of the religious unions, which the Court suggested would be inconsistent with the guarantees of free exercise of religion and no religious establishment.[9] The Supreme Court said that United States laws created these guarantees, but did not specifically reference the Religion Clauses[10] as the Court originally understood the Religion Clauses to apply only to the federal government.[11] Although the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in the 1860s imposed the First Amendment's limitations on the states,[12] at the time of Watson's decision in 1871, the Supreme Court had not yet recognized this incorporation of the Religion Clauses.[13]

The Supreme Court expressly grounded Watson in the First Amendment in Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church.[14] Kedroff was decided in 1952, after the Court had expressly held the First Amendment to be incorporated against the states.[15] After the Russian Revolution prompted disputes over the governance of the North American Diocese of the Russian Orthodox Church, New York enacted a law transferring control of the state's Russian Orthodox churches from the "central governing hierarchy" in Russia to the Russian Orthodox Church in America.[16] The Supreme Court held in Kedroff that this law violated the Constitution by prohibiting "the free exercise of religion" and breaching the "rule of separation between church and state."[17] The Court highlighted that the state statute required churches in New York to "conform" to the religious doctrine "of the Eastern Confession."[18] It also expressed concern that the state's action was apparently based on a determination that the Russian Orthodox Church in America would more faithfully effectuate the purposes of the religious trust.[19] Ultimately, the Court said that the Constitution protected the "freedom to select the clergy, where no improper methods of choice are proven."[20]

The Court remanded the Kedroff case back to New York state court, which again transferred control of state churches to the Russian Church in America—but this time, on

---

[8] Watson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 733. The Supreme Court phrased the issue in terms of jurisdiction, saying that civil courts could "exercise no jurisdiction" over a subject matter that was "strictly and purely ecclesiastical in its character." Id. By contrast, in Gonzalez v. Roman Catholic Archbishop, 280 U.S. 1, 16 (1929), the Court concluded that federal courts had jurisdiction over a religious dispute where the defendant was "a juristic person" and the subject matter involved the terms of a trust.

[9] Watson, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 728–29.

[10] See id. at 728 ("In this country the full and free right to entertain any religious belief, to practice any religious principle and to teach any religious doctrine which does not violate the laws of morality and property, and which does not infringe personal rights, is conceded to all. The law knows no heresy, and is committed to the support of no dogma, the establishment of no sect.").

[11] See Permoli v. New Orleans, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 589, 609–10 (1845) (rejecting a challenge to an ordinance prohibiting certain Catholic burials as a matter "exclusively of state cognisance," holding, inter alia, that the U.S. Constitution did not protect "the citizens of the . . . states in their religious liberties"), superseded by constitutional amendment, U.S. CONST. amend. XIV.

[12] Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 49 (1985).

[13] See Amdt14.S1.4.2 Early Doctrine on Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[14] 344 U.S. 94, 116 (1952) (saying that Watson "radiates . . . a spirit of freedom for religious organizations, an independence from secular control or manipulation" and that its guarantees "must now be said to have federal constitutional protection as a part of the free exercise of religion against state interference").

[15] Id. at 100 & n.6.

[16] Id. at 105–07.

[17] Id. at 107, 110. Subsequent caselaw clarified that resolving controversies over religious doctrine or polity also raises Establishment Clause concerns. See Presbyterian Church in the U.S. v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 449 (1969).

[18] Kedroff, 344 U.S. at 108.

[19] Id. at 109, 117–18.

[20] Id. at 116.

grounds of the common law rather than the state statute.[21] When the dispute returned to the Supreme Court in Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church, the Court held that the state court had acted unconstitutionally because, like the state statute, the court's common law decision was impermissibly premised on the idea that the Russian Orthodox Church in America would more faithfully carry out the religious trust.[22] Kreshik therefore confirmed that courts, as well as legislatures, may violate the Constitution's Religion Clauses by resolving issues of ecclesiastical government.[23]

Amdt1.2.3.3 Neutral Principles of Law and Government Resolution of Religious Disputes

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The approach to disputes involving churches that the Court developed in early cases such as Watson v. Jones largely still holds sway.[1] The Supreme Court described the prevailing doctrine in 1969:

> [T]here are neutral principles of law, developed for use in all . . . disputes, which can be applied without "establishing" churches to which property is awarded. But First Amendment values are plainly jeopardized when church property litigation is made to turn on the resolution by civil courts of controversies over religious doctrine and practice.[2]

On "issues of religious doctrine or polity," civil courts must defer to "the highest court of a hierarchical church organization."[3] Thus, in Presbyterian Church in the United States v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church, the Supreme Court held that a state erred in awarding church property to local churches, because its decision was based on a judgment that their mother church had "departed from the tenets of faith and practice it held at the time the local churches affiliated with it."[4] The state court had violated the First Amendment by "determin[ing] matters at the very core of a religion—the interpretation of particular church doctrines and the importance of those doctrines to the religion."[5] This stood in contrast to prior cases where courts had permissibly deferred to and enforced the decisions of the church itself on religious issues.[6]

Decades earlier, in Gonzalez v. Roman Catholic Archbishop, the Supreme Court had indicated that courts may have some role in reviewing ecclesiastical disputes.[7] The Gonzalez Court declined to enforce a will that purported to appoint someone as a Catholic chaplain,

---

[21] 363 U.S. 190, 190–91 (1960).

[22] See id. at 191 (citing Kedroff, 344 U.S. at 117–18).

[23] See id.

[1] See Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679, 714 (1871).

[2] Presbyterian Church in the U.S. v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 449 (1969).

[3] Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 602 (1979).

[4] Presbyterian Church in the U.S., 393 U.S. at 441, 444.

[5] Id. at 450.

[6] See id. at 450–51 (contrasting the decision with Gonzalez v. Roman Catholic Archbishop, 280 U.S. 1, 16 (1929)).

[7] Gonzalez, 280 U.S. at 16–17.

where the Archbishop had concluded that the person was not qualified to serve under religious law.[8] The Court said that because the chaplain's appointment was "a canonical act, it is the function of the church authorities to determine what the essential qualifications of a chaplain are and whether the candidate possesses them."[9] However, although the Court ultimately deferred to the decision of the church authority, its opinion suggested that courts could conduct a limited review of churches' decisions on ecclesiastical matters to determine whether there was "fraud, collusion, or arbitrariness."[10]

It is not clear, however, whether the mode of analysis outlined in Gonzalez is still viable. Decades later, in Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, the Supreme Court concluded that a state court violated the First Amendment when it impermissibly inquired "into matters of ecclesiastical cognizance and polity."[11] The Court held that Gonzalez's arbitrariness inquiry was unconstitutional to the extent that it allowed courts to inquire "whether the decisions of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of a hierarchical church complied with church laws and regulations."[12] Instead, the Court confirmed that the First Amendment requires civil courts "to accept the decisions of the highest judicatories of a religious organization of hierarchical polity on matters of discipline, faith, internal organization, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law."[13] Accordingly, the Court held that the state court should not have disturbed the Serbian Orthodox Church's decisions to defrock the bishop of its American-Canadian Diocese and to split up the diocese.[14]

By contrast, the Supreme Court has held that courts acted constitutionally when they resolved disputes between religious entities without inquiring into religious doctrine.[15] Jones v. Wolf approved a state decision that applied "neutral principles of law" to resolve a property dispute between a local church and its national body.[16] The Supreme Court said the state was not required to defer to the decision of the higher church authority where the dispute involved no "doctrinal controversy."[17] The Court explained that in order to resolve a property dispute, it would be permissible for the state court to apply the "ordinary presumption that . . . a voluntary religious association is represented by a majority of its members."[18] However, the

---

[8] See id. at 13–14.

[9] Id. at 16. In the case before it, the Court concluded that the Archbishop followed "the controlling Canon Law" and did not act "arbitrarily," and accordingly accepted his decision as controlling. Id. at 18.

[10] Id. at 16.

[11] 426 U.S. 696, 698 (1976).

[12] Milivojevich, 426 U.S. at 713.

[13] Id.

[14] See id. at 717–21.

[15] E.g., Md. & Va. Eldership of Churches of God v. Church of God, Inc., 396 U.S. 367, 367–68 (1970) (per curiam) (resolving a "church property dispute" by relying "upon language in the deeds conveying the properties in question to the local church corporations, upon the terms of the charters of the corporations, and upon provisions in the constitution of the General Eldership pertinent to the ownership and control of church property").

[16] Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 604 (1979) ("[A] State is constitutionally entitled to adopt neutral principles of law as a means of adjudicating a church property dispute.").

[17] Id. at 605 ("We cannot agree . . . that the First Amendment requires the States to adopt a rule of compulsory deference to religious authority in resolving church property disputes, even where no issue of doctrinal controversy is involved.").

[18] Id. at 607. The state argued that its courts had applied this presumption; the Supreme Court agreed that such a rule of decision "would be consistent with both the neutral-principles analysis and the First Amendment," but held that it was not clear whether the court had in fact followed this approach or whether this was the approach required by state law. Id. at 607–09. Accordingly, the Court vacated and remanded the judgment for further proceedings. Id. at 610. See also Bouldin v. Alexander, 82 U.S. (15 Wall) 131, 137, 139–40 (1872) (resolving question as to "the legally constituted trustees of the church" by looking to the terms of the deed, and noting that although the Court could not review church decisions about "who ought to be members," the actions of a minority of members to excommunicate the trustees were "not the action of the church" and were inoperative for determining trusteeship).

Court cautioned that to the extent "the neutral-principles method . . . requires a civil court to examine certain religious documents, ... a civil court must take special care to scrutinize the document in purely secular terms."[19] In cases where interpreting "instruments of ownership would require the civil court to resolve a religious controversy, then the court must defer to the resolution of the doctrinal issue by the authoritative ecclesiastical body."[20]

Amdt1.2.3.4 Church Leadership and the Ministerial Exception

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The broader ecclesiastical abstention doctrine has specifically been applied to questions about who may lead a religious group. The Supreme Court held in 1952 that religious associations' "freedom to select the clergy" was protected by the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause.[1] For another example, in 1976's Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, the Court ruled that a state court ran afoul of the ecclesiastical abstention principles outlined in Watson v. Jones when it overturned a church's decision to defrock a bishop.[2] In the ensuing decades, lower courts built on these precedents to develop a doctrine known as the "ministerial exception," which prevented courts from interfering with "the employment relationship between a religious institution and its ministers."[3]

The Supreme Court adopted the ministerial exception in 2012 in Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church & School v. EEOC, when it held that the doctrine limited the scope of certain employment discrimination laws.[4] Specifically, in Hosanna-Tabor, a teacher at a Lutheran school claimed that she had been fired in violation of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990.[5] The school sought to dismiss her claim, arguing that the suit was barred under the "ministerial exception."[6] The Court agreed, recognizing the existence of the exception and its basis in the First Amendment.[7] The Court ruled that "[r]equiring a church to accept or retain an unwanted minister, or punishing a church for failing to do so" impermissibly "interferes with the internal governance of the church," violating both the Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses.[8] The Court further held that this ministerial exception

---

[19] Wolf, 443 U.S. at 604.

[20] Id.

[1] Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church, 344 U.S. 94, 116 (1952) ("Freedom to select the clergy, where no improper methods of choice are proven, we think, must now be said to have federal constitutional protection as a part of the free exercise of religion against state interference.").

[2] 426 U.S. 696, 717–18 (1976).

[3] Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church & Sch. v. EEOC, 565 U.S. 171, 188 & n.2 (2012) (citing lower court decisions). Cf. NLRB v. Catholic Bishop, 440 U.S. 490, 502–04, 507 (1979) (holding that if a federal statute were read to grant the National Labor Relations Board jurisdiction over religious school teachers, it would present a "significant risk" of infringing the First Amendment, and accordingly, interpreting the statute to exclude "teachers in church-operated schools").

[4] Hosanna-Tabor, 565 U.S. at 188.

[5] Id. at 179.

[6] Id. at 180.

[7] Id. at 188–89.

[8] Id. ("By imposing an unwanted minister, the state infringes the Free Exercise Clause, which protects a religious group's right to shape its own faith and mission through its appointments. According the state the power to determine which individuals will minister to the faithful also violates the Establishment Clause, which prohibits government involvement in such ecclesiastical decisions.").

applied to the teacher's claim in Hosanna-Tabor even though she was not "the head of a religious congregation."[9] In the Court's view, the the teacher qualified "as a minister" because of her distinct role within the church, including her title as a "minister"; her religious training and commissioning; her duties to lead religous activities in furtherance of the church's mission; and the teacher's own characterization of her position.[10] As a result, the Court held, the First Amendment did not permit applying nondiscrimination provisions to the teacher's employment law claims.[11]

In Our Lady of Guadalupe School v. Morrissey-Berru, the Court suggested that one particular factor from Hosanna-Tabor—the individual's job functions—was the most important for determining whether a particular employee qualifies for the ministerial exception.[12] Our Lady of Guadalupe involved two employment discrimination claims brought by teachers fired by religious schools.[13] The Court ruled that the two teachers fell within the ministerial exception[14] even though, relative to the teacher in Hosanna-Tabor, they did not have the title of "minister," had less religious training, and were not practicing members of their employer's religion.[15] Instead, the Court said that "[w]hat matters, at bottom, is what an employee does."[16] Specifically, the Court recognized "that educating young people in their faith, inculcating its teachings, and training them to live their faith are responsibilities that lie at the very core of the mission of a private religious school."[17] The Court further stated that the two teachers in the combined cases "performed vital religious duties," emphasizing that they provided religious instruction, prayed with their students, and were "expected to guide their students, by word and deed, toward the goal of living their lives in accordance with the faith."[18] Consequently, in the Court's view, "judicial intervention" in either dispute would have "threaten[ed] the school's independence in a way that the First Amendment does not allow."[19]

[9] Id. at 190.

[10] Id. at 191–92.

[11] Id. at 194. The EEOC and the teacher had originally sought an order reinstating the teacher to her position, but at the Supreme Court, the teacher sought only front pay. Id. The Supreme Court said that while the reinstatement order "would have plainly violated the Church's freedom under the Religion Clauses to select its own ministers," the monetary relief was similarly unconstitutional "as a penalty on the Church for terminating an unwanted minister." Id. The Court emphasized that the monetary relief "would depend on a determination that Hosanna-Tabor was wrong to have relieved [the teacher] of her position"—a ruling "barred by the ministerial exception." Id.

[12] No. 19-267, slip op. at 18 (U.S. July 8, 2020). However, the Court emphasized that "a variety of factors may be important" in any given case. Id. at 16.

[13] Id. at 2.

[14] The majority opinion seemed to move away from using the term "ministerial exception," referring instead to "the Hosanna-Tabor exception," id. at 16, or "the exemption we recognized in Hosanna-Tabor," id. at 21. This nomenclature choice could be related to the substance of the decision; elsewhere, the Court emphasized that not all religions use the title of "minister," cautioning against "attaching too much significance to titles." Id. at 17.

[15] Id. at 23–26.

[16] Id. at 18.

[17] Id.

[18] Id. at 21.

[19] Id. at 27.

Amdt1.3 Establishment Clause

Amdt1.3.1 General Principle of Government Neutrality to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment's Establishment Clause forbids the government from making any law "respecting an establishment of religion."[1] Perhaps most obviously, this provision prevents the federal government from establishing an official national religion akin to the Church of England.[2] But a law may "respect" an establishment even if it does not explicitly establish a religion.[3] Thus, relying on the historical background preceding the adoption of the First Amendment, and looking particularly to the colonists' experiences with religious establishments, the Supreme Court has long understood the Establishment Clause to bar other types of government support that would tend to "establish" religion, as well.[4] According to the Court, for the Founders, laws respecting "the 'establishment' of a religion connoted sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity."[5]

The Supreme Court has often referred to government neutrality towards religion as its guiding principle in applying the Establishment Clause.[6] For example, the Court has said the state must "be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and non-believers."[7] The Court has further recognized that the government may provide some types of support without violating the Establishment Clause.[8] While "neutrality" has remained the general touchstone, the Court has adopted a variety of approaches to determine whether any given action is sufficiently neutral.[9]

---

[1] U.S. Const. amend. I. The Establishment Clause applies to the states by incorporation through the Fourteenth Amendment. See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947); see also Amdt14.S1.4.2 Early Doctrine on Incorporation of the Bill of Rights. For more information on how the Supreme Court has defined religious belief and activity, see Amdt1.2.1 Overview of the Religion Clauses (Establishment and Free Expression Clauses) and Amdt1.4.2 Laws Regulating Religious Belief.

[2] See, e.g., Everson, 330 U.S. at 15. See also, e.g., Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679, 728 (1871) ("The law knows no heresy, and is committed to the support of no dogma, the establishment of no sect.").

[3] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612 (1971) (emphasis added).

[4] Everson, 330 U.S. at 8–15. See also Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[5] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

[6] See, e.g., McCreary Cnty. v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 545 U.S. 844, 874 (2005); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 60 (1985).

[7] Everson, 330 U.S. at 18.

[8] Id. at 17.

[9] Cf., e.g., Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 837–38 (2000) (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment) (arguing that the plurality opinion's Establishment Clause analysis treated neutrality as a factor with "close to . . . singular importance" in a way inconsistent with the Supreme Court's prior jurisprudence).

Amdt1.3.2 Accommodationist and Separationist Theories of the Establishment Clause

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court's Establishment Clause decisions embody, to varying degrees, two views of the Establishment Clause that have been described as "separationist" and "accommodationist."[1] These two views reflect an inherent tension between the two Religion Clauses.[2] The Establishment Clause prohibits the government from providing some types of support to religion, requiring some separation between church and state, while the Free Exercise Clause prohibits the government from excluding religious individuals "from receiving the benefits of public welfare legislation" because of their faith, allowing and even requiring some accommodation of religion.[3]

The separationist view is embodied by Thomas Jefferson's statement that the First Amendment created "a wall of separation between church and State."[4] Thus, in Everson v. Board of Education in 1947, the Supreme Court said that this wall "must be kept high and impregnable."[5] It went on:

> The "establishment of religion" clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or to remain away from church against his will or force him to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or non-attendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa.[6]

The "separation" of church and state is intended not only to protect the government from religious influence, but also to protect religious exercise by preventing the government from intervening in religious affairs.[7]

Just five years after Everson, though, in Zorach v. Clauson, the Court confirmed that the government could sometimes accommodate private religious practices without violating Everson's wall.[8] It held that "no constitutional requirement . . . makes it necessary for government to be hostile to religion."[9] In 1971, in Lemon v. Kurtzman, the Supreme Court said

---

[1] See, e.g., Steven G. Gey, Reconciling the Supreme Court's Four Establishment Clauses, 8 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 725, 725 (2006); Ira C. Lupu, The Lingering Death of Separationism, 62 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 230, 232 (1994).

[2] See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 16 (1947).

[3] Id.; see also Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause.

[4] See Everson, 330 U.S. at 16 (quoting Letter from Thomas Jefferson to the Danbury Baptist Ass'n (Jan. 1, 1802), https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-36-02-0152-0006 (internal quotation marks omitted)).

[5] Id. at 18.

[6] Id. at 15–16.

[7] See, e.g., Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 431 (1962).

[8] Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314 (1952).

[9] Id.

that "far from being a 'wall,'" the line separating church from state "is a blurred, indistinct, and variable barrier depending on all the circumstances of a particular relationship."[10] And in a dissenting opinion in 1985, then-Associate Justice William Rehnquist argued that "[t]here is simply no historical foundation for the proposition that the Framers intended to build the 'wall of separation' that was constitutionalized in Everson."[11]

Amdt1.3.3 Establishment Clause Tests Generally

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As discussed in the prior essay, the Supreme Court's Establishment Clause jurisprudence has changed over time, vacillating between separationist and accommodationist views.[1] Due in part to these distinct views of the Religion Clauses, the Supreme Court has employed a variety of analyses to determine whether any given law violates the Establishment Clause, depending in part on the type of government support being challenged. And even where the Supreme Court has applied the same tests to similar types of government aid, the way those tests have been applied has shifted as either the separationist or the accommodationist mode of analysis has been ascendant. One opinion noted the Court's "unwillingness to be confined to any single test or criterion in this sensitive area."[2]

For example, the Court has said a law that creates express denominational preferences is generally subject to a strict scrutiny analysis, and "must be invalidated unless it is justified by a compelling governmental interest" and "closely fitted to further that interest."[3] Most laws, however, do not involve such express discrimination, and the Establishment Clause forbids more than just the "governmental preference of one religion over another."[4] Accordingly, the Court historically adopted other tests to evaluate other types of laws.

The Court's predominant approach to evaluating Establishment Clause challenges during much of the modern era was a tripartite analysis known as the Lemon test,[5] although the Court used that test less frequently in the early 2000s[6] and by 2022, said it had "long ago abandoned" that approach.[7] Lemon v. Kurtzman's three-part test instructed courts that for a government action to be considered constitutional: (1) it "must have a secular legislative purpose"; (2) "its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion"; and (3) it "must not foster 'an excessive government entanglement with religion.'"[8] [10] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 614 (1971).

---

[11] Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 92, 106 (1985) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

[1] Amdt1.3.2 Accommodationist and Separationist Theories of the Establishment Clause.

[2] Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 679 (1984).

[3] Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 246–47 (1982). But see Trump v. Hawaii, No. 17-965, slip op. at 26, 30 (U.S. June 26, 2018) (concluding that although certain statements suggested the President intended to exclude Muslims from the country, the Court would apply the "circumscribed judicial inquiry [that governs] when the denial of a visa allegedly burdens the constitutional rights of a U.S. citizen").

[4] Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 216 (1963).

[5] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971). See also, e.g., Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668 (2002) (O'Connor, J., concurring) (describing Lemon as "[a] central tool" in Establishment Clause analysis).

[6] See, e.g., Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 20 (U.S. June 20, 2019) (listing cases in which the Court "expressly declined to apply the [Lemon] test or . . . simply ignored it").

[7] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[8] Lemon, 403 U.S. at 612–13 (quoting Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 674 (1970)) (emphasis added).

These factors were not exclusive to Lemon: the Court looked to purpose and effect prior to that decision,[9] and continued to do so even in subsequent opinions that did not expressly cite Lemon.[10]

Since the adoption of Lemon there were questions about the degree to which each of its three factors was dispositive in particular cases. In an opinion issued the same day as Lemon, a plurality of the Court said standards in this area should "be viewed as guidelines," citing the difficulty of adopting one test to govern all circumstances.[11] The Court also employed variations on the Lemon test. For example, in Lynch v. Donnelly, issued in 1984, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor argued in a concurring opinion that in the first and second prongs of the Lemon test, the Court should ask whether a government action had "endorsed" religion.[12] The Supreme Court as a whole sometimes used this endorsement test.[13] Further, in a 1997 decision, the Supreme Court seemed to suggest a refinement of the last two prongs of the Lemon test, saying the Court uses "three primary criteria . . . to evaluate whether government aid has the effect of advancing religion:" looking to whether laws "result in governmental indoctrination; define [their] recipients by reference to religion; or create an excessive entanglement."[14]

Apart from the Lemon factors, the Supreme Court has sometimes evaluated Establishment Clause challenges by looking to whether the law is unduly coercive—particularly in the context of government-sponsored prayer.[15] "Coercion" includes at least legal compulsion,[16] but the Supreme Court has also held that "indirect coercive pressure" created by government support for "a particular religious belief" can run afoul of the Establishment Clause.[17]

---

[9] See, e.g., Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 222 (1963) ("The test may be stated as follows: what are the purpose and the primary effect of the enactment?"); Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v. McGinley, 366 U.S. 582, 598 (1961) (looking to a state law's purpose and effect); Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church, 344 U.S. 94, 110, 115 (1952) (holding that a state law violated the "rule of separation between church and state," concluding that the "purpose, meaning, and effect" of the law was to interfere in "a matter of ecclesiastical government"); see also Walz, 397 U.S. at 674 ("Determining that the [law's] legislative purpose . . . is not aimed at establishing, sponsoring, or supporting religion does not end the inquiry . . . . We must also be sure that the end result—the effect—is not an excessive government entanglement with religion.").

[10] See, e.g., Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 648–49 (2002) ("The Establishment Clause . . . prevents a State from enacting laws that have the 'purpose' or 'effect' of advancing or inhibiting religion." (quoting Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 222–23 (1997)); Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 838–39 (1995) ("[W]e must . . . inquire first into the purpose and object of the governmental action in question and then into the practical details of the program's operation.").

[11] Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 678 (1971) (plurality opinion) ("Constitutional adjudication does not lend itself to the absolutes of the physical sciences or mathematics. The standards should rather be viewed as guidelines with which to identify instances in which the objectives of the Religion Clauses have been impaired."). The Tilton plurality's analysis nonetheless considered the same three factors named in Lemon. Id.

[12] Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 690 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[13] See, e.g., Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 655 (2002); Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 307–08 (2000); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 56 (1985).

[14] Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 234 (1997).

[15] See, e.g., Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587 (1992). Cf. Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 587 (2014) (stating that the coercive effect of a "prayer opportunity . . . must be evaluated against the backdrop of historical practice").

[16] Justice Clarence Thomas has argued that the Establishment Clause is violated only by legal coercion, Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 693 (2005) (Thomas, J., concurring), effected "by force of law and threat of penalty," Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 49 (2004) (Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment) (quoting Lee, 505 U.S. at 640 (Scalia, J., dissenting)) (internal quotation marks omitted). See also Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 25 (U.S. June 27, 2022) ("Members of this Court have sometimes disagreed on what exactly qualifies as impermissible coercion in light of the original meaning of the Establishment Clause.").

[17] Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 431 (1962).

Finally, the Supreme Court has sometimes reviewed laws by reference to historical traditions—and in a 2022 ruling, said this was the test courts should use "in place of Lemon and the endorsement test."[18] In decisions since the mid-1900s, the Court's Establishment Clause analysis has sometimes looked to the history of government regulation or accommodation of religion, and the responses to those government actions.[19] In particular, some cases evaluating the constitutionality of government-sponsored prayer practices have looked to historical practice, in addition to the coercion analysis discussed above.[20] Accordingly, the Supreme Court has ruled unconstitutional prayer practices that it believed were inconsistent with early understandings of the Establishment Clause,[21] but upheld legislative prayer schemes that were consistent with long-standing historical practices.[22]

In 2022's Kennedy v. Bremerton School District the Supreme Court said it had "abandoned Lemon and its endorsement test offshoot" in favor of "an analysis focused on original meaning and history."[23] The Court said the shortcomings of Lemon's "'ambitiou[s],' abstract, and ahistorical approach to the Establishment Clause" Lemon test were "apparent."[24] Nonetheless, the Court did not expressly overrule Lemon or other precedent applying that test, leaving questions about how courts will apply those rulings in the future.[25]

The following essays provide more detail on the Supreme Court's decisions interpreting the Establishment Clause, focusing primarily on explaining the different types of analyses the Court has employed over time. Following Supreme Court precedent, the essays discuss cases involving financial assistance and non-financial assistance to religion separately. Although the two types of cases have sometimes employed the same analyses—both applied the Lemon test in at least some instances—the application of those analyses has differed based on the factual circumstances.

---

[18] Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 23.

[19] See, e.g., Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 688–92 (2005) (plurality opinion) (rejecting constitutional challenge to Ten Commandments display on the grounds of the Texas Capitol after reviewing the history and practice of "acknowledgments of the role played by the Ten Commandments in our Nation's heritage"); Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 675–80 (1970) (evaluating tax exemptions for religious properties in light of "an unbroken practice of according the exemption to churches, openly and by affirmative state action"); Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 490–92, 496 (1961) (holding a state religious test for public office unconstitutional, after reviewing colonial opposition to such oaths); Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8–14 (1947) (reviewing "the background and environment of the period in which that constitutional language [of the Establishment Clause] was fashioned and adopted").

[20] See, e.g., Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 24–25 (U.S. June 20, 2019) (plurality opinion).

[21] Engel, 370 U.S. at 424.

[22] Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 591–92 (2014); Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983).

[23] Bremerton Sch. Dist., , 24.

[24] Id. at 22 (quoting Am. Legion, slip op. at 12, 13 (plurality opinion)).

[25] Generally, lower courts must follow Supreme Court precedent that "has direct application in a case" even if the precedent "appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions," leaving to the Supreme Court "the prerogative of overruling its own decisions." Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484 (1989).

Amdt1.3.4 Financial Assistance to Religion

Amdt1.3.4.1 Overview of Financial Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

When the government provides financial aid to religious entities, as opposed to providing other types of aid such as facilities or supplies, such support presents heightened Establishment Clause concerns.[1] The Court has recognized that "financial support" of religion was squarely in the minds of those who adopted the Establishment Clause.[2]

Historically, the Supreme Court generally evaluated such aid under the three-part framework of Lemon v. Kurtzman—although its financial aid cases have also reflected the varying approaches to Lemon, including the endorsement approach.[3] While the Court has since "abandoned" the Lemon test in favor of an approach that looks to historical tradition,[4] it has not specifically overruled that opinion or some other cases applying that analysis, meaning the outcomes of those rulings may still be considered binding precedent. Accordingly, particularly in light of the fact that the Court has not frequently applied a test looking to historical traditions in the context of financial aid,[5] there is some uncertainty regarding how at least certain types of financial aid may be reviewed in the future.

In addition, one central issue in modern Establishment Clause jurisprudence concerns who decides that aid will be provided to a religious entity. The Supreme Court has said financial aid will be especially problematic if the government is giving funds directly to religious entities, as opposed to giving funds to religious entities indirectly—that is, giving funds to third parties who privately choose to use public funds to support religious entities.[6] The Court has said that indirect aid will generally be permissible under Lemon if the "government aid program is neutral with respect to religion, and provides assistance directly to a broad class of citizens who, in turn, direct government aid to religious schools wholly as a result of their own genuine and independent private choice."[7]

---

[1] See, e.g., Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 818–19 (2000) (plurality opinion); Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 842, 844 (1995); Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 18 (1947).

[2] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

[3] See Amdt1.3.4.3 Adoption of the Lemon Test; Amdt1.3.4.4 Application of the Lemon Test.

[4] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[5] Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 8–14 (1947), see Amdt1.3.4.2 Early Cases on Financial Assistance to Religion, looked to history to inform its understanding of the general principles animating the Religion Clauses. Additionally, Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 675–80 (1970), see Amdt1.3.4.3 Adoption of the Lemon Test, looked to historical practice in addition to the Lemon factors to evaluate the constitutionality of a tax exemption.

[6] See, e.g., Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 719 (2004). See also Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 649 (2002); Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 621 (1971). Cf. Helms, 530 U.S. at 818 (plurality opinion) ("Whether one chooses to label this [non-financial aid] program 'direct' or 'indirect' is a rather arbitrary choice, one that does not further the constitutional analysis.").

[7] Zelman, 536 U.S. at 652. Zelman analyzed indirect aid programs under the "purpose" and "effect" prongs of the Lemon test. Id. at 649–50.

Amdt1.3.4.1
Overview of Financial Assistance to Religion

In a few cases, the Supreme Court has considered the denial of financial assistance, and has held in those cases that the government did not violate the Establishment Clause either by imposing a generally applicable tax on a religious entity[8] or denying a tax exemption for religiously motivated activity.[9]

Amdt1.3.4.2 Early Cases on Financial Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court first recognized that the Establishment Clause applied to the states (through the Fourteenth Amendment) in 1947's Everson v. Board of Education.[1] Prior to Everson, the Court had issued only two decisions evaluating federal financial assistance to religious institutions.[2] Both took a fact-specific approach to evaluating the constitutional challenges in those cases rather than attempting to articulate a broader test, and both rejected the Establishment Clause challenges. Accordingly, these early cases, along with Everson, demonstrated that not all forms of government aid to religion violate the Establishment Clause.[3]

Everson thus was the Supreme Court's first significant modern attempt to elucidate the terms of the Establishment Clause.[4] The Court upheld a state program that reimbursed parents for bus fare to send their children to school, including children who attended parochial schools.[5] The Court largely declined to articulate a single test for courts to evaluate Establishment Clause challenges, although it did make some broad pronouncements about how to approach the Religion Clauses. For instance, in balancing the two Religion Clauses, the Court cautioned that in "protecting" citizens from "state-established churches," it did not want to "inadvertently prohibit [the state] from extending its general state law benefits to all its citizens without regard to their religious belief."[6] The Court said that the First Amendment "requires the state to be . . . neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and non-believers; it does not require the state to be their adversary."[7]

Applying these general principles, the Supreme Court said that the bus fare reimbursement program was constitutional.[8] Although it used "tax-raised funds" to help some

---

[8] Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Cal. Bd. of Equalization, 493 U.S. 378, 394 (1990).

[9] Hernandez v. Commissioner, 490 U.S. 680, 695 (1989); Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 604 n.30 (1983); see also Amdt1.3.4.5 Zelman and Indirect Assistance to Religion.

[1] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947). See also Amdt14.S1.4.2 Early Doctrine on Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[2] Quick Bear v. Leupp, 210 U.S. 50, 81–82 (1908) (concluding that a congressional appropriation of funds to religious schools did not violate the Establishment Clause where the appropriation involved the Rosebud Sioux Tribe's decisions about the use of its own money); Bradfield v. Roberts, 175 U.S. 291, 297–99 (1899) (concluding that a federal appropriation to expand a hospital owned by a religious order did not violate the Establishment Clause given the secular legal character of the corporation and Congress's secular goal to care for the sick).

[3] See, e.g., Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 679 (1971) (plurality opinion) ("The simplistic argument that every form of financial aid to church-sponsored activity violates the Religion Clauses was rejected long ago in Bradfield v. Roberts . . . ." (citation omitted)).

[4] See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947).

[5] Id. at 3.

[6] Id. at 16.

[7] Id. at 18.

[8] Id. at 17.

children "get to church schools," this was only "as a part of a general program" that paid "the fares of pupils attending public and other schools."[9] In the Court's view, the Establishment Clause did not require the state to "cut[ ] off church schools" from "general government services."[10]

Amdt1.3.4.3 Adoption of the Lemon Test

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The tripartite Establishment Clause test asking courts to look to purpose, effect, and entanglement is primarily associated with Lemon v. Kurtzman, decided in 1971.[1] However, the Supreme Court first compiled these three factors a year earlier, in Walz v. Tax Commission.[2] The Walz petitioners raised an Establishment Clause challenge to a state tax exemption for religious properties used solely for religious worship.[3] In upholding the exemption, the Court held first that its "legislative purpose" was "neither the advancement nor the inhibition of religion; . . . neither sponsorship nor hostility."[4] The state had granted the exemption not only to religious properties, but to "a broad class of property owned by nonprofit, quasi-public corporations" that the state considered to be "beneficial and stabilizing influences in community life."[5] The Court then considered whether the effect of the law was "an excessive government entanglement with religion."[6] The Court acknowledged that the exemption would create some entanglement by giving churches "an indirect economic benefit," but stated that the exemption entailed less government involvement than either taxing the churches or giving them a direct money subsidy.[7] As part of its analysis into whether the exemption impermissibly sponsored religion, the Court also emphasized widespread historical precedent for tax exemptions.[8] Ultimately, the Court ruled that the exemption created "only a minimal and remote involvement between church and state."[9]

In Lemon, the Supreme Court formally synthesized a three-part test for analyzing Establishment Clause challenges: to be constitutional, laws (1) "must have a secular legislative purpose;" (2) must have a "principal or primary effect . . . that neither advances nor

---

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 17–18. Somewhat similarly, the Supreme Court has held that states do not violate the Establishment Clause by providing unemployment benefits to individuals who are fired based on their unwillingness to work on the Sabbath, ruling instead that this accommodation of religious practices merely reflects government neutrality towards religion. Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136, 144–45 (1987); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 409 (1963). See also Thomas v. Review Bd. of Ind. Emp. Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 719–20 (1981) (reaching a similar conclusion with respect to an individual who was denied unemployment benefits after leaving his job because his newly assigned job responsibilities, producing armaments, violated his religious beliefs).

[1] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971).

[2] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 674 (1970). The Supreme Court looked to the first two Lemon factors, purpose and effect, prior to Walz. See Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon.

[3] Walz, 397 U.S. at 666–67.

[4] Id. at 672.

[5] Id. at 673.

[6] Id. at 674.

[7] Id. at 674–75.

[8] Id. at 676–78 (noting that all fifty states provided tax exemptions for places of worship at the time of decision, and noting examples from colonial times and early Congresses).

[9] Id. at 676.

inhibits religion . . .;" (3) and "must not foster 'an excessive government entanglement with religion.'"[10] The Court applied this test in Lemon to conclude that two state programs providing public funds to church-affiliated schools were unconstitutional because they created an excessive entanglement with religion.[11]

The first program provided supplemental payments to teachers in nonpublic schools.[12] The Court believed there was significant "danger that a teacher under religious control and discipline" could not separate "the religious from the purely secular aspects of . . . education."[13] Given this "potential for impermissible fostering of religion," the Court said that the state would have to ensure "that subsidized teachers do not inculcate religion"—and noted that the state had in fact imposed a number of restrictions on the use of state aid.[14] But in the Supreme Court's view, these restrictions created an "excessive and enduring entanglement between state and church" by requiring "a comprehensive, discriminating, and continuing state surveillance" of the religious schools.[15]

The second program considered in Lemon reimbursed nonpublic schools for purchasing certain secular educational services or textbooks.[16] The Court ruled this program unconstitutional for the same reasons as the first, noting that the program required the state to review reimbursements and required schools to use certain accounting procedures.[17] The Court said that the second program suffered from "the further defect of providing state financial aid directly to the church-related school."[18] This was particularly concerning to the Court because historically, programs involving "a continuing cash subsidy . . . have almost always been accompanied by varying measures of [government] control and surveillance."[19] The Court was also concerned about the "divisive political potential" and the relatively unprecedented nature of both programs, stating that these factors might suggest a danger of even greater government regulation of religious schools in the future.[20] [10] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971) (internal citation omitted) (quoting Walz, 397 U.S. at 674).

---

[11] Id. at 613–14.

[12] Id. at 606–07.

[13] Id. at 617.

[14] Id. at 619.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 607.

[17] Id. at 620–21.

[18] Id. at 621.

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 622–24. Two years later, however, the Supreme Court held that, with respect to the second program, the state could reimburse schools for services they had provided before the program was ruled unconstitutional, emphasizing the schools' reliance interests. Lemon v. Kurtzman (Lemon II), 411 U.S. 192, 201–03 (1973). But see New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 131, 133 (1977) (ruling unconstitutional a state law attempting to reimburse schools for expenses incurred in reliance on a law that the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional, noting that unlike in Lemon II, the "constitutional defect" in the law "lay in the payment itself, rather than in the process of its administration").

Amdt1.3.4.4 Application of the Lemon Test

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Since 1971, the Supreme Court has most frequently evaluated financial assistance to religious entities under the Lemon framework, notwithstanding its gradual disfavor and eventual "abandonment" of Lemon.[1] In a series of decisions issued during the 1970s, the Court applied these three factors to a series of programs offering funds to schools, holding some of those programs constitutional and others unconstitutional. The Court rejected Establishment Clause challenges to generally available aid programs that provided that funds could not be used "for sectarian purposes," concluding this type of restriction ensured the program would not have an unconstitutional effect of advancing religion under Lemon.[2] For example, in Tilton v. Richardson and Hunt v. McNair, the Court upheld programs that funded the construction or improvement of educational facilities, but expressly excluded facilities used for religious worship or instruction.[3] Further, in Tilton, the Court ruled that a provision that would have allowed federally funded facilities to revert to religious purposes after 20 years was unconstitutional.[4]

The Court also applied Lemon to disapprove of a number of financial aid programs in the 1970s.[5] In Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist and Levitt v. Committee for Public Education, the Supreme Court held that two state programs funding private schools violated the Establishment Clause because the programs lacked any measures to ensure that the funds would not be used for religious purposes.[6] In Nyquist, the Court considered a state law that, among other things, offered grants to private schools for facilities maintenance and repair.[7] The law did not "restrict payments . . . to the upkeep of facilities used exclusively for secular purposes," and would have, for example, allowed schools to use the funds for "the salaries of employees who maintain the school chapel, or the cost of renovating classrooms in which religion is taught."[8] Accordingly, the Court concluded that the program failed the effect prong of Lemon because it would "inevitably . . . subsidize and advance the religious mission of sectarian schools."[9]

Similarly, in Levitt, the Supreme Court held that a state program reimbursing religious schools for performing certain testing and recordkeeping services violated the Establishment

---

[1] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[2] Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works, 426 U.S. 736, 747 (1976) (plurality opinion) (upholding a state program offering grants to private institutions of higher education); id. at 767 (White, J., concurring in the judgment).

[3] Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 689 (1971) (plurality opinion) (upholding most of a federal program providing construction grants for educational facilities); Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 664 (1971) (White, J., concurring in the judgment in Tilton); Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 749 (1973) (upholding a state law authorizing the issuance of revenue bonds to a religious college for construction and improvement of certain nonsectarian facilities).

[4] Tilton, 403 U.S. at 683 (plurality opinion); id. at 692 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[5] New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 133 (1977); Sloan v. Lemon, 413 U.S. 825, 828 (1973); Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 783 (1973); Levitt v. Committee for Public Education, 413 U.S. 472, 482 (1973).

[6] Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 779–80; Levitt, 413 U.S. at 480.

[7] Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 774.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 779–80. See also Sloan, 413 U.S. at 828 (concluding that a state tuition reimbursement program was unconstitutional under Nyquist because there was "no constitutionally significant difference" between the programs in both cases).

Clause because "the aid that [would] be devoted to secular functions [was] not identifiable and separable from aid to sectarian activities."[10] The Court noted that the tests were prepared by "teachers under the authority of religious institutions" and ruled that there was an inherent risk of the test being used for "religious indoctrination."[11] Seven years after its decision in Levitt, the Supreme Court upheld a revised version of the same testing-reimbursement law.[12] The new law did not allow reimbursement for teacher-prepared tests and allowed states to audit payments.[13] The Court ruled that these new safeguards were sufficient to ensure "that the cash reimbursements would cover only secular services,"[14] and did not create an impermissible entanglement with religion.[15]

Starting in 1980, the Supreme Court almost uniformly rejected Establishment Clause challenges to financial aid provisions, finding a constitutional violation in only one case, discussed below.[16] The Court's analysis generally continued to focus on purpose, effect, and entanglement, although it occasionally referred more generally to a program's neutrality without explicitly citing Lemon.[17] Further, the Court began to move away from the separationist approach of Nyquist and Levitt, suggesting that financial aid programs might not have to prohibit expressly the religious use of funds in order to be ruled constitutional.[18] Indeed, the Supreme Court has rejected Establishment Clause challenges to a number of programs in part because they offer benefits broadly to both religious and nonreligious recipients.[19]

In Mueller v. Allen, the Supreme Court concluded that a state could allow individual tax deductions for tuition, textbooks, and transportation costs incurred in sending students to religious schools.[20] While the program disallowed deductions for instructional materials used

---

[10] Levitt, 413 U.S. at 480.

[11] Id. The state responded to the Supreme Court's decision in Levitt in part by attempting to allow schools to recover any expenses they had incurred in reliance on the law that the Court declared unconstitutional. New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 127 (1977). The Court held that these new payments were similarly unconstitutional because they did not "differ in any substantial way from those authorized" under the law it had already ruled unconstitutional. Id. at 131.

[12] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646, 657, 659 (1980).

[13] Id. at 652.

[14] Id. at 659.

[15] Id. at 660. The Court also rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a program that supplied testing and scoring services to nonpublic schools, but did "not authorize any payment to nonpublic school personnel," noting that the testing program was controlled entirely by the state. Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 240–41 (1977), partially overruled on other grounds by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).

[16] Tex. Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 5 (1989) (plurality opinion). Cf. Carson v. Makin, No. 20-1088, slip op. at 16–17 (U.S. June 21, 2022) (suggesting that a funding condition attempting to prevent religious uses of funds in an indirect aid program could "raise serious concerns about state entanglement with religion and denominational favoritism" by requiring scrutiny of "whether and how a religious school pursues its educational mission").

[17] See Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, No. 18-1195, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 30, 2020) ("[T]he Establishment Clause is not offended when religious observers and organizations benefit from neutral government programs."); Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 604 n.30 (1983) (rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to an IRS policy that extended tax exemptions only to nonprofit organizations that did not racially discriminate, noting that the policy had a neutral, secular basis).

[18] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 856 (2000) (O'Connor, J., concurring) ("Wolman and Levitt were both based on the same presumption that government aid will be used in the inculcation of religion that we have chosen not to apply to textbook lending programs and that we have more generally rejected in recent decisions."); see also Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 634–35 (1988) (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (arguing that the majority opinion "mark[ed] a sharp departure from" the Court's precedents, including Levitt).

[19] See Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388, 397 (1983); Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 610–11 (1988); see also Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 842 (1995) ("It does not violate the Establishment Clause for a public university to grant access to its facilities on a religion-neutral basis to a wide spectrum of student groups . . . .").

[20] Mueller, 463 U.S. at 402–03.

to "inculcate" religious tenets or doctrine,[21] the Court's analysis did not seem to turn on this restriction. The Court instead stressed, among other factors, that the tax deduction was "available for educational expenses incurred by all parents, including those whose children attend public schools and those whose children attend non-sectarian private schools or sectarian private schools."[22] Because the benefit was broadly available and neutral on its face with respect to religion, the Court believed that the program had a primarily secular effect and did not imply state endorsement of religion.[23]

The Court solidified this approach in Bowen v. Kendrick, upholding a federal grant program for adolescent health services even though it did not expressly prohibit the use of federal funds for religious purposes.[24] The Court noted that the statute made funds available to a wide variety of organizations and concluded that there was no evidence that a "significant proportion of the federal funds" would be given to religious institutions.[25] Further, the Court said that it would assume that even absent an express restriction on the religious use of funds, religious grantees could carry out the funded programs "in a lawful, secular manner."[26]

Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, however, illustrates the limits of the Supreme Court's favored approach of the 1980s. In Texas Monthly, the Court struck down a state tax exemption for periodicals distributed by a religious faith that consisted wholly of religious writings.[27] Justice William Brennan, writing for a plurality of the Court, concluded that this exemption failed the endorsement test.[28] He said that "when government directs a subsidy exclusively to religious organizations that is not required by the Free Exercise Clause," that conveys an impermissible message of "state sponsorship of religious belief."[29]

Amdt1.3.4.5 Zelman and Indirect Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has generally been more permissive of indirect financial aid programs, where the government does not give funds directly to religious organizations but gives them instead to third parties who make "genuinely independent and private choices" to support religious entities.[1] In such circumstances, the Court has not required the government to [21] Id. at 403.

[22] Id. at 397.

[23] Id.

[24] Bowen, 487 U.S. at 614.

[25] Id. at 608, 610.

[26] Id. at 612, 614.

[27] Tex. Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 5 (1989) (plurality opinion).

[28] Id. at 17.

[29] Id. at 15 (emphasis added). Justice Harry Blackmun, joined by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, agreed that the tax exemption violated the Establishment Clause because the state had "engaged in preferential support for the communication of religious messages." Id. at 28 (Blackmun, J., concurring).

[1] Witters v. Wash. Dep't of Servs. for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481, 487 (1986). Cf. Quick Bear v. Leupp, 210 U.S. 50, 81–82 (1908) (concluding a congressional appropriation of funds to religious schools did not violate the Establishment Clause where the appropriation involved the Rosebud Sioux Tribe's decisions about the use of its own money, suggesting that prohibiting private entities from "us[ing] their own money" to support religion would raise concerns under the Constitution's Free Exercise Clause).

include religious use restrictions.[2] Instead, where financial aid is provided to religious entities indirectly, the Court has said that such programs satisfy Lemon's effect prong even if the funds ultimately support religious activities—so long as the program is "neutral in all respects toward religion,"[3] particularly in the sense of using religiously neutral criteria to distribute aid.[4]

One 1973 case, Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, suggested that the Supreme Court might view at least some types of indirect aid programs with heightened scrutiny.[5] Nyquist struck down an indirect aid program that assisted only private schools, providing tuition reimbursements and tax benefits to parents.[6] With respect to the tuition reimbursements, the Court concluded that regardless of the fact that the funds were given to parents and not directly to schools, the program was still unconstitutional because "the effect of the aid is unmistakably to provide desired financial support for nonpublic, sectarian institutions."[7] The Court ruled that the tax benefits were similarly unconstitutional, saying that "in practical terms," there was little difference between the tuition grant and the tax benefits.[8]

In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, however, the Supreme Court suggested that indirect aid programs will generally satisfy Lemon, if they are "programs of true private choice."[9] Zelman rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a municipal program that offered "tuition aid" to parents with financial need who sought to enroll their children in schools in underperforming districts.[10] The parents could choose to use the tuition aid at religious or nonreligious private schools, as well as public schools.[11] The Court said that where the government program aided "a broad class of citizens" who then chose to "direct government aid to religious schools wholly as a result of their own genuine and independent private choice," any support for religion was "reasonably attributable to the individual recipient, not to the government, whose role ends with the disbursement of benefits."[12] Consequently, under the endorsement test, "no reasonable observer would think" that such a program "carries with it the imprimatur of government endorsement" of religion.[13]

Zelman distinguished but did not overrule Nyquist, saying "Nyquist does not govern neutral educational assistance programs that, like the program here, offer aid directly to a

[2] See, e.g., Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 649 (2002).

[3] Id. at 653.

[4] See, e.g., Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 838–39 (2000) (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[5] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 774 (1973).

[6] Id. at 762–67, 798. The case also involved direct grants to private schools for maintenance and repair costs, discussed Amdt1.3.4.4 Application of the Lemon Test. The Court noted that "all or practically all" of the schools eligible for the direct grants were Catholic, but that religious schools from other denominations and secular private schools were eligible for aid under the indirect aid provisions. Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 768 & n.23.

[7] Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 783. The Court held that a similar tuition reimbursement program violated the Establishment Clause in Sloan v. Lemon, 413 U.S. 825, 830 (1973), concluding that Nyquist mandated this outcome.

[8] Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 790–91. The Court distinguished Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664, 666–67 (1970), by noting, as one relevant factor, that the tax exemption in Walz "covered all property devoted to religious, educational, or charitable purposes," while the tax benefits in Nyquist "flow[ed] primarily to the parents of children attending sectarian, nonpublic schools." Nyquist, 413 U.S. at 794.

[9] Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 649 (2002).

[10] Id. at 646.

[11] Id. at 653. In its analysis, the Court noted that there was "no evidence" that parents did not have "genuine opportunities . . . to select secular educational options for their school-age children." Id. at 655. See also Witters v. Wash. Dep't of Servs. for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481, 489 (1986) (ruling that a state tuition aid program did not violate the Establishment Clause after noting that "nothing in the record indicates that . . . any significant portion of the aid expended under the Washington program as a whole will end up flowing to religious education").

[12] Zelman, 536 U.S. at 653.

[13] Id. at 655.

broad class of individual recipients defined without regard to religion."[14] The Court emphasized that the program in Nyquist provided benefits "exclusively to private schools," rather than providing benefits "generally without regard to the sectarian-nonsectarian, or public-nonpublic nature of the institution benefited."[15] Zelman thus seemed to leave open the question of whether an indirect aid program that was neutral towards religion on its face and supported both religious and secular private entities, but did not also aid public entities, would raise Establishment Clause concerns. However, the Supreme Court has more recently said that an Establishment Clause challenge to a state tax benefit program indirectly assisting only private schools would be "unavailing."[16] Accordingly, although the Supreme Court has never expressly overruled Nyquist, that case may now be narrowed to such a limited set of facts that the Court is unlikely to rely on it in future cases.

Further reinforcing Zelman, the Supreme Court has held that states do not violate the Establishment Clause by offering scholarship funds to students who may choose to use those funds at religious schools or for religious studies,[17] or by offering tax credits for donating to private organizations that granted scholarships to private schools.[18] To take one last example, the Supreme Court ruled that it did not violate the Establishment Clause for a public university to pay for the printing of a religious student publication in Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia.[19] The university generally offered funds to approved student groups.[20] The student groups chose how to use the funds, and the funds were given to the printer, rather than being paid directly to the religious student group.[21] Under the circumstances, the Court said it was not "plausible" that any religious speech supported with these funds would be attributed to the university.[22] The Court emphasized that the funds were available on a "religion-neutral basis" as part of a program that funded "secular services" such as printing.[23]

---

[14] Id. at 662.

[15] Id. at 661 (quoting Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 783 n.38 (1973) (internal quotation mark omitted)). See also, e.g., Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 819 n.8 (2000) (plurality opinion) (stating that Nyquist "involved serious concerns about whether the payments were truly neutral").

[16] Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, No. 18-1195, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 30, 2020).

[17] Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 719 (2004) (ruling that a state could have allowed state scholarship recipients to use scholarship funds to pursue degrees in devotional theology); Witters, 474 U.S. at 489 (ruling that a state could provide tuition aid to a visually impaired student studying religious subjects at a religious college). See also Carson v. Makin, No. 20-1088, slip op. at 10 (U.S. June 21, 2022) (ruling that a state could have allowed families to use tuition assistance payments at religious schools).

[18] Espinoza, slip op. at 7.

[19] Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 842 (1995).

[20] Id. at 823–24.

[21] Id. at 842.

[22] Id. at 841.

[23] Id. at 843–44. Seemingly illustrating the difference between direct aid and indirect aid, the Court cautioned that "if the State pays a church's bills it is subsidizing it, and we must guard against this abuse." Id. at 844. But the Court said that Rosenberger did not present this circumstance, in part because the university was paying "outside printers," attaining a "degree of separation from the student publication." Id.

Amdt1.3.4.6 Denying Financial Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Government decisions that refuse to grant a tax exemption may be viewed as a decision to deny financial aid. On that theory, religious entities have sometimes argued that the federal government's decision to deny them a tax exemption for religiously motivated actions violated the Establishment Clause where the exemption allegedly preferred certain religions.[1] The Supreme Court rejected the constitutional challenges in two such cases, noting that the federal government's tax laws were generally neutral in their purpose and effect, and that the challenged policies did not facially discriminate on the basis of religion.[2] In one of the cases, the Court further concluded that the decision to tax the church did not threaten an "excessive entanglement between church and state," even though the government would have to obtain certain information from religious entities to ascertain tax liability.[3] The Court described this as a "routine regulatory interaction" that did not require an impermissible inquiry "into religious doctrine" or entail "'detailed monitoring and close administrative contact' between secular and religious bodies."[4]

Entanglement was at the core of another Supreme Court opinion rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to a state's decision to impose generally applicable sales and use taxes on religious publications.[5] A religious organization that sold evangelical materials such as books and tapes sought an exemption from state tax liability, arguing that the state would violate Lemon's entanglement prong by taxing its materials.[6] The Supreme Court rejected this argument, saying that even if the law imposed accounting burdens on the organization, "such administrative and recordkeeping burdens do not rise to a constitutionally significant level."[7] Among other factors, the Court noted that the scheme did not require invasive surveillance or inspection of the organization's "day-to-day operations," and did not require the state "to inquire into the religious content of the items sold or the religious motivation for selling or purchasing the items."[8] The Court emphasized that materials were

---

[1] Hernandez v. Commissioner, 490 U.S. 680, 695 (1989) (arguing that by denying tax-deductible status to certain payments made to the Church of Scientology for services rendered, the federal government created "an unconstitutional denominational preference" by disfavoring religions that impose fixed costs for participating in religious practices); Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 604 n.30 (1983) (arguing that a federal policy denying tax-exempt status to schools that practice racial discrimination "preferr[ed] religions whose tenets do not require racial discrimination over those which believe racial intermixing is forbidden").

[2] Hernandez, 490 U.S. at 696; Bob Jones Univ., 461 U.S. at 604 n.30. Cf. Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 230, 246–47 (1982) (holding that a state statute imposing "registration and reporting requirements upon only those religious organizations that solicit more than fifty per cent of their funds from nonmembers" created a denominational preference, triggering strict scrutiny). For a more detailed discussion of Larson see Amdt1.3.6.5 Lemon's Entanglement Prong.

[3] Hernandez, 490 U.S. at 696.

[4] Id. at 696–97 (quoting Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 414 (1985)).

[5] Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Cal. Bd. of Equalization, 493 U.S. 378, 397 (1990).

[6] Id. at 382, 392. The organization's argument focused on Lemon's entanglement prong, but the Supreme Court also briefly considered the first two prongs of the Lemon test, ruling that "it is undeniable that a generally applicable tax has a secular purpose and neither advances nor inhibits religion, for the very essence of such a tax is that it is neutral and nondiscriminatory on questions of religious belief." Id. at 394.

[7] Id. at 394.

[8] Id. at 395–96.

"subject to the tax regardless of content or motive": the state cared only "whether there is a sale or a use, a question which involves only a secular determination."[9]

In Harris v. McRae, the Court considered a statute that even more directly denied financial assistance.[10] The Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to the Hyde Amendment, a law prohibiting federal funds from being used to fund certain abortions under the Medicaid program.[11] Challengers to the Hyde Amendment argued that this funding condition unconstitutionally "incorporate[d] into law the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church concerning the sinfulness of abortion and the time at which life commences."[12] The Supreme Court, however, concluded that the condition did not violate Lemon, saying the fact that the restriction "may coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church does not, without more, contravene the Establishment Clause."[13] In the Court's view, the Hyde Amendment was "as much a reflection of 'traditionalist' values towards abortion, as it [wa]s an embodiment of the views of any particular religion."[14]

Amdt1.3.5 Non-Financial Assistance to Religion

Amdt1.3.5.1 Overview of Non-Financial Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Apart from financial aid, the Supreme Court has recognized that other types of support for religion can violate the Establishment Clause.[1] Broadly considered, the Establishment Clause "forestalls compulsion by law of the acceptance of any creed or the practice of any form of worship."[2] Accordingly, for example, the Supreme Court has held invalid laws that required public schools to tailor their teachings to religious doctrine[3] or to conduct prayers,[4] as well as laws that created denominational preferences.[5] The Supreme Court has also, with varied outcomes, considered Establishment Clause challenges to government actions such as the

[9] Id. at 396.

[10] Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980).

[11] Id. at 302–03.

[12] Id. at 319.

[13] Id. at 319–20.

[14] Id. at 319.

[1] See generally, e.g., Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 15–16 (1947).

[2] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940).

[3] Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106–07 (1968).

[4] See Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 599 (1992); Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 424 (1962).

[5] E.g., Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 255 (1982); see generally, e.g., Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 450 (1971) ("[T]he Establishment Clause prohibits government from abandoning secular purposes in order to put an imprimatur on one religion, or on religion as such, or to favor the adherents of any sect or religious organization.").

sponsorship of monuments involving religious symbols,[6] the provision of textbooks, facilities, or other non-financial resources to religious schools,[7] and laws attempting to accommodate religiously motivated conduct.[8]

As discussed elsewhere, Establishment Clause challenges to financial aid cases have primarily been analyzed under Lemon v. Kurtzman or Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, distinguishing between direct and indirect aid.[9] The distinction between direct and indirect aid has not been as significant in evaluating non-financial aid.[10] Supreme Court cases involving non-financial support for religion have frequently employed Lemon's three-part inquiry into purpose, effect, and entanglement,[11] but have also used other types of inquiries, including looking for government endorsement or coercion, or considering historical practices.[12] By 2022, the Supreme Court said it had "abandoned Lemon and its endorsement test offshoot."[13] Instead, moving forward, the Court said the Establishment Clause "must be interpreted by 'reference to historical practices and understandings.'"[14] There are a greater number of cases that looked to historical traditions or coercion in the context of nonfinancial aid, as compared to financial aid cases.[15]

Amdt1.3.5.2 Early Cases on Non-Financial Assistance to Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Following 1947's Everson v. Board of Education,[1] the Supreme Court's early cases considering non-financial support for religion stressed general principles of neutrality towards

---

[6] Compare, e.g., Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 687 (1984) (concluding a city's Christmas display did not violate the Establishment Clause), with, e.g., Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41 (1980) (concluding a courthouse display of the Ten Commandments did violate the Establishment Clause).

[7] Compare, e.g., Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968) (rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to a textbook lending program), with, e.g., Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 210–11 (1948) (concluding a program allowing private religious teachers to teach religion in public schools violated the Establishment Clause).

[8] Compare, e.g., McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 452 (1961) (rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to laws prohibiting commercial activities on Sunday), with, e.g., Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703, 710 (1985) (concluding a law giving workers the right not to work on their chosen Sabbath violated the Establishment Clause).

[9] See Amdt1.3.4.1 Overview of Financial Assistance to Religion; Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971); Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002).

[10] See, e.g., Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 818 (2000) (plurality opinion) ("Whether one chooses to label this program 'direct' or 'indirect' is a rather arbitrary choice, one that does not further the constitutional analysis."); Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 250 (1975) (holding that "it would exalt form over substance" to rule an indirect aid program constitutional when the program was otherwise similar to a direct aid program the Court had previously ruled unconstitutional), partially overruled by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000). But cf. Zelman, 536 U.S. at 649, 652–53 (citing Mitchell as a case that recognized the distinction between direct aid programs and programs involving private choice).

[11] See Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong.

[12] See Amdt1.3.6.2 Overview of Lemon's Effect Prong.

[13] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[14] Id. at 23 (quoting Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 576 (2014)).

[15] See Amdt1.3.7.2 Coercion and Establishment Clause Doctrine; Amdt1.3.7.3 Establishment Clause and Historical Practices and Tradition.

[1] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 17 (1947). See Amdt1.3.4.2 Early Cases on Financial Assistance to Religion.

religion.[2] In Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, decided in 1948, the Court held that a program allowing private religious teachers to teach religion in public schools violated the "wall of separation between Church and State" referred to in Everson.[3] The Court raised concerns about "the use of tax-supported property for religious instruction and the close cooperation between the school authorities and the religious council in promoting religious education."[4] The school acted unconstitutionally by using "the State's compulsory public school machinery" to provide pupils for religious classes.[5]

Four years later, the Supreme Court concluded in Zorach v. Clauson that a different "released time" program allowing students to leave school grounds to receive religious instruction did not violate the Establishment Clause.[6] By contrast to the program invalidated in McCollum, the Zorach program "involve[d] neither religious instruction in public school classrooms nor the expenditure of public funds," and used no "coercion to get public school students into religious classrooms."[7] The Court said that while the First Amendment required the "complete and unequivocal" separation of church and state as to matters "within the scope of its coverage," it did not require separation "in every and all aspects."[8] Disallowing the public schools' accommodation of students' "religious needs," according to the Court, would have stretched the separation concept to an undesired "extreme[ ]."[9]

Also drawing on Everson, the Court's early cases sometimes reviewed "the background and environment of the period in which [the Establishment Clause] was fashioned and adopted" to analyze whether state laws would be consistent with the Founders' intent.[10] In Torcaso v. Watkins, the Supreme Court looked to colonial history with religious test oaths, and held that the "policy of probing religious beliefs by test oaths or limiting public offices to persons who have . . . a belief in some particular kind of religious concept" was "historically and constitutionally discredited."[11] The Court held that a state law requiring public officials to declare a "belief in the existence of God" violated the Establishment Clause because its "purpose" and "effect" was to put "the power and authority of the State . . . on the side of one particular sort of believers."[12] More broadly, the Court declared that the government cannot "pass laws or impose requirements which aid all religions as against non-believers," nor can it "aid those religions based on a belief in the existence of God as against those religions founded on different beliefs."[13]

---

[2] One pre-Everson case, Davis v. Beason upheld a state law barring those who practiced or advocated bigamy and polygamy from voting in the Idaho Territory. 133 U.S. 333, 345 (1890). The Court held that a state could prohibit practices that are "destructive of society," saying: "Whilst legislation for the establishment of a religion is forbidden, and its free exercise permitted, it does not follow that everything which may be so called can be tolerated." Id. See also Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 389–90 (1918) (summarily rejecting Establishment Clause challenge to draft law containing limited exemptions for ministers and members of certain religious sects); United States ex rel. Turner v. Williams, 194 U.S. 279, 292 (1904) (summarily rejecting Establishment Clause challenge to immigration law excluding noncitizens found to be anarchists).

[3] Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 210–11 (1948).

[4] Id. at 209.

[5] Id. at 212.

[6] Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 308, 312 (1952).

[7] Id. at 308–09, 311.

[8] Id. at 312.

[9] Id. at 313, 315.

[10] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947).

[11] Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 490–92, 494 (1961).

[12] Id. at 489, 495.

[13] Id. at 495.

In Engel v. Vitale, the Supreme Court looked to history again to hold unconstitutional a state law requiring a specified prayer to be recited at the beginning of a school day.[14] As part of its analysis, the Court noted that as "a matter of history[,] . . . this very practice of establishing governmentally composed prayers for religious services was one of the reasons which caused many of our early colonists to leave England and seek religious freedom in America."[15] The Court further reviewed post-Revolution movements to disestablish religion in the former colonies, concluding that when the First Amendment was adopted, "there was a widespread awareness among many Americans . . . . that one of the greatest dangers to the freedom of the individual to worship in his own way lay in the Government's placing its official stamp of approval upon one particular kind of prayer or one particular form of religious services."[16]

Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In the 1960s, the Court began to move away from the general neutrality principles embodied in the metaphor of a wall separating church and state, focusing more specifically on whether challenged laws had the purpose or effect of aiding religion.[1] To evaluate the constitutionality of state criminal laws prohibiting commercial activities on Sunday, McGowan v. Maryland reviewed "the history of Sunday Closing Laws."[2] That review led the Court to conclude that, although "the original laws which dealt with Sunday labor were motivated by religious forces," such laws had subsequently lost "some of their totally religious flavor."[3] Ultimately, the Court accepted the state's judgment "that the [challenged] statutes' present purpose and effect is not to aid religion but to set aside a day of rest and recreation."[4] The Court held that creating a common day of rest embodied a secular purpose, and emphasized that the statute allowed "nonlaboring persons" to engage in a variety of nonreligious Sunday activities.[5] However, the Court cautioned that a law might violate the Establishment Clause if "its purpose—evidenced either on the face of the legislation, in conjunction with its legislative history, or in its operative effect—is to use the State's coercive power to aid religion."[6]

Formalizing this focus on purpose and effect, School District of Abington Township v. Schempp clarified:

---

[14] Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 424 (1962).

[15] Id. at 425.

[16] Id. at 428–29.

[1] See, e.g., Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 489 (1961).

[2] McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 432 (1961).

[3] Id. at 432–34.

[4] Id. at 449. The Court employed a similar analysis to reject Establishment Clause challenges to Sunday Closing laws in three other opinions issued the same day as McGowan. Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market, Inc., 366 U.S. 617, 630 (1961) (plurality opinion); Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 601 (1961) (plurality opinion); Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v. McGinley, 366 U.S. 582, 598 (1961). Cf. Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703, 710 (1985) (holding that a state law giving workers the right not to work on their chosen Sabbath violated the Establishment Clause, given that the law's "primary effect" was to "impermissibly advance[ ] a particular religious practice").

[5] McGowan, 366 U.S. at 450–52.

[6] Id. at 453.

> The test may be stated as follows: what are the purpose and the primary effect of the enactment? If either is the advancement or inhibition of religion then the enactment exceeds the scope of legislative power as circumscribed by the Constitution. . . . [T]o withstand the strictures of the Establishment Clause there must be a secular legislative purpose and a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion.[7]

The Court applied this analysis in Schempp to hold that two states violated the Establishment Clause by requiring schools to begin the school day with Bible readings.[8] One of the states argued that the Bible readings served a secular purpose—promoting moral values and teaching literature.[9] The Court rejected this claim based on evidence showing that the reading was a religious exercise.[10]

Impermissible religious purpose arose again in Epperson v. Arkansas, in which the Supreme Court invalidated a state law that prohibited teaching evolution in school.[11] After reviewing the law's history, the Court said there was "no doubt" that the law prohibited "discussing the theory of evolution because it is contrary to the belief of some that the Book of Genesis must be the exclusive source of doctrine as to the origin of man."[12] This purpose of advancing a specific religious doctrine violated the First Amendment.[13] By contrast, the Court concluded that a federal law relieving conscientious objectors from military service did not violate the Establishment Clause, even though it included only objectors whose religious beliefs opposed all wars, excluding objectors opposed only to specific wars.[14] The Court believed that the law's differing treatment of religious objectors did not doom the law where it did not facially discriminate between religions, and critically, where the government had demonstrated that the law served a number of valid secular purposes.[15]

By contrast, the Supreme Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a textbook lending program in Board of Education v. Allen, applying the test outlined in Schempp.[16] The law required public schools to lend textbooks to students, including students enrolled at private schools.[17] The Court held that the law served a secular purpose—furthering childrens' "educational opportunities"—and that there was no evidence that the law had the effect of impermissibly advancing religion.[18] Among other factors, the Court noted that the textbooks

---

[7] Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 222 (1963).

[8] Id. at 223–24. The laws allowed individual students to opt out of the readings, but nonetheless required the schools to conduct the readings. Id. at 205, 211–12. See also Chamberlin v. Dade Cnty. Bd. of Pub. Instruction, 377 U.S. 402, 402 (1964) (per curiam) (holding that a similar state law was unconstitutional under Schempp); Wallace v. Jaffree, 466 U.S. 924, 924 (1984) (mem.) (affirming lower court ruling holding state law authorizing teacher-led prayer unconstitutional); Treen v. Karen B., 455 U.S. 913, 913 (1982) (mem.), aff'g 653 F.2d 897 (5th Cir. 1981) (ruling state law authorizing student-led prayer during class unconstitutional).

[9] Schempp, 374 U.S. at 223.

[10] Id. at 224. See also id. at 225 ("It certainly may be said that the Bible is worthy of study for its literary and historic qualities. Nothing we have said here indicates that such study of the Bible or of religion, when presented objectively as part of a secular program of education, may not be effected consistently with the First Amendment. But the exercises here do not fall into those categories.").

[11] Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106–07 (1968). See also Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 593 (1987) (ruling unconstitutional a state law prohibiting teaching evolution unless "creation science" was also taught, where the law's primary purpose was "to advance a particular religious belief").

[12] Epperson, 393 U.S. at 107.

[13] Id. at 106–07.

[14] Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 450 (1971).

[15] Id. at 452–54. See also id. at 452 ("[A] claimant alleging 'gerrymander' must be able to show the absence of a neutral, secular basis for the lines government has drawn.").

[16] Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 243 (1968).

[17] Id. at 239.

[18] Id. at 243–44.

were loaned to students, not parochial schools, and that the program included only secular textbooks.[19] Consequently, the Court concluded the program aided only the secular education conducted in religious schools, rejecting the idea "that the processes of secular and religious training are so intertwined that secular textbooks furnished to students . . . are in fact instrumental in the teaching of religion."[20]

Amdt1.3.6 Non-Financial Assistance to Religion and the Lemon Test

Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court's 1971 decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman further entrenched the Establishment Clause's focus on purpose and effect, and added a third element to the inquiry: entanglement.[1] Under Lemon, to be considered constitutional, laws (1) "must have a secular legislative purpose;" (2) must have a "principal or primary effect . . . that neither advances nor inhibits religion"; (3) and "must not foster 'an excessive government entanglement with religion.'"[2] However, the Court said in 2022 that it had "long ago abandoned Lemon and its endorsement test offshoot."[3] Nonetheless, it has not expressly overruled either Lemon or most other cases analyzing specific government actions by reference to purpose, effect, or entanglement—so the holdings of those cases remain binding in some courts.[4] Furthermore, even as the Court has shifted its doctrinal framework, over the years, it has sometimes given weight to the same kinds of facts or reasoning over those different frameworks. For those reasons, this essay explains the Court's Lemon jurisprudence in some detail.

The first Lemon factor focused on the purpose of a government policy.[5] According to the Supreme Court: "When the government acts with the ostensible and predominant purpose of advancing religion, it violates that central Establishment Clause value of official religious neutrality . . . ."[6] To determine a law's purpose, courts looked to the "text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute."[7] Accordingly, in ruling one government display of the Ten Commandments unconstitutional, the Supreme Court analyzed the history of the display and

---

[19] Id. at 243–45.

[20] Id. at 248. Subsequent Supreme Court cases approved of textbook lending programs deemed similar to the program upheld in Allen. See, e.g., Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 238 (1977); Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 359 (1975) (plurality opinion). Both Wolman and Meek were partially overruled on other grounds by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).

[1] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971). See also Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 674 (1970) (discussing entanglement as an aspect of the inquiry into a law's effect). Lemon is discussed in more detail in Amdt1.3.5.1 Overview of Non-Financial Assistance to Religion.

[2] Lemon, 403 U.S. at 612–13 (quoting Walz, 397 U.S. at 674).

[3] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022). See also Amdt1.3.6.6 Endorsement Variation on Lemon.

[4] See, e.g., Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484 (1989) (saying lower courts must follow Supreme Court precedent unless it has been specifically overruled by the Court, even if the precedent "appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions"). Some cases applying Lemon 's effect prong have been expressly overruled. See Amdt1.3.6.4 Lemon's Effect Prong and Pervasively Sectarian Institutions.

[5] Lemon, 403 U.S. at 612.

[6] McCreary Cnty. v. ACLU, 545 U.S. 844, 860 (2005).

[7] Id. at 862 (quoting Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 308 (2000)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

the county orders requiring the display, concluding that the original version had an "unmistakable" religious object, and that subsequent amendments to the display had failed to "cast off the objective so unmistakable in the earlier displays."[8]

It was relatively rare for the Supreme Court to find that a law failed Lemon's first factor, as it said a law would be unconstitutional "only when . . . there was no question that the statute or activity was motivated wholly by religious considerations."[9] Thus, the presence of "legitimate secular purposes" could outweigh potential religious purposes.[10] For example, the Court recognized supporting secular education[11] and protecting speech[12] as legitimate secular purposes. Further, to satisfy Lemon, the law's purpose did not have to "be unrelated to religion."[13] The Supreme Court has approved of laws that seek to accommodate religion, or to "alleviate significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions."[14] For example, in Wisconsin v. Yoder, the Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a state decision exempting the Amish from compulsory public education, saying "[t]he purpose and effect of such an exemption are not to support, favor, advance, or assist the Amish, but to allow their centuries-old religious society . . . to survive free from the heavy impediment compliance with the Wisconsin compulsory-education law would impose."[15]

However, the Court cautioned that the asserted secular purpose must "be genuine, not a sham, and not merely secondary to a religious objective."[16] The relevant inquiry was whether Congress "act[ed] with the intent of promoting a particular point of view in religious matters."[17] Thus, in one case, the Court ruled unconstitutional a state law relating to the teaching of "creation science," concluding that the law did not further its stated purpose of "academic freedom."[18] Instead, the Court believed that the evidence demonstrated that the primary purpose of the law "was to restructure the science curriculum to conform with a particular religious viewpoint."[19]

Two cases involving government displays of religious symbols further illustrate this first factor of the Lemon inquiry. First, in Stone v. Graham, the Supreme Court held that a state law requiring public schools to post a copy of the Ten Commandments in classrooms was unconstitutional because it had "no secular legislative purpose."[20] The Court said that the law's "avowed" secular purpose—displaying the Ten Commandments as part of "the fundamental legal code"—could not "blind" it to the law's "plainly religious" purpose.[21] Noting

---

[8] Id. at 869, 873. Cf. Kennedy, slip op. at 30 n.7 (concluding there was no "indelible taint of coercion by association" with prior prayer practices, and analyzing only the more recent prayer practices that it believed were the appropriate subject of the dispute).

[9] Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 680 (1984) (emphasis added). See also, e.g., Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 56 (1985) (ruling unconstitutional a state law authorizing a minute of silence for meditation or voluntary prayer in public schools because the law "had no secular purpose").

[10] See Lynch, 465 U.S. at 680–81.

[11] See, e.g., Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 240 (1977), partially overruled on other grounds by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).

[12] See, e.g., Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 248 (1990).

[13] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 335 (1987).

[14] Amos, 483 U.S. at 335; see also Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[15] Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 234 n.22 (1972).

[16] McCreary Cnty. v. ACLU, 545 U.S. 844, 864 (2005).

[17] Amos, 483 U.S. at 335.

[18] Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 586 (1987).

[19] Id. at 593.

[20] Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41 (1980).

[21] Id.

that the Ten Commandments were not "integrated into the school curriculum" in any "appropriate" field of study, the Court concluded that the only possible effect of the posting could be "to induce the schoolchildren to read, meditate upon, perhaps to venerate and obey, the Commandments," an impermissible religious objective.[22]

By contrast, in Lynch v. Donnelly, the Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a city's Christmas display, which included a crèche along with a number of other decorations such as reindeer, candy-striped poles, and a Christmas tree.[23] The Court said that under these circumstances, the city had stated "legitimate secular purposes": "to celebrate the Holiday and to depict the origins of that Holiday."[24] The religious nature of the crèche had to be viewed in the context of the whole display, and the Court concluded that there was "insufficient evidence to establish that the inclusion of the crèche is a purposeful or surreptitious effort to express some kind of subtle governmental advocacy of a particular religious message."[25]

Amdt1.3.6.2 Overview of Lemon's Effect Prong

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The second Lemon requirement was that a government policy must have a "principal or primary effect . . . that neither advances nor inhibits religion."[1] In 1997, the Supreme Court said it used "three primary criteria . . . to evaluate whether government aid has the effect of advancing religion:" looking to whether laws "result in governmental indoctrination; define [their] recipients by reference to religion; or create an excessive entanglement."[2]

The Supreme Court sometimes discussed the effect inquiry in terms of "incidental" or "indirect" benefits, saying that a policy will not have an impermissible effect if it only incidentally aids religion.[3] For example, the Court has characterized the textbook lending program in Board of Education v. Allen and the bus transportation program in Everson v. Board of Education as using "primarily secular means to accomplish a primarily secular end," aiding religion only indirectly, rather than as the "primary effect."[4] Similarly, the Court has said a law will not violate Lemon's effect prong "simply because it allows churches to advance

---

[22] Id. at 42. See also McCreary Cnty. v. ACLU, 545 U.S. 844, 868 (2005) (holding a courthouse display of the Ten Commandments violated the Establishment Clause, noting "two obvious similarities to" the Stone display: "both set out a text of the Commandments as distinct from any traditionally symbolic representation, and each stood alone, not part of an arguably secular display").

[23] Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 671 (1984).

[24] Id. at 681.

[25] Id. at 680.

[1] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612 (1971). For a discussion of Lemon's abandonment and the relevance of cases in this section, see Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong and Amdt1.3.6.6 Endorsement Variation on Lemon.

[2] Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 234 (1997).

[3] See, e.g., Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 683 (1984) (holding that a city's display of a crèche provided only an "indirect, remote, and incidental" benefit to religion); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 273–75 (1981) (holding that allowing student groups to use university facilities for religious activities offered only "incidental" benefits to religion). A government policy will also satisfy this prong if it has no effect on religion. Tony & Susan Alamo Found. v. Sec'y of Labor, 471 U.S. 290, 305 (1985) (rejecting Establishment Clause challenge to federal recordkeeping requirements that would apply only to certain commercial activities, with "no impact on petitioners' own evangelical activities or on individuals engaged in volunteer work for other religious organizations" (emphasis added)).

[4] Sch. Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 393 (1985) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 843–44 (1995) ("Any benefit to religion is incidental to the government's provision of secular [printing] services for secular purposes on a religion-neutral basis.").

religion."[5] Instead, to violate the effect prong, "it must be fair to say that the government itself has advanced religion through its own activities and influence."[6] Thus, one relevant concern is whether any aid to religion can be attributed to the government, rather than private parties.[7]

Generally, the Supreme Court has said that "government programs that neutrally provide benefits to a broad class of citizens defined without reference to religion are not readily subject to an Establishment Clause challenge just because sectarian institutions may also receive an attenuated financial benefit."[8] Thus, following the pre-Lemon precedent of Allen,[9] the Supreme Court rejected Establishment Clause challenges to school aid programs that were generally available to both religious and nonreligious recipients and supplied discrete secular services controlled by the state, including standardized testing services, speech and diagnostic health services, and off-site therapeutic and remedial services;[10] providing a sign-language interpreter;[11] and allowing religious groups to use school facilities.[12] However, as discussed in more detail elsewhere, the fact that a program is neutral in the sense of even distribution of benefits has not always been dispositive to the inquiry—particularly if the aid was not secular or if it was diverted to religious uses.[13]

Amdt1.3.6.3 Lemon's Effect Prong and Accommodation of Religion

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As under the purpose prong, the government may generally accommodate religious activity without violating Lemon's effect prong.[1] For example, in 1987, the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to a provision in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that exempted

---

[5] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 337 (1987).

[6] Id. The Court held in Amos that a federal statute exempting religious organizations from certain federal nondiscrimination requirements did not violate this principle, finding "no persuasive evidence . . . that the Church's ability to propagate its religious doctrine . . . is any greater now than it was prior to the passage of the relevant law." Id. Accordingly, the Court said "any advancement of religion" could not "be fairly attributed to the Government." Id.

[7] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 809 (2000) (plurality opinion).

[8] Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 8 (1993).

[9] Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968); see discussion in Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon.

[10] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 240–41, 244, 248 (1977), partially overruled on other grounds by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).

[11] Zobrest, 509 U.S. at 10.

[12] See Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 113 (2001) (holding elementary school would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing a religious club to use its facilities); Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 395 (1993) (holding school board would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing a church to use its facilities to show a religious film); Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 253 (1990) (holding that Congress could require public secondary schools, as a condition for federal funds, to grant equal access to student religious speech in forums); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 274 (1981) (holding university would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing religious groups to use its facilities on an equal basis as other student groups); see also Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause.

[13] See Amdt1.3.6.4 Lemon's Effect Prong and Pervasively Sectarian Institutions; Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 848–49 (2000) (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[1] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 334–35 (1987). See also Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 713–14 (2005). Cutter held that a federal law limiting the federal government's ability to restrict prisoners' religious freedoms was a permissible accommodation under the Establishment Clause. Id. at 720. However, the Court clarified that it did not resolve the case under Lemon's three-part test, but "on other grounds." Id. at 717 n.6. Its analysis relied primarily on prior Supreme Court precedent religious organizations from certain employment discrimination provisions.[2] While the Court acknowledged that the exemption "single[d] out religious entities for a benefit," it nonetheless concluded that the Establishment Clause allowed the accommodation, given that the government had "act[ed] with the proper purpose of lifting a regulation that burdens the exercise of religion."[3]

The Court has also warned, however, that "[a]t some point, accommodation may devolve into 'an unlawful fostering of religion.'"[4] Two years earlier, the Court had ruled unconstitutional a state law that barred employers from requiring employees to work on any day that the employee observed as the Sabbath.[5] By giving employees "an absolute and unqualified right not to work on whatever day they designate as their Sabbath," the Court said the law's "primary effect . . . impermissibly advance[d] a particular religious practice."[6] In implicit contrast to the Sunday Closing law approved in McGowan v. Maryland,[7] the law specifically referred to the "Sabbath," a religious term, and did not create a common day of rest.[8] This law granting an "unyielding weighting in favor of Sabbath observers" could be seen as an example of an impermissible accommodation.[9]

Two other examples further illustrate when laws crossed the line from permissible accommodation to impermissible advancement of religion.[10] In Larkin v. Grendel's Den, the Court held that a state law giving "churches and schools the power effectively to veto applications for liquor licenses within a 500-foot radius" violated the Establishment Clause.[11] According to the Court, the law had the impermissible effect of advancing religion: the veto power could be "employed for explicitly religious goals" and the "joint exercise of legislative authority . . . provide[d] a significant symbolic benefit to religion."[12] Similarly, in Board of Education of Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet, the Court said that a state had violated the Establishment Clause by drawing a school district that "divide[d] residents according to religious affiliation."[13] The Court believed that the inhabitants of the school district did not merely happen to be "united by common doctrine," but instead said that the state intentionally limited the district to a specific sect, giving that religious group "exclusive control of the political subdivision."[14] This went beyond the bounds of a permissible relating to religious accommodations. Id. at 720–24. For a discussion of Lemon's abandonment and the relevance of cases in this section that applied the Lemon test, see Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong and Amdt1.3.6.6 Endorsement Variation on Lemon.

---

[2] Amos, 483 U.S. at 329–30.

[3] Id. at 338.

[4] Id. at 334–35 (quoting Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136, 145 (1987)).

[5] Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703, 710–11 (1985).

[6] Id. at 709–10.

[7] McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 432 (1961); see Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon.

[8] See Caldor, Inc. v. Thornton, 464 A.2d 785, 792–93 (Conn. 1983).

[9] Estate of Thornton, 472 U.S. at 710; see also Bd. of Educ. of Kiryas Joel Village Sch. Dist. v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687, 725 (1994) (O'Connor, J., concurring) (giving Estate of Thornton as an example of "an accommodation" that violated the Establishment Clause).

[10] See, e.g., Grumet, 512 U.S. at 712 ("The question at the heart of these cases is: What may the government do, consistently with the Establishment Clause, to accommodate people's religious beliefs?").

[11] Larkin v. Grendel's Den, 459 U.S. 116, 117 (1982).

[12] Id. at 125–26.

[13] Grumet, 512 U.S. at 699 (plurality opinion); accord id. at 711 (Stevens, J., concurring).

[14] Id. at 698 (plurality opinion). See also id. ("[A] State may not delegate its civic authority to a group chosen according to a religious criterion.").

accommodation by "singl[ing] out a particular religious sect for special treatment"—the "unconstitutional delegation of political power."[15]

Amdt1.3.6.4 Lemon's Effect Prong and Pervasively Sectarian Institutions

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In a series of rulings that were eventually partially overturned, the Supreme Court suggested that providing certain secular materials or services to religious schools could violate Lemon's effect prong because of the pervasively religious character of the schools.[1] Thus, in Meek v. Pittenger and Wolman v. Walter, the Supreme Court concluded that programs providing instructional materials such as maps or laboratory equipment to nonpublic schools were unconstitutional.[2] The Court held in Meek that although the aid was "ostensibly limited to wholly neutral, secular instructional material and equipment," it would "inescapably result[ ] in the direct and substantial advancement of religious activity" because the schools' secular educational functions could not be separated from their predominantly religious activities.[3] In both cases, the Court emphasized that while the programs were open to all private schools, most of the private schools participating in the programs were religious.[4] Thus, the programs had "the unconstitutional primary effect of advancing religion because of the predominantly religious character of the schools" participating.[5] The Court recognized in Wolman that these rulings were in "tension" with Board of Education v. Allen, discussed elsewhere,[6] which had ruled that "secular" textbooks could be provided to religious schools in a way that served nonsectarian educational purposes.[7] That tension was ultimately resolved by Mitchell v. Helms, as discussed below.[8]

Building on the reasoning of Meek and Wolman, the Supreme Court also invalidated programs that offered secular education in private schools in School District v. Ball and Aguilar v. Felton.[9] Ball involved two state programs: a shared time program paying public school employees to teach supplemental classes at religious schools during the school day, and a community education program paying public and nonpublic teachers to lead various classes at religious schools after the school day.[10] For both programs, the Court emphasized the pervasive religious atmosphere in which the classes were being taught, saying there was "a substantial risk" that the religious messages conveyed by the school during its regular

---

[15] Id. at 706 (majority opinion).

[1] See, e.g., Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 412 (1985), overruled by Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997); Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 250–51 (1977), partially overruled by Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).

[2] Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 366 (1975); Wolman, 433 U.S. at 251. Wolman also held unconstitutional a provision of the state law that funded field trips, citing concerns about private schools' and teachers' control over such activities, but it upheld other kinds of aid that the state law provided. See id. at 253–54; 255.

[3] Meek, 421 U.S. at 365–66; accord Wolman, 433 U.S. at 250.

[4] Meek, 421 U.S. at 364; accord Wolman, 433 U.S. at 234.

[5] Meek, 421 U.S. at 363; accord Wolman, 433 U.S. at 250.

[6] Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968); see Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon.

[7] Wolman, 433 U.S. at 251 n.18; accord Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 835–36 (2000) (plurality opinion).

[8] See Mitchell, 530 U.S. at 835 (plurality opinion); id. at 837 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[9] Sch. Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 397 (1985); Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 414 (1985).

[10] Ball, 473 U.S. at 375–77.

activities would "infuse the supposedly secular classes."[11] Accordingly, the programs "entailed too great a risk of state-sponsored indoctrination."[12] Aguilar involved a federal law allowing federal funds to be used to pay public employees teaching in nonpublic schools.[13] Similar to Ball, the Court stressed the "pervasively sectarian environment" in which the program was being offered, although it ruled on Lemon's entanglement prong rather than the effect prong.[14]

The Court reconsidered the same federal program in Agostini v. Felton, overruling Aguilar and partially overruling Ball (with respect to the shared time program).[15] The Court said that its prior decisions had erred by assuming that the programs would inevitably result in state-sponsored indoctrination merely because the instruction happened on the premises of a pervasively sectarian school.[16] Instead, the Agostini Court emphasized that the federal law allocated public education services "on the basis of criteria that neither favor nor disfavor religion."[17] Ultimately, the Court approved the program because it did not violate "any of three primary criteria we currently use to evaluate whether government aid has the effect of advancing religion: it does not result in governmental indoctrination; define its recipients by reference to religion; or create an excessive entanglement."[18]

The 2000 decision Mitchell v. Helms revisited Meek and Wolman, reviewing a federal program authorizing public schools to lend secular materials purchased with federal funds to private schools.[19] The Supreme Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to the program and partially overruled Meek and Wolman in a split decision.[20] The four-Justice plurality opinion applied the "effects" criteria outlined in Agostini, ruling that the program was constitutional because it created no indoctrination attributable to the state and did not define the recipients by reference to religion.[21] For the plurality, the program was sufficiently neutral towards religion because it "offer[ed] aid on the same terms, without regard to religion, to all who adequately further [a legitimate secular] purpose."[22] Even if some aid were diverted to religious uses, the plurality would have held, those religious uses "cannot be attributed to the government and [are] thus not of constitutional concern."[23]

Concurring in the judgment, Justice Sandra Sandra Day O'Connor expressed concerns about the "unprecedented breadth" of the plurality's statements about neutrality and

---

[11] Id. at 387; accord id. at 388.

[12] Id. at 386. The Court also concluded that the programs impermissibly promoted religion under the endorsement test and that the programs "subsidize[d] the religious functions of the parochial schools by taking over a substantial portion of their responsibility for teaching secular subjects." Id. at 397. To state the latter rationale another way, the program relieved the schools "of an otherwise necessary cost" of providing a religious education. Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 12 (1993). These alternate grounds were also overruled, with respect to the shared time program, in Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 227–28 (1997).

[13] Aguilar, 473 U.S. at 404.

[14] Id. at 412–13 (expressing concern that "ongoing inspection" and "a permanent and pervasive state presence in the sectarian schools" would be required to ensure the funded teachers were not engaged in religious indoctrination).

[15] Agostini, 521 U.S. at 235. Thus, the Court did not overrule Ball's ruling on the community education program that funded private school teachers. See id.

[16] See id. at 223. See also Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 13 (1993) ("[T]he Establishment Clause lays down no absolute bar to the placing of a public employee in a sectarian school.").

[17] Agostini, 521 U.S. at 232.

[18] Id. at 234.

[19] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 802–03 (2000) (plurality opinion).

[20] See id. at 835; id. at 837 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[21] Id. at 808 (plurality opinion).

[22] Id. at 810.

[23] Id. at 820.

divertibility.[24] In her view, the federal program was constitutional not simply because aid was "distributed on the basis of neutral, secular criteria," but also because restrictions on the funds ensured that "religious schools reap[ed] no financial benefit," and because federal law required the supplied materials to be secular.[25] Justice O'Connor believed that whether the aid had been diverted to religious instruction was a relevant consideration, but concluded that any diversion in this case was "de minimis."[26] She agreed with the plurality opinion that Meek and Wolman erred in assuming without evidence "that secular instructional materials and equipment would be diverted to use for religious indoctrination."[27] For Justice O'Connor, while the mere possibility of diversion was insufficient to doom a program, the Establishment Clause did bar the actual diversion of government aid to religious uses.[28]

Accordingly, following Mitchell, the Supreme Court will not assume that government aid will be impermissibly used for religious activities under Lemon's effect prong merely because the recipient has a religious character.[29] Further, it appears that a majority of Justices agreed with Justice O'Connor that actual diversion of aid to religious indoctrination violates the Constitution.[30] Some lower courts have also recognized Justice O'Connor's approach to the neutrality inquiry as controlling.[31] It remains to be seen what effect the "abandonment" of Lemon will have on the analysis of aid that is used for religious indoctrination.[32]

Amdt1.3.6.5 Lemon's Entanglement Prong

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Under Lemon's "entanglement" prong, a law could create impermissible entanglement either through excessive government surveillance or through its divisive political potential.[1] The Court therefore struck down laws that would require "comprehensive, discriminating, and continuing" government supervision and control of religion,[2] or that impermissibly politicized religion.[3] However, contrary to the language in Lemon itself, the Supreme Court did not always

---

[24] Id. at 837–38 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[25] Id. at 848–49.

[26] Id. at 849.

[27] Id. at 851.

[28] Id. at 853; see also id. at 858 ("To establish a First Amendment violation, plaintiffs must prove that the aid in question actually is, or has been, used for religious purposes.").

[29] Id. at 828 (plurality opinion); id. at 851 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment).

[30] Id. at 853 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 890 (Souter, J., dissenting).

[31] Cmty. House, Inc. v. City of Boise, 490 F.3d 1041, 1058 (9th Cir. 2007); Columbia Union Coll. v. Oliver, 254 F.3d 496, 504 (4th Cir. 2001); DeStefano v. Emergency Hous. Grp., Inc., 247 F.3d 397, 419 (2d Cir. 2001); accord Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, No. 15-577, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 26, 2017) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting).

[32] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022). See also ArtI.S1.2.1 Origin of Limits on Federal Power.

[1] See Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 798–99 (1983) (Brennan, J., dissenting) (describing Lemon's entanglement prong as involving these two aspects). For a discussion of Lemon's abandonment and the relevance of cases in this section, see Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong and Amdt1.3.6.6 Endorsement Variation on Lemon.

[2] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 619 (1971). See also Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 675 (1970) (discussing unconstitutional government "surveillance").

[3] Lemon, 403 U.S. at 622 (pointing to "the divisive political potential of" the challenged programs and noting that "political division along religious lines was one of the principal evils against which the First Amendment was intended treat the entanglement prong of the Lemon test as a distinct inquiry.[4] Notably, the Supreme Court treated entanglement as an element of Lemon's effect prong in 1997's Agostini v. Felton.[5]

To violate the Establishment Clause under Lemon's third prong, an entanglement had to be "excessive," as some "[i]nteraction between church and state is inevitable."[6] The Court has sometimes noted that laws creating permissible accommodations have created "a more complete separation" between church and state, the opposite of a greater entanglement.[7] Further, the Court has concluded that relatively minor oversight or administrative burdens did not qualify as impermissible entanglement.[8] For example, the Court said applying the recordkeeping requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act to religious organizations did not create an excessive entanglement, emphasizing that the requirements applied only to certain commercial activities, with "no impact on petitioners' own evangelical activities or on individuals engaged in volunteer work for other religious organizations."[9] In another case, the Court concluded minor "custodial oversight" of religious groups, where the law prohibited greater government control or sponsorship of the groups' activities, did not violate the entanglement prong.[10]

By contrast, the Supreme Court said in Larkin v. Grendel's Den that a statute giving churches the power to veto liquor licenses for nearby businesses "enmeshe[d] churches in the exercise of substantial governmental powers contrary to our consistent interpretation of the Establishment Clause."[11] According to the Court, "few entanglements could be more offensive" than delegating "discretionary governmental powers" to religious groups.[12]

As discussed in more detail elsewhere,[13] the Supreme Court held in a few decisions in the 1970s and 1980s that providing certain secular materials or services to religious schools violated the effect and entanglement prongs of Lemon.[14] Notably, in Aguilar v. Felton, the Supreme Court said that a law allowing federal funds to be used to pay public employees teaching in nonpublic schools was unconstitutional "because the supervisory system established by the [implementing city would] inevitably result[ ] in the excessive entanglement of church and state."[15] The Court relied on the fact that the aid was "provided in a pervasively sectarian environment," and assumed that "because assistance is provided in the

---

to protect"); Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 253–54 (1982) (ruling that the challenged state laws impermissibly politicized religion, selectively imposing "burdens and advantages upon particular denominations").

[4] See, e.g., Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 233 (1997) ("[I]t is simplest to recognize why entanglement is significant and treat it—as we did in Walz—as an aspect of the inquiry into a statute's effect."); Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 674 (1970) ("We must . . . be sure that the end result—the effect—is not an excessive government entanglement with religion.").

[5] Agostini, 521 U.S. at 234.

[6] Id. at 233.

[7] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 339 (1987) (rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to a religious exemption from a federal nondiscrimination law); see also Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 253 (1990) (noting that prohibiting religious speech in school facilities "might well create greater entanglement problems in the form of invasive monitoring to prevent religious speech at meetings at which such speech might occur").

[8] See Mergens, 496 U.S. at 253; Tony & Susan Alamo Found. v. Sec'y of Labor, 471 U.S. 290, 305 (1985); Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 684 (1984).

[9] Tony & Susan Alamo Found., 471 U.S. at 305.

[10] Mergens, 496 U.S. at 253.

[11] Larkin v. Grendel's Den, 459 U.S. 116, 126 (1982).

[12] Id. at 127.

[13] See Amdt1.3.6.1 Lemon's Purpose Prong.

[14] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 258 (1977); Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 372 (1975).

[15] Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 409 (1985).

form of teachers, ongoing inspection is required to ensure the absence of a religious message."[16] However, these rulings were subsequently overruled.[17] The Supreme Court said it would "no longer presume that public employees will inculcate religion simply because they happen to be in a sectarian environment," and accordingly, would "also discard the assumption that pervasive monitoring of [the funded] teachers is required."[18]

Lemon relied in part on the "divisive political potential" of the school funding programs at issue in that case to find that there was an unconstitutional excessive entanglement.[19] However, the Court later suggested that "political divisiveness alone" is not enough "to invalidate otherwise permissible conduct,"[20] and further, that divisiveness may only be relevant in cases involving "direct subsid[ies]" to religious entities.[21] Notwithstanding these statements, in Larson v. Valente, decided in 1982, the Supreme Court held that a state statute imposing "registration and reporting requirements upon only those religious organizations that solicit more than fifty per cent of their funds from nonmembers" violated Lemon's entanglement prong because of its political divisiveness.[22] The opinion first ruled that the law created a denominational preference, triggering strict scrutiny.[23] But after concluding that the law failed strict scrutiny, the Court also went on to apply Lemon's three-part test.[24] The Court said that "the 'risk of politicizing religion'" was "obvious" in a law that selectively imposed burdens on "particular denominations."[25]

Amdt1.3.6.6 Endorsement Variation on Lemon

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Lynch v. Donnelly, issued in 1984, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested a "clarification" of Lemon.[1] She argued that the Court should ask whether a city's Christmas display had "endorsed Christianity," saying that the first and second prongs of the Lemon test relate to endorsement.[2] Justice O'Connor stated: "The purpose prong of the Lemon test asks

---

[16] Id. at 412.

[17] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 835 (2000) (plurality opinion) (partially overruling Meek and Wolman); id. at 837 (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment) (same); Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 235 (1997) (overruling Aguilar).

[18] Agostini, 521 U.S. at 234.

[19] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 621 (1971).

[20] Agostini, 521 U.S. at 233–34; Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 684 (1984). Cf. Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587–88 (1992) (stating that although divisiveness will not "necessarily invalidate[ ]" attempts to accommodate religion, the "potential for divisiveness" was "of particular relevance" in a case centering "around an overt religious exercise in a secondary school environment where . . . subtle coercive pressures exist and where the student had no real alternative which would have allowed her to avoid the fact or appearance of participation").

[21] Lynch, 465 U.S. at 684.

[22] Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 230, 253 (1982).

[23] Id. at 246–47.

[24] Id. at 251–52.

[25] Id. at 254 (quoting Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 695 (1970) (opinion of Harlan, J.)).

[1] Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 687 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring). Cf. Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271 n.10 (1981) (noting that by "creating a forum [for speech] the University does not thereby endorse or promote any of the particular ideas aired there"); Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 436 (1962) (holding that "the governmental endorsement of [a specific] prayer" was unconstitutional).

[2] Lynch, 465 U.S. at 690.

whether government's actual purpose is to endorse or disapprove of religion. The effect prong asks whether, irrespective of government's actual purpose, the practice under review in fact conveys a message of endorsement or disapproval."[3] In a later concurrence, Justice O'Connor stated that endorsement should be judged by whether a "reasonable observer" would think the government is endorsing religion.[4]

The Supreme Court as a whole employed this endorsement variation on Lemon in a number of cases.[5] For example, in cases involving non-financial aid to religious schools, the Court sometimes asked whether children or the larger community would perceive the challenged government support as an endorsement of religion.[6] Further, like Lynch v. Donnelly itself, some of the Court's Establishment Clause cases focusing on endorsement have involved government-sponsored displays or monuments involving religious symbols.[7] In Lynch, the Court upheld the display of a crèche as part of a set of holiday symbols, but in County of Allegheny v. ACLU, the Court held that a county violated the Establishment Clause by displaying a crèche by itself in a prominent position in a county building.[8] The Court held that the latter display "endorse[d] Christian doctrine."[9] Although there was a sign stating that the crèche was owned by a private religious organization, the Court said that under the circumstances, the sign showed only "that the government is endorsing the religious message of that organization."[10] Addressing a different kind of symbol in Capitol Square Review & Advisory Board v. Pinette, the Supreme Court ruled that a public body had not impermissibly endorsed religion when it allowed the Ku Klux Klan to set up a cross in a plaza that had been used as a public forum for a variety of speakers "for many, many years."[11] Given the context, the Court concluded that the cross would be seen as "private speech endorsing religion," and not attributed to the government.[12]

---

[3] Id.

[4] Allegheny Cnty. v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 630 (1989) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[5] See, e.g., Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 307–08 (2000) (holding that a school policy permitting student-led prayer at football games conveyed impermissible endorsement, noting the school's control over the delivery and content of the prayer); Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 585 (1987) (applying endorsement version of Lemon's purpose inquiry to hold unconstitutional a state law prohibiting teaching evolution unless "creation science" was also taught); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 56 (1985) (applying endorsement version of Lemon's purpose inquiry to hold unconstitutional a state law authorizing a minute of silence for meditation or voluntary prayer in public schools).

[6] Compare Sch. Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 390 (1985) (noting that "[t]he symbolism of a union between church and state is most likely to influence children of tender years"), partially overruled by Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997), with Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 250 (1990) (holding that secondary school students were "likely to understand" that a school did not endorse student speech that a federal law required it to host on a nondiscriminatory basis), and Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 395 (1993) (holding that there was "no realistic danger" that allowing a private group to use school facilities for religious activities outside of school hours would be perceived as an endorsement), and Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 113 (2001) (same).

[7] See Lynch, 465 U.S. at 687 (rejecting Establishment Clause challenge to municipal Christmas display that included a crèche).

[8] Cnty. of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 601 (1989).

[9] Id. at 598–99, 601.

[10] Id. at 600. Similar to Lynch, the Court in County of Allegheny upheld the county's separate display of a menorah "stand[ing] next to a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty." Id. at 614 (opinion of Blackmun, J.). Justice Harry Blackmun and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor separately concluded that the display conveyed an essentially secular message of pluralism in the context of winter holidays. Id. at 616 (Blackmun, J., concurring); id. at 635 (O'Connor, J., concurring). Justice Anthony Kennedy would have allowed the display where he found no evidence of coercion or proselytization. Id. at 663–64 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part).

[11] Capitol Square Review & Advisory Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753, 766 (1995) (plurality opinion); see also id. at 772 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (agreeing that the display did not violate the endorsement test).

[12] Capitol Square Review & Advisory Bd., 515 U.S. at 765 (plurality opinion); accord id. at 774 (O'Connor, J., concurring). See also Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause. In Salazar v. Buono, the Supreme Court somewhat similarly considered whether a federal district court had properly prevented the federal

Amdt1.3.7 Non-Financial Assistance to Religion and Non-Lemon Tests

Amdt1.3.7.1 Abandonment of the Lemon Test

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court did not generally apply Lemon rigidly, and two years after the decision, the Court described its three factors—purpose, effect, and entanglement—as "helpful signposts" in the Establishment Clause inquiry.[1] These three factors were also part of Establishment Clause jurisprudence before Lemon.[2] Since at least the early 1990s, however, the Supreme Court faced calls to reconsider Lemon.[3] While some opinions in the beginning of the 2000s continued to use the Lemon factors or variations on that test as their primary mode of analysis,[4] the Court ultimately said Lemon was "abandoned" in a 2022 opinion.[5]

The Court's 2019 decision in American Legion v. American Humanist Association had already limited Lemon's applicability, suggesting that in the future, it would not apply Lemon to evaluate "longstanding monuments, symbols, and practices."[6] Instead, a plurality of the Court said such practices should instead be considered constitutional so long as they "follow in" a historical "tradition" of religious accommodation.[7] In 2022's Kennedy v. Bremerton School District, the Court said it had "long ago abandoned Lemon and its endorsement test offshoot," citing portions of American Legion that discussed a number of earlier cases in which the Court did not apply Lemon.[8] Instead, moving forward, the Court said the Establishment Clause "must be interpreted by 'reference to historical practices and understandings.'"[9] The analysis government from transferring control of public land containing a Latin cross that was erected by a private group as a World War I memorial. 559 U.S. 700, 705–06 (2010) (plurality opinion). The lower court had initially ruled that the monument conveyed impermissible endorsement, and then further concluded that transferring the land was not a permissible way to remedy this constitutional violation. Id. at 708–11. A three-Justice plurality suggested that the memorial was consistent with the Establishment Clause, and concluded that the district court had erred by viewing Congress's "policy of accommodation" as embodying "an illicit governmental purpose." Id. at 717–19. Two other Justices would have reversed the ruling on standing grounds. Id. at 729 (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment).

---

[1] Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 741 (1973); see also Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971).

[2] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 335 (1987).

[3] See Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587 (1992) ("[W]e do not accept the invitation of petitioners and amicus the United States to reconsider our decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman . . . ."); see also McCreary Cnty. v. ACLU, 545 U.S. 844, 861 (2005) ("[T]he Counties ask us to abandon Lemon's purpose test, or at least to truncate any enquiry into purpose here.").

[4] See Salazar v. Buono, 559 U.S. 700, 705–06 (2010) (plurality opinion) (analyzing the constitutionality of a Latin cross war memorial using the endorsement test); McCreary Cnty. v. ACLU, 545 U.S. 844, 859–60 (2005) (reaffirming the use of the Lemon test in analyzing the constitutionality of a Ten Commandments display, particularly the purpose prong).

[5] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[6] Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 16, 25 (U.S. June 20, 2019) (plurality opinion). See also id. at 6 (Thomas, J., concurring in judgment) (stating that he "would take the logical next step and overrule the Lemon test in all contexts"). Some Justices had previously written that Lemon should not apply to monuments, but had not gathered a majority coalition for such a holding. See Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 686 (2005) (plurality opinion) (saying that Lemon was "not useful" to analyze a "passive monument," and that its analysis was instead "driven both by the nature of the monument and by our Nation's history"); Allegheny Cnty. v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 595 (1989) (opinion of Blackmun, J.) (stating that the endorsement test "provide[d] a sound analytical framework for evaluating governmental use of religious symbols").

[7] Am. Legion, slip op. at 28.

[8] Kennedy, No. 21-418, slip op. at 22; Am. Legion, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 13.

[9] Kennedy, slip op. at 23 (quoting Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 576 (2014)).

in Kennedy itself referred to the Court's prior cases on coercion, suggesting that will also provide an appropriate mode of analysis in the future.[10]

Amdt1.3.7.2 Coercion and Establishment Clause Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Particularly in the context of government-sponsored prayer practices, the Supreme Court has sometimes evaluated Establishment Clause challenges by looking for impermissible government coercion.[1] Although the Court has said the Establishment Clause is concerned with many aspects of the relationship between government and religion,[2] "at a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise."[3]

The Supreme Court has accordingly held that the government violates the Establishment Clause where there is coercion, including "indirect coercive pressure."[4] In Engel v. Vitale, the Court clarified that a law requiring a specific prayer to be recited in schools was unconstitutional even though participation was voluntary, in the sense that students could opt out.[5] Similarly, in Lee v. Weisman, the Court held that a high school violated the Establishment Clause with its involvement in prayers at high school graduations.[6] The school had "decided that an invocation and a benediction should be given," chosen "the religious participant" to give that invocation, and offered guidelines directing the content of the prayers.[7] The Court's opinion stressed the "heightened concerns with . . . subtle coercive pressure in the elementary and secondary public schools."[8] Under the circumstances, the Court said that "the dissenter of high school age" would have "a reasonable perception that she is being forced by the State to pray in a manner her conscience will not allow."[9] In Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, the Court again held that a school policy permitting student-led prayer at football games created impermissible coercion.[10] Although many students could freely choose whether to attend games, the delivery of a pregame prayer "over the school's public address system, by a speaker representing the student body, under the supervision of school faculty, and pursuant to

---

[10] Id. at 24–30.

[1] See, e.g., Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 310 (2000).

[2] Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 431 (1962).

[3] Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587 (1992).

[4] Id. at 430–311. Cf., e.g., Allegheny Cnty. v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 659–60 (1989) (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (giving examples of impermissible coercion as including "taxation to supply the substantial benefits that would sustain a state-established faith, direct compulsion to observance, or governmental exhortation to religiosity that amounts in fact to proselytizing").

[5] Engel, 370 U.S. at 433.

[6] Lee, 505 U.S. at 587.

[7] Id. at 587–88.

[8] Id. at 592.

[9] Id. at 593. The dissent disagreed with analysis, saying courts should interpret the Establishment Clause by reference to historical practices of coercion rather than "psychological coercion." Id. at 631–32 (Scalia, J., dissenting). Justice Clarence Thomas has continued to assert this criticism, arguing that the Establishment Clause is violated only by legal coercion, Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 693 (2005) (Thomas, J., concurring), effected "by force of law and threat of penalty," Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 49 (2004) (Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment) (quoting Lee, 505 U.S. at 640 (Scalia, J., dissenting)).

[10] Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 310 (2000).

a school policy that explicitly and implicitly encourages public prayer" nonetheless had "the improper effect of coercing those present to participate in an act of religious worship."[11]

The Supreme Court has reached different conclusions with respect to policies involving adults. For example, in Lee, the Supreme Court distinguished a prior case that rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to prayers at state legislative sessions, noting the "obvious differences" between a session "where adults are free to enter and leave" and a graduation ceremony, "the one school event most important for the student to attend."[12] Further, in a case where parents chose whether or not to allow their students to attend the meetings of a private religious club, the Supreme Court held that the school would not create impermissible coercion merely by allowing the meetings to occur on school premises after school hours.[13]

In Kennedy v. Bremerton School District, the Court considered whether a school would have violated the Establishment Clause by allowing a football coach to pray at the fifty yard line immediately after football games.[14] The school argued that the coach impermissibly coerced students to join his prayers, noting that the coach had previously led students in prayer before games and conducted overtly religious inspirational talks after games, and some students felt pressured to participate in the earlier prayers.[15] The Court concluded those arguments were not relevant because the school's disciplinary action against the coach focused on later instances when the coach "did not seek to direct any prayers to students."[16] In comparison to Santa Fe, the Court concluded that the coach's prayers "were not publicly broadcast or recited to a captive audience," and students were not "expected to participate."[17] People who saw or heard his prayers on the 50-yard line could be offended, but not coerced, in the Court's view.[18] The Court further said that the school could not require teachers to "eschew any visible religious expression," because that would impermissibly "preference secular activity."[19]

More broadly, Kennedy said that in the future, courts should evaluate Establishment Clause challenges "by 'reference to historical practices and understandings.'"[20] The Supreme Court acknowledged that while coercion "was among the foremost hallmarks of religious establishments the framers sought to prohibit when they adopted the First Amendment," the Justices "have sometimes disagreed on what exactly qualifies as impermissible coercion in light of the original meaning of the Establishment Clause."[21] The Court did not expressly resolve those open disputes, ruling instead that in Kennedy, the coach's "private religious

---

[11] Id. at 310, 312.

[12] Lee, 505 U.S. at 596–97 (discussing Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)). See also Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 590 (2014) (plurality opinion) ("[I]n the general course legislative bodies do not engage in impermissible coercion merely by exposing constituents to prayer they would rather not hear and in which they need not participate."); see also id. at 591 ("The inclusion of a brief, ceremonial prayer as part of a larger exercise in civic recognition suggests that its purpose and effect are to acknowledge religious leaders . . . rather than to exclude or coerce nonbelievers.").

[13] Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 115–16 (2001)

[14] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 20 (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[15] Id. at 26–27; id. at 4–5, 18 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting).

[16] Id. at 26.

[17] Id. at 30.

[18] Id. at 26–27.

[19] Id. at 28.

[20] Id. at 23 (quoting Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 576 (2014)).

[21] Id. at 25.

exercise did not come close to crossing any line one might imagine separating protected private expression from impermissible government coercion."[22]

Amdt1.3.7.3 Establishment Clause and Historical Practices and Tradition

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As previously discussed, the Supreme Court has long evaluated Establishment Clause challenges in part by reference to historical understandings of the Clause.[1] That mode of analysis did not disappear after the Court's decision in Lemon,[2] and eventually became the Court's primary mode of analysis, as further discussed below.[3] However, while earlier cases largely relied on history to rule government actions unconstitutional, post-Lemon cases largely pointed to historical tradition to uphold government actions that the Court saw as permissible accommodations of religion.[4] For example, in an opinion rejecting an Establishment Clause challenge to a city's Christmas display, the Court noted the "unbroken history of official acknowledgment by all three branches of government of the role of religion in American life from at least 1789."[5]

In the 2019 decision American Legion v. American Humanist Association, a split majority of the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to a Latin Cross erected as a World War I memorial.[6] The plurality opinion (with some support from Justice Clarence Thomas, concurring in the judgment) stated that "longstanding monuments, symbols, and practices" should not be evaluated under Lemon 's tripartite analysis, but should instead be considered constitutional so long as they "follow in" a historical "tradition" of religious accommodation.[7] A majority of the Court acknowledged that the cross was a Christian symbol, but decided that "the symbol took on an added secular meaning when used in World War I memorials."[8] Among other factors, the Court emphasized that the monument had "stood undisturbed for nearly a century" and had "acquired historical importance" to the community.[9] Consequently, the Court

---

[22] Id. Cf. id. at 30 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (arguing that the Court's opinion focused on direct coercion and did not account for earlier Supreme Court precedent recognizing that "indirect coercion may [also] raise serious establishment concerns").

[1] See Amdt1.3.5.2 Early Cases on Non-Financial Assistance to Religion.

[2] See, e.g., Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 673 (1984) ("The Court's interpretation of the Establishment Clause has comported with what history reveals was the contemporaneous understanding of its guarantees.").

[3] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 23 (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[4] Compare, e.g., Lynch, 465 U.S. at 681 (upholding a Christmas display that "depict[ed] the historical origins" of the event, consistent with prior accommodations taking "note of a significant historical religious event"), and Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677, 686 (2005) (plurality opinion) (citing Lynch and looking to "our Nation's history" and factual context to uphold a Ten Commandments monument on the grounds of the Texas State Capitol), with, e.g., Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 429–30 (1962) (holding a school prayer practice was contrary to Founding Era history), and Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 491–92 (1961) (invalidating a religious test oath after concluding history "discredited such oaths").

[5] Lynch, 465 U.S. at 674.

[6] Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 28 (U.S. June 20, 2019).

[7] Id. at 16, 25, 28 (plurality opinion). See also id. at 6 (Thomas, J., concurring in judgment) (agreeing with the plurality opinion rejecting Lemon's "relevance" to certain claims but saying that he "would take the logical next step and overrule the Lemon test in all contexts").

[8] Id. at 28.

[9] Id. at 28, 31.

concluded that "destroying or defacing the Cross . . . would not be neutral and would not further the ideals of respect and tolerance embodied in the First Amendment."[10]

The Supreme Court had previously applied an analysis looking to historical traditions in two cases involving prayer at state and local legislative sessions.[11] In 1983's Marsh v. Chambers, the Court noted that "opening . . . sessions of legislative and other deliberative public bodies with prayer is deeply embedded in the history and tradition of this country."[12] It upheld the state's prayer practice after concluding that the public employment of the legislative chaplain and the "Judeo-Christian" nature of the prayers were consistent with historical practices, given that "there [was] no indication that the prayer opportunity ha[d] been exploited to proselytize or advance any one, or to disparage any other, faith or belief."[13] The Supreme Court engaged in a similar analysis in 2014's Town of Greece v. Galloway, ruling that a municipality's challenged prayer practices "fit[ ] within the tradition long followed in Congress and the state legislatures."[14] The Court rejected an argument that the prayers should be considered unconstitutional because they were identified with a single religion, saying that some of the early prayers during congressional sessions had a "decidedly Christian nature."[15] These legislative prayer cases were presumably encompassed in the American Legion plurality's reference to "longstanding . . . practices,"[16] although future cases will have to elucidate what other government activities may be described by that phrase.

In 2022's Kennedy v. Bremerton School District, the Court ruled definitively that "the Establishment Clause must be interpreted by 'reference to historical practices and understandings.'"[17] While the Court's opinion said Establishment Clause analysis should focus "on original meaning and history,"[18] its own analysis of the school prayer practice at issue in that case proceeded by looking to prior cases on coercion.[19] Apart from stating generally that coercion was part of "a historically sensitive understanding" of the Clause, the Court did not look to evidence of original meaning or Founding-era history relevant to the specific disputed practice.[20] Accordingly, the opinion left open a number of questions regarding how to analyze any disputed government action by reference to historical tradition.

---

[10] Id. at 31.

[11] Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 591–92 (2014); Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 793 (1983).

[12] Marsh, 463 U.S. at 786.

[13] Id. at 793–95.

[14] Town of Greece, 572 U.S. at 577.

[15] Id. at 578–79. See also id. at 583–84 (looking to prayers offered to Congress to "discern . . . a commonality of theme and tone" and concluding that "[t]he prayers delivered in the town of Greece do not fall outside the tradition this Court has recognized").

[16] See Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 16 (U.S. June 20, 2019) (plurality opinion).

[17] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 23 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (quoting Town of Greece v. Galloway, 572 U.S. 565, 576 (2014)).

[18] Id. at 24.

[19] See id. at 24–30. The coercion analysis in the case is discussed in Amdt1.3.7.2 Coercion and Establishment Clause Doctrine.

[20] See id. at 25.

Amdt1.4 Free Exercise Clause

Amdt1.4.1 Overview of Free Exercise Clause

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause forbids Congress from "prohibiting the free exercise" of religion.[1] The general framework for the Supreme Court's Free Exercise jurisprudence was largely established in the 1940 case Cantwell v. Connecticut, which also gave the Supreme Court the opportunity to apply the Free Exercise Clause to the states.[2] In Cantwell, the Court explained that the Religion Clauses "embrace[ ] two concepts,—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute but, in the nature of things, the second cannot be."[3] Starting with the first freedom, as explored in more detail in a subsequent essay,[4] the Free Exercise Clause "categorically prohibits government from regulating, prohibiting, or rewarding religious beliefs as such."[5]

The Court also clarified in Cantwell that religious actions, as opposed to beliefs, are "subject to regulation for the protection of society."[6] However, the Court cautioned that the government must exercise its regulatory power cautiously so it does not "unduly . . . infringe" religious freedom.[7] Therefore, a law that burdens but does not directly regulate religious belief is not categorically prohibited but will likely still be subject to constitutional scrutiny. Over the years, the Court has fleshed out standards to determine when regulations of religious conduct unduly infringe constitutionally protected free exercise. These standards have differed over time and circumstances, as discussed in the following essays.

The prevailing standard governing most laws was established in 1990's Employment Division v. Smith, in which the Supreme Court ruled that "the right of free exercise does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a 'valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes (or prescribes) conduct that his religion prescribes (or proscribes).'"[8] This statement echoed early, pre-Cantwell cases involving free exercise challenges to criminal laws prohibiting polygamy in U.S. territories.[9] In these cases,

---

[1] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[2] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940) (holding that the Free Exercise Clause had been incorporated against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment); Hamilton v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 293 U.S. 245, 262 (1934) (holding that the "'liberty' protected by the due process clause" of the Fourteenth Amendment includes the right to hold and teach certain religious beliefs). See also Amdt14.S1.4.2 Early Doctrine on Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[3] Cantwell, 310 U.S. at 303–04. See also Sause v. Bauer, No. 17-742, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 28, 2018) ("Prayer unquestionably constitutes the 'exercise' of religion. At the same time, there are clearly circumstances in which a police officer may lawfully prevent a person from praying at a particular time and place.");

[4] Amdt1.4.2 Laws Regulating Religious Belief.

[5] McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 626 (1978) (plurality opinion).

[6] Cantwell, 310 U.S. at 304. See also Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 603–04 (1961) (plurality opinion) ("[L]egislative power . . . may reach people's actions when they are found to be in violation of important social duties or subversive of good order, even when the actions are demanded by one's religion."); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403 (1963) (noting that the government may regulate religiously motivated actions under otherwise valid laws that protect "public safety, peace or order").

[7] Cantwell, 310 U.S. at 304.

[8] See Emp. Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 879 (1990) (quoting United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 263 n.3 (1982) (Stevens, J., concurring)).

[9] Late Corp. of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890) [hereinafter LDS]; Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890); Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1845). LDS and Davis involved laws attaching the Supreme Court rejected the challenges brought by those who practiced religiously motivated polygamy, holding that the government could permissibly prohibit polygamy and the defendants' religious beliefs could not excuse them from punishment.[10] Similarly, early cases rejected the idea that conscientious objectors had a constitutional right "to avoid bearing arms," in light of Congress's broad war powers authority.[11] Although Smith hearkened back to these earlier cases,[12] the opinion's lenient standard of constitutional scrutiny departed from some cases in the mid-twentieth century that had suggested the government needed a compelling interest to apply a facially neutral law in a way that burdened a person's religious activity.[13]

Even after Smith, though, a law that imposes special burdens on religious activities may not be considered neutral or generally applicable and will likely trigger heightened scrutiny.[14] Accordingly, one critical factor in evaluating Free Exercise Clause challenges has been whether a law discriminates against religion in its text, purpose, or effect.[15] As one opinion cautioned, "[i]f the purpose or effect of a law is to impede the observance of one or all religions or is to discriminate invidiously between religions, that law is constitutionally invalid even though the burden may be characterized as being only indirect."[16]

Although it has not always been an explicit part of its analysis, the Supreme Court has suggested in some decisions that a government policy does not violate the Free Exercise Clause unless it has some coercive effect towards a person's religious exercise.[17] While recognizing that "indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion, not just outright prohibitions," may violate the First Amendment, the Court has further clarified that "incidental effects of government programs" with "no tendency to coerce individuals into acting contrary to their religious beliefs" do not trigger heightened constitutional scrutiny.[18] For example, the Court rejected a free exercise challenge to a program that allowed public schools to release students during the school day to take religious classes at private religious institutions.[19] The program did not involve any free exercise issue, in the Court's view, because it did not involve coercion: no one was "forced to go to the religious classroom and no religious legal consequences to the criminal practice of polygamy: a business's dissolution and a person's disenfranchisement. Cf. Cleveland v. United States, 329 U.S. 14, 20 (1946) (concluding that religious motivation did not negate criminal intent in polygamy prosecution); Miles v. United States, 103 U.S. 304, 310–11 (1880) (holding that because religion was not a defense to a polygamy prosecution, the constitutional rights of a juror in a bigamy trial "could not" be violated by inquiring "whether he himself was living in polygamy, and whether he believed it to be in accordance with the divine will and command").

---

[10] LDS, 136 U.S. at 50; Davis, 133 U.S. at 341–42; Reynolds, 98 U.S. at 166. In Reynolds, the Court looked to the long historical precedent of laws prohibiting polygamy. Id. at 164–66. In the other two cases, the Court appeared to take a more normative approach, saying that to call advocating polygamy "a tenet of religion is to offend the common sense of mankind," Davis, 133 U.S. at 341–42, and describing the religious belief in the practice of polygamy a "pretence" and "sophistical plea" for engaging in criminal activity, LDS, 136 U.S. at 49.

[11] United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 624 (1931).

[12] See Smith, 494 U.S. at 879, 882 (citing Reynolds and conscientious objector caselaw as support).

[13] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403 (1963); see Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s.

[14] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 531–32 (1993).

[15] See Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice.

[16] Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 607 (1961) (plurality opinion).

[17] Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 248–49 (1968) (rejecting a free exercise challenge to a textbook lending program because the challengers had not alleged the program "coerce[d] them as individuals in the practice of their religion"). See also Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 689 (1971) (plurality opinion) (rejecting a free exercise challenge to a federal program offering grants for constructing academic facilities because the challengers could not "identify any coercion directed at the practice or exercise of their religious beliefs").

[18] Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 450–51 (1988); see also Amdt1.4.3.3 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice and Internal Government Affairs.

[19] Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 308 (1952).

exercise or instruction [was] brought to the classrooms of the public schools."[20] Accordingly, the Court has sometimes held that where a government action does not require regulated entities to act in a way that their religious beliefs prohibit, there is no Free Exercise Clause violation.[21] Essentially, a law that does not regulate belief or burden religious exercise will not violate the Free Exercise Clause.[22]

Amdt1.4.2 Laws Regulating Religious Belief

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has long held that the Free Exercise Clause prohibits "any governmental regulation of religious beliefs as such," as opposed to "overt acts prompted by religious beliefs or principles."[1] The Constitution categorically prohibits the government from compelling "the acceptance of any creed or the practice of any form of worship."[2] Accordingly, a law that expressly requires declaring a specific religious belief will violate the Free Exercise Clause.[3] In Torcaso v. Watkins, decided in 1961, the Supreme Court held that a state constitutional provision requiring public officeholders to declare a "belief in the existence of God" violated the Free Exercise Clause.[4] Although the Court noted the "historical precedent" for such "religious test oaths" in Europe and in the Colonies,[5] it held that the adoption of the U.S. Constitution and the First Amendment, combined with countervailing evidence of opposition to the oaths during colonial times, rendered religious test oaths "historically and

---

[20] Id. at 311.

[21] See, e.g., Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Cal. Bd. of Equalization, 493 U.S. 378, 391–92 (1990) (holding that a generally applicable sales and use tax, applied to religious materials, imposed "no constitutionally significant burden on appellant's religious practices or beliefs"); Tex. Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 18 (1989) (plurality opinion) (saying that the Free Exercise Clause did not require a sales tax exemption for religious publications where there was no evidence that the payment of the tax "would offend . . . religious beliefs or inhibit religious activity"); Tony & Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, 471 U.S. 290, 303–04 (1985) (rejecting free exercise challenge to federal law that would require a religious employer to compensate employees, saying that although they held religious objections to cash wages, the required compensation could come in the form of benefits). Cf. Native Am. Church of Navajoland, Inc. v. Ariz. Corp. Comm'n, 329 F. Supp. 907, 910 (D. Ariz. 1971) (rejecting free exercise challenge to a state denial of corporate status based on the corporation's stated purpose to advocate for religious peyote use, saying that the state's refusal to grant corporate status "by itself does not infringe in any significant way on the free exercise of their religious practices"), aff'd, 405 U.S. 901 (1972) (mem.).

[22] Tony & Susan Alamo Foundation, 471 U.S. at 303.

[1] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 402–03 (1963) (emphasis added in second quotation); accord Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303–04 (1940).

[2] Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 603 (1961) (plurality opinion); accord Sherbert, 374 U.S. at 402. See also, e.g., Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106 (1968) (holding that a state law prohibiting teaching evolution in public schools violated both Religion Clauses, saying "the First Amendment does not permit the State to require that teaching and learning must be tailored to the principles or prohibitions of any religious sect or dogma").

[3] Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 495–96 (1961). Cf., e.g., W. Va. State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943) (holding that a school violated the First Amendment by expelling a student who, citing religious objections, refused to comply with a state law requiring teachers and pupils to salute the flag). Although the Supreme Court cited Barnette in at least one later case as involving a Free Exercise claim, see Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 15 n.22 (1947), other Supreme Court cases have treated Barnette as an interpretation of the Free Speech Clause, see, e.g., United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405, 410 (2001); Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 250 (1990) (plurality opinion). The Barnette opinion itself said its resolution of the case did not "turn on [the student's] possession of particular religious views," suggesting that other "citizens who do not share these religious views" might similarly object to this "compulsory rite" and would also receive constitutional protection. Id. at 634–35.

[4] Torcaso, 367 U.S. at 489 (quoting Md. Const. Declaration of Rights art. 37).

[5] Id. at 489–90.

constitutionally discredited."[6] By "limiting public offices to persons who have, or perhaps more properly profess to have, a belief in some particular kind of religious concept," the state law violated constitutional free exercise protections.[7]

The First Amendment's "absolute prohibition of infringements on the 'freedom to believe'" does not apply to laws that are "directed primarily at status, acts, and conduct."[8] However, even when courts are considering conduct-focused laws, the constitutional prohibition on regulation of belief can sometimes limit the bounds of judicial inquiry.[9] For example, in United States v. Ballard, the Supreme Court held that it would violate the Free Exercise Clause for a jury to determine whether criminal defendants' religious beliefs were true or false.[10] The defendants were charged with mail fraud after promoting a religious movement that claimed supernatural healing powers.[11] The district court had instructed the jury only to consider whether the defendants "honestly and in good faith" held their beliefs.[12] The court of appeals, in contrast, held that the defendants could only be convicted of fraud if the government proved that the defendants' beliefs, as they stated them, were false.[13] The Supreme Court did not decide whether the jury could consider the sincerity of the defendants' beliefs, as the district court thought, but it definitively rejected the court of appeals' view that the jury should decide the truth of those beliefs, citing the absolute prohibition on government regulation of belief.[14] The Court stated that "[h]eresy trials are foreign to our Constitution."[15] The Court later emphasized that "religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent, or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection."[16] Neither do religious beliefs have to comport with the "dogma of an established religious sect."[17]

The Court later reached the question it did not squarely resolve in Ballard, clarifying that although courts may not probe the truth of an individual's religious beliefs, they may assess the sincerity or good faith with which the individual holds those beliefs in evaluating the

---

[6] Id. at 491–92, 494.

[7] Id. at 494, 496.

[8] McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 627 (1978) (plurality opinion). In McDaniel, a plurality of the Court concluded that a state provision barring ministers from serving as delegates to a state constitutional convention did not operate because of the ministers' beliefs, as prohibited by Torcaso, but instead disqualified ministers based on their status. Id. at 627. The plurality opinion nonetheless applied a heightened level of scrutiny and held the law unconstitutional. Id. at 629. Two Justices would have held that the law unconstitutionally regulated belief. Id. at 631–32 (Brennan, J., concurring in the judgment). McDaniel, and cases exploring the additional distinction between laws operating based on religious status versus religious activity, are discussed Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice, and Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[9] The Supreme Court has suggested that Congress is similarly limited when it outlines protections for religious belief. See United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 184 (1965) (interpreting scope of federal conscientious objector law broadly, citing, among other considerations, the government's inability to question the validity of religious objectors' beliefs). Cf. Rusk v. Espinosa, 456 U.S. 951 (1982) (mem.), aff'g 634 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1980) (holding that city ordinance exempting "religious" groups from solicitation regulations violated the Free Exercise Clause as an impermissible prior restraint, because it gave administrative official overbroad discretion to determine what was religious).

[10] United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 88 (1944).

[11] Id. at 79–80.

[12] Id. at 81–82.

[13] Id. at 83.

[14] Id. at 86.

[15] Id.

[16] Thomas v. Review Bd. of Ind. Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 714 (1981).

[17] Id. at 715–16; Frazee v. Ill. Dep't of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 834 (1989). Cf. Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc., 573 U.S. 682, 724 (2014) (saying the courts have "no business" addressing whether a religious belief is "reasonable" when interpreting a federal statute protecting religious exercise).

merits of a free exercise claim or defense.[18] A belief must be religious rather than secular to enjoy First Amendment protection,[19] and the Supreme Court has suggested there may be some claims "so bizarre, so clearly nonreligious in motivation, as not to be entitled to protection under the Free Exercise Clause."[20] Accordingly, courts may also scrutinize a claimed belief to ensure that it is religious in nature rather than secular, and in the course of that inquiry, may evaluate evidence showing the centrality of a belief to a certain faith.[21] Citing early cases upholding criminal laws prohibiting polygamy,[22] the Court has rejected the claim that "any conduct can be made a religious rite and by the zeal of the practitioners swept into the First Amendment."[23] While "[t]he determination of what is a 'religious' belief or practice" may be "a difficult and delicate task," it may not depend on the government's "perception of the particular belief or practice."[24]

Amdt1.4.3 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice

Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court's early cases interpreting the Free Exercise Clause did not articulate one clear standard for evaluating claims under that clause, although some consistent principles did emerge, particularly in cases dealing with similar fact patterns.

Starting with Cantwell v. Connecticut in 1940 and continuing through the following two decades, the Supreme Court considered a series of cases involving state and local regulations restricting solicitation or other activity in public spaces, as applied to people engaged in religious speech.[1] Many of these cases invoked both the First Amendment's Free Exercise and Free Speech Clauses.[2] Some cases striking down restrictions on religious speech seemed to draw from free speech jurisprudence outlining protections for speech in public forums.[3]

---

[18] See, e.g., Frazee, 489 U.S. at 833; Thomas, 450 U.S. at 716; Seeger, 380 U.S. at 185.

[19] E.g., Frazee, 489 U.S. at 833. For additional discussion of how the Supreme Court has defined the scope of beliefs protected by the Religion Clauses, see Amdt1.2.1 Overview of the Religion Clauses (Establishment and Free Expression Clauses).

[20] Thomas, 450 U.S. at 715. Cf. Chaplinsky v. State of New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571 (1942) (rejecting a Free Exercise Clause challenge to a prosecution of a pastor under a statute prohibiting offensive addresses, saying the Court could not "conceive that cursing a public officer is the exercise of religion in any sense of the term," but further holding that even if the activity was religious, that would not shield "concomitant acts committed in violation of a valid criminal statute").

[21] See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 216–17 (1972).

[22] See discussion Amdt1.4.1 Overview of Free Exercise Clause.

[23] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 109–10 (1943).

[24] Thomas, 450 U.S. at 714. See also, e.g., Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 70 (1953) ("[I]t is no business of courts to say that what is a religious practice or activity for one group is not religion under the protection of the First Amendment.").

[1] See Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 300 (1940).

[2] See, e.g., Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 293–94 (1951) (holding that a city violated the First Amendment by revoking a minister's permit based on his ridicule of other religious beliefs, citing cases interpreting and applying both the Free Exercise and Free Speech Clauses); see also Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause.

[3] See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 507–09 (1946) (holding that, as applied to a person distributing religious literature, a state law prohibiting trespass and a company town policy prohibiting the distribution of

Similarly, the Court held unconstitutional under the Free Exercise Clause regulations that it believed were impermissibly broad and discretionary prior restraints on religious speech.[4]

In Cantwell, for example, the Court held that a state violated the Free Exercise Clause in convicting a man and his two sons under a state law that prohibited unapproved solicitations.[5] The man had played a religious record in the street, and his usual practice was to request that listeners would buy further religious materials.[6] The Court acknowledged that the state may generally regulate solicitation if the regulation "does not involve any religious test and does not unreasonably obstruct or delay the collection of funds."[7] However, the regulation challenged in Cantwell allowed a licensing official to decide whether any given solicitation was "religious" and should be approved.[8] In the Court's view, this broad discretion placed "a forbidden burden upon the exercise of liberty protected by the Constitution."[9]

Concerns about impermissible prior restraints also drove the decision in Murdock v. Pennsylvania, in which the Court held that a city could not require religious groups to pay for a license in order to distribute religious literature.[10] The Court emphasized first that the "hand distribution of religious tracts is an age-old form of missionary evangelism" that enjoyed the same "protection as the more orthodox and conventional exercises of religion" such as "preaching from the pulpits."[11] Further, the fact that the religious groups sought contributions did not "transform [their] evangelism into a commercial enterprise" that would merit lessened constitutional protection.[12] The Court distinguished taxes on a preacher's income or property (which it suggested might be allowed) from the challenged city ordinance, because the city's licensing tax "restrain[ed] in advance those constitutional liberties of press and religion and inevitably tend[ed] to suppress their exercise."[13] Before its decision in Murdock, the Court had previously approved a similar license fee, stating that religious groups could be subject to reasonable fees when they "use the ordinary commercial methods of sales."[14] However, the Court vacated that decision approving the license fee when it issued Jones, concluding that the literature violated the First Amendment, citing protections for speech and religion and a public interest in ensuring "that the channels of communication remain free"); Tucker v. Texas, 326 U.S. 517, 520 (1946) (applying Marsh to rule unconstitutional a similar application of a different state's law); Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413, 414, 416 (1943) (ruling unconstitutional under the Free Speech and Free Exercise Clauses a municipal ordinance prohibiting the distribution of handbills, emphasizing that a person lawfully on a public street retains speech rights). See also Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

---

[4] See Kunz, 340 U.S. at 293; Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 273 (1951); Follett v. Town of McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 577 (1944); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 114 (1943); Jones v. City of Opelika, 319 U.S. 103, 104 (1943) (mem.); Largent v. Texas, 318 U.S. 418, 422 (1943); Cantwell, 310 U.S. at 305. See also Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice; Amdt1.7.2.3 Prior Restraints on Speech.

[5] Cantwell, 310 U.S. at 303. The Court also held that the First Amendment precluded a breach-of-the-peace conviction based on this conduct. Id. at 311.

[6] Id. at 303.

[7] Id. at 305.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 307. See also Largent, 318 U.S. at 422 (holding that a city's permitting system involving discretionary judgments was "administrative censorship" that "abridge[d] the freedom of religion, of the press and of speech," in the context of a conviction for distributing religious books).

[10] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 114 (1943).

[11] Id. at 108–09.

[12] Id. at 110–11.

[13] Id. at 112, 114 (emphasis added).

[14] Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584, 597–98 (1942), vacated, 319 U.S. 103 (1943) (mem.). Among other factors, the Court in Jones emphasized that the fee did not constitute a "complete prohibition," was "nondiscriminatory" in the sense that it applied to all booksellers equally, and did not vest "discretionary power in the public authorities to refuse a license to any one desirous of selling religious literature." Id. at 596, 598.

groups "were engaged in a . . . religious venture" rather than a commercial one.[15] In subsequent cases, the Court made clear that Murdock bars only flat license taxes that operate as preconditions on exercising constitutional rights.[16]

By contrast, in Poulos v. New Hampshire, the Supreme Court held that a city could require religious groups to comply with a permitting scheme to conduct meetings in a public park.[17] The Supreme Court "assume[d]" that the permitting scheme entitled religious groups to hold religious services in the park "at reasonable hours and times."[18] Based on that assumption, the Court upheld the permitting scheme as a reasonable "regulation" rather than "suppression" of speech.[19] It also interpreted the law as giving licensing officials "no discretion as to granting permits, no power to discriminate, no control over speech."[20] Accordingly, the scheme was "not the kind of prepublication license" held unlawful in cases like Murdock and others, but instead "a ministerial, police routine for adjusting the rights of citizens so that the opportunity for effective freedom of speech may be preserved."[21]

Other cases from this time period similarly rejected Free Exercise Clause challenges to laws that the Court characterized as reasonable regulations.[22] One example is Prince v. Massachusetts, in which a woman was convicted of violating a state child labor law for distributing religious materials and soliciting donations with her minor niece.[23] The defendant argued that this application of the law violated her and her niece's freedom of religion.[24] The Supreme Court acknowledged that the Free Exercise Clause protected "[t]he rights of children to exercise their religion, and of parents to give them religious training and to encourage them

---

[15] Murdock, 319 U.S. at 111; Jones v. City of Opelika, 319 U.S. 103, 104 (1943) (mem.). See also Follett v. Town of McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 574–75, 577 (1944) (ruling it unconstitutional to impose a flat license tax "in all material respects the same as the ones involved in" Jones and Murdock on a resident preacher).

[16] See Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Cal. Bd. of Equalization, 493 U.S. 378, 389 (1990) (holding that Murdock and Follett "apply only where a flat license tax operates as a prior restraint on the free exercise or religious beliefs," and did not bar the application of a "generally applicable sales and use tax" to religious materials); Tex. Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 24 (1989) (plurality opinion) (holding that Murdock and Follett would not bar the application of a general sales tax to religious publications).

[17] Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395, 402–04 (1953).

[18] Id. at 408.

[19] Id. at 408.

[20] Id. at 404. The state officials had in fact denied the defendant a permit to conduct religious activity in a park and arrested him after he held unapproved services, apparently exercising discretion in their control over speech. See id at 397. Although this action was contrary to the Court's construction of the statute, the Court nevertheless concluded that the defendant could still be prosecuted for proceeding with the services instead of appealing the city's denial decision. Id. at 414.

[21] Id. at 403. See also Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 578 (1941) (rejecting a Free Exercise Clause challenge to a statute prohibiting processions on public streets).

[22] See, e.g., Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584, 596–98 (1942) (involving a licensing scheme for booksellers, as applied to sales that the Court said were "partaking more of commercial than religious or educational transactions"), vacated, 319 U.S. 103 (1943) (mem.); Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586, 597–98 (1940) (involving a requirement for school children to participate in a flag salute, which the Court said served the government's legitimate interest in national unity), overruled by W. Va. State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943). Cf. In re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 571, 573 (1945) (rejecting a conscientious objector's Free Exercise Clause challenge to a licensing scheme requiring attorneys to swear to support the state constitution and its provision requiring military service, emphasizing "the right of Congress to require military service from every able-bodied man" and the lack of any purpose to discriminate against religious groups); Hamilton v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 293 U.S. 245, 262–63 (1934) (saying a constitutional right for religious objectors to avoid military training as a condition of university attendance was "untenable" in light of citizens' duty "to support and defend government").

[23] Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 159–62 (1944).

[24] Id. at 164. The Court noted that the plaintiff's claim under the Free Exercise Clause was "buttresse[d] . . . with a claim of parental right as secured by the due process clause of the [Fourteenth] Amendment." Id. The case also involved an equal protection claim, which the Court similarly rejected. Id. at 170–71.

in the practice of religious belief."[25] Nonetheless, the Court also recognized that the state has broad powers to regulate child welfare, and additionally ruled that the state has greater authority "over children's activities . . . than over like actions of adults."[26] The Court declined to apply heightened scrutiny as urged by the defendant, instead accepting the state's conclusion that "an absolute prohibition" on child labor in certain places was "necessary to accomplish its legitimate objectives."[27]

These early cases dealing with burdens placed on religion by facially neutral laws outlined general principles; their main importance was in establishing that general regulations in the public interest were constitutional so long as they did not run afoul of doctrines prohibiting prior restraints or protecting speech in public forums. However, some early cases hinted at a potentially more rigorous standard of review that would emerge in the 1960s. Murdock, for example, ruled that the flat license tax was "not narrowly drawn to safeguard the people of the community in their homes against the evils of solicitations."[28] Another case expressed concern about a licensing scheme that lacked "narrowly drawn, reasonable and definite standards for the officials to follow."[29] Other cases emphasized that laws permissibly regulated religious activity in part because they did not reveal any purpose to discriminate against certain religions or to bar religious exercise.[30] The Court would pick up each of these threads in future cases.

Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In the 1960s through the 1980s, the Supreme Court began to apply a heightened level of scrutiny in many Free Exercise Clause challenges—although the precise contours of this heightened scrutiny were inconsistent, both in the particulars of the test and in its application.

In 1961's Braunfeld v. Brown, business owners who observed the Saturday Sabbath challenged a law requiring their businesses to close on Sundays.[1] Although the law was facially neutral as to religion, the merchants argued the law burdened their religious exercise by either compelling them "to give up their Sabbath observance" or putting them "at a serious economic disadvantage" if they closed for the entire weekend.[2] A plurality of the Court cautioned that courts should not unduly constrain "legislation which imposes only an indirect burden on the exercise of religion, i.e., legislation which does not make unlawful the religious practice itself."[3] The plurality held that "if the State regulates conduct by enacting a general law within its

---

[25] Prince, 321 U.S. at 165.

[26] Id. at 167–68.

[27] Id. at 170. The Court further said that "[s]treet preaching" could be "regulated within reasonable limits" for adults and could be prohibited for "children not accompanied by an older person." Id. at 169.

[28] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 116 (1943). The Court emphasized that the state might have been able to achieve its goals with more narrow restrictions, such as registration requirements, "nominal" fees, or more narrowly drawn proscriptions on certain types of solicitation. Id. at 116–17.

[29] Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 271 (1951).

[30] Tucker v. Texas, 326 U.S. 517, 520 (1946); In re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 571, 571 (1945).

[1] Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 601 (1961) (plurality opinion). Sunday closing laws also engendered a number of Establishment Clause challenges. See Amdt1.3.5.3 Purpose and Effect Test Before Lemon.

[2] Braunfeld, 366 U.S. at 601–02.

[3] Id. at 603, 606.

power, the purpose and effect of which is to advance the State's secular goals, the statute is valid despite its indirect burden on religious observance unless the State may accomplish its purpose by means which do not impose such a burden."[4] In the Court's view, the Sunday closing law had a valid secular purpose and effect in creating a common day of rest,[5] and there were no effective alternative measures that would achieve this purpose without incidentally burdening religious freedom.[6] Although the opinion seemed to state a somewhat heightened standard of review, the Court upheld the law after concluding that proposed alternative schemes that would accommodate the business owners "might well" be less effective at achieving the state's goals.[7] Subsequent cases similarly seemed to suggest that laws placing only "incidental burdens" on religious beliefs might be more readily upheld.[8]

The Court articulated and applied a heightened standard of review to evaluate a free exercise claim in Sherbert v. Verner, issued just two years after Braunfeld.[9] A state had denied unemployment benefits to an employee who was fired after refusing to work on the Sabbath, claiming the employee was ineligible for benefits because she had "failed, without good cause . . . to accept suitable work."[10] The Supreme Court held first that this denial burdened the employee's religious exercise by forcing "her to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand."[11] The Court then said that to justify this "substantial infringement" of her rights, the state could not show "merely . . . a rational relationship to some colorable state interest," but would have to demonstrate that its policy served a "compelling state interest"[12]—an element seemingly not required in Braunfeld.[13] The Court held that the state had not met its burden, as its concerns about fraudulent claims filed by "unscrupulous claimants feigning religious objections to Saturday work" were unsupported by the record.[14] Further, the state had not shown that "alternative forms of regulations" could not "combat such abuses without infringing First Amendment rights."[15] This stood in contrast to Braunfeld, which the Court said involved a "less direct burden upon religious practices," and where the alternative methods appeared to pose such significant administrative problems that they "would have rendered the entire statutory scheme unworkable."[16]

A number of subsequent decisions seemed to follow Sherbert's heightened scrutiny standard, particularly in the unemployment benefits context. Additional decisions in the 1980s

---

[4] Id. at 607.

[5] See id.; McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 507 (1961) (opinion of Frankfurter, J.) (rejecting the Free Exercise Clause claims in Braunfeld after concluding the law had this valid secular purpose).

[6] Braunfeld, 366 U.S. at 608 (plurality opinion); accord McGowan, 366 U.S. at 520 (opinion of Frankfurter, J.).

[7] Braunfeld, 366 U.S. at 608–09 (plurality opinion).

[8] See, e.g., Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 462 (1971) (rejecting Free Exercise Clause challenge to federal law exempting from military service only those who objected, on religious grounds, to participating in all wars, not those with religious objections to a particular war, saying the law's "incidental burdens" on religious beliefs were "strictly justified by substantial governmental interests"); Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 385 (1974) (rejecting Free Exercise Clause challenge to federal law excluding conscientious objectors from veterans' benefits, citing Gillette to conclude that the law's "incidental burden" on religion was justified by the government's "substantial interest in raising and supporting armies").

[9] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 406 (1963).

[10] Id. at 399–401 (quoting S.C. Code Ann. § 68-114 (1952)).

[11] Id. at 404.

[12] Id. at 406.

[13] See Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 607 (1961) (plurality opinion).

[14] Sherbert, 374 U.S. at 407.

[15] Id. at 407.

[16] Id. at 408–09.

held that states had failed to satisfy the compelling interest test in denying unemployment benefits to those who lost employment based on religious objections to the nature of their assigned tasks[17] or to working on certain days.[18] These decisions can be seen as the Court applying the general doctrine of unconstitutional conditions, which holds that the government cannot infringe constitutional rights "by the denial of or placing of conditions upon a benefit or privilege."[19]

In another decision, Wisconsin v. Yoder, the Court seemed to apply a Sherbert-like form of heightened scrutiny.[20] The case involved Amish parents who held religious objections to sending their children to high school and violated a state compulsory attendance law.[21] Although the Court recognized the state's "interest in universal education" as generally compelling, it held that such interest was "not totally free from a balancing process when it impinges on fundamental rights and interests, such as those specifically protected by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, and the traditional interest of parents with respect to the religious upbringing of their children."[22] After noting that the law's effect on the Amish parents' religious exercise was "not only severe, but inescapable," and would "gravely endanger if not destroy the free exercise" of their beliefs,[23] the Court said it had to "searchingly examine the interests that the State seeks to promote by its requirement for compulsory education to age 16."[24] The Court concluded that the evidence did not suggest the law was so necessary to serve the state's interests as "to justify the [law's] severe interference with religious freedom."[25]

The Court again applied a heightened form of scrutiny in United States v. Lee, although in that case it rejected a free exercise challenge to the forced payment of social security taxes.[26] An employer raised religious objections to accepting or paying into the national social security [17] Thomas v. Review Bd. of Ind. Emp. Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 719 (1981) (involving a religious objection to making armaments, a newly assigned role for the employee).

---

[18] Frazee v. Ill. Dep't of Emp. Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 831, 833 (1989) (involving a sincere religious objection to working on Sunday, which was held to be protected even though the challenger "was not a member of an established religious sect or church"); Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136, 141 (1987) (involving a religious objection to working on the Sabbath). Cf. Luetkemeyer v. Kaufmann, 364 F. Supp. 376, 386 (W.D. Mo. 1973) (rejecting free exercise challenge to provisions excluding private schools from a school transportation program, noting the state's compelling interest in "insist[ing] upon a degree of separation of church and state"), aff'd, 419 U.S. 888 (1974) (mem.).

[19] Sherbert, 374 U.S. at 404–05; see also Amdt1.7.13.1 Overview of Unconstitutional Conditions Doctrine. Cf. Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 706, 703 (1986) (plurality opinion) (ruling that a statutory requirement for benefits claimants to provide a Social Security number did not "place a direct condition or burden on the dissemination of religious views"); Native Am. Church of Navajoland, Inc. v. Ariz. Corp. Comm'n, 329 F. Supp. 907, 910 (D. Ariz. 1971) (rejecting free exercise challenge to a state denial of corporate status based on group's religiously motivated activity, saying that the state's refusal to grant corporate status "by itself does not infringe in any significant way on the free exercise of their religious practices"), aff'd, 405 U.S. 901 (1972) (mem.).

[20] Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215 (1972).

[21] Id. at 207.

[22] Id. at 214, 221; see also id. at 215 ("[O]nly those interests of the highest order and those not otherwise served can overbalance legitimate claims to the free exercise of religion."). Further, distinguishing the child labor law that was upheld in Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 169–70 (1944), the Court said the state's compulsory education law did not confront "any harm to the physical or mental health of the child or to the public safety, peace, order, or welfare." Yoder, 406 U.S. at 230. Prince is discussed in more detail in Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s.

[23] Yoder, 406 U.S. at 218–19.

[24] Id. at 221.

[25] Id. at 227. Although this language could be seen as going to the law's fit, or tailoring, the Court phrased the inquiry largely in terms of the state's interest. See id. at 228–29 (saying that after reviewing evidence on the law's purpose and effects, "Wisconsin's interest in compelling the school attendance of Amish children to age 16 emerges as somewhat less substantial than requiring such attendance for children generally").

[26] United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 254 (1982).

system.[27] The Court said the government could justify the law's infringement on his religious liberty by showing the law was "essential to accomplish an overriding governmental interest."[28] After describing the government's interest in "mandatory and continuous participation in" the social security system as "very high," the Court held that "it would be difficult to accommodate the comprehensive social security system with myriad exceptions flowing from a wide variety of religious beliefs."[29] Accordingly, "religious belief" could not provide a "basis for resisting the tax."[30] More broadly, the Court declared that "[w]hen followers of a particular sect enter into commercial activity as a matter of choice, the limits they accept on their own conduct as a matter of conscience and faith are not to be superimposed on the statutory schemes which are binding on others in that activity."[31] Justice John Paul Stevens, in a concurring opinion, suggested that this decision was in "tension" with Sherbert.[32]

Subsequent decisions of the Court attempted to reconcile the tension between the two standards in various ways. In Bob Jones University v. United States, a religious university argued that racial nondiscrimination requirements infringed upon its religious beliefs prohibiting interracial dating and marriage.[33] The Supreme Court held that the government had satisfied Sherbert's compelling interest test, citing Lee for the idea that the government may sometimes burden religious liberty.[34] Another opinion rejected a constitutional challenge to a federal decision to tax certain payments for religious services, saying that Sherbert's compelling interest test applied only if the government had "placed a substantial burden on the observation of a central religious belief or practice."[35] However, the Court in that case said that under Lee, even a substantial religious burden would be justified by the government's interest in maintaining a uniformly applicable tax system.[36] In another case involving a Free Exercise Clause challenge to a sales and use tax applied to religious materials, the Court concluded Sherbert's compelling interest standard did not apply where the challenger's religious beliefs did not "forbid payment" of the tax, holding that the collection and payment of the tax imposed "no constitutionally significant burden on appellant's religious practices or beliefs."[37]

In Bowen v. Roy, involving a religious objection to the federal government's assignment and use of Social Security numbers, a plurality of the Court agreed that public benefits laws

---

[27] Id. at 255–56. The law contained a religious exemption available to self-employed individuals, for which he did not qualify. Id. at 256.

[28] Id. at 258. As support for this standard, the Court cited Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215 (1972); Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 462 (1971); and Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 406 (1963). Lee, 455 U.S. at 257–58. As discussed above, these three cases could be seen as articulating slightly different standards for evaluating Free Exercise Clause claims.

[29] Lee, 455 U.S. at 259–60.

[30] Id. at 260.

[31] Id. at 261.

[32] Id. at 263 n.3 (Stevens, J., concurring).

[33] Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 602–03 (1983).

[34] Id. at 603–04.

[35] Hernandez v. Commissioner, 490 U.S. 680, 699 (1989).

[36] Id. at 699–700.

[37] Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Cal. Bd. of Equalization, 493 U.S. 378, 391–92 (1990). The Court distinguished prior cases invalidating flat license taxes as unconstitutional prior restraints by saying concerns that the tax would "act as a precondition to the free exercise of religious beliefs" were "simply not present where a tax applies to all sales and uses of tangible personal property in the State." Id. at 387. Those prior cases evaluating flat license taxes, Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943), and Follett v. Town of McCormick, 321 U.S. 573 (1944), are discussed supra Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s.

should not be subject to the heightened standard of Sherbert and Yoder.[38] The Court drew a distinction between "government regulation that indirectly and incidentally calls for a choice between securing a governmental benefit and adherence to religious beliefs" and "governmental action or legislation that criminalizes religiously inspired activity or inescapably compels conduct that some find objectionable for religious reasons."[39] Further, the plurality suggested that the heightened scrutiny applied in Sherbert was motivated by concerns specific to the state law's "'good cause' standard," which "created a mechanism for individualized exemptions" that opened the door for religious discrimination.[40] Applying a less rigorous standard, the Bowen plurality rejected a free exercise challenge to a federal law requiring benefits applicants to provide a Social Security number, saying there was no evidence "suggesting antagonism by Congress towards religion generally or towards any particular religious beliefs."[41] The Social Security number requirement "clearly promote[d]" the government's stated interest in preventing fraud—a "legitimate and important public interest."[42] The Bowen plurality's views on the appropriate standards to evaluate Free Exercise Clause challenges would be largely vindicated with the Supreme Court's 1990 decision in Employment Division v. Smith, discussed in a subsequent essay.[43]

Amdt1.4.3.3 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice and Internal Government Affairs

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Two Supreme Court cases from the late 1980s held that the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause is not implicated by internal government procedures—at least, so long as the internal policy is generally applicable and facially neutral towards religion.[1] The religious challenger in Bowen v. Roy believed that by assigning his daughter a Social Security number and using that number to administer certain government programs, her spirit had been robbed.[2] The Supreme Court rejected the father's constitutional challenge, saying "[t]he Free Exercise Clause simply cannot be understood to require the Government to conduct its own [38] Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 706–08 (1986) (plurality opinion).

---

[39] Id. at 706. See also Emp. Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 485 U.S. 660, 671–74 (1988) (saying that Sherbert might have been decided differently "if the employees had been discharged for engaging in criminal conduct," and remanding the case to the lower courts to reconsider a free exercise challenge to a denial of unemployment benefits, instructing the courts to consider whether religiously motivated peyote use was constitutionally protected or prohibited by state criminal law); Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 166 (1845) (rejecting a free exercise challenge to a criminal prosecution for bigamy).

[40] Bowen, 476 U.S. at 708.

[41] Id.

[42] Id. at 709. The plaintiffs also challenged the federal government's internal use of Social Security numbers. See Amdt1.4.3.3 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice and Internal Government Affairs.

[43] Emp. Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); see Amdt1.4.3.4 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice and Current Doctrine.

[1] Cf. Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, No. 19-123, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 17, 2021) (concluding that prior "cases involving internal government affairs" were not relevant to a government policy that was not generally applicable, noting that the Court has "never suggested that the government may discriminate against religion when acting in its managerial role").

[2] Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 696, 699 (1986). The religious challengers also objected to having to provide a Social Security number in order to obtain certain benefits. Id. at 699. That aspect of the case is discussed in Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s.

internal affairs in ways that comport with the religious beliefs of particular citizens."[3] The Court further said that the Clause "affords an individual protection from certain forms of governmental compulsion; it does not afford an individual a right to dictate the conduct of the Government's internal procedures."[4] In the Court's view, the federal government's use of a Social Security number did not "in any degree impair" the father's free exercise of religion.[5]

The Supreme Court extended this principle in Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, holding that the federal government could allow timber harvesting in a national forest that had "historically been used for religious purposes" by certain Native American tribes.[6] The Court declined to analyze the law under any heightened form of scrutiny, although it acknowledged that—as in Roy—the government's action would "interfere significantly with private persons' ability to pursue spiritual fulfillment according to their own religious beliefs."[7] Critically, though, the Court further concluded that the government's action would not coerce anyone into violating their religious beliefs or "penalize religious activity by denying any person an equal share of the rights, benefits, and privileges enjoyed by other citizens."[8] While prior cases had held that "indirect coercion or penalties on" religion could trigger heightened constitutional scrutiny, the Court distinguished prohibitions on religious activity from "incidental effects of government programs, which may make it more difficult to practice certain religions but which have no tendency to coerce individuals into acting contrary to their religious beliefs."[9] Even assuming that the government's decision about how to use the public land would destroy the tribes' ability to practice their religion, the Court said that the First Amendment could not give citizens the ability to "veto . . . public programs that do not prohibit the free exercise of religion."[10]

Amdt1.4.3.4 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice and Current Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In the 1990 decision Employment Division v. Smith, the Supreme Court attempted to reconcile its various standards for evaluating Free Exercise Clause challenges, limiting the heightened scrutiny of Sherbert v. Verner to a specific context and outlining a lower level of scrutiny for many other government actions.[1] Specifically, in Smith, the Court rejected a free exercise claim brought by two members of a Native American church.[2] The state had denied them unemployment benefits after they were fired for using peyote in violation of state

[3] Roy, 476 U.S. at 699.

[4] Id. at 700.

[5] Id.

[6] Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 441–42 (1988).

[7] Id. at 447–49.

[8] Id. at 449.

[9] Id. at 450–51.

[10] Id. at 451–52.

[1] Emp. Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 884–85 (1990). Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), is discussed in more detail in Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s.

[2] Smith, 494 U.S. at 874.

criminal drug laws.[3] The church members argued that this denial of benefits impermissibly burdened their religious practice, because they had used peyote for sacramental purposes.[4] The Supreme Court disagreed, stating that "the right of free exercise does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a 'valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes (or prescribes) conduct that his religion prescribes (or proscribes)."'[5]

The majority opinion in Smith acknowledged that some prior Supreme Court decisions, such as Sherbert, had applied a heightened standard that required the government to demonstrate that any substantial burdens on religion were justified by a compelling governmental interest.[6] However, the Court said those earlier cases concerned laws that were not truly "generally applicable," and had "nothing to do with an across-the-board criminal prohibition on a particular form of conduct."[7] Instead, those cases involved systems like unemployment benefit programs in which the government decided case by case whether to apply laws through "individualized . . . assessment[s]."[8] Because individual exemption decisions presented a greater risk of religious discrimination, they required a heightened standard of review.[9] By contrast, the criminal laws in Smith generally prohibited using certain drugs and were "not specifically directed at [the church members'] religious practice."[10] The Court noted that other cases such as United States v. Lee and Braunfeld v. Brown[11] had upheld the application of generally applicable laws to religiously motivated conduct.[12]

The majority opinion also said that some of the other cases applying a heightened standard of review to invalidate government actions violating the Free Exercise Clause had involved "hybrid" claims, in which plaintiffs claimed the government had violated additional constitutional rights beyond the free exercise of religion.[13] The Court placed its early cases dealing with religious speech in this category, noting they also implicated First Amendment protections for speech and press.[14] In contrast, the benefits claimants in Smith presented "a free exercise claim unconnected with any communicative activity" or any other right.[15]

The Court's opinion relied in part on its belief that applying a "'compelling interest' test" in any claim involving the application of a law to religious motivated action "would be courting anarchy."[16] A rule deeming such applications "presumptively invalid . . . . would open the prospect of constitutionally required religious exemptions from civic obligations of almost

---

[3] Id.

[4] Id.

[5] Id. at 879 (quoting United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 263 n.3 (1982) (Stevens, J., concurring)).

[6] Id. at 883; see also Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s.

[7] Smith, 494 U.S. at 884.

[8] Id.

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 878.

[11] United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982), and Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 (1961) (plurality opinion), are discussed in Amdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s.

[12] Smith, 494 U.S.at 880.

[13] Id. at 881–82.

[14] Id. at 881. These early cases are discussed in Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s. The Court also characterized Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), discussed inAmdt1.4.3.2 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice from the 1960s through the 1980s, as such a hybrid claim, involving "the right of parents . . . to direct the education of their children." Smith, 494 U.S. at 881.

[15] Smith, 494 U.S. at 882.

[16] Id. at 888.

every conceivable kind."[17] This aspect of the Court's decision drew from prior cases that had expressed similar concerns[18] in attempting to avoid outcomes that would "make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself."[19] For example, in a prior case involving a religious objection to internal government procedures, the Court had said that the government "simply could not operate if it were required to satisfy every citizen's religious needs and desires."[20]

Accordingly, after Smith, the Court has deemed burdens on free exercise that are "merely the incidental effect of a generally applicable and otherwise valid provision" not to violate the First Amendment.[21] However, some judges and commentators found Smith "controversial."[22] Although the Court has so far resisted calls to overrule the case,[23] subsequent cases discussed in another essay have explored limitations on the doctrine, effectively continuing to apply heightened constitutional scrutiny in a way that frequently requires government accommodation of religious exercise.[24] Specifically, Smith left open the possibility that some form of heightened scrutiny would apply to laws that were not generally applicable or neutral towards religion.[25] In addition, by declining to overrule Sherbert and its progeny, Smith suggested that the compelling interest test might still apply in certain circumstances, potentially when statutory schemes require "individualized governmental assessment."[26] The Court has not yet elaborated on Smith's discussion of "hybrid" constitutional claims which might also trigger heightened scrutiny.[27]

---

[17] Id.

[18] See id. at 885 (citing Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439 (1988) and Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1845)).

[19] Reynolds, 98 U.S. at 167.

[20] Lyng, 485 U.S. at 452; see also id. ("The First Amendment must apply to all citizens alike, and it can give to none of them a veto over public programs that do not prohibit the free exercise of religion.").

[21] Smith, 494 U.S. at 878. See also Christian Legal Soc'y Chapter of the Univ. of Cal. v. Martinez, 561 U.S. 661, 697 n.27 (2010) (citing Smith to reject a free exercise claim in which a religious student group sought "an exemption" from a university's "across-the-board" policy generally requiring school-approved student groups to accept all comers).

[22] Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colo. Civil Rights Comm'n, No. 16-111, slip op. at 1 (U.S. June 4, 2018) (Gorsuch, J., concurring). In addition, Congress responded to Smith by adopting the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb–bb-4, and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc–cc-5, which create a statutory cause of action with a heightened form of scrutiny for certain government actions imposing a substantial burden on religious exercise. RFRA was ruled partly unconstitutional in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 536 (1997), discussed in more detail in in Amdt14.S5.4 Modern Doctrine on Enforcement Clause. RLUIPA was upheld against an Establishment Clause challenge in Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 720 (2005), briefly discussed in Amdt1.3.6.3 Lemon's Effect Prong and Accommodation of Religion and Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause.

[23] See, e.g., Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, No. 19-123, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 17, 2021).

[24] Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice.

[25] Smith, 494 U.S. at 879.

[26] Id at 884.

[27] Id at 882.

Amdt1.4.3.5 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice Regulating Prisons and the Military

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Even before the Supreme Court ruled in Employment Division v. Smith that heightened constitutional scrutiny should be limited to certain circumstances, the Court had suggested that a lower level of scrutiny would apply in the context of prisons and the military.[1] In Goldman v. Weinberger, the Supreme Court held that the Air Force's uniform dress regulations, which prohibited most members from wearing headgear indoors, could apply to a yarmulke.[2] The Court declined to analyze the free exercise objection under heightened scrutiny, saying instead that the Court's "review of military regulations . . . is far more deferential than constitutional review of similar laws or regulations designed for civilian society."[3] Accordingly, the Court deferred to the Air Force's judgment that "standardized uniforms" were "vital" for discipline and unity, as well as its decision not to accommodate visible religious apparel that would detract from the desired uniformity.[4]

A year later, in O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, the Court adopted a similarly deferential position to uphold prison regulations that inhibited certain prisoners' religious exercise.[5] The prison chose not to allow Muslim prisoners assigned to outside work details to return to the prison to attend religious services.[6] While acknowledging that prisoners retain some First Amendment rights, the Court also said that prisoners' constitutional claims "are judged under a 'reasonableness' test" that affords more deference to prison administrators than ordinary standards.[7] The Court said that a prison's ability to accommodate religious activity might be "relevant to the reasonableness inquiry," but it would be inappropriate to place "the burden on prison officials to disprove the availability of alternatives."[8] Ultimately, the Court held that the prison regulations were constitutional because they had "a logical connection to legitimate governmental interests" in maintaining institutional order and security.[9]

Nonetheless, the First Amendment's guarantees still apply to members of the military and to prisoners, and the Supreme Court has also held that the government would violate the Free Exercise Clause if it discriminated against a Buddhist prisoner, denying him "a reasonable opportunity of pursuing his faith comparable to the opportunity afforded fellow prisoners."[10]

---

[1] The Court has also said that a lower level of constitutional scrutiny is appropriate to evaluate free speech claims in similar contexts. See Amdt1.7.8.1 Overview of Government Roles. However, Congress subsequently enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1, which prevented the government from substantially burdening an institutionalized person's religious exercise unless it met a heightened standard, showing that its action was the least restrictive means to further a compelling governmental interest.

[2] Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 504 (1986).

[3] Id. at 506–07.

[4] Id. at 508–10. The Court described the regulations as "reasonabl[e] and evenhanded[ ]." Id. at 510.

[5] O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 353 (1987).

[6] Id. at 346–47.

[7] Id. at 348–49; see also Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89 (1987) ("When a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.").

[8] Id. at 350.

[9] Id.

[10] Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972). The case came to the Court on an appeal of a motion to dismiss the prisoner's complaint. Id. at 320–21. The Court assumed the truth of the allegations for purposes of assessing the motion and vacated the dismissal of his complaint. Id. at 322–23. See also Cooper v. Pate, 378 U.S. 546, 546 (1964) (per

Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the Free Exercise Clause "protect[s] religious observers against unequal treatment."[1] Thus, even after Employment Division v. Smith held that laws burdening religion generally will not violate the Free Exercise Clause if they are neutral and generally applicable,[2] a law that imposes special burdens on religious activities may not be considered neutral and generally applicable and will trigger heightened scrutiny.[3] For example, in McDaniel v. Paty, the Court struck down a Tennessee law barring ministers from serving as delegates to a state constitutional convention.[4] While the Court splintered with respect to its rationale, a majority agreed that the law violated the Free Exercise Clause by unconstitutionally conditioning the right to exercise one's religion on the "surrender" of the right to seek office as a delegate.[5] As such, the law impermissibly imposed a "special disabilit[y] on the basis of religious views or religious status."[6] To take another example, in Kennedy v. Bremerton School District, the Court ruled that a school district violated the Free Exercise Clause by suspending a football coach because he engaged in religious conduct—praying at the fifty-yard line after a football game.[7]

Similarly, in Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, the Court held that a church that ran a preschool and daycare center could not be disqualified from participating in a Missouri program that offered funding to resurface playgrounds because of the church's religious affiliation.[8] The Court concluded that Missouri's policy of excluding an otherwise eligible recipient from a public benefit solely because of its religious character imposed an unlawful penalty on the free exercise of religion—a result that triggered the "most exacting scrutiny."[9] The Court rejected the State of Missouri's argument that withholding funds did not prohibit the church from engaging in any religious conduct or otherwise exercising its religious rights.[10] Relying on McDaniel, Chief Justice John Roberts concluded that because the Free Exercise Clause protects against "indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion," curiam) (holding lower courts erred by dismissing the complaint of a prisoner who alleged "that solely because of his religious beliefs he was denied permission to purchase certain religious publications and denied other privileges enjoyed by other prisoners").

---

[1] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 542 (1993) (quoting Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Fla., 480 U.S. 136, 148 (1987) (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment)).

[2] Emp't Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 879 (1990).

[3] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, 508 U.S. at 531–32.

[4] 435 U.S. 618, 629 (1978) (plurality opinion).

[5] Id. at 626; accord id. at 633–34 (Brennan, J., concurring in the judgment).

[6] Smith, 494 U.S at 877 (describing the holding in McDaniel).

[7] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 31–32 (U.S. June 27, 2022). The Court held that the school's policies were not neutral because they were based on the religious character of the actions, and the policies were not generally applicable because the school allowed coaching staff to engage in other types of personal activities after the game. Id. at 14. Although the Court acknowledged that strict scrutiny would ordinarily apply under the Free Exercise Clause, there were open questions in the case about whether a lower standard should apply under a Free Speech Clause framework. Id. at 19–20. The Court avoided answering that open question by concluding the school could not "sustain its burden under any" of the suggested levels of scrutiny. Id. at 20.

[8] See Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, No. 15-577, slip op. at 15 (U.S. June 26, 2017).

[9] Id. at 10. The Supreme Court later clarified that Trinity Lutheran had applied "strict scrutiny." Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, No. 18-1195, slip op. at 12 (U.S. June 30, 2020).

[10] Trinity Lutheran, slip op. 10

as well as "outright" prohibitions on religious exercise, Trinity Lutheran had a right to participate in a government benefit program without having to disavow its religious status.[11] In evaluating whether the state's policy was justified by "a state interest 'of the highest order,'" the Court noted the parties' agreement that the Establishment Clause did not require religious organizations' exclusion from the program, and said that the state's "policy preference" for achieving an even greater separation of church and state did not "qualify as compelling."[12] As a result, the Court held that Missouri's policy violated the Free Exercise Clause.[13] In a later case discussed in more detail in another essay, the Court further held that a law excluding religious schools from a state's tuition assistance program based on the fact that the schools would use the funds for religious activities was similarly unconstitutional.[14]

Even if a law does not expressly target religion, it will trigger strict scrutiny if its object "is to infringe upon or restrict practices because of their religious motivation."[15] In Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, the Court struck down a set of ordinances enacted by a Florida city that had the "impermissible object" of targeting "conduct motivated by religious beliefs."[16] The Florida ordinances prohibited animal sacrifice, making certain exemptions for animals killed for food consumption, and were passed in direct response to the establishment of a Santeria church within the city and city residents' concerns about the Santeria practice of animal sacrifice.[17] The Supreme Court concluded that the ordinances were not neutral within the meaning of Smith because they unconstitutionally sought to suppress Santeria religious worship.[18] Among other factors, the Court noted that the laws accomplished a "religious gerrymander": although the text did not expressly refer to Santeria, the law nonetheless prohibited only Santeria sacrifice.[19] The Court also held that the ordinances were not generally applicable under Smith because they selectively burdened "only . . . conduct motivated by religious belief."[20] The Court therefore applied "the most rigorous of scrutiny" and ruled the ordinances unconstitutional.[21] [11] Id. at 10–11. As a result, the Court characterized the church's injury not so much as being the "denial of a grant" itself, but rather the "refusal to allow the Church . . . to compete with secular organizations for a grant." Id. at 11.

---

[12] Id. at 6, 14 (quoting McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 628 (1978) (plurality opinion)).

[13] Id. at 14–15. See also Espinoza, slip op. at 10, 20 (holding that a state violated the Free Exercise Clause by excluding religious schools from a tax credit program based solely on the schools' "religious status"); Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 835 n.19 (2000) (plurality opinion) (saying that excluding religious schools from a federal program authorizing public schools to lend materials to private schools "would raise serious questions under the Free Exercise Clause."). But see Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 721–22 (2004) (rejecting free exercise challenge to state provision prohibiting scholarships from being used for devotional theology degrees, saying the state could permissibly choose not to fund this "distinct category of instruction" and noting the state's historically grounded "antiestablishment interests"). These cases are discussed in more detail in Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[14] Carson v. Makin, No. 20-1088, slip op. at 15–17 (U.S. June 21, 2022); see also Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[15] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 533 (1993). See also Tucker v. Texas, 326 U.S. 517, 520 (1946) (rejecting a free exercise challenge after noting that the challenged laws did not indicate "a purpose to bar freedom of press and religion"); In re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 571 (1945) (rejecting a free exercise challenge after noting that the challenged policy did not appear motivated by a "purpose to discriminate" against certain religious groups).

[16] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, 508 U.S. at 524.

[17] Id. at 526–28.

[18] Id. at 540.

[19] Id. at 534–35.

[20] Id. at 543.

[21] Id. at 546.

Amdt1.4.4
Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice

The Court has suggested that it is equally unconstitutional for hostility to religion to motivate the government's decisions to apply its laws.[22] Consequently, even laws that are neutral on their face and in their purpose may violate the Free Exercise Clause if they are applied in a way that discriminates against religious activity.[23] For example, the Supreme Court held that a city violated the First Amendment when it applied an ordinance prohibiting certain activities in public parks in a discriminatory fashion.[24] According to the Court, the evidence showed that a certain group's religious service had been treated differently "than a religious service of other sects," amounting "to the state preferring some religious groups over this one."[25] The Court cautioned that it was "no business of courts to say that what is a religious practice or activity for one group is not religion under the protection of the First Amendment."[26]

In Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colorado Civil Rights Commission, another case involving allegations of religious hostility, the Court set aside state administrative proceedings enforcing Colorado's anti-discrimination laws against a baker who had refused to make a cake for a same-sex wedding.[27] The Court held that the state had violated the Free Exercise Clause because the Colorado Civil Rights Commission had not considered the baker's case "with the religious neutrality that the Constitution requires."[28] The Court highlighted two aspects of the state proceedings that had, in its view, demonstrated impermissible religious hostility: first, certain statements by some of the Commissioners during the proceedings before the Commission[29]; and second, "the difference in treatment between [the petitioner's] case and the cases of other bakers who objected to a requested cake on the basis of conscience and prevailed before the Commission."[30]

Seemingly building on the Court's second rationale in Masterpiece Cakeshop, the Supreme Court has said that government regulations are not neutral and trigger strict scrutiny "whenever they treat any comparable secular activity more favorably than religious exercise."[31] In November 2020 and April 2021, the Supreme Court issued two per curiam opinions applying strict scrutiny to state regulations that limited gatherings, including

---

[22] Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colo. Civil Rights Comm'n, No. 16-111, slip op. at 18 (U.S. June 4, 2018). See also Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972) (holding that the government would violate the Free Exercise Clause if it discriminated against a Buddhist prisoner by denying him "a reasonable opportunity of pursuing his faith comparable to the opportunity afforded fellow prisoners"); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 272 (1951) ("The conclusion is inescapable that the use of the park was denied because of the City Council's dislike for or disagreement with the [Jehovah's] Witnesses or their views. The right to equal protection of the laws, in the exercise of those freedoms of speech and religion protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, has a firmer foundation than the whims or personal opinions of a local governing body."). In some cases involving both Religion Clauses, the Court has suggested that refusing to accommodate religious activity might also demonstrate impermissible hostility to religion. See Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.

[23] See, e.g., Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 67, 70 (1953).

[24] Id.

[25] Id. at 69.

[26] Id. at 69–70.

[27] Masterpiece Cakeshop, slip op. at 3. In a subsequent case, the Supreme Court emphasized that these "'official expressions of hostility' to religion" led the Court to "set aside" the policies "without further inquiry." Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 12 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (quoting Masterpiece Cakeshop, slip op. at 18). Two members of the six-Justice majority in Masterpiece Cakeshop, however, had stated that the case was reviewed under strict scrutiny analysis in a concurring opinion. Masterpiece Cakeshop, slip op. at 1 (Gorsuch, J., concurring).

[28] Masterpiece Cakeshop, slip op. at 3.

[29] Id. at 13–14.

[30] Id. at 14. See also id. at 16 ("A principled rationale for the difference in treatment of these two instances cannot be based on the government's own assessment of offensiveness.").

[31] Tandon v. Newsom, No. 20A151, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Apr. 9, 2021) (per curiam).

religious gatherings, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.[32] In the first case, Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn v. Cuomo, the Court noted that while houses of worship were subject to strict occupancy limits, "essential" businesses faced no such restrictions.[33] This "especially harsh treatment" of religious groups triggered strict scrutiny, which the government could not satisfy.[34] In the second case, Tandon v. Newsom, the Court explained that "whether two activities are comparable . . . must be judged against the asserted government interest that justifies the regulation at issue."[35] In the context of restrictions to prevent the spread of COVID-19, the Court said comparability was "concerned with the risks various activities pose."[36] Applying these principles to the challenged restrictions, the opinion held that the state did treat "some comparable secular activities more favorably than at-home religious exercise, permitting hair salons, retail stores, personal care services, movie theaters, private suites at sporting events and concerts, and indoor restaurants to bring together more than three households at a time."[37] The Court further held that the challengers were likely to prevail under a strict scrutiny analysis because the state had "not shown that 'public health would be imperiled' by employing less restrictive measures."[38]

Accordingly, a law that contains exemptions may be subject to strict scrutiny if those exemptions create or allow religious discrimination.[39] As discussed in more detail elsewhere,[40] early Supreme Court jurisprudence considering restrictions on religious speech in public forums invalidated rules that granted officials broad discretion that they could use to discriminate against religious speech.[41] Citing seemingly similar concerns, Smith said that the Court had reviewed laws creating "a system of individual exemptions" under a heightened level of scrutiny requiring the government to demonstrate a compelling interest.[42] The Supreme Court explained that, for example, it had applied this heightened standard of review to an unemployment compensation system that required "individualized governmental assessment" of whether an individual had shown "good cause" for refusing work.[43]

---

[32] Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn v. Cuomo, No. 20A87, slip op. at 3 (U.S. Nov. 25, 2020) (per curiam); Tandon, slip op. at 1. The per curiam opinion in Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn also "addresse[d]" another case, Agudath Israel of America v. Cuomo, No. 20A90. No. 20A87, slip op. at 1 (U.S. Nov. 25, 2020). See also S. Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, No. 20A136 (U.S. Feb. 5, 2021) (mem.) (granting temporary relief enjoining prohibition on indoor worship services); Gateway City Church v. Newsom, No. 20A138 (U.S. Feb. 26, 2021) (mem.) (granting temporary relief enjoining prohibition on indoor worship services and stating that such relief was "clearly dictated by this Court's decision in South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom").

[33] Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, slip op. at 3. The per curiam opinion did not explicitly analyze whether activities at these essential businesses were comparable to the religious activities before concluding that the policy was not neutral, though it did note that "factories and schools have contributed to the spread of COVID-19." See id. at 3. In a concurring opinion, Justice Neil Gorsuch emphasized that strict scrutiny is triggered if the government treats "religious exercises worse than comparable secular activities," and emphasized that people may also gather for extended periods in the businesses designated as essential. Id. at 1–2 (Gorsuch J., concurring) (emphasis added).

[34] Id. at 3, 4 (per curiam). The Court held that while the government had a "compelling interest" in "stemming the spread of COVID-19," these regulations were not narrowly tailored to that interest. Id. at 4.

[35] Tandon, slip op. at 2.

[36] Id.

[37] Id. at 3.

[38] Id. at 4 (quoting Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, slip op. at 5).

[39] See Tandon, slip op. at 2.

[40] Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s.

[41] See, e.g., Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 273 (1951); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 305 (1940).

[42] Smith, 494 U.S. at 883–84. Smith did not expressly draw a comparison between the broad "good cause" inquiry that was at issue in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 401 (1963), and the broad discretionary regimes governing public forums. Instead, Smith suggested that the Court had applied a heightened standard of review in the latter set of cases because they involved "the Free Exercise Clause in conjunction with other constitutional protections, such as freedom of speech and of the press." 494 U.S. at 881.

[43] Smith, 494 U.S. at 884.

The Court expanded on this aspect of the Smith opinion in Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, decided in 2021, saying that the presence of individualized exemptions may render a law not generally applicable and therefore subject to strict scrutiny.[44] In Fulton, the Supreme Court held that a Catholic foster care agency was entitled to a constitutional exception from a city's nondiscrimination policy.[45] The city had refused to sign a contract with the agency unless it agreed to a provision prohibiting discrimination on the basis of certain protected classes, including sexual orientation, in the provision of services.[46] The agency argued that this provision would impermissibly require it to certify same-sex foster parents in violation of its religious beliefs.[47] The Supreme Court agreed, saying that the contract's nondiscrimination provision was not generally applicable under Smith because it allowed a city official to grant exceptions, in the official's "sole discretion."[48] Although the city had never actually granted an exception to either secular or religious activities under its other contracts, and asserted that it had no intention of granting any such exception in the future, the Court nonetheless held that the nondiscrimination provision "incorporate[d] a system of individual exemptions," and that the city could not "refuse to extend that [exemption] system to cases of religious hardship without compelling reason."[49] Ultimately, the Supreme Court concluded that the city failed to meet this standard, because it had offered "no compelling reason why it has a particular interest in denying an exception to [the religious agency] while making them available to others."[50]

Amdt1.5 Relationship Between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment's Religion Clauses prohibit the government from making any law "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."[1] Together, the Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses guarantee religious freedom,[2] deeming "religious beliefs and religious expression . . . too precious to be either proscribed or prescribed by the State."[3]

In many ways, the two provisions work together to ensure government neutrality towards religion: the Establishment Clause prohibits "a fusion of governmental and religious functions" or official governmental support for "the tenets of one or of all orthodoxies," while the Free Exercise Clause protects "the right of every person to freely choose his own course" of [44] Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, No. 19-123, slip op. at 6–7 (U.S. June 17, 2021).

---

[45] Id. at 15.

[46] Id. at 3.

[47] Id. at 3, 15.

[48] Id. at 11.

[49] Id. (quoting Emp't Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 879 (1990)) (internal quotation marks omitted) (alteration in original).

[50] Id. at 15.

[1] U.S. Const. amend. I (emphasis added). The Religion Clauses apply to Congress in the text of the provision, and to the states by incorporation through the Fourteenth Amendment. See Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 8 (1947) (incorporating the Establishment Clause); Hamilton v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 293 U.S. 245, 262 (1934) (incorporating the Free Exercise Clause); see also Amdt14.S1.4.2 Early Doctrine on Incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

[2] E.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 162 (1878).

[3] Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 589 (1992).

religious observance "free of any compulsion from the state."[4] The two clauses, however, operate in distinct ways, and "forbid two quite different kinds of governmental encroachment upon religious freedom."[5] The Free Exercise Clause is concerned with "governmental compulsion," while the Establishment Clause is "violated by . . . laws which establish an official religion whether those laws operate directly to coerce nonobserving individuals or not."[6] Viewed another way, the Free Exercise Clause protects the individual's religious beliefs, while the Establishment Clause is additionally concerned with institutional "tendencies to political tyranny and subversion of civil authority."[7]

The Supreme Court has long recognized a "tension" between the Religion Clauses.[8] For example, in 1947's Everson v. Board of Education, the Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a state program that paid the bus fares of schoolchildren, including those who attended religious schools.[9] While acknowledging that the Establishment Clause prevented the state from giving "tax-raised funds to the support of an institution which teaches the tenets and faith of any church," the Court also cautioned that neither could the state exclude citizens, "because of their faith, or lack of it, from receiving the benefits of public welfare legislation."[10] The Court said it had to be "careful" that, in service of protecting "against state-established churches," it would not "inadvertently prohibit [the state] from extending . . . general . . . benefits to all its citizens without regard to their religious belief."[11] In the words of the Court: "State power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions than it is to favor them."[12] Accordingly, in some decisions, the Court has cautioned that the government "may not establish a 'religion of secularism' in the sense of affirmatively opposing or showing hostility to religion, thus 'preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe.'"[13]

The Court has recognized "room for play in the joints" between the proscriptions of "governmentally established religion" and "governmental interference with religion," pursuing "a benevolent neutrality which will permit religious exercise to exist without sponsorship and without interference."[14] Accordingly, the Court has recognized, as in Everson, that the government may sometimes accommodate or indirectly support religious entities or activities without violating the Establishment Clause, even when those accommodations are

---

[4] Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 222 (1963). See also, e.g., Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church & Sch. v. EEOC, 565 U.S. 171, 182 (2012) ("Both Religion Clauses bar the government from interfering with the decision of a religious group to fire one of its ministers."); Amdt1.2.3.1 Overview of Government Resolution of Religious Disputes.

[5] Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 430 (1962).

[6] Id.

[7] McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 430 (1961). See also Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 15 (1947) ("The structure of our government has, for the preservation of civil liberty, rescued the temporal institutions from religious interference. On the other hand, it has secured religious liberty from the invasion of the civil authority." (quoting Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679, 713 (1871))).

[8] E.g., Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 788 (1973); Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 677 (1971) (plurality opinion). See also Amdt1.3.2 Accommodationist and Separationist Theories of the Establishment Clause. Cf. Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 20 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (questioning an interpretation that would create tension between the Establishment, Free Exercise, and Free Speech Clauses, saying they should instead be viewed as having complementary purposes).

[9] Everson, 330 U.S. at 17.

[10] Id. at 16.

[11] Id.

[12] Id. at 18.

[13] Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 225 (1963) (quoting Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314 (1952)). In Schempp, however, the Court invalidated mandatory Bible readings in schools despite this caution against hostility to religion, holding these religious exercises instead violated the Establishment Clause's requirement of "strict neutrality." Id.

[14] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 669 (1970).

not required by the Free Exercise Clause.[15] A permissible accommodation will generally relieve a burden on religious exercise, such as by exempting religious practices from a general regulation.[16] Attempts at accommodation may go too far and violate the Establishment Clause, however, if they merely aid religious exercise rather than relieving a burden.[17] For instance, in one case, the Court concluded that a state had violated the Establishment Clause by intentionally giving a specific religious group "exclusive control" of a school district.[18] This "proposed accommodation single[d] out a particular religious sect for special treatment," and the Court clarified that "permissible legislative accommodations" must honor "neutrality as among religions."[19] Notwithstanding this case's concern about preferential treatment, the Supreme Court has seemed to move more towards an accommodationist view of the Establishment Clause in recent decades.[20]

Conversely, turning to the second aspect of the "play in the joints" described above,[21] the government may sometimes limit its support for religion without violating the Free Exercise Clause, even when those restrictions are not required by the Establishment Clause.[22] Stated another way, the government may sometimes take "antiestablishment" positions, such as declining to provide support to certain religious activities, without violating the Free Exercise Clause.[23] In Locke v. Davey, the Court held that a state did not violate the Free Exercise Clause by prohibiting students from using publicly funded scholarships to pursue devotional theology degrees.[24] Although providing such scholarships would not violate the Establishment [15] See, e.g., id. at 671–72 (describing prior cases and holding that a property tax exemption that included religious properties used solely for religious purposes did not violate the Establishment Clause). See also, e.g., Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709, 714 (2005) (holding that federal statute protecting prisoners' religious exercise did not "exceed the limits of permissible government accommodation of religious practices"); Corp. of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 338 (1987) (holding that exempting religious organizations' secular activities from federal law prohibiting employment discrimination was a permissible accommodation consistent with the Establishment Clause); Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 234 n.22 (1972) (holding that exempting the Amish from the state's compulsory education system was a permissible accommodation consistent with the Establishment Clause); Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 389–90 (1918) (saying the "unsoundness" of Free Exercise and Establishment Clause challenges to an exemption from the draft for conscientious objectors was "apparent").

[16] See Cnty. of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 613 n.59 (1989); Amos, 483 U.S. at 338; Yoder, 406 U.S. at 234 n.22. See also, e.g., Cutter, 544 U.S. at 720 ("Foremost, we find RLUIPA's institutionalized-persons provision compatible with the Establishment Clause because it alleviates exceptional government-created burdens on private religious exercise."); id. (noting that the Act must "be administered neutrally among different faiths" and that "courts must take adequate account of the burdens a requested accommodation may impose on nonbeneficiaries").

[17] See Cnty. of Allegheny, 492 U.S. at 613 n.59 (explaining that a county's crèche display was not a permissible accommodation, because prohibiting the display in a county building would "not impose a burden on the practice of Christianity (except to the extent that some Christian sect seeks to be an officially approved religion)"); see also, e.g., Tex. Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 15 (1989) (plurality opinion) (ruling that a state tax exemption for religious periodicals violated the Establishment Clause as a subsidy directed "exclusively to religious organizations that is not required by the Free Exercise Clause" (emphasis added)).

[18] Bd. of Educ. of Kiryas Joel Village Sch. Dist. v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687, 698 (1994) (plurality opinion); accord id. at 711 (Stevens, J., concurring).

[19] Id. at 706–07 (plurality opinion); see also Amdt1.3.6.3 Lemon's Effect Prong and Accommodation of Religion. Cf., e.g., Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136, 144–45, n.11 (1987) (holding that the government would not violate the Establishment Clause by extending generally available unemployment benefits equally to "religious observers who must leave their employment due to an irreconcilable conflict between the demands of work and conscience").

[20] Amdt1.3.3 Establishment Clause Tests Generally.

[21] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 669 (1970).

[22] Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 722 (2004).

[23] Id.

[24] Id. at 725.

Clause,[25] the Court nonetheless concluded that the state could take a "more stringent" approach to "antiestablishment" than the U.S. Constitution and choose not to fund these specific religious activities.[26] The Court characterized the state's interest in not using public funds to support church leadership as "historic and substantial," and noted that the state policy contained no evidence of "animus towards religion."[27] In a similar vein, the Court in 1974 upheld a state's ability to exclude religious schools from school transportation programs.[28]

Since deciding Locke, however, the Court has seemingly narrowed the "play in the joints"[29] on this issue, rejecting states' interests in "preventing establishment" in other cases presenting different factual circumstances.[30] The Court has suggested that in some cases, failing to accommodate religious activity would demonstrate impermissible hostility to religion.[31] Further, more recent decisions have ruled that states violated the Free Exercise Clause by excluding religious organizations from generally available benefits programs. First, in Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, the Court held that a state acted unconstitutionally when it excluded religious organizations from receiving grants to purchase rubber playground surfaces.[32] The Court explained that because the program barred religious organizations based solely on their religious character, this religious penalty was subject "to the 'most rigorous' scrutiny" and could be justified only by "a state interest 'of the highest order.'"[33] In the Court's view, the state's interest in "skating as far as possible from religious establishment concerns" was insufficiently "compelling" in light of the policy's "clear infringement on free exercise."[34] The Court distinguished Locke by saying the state in Locke had permissibly chosen to deny a scholarship because of what the recipient "proposed to do—use the funds to prepare for the ministry."[35] By contrast, in Trinity Lutheran, the Supreme Court held that the state was impermissibly denying funds because of what the recipient [25] Id. at 719 (characterizing the program as indirect aid); see also Amdt1.3.4.5 Zelman and Indirect Assistance to Religion.

[26] Locke, 540 U.S. at 722.

[27] Id. at 725.

[28] Luetkemeyer v. Kaufmann, 419 U.S. 888 (1974) (mem.), aff'g 364 F. Supp. 376, 386 (W.D. Mo. 1973) (holding that the state's "long established constitutional policy . . . insist[ing] upon a degree of separation of church and state to probably a higher degree than that required by the First Amendment" was a compelling state interest that justified "any possible" free exercise infringement).

[29] Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 669 (1970).

[30] McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 628–29 (1978) (plurality opinion) (saying that a state's antiestablishment interest in provisions disqualifying clergy from legislative office "lost whatever validity [it] may once have enjoyed," ruling that the "essence" of the state's rationale was "contrary to the [modern] anti-establishment principle with its command of neutrality"); see also Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 275–76 (1981) (holding that a state's interest "in proscribing indirect state support for religion" was not "sufficiently 'compelling'" to justify closing university facilities to religious worship, given that the state's antiestablishment interests were "limited by the Free Exercise Clause and in this case by the Free Speech Clause as well").

[31] See, e.g., Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 28–29 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (saying preventing teachers from engaging in personal religious activity would "preference secular activity" and be hostile to religion); Am. Legion v. Am. Humanist Ass'n, No. 17-1717, slip op. at 2 (U.S. June 20, 2019) (saying that removing a cross that had "become a prominent community landmark" would express hostility to religion); see generally Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314 (1952) (saying disallowing accommodation "would . . . find in the Constitution a requirement that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups," impermissibly "preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe").

[32] Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, No. 15-577, slip op. at 15 (U.S. June 26, 2017). See also Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice.

[33] Trinity Lutheran, slip op. at 14 (quoting Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 546 (1993) and McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 628 (1978)).

[34] Id.

[35] Id. at 12.

"was"—a church.[36] A plurality of the Court further clarified that the Trinity Lutheran decision did "not address religious uses of funding or other forms of discrimination."[37]

The Court built on Trinity Lutheran's nondiscrimination principle in Espinoza v. Montana Department of Revenue, ruling that a state could not bar religious schools from participating in a tax credit program benefiting private school students.[38] The state supreme court had concluded that the program, which originally included religious schools, violated a state constitutional provision that prohibited the government from providing direct or indirect financial support to religious schools.[39] The U.S. Supreme Court rejected the state's argument that it had barred religious schools from the program based on how they would use the funds—for religious education—and held instead that the text of the state constitution barred religious schools from public benefits solely because of their religious character.[40] Again distinguishing Locke, the Court emphasized that the state had not merely excluded any "particular 'essentially religious' course of instruction," but barred all aid to religious schools.[41] Further, unlike the "'historic and substantial' state interest in not funding the training of clergy" at issue in Locke, there was no similar historically grounded interest in disqualifying religious schools from public aid more generally.[42] Accordingly, following the analysis in Trinity Lutheran, the Court ruled that the exclusion based on religious status was unconstitutional under a strict scrutiny standard.[43]

In Carson v. Makin, the Court squarely rejected the idea that states could exclude religious schools from an indirect aid program based on religious uses of the funds, further narrowing the play in the joints.[44] A state program allowed parents to use tuition assistance funds at public schools or "approved" private schools, which had to be "nonsectarian."[45] Maine raised two claims to try to avoid Trinity Lutheran.[46] First, the state argued its program was designed to provide a public education, which inherently entailed a secular education.[47] The Court rejected this claim, saying the state could not recast a discriminatory exclusion as a permissible funding condition.[48] Second, seizing on the possible distinction in Trinity Lutheran between religious status and religious use, the state said it excluded sectarian schools based on concerns about public funds being used for religious activities.[49] In contrast to Espinoza, the Court in Carson accepted that the state was excluding the schools based on their religious use of funds, rather than merely their religious identity.[50] Nonetheless, the Court held that [37] Id. at 14 n.3 (plurality opinion).

[36] Id.

[38] Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, No. 18-1195, slip op. at 18–20 (U.S. June 30, 2020).

[39] Id. at 5.

[40] Id. at 10. Although the Court expressed concerns about the text of the state constitutional provision, the ruling solely invalidated this particular application of the provision. See id at 11–12.

[41] Id. at 13.

[42] Id. (quoting Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 725 (2004)).

[43] Id. at 18–20.

[44] Carson v. Makin, No. 20-1088, slip op. at 15–17 (U.S. June 21, 2022).

[45] Id. at 2–3. The assistance was available in districts that did not have a public secondary school. Id. at 2.

[46] Id. at 11.

[47] Id.

[48] Id. at 13. The Court stated that the nonsectarian private schools already participating in the program differed from public schools in a variety of ways, undermining the state's claim that the program sought to provide the equivalent of a public education. Id. at 12–13.

[49] Id. at 16.

[50] Id.

"use-based discrimination" is just as "offensive to the Free Exercise Clause,"[51] at least in the context of a "neutral" indirect benefit program that did not violate the Establishment Clause.[52] Accordingly, as in Trinity Lutheran and Espinoza, the Court ruled the exclusion unconstitutional under a strict scrutiny analysis.[53] Further, while Trinity Lutheran had distinguished Locke in part by emphasizing that the theology-degree exclusion was based on the recipient's use of the funds, the Carson opinion distinguished Locke by characterizing the case as having a "narrow focus on vocational religious degrees."[54]

Amdt1.6 Relationship Between Religion Clauses and Free Speech Clause

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has described the First Amendment as protecting certain rights of conscience.[1] This general description can encompass the related protections for both speech and religion: "Just as the right to speak and the right to refrain from speaking are complementary components of a broader concept of individual freedom of mind, so also the individual's freedom to choose his own creed is the counterpart of his right to refrain from accepting the creed established by the majority."[2]

Supreme Court cases recognizing protections for religious speech have explored the precise relationship between the Free Speech and Free Exercise Clauses. The Court has recognized that each Clause protects private religious speech on its own,[3] but in some cases, has invoked both Clauses to outline protections for religious speech.[4] The two Clauses "work in tandem": "[w]here the Free Exercise Clause protects religious exercises, whether communicative or not, the Free Speech Clause provides overlapping protection for expressive religious activities."[5] For example, in Jamison v. Texas, the Court held that a city ordinance prohibiting the distribution of handbills violated both the Free Exercise and the Free Speech Clauses when it was applied to a person who was advertising religious services and materials.[6] The Court emphasized constitutional protections for expressing one's views on public streets as well as

---

[51] Id.

[52] Id. at 10

[53] Id. at 9–10.

[54] Id. at 18.

[1] See, e.g., Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 50 (1985) (saying the Supreme Court "has identified the individual's freedom of conscience as the central liberty that unifies the various Clauses in the First Amendment"); see also Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[2] Wallace, 472 U.S. at 52.

[3] See, e.g., Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 269 (1981) (saying that religious worship and discussion "are forms of speech and association protected by the First Amendment"); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 300 (1940) (ruling that applying a law prohibiting solicitation to people engaged in religious speech violated the Free Exercise Clause).

[4] See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 509 (1946) (holding both clauses protected a person's right to distribute religious literature); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 114 (1943) (same); Largent v. Texas, 318 U.S. 418, 422 (1943) (same); Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413, 414 (1943) (same).

[5] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 11 (U.S. June 27, 2022). In this case, the Supreme Court separately analyzed the Free Exercise and Free Speech Clause claims of a football coach who sought to pray on the football field after games, and held that regardless of which constitutional standard it applied, the coach prevailed. See id. at 19–20.

[6] Jamison, 318 U.S. at 414.

protections for "a clearly religious activity."[7] In a similar vein, some early cases interpreting free exercise protections seemed to consider certain free speech concepts such as the public forum doctrine.[8]

In a later case, though, the Supreme Court emphasized that the First Amendment nonetheless "protects speech and religion by quite different mechanisms," pointing in part to the Establishment Clause.[9] Namely, the Free Speech Clause contemplates that the government will participate in public discussions, as part of the "full expression" of speech.[10] By contrast, while the Free Exercise Clause's "freedom of conscience and worship . . . has close parallels in the speech provisions of the First Amendment, . . . the Establishment Clause is a specific prohibition on forms of state intervention in religious affairs."[11] However, the Court has since cautioned against a reading of the Clauses that creates tension or allows the Establishment Clause to "trump the other two."[12] The Court has ruled that schools may not violate a party's free exercise or free speech rights based on "phantom constitutional violations" stemming from "misconstruction[s] of the Establishment Clause."[13]

A number of Supreme Court cases have considered whether the government violated the Establishment Clause by impermissibly supporting or endorsing private religious speech.[14] For instance, in Widmar v. Vincent, a university prevented a student group from using its buildings for religious worship, citing Establishment Clause concerns.[15] The Court recognized that although the group's private religious speech was protected by the Free Speech Clause, the government's obligation to comply with the Establishment Clause could provide a compelling interest allowing the university to restrict that speech—if allowing the group to use its facilities would constitute impermissible support.[16] However, in Widmar and a number of other cases, the Court held that schools do not violate the Establishment Clause merely by hosting religious speech, where the speech can be attributed to private parties rather than the government.[17]

---

[7] Id. at 416–17.

[8] These cases are discussed in more detail in Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s. By contrast, some Supreme Court cases have invoked only the Free Speech Clause to hold that religious speech is constitutionally protected. See, e.g., Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 717 (1977) (holding the Free Speech Clause prevented the government from requiring people to display a message they objected to on moral and religious grounds); Heffron v. Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, 452 U.S. 640, 654 (1981) (holding the Free Speech Clause did not prevent the government from imposing reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on an organization's religious practice). Cases involving only the Free Speech Clause and not the Free Exercise Clause are discussed Amdt1.2.2.1 Introduction to the Historical Background on the Religion Clauses.

[9] Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 591 (1992).

[10] Id.

[11] Id.

[12] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 30 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[13] Id. at 30–31.

[14] See, e.g., Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 303 n.12 (2000) (collecting cases). The Free Speech Clause aspects of these cases are discussed Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum and Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker.

[15] Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 265, 270 (1981).

[16] Id. at 269–71.

[17] Id. at 274; see also Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 113 (2001) (holding elementary school would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing a religious club to use its facilities); Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 840 (1995) (holding university would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing religious groups to use generally available student activity fund to publish religious newspaper); Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 395 (1993) (holding school board would not violate the Establishment Clause by allowing a church to use its facilities to show a religious film); Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 253 (1990) (holding federal law did not violate the Establishment Clause by creating a funding condition prohibiting public secondary schools from denying access to forums based on students' speech, including religious

To determine whether speech should be considered private, the Court has looked to factors such as whether a forum is generally available to a variety of participants, both religious and nonreligious, as well as the amount of control the government exercised over the speech.[18] In one case, the Supreme Court held that a state impermissibly denied a private group permission to display a cross in a public park, concluding that the cross "was private expression . . . . fully protected under the Free Speech Clause."[19] The fact that the "purely private religious speech" was "connected to the State only through its occurrence in a public forum"—a park where the state had previously hosted a variety of other speech—meant that the government did not violate the Establishment Clause by hosting the display.[20]

More broadly, the Supreme Court has rejected Establishment Clause challenges where schools "grant[ed] access to . . . facilities on a religion-neutral basis to a wide spectrum of student groups," including religious groups.[21] The Court stated this principle directly in Board of Education v. Mergens, in which a federal law prohibited public secondary schools from denying students access to forums based on the content of their speech.[22] The Court upheld that law, holding that requiring schools to host religious speech did not violate the Establishment Clause.[23] Among other factors, the Court highlighted that the law required schools to host a wide variety of speech "on a nondiscriminatory basis," and that the specific school raising this constitutional claim had in fact recognized a "broad spectrum" of student clubs, "counteract[ing] any possible message of official endorsement of or preference for religion or a particular religious belief."[24]

By contrast, in Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, the Court held that student-led prayers held prior to public school football games could not "be regarded as 'private speech.'"[25] The Court emphasized that not only did the invocations "take place on government property at government-sponsored school-related events," but the government also helped to select the speaker, "invite[d] and encourage[d] religious messages," and otherwise appeared to support the speech.[26] In addition, the Court noted that the school allowed "only one student, the same student for the entire season, to give the invocation," which was "subject to particular regulations that confine the content and topic of the student's message."[27] Consequently, the school practice violated the Establishment Clause.[28]

Thus, while the Free Speech and the Free Exercise Clauses serve similar goals of preventing government infringement of individual freedom of thought, their protections are speech). Cf. Shurtleff v. Boston, No. 20-1800, slip op. at 12 (U.S. May 2, 2022) (implicitly ruling city would not violate Establishment Clause by flying a religious flag at city hall, where the flag raising did not qualify as government speech under Free Speech Clause).

[18] See, e.g., Rosenberger, 515 U.S. at 842. Rosenberger is discussed in more detail in Amdt1.3.4.4 Application of the Lemon Test.

[19] Capitol Square Review & Advisory Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753, 760 (1995).

[20] Id. at 767 (plurality opinion); see also id. at 774–75 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (agreeing with the plurality's holding, noting that the case involved "truly private speech . . . allowed on equal terms in a vigorous public forum").

[21] Rosenberger, 515 U.S. at 842.

[22] Bd. of Educ. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 253 (1990).

[23] Id. at 248.

[24] Id. at 250, 252.

[25] Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 302 (2000).

[26] Id. at 302, 306–10.

[27] Id. at 303.

[28] Id. at 317.

not necessarily coextensive.[29] Further, while Establishment Clause concerns could theoretically justify restrictions on private religious speech, the Court has largely held that the government only violates the Establishment Clause if it goes beyond merely hosting private religious speech to give special support to religious activity. Cases reading the Establishment Clause to have a more limited scope could further contract the government's ability to restrict religious speech by employees or on public property.[30] For example, in Kennedy v. Bremerton School District, the Supreme Court ruled that a school violated the Free Exercise and Free Speech Clauses when it punished a football coach for praying on the football field after games.[31] The Court refused to consider concerns about government endorsement of prayer, and in considering the applicability of Santa Fe, looked only to aspects of that decision that it believed went to government coercion.[32] Ultimately, the Court concluded there was no coercion in the coach's prayer practice, as discussed in more detail in another essay.[33]

Amdt1.7 Free Speech Clause

Amdt1.7.1 Historical Background on Free Speech Clause

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Free Speech Clause went through several iterations before it was adopted as part of the First Amendment. James Madison drafted an initial version of the speech and press clauses that was introduced in the House of Representatives on June 8, 1789. Madison's draft provided: "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable."[1] The House of Representatives special committee rewrote Madison's language to make the speech and press clauses read: "The freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to the government for redress of grievances, shall not be infringed."[2] The Senate subsequently rewrote the speech and press clauses to read: "That Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."[3] Later, the Senate combined the religion clauses and the speech and press clauses[4] and the House and Senate agreed to final language in conference.

---

[29] Cf., e.g., Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 19–20 (U.S. June 27, 2022) (noting dispute over whether Free Exercise Clause strict scrutiny analysis or more lenient Free Speech Clause test applied to expressive activity protected under both Clauses).

[30] See id. at 29–30.

[31] See id. at 31–32.

[32] See id. at 23, 30.

[33] See id. at 29–30; Amdt1.3.7.2 Coercion and Establishment Clause Doctrine.

[1] Annals of Cong. 434 (1789). Madison had also proposed language limiting the power of the states in a number of respects, including a guarantee of freedom of the press. Id. at 435. Although passed by the House, the amendment was defeated by the Senate.

[2] Id. at 731.

[3] The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 1148–49 (B. Schwartz ed. 1971).

[4] Id. at 1153.

There was relatively little debate over the speech and press clauses in the House, and there is no record of debate over the clauses in the Senate.[5] During debate over the clauses, Madison warned against the dangers that would arise "from discussing and proposing abstract propositions, of which the judgment may not be convinced. I venture to say, that if we confine ourselves to an enumeration of simple, acknowledged principles, the ratification will meet with but little difficulty."[6] The general statement of these "simple" principles, however, gave rise to controversy when applied to specific government actions.[7]

The Sedition Act of 1798 sparked one such controversy that "crystallized a national awareness of the central meaning of the First Amendment."[8] The law punished anyone who would "write, print, utter or publish . . . any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either house of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame . . . or to bring them . . . into contempt or disrepute."[9] While Thomas Jefferson and Madison condemned the act as unconstitutional, the Adams Administration used it to prosecute its political opponents.[10] Although the Supreme Court never ruled the Sedition Act unconstitutional prior to its expiration in 1801, the Court later recognized "a broad consensus" from the political and judicial branches that the act was unconstitutional.[11]

Amdt1.7.2 Procedural Matters

Amdt1.7.2.1 The Overbreadth Doctrine, Statutory Language, and Free Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The overbreadth doctrine focuses on the need for precision in drafting a statute that may affect First Amendment rights, and more concretely, allows a special kind of facial challenge to statutes.[1] Ordinarily, to prevail in a facial challenge—a claim challenging a statute on its face, [5] The House debate insofar as it touched upon this amendment was concerned almost exclusively with a motion to strike the right to assemble and an amendment to add a right of the people to instruct their Representatives. 1 Annals of Cong. 731–49 (Aug. 15, 1789).

---

[6] Id. at 738.

[7] For example, Madison refused to concur officially in President George Washington's condemnation of "[c]ertain self-created societies"—political clubs supporting the French Revolution—and he successfully deflected Federalist interest in censuring such societies. I. Brant, James Madison: Father of the Constitution 1787–1800, at 416–20 (1950). "If we advert to the nature of republican government," Madison told the House, "we shall find that the censorial power is in the people over the government, and not in the government over the people." 4 Annals of Cong. 934 (1794). However, while a member of his county's committee on public safety, Madison had promoted prosecution of Loyalist speakers and the burning of their pamphlets during the Revolutionary period. 1 Papers of James Madison 147, 161–62, 190–92 (W. Hutchinson & W. Rachal, eds., 1962). Writing to Madison in 1788, Jefferson stated: "A declaration that the Federal Government will never restrain the presses from printing anything they please, will not take away the liability of the printers for false facts printed." 13 Papers of Thomas Jefferson 442 (J. Boyd ed., 1955). A year later, Jefferson suggested to Madison that the free speech-free press clause might read something like: "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write or otherwise to publish anything but false facts affecting injuriously the life, liberty, property, or reputation of others or affecting the peace of the confederacy with foreign nations." 15 Papers, supra, at 367.

[8] N.Y. Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 273 (1964).

[9] 1 Stat. 596 (1798)

[10] See J. Smith, Freedom's Fetters: The Alien and Sedition Laws and American Civil Liberties 159 et seq. (1956).

[11] N.Y. Times Co., 376 U.S. at 276.

[1] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 432–33 (1963).

rather than only in certain applications—a litigant "must 'establish that no set of circumstances exists under which the [law] would be valid,' or show that the law lacks 'a plainly legitimate sweep.'"[2] Accordingly, if a statute sweeps in both protected and unprotected activity, the Court will ordinarily only invalidate its application to protected conduct.[3] In the context of the First Amendment, however, the Supreme Court has allowed a person whose own conduct may not be constitutionally protected to bring a facial challenge to a law, if the statute is so broadly written that it sweeps in protected speech and could therefore have "a deterrent effect on free expression."[4] The overbreadth doctrine thus allows the facial invalidation of a law that "punishes a 'substantial' amount of protected free speech, 'judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.'"[5] For example, in United States v. Stevens, the Supreme Court applied the overbreadth doctrine to rule unconstitutional a federal law that "criminalize[d] the commercial creation, sale, or possession of certain depictions of animal cruelty."[6] The Court described the statute as "a criminal prohibition of alarming breadth," and concluded that "the presumptively impermissible applications of [the law] . . . far outnumber any permissible ones."[7]

The Supreme Court has recognized, however, that "there are substantial social costs created by the overbreadth doctrine when it blocks application of a law to constitutionally unprotected speech, or especially to constitutionally unprotected conduct."[8] The Supreme Court has cautioned that facial "[i]nvalidation for overbreadth is 'strong medicine' that is not to be 'casually employed.'"[9] The requirement that a law must be "substantially" overbroad

---

[2] Ams. for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta, No. 19-251, slip op. at 15 (U.S. July 1, 2021) (internal citations omitted) (quoting United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987); Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 552 U.S. 442, 449 (2008)).

[3] See, e.g., Barr v. Am. Ass'n of Political Consultants, No. 19-631, slip op at 13–14 (U.S. July 6, 2020) (discussing severability doctrine and the "power and preference" for partial invalidation of a statute); United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987) ("[W]e have not recognized an 'overbreadth' doctrine outside the limited context of the First Amendment."). But cf., e.g., Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500, 515–16 (1964) (concluding a First Amendment overbreadth case provided the appropriate analysis for a right-to-travel challenge to a statute that could not be narrowed due to the law's "indiscriminately cast and overly broad scope").

[4] Members of City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 798 (1984).

[5] Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 118–19 (2003) (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)).

[6] United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460, 464, 482 (2010).

[7] Id. at 474, 481. See, also, e.g., United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 266 (1967) (federal law barring members of registered Communist-action organizations from employment in defense facilities); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130, 131–32 (1974) (state law prohibiting using fighting words towards police performing official duties); Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 217–18 (1975) (city ordinance prohibiting films with nudity from being shown when visible from public streets); Doran v. Salem Inn, 422 U.S. 922, 932–34 (1975) (local ordinance prohibiting topless dancing in certain establishments, in the context of an appeal of a preliminary injunction); Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 U.S. 620, 633–39 (1980) (municipal ordinance prohibiting certain charitable organizations from soliciting contributions); Secretary of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 949–50 (1984) (charitable solicitation statute placing 25% cap on fundraising expenditures); City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 455, 467 (1987) (city ordinance making it unlawful to "oppose, molest, abuse, or interrupt" police officer in performance of duty); Bd. of Airport Comm'rs v. Jews for Jesus, 482 U.S. 569, 570, 577 (1987) (resolution banning all "First Amendment activities" at airport); Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844, 874–879 (1997) (statute banning "indecent" material on the internet); Iancu v. Brunetti, No. 18-302, slip op. at 11 (June 24, 2019) (federal law prohibiting the registration of immoral or scandalous trademarks); Ams. for Prosperity Found., slip op. at 16 (state law requiring charities to file forms disclosing information about donors).

[8] Hicks, 539 U.S. at 119 (upholding an ordinance banning from streets within a low-income housing development any person who is not a resident or employee and who "cannot demonstrate a legitimate business or social purpose for being on the premises"). The Supreme Court has also rejected application of the doctrine in, for example, Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134, 158–64 (1974) (plurality opinion); Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 757–61 (1974); and New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 766–74 (1982).

[9] United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 293 (2008) (quoting L.A. Police Dep't v. United Reporting Publ'g Corp., 528 U.S. 32, 39 (1999)).

accounts for this concern.[10] In addition, the Supreme Court has said "a state statute should not be deemed facially invalid unless it is not readily subject to a narrowing construction by the state courts, and its deterrent effect on legitimate expression is both real and substantial."[11] Further, the Court has said "that overbreadth analysis does not normally apply to commercial speech."[12]

Amdt1.7.2.2 Vagueness, Statutory Language, and Free Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Vagueness is a due process doctrine that can be brought into play with regard to any criminal and many civil statutes,[1] but it has a special significance when applied to governmental restrictions of speech: fear that a vague restriction may apply to one's speech may deter constitutionally protected speech as well as constitutionally unprotected speech.[2] In the First Amendment context, vagueness concerns are often combined with claims that the law is substantially overbroad and sweeps in too much protected speech.[3] Vagueness has been the basis for voiding numerous such laws, especially in the fields of loyalty oaths,[4] obscenity and indecency,[5] and restrictions on public demonstrations.[6] However, outside of the overbreadth context, the Court has rejected vagueness challenges where "the statutory terms are clear in their application to [a plaintiff's] proposed conduct"—even when that application may implicate speech, and when the scope of the law "may not be clear in every application."[7]

---

[10] Hicks, 539 U.S. at 119–20.

[11] Erznoznik, 422 U.S. at 216.

[12] Bd. of Trs. v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 481 (1989); see also, e.g., Bates v. State Bar of Ariz., 433 U.S. 350, 380 (1977) ("[T]he justification for the application of overbreadth analysis applies weakly, if at all, in the ordinary commercial context.")

[1] The vagueness doctrine generally requires that a statute be precise enough to give fair warning to actors that contemplated conduct is criminal, and to provide adequate standards to enforcement agencies, factfinders, and reviewing courts. See Amdt5.8.1 Overview of Void for Vagueness Doctrine through Amdt5.8.4 Laws That Establish Permissible Criminal Sentences.

[2] See, e.g., Brown v. Entm't Merchs. Ass'n, 564 U.S. 786, 807 (2011).

[3] see ; see also, e.g., NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 432–33 (1963).

[4] E.g., Cramp v. Board of Pub. Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961); Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967). See also Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991) (attorney discipline, extrajudicial statements).

[5] E.g., Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507 (1948); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952); Interstate Circuit v. City of Dallas, 390 U.S. 676 (1968); Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844, 870–874 (1997). In National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), the Court held that a "decency" criterion for the awarding of grants, which "in a criminal statute or regulatory scheme . . . could raise substantial vagueness concerns," was not unconstitutionally vague in the context of a condition on public subsidy for speech.

[6] E.g., Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969); Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971). See also Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974) (flag desecration law); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130 (1974) (punishment of opprobrious words); Hynes v. Mayor of Oradell, 425 U.S. 610 (1976) (door-to-door canvassing).

[7] Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1, 21 (2010); see also, e.g., Young v. Am. Mini Theatres, 427 U.S. 50, 59–61 (1976) (rejecting vagueness challenge brought by litigants who were "not affected" by "any element of vagueness" in the challenged laws, where they had not shown the statute had a real and substantial deterrent effect on protected speech).

Amdt1.7.2.3 Prior Restraints on Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has recognized that "liberty of the press, historically considered and taken up by the Federal Constitution, has meant, principally although not exclusively, immunity from previous restraints or censorship."[1] Under the English licensing system, which expired in 1695, all printing presses and printers were licensed and nothing could be published without prior approval of the state or church authorities.[2] The great struggle for liberty of the press was for the right to publish without a license what for a long time could be published only with a license.[3] Given this history, the Supreme Court reviews "[a]ny system of prior restraints of expression" with "a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity."[4] To state this another way, the government "carries a heavy burden of showing justification for the imposition of such a restraint."[5]

The United States Supreme Court's first encounter with a law imposing a prior restraint came in Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, in which a 5-4 majority voided a law authorizing the permanent enjoining of future violations by any newspaper or periodical once found to have published or circulated an "obscene, lewd and lascivious" or a "malicious, scandalous and defamatory" issue.[6] An injunction had been issued after the newspaper in question had printed a series of articles tying local officials to gangsters.[7] Although the dissenters maintained that the injunction constituted no prior restraint, because that doctrine applied to prohibitions of publication without advance approval of an executive official,[8] the majority deemed it "the essence of censorship" that, in order to avoid a contempt citation, the newspaper would have to clear future publications in advance with the judge.[9] Recognizing that liberty of the press to scrutinize closely the conduct of public affairs was essential, Chief Justice Charles Hughes stated: "The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct. Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege."[10] The Court, however, did not explore the kinds of restrictions to which the term "prior restraint" would apply other than to assert that prior restraint would only be permissible in "exceptional cases."[11]

The Supreme Court has written that "[t]he special vice of a prior restraint is that communication will be suppressed . . . before an adequate determination that it is unprotected

---

[1] Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931).

[2] 3 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1876 (1833).

[3] Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 451 (1938); Near, 283 U.S. at 713.

[4] Bantam Books v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963).

[5] Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 419 (1971); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 714 (1971).

[6] Near, 283 U.S. at 702, 723.

[7] Id. at 704.

[8] Id. at 733–36 (Butler, J., dissenting).

[9] Id. at 713 (majority opinion).

[10] Id. at 720 (emphasis added).

[11] Id. at 716.

by the First Amendment."[12] The prohibition on prior restraint, thus, essentially limits restraints until a final judicial determination is made that the First Amendment does not protect the restricted speech. For example, it limits temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions pending final judgments rather than permanent injunctions following final judgments that the First Amendment does not protect the restricted speech.[13]

In a number of cases during the mid-1900s, the Court invoked the doctrine of prior restraint to strike down restrictions on First Amendment rights, including a series of loosely drawn statutes and ordinances requiring licenses to hold meetings and parades and to distribute literature, with uncontrolled discretion in the licensor whether or not to issue them.[14] The doctrine that generally emerged from these early cases was that permit systems and prior licensing are constitutionally valid so long as the issuing official's discretion was limited to questions of time, place, and manner.[15] In a 1965 opinion, Freedman v. Maryland, the Supreme Court clarified that in the noncriminal context, a prior restraint may be upheld only if it contains certain procedural safeguards.[16] First, the burden must be on the government to prove that the speech is unprotected.[17] Second, the restraint may not "be administered in a manner which would lend an effect of finality to the censor's determination whether [speech] constitutes protected expression."[18] To meet this second requirement, a statute or "authoritative judicial construction" must ensure "that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain" the speech.[19] Content-neutral time, place, and manner regulations do not have to satisfy the procedural safeguards of [12] Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 390 (1973); see also Vance v. Univ. Amusement Co., 445 U.S. 308, 315–16 (1980) ("[T]he burden of supporting an injunction against a future exhibition [of allegedly obscene motion pictures] is even heavier than the burden of justifying the imposition of a criminal sanction for a past communication.").

---

[13] See Mark A. Lemley and Eugene Volokh, Freedom of Speech and Injunctions in Intellectual Property Cases, 48 DUKE L.J. 147, 169–71 (1998).

[14] E.g., Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951); Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U.S. 313 (1958). For other applications, see Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943); Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573 (1944). Some of these cases involved both free speech and free exercise rights. See Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s.

[15] Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941); Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953). In Carroll v. President & Comm'rs of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175 (1968), the Court held invalid the issuance of an ex parte injunction to restrain the holding of a protest meeting. The Carroll Court held that usually notice must be given the parties to be restrained and an opportunity for them to rebut the contentions presented to justify the sought-for restraint. In Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415 (1971), the Court held invalid as a prior restraint an injunction preventing the petitioners from distributing 18,000 pamphlets attacking respondent's alleged "blockbusting" real estate activities; he was held not to have borne the "heavy burden" of justifying the restraint. The Court stated: "No prior decisions support the claim that the interest of an individual in being free from public criticism of his business practices in pamphlets or leaflets warrants use of the injunctive power of a court. Designating the conduct as an invasion of privacy . . . is not sufficient to support an injunction against peaceful distribution of informational literature of the nature revealed by this record." Id. at 419–20. See also City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750 (1988) (ordinance vesting in the mayor unbridled discretion to grant or deny annual permit for location of newsracks on public property is facially invalid as prior restraint).

[16] Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58 (1965).

[17] Id.

[18] Id.

[19] Id. at 59. The Court further explained that "[a]ny restraint imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must . . . be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution," and "the procedure must . . . assure a prompt final judicial decision, to minimize the deterrent effect of an interim and possibly erroneous denial of a license." Id. at 59. The necessity of immediate appellate review of orders restraining the exercise of First Amendment rights was strongly emphasized in National Socialist Party v. Village of Skokie, 432 U.S. 43 (1977), and seems to explain the Court's action in Philadelphia Newspapers v. Jerome, 434 U.S. 241 (1978). But see Moreland v. Sprecher, 443 U.S. 709 (1979) (party can relinquish right to expedited review through failure to properly request it).

Freedman—although pursuant to those early cases, they still must "contain adequate standards to guide the official's decision and render it subject to effective judicial review."[20]

The Court has also encountered the doctrine in the national security area, for example, when the government attempted to enjoin press publication of classified documents pertaining to the Vietnam War[21] and, although the Court rejected the effort, at least five and perhaps six Justices concurred on principle that, in some circumstances, prior restraint of publication would be constitutional.[22]

Confronting a claimed conflict between free press and fair trial guarantees, the Court unanimously set aside a state court injunction barring the publication of information that might prejudice the subsequent trial of a criminal defendant.[23] Though agreed as to the result, the Justices were divided as to whether "gag orders" were ever permissible and if so what the standards for imposing them were. The majority opinion used a now-discredited formulation of the "clear and present danger" test and considered as factors in any decision on the imposition of a restraint upon press reporters "(a) the nature and extent of pretrial news coverage; (b) whether other measures would be likely to mitigate the effects of unrestrained pretrial publicity; and (c) how effectively a restraining order would operate to prevent the threatened danger."[24] Though the Court found that one seeking a restraining order must meet "the heavy burden of demonstrating, in advance of trial, that without a prior restraint a fair trial would be denied," it refused to "rule out the possibility of showing the kind of threat to fair trial rights that would possess the requisite degree of certainty to justify restraint."[25] On a different level, however, are orders that restrain the press as a party to litigation in the dissemination of information obtained through pretrial discovery. In Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, the Court determined that such orders protecting parties from abuses of discovery require "no heightened First Amendment scrutiny."[26]

---

[20] Thomas v. Chi. Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 322–23 (2002).

[21] New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971). The vote was 6-3, with Justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, William Brennan, Potter Stewart, Byron White, and Thurgood Marshall in the majority and Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices John Harlan and Harry Blackmun in the minority. Each Justice issued an opinion.

[22] The three dissenters thought such restraint appropriate in this case. Id. at 748, 752, 759. Justice Potter Stewart thought restraint would be proper if disclosure "will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people," id. at 730, while Justice Byron White did not endorse any specific phrasing of a standard. Id. at 730–33. Justice William Brennan would preclude even interim restraint except upon "governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly, and immediately cause the occurrence of an event kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea." Id. at 712–13. With respect to the right of the Central Intelligence Agency to prepublication review of the writings of former agents and its enforcement through contractual relationships, see Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980); Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. v. Colby, 509 F.2d 1362 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 992 (1975); United States v. Marchetti, 446 F.2d 1309 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1063 (1972).

[23] Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976).

[24] Id. at 562 (quoting Dennis v. United States, 183 F.2d 201, 212 (2d Cir. 1950), aff'd, 341 U.S. 494, 510 (1951)). Applying the tests, the Court agreed that (a) there was intense and pervasive pretrial publicity and more could be expected, but that (b) the lower courts had made little effort to assess the prospects of other methods of preventing or mitigating the effects of such publicity and that (c) in any event the restraining order was unlikely to have the desired effect of protecting the defendant's rights. Id. at 562–67. For more information on the Court's movement away from the clear-and-present danger standard, see Amdt1.7.5.3 Incitement Movement from Clear and Present Danger Test.

[25] Nebraska Press Ass'n, 427 U.S. at 569–70. The Court distinguished between reporting on judicial proceedings held in public and reporting of information gained from other sources, but found that a heavy burden must be met to secure a prior restraint on either. Id. at 570. See also Oklahoma Pub. Co. v. District Court, 430 U.S. 308 (1977) (setting aside injunction restraining news media from publishing name of juvenile involved in pending proceeding when name has been learned at open detention hearing that could have been closed but was not); Smith v. Daily Mail Pub. Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979).

[26] 467 U.S. 20, 36 (1984). The decision was unanimous, all other Justices joining Justice Lewis Powell's opinion for the Court, but Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall noting additionally that under the facts of the case important interests in privacy and religious freedom were being protected. Id. at 37, 38.

Amdt1.7.2.4 State Action Doctrine and Free Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment by its terms applies only to laws enacted by Congress and not to the actions of private persons.[1] As such, the First Amendment is subject to a "state action" (or "governmental action") limitation similar to that applicable to the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.[2] The Supreme Court has stated that "a private entity can qualify as a state actor in a few limited circumstances," such as "[1] when the private entity performs a traditional, exclusive public function; [2] when the government compels the private entity to take a particular action; or [3] when the government acts jointly with the private entity."[3] In addition, some private entities established by the government to carry out governmental objectives may qualify as state actors for purposes of the First Amendment. For example, in Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., the Court held that the national passenger train company Amtrak, "though nominally a private corporation," qualified as "an agency or instrumentality of the United States" for purposes of the First Amendment.[4] It did not matter, in the Court's view, that the federal statute establishing Amtrak expressly stated that Amtrak was not a federal agency because Amtrak was "established and organized under federal law for the very purpose of pursuing federal governmental objectives, under the direction and control of federal governmental appointees."[5]

Starting with the "public function" test, the Court extended the First Amendment to apply to the actions of a private party in Marsh v. Alabama, barring the punishment of a resident of a company-owned town for distributing religious literature.[6] While the town was owned by a private corporation, "it ha[d] all the characteristics of any other American town," including residences, businesses, streets, utilities, public safety officers, and a post office.[7] Under these circumstances, the Court held that "the corporation's property interests" did not "settle the question"[8]: "[w]hether a corporation or a municipality owns or possesses the town[,] the public in either case has an identical interest in the functioning of the community in such manner

---

[1] Through interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the prohibition extends to the states as well. See Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and Incorporation. Of course, the First Amendment also applies to the non-legislative branches of government—to every "government agency—local, state, or federal." Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 168 n.16 (1979).

[2] See, e.g., Amdt1.7.2.4 State Action Doctrine and Free Speech.

[3] Manhattan Cmty. Access Corp. v. Halleck, No. 17-702, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 17, 2019) (internal citations omitted) (citing Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 352–54 (1974), Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1004–05 (1982), and Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 941–42 (1982), respectively).

[4] 513 U.S. 374, 383, 394 (1995); see also Dep't of Transp. v. Ass'n of Am. R.R., 575 U.S. 43, 55 (2015) (extending the holding of Lebron, such that Amtrak was considered a governmental entity "for purposes of" the Fifth Amendment due process and separation-of-powers claims presented by the case).

[5] Lebron, 513 U.S. at 391–93, 398.

[6] Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 509 (1946). A state statute "ma[de] it a crime to enter or remain on the premises of another after having been warned not to do so"; the resident had been warned that, pursuant to a company policy, she could not distribute religious literature without a permit, and she subsequently disregarded that warning and refused to leave a sidewalk. Id. at 503–04. Accordingly, although the case involved a criminal prosecution brought by the State of Alabama, liability turned on the town's ability to prevent residents from distributing literature without a permit. See id.

[7] Id. at 502–03.

[8] Id. at 505.

that the channels of communication remain free."[9] Consequently, the corporation could not be permitted "to govern a community of citizens" in a way that "restrict[ed] their fundamental liberties."[10]

Since Marsh was issued in 1946, however, it has largely been limited to the facts presented in that case, and applies only if a private entity exercises "powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the State."[11] The Supreme Court extended the Marsh decision in 1968: in Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, the Court held that a private shopping mall could not prevent individuals from peacefully picketing on the premises, noting similarities between "the business block in Marsh and the shopping center" at issue in that case.[12] However, the Court subsequently disclaimed Logan Valley in Hudgens v. NLRB, rejecting the idea that "large self-contained shopping center[s]" are "the functional equivalent of a municipality."[13] Instead, the Court held that in Hudgens, where a shopping center manager had threatened to arrest picketers for trespassing, "the constitutional guarantee of free expression ha[d] no part to play."[14] As a result, the picketers "did not have a First Amendment right to enter this shopping center for the purpose of advertising their strike."[15] In another decision in which the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment did not prevent a shopping center from banning the distribution of handbills, the Court distinguished Marsh by noting that "the owner of the company town was performing the full spectrum of municipal powers and stood in the shoes of the State."[16] By contrast, the disputed shopping center had not assumed "municipal functions or power."[17] The fact that the shopping center was generally open to the public did not qualify as a "dedication of [the] privately owned and operated shopping center to public use" sufficient "to entitle respondents to exercise therein the asserted First Amendment rights."[18]

More recently, in Manhattan Community Access Corp. v. Halleck, the Supreme Court held that Manhattan Neighborhood Network (MNN), a private, nonprofit corporation designated by New York City to operate public access channels in Manhattan, was not a state actor for purposes of the First Amendment because it did not exercise a "traditional, exclusive public function."[19] Emphasizing the limited number of functions that met this standard under the Court's precedents,[20] the Court reasoned that operating public access channels "has not traditionally and exclusively been performed by government" because "a variety of private and

---

[9] Id. at 507. See also id. at 508 (noting that residents of company towns, like residents of other towns, "must make decisions which affect the welfare of community and nation," and that to do this, they must have access to "uncensored" information).

[10] Id. at 509.

[11] Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 352 (1974) (emphasis added). Accord Lugar v. Edmonson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 939 (1982); Flagg Bros., Inc. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 158–59 (1978).

[12] 391 U.S. 308, 317 (1968). In dissent, Justice Hugo Black would have ruled that the picketers could not, "under the guise of exercising First Amendment rights, trespass on . . . private property for the purpose of picketing." Id. at 329 (Black, J., dissenting).

[13] Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 520 (1976).

[14] Id. at 521.

[15] Id.

[16] Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551, 569 (1972).

[17] Id.

[18] Id. at 569–70.

[19] Manhattan Cmty. Access Corp. v. Halleck, No. 17-702, slip op. at 2–3, 6 (U.S. June 17, 2019)

[20] Id. at 6–7 (stating that while "running elections" and "operating a company town" qualify as traditional, exclusive public functions, "running sports associations and leagues, administering insurance payments, operating nursing homes, providing special education, representing indigent criminal defendants, resolving private disputes, and supplying electricity" do not).

public actors" had performed the function since the 1970s.[21] Moreover, the Court reasoned, "merely hosting speech by others is not a traditional, exclusive public function and does not alone transform private entities into state actors subject to First Amendment constraints."[22]

Apart from the factual circumstances presented by the company town that exercises powers "traditionally" and "exclusively" held by the government,[23] the Court has sometimes applied the First Amendment against private parties if they have a "sufficiently close relationship" to the government.[24] Such circumstances may exist where a private company "is subject to extensive state regulation"—although government regulation alone is not sufficient to establish the state action requirement.[25] Instead, the inquiry in such a case is "whether there is a sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the regulated entity so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself."[26] Accordingly, for example, in Manhattan Community Access Corp., the Supreme Court also held that the city's selection of MNN and the state's extensive regulation of MNN did not in and of themselves create state action.[27]

The question of when broadcast companies are engaged in governmental action subject to the First Amendment has sometimes been a difficult one. In Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, the Court considered whether a radio station that had a license from the government to broadcast over airwaves in the public domain needed to comply with the First Amendment when it sold air time to third parties.[28] The radio station had a policy of refusing to sell air time to persons seeking to express opinions on controversial issues.[29] Three Justices joined a plurality opinion concluding that the radio station was not engaged in governmental action when it enforced this policy.[30] They reasoned that the federal government had not partnered with or profited from the broadcaster's decisions and that Congress had "affirmatively indicated" that broadcasters subject to federal law retained certain journalistic license.[31] In the view of those Justices, if the Court were "to read the First Amendment to spell out governmental action in the circumstances presented . . . , few licensee decisions on the content of broadcasts or the processes of editorial evaluation would escape constitutional scrutiny."[32] In contrast, three other Members of the Court would have held that the radio station was engaged in governmental action because of the degree of governmental

[21] Id. at 7.

[22] Id. at 10.

[23] Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 352 (1974).

[24] See Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451, 462 (1952) (holding that such a relationship existed where the private company operated a public utility that represented a "substantial monopoly" under congressional authority and, more importantly, the company operated "under the regulatory supervision" of a governmental agency, and the particular action being challenged involved action by that agency).

[25] Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 350 (1974); see also Brentwood Acad. v. Tenn. Secondary Sch. Athletic Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288, 295 (2001).

[26] Jackson, 419 U.S. at 351.

[27] See id. at 11 (reasoning that absent performance of a traditional and exclusive public function, a private entity is not a state actor merely because the government licenses, contracts with, grants a monopoly to, or subsidizes it); id. at 12 (reasoning that state regulations that "restrict MNN's editorial discretion" and effectively require it to "operate almost like a common carrier" do not make MNN a state actor). The majority also rejected the argument that MNN was simply standing in for New York City in managing government property, reasoning that the record did not show that any government owned, leased, or otherwise had a property interest in the public access channels or the broader cable network in which they operated. Id. at 14–15.

[28] 412 U.S. 94 (1973).

[29] Id. at 98.

[30] Id. at 120 (plurality opinion of Burger, C.J., and Stewart and Rehnquist, JJ.).

[31] Id. at 119–20.

[32] Id. at 120.

regulation of broadcasters' activities and the station's use of the airwaves, a public resource.[33] And three Justices would not have decided the state action question.[34] Nevertheless, these three Justices joined the Court's opinion concluding that even if the broadcaster was engaged in governmental action, the First Amendment did not require "a private right of access to the broadcast media."[35]

Amdt1.7.3 Content-Based and Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech

Amdt1.7.3.1 Overview of Content-Based and Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

At its core, the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause prohibits the government from suppressing or forcing conformity with particular ideas or messages.[1] To guard against such abuses of power, the Supreme Court typically has subjected laws that "target speech based on its communicative content" to strict judicial scrutiny.[2] This rule applies not only to laws in the form of federal and state statutes and local ordinances,[3] but also to government regulations and policies[4] and judicial codes of conduct.[5] Additionally, the rule applies not only to outright bans or restrictions on speech but also to financial or other regulatory burdens on speech.[6] Although this essay focuses on when a law is content based or content neutral and the legal [33] Id. at 150 (Douglas, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 172–73 (Brennan and Marshall, JJ., dissenting).

[34] See id. at 171 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (noting that Justices Byron White, Harry Blackmun, and Lewis Powell would not have reached the state action question).

[35] Id. at 129 (majority opinion).

[1] See Police Dep't of Chi. v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972) (explaining that "above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content"); W. Va. State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943) (opining that under the First Amendment, the government may not "prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein").

[2] Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 576 U.S. 155, 163–64 (2015); see also Citizens United v. FEC, 558 U.S. 310, 340 (2010) ("Premised on mistrust of governmental power, the First Amendment stands against attempts to disfavor certain subjects or viewpoints."); Ashcroft v. ACLU, 542 U.S. 656, 660 (2004) (to guard against content-based prohibitions as a "repressive force in the lives and thoughts of a free people," the Constitution "demands that content-based restrictions on speech be presumed invalid and that the Government bear the burden of showing their constitutionality" (internal citations omitted)).

[3] E.g., Reed, 576 U.S. at 164 (holding that a town's sign ordinance violated the First Amendment).

[4] See, e.g., Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 264, 277 (1981) (holding that a state university's policy to open its buildings to student groups while denying student groups access "for purposes of religious worship or religious teaching" violated the First Amendment).

[5] See Republican Party v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 768 (2002) (holding unconstitutional an ethical standard promulgated by a state supreme court that prohibited candidates for judicial office from "announc[ing]" their "views on disputed legal or political issues").

[6] See Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of the N.Y. State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 116 (1991) (explaining that the "government's ability to impose content-based burdens on speech raises the specter that the government may effectively drive certain ideas or viewpoints from the marketplace").

effects of that determination, the free speech principles disfavoring content-based discrimination also apply to other forms of government action,[7] including the enforcement of content-neutral laws.[8]

The Court's approach to determining whether a law targets speech based on its content has shifted over time.[9] In the 1980s and early 1990s, for example, the Court examined both the text and justifications for a law, but sometimes placed more emphasis on the latter, asking whether the government's regulatory purpose was related to the suppression of a particular message or form of expression.[10] The Court's 2015 decision in Reed v. Town of Gilbert heralded a more text-focused approach, clarifying that content-based distinctions "on the face" of a law warrant heightened scrutiny even if the government advances a content-neutral justification for that law.[11]

Under Reed, a law can be content based "on its face" or due to a discriminatory purpose or justification.[12] A facially content-based law "draws distinctions based on the message a speaker conveys."[13] Such a law might define regulated speech by "particular subject matter" or by "its function or purpose."[14] The law might even regulate speech on the basis of the particular views expressed.[15] By comparison, a law that is content neutral on its face still may be deemed content based if the law "cannot be justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech," or was adopted "because of disagreement with the message [the speech] conveys."[16]

After Reed, lower courts diverged over whether a law was necessarily content based on its face if its application or enforcement turned on the content of the speech at issue. In City of Austin v. Reagan National Advertising of Austin, LLC, the Court clarified that a law is facially content based if it applies to particular speech because of the subject matter, topic, or viewpoint expressed—that is, if it turns on the "substantive message" conveyed.[17] A law may be facially content neutral, the Court explained, even if "a reader must ask: who is the speaker and what is the speaker saying" to determine if the law applies,[18] so long as that examination is "only in service of drawing neutral" lines that are "agnostic as to content."[19] Thus, in City of Austin, the Court upheld an ordinance that placed certain restrictions only on signs advertising off-premises businesses, even though application of those restrictions depended upon the content of the sign relative to its location.[20]As a general matter, content-based laws are

---

[7] See, e.g., Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 390–92 (1987) (holding that a county law enforcement office unlawfully fired a clerical employee based on the content of her speech even under the more lenient standards applicable when the government is acting as employer).

[8] See, e.g., Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 18 (1971) (reversing the judgment of conviction of a defendant who was arrested for disorderly conduct in a courthouse because of the content of the message inscribed on his jacket).

[9] See Amdt1.7.3.2 Development of a Judicial Approach to Content-Based Speech Laws.

[10] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989).

[11] Reed, 576 U.S. at 163–64.

[12] Id.

[13] Id. at 163.

[14] Id.

[15] Id. Because the Supreme Court considers viewpoint discrimination "an egregious form of content discrimination," cases analyzing viewpoint-based laws are discussed separately in a later essay. Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995). See Amdt1.7.4.1 Overview of Viewpoint-Based Regulation of Speech.

[16] Reed, 576 U.S. at 164 (quoting Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U. S. 781, 791 (1989)).

[17] No. 20-1029, slip op. at 6, 8–9 (Apr. 21, 2022).

[18] Id. at 6 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[19] Id.

[20] Id. at 8.

"presumptively unconstitutional" and subject to a strict scrutiny standard of judicial review.[21] This is a difficult test for the government to satisfy.[22] Under strict scrutiny, the government must show that its law serves a compelling governmental interest and is narrowly tailored to advance that interest.[23] Narrow tailoring in this context typically means that "[i]f a less restrictive alternative would serve the [g]overnment's purpose, the legislature must use that alternative."[24] Thus, in challenges to content-based laws under strict scrutiny, the government bears the burden of proving that any proposed alternatives are less effective than the challenged law.[25]

The Court has recognized some exceptions to the general rule that content-based laws receive strict scrutiny, two of which reflect the Court's "limited categorical approach" to First Amendment law.[26] Specifically, the Court has subjected laws regulating "commercial speech" to an intermediate form of scrutiny.[27] Even in the commercial context, though, the Court has applied or considered applying strict scrutiny to laws that completely ban a subset of commercial speech because of its content or that are aimed at particular commercial speakers.[28] In addition to the category of commercial speech (which is protected speech), the Court has recognized some narrowly defined categories of "unprotected speech" that the government may regulate because of their harmful content,[29] such as "true threats" and "defamation."[30] Within those categories, the government may not draw additional content-based distinctions unless "the basis for the content discrimination consists entirely of the very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable."[31]

There are also some specific contexts in which the Court has allowed for certain types of content-based distinctions,[32] including schools,[33] prisons,[34] and nonpublic forums (that is, government-owned property opened for specific or limited public purposes).[35] Additionally, the Court has held that when the government is providing a public subsidy, such as a tax exemption, or funding a government program, it may draw some types of content-based distinctions to identify the activities it seeks to subsidize and to define the limits of the government program.[36]

---

[21] Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 576 U.S. 155, 163 (2015).

[22] See Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 65 (1983) ("With respect to noncommercial speech, this Court has sustained content-based restrictions only in the most extraordinary circumstances.").

[23] United States v. Playboy Entm't Grp., 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000).

[24] Id.

[25] Ashcroft v. ACLU, 542 U.S. 656, 665 (2004).

[26] R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 383 (1992).

[27] See Amdt1.7.6.1 Commercial Speech Early Doctrine to Amdt1.7.6.2 Central Hudson Test and Current Doctrine.

[28] E.g., Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552, 565 (2011); 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 501–04 (1996) (plurality opinion); Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, 507 U.S. 410, 429 (1993).

[29] United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460, 468 (2010); R.A.V., 505 U.S. at 383; New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 763–64 (1982).

[30] See Amdt1.7.5.5 Fighting Words; Amdt1.7.5.6 True Threats; Amdt1.7.5.7 Defamation.

[31] R.A.V., 505 U.S. at 388.

[32] See FCC v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 744 (1978) (plurality opinion) (explaining that "[b]oth the content and the context of speech are critical elements of First Amendment analysis").

[33] Mahanoy Area Sch. Dist. v. B.L., No. 20-255, slip op. at 5 (U.S. June 23, 2021) (identifying three categories of student speech that schools may regulate). See Amdt1.7.8.3 School Free Speech and Government as Educator.

[34] E.g., Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 526 (2006). See Amdt1.7.8.4 Prison Free Speech and Government as Prison Administrator.

[35] Minn. Voters All. v. Mansky, 138 S. Ct. 1876, 1885 (2018). See Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

[36] See Amdt1.7.13.3 Conditions on Tax Exemptions; Amdt1.7.13.4 Conditions on Federal Funding.

The Court has distinguished content-based laws from content-neutral laws, while acknowledging that deciding whether a particular law "is content based or content neutral is not always a simple task."[37] A content-neutral law that imposes only an incidental burden on speech "will be sustained if 'it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest.'"[38] Similarly, the government "may impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, or manner of protected speech, provided the restrictions 'are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.'"[39]

Amdt1.7.3.2 Development of a Judicial Approach to Content-Based Speech Laws

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As explained in Amdt1.7.3.1 Overview of Content-Based and Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech, laws regulating protected speech on the basis of its content are generally subject to strict judicial scrutiny.[1] As the Supreme Court has acknowledged, however, deciding whether a particular law "is content based or content neutral is not always a simple task."[2] When confronted with the question, the Court has examined a law's text (that is, the face of the law) and considered arguments about the law's justification, purpose, design, and operation.

Whether a content-based distinction on the face of the law rendered that law presumptively invalid has changed over time, with earlier cases lacking a consistent approach.[3] For example, in the 1980s and early 1990s, the Court sometimes considered laws that drew content-based distinctions on their face to be content neutral (and subject to a form of intermediate scrutiny) so long as they were supported by a content-neutral justification.[4]

---

[37] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994).

[38] Id. at 662 (quoting United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376 (1968)).

[39] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989) (quoting Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984)). For more discussion of the time, place, and manner doctrine, see Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

[1] See Amdt1.7.3.1 Overview of Content-Based and Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech.

[2] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994).

[3] Compare Erznoznik v. Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 209–11 (1975) (suggesting that intermediate scrutiny was inappropriate for an ordinance prohibiting drive-in movie theaters from showing films containing nudity when their screens were visible from a public place, because the ordinance "discriminate[d] among movies solely on the basis of content"), with Young v. Am. Mini Theatres, 427 U.S. 50, 71–73 (1976) (viewing an ordinance restricting the location of "adult" movie theatres as a permissible restriction on the "place" where films could be exhibited even though the law distinguished among films based on their content).

[4] See Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989) (explaining that the "principal inquiry in determining content neutrality" is "whether the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of disagreement with the message it conveys" and that the "government's purpose is the controlling consideration"); see, e.g., Members of City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 791 n.1, 804 (1984) (applying intermediate scrutiny to an ordinance that excepted certain historical and cultural markers from a general prohibition on posting signs on public property). Relatedly, the Court has upheld some zoning restrictions on adult theatres on the grounds that the restrictions were based on the undesirable "secondary effects" of such theatres rather than the content of the movies shown there. See Amdt1.7.3.7 Content-Neutral Laws Burdening Speech.

This approach started to shift in the mid-1990s, as the Court began to clarify that a content-neutral purpose cannot "save a law which, on its face, discriminates based on content."[5]

In its 2015 decision in Reed v. Town of Gilbert, the Court squarely held that a facially content-based law is subject to strict scrutiny "regardless of the government's benign motive, content-neutral justification, or lack of 'animus toward the ideas contained' in the regulated speech."[6] Thus, under the approach set out in Reed, a law may be content based, and thus presumptively unconstitutional, if it draws content-based distinctions on its face or if it reflects a discriminatory purpose.[7]

Amdt1.7.3.3 Laws Making Facial Content-Based Distinctions Regarding Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the "First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic."[1] In 1980, the Court struck down a state order prohibiting private utility companies from including inserts in their billing envelopes discussing "controversial issues of public policy."[2] The Court reasoned that the order imposed an impermissible content-based restriction even though it did "not favor either side of a political controversy," reaffirming the general rule that the government may not regulate speech based on its subject matter.[3] The Court explained that to "allow a government the choice of permissible subjects for public debate would be to allow that government control over the search for political truth."[4]

Drawing on these precedents, the Court set out the modern test for determining whether a law is facially content based in two decisions involving local sign ordinances. In its 2015 decision in Reed v. Town of Gilbert, the Court held that a law is content based "on its face" if it "draws distinctions based on the message a speaker conveys."[5] The Court explained that "[s]ome facial distinctions based on a message are obvious, defining regulated speech by particular subject matter, and others are more subtle, defining regulated speech by its function or purpose."[6] The ordinance at issue in Reed fell into the former category because it "single[d]

---

[5] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642–43 (1994).

[6] Reed, 576 U.S. at 165 (quoting Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U. S. 410, 429 (1993)).

[7] Id.

[1] Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530, 537, 544 (1980) (citing Police Dep't of Chi. v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972)).

[2] Id. at 533.

[3] Id. at 537–39; see also FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364, 366, 383 (1984) (reasoning that a ban on "editorializing" by noncommercial broadcasting stations receiving federal funds was "defined solely on the basis of the content of the suppressed speech").

[4] Consol. Edison Co., 447 U.S. at 538.

[5] 576 U.S. 155, 163 (2015).

[6] Id.

out specific subject matter for differential treatment" by, for example, placing more onerous restrictions on "political" signs than on "ideological" signs.[7]

Other examples of laws that the Court has determined to be facially content based include a federal statute criminalizing the commercial sale of "depictions of animal cruelty,"[8] a federal statute requiring cable television operators to scramble or restrict the daytime transmission of channels "primarily dedicated to sexually-oriented programming,"[9] a federal statute restricting "indecent" and "patently offensive" internet communications,[10] and a state law imposing a sales tax on general interest magazines but exempting religious, trade, and sports magazines.[11]

Although Reed clarified the meaning of "content based" to some extent, courts continued to grapple with the question of whether a law is content based—and thus presumptively unconstitutional—whenever the government must read the speech at issue to determine the law's applicability or the speaker's compliance with the law.[12] In its 2022 decision in City of Austin v. Reagan National Advertising of Austin, LLC, the Court rejected that formulation of the rule as "too extreme an interpretation of this Court's precedent."[13] The case involved a city ordinance restricting "off-premises signs"—signs advertising or directing readers to businesses or events at another location, but not restricting signs advertising activities on the same premises. In practice, determining whether the restrictions applied required reading the sign to identify whether it advertised a business or event on or off of the premises where the sign was posted. In the majority's view, that ordinance was content neutral because it did not

---

[7] Id. at 159–60, 169; see also Burson v. Freeman, 504 U.S. 191, 197, 207, 211 (1992) (plurality opinion) (concluding that a state law prohibiting the solicitation of votes and the display or distribution of campaign materials within 100 feet of a polling place entrance was content based because the statute reached only political speech, not "other categories of speech, such as commercial solicitation," but concluding that the law nonetheless survived strict scrutiny); Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego, 453 U.S. 490, 493, 521 (1981) (plurality opinion) (striking down a billboard ordinance that "favor[ed] certain kinds of messages—such as onsite commercial advertising, and temporary political campaign advertisements—over others").

[8] United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460, 468 (2010).

[9] United States v. Playboy Entm't Grp., 529 U.S. 803, 806, 811 (2000); see also Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of the N.Y. State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 115–18, 123 (1991) (holding that a state law imposed an unconstitutional, content-based burden on speech by requiring anyone who contracts with an accused or convicted person for a depiction of the person's crime to turn over any income from that work to the state's crime victims board); Erznoznik v. Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 211–12 (1975) (holding that an ordinance prohibiting drive-in movie theaters visible from public streets from showing films depicting nudity was an invalid, content-based prohibition).

[10] Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844, 868 (1997); see also Sable Commc'ns of Cal. v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115, 122 (1989) (suggesting that a law banning "indecent" interstate commercial telephone communications regulated "the content of constitutionally protected speech"); Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 315, 334 (1988) (finding content based and holding unconstitutional a law banning the display of signs outside of an embassy that bring the foreign government of that embassy into "public disrepute").

[11] Ark. Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 223, 230–33 (1987) (holding that this "selective taxation" system violated the First Amendment).

[12] City of Austin v. Reagan Nat'l Advert. of Austin, LLC, No. 20-1029, slip op. at 6 (Apr. 21, 2022); Forsyth Cty. v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 134 (1992) (holding that a county ordinance requiring a permit to hold a public parade or assembly and a fee for "necesary and reasonable" police protection was content based as implemented because "[i]n order to assess accurately the cost of security for parade participants," the county "must necessarily examine the content of the message that is conveyed"). Other decisions of the Court sometimes framed the standard as whether the law turns on what a speaker says. See Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1, 27 (2010) (holding that a federal statute prohibiting material support to foreign terrorist organizations was content based because whether the law would allow the plaintiffs to speak with a foreign terrorist organization "depends on what they say").

[13] City of Austin, slip op. at 6.

"single out any topic or subject matter for differential treatment."[14] Instead, the ordinance distinguished signs based on a content-neutral factor—location—rather than their "substantive message."[15]

City of Austin also addressed the statement in Reed that laws that distinguish speech based on its "function or purpose" are content based.[16] The Court opined that not every "classification that considers function or purpose" is content based.[17] Instead, the Court suggested that defining regulated speech by its function is only problematic when function is used as a "proxy" for regulating content, such as when a legislature attempts to regulate political signs by describing regulated signs as those "designed to influence the outcome of an election."[18]

As with laws that restrict a discrete category of speech, laws that exempt one category of speech from a broader speech restriction could also create a facial content-based distinction.[19] In Regan v. Time, Inc., the Court evaluated a statutory exception to a long-standing ban on photographic reproductions of currency,[20] allowing certain publishers to use these photographs for "educational, historical, or newsworthy purposes."[21] The Court held that the purpose provision was "constitutionally infirm" because whether a photograph is "newsworthy" or "educational" requires the government to make a content-based judgment.[22]

The Court again struck down a content-based exception in Barr v. American Association of Political Consultants.[23] That case concerned a 1991 federal law that, among other things, prohibited automated calls to cell phones, also known as "robocalls."[24] Congress had added a provision in 2015 that exempted calls made to collect debt owed to the federal government, such as student loan debt, from the robocall restriction.[25] Five Justices held that the robocall restriction was impermissibly content based,[26] with a different majority concluding that the appropriate remedy was to "sever" the government-debt exception.[27] A plurality of the Court wrote that "[b]ecause the law favors speech made for collecting government debt over political and other speech, the law is a content-based restriction on speech."[28] Thus, even though Congress had removed a restriction on speech when it added the government-debt exception,

---

[14] Id. at 8.

[15] Id. See Amdt1.7.3.7 Content-Neutral Laws Burdening Speech.

[16] City of Austin, slip op. at 11.

[17] Id.

[18] Id. See McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 345 (1995) (reasoning that a state's ban on anonymous campaign literature defined the regulated documents "by their content," which was "publications containing speech designed to influence the voters in an election").

[19] See Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 460–63, 471 (1980) (holding that a statute banning residential picketing but exempting labor picketing was a content-based restriction on speech that violated the First Amendment and the Equal Protection Clause); Police Dep't of Chi. v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 93, 102 (1972) (holding the same with respect to an ordinance banning picketing outside of schools).

[20] Regan v. Time, Inc., 468 U.S. 641, 644 (1984) (plurality opinion).

[21] Id. (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 504(1)).

[22] Id. at 648–49 (majority opinion). The Court ruled that the purpose provision was "unenforceable," but upheld other statutory exceptions allowing the photographs to be published subject to certain size and color limitations. Id. at 658–59 (plurality opinion).

[23] Barr v. Am. Ass'n of Political Consultants, No. 19-631, slip op. (U.S. July 6, 2020) (plurality opinion); id. at 1 (Gorsuch, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part).

[24] Id. at 1 (plurality opinion).

[25] Id.

[26] Id. at 9; id. at 3 (Gorsuch, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part).

[27] Id. at 25 (plurality opinion); id. at 2 (Sotomayor, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 1 (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment with respect to severability and dissenting in part).

[28] Id. at 7 (plurality opinion).

that 2015 amendment created a "discriminatory exception" that resulted in "unequal treatment" of government-debt collection speech versus speech on other topics.[29]

Amdt1.7.3.4 Laws Regulating Speech with a Content-Discriminatory Purpose

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Even if a law is content neutral on its face, it could still be considered content based if it "cannot be 'justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech'" or was "adopted by the government 'because of disagreement with the message [the speech] conveys.'"[1] For example, in 1990, the Court held that a defendant could not be prosecuted for burning a flag in violation of a federal statute.[2] The case followed the Court's landmark symbolic-speech case Texas v. Johnson, in which the Court recognized that flag burning is a constitutionally-protected expressive activity under some circumstances.[3] Unlike the state law at issue in Johnson, however, the federal statute contained "no explicit" content-based limitation on flag burning.[4] The Court nonetheless concluded that Congress was concerned with the "communicative impact of flag destruction" because its stated goal of protecting the "physical integrity" of the flag depended on "a perceived need to preserve the flag's status as a symbol of our Nation and certain national ideals."[5] That justification for the law rendered it content based for purposes of First Amendment analysis.

The Court has also encountered laws that are content based both on their face and in their "design" and "practical operation."[6] In Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., the Court considered a state law that prohibited the use of certain pharmacy records for marketing purposes without the prescribers' consent.[7] The Court held that on its face, the law imposed content-based restrictions on the use of these records because it "disfavor[ed] marketing," which is "speech with a particular content."[8] The Court observed, too, evidence of a content-discriminatory purpose, pointing to statements in the legislative record suggesting that "the law's express purpose and practical effect are to diminish the effectiveness of marketing by manufacturers of brand-name drugs"—a content-based justification.[9]

---

[29] Id. at 18, 20.

[1] Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 576 U.S. 155, 164 (2015) (quoting Ward, 491 U.S. at 791).

[2] United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310, 319 (1990).

[3] 491 U.S. 397 (1989). See Amdt1.7.14.1 Overview of Symbolic Speech.

[4] Eichman, 496 U.S. at 315.

[5] Id. at 315–17 (observing too that the law prohibited mutilating, defacing, defiling, burning, or trampling upon a flag but authorized the disposal of a "worn or soiled" flag).

[6] Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552, 565 (2011).

[7] Id. at 559.

[8] Id. at 564. For a discussion of the components of the law that the Court deemed viewpoint discriminatory, see Amdt1.7.4.3 Viewpoint Discrimination in Facially Neutral Laws.

[9] Id. at 565. Although it found the law to be content based, the Court ultimately concluded that the law failed even the intermediate scrutiny that applies to commercial speech restrictions. Id. at 571.

Amdt1.7.3.5 Laws Making Speaker-Based Distinctions in Regulating Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the "First Amendment protects speech and speaker, and the ideas that flow from each."[1] While "a differential burden on speakers is insufficient by itself to raise First Amendment concerns,"[2] laws that are "designed or intended to suppress or restrict the expression of specific speakers" because of their ideas violate the First Amendment.[3] In terms of First Amendment analysis, this means that, unlike laws that regulate speech based on subject matter, topic, or viewpoint, laws that distinguish among different speakers are not necessarily deemed content based or presumptively unconstitutional. For example, a regulation distinguishing between cable operators and broadcasters, the Court observed in a 1994 case, differentiated among "speakers in the television programming market" based on "the manner in which [they] transmit their messages to viewers" rather than their content.[4] The Court explained that such distinctions are "not presumed invalid" as long as they are not "a subtle means of exercising a content preference."[5]

Speaker-based distinctions can, however, invite heightened scrutiny in some circumstances. As previously noted, speaker-based distinctions raise the specter of content-based discrimination. The Supreme Court has observed that "[s]peech restrictions based on the identity of the speaker are all too often simply a means to control content."[6] The law in Sorrell v. IMS Health, Inc., for example, prohibited pharmaceutical companies from using pharmacy records revealing physicians' individual prescribing practices for marketing purposes without the prescribers' consent.[7] The law did not prohibit other entities from using the records for non-marketing purposes, thus allowing, for example, educational institutions to use the regulated records for research purposes.[8] The Court observed that in addition to imposing content-based restrictions on how the information was used, the law targeted pharmaceutical companies for disfavored treatment, which contributed to the content-based nature of the law.[9]

Even apart from a desire to control the content of speech, the government may violate the First Amendment if it singles out "disfavored speakers" for speech restrictions.[10] In Citizens United v. FEC, for example, the Court held that Congress may not prohibit political speech in the form of independent expenditures because of a speaker's corporate identity.[11]

---

[1] Citizens United v. FEC, 558 U.S. 310, 341 (2010).

[2] Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 452 (1991).

[3] United States v. Playboy Entm't Grp., 529 U.S. 803, 812 (2000).

[4] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 645 (1994).

[5] Id.

[6] Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 340.

[7] Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552, 559 (2011). For additional discussion of Sorrell, see Amdt1.7.3.4 Laws Regulating Speech with a Content-Discriminatory Purpose.

[8] Sorrell, 564 U.S. at 563, 573.

[9] Id. at 564. For a discussion of the components of the law that the Court deemed viewpoint discriminatory, see Amdt1.7.4.3 Viewpoint Discrimination in Facially Neutral Laws.

[10] Citizens United v. FEC, 558 U.S. 310, 341 (2010).

[11] Id. at 341–65. See Amdt1.7.11.3 Campaign Finance Expenditure Limits.

Thus, speech restrictions that apply to some speakers but not others may trigger heightened scrutiny, especially where the law contains other, facial distinctions based on the message conveyed, or reflects a content-discriminatory purpose.[12]

Amdt1.7.3.6 Content-Based and Compelled Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has suggested that laws that compel speech, such as labeling or disclosure requirements, are typically content based because they alter the content of the speaker's message.[1] For example, in a 2018 case, the Court considered a state law that required licensed pregnancy resource centers to post a notice that the state provided free or low-cost access to certain services, including abortion.[2] The Court held that this requirement regulated speech based on its content.[3] The Court reasoned that by requiring the petitioners (pregnancy resource centers that opposed abortion) "to inform women how they can obtain state-subsidized abortions—at the same time petitioners try to dissuade women from choosing that option—the licensed notice plainly 'alters the content' of petitioners' speech."[4] The Court concluded that heightened scrutiny should apply,[5] because the law required the petitioners to adopt a "government-drafted script" about a service—abortion—that the petitioners opposed.[6]

Thus, laws that compel private speakers to make a particular statement or to include certain information in their own speech are likely content based.[7] Whether such requirements

---

[12] In FCC v. League of Women Voters, the Court struck down a law banning noncommercial educational broadcasting stations that received federal funds from "editorializing." 468 U.S. 364, 402 (1984). In explaining its application of heightened scrutiny, the Court observed that the law "single[d] out noncommercial broadcasters and denie[d] them the right to address their chosen audience on matters of public importance," which suggested that Congress sought "to limit discussion of controversial topics and thus to shape the agenda for public debate." Id. at 384. For additional discussion of League of Women Voters, see Amdt1.7.13.5 Restrictions on Editorializing.

[1] Nat'l Inst. of Family & Life Advocates (NIFLA) v. Becerra, No. 16-1140, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 26, 2018); Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of Blind, 487 U.S. 781, 795 (1988) ("Mandating speech that a speaker would not otherwise make necessarily alters the content of the speech.").

[2] NIFLA, slip op. at 3.

[3] Id. at 7.

[4] Id. (quoting Riley, 487 U.S. at 795).

[5] In some circumstances, the Court has evaluated commercial disclosure requirements under a less rigorous standard of scrutiny. See Amdt1.7.12.1 Overview of Compelled Speech.

[6] NIFLA, slip op. at 7, 9. Although the Court suggested that the notice requirement should receive strict scrutiny, the Court declined to resolve whether strict or intermediate scrutiny was the appropriate standard because it concluded that the law "cannot survive even intermediate scrutiny." Id. at 14–16 (evaluating the law at the preliminary injunction stage and concluding that the petitioners were likely to succeed on the merits of their First Amendment challenge).

[7] See McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 345 (1995) (reasoning that a state's ban on anonymous campaign literature was "a direct regulation of the content of speech" because it required such documents to contain the name and address of the person or organization that issued them); Riley, 487 U.S. at 795 (evaluating a requirement that professional fundraisers disclose information about charitable contributions collected during the previous year before soliciting funds as a content-based regulation of speech); Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Com., 475 U.S. 1, 9–16, 20–21 (1986) (plurality opinion) (invalidating a state law that required a private company to include in its billing envelopes, alongside its own newsletter, third-party speech that the company opposed).

would receive strict scrutiny, intermediate scrutiny, or a lesser degree of scrutiny, depends, among other things, on whether they involve commercial speech and concern the speaker's own product or services.[8]

Amdt1.7.3.7 Content-Neutral Laws Burdening Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Court has distinguished content-based laws from content-neutral laws, while acknowledging that deciding whether a particular law "is content based or content neutral is not always a simple task."[1] A content-neutral law that imposes only an incidental burden on speech "will be sustained if 'it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest.'"[2] Similarly, the government "may impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, or manner of protected speech, provided the restrictions 'are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.'"[3]

A series of cases allowing speech to be regulated due to its "secondary effects" is related to these content-neutral standards.[4] In Young v. American Mini Theater, the Court recognized a municipality's authority to zone land to prevent deterioration of urban areas, upholding an ordinance providing that adult theaters showing motion pictures that depicted specified sexual activities or specified anatomical areas could not be located within 100 feet of any two other establishments included within the ordinance or within 500 feet of a residential area.[5]

---

[8] NIFLA, slip op. at 14. See also, Amdt1.7.11.4 Campaign Finance Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements, for a discussion of the exacting scrutiny standard that generally applies to campaign-finance disclosure requirements.

[1] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994).

[2] Id. at 662 (quoting United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376 (1968)). See also, e.g., San Francisco Arts & Ath., Inc. v. U.S. Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 536–40 (1987) (applying this standard to uphold an incidental speech restriction prohibiting certain uses of the word "Olympic"). The distinction between, on the one hand, directly regulating, and, on the other hand, incidentally affecting, the content of expression was sharply drawn by Justice John Harlan in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36, 49–51 (1961): "Throughout its history this Court has consistently recognized at least two ways in which constitutionally protected freedom of speech is narrower than an unlimited license to talk. On the one hand, certain forms of speech, or speech in certain contexts, has been considered outside the scope of constitutional protection. . . . On the other hand, general regulatory statutes, not intended to control the content of speech but incidentally limiting its unfettered exercise, have not been regarded as the type of law the First or Fourteenth Amendments forbade Congress or the States to pass, when they have been found justified by subordinating valid governmental interests, a prerequisite to constitutionality which has necessarily involved a weighing of the governmental interest involved." Cf, e.g., Arcara v. Cloud Books, 478 U.S. 697, 707 (1986) (upholding the application of a statute authorizing closure of places of prostitution to an adult bookstore, saying O'Brien was not applicable to "a statute directed at imposing sanctions on nonexpressive activity").

[3] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989) (quoting Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984)). For more discussion of the time, place, and manner doctrine, see Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

[4] See, e.g., Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41, 48 (1986) (saying an ordinance was content-neutral where the law was justified by a desire to combat undesirable secondary effects of speech, rather than justified by reference to the speech's content). Cf. R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 389 (1992) ("Another valid basis for according differential treatment to even a content-defined subclass of proscribable speech is that the subclass happens to be associated with particular 'secondary effects' of the speech[.]").

[5] 427 U.S. 50, 70 (1976) (plurality opinion) (saying governments could regulate "the places where sexually explicit films may be exhibited," drawing a line "on the basis of content without violating the government's paramount

The Court endorsed this approach in Renton v. Playtime Theatres, rejecting a constitutional challenge to a zoning ordinance restricting the locations of adult theaters after concluding that although the ordinance targeted businesses selling sexually explicit materials, the law was content-neutral because it was justified by studies showing adult theaters produced undesirable secondary effects, rather than being justified by reference to the content of the regulated speech.[6] By contrast, for example, the Court rejected one city's argument that it could prohibit as a nuisance "any movie containing nudity which is visible from a public place."[7] Concluding that the ordinance was not well tailored to the city's stated goals of protecting the privacy interests of passers-by or protecting children, the Court held instead that the law was an unconstitutional content-based regulation.[8]

Amdt1.7.4 Viewpoint-Based Regulation of Speech

Amdt1.7.4.1 Overview of Viewpoint-Based Regulation of Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Content-based regulation of speech is generally subject to strict scrutiny and presumptively unconstitutional.[1] The Supreme Court considers viewpoint-based regulation of speech to be "an egregious form of content discrimination."[2] A law[3] is viewpoint-based when it regulates speech based on its "specific motivating ideology" or the speaker's "opinion or perspective."[4] The following general principles have emerged from the Supreme Court's decisions on viewpoint discrimination and the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment.

First, the Free Speech Clause ordinarily prohibits the government from restricting speech based on the particular views expressed in that speech.[5] Even when regulating speech that is otherwise proscribable, the government typically may not permit some viewpoints and obligation of neutrality" because the place-based regulation was unaffected by the viewpoint or message of the film); id. at 82 n.6 (Powell, J., concurring) (saying the regulation was not impermissibly content-based when it treated "certain movie theaters differently because they have markedly different effects upon their surroundings").

---

[6] Renton, 475 U.S. at 48, 51. The Supreme Court also upheld zoning of sexually oriented businesses in FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215 (1990), and City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S. 425 (2002). Cf. Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560, 566–72 (1991) (plurality opinion) (upholding application of Indiana's public indecency statute to prohibit totally nude dancing under the O'Brien standard); id. at 582 (Souter, J., concurring) (saying he would uphold the law based on "the State's substantial interest in combating the secondary effects of adult entertainment establishments of the sort typified by respondents' establishments"); Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 290 (2000) (plurality opinion) (upholding the application of a statute prohibiting public nudity to an adult entertainment establishment, citing both O'Brien and Renton and noting that "one purpose of the ordinance is to combat harmful secondary effects"); id. at 310 (Scalia, J., concurring) (expressing doubt about the "secondary effects").

[7] Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 208 (1975).

[8] Id. at 211–18.

[1] See Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech.

[2] Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995).

[3] This group of essays generally refers to viewpoint-based laws, which may include statutes or regulations. However, as these cases illustrate, the principle of viewpoint neutrality also extends to the policies of public institutions, the enforcement of public laws, and other types of government actions. See, e.g., Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union, 466 U.S. 485, 505 (1984) (stating that the "principle of viewpoint neutrality" imposes "a special responsibility on judges" when deciding whether a particular communication receives First Amendment protection).

[4] Rosenberger, 515 U.S. at 829.

[5] See Amdt1.7.4.2 Viewpoint-Based Distinctions on the Face of a Law.

disallow others.[6] The government may differentiate among viewpoints only in limited circumstances,[7] such as when the government itself is the speaker,[8] or when the government selectively funds certain speech as part of a government program.[9] These limited exceptions are discussed elsewhere in the Constitution Annotated.[10]

Second, the government generally may not compel a private party to espouse a particular viewpoint.[11] This principle extends to compelled association[12] and compelled subsidization of speech.[13]

Third, laws that do not single out a specific viewpoint on their face, but that were enacted for the purpose of suppressing an idea or message, or otherwise invite discriminatory enforcement, sometimes run afoul of the First Amendment as well.[14]

Amdt1.7.4.2 Viewpoint-Based Distinctions on the Face of a Law

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

A law that explicitly regulates speech on the basis of the particular ideas or opinions expressed is said to be viewpoint-based "on its face."[1] Such facially viewpoint-based laws,

---

[6] See Amdt1.7.4.4 Viewpoint-Based Distinctions Within Proscribable Speech.

[7] See, e.g., Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 403 (2007) (holding that a high school principal may "restrict student speech at a school event, when that speech is reasonably viewed as promoting illegal drug use").

[8] See, e.g., Walker v. Tex. Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 576 U.S. 200, 219 (2015) (holding that an organization could not "force Texas to include a Confederate battle flag on its specialty license plates" because those plates were "government speech"); Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, 555 U.S. 460, 481 (2009) (holding that a city's "decision to accept certain privately donated monuments while rejecting respondent's" was "best viewed as a form of government speech" that did not require viewpoint-neutrality).

[9] See Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 541 (2001) (explaining that "viewpoint-based funding decisions can be sustained" where the government uses "private speakers to transmit information pertaining to its own program"); Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 193 (1991) (holding that the government does not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint when "it has merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of" another).

[10] See Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker; Amdt1.7.13.6 Selective Funding Arrangements; Amdt1.7.13.7 Government's Message Versus Private Speakers.

[11] See Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Com., 475 U.S. 1, 12 (1986) (plurality opinion) (concluding that an agency order requiring a regulated utility company to include a message from an opposing organization in its billing envelopes discriminated on the basis of viewpoint and violated the First Amendment); Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 717 (1977) (holding that the State of New Hampshire could not constitutionally punish the respondents for covering up the state motto "Live Free or Die," to which they objected on religious grounds, on their vehicles' license plates). See Amdt1.7.12.1 Overview of Compelled Speech.

[12] See Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 648 (2000) (holding that the "forced inclusion of an unwanted person in a group infringes the group's freedom of expressive association if the presence of that person affects in a significant way the group's ability to advocate public or private viewpoints"); Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group, 515 U.S. 557, 581 (1995) (reasoning that the government may not "compel" a speaker "to alter [its] message by including one more acceptable to others"). See Amdt1.7.12.1 Overview of Compelled Speech.

[13] See, e.g., United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405, 416 (2001) (holding that compelling handlers of fresh mushrooms to subsidize generic advertising for that product when some handlers objected to the views expressed in those advertisements violated the First Amendment); Bd. of Regents v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 233 (2000) (holding that "[w]hen a university requires its students to pay fees to support the extracurricular speech of other students, all in the interest of open discussion, it may not prefer some viewpoints to others"). See Amdt1.7.12.1 Overview of Compelled Speech and Amdt1.7.12.3 Compelled Subsidization.

[14] See Amdt1.7.4.5 Viewpoint Neutrality in Forum Analysis.

[1] Iancu v. Brunetti, No. 18-302, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 24, 2019).

which are unconstitutional in most contexts,[2] can take several forms. The most obvious form is a law that, by its terms, regulates speech based on "the specific motivating ideology or the opinion or perspective of the speaker."[3]

A law need not single out a particular ideology or message to be viewpoint-based, however. For example, a law that categorically prohibits "religious" speech may be viewpoint-based even if it does not draw sectarian distinctions. In Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, the Court considered a local public school board's regulations that allowed organizations to use school property for "social, civic, or recreational uses" but not for "religious purposes."[4] Based on that rule, the school district refused to allow a church to use the property to show a film series about family and child-rearing—subjects that fell within the social-or-civic-use purpose.[5] The Court held that this refusal violated the Free Speech Clause: even though the school district's regulation treated "all religions and all uses for religious purposes" alike, the school district still discriminated on the basis of viewpoint by excluding the films solely on the basis of their "religious standpoint."[6]

Laws that allow the government to determine whether speech is disparaging or offensive also raise concerns about viewpoint discrimination.[7] In the 2017 case Matal v. Tam, the Court considered a provision of the Lanham Act, a federal trademark statute, that prohibited the registration of trademarks "which may disparage . . . persons, living or dead."[8] After holding that trademarks are not a form of government speech (for which viewpoint-based distinctions are sometimes permissible),[9] the Court ruled that the Lanham Act's "disparagement clause" violated the First Amendment.[10] The plurality opinion explained that although the clause "evenhandedly prohibit[ed] disparagement of all groups," it discriminated on the basis of viewpoint because it "denie[d] registration to any mark that is offensive to a substantial

---

[2] As explained in the Overview, there are certain contexts in which the government can draw viewpoint-based distinctions, such as when the government itself is the speaker. See Amdt1.7.4.1 Overview of Viewpoint-Based Regulation of Speech. See also Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker; Amdt1.7.13.6 Selective Funding Arrangements; Amdt1.7.13.7 Government's Message Versus Private Speakers.

[3] Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 576 U.S. 155, 168 (2015) (quoting Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995))).

[4] 508 U.S. 384, 387 (1993).

[5] Id. at 393.

[6] Id.; see also Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 831 (1995) (holding that a public university's denial of funding to a student-run religious publication amounted to viewpoint discrimination because the university "does not exclude religion as a subject matter but selects for disfavored treatment those student journalistic efforts with religious editorial viewpoints").

[7] The Court held in Snyder v. Phelps that the government cannot punish speech in a public place on a matter of public concern "simply because it is upsetting or arouses contempt." 562 U.S. 443, 458 (2011). In that case, the Court held that the First Amendment barred an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against members of a church who picketed a soldier's funeral. Id. at 459. In the Court's assessment, "any distress" caused by the picketing "turned on the content and viewpoint of the message conveyed, rather than any interference with the funeral itself." Id. at 457.

[8] Matal v. Tam, No. 15-1293, slip op. at 5 (U.S. June 19, 2017) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1052(a)).

[9] Id. at 18. A plurality of the Court further rejected analogies to federal benefits and government-funded programs for which "some content- and speaker-based restrictions are permitted." Id. at 18–23 (plurality opinion). The Court did not resolve the question of whether trademarks are commercial speech. The plurality reasoned that the law failed even the "relaxed" intermediate scrutiny standard applicable to commercial speech regulations. Id. at 23–24.

[10] Id. at 26 (majority opinion).

percentage of the members of any group," and "[g]iving offense is a viewpoint."[11] Two years later, the Court struck down the Lanham Act's bar to registering "immoral or scandalous" trademarks on similar grounds.[12]

By comparison, in a case involving a government-funded program, the Court upheld a statute requiring a federal agency to "take into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public" in awarding grants to support the arts.[13] The Court did not "perceive a realistic danger" that the statute would "compromise First Amendment values."[14] The program, the Court observed, was based on otherwise "subjective" grant criteria such as artistic excellence.[15] Given that context, making "decency and respect" a consideration was unlikely to "effectively preclude or punish the expression of particular views."[16]

Amdt1.7.4.3 Viewpoint Discrimination in Facially Neutral Laws

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

A law can discriminate on the basis of viewpoint even if it is viewpoint-neutral on its face. In assessing whether a facially neutral law nevertheless discriminates on the basis of viewpoint, the Supreme Court has asked whether the law, in its "design" or "operation," favors or disfavors a particular point of view.[1]

With regard to discriminatory design, the Court appears to distinguish between a law intended to or crafted to suppress a particular viewpoint and a law advanced or supported by a group with a particular viewpoint. According to the Court, "facially neutral and valid justifications" cannot save a law "that is in fact based on the desire to suppress a particular point of view."[2] A law is not viewpoint-based, however, "simply because its enactment was motivated by the conduct of the partisans on one side of a debate."[3] Further, while the Supreme Court has examined the general purposes of a statute to assess viewpoint neutrality in some cases,[4] the Court has declined to examine the motivations of particular legislators or regulators in other cases.[5]

---

[11] Id. at 22 (plurality opinion). At least four of the concurring Justices agreed with the plurality that the clause discriminated on the basis of viewpoint. Id. at 1 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

[12] Iancu v. Brunetti, No. 18-302, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 24, 2019) (reasoning that "the statute, on its face, distinguishes between two opposed sets of ideas: those aligned with conventional moral standards and those hostile to them; those inducing societal nods of approval and those provoking offense and condemnation").

[13] Nat'l Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 576 (1998) (quoting 20 U.S.C. § 954(d)(1)). See Amdt1.7.13.6 Selective Funding Arrangements.

[14] Nat'l Endowment for the Arts, 524 U.S. at 583.

[15] Id. at 585, 589–90.

[16] Id. at 583, 590.

[1] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 647 (1994).

[2] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 812 (1985) (holding that the federal government's decision to exclude advocacy groups from a charity drive aimed at federal employees was reasonable in light of the purposes of the charity drive, but allowing the respondent organization to argue that the decision was a pretext for viewpoint discrimination on remand).

[3] Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 724 (2000) (explaining that enacting a law "in response to the activities of antiabortion protesters" did not render that law viewpoint-based).

[4] E.g., Turner Broad. Sys., 512 U.S. at 646.

[5] E.g., United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383–84 (1968).

Various decisions of the Court suggest at least three indicators that a law may have been designed to suppress a particular viewpoint. First, a law that singles out particular speakers may be aimed at restricting certain content or certain viewpoints.[6] For example, in Sorrell v. IMS Health, Inc., the Court held unconstitutional a law limiting who could access certain information about prescriptions and for what purposes.[7] In addition to being content-based on its face, the Court explained, the law authorized "actual viewpoint discrimination" in practice.[8] Formal legislative findings showed that "the law's express purpose and practical effect [were] to diminish the effectiveness of marketing by manufacturers of brand-name drugs."[9] In other words, the Court concluded, the law targeted specific speakers in order to target their messages.[10] Thus, the law, while viewpoint-neutral on its face, was impermissibly "aimed at a particular viewpoint."[11]

Second—and related to speaker-based distinctions—a law that contains numerous exemptions may have the impermissible effect of restricting the speech of individuals or entities with a certain point of view. Exceptions and exemptions are not necessarily viewpoint-based: a law that regulates speech may include certain exemptions to avoid undermining the government's purpose or restricting more speech than is necessary. For example, in a 2014 case, the Court concluded that there was "nothing inherently suspect" in exempting abortion clinic employees from a law that otherwise restricted the zones in which persons could speak outside abortion clinics, because of the need to allow clinic employees "to do their jobs."[12] Because exemptions can introduce content or viewpoint-based distinctions,[13] however, a law that is "wildly underinclusive" may signal that the law was designed to "disfavor[ ] a particular speaker or viewpoint."[14]

Third, a law that restricts only a particular form of expression may be aimed at suppressing a particular viewpoint. For example, Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District arose from the suspension of three public high school students for violating a school policy prohibiting wearing armbands to school.[15] School officials had adopted the policy after learning that a group of students planned to wear black armbands to school as a symbol of opposition to the Vietnam War.[16] The Supreme Court held that the public school's denial of this "form of expression" violated the First Amendment.[17] Although schools have

---

[6] See Citizens United v. FEC, 558 U.S. 310, 340, 353–55 (2010) (opining that "[s]peech restrictions based on the identity of the speaker are all too often simply a means to control content"). Court-ordered injunctions, which necessarily apply to particular litigants (and thus particular speakers), present different considerations than a generally-applicable law that targets particular speakers. In Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., the Court held that an injunction against a group of anti-abortion protestors was not impermissibly viewpoint-based because it was based on the group's "past actions," not "the contents of [their] message." 512 U.S. 753, 762–63 (1994).

[7] 564 U.S. 552, 579–80 (2011).

[8] Id. at 565.

[9] Id.

[10] Id.

[11] Id.

[12] McCullen v. Coakley, 573 U.S. 464, 483 (2014). For other reasons, the Court ultimately held that the law violated the First Amendment because it "burden[ed] substantially more speech than necessary to achieve" the government's interests. Id. at 490.

[13] E.g., Barr v. Am. Ass'n of Pol. Consultants, Inc., No. 19-631, slip op. at 9 (U.S. July 6, 2020) (plurality opinion).

[14] Brown v. Entm't Merchs. Ass'n, 564 U.S. 786, 802 (2011). See Nat'l Inst. of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra, No. 16-1140, slip op. at 6 n.2, 15 (U.S. June 26, 2018) (expressing reservations about a law's underinclusivity because of the scope of its exemptions, but declining to decide whether the law was viewpoint-based because it violated the First Amendment on other grounds).

[15] 393 U.S. 503, 504 (1969).

[16] Id.

[17] Id. at 514.

some leeway to restrict student expression that might reasonably lead to "substantial disruption of or material interference with school activities,"[18] there was no indication that such disturbances would take place under the circumstances.[19] Instead, the Court observed, the school adopted the policy in anticipation of this "particular opinion" and prohibited this "particular symbol" but no other political symbols.[20] A public school cannot restrict student speech, the Court explained, based on a "mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint."[21]

In addition to the design of a law, a claim of viewpoint discrimination may be based on how the law operates in practice. A facially neutral law may be viewpoint-based if, in operation, it restricts or promotes a particular viewpoint.[22] Here again the Court has drawn some distinctions. Government action is not automatically viewpoint-based simply because it affects groups with opposing viewpoints unequally.[23] However, a law that invites discriminatory enforcement may violate the principle of viewpoint-neutrality.[24] The Court has held, for example, that a licensing law is vulnerable to a First Amendment challenge if it "gives a government official or agency substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech by suppressing disfavored speech or disliked speakers."[25]

Even if a law does not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint on its face, in its design, or in its operation, discriminatory enforcement of that law may still violate the First Amendment because enforcement involves government action subject to the First Amendment.[26] Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colorado Civil Rights Commission, which the Court ultimately decided on free exercise rather than free speech grounds, is instructive on this point.[27] In that case, a bakery owner was charged with violating the state's antidiscrimination law after refusing to make a cake for a same-sex couple's wedding.[28] The Court's decision focused not on the validity of the antidiscrimination law, but rather on its application to the bakery owner. In the record, the Court found evidence of "a clear and impermissible hostility toward the sincere religious beliefs that motivated [the baker's] objection."[29] The offending statements, the Court held, "violated the State's duty under the First Amendment not to base laws or regulations on hostility to a religion or religious viewpoint."[30]

---

[18] Id. See Amdt1.7.8.3 School Free Speech and Government as Educator.

[19] Tinker, 393 U.S. at 514.

[20] Id. at 510.

[21] Id. at 509; see also Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 187 (1972) (providing that a state college may not deny official recognition to a student group based on "mere disagreement" with the group's philosophy).

[22] Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552, 565 (2011).

[23] In Wood v. Moss, the Court held that Secret Service agents had not violated a clearly established First Amendment principle by separating protestors and supporters of the President at an impromptu dinner stop. 572 U.S. 744, 748 (2014). The Court suggested that the agents could not treat those groups differently solely based on their respective viewpoints. Id. at 761–62. The record showed, however, that the "because of their location, the protesters posed a potential security risk to the President, while the supporters, because of their location, did not." Id. at 762.

[24] See Amdt1.7.4.5 Viewpoint Neutrality in Forum Analysis.

[25] Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Pub. Co., 486 U.S. 750, 759, 772 (1988) (holding unconstitutional parts of a city ordinance "giving the mayor unfettered discretion to deny a permit application and unbounded authority to condition the permit on any additional terms" the mayor deemed necessary).

[26] See, e.g., Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 18, 26 (1971) (overturning a conviction that was based, not on conduct prohibited by the statute, but on the offensiveness of the defendant's speech).

[27] See No. 16-111, slip op. at 1, 3–4 (U.S. June 4, 2018). See Amdt1.4.4 Laws that Discriminate Against Religious Practice.

[28] No. 16-111, slip op. at 1, 4 (U.S. June 4, 2018).

[29] Id. at 12.

[30] Id. at 16 (emphasis added). The Court cited both free speech and free exercise cases for this principle, but decided the case solely on free exercise grounds. Id. at 16–17.

Amdt1.7.4.4 Viewpoint-Based Distinctions Within Proscribable Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Although content-based regulation of speech typically receives strict scrutiny,[1] there are certain, limited categories of speech—sometimes called "unprotected" speech—that the government may prohibit because of its harmful content.[2] Even when regulating in these areas, however, the government is not free to draw viewpoint-based distinctions, as explained in R.A.V. v. City of Saint Paul.[3] R.A.V. involved an ordinance that criminalized, among other acts, placing a burning cross on someone's property knowing that it would "arouse[ ] anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender."[4] For purposes of its analysis, the U.S. Supreme Court accepted the Minnesota Supreme Court's conclusion that the law reached only expressive acts that constitute "fighting words"—a category of unprotected speech.[5] The Court nevertheless concluded that the law violated the First Amendment because it drew additional distinctions between different types of fighting words based on subject matter and viewpoint.[6] The ordinance, the Court explained, applied "only to 'fighting words' that insult, or provoke violence, 'on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.'"[7] The Court held that the city could not "impose special prohibitions on those speakers who express views on disfavored subjects"—that is, on race, religion, or one of the other named topics.[8] The Court also held that the ordinance effectively amounted to "actual viewpoint discrimination" because persons "arguing in favor of racial, color, etc., tolerance and equality" could use fighting words that "could not be used by those speakers' opponents."[9]

Eleven years later, in Virginia v. Black, the Court held that a state could prohibit cross-burning with the intent to intimidate because "burning a cross is a particularly virulent form of intimidation," and such "true threats" are considered unprotected speech under the First Amendment.[10] The ordinance in R.A.V. was distinguishable, the Court explained, because it singled out threats made on the basis of certain viewpoints.[11]

---

[1] See Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech.

[2] R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 383–84 (1992) (referring to "proscribable content"); id. at 406 (White, J., concurring in the judgment) (referring to "unprotected speech").

[3] Id. at 388–91 (majority opinion).

[4] Id. at 380.

[5] Id. at 380–81. See Amdt1.7.5.5 Fighting Words.

[6] R.A.V., 505 U.S. at 381, 391.

[7] Id. at 391. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for the majority, gave the following example: "One could hold up a sign saying, for example, that all 'anti-Catholic bigots' are misbegotten; but not that all 'papists' are, for that would insult and provoke violence 'on the basis of religion.'" Id. at 391–92.

[8] Id. at 391.

[9] Id.

[10] 538 U.S. 343, 359–60, 363 (2003). The Court ruled that a certain provision of the statute at issue was unconstitutionally overbroad. Id. at 367 (plurality opinion).

[11] Id. at 361 (majority opinion).

Amdt1.7.4.5 Viewpoint Neutrality in Forum Analysis

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The government's latitude to regulate speech depends, in part, on the forum where that speech occurs. When the government regulates speech in a traditional public forum, such as a public park or sidewalk, or intentionally designates a forum for public speech, content-based regulations are subject to strict scrutiny.[1] In contrast, when the government opens up a nonpublic forum for a limited public purpose, it "may impose some content-based restrictions on speech."[2] Regardless of the type of forum, however, restrictions on content generally must be viewpoint-neutral to comply with the First Amendment.[3]

The Court applied these standards in several cases involving programs for student organizations at public universities, which generally have been considered limited or nonpublic forums. In one such case from 1995, the Court acknowledged that the government sometimes needs to limit forums it creates to "certain groups" or "certain topics," but ruled that once a government "has opened a limited forum," it may not "discriminate against speech on the basis of its viewpoint."[4] In that case, the university discriminated on the basis of viewpoint by denying funding to a student group because of its religious perspective.[5] By comparison, requiring registered student organizations "to accept all comers" is "textbook viewpoint neutral," the Court held in a 2010 decision.[6]

Apart from the requirement of viewpoint-neutrality, a regulation of speech in a nonpublic forum must be "reasonable" in light of the forum's purpose.[7] A law that is viewpoint-neutral on its face may be unreasonable if it lacks discernible standards to encourage viewpoint-neutral enforcement. In Minnesota Voters Alliance v. Mansky, a 2018 decision, the Court reviewed a state's political "apparel ban," which prohibited wearing any "political badge, political button, or other political insignia" within a polling place.[8] The Court held that a polling place on Election Day is a nonpublic forum subject to reasonable, content-based restrictions.[9] The apparel ban was viewpoint-neutral on its face, the Court determined, because it made "no

---

[1] Minn. Voters All. v. Mansky, No. 16-1435, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 14, 2018).

[2] Id. at 8; see, e.g., Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 48–49 (1983) (reasoning that because a public school's mail system was not a public forum, it had no constitutional obligation to let any organization use its mail boxes).

[3] See Manhattan Cmty. Access Corp. v. Halleck, No. 17-1702, slip op. at 8–9 (U.S. June 17, 2019) (stating that "[w]hen the government provides a forum for speech (known as a public forum)," it "ordinarily may not exclude speech or speakers from the forum on the basis of viewpoint"); Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 806 (1985) (explaining that "[c]ontrol over access to a nonpublic forum can be based on subject matter and speaker identity so long as the distinctions drawn are reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum and are viewpoint neutral").

[4] Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995).

[5] Id. at 825–27; see also Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 109 (2001) (holding that a public school engaged in viewpoint discrimination when it excluded a club from its "afterschool forum" because of the club's "religious nature").

[6] Christian Legal Soc'y Chapter of the Univ. of Cal. v. Martinez, 561 U.S. 661, 694–95 (2010) (holding, in addition, that the policy did not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in effect); see also Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 647 (1994) (holding that a federal statute requiring cable companies to transmit certain broadcast stations was not viewpoint-based because it did not differentiate among the messages that the stations carry).

[7] Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 806.

[8] No. 16-1435, slip op. at 3 (U.S. June 14, 2018).

[9] Id. at 8–9.

distinction based on the speaker's political persuasion."[10] The Court nonetheless struck down the apparel ban because it was overbroad in its operation, reaching apparel expressing viewpoints on issues on and off the ballot.[11] In addition, the lack of "objective, workable standards" for election judges to apply made the apparel ban susceptible to viewpoint-discriminatory enforcement, which contributed to its unreasonableness.[12]

Amdt1.7.5 Categorical Approach

Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

While content-based restrictions on protected speech are presumptively unconstitutional, the Supreme Court has recognized that the First Amendment permits restrictions upon the content of speech falling within a few limited categories, including obscenity, child pornography, defamation, fraud, incitement, fighting words, true threats, and speech integral to criminal conduct.[1] This "limited categorical approach"[2] to content-based regulations of speech derives from Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, wherein the Court opined that there exist "certain well- defined and narrowly limited classes of speech [that] are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth" such that the government may prevent those utterances and punish those uttering them without raising any constitutional issues.[3] More recent decisions of the Court reflect a reluctance to add any new categories of excepted speech and an inclination to interpret narrowly the excepted categories of speech that have long-established roots in First Amendment law.[4] Further, a 1992 decision cautioned that although "these areas of speech can, consistently with the First Amendment, be regulated because of their constitutionally proscribable content (obscenity, defamation, etc.)," these categories are not "entirely invisible to the Constitution."[5] Specifically, the Court said a regulation of one of these categories of speech might still violate the First Amendment if it contained additional content- or viewpoint-based distinctions unrelated to the proscribable content: while "the government may proscribe libel . . . it may not make the further content discrimination of proscribing only libel critical of the government."[6]

---

[10] Id. at 9.

[11] Id. at 13–17.

[12] Id. at 18.

[1] See United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460, 468 (2010).

[2] R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 383 (1992).

[3] 315 U.S. 568, 571–72 (1942).

[4] See, e.g., United States v. Alvarez, 567 U.S. 709, 718 (2012) (plurality opinion) ("Absent from those few categories where the law allows content-based regulation of speech is any general exception to the First Amendment for false statements."); Brown v. Entm't Merchs. Ass'n, 564 U.S. 786, 792 (2011) (holding that the obscenity exception to the First Amendment does not cover violent speech); Stevens, 559 U.S. at 472 (declining to "carve out" an exception to First Amendment protections for depictions of illegal acts of animal cruelty); Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 55 (1988) (refusing to restrict speech based on its level of "outrageousness").

[5] R.A.V., 505 U.S. at 383.

[6] Id. at 383–84.

Amdt1.7.5.2 Early Doctrine of Incitement

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Criminal punishment for advocating illegal or merely unpopular goals and ideas did not originate in the United States with the post-World War II concern with Communism. Prosecutions occurred under the Sedition Act of 1798,[1] and under the federal espionage laws[2] and state sedition and criminal syndicalism laws[3] in the 1920s and early 1930s.[4] Certain expression, oral or written, may incite, urge, counsel, advocate, or importune the commission of criminal conduct; other expression, such as picketing, demonstrating, and engaging in certain forms of "symbolic" action, may either counsel the commission of criminal conduct or itself constitute criminal conduct. Setting aside the problem of symbolic action,[5] the Court had to determine when expression that may be a nexus to criminal conduct is subject to punishment and restraint. Initially, the Court seemed disposed in the few cases reaching it to rule that if the conduct could be made criminal, advocating or promoting the conduct could be made criminal.[6]

In the Court's 1919 decision Schenck v. United States,[7] which concerned defendants convicted of violating the Espionage Act by disseminating leaflets seeking to disrupt recruitment of military personnel, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes formulated the "clear and present danger" test that governed this area for decades. To determine whether speech could be proscribed, he said, "[t]he question . . . is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent."[8] Consequently, the Court unanimously affirmed the convictions. One week later, in Frohwerk v. United States, the Court again unanimously affirmed convictions under the same act with Justice Holmes writing, "the First Amendment . . . obviously was not[ ] intended to give immunity for every possible use of language. We venture to believe that neither Hamilton nor Madison, nor any other competent person then or later, ever supposed that to make criminal the counselling of a murder within the jurisdiction of Congress would be an unconstitutional interference with free

---

[1] Ch. 74, 1 Stat. 596 (1798). As discussed in Amdt1.7.1 Historical Background on Free Speech Clause, the Sedition Act was eventually widely considered unconstitutional.

[2] The cases included Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919) (affirming conviction for attempting to disrupt conscription by circulation of leaflets condemning the draft); Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919) (affirming conviction for attempting to create insubordination in armed forces based on one speech advocating socialism and opposition to war, and praising resistance to the draft); Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919) (affirming convictions based on two leaflets, one of which attacked President Wilson as a coward and hypocrite for sending troops into Russia and the other of which urged workers not to produce materials to be used against their brothers).

[3] The cases included Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925) (affirming conviction based on publication of "manifesto" calling for the furthering of the "class struggle" through mass strikes and other mass action); Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927) (affirming conviction based upon adherence to party which had platform rejecting parliamentary methods and urging a "revolutionary class struggle," the adoption of which defendant had opposed).

[4] See also, e.g., Taylor v. Mississippi, 319 U.S. 583 (1943), setting aside convictions of three Jehovah's Witnesses under a statute that prohibited teaching or advocacy intended to encourage violence, sabotage, or disloyalty to the government after the defendants had said that it was wrong for the President "to send our boys across in uniform to fight our enemies" and that boys were being killed "for no purpose at all." The Court found no evil or sinister purpose, no advocacy of or incitement to subversive action, and no threat of clear and present danger to government.

[5] See Amdt1.7.14.1 Overview of Symbolic Speech.

[6] Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890); Fox v. Washington, 236 U.S. 273 (1915).

[7] 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[8] 249 U.S. at 52.

speech."[9] And, in Debs v. United States,[10] Justice Holmes upheld a conviction because "the natural and intended effect" and the "reasonably probable effect" of the speech for which the defendant was prosecuted was to obstruct military recruiting.

In Abrams v. United States,[11] however, Justices Holmes and Louis Brandeis dissented on affirming the convictions of several alien anarchists who had printed leaflets seeking to encourage discontent with the United States' participation in World War I. The majority simply referred to Schenck and Frohwerk to rebut the First Amendment argument, but the dissenters urged that the government had made no showing of a clear and present danger. Another case in which the Court affirmed a conviction by simply saying that "[t]he tendency of the articles and their efficacy were enough for the offense" drew a similar dissent.[12]

The Court did not invariably affirm convictions during this period in cases like those under consideration. In Fiske v. Kansas,[13] the Court held that a criminal syndicalism law had been invalidly applied to convict one against whom the only evidence was the "class struggle" language of the constitution of the organization to which he belonged. A conviction for violating a "red flag" law was voided because the statute was found unconstitutionally vague.[14] Neither case mentioned clear and present danger. An "incitement" test seemed to underlie the opinion in DeJonge v. Oregon,[15] upsetting a conviction under a criminal syndicalism statute for attending a meeting held under the auspices of an organization that was said to advocate violence as a political method, although the meeting was orderly and no violence was advocated during it. In Herndon v. Lowry,[16] the Court narrowly rejected the contention that the standard of guilt could be made the "dangerous tendency" of one's words, and indicated that the power of a state to abridge speech "even of utterances of a defined character must find its justification in a reasonable apprehension of danger to organized government."

Finally, in Thornhill v. Alabama,[17] a state anti-picketing law was invalidated because "no clear and present danger of destruction of life or property, or invasion of the right of privacy, or breach of the peace can be thought to be inherent in the activities of every person who approaches the premises of an employer and publicizes the facts of a labor dispute involving the latter." During the same term, the Court reversed the breach of the peace conviction of a Jehovah's Witness who had played an inflammatory phonograph record to persons on the street, the Court discerning no clear and present danger of disorder.[18]

The Court also applied the clear and present danger test in Terminiello v. City of Chicago,[19] in which a 5-4 majority struck down a conviction obtained after the judge instructed the jury that a breach of the peace could be committed by speech that "stirs the public to anger, invites dispute, brings about a condition of unrest, or creates a disturbance." Justice William O. Douglas wrote for the majority that:

---

[9] Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204, 206 (1919) (citations omitted).

[10] 249 U.S. 211, 215–16 (1919).

[11] 250 U.S. 616 (1919).

[12] Schaefer v. United States, 251 U.S. 466, 479 (1920). See also Pierce v. United States, 252 U.S. 239 (1920).

[13] 274 U.S. 380 (1927).

[14] Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

[15] 299 U.S. 353 (1937). See id. at 364–65.

[16] 301 U.S. 242, 258 (1937). At another point, clear and present danger was alluded to without any definite indication it was the standard. Id. at 261.

[17] 310 U.S. 88, 105 (1940). The Court admitted that the picketing resulted in economic injury to the employer, but found such injury "neither so serious nor so imminent" as to justify restriction. The doctrine of clear and present danger did not play a future role in labor picketing cases.

[18] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308 (1940).

[19] 337 U.S. 1 (1949).

> [A] function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute. It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger. Speech is often provocative and challenging. It may strike at prejudices and preconceptions and have profound unsettling effects as it presses for acceptance of an idea. That is why freedom of speech, though not absolute, . . . is nevertheless protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest.[20]

The dissenters focused on the disorders that had actually occurred as a result of Terminiello's speech, Justice Robert Jackson saying: "Rioting is a substantive evil, which I take it no one will deny that the State and the City have the right and the duty to prevent and punish . . . . In this case the evidence proves beyond dispute that danger of rioting and violence in response to the speech was clear, present and immediate."[21] The disorderly consequences of speech were emphasized in Feiner v. New York,[22] in which Chief Justice Fred Vinson said that "[t]he findings of the state courts as to the existing situation and the imminence of greater disorder coupled with petitioner's deliberate defiance of the police officers convince us that we should not reverse this conviction in the name of free speech."

Amdt1.7.5.3 Incitement Movement from Clear and Present Danger Test

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Gitlow v. New York,[1] a conviction for distributing a manifesto in violation of a law making it criminal to advocate, advise, or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of overthrowing organized government by force or violence, the Court affirmed in the absence of any evidence regarding the effect of the distribution and in the absence of any contention that it created any immediate threat to the security of the state. In so doing, the Court distinguished the "clear and present danger" test used in Schenck: Schenck governed "cases where the statute merely prohibits certain acts involving the danger of substantive evil, without any reference to language itself, and it is sought to apply its provisions to language used by the defendant for the purpose of bringing about the prohibited results."[2] By contrast, in Gitlow, the Court observed that "the legislative body itself ha[d] previously determined the danger of substantive evil arising from utterances of a specified character."[3] Thus, a state legislative determination "that utterances advocating the overthrow of organized government by force, violence and unlawful means, are so inimical to the general welfare and involve such danger of substantive evil that they may be penalized in the exercise of its police power" was almost conclusive to the Court.[4]

---

[20] 337 U.S. at 4–5.

[21] 337 U.S. at 25–26.

[22] 340 U.S. 315, 321 (1951).

[1] 268 U.S. 652 (1925).

[2] Id. at 670–71.

[3] 268 U.S. at 671.

[4] 268 U.S. at 668. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes dissented. "If what I think the correct test is applied, it is manifest that there was no present danger of an attempt to overthrow the government by force on the part of the admittedly small minority who shared the defendant's views. It is said that this manifesto was more than a theory,

In Whitney v. California,[5] the Court affirmed a conviction under a criminal syndicalism statute based on the defendant's association with and membership in an organization that advocated the commission of illegal acts, finding again that the determination of a legislature that such advocacy involves "danger to the public peace and the security of the State" was entitled to almost conclusive weight. In a technical concurrence on procedural grounds, which in fact disagreed with the substance of the majority opinion, Justice Louis Brandeis restated the "clear and present danger" test, saying "even advocacy of violation [of the law] . . . is not a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy fails short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on. . . . In order to support a finding of clear and present danger it must be shown either that immediate serious violence was to be expected or was advocated, or that the past conduct furnished reason to believe that such advocacy was then contemplated."[6]

In Dennis v. United States,[7] the Court sustained the constitutionality of the Smith Act,[8] which proscribed advocacy of the overthrow by force and violence of the government of the United States, and upheld convictions under it. The plurality opinion in Dennis recognized that Whitney and Gitlow had largely been superseded by Schenck, and applied a revised version of the clear and present danger test to conclude that the evil sought to be prevented was serious enough to justify suppression of speech.[9] The plurality said the phrase "clear and present danger" should not "be crystallized into a rigid rule to be applied inflexibly without regard to the circumstances of each case."[10] Many of the cases in which it had previously been used to reverse convictions had turned "on the fact that the interest which the State was attempting to protect was itself too insubstantial to warrant restriction of speech."[11]

By contrast, in Dennis, the plurality reasoned that "[o]verthrow of the government by force and violence is certainly a substantial enough interest for the government to limit speech."[12] Further, the plurality said the government did not need to wait to act until the plan was set in action.[13] The Court adopted a flexible version of the "clear and present danger" test: "In each case [courts] must ask whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies that it was an incitement. Every idea is an incitement. It offers itself for belief and if believed it is acted on unless some other belief outweighs it or some failure of energy stifles the movement at its birth. The only difference between the expression of an opinion and an incitement in the narrower sense is the speaker's enthusiasm for the result. Eloquence may set fire to reason. But whatever may be thought of the redundant discourse before us it had no chance of starting a present conflagration. If in the long run the beliefs expressed in proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way." Id. at 673.

---

[5] 274 U.S. 357, 371 (1927), overruled by Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

[6] 274 U.S. at 376.

[7] 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

[8] 54 Stat. 670 (1940), 18 U.S.C. § 2385.

[9] Dennis, 341 U.S. at 507–09, 517.

[10] Id. at 508.

[11] 341 U.S. at 508.

[12] 341 U.S. at 509.

[13] 341 U.S. at 508, 509.

such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger."[14] The "requisite danger" of a conspiracy was found to justify the convictions.[15]

The clear and present danger test was a lighter restriction on governmental power after Dennis, and it virtually disappeared from the Court's language over the next twenty years.[16] Its replacement for part of this period was the much disputed "balancing" test, which made its appearance the year before Dennis in American Communications Ass'n v. Douds.[17] There the Court sustained a law barring the National Labor Relations Board from investigating a labor union's petition if any of its officers failed to file annually an oath disclaiming membership in the Communist Party and belief in the violent overthrow of the government.[18] Chief Justice Fred Vinson, for the Court, rejected reliance on the clear and present danger test because the government's interest in the law was "not in preventing the dissemination of Communist doctrine or the holding of particular beliefs because it is feared that unlawful action will result therefrom if free speech is practiced."[19] Instead, the Court concluded that the law did not interfere with speech—the government's interest was "in protecting the free flow of commerce from what Congress considers to be substantial evils of conduct that are not the products of speech at all."[20] In evaluating the permissibility of the oath, the Court said it had to balance "the conflicting individual and national interests." The Court further reasoned, "When particular conduct is regulated in the interest of public order, and the regulation results in an indirect, conditional, partial abridgement of speech, the duty of the courts is to determine which of these two conflicting interests demands the greater protection under the particular circumstances presented."[21] As the interest in the restriction, the government's right to prevent political strikes and disruption of commerce, was much more substantial than the limited interest on the other side in view of the relative handful of persons affected in only a partial manner, the Court perceived no difficulty upholding the statute.[22]

During the 1950s and early 1960s, the Court used the balancing test in decisions that did not concern threatening expression or advocacy but rather governmental inquiries into or regulation of associations and personal beliefs premised on these being predictive of future or intended conduct that government could regulate or prohibit. Thus, in the leading case on [14] 341 U.S. at 510 (quoting United States v. Dennis, 183 F.2d 201, 212 (2d Cir. 1950). Justice Felix Frankfurter, concurring, adopted a balancing test. Id. at 517. Justice Robert Jackson appeared to proceed on a conspiracy approach rather than one depending on advocacy. Id. at 561. Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented, reasserting clear and present danger as the standard. Id. at 579, 581. Note the recurrence to the Learned Hand formulation in Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 562 (1976), although the Court appeared in fact to apply balancing.

---

[15] Dennis, 341 U.S. at 510–11. In Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), the Court discussed its constitutional jurisprudence while interpreting the Smith Act to require advocacy of unlawful action, to require the urging of doing something now or in the future, rather than merely advocacy of forcible overthrow as an abstract doctrine, and by finding the evidence lacking to prove the former.

[16] Cf. Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 HARV. L. REV. 1, 8 (1965). See Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U.S. 157, 185–207 (1961) (Harlan, J., concurring).

[17] 339 U.S. 382 (1950). See also Osman v. Douds, 339 U.S. 846 (1950). Balancing language was used by Justice Hugo Black in his opinion for the Court in Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 143 (1943), but it seems not to have influenced the decision. Similarly, in Schneider v. Irvington, 308 U.S. 147, 161–62 (1939), Justice Owen Roberts used balancing language that he apparently did not apply.

[18] The law, § 9(h) of the Taft-Hartley Act, 61 Stat. 146 (1947), was repealed, 73 Stat. 525 (1959), and replaced by a section making it a criminal offense for any person "who is or has been a member of the Communist Party" during the preceding five years to serve as an officer or employee of any union. § 504, 73 Stat. 536 (1959); 29 U.S.C. § 504 . It was held unconstitutional in United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437 (1965).

[19] Id. at 396.

[20] Id. For additional discussion of Douds and other cases involving loyalty oaths impinging on associational freedom, see Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits.

[21] 339 U.S. at 399, 410.

[22] 339 U.S. at 400–06.

balancing, Konigsberg v. State Bar of California,[23] the Court upheld a state's refusal to certify an applicant for admission to the bar. Describing the relevant analysis, the Court said "general regulatory statutes, not intended to control the content of speech but incidentally limiting its unfettered exercise, have not been regarded as the type of law the First or Fourteenth Amendment forbade Congress or the States to pass, when they have been found justified by subordinating valid governmental interests, a prerequisite to constitutionality which has necessarily involved a weighing of the governmental interest involved."[24]

The Court used balancing to sustain congressional and state inquiries into associations and individual activities that were alleged to be subversive[25] and proceedings against the Communist Party and its members.[26] The Court did not use balancing, however, when it struck down restrictions on receiving materials mailed from Communist countries[27] or in cases involving picketing, pamphleteering, and demonstrating in public places.[28] But the only case in which the Court specifically rejected balancing involved a statutory regulation like those that had led the Court to adopt the test in the first place. In United States v. Robel,[29] the Court held invalid under the First Amendment a statute that made it unlawful for any member of an organization that the Subversive Activities Control Board had ordered to register to work in a defense establishment.[30] Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Earl Warren reasoned that the law was flawed because its proscription operated per se "without any need to establish that an individual's association poses the threat feared by the Government in proscribing it,"[31] and, as a result, the rationale of the decision was not clear and present danger but the existence of less restrictive means by which the governmental interest could be accomplished.[32] In a concluding footnote, the Court said: "It has been suggested that this case should be decided by 'balancing' the governmental interests . . . against the First Amendment rights asserted by the appellee. This we decline to do. We recognize that both interests are substantial, but we deem it inappropriate for this Court to label one as being more important or more substantial than the other. Our inquiry is more circumscribed. . . . We have ruled only that the Constitution requires that the conflict between congressional power and individual rights be accommodated by legislation drawn more narrowly to avoid the conflict."[33]

The government used the Smith Act provision criminalizing organizing or becoming a member of an organization that teaches, advocates, or encourages the overthrow of government by force or violence against Communist Party members. In Scales v. United States,[34] the Court affirmed a conviction and held it constitutional against First Amendment

---

[23] 366 U.S. 36 (1961).

[24] 366 U.S. at 50–51. Again, the ruling in Konigsberg is discussed in more detail in Amdt1.8.2.3 Denial of Employment or Public Benefits.

[25] Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (1959); Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U.S. 399 (1961); Braden v. United States, 365 U.S. 431 (1961).

[26] Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961); Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961).

[27] Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301 (1965).

[28] E.g., Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 and 559 (1965) (2 cases); Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963); Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966). But see Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972), where balancing reappears and in which other considerations overbalance the First Amendment claims.

[29] 389 U.S. 258 (1967).

[30] Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, § 5(a)(1)(D), 64 Stat. 992, 50 U.S.C. § 784 (a)(1)(D).

[31] United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 265 (1967).

[32] 389 U.S. at 265–68.

[33] 389 U.S. at 268 n.20.

[34] 367 U.S. 203 (1961). Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented on First Amendment grounds, id. at 259, 262, while Justice William Brennan and Chief Justice Warren dissented on statutory grounds. Id. at 278.

attack. Advocacy such as the Communist Party engaged in, Justice John Harlan wrote for the Court, was unprotected under Dennis, and he could see no reason why membership that constituted a purposeful form of complicity in a group engaging in such advocacy should be a protected form of association. Of course, he observed "[i]f there were a similar blanket prohibition of association with a group having both legal and illegal aims, there would indeed be a real danger that legitimate political expression or association would be impaired, but the membership clause . . . does not make criminal all association with an organization which has been shown to engage in illegal advocacy."[35] Only an "active" member of the Party—one who with knowledge of the proscribed advocacy intends to accomplish the aims of the organization—was to be punished, the Court said, not a "nominal, passive, inactive or purely technical" member.[36]

Amdt1.7.5.4 Incitement Current Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Brandenburg v. Ohio,[1] the Supreme Court reversed a conviction under a criminal syndicalism statute of advocating the necessity or propriety of criminal or terrorist means to achieve political change. The prevailing doctrine developed in the Communist Party cases was that "mere" advocacy was protected but that a call for concrete, forcible action even far in the future was not protected speech and knowing membership in an organization calling for such action was not protected association, regardless of the probability of success.[2] In Brandenburg, however, the Court reformulated these and other rulings to mean "that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."[3] The Court has applied the Brandenburg formulation in subsequent cases, although a number of questions remain with respect to the imminence and likelihood aspects of the standard.[4]

---

[35] 367 U.S. at 229.

[36] 367 U.S. at 220. In Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961), the Court reversed a conviction under the membership clause because the evidence was insufficient to prove that the Party had engaged in unlawful advocacy. "[T]he mere abstract teaching of Communist theory, including the teaching of the moral propriety or even moral necessity for a resort to force and violence, is not the same as preparing a group for violent action and steeling it to such action. There must be some substantial direct or circumstantial evidence of a call to violence now or in the future which is both sufficiently strong and sufficiently pervasive to lend color to the otherwise ambiguous theoretical material regarding Communist Party teaching, and to justify the inference that such a call to violence may fairly be imputed to the Party as a whole, and not merely to some narrow segment of it." Id. at 297–98.

[1] 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

[2] Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957); Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961); Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961). See also Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966); Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969).

[3] 395 U.S. at 447 (emphasis added).

[4] See, e.g., Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 928 (1982). In Stewart v. McCoy, 537 U.S. 993 (2002), Justice John Paul Stevens, in a statement accompanying a denial of certiorari, wrote that, while Brandenburg's "requirement that the consequence be 'imminent' is justified with respect to mere advocacy, the same justification does not necessarily adhere to some speech that performs a teaching function. Long range planning of criminal enterprises—which may include oral advice, training exercises, and perhaps the preparation of written materials—involve speech that should not be glibly characterized as mere 'advocacy' and certainly may create significant public danger. Our cases have not yet considered whether, and if so to what extent, the First Amendment protects such instructional speech." Id. at 995.

Amdt1.7.5.5 Fighting Words

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire,[1] the Court unanimously sustained a conviction under a state law proscribing "any offensive, derisive or annoying word" addressed to any person in a public place after accepting the state court's interpretation of the statute as being limited to "fighting words"—that is, to words that "have a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the person to whom, individually, the remark is addressed." The Court sustained the statute as "narrowly drawn and limited to define and punish specific conduct lying within the domain of state power, the use in a public place of words likely to cause a breach of the peace."[2] The Court further explained that "by their very utterance," fighting words "inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace."[3] Accordingly, "such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."[4]

Chaplinsky still remains viable for the principle that "the States are free to ban the simple use, without a demonstration of additional justifying circumstances, of so-called 'fighting words,' those personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction."[5] But, in actuality, the Court has closely scrutinized statutes on vagueness and overbreadth grounds and set aside convictions as not being within the doctrine. Chaplinsky thus remains the governing standard, but the Court has not upheld a government action on the basis of that doctrine since Chaplinsky itself.[6]

In the related "hostile audience" situation, the Court sustained a conviction for disorderly conduct of one who refused police demands to cease speaking after his speech seemingly stirred numbers of his listeners to mutterings and threatened disorders.[7] But this case has been significantly limited by cases that hold the Fifth Amendment protects the peaceful expression of views that stirs people to anger because of the content of the expression, or perhaps because of the manner in which it is conveyed, and that government may not use breach of the peace and disorderly conduct statutes to curb such expression. Specifically, the

---

[1] 315 U.S. 568 (1942).

[2] 315 U.S. at 573.

[3] 315 U.S. at 572.

[4] Id.

[5] Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971). Cohen's conviction for breach of the peace, occasioned by his appearance in public with an "offensive expletive" lettered on his jacket, was reversed, in part because the words were not a personal insult and there was no evidence of audience objection.

[6] The Court held that government may not punish profane, vulgar, or opprobrious words simply because they are offensive, but only if they are "fighting words" that have a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the person to whom they are directed. Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972); Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130 (1974); Lucas v. Arkansas, 416 U.S. 919 (1974); Kelly v. Ohio, 416 U.S. 923 (1974); Karlan v. City of Cincinnati, 416 U.S. 924 (1974); Rosen v. California, 416 U.S. 924 (1974); see also Eaton v. City of Tulsa, 416 U.S. 697 (1974).

[7] Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951). See also Milk Wagon Drivers v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U.S. 287 (1941), in which the Court held that a court could enjoin peaceful picketing because violence occurring at the same time against the businesses picketed could have created an atmosphere in which even peaceful, otherwise protected picketing could be illegally coercive. But compare NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982).

Court has held that "speech cannot be restricted simply because it is upsetting or arouses contempt," at least when the speech occurs in "a public place on a matter of public concern."[8]

The cases are unclear as to what extent the police must go to protect a speaker against hostile audience reaction or whether only actual disorder or a clear and present danger of disorder entitles the authorities to terminate the speech or other expressive conduct.[9] The Court has also held that, absent incitement to illegal action, government may not punish mere expression or proscribe ideas,[10] regardless of the trifling or annoying caliber of the expression.[11]

Amdt1.7.5.6 True Threats

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has cited three "reasons why threats of violence are outside the First Amendment"—"protecting individuals from the fear of violence, from the disruption that fear engenders, and from the possibility that the threatened violence will occur."[1] In Watts v. United States, however, the Court held that only "true" threats are outside ordinary First Amendment protections.[2] The defendant in Watts expressed his opposition to the military draft at a public rally, saying, "If they ever make me carry a rifle, the first man I want to get in my sights is L.B.J."[3] He was convicted of violating a federal statute that prohibited "any threat to take the life of or to inflict bodily harm upon the President of the United States." The Supreme Court reversed. Interpreting the statute "with the commands of the First Amendment clearly in mind,"[4] the Court found that the defendant had not made a "true 'threat,'" but had indulged in mere "political hyperbole."[5]

In NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., White merchants in Claiborne County, Mississippi, sued the NAACP to recover losses caused by a boycott by Black citizens of their businesses, and to enjoin future boycott activity.[6] During the course of the boycott, NAACP Field Secretary Charles Evers told an audience of "black people that any 'uncle toms' who broke the boycott

---

[8] Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 458 (2011).

[9] The principle actually predates Feiner. See Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). For subsequent application, see Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966); Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969); Bachellar v. Maryland, 397 U.S. 564 (1970). Significant is Justice John Harlan's statement of the principle reflected by Feiner. "Nor do we have here an instance of the exercise of the State's police power to prevent a speaker from intentionally provoking a given group to hostile reaction. Cf. Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)." Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971).

[10] Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971); Bachellar v. Maryland, 397 U.S. 564 (1970); Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969); Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952); Kingsley Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959); Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

[11] Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971); Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972).

[1] R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 388 (1992).

[2] 394 U.S. 705, 708 (1969) (per curiam).

[3] 394 U.S. at 706.

[4] 394 U.S. at 707.

[5] 394 U.S. at 708.

[6] 458 U.S. 886 (1982). Claiborne is also discussed below under "Public Issue Picketing and Parading."

would 'have their necks broken' by their own people."[7] The Court acknowledged that this language "might have been understood as inviting an unlawful form of discipline or, at least, as intending to create a fear of violence."[8] Yet, no violence had followed directly from Evers' speeches, and the Court found that Evers' "emotionally charged rhetoric did not transcend the bounds of protected speech set forth in Brandenburg. An advocate must be free to stimulate his audience with spontaneous and emotional appeals for unity and action in a common cause. When such appeals do not incite lawless action, they must be regarded as protected speech."[9] Although the Court held that, under Brandenburg, Evers' speech did not constitute unprotected incitement of lawless action,[10] the Court also cited Watts, thereby implying that Evers' speech also did not constitute a "true threat."[11]

In 2003's Virginia v. Black, the Supreme Court considered a First Amendment challenge to a state law that banned cross burning carried out with the intent to intimidate.[12] The Court held that, at least in theory, states could prohibit such cross burnings as a "true threat."[13] Specifically, intimidation can be prohibited as "a type of true threat, where a speaker directs a threat to a person or group of persons with the intent of placing the victim in fear of bodily harm or death."[14] Cross burning could fall within this category of "intimidating speech," given that the "history of cross burning in this country" demonstrated they were often "intended to create a pervasive fear in victims that they are a target of violence."[15] However, the Court concluded that the specific state law before it was unconstitutional insofar as it allowed the mere fact of cross burning to provide prima facie evidence of the intent to intimidate, creating a chill on constitutionally protected speech.[16]

Amdt1.7.5.7 Defamation

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

One of the most foundational cases in First Amendment jurisprudence occurred in 1964 with the Court's decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.[1] The Times had published a paid advertisement by a civil rights organization criticizing the response of a Southern community to demonstrations led by Dr. Martin Luther King and containing several factual errors. The plaintiff, a city commissioner in charge of the police department, claimed that the advertisement had libeled him even though he was not referred to by name or title and even [7] 458 U.S. at 900, n.29. See id. at 902 for a similar remark by Evers.

[8] 458 U.S. at 927.

[9] 458 U.S. at 928.

[10] Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Brandenburg is discussed above under "Is There a Present Test?"

[11] Claiborne, 458 U.S. at 928 n.71.

[12] Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 347 (2003).

[13] Id. at 360, 363.

[14] Id. at 360.

[15] Id.

[16] Id. at 364–65 (plurality opinion); id. at 386 (Souter, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (concluding that the law was an impermissibly content-based statute, in part because "the prima facie evidence provision skews prosecutions . . . toward suppressing ideas."). A cross burning done as "a statement of ideology, a symbol of group solidarity," or "in movies such as Mississippi Burning," however, would be protected speech. Id. at 365–366 (plurality opinion).

[1] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

though several of the incidents described had occurred prior to his assumption of office. Unanimously, the Court reversed the lower court's judgment for the plaintiff. To the contention that the First Amendment did not protect libelous publications, the Court replied that constitutional scrutiny could not be completely foreclosed by the "label" attached to something. The Court said libel could "claim no talismanic immunity from constitutional limitations," and the standards for proving defamation must "satisfy the First Amendment."[2] The Court considered the case "against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials."[3] Because the advertisement was "an expression of grievance and protest on one of the major public issues of our time, [it] would seem clearly to qualify for the constitutional protection [unless] it forfeits that protection by the falsity of some of its factual statements and by its alleged defamation of respondent."[4]

Prior interpretations had established that the First Amendment contained no exception "for any test of truth."[5] The Court explained that error is inevitable in any free debate, to place on the speaker the burden of proving truth would introduce self-censorship and stifle the free expression which the First Amendment protects.[6] Nor would injury to official reputation afford a warrant for repressing otherwise free speech. Public officials are subject to public scrutiny and "[c]riticism of their official conduct does not lose its constitutional protection merely because it is effective criticism and hence diminishes their official reputation."[7] Ultimately, the Court said the First Amendment "prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."[8]

In the wake of the Times ruling, the Court decided two cases involving the type of criminal libel statute upon which Justice Felix Frankfurter had relied in analogy to uphold the group libel law in Beauharnais v. Illinois, discussed in a subsequent essay.[9] In neither case did the Court apply the concept of Times to void them altogether. Garrison v. Louisiana[10] held that a statute that did not incorporate the Times rule of "actual malice" was invalid, while in Ashton v. Kentucky[11] a common-law definition of criminal libel as "any writing calculated to create disturbances of the peace, corrupt the public morals or lead to any act, which, when done, is indictable" was too vague to be constitutional.

Subsequent cases elaborated which defamed individuals had to satisfy the Times rule. Explaining the definition of a "public official," the Court said this includes "at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have,

---

[2] 376 U.S. at 269. Justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, and Arthur Goldberg, concurring, would have held libel laws per se unconstitutional. Id. at 293, 297.

[3] 376 U.S. at 269, 270.

[4] 376 U.S. at 271.

[5] 376 U.S. at 271.

[6] 376 U.S. at 271–72, 278–79. The substantial truth of an utterance is ordinarily a defense to defamation. See Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, 501 U.S. 496, 516 (1991).

[7] 376 U.S. at 272–73.

[8] 376 U.S. at 279–80. The same standard applies for defamation contained in petitions to the government, the Court having rejected the argument that the petition clause requires absolute immunity. McDonald v. Smith, 472 U.S. 479 (1985).

[9] Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 254–58 (1952); Amdt1.7.5.8 Application of Defamation Cases to Group Libel, Hate Speech.

[10] 379 U.S. 64 (1964).

[11] 384 U.S. 195 (1966).

substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs."[12] But the Court appeared to expand the concept of "public official" to take on overtones of anyone holding public elective or appointive office.[13] Moreover, candidates for public office were subject to the Times rule and comment on their character or past conduct, public or private, insofar as it touches upon their fitness for office, is protected.[14]

Thus, a wide range of reporting about both public officials and candidates was quickly held to be subject to heightened constitutional standards. While the First Amendment protects scrutiny and criticism of the conduct of official duties by public officials,[15] the Court has also held that criticism that reflects generally upon an official's integrity and honesty is protected.[16] Candidates for public office, the Court has said, place their whole lives before the public, and it is difficult to see what criticisms could not be related to their fitness.[17]

Only three years after its Sullivan decision, the Court said the First Amendment also required a heightened standard to prove defamation of a "public figure," which included those otherwise private individuals who have attained some prominence, either through their own efforts or because it was thrust upon them, with respect to a matter of public interest, or, in Chief Justice Earl Warren's words, those persons who are "intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large."[18] Later, the Court curtailed the definition of "public figure" by [12] Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 85 (1966).

[13] See Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966) (supervisor of a county recreation area employed by and responsible to the county commissioners may be public official within Times rule); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964) (elected municipal judges); Henry v. Collins, 380 U.S. 356 (1965) (county attorney and chief of police); St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968) (deputy sheriff); Greenbelt Cooperative Pub. Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970) (state legislator who was major real estate developer in area); Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279 (1971) (police captain). The categorization does not, however, include all government employees. Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 119 n.8 (1979).

[14] Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265 (1971); Ocala Star-Banner Co. v. Damron, 401 U.S. 295 (1971).

[15] Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 85 (1966).

[16] Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), involved charges that judges were inefficient, took excessive vacations, opposed official investigations of vice, and were possibly subject to "racketeer influences." The Court rejected the argument that these criticisms were not about how the judges conducted their courts but were personal attacks upon their integrity and honesty. The Court observed: "Of course, any criticism of the manner in which a public official performs his duties will tend to affect his private, as well as his public, reputation . . . .The public-official rule protects the paramount public interest in a free flow of information to the people concerning public officials, their servants. To this end, anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office is relevant. Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character." Id. at 76–77.

[17] In Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 274–75 (1971), the Court said: "The principal activity of a candidate in our political system, his 'office,' so to speak, consists in putting before the voters every conceivable aspect of his public and private life that he thinks may lead the electorate to gain a good impression of him. A candidate who, for example, seeks to further his cause through the prominent display of his wife and children can hardly argue that his qualities as a husband or father remain of 'purely private' concern. And the candidate who vaunts his spotless record and sterling integrity cannot convincingly cry 'Foul' when an opponent or an industrious reporter attempts to demonstrate the contrary. Given the realities of our political life, it is by no means easy to see what statements about a candidate might be altogether without relevance to his fitness for the office he seeks. The clash of reputations is the staple of election campaigns and damage to reputation is, of course, the essence of libel. But whether there remains some exiguous area of defamation against which a candidate may have full recourse is a question we need not decide in this case."

[18] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 164 (1967) (Chief Justice Earl Warren concurring in the result). Curtis involved a college football coach, and Associated Press v. Walker, decided in the same opinion, involved a retired general active in certain political causes. The suits arose from reporting allegations, respectively, that the football coach fixed a football game and the retired general led a violent crowd in opposition to enforcement of a desegregation decree. While the Court was extremely divided, Chief Justice Warren's rule became the generally accepted rule. Essentially, four Justices opposed applying the Times standard to "public figures," although they would have imposed a lesser but constitutionally based burden on public figure plaintiffs. Id. at 133 (plurality opinion of Harlan, Clark, playing down the matter of public interest and emphasizing that one becomes a "public figure" by voluntarily assuming a role in public affairs.[19]

Second, in a fragmented ruling, the Court applied the Times standard to private citizens who had simply been involved in events of public interest, usually, though not invariably, not through their own choosing.[20] But, in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.[21] the Court clarified that Sullivan's actual malice standard did not apply to any defamation on a matter of public concern. Instead, persons who are neither public officials nor public figures may recover for the publication of defamatory falsehoods so long as state defamation law establishes a standard higher than strict liability, such as negligence; damages may not be presumed, however, but must be proved, and punitive damages will be recoverable only upon the Times showing of "actual malice."[22]

Subsequent cases have revealed a trend toward narrowing the scope of the "public figure" concept. A socially prominent litigant in a particularly messy divorce controversy was held not to be such a person,[23] and a person convicted years before of contempt after failing to appear before a grand jury was similarly not a public figure even as to commentary with respect to his conviction.[24] Also the Court deemed a scientist who sought and received federal grants for research, the results of which were published in scientific journals, not to be a public figure for purposes of an allegedly defamatory comment about the value of his research.[25] Public figures, the Court reiterated, are those who (1) occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes or (2) have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved, and are public figures with respect to comment on those issues.[26]

The Court has elaborated on the principles governing defamation actions brought by private figures. First, when a private plaintiff sues a media defendant for publication of information that is a matter of public concern—such as the Gertz situation—the burden is on the plaintiff to establish the information is false. Thus, the Court held in Philadelphia Newspapers v. Hepps,[27] the common law rule that defamatory statements are presumptively false must give way to the First Amendment interest that true speech on matters of public concern not be inhibited. This means, as the dissenters noted, that a Gertz plaintiff must establish falsity in addition to establishing some degree of fault (for example, negligence).[28] On the other hand, the Court held in Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders that the Gertz standard limiting award of presumed and punitive damages applies only in cases involving Stewart, and Fortas, JJ.). Three Justices applied Times, id. at 162 (Warren, C.J.), and id. at 172 (Brennan and White, JJ.). Two Justices would have applied absolute immunity. Id. at 170 (Black and Douglas, JJ.). See also Greenbelt Cooperative Pub. Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970).

---

[19] Public figures "[f]or the most part [are] those who . . . have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345 (1974).

[20] Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, 403 U.S. 29 (1971). Rosenbloom had been prefigured by Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967), a "false light" privacy case considered infra

[21] 418 U.S. 323, 346 (1974).

[22] Id. at 347, 349.

[23] Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448 (1976). See also Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157 (1979).

[24] Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157 (1979).

[25] Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111 (1979).

[26] 443 U.S. at 134 (quoting Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345 (1974)).

[27] 475 U.S. 767 (1986).

[28] 475 U.S. at 780 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

matters of public concern, and that selling credit reporting information to subscribers is not such a matter of public concern.[29] The Court has left unclear whether it matters if the defendant to the defamation suit is from the media rather than a private person. The plurality in Dun & Bradstreet declined to follow the lower court's rationale that Gertz protections are unavailable to nonmedia defendants, and a majority of Justices agreed on that point.[30] In Philadelphia Newspapers, however, the Court expressly reserved the issue of "what standards would apply if the plaintiff sues a nonmedia defendant."[31]

Other issues besides who is covered by the Times privilege are of considerable importance. The Court has distinguished "actual malice" from the common law meaning of malice.[32] Under Times, constitutional "actual malice" means the defendant published the defamation with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false.[33] Reckless disregard is not simply negligent behavior, but publication with serious doubts as to the truth of what is uttered.[34] A defamation plaintiff under the Times or Gertz standard has the burden of proving by "clear and convincing" evidence, not merely by the preponderance of evidence standard generally used in civil cases, that the defendant acted with knowledge of falsity or with reckless disregard.[35] Moreover, the Court has held, a Gertz plaintiff has the burden of proving the actual falsity of the defamatory publication.[36] A plaintiff suing the press for defamation under the Times or Gertz standards is not required to prove his case or establish "actual malice" absent discovery of the defendant's editorial processes.[37] Through discovery, the plaintiff may inquire into the defendant's state of mind; his thoughts, opinions, and conclusions with respect to the material he gathered; and how he reviewed and handled it. As with other areas of protection or qualified protection under the First Amendment (as well as some other constitutional provisions), appellate courts, and ultimately the Supreme Court, must independently review the findings below to ascertain that constitutional standards were met.[38]

---

[29] 472 U.S. 749 (1985). Justice Lewis Powell wrote a plurality opinion joined by Justices William Rehnquist and Sandra Day O'Connor, and Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice ByronWhite, both of whom had dissented in Gertz, added brief concurring opinions agreeing that the Gertz standard should not apply to credit reporting. Justice William Brennan, joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun, and John Paul Stevens, dissented, arguing that Gertz had not been limited to matters of public concern, and should not be extended to do so.

[30] 472 U.S. at 753 (plurality); id. at 773 (Justice White); id. at 781–84 (dissent).

[31] 475 U.S. at 779 n.4. Justice Wiliam Brennan added a brief concurring opinion expressing his view that such a distinction is untenable. Id. at 780.

[32] See, e.g., Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 199 (1979) (Stewart, J., dissenting).

[33] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 280 (1964); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 78 (1964); Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 U.S. 245, 251–52 (1974).

[34] St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, 730–33 (1968); Beckley Newspapers Corp. v. Hanks, 389 U.S. 81 (1967). A finding of "highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers" is alone insufficient to establish actual malice. Harte-Hanks Communications v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657 (1989) (nonetheless upholding the lower court's finding of actual malice based on the "entire record").

[35] Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 331–32 (1974); Beckley Newspapers Corp. v. Hanks, 389 U.S. 81, 83 (1967). See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 285–86 (1964) ("convincing clarity"). A corollary is that the issue on motion for summary judgment in a New York Times case is whether the evidence is such that a reasonable jury might find that actual malice has been shown with convincing clarity. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242 (1986).

[36] Philadelphia Newspapers v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986) (leaving open the issue of what "quantity" or standard of proof must be met).

[37] Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979).

[38] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 284–86 (1964). See, e.g., NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 933–34 (1982). Harte-Hanks Communications v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 688 (1989) ("the reviewing court must consider the factual record in full"); Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, 466 U.S. 485 (1984) (the "clearly erroneous" standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(a) must be subordinated to this constitutional principle).

While the Court had suggested in dicta that statements of opinion, unlike assertions of fact, might be absolutely protected,[39] the Court held in Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co.[40] that there is no constitutional distinction between fact and opinion, hence no "wholesale defamation exemption" for any statement that can be labeled "opinion."[41] Instead, the issue is whether, regardless of the context in which a statement is uttered, the statement is sufficiently factual to be susceptible of being proved true or false. Thus, if statements of opinion may "reasonably be interpreted as stating actual facts about an individual,"[42] then the truthfulness of the factual assertions may be tested in a defamation action. There are sufficient protections for free public discourse already available in defamation law, the Court concluded, without creating "an artificial dichotomy between 'opinion' and fact."[43]

In Masson v. New Yorker Magazine,[44] the Court considered whether a publisher's alterations to quotations attributed to a public figure met the actual malice standard given journalistic conventions allowing publishers to make some alterations to correct grammar and syntax. The Court ruled that "a deliberate alteration of words [in a quotation] does not equate with knowledge of falsity for purposes of [New York Times] unless the alteration results in a material change in the meaning conveyed by the statement."[45]

Amdt1.7.5.8 Application of Defamation Cases to Group Libel, Hate Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In Beauharnais v. Illinois,[1] relying on dicta in past cases,[2] the Court upheld a state group libel law that made it unlawful to defame a race or class of people. The defendant had been convicted under this statute after he had distributed a leaflet, part of which was in the form of a petition to his city government, taking a hard-line white-supremacy position and calling for action to keep African Americans out of White neighborhoods. Justice Felix Frankfurter for the Court sustained the statute along the following reasoning. Libel of an individual, he established, was a common-law crime and was now made criminal by statute in every state in the Union. These laws raise no constitutional difficulty because libel is within that class of speech that is not protected by the First Amendment. If an utterance directed at an individual may be the object of criminal sanctions, then no good reason appears to deny a state the power to punish the same utterances when they are directed at a defined group, "unless we can say that this is a willful and purposeless restriction unrelated to the peace and well-being of the [39] See, e.g., Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 339 (1974) ("under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea"); Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970) (holding protected the accurate reporting of a public meeting in which a particular position was characterized as "blackmail"); Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264 (1974) (holding protected a union newspaper's use of epithet "scab").

[40] 497 U.S. 1 (1990).

[41] 497 U.S. at 18.

[42] 497 U.S. at 20. In Milkovich the Court held to be actionable assertions and implications in a newspaper sports column that a high school wrestling coach had committed perjury in testifying about a fight involving his team.

[43] 497 U.S. at 19.

[44] 501 U.S. 496 (1991).

[45] 501 U.S. at 517.

[1] 343 U.S. 250 (1952).

[2] Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571–72 (1942); Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 707–08 (1931).

State."[3] Justice Felix Frankfurter then reviewed the history of racial strife in Illinois to conclude that the legislature could reasonably have feared substantial evils from defamatory racist statements. He also held that the Constitution did not require states to accept a defense of truth, because historically a defendant had to show not only truth but publication with good motives and for justifiable ends.[4]

The holding of Beauharnais, premised in part on the categorical exclusion of defamatory statements from First Amendment protection, has been undercut by subsequent developments, including the Court's subjecting defamation law to First Amendment challenge and endorsing "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" debate on public issues in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.[5] Further, in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, explained and qualified the categorical exclusions for defamation, obscenity, and fighting words. These categories of speech are not "entirely invisible to the Constitution," even though they "can, consistently with the First Amendment, be regulated because of their constitutionally proscribable content."[6] Content discrimination unrelated to that "distinctively proscribable content," however, runs afoul of the First Amendment.[7] Therefore, the city's bias-motivated crime ordinance, interpreted as banning the use of fighting words known to offend on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, or gender, but not on such other possible bases as political affiliation, union membership, or homosexuality, was invalidated for its content discrimination. Consequently, the R.A.V. Court held: "The First Amendment does not permit [the city] to impose special prohibitions on those speakers who express views on disfavored subjects."[8]

In Virginia v. Black, the Court held that its opinion in R.A.V. did not make it unconstitutional for a state to prohibit burning a cross with the intent of intimidating any person or group of persons.[9] The state law did not single out only speech on certain disfavored topics; nor, as a factual matter, did all "cross burners direct their intimidating conduct solely to racial or religious minorities."[10] Under R.A.V., the statute permissibly targeted a subset of true threats "because burning a cross is a particularly virulent form of intimidation."[11]

The Court has also struck down non-libel legislation intended to prevent offense of individuals and groups of people as unconstitutional. For example, in Matal v. Tam, the Supreme Court considered a federal law prohibiting registering trademarks that "may [3] Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 254–58 (1952).

---

[4] 343 U.S. at 265–66.

[5] 376 U.S. 254 (1964). See also Collin v. Smith, 447 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Ill.) (ordinances prohibiting distribution of materials containing racial slurs are unconstitutional), aff'd, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir.), stay denied, 436 U.S. 953 (1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 916 (1978) (Justices Harry Blackmun and William Rehnquist dissenting on the basis that Court should review case that is in "some tension" with Beauharnais). But see New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 763 (1982) (obliquely citing Beauharnais with approval).

[6] 505 U.S. 377, 383 (1992).

[7] 505 U.S. at 384.

[8] Id. 505 U.S. at 391. On the other hand, the First Amendment permits enhancement of a criminal penalty based on the defendant's motive in selecting a victim of a particular race. Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993). The law has long recognized motive as a permissible element in sentencing, the Court noted. Id. at 485. It distinguished R.A.V. as involving a limitation on speech rather than conduct, and because the state might permissibly conclude that bias-inspired crimes inflict greater societal harm than do non-bias inspired crimes (for example, they are more likely to provoke retaliatory crimes). Id. at 487–88. See generally Laurence H. Tribe, The Mystery of Motive, Private and Public: Some Notes Inspired by the Problems of Hate Crime and Animal Sacrifice, 1993 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1.

[9] 538 U.S. 343 (2003). A plurality held, however, that a statute may not presume, from the fact that a defendant burned a cross, that he had an intent to intimidate. The state must prove that he did, as "a burning cross is not always intended to intimidate," but may constitute a constitutionally protected expression of opinion. Id. at 365–66.

[10] 538 U.S. at 362 (majority opinion).

[11] 538 U.S. at 362–63.

disparage . . . or bring . . . into contempt[ ] or disrepute" any "persons, living or dead."[12] In Tam, the Patent and Trademark Office rejected a trademark application for THE SLANTS for an Asian-American dance-rock band because it found the mark may be disparaging to Asian Americans.[13] The Court held that the disparagement provision violated the Free Speech Clause as "[i]t offends a bedrock First Amendment principle: Speech may not be banned on the ground that it expresses ideas that offend."[14] Two years later, the Court invalidated another statutory trademark restriction—one prohibiting the registration of "immoral" or "scandalous" marks—on similar grounds.[15]

Amdt1.7.5.9 False Statements Outside of Defamation

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As defamatory false statements can lead to legal liability, false statements in other contexts can violate legal prohibitions. For instance, more than 100 federal criminal statutes punish false statements in areas of concern to federal courts or agencies,[1] and the Court has often noted the limited First Amendment value of such speech.[2] The Court, however, has rejected the idea that all false statements fall outside of First Amendment protection.

In United States v. Alvarez,[3] the Court overturned the Stolen Valor Act of 2005,[4] which imposed criminal penalties for falsely representing oneself to have been awarded a military decoration or medal. In an opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy, four Justices distinguished false statement statutes that threaten the integrity of governmental processes or that further criminal activity, and evaluated the Act under a strict scrutiny standard.[5] Noting that the Stolen Valor Act applied to false statements made "at any time, in any place, to any person,"[6] Justice Anthony Kennedy suggested that upholding this law would leave the government with the power to punish any false discourse without a clear limiting principle. The plurality applied strict scrutiny to the Act as a content-based law. Justice Stephen Breyer, in a separate opinion joined by Justice Elena Kagan, concurred in judgment, but did so only after evaluating the prohibition under an intermediate scrutiny standard. While Justice Breyer was also [12] No. 15-1293, slip op. (2017).

---

[13] Id. at 1.

[14] Id. at 1–2.

[15] Iancu v. Brunetti, 588 U.S., No. 18-302, slip op. at 2 (2019) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1052 (a)). See also Amend. 1, Non-obscene But Sexually Explicit and Indecent Expression.

[1] United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482, 505–507, nn. 8–10 (1997) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (listing statute citations).

[2] See, e.g., Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. at 52 (1988) ("False statements of fact are particularly valueless [because] they interfere with the truth-seeking function of the marketplace of ideas."); Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. at 771 ("Untruthful speech, commercial or otherwise, has never been protected for its own sake.").

[3] 567 U.S., No. 11-210, slip op. (2012).

[4] 18 U.S.C. § 704.

[5] Alvarez, slip op. at 8-12 (Kennedy, J.). Justice Anthony Kennedy was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sonia Sotomayor.

[6] Alvarez, slip op. at 10 (Kennedy, J). Justice Anthony Kennedy was joined in his opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sonia Sotomayor.

concerned about the breadth of the Act, his opinion suggested that a statute more finely tailored to "a subset of lies where specific harm is likely to occur" could withstand legal challenge.[7]

Amdt1.7.5.10 Privacy Torts

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Government power to protect the privacy interests of its citizens by penalizing publication or authorizing causes of action for publication directly implicates First Amendment rights. Privacy is a concept composed of several aspects.[1] As a tort concept, it embraces at least four branches of protected interests: protection from unreasonable intrusion upon one's seclusion, from appropriation of one's name or likeness, from unreasonable publicity given to one's private life, and from publicity which unreasonably places one in a false light before the public.[2]

Although the Court has recognized valid governmental interests in extending protection to privacy,[3] it has nevertheless interposed substantial free expression interests in the balance. The Court's constitutional jurisprudence in this area has drawn heavily from its rulings in New York Times v. Sullivan and other defamation cases discussed in an earlier essay.[4] Thus, in Time, Inc. v. Hill,[5] the Times standard requiring proof of actual malice precluded recovery under a state privacy statute that permitted recovery for harm caused by exposure to public attention in any publication which contained factual inaccuracies, although not necessarily defamatory inaccuracies, in communications on matters of public interest. Given that this actual malice standard did not limit the recovery of compensatory damages for defamation by private persons, the question arose whether Hill applied to all "false-light" cases or only such cases involving public officials or public figures.[6] More specifically, one defamation case left unresolved the issue "whether the State may ever define and protect an area of privacy free from unwanted publicity in the press."[7] In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, the Court declined to pass on the broad question, holding instead that the accurate publication of information obtained from public records is absolutely privileged.[8] Thus, the state could not permit a civil [7] Alvarez, slip op. at 8–9 (Breyer, J).

---

[1] See, e.g., William Prosser, Law of Torts 117 (4th ed. 1971); Prosser, Privacy, 48 Calif. L. Rev. 383 (1960); J. Thomas McCarthy, The Rights of Publicity and Privacy (1987); Thomas Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 544–61 (1970). Note that we do not have here the question of the protection of one's privacy from governmental invasion.

[2] Restatement (Second), of Torts §§ 652A–652I (1977). These four branches were originally propounded in Prosser's 1960 article, incorporated in the Restatement, and now "routinely accept[ed]." McCarthy, § 5.8[A].

[3] Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 383 n.7 (1967); and id. at 402, 404 (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), 411, 412–15 (Fortas, J., dissenting); Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 487–89 (1975).

[4] See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); Amdt1.7.5.7 Defamation.

[5] 385 U.S. 374 (1967). See also Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 U.S. 245 (1974).

[6] Cf. Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 U.S. 245, 250–51 (1974); Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 490 n.19 (1975).

[7] Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 491 (1975) (explaining the open question).

[8] More specifically, the information was obtained "from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection." 420 U.S. at 491. There was thus involved both the First Amendment and the traditional privilege of the press to report the events of judicial proceedings. Id. at 493, 494–96.

recovery for invasion of privacy occasioned by the reporting of the name of a rape victim obtained from court records and from a proceeding in open court.[9]

Continuing to adhere to "limited principles that sweep no more broadly than the appropriate context of the instant case," the Court invalidated an award of damages against a newspaper for printing the name of a sexual assault victim lawfully obtained from a sheriff's department press release.[10] The state was unable to demonstrate that imposing liability served a "need" to further a state interest of the highest order, since the same interest could have been served by the more limited means of self regulation by the police, since the particular per se negligence statute precluded inquiry into the extent of privacy invasion (for example, inquiry into whether the victim's identity was already widely known), and since the statute singled out "mass communications" media for liability rather than applying evenhandedly to anyone disclosing a victim's identity.[11]

The tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress has presented special concerns due to its "outrageousness" standard of liability. In Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell,[12] the Court applied the New York Times v. Sullivan standard to a public figure seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The case involved an advertisement "parody" portraying the plaintiff, described by the Court as a "nationally known minister who has been active as a commentator on politics and public affairs," as stating that he lost his virginity "during a drunken incestuous rendezvous with his mother in an outhouse."[13] Affirming liability in this case, the Court believed, would subject "political cartoonists and satirists . . . to damage awards without any showing that their work falsely defamed its subject."[14] The Court noted that "most if not all jurisdictions" had imposed liability for this tort only where the conduct was "outrageous."[15] However, the Court rejected the idea that this "outrageousness" standard could distinguish supposedly impermissible parodies from more traditional political cartoons, explaining that "'[o]utrageousness' in the area of political and social discourse has an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors' tastes or views."[16] Therefore, proof of intent to cause injury, "the gravamen of the tort," was insufficient "in the area of public debate about public figures." Additional proof that the publication contained a false statement of fact made with actual malice was necessary, the Court concluded, in order "to give adequate 'breathing space' to the freedoms protected by the First Amendment."[17]

The Court next considered whether an intentional infliction of emotional distress action could be brought by a father against public protestors who picketed the military funeral of his son, where the plaintiff was neither a public official nor a public figure. In Snyder v. Phelps,[18] the Court avoided addressing whether the actual malice standard applied to the intentional

[9] 420 U.S. at 491.

[10] The Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 533 (1989).

[11] Id. at 537–41. The Court left open the question "whether, in cases where information has been acquired unlawfully by a newspaper or by a source, the government may ever punish not only the unlawful acquisition, but the ensuing publication as well." Id. at 535 n.8. In Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001), the Court held that a content-neutral statute prohibiting the publication of illegally intercepted communications (in this case a cell phone conversation) violates free speech where the person who publishes the material did not participate in the interception, and the communication concerns a public issue.

[12] 485 U.S. 46 (1988).

[13] 485 U.S. at 47, 48.

[14] 485 U.S. at 53.

[15] 485 U.S. at 53.

[16] 485 U.S. at 55.

[17] 485 U.S. at 53, 56.

[18] 562 U.S. ___, No. 09-751, slip op. (March 2, 2011).

infliction of emotional distress upon a private citizen, finding that where public protesters are addressing issues of public concern, the fact that such protests occurred in a setting likely to upset private individuals did not reduce the First Amendment protection of that speech. In Phelps, the congregation of the Westboro Baptist Church, based on the belief that God punishes the United States for its tolerance of homosexuality, particularly in America's armed forces, had engaged in nearly 600 protests at funerals, mostly military. While it was admitted that the plaintiff had suffered emotional distress after a protest at his son's funeral, the Court declined to characterize the protests as directed at the father personally.[19] Rather, considering the "content, form, and context" of that speech,[20] the Court found that the dominant themes of the protest went to public concerns, and thus could not serve as the basis for a tort suit.[21]

The Court has further suggested that the actual malice standard does not apply to a right of publicity claim. In Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co.,[22] the Court held unprotected by the First Amendment a broadcast of a video tape of the "entire act" of a "human cannonball" in the context of the performer's suit for damages against the company for having "appropriated" his act, thereby injuring his right to the publicity value of his performance. The Court emphasized two differences between the legal action permitted here and the legal actions found unprotected or not fully protected in defamation and other privacy-type suits. First, the interest sought to be protected was, rather than a party's right to his reputation and freedom from mental distress, the right of the performer to remuneration for putting on his act. Second, the other torts if permitted decreased the information that would be made available to the public, whereas permitting this tort action would have an impact only on "who gets to do the publishing."[23] In both respects, the tort action was analogous to patent and copyright laws in that both provide an economic incentive to persons to make the investment required to produce a performance of interest to the public.[24]

Amdt1.7.5.11 Obscenity

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Although public discussion of political affairs is at the core of the First Amendment, the guarantees of speech and press are broader, extending also, for example, to sexually explicit entertainment. The Supreme Court has rejected the idea that the First Amendment "applies only to the exposition of ideas," saying "[t]he line between the informing and the entertaining

---

[19] Signs displayed at the protest included the phrases "God Hates the USA/Thank God for 9/11," "America is Doomed," "Don't Pray for the USA," "Thank God for IEDs," "Thank God for Dead Soldiers," "Pope in Hell," "Priests Rape Boys," "God Hates Fags," "You're Going to Hell," and "God Hates You." slip op. at 2.

[20] Id. at 8 (citations omitted).

[21] Justice Alito, in dissent, argued that statements made by the defendants on signs and on a website could have been reasonably interpreted as directed at the plaintiffs, and that even if public themes were a dominant theme at the protest, that this should not prevent a suit from being brought on those statements arguably directed at private individuals. slip op. at 9–11 (Alito, J., dissenting).

[22] 433 U.S. 562 (1977). The "right of publicity" tort is conceptually related to one of the privacy strands: "appropriation" of one's name or likeness for commercial purposes. Id. at 569–72. Justices Lewis Powell, William Brennan, and Thurgood Marshall dissented, finding the broadcast protected, id. at 579, and Justice Stevens dissented on other grounds. Id. at 582.

[23] 433 U.S. at 573–74. Plaintiff was not seeking to bar the broadcast but rather to be paid for the value he lost through the broadcasting.

[24] 433 U.S. at 576–78.

is too elusive for the protection of that basic right."[1] The right to impart and to receive "information and ideas, regardless of their social worth . . . is fundamental to our free society."[2] Accordingly, obscene material, referring to certain sexually explicit material,[3] may be protected even if it is "arguably devoid of any ideological content."[4] Nonetheless, while sexually explicit material may be entitled to constitutional protection, the Court has said the subcategories of obscenity and child pornography—the latter discussed in a subsequent essay—can generally be regulated without triggering heightened scrutiny.[5]

Adjudication over the constitutional law of obscenity began in Roth v. United States,[6] in which the Court ruled that obscenity is not "within the area of protected speech and press."[7] The Court undertook a brief historical survey to demonstrate that "the unconditional phrasing of the First Amendment was not intended to protect every utterance."[8] All or practically all the states that ratified the First Amendment had laws making blasphemy or profanity or both crimes, and provided for prosecutions of libels as well. This history was deemed to demonstrate that "obscenity, too, was outside the protection intended for speech and press."[9] The Court said that although "[a]ll ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance" were entitled to First Amendment protections, "implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance."[10] Because obscenity was not protected at all, tests such as clear and present danger, which the Court had previously applied to assess the constitutionality of other laws, were irrelevant.[11]

The Court clarified, however, that, "sex and obscenity are not synonymous. Obscene material is material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest. The portrayal of sex, for example, in art, literature and scientific works, is not itself sufficient reason to deny material the constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press . . . . It is therefore vital that the standards for judging obscenity safeguard the protection of freedom of speech and press for material which does not treat sex in a manner appealing to prurient

[1] Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 510 (1948). Illustrative of the general observation is the fact that "[m]usic, as a form of expression and communication, is protected under the First Amendment." Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 790 (1989). Nude dancing is also. Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560, 564 (1991).

[2] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969).

[3] See, e.g., Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971) (noting that "obscene expression" must be "erotic," not just crude); accord Mahanoy Area Sch. Dist. v. B.L., No. 20-255, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 23, 2021).

[4] Id. at 566. See also Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507 (1948); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952); Commercial Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 346 U.S. 587 (1954); Kingsley Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959). The last case involved the banning of the movie Lady Chatterley's Lover on the ground that it dealt too sympathetically with adultery. The Court stated: "It is contended that the State's action was justified because the motion picture attractively portrays a relationship which is contrary to the moral standards, the religious precepts, and the legal code of its citizenry. This argument misconceives what it is that the Constitution protects. Its guarantee is not confined to the expression of ideas that are conventional or shared by a majority. It protects advocacy of the opinion that adultery may sometimes be proper no less than advocacy of socialism or the single tax. And in the realm of ideas it protects expression which is eloquent no less than that which is unconvincing." Id. at 688–89.

[5] Amdt1.7.5.12 Child Pornography.

[6] 354 U.S. 476 (1957). Heard at the same time and decided in the same opinion was Alberts v. California, involving a state obscenity law. The Court's first opinion in the obscenity field was Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957), considered infra. Earlier the Court had divided 4-4 and thus affirmed a state court judgment that Edmund Wilson's Memoirs of Hecate County was obscene. Doubleday & Co. v. New York, 335 U.S. 848 (1948).

[7] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 485 (1957). Justice William Brennan later changed his mind on this score, arguing that, because the Court had failed to develop a workable standard for distinguishing the obscene from the non-obscene, regulation should be confined to protecting children and non-consenting adults. See Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973).

[8] 354 U.S. at 483.

[9] 354 U.S. at 482–83.

[10] 354 U.S. at 484. See also Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571–72 (1942).

[11] 354 U.S. at 486 (quoting Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 266 (1952)).

interest."[12] The Court identified the relevant standard for unprotected obscenity as "whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest."[13] The Court defined material appealing to prurient interest as "material having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts," and defined prurient interest as "a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion."[14]

In the years after Roth, the Court considered many obscenity cases. The cases can be grouped topically, but, with the exception of those cases dealing with protection of children,[15] unwilling adult recipients,[16] and procedure,[17] these cases are best explicated chronologically. In Manual Enterprises v. Day,[18] the Court upset a Post Office ban upon mailing certain magazines addressed to homosexual audiences, but none of the Court's opinions gained the support of the majority. Nor did a majority opinion emerge in Jacobellis v. Ohio, which reversed

[12] 354 U.S. at 487, 488.

[13] 354 U.S. at 489.

[14] 354 U.S. at 487 n.20. A statute defining "prurient" as "that which incites lasciviousness or lust" covers more than obscenity, the Court later indicated in Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 498 (1985). The Court noted that obscenity consists in appeal to "a shameful or morbid" interest in sex, not in appeal to "normal, healthy sexual desires." Id. Brockett involved a facial challenge to the statute, so the Court did not have to explain the difference between "normal, healthy" sexual desires and "shameful" or "morbid" sexual desires.

[15] In Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957), the Court unanimously reversed a conviction under a statute that punished general distribution of materials unsuitable for children. Protesting that the statute "reduce[d] the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children," the Court pronounced the statute void. Narrowly drawn proscriptions for distribution or exhibition to children of materials which would not be obscene for adults are permissible, Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), although the Court insists on a high degree of specificity. Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 390 U.S. 676 (1968); Rabeck v. New York, 391 U.S. 462 (1968). Even those Justices who would proscribe obscenity regulation for adults concurred in protecting children in this context. Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 73, 113 (1973) (Brennan, J., dissenting). But children do have First Amendment protection and government may not bar dissemination of everything to them. The Court stated: "Speech that is neither obscene as to youths nor subject to some other legitimate proscription cannot be suppressed solely to protect the young from ideas or images that a legislative body thinks unsuitable for them." Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 212–14 (1975) (in context of nudity on movie screen). See also FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726, 749–50 (1978); Pinkus v. United States, 436 U.S. 293, 296–98 (1978).

[16] The Court emphasized protecting unwilling adults in Rowan v. Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728 (1970), which upheld a scheme by which recipients of objectionable mail could put their names on a list and require the mailer to send no more such material. But, absent intrusions into the home, FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), or a degree of captivity that makes it impractical for the unwilling viewer or auditor to avoid exposure, government may not censor content, in the context of materials not meeting constitutional standards for denomination as pornography, to protect the sensibilities of some. Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 208–12 (1975). But see Pinkus v. United States, 436 U.S. 293, 300 (1978) (jury in determining community standards must include both "'sensitive' and 'insensitive' persons" in the community, but may not "focus[ ] upon the most susceptible or sensitive members when judging the obscenity of materials . . . ").

[17] The First Amendment requires that procedures for suppressing distribution of obscene materials provide for expedited consideration, for placing the burden of proof on government, and for hastening judicial review. Additionally, Fourth Amendment search and seizure law has absorbed First Amendment principles, so that the law governing searches for and seizures of allegedly obscene materials is more stringent than in most other areas. Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717 (1961); A Quantity of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205 (1964); Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483 (1973); Roaden v. Kentucky, 413 U.S. 496 (1973); Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979); see also Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980). Scienter—knowledge of the nature of the materials—is a prerequisite to conviction, Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959), but the prosecution need only prove the defendant knew the contents of the material, not that he knew they were legally obscene. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 119–24 (1974). See also Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., 445 U.S. 308 (1980) (public nuisance injunction of showing future films on basis of past exhibition of obscene films constitutes impermissible prior restraint); McKinney v. Alabama, 424 U.S. 669 (1976) (criminal defendants may not be bound by a finding of obscenity of materials in prior civil proceeding to which they were not parties). None of these strictures applies, however, to forfeitures imposed as part of a criminal penalty. Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544 (1993) (upholding RICO forfeiture of the entire adult entertainment book and film business of an individual convicted of obscenity and racketeering offenses). Justice Anthony Kennedy, dissenting in Alexander, objected to the "forfeiture of expressive material that had not been adjudged to be obscene." Id. at 578.

[18] 370 U.S. 478 (1962).

a conviction for exhibiting a motion picture.[19] In Ginzburg v. United States,[20] the Court held that in "close" cases borderline materials could be determined to be obscene if the seller "pandered" them in a way that indicated he was catering to prurient interests. On the same day, the same five-Justice majority affirmed a state conviction under a law prohibiting distributing obscene books by applying the "pandering" test and concluding that courts could hold material to be legally obscene if it appealed to the prurient interests of the deviate group to which it was directed.[21] On the same day, however, the Court held that Fanny Hill, a novel, which at that point was 277 years old, was not legally obscene.[22] The Court's prevailing opinion restated the Roth tests that, to be considered obscene, material must (1) have a dominant theme in the work considered as a whole that appeals to prurient interest, (2) be patently offensive because it goes beyond contemporary community standards, and (3) be utterly without redeeming social value.[23]

After the divisions engendered by the disparate opinions in the three 1966 cases, the Court over the next several years submerged its differences by issuing per curiam dispositions in nearly three dozen cases in which it reversed convictions or civil determinations of obscenity in all but one. The initial case was Redrup v. New York,[24] in which, after noting that the cases involved did not present special questions requiring other treatment, such as concern for juveniles, protection of unwilling adult recipients, or proscription of pandering,[25] the Court succinctly summarized the varying positions of the seven Justices in the majority and said: "[w]hichever of the constitutional views is brought to bear upon the cases before us, it is clear that the judgments cannot stand . . . ."[26] Although the Court's subsequent cases followed the pattern established in Redrup,[27] the Court's changing membership led to speculation about the continuing vitality of Roth and the Court's Redrup approach.[28]

At the end of the October 1971 Term, the Court requested argument on whether the display of sexually oriented films or of sexually oriented pictorial magazines, when surrounded [19] 378 U.S. 184 (1964). Without opinion, citing Jacobellis, the Court reversed a judgment that Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer was obscene. Grove Press v. Gerstein, 378 U.S. 577 (1964). Jacobellis is best known for Justice Potter Stewart's concurrence, contending that criminal prohibitions should be limited to "hard-core pornography." The category "may be indefinable," he added, but "I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that." Id. at 197. The difficulty with this visceral test is that other members of the Court did not always "see it" the same way; two years later, for example, Justice Stewart was on opposite sides in two obscenity decisions decided on the same day. A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General, 383 U.S. 413 (1966) (concurring on basis that book was not obscene); Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502, 518 (1966) (dissenting from finding that material was obscene).

---

[20] 383 U.S. 463 (1966). Pandering remains relevant in pornography cases. Splawn v. California, 431 U.S. 595 (1977); Pinkus v. United States, 436 U.S. 293, 303–04 (1978).

[21] Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966). See id. at 507–10 for discussion of the legal issue raised by the limited appeal of the material. The Court relied on Mishkin in Ward v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 767, 772 (1977).

[22] A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General, 383 U.S. 413 (1966).

[23] 383 U.S. at 418. On the precedential effect of the Memoirs plurality opinion, see Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 192–94 (1977).

[24] 386 U.S. 767 (1967).

[25] 386 U.S. at 771.

[26] 386 U.S. at 770–71. The majority was thus composed of Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, William Brennan, Potter Stewart, Byron White, and Abe Fortas.

[27] See Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 82–83 & n.8 (1973) (Brennan, J., dissenting) (describing Redrup practice and listing thirty-one cases decided on the basis of it).

[28] See United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971) (federal prohibition of dissemination of obscene materials through the mails is constitutional); United States v. Thirty-seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971) (customs seizures of obscene materials from baggage of travelers are constitutional). In Grove Press v. Maryland State Board of Censors, 401 U.S. 480 (1971), a state court determination that the motion picture "I Am Curious (Yellow)" was obscene was affirmed by an equally divided Court, Justice William O. Douglas not participating. And Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 560– 64, 568 (1969), had insisted that Roth remained the governing standard.

by notice to the public of their nature and by reasonable protection against exposure to juveniles, was constitutionally protected.[29] By a 5-4 vote during the October 1972 Term, the Court in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton adhered to the Roth principle that the First and Fourteenth Amendments do not protect obscene material even if access is limited to consenting adults.[30] Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Warren Burger observed that the states have wider interests than protecting juveniles and unwilling adults from exposure to pornography; legitimate state interests, effectuated through the exercise of the police power, exist in protecting and improving the quality of life and the total community environment, in improving the tone of commerce in the cities, and in protecting public safety. Consequently, Chief Justice Warren reasoned, it does not matter that the states may be acting based on unverifiable assumptions in deciding to suppress the trade in pornography because the Constitution does not require, in the context of the trade in ideas, that governmental courses of action be subject to empirical verification any more than it does in other fields. Chief Justice Warren further noted that the Constitution does not embody any concept of laissez-faire, or of privacy, or of "free will," that curbs governmental efforts to suppress pornography.[31]

In Miller v. California,[32] the Court prescribed the currently prevailing standard by which courts identify unprotected pornographic materials. Because of the inherent dangers in regulating any form of expression, the Court noted, laws to regulate pornography must be carefully limited and their scope confined to materials that "depict or describe patently offensive 'hard core' sexual conduct specifically defined by the regulating state law, as written or construed."[33] The Court further reasoned that law "must also be limited to works which, taken as a whole, appeal to the prurient interest in sex, which portray sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, and which, taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."[34] The Court disavowed and discarded the standard that a work must be "utterly without redeeming social value" to be suppressed.[35] In determining whether material appeals to a prurient interest or is patently offensive, the trier-of-fact, whether a judge or a jury, is not bound by a hypothetical national standard but may apply the [29] Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973); Alexander v. Virginia, 408 U.S. 921 (1972).

[30] 413 U.S. 49 (1973).

[31] 413 U.S. at 57, 60–62, 63–64, 65–68. Delivering the principal dissent, Justice William Brennan argued that the Court's Roth approach allowing the suppression of pornography was a failure, that the Court had not and could not formulate standards by which protected materials could be distinguished from unprotected materials, and that the First Amendment had been denigrated through the exposure of numerous persons to punishment for the dissemination of materials that fell close to one side of the line rather than the other, but more basically by deterrence of protected expression caused by the uncertainty. Id. at 73. Justice William Brennan stated: "I would hold, therefore, that at least in the absence of distribution to juveniles or obtrusive exposure to unconsenting adults, the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the State and Federal Governments from attempting wholly to suppress sexually oriented materials on the basis of their allegedly 'obscene' contents." Id. at 113. Justices Stewart and Marshall joined Justice William Brennan's opinion; Justice William O. Douglas dissented separately, adhering to the view that the First Amendment absolutely protected all expression. Id. at 70.

[32] 413 U.S. 15 (1973).

[33] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 27 (1973). The Court may read into federal statutes standards it has formulated. United States v. 12 200-Ft. Reels of Film, 413 U.S. 123, 130 n.7 (1973) (Court is prepared to construe statutes proscribing materials that are "obscene," "lewd," "lascivious," "filthy," "indecent," and "immoral" as limited to the types of "hard core" pornography reachable under the Miller standards). For other cases applying Miller standards to federal statutes, see Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 110–16 (1974) (use of the mails); United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139 (1973) (transportation of pornography in interstate commerce). The Court's insistence on specificity in state statutes, either as written by the legislature or as authoritatively construed by the state court, appears to have been significantly weakened, in fact if not in enunciation, in Ward v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 767 (1977).

[34] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. at 24.

[35] 413 U.S. at 24–25.

trier-of-fact's local community standard.[36] Prurient interest and patent offensiveness, the Court indicated, "are essentially questions of fact."[37] By contrast, the prong of the Miller test that looked at the material's "value" is not subject to a community standards test; instead, the appropriate standard is "whether a reasonable person would find [literary, artistic, political, or scientific] value in the material, taken as a whole."[38]

The Court in Miller reiterated that it was not permitting an unlimited degree of suppression of materials. Only "hard core" materials were to be deemed without the protection of the First Amendment, and the Court's idea of the content of "hard core" pornography was revealed in "a few plain examples of what a state" could regulate: "(a) Patently offensive representations or descriptions of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated. (b) Patently offensive representations or descriptions of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals."[39] Subsequently, the Court held that a publication was not obscene if it "provoked only normal, healthy sexual desires."[40] To be obscene it must appeal to "a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion."[41] The Court has also indicated that obscenity is not be limited to pictures; books containing only descriptive language may be suppressed.[42]

First Amendment values, the Court stressed in Miller, "are adequately protected by the ultimate power of appellate courts to conduct an independent review of constitutional claims when necessary."[43] While the Court had said juries as triers-of-fact should determine, based on their understanding of community standards, whether material was "patently offensive," it was less clear how appeals courts could appropriately review these jury determinations. In Jenkins v. Georgia,[44] the Court, while adhering to the Miller standards, stated that "juries [do not] have unbridled discretion in determining what is 'patently offensive.'" Miller was intended to make clear that only "hard-core" materials could be suppressed and this concept and the Court's descriptive itemization of some types of hardcore materials were "intended to fix substantive constitutional limitations, deriving from the First Amendment, on the type of [36] It is the unprotected nature of obscenity that allows this inquiry; offensiveness to local community standards is, of course, a principle completely at odds with mainstream First Amendment jurisprudence. See, e.g., Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989); R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992).

[37] 413 U.S. at 30–34. The Court stated: "A juror is entitled to draw on his knowledge of the views of the average person in the community or vicinage from which he comes for making the required determination, just as he is entitled to draw on his knowledge of the propensities of a 'reasonable' person in other areas of the law." Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 104 (1974). The holding does not compel any particular circumscribed area to be used as a "community." In federal cases, it will probably be the judicial district from which the jurors are drawn, id. at 105–106. The jurors may be instructed to apply "community standards" without any definition being given of the "community." Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153, 157 (1974). In a federal prosecution for using the mails to transmit pornography, the fact that the legislature of the state in which the transaction occurred had abolished pornography regulation except for dealings with children does not preclude permitting jurors in a federal case to make their own definitions of what is offensive to contemporary community standards; they may be told of the legislature's decision but they are not bound by it. Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291 (1977).

[38] Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497, 500–01 (1987).

[39] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 25 (1973). Quoting Miller's language in Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 114 (1974), the Court reiterated that it was only "hard-core" material that was unprotected. The Court stated: "While the particular descriptions there contained were not intended to be exhaustive, they clearly indicate that there is a limit beyond which neither legislative draftsmen nor juries may go in concluding that particular material is 'patently offensive' within the meaning of the obscenity test set forth in the Miller cases." Referring to this language in Ward v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 767 (1977), the Court upheld a state court's power to construe its statute to reach sadomasochistic materials not within the confines of the Miller language.

[40] Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 498 (1985).

[41] Id.

[42] Kaplan v. California, 413 U.S. 115 (1973).

[43] 413 U.S. at 25.

[44] 418 U.S. 153 (1974).

material subject to such a determination."[45] Viewing the motion picture in question convinced the Court that "[n]othing in the movie falls within either of the two examples given in Miller of material which may constitutionally be found to meet the 'patently offensive' element of those standards, nor is there anything sufficiently similar to such material to justify similar treatment."[46] But, in a companion case, the Court found that a jury determination of obscenity "was supported by the evidence and consistent with" the standards.[47]

While the Court's decisions from the Paris Adult Theatre and Miller era were rendered by narrow majorities,[48] they have since guided the Court. For example, the Court struck down federal regulations aimed at preventing the transmission of indecent materials over the telephone and internet, where those statutes did not adhere to the Miller standard.[49] Even as to materials falling within the constitutional definition of obscene, the Court has recognized a limited private, protected interest in possession within the home,[50] unless those materials constitute child pornography. In Stanley v. Georgia, the appellant appealed his state conviction for possessing obscene films that police officers discovered in his home pursuant to a search warrant for other items which the police did not find. The Court reversed, holding that mere private possession of obscene materials in the home cannot be a criminal offense. The Constitution protects the right to receive information and ideas, the Court said, regardless of their social value, and "that right takes on an added dimension" in the context of a prosecution for possession of something in one's own home. The Court stated: "For also fundamental is the right to be free, except in very limited circumstances, from unwanted governmental intrusions into one's privacy."[51] Despite the Court's unqualified assertion in Roth that the First Amendment did not protect obscenity, the Court remained concerned with the government interest in regulating commercial distribution of obscene materials. Though the Stanley Court said its decision did not impair Roth and cases relying on that decision,[52] by rejecting each state contention in support of a conviction, the Court appeared to reject much of Roth's basis. In Stanley, the Court made the following points: (1) there is no government interest in protecting an individual's mind from the effect of obscenity; (2) the absence of ideological content in films is irrelevant, since the Court would not distinguish transmission of ideas and entertainment; (3) no empirical evidence supported a contention that exposure to obscene materials may incite a person to antisocial conduct and, even if such evidence existed, government may address this by enforcing laws proscribing the offensive conduct; (4) it is not necessary to punish mere possession in order to punish distribution; and (5) private possession was unlikely to [46] 418 U.S. at 161. The film at issue was Carnal Knowledge.

[45] 418 U.S. at 160–61.

[47] Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974). In Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 305–06 (1977), the Court explained that jury determinations in accordance with their own understanding of the tolerance of the average person in their community are not unreviewable. Judicial review would pass on (1) whether the jury was properly instructed to consider the entire community and not simply the members' own subjective reaction or the reactions of a sensitive or of a callous minority, (2) whether the conduct depicted fell within the examples specified in Miller, (3) whether the work lacked serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, and (4) whether the evidence was sufficient. The Court indicated that the value test of Miller "was particularly amenable to judicial review." The value test is not to be measured by community standards, the Court later held in Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987), but instead by a "reasonable person" standard. An erroneous instruction on this score, however, may be "harmless error." Id. at 503.

[48] For other 5-4 decisions of the era, see Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188 (1977); Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291 (1977); Splawn v. California, 431 U.S. 595 (1977); and Ward v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 767 (1977).

[49] See, e.g., Sable Commc'ns of Cal. v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115, 126 (1989); Reno v. Aclu, 521 U.S. 844, 874 (1997); see also

[50] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969).

[51] 394 U.S. at 564.

[52] 394 U.S. at 560–64, 568.

contribute to the problems prompting laws barring public dissemination of obscene materials or exposing children and unwilling adults to such materials.[53]

The Court has confined Stanley's holding to its facts and has also dispelled any suggestion that Stanley applies outside the home or recognizes a right to obtain or supply pornography.[54] For instance, the Court has held Stanley does not apply to possessing child pornography in the home because the state interest in protecting children from sexual exploitation far exceeds the interest in Stanley of protecting adults from themselves.[55]

Amdt1.7.5.12 Child Pornography

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In New York v. Ferber,[1] the Court recognized another category of expression that is outside the coverage of the First Amendment: the visual depiction of children in films or still photographs in a variety of sexual activities or exposures of the genitals. The reason that such depictions may be prohibited was the governmental interest in protecting the physical and psychological well-being of children, whose participation in the production of these materials would subject them to exploitation and harm. The state may go beyond a mere prohibition of the use of children, because it is not possible to protect children adequately without prohibiting the exhibition and dissemination of the materials and advertising about them. Thus, the Court held that "the evil to be restricted so overwhelmingly outweighs the expressive interests, if any, at stake, that no process of case-by-case adjudication is required."[2] But, because expression is involved, the government must carefully define what conduct is to be prohibited and may reach only "works that visually depict sexual conduct by children below a specified age."[3]

The Court has considered cases addressing the private possession of child pornography in the home. In Osborne v. Ohio[4] the Court upheld a state law criminalizing possessing or viewing of child pornography as applied to someone who possessed such materials in his home. Distinguishing a prior case protecting the personal possession of obscene material, the Court ruled that Ohio's interest in preventing exploitation of children far exceeded what it characterized as Georgia's "paternalistic interest" in protecting the minds of adult viewers of obscene material.[5] Because the state's interest in regulating child pornography was of greater importance, the Court saw less need to require states to demonstrate a strong necessity for regulating private possession in addition to the commercial distribution and sale.

---

[53] 394 U.S. at 565–68.

[54] Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 65–68 (1973). Transportation of unprotected material for private use may be prohibited, United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139 (1973), and the mails may be closed, United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971), as may channels of international movement, United States v. Thirty-seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971); United States v. 12 200-Ft. Reels of Film, 413 U.S. 123 (1973).

[55] Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990).

[1] 458 U.S. 747 (1982). The Court's decision was unanimous, although there were several limiting concurrences. Compare, e.g., 775 (Justice William Brennan, arguing for exemption of "material with serious literary, scientific, or educational value"), with 774 (Justice O'Connor, arguing that such material need not be excepted). The Court did not pass on the question, inasmuch as the materials before it were well within the prohibitable category. Id. at 766–74.

[2] 458 U.S. at 763–64.

[3] 458 U.S. at 764 (emphasis original). Child pornography need not meet Miller obscenity standards to be unprotected by the First Amendment. Id. at 764–65.

[4] 495 U.S. 103 (1990).

[5] 495 U.S. at 108.

In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Court held unconstitutional the federal Child Pornography Prevention Act (CPPA) to the extent that it prohibited pictures that were not produced with actual minors.[6] The law prohibited computer-generated ("virtual") child pornography, and photographs of adult actors who appeared to be minors, and could have extended to "a Renaissance painting depicting a scene from classical mythology."[7] The Court observed that statutes prohibiting child pornography that uses real children are constitutional because they target "[t]he production of the work, not the content."[8] The CPPA, by contrast, targeted the content, not the means of production. The government's rationales for the CPPA included that "[p]edophiles might use the materials to encourage children to participate in sexual activity" and might "whet their own sexual appetites" with it, "thereby increasing . . . the sexual abuse and exploitation of actual children."[9] The Court found these rationales inadequate because the government "cannot constitutionally premise legislation on the desirability of controlling a person's private thoughts" and "may not prohibit speech because it increases the chance an unlawful act will be committed 'at some indefinite future time.'"[10] The government had also argued that the existence of "virtual" child pornography "can make it harder to prosecute pornographers who do use real minors," because, "[a]s imaging technology improves . . . , it becomes more difficult to prove that a particular picture was produced using actual children."[11] This rationale, the Court found, "turns the First Amendment upside down. The Government may not suppress lawful speech as a means to suppress unlawful speech."[12]

In United States v. Williams,[13] the Supreme Court upheld a federal statute that prohibits knowingly advertising, promoting, presenting, distributing, or soliciting material "in a manner that reflects the belief, or that is intended to cause another to believe, that the material" is child pornography that is obscene or that depicts an actual minor (that is, is child pornography that is not constitutionally protected).[14] Under the provision, in other words, "an Internet user who solicits child pornography from an undercover agent violates the statute, even if the officer possesses no child pornography. Likewise, a person who advertises virtual child pornography as depicting actual children also falls within the reach of the statute."[15] The Court found that these activities are not constitutionally protected because "[o]ffers to engage in illegal transactions [as opposed to abstract advocacy of illegality] are categorically excluded from First Amendment protection," even "when the offeror is mistaken about the factual predicate of his offer," such as when the child pornography that one offers to buy or sell does not exist or is constitutionally protected.[16]

---

[6] 535 U.S. 234 (2002).

[7] 535 U.S. at 241.

[8] 535 U.S. at 249; see also id. at 241.

[9] 535 U.S. at 241.

[10] 535 U.S. at 253.

[11] 535 U.S. at 242.

[12] 535 U.S. at 255. Following Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, Congress enacted the PROTECT Act, Pub. L. No. 108-21, 117 Stat. 650 (2003), which, despite the decision in that case, defined "child pornography" so as to continue to prohibit computer-generated child pornography (but not other types of child pornography produced without an actual minor). 18 U.S.C. § 2256 (8)(B). In United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1836 (2008), the Court, without addressing the PROTECT Act's new definition, cited Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition with approval.

[13] 128 S. Ct. 1830 (2008).

[14] 18 U.S.C. § 2252A (a)(3)(B).

[15] 128 S. Ct. at 1839.

[16] 128 S. Ct. at 1841, 1842, 1843. In a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Justice David Souter agreed that "Congress may criminalize proposals unrelated to any extant image," but disagreed with respect to "proposals made with regard to specific, existing [constitutionally protected] representations." Id. at 1849. Justice David Souter believed that, "if the Act stands when applied to identifiable, extant [constitutionally protected]

However, the principles applying to child pornography do not extend to protecting children from encountering sexually explicit material. Although the government has a "compelling" interest in protecting children from seeing or hearing indecent material, total bans applicable to adults and children alike are constitutionally suspect.[17] In Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union,[18] the Court struck down two provisions of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA), one of which would have prohibited use of an "interactive computer service" to display indecent material "in a manner available to a person under 18 years of age."[19] This prohibition would, in effect, have banned indecent material from all internet sites except those accessible only by adults. Although intended "to deny minors access to potentially harmful speech . . . , [the CDA's] burden on adult speech," the Court wrote, "is unacceptable if less restrictive alternatives would be at least as effective. . . . [T]he Government may not 'reduc[e] the adult population . . . to . . . only what is fit for children.'"[20]

In Reno, the Court distinguished FCC v. Pacifica Foundation,[21] in which it had upheld the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) restrictions on indecent radio and television broadcasts, because (1) "[t]he CDA's broad categorical prohibitions are not limited to particular times and are not dependent on any evaluation by an agency familiar with the unique characteristics of the Internet," (2) the CDA imposes criminal penalties, and the Court has never decided whether indecent broadcasts "would justify a criminal prosecution," and (3) broadcast radio and television, unlike the internet, have, "as a matter of history . . . 'received the most limited First Amendment protection,' . . . in large part because warnings could not pornographic photographs, then in practical terms Ferber and Free Speech Coalition fall. They are left as empty as if the Court overruled them formally" Id. at 1854. Justice Antonin Scalia's opinion for the majority replied that this "is simply not true . . . Simulated child pornography will be as available as ever, so long as it is offered and sought as such, and not as real child pornography . . . There is no First Amendment exception from the general principle of criminal law that a person attempting to commit a crime need not be exonerated because he has a mistaken view of the facts." Id. at 1844–45.

---

[17] See Sable Communications v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115 (1989) (FCC's "dial-a-porn" rules imposing a total ban on "indecent" speech are unconstitutional, given less restrictive alternatives—e.g., credit cards or user IDs—of preventing access by children). Pacifica Foundation is distinguishable, the Court reasoned, because that case did not involve a "total ban" on broadcast, and also because there is no "captive audience" for the "dial-it" medium, as there is for the broadcast medium. 492 U.S. at 127–28. Similar rules apply to regulation of cable TV. In Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium518 U.S. 727, 755 (1996), the Court, acknowledging that protection of children from sexually explicit programming is a "compelling" governmental interest (but refusing to determine whether strict scrutiny applies), nonetheless struck down a requirement that cable operators segregate and block indecent programming on leased access channels. The segregate-and-block restrictions, which included a requirement that a request for access be in writing, and which allowed for up to thirty days' delay in blocking or unblocking a channel, were not sufficiently protective of adults' speech and viewing interests to be considered either narrowly or reasonably tailored to serve the government's compelling interest in protecting children. In United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803 (2000), the Supreme Court, explicitly applying strict scrutiny to a content-based speech restriction on cable TV, struck down a federal statute designed to "shield children from hearing or seeing images resulting from signal bleed." Id. at 806. In striking down the Communications Decency Act of 1996, the Court would "neither accept nor reject the Government's submission that the First Amendment does not forbid a blanket prohibition on all 'indecent' and 'patently offensive' messages communicated to a 17-year-old—no matter how much value the message may have and regardless of parental approval. It is at least clear that the strength of the Government's interest in protecting minors is not equally strong throughout the coverage of this broad statute." Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997). In Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. at 825, the Court wrote: "Even upon the assumption that the government has an interest in substituting itself for informed and empowered parents, its interest is not sufficiently compelling to justify this widespread restriction on speech." The Court also would "not discount the possibility that a graphic image could have a negative impact on a young child" (id. at 826), thereby suggesting again that it may take age into account when applying strict scrutiny.

[18] 521 U.S. 844 (1997).

[19] The other provision the Court struck down would have prohibited indecent communications, by telephone, fax, or e-mail, to minors.

[20] 521 U.S. at 874–75. The Court did not address whether, if less restrictive alternatives would not be as effective, the government would then be permitted to reduce the adult population to only what is fit for children. Id.

[21] 438 U.S. 726 (1978).

adequately protect the listener from unexpected program content."[22] By contrast, on the internet, at least as it existed in 1997, the Court believed "the risk of encountering indecent material by accident is remote because a series of affirmative steps is required to access specific material."[23]

After the Supreme Court struck down the CDA, Congress enacted the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), which banned "material that is harmful to minors" on websites that have the objective of earning a profit.[24] In ACLU v. Reno, the Third Circuit upheld a preliminary injunction against enforcement of the statute on the ground that, "because the standard by which COPA gauges whether material is 'harmful to minors' is based on identifying 'contemporary community standards[,]' the inability of Web publishers to restrict access to their Web sites based on the geographic locale of the site visitor, in and of itself, imposes an impermissible burden on constitutionally protected First Amendment speech."[25] The Third Circuit reasoned that COPA would have resulted in communications available to a nationwide audience being judged by the standards of the community most likely to be offended. In Ashcroft v. ACLU, the Supreme Court vacated and remanded the Third Circuit decision, holding "that COPA's reliance on community standards to identify 'material that is harmful to minors' does not by itself render the statute substantially overbroad for purposes of the First Amendment."[26]

Upon remand, the Third Circuit again upheld the preliminary injunction, and the Supreme Court affirmed and remanded the case for trial. The Supreme Court found that the district court had not abused its discretion in granting the preliminary injunction, because the government had failed to show that proposed alternatives to COPA would not be as effective in accomplishing its goal. The primary alternative to COPA, the Court noted, is blocking and filtering software. Filters are less restrictive than COPA because "[t]hey impose selective restrictions on speech at the receiving end, not universal restriction at the source."[27] Subsequently, the district court found COPA to violate the First Amendment and issued a permanent injunction against its enforcement; the Third Circuit affirmed, and the Supreme Court denied certiorari.[28]

In United States v. American Library Association, Inc., a four-Justice plurality of the Supreme Court upheld the Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA), which, as the plurality summarized it, provides that a public school or "library may not receive federal assistance to provide Internet access unless it installs software to block images that constitute obscenity or child pornography, and to prevent minors from obtaining access to material that is harmful to them."[29] The plurality asked "whether libraries would violate the First Amendment by

---

[22] 521 U.S. at 867.

[23] Id.

[24] "Harmful to minors" statutes ban the distribution of material to minors that is not necessarily obscene under the Miller test. In Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 641 (1968), the Supreme Court, applying a rational basis standard, upheld New York's harmful-to-minors statute.

[25] ACLU v. Reno, 217 F.3d 162, 166 (3d Cir. 2000).

[26] Ashcroft v. ACLU, 535 U.S. 564, 585 (2002).

[27] Ashcroft v. ACLU, 542 U.S. 656, 667 (2004). Justice Stephen Breyer, dissenting, wrote that blocking and filtering software is not a less restrictive alternative because "it is part of the status quo" and "[i]t is always less restrictive to do nothing than to do something." Id. at 684. The majority opinion countered that Congress "may act to encourage the use of filters," and "[t]he need for parental cooperation does not automatically disqualify a proposed less restrictive alternative." Id. at 669.

[28] American Civil Liberties Union v. Gonzales, 478 F. Supp. 2d 775 (E.D. Pa. 2007), aff'd sub nom. American Civil Liberties Union v. Mukasey, 534 F.3d 181 (3d Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 129 S. Ct. 1032 (2009).

[29] 539 U.S. 194, 199 (2003).

employing the filtering software that CIPA requires"[30]—in other words, whether CIPA would effectively violate library patrons' rights. The plurality concluded that it did not, after finding that "Internet access in public libraries is neither a 'traditional' nor a 'designated' public forum," and that it therefore would not be appropriate to apply strict scrutiny to determine whether the filtering requirements are constitutional.[31] The plurality acknowledged "the tendency of filtering software to 'overblock'—that is, to erroneously block access to constitutionally protected speech that falls outside the categories that software users intend to block."[32] It found, however, that, "[a]ssuming that such erroneous blocking presents constitutional difficulties, any such concerns are dispelled by the ease with which patrons may have the filtering software disabled."[33]

The plurality also considered whether CIPA imposes an unconstitutional condition on the receipt of federal assistance—in other words, whether the government can require public libraries to limit their speech if they accept federal funds. The plurality found that, assuming that government entities have First Amendment rights (it did not decide the question), "CIPA does not 'penalize' libraries that choose not to install such software, or deny them the right to provide their patrons with unfiltered Internet access. Rather, CIPA simply reflects Congress's decision not to subsidize their doing so."[34]

Amdt1.7.6 Commercial Speech

Amdt1.7.6.1 Commercial Speech Early Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In the 1970s, the Court's treatment of "commercial speech" changed from total nonprotection under the First Amendment to qualified protection. In 1942, the Court had stated that speech concerning commercial transactions is undeserving of First Amendment protection in Valentine v. Chrestensen.[1] In Chrestensen, the Court upheld a city ordinance prohibiting distributing on the street "commercial and business advertising matter," as applied to an exhibitor of a submarine who distributed leaflets describing his submarine on one side and on the other side protesting the city's refusal of certain docking facilities. The Chrestensen doctrine was limited to expression promoting commercial activities; whether the speaker disseminated his expression for profit or through commercial channels did not subject

[30] 539 U.S. at 203.

[31] 539 U.S. at 205.

[32] 539 U.S. at 208.

[33] 539 U.S. at 209. Justice Anthony Kennedy, concurring, noted that, "[i]f some libraries do not have the capacity to unblock specific Web sites or to disable the filter . . . that would be the subject for an as-applied challenge, not the facial challenge made in this case." 539 U.S. at 215. Justice David Souter, dissenting, noted that "the statute says only that a library 'may' unblock, not that it must." 539 U.S. at 233.

[34] 539 U.S. at 212.

[1] 316 U.S. 52 (1942). See also Breard v. City of Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951). The doctrine was one of the bases upon which the banning of all commercials for cigarettes from radio and television was upheld. Capital Broadcasting Co. v. Mitchell, 333 F. Supp. 582 (D.D.C. 1971) (three-judge court), aff'd per curiam, 405 U.S. 1000 (1972).

it to any greater regulation than if he offered it for free.[2] The doctrine lasted in this form for decades, until the Court's approach began shifting in the 1970s.

Relying on the Chrestensen doctrine in a 5-4 decision issued in 1973, the Court sustained the application of a city's ban on employment discrimination to bar sex-designated employment advertising in a newspaper.[3] Suggesting that speech does not lose its constitutional protection simply because it appears in a commercial context, the Court nonetheless described placing want-ads in newspapers as "classic examples of commercial speech," controlled by Chrestensen because they were devoid of expressions relating to social policy and "did no more than propose a commercial transaction." But the Court also noted that the advertisements facilitated employment discrimination, which was itself illegal.[4]

In 1975, the Court overturned a conviction under a state statute that made it illegal for any publication by sale or circulation to encourage or prompt procuring an abortion. The Court held the statute unconstitutional as applied to an editor of a weekly newspaper who published an advertisement announcing the availability of legal and safe abortions in another state and detailing assistance that state residents could get to obtain abortions in the other state.[5] Distinguishing Chrestensen, the Court discerned that the advertisements conveyed information of other than a purely commercial nature, that they related to services that were legal in the other jurisdiction, and that the state could not prevent its residents from obtaining abortions in the other state or punish them for doing so.

In 1976, the Court eliminated these distinctions by disclaiming Chrestensen's commercial speech "exception" to the First Amendment as it voided a statute that effectively prohibited licensed pharmacists from advertising prescription drug prices.[6] In a suit brought by consumers to protect their right to receive information, the Court held that speech that does no more than propose a commercial transaction is nonetheless of such social value and entitled to protection. Noting that consumers' interests in receiving factual information about prices may sometimes be even "keener" than their interest in political debate, the Court concluded that price competition and access to information about it serves the public interest.[7] The Court ruled that state interests in the ban—protecting professionalism and the quality of prescription goods—were either badly served or not served by the statute.[8]

Turning from the interests of consumers to receive information to that of advertisers to communicate, the Court in 1977 voided a municipal ordinance that barred displaying "For sale" and "Sold" signs on residential lawns, purportedly to limit "white flight" resulting from a "fear psychology" that developed among White residents following sale of homes to non-Whites. The right of owners to communicate their intention to sell a commodity and the right of potential buyers to receive the message was protected, the Court determined; the

---

[2] Books that are sold for profit, Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 150 (1959); Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463, 474–75 (1966), advertisements dealing with political and social matters which newspapers carry for a fee, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265–66 (1964), and motion pictures which are exhibited for an admission fee, United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 501–02 (1952), were all during this period held entitled to full First Amendment protection regardless of the commercial element involved.

[3] Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973).

[4] 413 U.S. at 385, 389. The Court continues to hold that government may ban commercial speech related to illegal activity. Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 563–64 (1980).

[5] Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975).

[6] Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976).

[7] 425 U.S. at 763–64.

[8] 425 U.S. at 766–70.

community interest could have been achieved by less restrictive means and in any event may not be achieved by restricting the free flow of truthful information.[9]

Amdt1.7.6.2 Central Hudson Test and Current Doctrine

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court established the standard that generally governs government restrictions on commercial speech in 1980's Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission.[1] In that case, the Court explained that commercial speech enjoys "lesser protection" than "other constitutionally guaranteed expression."[2] After emphasizing that First Amendment protection for commercial speech "is based on the informational function of advertising," the Court said that "there can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of commercial messages that do not accurately inform the public about lawful activity."[3] Accordingly, the Court held that the government may prohibit "forms of communication more likely to deceive the public than to inform it" as well as "commercial speech related to illegal activity."[4] But if the regulated "communication is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity," the government's action is subject to intermediate scrutiny.[5] Under Central Hudson's intermediate standard, the government must prove that its interest is "substantial," and that the regulation "directly advances" that interest and is "not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest."[6] In Central Hudson, the Court ruled a state regulation banning promotional advertising by electric utilities unconstitutional.[7] Although the Court recognized the state's alleged interests in energy conservation and equitable pricing as substantial, it concluded the total ban was not sufficiently narrowly tailored to the government's interest.[8] The Court stressed that the state regulation extended to "all promotional advertising, regardless of the impact of the touted service on overall energy use"—including barring advertisements of more energy efficient products.[9]

The Court has since described Central Hudson as setting out a four-pronged test for restraints upon commercial expression.[10] The test applies to commercial speech, which the Court has defined alternately as speech that "does 'no more than propose a commercial

---

[9] Linmark Assocs. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977).

[1] 447 U.S. 557, 566 (1980).

[2] Id. at 563. Commercial speech is viewed by the Court as usually hardier than other speech; because advertising is the sine qua non of commercial profits, it is less likely to be chilled by regulation. Thus, the difference inheres in both the nature of the speech and the nature of the governmental interest. Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 771–72 n.24 (1976); Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 455–56 (1978).

[3] Central Hudson, 447 U.S. at 563.

[4] Id. at 563–64.

[5] Id. at 564.

[6] Id. at 566.

[7] Id. at 558, 572.

[8] Id. at 568–71.

[9] Id. at 570.

[10] In one case, the Court referred to the test as having three prongs, referring to its second, third, and fourth prongs, as, respectively, its first, second, and third. The Court in that case did, however, apply Central Hudson's first prong as well. Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 624 (1995).

transaction'"[11] and as "expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience."[12] The Court has also distinguished laws that regulate the conduct of sellers—an "area traditionally subject to government regulation"—from those that regulate a seller's speech.[13] In Expressions Hair Design v. Schneiderman, the Court held that a New York State statute that prohibited businesses from displaying a cash price alongside a surcharge for credit card purchases burdened speech.[14] Relying on Supreme Court precedent suggesting that "price regulation alone regulates conduct, not speech," the lower court held that the statute was constitutional.[15] The Supreme Court disagreed, stating "[w]hat the law does regulate is how sellers may communicate their prices," and "[i]n regulating the communication of prices rather than prices themselves, [the statute] regulates speech."[16] The Court, however, remanded the case to the lower court to determine in the first instance whether the law survives First Amendment scrutiny.[17]

Under the first prong of the test, certain commercial speech is not entitled to protection; the informational function of advertising is the First Amendment concern and if an advertisement does not accurately inform the public about lawful activity, it can be suppressed.[18] Accordingly, a statute prohibiting the practice of optometry under a trade name was sustained because there was "a significant possibility" that the public might be misled through deceptive use of the same or similar trade names.[19] Second, if the speech is protected, the interest of the government in regulating and limiting it must be assessed. The state must assert a substantial interest to be achieved by restrictions on commercial speech.[20] Third, the [11] Va. State Bd. of Pharm., 425 U.S. at 762 (quoting Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 385 (1973)).

---

[12] Central Hudson, 447 U.S. at 561. The Court has viewed as noncommercial the advertising of views on public policy that would inhere to the economic benefit of the speaker. Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530 (1980). See also, e.g., Harris v. Quinn, 573 U.S. 616, 648 (2014) (holding that union speech on matters of public concern did "much more than" propose a commercial transaction). So too, the Court has refused to treat as commercial speech charitable solicitation undertaken by professional fundraisers, characterizing the commercial component as "inextricably intertwined with otherwise fully protected speech." Riley v. National Fed'n of the Blind, 487 U.S. 781, 796 (1988). By contrast, a mixing of home economics information with a sales pitch at a Tupperware party did not remove the transaction from commercial speech. Board of Trustees v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469 (1989). The mere linking of a product to matters of public debate does not thereby entitle an ad to the increased protection afforded noncommercial speech. Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983).

[13] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978). In Ohralik, the Court said it could cite "[n]umerous examples . . . of communications that are regulated without offending the First Amendment, such as the exchange of information about securities, corporate proxy statements, the exchange of price and production information among competitors, and employers' threats of retaliation for the labor activities of employees." Id. at 456 (citations omitted). .

[14] No. 15-1391 (2017).

[15] Id. at 5.

[16] Id. at 9–10.

[17] Id. at 1.

[18] Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 563, 564 (1980). Within this category fall the cases involving the possibility of deception through such devices as use of trade names, Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979), and solicitation of business by lawyers, Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978), as well as the proposal of an unlawful transaction, Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973).

[19] Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979).

[20] Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 564, 568–69 (1980). See also San Francisco Arts & Athletics, Inc. v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522 (1987) (governmental interest in protecting USOC's exclusive use of word "Olympic" is substantial); Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995) (government's interest in curbing strength wars among brewers is substantial, but interest in facilitating state regulation of alcohol is not substantial). Contrast United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418 (1993), finding a substantial federal interest in facilitating state restrictions on lotteries. "Unlike the situation in Edge Broadcasting," the Coors Court explained, "the policies of some states do not prevent neighboring states from pursuing their own alcohol-related policies within their respective borders." 514 U.S. at 486. However, in Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983), the Court deemed insubstantial a governmental interest in protecting postal patrons from offensive but not obscene materials. Accord Matal v. Tam, No. 15-1293, slip op. at 25 (U.S. June 19, 2017) (plurality opinion).

restriction cannot be sustained if it provides only ineffective or remote support for the asserted purpose.[21] Instead, the regulation must "directly advance" the governmental interest. The Court resolves this issue with reference to aggregate effects, and does not limit its consideration to effects on the challenging litigant.[22] Fourth, if the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restriction cannot survive.[23]

Although Central Hudson described the fourth prong as testing whether a restriction is more extensive than necessary, the Court has rejected the idea that a "least restrictive means" test is required.[24] Instead, what is required is a reasonable "fit" between means and ends, with the means "narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objective."[25] The Court, however, does "not equate this test with the less rigorous obstacles of rational basis review; . . . the existence of 'numerous and obvious less-burdensome alternatives to the restriction on commercial speech . . . is certainly a relevant consideration in determining whether the 'between ends and means is reasonable.'"[26]

In City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc.,[27] the Court showed the importance of the "reasonable fit" standard by striking down a city's prohibition on distributing "commercial handbills" through freestanding newsracks located on city property. The city's aesthetic interest in reducing visual clutter was furthered by reducing the total number of newsracks, but the distinction between prohibited "commercial" publications and permitted "newspapers" bore "no relationship whatsoever" to this legitimate interest.[28] The city could not, the Court

---

[21] 447 U.S. at 569. The ban here was found to directly advance one of the proffered interests. Contrast this holding with Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977); Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976); Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983); Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995) (prohibition on display of alcohol content on beer labels does not directly and materially advance government's interest in curbing strength wars among brewers, given the inconsistencies and "overall irrationality" of the regulatory scheme); and Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761 (1993) (Florida's ban on in-person solicitation by certified public accountants does not directly advance its legitimate interests in protecting consumers from fraud, protecting consumer privacy, and maintaining professional independence from clients), where the restraints were deemed indirect or ineffectual.

[22] United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 427 (1993) ("this question cannot be answered by limiting the inquiry to whether the governmental interest is directly advanced as applied to a single person or entity").

[23] Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 565, 569–71 (1980). See also Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983) (ruling that the governmental interest in not interfering with parental efforts at controlling children's access to birth control information could not justify a ban on commercial mailings about birth control products); Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995) (there are less intrusive alternatives—e.g., direct limitations on alcohol content of beer—to prohibition on display of alcohol content on beer label); Matal v. Tam, No. 15-1293, slip op. at 25–26 (U.S. June 19, 2017) (ruling that a ban on disparaging trademarks was not "narrowly drawn" to the government's interest in "protecting the orderly flow of commerce"). Note, however, that, in San Francisco Arts & Athletics, Inc. v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 539 (1987), the Court applied the test in a manner deferential to Congress: "the restrictions [at issue] are not broader than Congress reasonably could have determined to be necessary to further these interests."

[24] Board of Trustees v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 476–77 (1989).

[25] Board of Trustees v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 480 (1989). In a 1993 opinion the Court elaborated on the difference between reasonable fit and least restrictive alternative. "A regulation need not be 'absolutely the least severe that will achieve the desired end,' but if there are numerous and obvious less-burdensome alternatives to the restriction . . . , that is certainly a relevant consideration in determining whether the 'fit' between ends and means is reasonable." City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 410, 417 n.13 (1993).

[26] Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 632 (1995). See, e.g., Thompson v. W. States Med. Ctr., 535 U.S. 357, 371–72 (2002) (discussing previous cases in which the Court had looked to the availability of less-speech restrictive alternatives for the government to achieve its interests).

[27] 507 U.S. 410 (1993). See also Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761 (1993), decided the same Term, relying on the "directly advance" third prong of Central Hudson to strike down a ban on in-person solicitation by certified public accountants.

[28] 507 U.S. at 424.

ruled, single out commercial speech to bear the full onus when "all newsracks, regardless of whether they contain commercial or noncommercial publications, are equally at fault."[29]

Accordingly, as in Central Hudson itself, the Court has sometimes struck down total bans as insufficiently narrowly tailored. For instance, the Court held that a state could not forbid lawyers from advertising the prices they charged for performing routine legal services.[30] The Court did not deem any of the proffered state justifications for the ban sufficient to overcome the private and societal interest in the free exchange of this form of speech.[31] The Court also held that a state may not categorically prohibit attorney advertising through mailings that target persons known to face particular legal problems,[32] or prohibit an attorney from holding himself out as a certified civil trial specialist,[33] or prohibit a certified public accountant (CPA) from holding herself out as a certified financial planner.[34]

Nonetheless, as stated, the Court's current commercial speech doctrine does not require the least restrictive means, and the Court has upheld a number of commercial speech restrictions under this intermediate scrutiny standard. For instance, in Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to a state regulation restricting person-to-person solicitation of clients by attorneys.[35] Similarly, the Court upheld a rule prohibiting high school coaches from recruiting middle school athletes, finding that "the dangers of undue influence and overreaching that exist when a lawyer chases an ambulance are also present when a high school coach contacts an eighth grader."[36] The Court later refused, however, to extend this principle to in-person solicitation by certified public accountants, explaining that CPAs, unlike attorneys, are not professionally "trained in the art of persuasion," and that the typical business executive client of a CPA is "far less susceptible to manipulation" than was the accident victim in Ohralik.[37] A ban on personal solicitation is "justified only in situations 'inherently conducive to overreaching and other forms of [29] 507 U.S. at 426. The Court also noted the "minute" effect of removing 62 "commercial" newsracks while 1,500 to 2,000 other newsracks remained in place. Id. at 418.

---

[30] Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977). Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Lewis Powell, Potter Stewart, and William Rehnquist dissented. Id. at 386, 389, 404.

[31] 433 U.S. at 368–79. See also In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191 (1982) (invalidating sanctions imposed on attorney for deviating in some respects from rigid prescriptions of advertising style and for engaging in some proscribed advertising practices, because the state could show neither that his advertising was misleading nor that any substantial governmental interest was served by the restraints).

[32] Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 486 U.S. 466 (1988). Shapero was distinguished in Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618 (1995), a 5-4 decision upholding a prohibition on targeted direct-mail solicitations to victims and their relatives for a 30-day period following an accident or disaster. "Shapero dealt with a broad ban on all direct mail solicitations" (id. at 629), the Court explained, and was not supported, as Florida's more limited ban was, by findings describing the harms to be prevented by the ban. Dissenting Justice Anthony Kennedy disagreed that there was a valid distinction, pointing out that in Shapero the Court had said that "the mode of communication [mailings versus potentially more abusive in-person solicitation] makes all the difference," and that mailings were at issue in both Shapero and Florida Bar. 515 U.S. at 637 (quoting Shapero, 486 U.S. at 475).

[33] Peel v. Illinois Attorney Disciplinary Comm'n, 496 U.S. 91 (1990).

[34] Ibanez v. Florida Bd. of Accountancy, 512 U.S. 136 (1994) (also ruling that Accountancy Board could not reprimand the CPA, who was also a licensed attorney, for truthfully listing her CPA credentials in advertising for her law practice).

[35] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978). But compare In re Primus, 426 U.S. 412 (1978). The distinction between in-person and other attorney advertising was continued in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626 (1985) ("print advertising . . . in most cases . . . will lack the coercive force of the personal presence of the trained advocate").

[36] Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Ass'n v. Brentwood Academy, 551 U.S. 291, 298 (2007).

[37] Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761, 775 (1993).

misconduct.'"[38] To allow enforcement of such a broad prophylactic rule absent identification of a serious problem such as ambulance chasing, the Court explained, would dilute commercial speech protection "almost to nothing."[39]

Two additional cases illustrate application of the intermediate scrutiny standard. In 1993, the Court upheld a federal law that prohibited broadcasters from broadcasting lottery advertisements in states that prohibit lotteries, while allowing stations in states that sponsor lotteries to broadcast such ads. The Court held there was a "reasonable fit" between the restriction and the asserted federal interest in supporting state anti-gambling policies without unduly interfering with policies of neighboring states that promote lotteries.[40] The prohibition "directly served" the congressional interest, and could be applied to a broadcaster whose principal audience was in an adjoining lottery state, and who sought to run ads for that state's lottery.[41]

Six years later, the Court struck down a provision of the same statute as applied to advertisements for private casino gambling that are broadcast by radio and television stations located in a state where such gambling is legal.[42] The Court emphasized the interrelatedness of the four parts of the Central Hudson test: "Each [part] raises a relevant question that may not be dispositive to the First Amendment inquiry, but the answer to which may inform a judgment concerning the other three."[43] For example, although the Court recognized the government had a substantial interest in reducing the social costs of gambling, the fact that Congress has simultaneously encouraged gambling, because of its economic benefits, made it more difficult for the government to demonstrate that its restriction on commercial speech materially advanced its asserted interest and constituted a reasonable "fit."[44] In this case, the federal law's operation was "so pierced by exemptions and inconsistencies that the Government cannot hope to exonerate it."[45] Moreover, the Court noted "the regulation distinguishes among the indistinct, permitting a variety of speech that poses the same risks the Government purports to fear, while banning messages unlikely to cause any harm at all."[46]

As mentioned above, the Supreme Court has sometimes suggested that the government has greater power to regulate commercial speech because it "occurs in an area traditionally subject to government regulation."[47]In Posadas de Puerto Rico Assocs. v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, the Court seemed to take this principle further when it asserted that "the greater power to completely ban casino gambling necessarily includes the lesser power to ban advertising of casino gambling."[48] Subsequently, however, the Court eschewed reliance on this language,[49]

---

[38] 507 U.S. at 774 (quoting Ohralik, 436 U.S. at 464).

[39] 507 U.S. at 777.

[40] United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418 (1993).

[41] 507 U.S. at 428.

[42] Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Ass'n, Inc. v. United States, 527 U.S. 173 (1999).

[43] 527 U.S. at 184.

[44] 527 U.S. at 186–87.

[45] 527 U.S. at 190.

[46] 527 U.S. at 195.

[47] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 455–56 (1978). See also, e.g., Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552, 567 (2011) ("[T]he First Amendment does not prevent restrictions directed at commerce or conduct from imposing incidental burdens on speech.").

[48] 478 U.S. 328, 345–46 (1986).

[49] In Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995) (invalidating a federal ban on revealing alcohol content on malt beverage labels), the Court rejected reliance on Posadas, pointing out that the statement in Posadas had been made only after a determination that the advertising could be upheld under Central Hudson. The Court found it unnecessary to consider the greater-includes-lesser argument in United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 427 (1993), upholding through application of Central Hudson principles a ban on broadcast of lottery ads.

and a majority of the Court ultimately rejected Posadas in 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island,[50] striking down the state's ban on advertisements that provide truthful information about liquor prices. The plurality opinion in 44 Liquormart called Posadas's First Amendment analysis "erroneous," declining to give force to its "highly deferential approach," and proclaiming that a state "does not have the broad discretion to suppress truthful, nonmisleading information for paternalistic purposes that the Posadas majority was willing to tolerate."[51] Four other Justices concluded that Posadas was inconsistent with the "closer look" that the Court has since required in applying the principles of Central Hudson.[52]

The "different degree of protection" the Court accords commercial speech has a number of consequences as regards other First Amendment doctrine. For instance, somewhat broader times, places, and manner regulations are to be tolerated,[53] and the rule against prior restraints may be inapplicable.[54] Further, disseminators of commercial speech are not protected by the overbreadth doctrine.[55] Nonetheless, there are circumstances in which the nature of the restriction placed on commercial speech may alter the First Amendment analysis, and even result in applying a heightened level of scrutiny.

For instance, in Sorrell v. IMS Health, Inc.,[56] the Court struck down state restrictions on pharmacies and "data-miners" selling or leasing information on the prescribing behavior of doctors for marketing purposes and related restrictions limiting the use of that information by pharmaceutical companies.[57] These prohibitions, however, were subject to a number of exceptions, including provisions allowing such prescriber-identifying information to be used for health care research. Because the restrictions only applied to the use of this information for marketing and because they principally applied to pharmaceutical manufacturers of non-generic drugs, the Court found that these restrictions were content-based and speaker-based limits and thus subject to heightened scrutiny.[58] However, the Court declined to say definitively whether Central Hudson or "a stricter form of judicial scrutiny" should apply because, in the Court's view, the law failed to pass constitutional muster even under Central Hudson.[59]

---

[50] 517 U.S. 484 (1996).

[51] 517 U.S. at 510 (opinion of Stevens, J., joined by Kennedy, Thomas, and Ginsburg, JJ.). Justice John Paul Stevens' opinion also dismissed the Posadas "greater-includes-the-lesser argument" as "inconsistent with both logic and well-settled doctrine," pointing out that the First Amendment "presumes that attempts to regulate speech are more dangerous than attempts to regulate conduct." Id. at 511–512.

[52] 517 U.S. at 531–32 (O'Connor, J., concurring, joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Souter, and Breyer, JJ.).

[53] Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 771 (1976); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 384 (1977). But, in Linmark Associates v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85, 93–94 (1977), the Court refused to accept a times, places, and manner defense of an ordinance prohibiting "For Sale" signs on residential lawns. First, ample alternative channels of communication were not available, and second, the ban was seen rather as a content limitation.

[54] Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 571 n.13 (1980), citing Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 772 n.24 (1976). See Amdt1.7.2.3 Prior Restraints on Speech.

[55] Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 379–81 (1977); Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 557, 565 n.8 (1980).

[56] 564 U.S. 552, 557 (2011).

[57] "Detailers," marketing specialists employed by pharmaceutical manufacturers, used the reports to refine their marketing tactics and increase sales to doctors. 564 U.S. at 558.

[58] 564 U.S. at 565.

[59] 564 U.S. at 571. Although the state advanced a variety of proposed governmental interests to justify the regulations, the Court found these interests (expectation of physician privacy, discouraging harassment of physicians, and protecting the integrity of the doctor-physician relationship) were ill-served by the content-based restrictions. Sorrell, 564 U.S. at 572–77. The Court also rejected the argument that the regulations were an appropriate way to reduce health care costs, noting that "[t]he State seeks to achieve its policy objectives through the indirect means of restraining certain speech by certain speakers—that is, by diminishing detailers' ability to influence prescription

More recently, the Court noted, "several Members of the Court have expressed doubts about the Central Hudson analysis and whether it should apply in particular cases."[60] Sorrell's suggestion that content-based regulations of commercial speech might be subject to "a stricter form of judicial scrutiny"[61] may be further evidence that the Court is increasing protection of commercial speech. Nonetheless, the Central Hudson test remains the primary test for commercial speech restrictions.[62]

Amdt1.7.7 Public Forum Doctrine

Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In 1895, while on the highest court of Massachusetts, future Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes rejected a contention that public property was by right open to the public as a place where the right of speech could be recognized,[1] and on review the United States Supreme Court endorsed Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes's view.[2] Years later, beginning with Hague v. CIO,[3] the Court reconsidered the issue. Justice Owen Roberts wrote in Hague:

> Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions.

---

decisions. Those who seek to censor or burden free expression often assert that disfavored speech has adverse effects. But the 'fear that people would make bad decisions if given truthful information' cannot justify content-based burdens on speech." Id. at 577.

[60] Thompson v. W. States Med. Ctr., 535 U.S. 357, 367 (2002). For instance, Justice John Paul Stevens criticized the Central Hudson test because it seemingly allows regulation of any speech propounded in a commercial context regardless of the content of that speech: "[A]ny description of commercial speech that is intended to identify the category of speech entitled to less First Amendment protection should relate to the reasons for permitting broader regulation: namely, commercial speech's potential to mislead." Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476, 494 (1995) (Stevens, J., concurring). Justice Clarence Thomas, similarly, wrote that, in cases "in which the government's asserted interest is to keep legal users of a product or service ignorant in order to manipulate their choices in the marketplace, the Central Hudson test should not be applied because such an interest' is per se illegitimate." Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n, Inc. v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 197 (1999) (Thomas, J., concurring) (internal quotation marks omitted). Other decisions in which the Court majority acknowledged that some Justices would grant commercial speech greater protection than it has under the Central Hudson test include United States v. United Foods, Inc., 533 U.S. 405, 409–410 (2001) (mandated assessments, used for advertising, on handlers of fresh mushrooms struck down as compelled speech, rather than under Central Hudson), and Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 554 (2001) (various state restrictions on tobacco advertising struck down under Central Hudson as overly burdensome).

[61] Sorrell, 564 U.S. at 571.

[62] See, e.g., City of Austin v. Reagan Nat'l Advert. of Austin, LLC, No. 20-1029, slip op. at 6 (U.S. Apr. 21, 2022) ("The Metromedia court did not need to decide whether the off-premises prohibition was content based, as it regulated only commercial speech and so was subject to intermediate scrutiny in any event." (discussing Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490, 507–12 (1981) (plurality opinion))).

[1] Commonwealth v. Davis, 162 Mass. 510, 511 (1895) ("For the Legislature absolutely or conditionally to forbid public speaking in a highway or public park is no more an infringement of rights of a member of the public than for the owner of a private house to forbid it in the house.")

[2] Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U.S. 43, 48 (1897).

[3] 307 U.S. 496 (1939). Only Justice Hugo Black joined the John Owen Roberts opinion, but only Justices James McReynolds and Pierce Butler dissented from the result.

> Such use of the streets and public places has from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights, and liberties of citizens.[4]

Although majority of the Justices did not join Justice Roberts's opinion, the Court subsequently endorsed the view in several opinions.[5]

In the 1960s, the Court appeared to call the Roberts view into question,[6] and subsequently a majority endorsed an opinion by Justice Hugo Black asserting a narrower view of speech rights in public places.[7] Later decisions restated and quoted the Roberts language from Hague, and that is now the position of the Court.[8] Public streets and parks,[9] including those adjacent to courthouses[10] and foreign embassies,[11] as well as public libraries[12] and the grounds of legislative bodies,[13] are open to public demonstrations, although the uses to which public areas are dedicated may shape the range of permissible expression and conduct that may occur there.[14] Moreover, not all public properties are public forums. In U.S. Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Ass'ns, the Court stated: "[T]he First Amendment does not guarantee access to property simply because it is owned or controlled by the government,"[15] while in Grayned v. City of Rockford, the Court stated: "The crucial question is whether the manner of expression is basically compatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time."[16] Thus, by the nature of the use to which the property is put or by tradition, some sites are

---

[4] Id. at 515.

[5] E.g., Schneider v. Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147, 163 (1939); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 293 (1951).

[6] Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 555 (1965). For analysis of this case in the broader context, see Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, 1965 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1.

[7] Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966). See id. at 47–48; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 578 (1965) (Black, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413, 416 (1943) (Black, J., for the Court).

[8] E.g., Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, 152 (1969); Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 115 (1972); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 460 (1980).

[9] Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951); Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969); Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971); Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972); Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 835–36 (1976); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980).

[10] Narrowly drawn statutes that serve the state's interests in security and in preventing obstruction of justice and influencing of judicial officers are constitutional. Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965). A restriction on carrying signs or placards on the grounds of the Supreme Court is unconstitutional as applied to the public sidewalks surrounding the Court, since it does not sufficiently further the governmental purposes of protecting the building and grounds, maintaining proper order, or insulating the judicial decision making process from lobbying. United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171 (1983).

[11] In Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988), the Court struck down as content-based a District of Columbia law prohibiting the display of any sign within 500 feet of a foreign embassy if the sign tends to bring the foreign government into "public odium" or "public disrepute." However, another aspect of the District's law, making it unlawful for three or more persons to congregate within 500 feet of an embassy and refuse to obey a police dispersal order, was upheld; under a narrowing construction, the law had been held applicable only to congregations directed at an embassy, and reasonably believed to present a threat to the peace or security of the embassy.

[12] Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966) (sit-in in library reading room).

[13] Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963); Jeanette Rankin Brigade v. Capitol Police Chief, 342 F. Supp. 575 (D.D.C. 1972) (three-judge court), aff'd, 409 U.S. 972 (1972) (voiding statute prohibiting parades and demonstrations on United States Capitol grounds).

[14] E.g., Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972) (sustaining ordinance prohibiting noisemaking adjacent to school if that noise disturbs or threatens to disturb the operation of the school); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966) (silent vigil in public library protected while noisy and disruptive demonstration would not be); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969) (wearing of black armbands as protest protected but not if it results in disruption of school); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611 (1968) (preservation of access to courthouse); Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988) (ordinance prohibiting picketing "before or about" any residence or dwelling, narrowly construed as prohibiting only picketing that targets a particular residence, upheld as furthering significant governmental interest in protecting the privacy of the home).

[15] United States Postal Serv. V. Council of Greenburgh Civic Assn's, 453 U.S. 114, 129 (1981).

[16] Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 116 (1972).

simply not as open for expression as streets and parks are.[17] But if government does open non-traditional forums for expressive activities, it may not discriminate on the basis of content or viewpoint in according access.[18]

Speech in public forums is subject to time, place, and manner regulations that take into account such matters as control of traffic in the streets, the scheduling of two meetings or demonstrations at the same time and place, the preventing of blockages of building entrances, and the like.[19] Such regulations are closely scrutinized in order to protect free expression, and, to be valid, must be justified without reference to the content or subject matter of speech,[20] must serve a significant governmental interest,[21] and must leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.[22] The Court has written that a time, place, or manner regulation > must be narrowly tailored to serve the government's legitimate, content-neutral interests but that it need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of doing so. Rather, the requirement of narrow tailoring is satisfied. . .[s]o long as the means chosen are not substantially broader than necessary to achieve the government's interest. . . .[23]

A content-neutral time, place, and manner regulation of the use of a public forum must also "contain adequate standards to guide the official's decision and render it subject to effective judicial review."[24] Unlike a content-based licensing scheme, however, it need not "adhere to the procedural requirements set forth in Freedman."[25] In Freedman v. Maryland, the Court had set forth certain requirements, including that the "burden of proving that the film [or other speech] is unprotected expression must rest on the censor," and that the censor must, "within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film. Any restraint imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must similarly be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution."[26]

---

[17] E.g., Minn. Voters All. v. Mansky, No. 16-1435, slip op. at 13 (U.S. June 14, 2018) (polling places); ISKCON v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 679 (1992) (publicly owned airport terminal); Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 46 (1983) (interschool mail system); Council of Greenburgh Civic Ass'ns, 453 U.S. at 128 (private mail boxes); Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 838 (1976) (military bases); Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298, 304 (1974) (plurality opinion) (advertising space in city rapid transit cars); Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 47–48 (1966) (jails).

[18] E.g., Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975) (municipal theater); Madison Sch. Dist. v. WERC, 429 U.S. 167 (1976) (school board meeting); Heffron v. ISKCON, 452 U.S. 640 (1981) (state fair grounds); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981) (university meeting facilities).

[19] See, e.g., Heffron v. ISKCON, 452 U.S. 640, 647–50 (1981), and id. at 656 (Brennan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (stating law and discussing cases); Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288 (1984) (prohibition of sleep-in demonstration in area of park not designated for overnight camping).

[20] Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965); Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosle, 408 U.S. 92 (1972); Madison Sch. Dist. v. WERC, 429 U.S. 167 (1976); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981). In Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974), a divided Court permitted the city to sell commercial advertising space on the walls of its rapid transit cars but to refuse to sell political advertising space.

[21] E.g., the governmental interest in safety and convenience of persons using public forum, Heffron v. ISKCON, 452 U.S. 640, 650 (1981); the interest in preservation of a learning atmosphere in school, Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 115 (1972); and the interest in protecting traffic and pedestrian safety in the streets, Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 554–55 (1965); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 293–94 (1951); Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515–16 (1939).

[22] Heffron v. ISKCON, 452 U.S. 640, 654–55 (1981); Consol. Edison Co. v. PSC, 447 U.S. 530, 535 (1980).

[23] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 798–99, 800 (1989).

[24] Thomas v. Chi. Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 323 (2002).

[25] Id. at 322(citing Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)). See National Socialist Party v. Village of Skokie, 432 U.S. 43 (1977).

[26] Freedman, 380 U.S. at 58–59.

A corollary to the rule forbidding regulation based on content is the principle—a merging of free expression and equal protection standards—that government may not discriminate between different kinds of messages in affording access.[27] In order to ensure against covert forms of discrimination against expression and between different kinds of content, the Court has insisted that licensing systems be constructed as free as possible of the opportunity for arbitrary administration.[28] The Court has also applied its general strictures against prior restraints in the contexts of permit systems and judicial restraint of expression.[29]

It appears that the government may not deny access to the public forum for demonstrators on the ground that the past meetings of these demonstrators resulted in violence,[30] and may not vary a demonstration licensing fee based on an estimate of the amount of hostility likely to [27] Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosle, 408 U.S. 92 (1972) (ordinance void that barred all picketing around school building except labor picketing); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980) (same); Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981) (striking down college rule permitting access to all student organizations except religious groups); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951) (striking down denial of permission to use parks for some groups but not for others); R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992) (striking down ordinance that prohibited symbols, such as burning crosses, that constituted fighting words that insult on the basis of some factors, such as race, but not on the basis of other factors). These principles apply only to the traditional public forum and to the governmentally created "limited public forum." Government may, without creating a limited public forum, place "reasonable" restrictions on access to nonpublic areas. See, e.g., Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 48 (1983) (use of school mail system); and Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985) (charitable solicitation of federal employees at workplace). See also Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974) (city may sell commercial advertising space on the walls of its rapid transit cars but refuse to sell political advertising space); Capitol Square Review Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995) (denial of permission to Ku Klux Klan, allegedly in order to avoid Establishment Clause violation, to place a cross in plaza on grounds of state capitol); Rosenberger v. Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819 (1995) (University's subsidy for printing costs of student publications, available for student "news, information, opinion, entertainment, or academic communications," could not be withheld because of the religious content of a student publication); Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384 (1993) (school district rule prohibiting after-hours use of school property for showing of a film presenting a religious perspective on child-rearing and family values, but allowing after-hours use for non-religious social, civic, and recreational purposes).

---

[28] E.g., Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 516 (1939); Schneider v. Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147, 164 (1939); Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941); Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953); Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U.S. 313, 321–25 (1958); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 555–58 (1965); Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, 150–53 (1969). Writing for the Court, Justice Potter Stewart described these and other cases as "holding that a law subjecting the exercise of First Amendment freedoms to the prior restraint of a license without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide the licensing authority is unconstitutional." Shuttlesworth, 394 U.S. at 150–51. A person faced with an unconstitutional licensing law may ignore it, engage in the desired conduct, and challenge the constitutionality of the permit system upon a subsequent prosecution for violating it. Id. at 151; Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584, 602 (1942) (Stone, C.J., dissenting), adopted per curiam on rehearing, 319 U.S. 103 (1943); see also City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750 (1988) (upholding facial challenge to ordinance vesting in the mayor unbridled discretion to grant or deny annual permit for location of newsracks on public property); Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of the Blind, 487 U.S. 781 (1988) (invalidating as permitting "delay without limit" licensing requirement for professional fundraisers); Forsyth Cnty. v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123 (1992). But see Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967) (same rule not applicable to injunctions).

[29] In Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, the Court reaffirmed the holdings of the earlier cases, and, additionally, both Justice Potter Stewart, for the Court, 39 U.S. at 155 n.4, and Justice John Harlan concurring, id. at 162– 64, asserted that the principles of Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), governing systems of prior censorship of motion pictures, were relevant to permit systems for parades and demonstrations. The Court also voided an injunction against a protest meeting that was issued ex parte, without notice to the protestors and with, of course, no opportunity for them to rebut the representations of the seekers of the injunction. Carroll v. President and Comm'rs of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175 (1968).

[30] The only precedent is Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951). The holding was on a much narrower basis, but in dictum the Court said: "The court below has mistakenly derived support for its conclusions from the evidence produced at the trial that appellant's religious meetings had, in the past, caused some disorder. There are appropriate public remedies to protect the peace and order of the community if appellant's speeches should result in disorder and violence." Id. at 294. A different rule applies to labor picketing. See Milk Wagon Drivers Local 753 v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U.S. 287 (1941) (background of violence supports prohibition of all peaceful picketing). The military may ban a civilian, previously convicted of destroying government property, from reentering a military base, and may apply the ban to prohibit the civilian from reentering the base for purposes of peaceful demonstration during an Armed Forces Day "open house." United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675 (1985).

be engendered.[31] The Court has also suggested that the government cannot effectuate a "heckler's veto," the governmental termination of a speech or demonstration because of hostile crowd reaction.[32]

The Court has defined three categories of public property for public forum analysis.[33] First, there is the traditional public forum—places such as streets and parks that have traditionally been used for public assembly and debate.[34] In such a forum, the government "may impose reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on private speech, but restrictions based on content must satisfy strict scrutiny, and those based on viewpoint are prohibited."[35] Second, there is the designated public forum, where the government opens property for communicative activity and thereby creates a public forum.[36] Such a forum may be limited—hence the expression "limited public forum"—for "use by certain groups, for example, Widmar v. Vincent (student groups), or for discussion of certain subjects, for example, City of Madison Joint School District v. Wisconsin PERC (school board business),"[37] but, within the framework of such legitimate limitations, "a content-based prohibition must be narrowly drawn to effectuate a compelling state interest."[38] Third, in a "nonpublic forum," or "a space that 'is not by tradition or designation a forum for public communication,'"[39] the government "may reserve the forum for its intended purposes, communicative or otherwise, as long as the regulation on speech is reasonable and not an effort to suppress expression merely because public officials oppose the speaker's view."[40]

Amdt1.7.7.2 Public and Nonpublic Forums

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The distinction between public and nonpublic forums may be difficult to ascertain. Whether a speech restriction will be reviewed under strict scrutiny or only for reasonableness

[31] Forsyth Cnty., 505 U.S. 123 (a fee based on anticipated crowd response necessarily involves examination of the content of the speech, and is invalid as a content regulation).

[32] Dicta indicate that a hostile reaction will not justify suppression of speech, Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 502 (1939) ; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 551 (1965); Bachellar v. Maryland, 397 U.S. 564, 567 (1970), and one holding appears to point this way. Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969). In a 2022 decision involving how the Free Speech, Free Exercise, and Establishment Clauses interplay, the Court rejected a "heckler's veto" in the Establishment Clause context, stating "This Court has since made plain, too, that the Establishment Clause does not include anything like a 'modified heckler's veto in which". . . religious activity can be proscribed' based on '"perceptions"' or '"discomfort."' Kennedy v. Bremerton School Dist., No. 21-418, (U.S. June 27, 2022). However, the Court upheld a breach of the peace conviction of a speaker who refused to cease speaking upon the demand of police who feared imminent violence. Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951). In Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 273 (1951) (concurring opinion), Justice Felix Frankfurter wrote: "It is not a constitutional principle that, in acting to preserve order, the police must proceed against the crowd whatever its size and temper and not against the speaker." Id

[33] E.g., Minn. Voters All. v. Mansky, No. 16-1435, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 14, 2018).

[34] Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, 555 U.S. 460, 469 (2009).

[35] Minn. Voters All., slip op. at 11. See also Summum, 555 U.S. at 469. Cf. Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984) ("[T]ime, place, or manner restrictions. . . are valid provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.").

[36] Minn. Voters All., slip op. at 11. See also Summum, 555 U.S. at 469–70.

[37] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 45, 46 n.7 (1983).

[38] 460 U.S. at 46.

[39] Minn. Voters All., slip op. at 7 (quoting Perry Educ. Ass'n, 460 U.S. at 46).

[40] Perry Educ. Ass'n, 460 U.S. at 46.

thus may turn in part on whether the government has "intentionally open[ed] a nontraditional forum for public discourse," creating a designated public forum.[1] To determine whether a forum is a designated public forum or a nonpublic forum, the Court will look to the government's intent in opening the forum,[2] the restrictions initially placed on speakers' access to the forum,[3] and the nature of the forum.[4] For example, in Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the Court held that the Combined Federal Campaign (CFC), "an annual charitable fundraising drive conducted in the federal workplace,"[5] was a nonpublic forum.[6] Notwithstanding the fact that the federal government had opened the forum for solicitation by some charitable organizations, the Court concluded that "neither [the government's] practice nor its policy [was] consistent with an intent to designate the CFC as a public forum open to all tax-exempt organizations."[7] Accordingly, the Court upheld the government's decision to exclude certain charitable organizations as reasonable in light of the purpose of the forum.[8] Similarly, the Court concluded in another case that a school district had not created a public forum with its system for internal school mail because the district had not, "by policy or by practice," "opened its mail system for indiscriminate use by the general public."[9] The Court therefore concluded that the school district could permissibly exclude a teacher's association from using the mail system, while also allowing a different teacher's association—the teachers' exclusive representative—to use the mail system, because the school's policy was reasonable and consistent with the purposes of the forum.[10]

However, although the government has greater discretion to restrict speech in nonpublic forums,[11] the First Amendment still prohibits certain restrictions even in nonpublic forums. For instance, the Court held in Minnesota Voters Alliance v. Mansky that "[a] polling place in Minnesota qualifies as a nonpublic forum."[12] After reviewing the long history of state regulation of polling places on election day,[13] the Court concluded that because the polling

---

[1] See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 802 (1985); see also United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, Inc., 539 U.S. 194, 206 (2003) (plurality opinion) ("To create such a [designated public] forum, the government must make an affirmative choice to open up its property for use as a public forum."); United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 727 (1990) (plurality opinion) (holding certain sidewalks were a nonpublic forum because the government owner had not "expressly dedicated" them "to any expressive activity"). Cf. Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 814 (1984) ("Appellees' reliance on the public forum doctrine is misplaced. They fail to demonstrate the existence of a traditional right of access respecting such items as utility poles for purposes of their communication comparable to that recognized for public streets and parks. . . .").

[2] Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 803.

[3] See Perry Educ. Ass'n, 460 U.S. at 4748.

[4] Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 803.

[5] Id. at 790.

[6] Id. at 805.

[7] Id. at 804 (emphasis added).

[8] Id. at 809.

[9] See Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 47 (1983). The Court also stated, however, that "even if we assume that by granting access to the Cub Scouts, YMCA's, and parochial schools, the School District has created a 'limited' public forum, the constitutional right of access would in any event extend only to other entities of similar character. While the school mail facilities thus might be a forum generally open for use by the Girl Scouts, the local boys' club, and other organizations that engage in activities of interest and educational relevance to students, they would not as a consequence be open to an organization such as [the Perry Local Educators' Association], which is concerned with the terms and conditions of teacher employment." Id. at 48. In United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 730 (1990) (plurality opinion), the Court interpreted this language to mean that in a limited public forum, "regulation of the reserved nonpublic uses would still require application of the reasonableness test."

[10] Perry Educ. Ass'n, 460 U.S. at 50–51. See also Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 269–70 (1988) (holding that a student newspaper created as part of "a supervised learning experience" was not a public forum).

[11] See, e.g., United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, Inc., 539 U.S. 194, 204–05 (2003) (plurality opinion).

[12] Minn. Voters All. v. Mansky, No. 16-1435, slip op. at 8 (U.S. June 14, 2018).

[13] Id. at 1–3.

place was "government-controlled property set aside for the sole purpose of voting,"[14] it qualified as "a special enclave, subject to greater restriction."[15] Although the forum's designation as a nonpublic forum meant that the Court did not apply strict scrutiny, the Court nonetheless struck down a Minnesota law that barred all "political" apparel from polling places as unreasonable.[16] The Court acknowledged that the state could permissibly seek to "prohibit certain apparel" in polling places "because of the message it conveys,"[17] but concluded that the particular scheme followed by Minnesota was not "capable of reasoned application."[18] In the Court's view, the breadth of the term "political" and the state's "haphazard interpretations"[19] of that term failed to provide "objective, workable standards" to guide the discretion of the election judges who implemented the statute.[20]

Application of these principles continues to raise often difficult questions. In United States v. Kokinda, a majority of Justices, who ultimately upheld a ban on soliciting contributions on postal premises under the "reasonableness" review governing nonpublic forums, could not agree on the public forum status of a sidewalk located entirely on postal service property.[21] Two years later, in International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, the Court was similarly divided as to whether non-secured areas of airport terminals, including shops and restaurants, constitute public forums.[22] A five-Justice majority held that airport terminals are not public forums and upheld regulations banning the repetitive solicitation of money within the terminals.[23]

A decade later, the Court considered the public forum status of the internet. In United States v. American Library Association, Inc., a four-Justice plurality held that "Internet access in public libraries is neither a 'traditional' nor a 'designated' public forum."[24] The plurality therefore did not apply strict scrutiny in upholding the Children's Internet Protection Act, which provides that a public school or "library may not receive federal assistance to provide

---

[14] Id. at 8.

[15] Id. (quoting Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 680 1992)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[16] Id. at 13.

[17] Id. at 12.

[18] Id. at 19.

[19] Id. at 13.

[20] Id. at 18.

[21] 497 U.S. 720, 727 (1990) ("[R]egulation of speech activity where the Government has not dedicated its property to First Amendment activity is examined only for reasonableness.").

[22] 505 U.S. 672 (1992).

[23] Id. at 683 ("[N]either by tradition nor purpose can the terminals be described as satisfying the standards we have previously set out for identifying a public forum.").

[24] 539 U.S. 194, 205–06 (2003) ("We have 'rejected the view that traditional public forum status extends beyond its historic confines.' The doctrines surrounding traditional public forums may not be extended to situations where such history is lacking." (quoting Ark. Educ. TV Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 679 (1998))). While decided on constitutional vagueness grounds, in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, the Court struck down a provision of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 that prohibited the use of an "interactive computer service" (that is, the internet) to display indecent material "in a manner available to a person under 18 years of age." 521 U.S. 844, 860 (1997). The Court did not consider the internet's status as a forum for free speech, but observed that the internet "constitutes a vast platform from which to address and hear from a world-wide audience of millions of readers, viewers, researchers, and buyers. Any person or organization with a computer connected to the Internet can 'publish' information." Id. at 853.

Internet access unless it installs software to block images that constitute obscenity or child pornography, and to prevent minors from obtaining access to material that is harmful to them."[25]

More recently, in Packingham v. North Carolina, the Court appeared to equate the internet to traditional public forums like a street or public park. Specifically, Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the Court, observed that, "[w]hile in the past there may have been difficulty in identifying the most important places (in a spatial sense) for the exchange of views, today the answer is clear. It is cyberspace—the 'vast democratic forums of the Internet' in general, and social media in particular."[26] Consequently, the Court struck down a North Carolina law making it a felony for registered sex offenders to use commercial social networking websites that allow minor children to be members, such as Facebook. Applying strict scrutiny, the Court held that the North Carolina law impermissibly restricted lawful speech as it was not narrowly tailored to serve the government's interest in protecting minors from registered sex offenders because it "foreclose[d] access to social media altogether," thereby "prevent[ing] the user from engaging in the legitimate exercise of First Amendment rights."[27]

Amdt1.7.7.3 Quasi-Public Places

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment precludes government restraint of expression and it does not require individuals to turn over their homes, businesses, or other property to those wishing to communicate about a particular topic.[1] But it may be that in some instances private property is so functionally akin to public property that private owners may not forbid expression upon [25] Am. Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. at 199; see also id. at 206 ("A public library does not acquire Internet terminals in order to create a public forum for Web publishers to express themselves, any more than it collects books in order to provide a public forum for the authors of books to speak.").

---

[26] Packingham v. North Carolina, No. 15-1194, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 19, 2017) (quoting Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 at 868); see also id. at 6 ("This case is one of the first this Court has taken to address the relationship between the First Amendment and the modern Internet. As a result, the Court must exercise extreme caution before suggesting that the First Amendment provides scant protection for access to vast networks in that medium.").

[27] Id. at 6, 8; see id. at 7 ("[G]iven the broad wording of the North Carolina statute at issue, it might well bar access not only to commonplace social media websites but also to websites as varied as Amazon.com, Washingtonpost.com, and Webmd.com."). The Court was careful to point out, however, that its opinion should not be read as barring states from enacting laws more specific than that of North Carolina, noting that "[s]pecific criminal acts are not protected speech even if speech is the means for their commission." Id. (citing Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447–49 (1969)). Indeed, "it can be assumed that the First Amendment permits a State to enact specific, narrowly tailored laws that prohibit a sex offender from engaging in conduct that often presages a sexual crime, like contacting a minor or using a website to gather information about a minor." Id.

[1] In Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U.S. 157, 185, 201–07 (1961), Justice John Harlan, concurring, would have reversed breach of the peace convictions of "sit-in" demonstrators who conducted their sit-in at lunch counters of department stores. He asserted that the protesters were sitting at the lunch counters where they knew they would not be served in order to demonstrate that segregation at such counters existed. "Such a demonstration. . .is as much a part of the 'free trade in ideas'. . .as is verbal expression, more commonly thought of as 'speech.'" Conviction for breach of peace was void in the absence of a clear and present danger of disorder. The Justice would not, however, protect "demonstrations conducted on private property over the objection of the owner. . . just as it would surely not encompass verbal expression in a private home if the owner has not consented." He had read the record to indicate that the demonstrators were invitees in the stores and that they had never been asked to leave by the owners or managers. See also Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988) (government may protect residential privacy by prohibiting altogether picketing that targets a single residence).

it. In Marsh v. Alabama,[2] the Court held that the private owner of a company town could not forbid distribution of religious materials by a Jehovah's Witness on a street in the town's business district. The town, wholly owned by a private corporation, had all the attributes of any American municipality, aside from its ownership, and was functionally like any other town. In those circumstances, the Court reasoned, "the more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it."[3] This precedent lay unused for some twenty years until the Court first indicated a substantial expansion of it, and then withdrew to a narrow interpretation.

First, in Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza,[4] the Court held constitutionally protected the picketing of a store located in a shopping center by a union objecting to the store's employment of nonunion labor. Finding that the shopping center was the functional equivalent of the business district involved in Marsh, the Court announced there was "no reason why access to a business district in a company town for the purpose of exercising First Amendment rights should be constitutionally required, while access for the same purpose to property functioning as a business district should be limited simply because the property surrounding the 'business district' is not under the same ownership."[5] "[T]he State," said Justice Thurgood Marshall, "may not delegate the power, through the use of its trespass laws, wholly to exclude those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put."[6] The Court observed that it would have been hazardous to attempt to distribute literature at the entrances to the center, and it reserved for future decision "whether respondents' property rights could, consistently with the First Amendment, justify a bar on picketing which was not thus directly related in its purpose to the use to which the shopping center property was being put."[7]

Four years later, the Court answered the reserved question in the negative.[8] Several members of an antiwar group had attempted to distribute leaflets on the mall of a large shopping center, calling on the public to attend a protest meeting. Center guards invoked a trespass law against them, and the Court held that they could rightfully be excluded. The center had not dedicated its property to a public use, the Court said; rather, it had invited the public in specifically to conduct business with those stores located in the center. Plaintiffs' leafleting, not directed to any store or to the customers qua customers of any of the stores, was unrelated to any activity in the center. Unlike the situation in Logan Valley Plaza, there were reasonable alternatives by which plaintiffs could reach those who used the center. Thus, in the absence of a relationship between the purpose of the expressive activity and the business of the shopping center, the property rights of the center owner will overbalance the expressive rights to persons who would use their property to communicate.

Then, the Court formally overruled Logan Valley Plaza, holding that shopping centers are not functionally equivalent to the company town involved in Marsh.[9] Suburban malls may be

[2] 326 U.S. 501 (1946).

[3] 326 U.S. at 506.

[4] Amalgamated Food Emps. Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968).

[5] 391 U.S. at 319. Justices Hugo Black, John Harlan, and Byron White dissented. Id. at 327, 333, 337.

[6] 391 U.S. at 319–20.

[7] 391 U.S. at 320 n.9.

[8] Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972).

[9] Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976). Justice Potter Stewart's opinion for the Court asserted that Logan Valley had in fact been overruled by Lloyd Corp., 424 U.S. at 517–18, but Justice Lewis Powell, the author of the Lloyd Corp. opinion, did not believe that to be the case, id. at 523.

the "new town squares" in the view of sociologists, but they are private property in the eye of the law. The ruling came in a case in which a union of employees engaged in an economic strike against one store in a shopping center was barred from picketing the store within the mall. The rights of employees in such a situation are generally to be governed by federal labor laws[10] rather than the First Amendment, although there is also the possibility that state constitutional provisions may be interpreted more expansively by state courts to protect some kinds of public issue picketing in shopping centers and similar places.[11] Henceforth, only when private property "'has taken on all the attributes of a town'" is it to be treated as a public forum.[12]

Amdt1.7.8 Role of Government

Amdt1.7.8.1 Overview of Government Roles

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has granted the government more allowance to control speech in certain contexts where the government is the speaker, or the government otherwise has a valid interest in regulating speech in order to perform certain functions like operating schools or prisons. For example, the government has an interest in educating children free from distractions. In the context of these special government roles, the government may impose some restrictions on expression to achieve its legitimate objectives, but if the regulation goes too far, it will violate the First Amendment.[1]

This idea of granting deference to the government when it performs certain functions is related to the idea that certain individuals—such as members of the military—stand in a distinct relationship with the government.[2] To take another example, government employers have some leeway to control their employees' words and actions similar to private employers, both because those employees stand in a distinct relationship with the government and [10] But see Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180 (1978).

[11] In PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980), the Court held that a state court interpretation of the state constitution to protect picketing in a privately owned shopping center did not deny the property owner any federal constitutional rights. But cf. Pacific Gas & Elec. v. Public Utils. Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1 (1986) (holding that a state may not require a privately owned utility company to include in its billing envelopes views of a consumer group with which it disagrees, a majority of Justices distinguishing PruneYard as not involving such forced association with others' beliefs).

[12] Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 516–17 (1976) (quoting Justice Hugo Black's dissent in Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308, 332–33 (1968)).

[1] The Court has distinguished content-based regulations—regulations that are imposed because the government disapproves of the content of particular expression—from content-neutral regulations—regulations that serve legitimate governmental interests and do not discriminate based on speech's content. Compare Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972); Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205 (1975); and Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970), with Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1976); Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973); and United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). Content-based regulations are subject to strict scrutiny, but content-neutral regulations are subject to lesser scrutiny. See Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech.

[2] See, e.g., Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 758 (1974) ("While the members of the military are not excluded from the protection granted by the First Amendment, the different character of the military community and of the military mission requires a different application of those protections. The fundamental necessity for obedience, and the consequent necessity for imposition of discipline, may render permissible within the military that which would be constitutionally impermissible outside it.").

because the government has a valid interest in efficiently providing public services.[3] The issue of public employee speech is discussed in a subsequent series of essays, but it is similarly premised on the concept of government's legitimate interests in performing certain functions.[4]

Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

As an outgrowth of the government subsidy cases, such as Rust v. Sullivan,[1] the Court has established the "government speech doctrine" that recognizes that a government entity "is entitled to say what it wishes"[2] and to select the views that it wants to express.[3] In this vein, when the government speaks, the government is not barred by the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment from determining the content of what it says and can engage in viewpoint discrimination.[4] The underlying rationale for the government speech doctrine is that the government could not "function" if the government could not favor or disfavor points of view in enforcing a program.[5] And the Supreme Court has recognized that the government speech doctrine even extends to when the government receives private assistance in helping deliver a government controlled message.[6] As a consequence, the Court, relying on the government speech doctrine, has rejected First Amendment challenges to (1) regulations prohibiting recipients of government funds from advocating, counseling, or referring patients for abortion;[7] (2) disciplinary actions taken as a result of statements made by public employees pursuant to their official duties;[8] (3) mandatory assessments made against cattle merchants when used to fund advertisements whose message was controlled by the government;[9] (4) a city's decision to reject a monument for placement in a public park;[10] and (5) a state's decision to reject a design for a specialty license plate for an automobile.[11]

A central issue prompted by the government speech doctrine is determining when speech is that of the government, which can be difficult when the government utilizes or relies on private parties to relay a particular message. In Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association, the Court held that the First Amendment did not prohibit the compelled subsidization of

---

[3] See, e.g., Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 418 (2006).

[4] See Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths, Amdt1.7.9.2 Political Activities and Government Employees, Amdt1.7.9.3 Honoraria and Government Employees, and Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

[1] 500 U.S. 173 (1991).

[2] Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995).

[3] Id. at 833. Accord, e.g., Shurtleff v. Boston, No. 20-1800 (U.S. May 2, 2022).

[4] See Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, 555 U.S. 460, 467–68 (2009). Nonetheless, while the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause has no applicability with regard to government speech, other constitutional provisions—such as the Equal Protection principles of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments—may constrain what the government can say. Id. at 468–69.

[5] See id. at 468 ("Indeed, it is not easy to imagine how government could function if it lacked this freedom.").

[6] See Johanns v. Livestock Mktg. Ass'n, 544 U.S. 550, 562 (2005).

[7] See Rust, 500 U.S. at 194.

[8] See Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 421–22 (2006).

[9] See Livestock Mktg. Ass'n, 544 U.S. at 562.

[10] See Pleasant Grove City, 555 U.S. at 472.

[11] See Walker v. Tex. Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 576 U.S. 200, 203 (2015).

advertisements promoting the sale of beef because the underlying message of the advertisements was "effectively controlled" by the government.[12]

The line can also be blurred when "a government invites the people to participate in a program," such as when the government opens up its property for use by private speakers.[13] In Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, the Court shifted from an exclusive focus on the "effective control" test in holding that "permanent monuments displayed on public property," even when provided by private parties, generally "represent government speech."[14] In so concluding, the Court relied not only on the fact that a government, in selecting monuments for display in a park, generally exercises "effective control" and has "final approval authority" over the monument, but also on (1) the government's long history of "us[ing] monuments to speak for the public"; and (2) the public's common understanding as to monuments and their role in conveying a message from the government.[15] In Walker v. Texas Division, Sons of Confederate Veterans, the Court relied on the same analysis used in Pleasant Grove City to conclude that the State of Texas, in approving privately crafted designs for specialty license plates, could reject designs the state found offensive without running afoul of the Free Speech Clause.[16] Specifically, the Walker Court held that license plate designs amounted to government speech because (1) states historically used license plates to convey government messages; (2) the public closely identifies license plate designs with the state; and (3) the State of Texas maintained effective control over the messages conveyed on its specialty license plates.[17]

By contrast, in Shurtleff v. Boston, the Supreme Court concluded that private flags flown at a city hall plaza did not qualify as government speech.[18] While "the history of flag flying. . . at the seat of government" suggested such flags usually conveyed governmental messages, other factors specific to the city program pointed the other way.[19] Given that the city sometimes flew its own flags but regularly let private groups use the flagpole, the Court suggested the evidence was inconclusive on public perceptions.[20] The critical inquiry was government control: the Court concluded that the city exercised no active control over the flag raisings or the messages of the flags.[21] While the city might have exercised control over scheduling or physical maintenance, there was no evidence it had ever reviewed the flags or denied a group's request, prior to the denial that formed the basis of the lawsuit.[22] Accordingly, while Shurtleff looked to multiple factors to analyze whether the flags were government speech, effective control was "the most salient" factor in the case.[23]

In 2017's Matal v. Tam, the Supreme Court looked at a different type of activity to hold that trademarks do not constitute government speech, concluding that it is "far-fetched to suggest [12] See Livestock Mktg. Ass'n, 544 U.S. at 560.

[13] Shurtleff v. Boston, No. 20-1800, slip op. at 5 (U.S. May 2, 2022). In this context, the government speech doctrine sometimes overlaps with the public forum doctrine, discussed in Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum, in determining whether the speech is governmental or private.

[14] See Pleasant Grove City, 555 U.S. at 470.

[15] Id. at 470–73.

[16] See Walker, 576 U.S. at 203–04.

[17] See id. at 210–13. Accord Shurtleff, slip op. at 6 ("Our past cases have looked to several types of evidence to guide the analysis, including: the history of the expression at issue; the public's likely perception as to who (the government or a private person) is speaking; and the extent to which the government has actively shaped or controlled the expression.").

[18] Shurtleff, slip op. at 12.

[19] Id. at 7–9.

[20] Id. at 9.

[21] Id.

[22] Id. at 10–11.

[23] Id. at 10.

that the content of a registered mark is government speech."[24] The Court distinguished trademarks from the license plates at issue in Walker, a case the Court stated "likely marks the outer bounds of the government-speech doctrine."[25] First, the Court noted that, unlike license plates, trademarks do not have a history of use to convey messages by the government.[26] Second, the Court further reasoned that the government does not maintain direct control over the messages conveyed in trademarks—indeed, "[t]he Federal Government does not dream up these marks, and it does not edit marks submitted for registration."[27] And third, the public, according to the Tam Court, does not closely identify trademarks with the government.[28] Thus, while Tam demonstrates the Court's continuing reliance on the multi-factor test for determining government speech from Walker and Summum, that test is not so flexible as to allow for expression like trademarks to be deemed the speech of the government.

In both Shurtleff and Tam, the Supreme Court held that because the flags and trademarks were not government speech, the government had acted unconstitutionally by creating viewpoint-based distinctions.[29] In Shurtleff, the Court noted that the city had made the plaza with the flagpole available to the public and had itself described that plaza as a public forum.[30] Accordingly, after ruling that the flags were "private, not government, speech," the Court held that the city had violated the Free Speech Clause by excluding a flag based on its religious viewpoint.[31] Although the Court's opinions in Tam did not clearly agree on whether public forum analysis applied,[32] a majority nonetheless ruled that the federal law barring disparaging trademarks entailed unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination.[33]

Amdt1.7.8.3 School Free Speech and Government as Educator

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Although the Supreme Court had previously held that students in public schools are entitled to some constitutional protection,[1] as are minors generally,[2] it established the controlling standard for assessing First Amendment rights in the school environment in [24] Matal v. Tam, No. 15-1293, slip op. at 14 (U.S. June 19, 2017).

[25] Id. at 17–18 ("Trademarks are private, not government, speech.")

[26] Id.

[27] Id. at 2.

[28] Id. at 17.

[29] Shurtleff v. Boston, No. 20-1800, slip op. at 2 (U.S. May 2, 2022); Tam, (plurality opinion); id. at 1 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

[30] Shurtleff, slip op. at 3; see also id. at 2 (describing the legal question as whether the flagpole was government speech or instead open for citizens' views).

[31] Id. at 12.

[32] Cf. Tam, slip op. at 22 (plurality opinion) (saying limited public forum cases were "potentially. . .analogous").

[33] Id.; id. at 1 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

[1] See, e.g., West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925).

[2] In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967). Children are subject to some restrictions that could not constitutionally be applied to adults. E.g., Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968) (upholding state law restricting access to certain material deemed "harmful to minors," although not obscene as to adults).

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.[3] In that case, the Court articulated a need to balance students' First Amendment protections with the goals and needs of educators and the community.

In Tinker, high school principals had banned students from wearing black armbands as a symbol of protest against the United States' actions in Vietnam.[4] Reversing the lower courts' refusal to reinstate students who had been suspended for violating the ban, the Court set out a balancing test for applying the First Amendment in schools.[5] According to the Court, "First Amendment rights, applied in light of the special characteristics of the school environment, are available to teachers and students," and neither students nor teachers "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate."[6] Notwithstanding these protections, the Court affirmed the comprehensive authority of the states and of school officials, consistent with fundamental constitutional safeguards, "to prescribe and control conduct in the schools."[7] On balance, therefore, school authorities may restrict expression to prevent disruption of school activities or discipline,[8] but such restrictions must be justified by "something more than a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint."[9]

The Court reaffirmed Tinker in Healy v. James, finding no basis to believe that, "First Amendment protections should apply with less force on college campuses than in the community at large."[10] In Healy, the Court held that students' rights of association, implicit in the First Amendment, were violated when a public college denied a student group official recognition as a campus organization.[11] Denying recognition, the Court held, was impermissible if it was based on factors such as the student organization's affiliation with the national Students for a Democratic Society, on disagreement with the organization's philosophy, or on an unfounded fear of disruption.[12] The Court suggested that how courts strike the balance under the Tinker inquiry may differ depending on the students' ages. The Court emphasized that "[t]he college classroom with its surrounding environs is peculiarly the 'marketplace of ideas,'" but also concluded that a college administration may require "that a group seeking official recognition affirm in advance its willingness to adhere to reasonable campus law."[13]

In 1982, the Court faced a conflict between a school system's obligation to inculcate community values in students and the free-speech rights of those students. In Board of Education v. Pico, the Court considered a case challenging a school board's authority to remove

---

[3] 393 U.S. 503 (1969).

[4] Id. at 504

[5] Id. at 514.

[6] Id. at 506.

[7] Id. at 507.

[8] Id.

[9] Id. at 509 (citing Burnside v. Byars, 363 F.2d 744, 749 (5th Cir. 1966)). See also Papish v. Bd. of Curators, 410 U.S. 667 (1973) (state university could not expel a student for using "indecent speech" in campus newspaper); but cf. Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986) (upholding two-day suspension, and withdrawal of privilege of speaking at graduation, for student who used sexual metaphor in speech given to high school assembly).

[10] 408 U.S. 169 (1972).

[11] Id. at 180.

[12] Id. at 187–90.

[13] Id. at 193. Because a First Amendment right was in issue, the college had the burden to justify rejecting a request for recognition rather than the requesters to justify affirmatively their right to be recognized. Id. at 184. See also Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972) (upholding an anti-noise ordinance that forbade persons on grounds adjacent to a school to willfully make noise or to create any other diversion during school hours that "disturbs or tends to disturb" normal school activities).

certain books from high school and junior high school libraries.[14] The procedural posture of the case required the Court to assume that the books were removed because the school board disagreed with the books' content for political reasons.[15] A plurality of the Court thought that students retained substantial free-speech protections and that among these was the right to receive information and ideas.[16] Although the plurality conceded that school boards must be permitted "to establish and apply their curriculum in such a way as to transmit community values," and that "there is a legitimate and substantial community interest in promoting respect for authority and traditional values be they social, moral, or political," it reasoned that a school board was constitutionally prohibited from removing library books in order to deny access to political ideas with which the board disagreed.[17] The four dissenters argued that the Constitution did not prevent the school board from expressing community values in this way regardless of its motivation.[18]

The Court struck a different balance between student freedom and educator authority in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier,[19] in which it relied on public forum analysis to hold that editorial control and censorship of a student newspaper sponsored by a public high school need be only "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."[20] The Court distinguished the facts of Kuhlmeier from Tinker, explaining that "[t]he question whether the First Amendment requires a school to tolerate particular student speech—the question that we addressed in Tinker—-is different from the question whether the First Amendment requires a school affirmatively to promote particular student speech."[21] The student newspaper at issue had been created by school officials as a part of the school curriculum, and served "as a supervised learning experience for journalism students."[22] Because the newspaper was not a public forum, school officials could maintain editorial control so long as their actions were "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."[23] Thus, a principal's decision to remove an article describing student pregnancy in a manner believed inappropriate for younger students, and another article on divorce critical of a named parent, were upheld.[24]

In Morse v. Frederick,[25] the Court held that a school could punish a pupil for displaying a banner that said, "BONG HiTS 4 JESUS" at a school-sponsored event even absent evidence [14] Bd. of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982).

[15] Id. at 872.

[16] Id. at 866–67.

[17] Id. at 862, 864–69, 870–72. Justices Thurgood Marshall and John Paul Stevens joined Justice William Brennan's opinion fully. Justice Harry Blackmun believed "that certain forms of state discrimination between ideas are improper" and agreed that the government "may not act to deny access to an idea simply because state officials disapprove of that idea for partisan or political reasons." Id. at 878–79 (Blackmun, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). Justice Byron White provided the fifth vote for reversal, and he would have avoided "a dissertation" on the First Amendment issue. Id. at 883 (White, J., concurring in the judgment). Instead, he voted to reverse the trial court's grant of summary judgment based on an unresolved factual issue going to the reasons for the school board's removal. Id.

[18] Justice William Rehnquist wrote the principal dissent. Id. at 904 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). See also id. at 885 (Burger, C.J., dissenting), 893 (Powell, J., dissenting), 921 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

[19] 484 U.S. 260 (1988).

[20] Id. at 273.

[21] Id. at 270–71.

[22] Id. at 270.

[23] Id. at 273.

[24] Id. at 276.

[25] 551 U.S. 393 (2007).

the banner caused substantial disruption.[26] The Court reasoned that schools "may take steps to safeguard those entrusted to their care from speech that can reasonably be regarded as encouraging illegal drug use,"[27] but indicated that it might have reached a different result if the banner had addressed the issue of "the criminalization of drug use or possession."[28] In his concurrence, Justice Samuel Alito commented that the Court's opinion "provides no support for any restriction on speech that can plausibly be interpreted as commenting on any political or social issue."[29]

While the Kuhlmeier and Morse cases focused on applying Tinker to on-campus speech, the Court addressed Tinker's application to off-campus speech in its 2021 Mahanoy Area School District v. B.L. decision.[30] In Mahanoy, the Court held that while public schools may have a special interest in some off-campus student speech, there are several features of off-campus speech that diminish "the unique educational characteristics that might call for the special First Amendment leeway" to regulate speech that Tinker provided.[31] The Court identified three distinguishing characteristics of off-campus speech that the Court reasoned made the Tinker standards less applicable.[32] First, off-campus speech, in some circumstances, should fall within the zone of parental, rather than school officials', responsibility.[33] Second, the Court reasoned that allowing schools to regulate off-campus speech would provide an opportunity to regulate student speech 24 hours a day, which may, in effect, chill students' protected speech.[34] Third, the Court emphasized that while a school does have authority to regulate speech that interrupts the school's work,[35] schools also have an interest in protecting students' unpopular expressions, as America's public schools are "the nurseries of democracy."[36] Although the Court recognized that some off-campus speech—-such as severe bullying, threats, or participation in online school activities—may require school regulation, it was hesitant to establish any clear general rules about what constitutes off-campus speech.[37] In light of these considerations, the Court held that a school could not regulate a student's social media posts that criticized the school because the circumstances of the speech—the fact that the posts were made at an off-campus convenience store on a personal cellphone to a limited group of people and did not name the specific school or school authorities—diminished the school's interest in regulation.[38]

The line of cases from Tinker to Mahanoy address the First Amendment rights of school and university students. Teachers and other employees of schools also have rights, but those rights are generally analyzed under rules that apply to the government as an employer.[39]

---

[26] Id. at 401.

[27] Id. at 397.

[28] Id. at 403.

[29] Id. at 422.

[30] No. 20-255 (U.S. June 23, 2021).

[31] Id. at 5–7.

[32] Id. at 7.

[33] Id.

[34] Id.

[35] The Court also reiterated that, pursuant to Tinker, schools have a "special interest in regulating speech that 'materially disrupts classwork or involves substantial disorder or invasion of the rights of others.'" Id.

[36] Id.

[37] Id. at 5–6.

[38] Id. at 7–8.

[39] See, e.g., Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S., 589 (1967). See also Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths, Amdt1.7.9.2 Political Activities and Government Employees, Amdt1.7.9.3 Honoraria and Government Employees, and Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech.

Amdt1.7.8.4 Prison Free Speech and Government as Prison Administrator

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

A prison inmate retains only those First Amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system.[1] The Supreme Court has recognized that the government has legitimate interests in preserving internal prison order and discipline, maintaining of institutional security against escape or unauthorized entry, and rehabilitating prisoners.[2] In applying these general standards, the Court initially seemed to arrive at somewhat divergent points in assessing prison restrictions on mail and on face-to-face news interviews between reporters and prisoners. Later cases took a more deferential approach to restrictions on both, and the Court walked back language in earlier rulings that suggested heightened scrutiny applied in assessing restrictions on inmates' mail.

In Procunier v. Martinez,[3] the Court invalidated mail censorship regulations that permitted authorities to hold back or to censor mail to and from prisoners whenever they thought that the letters "unduly complain," express "inflammatory . . . views," or were "defamatory" or "otherwise inappropriate."[4] The Court based this ruling not on the rights of the prisoner, but instead on the outsider's right to communicate with the prisoner either by sending or by receiving mail. Under this framework, the Court held, mail regulation must further an important interest unrelated to suppressing expression; regulation must be shown to further the substantial interest of security, order, and rehabilitation; and regulation must not be used simply to censor opinions or other expressions. Further, a restriction must be no greater than is necessary to protecting particular government interest involved.

In Turner v. Safley,[5] however, the Court held that a standard that is more deferential to the government applies when the free speech rights only of inmates are at stake. In upholding a Missouri restriction on correspondence between inmates at different institutions, while striking down a prohibition on inmate marriages absent a compelling reason such as

---

[1] Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822 (1974). The Supreme Court has applied this same deferential review to the assessment of neutral regulations inhibiting religious exercise. See Amdt1.4.3.5 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice Regulating Prisons and the Military. In a related, but distinct context, however, state laws that restrict the First Amendment rights of former prisoners that are still under the supervision of the state may trigger strict scrutiny. For example, in Packingham v. North Carolina, the Court struck down a North Carolina law making it a felony for registered sex offenders to use commercial social networking websites that allow minor children to be members, such as Facebook. 582 U.S. ___, No. 15-1194, slip op. (2017). The Court held that the North Carolina law impermissibly restricted lawful speech because it was not narrowly tailored to serve the significant government interest in protecting minors from registered sex offenders. Id. at 8 (holding that it was "unsettling to suggest that only a limited set of websites can be used even by persons who have completed their sentences.").

[2] Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 412 (1974). The Court later clarified that to the extent Martinez suggested a "categorical discrimination between incoming correspondence from prisoners (to which we applied a reasonableness standard . . .) and incoming correspondence from nonprisoners" (to which Martinez suggested the Court might have applied a heightened standard), those aspects of the decision were overruled. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 413–14 (1989).

[3] 416 U.S. 396 (1974). But see Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Union, 433 U.S. 119 (1977), in which the Court sustained prison regulations barring solicitation of prisoners by other prisoners to join a union, banning union meetings, and denying bulk mailings concerning the union from outside sources. The reasonable fears of correctional officers that organizational activities of the sort advocated by the union could impair discipline and lead to possible disorders justified the regulations.

[4] 416 U.S. at 396.

[5] 482 U.S. 78 (1987).

pregnancy or birth of a child, the Court announced the appropriate standard: "[W]hen a regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."[6] Four factors "are relevant in determining the reasonableness of a regulation at issue,"[7] the Court explained:

> First, is there a valid, rational connection between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest put forward to justify it? Second, are there alternative means of exercising the right that remain open to prison inmates? Third, what impact will accommodation of the asserted constitutional right . . . have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally? And, fourth, are ready alternatives for furthering the governmental interest available?[8]

Two years after Turner v. Safley, in Thornburgh v. Abbott, the Court restricted Procunier v. Martinez to regulating outgoing correspondence, finding that the needs of prison security justify a more deferential standard for prison regulations restricting incoming material, whether those incoming materials are correspondence from other prisoners, correspondence from nonprisoners, or outside publications.[9]

In Beard v. Banks, a plurality of the Supreme Court upheld "a Pennsylvania prison policy that 'denies newspapers, magazines, and photographs' to a group of specially dangerous and recalcitrant inmates."[10] These inmates were housed in Pennsylvania's Long Term Segregation Unit and one of the prison's penological rationales for its policy, which the plurality found to satisfy the four Turner factors, was to motivate better behavior on the part of the prisoners by providing them with an incentive to move back to the regular prison population.[11] Applying the four Turner factors to this rationale, the plurality found that (1) there was a logical connection between depriving inmates of newspapers and magazines and providing an incentive to improve behavior; (2) the Policy provided no alternatives to the deprivation of newspapers and magazines, but this was "not 'conclusive' of the reasonableness of the Policy"; (3) the impact of accommodating the asserted constitutional right would be negative; and (4) no alternative would "fully accommodate the prisoner's rights at de minimis cost to valid penological interests."[12] The plurality believed that its "real task in this case is not balancing these factors, but rather determining whether the Secretary shows more than simply a logical relation, that is, whether he shows a reasonable relation" between the policy and legitimate penological objections, as Turner requires.[13] The plurality concluded that he had. Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia concurred in the result but would eliminate the Turner factors because they believe that "States are free to define and redefine all types of punishment, [6] 482 U.S. at 89. In Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126 (2003), the Court applied Turner to uphold various restrictions on visitation by children and by former inmates, and on all visitation except attorneys and members of the clergy for inmates with two or more substance-abuse violations; an inmate subject to the latter restriction could apply for reinstatement of visitation privileges after two years. "If the withdrawal of all visitation privileges were permanent or for a much longer period, or if it were applied in an arbitrary manner to a particular inmate, the case would present different considerations." Id. at 137.

---

[7] 482 U.S. at 89.

[8] Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 529 (2006) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted; this quotation quotes language from Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. at 89–90).

[9] 490 U.S. 401, 411–14 (1989). Thornburgh v. Abbott noted that, if regulations deny prisoners publications on the basis of their content, but the grounds on which the regulations do so is content-neutral (for example, to protect prison security), then the regulations will be deemed neutral. Id. at 415–16.

[10] 548 U.S. 521, 524–25 (2006). This was a 4-2-2 decision, with Justice Samuel Alito, who had written the court of appeals decision, not participating.

[11] 548 U.S. at 531.

[12] 548 U.S. at 531–32.

[13] 548 U.S. at 533.

including imprisonment, to encompass various types of deprivation—provided only that those deprivations are consistent with the Eighth Amendment."[14]

Only two months after Procunier v. Martinez, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to regulations barring face-to-face media interviews with specific inmates.[15] Prison restrictions on such interviews implicate the First Amendment rights of prisoners, the Court held, but such rights must be balanced against "the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system" and "internal security within the corrections facilities," taking into account available alternative means of communications, such as mail and "limited visits from members of [prisoners'] families, the clergy, their attorneys, and friends of prior acquaintance."[16]

While reaffirming "news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections,"[17] the Court held that the First Amendment did not impose on the government any affirmative obligation "to accord the press special access to information not shared by members of the public generally."[18] In Houchins v. KQED,[19] a broadcaster sued for access to a prison from which public and press alike were barred and as to which there was considerable controversy over conditions of incarceration. Following initiation of the suit, the administrator of the prison authorized limited public tours. The tours were open to the press, but cameras and recording devices were not permitted, there was no opportunity to talk to inmates, and the tours did not include the maximum security area about which much of the controversy centered. The Supreme Court overturned the injunction obtained in the lower courts, the plurality reiterating that the First Amendment does not "mandate[ ] a right of access to government information or sources of information within the government's control," and "until the political branches decree otherwise . . . the media have no special right of access to the Alameda County Jail different from or greater than that accorded the public generally."[20] Justice Potter Stewart, whose vote was necessary to the disposition of the case, agreed with the equal access holding but would have allowed the trial court to craft an injunction more narrowly drawn to protect the press's right to use cameras and recorders so as to enlarge public access to the information.[21]

---

[14] 548 U.S. at 537 (Thomas, J., concurring), quoting Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. at 139 (Thomas, J., concurring) (emphasis originally in Overton).

[15] Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974).

[16] 417 U.S. at 822–25.

[17] Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 707 (1972), quoted in Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 833 (1974).

[18] 417 U.S. at 834. The holding was applied to federal prisons in Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 843 (1974).

[19] Houchins v. KQED,438 U.S. 1, 17 (1978). In this case, there was no majority opinion of the Court. A plurality opinion represented the views of only three Justices; two Justices did not participate, three Justices dissented, and one Justice concurred with views that departed somewhat from the plurality.

[20] 438 U.S. at 15–16.

[21] 438 U.S. at 18–19 (Stewart, J., concurring in the judgment).

Amdt1.7.9 Public Employee Speech and Government as Employer

Amdt1.7.9.1 Loyalty Oaths

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

An area in which significant First Amendment issues are often raised is the establishment of loyalty-security standards for government employees. Such programs generally take one of two forms or may combine the two. First, government may establish a system investigating employees or prospective employees under standards relating to presumed loyalty. Second, government may require its employees or prospective employees to subscribe to a loyalty oath disclaiming belief in or advocacy of, or membership in an organization that stands for or advocates unlawful or disloyal action.

Following the Civil War, the state and federal governments adopted test oaths, which the Supreme Court generally voided as ex post facto laws and bills of attainder.[1] Accepting the state court construction that the law required each candidate to "make oath that he is not a person who is engaged 'in one way or another in the attempt to overthrow the government by force or violence,' and that he is not knowingly a member of an organization engaged in such an attempt," the Court unanimously sustained the provision in a one-paragraph per curiam opinion.[2] Less than two months later, the Court upheld a requirement that employees take an oath that they had not within a prescribed period advised, advocated, or taught the overthrow of government by unlawful means, nor been a member of an organization, with similar objectives; every employee was also required to swear that he was not and had not been a member of the Communist Party.[3] Writing for the Court, Justice Tom Clark perceived no problem with the inquiry into Communist Party membership but cautioned that no issue had been raised whether an employee who was or had been a member could be discharged merely for that reason.[4] With regard to the oath, the Court did not discuss First Amendment considerations but stressed that it believed the appropriate authorities would not construe the oath adversely against persons who were innocent of an organization's purpose during their affiliation, who had severed their associations upon knowledge of an organization's purposes, or who had been members of an organization at a time when it was not unlawfully engaged.[5] Otherwise, the oath requirement was valid as "a reasonable regulation to protect the municipal service by establishing an employment qualification of loyalty" and as being "reasonably designed to protect the integrity and competency of the service."[6] [1] Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 277 (1867); Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 333 (1867).

---

[2] Gerende v. Board of Supervisors of Elections, 341 U.S. 56 (1951). In Indiana Communist Party v. Whitcomb, 414 U.S. 441 (1974), a requirement that parties and candidates seeking ballot space subscribe to a similar oath was voided because the oath's language did not comport with the advocacy standards of Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Four Justices concurred more narrowly. 414 U.S. at 452 n.3. See also Whitcomb v. Communist Party of Indiana, 410 U.S. 976 (1973).

[3] Garner v. Board of Pub. Works, 341 U.S. 716 (1951). Justice Felix Frankfurter dissented in part on First Amendment grounds, id. at 724, Justice Harold Burton dissented in part, id. at 729, and Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented completely, on bill of attainder grounds, id. at 731.

[4] Id. at 720. Justices Felix Frankfurter and Burton agreed with this ruling. Id. at 725–26, 729–30.

[5] Id. at 723–24.

[6] 341 U.S. at 720–21. Justice Felix Frankfurter objected that the oath placed upon the takers the burden of assuring themselves that every organization to which they belonged or had been affiliated with for a substantial period of time had not engaged in forbidden advocacy.

Amdt1.7.9.1
Loyalty Oaths

In the following Term, the Court sustained in Adler v. Board of Education a state statute disqualifying for government employment persons who advocated the overthrow of government by force or violence or persons who were members of organizations that so advocated.[7] The statute had been supplemented by a provision applicable to teachers calling for the drawing up of a list of organizations that advocated violent overthrow and making membership in any listed organization prima facie evidence of disqualification. Justice Sherman Minton observed that everyone had a right to assemble, speak, think, and believe as he pleased, but had no right to work for the state in its public school system except upon compliance with the state's reasonable terms. He stated: "If they do not choose to work on such terms, they are at liberty to retain their beliefs and associations and go elsewhere. Has the State thus deprived them of any right to free speech or assembly? We think not."[8] A state could deny employment based on a person's advocacy of overthrow of the government by force or violence or based on unexplained membership in an organization so advocating with knowledge of the advocacy.[9] With regard to the required list, the Justice observed that the state courts had interpreted the law to provide that a person could rebut the presumption attached to his mere membership.[10]

The same year, the Court invalidated an oath requirement, addressed to membership in the Communist Party and other proscribed organizations, which the state courts had interpreted to disqualify from employment "solely on the basis of organizational membership."[11] Stressing that membership might be innocent, that one might be unaware of an organization's aims, or that he might have severed a relationship upon learning of its aims, the Court struck the law down; one must be or have been a member with knowledge of illegal aims.[12] But subsequent cases reiterated the power of governmental agencies to inquire into the associational relationships of their employees for purposes of determining fitness and upheld dismissals for refusal to answer relevant questions.[13] In Shelton v. Tucker,[14] however, a 5-4 majority held that, although a state could inquire into the fitness and competence of its teachers, a requirement that every teacher annually list every organization to which he belonged or had belonged in the previous five years was invalid because it was too broad, bore no rational relationship to the state's interests, and had a considerable potential for abuse.

The Court relied on vagueness when loyalty oaths aimed at "subversives" next came before it. In Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction,[15] it unanimously held an oath too vague that required one to swear, among other things, that "I have not and will not lend my aid, support, advice, counsel or influence to the Communist Party." Similarly, in Baggett v. Bullitt,[16] the Court struck down two oaths, one requiring teachers to swear that they "will by precept and example promote respect for the flag and the institutions of the United States of America and [7] Adler v. Board of Educ., 342 U.S. 485 (1952).

---

[8] 342 U.S. at 492.

[9] Id.

[10] Id. at 494–96.

[11] Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 190 (1952).

[12] Id. at 190–91.

[13] Beilan v. Board of Education, 357 U.S. 399 (1958); Lerner v. Casey, 357 U.S. 468 (1958); Nelson v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 362 U.S. 1 (1960). Compare Slochower v. Bd. of Higher Educ., 350 U.S. 551 (1956). For the self-incrimination aspects of these cases, see Amdt5.4.3 General Protections Against Self-Incrimination Doctrine and Practice.

[14] 364 U.S. 479 (1960). "It is not disputed that to compel a teacher to disclose his every associational tie is to impair that teacher's right of free association, a right closely allied to freedom of speech and a right which, like free speech, lies at the foundation of a free society." Id. at 485–86.

[15] 368 U.S. 278 (1961). For further proceedings on this oath, see Connell v. Higginbotham, 305 F. Supp. 445 (M.D. Fla. 1970), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 403 U.S. 207 (1971). 377 U.S. 360 (1964).

[16] 377 U.S. 360 (1964). Justices Clark and John Harlan dissented. Id. at 380.

the State of Washington, reverence for law and order and undivided allegiance to the government," and the other requiring all state employees to swear, among other things, that they would not "aid in the commission of any act intended to overthrow, destroy, or alter or assist in the overthrow, destruction, or alteration" of government. Although couched in vagueness terms, the Court's opinion stressed that the vagueness was compounded by its effect on First Amendment rights and seemed to emphasize that the state could not deny employment to one simply because he unintentionally lent indirect aid to the cause of violent overthrow by engaging in lawful activities that he knew might add to the power of persons supporting illegal overthrow.[17]

More precisely drawn oaths survived vagueness attacks but fell before First Amendment objections in the next three cases. Elfbrandt v. Russell[18] involved an oath that as supplemented would have been violated by one who "knowingly and willfully becomes or remains a member of the communist party. . . or any other organization having for its purposes the overthrow by force or violence of the government" with "knowledge of said unlawful purpose of said organization." The law's blanketing in of "knowing but guiltless" membership was invalid, wrote Justice William O. Douglas for the Court, because one could be a knowing member but not subscribe to the illegal goals of the organization; moreover, it appeared that one must also have participated in the unlawful activities of the organization before public employment could be denied.[19] Next, in Keyishian v. Board of Regents,[20] the oath provisions sustained in Adler[21] were declared unconstitutional. A number of provisions were voided as vague,[22] but the Court held invalid a new provision making Communist Party membership prima facie evidence of disqualification for employment because the opportunity to rebut the presumption was too limited. It could be rebutted only by denying membership, denying knowledge of advocacy of illegal overthrow, or denying that the organization advocates illegal overthrow. But "legislation which sanctions membership unaccompanied by specific intent to further the unlawful goals of the organization or which is not active membership violates constitutional limitations."[23] Similarly, in Whitehill v. Elkins,[24] an oath was voided because the Court thought it might include within its proscription innocent membership in an organization that advocated illegal overthrow of government.

Loyalty oath cases from the 1970s reflected the heightened constitutional protections announced in Keyishian. In Connell v. Higginbotham,[25] the Court invalidated an oath provision reading "that I do not believe in the overthrow of the Government of the United States or of the State of Florida by force or violence" because the statute provided for summary dismissal of an employee refusing to take the oath, with no opportunity to explain that refusal. Cole v. Richardson[26] upheld a clause in an oath "that I will oppose the overthrow of the government of the United States of America or of this Commonwealth by force, violence, or by any illegal or unconstitutional method" upon the construction that this clause was mere

---

[17] 377 U.S. at 369–70.

[18] 384 U.S. 11 (1966) Justices Byron White, Clark, John Harlan and Potter Stewart dissented. Id. at 20.

[19] Id. at 16, 17, 19. "Those who join an organization but do not share its unlawful purposes and who do not participate in its unlawful activities pose no threat, either as citizens or public employees." Id. at 17.

[20] 385 U.S. 589 (1967). Justices Clark, John Harlan, Potter Stewart, and Byron White dissented. Id. at 620.

[21] 342 U.S. 485 (1952).

[22] Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 597–604 (1967).

[23] Id. at 608. The statement here makes specific intent or active membership alternatives in addition to knowledge, whereas Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 19 (1966), requires both in addition to knowledge.

[24] 389 U.S. 54 (1967). Justices John Harlan, Potter Stewart, and Byron White dissented. Id. at 62.

[25] 403 U.S. 207 (1971).

[26] 405 U.S. 676, 683–84 (1972).

"repetition, whether for emphasis or cadence," of the first part of the oath, which was a valid "uphold and defend" positive oath. More broadly, as Keyishian suggests and as discussed in subsequent essays, the Court has rejected the Adler rationale that public employment may be subject to unreasonable conditions because there is no right to public employment.[27] Instead, the controlling principle now is that government may not deny employment or other benefits on a basis that infringes a person's constitutionally protected interests.[28]

Amdt1.7.9.2 Political Activities and Government Employees

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Abolition of the "spoils system" in federal employment brought with it restrictions on political activities by federal employees. In 1876, federal employees were prohibited from requesting from, giving to, or receiving from any other federal employee money for political purposes, and the Civil Service Act of 1883 more broadly forbade civil service employees to use their official authority or influence to coerce political action of any person or to interfere with elections.[1] By the Hatch Act, federal employees, and many state employees as well, are forbidden to "take any active part in political management or in political campaigns."[2] As applied through the regulations and rulings of the Office of Personnel Management, formerly the Civil Service Commission, the Act prevents employees from running for public office, distributing campaign literature, playing an active role at political meetings, circulating nomination petitions, attending a political convention except as a spectator, publishing a letter soliciting votes for a candidate, and all similar activity.[3] The question was whether government, which may not prohibit citizens in general from engaging in these activities, could nonetheless so control the off-duty activities of its own employees.

In United Public Workers v. Mitchell,[4] the Court answered in the affirmative. While the Court refused to consider the claims of persons who had not yet engaged in forbidden political activities, it ruled against a mechanical employee of the Mint who had done so. The Court's opinion, by Justice Stanley Reed, recognized that the restrictions of political activities imposed by the Act did in some measure impair First Amendment and other constitutional rights,[5] but it based its decision upon the established principle that no right is absolute. The standard by

---

[27] Keyishian, 385 U.S. at 605–06.

[28] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972) (citation omitted). A finding, however, that protected expression or conduct played a substantial part in the decision to dismiss or punish does not conclude the case; the employer may show by a preponderance of the evidence that the same decision would have been reached in the absence of the protected expression or conduct. Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 287 (1977); Givhan v. Western Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410, 416 (1979).

[1] 19 Stat. 143, § 6, 18 U.S.C. §§ 602–03, sustained in Ex parte Curtis, 106 U.S. 371 (1882); 22 Stat. 403, as amended, 5 U.S.C. § 7323.

[2] 53 Stat. 1147 § 9(a), (1939), as amended, 5 U.S.C. § 7324(a)(2). By 54 Stat. 767 (1940), as amended, 5 U.S.C. §§ 1501–08, the restrictions on political activity were extended to state and local governmental employees working in programs financed in whole or in part with federal funds. This provision was sustained against federalism challenges in Oklahoma v. Civil Service Comm'n, 330 U.S. 127 (1947). All the states have adopted laws patterned on the Hatch Act. See Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 604 (1973).

[3] The Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel, Findings and Recommendations 11, 19–24 (Washington: 1968).

[4] 330 U.S. 75, 94–104 (1947)

[5] Id. at 94–95.

which the Court judged the validity of the permissible impairment of First Amendment rights was a due process standard of reasonableness.[6] Thus, changes in the standards of judging incidental restrictions on expression suggested the possibility of a reconsideration of Mitchell.[7]

In Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, however, a divided Court, reaffirming Mitchell, sustained the Act's limitations upon political activity against a range of First Amendment challenges.[8] The Court emphasized that the interest of the government in forbidding partisan political activities by its employees was so substantial that it overrode the rights of those employees to engage in political activities and association.[9] The issue in Letter Carriers, however, was whether the language that Congress had enacted, forbidding employees to take "an active part in political management or in political campaigns,"[10] was unconstitutional on its face, either because the statute was too imprecise to allow government employees to determine what was forbidden and what was permitted, or because the statute covered conduct that Congress could not forbid as well as conduct subject to prohibition or regulation. With respect to vagueness, the plaintiffs contended and the lower court had held that the quoted proscription was inadequate to provide sufficient guidance and that the only further elucidation Congress had provided was in a section stating that the forbidden activities were the same activities that the Commission had as of 1940, and reaching back to 1883, "determined are at the time of the passage of this act prohibited on the part of employees. . .by the provisions of the civil-service rules. . . ."[11] This language had been included, it was contended, to deprive the Commission of power to alter thousands of rulings it had made that were not available to employees and that were in any event mutually inconsistent and too broad.

The Court held, on the contrary, that Congress had intended to confine the Commission to the boundaries of its rulings as of 1940 but had further intended the Commission by a process of case-by-case adjudication to flesh out the prohibition and to give content to it. The Commission had done that. It had regularly summarized in understandable terms the rules that it applied, and it was authorized as well to issue advisory opinions to employees uncertain of the propriety of contemplated conduct. "[T]here are limitations in the English language with respect to being both specific and manageably brief," said the Court, but it thought the prohibitions as elaborated in Commission regulations and rulings were "set out in terms that the ordinary person exercising ordinary common sense can sufficiently understand and comply with, without sacrifice to the public interests."[12] There were conflicts, the Court conceded, between some of the things forbidden and some of the protected expressive activities, but these were at most marginal. Thus, some conduct arguably protected did, under some circumstances, so partake of partisan activities as to be properly proscribable. But the Court would not invalidate the entire statute for this degree of overbreadth.[13] Subsequently, in Bush v. Lucas[14]

---

[6] Id. at 101–02.

[7] The Act was held unconstitutional by a divided three-judge district court. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers v. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 346 F. Supp. 578 (D.D.C. 1972).

[8] 413 U.S. 548 (1973). In Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), the Court refused to consider overbreadth attacks on a state statute of much greater coverage because the plaintiffs had engaged in conduct that the statute clearly could constitutionally proscribe.

[9] The interests the Court recognized as served by the proscription on partisan activities were (1) the interest in the efficient and fair operation of governmental activities and the appearance of such operation, (2) the interest in fair elections, and (3) the interest in protecting employees from improper political influences. 413 U.S. at 557–67.

[10] Id. at 570 n.17.

[11] Id..

[12] Id. at 578–79.

[13] Id. at 580–81.

[14] 462 U.S. 367, 385 (1983).

the Court held that the civil service laws and regulations constitute a sufficiently "elaborate, comprehensive scheme" to afford federal employees an adequate remedy for deprivation of First Amendment rights as a result of disciplinary actions by supervisors, and that therefore there is no need to create an additional judicial remedy for the constitutional violation.

The Court has also addressed the balance between elected officials' First Amendment rights to speak about matters of public concern and elected bodies' rights to censure objectionable speech. In Houston Community College System v. Wilson, a community college Board of Trustees censured one of its elected members after he made public comments that the Board found "inappropriate," "reprehensible," and "not consistent with the best interests of the College."[15] The Board member claimed the censure violated his First Amendment right to be free from government retaliation for engaging in protected speech.[16] While acknowledging that elected representatives, like the Board member, have the right to speak freely on government policy, the Court recognized that the censure issued by the other elected representatives was also a form of protected speech.[17] According to the Court, the Board member could not use his First Amendment rights "as a weapon to silence other representatives seeking to do the same."[18] Although it concluded that the censure at issue did not violate the First Amendment, the Court explained its decision was a "narrow one" involving only a First Amendment retaliation claim regarding the "censure of one member of an elected body by other members of the same body."[19] As a result, claims involving other forms of discipline or punishment, such as expulsion or exclusion, may produce a different outcome.[20]

Amdt1.7.9.3 Honoraria and Government Employees

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In United States v. National Treasury Employees Union (NTEU),[1] the Court struck down an honoraria ban as applied to lower-level employees of the Federal Government. The Court distinguished the honoraria ban from the Hatch Act on the grounds that the honoraria ban suppressed employees' right to free expression while the Hatch Act sought to protect that right.[2] The Court also observed that there was no evidence of improprieties in the acceptance of honoraria by members of the plaintiff class of federal employees.[3] The Court emphasized further difficulties with the "crudely crafted" honoraria ban: it was limited to expressive activities and had no application to other sources of outside income, it applied when neither the subjects of speeches and articles nor the persons or groups paying for them bore any connection to the employee's job responsibilities, and it exempted a "series" of speeches or articles without [15] 20-804, slip op. at 2 (U.S. March 24, 2022).

[16] Id. at 4.

[17] Id. at 9.

[18] Id.

[19] Id. at 13.

[20] Id.

[1] 513 U.S. 454 (1995).

[2] See id. at 471.

[3] See id. The plaintiff class consisted of all Executive Branch employees below grade GS-16. Also covered by the ban were senior executives, Members of Congress, and other federal officers, but the possibility of improprieties by these groups did not justify application of the ban to "the vast rank and file of federal employees below grade GS-16." Id. at 472.

also exempting individual articles and speeches. These "anomalies" led the Court to conclude that the "speculative benefits" of the ban were insufficient to justify the burdens it imposed on expressive activities.[4]

Amdt1.7.9.4 Pickering Balancing Test for Government Employee Speech

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

While the government does not have complete freedom to restrict the speech of its employees, it does have some power. "[I]t cannot be gainsaid," the Court said in Pickering v. Board of Education, "that the State has interests as an employer in regulating the speech of its employees that differ significantly from those it possesses in connection with regulation of the speech of the citizenry in general."[1] Pickering concerned the dismissal of a high school teacher who had written a critical letter to a local newspaper reflecting on the administration of the school system. The letter also contained several factual errors. "The problem in any case," Justice Thurgood Marshall wrote for the Court, "is to arrive at a balance between the interests of the teacher, as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees."[2] The Court's analysis suggested some factors that might be relevant in conducting the balancing test. Dismissal of a public employee for criticism of his superiors was improper, the Court indicated, where the relationship of employee to superior was not so close, such as day-to-day personal contact, that problems of discipline or harmony among coworkers, or problems of personal loyalty and confidence, would arise.[3] The school board had not shown that any harm had resulted from the false statements in the letter, and it could not proceed on the assumption that the false statements were per se harmful, inasmuch as the statements primarily reflected a difference of opinion between the teacher and the board about the allocation of funds. Moreover, the allocation of funds is a matter of important public concern about which teachers have informed and definite opinions of which the community should be aware. The Pickering Court stated: "In these circumstances we conclude that the interest of the school administration in limiting teachers' opportunities to contribute to public debate is not significantly greater than its interest in limiting a similar contribution by any member of the general public."[4]

---

[4] Id. at 477.

[1] 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968).

[2] Id. at 568.

[3] Id. at 568–70. Contrast Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983), where Pickering was distinguished on the basis that the employee, an assistant district attorney, worked in an environment where a close personal relationship involving loyalty and harmony was important. "When close working relationships are essential to fulfilling public responsibilities, a wide degree of deference to the employer's judgment is appropriate." Id. at 151–52.

[4] 391 U.S. at 573. The Court extended Pickering to private communications of an employee's views to the employer in Givhan v. Western Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410 (1979), although it recognized that different considerations might arise in different contexts. That is, with respect to public speech, content may be determinative in weighing impairment of the government's interests, whereas, with private speech, as "[w]hen a government employee personally confronts his immediate superior,. . .the manner, time, and place in which it is delivered" may also be relevant. Id. at 415 n.4. As discussed below, however, in Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410 (2006), the Court held that there is no First Amendment protection at all for government employees when they make statements pursuant to their official duties.

Combining a balancing test of governmental interest and employee rights with a purportedly limiting statutory construction, the Court, in Arnett v. Kennedy,[5] sustained the constitutionality of a federal law that authorized the removal or suspension without pay of an employee "for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service" when the "cause" cited concerned speech by an employee. The employee charged that his superiors had made an offer of a bribe to a private person. The quoted statutory phrase, the Court held, "is without doubt intended to authorize dismissal for speech as well as other conduct."[6] But, referencing its Letter Carriers analysis,[7] it ruled that the authority conferred was not impermissibly vague, inasmuch as it is not possible to encompass within a statute all the myriad situations that arise in the course of employment, and inasmuch as the language used was informed by developed principles of agency adjudication coupled with a procedure for obtaining legal counsel from the agency on the interpretation of the law.[8] Nor was the language overbroad, continued the Court, because it "proscribes only that public speech which improperly damages and impairs the reputation and efficiency of the employing agency, and it thus imposes no greater controls on the behavior of federal employees than are necessary for the protection of the government as an employer. . . .We hold that the language 'such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service' in the Act excludes constitutionally protected speech, and that the statute is therefore not overbroad."[9]

The Court clarified the Pickering inquiry in Connick v. Myers,[10] involving what the Court characterized, in the main, as an employee grievance rather than an effort to inform the public on a matter of public concern. The employee, an assistant district attorney involved in a dispute with her supervisor over transfer to a different section, was fired for insubordination after she circulated a questionnaire among her peers soliciting views on matters relating to employee morale. The Court found this firing permissible, stating: "When employee expression cannot be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community, government officials should enjoy wide latitude in managing their offices, without intrusive oversight by the judiciary in the name of the First Amendment."[11] Whether an employee's speech addresses a matter of public concern, the Court indicated, must be determined not only by its content, but also by its form and context.[12] Because one aspect of the employee's speech did raise matters of public concern, Connick also applied Pickering's balancing test, holding that "a wide degree of deference is appropriate" when "close working relationships" between employer and employee are involved.[13] The issue of public concern is not only a threshold inquiry, but, under Connick, still figures in the balancing of interests: as the Connick Court stated, "the State's burden in justifying a particular discharge varies depending upon the nature of the employee's expression" and its importance to the public.[14]

On the other hand, the Court has indicated that an employee's speech may be protected as relating to matters of public concern even in the absence of any effort or intent to inform the [5] 416 U.S. 134 (1974). The quoted language is from 5 U.S.C. § 7501(a).

[6] 416 U.S. at 160.

[7] Civil Service Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548, 578–79 (1973).

[8] Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134, 158–64 (1974).

[9] 416 U.S. at 162.

[10] 461 U.S. 138 (1983).

[11] Id. at 146.

[12] Id. at 147–148.

[13] Id. at 151–52.

[14] Id. at 150.

public.[15] In Rankin v. McPherson[16] the Court held protected an employee's comment, made to a co-worker upon hearing of an unsuccessful attempt to assassinate the President, and in a context critical of the President's policies—If they go for him again, I hope they get him. Indeed, the Court in McPherson emphasized the clerical employee's lack of contact with the public in concluding that the employer's interest in maintaining the efficient operation of the office (including public confidence and good will) was insufficient to outweigh the employee's First Amendment rights.[17]

In City of San Diego v. Roe,[18] the Court held that a police department could fire a police officer who sold a video on the adults-only section of eBay that showed him stripping off a police uniform and masturbating. The Court found that the officer's "expression does not qualify as a matter of public concern. . . and Pickering balancing does not come into play."[19] The Court also noted that the officer's speech, unlike federal employees' speech in United States v. National Treasury Employees Union (NTEU),[20] "was linked to his official status as a police officer, and designed to exploit his employer's image," and therefore "was detrimental to the mission and functions of his employer."[21] The Court, therefore, had "little difficulty in concluding that the City was not barred from terminating Roe under either line of cases [that is, Pickering or NTEU]."[22]

In Garcetti v. Ceballos, the Court held that there is no First Amendment protection—Pickering balancing is not to be applied—"when public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties," even if those statements are about matters of public concern.[23] In this case, a deputy district attorney had presented his supervisor with a memo expressing his concern that an affidavit that the office had used to obtain a search warrant contained serious misrepresentations. The deputy district attorney claimed that he was subjected to retaliatory employment actions, and he sued. The Supreme Court held "that when public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline."[24] The fact that the employee's speech occurred inside his office, and the fact that the speech concerned the subject matter of his employment, were not sufficient to foreclose First Amendment protection.[25] Rather, the "controlling factor" was "that his expressions were made pursuant to his duties."[26]

In distinguishing between wholly unprotected "employee speech" and quasi-protected "citizen speech," sworn testimony outside of the scope of a public employee's ordinary job

[15] This conclusion was implicit in Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410 (1979), which the Court characterized in Connick as involving "an employee speak[ing] out as a citizen on a matter of general concern, not tied to a personal employment dispute, but. . .[speaking] privately." 461 U.S. at 148, n.8

[16] 483 U.S. 378 (1987).

[17] "Where. . .an employee serves no confidential, policymaking, or public contact role, the danger to the agency's successful function from that employee's private speech is minimal." Id. at 390–91.

[18] 543 U.S. 77 (2004) (per curiam).

[19] Id. at 84.

[20] 513 U.S. 454 (1995). For discussion on United States v. NTEU, see Amdt1.7.9.3 Honoraria and Government Employees.

[21] City of San Diego v. Roe, 543 U.S. 77, 84 (2004) (per curiam).

[22] Id. at 80.

[23] 547 U.S. 410, 421 (2006).

[24] Id. at 421. However, "[s]o long as employees are speaking as citizens about matters of public concern, they must face only those speech restrictions that are necessary for their employers to operate efficiently and effectively." Id. at 419. Such necessity, however, may be based on a "common-sense conclusion" rather than on "empirical data." Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Ass'n v. Brentwood Academy, 551 U.S. 291, 300 (2007) (citing Garcetti).

[25] Id. at 421.

[26] Id.

duties appears to be "citizen speech." In Lane v. Franks,[27] the director of a state government program for underprivileged youth was terminated from his job following his testimony regarding the alleged fraudulent activities of a state legislator that occurred during the legislator's employment in the government program. The employee challenged the termination on First Amendment grounds.

The Court held generally that testimony by a subpoenaed public employee made outside the scope of his ordinary job duties is to be treated as speech by a citizen, subject to the Pickering-Connick balancing test.[28] The Court noted that "[s]worn testimony in judicial proceedings is a quintessential example of speech as a citizen for a simple reason: Anyone who testifies in court bears an obligation to the court and society at large, to tell the truth."[29] In so holding, the Court confirmed that Garcetti's holding is limited to speech made in accordance with an employee's official job duties and does not extend to speech that merely concerns information learned during that employment. The Court in Lane ultimately found that the plaintiff's speech deserved protection under the Pickering-Connick balancing test because the speech was both a matter of public concern (the speech was testimony about misuse of public funds) and the testimony did not raise concerns for the government employer.[30]

In a 2022 case, the Supreme Court expressly connected the issue of public employee speech to the related issue of government speech,[31] saying that the Free Speech Clause question in Kennedy v. Bremerton School District turned on whether a football coach had acted "in his capacity as a private citizen," or whether instead his actions "amount[ed] to government speech attributable to" his public employer.[32] The school had disciplined the coach for praying at the 50-yard line immediately after football games, while he was still on duty.[33] The parties agreed that the coach's prayer implicated a matter of public concern, but the school argued his speech was unprotected under Pickering because he was speaking in his official capacity as a public employee.[34] The Court held instead that the coach's prayers were private speech, stating the speech was not within the scope of his ordinary duties and he "was not seeking to convey a government-created message."[35] The Court noted further that during this postgame period, employees "were free to attend briefly to [other] personal matters" and students were engaged in other activities, suggesting the coach's "prayers were not delivered as an address to the team, but instead in his capacity as a private citizen."[36] Although the coach was on duty and his prayers were delivered at his workplace, these facts were not dispositive to the analysis.[37] Ultimately, the Court held that the school had not met its burden to justify the restrictions on the coach's religious speech.[38]

---

[27] 573 U.S. 228 (2014).

[28] Id. at 238.

[29] Id.

[30] Id. at 241–42. The Court, however, held that because no relevant precedent in the lower court or in the Supreme Court clearly established that the government employer could not fire an employee because of testimony the employee gave, the defendant was entitled to qualified immunity. Id. at 243.

[31] See Amdt1.7.8.2 Government Speech and Government as Speaker.

[32] Kennedy v. Bremerton Sch. Dist., No. 21-418, slip op. at 16 (U.S. June 27, 2022).

[33] Id. at 7.

[34] See id. at 16.

[35] Id. at 17.

[36] Id. at 17–18.

[37] Id. See also id. at 18 (suggesting it would be inappropriate to treat "everything teachers and coaches say in the workplace as government speech subject to government control").

[38] See id. at 19–20. This aspect of the Court's ruling, which turned on an interpretation of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, is discussed .

The protections applicable to government employees have been extended to independent government contractors, the Court announcing that "the Pickering balancing test, adjusted to weigh the government's interests as contractor rather than as employer, determines the extent of their protection."[39]

In sum, although a public employer may not muzzle its employees or penalize them for their expressions and associations to the same extent that a private employer can,[40] the public employer nonetheless has broad leeway in restricting employee speech. If the employee speech does not relate to a matter of "public concern," then Connick applies and the employer is largely free of constitutional restraint.[41] If the speech does relate to a matter of public concern, then unless the speech was made by an employee pursuant to his duties, Pickering's balancing test is applied, with the governmental interests in efficiency, workplace harmony, and the satisfactory performance of the employee's duties[42] balanced against the employee's First Amendment rights.[43] Although the general approach is easy to describe, it has proven difficult to apply.[44] The First Amendment, however, does not stand alone in protecting the speech of public employees; statutory protections for "whistleblowers" add to the mix.[45]

---

[39] Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668, 673 (1996). See also O'Hare Truck Serv., Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 715 (1996) (government may not "retaliate[ ] against a contractor, or a regular provider of services, for the exercise of rights of political association or the expression of political allegiance").

[40] See, e.g., Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), and Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980) (political patronage systems impermissibly infringe protected belief and associational rights of employees); Madison Sch. Dist. v. WERC, 429 U.S. 167 (1976) (school teacher may not be prevented from speaking at a public meeting in opposition to position advanced by union with exclusive representation rights). The public employer may, as may private employers, permit collective bargaining and confer on representatives of its employees the right of exclusive representation, Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 223–32 (1977), but the fact that its employees may speak does not compel government to listen to them. See Smith v. Arkansas State Highway Emps., 441 U.S. 463 (1979) (employees have right to associate to present their positions to their employer but the employer is not constitutionally required to engage in collective bargaining). See also Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Coll. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271 (1984) (public employees not members of union have no First Amendment right to meet separately with public employers compelled by state law to "meet and confer" with exclusive bargaining representative). Government may also inquire into the fitness of its employees and potential employees, but it must do so in a manner that does not needlessly endanger the expression and associational rights of those persons. See, e.g., Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1969).

[41] In Connick, the Court noted that it did not suggest "that Myers' speech, even if not touching upon a matter of public concern, is totally beyond the protection of the First Amendment." Rather, it was beyond First Amendment protection "absent the most unusual of circumstances." Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147 (1983). In Ceballos, however, the Court, citing Connick at 147, wrote that, if an employee did not speak as a citizen on a matter of public concern, then "the employee has no First Amendment cause of action based on his or her employer's reaction to the speech." Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 418 (2006).

[42] In some contexts, the governmental interest is more far-reaching. See Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507, 509 n.3 (1980) (interest in protecting secrecy of foreign intelligence sources).

[43] The Court stated in Janus v. American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31, No. 16-1466, slip op. at 23–24 (U.S. June 27, 2018), that this analysis "requires modification" when a court considers "general rules that affect broad categories of employees." In such a case, "the government must shoulder a correspondingly 'heav[ier]' burden and is entitled to considerably less deference in its assessment that a predicted harm justifies a particular impingement on First Amendment rights." Id. at 24 (quoting United States v. Nat'l Treasury Emps. Union, 513 U.S. 454, 466 (1995)) (alteration in original).

[44] In Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661 (1994), a plurality of a divided Court concluded that a public employer does not violate the First Amendment if the employer (1) had reasonably believed that the employee's conversation involved personal matters and (2) dismissed the employee because of that reasonable belief, even if the belief was mistaken. Id. at 679–80 (plurality opinion) (O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Souter and Ginsburg, JJ.). More than two decades later, a six-Justice majority approvingly cited to the plurality opinion from Waters, concluding that the employer's motive is dispositive in determining whether a public employee's First Amendment rights had been violated as a result of the employer's conduct. See Heffernan v. City of Paterson, 578 U.S. 266, 272 (2016). In so doing, the Court held that the converse of the situation in Waters —a public employer's firing of an employee based on the mistaken belief that the employee had engaged in activity protected by the First Amendment—was actionable as a violation of the Constitution. See id. ("After all, in the law, what is sauce for the goose is normally sauce for the gander."). Put another way, when an employer demotes an employee to prevent the employee from engaging in protected political activity, the employee is entitled to challenge that unlawful action under the First Amendment, "even if. . .the employer makes a factual mistake about the employee's behavior." Id. at 273. The Court concluded that the employer's motivation is

Amdt1.7.10 Media Regulation

Amdt1.7.10.1 Overview of Media Regulation

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The protections of the First Amendment extend regardless of the medium of expression—speech will remain constitutionally protected whether it is communicated in a park, in a newspaper, or in a movie.[1] Nonetheless, the standards for assessing First Amendment protections may vary according to the medium of expression.[2] In particular, as discussed in the following essays, the Supreme Court has recognized that "differential treatment" of speech may sometimes be "'justified by some special characteristic of' the particular medium being regulated."[3] Further, although the Supreme Court has recognized that both the Free Speech and Free Press Clauses protect media outlets,[4] such organizations are not relieved from complying with generally applicable laws simply because such laws may have incidental effects on the exercise of free speech rights.[5]

Amdt1.7.10.2 Taxation of Media

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment often requires heightened scrutiny of restrictions that target or disfavor the media. For example, the Supreme Court has invalidated taxes that single out media organizations for payment. In Grosjean v. American Press Co., while recognizing that newspapers are not "immune from any of the ordinary forms of taxation for support of the government," the Court voided a state 2% tax on the gross receipts of advertising in newspapers with a circulation exceeding 20,000 copies a week.[1] In the Court's view, the tax was analogous to the eighteent-century English practice of imposing advertising and stamp taxes on newspapers for the express purpose of pricing the opposition penny press beyond the means of the mass of the population.[2] The tax at issue focused exclusively upon newspapers, it central with respect to public employee speech issues because of (1) the text of the First Amendment—which "focus[es] upon the activity of the Government"; and (2) the underlying purposes of the public employee speech doctrine, which is to prevent the chilling effect that results when an employee is discharged for having engaged in protected activity. Id. at 273–74.

---

[45] See, e.g., Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-12, 103 Stat. 16.

[1] See, e.g., Joseph Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503 (1952) (noting that although each "method of expression tends to present its own peculiar problems . . . . the basic principles of freedom of speech and the press, like the First Amendment's command, do not vary").

[2] See, e.g., Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 557 (1975) ("Each medium of expression, of course, must be assessed for First Amendment purposes by standards suited to it, for each may present its own problems.").

[3] Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 660–61 (1994) (quoting Minn. Star & Tribune Co. v. Minn. Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983)).

[4] See, e.g., Grosjean v. Am. Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 244 (1936); see also Amdt1.9.1 Overview of Freedom of the Press.

[5] See Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 669 (1991).

[1] Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936).

[2] 297 U.S. at 245–48.

imposed a serious burden on the distribution of news to the public, and it appeared to be a discriminatorily selective tax aimed almost solely at the opposition to the state administration.[3] Combined with the standard that government may not impose a tax as a prior restraint upon the exercise of a constitutional right itself,[4] these tests seem to permit general business taxes upon receipts of businesses engaged in communicating protected expression without raising any First Amendment issues.[5]

Ordinarily, a tax singling out the press for differential treatment is highly suspect, and creates a heavy burden of justification on the state. This is so, the Court explained in 1983, in part because "differential treatment, unless justified by some special characteristic of the press, suggests that the goal of the regulation is not unrelated to suppression of expression."[6] The Court said the state's interest in raising revenue was not sufficient justification for differential treatment of the press, where the state had alternative means to achieve the same interest. Moreover, the Court refused to adopt a rule permitting analysis of the "effective burden" imposed by a differential tax; even if the current effective tax burden could be measured and upheld, the threat of increasing the burden on the press might have "censorial effects," and "courts as institutions are poorly equipped to evaluate with precision the relative burdens of various methods of taxation."[7]

A tax that targets specific subgroups within a segment of the press for differential treatment can also trigger heightened constitutional scrutiny. An Arkansas sales tax exemption for newspapers and for "religious, professional, trade, and sports journals" published within the state was struck down as an invalid content-based regulation of the press.[8] Entirely as a result of content, some magazines were treated less favorably than others. The measure was viewed as not narrowly tailored to achieve allegedly "compelling" state interests such as raising revenue, encouraging "fledgling" publishers, and fostering communications.[9]

In 1991, the Court upheld a state tax that discriminated among different components of the communications media on a content-neutral basis, proclaiming that "differential taxation of speakers, even members of the press, does not implicate the First Amendment unless the tax is directed at, or presents the danger of suppressing, particular ideas."[10]

---

[3] 297 U.S. at 250–51. The Court distinguished Grosjean on this latter basis in Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575 (1983).

[4] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943) (ruling license tax operating as a prior restraint on distribution of religious material unconstitutional); Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573 (1944) (same). For further discussion of these cases, see Amdt1.4.3.1 Laws Neutral to Religious Practice during the 1940s and 1950s.

[5] See Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959) (no First Amendment violation to deny business expense tax deduction for expenses incurred in lobbying about measure affecting one's business); Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439 (1991) (no First Amendment violation in applying general gross receipts tax to cable television services while exempting other communications media).

[6] Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983) (invalidating a Minnesota use tax on the cost of paper and ink products used in a publication, and exempting the first $100,000 of such costs each calendar year; Star & Tribune paid roughly two-thirds of all revenues the state raised by the tax). The Court seemed less concerned, however, when the affected group within the press was not so small, upholding application of a gross receipts tax to cable television services even though other segments of the communications media were exempted. Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439 (1991).

[7] 460 U.S. at 588, 589.

[8] Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221 (1987). For a discussion of general First Amendment treatment of content-based speech regulation, see Amdt1.7.5.1 Overview of Categorical Approach to Restricting Speech.

[9] 481 U.S. at 231–32.

[10] Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 453 (1991) (tax applied to all cable television systems within the state, but not to other segments of the communications media).

The general principle that government may not impose a financial burden based on the content of speech underlay the Court's invalidation of New York's "Son of Sam" law, which provided that a criminal's income from publications describing his crime was to be placed in escrow and made available to victims of the crime.[11] Although the Court recognized a compelling state interest in ensuring that criminals do not profit from their crimes, and in compensating crime victims, it found that the statute was not narrowly tailored to those ends. The statute applied only to income derived from speech, not to income from other sources, and it was significantly overinclusive because it reached a wide range of literature (for example, the Confessions of Saint Augustine and Thoreau's Civil Disobedience) "that did not enable a criminal to profit from his crime while a victim remains uncompensated."[12]

Amdt1.7.10.3 Labor and Antitrust Regulation of Media

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Just as newspapers and other communications businesses are subject to nondiscriminatory taxation, they are entitled to no immunity from the application of general laws regulating their relations with their employees and prescribing wage and hour standards. In Associated Press v. NLRB,[1] application of the National Labor Relations Act to a newsgathering agency was found to raise no constitutional problem. The Court explained that "[t]he publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws," and noted that the federal law did not interfere with "the impartial distribution of news." Similarly, the Court has found no problem with requiring newspapers to pay minimum wages and observe maximum hours.[2]

In another case, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to using antitrust laws to break up restraints on competition in the newsgathering and publishing field.[3] The Court suggested that antitrust regulation could serve First Amendment purposes—protecting press freedom by promoting "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society."[4] Thus, both newspapers and broadcasters, as well as other such industries, may not engage in monopolistic and other anticompetitive activities free of the possibility of antitrust law attack,[5] even if such activities might promote speech.[6]

---

[11] Simon & Schuster v. New York Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105 (1991).

[12] 502 U.S. at 122.

[1] 301 U.S. 103, 132 (1937).

[2] Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186 (1946).

[3] Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 7, 20 (1945).

[4] 326 U.S. at 20.

[5] Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951) (refusal of newspaper publisher who enjoyed a substantial monopoly to sell advertising to persons also advertising over a competing radio station violated antitrust laws); United States v. Radio Corp. of America, 358 U.S. 334 (1959) (FCC approval no bar to antitrust suit); United States v. Greater Buffalo Press, 402 U.S. 549 (1971) (monopolization of color comic supplements). See also FCC v. National Citizens Comm. for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775 (1978) (upholding FCC rules prospectively barring, and in some instances requiring divesting to prevent, the common ownership of a radio or television broadcast station and a daily newspaper located in the same community).

[6] Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131 (1969) (pooling arrangement between two newspapers violated antitrust laws; First Amendment argument that one paper will fail if arrangement is outlawed rejected). In

Amdt1.7.10.4 Broadcast Radio and Television

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Because there are a limited number of broadcast frequencies for radio and non-cable television use, the Federal Government licenses access to these frequencies, permitting some applicants to use them and denying the greater number of applicants such permission. Even though this licensing system is in form a variety of prior restraint, the Court has held that it does not present a First Amendment issue because of the unique characteristic of broadcast scarcity.[1] Thus, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) has broad authority to determine the right of access to broadcasting,[2] although, to avoid heightened constitutional scrutiny, the regulation must be exercised in a manner that is neutral with regard to the content of the materials broadcast.[3]

In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, the Court upheld an FCC regulation that required broadcasters to afford persons an opportunity to reply if they were attacked on the air on the basis of their "honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities," or if they were legally qualified candidates and a broadcast editorial endorsed their opponent or opposed them.[4] In Red Lion, Justice Byron White explained that "differences in the characteristics of [various] media justify differences in First Amendment standards applied to them."[5] In contrast to speaking or publishing, the Court noted that broadcast frequencies are limited and some few must be given the privilege over others. The Court held that a particular licensee, however, has no First Amendment right to hold that license and his exclusive privilege may be qualified. The Court ruled that the government could require that a licensee to "conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves."[6] Furthermore, Justice Byron White explained that by helping expand access to different ideas, these restrictions furthered the "collective right" of the viewers and listeners, "to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment."[7] The broadcasters had argued that, if they were required to provide equal time at their expense to response to this decision, Congress enacted the Newspaper Preservation Act to sanction certain joint arrangements where one paper is in danger of failing. 84 Stat. 466 (1970), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1801–1804.

---

[1] NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226–27 (1943) (saying "[t]he right of free speech does not include . . . the right to use the facilities of radio without a license," but noting that a "different" issue would be presented if Congress had authorized licensing on "the basis of [applicants'] political, economic or social views, or . . . any other capricious basis"); accord Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 375–79, 387–89 (1969); FCC v. National Citizens Comm. for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775, 798–802 (1978).

[2] NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943); Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266 (1933); FCC v. Pottsville, 309 U.S. 134 (1940); FCC v. ABC, 347 U.S. 284 (1954); Farmers Union v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525 (1958).

[3] "But Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views or upon any other capricious basis. If it did, or if the Commission by these regulations proposed a choice among applicants upon some such basis, the issue before us would be wholly different." NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1943).

[4] 395 U.S. 367, 373 (1969). "The Federal Communications Commission has for many years imposed on radio and television broadcasters the requirement that discussion of public issues be presented on broadcast stations, and that each side of those issues must be given fair coverage. This is known as the fairness doctrine. . . ." Id. at 369. The two issues passed on in Red Lion were integral parts of the doctrine.

[5] 395 U.S. at 386.

[6] 395 U.S. at 389.

[7] 395 U.S. at 390.

persons attacked and to points of view different from those expressed on the air, expression would be curbed through self-censorship, for fear of controversy and economic loss. Justice Byron White thought this possibility "at best speculative," but if it should materialize "the Commission is not powerless to insist that they give adequate and fair attention to public issues."[8]

In Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee,[9] the Court rejected claims of political groups that a broadcaster's policy of not running "editorial" advertisements violated the First Amendment. Though it declined to require broadcaster access based on the First Amendment or existing federal law, the Court left open the possibility that "at some future date Congress or the [FCC]—or the broadcasters—may devise some kind of limited right of access that is both practicable and desirable."[10] Consequently, in CBS v. FCC,[11] the Court upheld a federal law requiring "reasonable access" to broadcast stations for candidates seeking federal elective office. The constitutional analysis restated the spectrum scarcity rationale and the role of the broadcasters as fiduciaries for the public interest.

In FCC v. League of Women Voters,[12] the Court took the same general approach to governmental regulation of broadcasting, but struck down a total ban on editorializing by stations receiving public funding. In summarizing the principles guiding analysis in this area, the Court reaffirmed that Congress may regulate in ways that would be impermissible in other contexts, but indicated that broadcasters are entitled to greater protection than may have been suggested by Red Lion, saying broadcast "restrictions have been upheld only when we were satisfied that the restriction is narrowly tailored to further a substantial governmental interest, such as ensuring adequate and balanced coverage of public issues."[13] The Court said that "in sharp contrast to the restrictions upheld in Red Lion or in [CBS v. FCC], which left room for editorial discretion and simply required broadcast editors to grant others access to the microphone, [the challenged federal law] directly prohibits the broadcaster from speaking out on public issues even in a balanced and fair manner."[14] The ban on all editorializing was deemed too severe and restrictive a means of accomplishing the governmental purposes—protecting public broadcasting stations from being coerced, through threat or fear of withdrawal of public funding, into becoming "vehicles for governmental propagandizing," and also keeping the stations "from becoming convenient targets for capture by private interest groups wishing to express their own partisan viewpoints."[15] Expression of editorial opinion was described as a "form of speech . . . that lies at the heart of First Amendment protection,"[16] and the ban was said to be "defined solely on the basis of . . . content," since it had been interpreted as speech directed at "controversial issues of public importance."[17] Moreover, the ban on editorializing was both overinclusive, applying to commentary on local

[8] 395 U.S. at 392–93.

[9] 412 U.S. 94 (1973).

[10] 412 U.S. at 131.

[11] 453 U.S. 367 (1981). The dissent argued that the FCC had assumed, and the Court had confirmed it in assuming, too much authority under the congressional enactment. In its view, Congress had not meant to do away with the traditional deference to the editorial judgments of the broadcasters. Id. at 397 (Justices Byron White, William Rehnquist, and John Paul Stevens).

[12] 468 U.S. 364 (1984), holding unconstitutional § 399 of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, as amended.

[13] 468 U.S. at 380. The Court rejected the suggestion that only a "compelling" rather than "substantial" governmental interest can justify restrictions.

[14] 468 U.S. at 385.

[15] 468 U.S. at 384–85. Dissenting Justice John Paul Stevens thought that the ban on editorializing served an important purpose of "maintaining government neutrality in the free marketplace of ideas." Id. at 409.

[16] 468 U.S. at 381.

[17] 468 U.S. at 383.

issues of no likely interest to Congress, and underinclusive, not applying at all to expression of controversial opinion in the context of regular programming. Therefore, the Court concluded, the restriction was not narrowly enough tailored to fulfill the government's purposes.

Sustaining FCC discipline of a broadcaster who aired a record containing a series of repeated "barnyard" words, considered "indecent" but not obscene, the Court articulated additional justifications allowing greater regulation of indecent broadcasting.[18] The Court noted first that broadcast was "uniquely pervasive," confronting individuals "not only in public, but also in the privacy of the home, where the individual's right to be left alone plainly outweighs the First Amendment rights of an intruder."[19] Second, the Court emphasized that, "broadcasting is uniquely accessible to children, even those too young to read. . . . amply justify[ing] special treatment of indecent broadcasting."[20] The Court emphasized the "narrowness" of its holding, which "requires consideration of a host of variables."[21] The use of more than "an occasional expletive," the time of day of the broadcast, the likely audience, "and differences between radio, television, and perhaps closed-circuit transmissions" were all relevant in the Court's view.[22]

Amdt1.7.10.5 Cable Television

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Court has recognized that cable television "implicates First Amendment interests," because a cable operator communicates ideas through selection of original programming and through exercise of editorial discretion in determining which stations to include in its offering.[1] Moreover, "settled principles of . . . First Amendment jurisprudence" govern review of cable regulation; cable is not limited by "scarce" broadcast frequencies and does not require the same less rigorous standard of review that the Court applies to regulation of broadcasting.[2] Cable does, however, have unique characteristics that can justify regulations singling out cable [18] FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978).

[19] 438 U.S. at 748.

[20] 438 U.S. at 749–50. This was the only portion of the constitutional discussion that obtained the support of a majority of the Court. In Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC, 518 U.S. 727, 748 (1996), the Court noted that spectrum scarcity "has little to do with a case that involves the effects of television viewing on children."

[21] 438 U.S. at 750. See also id. at 742–43 (plurality opinion), and id. at 755–56 (Powell, J., concurring) ("The Court today reviews only the Commission's holding that Carlin's monologue was indecent 'as broadcast' at two o'clock in the afternoon, and not the broad sweep of the Commission's opinion.").

[22] 438 U.S. at 750. Subsequently, the FCC began to apply its indecency standard to fleeting uses of expletives in non-sexual and non-excretory contexts. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit found this practice arbitrary and capricious under the Administrative Procedure Act, but the Supreme Court disagreed and upheld the FCC policy without reaching the First Amendment question. FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502 (2009). See also CBS Corp. v. FCC, 535 F.3d 167 (3d Cir. 2008), vacated and remanded, 556 U.S. 1218 (2009) (invalidating, on non-constitutional grounds, a fine against CBS for broadcasting Janet Jackson's exposure of her breast for nine-sixteenths of a second during a Super Bowl halftime show). The Supreme Court vacated and remanded this decision to the Third Circuit for further consideration in light of FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc.

[1] City of Los Angeles v. Preferred Communications, 476 U.S. 488 (1986) (leaving for future decision how the operator's interests are to be balanced against a community's interests in limiting franchises and preserving utility space); Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 636 (1994).

[2] Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 638–39 (1994).

for special treatment.[3] The Court in Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC[4] upheld federal statutory requirements that cable systems carry local commercial and public television stations. Although these "must-carry" requirements "distinguish[ed] between speakers in the television programming market," they did so based on the manner of transmission and not on the content the messages conveyed, and hence were content-neutral.[5] The regulations could therefore be measured by the "intermediate level of scrutiny" set forth in United States v. O'Brien.[6] Two years later, however, a splintered Court could not agree on what standard of review to generally apply to content-based restrictions of cable broadcasts. Striking down a requirement that cable operators must, in order to protect children, segregate and block programs with patently offensive sexual material, a plurality opinion in Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC,[7] found it unnecessary to determine whether strict scrutiny or some lesser standard applies, because it deemed the restriction invalid under any of the alternative tests. The plurality[8] rejected assertions that public forum analysis,[9] or a rule giving cable operators' editorial rights "general primacy" over the rights of programmers and viewers,[10] should govern.

Subsequently, in United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc.,[11] the Supreme Court made clear, as it had not in Denver Consortium, that strict scrutiny applies to content-based speech restrictions on cable television. The Court struck down a federal statute designed to "shield children from hearing or seeing images resulting from signal bleed," which refers to blurred images or sounds that come through to non-subscribers.[12] The statute required cable operators, on channels primarily dedicated to sexually oriented programming, either to scramble fully or otherwise fully block such channels, or to not provide such programming when a significant number of children are likely to be viewing it, which, under an FCC regulation meant to transmit the programming only from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. The Court found that, even without "discount[ing] the possibility that a graphic image could have a negative impact on a young child," it could not conclude that Congress had used "the least restrictive

[3] 512 U.S. at 661 (referring to the "bottleneck monopoly power" exercised by cable operators in determining which networks and stations to carry, and to the resulting dangers posed to the viability of broadcast television stations). See also Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439 (1991) (application of state gross receipts tax to cable industry permissible even though other segments of the communications media were exempted).

[4] 512 U.S. 622 (1994).

[5] 512 U.S. at 645. "Deciding whether a particular regulation is content-based or content-neutral is not always a simple task," the Court confessed. Id. at 642. Indeed, dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, joined by Justices Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Clarence Thomas, viewed the rules as content-based. Id. at 674–82.

[6] 391 U.S. 367, 377 (1968). The Court remanded Turner for further factual findings relevant to the O'Brien test. On remand, the district court upheld the must-carry provisions, and the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that it "cannot displace Congress's judgment respecting content-neutral regulations with our own, so long as its policy is grounded on reasonable factual findings supported by evidence that is substantial for a legislative determination." Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC, 520 U.S. 180, 224 (1997).

[7] 518 U.S. 727, 755 (1996) (invalidating § 10(b) of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992). The Court upheld § 10(a) of the Act, which permitted cable operators to prohibit indecent material on leased access channels; and struck down § 10(c), which permitted a cable operator to prevent transmission of "sexually explicit" programming on public access channels. In upholding § 10(a), Justice Stephen Breyer's plurality opinion cited FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), and noted that cable television "is as 'accessible to children' as over-the-air broadcasting, if not more so." 518 U.S. at 744.

[8] This section of Justice Stephen Breyer's opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, Sandra Day O'Connor, and David Souter. 518 U.S. at 749.

[9] Justice Anthony Kennedy, joined by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, advocated this approach, 518 U.S. at 791, and took the plurality to task for its "evasion of any clear legal standard." 518 U.S. at 784.

[10] Justice Thomas, joined by Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justice Antonin Scalia, advocated this approach.

[11] 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000).

[12] 529 U.S. at 806.

means for addressing the problem."[13] Congress in fact had enacted another provision that was less restrictive and that served the government's purpose. This other provision required that, upon request by a cable subscriber, a cable operator, without charge, fully scramble or otherwise fully block any channel to which a subscriber does not subscribe.[14]

Amdt1.7.10.6 Newspapers, Telephones, and the Internet

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court has clarified that the relaxed First Amendment standards allowing greater regulation of broadcast and (to a lesser extent) cable television do not apply to newspapers, telephone communications, or the internet. Looking first at newspapers, the Court was unanimous in holding void under the First Amendment a state law that granted a political candidate a right to equal space to answer criticism and attacks on his record by a newspaper.[1] Granting that the number of newspapers had declined over the years, that ownership had become concentrated, and that new entries were prohibitively expensive, the Court agreed with proponents of the law that the problem of newspaper responsibility was a great one. But press responsibility, although desirable, "is not mandated by the Constitution," whereas press freedom is. The compulsion exerted by government on a newspaper to print what it would not otherwise print, "a compulsion to publish that which 'reason tells them should not be published,'" runs afoul of the free press clause.[2]

The Court expressly distinguished the broadcast medium from telephone[3] and internet[4] communications in ruling unconstitutional two different statutes prohibiting certain transmissions of indecent messages. A 2017 opinion went so far as to equate the internet with streets or parks, historically some of the most important—and constitutionally protected—forums for the exercise of First Amendment rights.[5] [13] 529 U.S. at 826–27. The Court stated: "Even upon the assumption that the government has an interest in substituting itself for informed and empowered parents, its interest is not sufficiently compelling to justify this widespread restriction on speech." Id. at 825.

---

[14] 47 U.S.C. § 560.

[1] Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974).

[2] 418 U.S. at 256. The Court also adverted to the imposed costs of the compelled printing of replies but this seemed secondary to the quoted conclusion. The Court has also held that a state may not require a privately owned utility company to include in its billing envelopes views of a consumer group with which it disagrees. Although a plurality opinion to which four Justices adhered relied heavily on Tornillo, there was no Court majority consensus as to rationale. Pacific Gas & Elec. v. Public Utilities Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1 (1986). See also Hurley v. Irish-American Gay Group, 515 U.S. 557 (1995) (state may not compel parade organizer to allow participation by a parade unit proclaiming message that organizer does not wish to endorse).

[3] Sable Commc'ns of Cal., Inc. v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115, 127–28 (1989) (noting the previously recognized "'unique' attributes of broadcasting," primarily the problem of an unwilling captive audience, were not present in the context of dial-in services (quoting FCC v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 762 (1978))).

[4] Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844, 868–69 (1997) (saying the factors justifying greater regulation of broadcast "are not present in cyberspace").

[5] Packingham v. North Carolina, No. 15-1194, slip op. at 4–5 (U.S. June 19, 2017). See also Amdt1.7.7.1 The Public Forum.

Amdt1.7.11 Political Speech

Amdt1.7.11.1 Overview of Campaign Finance

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Federal and state governments regulate political campaign financing. At the federal level, the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA)[1] imposes contribution limits, source restrictions for contributions, disclosure and disclaimer requirements for political advertising, and a presidential public financing system.[2] In a landmark 1976 ruling, Buckley v. Valeo, and its progeny, the Supreme Court has held that such regulation can infringe on First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and association.[3] According to the Court, limits on campaign contributions—which involve giving money to an entity, such as a candidate's campaign committee—and expenditures—which involve spending money directly for electoral advocacy—implicate rights of political expression and association under the First Amendment.[4] Likewise, the Court has held that campaign disclosure and disclaimer requirements can infringe on the right to privacy of association and belief as guaranteed under the First Amendment.[5] In evaluating challenges under the First Amendment, the Court has assigned different standards of review to various types of campaign finance regulation, based on the burdens imposed and the government interests served.[6]

Amdt1.7.11.2 Campaign Finance Contribution Limits and Source Restrictions

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo held that contribution limits are subject to a more lenient standard of review than expenditure limits because they impose only a marginal restriction on speech and will be upheld if the government can demonstrate that they are a "closely drawn" means of achieving a "sufficiently important" governmental interest.[1] Unlike expenditure limits, which reduce the amount of expression, the Court opined that contribution limits involve "little direct restraint" on the speech of a contributor.[2] While acknowledging that a contribution limit restricts an aspect of a contributor's freedom of association by affecting a

---

[1] Codified, as amended, primarily at 52 U.S.C. §§ 30101–30146 and sections of titles 18 and 26. FECA was first enacted in 1971, and was amended in 1974, 1976, 1979, and most recently and significantly, by the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), Pub. L. No. 107-155.

[2] The term disclaimer generally refers to statements of attribution that appear directly on a campaign-related communication, and the term disclosure generally refers to requirements for periodic reporting to the Federal Election Commission (FEC) that are publicly available for inspection.

[3] See 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam).

[4] See id. at 23.

[5] See id. at 64.

[6] For additional discussion on campaign finance, see Amdt1.7.11.2 Campaign Finance Contribution Limits and Source Restrictions, Amdt1.7.11.3 Campaign Finance Expenditure Limits, and Amdt1.7.11.4 Campaign Finance Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements.

[1] See 424 U.S. 1, 25 (1976).

[2] Id. at 21.

contributor's ability to support a candidate, the Court determined that a contribution limit still permits symbolic expressions of support and does not infringe on a contributor's freedom to speak about candidates and issues.[3]

Under the First Amendment, the Supreme Court has evaluated the constitutionality of specific types of contribution limits. In Buckley, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA)[4] base limits, which cap the amounts of money an individual can contribute to a candidate, party, or political committee.[5] In assessing whether a contribution limit is closely drawn, the Court determined it necessary to examine whether the limit is so low that it significantly impedes a candidate from raising the necessary funds for effective advocacy.[6] In Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, the Court announced that while limits must be closely drawn to a sufficiently important interest, the amount of the limitation "need not be 'fine tuned.'"[7] In contrast, in Randall v. Sorell, in a plurality opinion, the Court determined that contribution limits were too low to comport with First Amendment free-speech guarantees when they were substantially lower than limits previously upheld by the Court and limits in effect in other states.[8]

Similarly, in McConnell v. FEC, the Supreme Court upheld against facial constitutional challenges, among other things, a prohibition on national political parties fundraising or spending federally-unregulated funds, known as soft money.[9] The Court determined that the subject provisions of law are, in effect, contribution limits and source restrictions—not expenditure limits because they do not limit the total amount of funds that parties can spend.[10] Hence, the Court applied the "less rigorous" standard of scrutiny that it applied in Buckley to contribution limits.[11] However, the McConnell Court invalidated a prohibition on individuals age seventeen and under from making contributions, reasoning that minors enjoy First Amendment protection and that the prohibition was not closely drawn to serve a sufficiently important government interest.[12]

The Court has considered the constitutionality of aggregate contribution limits, which cap the total amount that an individual can contribute to a candidate, political party, or political committee. In Buckley, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a FECA aggregate contribution limit in effect in 1976, characterizing the limit as a "quite modest restraint" that served to prevent circumvention of base limits.[13] In McCutcheon v. FEC, however, in a plurality opinion, the Court invalidated a similar aggregate limit, determining that regardless of whether strict scrutiny or the "closely drawn" standard applies, the Court needed to "assess

[3] See id. at 21, 24.

[4] Codified, as amended, primarily at 52 U.S.C. §§ 30101–30146 and sections of titles 18 and 26. FECA was first enacted in 1971, and was amended in 1974, 1976, 1979, and most recently and significantly, by the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), Pub. Law No. 107–155.

[5] See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 29.

[6] See id. at 21.

[7] 528 U.S. 377, 387–88 (2000) (quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 30, n. 3).

[8] See id. at 261.

[9] 540 U.S. 93, 188–89 (2003).

[10] See id. at 138–39. ("Plaintiffs contend that we must apply strict scrutiny to § 323 because many of its provisions restrict not only contributions but also the spending and solicitation of funds raised outside of FECA's contribution limits. for purposes of determining the level of scrutiny, it is irrelevant that Congress chose in § 323 to regulate contributions on the demand rather than the supply side.") Id. at 138.

[11] Id. 138–39

[12] See id. at 137, 231–32 (citing Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 511–513 (1969); Buckley, 424 U.S. at 20–22).

[13] See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 38.

the fit" between the government's stated objective and the means to achieve it.[14] Observing a "substantial mismatch" between the two, the opinion concluded that even under the more lenient standard of review, the limits could not be upheld.[15]

In Davis v. FEC, the Supreme Court held that a FECA provision establishing a series of staggered increases in contribution limits for candidates whose opponents significantly self-finance their campaigns violates the First Amendment.[16] The Court reasoned that limits on a candidate's right to advocate for his or her own election are not justified by the compelling governmental interest of preventing corruption because the use of personal funds actually lessens a candidate's reliance on outside contributions, thereby counteracting coercive pressures and risks of abuse that contribution limits seek to avoid.[17]

The Supreme Court has also upheld the constitutionality of laws limiting who can make a campaign contribution, known as a source restriction. In FEC v. Beaumont, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a FECA prohibition on corporations making direct campaign contributions from their general treasuries in connection with federal elections.[18] The Court observed that large, unlimited contributions can threaten "political integrity," necessitating restrictions in order to counter corruption or its appearance.[19] In that same vein, while not issuing an opinion, the Supreme Court in Bluman v. FEC affirmed a lower court ruling that upheld the constitutionality of another FECA source restriction that prohibits contributions by foreign nationals.[20]

Amdt1.7.11.3 Campaign Finance Expenditure Limits

First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

In contrast to contribution limits, the Supreme Court has determined that expenditure limits impose a substantial restraint on speech and association and, hence, are subject to a

---

[14] See McCutcheon, 572 U.S at 199.

[15] Id.

[16] See Davis v. FEC, 555 U.S. at 740, 744 (2008). See also FEC v. Ted Cruz for Senate, No. 21-12, (U.S. May 16, 2022) (holding that a FECA limit on the amount of post-election campaign contributions that may be used to repay a candidate for personal loans made pre-election violates the First Amendment, determining that the limit did not serve the governmental interest of avoiding quid pro quo candidate corruption).

[17] See id. While conceding that the law did not directly impose a limit on a candidate's expenditure of personal funds, the Court concluded that it impermissibly required a candidate to make a choice between the right of free political expression and being subjected to discriminatory contribution limits, and created a fundraising advantage for his or her opponents. See id. See also Ariz. Free Enterprise Club's Freedom Club PAC v. Bennett, 564 U.S. 721, 755 (2011) (holding unconstitutional a voluntary public financing system that granted additional financing to a publicly-financed state office candidate in response to a privately-financed opponent engaging in spending, because it subjected privately-financed candidates and independent expenditure groups to "a substantial burden" on their political speech).

[18] 539 U.S. 146, 163 (2003). While FECA prohibits contributions by corporations and labor unions from their own funds or "general treasuries," the law permits contributions from separate segregated funds or political action committees (PACs) that are established and administered by corporations and unions. 52 U.S.C. §§ 30118(a), 30118(b)(2)(C).

[19] Id. at 154–55. Regarding corporations specifically, the Court determined that the corporate structure requires careful regulation to counter the "misuse of corporate advantages." Id. at 155.

[20] See Bluman v. FEC, 800 F. Supp. 2d 281, 288 (D.D.C. 2011), summ. aff'd, 565 U.S. 1104 (2012) (upholding, among other things, the constitutionality of the FECA prohibition on foreign nationals making contributions, identifying the compelling governmental interest in limiting foreign citizen participation in the U.S. government by preventing foreign influence over the U.S. political process).

strict scrutiny standard of review that requires narrow tailoring to serve a compelling governmental interest.[1] According to the Court in Buckley v. Valeo, expenditure limits impose a restriction on the amount of money that a candidate can spend on communications, thereby reducing the number and depth of issues discussed and the size of the audience reached.[2] Such restrictions, the Court determined, are not justified by an overriding governmental interest because expenditures do not involve money flowing directly to the benefit of a candidate's campaign fund and hence, the risk of quid pro quo corruption does not exist.[3] Upon a similar premise, the Court rejected the government's interest in limiting the ability of a wealthy candidate to draw upon personal wealth to finance a campaign and invalidated a law limiting expenditures from personal funds.[4] When a candidate self-finances, the Court observed, the candidate's dependence on outside contributions is reduced, thereby lessening the risk of corruption.[5]

Relying on Buckley, in the 2010 decision of Citizens United v. FEC, the Court invalidated two FECA prohibitions on independent electoral spending by corporations and labor unions.[6] The Court invalidated, first, the long-standing prohibition on corporations and labor unions[7] using their general treasury funds for independent expenditures,[8] and second, a Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA) prohibition on the use of such funds for electioneering communications.[9] According to the Court, independent expenditures and electioneering communications are protected speech, regardless of whether the speaker is a corporation. Although the statutory prohibition contained an exception that permitted the use of corporate treasury funds to establish, administer, and solicit contributions to a political action committee (PAC) for such spending,[10] the Court determined that merely permitting speech through a PAC does not equate to allowing a corporation to speak directly because corporations and PACs are separate associations.[11] The Court also concluded that upholding the ban on corporate independent electoral spending would have the "dangerous, and unacceptable" result of permitting Congress to prohibit the political speech of media corporations.[12] [1] See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 23 (1976).

---

[2] See id.

[3] See id. Essentially, quid pro quo corruption captures the notion of "a direct exchange of an official act for money." See, e.g., McCutcheon v. FEC, 572 U.S. 185, 192 (2014).

[4] See id. at 58.

[5] See id. at 53 ("[T]he use of personal funds reduces the candidate's dependence on outside contributions and thereby counteracts the coercive pressures and attendant risks of abuse to which the Act's contribution limitations are directed.")

[6] 558 U.S. 310 (2010). See also Am. Tradition P'ship. v. Bullock, 567 U.S. 516 (2014) (per curiam) (rejecting arguments attempting to distinguish a state law from the federal law invalidated by Citizens United and reiterating that "political speech does not lose First Amendment protection simply because its source is a corporation.").

[7] Although the issue before the Court was limited to the application of the prohibition on independent expenditures and electioneering communications to Citizens United, a corporation, the reasoning of the opinion also appears to apply to labor unions. ("The text and purpose of the First Amendment point in the same direction: Congress may not prohibit political speech, even if the speaker is a corporation or union.") Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 376.

[8] Codified at 52 U.S.C. § 30118(a) (defining an "independent expenditure" as a communication that "expressly advocat[es] the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate" and is not coordinated with any candidate or party).

[9] Codified at 52 U.S.C. §§ 30118(b)(2), 30104(f)(3) (defining an "electioneering communication" to include "any broadcast, cable, or satellite" transmission that "refers to a clearly identified" federal office candidate and is transmitted within 60 days of a general election or 30 days of a primary).

[10] 52 U.S.C. § 30118(b)(2)(c). The law also permits a corporation to establish a PAC in order to make contributions. As a result of Citizens United, corporations are currently only required to use PAC funds to make contributions, not expenditures.

[11] See Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 337.

[12] Id. at 351.

While invalidating the FECA ban on corporate and union-funded independent expenditures, the Citizens United ruling also overturned a 1990 ruling, Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce,[13] determining that it conflicted with a 1978 precedent, First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti.[14] In Bellotti, the Court had invalidated a state prohibition on corporate independent expenditures related to referenda, holding that the government cannot restrict political speech because the speaker is a corporation.[15] Criticizing the Austin decision for "bypass[ing] Buckley and Bellotti," the Court in Citizens United rejected the "antidistortion interest" that the Court in Austin "identified" to justify limits on political speech.[16] According to the Court, independent expenditures, including those made by corporations, do not cause corruption or the appearance of corruption.[17] The Court further denounced the Austin precedent for permitting "interfer[ence] with the 'open marketplace' of ideas protected by the First Amendment" through a ban on speech by millions of associations of citizens—many of them small corporations without large aggregations of wealth.[18]

Similarly, in invalidating the BCRA-enacted prohibition on corporate and union treasury-funded electioneering communications, the Citizens United ruling overruled a portion of its 2003 decision in McConnell v. FEC that upheld the facial validity of the prohibition, concluding that the McConnell decision had relied on Austin.[19] The Court reached this conclusion despite a limiting principle imposed by a 2007 ruling, FEC v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. (WRTL).[20] In WRTL, the Court had narrowed the definition of an electioneering communication to mitigate concerns that the law could prohibit First Amendment protected issue speech, known as issue advocacy. According to the Court in WRTL, the term "electioneering communication" could constitutionally encompass only express advocacy[21]—communications expressly advocating for the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, including for example, statements such as "vote for" or "vote against"—or the "functional equivalent" of express advocacy. Further, the Court in WRTL advised that communications that could reasonably be interpreted as something other than an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate could not be considered electioneering communications.

---

[13] 494 U.S. 652 (1990).

[14] Id. at 348. ("The Court is thus confronted with conflicting lines of precedent: a pre-Austin line that forbids restrictions on political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity and a post-Austin line that permits them.")

[15] 435 U.S. 765 (1978).

[16] Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 348 (determining that "the corrosive and distorting" impact of large amounts of money that were acquired with the benefit of the corporate form, but were unrelated to the public's support for the corporation's political views, constituted a sufficiently compelling governmental interest to justify such a restriction).

[17] See id. at 357.

[18] Id. at 354.

[19] See id. at 365–66. Referencing Justice Antonin Scalia's concurrence in WRTL, the Court agreed with the conclusion that "Austin was a significant departure from ancient First Amendment principles," and held "that stare decisis does not compel the continued acceptance of Austin." Id. at 319 (quoting WRTL, 551 U.S. at 449 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)).

[20] 551 U.S. 449 (2007). WRTL was decided four years after the Supreme Court upheld the electioneering communication prohibition against a First Amendment facial challenge in McConnell v. FEC, 540 U.S. 93 (2003). While not expressly overruling McConnell, the Court in WRTL limited the prohibition's application.

