OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER, CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. Good morning, everyone. The committee is very privileged to have before us this morning Secretary Baker and Congressman Hamilton, two colleagues well known and admired I think by every person on this committee. We commend you for the work that you have done. This committee in the course of its deliberations on these issues, I assure you, will take into consideration very carefully the work and ability that you applied to reach consensus between five Democrats, five Republicans, and the fact that you had made available the opportunity for all types of people—private sector, public sector, people from abroad—to come and provide your study group with testimony.

I believe that I have watched you carefully, as others have, in appearances, and in your appearance yesterday before our Senate leadership joint session you indicated that every issue about this complex situation that is known to mankind was considered by your group.

Now, could you advise us with regard to your time constraints? There was some communication to Senator Levin and myself. Could you give us that estimate?

Mr. Baker. We're scheduled, Senator Warner, to leave the Capitol at 11 o'clock if we can.

Chairman Warner. We'll try our best to accommodate that schedule, we'll start out with say a 3-minute question round, so that hopefully all members can fit within that time constraint. We have a vote that will be superimposed on that, but the hearing will continue during the vote, and as members come and go just in an orderly way we'll ask our questions.

So, I once again thank you gentlemen and all members of your committee. I wish to also acknowledge my long-time friend and colleague, Frank Wolf, who came to me with this concept 2 years ago. We worked together on it, in concert with the United States Institute for Peace. I would hope that in your opening remarks you would comment on the value of that organization as it's helped you in this work. I want to thank Frank and others, because you're more or less a creation of the Congress of the United States. The idea came to fruition. You then, Mr. Baker, met with the President and he indicated his concurrence in going forward, and here we are, and you have your report.

So with that, I turn to Senator Levin for such remarks as you have.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator Levin. Mr. Chairman, I join you first in thanking the co-chairs of the Iraq Study Group. We thank the other members of that study group. We thank their staff for a really very comprehensive, important report.

Yesterday was surely an extraordinary day in the history of the Iraq war. A day which signaled the end of the administration’s “stay the course” policy and the beginning of the development of a new, realistic, bipartisan, and hopefully successful approach. First, Robert Gates was confirmed. Dr. Gates brought to this committee and the country a realistic view of the situation in Iraq, that after 3½ years we’re not winning and that the only way to end the violence is for the Iraqis to reach a political settlement.

Yesterday, the Baker-Hamilton Study Group issued a powerful comprehensive plan for change in course, including calling for an end to the open-ended commitment of American troops as a way of pressing the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future. Like Dr. Gates, the Baker-Hamilton report concludes that the violence cannot be stopped or even contained, “if there is no underlying political agreement among Iraqis about the future of their country.”

The report calls for U.S. combat brigades to move out of Iraq and says further that, “By the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq.”

A principal reason for the Iraq Study Group, that they called for these reductions, is as follows: “An open-ended commitment of American forces would not provide the Iraqi government the incentive it needs to take the political actions that give Iraq the best chance of quelling sectarian violence.” In the absence of such an incentive, the report says, the Iraqi government might continue to delay taking those difficult actions.

As I told President Bush yesterday at the White House, his statement a few weeks ago that, “We are going to stay in Iraq as long as the Iraqis ask us to be there,” creates the exact opposite impression. It maintains an open-ended commitment and removes the pressure from the Iraqis to take responsibility for their future.

I hope the administration will accept the recommendations in this report and will determine to change course as the best hope of turning around this “grave and deteriorating situation” in the words of the report.

Once again, I commend Secretary Baker, Congressman Hamilton, their colleagues, and their staff for an extraordinary bipartisan effort.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Levin.

Gentlemen, we’ll now receive your opening statements.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES A. BAKER III, CO-CHAIR, IRAQ STUDY GROUP

Mr. BAKER. Senator Warner, if it’s okay with the committee, I have an opening statement. I think my co-chairman, Congressman Hamilton does. We would submit those for the record and go to your questions if that would be acceptable.

Chairman WARNER. That’s fine.

Mr. BAKER. I think we should say, and Lee will probably have something to add to this, that we note your appreciative statements about Congressman Frank Wolf. Lee made the same remarks yesterday at our press conference, and many other people, Senator Warner, helped us in the preparation of this report and in the preparation for writing this report, including the administration, who was very supportive in providing documents and personnel, and travel and access to people, and things that we needed in order to do our job.

STATEMENT OF HON. LEE HAMILTON, CO-CHAIR, IRAQ STUDY GROUP

Mr. HAMILTON. Senator Warner, we are mindful of the fact that at the creation of the Iraq Study Group you were there, you were helpful to us. We deeply appreciate that, as indeed were other members of the Senate and the House. You’re quite right to acknowledge the initiative taken by Congressman Frank Wolf, without whose initiative there would be no Iraq Study Group. You’re right, of course, to recognize the important role that the United States Institute of Peace played. They gave us marvelous logistical support, expert support, all along the way, along with the Baker Institute, the Center for Strategic and International Studies, and the Center for the Study of the Presidency. They were all very helpful to us. As Jim has indicated, we had very strong support from the administration. We saw the people we wanted to see. They facilitated our travel and they made the documents available we needed.

The only thing I would say about the statement that I have submitted that we did not comment really very much in our public presentation yesterday is that we really spend a good bit of time on the whole question of resetting the American military. We consider that enormously important and I know this committee will likewise. We make some recommendations here about how to restore the U.S. military. I know this committee is very well-informed on that matter. We want to try to reinforce what you will do with your leadership.

[The joint prepared statement of Messrs. Baker and Hamilton follows:]

JOINT PREPARED STATEMENT BY JAMES A. BAKER III AND LEE H. HAMILTON

Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, distinguished members of the Committee on Armed Services. It is a distinct honor to appear before you this morning, and to have the opportunity to discuss the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group report.

We want to begin by thanking Chairman Warner for his strong support from the outset of the work of the Iraq Study Group. We also thank Chairman Warner and Senator Levin for taking the time to meet with the Study Group. Our work is better informed because of the wise counsel you gave.

THE SITUATION IN IRAQ

The situation in Iraq today is grave and deteriorating. Violence is increasing in scope and lethality. Attacks on U.S. forces—and U.S. casualties—continue at an alarming rate.

The Iraqi people are suffering great hardship. The democratically elected government that replaced Saddam Hussein is not adequately advancing the key issues: national reconciliation, providing basic security, or delivering essential services. Economic development is hampered. The current approach is not working, and the ability of the United States to influence events is diminishing.

The United States has committed staggering resources. Our country has lost 2,900 Americans, 21,000 more have been wounded. The United States has spent $400 billion in Iraq. Costs could rise well over $1 trillion.

Many Americans are understandably dissatisfied. Our ship of state has hit rough waters. It must now chart a new way forward.

A NEW WAY FORWARD

No course of action in Iraq is guaranteed to stop a slide toward chaos. Yet not all options have been exhausted.

We agree with the goal of U.S. policy in Iraq, as stated by President Bush: “an Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself.”

We recommend a new approach to pursue that goal. We recommend a responsible transition. Our three most important recommendations are equally important and reinforce one another:

• a change in the primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq, that will enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly;
• prompt action by the Iraqi government to achieve milestones—particularly on national reconciliation; and
• new and enhanced diplomatic and political efforts in Iraq and the region.

U.S. FORCES

The United States must encourage Iraqis to take responsibility for their own destiny. This responsible transition can allow for a reduction in the U.S. presence in Iraq over time.

The primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq should evolve to one of supporting the Iraqi Army, which would take over primary responsibility for combat operations. As this transition proceeds, the United States should increase the number of troops imbedded in and supporting the Iraqi Army, and U.S. combat forces could begin to move out of Iraq.

By the first quarter of 2008—subjected to unexpected developments on the ground—all U.S. combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq. U.S. combat forces in Iraq could be deployed only in units embedded with Iraqi forces, in rapid reaction and special operations teams, and in training, equipping, advising, and force protection. A key mission for rapid-reaction and special operations forces that remain would be to target al Qaeda.

It is clear that the Iraqi government will need assistance from the United States for some time to come. Yet the United States must make it clear to the Iraqi government that we could carry out our plans—including planned redeployments—even if the Iraqi government did not implement their planned changes.

The United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of troops deployed in Iraq.

RESTORING THE U.S. MILITARY

We also make several recommendations to restore the U.S. military:
• The new Secretary of Defense should make every effort to build healthy civil-military relations, by creating an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice not only to the civilian leadership in the Pentagon but also to the President and the National Security Council, as envisioned in the Goldwater-Nichols legislation.
• As redeployment proceeds, the Pentagon leadership should emphasize training and education programs for the force that have returned to the continental United States in order to “reset” the force and restore the U.S. military to a high level of readiness for global contingencies.
• As equipment returns to the United States, Congress should appropriate sufficient funds to restore the equipment to full functionality over the next 5 years.
• The administration, in full consultation with the relevant committees of Congress, should assess the full future budgetary impact of the war in Iraq and its potential impact on the future readiness of the force, the ability to recruit and retain high-quality personnel, needed investments in procurement and in research and development, and the budgets of other U.S. Government agencies involved in the stability and reconstruction effort.

MILESTONES

A military solution alone will not end the violence in Iraq—we must help the Iraqis help themselves. President Bush and his national security team should convey a clear message to Iraqi leaders: the United States will support them if they take action to make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and improving the daily lives of Iraqis.

If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones, the United States should reduce its political, military, or economic support for the Iraqi government.

DIPLOMACY

There is no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq. But to give the Iraqi government a chance to succeed, U.S. policy must be focused more broadly than on military strategy alone or Iraq alone. It must seek the active and constructive engagement of all governments that have an interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq, including all of Iraq’s neighbors.

To gain this constructive engagement, the United States should promptly initiate a New Diplomatic Offensive and, working with the government of Iraq, create an International Iraq Support Group to address comprehensively the political, economic, and military matters necessary to provide stability in Iraq. That support group should include Iraq, of course, and all of Iraq’s neighbors, including Iran and Syria, as well as Egypt, the U.N. Security Council Perm 5 member countries, a representative of the U.N. Secretary General, and the European Union.

Given the central importance of the Arab-Israeli conflict to many countries both in and out of the region, the United States must again initiate active negotiations to achieve a stable Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts in the manner we outline in the Report.

Altogether in this Report, we make 79 recommendations. In addition to Military, Political, and Diplomatic recommendations, which are equally important and reinforce each other, they cover a range of other areas: criminal justice, oil, reconstruction, the U.S. budget process, the training of U.S. Government personnel, and U.S. intelligence. These recommendations are important, and will greatly increase our ability to achieve a responsible transition in Iraq.

We agreed upon our recommendations after considering a full range of other approaches.

We have not recommended a “stay the course” solution. In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable. While we do recommend a five-fold increase in U.S. forces training Iraqi troops, we do not recommend increasing U.S. forces by in excess of 100,000 as some have suggested. Additional fully combat-ready U.S. forces of that magnitude are simply not available. We have not recommended a division of Iraq into three autonomous regions based on ethnic or sectarian identities, but with a weak central government. As a practical matter, such a devolution could not be managed on an orderly basis; and because Iraq’s major cities are peopled by a mixture of warring groups, a disorderly devolution would likely result in a humanitarian disaster or civil war. We also did not recommend a precipitate withdrawal of troops—because that might not only cause a bloodbath. It would also invite a wider regional war.

The approach we recommend has shortcomings. We recognize that implementing it will require a tremendous amount of political will and unity of effort by government agencies. It will require cooperation by the executive and legislative branches of government.

Events in Iraq may overtake what we recommend. For that reason, we believe that decisions must be made by our national leaders with urgency.

As it is now, people are being killed day after day—Iraqis and the brave American troops who are trying to help them. Struggling in a world of fear, Iraqis dare not dream. They have been liberated from the nightmare of a tyrannical order, only to face the nightmare of brutal violence.

As a matter of humanitarian concern, as a matter of national interest, and as a matter of practical necessity, it is time to find a new way forward—a new approach.

We believe that a constructive solution requires that a new political consensus be built—a new consensus here at home, and a new consensus abroad. In that spirit, we have approached our Study Group’s task on a bipartisan basis. So we are especially pleased to note that our group offers and supports each and every one of our recommendations unanimously.

We, of course, recognize that some people will differ with some of our recommendations. We nevertheless hope very much that, in moving forward, others will wish to continue to broaden and deepen the bipartisan spirit that has helped us come together.

We would be pleased to respond to your questions.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much. Thank you.

I will proceed now with 2 or 3 minutes. First, Congressman Hamilton, I’ve watched a number of the appearances and listened to you yesterday. You made two strong points yesterday to the joint leadership, and the chairmen and ranking members of several of our committees: one, the need for a bipartisan approach to unify as best we can Congress and the executive branch behind such future policies as the President may determine. Would you comment on that and once again establish how you feel that that is a very essential element to any success?

Mr. HAMILTON. I thank the Senator for his question. We are indeed impressed with the necessity of having a unity of effort in dealing with an extremely difficult foreign policy challenge. To the extent that the country is split, to the extent that the country is divided on how to deal with Iraq, we greatly weaken our ability to deal with the problem.

I’m impressed, as I’m sure you have been, with how much of the political debate seems to be people kind of talking passing in the night, as it were, and not really connecting with a genuine substantive policy debate. Bipartisanship is absolutely essential. What we tried very hard to do in this report, and I don’t know that we’ve succeeded entirely, is to put together realizable recommendations. Given the political environment in Washington, given the political environment in Iraq, what can be done in both of these governments to put together an effective policy? That’s a very tough policy problem and we tried to say that in order for this to happen it can’t be pie in the sky, it can’t be idealistic; it has to be very pragmatic as to the recommendations, and so we hope they are achievable recommendations.

The fact of the matter is you have President Bush in office for 2 more years. The fact of the matter is that the report that we put before you must largely be implemented by the executive branch. You cannot dodge that fact. It is a fact of political life, and Congress will play an important role, should play an important role, but Congress cannot implement the decisions in this report for the most part. There are some legislative matters to be addressed.

So we feel the approach of bipartisanship and unity of effort is absolutely critical to the success of our policy.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you for that. To take off on your question on Congress, Congress having really been the impetus that established this group, the President will now look at the options that his internal National Security Council provides for him, certain other perspectives that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs will give, and then he has to synthesize this and make these decisions.

I’ve recommended that somehow Congress reinvolve itself, obviously not the whole Congress, but the leadership of Congress. I would hope that the President would consult with them before he finally promulgates to the public and to the world his views.

Do you think that would be a wise idea?

Mr. HAMILTON. I certainly do, and I think Congress is quite capable of doing that. I do have some questions about your word “synthesize.” I think it’s terribly important that we understand that you cannot solve the Iraqi problem in pieces, and so you have to approach it comprehensively. If you think you can solve the problem of Iraq by manipulating the troop levels, I think you have it dead wrong. If you think you can solve the problem by economic reconstruction or political action, I think that’s wrong, too.

What has to be done is that all of the tools of American power have to be integrated carefully here—political, economic, military for sure—and to use those effectively. What you have to have is a comprehensive approach.

Chairman WARNER. Excuse me. My time is running out. I think I concur generally with that. I used the word deliberately because the President must take into consideration the perspectives from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. That’s what I meant.

Mr. HAMILTON. That’s correct.
Chairman Warner. But you concur generally that Congress would be helpful to look at it once before, likely through the leadership, whatever private meetings can be arranged, before it goes out, Secretary Baker?

Mr. Baker. Yes, I do, Senator. But let me reinforce what Mr. Hamilton has just said on two points. Bipartisanship is critical. This is an extraordinarily difficult problem and unless Congress comes together behind a unified approach, we’re going to have a tough time dealing with it.

Second, I hope we don’t treat this like a fruit salad and say, “I like this but I don’t like that, I like this but I don’t like that.” This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we’re facing in Iraq, but also designed to deal with other problems that we face in the region, and to restore America’s standing and credibility in that part of the world.

So that’s why we say in here that it’s important. These are interdependent recommendations we make, and we hope that when people look at them and start thinking about implementing them they’ll think about implementing all of them and certainly at least as many as they can.

Chairman Warner. I thank the witnesses. I just simply close with this observation: But the President under the Constitution has the responsibility and he has a great deal of valuable input coming before him.

Mr. Baker. That is correct.

Chairman Warner. Senator Levin.

Senator Levin. Thank you.

I agree with both of your comments about the need for a comprehensive approach. Secretary Baker, I heard you yesterday say on some radio program that the “stay the course” solution is no longer viable. Would you tell us why you believe that?

Mr. Baker. We took a look at this over a period of 9 months, Senator, and the principal recommendations in here are that we change the primary mission of U.S. forces, that we have a new diplomatic offensive that is very extensive and comprehensive, and that we work with the Iraqi government to create performance milestones which we expect them to live up to.

We condition most of our security assistance and economic assistance when we give it to other countries. There’s nothing unreasonable, we don’t think, about having some reasonable conditionality here, particularly when you’re talking about milestones worked out by the United States in consultation with the government of Iraq.

Senator Levin. Thank you. Your report says that American military forces cannot stop the violence or even contain it if there is no underlying political agreement among Iraqis about the future of their country. Then you go on to say that an open-ended commitment of American forces would not provide the Iraqi government the incentive that it needs to take the political actions that give Iraq the best chance of quelling sectarian violence. In the absence of such an incentive, the Iraqi government might continue to delay taking those difficult actions.

I’m wondering if perhaps you or Congressman Hamilton could give us your thinking behind that conclusion, which is a very, very significant one and one which many of us have been preaching here for a long time?

Mr. HAMILTON. One of the things we kept asking ourselves repeatedly through our discussions was what kind of leverage you could assert on the Iraqi government. The Iraqi government has not performed well. It's a weak government. If you look at the ministries of the Iraqi government, not a single one of those ministries are what you would call really effective, some better than others.

Now, our approach to this point has been one of giving assistance without conditionality, providing the troops without any reservation of any kind. If you look at this from the standpoint of the Iraqi government, that's a pretty good deal. We're supplying them a lot of money and a lot of troops. We're doing a lot of fighting. We're taking a lot of bloodshed. We're pouring huge resources into there, and why wouldn't they be satisfied with that? Why wouldn't they criticize our report, as they did yesterday?

But the fact of the matter is this government has not taken the tough steps it needs to take, the Iraqi government, on the three key issues of national security, on the security question, national reconciliation, and providing just the basic services of any governing power—electricity and water and all the rest of it.

Now, how do you get them to do it? What kind of leverage do you have? We believe that the troop level question is one point of leverage, and we have to say to those folks that we're just not going to be there indefinitely. There are limits to American patience, there are limits to American resources, and you have to get moving and get your act together. Among the things you have to do—and you mentioned this—is to deal with the political problem.

Again and again the comment from the experts is that you cannot solve this problem by military power alone. Military power is important, but fundamentally you have to deal with the underlying political problems of that country. Now, there's no mystery as to what has to be done. What has to be done is that the various elements of that country have to be given a fair deal, a fair shake, in the political structure of the country.

If you're going to ignore 20 percent of the people in the country, the Sunnis who have traditionally ruled the country, they're going to be pretty upset about it and they're going to fight and they're going to bring violence to the table, and they feel they're being shut out of the game, and that's one of the principal driving forces behind the sectarian violence that is now taking place.

So the idea here is leverage through aid, leverage through troop levels, letting the Iraqis know firmly that they have to move and make substantial progress in a whole variety of areas—we spell it all out in the report—and that that has to be done promptly. That brings up the question of time frame. I see people talking about very elongated time frames. I don't think you have that kind of time frame here. You're dealing with time frames of weeks and maybe days.

Throughout our consideration of this report, we were constantly aware that events could overtake us. Maybe they have, I don't know, and tomorrow morning maybe they will. But you are where you are. You have to deal with the circumstances that you have.
We’ve put forward a plan that we think has a reasonable chance of success in that region if it is well carried out.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

Mr. BAKER. At the same time, Senator Levin, I think it’s fair to say, and I know Lee would agree with this, that our panel, our Study Group, understands the difference between political will to take the actions that we want the Iraqi government to take, and ability to take those actions. So if you will look at the report carefully, you will see that what we say is that if they do not make substantial progress toward the completion of these milestones, or toward meeting these milestones, the United States should reduce its political, economic, or military support. It’s phrased dysjunctively because there could be, and probably will be, occasions where they might try in good faith to meet a milestone they’ve agreed to with us but not be able to, simply as a matter of capacity.

So I want to call the committee’s attention to that particular provision. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

I wish to advise the committee that the vote will be at 10:45. Consequently, I’m certain that we can conclude our committee meeting and give every member present the opportunity to question our witnesses.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. I want to thank the panel and especially our two leaders for the outstanding work and effort they’ve made to try to help us through this difficult dilemma which we face, and I very much appreciate not only their present, but past service to the country.

I do believe that General Jack Kean, who was I believe on your panel of military advisers, said, “Based on where we are now, we can’t get there,” adding that the report’s conclusions say more about, “the absence of political will in Washington than the harsh realities in Iraq.”

I agree with him, particularly in light of your conclusions on page 73, which say: “Because of the importance of Iraq to our national security goals and our ongoing fight against al Qaeda, we considered proposals to make substantial increases in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. We rejected this course because we do not believe that the needed levels are available for a sustained deployment.”

My studies and figures show that they are available for sustained deployment, at least in order to get the situation under control, number one.

I want to tell you something that I know that you know. There’s only one thing worse than an overstressed Army and Marine Corps, and that’s a defeated Army and Marine Corps. We saw that in 1973. I believe that this is a recipe that will lead to sooner or later our defeat in Iraq. I don’t believe that a peace conference with people who are dedicated to your extinction has much short-term gain. I do not believe that a regional conference with Iran and Syria, who obviously have at least very difficult short-term goals than the United States of America, including a 1,000-year-old ambition on the part of the Persians to exert hegemony in the area, are probably, at least in the short term, going to lead to a viable solution or one that we would agree on.

But most of all, this issue of saying that we don't support increased number of troops because we've always known now that there was not enough troops there. That is the overall consensus of opinion. To say that we don't have enough troops, but we'll threaten to have less unless you somehow react in a way that we want you to, is a degree of impracticality. To withdraw the troops and then still have thousands of American soldiers embedded in Iraqi units that are of questionable value or loyalty, I think, puts at risk a large number of American military advisers.

I'd like to hear your response to that, but I do also want to thank you again, with the greatest respect, for the hard work that you and the other members of the commission did.

Mr. BAKER. Thank you, Senator. Let me say one or two things, and I know Lee will have some comments as well.

First of all with respect to the augmentation of forces, we call for a fivefold increase in the U.S. combat forces dedicated to the training and equipping mission. We do point out that those forces could be—it's up to the commander in chief, of course—available perhaps in region without bringing them in from the United States. Or they might be brought in from the United States.

We did receive commentary from people to the effect, generally, that we do not have readily available combat forces up to the level of 100,000, that if that were the policy approach that was suggested, that would be available to go in there for at least quite some time.

We're not suggesting a regional conference, Senator McCain, as a solution or a panacea to this. It is really only part of a comprehensive strategy. General Kean's comments we noted today as well, and what I think he really was saying, at least the way I read them, was that the training and equipping mission would not succeed, and that's his opinion. We received opinions to the contrary, but whether he's right or whether the others are right, we think it's worth a try, particularly if we're going to enhance the number and the capability of our trainers, as is also called for in this document.

Mr. HAMILTON. Senator McCain, that relates to the risk with embedded American forces with Iraqi forces. You're absolutely right about that, there are risks there. If you put American forces right in the middle of this sectarian violence working with Iraqi forces, those young men and perhaps young women too are in a place of danger.

Now, we tried to deal with that by saying that we're going to do everything we can by way of force protection. We will have combat forces there to protect the embedded forces. We're going to have all kinds of logistics and supply efforts to help them. But there is no blinking the fact that that's a risky mission and a different mission and we should not slide over it, as you have not in your comments.

The comment the general made about we can't get there is a deeply pessimistic comment, not without some basis. We appreciate the fact that the training of Iraqi forces did not go very well for the first 2 years. We do believe that we've learned and, through trial and error, that our efforts over the past year have been much better, and we believe that an intensive effort over the next 18 months can make a difference in this military training. We don't underestimate that task at all.

It is certainly the case that the Iraqi units perform better when the U.S. trainers are present, and if we accelerate that effort we believe we can make a difference in getting where we want to go. So this is a very, very important part of the security arrangements in that country. Incidentally, this embedding idea is strongly supported by the Iraqi government itself. It obviously doesn't agree with all of our report, but it does agree with this part of it.

Are we convinced that this is going to work? We just believe it's the best plan possible under the circumstances, and obviously everything we do to protect the forces that are engaged in whatever capacity just has to be done.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. BAKER. Senator McCain, may I just add to what Lee has said? We're not only increasing fivefold the combat forces dedicated to training and calling for the best U.S. combat personnel to be engaged in this; we're also suggesting that they be inserted all the way down to the company level. We had a lot of very difficult discussions about this issue you raise about forces to be left there to protect our trainers and our embedded U.S. forces with the Iraqi forces. It was the subject of some dispute and debate. I think we have come up with language on page 72 of the document, Senator, that will enable us to maintain sufficient combat forces there in a robust deployment that we will be able to protect our trainers. I discussed this indirectly with General Pace, and I think he agrees with that.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just would like to say it should alarm us—and it's out of the scope of your study—that with 300 million people in America and the responsibilities we have throughout the world that we don't have enough troops to surge in Iraq, which was your conclusion. I do not believe it would require 100,000, but I won't waste the time of the committee. But I think there's a disconnect between what you're recommending and the situation on the ground. I very much appreciate all your work.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator McCain.

I hope in the course of your dialogue here today you can touch once again on the involvement or noninvolvement of our troops in combat relating to sectarian violence. Speaking for myself, I think they should not be put in positions where if Iraqi troops decide to get involved directly in trying to fight against the Sunni, or fight against the Shia, because of this senseless, wanton killing for religious reasons, I do not think they're there for that purpose.

Mr. BAKER. Senator Warner, just one more thing with reference to Senator McCain's very, very valid point. We also call, Senator, for support of a short-term surge of forces for the mission in Baghdad if U.S. commanders should suggest it.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

Senator Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Time does not permit me to adequately express my respect for both of you gentlemen, and my thanks for the work you have done for our country and that you are doing.
The theme of your report seems to be that the United States should be moving quickly to find an end to our involvement in Iraq and allow Iraqis to take control of their future. You emphasize that the U.S. involvement in Iraq cannot be permanent, and I agree. Meanwhile, the 2002 Iraqi war resolution is outdated and does not take into account the current situation.

In June, I introduced an amendment in the Senate with Senator Snowe that would provide an exit strategy for Iraq that is not based upon dates. The amendment would have sunset the war resolution based on conditions such as Iraq taking control of security, other countries relieving U.S. troops of their mission to support the Iraqi Security Forces, the President declaring the mission in Iraq to be complete, and so on and so on. In short, this amendment would have put an exit strategy in law, signaled the finite commitment of the United States to Iraq, and set forth a path for U.S. troops to come home, while avoiding the mistake of Congress’s trying to micromanage military decisions.

Secretary Baker and Congressman Hamilton, is it not time for Congress to take a fresh look at the outdated use of force resolution that was passed in 2002 without my vote? Isn’t it time?

Mr. HAMILTON. Senator, we really did not express a view on that. One of the rules we followed pretty closely throughout the consideration of our work was not to look backwards, and we did not look at the resolution that you refer to. I really don’t have a judgment with regard to its adequacy for the present situation.

I saw the piece in the post by my friend Michael Lennon today, but we did not make a judgment about that. We operated with a very strict rule that we would not try to evaluate the past. Our mandate was to look forward. We are where we are. What do we do from this point on was the question we addressed, and we really do not have a judgment about this resolution.

Senator BYRD. Secretary Baker?

Mr. BAKER. I would agree with that, Senator Byrd. I haven’t studied it and we did not study it as a part of our report because it was a past tense action.

Senator BYRD. I think you’re exactly right and were exactly right, but I ask the question again: Isn’t it time—maybe you can help us a little on this—for Congress itself, us, to take a fresh look at the outdated use of force resolution that was passed in 2002? Would you venture a response? Do you think it’s time?

Mr. HAMILTON. Senator, I think if such a resolution were in the form and supported strongly, which would reinforce the role of Congress in the very grave question of sending young men and women into harm’s way, and would contribute to a unified effort and more bipartisan support, such a resolution could play a very, very important role in terms of strengthening American foreign policy in the region.

Senator BYRD. That’s a very helpful response.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Might I just elicit a response from Secretary Baker?

Chairman WARNER. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I wouldn’t disagree with my co-chairman. He’s the legislative expert, Senator. I’m an executive branch expert, or maybe not an expert, but all of my experience has been in the executive branch. So if the distinguished gentleman on my left says that as a legislative matter it would be appropriate, I'll go along with that.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator BYRD. Good answer. Thank you both.

Mr. BAKER. Reluctantly. Reluctantly, Senator, reluctantly.

[Laughter.]

Chairman WARNER. I raised a similar question to that about 6 months ago in the context of one of these hearings.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First of all, I can't think of any two people better equipped to handle this thing than the two who are doing it. I still work with Secretary Baker on a regular basis, and of course I've worked under Mr. Hamilton on the House Armed Services Committee. So I just appreciate the fact that the right people are doing this.

I have two questions. The first one is, if I could get an answer for the record because it would take too long, but I have not agreed quite often with some of the things of Senator Levin, some of the positions he's taken, but one that I have agreed with is we need to budget this stuff and not have it depend on these emergency supplementals. I notice the 79 specific recommendations. We have not gotten into that, and I'd like to do that. Some of the things that you're doing, I think, I'm glad you're talking about, and that is this 5-year limitation on reset. I had occasion to be to the Army logistics centers and see the lines, and I recognize that's going to be a very expensive thing and we need to address that.

Also on the train and equip. I've been more impressed than some of the rest of the people on this committee over the quality of training that we're giving these people. I was in Afghanistan. I've had 12 trips over there to the area of responsibility (AOR), and I saw the way that they are taking up their training, their abilities, and I think maybe a lesson could be learned in Iraq.

But I've also seen the equipment that they're using, up in Fallujah during one of the elections. I saw them carrying around this old Russian stuff. Most of it didn't work. So we have to get them the right equipment. You acknowledge this in the report, but again this is a very expensive thing, and I'd like to get something for the record on where we might go in addressing that and preparing ourselves fiscally for the future.

Mr. BAKER. On budgeting, Senator—and Lee's the one to answer this question, but on budgeting we have a specific recommendation about the question of supplementals in here.

Senator INHOFE. I know you do.

Mr. BAKER. We say the costs for the war should be included in the President's annual budget request starting in fiscal year 2008.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, sir, I understand that. I'm talking about amounts, so we can get an idea of what that's going to be. I applaud the fact that you've included that.

But one thing that was not in the report, when you talk about the advisory teams and the drawdowns that will be taking place or the redeployment, you talk about the ground forces, and I was a ground guy, so I have a prejudice in that direction. But nothing is really said about the air support. Right now, the only places outside of Iraq that we have that capability would be in Qatar, Bahrain, and maybe Kuwait.

But as we're drawing down, we also are going to lose some of our capability to take care of our F–16s, our A–10s, and other equipment that's going to provide ground support. Now, I would like to see that added as a component of the ground deployment, and I wondered if you had any comments about whether or not you took that into consideration, and if not where we should go with that?

Mr. HAMILTON. That's totally consistent, Senator, with everything we heard. I think we used the word “support.” Perhaps we weren't specific enough in some respects. But air support is clearly needed in large quantities, maybe needed in even larger quantities if we go to this embedded idea. So that equipment has to be available and the people have to be trained for that.

I want to say that, with regard to your comment on the quality of training, I think was quite appropriate, and I just emphasize that I really do think we've made improvements here in training. It took us a while. I think we were a little slow to learn on it, but we're getting it right, I believe. It's terribly important that we do.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you very much for your service.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Lieberman.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you.

Thanks to both of you for the contribution that you've made to the decisions that the President and Members of Congress now have to make about what to do in Iraq. I want to make two quick points and ask a question. I think perhaps the most significant thing you've done is to set an example for us, that five Democrats and five Republicans sat and reasoned together about what we should do in Iraq to succeed, because you have stated your understanding quite clearly of the importance of how our involvement ends in Iraq, how important it is to end it successfully.

Too much of our debate here about Iraq has been carried out in partisan press conferences, and that has to end and I think you've created an example for us as to how to do that.

The second point is that I must say, notwithstanding what the media has said, I find that large parts of the report are not that different than the course—it's not “stay the course,” but than the policies that we have been following. In the cases where you have made a choice, I want to compliment you and say I think you've made some right choices.

For instance, you have rejected the idea of a deadline by which we must remove all of our troops from Iraq because of what's at stake there. You have rejected the idea of a time line to begin withdrawal of troops. You have said, “All combat brigades not necessary for force protection could”—I emphasize, “could”—“be out of Iraq by the first quarter of 2008.”

In fact, as you said, Secretary Baker, the report does recommend a surge in our forces there now to try to grab hold of the situation, particularly in Baghdad. So I appreciate that you have expressed that consensus, because these are ongoing debates here.

The question is this, and let me just say that I totally support the idea of a regional approach, an international conference. I believe that the United States is strong enough never to fear to sit... down and talk to anyone. But if I may say respectfully, others have described this commission as composed of realists. You haven't described yourself that way. I'm skeptical that it's realistic to think that Iran wants to help the United States succeed in Iraq. They are, after all, supporting Hezbollah, which gathers people in a square in Beirut to shout “Death to America.” They are giving sophisticated IEDs to the militias which are killing Americans every day in Iraq.

So to say that, as you do, that Iran should stem the flow of arms and training to Iraq, respect Iraq's security and territorial integrity, and use its influence over Iraqi Shia groups to encourage national reconciliation—why is there any reasonable belief that the Iranians should do any of the things that you think they should do? If they do, won't they ask us an unacceptable price, which is to allow them to go ahead——

Mr. BAKER. Develop nukes?

Senator LIEBERMAN. Exactly.

Mr. BAKER. Yes. Senator, thank you. That's a very good question and let me answer it this way. First of all, we specifically exclude any linkage to the nuclear proliferation issue. We say that should not be taken up in any discussion we might have with Iran.

You're saying why should we approach them? There are two reasons in my opinion. One, we did so in Afghanistan and, guess what, they helped us. Now, you're quite right, they probably would much prefer to see us stay bogged down in Iraq. But approaching them in the context, Senator, of pulling together all of Iraq's neighbors to put the finger on each one of them and say, you can do this, you can do that, and they can all do a better job of not stirring, fomenting trouble, or they can do a better job of trying to assist. Some of them are actually trying to assist.

But if we ask Iran to come and they say no, we and the Iraqi government, and they say no, then we will hold them up to public scrutiny as the rejectionist state that they have proven to be. Now, we're not naive enough to think that in this case they may want to help. They probably don't. The President authorized me to approach the Iranian government. I did so, and they in effect said: We would not be inclined to help you this time around.

Fine. What do we lose by saying we're getting all of Iraq's neighbors together, we want you to come, and if they say no we show the world what they're all about.

Syria is a totally different issue, a totally different proposition, and I didn't understand you to say what makes you think we could get something out of Syria. What makes me think that is we have it, I have it, back in 1991 after 15 trips there, at a time when they were a state that sponsored terrorism. But we talked to them and we made them change 25 years of policy.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Yes, I agree with that. So I appreciate your answer. There's obviously a lot to gain from getting most of the neighbors who have common interests to ours in not seeing Iraq collapse and go into chaos. I'm just not convinced that the Iranians do, and I single out the Iranians. I appreciate the fact that you just said that—I don't want to put words in your mouth—that the Iranians probably won't want to assist us.
Mr. BAKER. We say it in the report, Senator. It’s in the report. We say we’ve approached them; based on our limited contact we suspect they will not come. But what do we lose by approaching them, in the same way that this same administration has approached them with respect to Afghanistan?

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Collins.

Senator COLLINS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First let me echo the thanks of my colleagues on this committee for your study, for your dedicated work. We really need a bipartisan approach to developing a new strategy for Iraq since the current strategy clearly has not been successful.

I appreciate your blunt assessment of where we are, your description of Iraq as a situation that is grave and deteriorating. It’s very realistic. I do share some of the concerns that have been expressed here this morning about some of the specific recommendations. Like my colleague from Connecticut, I must say that, while I’m always open to our country talking with anyone, I’m very skeptical that Syria, which has been the source, or the path for foreign fighters to get into Iraq, and Iran, which has provided munitions and IEDs that have killed or maimed so many of our troops, are really going to be partners in the solution.

For my question, however, I want to go back to the issue that Senator McCain has raised. Under your proposal we would have American advisers, both civilian and military, embedded in Iraqi units all over Iraq, down to the company level, as you’ve said. That means that thousands of Americans are going to be in units all over Iraq. If we withdraw all of the combat brigades, as you have recommended, except those necessary for force protection, how can we really ensure that we’re going to have a sufficient number of troops for force protection? It seems to me that’s going to require a massive effort if we’re dispersing our advisers.

I like the embedding concept. I think we should do more of it. But I’m just wondering as a practical matter whether that isn’t an invitation to attack American troops that are one by one in small units.

Mr. HAMILTON. We’re not at all satisfied with the present exposure of American forces and we want to make some changes. As we say in the report, the options in front of you aren’t very good. You want to get out in a way that is responsible. America has a lot of interests there and that’s why we reject the idea of a precipitous withdrawal. But we think the best course forward is the embedded approach; absolutely not risk-free.

We spent a lot of time in wording those sentences involving that in the report, and I think you’ll see that we made quite an allowance for the necessity of having the forces in place to protect Americans who are embedded. That’s what we mean by force protection, and it involves a lot of aspects and it includes having some American combat forces there, such as Special Operations Forces and rapid reaction teams so that you can move in quickly when a problem breaks out.

That will have some risks to it, and there will be some American casualties there, but not like I think we’re now suffering.
Mr. Baker. Combat brigades, Senator, dedicated to force protection.

Senator Collins. It just seems to me that you’re going to have to have a substantial combat presence in order to protect those advisers.

Mr. Hamilton. I think you will have to have substantial capabilities to protect those advisers, and obviously any American, every American Member of Congress, I’m sure wants to do whatever is necessary to protect those people. But you have to be candid here and the candor part of it is, when you put these men into Iraqi units they’re very exposed, and you have to do everything you can to protect them, but it’s not risk-free.

Mr. Baker. The Pentagon, of course, is coming up with its own study here in connection with where we go from here with Iraq. I don’t know this for certain, Senator, but I think they have done some looking at this business of how many combat brigades they might need for force protection if we beef up the training, equipping, and advising mission.

Senator Collins. Thank you.

Chairman Warner. Thank you very much, Senator. It’s an excellent question.

Senator Reed.

Senator Reed. Thank you very much, gentlemen, for your extraordinary work and the work of your colleagues.

This issue of troop levels, of surging troops, I think is an important one, and I think it rests on some basic questions: How many troops would be necessary, how long must they stay there, and for what purpose would they be sent into Baghdad in particular? Baghdad as I understand it is a city of about 6 million people. In your deliberations did you have a notion of how many additional troops would be necessary to make an impact?

Mr. Hamilton. In Baghdad?

Senator Reed. In Baghdad, if that was the only area we decided to be proactive.

Mr. Hamilton. I think we’re impressed that the operation in Baghdad has not gone well and has not met our expectations, and that the Iraqi forces that were assisting us there have not performed all that well. I don’t know that we have, Senator Reed, an exact estimate. The figure that Jim and I just mentioned to one another is 20,000. I think that was the figure that might be available in country pretty quickly to help in Baghdad.

Mr. Baker. General Corelli’s Reserves are about 20,000 in Kuwait and Germany, as I understand it.

Mr. Hamilton. Now, I know you’ve talked to the commanders a lot, but it’s not crystal clear to me that the commanders believe that additional forces will help all that much.

Senator Reed. My impression is that if you’re going to take this road, the force has to be substantial in size and you have to be prepared to be there for not 2 or 3 months as a demonstration, but probably longer than that, which again raises the issue of how such a force can be supported in size over the time.

It also raises the other issue, too, which is for what purpose. The strategy that’s being pursued there now, the clear, hold, and build strategy—and I think your report alludes to this—has become the clear, hold, and wait strategy, where military forces are on the ground, but not the complementary reconstruction, political governance aspects. I think your report goes to the point, unless we're able to do all of this together simultaneously, in a coordinated fashion, none of it will work.

Mr. HAMILTON. That's right.

Senator REED. So that begs the other question of, let's assume we're going to plus-up our forces in Baghdad, for just one example, by 50,000 troops. I think we have to ask the other question: How many more civilian personnel, how much more reconstruction money, how is it delivered? That has to be part of the equation because to simply talk in terms of troops misses the whole essence of this operation, which is it's a political dynamic and an economic dynamic, as well as a military one.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think you make a very good point. I don't want to understate this, but the clearing aspect is not the tough part. Now, you may sustain casualties there and obviously that's the most serious consideration, but we have the ability to clear, no doubt about that. The real question is can we hold? What has happened is that we have not been able to hold, and the very forces that you've pushed out filter back in again. Holding is very man-power-intensive. You would normally look to the police to help, but the police have been the most disappointing in terms of performance in Iraq, the various Iraqi police forces.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator, very much.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Chambliss.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, thank you once again for your strong leadership and your commitment to freedom and to the American people. We indeed owe you a debt of gratitude and we do thank you very much.

Going back to what Senator Lieberman was talking about with reference to the Syrians and the Iranians, I happen to like your approach to some sort of coalition approach to these two countries, and I'm not sure that we can ever achieve any sort of total peaceful resolution in that part of the world without the involvement of a number of those countries, and particularly in Iraq with regard to the Syrians and the Iranians.

However, you correctly point out in your report that the Iranians and the Syrians are providing financial assistance, they're providing training, they're also weaponizing to a certain degree the insurgents. Before we ever get to the point of a coalition group sitting down at a table or entering into any sort of diplomatic negotiations, should we not receive some sort of overt act from the Syrians and the Iranians relative to a public commitment to stopping the violence, and to ceasing their support of the insurgent activity in advance of any kind of diplomatic overture?

Mr. BAKER. Senator, the two countries, in our report, we approach them differently. With respect to Iran, we're not suggesting direct bilateral negotiations with Iran on a wide variety of issues, and particularly not the nuclear issue. We are suggesting that, with respect to Syria, in terms of progress on the Arab-Israeli conflict, going back to the Madrid conference of 1991 and the two tracks, one on Palestinians, one Lebanese-Syrian, we think we ought to try and reenergize that. That’s a different proposition.

On September 18, Secretary Rice attended a meeting of the International Compact for Iraq, which is an economic grouping of regional countries, and sat there in the meeting with the Iranian foreign minister. So I don’t know that preconditioning it in terms of inviting them to some sort of a regional meeting to improve the situation in Iraq is necessary. I don’t know that we lose anything by saying to them, you want to be part of the solution instead of part of the problem? If they say no, fine; everybody in the world knows the attitude that they take and we haven’t lost a thing, particularly given the fact we’ve already sat with them as recently as the 18th of September.

With respect to Syria, I think it’s different, Senator. I think there are some opportunities there, that it is in the national interest of the United States to explore the peace process.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Nelson, I inform my colleagues the vote has started.

Mr. HAMILTON. Excuse me.

Chairman WARNER. Please go ahead.

Mr. HAMILTON. We’ve had more than a little pushback on the Syrian and Iranian question because it’s a tough one.

We understand that the road to peace lies through Baghdad in Iraq and you don’t get peace unless a lot of things happen there. But we also believe that what you do in the region can be reinforcing of what steps are necessary to take in Iraq, and that Iraq’s neighbors have to play a role in all of this. Syria and Iran have very great influence over events within Iraq, particularly Iran, but also Syria. I just don’t think you can avoid that.

Now, it is quite true that the Iranians have not been all that helpful, as a matter of fact just the opposite, in Iraq today. But we do not think it’s in the Iranian interest for American policy to fail completely and to lead to chaos in that country. It is important to take a look at Iran itself. Iran is not a homogeneous population. Only slightly more than 50 percent of its population is Persian, and what they are really worried about is a flow of refugees into that country, which would be highly destabilizing.

So Iran has some interests here that we must not forget. Of course, they live in a very dangerous part of the world and they have huge security interests. It is quite possible—we don’t know that this is probable, but it is possible—that you can put together some incentives and disincentives that can attract them. As Jim has repeatedly pointed out, you don’t have much to lose here. Things are not going in a very good direction right now, and why not take some chance here in involving these countries?

Chairman WARNER. Secretary Baker, do you want to add?

Mr. BAKER. I want to just direct your attention if I could, Senator Chambliss, to the bottom of page 56, the top of page 57, with respect to the issues we would raise with Syria, if we could reenergize the peace process to deal with the Arab-Israeli conflict. You’ll find in there we would ask everything of them. We’re going to want their full cooperation in these assassinations in Lebanon, stop screwing around in Lebanon, implement U.N. Security Council 1701.
But there's one thing that, if we were able to bring Syria around—and you know, they're a Sunni Arab state. I think they want to resume good relations with their Sunni Arab neighbors, and I think they would much rather be on a normal relationship basis with the United States than they would their marriage of convenience with Iran. What could they do for us and what could they do for our ally Israel? They could—if we could bring Syria back, we could stop the flow of arms to Hezbollah, because they are the transit point, and that would cure Israel's Hezbollah problem.

Second, they have the ability in my opinion to get Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist, which would give Israel a negotiating partner on the Palestinian track, something that Israel badly wants.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

I note the vote is on, but we will be able to meet your deadline and all Senators if we keep it short. I will now turn to Senator Nelson.

Senator BILL NELSON. Thank you, and thank you to both of you. Your success in government has been extraordinary. Thank you again for your contribution. Secretary Baker, about the only thing that I disagree with your success in the past is the 34 days that you spent in Tallahassee, Florida.

Mr. BAKER. 37, Senator.

Senator BILL NELSON. 37 days in Tallahassee, Florida in November and December 2000. [Laughter.]

I want to point out that Associated Press has moved a story today that the prime minister of Israel said he disagreed with your recommendation of linkage of efforts to stabilize Iraq with the new moves to end Israel's conflict with its neighbors. Your report recommends negotiations toward the Syrian-Israeli peace agreement that would include Israel's return of the Golan Heights, Syria, ending its support for the terrorist groups, agreeing to full normalization with Israel, and ending its attempts to dominate Lebanon.

Are you suggesting that the war in Iraq cannot be resolved unless Israel and the United States reach an accord with the Golan Heights? I know you're talking about a comprehensive—if it's true, does it mean that the conflict in Iraq could be extended indefinitely by rejectionist hard-liners in conflicts that have long predated this Iraq conflict?

Mr. BAKER. I'm not sure you can say that, Senator. But let me mention one other thing that's in there that we recommended in connection with the Golan Heights. We don't suggest that if Syria does all these things you've outlined and that we have outlined here that there should be a peace agreement between Israel and Syria on the Golan Heights without a United States security guarantee. That's a very important point and should not be left out.

The reason we have the suggestion for a new diplomatic offensive in this document is because we think we need to have, as Congressman Hamilton has said, a comprehensive strategy to deal with the problems of Iraq and the problems of the region. I don't think there's anybody we talked to that did not raise this issue of our engagement on the Arab-Israeli peace process, and every one of them said without exception you need to become re-engaged in a very vigorous way on this issue.
Senator Bill Nelson. So too with the proposed two-state solution. The prime minister of Israel has said he wants to negotiate with Mahmoud Abbas. What do you recommend if Hamas says no dice?

Mr. Baker. I recommend that we bring Syria across and get them to get Hamas to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, so Israel would have a negotiating partner on the Palestinian track. That's exactly one of the main reasons for engaging Syria. If we can't do it we can't do it, but we don't lose a darn thing by trying.

Mr. Hamilton. Senator, there are a lot of moderate Arabs that you have to appeal to in order to solve the Iraqi problem. All of them are friends of ours—the Saudis, the Jordanians, the Egyptians, the Kuwaitis, the Gulf States. It goes on and on and on. Now, in order to appeal to the moderate Arabs—and this is hugely important in our relationship with Islam and the Islamic countries, 1.3 billion Muslims in the world—in order to appeal to that group, you have to be able to show that we are serious about dealing with the Arab-Israeli dispute. It is absolutely essential.

Now, you used the words, I think, are we requiring that we reach an accord? No, we're not requiring that and I don't think it's required. What is required is that the United States re-energize this process. We're not going to solve it. It's been here for a number of decades. We're not going to solve it quickly. So it's not so much a question of solving the problem. It is a question of the United States as the principal power being sensitive to this and trying to do what we can to move towards a solution of the Israeli-Palestinian problem. Without it, we have no credibility, we have no legitimacy, with the moderate Arabs, who are key for us.

Chairman Warner. Thank you very much.

Senator Graham.

Senator Graham. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Again, thank you both on behalf of our country. I think the biggest contribution you've made is to explain to us the state of affairs in Iraq as they are, and we may not agree on solutions for it, but that's a beginning point, and we've never really had a consensus until you came along. Things are not good.

Based on your review of our situation, not only just in Iraq but of our own military, do you think Congress would be well-advised to consider growing the Army and Marine Corps?

Mr. Baker. I personally do, but then I'm a former marine.

Mr. Hamilton. I do as well.

Senator Graham. We may have to draft you back into the Service here.

Mr. Baker. There's no such thing as a former marine. Let me correct the record. I am a marine.

Mr. Baker. That's right.

Senator Graham. I'm glad you're on our side, then and now.

Mr. Baker. That's right.

Senator Graham. Now, to me the heart of the matter is, we can differ about how to go forward and that's okay, nothing wrong with having different opinions. I get asked all the time, gentlemen, on the streets of South Carolina and every other place in the country
I go to: Are we in the middle of a bunch of people who could never solve their problems no matter how much we help them? So the question is, based on your assessment of the situation, are the Iraqi people capable of forming a democracy with the right assistance?

Mr. BAKER. I think so.

Mr. HAMILTON. Our whole premise of the policy is that they are.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. The second question is——

Mr. BAKER. Excuse me. The whole premise of our policy suggestions in our report is that they are.

Senator GRAHAM. That’s important for the country to hear, because a lot of Americans don’t believe that. Do you agree with that?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think I do agree with it. Your judgment on that would be better than mine. Now, I don’t want to pretend to you that I don’t have doubts.

Senator GRAHAM. I don’t mean to—well, I think we all have doubts. We probably have doubts about our own democracy. The Civil War was started in my State. We had a lot of doubts there, and I’m glad we resolved them in favor of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. There are a lot of pundits writing now about how the Iraqi government will never be able to get their act together and the whole situation is hopeless. That’s not exactly a policy. We are where we are. We have to deal with this. You have a democratically-elected government.

Senator GRAHAM. But you both believe, after having analyzed the situation, that there’s reason to believe with the right assistance they can pull this off?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes, we believe that. The “if” clause you used is hugely important.

Senator GRAHAM. That’s where the debate is, and I don’t want to monopolize more than my time.

Last question. If you asked the 10 members of the commission the question, is Iraq the central battle front in the war on terror, what answer would you have received?

Mr. BAKER. I’ll answer for myself, Senator. In my view it may not have been when we first went in, but it certainly is now.

Senator GRAHAM. The outcome affects the overall war on terror?

Mr. BAKER. It certainly does.

Senator GRAHAM. Mr. Hamilton?

Mr. HAMILTON. I would strike the word “the” and use “a”. It is a central front. Look, al Qaeda today is an important part of the violence, but not as important as sectarian violence. It is a central front in the war on terror, but to make it the central front overstates it.

Senator GRAHAM. Well said.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Clinton.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you very much again, gentlemen, for your service to our country once again. I think you can tell from the tenor and content of the questions that we’re searching for the best way to implement a series of policies and actions that might possibly move us forward.
As I listen to you and as I reviewed the report, I'm basically hearing two overriding suggestions: one, that we have to engender the will and assist the capacity of the Iraqi government to take the political and economic actions necessary to stabilize itself, and our biggest stick in order to do that is to make it clear we are not there unconditionally, we are not going to be babysitting a civil war, we are not going to take sides in sectarian violence. Is that a correct statement, number one?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think it’s a correct statement, but it’s not the only leverage we have, the troop level. I think the conditionality of aid is another leverage. I also think if you play it right the regional diplomacy which Jim has been talking about can be used very effectively as leverage on the Iraqi government.

But you're right, we think you have to encourage the Iraqi government to act, and the military troop level is a very important part of that.

Senator CLINTON. But let me follow up and ask about our own Government, because you have a series of recommendations that are both comprehensive and challenging. The idea of a Goldwater-Nichols process that would get us where we need to be, that took decades. We know it was contentious. It made significant changes. We don't have time for that.

You have other recommendations that talk about engaging the entire United States Government, using all the tools at our disposal. We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group, but we need the White House to become the “Iraq Results Group.” That is very frustrating for some of us. We don't understand the misjudgments and missteps that have been taken in the last years.

What advice can you give us as to the role that Congress can play to try to help create the conditions that our own Government will muster both the will and capacity to act along the lines that you’ve recommended, and that I think we in general agree need to be pursued?

Mr. BAKER. Senator Clinton, I think if Congress were to, in addition to praising this report, which many Members of Congress have and for which we are grateful, say this is a good basis for going forward and unifying the country behind a single approach to this difficult problem of Iraq, that would help, I think, the executive branch in its deliberations.

They just received the report yesterday, just like you just got it yesterday, and we've heard differing views here with respect to many of the recommendations. If Congress could come together behind supporting, let's say utopianly, all of the recommendations of this report, that would do a lot toward moving things downtown in my opinion.

Mr. HAMILTON. Congress is a co-equal branch of Government. I frankly am not that impressed with what Congress has been able to do. I think Congress has been extraordinarily timid in the exercise of its constitutional responsibilities on the question of warmaking and conducting war.

Now, the answers here are not easy, but in a word I think very robust oversight is necessary. I think it's been lacking. I think it has not been a strong performance by Congress. What can you do to most assure success of the policy? I would say very vigorous, robust oversight. Many of the problems that you mention that have occurred we did not examine because we thought they are out of our mandate. I think they could have been corrected with vigorous oversight.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

I feel I must make an observation here. Yes, Congress is very impressed with your report. But we, the Congress, I do not know the extent to which we will be able to share the President's internal review of his own security who will come up with a framework of points. So we have to be cautious as we, I'm sure, endorse what you have done, but at the same time I don't know to the extent we will have before us the full realm of the options that have been shown to the President, namely from his own internal staff, as well as from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs.

So before Congress rushes in, I'm just hopeful we can have all points.

Mr. BAKER. Thank you, Senator, but could you say this is good until something better comes along?

Chairman WARNER. I'll let your question stand unanswered. Thank you, dear friend. I know you too well.

Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. Gentlemen, let me add my word of thanks. I think you've rendered a great service to the country. Clearly now, or at least by the time the process of the Pentagon and the State Department and within the executive branch itself in addition to your good work, it'll be clear that this situation has been analyzed without regard to ideology, without regard to partisan affiliation, without regard to the consequences of the next election, but in the interests of the country.

I think the second service that you've rendered is to point out that this is not just about Iraq, that the debate seems to be, how do we fix Iraq. You've made clear that Iraq cannot be viewed in isolation and I think rendered a service in making that point.

There have been some, of course, during the course of the debates in Congress and during the recent election who have said that we need to have a phased withdrawal from Iraq. The irony of that to me is that we all agree we need to bring our troops home as soon as we can. The question is whether it's based upon domestic political considerations or based upon our national security interests.

I've always scratched my head and wondered why it's appropriate to threaten the Iraqis that unless they shape up we'll ship out, when in fact if we ship out before Iraq becomes more stable it remains an ongoing threat of a failed state which will provide opportunities for terrorists to regroup and to continue their assaults against the United States, not to mention the chance, the likelihood, of Iranian expansionism in the area.

I have really two questions, if I can ask them quickly. One is, Secretary Baker, you've been good to point out and your report points out on page 52 that the President has authorized you to approach the Iranians about their likely participation in diplomatic efforts to support stability in Iraq, and they've indicated to you they would be unlikely to participate. Did I get that correct, sir?
Mr. Baker. That’s correct.
Senator Cornyn. There are some who’ve criticized the President for not agreeing to talk to Iran. But from what you’ve told us here today, the President has authorized you to do so and they’ve indicated their disinclination.

Mr. Baker. Further to that, Senator, the President authorized his Secretary of State to attend a meeting with the Iranian Foreign Minister in the International Compact for Iraq on September 18. Furthermore, with respect to Afghanistan he authorized his administration to approach the Iranians to help us in Afghanistan and they did.

Senator Cornyn. You’ve been around this city a lot longer than I have, but sometimes these positions appear to be caricatured in a way that isn’t justified by the facts. I appreciate your pointing that out.

Mr. Baker. Before you ask the second question, may I just say something about the “shape up or ship out”? We had to walk a fine line here between being overbearing in that regard and giving the Iraqis the message that we can’t just stay there forever if they’re not willing to take some political actions that they need to take.

So the sentence was very carefully crafted. You can look at it at your convenience, but it says if they do not make substantial progress on these milestones, the United States could reduce its military, political, or economic support. So it’s not a case of shipping out necessarily. The President will have the latitude to determine what he wants to do by way of reduction in support.

Senator Cornyn. My last question is, you recommend that the United States talk to al-Sadr. At one point there was an arrest warrant out for al-Sadr. Why do you recommend that we talk to him rather than arrest him and bring him to justice?

Mr. Hamilton. Because he’s a very important leader in the country. We had described to us again and again that the most important politician in the country was Sistani, who’s a clergyman. If you really want to influence events in Iraq, you go to the Grand Ayatollah and his principal people. That’s the nature of the society.

Now, we have tried to speak to Sadr and he won’t talk to us. We tried to speak to Sistani. He won’t talk to us either. So it’s not that we haven’t tried. But the point here is, I think, that the religious leaders in this country are hugely important, not just as religious leaders, but as political leaders too.

The only person I know that talks to either of these gentlemen is the U.N. representative in Baghdad, and even his contact has been limited. So we recognize, number one, their importance; number two, the difficulty of talking to them; and number three, we think it would be good if we could talk to Sadr.

Mr. Baker. Senator, that arrest warrant, you’re right, but it was quite some time ago, and it was rescinded after Bremer left.

Senator Cornyn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Warner. Senator Dayton, would you indulge me? I wish to go vote.

Senator Dayton. Yes.

Chairman Warner. Then Senator Levin and Senator Thune will resume.
I want to reiterate, Mr. Secretary, my profound gratitude for your report. It's important. But if Congress is going to be a partner to work through this, you can understand that before we come forward with such recommendations as we wish to make we'd like to hear from our President about his own internal review.

Mr. BAKER. Absolutely. I understand that, Senator. Absolutely.

Chairman WARNER. Then have some input. Now, practically we're going to be out of here in about 48 hours, not to return until the first week in January. So this poses a challenge.

Mr. BAKER. Absolutely.

Chairman WARNER. But I'm sure a number of us could come back and work with the administration. I know my colleague has indicated his willingness to join me.

Senator LEVIN. With the President, indeed we made that point. The chairman made it to the President. He indicated he's more than willing to involve that part in the process and to receive our reaction before something is just announced. Not just the two of us. I'm saying the reaction of leaders of Congress.

Chairman WARNER. I just ask one observation that perplexes me greatly. I've been back and forth, maybe not as many times, certainly not as many times as you have, Mr. Secretary Baker and Congressman Hamilton, to that part of the world in my 28 years in the Senate and then 5 years before that when I was in the Navy secretariat. Throughout history, the Sunni and the Shia have found the ability to live together in peace. To a certain extent, that's being done in the peripheral states. Now we see a mass exodus to Jordan, primarily Sunni but undoubtedly some Shia, living in peace. We do not hear of any instance of this sectarian violence to speak of in the bordering states.

What is the root cause for this thing suddenly to erupt in Iraq like a volcano, where they lived in Iraq prior to our intervention, which I support that intervention, intermarried, lived side by side? What is the root cause that has caused this volcanic sectarian violence, wanton, senseless killing of each other?

Mr. BAKER. Senator, this is the first time to my knowledge that you've ever had a state that has been dominated by one of those ethnic groups, in this case the Sunnis, who represented only 20 percent of the population, but who have ruled over, in a fairly ruthless way, the remaining 60 percent of the population that is Shia. I think that's part of the problem.

Another part of the problem, quite frankly, are the efforts of al Qaeda in Iraq and people like Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who set about specifically to foment sectarian violence as the best way to advance al Qaeda in Iraq and to bring down the government that the United States had established in Iraq.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you both very much, and I must depart for the vote at this point in time. But you've made a remarkable contribution and it just shows how within our private sector there are those who are willing to receive the call to come back and perform admirable public service and valuable public service.

Mr. BAKER. Senator Warner, thank you. I want to add my appreciation to that of Congressman Hamilton. I remember the day we rolled out the announcement of the Iraq Study Group on March 15 of this year. You were kind enough to be our host on that occasion.
Without you or Congressman Wolf, and perhaps a few others, there would not have been an Iraq Study Group. So thank you, sir.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you with a great sense of humility for that recognition.

Senator Dayton.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, both for your service. Some cynic was quoted as saying that in Washington when the situation is hopeless people turn to a commission. If you could help me translate your description of the situation in Iraq as grave and deteriorating into that vernacular, if you put hopeless on a scale of one and complete success a ten, where are we in Iraq today, just a number?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think we reject the idea that the situation is hopeless.

Senator DAYTON. So it's not a one. Where are we on that spectrum from hopeless to successful?

Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, my mind doesn't think in those quantitative terms, I guess, Senator. I think where we are is that the situation is just very difficult, that political leaders have the responsibility in this country to let people know how difficult that situation is. We tried to spell that out in the assessment to some degree.

But we also said that if we take the right steps we can improve it, and that's where we are in terms of public policy, to try to take the right steps now. Nobody can assure success even if we take the right steps, but you can certainly secure failure if we don't take those steps.

Senator DAYTON. I understand. This leads into my next question, which is: To get to the point where your recommendations can take hold and be successful, it seems that we're going on the spectrum there from, I don't know, a three to an eight or so. I guess others have posited this question, but realistically in the timeframe you've described is that feasible? Conversely, is there a tipping point in a rough timetable where if the situation remains grave and deteriorating it does become hopeless?

Mr. HAMILTON. There certainly is that point and we're perilously close to that point, and that's why we emphasize here very, very, great urgency in action by ourselves as well as by the Iraqi government.

Senator DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I'll let our distinguished visitors move on.

Senator LEVIN [presiding]. Thank you.

Has Senator Nelson had an opportunity?

Senator BILL NELSON. Yes.

Senator LEVIN. We're past the 11 o'clock hour. We thank you for not just your contribution to this Nation and hopefully to the success in Iraq, but your patience. Thank you. We are adjourned.

Letter from the Co-Chairs

There is no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq. However, there are actions that can be taken to improve the situation and protect American interests.

Many Americans are dissatisfied, not just with the situation in Iraq but with the state of our political debate regarding Iraq. Our political leaders must build a bipartisan approach to bring a responsible conclusion to what is now a lengthy and costly war. Our country deserves a debate that prizes substance over rhetoric, and a policy that is adequately funded and sustainable. The President and Congress must work together. Our leaders must be candid and forthright with the American people in order to win their support.

No one can guarantee that any course of action in Iraq at this point will stop sectarian warfare, growing violence, or a slide toward chaos. If current trends continue, the potential consequences are severe. Because of the role and responsibility of the United States in Iraq, and the commitments our government has made, the United States has special obligations. Our country must address as best it can Iraq’s many problems. The United States has long-term relationships and interests at stake in the Middle East, and needs to stay engaged.

In this consensus report, the ten members of the Iraq Study Group present a new approach because we believe there is a better way forward. All options have not been exhausted. We believe it is still possible to pursue different policies that can give Iraq an opportunity for a better future, combat terrorism, stabilize a critical region of the world, and protect America’s credibility, interests, and values. Our report makes it clear that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi people also must act to achieve a stable and hopeful future.

What we recommend in this report demands a tremendous amount of political will and cooperation by the executive and legislative branches of the U.S. government. It demands skillful implementation. It demands unity of effort by government agencies. And its success depends on the unity of the American people in a time of political polarization. Americans can and must enjoy the right of robust debate within a democracy. Yet U.S. foreign policy is doomed to failure—as is any course of action in Iraq—if it is not supported by a broad, sustained consensus. The aim of our report is to move our country toward such a consensus.

We want to thank all those we have interviewed and those who have contributed information and assisted the Study Group, both inside and outside the U.S. government, in Iraq, and around the world. We thank the members of the expert working groups, and staff from the sponsoring organizations. We especially thank our colleagues on the Study Group, who have worked with us on these difficult issues in a spirit of generosity and bipartisanship.

In presenting our report to the President, Congress, and the American people, we dedicate it to the men and women—military and civilian—who have served and are serving in Iraq, and to their families back home. They have demonstrated extraordinary courage and made difficult sacrifices. Every American is indebted to them.
We also honor the many Iraqis who have sacrificed on behalf of their country, and the members of the Coalition Forces who have stood with us and with the people of Iraq.

James A. Baker, III   Lee H. Hamilton
Executive Summary

The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating. There is no path that can guarantee success, but the prospects can be improved.

In this report, we make a number of recommendations for actions to be taken in Iraq, the United States, and the region. Our most important recommendations call for new and enhanced diplomatic and political efforts in Iraq and the region, and a change in the primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq that will enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly. We believe that these two recommendations are equally important and reinforce one another. If they are effectively implemented, and if the Iraqi government moves forward with national reconciliation, Iraqis will have an opportunity for a better future, terrorism will be dealt a blow, stability will be enhanced in an important part of the world, and America’s credibility, interests, and values will be protected.

The challenges in Iraq are complex. Violence is increasing in scope and lethality. It is fed by a Sunni Arab insurgency, Shiite militias and death squads, al Qaeda, and widespread criminality. Sectarian conflict is the principal challenge to stability. The Iraqi people have a democratically elected government, yet it is not adequately advancing national reconciliation, providing basic security, or delivering essential services. Pessimism is pervasive.

If the situation continues to deteriorate, the consequences could be severe. A slide toward chaos could trigger the collapse of Iraq’s government and a humanitarian catastrophe. Neighboring countries could intervene. Sunni-Shia clashes could spread. Al Qaeda could win a propaganda victory and expand its base of operations. The global standing of the United States could be diminished. Americans could become more polarized.

During the past nine months we have considered a full range of approaches for moving forward. All have flaws. Our recommended course has shortcomings, but we firmly believe that it includes the best strategies and tactics to positively influence the outcome in Iraq and the region.

External Approach

The policies and actions of Iraq’s neighbors greatly affect its stability and prosperity. No country in the region will benefit in the long term from a chaotic Iraq. Yet Iraq’s neighbors are not doing enough to help Iraq achieve stability. Some are undercutting stability.

The United States should immediately launch a new diplomatic offensive to build an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region. This diplomatic effort should include every country that has an interest in avoiding a chaotic Iraq, including all of Iraq’s neighbors. Iraq’s neighbors and key states in and outside the region should form a support group to reinforce security and national reconciliation within Iraq, neither of which Iraq can achieve on its own.
Given the ability of Iran and Syria to influence events within Iraq and their interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq, the United States should try to engage them constructively. In seeking to influence the behavior of both countries, the United States has disincentives and incentives available. Iran should stem the flow of arms and training to Iraq, respect Iraq’s sovereignty and territorial integrity, and use its influence over Iraqi Shia groups to encourage national reconciliation. The issue of Iran’s nuclear programs should continue to be dealt with by the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus Germany. Syria should control its border with Iraq to stem the flow of funding, insurgents, and terrorists in and out of Iraq.

The United States cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East unless it deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and regional instability. There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the United States to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts: Lebanon, Syria, and President Bush’s June 2002 commitment to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine. This commitment must include direct talks with, by, and between Israel, Lebanon, Palestinians (those who accept Israel’s right to exist), and Syria.

As the United States develops its approach toward Iraq and the Middle East, the United States should provide additional political, economic, and military support for Afghanistan, including resources that might become available as combat forces are moved out of Iraq.

Internal Approach

The most important questions about Iraq’s future are now the responsibility of Iraqis. The United States must adjust its role in Iraq to encourage the Iraqi people to take control of their own destiny.

The Iraqi government should accelerate assuming responsibility for Iraqi security by increasing the number and quality of Iraqi Army brigades. While this process is under way, and to facilitate it, the United States should significantly increase the number of U.S. military personnel, including combat troops, embedded in and supporting Iraqi Army units. As these actions proceed, U.S. combat forces could begin to move out of Iraq.

The primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq should evolve to one of supporting the Iraqi army, which would take over primary responsibility for combat operations. By the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq. At that time, U.S. combat forces in Iraq could be deployed only in units embedded with Iraqi forces, in rapid-reaction and special operations teams, and in training, equipping, advising, force protection, and search and rescue. Intelligence and support efforts would continue. A vital mission of those rapid reaction and special operations forces would be to undertake strikes against al Qaeda in Iraq.

It is clear that the Iraqi government will need assistance from the United States for some time to come, especially in carrying out security responsibilities. Yet the United States must make it clear to the Iraqi government that the United States could carry out its plans, including planned redeployments, even if the Iraqi government did not implement their planned changes. The United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq.
As redeployment proceeds, military leaders should emphasize training and education of forces that have returned to the United States in order to restore the force to full combat capability. As equipment returns to the United States, Congress should appropriate sufficient funds to restore the equipment over the next five years.

The United States should work closely with Iraq’s leaders to support the achievement of specific objectives—or milestones—on national reconciliation, security, and governance. Miracles cannot be expected, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect action and progress. The Iraqi government needs to show its own citizens—and the citizens of the United States and other countries—that it deserves continued support.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, in consultation with the United States, has put forward a set of milestones critical for Iraq. His list is a good start, but it must be expanded to include milestones that can strengthen the government and benefit the Iraqi people. President Bush and his national security team should remain in close and frequent contact with the Iraqi leadership to convey a clear message: there must be prompt action by the Iraqi government to make substantial progress toward the achievement of these milestones.

If the Iraqi government demonstrates political will and makes substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should make clear its willingness to continue training, assistance, and support for Iraq’s security forces and to continue political, military, and economic support. If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military, or economic support for the Iraqi government.

Our report makes recommendations in several other areas. They include improvements to the Iraqi criminal justice system, the Iraqi oil sector, the U.S. reconstruction efforts in Iraq, the U.S. budget process, the training of U.S. government personnel, and U.S. intelligence capabilities.

Conclusion

It is the unanimous view of the Iraq Study Group that these recommendations offer a new way forward for the United States in Iraq and the region. They are comprehensive and need to be implemented in a coordinated fashion. They should not be separated or carried out in isolation. The dynamics of the region are as important to Iraq as events within Iraq.

The challenges are daunting. There will be difficult days ahead. But by pursuing this new way forward, Iraq, the region, and the United States of America can emerge stronger.
Assessment

There is no guarantee for success in Iraq. The situation in Baghdad and several provinces is dire. Saddam Hussein has been removed from power and the Iraqi people have a democratically elected government that is broadly representative of Iraq’s population, yet the government is not adequately advancing national reconciliation, providing basic security, or delivering essential services. The level of violence is high and growing. There is great suffering, and the daily lives of many Iraqis show little or no improvement. Pessimism is pervasive.

U.S. military and civilian personnel, and our coalition partners, are making exceptional and dedicated efforts—and sacrifices—to help Iraq. Many Iraqis have also made extraordinary efforts and sacrifices for a better future. However, the ability of the United States to influence events within Iraq is diminishing. Many Iraqis are embracing sectarian identities. The lack of security impedes economic development. Most countries in the region are not playing a constructive role in support of Iraq, and some are undercutting stability.

Iraq is vital to regional and even global stability, and is critical to U.S. interests. It runs along the sectarian fault lines of Shia and Sunni Islam, and of Kurdish and Arab populations. It has the world’s second-largest known oil reserves. It is now a base of operations for international terrorism, including al Qaeda.

Iraq is a centerpiece of American foreign policy, influencing how the United States is viewed in the region and around the world. Because of the gravity of Iraq’s condition and the country’s vital importance, the United States is facing one of its most difficult and significant international challenges in decades. Because events in Iraq have been set in motion by American decisions and actions, the United States has both a national and a moral interest in doing what it can to give Iraqis an opportunity to avert anarchy.

An assessment of the security, political, economic, and regional situation follows (all figures current as of publication), along with an assessment of the consequences if Iraq continues to deteriorate, and an analysis of some possible courses of action.
A. Assessment of the Current Situation in Iraq

1. Security

Attacks against U.S., Coalition, and Iraqi security forces are persistent and growing. October 2006 was the deadliest month for U.S. forces since January 2005, with 102 Americans killed. Total attacks in October 2006 averaged 180 per day, up from 70 per day in January 2006. Daily attacks against Iraqi security forces in October were more than double the level in January. Attacks against civilians in October were four times higher than in January. Some 3,000 Iraqi civilians are killed every month.

Sources of Violence

Violence is increasing in scope, complexity, and lethality. There are multiple sources of violence in Iraq: the Sunni Arab insurgency, al Qaeda and affiliated jihadist groups, Shiite militias and death squads, and organized criminality. Sectarian violence—particularly in and around Baghdad—has become the principal challenge to stability.

Most attacks on Americans still come from the Sunni Arab insurgency. The insurgency comprises former elements of the Saddam Hussein regime, disaffected Sunni Arab Iraqis, and common criminals. It has significant support within the Sunni Arab community. The insurgency has no single leadership but is a network of networks. It benefits from participants’ detailed knowledge of Iraq’s infrastructure, and arms and financing are supplied primarily from within Iraq. The insurgents have different goals, although nearly all oppose the presence of U.S. forces in Iraq. Most wish to restore Sunni Arab rule in the country. Some aim at winning local power and control.

Al Qaeda is responsible for a small portion of the violence in Iraq, but that includes some of the more spectacular acts: suicide attacks, large truck bombs, and attacks on significant religious or political targets. Al Qaeda in Iraq is now largely Iraqi-run and composed of Sunni Arabs. Foreign fighters—numbering an estimated 1,300—play a supporting role or carry out suicide operations. Al Qaeda’s goals include instigating a wider sectarian war between Iraq’s Sunni and Shia, and driving the United States out of Iraq.

Sectarian violence causes the largest number of Iraqi civilian casualties. Iraq is in the grip of a deadly cycle: Sunni insurgent attacks spark large-scale Shia reprisals, and vice versa. Groups of Iraqis are often found bound and executed, their bodies dumped in rivers or fields. The perception of unchecked violence emboldens militias, shakes confidence in the government, and leads Iraqis to flee to places where their sect is the majority and where they feel they are in less danger. In some parts of Iraq—notably in Baghdad—sectarian cleansing is taking place. The United Nations estimates that 1.6 million are displaced within Iraq, and up to 1.8 million Iraqis have fled the country.
Shiite militias engaging in sectarian violence pose a substantial threat to immediate and long-term stability. These militias are diverse. Some are affiliated with the government, some are highly localized, and some are wholly outside the law. They are fragmenting, with an increasing breakdown in command structure. The militias target Sunni Arab civilians, and some struggle for power in clashes with one another. Some even target government ministries. They undermine the authority of the Iraqi government and security forces, as well as the ability of Sunnis to join a peaceful political process. The prevalence of militias sends a powerful message: political leaders can preserve and expand their power only if backed by armed force.

The Mahdi Army, led by Moqtada al-Sadr, may number as many as 60,000 fighters. It has directly challenged U.S. and Iraqi government forces, and it is widely believed to engage in regular violence against Sunni Arab civilians. Mahdi fighters patrol certain Shia enclaves, notably northeast Baghdad’s teeming neighborhood of 2.5 million known as “Sadr City.” As the Mahdi Army has grown in size and influence, some elements have moved beyond Sadr’s control.

The Badr Brigade is affiliated with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), which is led by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim. The Badr Brigade has long-standing ties with the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps. Many Badr members have become integrated into the Iraqi police, and others play policing roles in southern Iraqi cities. While wearing the uniform of the security services, Badr fighters have targeted Sunni Arab civilians. Badr fighters have also clashed with the Mahdi Army, particularly in southern Iraq.

Criminality also makes daily life unbearable for many Iraqis. Robberies, kidnappings, and murder are commonplace in much of the country. Organized criminal racketeers thrive, particularly in unstable areas like Anbar province. Some criminal gangs cooperate with, finance, or purport to be part of the Sunni insurgency or a Shiite militia in order to gain legitimacy. As one knowledgeable American official put it, “If there were foreign forces in New Jersey, Tony Soprano would be an insurgent leader.”

Four of Iraq’s eighteen provinces are highly insecure—Baghdad, Anbar, Diyala, and Salah ad Din. These provinces account for about 40 percent of Iraq’s population of 26 million. In Baghdad, the violence is largely between Sunni and Shia. In Anbar, the violence is attributable to the Sunni insurgency and to al Qaeda, and the situation is deteriorating.

In Kirkuk, the struggle is between Kurds, Arabs, and Turkmen. In Basra and the south, the violence is largely an intra-Shia power struggle. The most stable parts of the country are the three provinces of the Kurdish north and parts of the Shia south. However, most of Iraq’s cities have a sectarian mix and are plagued by persistent violence.

U.S., Coalition, and Iraqi Forces

Confronting this violence are the Multi-National Forces–Iraq under U.S. command, working in concert with Iraq’s security forces. The Multi-National Forces–Iraq were authorized by UN Security Council Resolution 1546 in 2004, and the mandate was extended in November 2006 for another year.
Approximately 141,000 U.S. military personnel are serving in Iraq, together with approximately 16,500 military personnel from twenty-seven coalition partners, the largest contingent being 7,200 from the United Kingdom. The U.S. Army has principal responsibility for Baghdad and the north. The U.S. Marine Corps takes the lead in Anbar province. The United Kingdom has responsibility in the southeast, chiefly in Basra.

Along with this military presence, the United States is building its largest embassy in Baghdad. The current U.S. embassy in Baghdad totals about 1,000 U.S. government employees. There are roughly 5,000 civilian contractors in the country.

Currently, the U.S. military rarely engages in large-scale combat operations. Instead, counterinsurgency efforts focus on a strategy of “clear, hold, and build”—“clearing” areas of insurgents and death squads, “holding” those areas with Iraqi security forces, and “building” areas with quick-impact reconstruction projects.

Nearly every U.S. Army and Marine combat unit, and several National Guard and Reserve units, have been to Iraq at least once. Many are on their second or even third rotations; rotations are typically one year for Army units, seven months for Marine units. Regular rotations, in and out of Iraq or within the country, complicate brigade and battalion efforts to get to know the local scene, earn the trust of the population, and build a sense of cooperation.

Many military units are under significant strain. Because the harsh conditions in Iraq are wearing out equipment more quickly than anticipated, many units do not have fully functional equipment for training when they redeploy to the United States. An extraordinary amount of sacrifice has been asked of our men and women in uniform, and of their families. The American military has little reserve force to call on if it needs ground forces to respond to other crises around the world.

A primary mission of U.S. military strategy in Iraq is the training of competent Iraqi security forces. By the end of 2006, the Multi-National Security Transition Command—Iraq under American leadership is expected to have trained and equipped a target number of approximately 326,000 Iraqi security services. That figure includes 138,000 members of the Iraqi Army and 188,000 Iraqi police. Iraqis have operational control over roughly one-third of Iraqi security forces; the U.S. has operational control over most of the rest. No U.S. forces are under Iraqi command.

The Iraqi Army

The Iraqi Army is making fitful progress toward becoming a reliable and disciplined fighting force loyal to the national government. By the end of 2006, the Iraqi Army is expected to comprise 118 battalions formed into 36 brigades under the command of 10 divisions. Although the Army is one of the more professional Iraqi institutions, its performance has been uneven. The training numbers are impressive, but they represent only part of the story.

Significant questions remain about the ethnic composition and loyalties of some Iraqi units—specifically, whether they will carry out missions on behalf of national goals instead of a sectarian agenda. Of Iraq’s 10 planned divisions, those that are even-numbered are made up of Iraqis who signed up to serve in a specific area, and they have been reluctant to redeploy to other areas of the country. As a result, elements of the Army have refused to carry out missions.

The Iraqi Army is also confronted by several other significant challenges:
Units lack leadership. They lack the ability to work together and perform at higher levels of organization the brigade and division level. Leadership training and the experience of leadership are the essential elements to improve performance.

Units lack equipment. They cannot carry out their missions without adequate equipment. Congress has been generous in funding requests for U.S. troops, but it has resisted fully funding Iraqi forces. The entire appropriation for Iraqi defense forces for FY 2006 ($3 billion) is less than the United States currently spends in Iraq every two weeks.

Units lack personnel. Soldiers are on leave one week a month so that they can visit their families and take them their pay. Soldiers are paid in cash because there is no banking system. Soldiers are given leave liberally and face no penalties for absence without leave. Unit readiness rates are low, often at 50 percent or less.

Units lack logistics and support. They lack the ability to sustain their operations, the capability to transport supplies and troops, and the capacity to provide their own indirect fire support, close-air support, technical intelligence, and medical evacuation. They will depend on the United States for logistics and support through at least 2007.

The Iraqi Police

The state of the Iraqi police is substantially worse than that of the Iraqi Army. The Iraqi Police Service currently numbers roughly 135,000 and is responsible for local policing. It has neither the training nor legal authority to conduct criminal investigations, nor the firepower to take on organized crime, insurgents, or militias. The Iraqi National Police numbers roughly 25,000 and its officers have been trained in counterinsurgency operations, not police work. The Border Enforcement Department numbers roughly 28,000.

Iraqi police cannot control crime, and they routinely engage in sectarian violence, including the unnecessary detention, torture, and targeted execution of Sunni Arab civilians. The police are organized under the Ministry of the Interior, which is confronted by corruption and militia infiltration and lacks control over police in the provinces.

The United States and the Iraqi government recognize the importance of reform. The current Minister of the Interior has called for purging militia members and criminals from the police. But he has little police experience or base of support. There is no clear Iraqi or U.S. agreement on the character and mission of the police. U.S. authorities do not know with precision the composition and membership of the various police forces, nor the disposition of their funds and equipment. There are ample reports of Iraqi police officers participating in training in order to obtain a weapon, uniform, and ammunition for use in sectarian violence. Some are on the payroll but don’t show up for work. In the words of a senior American general, “2006 was supposed to be ‘the year of the police’ but it hasn’t materialized that way.”
Facilities Protection Services

The Facilities Protection Service poses additional problems. Each Iraqi ministry has an armed unit, ostensibly to guard the ministry’s infrastructure. All together, these units total roughly 145,000 uniformed Iraqis under arms. However, these units have questionable loyalties and capabilities. In the ministries of Health, Agriculture, and Transportation controlled by Moqtada al-Sadr, the Facilities Protection Service is a source of funding and jobs for the Mahdi Army. One senior U.S. official described the Facilities Protection Service as “incompetent, dysfunctional, or subversive.” Several Iraqis simply referred to them as militias.

The Iraqi government has begun to bring the Facilities Protection Service under the control of the Interior Ministry. The intention is to identify and register Facilities Protection personnel, standardize their treatment, and provide some training. Though the approach is reasonable, this effort may exceed the current capability of the Interior Ministry.
Operation Together Forward II

In a major effort to quell the violence in Iraq, U.S. military forces joined with Iraqi forces to establish security in Baghdad with an operation called "Operation Together Forward II," which began in August 2006. Under Operation Together Forward II, U.S. forces are working with members of the Iraqi Army and police to "clear, hold, and build" in Baghdad, moving neighborhood by neighborhood. There are roughly 15,000 U.S. troops in Baghdad.

This operation—and the security of Baghdad—is crucial to security in Iraq more generally. A capital city of more than 6 million, Baghdad contains some 25 percent of the country’s population. It is the largest Sunni and Shia city in Iraq. It has high concentrations of both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. Both Iraqi and American leaders told us that as Baghdad goes, so goes Iraq.

The results of Operation Together Forward II are disheartening. Violence in Baghdad—already at high levels—jumped more than 43 percent between the summer and October 2006. U.S. forces continue to suffer high casualties. Perpetrators of violence leave neighborhoods in advance of security sweeps, only to filter back later. Iraqi police have been unable or unwilling to stop such infiltration and continuing violence. The Iraqi Army has provided only two out of the six battalions that it promised in August would join American forces in Baghdad. The Iraqi government has rejected sustained security operations in Sadr City.

Security efforts will fail unless the Iraqis have both the capability to hold areas that have been cleared and the will to clear neighborhoods that are home to Shiite militias. U.S. forces can "clear" any neighborhood, but there are neither enough U.S. troops present nor enough support from Iraqi security forces to "hold" neighborhoods so cleared. The same holds true for the rest of Iraq. Because none of the operations conducted by U.S. and Iraqi military forces are fundamentally changing the conditions encouraging the sectarian violence, U.S. forces seem to be caught in a mission that has no foreseeable end.

2. Politics

Iraq is a sovereign state with a democratically elected Council of Representatives. A government of national unity was formed in May 2006 that is broadly representative of the Iraqi people. Iraq has ratified a constitution, and—per agreement with Sunni Arab leaders—has initiated a process of review to determine if the constitution needs amendment.

The composition of the Iraqi government is basically sectarian, and key players within the government too often act in their sectarian interest. Iraq’s Shia, Sunni, and Kurdish leaders frequently fail to demonstrate the political will to act in Iraq’s national interest, and too many Iraqi ministries lack the capacity to govern effectively. The result is an even weaker central government than the constitution provides.
There is widespread Iraqi, American, and international agreement on the key issues confronting the Iraqi government: national reconciliation, including the negotiation of a “political deal” among Iraq’s sectarian groups on Constitution review, de-Baathification, oil revenue sharing, provincial elections, the future of Kirkuk, and amnesty; security, particularly curbing militias and reducing the violence in Baghdad; and governance, including the provision of basic services and the rollback of pervasive corruption. Because Iraqi leaders view issues through a sectarian prism, we will summarize the differing perspectives of Iraq’s main sectarian groups.

Sectarian Viewpoints

The Shia, the majority of Iraq’s population, have gained power for the first time in more than 1,300 years. Above all, many Shia are interested in preserving that power. However, fissures have emerged within the broad Shia coalition, known as the United Iraqi Alliance. Shia factions are struggling for power—over regions, ministries, and Iraq as a whole. The difficulties in holding together a broad and fractious coalition have led several observers in Baghdad to comment that Shia leaders are held “hostage to extremes.” Within the coalition as a whole, there is a reluctance to reach a political accommodation with the Sunnis or to disarm Shiite militias.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has demonstrated an understanding of the key issues facing Iraq, notably the need for national reconciliation and security in Baghdad. Yet strains have emerged between Maliki’s government and the United States. Maliki has publicly rejected a U.S. timetable to achieve certain benchmarks, ordered the removal of blockades around Sadr City, sought more control over Iraqi security forces, and resisted U.S. requests to move forward on reconciliation or on disbanding Shiite militias.

Sistani, Sadr, Hakim

The U.S. deals primarily with the Iraqi government, but the most powerful Shia figures in Iraq do not hold national office. Of the following three vital power brokers in the Shia community, the United States is unable to talk directly with one (Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani) and does not talk to another (Moqtada al-Sadr).

GRAND AYATOLLAH ALI AL-SISTANI: Sistani is the leading Shiite cleric in Iraq. Despite staying out of day-to-day politics, he has been the most influential leader in the country: all major Shia leaders have sought his approval or guidance. Sistani has encouraged a unified Shia bloc with moderated aims within a unified Iraq. Sistani’s influence may be waning, as his words have not succeeded in preventing intra-Shia violence or retaliation against Sunnis.
ABDUL AZIZ AL-HAKIM: Hakim is a cleric and the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the largest and most organized Shia political party. It seeks the creation of an autonomous Shia region comprising nine provinces in the south. Hakim has consistently protected and advanced his party’s position. SCIRI has close ties with Iran.

MOOTADA AL-SADR: Sadr has a large following among impoverished Shia, particularly in Baghdad. He has joined Maliki’s governing coalition, but his Mahdi Army has clashed with the Badr Brigades, as well as with Iraqi, U.S., and U.K. forces. Sadr claims to be an Iraqi nationalist. Several observers remarked to us that Sadr was following the model of Hezbollah in Lebanon: building a political party that controls basic services within the government and an armed militia outside of the government.

Sunni Arabs feel displaced because of the loss of their traditional position of power in Iraq. They are torn, unsure whether to seek their aims through political participation or through violent insurgency. They remain angry about U.S. decisions to dissolve Iraqi security forces and to pursue the “de-Baathification” of Iraq’s government and society. Sunnis are confronted by paradoxes: they have opposed the presence of U.S. forces in Iraq but need those forces to protect them against Shia militias; they chafe at being governed by a majority Shia administration but reject a federal, decentralized Iraq and do not see a Sunni autonomous region as feasible for themselves.

Hashimi and Dhari

The influence of Sunni Arab politicians in the government is questionable. The leadership of the Sunni Arab insurgency is murky, but the following two key Sunni Arab figures have broad support.

tariq al-hashimi: Hashimi is one of two vice presidents of Iraq and the head of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni Muslim bloc in parliament. Hashimi opposes the formation of autonomous regions and has advocated the distribution of oil revenues based on population, a reversal of de-Baathification, and the removal of Shiite militia fighters from the Iraqi security forces. Shiite death squads have recently killed three of his siblings.

sheik harith al-dhari: Dhari is the head of the Muslim Scholars Association, the most influential Sunni organization in Iraq. Dhari has condemned the American occupation and spoken out against the Iraqi government. His organization has ties both to the Sunni Arab insurgency and to Sunnis within the Iraqi government. A warrant was recently issued for his arrest for inciting violence and terrorism, an act that sparked bitter Sunni protests across Iraq.
Iraqi Kurds have succeeded in presenting a united front of two main political blocs—the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK). The Kurds have secured a largely autonomous Kurdish region in the north, and have achieved a prominent role for Kurds within the national government. Barzani leads the Kurdish regional government, and Talabani is president of Iraq.

Leading Kurdish politicians told us they preferred to be within a democratic, federal Iraqi state because an independent Kurdistan would be surrounded by hostile neighbors. However, a majority of Kurds favor independence. The Kurds have their own security forces—the peshmerge—which number roughly 100,000. They believe they could accommodate themselves to either a unified or a fractured Iraq.

Barzani and Talabani

Kurdish politics has been dominated for years by two figures who have long-standing ties in movements for Kurdish independence and self-government.

MASSOUD BARZANI: Barzani is the leader of the Kurdistan Democratic Party and the President of the Kurdish regional government. Barzani has cooperated with his longtime rival, Jalal Talabani, in securing an empowered, autonomous Kurdish region in northern Iraq. Barzani has ordered the lowering of Iraqi flags and raising of Kurdish flags in Kurdish-controlled areas.

JALAL TALABANI: Talabani is the leader of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan and the President of Iraq. Whereas Barzani has focused his efforts in Kurdistan, Talabani has secured power in Baghdad, and several important PUK government ministers are loyal to him. Talabani strongly supports autonomy for Kurdistan. He has also sought to bring real power to the office of the presidency.

Key Issues

NATIONAL RECONCILIATION. Prime Minister Maliki outlined a commendable program of national reconciliation soon after he entered office. However, the Iraqi government has not taken action on the key elements of national reconciliation: revising de-Baathification, which prevents many Sunni Arabs from participating in governance and society; providing amnesty for those who have fought against the government; sharing the country’s oil revenues; demobilizing militias; amending the constitution; and settling the future of Kirkuk.
One core issue is federalism. The Iraqi Constitution, which created a largely autonomous Kurdistan region, allows other such regions to be established later, perhaps including a "Shi'astan" comprising nine southern provinces. This highly decentralized structure is favored by the Kurds and many Shia (particularly supporters of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim), but it is anathema to Sunnis. First, Sunni Arabs are generally Iraqi nationalists, albeit within the context of an Iraq they believe they should govern. Second, because Iraq's energy resources are in the Kurdish and Shia regions, there is no economically feasible "Sunni region." Particularly contentious is a provision in the constitution that shares revenues nationally from current oil reserves, while allowing revenues from reserves discovered in the future to go to the regions.

The Sunnis did not actively participate in the constitution-drafting process, and acceded to entering the government only on the condition that the constitution be amended. In September, the parliament agreed to initiate a constitutional review commission slated to complete its work within one year; it delayed considering the question of forming a federalized region in southern Iraq for eighteen months.

Another key unresolved issue is the future of Kirkuk, an oil-rich city in northern Iraq that is home to substantial numbers of Kurds, Arabs, and Turkmen. The Kurds insisted that the constitution require a popular referendum by December 2007 to determine whether Kirkuk can formally join the Kurdish administered region, an outcome that Arabs and Turkmen in Kirkuk staunchly oppose. The risks of further violence sparked by a Kirkuk referendum are great.

Iraq's leaders often claim that they do not want a division of the country, but we found that key Shia and Kurdish leaders have little commitment to national reconciliation. One prominent Shia leader told us pointedly that the current government has the support of 80 percent of the population, notably excluding Sunni Arabs. Kurds have fought for independence for decades, and when our Study Group visited Iraq, the leader of the Kurdish region ordered the lowering of Iraqi flags and the raising of Kurdish flags. One senior American general commented that the Iraqis "still do not know what kind of country they want to have." Yet many of Iraq's most powerful and well-positioned leaders are not working toward a united Iraq.

SECURITY. The security situation cannot improve unless leaders act in support of national reconciliation. Shiite leaders must make the decision to demobilize militias. Sunni Arabs must make the decision to seek their aims through a peaceful political process, not through violent revolt. The Iraqi government and Sunni Arab tribes must aggressively pursue al Qaeda.

Militias are currently seen as legitimate vehicles of political action. Shia political leaders make distinctions between the Sunni insurgency (which seeks to overthrow the government) and Shia militias (which are used to fight Sunnis, secure neighborhoods, and maximize power within the government). Though Prime Minister Maliki has said he will address the problem of militias, he has taken little meaningful action to curb their influence. He owes his office in large part to Sadr and has shown little willingness to take on him or his Mahdi Army.
Sunnī Arabs have not made the strategic decision to abandon violent insurgency in favor of the political process. Sunnī politicians within the government have a limited level of support and influence among their own population, and questionable influence over the insurgency. Insurgents wage a campaign of intimidation against Sunnī leaders—assassinating the family members of those who do participate in the government. Too often, insurgents tolerate and cooperate with al Qaeda, as they share a mutual interest in attacking U.S. and Shia forces. However, Sunnī Arab tribal leaders in Anbar province recently took the positive step of agreeing to pursue al Qaeda and foreign fighters in their midst, and have started to take action on those commitments.

Sunnī politicians told us that the U.S. military has to take on the militias; Shia politicians told us that the U.S. military has to help them take out the Sunnī insurgents and al Qaeda. Each side watches the other. Sunnī insurgents will not lay down arms unless the Shia militias are disarmed. Shia militias will not disarm until the Sunnī insurgency is destroyed. To put it simply: there are many armed groups within Iraq, and very little will to lay down arms.

GOVERNANCE: The Iraqi government is not effectively providing its people with basic services: electricity, drinking water, sewage, health care, and education. In many sectors, production is below or hovers around prewar levels. In Baghdad and other unstable areas, the situation is much worse. There are five major reasons for this problem.

First, the government sometimes provides services on a sectarian basis. For example, in one Sunnī neighborhood of Shia-governed Baghdad, there is less than two hours of electricity each day and trash piles are waist-high. One American official told us that Baghdad is run like a "Shia dictatorship" because Sunnis boycotted provincial elections in 2005, and therefore are not represented in local government.

Second, security is lacking. Insurgents target key infrastructure. For instance, electricity transmission towers are downed by explosives, and then sniper attacks prevent repairs from being made.

Third, corruption is rampant. One senior Iraqi official estimated that official corruption costs Iraq $5–7 billion per year. Notable steps have been taken: Iraq has a functioning audit board and inspectors general in the ministries, and senior leaders including the Prime Minister have identified rooting out corruption as a national priority. But too many political leaders still pursue their personal, sectarian, or party interests. There are still no examples of senior officials who have been brought before a court of law and convicted on corruption charges.

Fourth, capacity is inadequate. Most of Iraq’s technocratic class was pushed out of the government as part of de-Baathification. Other skilled Iraqis have fled the country as violence has risen. Too often, Iraq’s elected representatives treat the ministries as political spoils. Many ministries can do little more than pay salaries, spending as little as 10–15 percent of their capital budget. They lack technical expertise and suffer from corruption, inefficiency, a banking system that does not permit the transfer of moneys, extensive red tape put in place in part to deter corruption, and a Ministry of Finance reluctant to disburse funds.
Fifth, the judiciary is weak. Much has been done to establish an Iraqi judiciary, including a supreme court, and Iraq has some dedicated judges. But criminal investigations are conducted by magistrates, and they are too few and inadequately trained to perform this function. Intimidation of the Iraqi judiciary has been ruthless. As one senior U.S. official said to us, “We can protect judges, but not their families, their extended families, their friends.” Many Iraqis feel that crime not only is unpunished, it is rewarded.

3. Economics

There has been some economic progress in Iraq, and Iraq has tremendous potential for growth. But economic development is hobbled by insecurity, corruption, lack of investment, dilapidated infrastructure, and uncertainty. As one U.S. official observed to us, Iraq’s economy has been badly shocked and is dysfunctional after suffering decades of problems: Iraq had a police state economy in the 1970s, a war economy in the 1980s, and a sanctions economy in the 1990s. Immediate and long-term growth depends predominantly on the oil sector.

Economic Performance

There are some encouraging signs. Currency reserves are stable and growing at $12 billion. Consumer imports of computers, cell phones, and other appliances have increased dramatically. New businesses are opening, and construction is moving forward in secure areas. Because of Iraq’s ample oil reserves, water resources, and fertile lands, significant growth is possible if violence is reduced and the capacity of government improves. For example, wheat yields increased more than 40 percent in Kurdistan during this past year.

The Iraqi government has also made progress in meeting benchmarks set by the International Monetary Fund. Most prominently, subsidies have been reduced—for instance, the price per liter of gas has increased from roughly 1.7 cents to 23 cents (a figure far closer to regional prices). However, energy and food subsidies generally remain a burden, costing Iraq $11 billion per year.

Despite the positive signs, many leading economic indicators are negative. Instead of meeting a target of 10 percent, growth in Iraq is at roughly 4 percent this year. Inflation is above 50 percent. Unemployment estimates range widely from 20 to 60 percent. The investment climate is bleak, with foreign direct investment under 1 percent of GDP. Too many Iraqis do not see tangible improvements in their daily economic situation.
Oil Sector

Oil production and sales account for nearly 70 percent of Iraq's GDP, and more than 95 percent of government revenues. Iraq produces around 2.2 million barrels per day, and exports about 1.5 million barrels per day. This is below both prewar production levels and the Iraqi government's target of 2.5 million barrels per day, and far short of the vast potential of the Iraqi oil sector. Fortunately for the government, global energy prices have been higher than projected, making it possible for Iraq to meet its budget revenue targets.

Problems with oil production are caused by lack of security, lack of investment, and lack of technical capacity. Insurgents with a detailed knowledge of Iraq's infrastructure target pipelines and oil facilities. There is no metering system for the oil. There is poor maintenance at pumping stations, pipelines, and port facilities, as well as inadequate investment in modern technology. Iraq had a cadre of experts in the oil sector, but intimidation and an extended migration of experts to other countries have eroded technical capacity. Foreign companies have been reluctant to invest, and Iraq's Ministry of Oil has been unable to spend more than 15 percent of its capital budget.

Corruption is also debilitating. Experts estimate that 150,000 to 200,000—and perhaps as many as 500,000—barrels of oil per day are being stolen. Controlled prices for refined products result in shortages within Iraq, which drive consumers to the thriving black market. One senior U.S. official told us that corruption is more responsible than insurgents for breakdowns in the oil sector.

The Politics of Oil

The politics of oil has the potential to further damage the country's already fragile efforts to create a unified central government. The Iraqi Constitution leaves the door open for regions to take the lead in developing new oil resources. Article 108 states that "oil and gas are the ownership of all the peoples of Iraq in all the regions and governorates," while Article 109 tasks the federal government with "the management of oil and gas extracted from current fields." This language has led to contention over what constitutes a "new" or an "existing" resource, a question that has profound ramifications for the ultimate control of future oil revenue.

Senior members of Iraq's oil industry argue that a national oil company could reduce political tensions by centralizing revenues and reducing regional or local claims to a percentage of the revenue derived from production. However, regional leaders are suspicious and resist this proposal, affirming the rights of local communities to have direct access to the inflow of oil revenue. Kurdish leaders have been particularly aggressive in asserting independent control of their oil assets, signing and implementing investment deals with foreign oil companies in northern Iraq. Shia politicians are also reported to be negotiating oil investment contracts with foreign companies.
There are proposals to redistribute a portion of oil revenues directly to the population on a per capita basis. These proposals have the potential to give all Iraqi citizens a stake in the nation’s chief natural resource, but it would take time to develop a fair distribution system. Oil revenues have been incorporated into state budget projections for the next several years. There is no institution in Iraq at present that could properly implement such a distribution system. It would take substantial time to establish, and would have to be based on a well-developed state census and income tax system, which Iraq currently lacks.

U.S.-Led Reconstruction Efforts

The United States has appropriated a total of about $34 billion to support the reconstruction of Iraq, of which about $21 billion has been appropriated for the “Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund.” Nearly $16 billion has been spent, and almost all the funds have been committed. The administration requested $1.6 billion for reconstruction in FY 2006, and received $1.485 billion. The administration requested $750 million for FY 2007. The trend line for economic assistance in FY 2008 also appears downward.

Congress has little appetite for appropriating more funds for reconstruction. There is a substantial need for continued reconstruction in Iraq, but serious questions remain about the capacity of the U.S. and Iraqi governments.

The coordination of assistance programs by the Defense Department, State Department, United States Agency for International Development, and other agencies has been ineffective. There are no clear lines establishing who is in charge of reconstruction.

As resources decline, the U.S. reconstruction effort is changing its focus, shifting from infrastructure, education, and health to smaller-scale ventures that are chosen and to some degree managed by local communities. A major attempt is also being made to improve the capacity of government bureaucracies at the national, regional, and provincial levels to provide services to the population as well as to select and manage infrastructure projects.

The United States has people embedded in several Iraqi ministries, but it confronts problems with access and sustainability. Moqtada al-Sadr objects to the U.S. presence in Iraq, and therefore the ministries he controls—Health, Agriculture, and Transportation—will not work with Americans. It is not clear that Iraqis can or will maintain and operate reconstruction projects launched by the United States.

Several senior military officers commented to us that the Commander’s Emergency Response Program, which funds quick-impact projects such as the clearing of sewage and the restoration of basic services, is vital. The U.S. Agency for International Development, in contrast, is focused on long-term economic development and capacity building, but funds have not been committed to support these efforts into the future. The State Department leads seven Provincial Reconstruction Teams operating around the country. These teams can have a positive effect in secure areas, but not in areas where their work is hampered by significant security constraints.
Substantial reconstruction funds have also been provided to contractors, and the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction has documented numerous instances of waste and abuse. They have not all been put right. Contracting has gradually improved, as more oversight has been exercised and fewer cost-plus contracts have been granted; in addition, the use of Iraqi contractors has enabled the employment of more Iraqis in reconstruction projects.

4. International Support

International support for Iraq reconstruction has been tepid. International donors pledged $13.5 billion to support reconstruction, but less than $4 billion has been delivered.

An important agreement with the Paris Club relieved a significant amount of Iraq’s government debt and put the country on firmer financial footing. But the Gulf States, including Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, hold large amounts of Iraqi debt that they have not forgiven.

The United States is currently working with the United Nations and other partners to fashion the “International Compact” on Iraq. The goal is to provide Iraqis with greater debt relief and credits from the Gulf States, as well as to deliver on pledged aid from international donors. In return, the Iraqi government will agree to achieve certain economic reform milestones, such as building anticorruption measures into Iraqi institutions, adopting a fair legal framework for foreign investors, and reaching economic self-sufficiency by 2012. Several U.S. and international officials told us that the compact could be an opportunity to seek greater international engagement in the country.

The Region

The policies and actions of Iraq’s neighbors greatly influence its stability and prosperity. No country in the region wants a chaotic Iraq. Yet Iraq’s neighbors are doing little to help it, and some are undercutting its stability. Iraqis complain that neighbors are meddling in their affairs. When asked which of Iraq’s neighbors are intervening in Iraq, one senior Iraqi official replied, “All of them.”

The situation in Iraq is linked with events in the region. U.S. efforts in Afghanistan have been complicated by the overriding focus of U.S. attention and resources on Iraq. Several Iraqi, U.S., and international officials commented to us that Iraqi opposition to the United States—and support for Sadr—spiked in the aftermath of Israel’s bombing campaign in Lebanon. The actions of Syria and Iran in Iraq are often tied to their broader concerns with the United States. Many Sunni Arab states are concerned about rising Iranian influence in Iraq and the region. Most of the region’s countries are wary of U.S. efforts to promote democracy in Iraq and the Middle East.
Neighboring States

IRAN. Of all the neighbors, Iran has the most leverage in Iraq. Iran has long-standing ties to many Iraqi Shia politicians, many of whom were exiled to Iran during the Saddam Hussein regime. Iran has provided arms, financial support, and training for Shiite militias within Iraq, as well as political support for Shia parties. There are also reports that Iran has supplied improvised explosive devices to groups—including Sunni Arab insurgents—that attack U.S. forces. The Iranian border with Iraq is porous, and millions of Iranians travel to Iraq each year to visit Shia holy sites. Many Iraqis spoke of Iranian meddling, and Sunnis took a particularly alarmist view. One leading Sunni politician told us, "If you turn over any stone in Iraq today, you will find Iran underneath."

U.S., Iraqi, and international officials also commented on the range of tensions between the United States and Iran, including Iran’s nuclear program, Iran’s support for terrorism, Iran’s influence in Lebanon and the region, and Iran’s influence in Iraq. Iran appears content for the U.S. military to be tied down in Iraq, a position that limits U.S. options in addressing Iran’s nuclear program and allows Iran leverage over stability in Iraq. Proposed talks between Iran and the United States about the situation in Iraq have not taken place. One Iraqi official told us: “Iran is negotiating with the United States in the streets of Baghdad.”

SYRIA. Syria is also playing a counterproductive role. Iraqis are upset about what they perceive as Syrian support for efforts to undermine the Iraqi government. The Syrian role is not so much to take active measures as to countenance malign neglect: the Syrians look the other way as arms and foreign fighters flow across their border into Iraq, and former Baathist leaders find a safe haven within Syria. Like Iran, Syria is content to see the United States tied down in Iraq. That said, the Syrians have indicated that they want a dialogue with the United States, and in November 2006 agreed to restore diplomatic relations with Iraq after a 24-year break.

SAUDI ARABIA AND THE GULF STATES. These countries for the most part have been passive and disengaged. They have declined to provide debt relief or substantial economic assistance to the Iraqi government. Several Iraqi Sunni Arab politicians complained that Saudi Arabia has not provided political support for their fellow Sunnis within Iraq. One observed that Saudi Arabia did not even send a letter when the Iraqi government was formed, whereas Iran has an ambassador in Iraq. Funding for the Sunni insurgency comes from private individuals within Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, even as those governments help facilitate U.S. military operations in Iraq by providing basing and overflight rights and by cooperating on intelligence issues.

As worries about Iraq increase, the Gulf States are becoming more active. The United Arab Emirates and Kuwait have hosted meetings in support of the International Compact. Saudi Arabia recently took the positive step of hosting a conference of Iraqi religious leaders in Mecca. Several Gulf States have helped foster dialogue with Iraq’s Sunni Arab population. While the Gulf States are not proponents of democracy in Iraq, they worry about the direction of events: battle-hardened insurgents from Iraq could pose a threat to their own internal stability, and the growth of Iranian influence in the region is deeply troubling to them.
TURKEY. Turkish policy toward Iraq is focused on discouraging Kurdish nationalism, which is seen as an existential threat to Turkey’s own internal stability. The Turks have supported the Turkmen minority within Iraq and have used their influence to try to block the incorporation of Kirkuk into Iraqi Kurdistan. At the same time, Turkish companies have invested in Kurdish areas in northern Iraq, and Turkish and Kurdish leaders have sought constructive engagement on political, security, and economic issues.

The Turks are deeply concerned about the operations of the Kurdish Workers Party (PKK)—a terrorist group based in northern Iraq that has killed thousands of Turks. They are upset that the United States and Iraq have not targeted the PKK more aggressively. The Turks have threatened to go after the PKK themselves, and have made several forays across the border into Iraq.

JORDAN AND EGYPT. Both Jordan and Egypt have provided some assistance for the Iraqi government. Jordan has trained thousands of Iraqi police, has an ambassador in Baghdad, and King Abdullah recently hosted a meeting in Amman between President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki. Egypt has provided some limited Iraqi army training. Both Jordan and Egypt have facilitated U.S. military operations—Jordan by allowing overflight and search-and-rescue operations, Egypt by allowing overflight and Suez Canal transits; both provide important cooperation on intelligence. Jordan is currently home to 700,000 Iraqi refugees (equal to 10 percent of its population) and fears a flood of many more. Both Jordan and Egypt are concerned about the position of Iraq’s Sunni Arabs and want constitutional reforms in Iraq to bolster the Sunni community. They also fear the return of insurgents to their countries.

The International Community

The international community beyond the United Kingdom and our other coalition partners has played a limited role in Iraq. The United Nations—acting under Security Council Resolution 1546—has a small presence in Iraq; it has assisted in holding elections, drafting the constitution, organizing the government, and building institutions. The World Bank, which has committed a limited number of resources, has one and sometimes two staff in Iraq. The European Union has a representative there.

Several U.S.-based and international nongovernmental organizations have done excellent work within Iraq, operating under great hardship. Both Iraqi and international nongovernmental organizations play an important role in reaching across sectarian lines to enhance dialogue and understanding, and several U.S.-based organizations have employed substantial resources to help Iraqis develop their democracy. However, the participation of international nongovernmental organizations is constrained by the lack of security, and their Iraqi counterparts face a cumbersome and often politicized process of registration with the government.
The United Kingdom has dedicated an extraordinary amount of resources to Iraq and has made great sacrifices. In addition to 7,200 troops, the United Kingdom has a substantial diplomatic presence, particularly in Basra and the Iraqi southeast. The United Kingdom has been an active and key player at every stage of Iraq’s political development. U.K. officials told us that they remain committed to working for stability in Iraq, and will reduce their commitment of troops and resources in response to the situation on the ground.

5. Conclusions

The United States has made a massive commitment to the future of Iraq in both blood and treasure. As of December 2006, nearly 2,900 Americans have lost their lives serving in Iraq. Another 21,000 Americans have been wounded, many severely.

To date, the United States has spent roughly $400 billion on the Iraq War, and costs are running about $8 billion per month. In addition, the United States must expect significant “tail costs” to come. Caring for veterans and replacing lost equipment will run into the hundreds of billions of dollars. Estimates run as high as $2 trillion for the final cost of the U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Despite a massive effort, stability in Iraq remains elusive and the situation is deteriorating. The Iraqi government cannot now govern, sustain, and defend itself without the support of the United States. Iraqis have not been convinced that they must take responsibility for their own future. Iraq’s neighbors and much of the international community have not been persuaded to play an active and constructive role in supporting Iraq. The ability of the United States to shape outcomes is diminishing. Time is running out.

B. Consequences of Continued Decline in Iraq

If the situation in Iraq continues to deteriorate, the consequences could be severe for Iraq, the United States, the region, and the world.
Continuing violence could lead toward greater chaos, and inflict greater suffering upon the Iraqi people. A collapse of Iraq’s government and economy would further cripple a country already unable to meet its people’s needs. Iraq’s security forces could split along sectarian lines. A humanitarian catastrophe could follow as more refugees are forced to relocate across the country and the region. Ethnic cleansing could escalate. The Iraqi people could be subjected to another strongman who flexes the political and military muscle required to impose order amid anarchy. Freedoms could be lost.

Other countries in the region fear significant violence crossing their borders. Chaos in Iraq could lead those countries to intervene to protect their own interests, thereby perhaps sparking a broader regional war. Turkey could send troops into northern Iraq to prevent Kurdistan from declaring independence. Iran could send in troops to restore stability in southern Iraq and perhaps gain control of oil fields. The regional influence of Iran could rise at a time when that country is on a path to producing nuclear weapons.

Ambassadors from neighboring countries told us that they fear the distinct possibility of Sunni-Shia clashes across the Islamic world. Many expressed a fear of Shia insurrections—perhaps fomented by Iran—in Sunni-ruled states. Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora’s box of problems—including the radicalization of populations, mass movements of populations, and regime changes—that might take decades to play out. If the instability in Iraq spreads to the other Gulf States, a drop in oil production and exports could lead to a sharp increase in the price of oil and thus could harm the global economy.

Terrorism could grow. As one Iraqi official told us, “Al Qaeda is now a franchise in Iraq, like McDonald’s.” Left unchecked, al Qaeda in Iraq could continue to incite violence between Sunnis and Shia. A chaotic Iraq could provide a still stronger base of operations for terrorists who seek to act regionally or even globally. Al Qaeda will portray any failure by the United States in Iraq as a significant victory that will be featured prominently as they recruit for their cause in the region and around the world. Ayman al-Zawahiri, deputy to Osama bin Laden, has declared Iraq a focus for al Qaeda: they will seek to expel the Americans and then spread “the jihad wave to the secular countries neighboring Iraq.” A senior European official told us that failure in Iraq could incite terrorist attacks within his country.

The global standing of the United States could suffer if Iraq descends further into chaos. Iraq is a major test of, and strain on, U.S. military, diplomatic, and financial capacities. Perceived failure there could diminish America’s credibility and influence in a region that is the center of the Islamic world and vital to the world’s energy supply. This loss would reduce America’s global influence at a time when pressing issues in North Korea, Iran, and elsewhere demand our full attention and strong U.S. leadership of international alliances. And the longer that U.S. political and military resources are tied down in Iraq, the more the chances for American failure in Afghanistan increase.

Continued problems in Iraq could lead to greater polarization within the United States. Sixty-six percent of Americans disapprove of the government’s handling of the war, and more than 60 percent feel that there is no clear plan for moving forward. The November elections were largely viewed as a referendum on the progress in Iraq. Arguments about continuing to provide security and assistance to Iraq will fall on deaf ears if Americans become disillusioned with the government that the United States invested so much to create. U.S. foreign policy cannot be successfully sustained without the broad support of the American people.
Continued problems in Iraq could also lead to greater Iraqi opposition to the United States. Recent polling indicates that only 36 percent of Iraqis feel their country is heading in the right direction, and 79 percent of Iraqis have a "mostly negative" view of the influence that the United States has in their country. Sixty-one percent of Iraqis approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces. If Iraqis continue to perceive Americans as representing an occupying force, the United States could become its own worst enemy in a land it liberated from tyranny.

These and other predictions of dire consequences in Iraq and the region are by no means a certainty. Iraq has taken several positive steps since Saddam Hussein was overthrown: Iraqis restored full sovereignty, conducted open national elections, drafted a permanent constitution, ratified that constitution, and elected a new government pursuant to that constitution. Iraqis may become so sobered by the prospect of an unfolding civil war and intervention by their regional neighbors that they take the steps necessary to avert catastrophe. But at the moment, such a scenario seems implausible because the Iraqi people and their leaders have been slow to demonstrate the capacity or will to act.

C. Some Alternative Courses in Iraq

Because of the gravity of the situation in Iraq and of its consequences for Iraq, the United States, the region, and the world, the Iraq Study Group has carefully considered the full range of alternative approaches for moving forward. We recognize that there is no perfect solution and that all that have been suggested have flaws. The following are some of the more notable possibilities that we have considered.
1. Precipitate Withdrawal

Because of the importance of Iraq, the potential for catastrophe, and the role and commitments of the United States in initiating events that have led to the current situation, we believe it would be wrong for the United States to abandon the country through a precipitate withdrawal of troops and support. A premature American departure from Iraq would almost certainly produce greater sectarian violence and further deterioration of conditions, leading to a number of the adverse consequences outlined above. The near-term results would be a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization, and a threat to the global economy. Al Qaeda would depict our withdrawal as a historic victory. If we leave and Iraq descends into chaos, the long-range consequences could eventually require the United States to return.

2. Staying the Course

Current U.S. policy is not working, as the level of violence in Iraq is rising and the government is not advancing national reconciliation. Making no changes in policy would simply delay the day of reckoning at a high cost. Nearly 100 Americans are dying every month. The United States is spending $2 billion a week. Our ability to respond to other international crises is constrained. A majority of the American people are souring on the war. This level of expense is not sustainable over an extended period, especially when progress is not being made. The longer the United States remains in Iraq without progress, the more resentment will grow among Iraqis who believe they are subjects of a repressive American occupation. As one U.S. official said to us, “Our leaving would make it worse... The current approach without modification will not make it better.”

3. More Troops for Iraq

Sustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental cause of violence in Iraq, which is the absence of national reconciliation. A senior American general told us that adding U.S. troops might temporarily help limit violence in a highly localized area. However, past experience indicates that the violence would simply rekindle as soon as U.S. forces are moved to another area. As another American general told us, if the Iraqi government does not make political progress, “all the troops in the world will not provide security.” Meanwhile, America’s military capacity is stretched thin: we do not have the troops or equipment to make a substantial, sustained increase in our troop presence. Increased deployments to Iraq would also necessarily hamper our ability to provide adequate resources for our efforts in Afghanistan or respond to crises around the world.
4. Devolution to Three Regions

The costs associated with devolving Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions with loose central control would be too high. Because Iraq’s population is not neatly separated, regional boundaries cannot be easily drawn. All eighteen Iraqi provinces have mixed populations, as do Baghdad and most other major cities in Iraq. A rapid devolution could result in mass population movements, collapse of the Iraqi security forces, strengthening of militias, ethnic cleansing, destabilization of neighboring states, or attempts by neighboring states to dominate Iraqi regions. Iraqis, particularly Sunni Arabs, told us that such a division would confirm wider fears across the Arab world that the United States invaded Iraq to weaken a strong Arab state.

While such devolution is a possible consequence of continued instability in Iraq, we do not believe the United States should support this course as a policy goal or impose this outcome on the Iraqi state. If events were to move irreversibly in this direction, the United States should manage the situation to ameliorate humanitarian consequences, contain the spread of violence, and minimize regional instability. The United States should support as much as possible central control by governmental authorities in Baghdad, particularly on the question of oil revenues.

D. Achieving Our Goals

We agree with the goal of U.S. policy in Iraq, as stated by the President: an Iraq that can “govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself.” In our view, this definition entails an Iraq with a broadly representative government that maintains its territorial integrity, is at peace with its neighbors, denies terrorism a sanctuary, and doesn’t brutalize its own people. Given the current situation in Iraq, achieving this goal will require much time and will depend primarily on the actions of the Iraqi people.

In our judgment, there is a new way forward for the United States to support this objective, and it will offer people of Iraq a reasonable opportunity to lead a better life than they did under Saddam Hussein. Our recommended course has shortcomings, as does each of the policy alternatives we have reviewed. We firmly believe, however, that it includes the best strategies and tactics available to us to positively influence the outcome in Iraq and the region. We believe that it could enable a responsible transition that will give the Iraqi people a chance to pursue a better future, as well as serving America’s interests and values in the years ahead.
II

The Way Forward—
A New Approach

Progress in Iraq is still possible if new approaches are taken promptly by Iraq, the United States, and other countries that have a stake in the Middle East.

To attain the goals we have outlined, changes in course must be made both outside and inside Iraq. Our report offers a comprehensive strategy to build regional and international support for stability in Iraq, as it encourages the Iraqi people to assume control of their own destiny. It offers a responsible transition.

Externally, the United States should immediately begin to employ all elements of American power to construct a regional mechanism that can support, rather than retard, progress in Iraq. Internally, the Iraqi government must take the steps required to achieve national reconciliation, reduce violence, and improve the daily lives of Iraqis. Efforts to implement these external and internal strategies must begin now and must be undertaken in concert with one another.

This responsible transition can allow for a reduction in the U.S. presence in Iraq over time.

A. The External Approach: Building an International Consensus

The United States must build a new international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region.

In order to foster such consensus, the United States should embark on a robust diplomatic effort to establish an international support structure intended to stabilize Iraq and ease tensions in other countries in the region. This support structure should include every country that has an interest in averting a chaotic Iraq, including all of Iraq’s neighbors—Iran and Syria among them. Despite the well-known differences between many of these countries, they all share an interest in avoiding the horrific consequences that would flow from a chaotic Iraq, particularly a humanitarian catastrophe and regional destabilization.
A reinvigorated diplomatic effort is required because it is clear that the Iraqi government cannot succeed in governing, defending, and sustaining itself by relying on U.S. military and economic support alone. Nor can the Iraqi government succeed by relying only on U.S. military support in conjunction with Iraqi military and police capabilities. Some states have been withholding commitments they could make to support Iraq’s stabilization and reconstruction. Some states have been actively undermining stability in Iraq. To achieve a political solution within Iraq, a broader international support structure is needed.

1. The New Diplomatic Offensive

Iraq cannot be addressed effectively in isolation from other major regional issues, interests, and unresolved conflicts. To put it simply, all key issues in the Middle East—the Arab-Israeli conflict, Iraq, Iran, the need for political and economic reforms, and extremism and terrorism—are inextricably linked. In addition to supporting stability in Iraq, a comprehensive diplomatic offensive—the New Diplomatic Offensive—should address these key regional issues. By doing so, it would help marginalize extremists and terrorists, promote U.S. values and interests, and improve America’s global image.

Under the diplomatic offensive, we propose regional and international initiatives and steps to assist the Iraqi government in achieving certain security, political, and economic milestones. Achieving these milestones will require at least the acquiescence of Iraq’s neighbors, and their active and timely cooperation would be highly desirable.

The diplomatic offensive would extend beyond the primarily economic “Compact for Iraq” by also emphasizing political, diplomatic, and security issues. At the same time, it would be coordinated with the goals of the Compact for Iraq. The diplomatic offensive would also be broader and more far-reaching than the “Gulf Plus Two” efforts currently being conducted, and those efforts should be folded into and become part of the diplomatic offensive.

States included within the diplomatic offensive can play a major role in reinforcing national reconciliation efforts between Iraqi Sunnis and Shia. Such reinforcement would contribute substantially to legitimizing the political process in Iraq. Iraq’s leaders may not be able to come together unless they receive the necessary signals and support from abroad. This backing will not materialize of its own accord, and must be encouraged urgently by the United States.

In order to advance a comprehensive diplomatic solution, the Study Group recommends as follows:

RECOMMENDATION 1: The United States, working with the Iraqi government, should launch the comprehensive New Diplomatic Offensive to deal with the problems of Iraq and of the region. This new diplomatic offensive should be launched before December 31, 2006.

RECOMMENDATION 2: The goals of the diplomatic offensive as it relates to regional players should be to:
i. Support the unity and territorial integrity of Iraq.

ii. Stop destabilizing interventions and actions by Iraq’s neighbors.

iii. Secure Iraq’s borders, including the use of joint patrols with neighboring countries.

iv. Prevent the expansion of the instability and conflict beyond Iraq’s borders.

v. Promote economic assistance, commerce, trade, political support, and, if possible, military assistance for the Iraqi government from non-neighboring Muslim nations.

vi. Energize countries to support national political reconciliation in Iraq.

vii. Validate Iraq’s legitimacy by resuming diplomatic relations, where appropriate, and reestablishing embassies in Baghdad.

viii. Assist Iraq in establishing active working embassies in key capitals in the region (for example, in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia).

ix. Help Iraq reach a mutually acceptable agreement on Kirkuk.

x. Assist the Iraqi government in achieving certain security, political, and economic milestones, including better performance on issues such as national reconciliation, equitable distribution of oil revenues, and the dismantling of militias.

RECOMMENDATION 3: As a complement to the diplomatic offensive, and in addition to the Support Group discussed below, the United States and the Iraqi government should support the holding of a conference or meeting in Baghdad of the Organization of the Islamic Conference or the Arab League both to assist the Iraqi government in promoting national reconciliation in Iraq and to reestablish their diplomatic presence in Iraq.

2. The Iraq International Support Group

This new diplomatic offensive cannot be successful unless it includes the active participation of those countries that have a critical stake in preventing Iraq from falling into chaos. To encourage their participation, the United States should immediately seek the creation of the Iraq International Support Group. The Support Group should also include all countries that border Iraq as well as other key countries in the region and the world.

The Support Group would not seek to impose obligations or undertakings on the government of Iraq. Instead, the Support Group would assist Iraq in ways the government of Iraq would desire, attempting to strengthen Iraq’s sovereignty—not diminish it.
It is clear to Iraq Study Group members that all of Iraq’s neighbors are anxious about the situation in Iraq. They favor a unified Iraq that is strong enough to maintain its territorial integrity, but not so powerful as to threaten its neighbors. None favors the breakup of the Iraqi state. Each country in the region views the situation in Iraq through the filter of its particular set of interests. For example:

- Turkey opposes an independent or even highly autonomous Kurdistan because of its own national security considerations.

- Iran backs Shia claims and supports various Shia militias in Iraq, but it also supports other groups in order to enhance its influence and hedge its bets on possible outcomes.

- Syria, despite facilitating support for Iraqi insurgent groups, would be threatened by the impact that the breakup of Iraq would have on its own multiethnic and multiconfessional society.

- Kuwait wants to ensure that it will not once again be the victim of Iraqi irredentism and aggression.

- Saudi Arabia and Jordan share Sunni concerns over Shia ascendancy in Iraq and the region as a whole.

- The other Arab Gulf states also recognize the benefits of an outcome in Iraq that does not destabilize the region and exacerbate Shia-Sunni tensions.

- None of Iraq’s neighbors especially major countries such as Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Israel see it in their interest for the situation in Iraq to lead to aggrandized regional influence by Iran. Indeed, they may take active steps to limit Iran’s influence, steps that could lead to an intraregional conflict.

Left to their own devices, these governments will tend to reinforce ethnic, sectarian, and political divisions within Iraqi society. But if the Support Group takes a systematic and active approach toward considering the concerns of each country, we believe that each can be encouraged to play a positive role in Iraq and the region.

SAUDI ARABIA. Saudi Arabia’s agreement not to intervene with assistance to Sunni Arab Iraqis could be an essential quid pro quo for similar forbearance on the part of other neighbors, especially Iran. The Saudis could use their Islamic credentials to help reconcile differences between Iraqi factions and build broader support in the Islamic world for a stabilization agreement, as their recent hosting of a meeting of Islamic religious leaders in Mecca suggests. If the government in Baghdad pursues a path of national reconciliation with the Sunnis, the Saudis could help Iraq confront and eliminate al Qaeda in Iraq. They could also cancel the Iraqi debt owed them. In addition, the Saudis might be helpful in persuading the Syrians to cooperate.
TURKEY. As a major Sunni Muslim country on Iraq’s borders, Turkey can be a partner in supporting the national reconciliation process in Iraq. Such efforts can be particularly helpful given Turkey’s interest in Kurdistan remaining an integral part of a unified Iraq and its interest in preventing a safe haven for Kurdish terrorists (the PKK).

EGYPT. Because of its important role in the Arab world, Egypt should be encouraged to foster the national reconciliation process in Iraq with a focus on getting the Sunnis to participate. At the same time, Egypt has the means, and indeed has offered, to train groups of Iraqi military and security forces in Egypt on a rotational basis.

JORDAN. Jordan, like Egypt, can help in the national reconciliation process in Iraq with the Sunnis. It too has the professional capability to train and equip Iraqi military and security forces.

RECOMMENDATION 4: As an instrument of the New Diplomatic Offensive, an Iraq International Support Group should be organized immediately following the launch of the New Diplomatic Offensive.

RECOMMENDATION 5: The Support Group should consist of Iraq and all the states bordering Iraq, including Iran and Syria; the key regional states, including Egypt and the Gulf States; the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council; the European Union; and, of course, Iraq itself. Other countries for instance, Germany, Japan and South Korea—that might be willing to contribute to resolving political, diplomatic, and security problems affecting Iraq could also become members.

RECOMMENDATION 6: The New Diplomatic Offensive and the work of the Support Group should be carried out with urgency, and should be conducted by and organized at the level of foreign minister or above. The Secretary of State, if not the President, should lead the U.S. effort. That effort should be both bilateral and multilateral, as circumstances require.

RECOMMENDATION 7: The Support Group should call on the participation of the office of the United Nations Secretary-General in its work. The United Nations Secretary-General should designate a Special Envoy as his representative.

RECOMMENDATION 8: The Support Group, as part of the New Diplomatic Offensive, should develop specific approaches to neighboring countries that take into account the interests, perspectives, and potential contributions as suggested above.

3. Dealing with Iran and Syria

Dealing with Iran and Syria is controversial. Nevertheless, it is our view that in diplomacy, a nation can and should engage its adversaries and enemies to try to resolve conflicts and differences consistent with its own interests. Accordingly, the Support Group should actively engage Iran and Syria in its diplomatic dialogue, without preconditions.
The Study Group recognizes that U.S. relationships with Iran and Syria involve difficult issues that must be resolved. Diplomatic talks should be extensive and substantive, and they will require a balancing of interests. The United States has diplomatic, economic, and military disincentives available in approaches to both Iran and Syria. However, the United States should also consider incentives to try to engage them constructively, much as it did successfully with Libya.

Some of the possible incentives to Iran, Syria, or both include:

i. An Iraq that does not disintegrate and destabilize its neighbors and the region.

ii. The continuing role of the United States in preventing the Taliban from destabilizing Afghanistan.

iii. Accession to international organizations, including the World Trade Organization.

iv. Prospects for enhanced diplomatic relations with the United States.

v. The prospect of a U.S. policy that emphasizes political and economic reforms instead of (as Iran now perceives it) advocating regime change.

vi. Prospects for a real, complete, and secure peace to be negotiated between Israel and Syria, with U.S. involvement as part of a broader initiative on Arab-Israeli peace as outlined below.

RECOMMENDATION 9: Under the aegis of the New Diplomatic Offensive and the Support Group, the United States should engage directly with Iran and Syria in order to try to obtain their commitment to constructive policies toward Iraq and other regional issues. In engaging Syria and Iran, the United States should consider incentives, as well as disincentives, in seeking constructive results.

IRAN. Engaging Iran is problematic, especially given the state of the U.S.-Iranian relationship. Yet the United States and Iran cooperated in Afghanistan, and both sides should explore whether this model can be replicated in the case of Iraq.

Although Iran sees it in its interest to have the United States bogged down in Iraq, Iran’s interests would not be served by a failure of U.S. policy in Iraq that led to chaos and the territorial disintegration of the Iraqi state. Iran’s population is slightly more than 50 percent Persian, but it has a large Azeri minority (24 percent of the population) as well as Kurdish and Arab minorities. Worst-case scenarios in Iraq could inflame sectarian tensions within Iran, with serious consequences for Iranian national security interests.

Our limited contacts with Iran’s government lead us to believe that its leaders are likely to say they will not participate in diplomatic efforts to support stability in Iraq. They attribute this reluctance to their belief that the United States seeks regime change in Iran.
Nevertheless, as one of Iraq's neighbors Iran should be asked to assume its responsibility to participate in the Support Group. An Iranian refusal to do so would demonstrate to Iraq and the rest of the world Iran's rejectionist attitude and approach, which could lead to its isolation. Further, Iran's refusal to cooperate on this matter would diminish its prospects of engaging with the United States in the broader dialogue it seeks.

RECOMMENDATION 10: The issue of Iran's nuclear programs should continue to be dealt with by the United Nations Security Council and its five permanent members (i.e., the United States, United Kingdom, France, Russia, and China) plus Germany.

RECOMMENDATION 11: Diplomatic efforts within the Support Group should seek to persuade Iran that it should take specific steps to improve the situation in Iraq.

Among steps Iran could usefully take are the following:

- Iran should stem the flow of equipment, technology, and training to any group resorting to violence in Iraq.
- Iran should make clear its support for the territorial integrity of Iraq as a unified state, as well as its respect for the sovereignty of Iraq and its government.
- Iran can use its influence, especially over Shia groups in Iraq, to encourage national reconciliation.
- Iran can also, in the right circumstances, help in the economic reconstruction of Iraq.

SYRIA. Although the U.S.-Syrian relationship is at a low point, both countries have important interests in the region that could be enhanced if they were able to establish some common ground on how to move forward. This approach worked effectively in the early 1990s. In this context, Syria's national interests in the Arab-Israeli dispute are important and can be brought into play.

Syria can make a major contribution to Iraq's stability in several ways. Accordingly, the Study Group recommends the following:

RECOMMENDATION 12: The United States and the Support Group should encourage and persuade Syria of the merit of such contributions as the following:

- Syria can control its border with Iraq to the maximum extent possible and work together with Iraqis on joint patrols on the border. Doing so will help stem the flow of funding, insurgents, and terrorists in and out of Iraq.
- Syria can establish hotlines to exchange information with the Iraqis.
- Syria can increase its political and economic cooperation with Iraq.
4. The Wider Regional Context

The United States will not be able to achieve its goals in the Middle East unless the United States deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict.

There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the United States to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts: Lebanon, Syria, and President Bush’s June 2002 commitment to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine. This commitment must include direct talks with, by, and between Israel, Lebanon, Palestinians (those who accept Israel’s right to exist), and particularly Syria—which is the principal transit point for shipments of weapons to Hezbollah, and which supports radical Palestinian groups.

The United States does its ally Israel no favors in avoiding direct involvement to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict. For several reasons, we should act boldly:

• There is no military solution to this conflict.

• The vast majority of the Israeli body politic is tired of being a nation perpetually at war.

• No American administration—Democratic or Republican—will ever abandon Israel.

• Political engagement and dialogue are essential in the Arab-Israeli dispute because it is an axiom that when the political process breaks down there will be violence on the ground.

• The only basis on which peace can be achieved is that set forth in UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and in the principle of “land for peace.”

• The only lasting and secure peace will be a negotiated peace such as Israel has achieved with Egypt and Jordan.

This effort would strongly support moderate Arab governments in the region, especially the democratically elected government of Lebanon, and the Palestinian Authority under President Mahmoud Abbas.

RECOMMENDATION 13: There must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the United States to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts: Lebanon and Syria, and President Bush’s June 2002 commitment to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine.

RECOMMENDATION 14: This effort should include—as soon as possible—the unconditional calling and holding of meetings, under the auspices of the United States or the Quartet (i.e., the United States, Russia, European Union, and the United Nations), between Israel and Lebanon and Syria on the one hand, and Israel and Palestinians (who acknowledge Israel’s right to exist) on the other. The purpose of these meetings would be to negotiate peace as was done at the Madrid Conference in 1991, and on two separate tracks—one Syrian-Lebanese, and the other Palestinian.
RECOMMENDATION 15: Concerning Syria, some elements of that negotiated peace should be:

- Syria’s full adherence to UN Security Council Resolution 1701 of August 2006, which provides the framework for Lebanon to regain sovereign control over its territory.

- Syria’s full cooperation with all investigations into political assassinations in Lebanon, especially those of Rafik Hariri and Pierre Gemayel.

- A verifiable cessation of Syrian aid to Hezbollah and the use of Syrian territory for transshipment of Iranian weapons and aid to Hezbollah. (This step would do much to solve Israel’s problem with Hezbollah.)

- Syria’s use of its influence with Hamas and Hezbollah for the release of the captured Israeli Defense Force soldiers.

- A verifiable cessation of Syrian efforts to undermine the democratically elected government of Lebanon.

- A verifiable cessation of arms shipments from or transiting through Syria for Hamas and other radical Palestinian groups.

- A Syrian commitment to help obtain from Hamas an acknowledgment of Israel’s right to exist.

- Greater Syrian efforts to seal its border with Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 16: In exchange for these actions and in the context of a full and secure peace agreement, the Israelis should return the Golan Heights, with a U.S. security guarantee for Israel that could include an international force on the border, including U.S. troops if requested by both parties.

RECOMMENDATION 17: Concerning the Palestinian issue, elements of that negotiated peace should include:

- Adherence to UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and to the principle of land for peace, which are the only bases for achieving peace.

- Strong support for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian Authority to take the lead in preparing the way for negotiations with Israel.

- A major effort to move from the current hostilities by consolidating the cease-fire reached between the Palestinians and the Israelis in November 2006.
• Support for a Palestinian national unity government.

• Sustainable negotiations leading to a final peace settlement along the lines of President Bush’s two-state solution, which would address the key final status issues of borders, settlements, Jerusalem, the right of return, and the end of conflict.

Afghanistan

At the same time, we must not lose sight of the importance of the situation inside Afghanistan and the renewed threat posed by the Taliban. Afghanistan’s borders are porous. If the Taliban were to control more of Afghanistan, it could provide al Qaeda the political space to conduct terrorist operations. This development would destabilize the region and have national security implications for the United States and other countries around the world. Also, the significant increase in poppy production in Afghanistan fuels the illegal drug trade and narco-terrorism.

The huge focus of U.S. political, military, and economic support on Iraq has necessarily diverted attention from Afghanistan. As the United States develops its approach toward Iraq and the Middle East, it must also give priority to the situation in Afghanistan. Doing so may require increased political, security, and military measures.

RECOMMENDATION 18: It is critical for the United States to provide additional political, economic, and military support for Afghanistan, including resources that might become available as combat forces are moved from Iraq.

B. The Internal Approach:
Helping Iraqis Help Themselves

The New Diplomatic Offensive will provide the proper external environment and support for the difficult internal steps that the Iraqi government must take to promote national reconciliation, establish security, and make progress on governance.

The most important issues facing Iraq’s future are now the responsibility of Iraq’s elected leaders. Because of the security and assistance it provides, the United States has a significant role to play. Yet only the government and people of Iraq can make and sustain certain decisions critical to Iraq’s future.
1. Performance on Milestones

The United States should work closely with Iraq’s leaders to support the achievement of specific objectives—or milestones—on national reconciliation, security, and governance. Miracles cannot be expected, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect action and progress. The Iraqi government needs to show its own citizens—and the citizens of the United States and other countries—that it deserves continued support.

The U.S. government must make clear that it expects action by the Iraqi government to make substantial progress toward these milestones. Such a message can be sent only at the level of our national leaders, and only in person, during direct consultation.

As President Bush’s meeting with Prime Minister Maliki in Amman, Jordan demonstrates, it is important for the President to remain in close and frequent contact with the Iraqi leadership. There is no substitute for sustained dialogue at the highest levels of government.

During these high-level exchanges, the United States should lay out an agenda for continued support to help Iraq achieve milestones, as well as underscoring the consequences if Iraq does not act. It should be unambiguous that continued U.S. political, military, and economic support for Iraq depends on the Iraqi government’s demonstrating political will and making substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance. The transfer of command and control over Iraqi security forces units from the United States to Iraq should be influenced by Iraq’s performance on milestones.

The United States should also signal that it is seeking broad international support for Iraq on behalf of achieving these milestones. The United States can begin to shape a positive climate for its diplomatic efforts, internationally and within Iraq, through public statements by President Bush that reject the notion that the United States seeks to control Iraq’s oil, or seeks permanent military bases within Iraq. However, the United States could consider a request from Iraq for temporary bases.

RECOMMENDATION 19: The President and the leadership of his national security team should remain in close and frequent contact with the Iraqi leadership. These contacts must convey a clear message: there must be action by the Iraqi government to make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones. In public diplomacy, the President should convey as much detail as possible about the substance of these exchanges in order to keep the American people, the Iraqi people, and the countries in the region well informed.

RECOMMENDATION 20: If the Iraqi government demonstrates political will and makes substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should make clear its willingness to continue training, assistance, and support for Iraq’s security forces, and to continue political, military, and economic support for the Iraqi government. As Iraq becomes more capable of governing, defending, and sustaining itself, the U.S. military and civilian presence in Iraq can be reduced.
RECOMMENDATION 21: If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military, or economic support for the Iraqi government.

RECOMMENDATION 22: The President should state that the United States does not seek permanent military bases in Iraq. If the Iraqi government were to request a temporary base or bases, then the U.S. government could consider that request as it would in the case of any other government.

RECOMMENDATION 23: The President should restate that the United States does not seek to control Iraq’s oil.

Milestones for Iraq

The government of Iraq understands that dramatic steps are necessary to avert a downward spiral and make progress. Prime Minister Maliki has worked closely in consultation with the United States and has put forward the following milestones in the key areas of national reconciliation, security and governance:

NATIONAL RECONCILIATION

By the end of 2006–early 2007:

➢ Approval of the Provincial Election Law and setting an election date
➢ Approval of the Petroleum Law
➢ Approval of the De-Baathification Law
➢ Approval of the Militia Law

By March 2007:

➢ A referendum on constitutional amendments (if it is necessary)

By May 2007:

➢ Completion of Militia Law implementation
➢ Approval of amnesty agreement
➢ Completion of reconciliation efforts
By June 2007:

- Provincial elections

SECURITY (pending joint U.S.-Iraqi review)

By the end of 2006:

- Iraqi increase of 2007 security spending over 2006 levels

By April 2007:

- Iraqi control of the Army

By September 2007:

- Iraqi control of provinces

By December 2007:

- Iraqi security self-reliance (with U.S. support)

GOVERNANCE

By the end of 2006:

- The Central Bank of Iraq will raise interest rates to 20 percent and appreciate the Iraqi dinar by 10 percent to combat accelerating inflation.

- Iraq will continue increasing domestic prices for refined petroleum products and sell imported fuel at market prices.

RECOMMENDATION 24: The contemplated completion dates of the end of 2006 or early 2007 for some milestones may not be realistic. These should be completed by the first quarter of 2007.

RECOMMENDATION 25: These milestones are a good start. The United States should consult closely with the Iraqi government and develop additional milestones in three areas: national reconciliation, security, and improving government services affecting the daily lives of Iraqis. As with the current milestones, these additional milestones should be tied to calendar dates to the fullest extent possible.
2. National Reconciliation

National reconciliation is essential to reduce further violence and maintain the unity of Iraq.

U.S. forces can help provide stability for a time to enable Iraqi leaders to negotiate political solutions, but they cannot stop the violence—or even contain it—if there is no underlying political agreement among Iraqis about the future of their country.

The Iraqi government must send a clear signal to Sunnis that there is a place for them in national life. The government needs to act now, to give a signal of hope. Unless Sunnis believe they can get a fair deal in Iraq through the political process, there is no prospect that the insurgency will end. To strike this fair deal, the Iraqi government and the Iraqi people must address several issues that are critical to the success of national reconciliation and thus to the future of Iraq.

Steps for Iraq to Take on Behalf of National Reconciliation

RECOMMENDATION 26: Constitution review. Review of the constitution is essential to national reconciliation and should be pursued on an urgent basis. The United Nations has expertise in this field, and should play a role in this process.

RECOMMENDATION 27: De-Baathification. Political reconciliation requires the reintegration of Baathists and Arab nationalists into national life, with the leading figures of Saddam Hussein’s regime excluded. The United States should encourage the return of qualified Iraqi professionals—Suni or Shia, nationalist or ex-Baathist, Kurd or Turkmen or Christian or Arab—into the government.

RECOMMENDATION 28: Oil revenue sharing. Oil revenues should accrue to the central government and be shared on the basis of population. No formula that gives control over revenues from future fields to the regions or gives control of oil fields to the regions is compatible with national reconciliation.

RECOMMENDATION 29: Provincial elections. Provincial elections should be held at the earliest possible date. Under the constitution, new provincial elections should have been held already. They are necessary to restore representative government.

RECOMMENDATION 30: Kirkuk. Given the very dangerous situation in Kirkuk, international arbitration is necessary to avert communal violence. Kirkuk’s mix of Kurdish, Arab, and Turkmen populations could make it a powder keg. A referendum on the future of Kirkuk (as required by the Iraqi Constitution before the end of 2007) would be explosive and should be delayed. This issue should be placed on the agenda of the International Iraq Support Group as part of the New Diplomatic Offensive.
RECOMMENDATION 31: Amnesty. Amnesty proposals must be far-reaching. Any successful effort at national reconciliation must involve those in the government finding ways and means to reconcile with former bitter enemies.

RECOMMENDATION 32: Minorities. The rights of women and the rights of all minority communities in Iraq, including Turkmen, Chaldeans, Assyrians, Yazidis, Sabeans, and Armenians, must be protected.

RECOMMENDATION 33: Civil society. The Iraqi government should stop using the process of registering nongovernmental organizations as a tool for politicizing or stopping their activities. Registration should be solely an administrative act, not an occasion for government censorship and interference.

Steps for the United States to Take on Behalf of National Reconciliation

The United States can take several steps to assist in Iraq’s reconciliation process.

The presence of U.S. forces in Iraq is a key topic of interest in a national reconciliation dialogue. The point is not for the United States to set timetables or deadlines for withdrawal, an approach that we oppose. The point is for the United States and Iraq to make clear their shared interest in the orderly departure of U.S. forces as Iraqi forces take on the security mission. A successful national reconciliation dialogue will advance that departure date.

RECOMMENDATION 34: The question of the future U.S. force presence must be on the table for discussion as the national reconciliation dialogue takes place. Its inclusion will increase the likelihood of participation by insurgents and militia leaders, and thereby increase the possibilities for success.

Violence cannot end unless dialogue begins, and the dialogue must involve those who wield power, not simply those who hold political office. The United States must try to talk directly to Grand Ayatollah Sistani and must consider appointing a high-level American Shia Muslim to serve as an emissary to him. The United States must also try to talk directly to Moqtada al-Sadr, to militia leaders, and to insurgent leaders. The United Nations can help facilitate contacts.

RECOMMENDATION 35: The United States must make active efforts to engage all parties in Iraq, with the exception of al Qaeda. The United States must find a way to talk to Grand Ayatollah Sistani, Moqtada al-Sadr, and militia and insurgent leaders.
The very focus on sectarian identity that endangers Iraq also presents opportunities to seek broader support for a national reconciliation dialogue. Working with Iraqi leaders, the international community and religious leaders can play an important role in fostering dialogue and reconciliation across the sectarian divide. The United States should actively encourage the constructive participation of all who can take part in advancing national reconciliation within Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 36: The United States should encourage dialogue between sectarian communities, as outlined in the New Diplomatic Offensive above. It should press religious leaders inside and outside Iraq to speak out on behalf of peace and reconciliation.

Finally, amnesty proposals from the Iraqi government are an important incentive in reconciliation talks and they need to be generous. Amnesty proposals to once-bitter enemies will be difficult for the United States to accept, just as they will be difficult for the Iraqis to make. Yet amnesty is an issue to be grappled with by the Iraqis, not by Americans. Despite being politically unpopular—in the United States as well as in Iraq—amnesty is essential if progress is to take place. Iraqi leaders need to be certain that they have U.S. support as they move forward with this critical element of national reconciliation.

RECOMMENDATION 37: Iraqi amnesty proposals must not be undercut in Washington by either the executive or the legislative branch.

Militias and National Reconciliation

The use of force by the government of Iraq is appropriate and necessary to stop militias that act as death squads or use violence against institutions of the state. However, solving the problem of militias requires national reconciliation.

Dealing with Iraq’s militias will require long-term attention, and substantial funding will be needed to disarm, demobilize, and reintegrate militia members into civilian society. Around the world, this process of transitioning members of irregular military forces from civil conflict to new lives once a peace settlement takes hold is familiar. The disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration of militias depends on national reconciliation and on confidence-building measures among the parties to that reconciliation.

Both the United Nations and expert and experienced nongovernmental organizations, especially the International Organization for Migration, must be on the ground with appropriate personnel months before any program to disarm, demobilize, and reintegrate militia members begins. Because the United States is a party to the conflict, the U.S. military should not be involved in implementing such a program. Yet U.S. financial and technical support is crucial.

RECOMMENDATION 38: The United States should support the presence of neutral international experts as advisors to the Iraqi government on the processes of disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration.
RECOMMENDATION 39: The United States should provide financial and technical support and establish a single office in Iraq to coordinate assistance to the Iraqi government and its expert advisors to aid a program to disarm, demobilize, and reintegrate militia members.

3. Security and Military Forces

A Military Strategy for Iraq

There is no action the American military can take that, by itself, can bring about success in Iraq. But there are actions that the U.S. and Iraqi governments, working together, can and should take to increase the probability of avoiding disaster there, and increase the chance of success.

The Iraqi government should accelerate the urgently needed national reconciliation program to which it has already committed. And it should accelerate assuming responsibility for Iraqi security by increasing the number and quality of Iraqi Army brigades. As the Iraqi Army increases in size and capability, the Iraqi government should be able to take real responsibility for governance.

While this process is under way, and to facilitate it, the United States should significantly increase the number of U.S. military personnel, including combat troops, imbedded in and supporting Iraqi Army units. As these actions proceed, we could begin to move combat forces out of Iraq. The primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq should evolve to one of supporting the Iraqi army, which would take over primary responsibility for combat operations. We should continue to maintain support forces, rapid-reaction forces, special operations forces, intelligence units, search-and-rescue units, and force protection units.

While the size and composition of the Iraqi Army is ultimately a matter for the Iraqi government to determine, we should be firm on the urgent near-term need for significant additional trained Army brigades, since this is the key to Iraqis taking over full responsibility for their own security, which they want to do and which we need them to do. It is clear that they will still need security assistance from the United States for some time to come as they work to achieve political and security changes.
One of the most important elements of our support would be the imbedding of substantially more U.S. military personnel in all Iraqi Army battalions and brigades, as well as within Iraqi companies. U.S. personnel would provide advice, combat assistance, and staff assistance. The training of Iraqi units by the United States has improved and should continue for the coming year. In addition to this training, Iraqi combat units need supervised on-the-job training as they move to field operations. This on-the-job training could be best done by imbedding more U.S. military personnel in Iraqi deployed units. The number of imbedded personnel would be based on the recommendation of our military commanders in Iraq, but it should be large enough to accelerate the development of a real combat capability in Iraqi Army units. Such a mission could involve 10,000 to 20,000 American troops instead of the 3,000 to 4,000 now in this role. This increase in imbedded troops could be carried out without an aggregate increase over time in the total number of troops in Iraq by making a corresponding decrease in troops assigned to U.S. combat brigades.

Another mission of the U.S. military would be to assist Iraqi deployed brigades with intelligence, transportation, air support, and logistics support, as well as providing some key equipment.

A vital mission of the U.S. military would be to maintain rapid-reaction teams and special operations teams. These teams would be available to undertake strike missions against al Qaeda in Iraq when the opportunity arises, as well as for other missions considered vital by the U.S. commander in Iraq.

The performance of the Iraqi Army could also be significantly improved if it had improved equipment. One source could be equipment left behind by departing U.S. units. The quickest and most effective way for the Iraqi Army to get the bulk of their equipment would be through our Foreign Military Sales program, which they have already begun to use.

While these efforts are building up, and as additional Iraqi brigades are being deployed, U.S. combat brigades could begin to move out of Iraq. By the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq. At that time, U.S. combat forces in Iraq could be deployed only in units embedded with Iraqi forces, in rapid-reaction and special operations teams, and in training, equipping, advising, force protection, and search and rescue. Intelligence and support efforts would continue. Even after the United States has moved all combat brigades out of Iraq, we would maintain a considerable military presence in the region, with our still significant force in Iraq and with our powerful air, ground, and naval deployments in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Qatar, as well as an increased presence in Afghanistan. These forces would be sufficiently robust to permit the United States, working with the Iraqi government, to accomplish four missions:

- Provide political reassurance to the Iraqi government in order to avoid its collapse and the disintegration of the country.
- Fight al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations in Iraq using special operations teams.
- Train, equip, and support the Iraqi security forces.
• Deter even more destructive interference in Iraq by Syria and Iran.

Because of the importance of Iraq to our regional security goals and to our ongoing fight against al Qaeda, we considered proposals to make a substantial increase (100,000 to 200,000) in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. We rejected this course because we do not believe that the needed levels are available for a sustained deployment. Further, adding more American troops could conceivably worsen those aspects of the security problem that are fed by the view that the U.S. presence is intended to be a long-term "occupation." We could, however, support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad, or to speed up the training and equipping mission, if the U.S. commander in Iraq determines that such steps would be effective.

We also rejected the immediate withdrawal of our troops, because we believe that so much is at stake.

We believe that our recommended actions will give the Iraqi Army the support it needs to have a reasonable chance to take responsibility for Iraq’s security. Given the ongoing deterioration in the security situation, it is urgent to move as quickly as possible to have that security role taken over by Iraqi security forces.

The United States should not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq for three compelling reasons.

First, and most importantly, the United States faces other security dangers in the world, and a continuing Iraqi commitment of American ground forces at present levels will leave no reserve available to meet other contingencies. On September 7, 2006, General James Jones, our NATO commander, called for more troops in Afghanistan, where U.S. and NATO forces are fighting a resurgence of al Qaeda and Taliban forces. The United States should respond positively to that request, and be prepared for other security contingencies, including those in Iran and North Korea.

Second, the long-term commitment of American ground forces to Iraq at current levels is adversely affecting Army readiness, with less than a third of the Army units currently at high readiness levels. The Army is unlikely to be able to meet the next rotation of troops in Iraq without undesirable changes in its deployment practices. The Army is now considering breaking its compact with the National Guard and Reserves that limits the number of years that these citizen-soldiers can be deployed. Behind this short-term strain is the longer-term risk that the ground forces will be impaired in ways that will take years to reverse.

And finally, an open-ended commitment of American forces would not provide the Iraqi government the incentive it needs to take the political actions that give Iraq the best chance of quelling sectarian violence. In the absence of such an incentive, the Iraqi government might continue to delay taking those difficult actions.

While it is clear that the presence of U.S. troops in Iraq is moderating the violence, there is little evidence that the long-term deployment of U.S. troops by itself has led or will lead to fundamental improvements in the security situation. It is important to recognize that there are no risk-free alternatives available to the United States at this time. Reducing our combat troop commitments in Iraq, whenever that occurs, undeniably creates risks, but leaving those forces tied down in Iraq indefinitely creates its own set of security risks.
RECOMMENDATION 40: The United States should not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 41: The United States must make it clear to the Iraqi government that the United States could carry out its plans, including planned redeployments, even if Iraq does not implement its planned changes. America’s other security needs and the future of our military cannot be made hostage to the actions or inactions of the Iraqi government.

RECOMMENDATION 42: We should seek to complete the training and equipping mission by the first quarter of 2008, as stated by General George Casey on October 24, 2006.

RECOMMENDATION 43: Military priorities in Iraq must change, with the highest priority given to the training, equipping, advising, and support mission and to counterterrorism operations.

RECOMMENDATION 44: The most highly qualified U.S. officers and military personnel should be assigned to the imbedded teams, and American teams should be present with Iraqi units down to the company level. The U.S. military should establish suitable career-enhancing incentives for these officers and personnel.

RECOMMENDATION 45: The United States should support more and better equipment for the Iraqi Army by encouraging the Iraqi government to accelerate its Foreign Military Sales requests and, as American combat brigades move out of Iraq, by leaving behind some American equipment for Iraqi forces.

Restoring the U.S. Military

We recognize that there are other results of the war in Iraq that have great consequence for our nation. One consequence has been the stress and uncertainty imposed on our military—the most professional and proficient military in history. The United States will need its military to protect U.S. security regardless of what happens in Iraq. We therefore considered how to limit the adverse consequences of the strain imposed on our military by the Iraq war.

U.S. military forces, especially our ground forces, have been stretched nearly to the breaking point by the repeated deployments in Iraq, with attendant casualties (almost 3,000 dead and more than 21,000 wounded), greater difficulty in recruiting, and accelerated wear on equipment.

Additionally, the defense budget as a whole is in danger of disarray, as supplemental funding winds down and reset costs become clear. It will be a major challenge to meet ongoing requirements for other current and future security threats that need to be accommodated together with spending for operations and maintenance, reset, personnel, and benefits for active duty and retired personnel. Restoring the capability of our military forces should be a high priority for the United States at this time.
The U.S. military has a long tradition of strong partnership between the civilian leadership of the Department of Defense and the uniformed services. Both have long benefited from a relationship in which the civilian leadership exercises control with the advantage of fully candid professional advice, and the military serves loyally with the understanding that its advice has been heard and valued. That tradition has frayed, and civil-military relations need to be repaired.

RECOMMENDATION 46: The new Secretary of Defense should make every effort to build healthy civil-military relations, by creating an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice not only to the civilian leadership in the Pentagon but also to the President and the National Security Council, as envisioned in the Goldwater-Nichols legislation.

RECOMMENDATION 47: As redeployment proceeds, the Pentagon leadership should emphasize training and education programs for the forces that have returned to the continental United States in order to “reset” the force and restore the U.S. military to a high level of readiness for global contingencies.

RECOMMENDATION 48: As equipment returns to the United States, Congress should appropriate sufficient funds to restore the equipment to full functionality over the next five years.

RECOMMENDATION 49: The administration, in full consultation with the relevant committees of Congress, should assess the full future budgetary impact of the war in Iraq and its potential impact on the future readiness of the force, the ability to recruit and retain high-quality personnel, needed investments in procurement and in research and development, and the budgets of other U.S. government agencies involved in the stability and reconstruction effort.

4. Police and Criminal Justice

The problems in the Iraqi police and criminal justice system are profound.

The ethos and training of Iraqi police forces must support the mission to "protect and serve" all Iraqis. Today, far too many Iraqi police do not embrace that mission, in part because of problems in how reforms were organized and implemented by the Iraqi and U.S. governments.

Recommended Iraqi Actions

Within Iraq, the failure of the police to restore order and prevent militia infiltration is due, in part, to the poor organization of Iraq’s component police forces: the Iraqi National Police, the Iraqi Border Police, and the Iraqi Police Service.
The Iraqi National Police pursue a mission that is more military than domestic in nature— involving commando-style operations—and is thus ill-suited to the Ministry of the Interior. The more natural home for the National Police is within the Ministry of Defense, which should be the authority for counterinsurgency operations and heavily armed forces. Though depriving the Ministry of the Interior of operational forces, this move will place the Iraqi National Police under better and more rigorous Iraqi and U.S. supervision and will enable these units to better perform their counterinsurgency mission.

RECOMMENDATION 50: The entire Iraqi National Police should be transferred to the Ministry of Defense, where the police commando units will become part of the new Iraqi Army.

Similarly, the Iraqi Border Police are charged with a role that bears little resemblance to ordinary policing, especially in light of the current flow of foreign fighters, insurgents, and weaponry across Iraq’s borders and the need for joint patrols of the border with foreign militaries. Thus the natural home for the Border Police is within the Ministry of Defense, which should be the authority for controlling Iraq’s borders.

RECOMMENDATION 51: The entire Iraqi Border Police should be transferred to the Ministry of Defense, which would have total responsibility for border control and external security.

The Iraqi Police Service, which operates in the provinces and provides local policing, needs to become a true police force. It needs legal authority, training, and equipment to control crime and protect Iraqi citizens. Accomplishing those goals will not be easy, and the presence of American advisors will be required to help the Iraqis determine a new role for the police.

RECOMMENDATION 52: The Iraqi Police Service should be given greater responsibility to conduct criminal investigations and should expand its cooperation with other elements in the Iraqi judicial system in order to better control crime and protect Iraqi civilians.

In order to more effectively administer the Iraqi Police Service, the Ministry of the Interior needs to undertake substantial reforms to purge bad elements and highlight best practices. Once the ministry begins to function effectively, it can exert a positive influence over the provinces and take back some of the authority that was lost to local governments through decentralization. To reduce corruption and militia infiltration, the Ministry of the Interior should take authority from the local governments for the handling of policing funds. Doing so will improve accountability and organizational discipline, limit the authority of provincial police officials, and identify police officers with the central government.

RECOMMENDATION 53: The Iraqi Ministry of the Interior should undergo a process of organizational transformation, including efforts to expand the capability and reach of the current major crime unit (or Criminal Investigation Division) and to exert more authority over local police forces. The sole authority to pay police salaries and disburse financial support to local police should be transferred to the Ministry of the Interior.
Finally, there is no alternative to bringing the Facilities Protection Service under the control of the Iraqi Ministry of the Interior. Simply disbanding these units is not an option, as the members will take their weapons and become full-time militiamen or insurgents. All should be brought under the authority of a reformed Ministry of the Interior. They will need to be vetted, retrained, and closely supervised. Those who are no longer part of the Facilities Protection Service need to participate in a disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration program (outlined above).

RECOMMENDATION 54: The Iraqi Ministry of the Interior should proceed with current efforts to identify, register, and control the Facilities Protection Service.

U.S. Actions

The Iraqi criminal justice system is weak, and the U.S. training mission has been hindered by a lack of clarity and capacity. It has not always been clear who is in charge of the police training mission, and the U.S. military lacks expertise in certain areas pertaining to police and the rule of law. The United States has been more successful in training the Iraqi Army than it has the police. The U.S. Department of Justice has the expertise and capacity to carry out the police training mission. The U.S. Department of Defense is already bearing too much of the burden in Iraq. Meanwhile, the pool of expertise in the United States on policing and the rule of law has been underutilized.

The United States should adjust its training mission in Iraq to match the recommended changes in the Iraqi government—the movement of the National and Border Police to the Ministry of Defense and the new emphasis on the Iraqi Police Service within the Ministry of the Interior. To reflect the reorganization, the Department of Defense would continue to train the Iraqi National and Border Police, and the Department of Justice would become responsible for training the Iraqi Police Service.

RECOMMENDATION 55: The U.S. Department of Defense should continue its mission to train the Iraqi National Police and the Iraqi Border Police, which should be placed within the Iraqi Ministry of Defense.

RECOMMENDATION 56: The U.S. Department of Justice should direct the training mission of the police forces remaining under the Ministry of the Interior.
RECOMMENDATION 57: Just as U.S. military training teams are imbedded within Iraqi Army units, the current practice of imbedding U.S. police trainers should be expanded and the numbers of civilian training officers increased so that teams can cover all levels of the Iraqi Police Service, including local police stations. These trainers should be obtained from among experienced civilian police executives and supervisors from around the world. These officers would replace the military police personnel currently assigned to training teams.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has provided personnel to train the Criminal Investigation Division in the Ministry of the Interior, which handles major crimes. The FBI has also fielded a large team within Iraq for counterterrorism activities.

Building on this experience, the training programs should be expanded and should include the development of forensic investigation training and facilities that could apply scientific and technical investigative methods to counterterrorism as well as to ordinary criminal activity.

RECOMMENDATION 58: The FBI should expand its investigative and forensic training and facilities within Iraq, to include coverage of terrorism as well as criminal activity.

One of the major deficiencies of the Iraqi Police Service is its lack of equipment, particularly in the area of communications and motor transport.

RECOMMENDATION 59: The Iraqi government should provide funds to expand and upgrade communications equipment and motor vehicles for the Iraqi Police Service.

The Department of Justice is also better suited than the Department of Defense to carry out the mission of reforming Iraq’s Ministry of the Interior and Iraq’s judicial system. Iraq needs more than training for cops on the beat; it needs courts, trained prosecutors and investigators, and the ability to protect Iraqi judicial officials.

RECOMMENDATION 60: The U.S. Department of Justice should lead the work of organizational transformation in the Ministry of the Interior. This approach must involve Iraqi officials, starting at senior levels and moving down, to create a strategic plan and work out standard administrative procedures, codes of conduct, and operational measures that Iraqis will accept and use. These plans must be drawn up in partnership.

RECOMMENDATION 61: Programs led by the U.S. Department of Justice to establish courts; to train judges, prosecutors, and investigators; and to create institutions and practices to fight corruption must be strongly supported and funded. New and refurbished courthouses with improved physical security, secure housing for judges and judicial staff, witness protection facilities, and a new Iraqi Marshals Service are essential parts of a secure and functioning system of justice.
5. The Oil Sector

Since the success of the oil sector is critical to the success of the Iraqi economy, the United States must do what it can to help Iraq maximize its capability.

Iraq, a country with promising oil potential, could restore oil production from existing fields to 3.0 to 3.5 million barrels a day over a three- to five-year period, depending on evolving conditions in key reservoirs. Even if Iraq were at peace tomorrow, oil production would decline unless current problems in the oil sector were addressed.

Short Term

RECOMMENDATION 62:

- As soon as possible, the U.S. government should provide technical assistance to the Iraqi government to prepare a draft oil law that defines the rights of regional and local governments and creates a fiscal and legal framework for investment. Legal clarity is essential to attract investment.

- The U.S. government should encourage the Iraqi government to accelerate contracting for the comprehensive well work-overs in the southern fields needed to increase production, but the United States should no longer fund such infrastructure projects.

- The U.S. military should work with the Iraqi military and with private security forces to protect oil infrastructure and contractors. Protective measures could include a program to improve pipeline security by paying local tribes solely on the basis of throughput (rather than fixed amounts).

- Metering should be implemented at both ends of the supply line. This step would immediately improve accountability in the oil sector.

- In conjunction with the International Monetary Fund, the U.S. government should press Iraq to continue reducing subsidies in the energy sector, instead of providing grant assistance. Until Iraqis pay market prices for oil products, drastic fuel shortages will remain.

Long Term

Expanding oil production in Iraq over the long term will require creating corporate structures, establishing management systems, and installing competent managers to plan and oversee an ambitious list of major oil-field investment projects.

To improve oil-sector performance, the Study Group puts forward the following recommendations:

RECOMMENDATION 63:
• The United States should encourage investment in Iraq’s oil sector by the international community and by international energy companies.

• The United States should assist Iraqi leaders to reorganize the national oil industry as a commercial enterprise, in order to enhance efficiency, transparency, and accountability.

• To combat corruption, the U.S. government should urge the Iraqi government to post all oil contracts, volumes, and prices on the Web so that Iraqis and outside observers can track exports and export revenues.

• The United States should support the World Bank’s efforts to ensure that best practices are used in contracting. This support involves providing Iraqi officials with contracting templates and training them in contracting, auditing, and reviewing audits.

• The United States should provide technical assistance to the Ministry of Oil for enhancing maintenance, improving the payments process, managing cash flows, contracting and auditing, and updating professional training programs for management and technical personnel.

6. U.S. Economic and Reconstruction Assistance

Building the capacity of the Iraqi government should be at the heart of U.S. reconstruction efforts, and capacity building demands additional U.S. resources.

Progress in providing essential government services is necessary to sustain any progress on the political or security front. The period of large U.S.-funded reconstruction projects is over, yet the Iraqi government is still in great need of technical assistance and advice to build the capacity of its institutions. The Iraqi government needs help with all aspects of its operations, including improved procedures, greater delegation of authority, and better internal controls. The strong emphasis on building capable central ministries must be accompanied by efforts to develop functioning, effective provincial government institutions with local citizen participation.

Job creation is also essential. There is no substitute for private-sector job generation, but the Commander’s Emergency Response Program is a necessary transitional mechanism until security and the economic climate improve. It provides immediate economic assistance for trash pickup, water, sewers, and electricity in conjunction with clear, hold, and build operations, and it should be funded generously. A total of $753 million was appropriated for this program in FY 2006.

RECOMMENDATION 64: U.S. economic assistance should be increased to a level of $5 billion per year rather than being permitted to decline. The President needs to ask for the necessary resources and must work hard to win the support of Congress. Capacity building and job creation, including reliance on the Commander’s Emergency Response Program, should be U.S. priorities. Economic assistance should be provided on a nonsectarian basis.
The New Diplomatic Offensive can help draw in more international partners to assist with the reconstruction mission. The United Nations, the World Bank, the European Union, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and some Arab League members need to become hands-on participants in Iraq’s reconstruction.

RECOMMENDATION 65: An essential part of reconstruction efforts in Iraq should be greater involvement by and with international partners, who should do more than just contribute money. They should also actively participate in the design and construction of projects.

The number of refugees and internally displaced persons within Iraq is increasing dramatically. If this situation is not addressed, Iraq and the region could be further destabilized, and the humanitarian suffering could be severe. Funding for international relief efforts is insufficient, and should be increased.

RECOMMENDATION 66: The United States should take the lead in funding assistance requests from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and other humanitarian agencies.

Coordination of Economic and Reconstruction Assistance

A lack of coordination by senior management in Washington still hampers U.S. contributions to Iraq’s reconstruction.

Focus, priority setting, and skillful implementation are in short supply. No single official is assigned responsibility or held accountable for the overall reconstruction effort. Representatives of key foreign partners involved in reconstruction have also spoken to us directly and specifically about the need for a point of contact that can coordinate their efforts with the U.S. government.

A failure to improve coordination will result in agencies continuing to follow conflicting strategies, wasting taxpayer dollars on duplicative and uncoordinated efforts. This waste will further undermine public confidence in U.S. policy in Iraq.

A Senior Advisor for Economic Reconstruction in Iraq is required. He or she should report to the President, be given a staff and funding, and chair a National Security Council interagency group consisting of senior principals at the undersecretary level from all relevant U.S. government departments and agencies. The Senior Advisor’s responsibility must be to bring unity of effort to the policy, budget, and implementation of economic reconstruction programs in Iraq. The Senior Advisor must act as the principal point of contact with U.S. partners in the overall reconstruction effort.

He or she must have close and constant interaction with senior U.S. officials and military commanders in Iraq, especially the Director of the Iraq Reconstruction and Management Office, so that the realities on the ground are brought directly and fully into the policy-making process. In order to maximize the effectiveness of assistance, all involved must be on the same page at all times.
RECOMMENDATION 67: The President should create a Senior Advisor for Economic Reconstruction in Iraq.

Improving the Effectiveness of Assistance Programs

Congress should work with the administration to improve its ability to implement assistance programs in Iraq quickly, flexibly, and effectively. As opportunities arise, the Chief of Mission in Iraq should have the authority to fund quick-disbursing projects to promote national reconciliation, as well as to rescind funding from programs and projects in which the government of Iraq is not demonstrating effective partnership. These are important tools to improve performance and accountability—as is the work of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

RECOMMENDATION 68: The Chief of Mission in Iraq should have the authority to spend significant funds through a program structured along the lines of the Commander’s Emergency Response Program, and should have the authority to rescind funding from programs and projects in which the government of Iraq is not demonstrating effective partnership.

RECOMMENDATION 69: The authority of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction should be renewed for the duration of assistance programs in Iraq.

U.S. security assistance programs in Iraq are slowed considerably by the differing requirements of State and Defense Department programs and of their respective congressional oversight committees. Since Iraqi forces must be trained and equipped, streamlining the provision of training and equipment to Iraq is critical. Security assistance should be delivered promptly, within weeks of a decision to provide it.

RECOMMENDATION 70: A more flexible security assistance program for Iraq, breaking down the barriers to effective interagency cooperation, should be authorized and implemented.

The United States also needs to break down barriers that discourage U.S. partnerships with international donors and Iraqi participants to promote reconstruction. The ability of the United States to form such partnerships will encourage greater international participation in Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 71: Authority to merge U.S. funds with those from international donors and Iraqi participants on behalf of assistance projects should be provided.

7. Budget Preparation, Presentation, and Review

The public interest is not well served by the government’s preparation, presentation, and review of the budget for the war in Iraq.
First, most of the costs of the war show up not in the normal budget request but in requests for emergency supplemental appropriations. This means that funding requests are drawn up outside the normal budget process, are not offset by budgetary reductions elsewhere, and move quickly to the White House with minimal scrutiny. Bypassing the normal review erodes budget discipline and accountability.

Second, the executive branch presents budget requests in a confusing manner, making it difficult for both the general public and members of Congress to understand the request or to differentiate it from counterterrorism operations around the world or operations in Afghanistan. Detailed analyses by budget experts are needed to answer what should be a simple question: "How much money is the President requesting for the war in Iraq?"

Finally, circumvention of the budget process by the executive branch erodes oversight and review by Congress. The authorizing committees (including the House and Senate Armed Services committees) spend the better part of a year reviewing the President’s annual budget request. When the President submits an emergency supplemental request, the authorizing committees are bypassed. The request goes directly to the appropriations committees, and they are pressured by the need to act quickly so that troops in the field do not run out of funds. The result is a spending bill that passes Congress with perfunctory review. Even worse, the must-pass appropriations bill becomes loaded with special spending projects that would not survive the normal review process.

RECOMMENDATION 72: Costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the President’s annual budget request, starting in FY 2008: the war is in its fourth year, and the normal budget process should not be circumvented. Funding requests for the war in Iraq should be presented clearly to Congress and the American people. Congress must carry out its constitutional responsibility to review budget requests for the war in Iraq carefully and to conduct oversight.

8. U.S. Personnel

The United States can take several steps to ensure that it has personnel with the right skills serving in Iraq.

All of our efforts in Iraq, military and civilian, are handicapped by Americans’ lack of language and cultural understanding. Our embassy of 1,000 has 33 Arabic speakers, just six of whom are at the level of fluency. In a conflict that demands effective and efficient communication with Iraqis, we are often at a disadvantage. There are still far too few Arab language-proficient military and civilian officers in Iraq, to the detriment of the U.S. mission.

Civilian agencies also have little experience with complex overseas interventions to restore and maintain order—stability operations—outside of the normal embassy setting. The nature of the mission in Iraq is unfamiliar and dangerous, and the United States has had great difficulty filling civilian assignments in Iraq with sufficient numbers of properly trained personnel at the appropriate rank.
RECOMMENDATION 73: The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Director of National Intelligence should accord the highest possible priority to professional language proficiency and cultural training, in general and specifically for U.S. officers and personnel about to be assigned to Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 74: In the short term, if not enough civilians volunteer to fill key positions in Iraq, civilian agencies must fill those positions with directed assignments. Steps should be taken to mitigate familial or financial hardships posed by directed assignments, including tax exclusions similar to those authorized for U.S. military personnel serving in Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 75: For the longer term, the United States government needs to improve how its constituent agencies—Defense, State, Agency for International Development, Treasury, Justice, the intelligence community, and others—respond to a complex stability operation like that represented by this decade’s Iraq and Afghanistan wars and the previous decade’s operations in the Balkans. They need to train for, and conduct, joint operations across agency boundaries, following the Goldwater-Nichols model that has proved so successful in the U.S. armed services.

RECOMMENDATION 76: The State Department should train personnel to carry out civilian tasks associated with a complex stability operation outside of the traditional embassy setting. It should establish a Foreign Service Reserve Corps with personnel and expertise to provide surge capacity for such an operation. Other key civilian agencies, including Treasury, Justice, and Agriculture, need to create similar technical assistance capabilities.

9. Intelligence

While the United States has been able to acquire good and sometimes superb tactical intelligence on al Qaeda in Iraq, our government still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias.

A senior commander told us that human intelligence in Iraq has improved from 10 percent to 30 percent. Clearly, U.S. intelligence agencies can and must do better. As mentioned above, an essential part of better intelligence must be improved language and cultural skills. As an intelligence analyst told us, “We rely too much on others to bring information to us, and too often don’t understand what is reported back because we do not understand the context of what we are told.”

The Defense Department and the intelligence community have not invested sufficient people and resources to understand the political and military threat to American men and women in the armed forces. Congress has appropriated almost $2 billion this year for countermeasures to protect our troops in Iraq against improvised explosive devices, but the administration has not put forward a request to invest comparable resources in trying to understand the people who fabricate, plant, and explode those devices.
We were told that there are fewer than 10 analysts on the job at the Defense Intelligence Agency who have more than two years’ experience in analyzing the insurgency. Capable analysts are rotated to new assignments, and on-the-job training begins anew. Agencies must have a better personnel system to keep analytic expertise focused on the insurgency. They are not doing enough to map the insurgency, dissect it, and understand it on a national and provincial level. The analytic community’s knowledge of the organization, leadership, financing, and operations of militias, as well as their relationship to government security forces, also falls far short of what policy makers need to know.

In addition, there is significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq. The standard for recording attacks acts as a filter to keep events out of reports and databases. A murder of an Iraqi is not necessarily counted as an attack. If we cannot determine the source of a sectarian attack, that assault does not make it into the database. A roadside bomb or a rocket or mortar attack that doesn’t hurt U.S. personnel doesn’t count. For example, on one day in July 2006 there were 93 attacks or significant acts of violence reported. Yet a careful review of the reports for that single day brought to light 1,100 acts of violence. Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes its discrepancy with policy goals.

RECOMMENDATION 77: The Director of National Intelligence and the Secretary of Defense should devote significantly greater analytic resources to the task of understanding the threats and sources of violence in Iraq.

RECOMMENDATION 78: The Director of National Intelligence and the Secretary of Defense should also institute immediate changes in the collection of data about violence and the sources of violence in Iraq to provide a more accurate picture of events on the ground.

Recommended Iraqi Actions

The Iraqi government must improve its intelligence capability, initially to work with the United States, and ultimately to take full responsibility for this intelligence function.

To facilitate enhanced Iraqi intelligence capabilities, the CIA should increase its personnel in Iraq to train Iraqi intelligence personnel. The CIA should also develop, with Iraqi officials, a counterterrorism intelligence center for the all-source fusion of information on the various sources of terrorism within Iraq. This center would analyze data concerning the individuals, organizations, networks, and support groups involved in terrorism within Iraq. It would also facilitate intelligence-led police and military actions against them.

RECOMMENDATION 79: The CIA should provide additional personnel in Iraq to develop and train an effective intelligence service and to build a counterterrorism intelligence center that will facilitate intelligence-led counterterrorism efforts.

Letter from the Sponsoring Organizations

The initiative for a bipartisan, independent, forward-looking "fresh-eyes" assessment of Iraq emerged from conversations U.S. House Appropriations Committee Member Frank Wolf had with us. In late 2005, Congressman Wolf asked the United States Institute of Peace, a bipartisan federal entity, to facilitate the assessment, in collaboration with the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University, the Center for the Study of the Presidency, and the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Interested members of Congress, in consultation with the sponsoring organizations and the administration, agreed that former Republican U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker, III and former Democratic Congressman Lee H. Hamilton had the breadth of knowledge of foreign affairs required to co-chair this bipartisan effort. The co-chairs subsequently selected the other members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, all senior individuals with distinguished records of public service. Democrats included former Secretary of Defense William J. Perry, former Governor and U.S. Senator Charles S. Robb, former Congressman and White House chief of staff Leon E. Panetta, and Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., advisor to President Bill Clinton. Republicans included former Associate Justice to the U.S. Supreme Court Sandra Day O'Connor, former U.S. Senator Alan K. Simpson, former Attorney General Edwin Meese III, and former Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger. Former CIA Director Robert Gates was an active member for a period of months until his nomination as Secretary of Defense.

The Iraq Study Group was launched on March 15, 2006, in a Capitol Hill meeting hosted by U.S. Senator John Warner and attended by congressional leaders from both sides of the aisle.

To support the Study Group, the sponsoring organizations created four expert working groups consisting of 44 leading foreign policy analysts and specialists on Iraq. The working groups, led by staff of the United States Institute of Peace, focused on the Strategic Environment, Military and Security Issues, Political Development, and the Economy and Reconstruction. Every effort was made to ensure the participation of experts across a wide span of the political spectrum. Additionally, a panel of retired military officers was consulted.

We are grateful to all those who have assisted the Study Group, especially the supporting experts and staff. Our thanks go to Daniel P. Serwer of the Institute of Peace, who served as executive director; Christopher Coe, advisor to the Study Group; John Williams, Policy Assistant to Mr. Baker; and Ben Rhodes, Special Assistant to Mr. Hamilton.

James A. Baker, III—Co-Chair

James A. Baker, III, has served in senior government positions under three United States presidents. He served as the nation’s 61st Secretary of State from January 1989 through August 1992 under President George H. W. Bush. During his tenure at the State Department, Mr. Baker traveled to 90 foreign countries as the United States confronted the unprecedented challenges and opportunities of the post–Cold War era. Mr. Baker’s reflections on those years of revolution, war, and peace—The Politics of Diplomacy—was published in 1995.

Mr. Baker served as the 67th Secretary of the Treasury from 1985 to 1988 under President Ronald Reagan. As Treasury Secretary, he was also Chairman of the President’s Economic Policy Council. From 1981 to 1985, he served as White House Chief of Staff to President Reagan. Mr. Baker’s record of public service began in 1975 as Under Secretary of Commerce to President Gerald Ford. It concluded with his service as White House Chief of Staff and Senior Counselor to President Bush from August 1992 to January 1993.

Long active in American presidential politics, Mr. Baker led presidential campaigns for Presidents Ford, Reagan, and Bush over the course of five consecutive presidential elections from 1976 to 1992.

A native Houstonian, Mr. Baker graduated from Princeton University in 1952. After two years of active duty as a lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps, he entered the University of Texas School of Law at Austin. He received his J.D. with honors in 1957 and practiced law with the Houston firm of Andrews and Kurth from 1957 to 1975.

Mr. Baker’s memoir—Work Hard, Study . . . and Keep Out of Politics! Adventures and Lessons from an Unexpected Public Life—was published in October 2006.

Mr. Baker received the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1991 and has been the recipient of many other awards for distinguished public service, including Princeton University’s Woodrow Wilson Award, the American Institute for Public Service’s Jefferson Award, Harvard University’s John F. Kennedy School of Government Award, the Hans J. Morgenthau Award, the George F. Kennan Award, the Department of the Treasury’s Alexander Hamilton Award, the Department of State’s Distinguished Service Award, and numerous honorary academic degrees.

Mr. Baker is presently a senior partner in the law firm of Baker Botts. He is Honorary Chairman of the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University and serves on the board of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute. From 1997 to 2004, Mr. Baker served as the Personal Envoy of United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan to seek a political solution to the conflict over Western Sahara. In 2003, Mr. Baker was appointed Special Presidential Envoy for President George W. Bush on the issue of Iraqi debt. In 2005, he was co-chair, with former President Jimmy Carter, of the Commission on Federal Election Reform. Since March 2006, Mr. Baker and former U.S. Congressman Lee H. Hamilton have served as the co-chairs of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan blue-ribbon panel on Iraq.

Alan K. Simpson—Member

Alan K. Simpson served from 1979 to 1997 as a United States Senator from Wyoming. Following his first term in the Senate, Al was elected by his peers to the position of the Assistant Majority Leader in 1984—and served in that capacity until 1994. He completed his final term on January 3, 1997.

His book published by William Morrow Company, Right in the Old Gazoo: A Lifetime of Scraping with the Press (1997), chronicles his personal experiences and views of the Fourth Estate.

During the fall of 2000 he returned to his alma mater, the University of Wyoming, as a Visiting Lecturer in the Political Science Department and he continues to team teach a class part-time with his brother, Peter, titled “Wyoming’s Political Identity: Its History and Its Politics,” which is proving to be one of the most popular classes offered at UW.

A member of a political family—his father served both as Governor of Wyoming from 1954 to 1958 and as United States Senator from Wyoming from 1962 to 1966—Al chose to follow in his father’s footsteps and began his own political career in 1964 when he was elected to the Wyoming State Legislature as a state representative of his native Park County. Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:

Question Submitted by Senator Carl Levin

Phased redeployment

1. Senator Levin, Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, for some time I, along with Senator Jack Reed, have urged President Bush to tell Iraqi political leaders that the United States will begin a phased redeployment of American forces within the next 4 to 6 months so as to induce those leaders to make the political compromises that are required for the political settlement, which in turn is essential for ending the insurgency and the sectarian violence now plaguing Iraq. Our proposal recognized that a residual force would be needed for some period of time dedicated to training Iraqi security forces, conducting targeted counterterrorism missions, and providing logistical support and force protection.

The Iraq Study Group recommends that “by the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq.”

Do you believe that our proposal is consistent with the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group?

Mr. BAKER. The Iraq Study Group does not address the question of a phased redeployment. It opposes a precipitate withdrawal of troops. The Iraq Study Group argues that the primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq should evolve to one of supporting the Iraqi army, which would take over the primary responsibility for combat operations. While these efforts are building up and as additional Iraqi brigades are being deployed, U.S. combat troops could begin to move out of Iraq, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground. It argues that the United States will maintain a significant force in Iraq in order to provide political reassurance to the Iraqi government; fight al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations in Iraq; train, equip, and support Iraqi security forces; and deter destructive interference in Iraq by Syria and Iran.

Mr. HAMILTON. The Iraq Study Group report does not address the question of a phased redeployment of U.S. forces. It recommended no timetable or deadline for troop withdrawals, which are left to the commander in chief.

At the same time, there are common elements in the proposal put forward by Senators Levin and Reed and the proposal by the Iraq Study Group. They are not inconsistent. They offer a basis for a responsible transition.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY JAMES M. INHOFE

DRAWDOWN ASYMMETRY BETWEEN GROUND AND AIR FORCES

2. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, there is much discussion in your report about how and when to redeploy our ground forces, which is obviously of extreme importance, but nowhere have I seen detailed discussion on the disengagement of our air forces.

I recognize that Iraqi air forces will not be able to assume responsibilities for air missions in the near future, but I am troubled by the lack of analysis on the implications of a long-term air presence in Iraq.

When we redeployed ground forces in 1991 after Operation Desert Storm, our Air Force remained deployed in the region and has maintained a constant air presence there for the last 15 years.

Many assume our air presence after the eventual redeployment of ground forces will be similar to the years after Operation Desert Storm. While there are similarities, we need to ensure we understand the differences.

The no-fly zones were part of an international standoff between the U.N. and Saddam Hussein. They were flown in support of a U.N. resolution and had international legitimacy. The objectives were achievable through air power alone.

Today we are dealing with an Iraqi government that wants to be seen as independent of U.S. influence, and we will need its permission to employ air power in pursuit of counterinsurgency objectives or we will undermine the government of Iraq’s legitimacy in the eyes of Iraqis and hence our long-term goals.

The situation in Iraq today is an insurgency. The ability to achieve counterinsurgency objectives by air power alone is limited and would require close coordination with ground forces. Once coalition ground forces redeploy, we are also left with serious dilemmas regarding the rules of engagement for employing air power.

Specifically, are we going to allow Iraqi forces access to joint fires (air power employing ordinance) only if they have a U.S./coalition joint tactical air controller as part of their advisory team?

Mr. BAKER. This was not an issue that the Iraq Study Group addressed in great detail. However, on page 72, the report states: Even after the United States has moved all combat brigades out if Iraq, we would maintain a considerable military presence in Iraq and with our powerful air, ground, and naval deployments in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Qatar, as well as increased presence in Afghanistan.
Mr. HAMILTON. The Iraq Study Group did not address your question in any detail. Given that air power is a critical part of the support mission for U.S. forces in Iraq, the Iraq Study Group would support a continuing, robust presence for U.S. air power in Iraq and the region.

3. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, if yes, then unless we leave hundreds of these advisory teams for the duration of our air presence, we will leave significant sanctuaries for insurgents to hide.
If we employ air power under the control of an Iraqi controller, or independently of any controller at all, the effects would be too indiscriminate, especially in urban areas where the air power would be most needed.
We also need to consider basing. No-fly zone operations were flown from bases outside of Iraq. If we keep bases inside Iraq, there will be significant force protection issues.
If we attempt to utilize bases outside Iraq, then we must contend with ramp space, fuel shortages, and facilities that are already overloaded. Furthermore, we must consider the national caveats placed on our air forces regarding the types of missions we could fly from the remaining bases.
If we move these assets outside of Iraq, then we will pay a higher bill in flight hours, tankers, and maintenance to get the assets to the fight.
What consideration did your panel give to the disengagement of air forces, and what recommendations do you have for dealing with the drawdown asymmetry between ground and air forces?
Mr. BAKER. This was not an issue that the Iraq Study Group studied in great detail. We would leave such decisions to U.S. military leaders, depending on the situation on the ground.
Mr. HAMILTON. We did not address the question of air power in detail.
We would defer to others on the nature of the air assets that should remain, and where they should be based, consistent with the principle outlined in the Iraq Study Group report that training should become the primary mission of U.S. forces in Iraq.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN THUNE

POLICE AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE

4. Senator THUNE. Mr. Hamilton, on page 78 of the report under Police and Criminal Justice the Iraq Study Group wrote: “The problems in the Iraqi police and criminal justice system are profound. The ethos and training of Iraqi police forces must support the mission to protect and serve all Iraqis. Today, far too many Iraqi police do not embrace that mission.” In recommendation 50 you state that “the entire Iraqi National Police should be transferred to the Ministry of Defense, where the police commando units will become part of the new Iraqi Army.”
Do you believe that the current organization of the police is responsible for their failure to effectively combat the insurgency and how will placing them in the Ministry of Defense affect the long-term mission of the police which is not primarily a military one but a domestic one?
Mr. HAMILTON. The reason for recommendation 50 is that the Iraqi National Police is comprised of heavily armed units engaged in commando-style operations. That mission fits better under the Ministry of Defense.
Moreover, U.S. advisers have greater access in the Ministry of Defense than they do in the Ministry of the Interior. Units under the command of the Ministry of Defense perform better than those under the Ministry of Interior.
It is our belief that a reorganization of this kind can be helpful as part of the comprehensive reforms necessary to create professional, well-trained, non-sectarian Iraqi security forces.
The Ministry of the Interior will still have responsibility for traditional policing activities, which are carried out by the Iraqi Police Service, and the Iraq Study Group outlined several recommendations for reform of that Ministry.

RECONCILIATION

5. Senator THUNE. Mr. Hamilton, in other areas of the report the group emphasizes the importance for Iraq to follow through with the reconciliation program. The reconciliation between Sunni and Shia is, I believe, at the heart of stabilizing Iraq. Further, I believe it is also the driving factor which is keeping the police from being more effective against sectarian militias and the insurgency as a whole. For some time I have been concerned with the development of the Iraqi police force. While there have been some successes such as increased visibility on the streets and some signs of increased respect among the people, my concerns lie with the loyalty and quality of the police. In your consultations with Iraqi officials, what steps did you find they were taking to break a recruit’s ties to a militia or tribal loyalties?

Mr. Hamilton. It is our understanding that the Minister of the Interior is taking important steps to identify and begin removing members of the police force with criminal records.

It is unclear what specific actions the Minister of the Interior is taking against police force members who have ties to militias, unless they also have criminal records.

AL QAEDA

6. Senator Thune. Mr. Baker, the role of al Qaeda in Iraq is nefarious and single-minded. Their goal is to destabilize the rebuilding process and create a failed state which would serve as a breeding ground for recruitment of young men to their extremist ideology. No one in the international community, especially in the Middle East, benefits from Iraq as a failed state. While conducting your research what did you discover about how the Iraqi people view al Qaeda in Iraq?

Mr. Baker. Al Qaeda is responsible for a small portion of the violence in Iraq, but that includes some of the more spectacular acts: suicide attacks, large truck bombs, and attacks on significant religious targets. Al Qaeda in Iraq is now largely Iraq-run and composed of Sunni Arabs. Al Qaeda is a fact of life. As one Iraqi told us, “Al Qaeda is now a franchise in Iraq, like McDonalds."

7. Senator Thune. Mr. Baker, do they see them as an outside force impeding progress?

Mr. Baker. The response of Iraqis to al Qaeda varies. Some, like the tribal leaders in al Anbar province, are actively working against al Qaeda efforts. On the other hand, some Sunni leaders view branches of al Qaeda as resistance rather than terrorism.

8. Senator Thune. Mr. Baker, what has been the reaction of other states in the Middle East to al Qaeda in Iraq’s effort to derail the rebuilding process by fomenting conflict between the Sunni and Shia populations?

Mr. Baker. The countries neighboring Iraq are concerned about the type of sectarian violence that has erupted between Sunni and Shiites spreading to their populations. Many fear Shia insurrections—perhaps fomented by Iran—in Sunni-run states. Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora’s box of problems—including the radicalization of populations, mass movement of populations, and regime changes—that might take decades to play out.

ROLE OF SAUDI ARABIA AND JORDAN

9. Senator Thune. Mr. Baker, what role are Saudi Arabia and Jordan playing to engage the Sunnis in Iraq to convince them to dialogue with the Shiias in Iraq?

Mr. Baker. Saudi Arabia and Jordan should be a participant in regional and international diplomatic efforts to help bring about peace and stability in Iraq. Both countries can assist the national reconciliation process in Iraq with a focus on getting the Sunnis to participate. The Saudis, especially, could use their Islamic credentials to help reconcile differences between Iraqi factions and build broader support in the Islamic world for national reconciliation.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR DANIEL K. AKAKA

STABILITY IN IRAQ

10. Senator Akaka. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, the report states, “The situation in Baghdad and several provinces is dire. . . . U.S. military and civilian personnel, and our coalition partners, are making exceptional and dedicated efforts—and sacrifices—to help Iraq. Many Iraqis have also made extraordinary efforts and sacrifices for a better future. However, the ability of the United States to influence events within Iraq is diminishing.” Should President Bush elect not to implement the recommendations of the report, is it your belief that the stability in Iraq would continue to deteriorate?

Mr. Baker. The President has implemented some of the essential elements of the report, including the decision to make the training of Iraqi troops the essential or primary mission of U.S. troops. He has decided not to implement others, for the time being. As we frequently state, there is no silver bullet for Iraq. It is possible that even if the President implemented all of the Iraq Study Group’s recommendations, the situation would continue to deteriorate. However, the Iraq Study Group believes that its recommendations, taken together, represent the best chance for success in Iraq.

Mr. HAMILTON. The President has decided to implement some elements of the Iraq Study Group’s recommendations, and not others.

As we said at the outset of the report, the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating. There is no path that can guarantee success, but the prospects can be improved.

Mr. HAMILTON. We do not know when time will run out, but we do know that the situation is deteriorating.

Therefore, we believe the need for action in Iraq is urgent.

12. Senator AKAKA. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, the report recommends that the "United States, working with the Iraqi government, should launch the comprehensive new diplomatic offensive to deal with the problems of Iraq and the region. This new diplomatic offensive should be launched before December 31, 2006."

However, this offensive requires not only for the United States to work with the Iraqi government, but also neighboring countries, including Iran and Syria, that have a critical stake in the stability of Iraq, to assist the Iraqi government in promoting national reconciliation in Iraq.

How important is the inclusion of countries such as Iran and Syria in this new offensive, given the Bush administration’s strained relations with them?

Mr. BAKER. Both Iran and Syria can and do play major roles in developments in Iraq. The Iraqi borders with these two countries are porous. They allow destabilizing elements into Iraq such as arms and foreign fighters. It is possible that Iran may reject offers to take part in a new diplomatic offensive. However, the United States should offer Iran that opportunity. If Iran declines, the world will view its rejectionist attitude towards Iraq. Syria is more likely to take part in such discussions, though it will take tough diplomacy by the United States. With both Iran and Syria, the United States should use incentives and disincentives. Neither of those countries wants a chaotic Iraq, in our view.

Mr. HAMILTON. The inclusion of Iran and Syria is critical to the success of diplomatic efforts to support peace and stability in Iraq. Iran and Syria border Iraq. They have influence in Iraq. They can contribute in important ways to stability or instability in Iraq. Their exclusion from regional diplomacy will undermine the success of diplomatic efforts.

AFGHANISTAN

13. Senator AKAKA. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, while the group’s main concern was addressing the situation in Iraq, as stated in its report, there are other areas of concern that must also not be overlooked, in particular the situation in Afghanistan and the renewed threat posed by the Taliban. If Iraq continues to require greater U.S. military involvement, do you believe that the situation in Afghanistan would deteriorate?

Mr. BAKER. We must not lose sight of the importance of the situation inside of Afghanistan and the renewed threat posed by the Taliban. As the United States develops an approach towards Iraq and the Middle East, it must give priority to the situation in Afghanistan.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is critical for the United States to provide additional political, economic and military support for Afghanistan, including resources that might become available as combat forces are moved from Iraq.

Mr. HAMILTON. The inclusion of Iran and Syria is critical to the success of diplomatic efforts to support peace and stability in Iraq. Iran and Syria border Iraq. They have influence in Iraq. They can contribute in important ways to stability or instability in Iraq. Their exclusion from regional diplomacy will undermine the success of diplomatic efforts.

AFGHANISTAN

14. Senator AKAKA. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, the report recommends that “If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military, or economic support for the Iraqi government.”
Am I correct to assume that it is the group's understanding that without incentives for the Iraqi government to stand up and make substantial progress toward national reconciliation, security, and governance, that stability of Iraq is in jeopardy?

Mr. BAKER. Incentives are one tool that the United States should employ in order to encourage the Iraqi government to make the changes required to improve national reconciliation, security, and governance.

Mr. HAMILTON. The violence in Iraq will not end without national reconciliation. Unfavorable trends in Iraq are likely to continue unless the Iraqi government makes substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation and governance. The United States must pressure the Iraqi government to act. Making assistance conditional on Iraqi performance is a way to apply that pressure.

15. Senator AKAKA. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, the report recommends that the Iraqi National Police and Border Police should be transferred to the Ministry of Defense, and the Iraqi Police Service should become a true police force. However, the group also states that U.S. authorities do not know with precision the composition and membership of the various police forces, nor the disposition of their funds and equipment. There are ample reports of Iraqi police officers participating in training in order to obtain a weapon, uniform, and ammunition for use in sectarian violence. What mechanisms should be in place to ensure that participants do not use their knowledge and position to further advance sectarian violence?

Mr. BAKER and Mr. HAMILTON. The Ministry of the Interior needs to undertake substantial reforms to purge bad elements and highlight best practices. The Ministry of the Interior needs to gain control of policing funds. Doing so will improve accountability and organizational discipline.

All officers need to be vetted, retrained, and closely supervised. The presence of U.S. and international expert advisers is crucial to the success of reform efforts. Those who are no longer part of the police force need to participate in a disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration program.

16. Senator AKAKA. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, it is my understanding that various countries, including Iran, are already discussing current relations with the Iraqi government. What role should the United States play as the discussions are ongoing?

Mr. BAKER and Mr. HAMILTON. The United States should be a participant in regional and international diplomatic efforts to help bring about peace and stability in Iraq.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

OIL TRUST

17. Senator CLINTON. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, you recommend that Iraq's oil revenue should accrue to the Federal Government and be shared on the basis of population instead of on the basis of geographic regions. For several years, I have advocated an oil trust plan for Iraq, based on the Alaskan Permanent Fund, which would take the profits from Iraq's oil sector, invest it, and distribute the dividends to every Iraqi so that all of Iraq has an incentive to keep their oil flowing and at the same time, help the economy grow and keep regular Iraqis from joining the insurgency by putting more money in their pockets.

Instead, oil distribution remains unsettled. Guaranteeing every Iraqi a share of the oil revenues at the individual level is one way to try to begin to move beyond the impasse—and to give Iraqis some reason to believe we aren't there for oil; we aren't there to support big oil; and to give the Iraqis also some reason to feel positive about their national government. How do you think such a plan would be received?

Mr. BAKER. There is some merit to the plan that you propose. However, it would be difficult to do because the Iraqi government does not have a banking system to distribute the revenues.

Mr. HAMILTON. The Iraq Study Group examined such plans with great interest. The Iraq Study Group agrees that such a plan has the potential to give all Iraqi citizens a stake in the nation's chief natural resource.

However, there is no institution in Iraq at present that could properly implement such a distribution system for oil revenues. It would take substantial time to establish, and would have to be based on a well-developed state census and income tax system, which Iraq currently lacks.
In addition, oil revenues have been incorporated into state budget projections for the next several years. If oil revenues are removed from the state budget and distributed to the general population, alternative sources of revenues would need to be identified.

18. Senator CLINTON, Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, do you believe that such a plan would help national reconciliation?
   Mr. BAKER. Yes, if the plan were accepted by all factions of the Iraqi government.
   Mr. HAMILTON. Yes. Such a plan, if implemented efficiently and effectively, could help national reconciliation.
   Alternative sources of revenues for the Iraqi state budget would also need to be identified.

   [Whereupon, at 11:11 a.m., the committee adjourned.]
